MADONNA MARY.

By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," &c.

PART I.

CHAPTER I.

MAJOR OCHTERLONY had been very fidgety after the coming in of the mail. He was always so, as all his friends were aware, and nobody so much as Mary, his wife, who was herself, on ordinary occasions, of an admirable composure. But the arrival of the mail, which is so welcome an event at an Indian station, and which generally affected the Major very mildly, had produced a singular impression upon him on this special occasion. He was not a man who possessed a large correspondence in his own person; he had reached middle life, and had nobody particular belonging to him, except his wife and his little children, who were as yet too young to have been sent "home;" and consequently there was nobody to receive letters from, except a few married brothers and sisters, who don't count, as everybody knows. That kind of formally affectionate correspondence is not generally exciting, and even Major Ochterlony supported it with composure. But as for the mail which arrived on the 15th of April, 1838, its effect was different. He went out and in so often, that Mary got very little good of her letters, which were from her young sister and her old aunt, and were naturally overflowing with all kinds of pleasant gossip and domestic information. The present writer has so imperfect an idea of what an Indian bungalow is like, that it would be impossible for her to convey a clear idea to the reader, who probably knows much better about it. But yet it was in an Indian bungalow that Mrs. Ochterlony was seated—in the dim hot atmosphere, out of which the | it down in her open work-basket. Her anxiety was sun was carefully excluded, but in which, nevertheless, the inmates simmered softly with the patience of people who cannot help it, and who are used to their martyrdom. She sat still, and did her best to make out the pleasant babble in the letters, which seemed to take sound to itself as she read, and to break into a sweet confusion of kind voices, and rustling leaves, and running water, such as, she knew, had filled the little rustic drawingroom in which the letters were written. The sister was very young, and the aunt was old, and all the experience of the world possessed by the two together, might have gone into Mary's thimble, which she kept playing with upon her finger as she read. But though she knew twenty times better than they did, the soft old lady's gentle counsel, and the audacious girl's advice and censure, were sweet to Mary, who smiled many a time at their simplicity, and yet took the good of it in a way that was peculiar to her. She read, and she smiled in her reading, and felt the fresh English air blow about her, and the leaves rustling-if it had not been for the Major, who went and came like a ghost, and let everything fall that he touched, and hunted every innocent beetle or lizard that had come in to see how things were going on; for he was one of those men who have a great, almost womanish objection to reptiles and insects, which is a sentiment much misplaced in India. geted so much, indeed, as to disturb even his wife's accustomed nerves at last.

"Is there anything wrong-has anything happened?" she asked, folding up a letter, and laying not profound, for she was accustomed to the Major's "ways," but still she saw it was necessary for his comfort to utter what was on his mind.

"When you have read your letters I want to speak to you," he said. "What do your people mean by sending you such heaps of letters? I thought you would never be done. Well, Mary, this is what it is—there's nothing wrong with the children, or anybody belonging to us, thank God; but it's very nearly as bad, and I am at my wits' end. Old Sommerville's dead."

"Old Sommerville!" said Mrs. Ochterlony. This time she was utterly perplexed and at a loss. She could read easily enough the anxiety which filled her husband's handsome, restless face; but, then, so small a matter put him out of his ordinary! And she could not for her life remember who old Sommerville was.

"I daresay you don't recollect him," said the Major, in an aggrieved tone. "It is very odd how everything has gone wrong with us since that false, start. It is an awful shame, when a set of old fogies put young people in such a position—all for nothing, too," Major Ochterlony added: "for after we were actually married, everybody came round. It is an awful shame!"

"If I was a suspicious woman," said Mary, with a smile, "I should think it was our marriage that you called a false start and an awful shame."

"And so it is, my love; so it is," said the innocent soldier, his face growing more and more cloudy. As for his wife being a suspicious woman, or the possible existence of any delicacy on her part about his words, the Major knew better than that. The truth was that he might have given utterance to sentiments of the most atrocious description on that point, sentiments which would have broken the heart and blighted the existence, so to speak, of any sensitive young woman, without producing the slightest effect upon Mary, or upon himself, to whom Mary was so utterly and absolutely necessary, that the idea of existing without her never once entered into his restless but honest brain. "That is just what it is," he said; "it is a horrid business for me, and I don't know what to do about it. They must have been out of their senses to drive us to marry as we did; and we were a couple of awful fools," said the Major, with the gravest and most care-worn countenance. Mrs. Ochterlony was still a young woman, handsome and admired, and she might very well have taken offence at such words; but, oddly enough, there was something in his gravely-disturbed face and pathetic tone which touched another chord in Mary's breast. laughed, which was unkind, considering all the circumstances, and took up her work, and fixed a pair of smiling eyes upon her perplexed husband's face.

"I daresay it is not so bad as you think," she said, with the manner of a woman who was used to that kind of thing. "Come, and tell me all about it." She drew her chair a trifle nearer his, and looked at him with a face in which a touch of suppressed amusement was visible, under a good deal of gravity and sympathy. She was used to lend a sympathetic ear to all his difficulties, and to give all her efforts to their elucidation, but still she could not help feeling it somewhat droll to be complained to in this strain about her own marriage. "We were a couple of fools," she said with a little laugh, "but it has not turned out so badly as it might have done." Upon which rash statement the Major shook his head.

"Yes, I know," said Mrs. Ochterlony, still struggling with a perverse inclination to laugh; "but now tell me what old Sommerville has to do with it; and who old Sommerville is; and what put it into his head just at this moment to die."

The Major sighed, and gave her a half-irritated, half-melancholy look. To think she should laugh, when, as he said to himself, the gulf was yawning under her very feet. "My dear Mary," he said, "I wish you would learn that this is not anything to laugh at. Old Sommerville was the old gardener at Earlston, who went with us, you recollect, when we went to—to Scotland. My brother would never have him back again, and he went among his own friends. He was a stupid old fellow. I don't know what he was good for, for my part;—but," said Major Ochterlony, with solemnity, "he was the only surviving witness of our unfortunate marriage—that is the only thing that made him interesting to me."

"Poor old man!" said Mary, "I am very sorry. I had forgotten his name; but really,—if you speak like this of our unfortunate marriage, you will hurt my feelings," Mrs. Ochterlony added. She had cast down her eyes on her work, but still there was a gleam of fun out of one of the corners. This was all the effect made upon her mind by words which would have naturally produced a scene between half the married people in the world.

As for the Major, he sighed: he was in a sighing mood, and at such moments his wife's obtusity and thoughtlessness always made him sad. "It is easy talking," he said, "and if it were not on your account, Mary - The fact is that everything has gone wrong that had any connection with it. blacksmith's house, you know, was burned down, and his kind of a register-if it was any good, and I am sure I don't know if it was any good-and then that woman died, though she was as young as you are, and as healthy, and nobody had any right to expect that she would die," Major Ochterlony added with an injured tone, "and now old Sommerville; and we have nothing in the world to vouch for its being a good marriage, except what that blacksmith fellow called the 'lines.' Of course you have taken care of the lines," said the Major, with a little start. It was the first time that this new subject of doubt had occurred to his mind.

"To vouch for its being a good marriage!" said Mrs. Ochterlony: "really, Hugh, you go too far. Our marriage is not a thing to make jokes about, you know-nor to get up alarms about either. Everybody knows all about it, both among your people and mine. It is very vexatious and disagreeable of you to talk so." As she spoke the colour rose to Mary's matron cheek. learned to make great allowances for her husband's anxious temper and perpetual panies; but this suggestion was too much for her patience just at the moment. She calmed down, however, almost immediately, and came to herself with a smile. "To think you should almost have made me angry!" she said, taking up her work again. This did not mean to imply that to make Mrs. Ochterlony angry was at all an impossible process. She had her gleams of wrath like other people, and sometimes it was not at all difficult to call them forth; but, so far as the Major's "temperament" was concerned, she had got by much exercise to be the most indulgent of women-perhaps by finding that no other way of meeting it was of any use.

"It is not my fault, my love," said the Major, with a meekness which was not habitual to him. "But I hope you are quite sure you have the lines. Any mistake about them would be fatal. They are the only proof that remains to us. I wish you would go and find them, Mary, and let me make sure."

"The lines!" said Mrs. Ochterlony, and, not-withstanding her self-command, she faltered a little. "Of course I must have them somewhere—I don't quite recollect at this moment. What do you want them for, Hugh? Are we coming into a fortune, or what are the statistics good for? When I can lay my hand upon them I will give them to you," she answered, with that culpable carelessness which her husband had already so often remarked in her. If it had been a trumpery picture or book that had been mislaid, she could not have been less concerned.

"When you can lay your hands upon them!" cried the exasperated man. "Are you out of your senses, Mary? Don't you know that they are your sheet-anchor, your charter—the only document you have——"

"Hugh," said Mrs. Ochterlony, "tell me what this means. There must be something in it more than I can see. What need have I for documents? What does it matter to us this old man being dead, more than it matters to any one the death of somebody who has been at their wedding? It is sad, but I don't see how it can be a personal misfortune. If you really mean anything, tell me what it is."

The Major for his part grew angry, as was not unnatural. "If you choose to give me the attention you ought to give to your husband when he speaks seriously to you, you will soon perceive what I mean," he said; and then he repented, and came up to her and kissed her. "My poor Mary, my bonnie Mary," he said. "If that wretched irregular marriage of ours should bring harm to you! It is you only I am thinking of, my darling—that you should have something to rest upon;" and his feelings were so genuine that with that the water stood in his eyes.

As for Mrs. Ochterlony, she was very near losing patience altogether; but she made an effort and restrained herself. It was not the first time that she had heard compunctions expressed for the irregular marriage, which certainly was not her fault. But this time she was undeniably a little alarmed, for the Major's gravity was extreme. "Our marriage is no more irregular than it always was," she said. "I wish you would give up this subject, Hugh; I have you to rest upon, and everything that a woman can have. We never did anything in a corner," she continued, with a little vehemence. "Our marriage was just as well known, and well published, as if it had been in St. George's, Hanover Square. I cannot imagine what you are aiming at. And besides, it is done, and we cannot mend it," she added abruptly. On the whole, the runaway match had been a pleasant frolic enough; there was no earthly reason, except some people's stupid notions, why they should not have been married; and everybody came to rapidly, and very little harm had come of it. But the least idea of doubt on such a subject is an offence to a woman, and her colour rose and her breath came quick, without any will of hers. As for the Major, he abandoned the broader general question and went back to the detail, as was natural to the man.

"If you only have the lines all safe," he said, "if you would but make sure of it. I confess old Sommerville's death was a great shock to me, Mary,—the last surviving witness; but Kirkman tells me the marriage lines in Scotland are a woman's safeguard, and Kirkman is a Scotchman and ought to know."

"Have you been consulting him?" said Mary, with a certain despair; "have you been talking of such a subject to——"

"I don't know where I could have a better confidant," said the Major. "Mary, my darling, they are both attached to you—and they are good people, though they talk; and then he is Scotch, and understands. If anything were to happen to me, and you had any difficulty in proving—"

"Hugh, for Heaven's sake, have done with this. I cannot put up with any more," cried Mrs. Ochterlony, who was at the end of her powers.

It was time for the great coup for which his restless soul had been preparing. He approached the moment of fate with a certain skill, such as weak people occasionally display, and mad people almost always,—as if the feeble intellect had a certain right by reason of its weakness to the same kind of defence which is possessed by the mind diseased. "Hush, Mary, you are excited," he said, "and it is only you I am thinking of. If anything should happen to me—I am quite well, but no man can answer for his own life:—my dear, I am afraid you will be vexed with what I am going to say—But for my own satisfaction—for my peace of mind—if we were to go through the ceremony again——"

Mary Ochterlony rose up with sudden passion. It was altogether out of proportion to her husband's intentions or errors, and perhaps to the occasion. That was but a vexatious complication of ordinary life; and he a fidgety, uneasy, perhaps over-conscientious, well-meaning man. She rose, tragic without knowing it, with a swell in her heart of the unutterable and supreme-feeling herself for the moment an outraged wife, an insulted woman, and a mother wounded to the heart. "I will hear no more." she said, with lips that had suddenly grown parched and dry. "Don't say another word. If it has come to this, I will take my chance with my boys. Hugh, no more, no more." As she lifted her hands with an impatient gesture of horror, and towered over him as he sat by, having thus interrupted and cut short his speech, a certain fear went through Major Ochterlony's mind. Could her mind be going? Had the shock been too much for her? He could not understand otherwise how the suggestion which he thought a wise one, and of advantage to his own peace of mind, should have stung her into such an incomprehensible passion. But he was afraid and silenced, and could not go on.

"My dear Mary," he said mildly, "I had no intention of vexing you. We can speak of this another time. Sit down, and I'll get you a glass of water," he added, with anxious affection; and hurried off to seek it: for he was a good husband, and very fond of his wife, and was terrified to see her turn suddenly pale and faint, notwithstanding that he was quite capable of wounding her in the most exquisite and delicate point. But then he did not mean it. He was a matter-of-fact man, and the idea of marrying his wife over again in case there might be any doubtfulness about the first marriage, seemed to him only a rational suggestion, which no sensible woman ought to be disturbed by; though no doubt it was aunoying to be compelled to have recourse to such an expedient. So he went and fetched her the water, and gave up the subject, and stayed with her all the afternoon and read the papers to her, and made himself agreeable. It was a puzzling sort of demonstration on Mary's part, but that did not make her the less Mary, and the dearest and best of earthly creatures. Major Ochterlony put his proposal aside for a more favourable moment, and did all he could to make his wife forget it, and behaved himself as a mau naturally would behave who was recognised as the best husband and most domestic man in the regiment. Mary took her seat again and her work, and the afternoon went on as if nothing had happened. They were a most united couple, and very happy together, as everybody knew; or if one of them at any chance moment was perhaps less than perfectly blessed, it was not, at any rate, because the love-match, irregular as it might be, had ended in any lack of love.

CHAPTER II.

MRS. OCHTERLONY sat and worked and listened, and her husband read the papers to her, picking out by instinct all those little bits of news that are grateful to people who are far away from their own country. And he went through the births and marriages, to see "if there is anybody we know,"notwithstanding that he was aware that corner of the paper is one which a woman does not leave to any reader, but makes it a principle to examine herself. And Mary sat still and went on with her work, and not another syllable was said about old Sommerville, or the marriage lines, or anything that had to do with the previous conversation. This tranquillity was all in perfect good faith on Major Ochterlony's side, who had given up the subject with the intention of waiting until a more convenient season, and who had relieved his mind by talking of it, and could put off his anxiety. But as for Mary, it was not in good faith that she put on this expression of outward calm. She knew her husband, and she knew that he was pertinacious and insisting, and that a question which he had once started was not to be made an end of, and finally settled, in so short a time. She sat with her head a little bent, hearing the bits of news runon like a kind of accompaniment to the quick-flowing current of her own thoughts. Her heart was beating quick, and her blood coursing through her veins as if it had been a sudden access of fever which had come upon her. She was a tall, fair, serene woman, with no paltry passion about her; but at the same time, when the occasion required it, Mary was capable of a vast suppressed fire of feeling which it gave her infinite trouble to keep down. This was a side of her character which was not suspected by the world in general-meaning of course the regiment, and the ladies at the station, who were all, more or less, military. Mrs. Ochterlony was the kind of woman to whom by instinct any stranger would have appropriated the name of Mary; and naturally all her intimates (and the regiment was very "nice," and lived in great harmony, and they were all intimate) called her by her Christian-most Christian name. And there were people who put the word Madonna before it,-"as if the two did not mean the same thing!" said little Mrs. Askell, the ensign's baby-wife, whose education had been neglected, but whom Mrs. Ochterlony had been very kind to. It was difficult to know how the title had originated, though people did say it was young Stafford who had been brought up in Italy, and who had such a strange adoration for Mrs. Ochterlony, and who died, poor fellow !-- which was the best thing he could have done under the circum-"It was a special providence," said Mrs. Kirkman, who was the Colonel's wife: for, to be sure, to be romantically adored by a foolish young subaltern, was embarrassing for a woman, however perfect her mind and temper and fairest fame might be. It was he who originated the name, perhaps with some faint foolish thought of Petrarch and his Madonna Laura: and then he died and did no more harm; and a great many people adopted it, and Mary herself did not object to be addressed by that sweetest of titles. And yet she was not meek enough for the name. Her complexion was very fair, but she had only a very faint rose-tint on her cheeks, so faint that people called her pale-which, with her fairness, was a drawback to her. Her hair was light-brown, with a golden reflection that went and came, as if it somehow depended upon the state of her mind and spirits; and her eyes were dark, large, and lambent, -not sparkling, but concentrating within themselves a soft, full depth of light. It was a question whether they were grey or brown; but at all events they were dark and deep. And she was, perhaps, a little too large and full and matronly in all her proportions to please a youthful critic. Naturally such a woman had a mass of hair which she scarcely knew what to do with, and which at this moment seemed to betrav the disturbed state of her mind by unusual gleams of the golden reflection which sometimes lay quite tranquil and hidden among the great silky coils. She was very happily married, and Major Ochterlony was the model husband of the regiment. They had married very young, and made a runaway lovematch which was one of the few which everybody allowed had succeeded to perfection. But yet-There are so few things in this world which succeed quite to perfection. It was Mrs. Kirkman's opinion that nobody else in the regiment could have supported the Major's fidgety temper. "It would be a great trial for the most experienced Christian," she said; "and dear Mary is still among the babes who have to be fed with milk; but Providence is kind, and I don't think she feels it as you or I would." This was the opinion of the Colonel's wife; but as for Mary, as she sat and worked and listened to her husband reading the papers, perhaps she could have given a different version of her own composure and calm.

They had been married about ten years, and it was the first time he had taken this idea into his head. It is true that Mrs. Ochterlony looked at it solely as one of his ideas, and gave no weight whatever to the death of old Sommerville, or the loss of the marriage lines. She had been very young at the time of her marriage, and she was motherless, and had not those pangs of wounded delicacy to encounter, which a young woman ought to have who abandons her home in such a way. This perhaps arose from a defect in Mary's girlish undeveloped character; but the truth was, that she too belonged to an Indian family, and had no home to speak of, nor any of the sweeter ties to break. And after that, she had thought nothing more about it. She was married, and there was an end of it; and the young people had gone to India immediately, and had been very poor and very happy and very miserable, like other young people who begin the world in an inconsiderate way. But in spite of a hundred drawbacks, the happiness had always been pertinacious, lasted longest, and held out most steadfastly, and lived everything down. For one thing, Mrs. Ochterlony had a great deal to do, not being rich, and that happily quite preserved her from the danger of brooding over the Major's fidgets, and making something serious out of them. And then they had married so young that neither of them could ever identify himself or herself, or make the distinction that more reasonable couples can between "me" and "you." This time, however, the Major's restlessness had taken an uncomfortable form. Mary felt herself offended and insulted without knowing why. She, a matron of ten years' standing, the mother of children! She could not believe that she had really heard true, that a repetition of her marriage could have been suggested to her-and at the same time she knew that it was perfectly true. It never occurred to her as a thing that possibly might have to be done, but still the suggestion itself was a wound. Major Ochterlony, for his part, thought of it as a precaution, and good for his peace of mind, as he had said; but to Mary it was scarcely less offensive than if somebody else had ventured to make love to her, or offer her his allegiance. It seemed to her an insult of the same description, an outrage which surely could not have occurred without some unwitting folly on her part to make such a proposal possible. She went away, searching back into the far, far distant years, as she sat at work and he read the papers. Had she anyhow failed in womanly restraint or delicacy at that moment when she was eighteen, and knew of nothing but honour, and love, and purity in the world? To be sure, she had not occupied herself very much about the matter-she had taken no pains for her own safety, and had not an idea what registrars meant, nor marriage laws, nor "lines." All that she knew was that a great many people were married at Gretna Green, and that she was married, and that there was an end of it. All these things came up and passed before her mind in a somewhat hurrying crowd; but Mary's mature judgment did not disapprove of the young bride who believed what was said to her, and was content, and had unbounded faith in the blacksmith and in her bridegroom. If that young woman had been occupying herself about the register, Mrs. Ochterlony probably, looking back, would have entertained but a mean opinion of her. It was not anything she had done. It was not anything special, so far as she could sec, in the circumstances: for hosts of people before and after had been married on the Scottish border. The only conclusion accordingly that she could come to, was the natural conclusion, that it was one of the But there was little comfort in Major's notions. that, for Mrs. Ochterlony was aware that his notions were persistent, that they lived and lasted and took new developments, and were sometimes very hard to get rid of. And she sighed in the midst of the newspaper reading, and betrayed that she had not been listening. Not that she expected her husband's new whim to come to anything; but because she foresaw in it endless repetitions of the scene which had just ended, and endless exasperation and weariness to herself.

Major Ochterlony stopped short when he heard his wife sigh—for he was not a man to leave anything alone, or to practise a discreet neglect—and laid down his paper and looked with anxiety in her face. "You have a headache," he said tenderly; "I saw it the moment I entered the room. Go and lie down, my dear, and take care of yourself. You take care of everybody else," said the Major. "Why did you let me go on reading the paper like an ass, when your head aches?"

"My head does not ache. I was only thinking," said Mrs. Ochterlony: for she thought on the whole it would be best to resume the subject and endeavour to make an end of it. But this was not the Major's way. He had in the meantime emptied his reservoir, and it had to be filled again before he would find himself in the vein for speech.

"But I don't want you to think," said Major Ochterlony with tender patronage: "that ought to be my part of the business. Have you got a novel?—if not, I'll go over and ask Miss Sorbette for one of hers. Lie down and rest, Mary; I can see that is all you are good for to-day."

Whether such a speech was aggravating or not to a woman who knew that it was her brain which had all the real weight of the family affairs to bear, may be conjectured by wives in general who know the sort of thing. But as for Mary, she was so used to it, that she took very little notice. She said, "Thank you, Hugh; I have got my letters here, which I have not read, and Aunt Agatha is as good as a novel." If this was not a very clear indication to the Major that his best policy was to take himself off a little, and leave her in peace, it would be hard to say what could have taught him. But then Major Ochterlony was a man of a lively mind and above being taught.

"Ah, Aunt Agatha," he said. "My dear, I know it is a painful subject, but we must, you know, begin to think where we are to send Hugh."

Mary shuddered; her nerves—for she had nerves, though she was so fair and serene—began to get excited. She said, "For pity's sake, not any more to-day. I am worn out. I cannot bear it. He is only six, and he is quite well."

The Major shook his head. "He is very well, but I have seen when a few hours changed all that," he said. "We cannot keep him much longer. His age, you know; all the little Heskeths go at four—

I think-"

"Ah," said Mary, "the Heskeths have nothing to do with it; they have floods and floods of children,—they don't know what it is; they can do without their little things; but I—Hugh, I am tired—I am not able for any more. Let me off for to-day."

Major Ochterlony regarded his wife with calm indulgence, and smoothed her hair off her hot forehead as he stooped to kiss her. "If you only would call things by the same names as other people, and say you have a headache, my dear," he said in his caressing way. And then he was so good as to leave her, saying to himself as he went away that his Mary too had a little temper, though nobody gave her credit for it. Instead of annoying him, this little temper on Mary's part rather pleased her husband. When it came on he could be indulgent to her and pet her, which he liked to do; and then he could feel the advantage on his own side, which was not always the case. His heart quite swelled over her as he went away; so good and so wise and so fair, and yet not without that womanly weakness which it was sweet for a man to protect and pardon and put up with. Perhaps all men are not of the same way of thinking; but then Major Ochterlony reasoned only in his own way.

Mary stayed behind, and found it very difficult to occupy herself with anything. It was not temper, according to the ordinary meaning of the word. She was vexed, disturbed, disquieted, rather than angry. When she took up the pleasant letter in which the English breezes were blowing and the leaves rustling, she could no longer keep her attention from wandering. She began it a dozen times, and as often gave it up again, driven by the importunate thoughts which took her mind by storm and thrust everything else away. As if it were not enough to have one great annoyance suddenly overwhelming her, she had the standing terror of her life, the certainty that she should have to send her children away, thrown in to make up. She could have cried, had that been of any use; but Mrs. Ochterlony had had good occasion to cry many times in her life, which takes away the inclination at less important moments. The worst of all was that her husband's oft-repeated suggestion struck at the very roots of her existence, and seemed to throw everything of which she had been most sure into sudden ruin. She would put no faith in it-pay no attention to it, she said to herself; and then, in spite of herself, she found that she paid great attention, and could not get it out of her mind. The only character in which she knew herself-in which she had ever been known-was that of a wife. There are some women-many women-who have felt their own independent standing before they made the first great step in a woman's life, and who are able to realise their own identity without associating it for ever with that of any other. But as for Mary, she had married, as it were, out of the nursery, and except as Hugh Ochterlony's wife, and his son's mother, she did not know herself. In such circumstances, it may be imagined what a bewildering effect any doubt about her marriage would have upon her. For the first time she began to think of herself, and to see that she had been hardly dealt with. began to resent her guardian's carelessness, and to blame even kind Aunt Agatha, who in those days was taken up with some faint love-affairs of her own which never came to anything. Why did not they see that everything was right? Why did not Hugh make sure, whose duty it was? After she had vexed herself with such thoughts, she returned with natural inconsistency to the conclusion that it was all one of the Major's notions. This was the easiest way of getting rid of it, and yet it was aggravating enough that the Major should permit his restless fancy to enter such sacred ground, and to play with the very foundations of their life and honour. And as if that was not enough, to talk at the end of it all of sending Hugh away! Perhaps it would have been good for Mary if she had taken her husband's advice and lain down, and sent over to Miss Sorbette for a novel. But she was rebellious and excited, and would not do it. It was true that they were engaged out to dinner that night, and that when the hour came Mrs. Ochterlony entered Mrs. Hesketh's drawing-room with her usual composure, and without any betraval of the agitation that was still smouldering within. But that did not make it any easier for her. There was nobody more respected, as people say, in the station than she was-and to think that it was possible that such a thing might be, as that she should be humiliated and pulled down from her fair elevation among all these women! Neither the Major nor any man had any right to have notions upon a matter of such importance. Mary tried hard to calm herself down to her ordinary tranquillity, and to represent to herself how good he was, and how small a drawback after all were those fidgets of his, in comparison with the faults of most other men. Just as he represented to himself, with more success, how trifling a disadvantage was the "little temper" which gave him the privilege, now and then, of feeling tenderly superior to his wife. But the attempt was not successful that day in Mrs. Ochterlony's mind; for after all there are some things too sacred for discussion, and with which the most fidgety man in the world cannot be permitted to play. Such was the result of the first conversation upon this startling subject. The Major found himself very tolerably at his ease, having relieved his mind for the moment, and enjoyed his dinner and spent a very pleasant evening; but as for the Madonna Mary, she might have prejudiced her serene character in the eyes of the regiment had the veil been drawn aside only for a moment, and could anybody have seen or guessed the whirl of thoughts that was passing through her uneasy mind.

CHAPTER III.

The present writer has already lamented her inability to convey to the readers of this history any clear account of an Indian bungalow, or the manner in which life goes on in that curious kind of English home: so that it would be vain to attempt any detailed description of Mary Ochterlony's life at this period of her career. She lived very much as all the others lived, and gave a great deal of attention to her two little boys, and wrote regularly by every mail to her friends in England, and longed for the days when the mail came in, though the interest of her correspondence was not absorbing. All this she did like everybody else, though the other ladies at the station had perhaps more people belonging to them, and a larger number of letters, and got more good of the eagerly looked for mail. And she read all the books she could come by, even Miss Sorbette's novels, which were indeed the chief literary nourishment of the station; and took her due share in society, and was generally very popular, though not so superior as Miss Sorbette for example, nor of obtrusive piety like Mrs. Kirkman, nor nearly so well off as Mrs. Hesketh. Perhaps these three ladies, who were the natural leaders of society, liked Mary all the better because she did not come in direct contact with their claims; though if it had ever entered into Mrs. Ochterlony's head to set up a distinct standard, no doubt the masses would have flocked to it, and the peace of the station might have been put in jeopardy. But as no such ambitious project was in her mind, Mary kept her popularity with everybody, and gained besides that character of "She could an if she would," which goes a great deal farther than the limited reputation of any actual achievement. She was very good to the new people, the young people, the recent arrivals, and managed to make them feel at home sooner than anybody else could, which was a very useful gift in such a society; and then a wife who bore her husband's fidgets so serenely was naturally a model and example for all the new wives.

"I am sure nobody else in the station could do so well," Mrs. Kirkman said. "The most experienced Christian would find it a trying task. But then some people are so mercifully fitted for their position in life. I don't think she feels it as you or I should." This was said, not as implying that little Mrs. Askell-to whom the words were ostensibly addressed-had peculiarly sensitive feelings, or was in any way to be associated with the Colonel's wife, but only because it was a favourite way Mrs. Kirkman had of bringing herself down to her audience, and uniting herself, as it were, to ordinary humanity; for if there was one thing more than another for which she was distinguished, it was her beautiful Christian humility; and this was the sense in which she now spoke.

"Please don't say so," cried the ensign's wife, who was an unmanageable eighteen-year-old, half-Irish creature. "I am sure she has twenty thousand times more feeling than you and—than both of us put together. It's because she is real good; and the Major is an old dear. He is a fidget and he's awfully aggravating, and he puts one in a passion; but he's an old dear, and so you would say if you knew him as well as I do."

Mrs. Kirkman regarded the creature by her side, as may be supposed, with the calm contempt which her utterance merited. She looked at her, out of those "down-dropt," half-veiled eyes, with that look which everybody in the station knew so well, as if she was looking down from an infinite distance with a serene surprise which was too far off and elevated to partake of the nature of disgust. If she knew him as well as this baby did! But the Colonel's wife did not take any notice of the audacious suggestion. It was her duty, instead of resenting the impertinence to herself, to improve the occasion for the offender's own sake.

"My dear, there is nobody really good," said Mrs. Kirkman. "We have the highest authority for that. I wish I could think dear Mary was possessed of the true secret of a higher life; but she has so much of that natural amiability, you know, which is, of all things, the most dangerous for the soul. I would rather, for my part, she was not so 'good' as you say. It is all filthy rags," said Mrs. Kirkman, with a sigh. "It might be for the good of her soul to be brought low, and forced to abandon these refuges of lies—""

Upon which the little Irish wild-Indian blazed up with natural fury.

"I don't believe she ever told a lie in her life. I'll swear to all the lies she tells," cried the foolish little woman; "and as for rags—it's horrible to talk so. If you only knew—if you only could think—how kind she was to me!"

For this absurd little hapless child had had a baby, as might have been expected, and would have been in rags indeed, and everything that is miserable, but for Mary, who had taken her in hand; and being not much more than a baby herself, and not strong yet, and having her heart in her mouth, she burst out crying, as might have been expected too.

This was a result which her companion had not in the least calculated upon, for Mrs. Kirkman, notwithstanding her belief in Mary's insensibility, had not very lively feelings, and was not quick at divining other people. But she was a good woman notwithstanding all her talk. She came down off her mountain top, and soothed her little visitor, and gave her a glass of wine, and even kissed her, to make matters up.

"I know she has a way, when people are sick"—said the Colonel's wife; and then, after that confession, she sighed again. "If only she does not put her trust in her own works," Mrs. Kirkman added.

For, to tell the truth, the Chaplain of the regiment was not (as she thought) a spiritual-minded man, and the Colonel's wife was troubled by an abiding consciousness that it was into her hands that Providence had committed the souls of the station—"Which was an awful responsibility for a sinful creature," she said in her letters home; "and one that required constant watch over herself."

Perhaps, in a slightly different way, Mrs. Ochterlony would have been similarly put down and defended in the other two centres of society at the station. "She is intelligent," Miss Sorbette said; "I don't deny that she is intelligent; but I would not say she was superior. She is fond of reading, but then most people are fond of reading, when it's amusing, you know. She is a little too like Amelia in 'Vanity Fair.' She is one of the sweet women. In a general way, I can't bear sweet women; but I must confess she is the very best specimen I ever saw."

As for Mrs. Hesketh, her opinion was not much worth stating in words. If she had any fault to find with Mrs. Ochterlony, it was because Mary had sometimes a good deal of trouble in making the two ends meet. "I cannot endure people that are always having anxieties," said the rich woman of the station, who had an idea that everybody could be comfortable if they liked, and that it was an offence to all his neighbours when a man insisted on being poor; but at the same time everybody knew that she was very fond of Mary. This had been the general opinion of her for all these years, and naturally Mrs. Ochterlony was used to it, and, without being at all vain on the subject, had that sense of the atmosphere of general esteem and regard which surrounded her, which has a favourable influence upon every character, and which did a great deal to give her that sweet composure and serenity for which she was famed. But from the time of that first conversation with her husband, a change came upon the Madonna of the station. It was not perceptible to the general vision, yet there were individual eyes which found out that something was the matter, though nobody could tell what. Mrs. Hesketh thought it was an attack of fever coming on, and Mrs. Kirkman hoped that Mrs. Ochterlony was beginning to occupy herself about her spiritual state; and the one recommended quinine to Mary, and the other sent her sermons, which, to tell the truth, were not much more suitable to her case. But Mary did not take any of the charitable friends about her into her confidence. She went about among them as a prince might have gone about in his court, or a chief among his vassals, after hearing in secret that it was possible that one day he may be discovered to be an impostor. Or, if not that,-for Mary knew that she never could be found out an impostor, -at least, that such a change was hanging over her head, and that somebody might believe it; and that her history would be discussed and her name get into people's mouths and her claims to their regard be questioned. It was very hard upon her to think that such a thing was possible with composure, or to contemplate her husband's restless ways, and to recollect the indiscreet confidences which he was in the habit of making. He had spoken to Colonel Kirkman about it, and even quoted his advice about the marriage lines; and Mary could not but think (though in this point she did the Colonel injustice) that Mrs. Kirkman too must know; and then, with a man of Major Ochterlony's temperament, nobody could make suro that he would not take young Askell, the ensign, or any other boy in the station, into his confidence, if he should happen to be in the way. All this was very galling to Mary, who had so high an appreciation of the credit and honour which, up to this moment, she had enjoyed; and who felt that she would rather die than come down to be discussed and pitied and talked about among all these people. She thought in her disturbed and uneasy mind, that she could already hear all the different tones in which they would say "Poor Mary!" and all the wonders, and doubts, and inquiries that would rise up round her. Mrs. Kirkman would have said that all these were signs that her pride wanted humbling, and that the thing her friends should pray for, should be some startling blow to lead her back to a better state of mind. But naturally that was a kind of discipline which for herself, or indeed for anybody else, Mary was not far enough advanced to desire.

Perhaps, however, it was partly true about the pride. Mrs. Ochterlony did not say anything about it, but she locked the door of her own room the next morning after that talk with the Major, and searched through all her repositories for those "marriage lines," which no doubt she had put away somewhere, and which she had naturally forgotten all about for years. It was equally natural, and to be expected, that she should not find them. She looked through all her papers and letters and little sacred corners, and found many things that filled her heart with sadness and her eyes with tears-for she had not come through those ten years without leaving traces behind her where her heart had been wounded and had bled by the way-but she did not find what she was in search of. She tried hard to look back and think, and to go over in her mind the contents of her little schoolgirl desk, which she had left at Aunt Agatha's cottage, and the little work-table, and the secretary with all its drawers. But she could not recollect anything about it, nor where she had put it, nor what could have become of it; and the effect of her examination was to give her, this time in reality, a headache, and to make her eyes heavy and her heart sore. But she did not say a syllable about her search to the Major, who was (as, indeed, he always was) as anxiously affectionate as a man could be, and became (as he always did) when he found his wife suffering, so elaborately noiseless and still, that Mary ended by a good fit of laughing, which was of the greatest possible service to her.

"When you are so quiet, you worry me, Hugh," she said. "I am used to hear you moving about."

"My dear, I hope I am not such a brute as to move about when you are suffering," her husband replied. And though his mind had again begun to fill with the dark thoughts that had been the occasion of all Mary's annoyance, he restrained himself with an heroic effort, and did not say a syllable about it all that night.

But this was a height of virtue which it was quite truth.

impossible any merely mortal powers could keep up to. He began to make mysterious little broken speeches next day, and to stop short and to say, "My darling, I mustn't worry you," and to sigh like furnace, and to worry Mary to such an extremity that her difficulty in keeping her temper and patience grew indescribable. And then, when he had afflicted her in this way till it was impossible to go any further-when he had betrayed it to her in every look, in every step, in every breath he drew-which was half a sigh-and in every restless movement he made; and when Mrs. Ochterlony, who could not sleep for it, nor rest, nor get any relief from the torture, had two red lines round her eyes, and was all but out of her senses—the stream burst forth at last, and the Major spoke:

"You remember, perhaps, Mary, what we were talking of the other day," he said, in an insidiously gentle way, on an early morning—when they had still the long, long day before them to be miserable in. "I thought it very important, but perhaps you may have forgot—about old Sommerville whodied?"

"Forgot!" said Mary. She felt it was coming now, and was rather glad to have it over. "I don't know how I could forget, Hugh. What you said would have made one recollect anything; but you cannot make old Sommerville come alive again, whatever you do."

"My dear, I spoke to you about some—about a—paper," said the Major. "Lines—that is what the Scotch call them—though, I daresay, they're very far from being poetry. Perhaps you have found them, Mary," said Major Ochterlony, looking into her face in a pleading way, as if he prayed her to answer yes. And it was with difficulty that she kept as calm as she wished to do, and answered without letting him see the agitation and excitement in her mind.

"I don't know where I have put them, Hugh," she said, with a natural evasion, and in a low voice. She did not acknowledge having looked for them, and having failed to find them; but in spite of herself, she answered with a certain humility as of a woman culpable. For, after all, it was her fault.

"You don't know where you put them," said the Major, with rising horror. "Have you the least idea how important they are? They may be the saving of you and of your children, and you don't know where you have put them! Then it is all as I feared," Major Ochterlony added with a groan, "and everything is lost."

"What is lost?" said Mary. "You speak to me in riddles, Hugh. I know I put them somewhere—I must have put them somewhere safe. They are most likely in my old desk at home, or in one of the drawers of the secretary," said Mary caluly, giving those local specifications with a certainty which she was far from feeling. As for the Major, he was arrested by the circumstance which made her faint hope and supposition look somehow like truth.

"If I could hope that that was the case," he said; "but it can't be the case, Mary. You never were at home after we were married—you forget that. We went to Earlston for a day, and we went to your guardian's; but never to Aunt Agatha. You are making a mistake, my dear; and God bless me, to think of it, what would become of you if anything were to happen to me?"

"I hope there is nothing going to happen to you; but I don't think in that case it would matter what became of me," said Mary in utter depression; for by this time she was worn out.

"You think so now, my love; but you would be obliged to think otherwise," said Major Ochterlony. "I hope I'm all right for many a year; but a man can never tell. And the insurance, and pension, and everything—and Earlston, if my brother should leave it to us—all your future, my darling. I think it will drive me distracted," said the Major, "not a witness, nor a proof left!"

Mary could make no answer. She was quite overwhelmed by the images thus called before her: for her part the pension and the insurance money had no meaning to her ears; but it is difficult not to put a certain faith in it when a man speaks in such a circumstantial way of things that can only happen after his death.

"You have been talking to the doctor, and he has been putting things into your head," she said faintly. "It is cruel to torture me so. We know very well how we were married, and all about it, and so do our friends, and it is cruel to try to make me think of anything happening. There is nobody in the regiment so strong and well as you are," she continued, taking courage a little. She thought to herself he looked, as people say, the picture of health as he sat beside her, and she began to recover out of her prostration. As for spleen or liver, or any of those uncomfortable attributes, Major Ochterlony, up to this moment, had not known whether he possessed them—which was a most re-assuring thought, naturally, for his anxious wife.

"Thank God," said the Major, with a little solemnity. It was not that he had any presentiment, or thought himself likely to die early; but simply that he was in the pathetic way, and had a naif and innocent pleasure in deepening his effects; and then he took to walking about the room in his nervous manner. After a while he came to a dead stop before his wife, and took both her hauds into his.

"Mary," he said, "I know it's an idea that you don't like; but for my peace of mind.—Suppose—just suppose for the sake of supposing—that I was to die now, and leave you without a word to prove your claims. It would be ten times worse than death, Mary; but I could die at peace if you would only make one little sacrifice to my peace of mind."

"Oh, Hugh, don't kill me—you are not going to die," was all Mary could say.

"No, my darling, not if I can help it; but if it were only for my peace of mind. There's no harm in it, that I can see. It's ridiculous, you know; but that's all, Mary," said the Major, looking anxiously in her face. "Why, it is what hosts of people do every day. It is the easiest thing to do—a mere joke for that matter. They will say, you know, that it is like Ochterlony, and a piece of his nonsense. I know how they talk; but never mind. I know very well there is nothing else that you would not do for my peace of mind. It will set your future above all casualties, and it will be all over in half an hour. For instance, Churchill says—"

"You have spoken to Mr. Churchill, too?" said

Mary, with a thrill of despair.

"A man can never do any harm speaking to his clergyman, I hope," the Major said, peevishly. "What do you mean by too? I've only mentioned it to Kirkman besides—I wanted his advice—and to Sorbette, to explain that bad headache of yours. And they all think I am perfectly right."

Mary put her hands up to her face, and gave a low but bitter cry. She said nothing more—not a syllable. She had already been dragged down without knowing it, and set low among all these people. She who deserved nothing but honour, who had done nothing to be ashamed of, who was the same Madonna Mary whom they had all regarded as the "wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best." By this time they had all begun to discuss her story, and to wonder if all had been quite right at the beginning, and to say, "Poor Mary!" She knew it as well as if she had heard the buzz of talk in those three houses to which her husband had confided his difficulty. It was a horrible torture, if you will but think of it, for an innocent woman to bear.

"It is not like you to make such a fuss about so simple a thing," said Major Ochterlony. "You know very well it is not myself, but you I am thinking of; that you may have everything in order, and your future provided for, whatever may happen. It may be absurd, you know; but a woman mustn't mind being absurd to please her husband. We'll ask our friends to step over with us to church in the morning, and in half an hour it will be all over. Don't cover your face, Mary. It worries me not to see your face. God bless me, it is nothing to make such a fuss about," said the Major, getting excited. "I would do a great deal more, any day, to please you."

"I would cut off my hand to please you," said Mary, with perhaps a momentary extravagance in the height of her passion. "You know there is no sacrifice I would not make for you; but oh, Hugh, not this, not this," she said, with a sob that startled him—one of those sobs that tear and rend the breast they come from, and have no accompaniment of tears.

His answer was to come up to her side, and take the face which she had been covering between his hands, and kiss it as if it had been a child's. "My darling, it is only this that will do me any good. It is for my peace of mind," he said, with all that tenderness and effusion which made him the best of husbands. He was so loving to her that, even in the bitterness of the injury, it was hard for Mary to refuse to be soothed and softened. He had got his way, and his unbounded love and fondness surrounded her with a kind of atmosphere of tender enthusiasm. He knew so well there was none like her, nobody fit to be put for a moment in comparison with his Mary; and this was how her fate was fixed for her, and the crisis came to an end.

"I AM going with you, Mary," said Mrs. Kirkman, coming suddenly in upon the morning of the day which was to give peace to Major Ochterlony's mind, and cloud over with something like a shadow of shame (or at least she thought so) his wife's fair matron fame. The Colonel's wife had put on her last white bonnet, which was not so fresh as it had been at the beginning of the season, and white gloves which were also a little the worse for wear. To be sure the marriage was not like a real marriage, and nobody knew how the unwilling bride would think proper to dress. Mrs. Kirkman come in at a quicker pace than ordinary, with her hair hanging half out of curl on either side of her face, as was always the case. She was fair, but of a greyish complexion, with light blue eyes à fleur de la tête, which generally she kept half veiled within their lids - a habit which was particularly aggravating to some of the livelier spirits. came in hastily (for her), and found Mary seated disconsolately enough, with an entire want of occupation, which is, in such a woman, one of the saddest signs of a mind disturbed. Mrs. Ochterlony sat, dropped down upon a chair, with her hands listlessly clasped in her lap, and a hot flush upon her cheek. She was lost in a dreary contemplation of the sacrifice which was about to be exacted from her, and of the possible harm it might do. She was thinking of her children, what effect it might have on them-and she was thinking bitterly, that for good or evil she could not help it: that again, as on many a previous occasion, her husband's restless mind had carried the day over her calmer judgment, and that there was no way of changing it. To say that she consented with personal pain of the most acute kind, would not be to say all. She gave in, at the same time with a foreboding utterly indistinct, and which she would not have given utterance to, yet which was strong enough to heighten into actual misery the pain and shame of her position. When Mrs. Kirkman came in, with her eyes full of observation, and making the keenest scrutiny from beneath the downcast lids, Mrs. Ochterlony was not in a position to hide her emotions. She was not crying, it is true, for the circumstances were too serious for crying; but it was not difficult to form an idea of her state of mind from her strangely listless attitude, and the expression of her face.

"Pression of her face.
"I have come to go with you," said Mrs. Kirkman. "I thought you would like to have somebody to countenance you. It will make no difference to me, I assure you, Mary; and both the Colonel and I think if there is any doubt, you know, that it is by far the wisest thing you could do. And I only hope——"

"Doubt!" said Mary, lighting up for the moment. "There is no more doubt than there is of all the marriages made in Scotland. The people who go there to be married are not married again afterwards that I ever heard of. There is no doubt whatever—none in the world. I beg your pardon. I am terribly vexed and annoyed, and I don't know what I am saying. To hear any one talk of doubt!"

"My dear Mary, we know nothing but what the Major has told," said Mrs. Kirkman. "You may depend upon it he has reason for what he is doing; and I do hope you will see a higher hand in it all, and feel that you are being humbled for your good."

"I wish you would tell me how it can be for my good," said Mrs. Ochterlony, "when even you, who ought to know better, talk of doubt—you who have known us all along from the very first. Hugh has taken it into his head—that is the whole matter; and you, all of you know, when he takes a thing into his head—"

She had been hurried on to say this, by the rush of her disturbed thoughts; but Mary was not a woman to complain of her husband. She came to a sudden standstill, and rose up, and looked at her watch.

"It is about time to go," she said, "and I am sorry to give you the trouble of going with me. It is not worth while for so short a distance; but, at least, don't say anything more about it, please."

Mrs. Kirkman had already made the remark that Mary was not at all "dressed." She had on her brown muslin, which was the plainest morning dress in her possession, as everybody knew; and instead of going to her room to make herself a little nice, she took up her bonnet, which was on the table, and tied it on without even so much as looking into the glass. "I am quite ready," she said, when she had made this simple addition to her dress, and stood there, looking everything that was most unlike the Madonna of former days-flushed and clouded over, with lines in her forehead, and the corners of her mouth dropped, and her fair large serene beauty hidden beneath the thunder-cloud. And the Colonel's wife was very sorry to see her friend in such a state of mind, as may be supposed.

"My dear Mary," Mrs. Kirkman said, taking her arm as they went out, and holding it fast. "I should much wish to see you in a better frame of mind. Man is only the instrument in our troubles. It must have been that Providence saw you stood in need of it, my dear. He knows best. It would not have been sent if it had not been for your good."

"In that way, if I were to stand in the sun till I got a sunstroke, it would still be for my good," said Mary in her anger. "You would say, it was God's fault, and not mine. But I know it is my fault; I ought to have stood out and resisted, and I have not had the strength; and it is not for good, but evil. It is not God's fault, but ours. It can be for nobody's good."

But after this, she would not say any more. Not though Mrs. Kirkman was shocked at her way of speaking, and took great pains to impress upon her that she must have been doing or thinking something which God punished by this means. "Your pride must have wanted bringing down, my dear; as we all do, Mary, both you and I," said the Colonel's wife; but then Mrs. Kirkman's humility was well known.

Thus they walked together to the chapel, whither various wondering people, who could not understand what it meant, were straying. Major Ochterlony had meant to come for his wife, but he was late, as he so often was, and met them only near the chapel-door; and then he did something, which sent the last pang of which it was capable to Mary's heart, though it was only at a later period that she found it out. He found his boy with the Hindoo nurse, and brought little Hugh in, 'wildered and wondering. Mr. Churchill by this time had put his surplice on, and all was ready. Colonel Kirkman had joined his wife, and stood by her side behind the "couple," furtively grasping his grey moustache, and looking out of a corner of his eyes at the strange seene. Mrs. Kirkman, for her part, dropt her eyelids as usual, and looked down upon Mary kneeling at her feet, with a certain compassionate uncertainty, sorry that Mrs. Ochterlony did not see this trial to be for her good, and at the same time wondering within herself whether it had all been perfectly right, or was not something more than a notion of the Major's. Farther back Miss Sorbette, who was with Annie Hesketh, was giving vent in a whisper to the same sentiments.

"I am very sorry for poor Mary; but could it be all quite right before," Miss Sorbette was saying. "A man does not take fright like that for nothing. We women are silly, and take fancies; but when a man does it, you know——"

And it was with such an accompaniment that Mary knelt down, not looking like a Madonna, at her husband's side. As for the Major, an air of serenity had diffused itself over his handsome features. He knelt in quite an easy attitude, pleased with himself, and not displeased to be the centre of so interesting a group. Mary's face was slightly averted from him, and was burning with the same flush of indignation as when Mrs. Kirkman found her in her own house. She had taken off her bonnet and thrown it down by her side; and her hair was shining as if in anger and resistance to this fate, which with closed mouth, and elasped hands, and steady front, she was submitting to, though it was almost as terrible as death. Such was the curious scene upon which various subaltern members of society at the station looked on with wondering eyes. And little Hugh Ochterlony stood near his mother with childish astonishment, and laid up the singular group in his memory, without knowing very well what it meant; but that was a sentiment shared by many persons much more enlightened than the poor little boy, who did not know how much influence this mysterious transaction might have upon his own fate.

The only other special feature was that Mary, with the corners of her mouth turned down, and her whole soul wound up to obstinacy, would not call herself by any name but Mary Ochterlony. They persuaded her, painfully, to put her long disused maiden name upon the register, and kind Mr. Churchill shut his ears to it in the service; but yet it was a thing that everybody remarked. When all was over, nobody knew how they were expected to behave, whether to congratulate the pair, or whether to disappear and hold their tongues, which seemed in fact the wisest way. But no popular assembly ever takes the wisest way of working. Mr. Churchill was the first to decide the action of the party. He descended the altar steps, and shook hands with Mary, who stood tying her bonnet, with still the corners of her mouth turned down, and that feverish flush on her cheeks. He was a good man, though not spiritually-minded in Mrs. Kirkman's opinion; and he felt the duty of softening and soothing his flock as much as that of teaching them, which is sometimes a great deal less difficult. He came and shook hands with her, gravely and kindly.

"I don't see that I need congratulate you, Mrs. Ochterlony," he said, "I don't suppose it makes much difference; but you know you always have all our best wishes." And he cast a glance over his audience, and reproved by that glance the question that was circulating among them. But to tell the truth, Mrs. Kirkman and Miss Sorbette paid very little attention to Mr. Churchill's looks.

"My dear Mary, you have kept up very well, though I am sure it must have been trying," Mrs. Kirkmau said. "Once is bad enough; but I am sure you will see a good end in it at the last."

And while she spoke she allowed a kind of silent interrogation, from her half-veiled eyes, to steal over Mary, and investigate her from head to foot. Had it been all right before? Might not this perhaps be in reality the first time, the once which was bad enough? The question crept over Mrs. Ochterlony, from the roots of her hair down to her fect, and examined her curiously to find a response. The answer was plain enough, and yet it was not plain to the Colonel's wife; for she knew that the heart is deceitful above all things, and that where human nature is considered it is always safest to believe the worse.

which with closed mouth, and clasped hands, and steady front, she was submitting to, though it was almost as terrible as death. Such was the curious scene upon which various subaltern members of had the moral courage," the doctor's sister said, with a certain solemnity. But perhaps it was Annie Hesketh, in her innocence, who was the worst of all. She advauced timidly, with her face in a blaze, like Mary's own, not knowing where to look, and lost in ingenuous embarrassment.

"Oh, dear Mrs. Ochterlony, I don't know what to say," said Annie. "I am so sorry, and I hope you will always be very very happy; and mamma couldn't come—" Here she stopped short, and looked up with candid eyes, that asked a hundred questions. And Mary's reply was addressed to her alone.

"Tell your mamma, Annie, that I am glad she could not come," said the injured wife. "It was very kind of her." When she had said so much, Mrs. Ochterlony turned round, and saw her boy standing by, looking at her. It was only then that she turned to the husband to whom she had just renewed her troth. She looked full at him, with a look of indignation and dismay. It was the last drop that made the cup run over; but then, what was the good of saying anything? That final prick, however, brought her to herself. shook hands with all the people afterwards, as if they were dispersing after an ordinary service, and took little Hugh's hand and went home as if nothing had happened. She left the Major behind her, and took no notice of him, and did not even, as young Askell remarked, offer a glass of wine to the assistants at the ceremony, but went home with her little boy, talking to him, as she did on Sundays going home from church; and everybody stood and looked after her, as might have been expected. She knew they were looking after her, and saying "Poor Mary!" and wondering after all if there must not have been a very serious cause for this re-marriage. Mary thought to herself that she knew as well what they were saying as if she had been among them, and yet she was not entirely so correct in her ideas of what was going on as she thought.

In the first place, she could not have imagined how a moment could undo all the fair years of unblemished life which she had passed among them. She did not really believe that they would doubt her honour, although she herself felt it clouded; and at the same time she did not know the curious compromise between cruelty and kindness, which is all that their Christian feelings can effect in many commonplace minds, yet which is a great deal when one comes to think of it. Mrs. Kirkman, arguing from the foundation of the desperate wickedness of the human heart, had gradually reasoned herself into the belief that Mary had deceived her, and had never been truly an honourable wife; but notwithstanding this conclusion, which in the abstract would have made her cast off the culprit with utter disdain, the Colonel's wife paused, and was moved, almost in spite of herself, by the spirit of that faith which she so often wrapped up and smothered in disguising talk. She did not believe in Mary; but she did, in a wordy, defective way, in Him who was the son of a woman, and who came not to condemn; and she could not find it in her heart to cast off the sinner. Perhaps if Mrs. Ochterlony had known this divine reason for her friend's charity, it would have struck a deeper blow than any other indignity to which she had been subjected. In all her bitter thoughts, it never occurred to her that her neighbour stood by her as thinking of those Marys who once wept at the Saviour's feet. Heaven help the poor Madonna, whom all the world had heretofore honoured! In all her thoughts she never went so far as that.

The ladies waited a little, and sent away Annie Hesketh, who was too young for scenes of this sort, though her mamma was so imprudent, and themselves laid hold of Mr. Churchill, when the other gentlemen had dispersed. Mr. Churchill was one of those mild missionaries who turn one's thoughts involuntarily to that much-abused, yet not altogether despicable institution of a celibate clergy. He was far from being celibate, poor man! He, or at least his wife, had such a succession of babies as no man could number. They had children at "home" in genteel asylums for the sons and daughters of the clergy, and they had children in the airiest costume at the station, whom people were kind to, and who were waiting their chance of being sent "home" too; and withal, there were always more arriving, whom their poor papa received with a mild despair. For his part, he was not one of the happy men who held appointments under the beneficent rule of the Company, nor was he a regimental chaplain. was one of that hapless band who are always "doing duty" for other and better-off people. He was almost too old now (though he was not old), and too much hampered and overlaid by children, to have much hope of anything better than "doing duty" all the rest of his life; and the condition of Mrs. Churchill, who had generally need of neighbourly help, and of the children, who were chiefly clothed-such clothing as it was-by the bounty of the Colonel's and Major's and Captain's wives, somehow seemed to give these ladies the upper hand of their temporary pastor. He managed well enough among the men, who respected his goodness, and recognised him to be a gentleman, notwithstanding his poverty; but he stood in terror of the women, who were more disposed to interfere, and who were kind to his family and patronised him-He tried hard on this occasion, as on many others, to escape, but he was hemmed in, and no outlet was left him. If he had been a celibate brother, there can be little doubt it would have been he who would have had the upper hand; but with all his family burdens and social obligations, the despotism of the ladies of his flock came hard upon the poor clergyman; all the more that, poor though he was, and accustomed to humiliations, he had not learned yet to dispense with the luxury of feelings and delicacies of his own.

"Mr. Churchill, do give us your advice," said

Miss Sorbette, who was first. "Do tell us what all this means? They surely must have told you at least the rights of it. What is the secret of it all? Do you think they have really never been married all this time? Goodness gracious me! to think of us all receiving her, and petting her, and calling her Madonna, and all that, if this should be true! Do you think—"

"I don't think anything but what Major Ochterlony told me," said Mr. Churchill, with a little emphasis. "I have not the least doubt he told me the truth. The witnesses of their marriage are dead, and that wretched place at Gretna was burnt down, and he is afraid that his wife would have no means of proving her marriage in case anything happened to him. I don't know what reason there can be to suppose that Major Ochterlony, who is a Christian and a gentleman, said anything that was not true."

"My dear Mr. Churchill," said Mrs. Kirkman with a sigh, "you are so charitable. If one could but hope that the poor dear Major was a true Christian, as you say. But one has no evidence of any vital change in his case. And, dear Mary, I have made up my mind for one thing, that it shall make no difference to me. Other people can do as they like, but so far as I am concerned, I can but think of our Divine Example," said the Colonel's wife. It was a real sentiment, and she meant well, and was actually thinking as well as talking of that Divine Example; but still somehow the words made the blood run cold in the poor priest's veins.

"What in the world do you mean, Mrs. Kirkman?" he said, "Mrs. Ochterlony is as she always was, a person whom we all may be proud to know."

"Yes, yes," said Miss Sorbette, who interrupted them both without any ceremony; "but that is not what I am asking. As for his speaking the truth as a Christian and a gentleman, I don't give much weight to that. If he has been deceiving us for all these years, you may be sure he would not stick at a fib to end off with. What is one to do? I don't believe it can have ever been a good marriage for my part."

This was the issue to which she had come by dint of thinking it over and discussing it; for, indeed, the doctor's sister, like the Colonel's wife, had got up that morning with the impression that Major Ochterlony's fidgets had finally driven him out of his senses, and that Mary was the most ill-used woman in the world.

"And I believe exactly the contrary," said the clergyman, with some heat. "I believe in an honourable man and a pure-minded woman. I had rather give up work altogether than reject such an obvious truth."

"Ah, Mr. Churchill," Mrs. Kirkman said again, "we must not rest in these vain appearances. We are all vile creatures, and the heart is deceifful above all things. I do fear that you are taking too charitable a view."

"Yes," said Mr. Churchill, but perhaps he made a different application of the words; "I believe that about the heart; but then it shows its wickedness generally in a sort of appropriate, individual way. I dare say they have their thorns in the flesh, like the rest; but it is not falsehood and wantonness that are their besetting sins," said the poor man, with a plainness of speech which put his hearers to the blush.

"Goodness gracious! remember that you are talking to ladies, Mr. Churchill," Miss Sorbette said, and put down her veil. It was not a fact he was very likely to forget; and then he put on his hat as they left the chapel, and hoped he was now free to go upon his way.

"Stop a minute, please," said Miss Sorbette.
"I should like to know what course of action is going to be decided on. I am very sorry for Mary, but so long as her character remains under this doubt—"

"It shall make no difference to me," said Mrs. Kirkman. "I don't pretend to regulate anybody's actions, Sabina; but when one thinks of Mary of Bethany! She may have done wrong, but I hope this occurrence will be blessed to her soul. I felt sure she wanted something to bring her low, and make her feel her need," the Colonel's wife added, with solemnity; "and it is such a lesson for us all. In other circumstances, the same thing might have happened to you or me."

"It could never have happened to me," said Miss Sorbette, with sudden wrath; which was a fortunate diversion for Mr. Churchill. This was how her friends discussed her after Mary had gone away from her second wedding; and perhaps they were harder upon her than she had supposed in her secret thoughts.

CHAPTER V.

But the worst of all to Mrs. Ochterlony was that little Hugh had been there-Hugh, who was six years old, and so intelligent for his age. The child was very auxious to know what it meant, and why she knelt by his father's side while all the other people were standing. Was it something particular they were praying for, which Mrs. Kirkman and the rest did not want? Mary satisfied him as she best could, and by and bye he forgot and began to play with his little brother as usual, but his mother knew that so strange a scene could not fail to leave some impression. She sat by herself that long day, avoiding her husband for perhaps the first time in her life, and imagining a hundred possibilities to It seemed to her as if everybody who ever heard of her henceforth must hear of this, and as if she must go through the world with a continual doubt upon her; and Mary's weakness was to prize fair reputation and spotless honour above everything in the world. Perhaps Mrs. Kirkman was not so far wrong after all, and there was a higher meaning in the unlooked-for blow that thus struck her at her tenderest point; but that was an idea she could not receive. She could not think that God had anything to do with her husband's foolish restlessness, and her own impatient submission. It was a great deal more like a malicious devil's work, than anything a beneficent providence could have arranged. This way of thinking was far from bringing Mary any consolation or solace, but still there was a certain reasonableness in her thoughts. And then an indistinct foreboding of harm to her children, she did not know what, or how to be brought about, weighed upon Mary's mind. She kept looking at them as they played beside her, and thinking how, in the far future, the meaning of that scene he had been a witness to might flash into Hugh's mind when he was a man, and throw a bewildering doubt upon his mother's name which perhaps she might not be living to clear up; and these ideas stung her like a nest of serpents, each waking up and darting its venom to her heart at a separate moment. She had been very sad and very sorry many a time before in her life,—she had tasted all the usual sufferings of humanity; and yet she had never been what may be called unhappy, tortured from within and without, dissatisfied with herself and everything about her. Major Ochterlony was in every sense of the word a good husband, and he had been Mary's support and true companion in all her previous troubles. He might be absurd now and then, but he never was anything but kind and tender and sympathetic, as was the nature of the man. But the special feature of this misfortune was that it irritated and set her in arms against him, that it separated her from her closest friend and all her friends, and that it made even the sight and thought of her children a pain to her among all her other pains. This was the wretched way in which Mary spent the day of her second wedding. Naturally, Major Ochterlony brought people in with him to lunch (probably it should be written tiffin, but our readers will accept the generic word), and was himself in the gayest spirits, and insisted upon champagne, though he knew they could not afford it. "We ate our real wedding breakfast all by ourselves in that villanous little place at Gretna," he said with a boy's enthusiasm, "and had trout out of the Solway: don't you recollect, Mary? Such trout! What a couple of happy young fools we were; and if every Gretna Green marriage turned out like mine!" the Major added, looking at his wife with beaming eyes. She had been terribly wounded by his hand, and was suffering secret torture and was full of the irritation of pain; and yet she could not so steel her heart as not to feel a momentary softening at sight of the love and content in his eyes. But though he loved her he had sacrificed all her scruples, and thrown a shadow upon her honour, and filled her heart with hitterness, to satisfy an unreasonable fancy of his own, and give peace, as he said, to his mind. All this was very natural, but in the pain of the moment it seemed almost inconceivable to Mary, who was obliged to conceal her mortification and suffering, and minister to her guests as she was wont to do, without making any show of the shadow that she felt to have fallen upon her life.

It was, however, tacitly agreed by the ladies of the station to make no difference, according to the example of the Colonel's wife. Mrs. Kirkman had resolved upon that charitable course from the highest motives, but the others were perhaps less elevated in their principles of conduct. Mrs. Hesketh, who was quite a worldly-minded woman, concluded that it would be absurd for one to take any step unless they all did, and that on the whole, whatever were the rights of it, Mary could be no worse than she had been for all the long time they had known her. As for Miss Sorbette, who was strong-minded, she was disposed to consider that the moral courage the Ochterlonys had displayed in putting an end to an unsatisfactory state of affairs merited public appreciation. Little Mrs. Askell, for her part, rushed headlong as soon as she heard of it, which fortunately was not until it was all over, to see her suffering protectress. Perhaps it was at that moment, for the first time, that the ensign's wife felt the full benefit of being a married lady, able to stand up for her friend and stretch a small wing of championship over her. She rushed into Mrs. Ochterlony's presence and arms like a little tempest, and cried and sobbed and uttered inarticulate exclamations on her friend's shoulder, to Mary's great surprise, who thought something had happened to her. Fortunately the little eighteen-year-old matron, after the first incoherence was over, began to find out that Mrs. Ochterlony looked the same as ever, and that nothing tragical could have happened, and so restrained the offer of her own countenance and support, which would have been more humbling to Mary than all the desertion in the world.

"What is the matter, my dear?" said Mrs. Ochterlony, who had regained her serene looks, though not her composed mind; and little Irish Emma, looking at her, was struck with such a sense of her own absurdity and temerity and ridiculous pretensions, that she very nearly broke down again.

"I've heen quarrelling with Joe," the quickwitted girl said, with the best grace she could, and added in her mind a secret clause to soften down the fib,—"he is so aggravating; and when I saw my Madonna looking so sweet and so still——"

"Hush!" said Mary "there was no need for crying about that—nor for telling fibs either," she added, with a smile that went to the heart of the ensign's wife. "You see there is nothing the matter with me," Mrs. Ochterlony added; but notwithstanding her perfect composure it was in a harder tone.

"I never expected anything else," said the impetuous little woman; "as if any nonsense could do any harm to you! And I love the Major, and I always have stood up for him; but oh, I should just like for once to box his ears."

"Hush!" said Mary again; and then the need she had of sympathy prompted her for one moment to descend to the level of the little girl beside her, who was all sympathy and no criticism, which Mary knew to be a kind of friendship wonderfully uncommon in this world. "It did me no harm," she said, feeling a certain relief in dropping her reserve, and making visible the one thing of which they were both thinking, and which had no need of being identified by name. "It did me no harm, and it pleased him. I don't deny that it hurt at the time," Mary added after a little pause, with a smile; "but that is all over now. You do not need to cry over me, my dear."

" "I-cry over you," cried the prevaricating Emma, "as if such a thing had ever come into my head; but I did feel glad I was a married lady," the little thing added; and then saw her mistake, and blushed and faltered and did not know what to say next. Mrs. Ochterlony knew very well what her young visitor meant, but she took no notice, as was the wisest way. She had steeled herself to all the consequences by this time, and knew she must accustom herself to such allusions and to take no notice of them. But it was hard upon her, who had been so good to the child, to think that little Emma was glad she was a married lady, and could in her turn give a certain countenance. All these sharp, secret, unseen arrows went direct to Mary's heart.

But on the whole the regiment kept its word and made no difference. Mrs. Kirkman called every Wednesday and took Mary with her to the prayermeeting which she held among the soldiers' wives, and where she said she was having much precious fruit; and was never weary of representing to her companion that she had need of being brought down and humbled, and that for her part she would rejoice in anything which would bring her dear Mary to a more serious way of thinking; which was an expression of feeling perfectly genuine on Mrs. Kirkman's part, though at the same time she felt more and more convinced that Mrs. Ochterlony. had been deceiving her, and was not by any means an innocent sufferer. The Colonel's wife was quite sincere in both these beliefs, though it would be hard to say how she reconciled them to each other; but then a woman is not bound to be logical, whether she belongs to the High or Low Church. At the same time she brought Mary sermons to read, with passages marked, which were adapted for both these states of feeling, -some consoling the righteons who were chastened because they were beloved, and some exhorting the sinners who had been long callous and now were beginning to awaken to a sense of their sins. Perhaps Mary, who was not very discriminating in point of sermon-books, read both with equal innocence, not seeing their special application: but she could scarcely be so blind when her friend discoursed at the Mothers' Meeting upon the Scripture Marys, and upon her who wept at the Saviour's feet. Mrs. Ochterlony understood then, and never forgot afterwards, that it was that Mary with whom, in the mind of one of

Not the Mary blessed among women, identified. the type of motherhood and purity, but the other Mary, who was forgiven much because she had much loved. That night she went home with a swelling heart, wondering over the great injustice of human ways and dealings, and crying within herself to the Great Spectator who knew all, against the evil thoughts of her neighbours. Was that what they all believed of her, all these women? and vet she had done nothing to deserve it, not so much as by a light look, or thought, or word; and it was not as if she could defend herself, or convince them of their cruelty: for nobody accused her, nobody reproached her-her friends, as they all said, made no difference. This was the sudden cloud that came over Mary in the very fairest and best moment of her life.

But as for the Major, he knew nothing about all that. It had been done for his peace of mind, and until the next thing occurred to worry him he was radiant with good-humour and satisfaction. If he saw at any time a cloud on his wife's face he thought it was because of that approaching necessity which took the pleasure out of everything even to himself, for the moment, when he thought of itthe necessity of sending Hugh "home." "We shall still have Islay for a few years at least, my darling," he would say, in his affectionate way; "and then the baby,"-for there was a baby, which had come some time after the event which we have just narrated. That too must have had something to do, no doubt, with Mary's low spirits. "He'll get along famously with Aunt Agatha, and get spoiled, that fellow will," the Major said; "and as for Islay, we'll make a man of him." And except at those moments, when, as we have just said, the thoughts of his little Hugh's approaching departure struck him, Major Ochterlony was as happy and lighthearted as a man who is very well off in all his domestic concerns, and getting on in his profession, and who has a pleasant consciousuess of doing his duty to all men and a grateful sense of the mercies of God, should be, and naturally is. When two people are yoked for life together, there is generally one of the two who bears the burden, while the other takes things easy. Sometimes it is the husband, as is fit and right, who has the heavy weight on his shoulders; but sometimes, and oftener than people think, it is the wife. And perhaps this was why Major Ochterlony was so frisky in his harness, and the Madonna Mary felt her screnity fall into sadness, and was conscious of going on very slowly and heavily upon the way of life. Not that he was to blame, who was now, as always, the best husband in the regiment, or even in the world. Mary would not for all his fidgets, not for any reward, have changed him against Colonel Kirkman with his fishy eye, nor against Captain Hesketh's jolly countenance, nor for anybody else within her range of vision. He was very far from perfect, and in utter innocence had given her a wound which her most intimate associates, she had come to be throbbed and bled daily whichever way she turned herself, and which she would never cease to feel all her life; but still at the same time he stood alone in the world, so far as Mary's heart was concerned: for true love is, of all things on earth, the most pertinacious and unreasonable, let the philosophers say what they will.

And then the baby, for his part, was not like what the other babies had been; he was not a great fellow, like Hugh and Islay; but puny and pitiful and weakly,—a little selfish soul that would leave his mother no rest. She had been content to leave the other boys to Providence and Nature, tending them tenderly, wholesomely, and not too much, and hoping to make men of them some day; but with this baby Mary fell to dreaming, wondering often as he lay in her lap what his future would be. She used to ask herself unconsciously, without knowing why, what his influence might be on the lives of his brothers, who were like and yet so unlike him: though when she roused up she rebuked herself, and thought how much more reasonable it would be to speculate upon Hugh's influence, who was the eldest, or even upon Islay, who had the longest head in the regiment, and looked as if he meant to make some use of it one day. To think of the influence of little weakly Wilfrid coming to be of any permanent importance in the lives of those two strong fellows seemed absurd enough; and yet it was an idea which would come back to her, when she thought without thinking, and escaped as it were into a spontaneous state of mind. The name even was a weak-minded sort of name, and did not please Mary; and all sorts of strange fancies came into her head as she sat with the pitiful little peevish baby, who insisted upou having all her attention, lying awake and fractious upon her wearied knee.

Thus it was that the first important scene of her history came to an end, with thorns which she never dreamed of planted in Mrs. Ochterlony's way, and a still greater and more unthought-of cloud rising slowly upon the broken serenity of her life.

MY DERVISH LIFE.

In the evening of the 27th March, 1863, my noble patron, the Turkish ambassador in Teheran, received me at his table for the last time before my departure. It was said (but this, of course, was only to frighten and dissuade me from my adventurous scheme) that I was, on this occasion, for the last time in my life to partake of European fare, served up in European fashion. The elegant diningroom at the hotel of the Embassy was brilliantly illuminated, the best dishes were placed before the guests, the best wines were passed round; they wanted, in short, to send me forth on my arduous journey haunted by recollections of European comforts. My friends sought all that evening to trace in my features some traitorous indications of the excitement within. They were, however, greatly out in their anticipations. In a state of ecstatic enjoyment I lay buried in my silk-velvet arm-chair.

Twenty-four hours afterwards, in the evening of the 28th March, I was in the middle of my mendicant associates, on my journey to Sari. We had taken refuge in a half-ruined mud hut, named Dagarn. The rain fell in torrents. Tolerably well soaked, we hastened, all of us, to shelter ourselves under the dry roof. The space was small, and it was my destiny this very first evening to find myself in the closest coutact with my travelling companions, whose tattered clothes, giving out at no time any very fragrant odours, in their present wet condition emitted a vaporous steam really curious to observe! It was not, then, surprising under such circumstances, that I had little desire to assail the large wooden dish from which the famished VII—2

Hadjis extracted and devoured their supper, splashing about as they did so with their hands in the common receptacle. Besides, I was at the moment less tormented by the pangs of hunger than exhausted with fatigue and uneasy in my wet dress of rags, to which habit had not yet made me familiar. Huddled together in a ball on the ground, I sought to abandon myself to sleep; but sleep in such confined space was impossible. Now I felt my neighbour's hand, now his head, whirled over me; at another time it was the foot of a vis-à-vis which was extended to scratch me behind my ear. With the patience of a Job I had to defend myself against all these offices of questionable amiability. I might even then have contrived to snatch some moments of slumber, had it not been for the snoring dialogue kept up by the Tartars, and more especially for the loud cries of suffering that a Persian mulcdriver, afflicted with rheumatism, emitted in his

Finding all attempts to close my eyes fruitless, I extricated myself from the midst of the heap of human beings spread around in chaotic confusion, and set myself upon my legs. The rain continued to fall, and looking out into the deep and troubled obscurity I thought of where I had been twenty-four hours previously, and of the sumptuous parting entertainment at the splendid hotel of the Turkish Embassy. All seemed to me like a dramatic representation of the "King and the Beggar," in which I was myself playing the principal part. The sentiment of reality produced, however, upon me not so bitter an impression, for was I not master of the position? was I not he who had worked this sudden metamorphosis? had not I myself imposed my fate upon myself?

The task of conquering my own feelings, however hard, did not occupy me more than a few days. With respect to externals, I soon made myself familiar with all the attributes, moveable and immoveable, of the state of Dervish-its filth and other etceteras. The best garment that I had brought with me from Teheran, I presented as a gift to a poor infirm sick Hadji, and this act of beneficence won me the hearts of all. My new uniform consisted of a felt jacket, worn by me without any shirt, close to my skin, and a Djubbe (upper garment)* tied round my loins by a cord. I had enveloped my feet in rags, and covered my head with an immense turban; the lafter served me as a parasol by day, and as a bolster by night. Like the rest of the Hadjis, I slung around me a sack by way of cartouche-box, containing a voluminous Koran; and then contemplating myself thus accoutred for grand parade, I felt authorised to cry out proudly, "Verily, I am a beggar born."

The external, the material part of my "disguise," was easy. The moral, the inner part, presented more difficulty than I had contemplated. many a long year I had had occasion to study the contrast between European and Asiatic modes of existence; the critical position in which I was forced me to be on my guard, and yet I could not help committing many gross blunders. It is not merely in language, features, and dress that esseutial differences exist between the two races. We Europeans eat, drink, sleep, sit, and stand otherwise than the Orientals, -uay, I might even say, we laugh, cry, and wink differently. These are little points, evident at once to the senses, and still difficult enough of imitation: and yet what is the difficulty of surmounting them, in comparison with the trouble that it costs to metamorphose sentiments and feelings! One is always more excited and observant, and more disposed to play the critic, during journeys than on other occasions of everyday life; it requires an unspeakable effort for an European to conceal the curiosity, wonder, and other emotions which the contemplation of the allindifferent, the energiless Oriental excites in his mind. The object, however, of the journey of my friends was to reach their homes; my object was simply the journey itself. The peculiarity of my character interested them only in the first moment of approach, theirs on the other hand was an object of continual study to me; certainly the idea never could have occurred to any one amongst them, that my mind was employed upon a twofold task, even when we were jesting and chattering in the most familiar terms of companionship.

Any one who has the smallest practical or theoretical experience of the East will understand how hard it is to adapt oneself to these remarkable idiosyncrasies. The happy result that attended my "disguise" may appear surprising, but still not a subject of extraordinary astonishment, when I lay before the reader the key to the secret in the following observations.

First. Only one of my travelling companions had ever seen Europe or had to do with Europeans: this was Hadji Bilal, who may perhaps have known a few Greeks or Armeniaus passing for Frenghi. Even Stambul, and the mode of living amongst the Stambuli, were but imperfectly known to them. My transgressions against custom and usage did not pass unobserved, but met with the ready excuse: "Stambul kaidesi sundek iken." "It is the custom at Constantinople." They regarded, therefore, the particular offence as a mere solecism.

Secondly. The consciousness of the imminent danger that threatened me when once beyond the circle of my companious, disposed me to make the greatest sacrifices. I soon was aware of the high value of their friendship, and did everything I could to win it. In spite of my admitted superiority to them from being a Mollah, no one in the Karavan, in purse, clothes, or food, was poorer or worse off than myself. I submitted to all, and was ever ready to render a service or do an obliging act; and as they really all were at bottom straightforward and honest men, I saw at once that they would not fail to protect their friend and fellow-traveller, who was a universal favourite.

Thirdly. And this perhaps may be regarded as the main cause: my poverty and my bodily infirmity beyond dispute were my principal safeguards. Amongst the Turkomans, and especially in Etnek, the Hadjis not being in much respect, I ran considerable risk; but at the current market rate for slaves of inferior class, I was hardly worth more than three ducats-not so valuable, in fact, as a stout ass. I could only be used by private individuals to turn a millstone or take charge of camels: trivial services these, hardly on the one side worth the cost of my maintenance, and on the other not possessing sufficient force of attraction to tempt the superstitious Nomad to commit a sin. Again, in Bokhara the emptiness of my purse was of more help to me than all the learning of Islamism. My character of Mollah and Devotee made me certainly safe from any public attack, but had I been in the possession of visible property, it would not have secured me from the underhand proceedings of secret enemies. Strangers in Bokhara, objects of suspicion, have in other cases excited cupidity by being known to be possessors of money and other articles of value; whereas I was not only a beggar, but an urgent one, from whose importunities all men carefully sought to escape.

Such were the causes which prevented my disguise from having any evil consequences, and made it happily contribute to the ends I had in view. But every one will understand that whilst I was actually occupied with my journey, I was only half conscious of the efficacy of these causes, and so could not place any entire confidence in them. Habit too enables us to endure a life subject even to constant perils: still it is remarkable how long and violent the struggle is which the soul, in its recklessness and its callousness, maintains with the hope of an existence beyond this world. To guard against every event, it was long before I ventured to make a hearty meal at my supper: for I dreaded lest an overloaded stomach should lead to dreams, and dreams to the utterance of foreign European phrases. I laughed at my pusillanimity, and blamed myself, but still I persisted, particularly in the first months, in my ceaseless measures of precaution.

What pain these phantom terrors occasioned me! how they persecuted me, when I sat alone in the immense desert away from the Karavan devouring my unleavened bread, mixed with ashes and charcoal, and washed down with a few mouthfuls of foul-smelling water,—a refreshment that those thoughts would not even allow me to partake of in repose! "All slumber, no eye beholds thee," I said to myself. Yet no: the hills of sand in the distance seemed to me to be spies on the watch to catch me omitting the Bismillah, or breaking or eating my bread in other than right Mohammedan fashion.

Often did it happen, and the remark applies particularly to Khiva, that when I was lying all alone in the dark and closed teut, the cry to prayers reached my ears, and made me spring hurriedly up from my couch, and apply myself to the fatiguing operation of the thirteen Rikaat (genuflexions). At the sixth, seventh, eighth, I said to myself, "Surely it is enough, for no eye beholds thee." Not at all, for I could not divest myself of the idea that prying eyes were regarding me through the crevices, and so I continued until I had conscientiously completed the prescribed number.

Perhaps the expression, "measures of precaution," may be regarded as inappropriate, and my whole proceedings be ascribed to want of courage. Now I will not deny that, seeing with what suspicion I was at first regarded, and in how mild and anarchical a state Central Asia was, I did not feel in any great spirits for my adventure. But this discouragement did not extend beyond the first month of my disguise. In the others, from the moment when I had turned my back upon Bokhara, I was really metamorphosed into a povertystricken Dervish, who, as he himself gradually forgot the assumed part that he was playing, ceased to excite suspicion in the minds of others. When I now, in the centre of European civilisation, reflect upon my position at that time, I cannot refrain from laughing at what habit and necessity were capable of making of me in so short a time. That life of Dervish began even to have charms, it procured me many a moment of great enjoyment. Without feeling any especial aptitude to play the part of the Russian Count who, weary of a life spent in saloons, retreated to one of the valleys of Cashmere, I felt often an inner sensation of satisfaction as I warmed myself to my heart's content in some ruin or other sequestered spot by the temperate beams of the autumn sun. And then it is beyond expression sweet to know that one can, without money, position, or business—and yet free from all care, agitation, and exciting impulse—rock oneself to repose in the soft cradle of Oriental indifference and tranquillity!

Of course for us Europeans such enjoyment must be of brief duration; for let but our thoughts flee away towards that remote West that is ever active and ever moving, and the great contrast of the two presents itself to us in the clearest light. European enterprise and Oriental repose are the two problems that occupy the mind: need we do more than glance at those ruins lying everywhere scattered in the East, to see on which side is the true philosophy? Here everything tends to destruction and slavery; there, to prosperity and world-wide dominion!

But these enjoyments of the "state of Dervish" were in my case prevented, by my strong European temperament, from being more than short-lived and transitory. My disguise, however, furnished me with another of a far more elevated description—the enjoyment, I mean, derived by me from being able, as an accomplished Dervish, to hold free and unconstrained intercourse with those strange nations. Was it an innate talent, or a particular predilection for the status, which enabled me soon to outstrip in Fakirship even my preceptor in the art? I know not. When in the cities or amongst the Nomads I undertook the part of levying contributions, my friends felt at once assured that I would return with my bags well crammed. Of the tribes of Central Asia the Özbegs, from their straightforward and honest natures, possess hearts most accessible and most easily won. At one house in the vicinity of Khiva, where I spent several days, they tried even forcibly to detain me; nay, even to marry me -at least, the head of the family, representing his daughter, had already made me a declaration of love. The honest, unsuspicious people saw, as they thought, in me a poor Garib (stranger) whom his passion (arman) impelled forth into the wide world, and so they took a real interest in my fortunes. In their opinion the travelling Dervish is a sort of wandering Jew in miniature, in whose ear some spirit abiding within keeps whispering those ominous words, "On, On!" and who can never rest until he has reached the goal prescribed by fate.

This childish simplicity, these characters and manners, which have remained in stereotype there for so many years, one might even say for thousands, have left upon my soul ineffaceable impressions. After being with the Nomads some hours, they often began to converse with me in the most confidential tone of the rearing of cattle or some other subject of domestic economy. A husband would speak of the peculiar qualities that distinguished one of his horses, of the sons of the famous chieftain N. N., of the failure of a predatory expedition undertaken by this or that tribe, &c. The wife would question me whether in my country this year the Rugar (a sort of red root) had a similarly pale colour, whether the camel's hair was there as bad, and so on. How little likely such people were to have any notion of the meaning of an academical mission the reader must easily see, and will as easily divine what was the nature of my answers to each particular question!

However incredible the avowal may appear, I will nevertheless make it openly, that the very extraordinary condition in which I found myself during my time of disguise was far from being attended by as much hardship and fatigue as many Europeans may fancy. At this moment, it is true, I find my health somewhat impaired, and my former acquaintances do not affect to conceal from me that I seem grown much older; but during the journey itself I did not experience the slightest sensation of exhaustion or uneasiness, excepting of course when I was suffering from the torments of thirst. Was it the continued state of excitement that lightened the burden which I had to endure; or was it the ever-fresh, free air of the desert that imparted a giant energy to my stomach, enabling it to assimilate and digest such dough kneaded with sand and ashes as even my camel found too bad to touch? This still remains a riddle to me.

Certain, however, it is, that at this moment, in the midst of the civilised life of Europe, I seem somewhat to miss those active movements of body and soul; and who knows if I shall not in my later years dwell often upon that time when, although covered with rags and having no roof to cover me, I tramped sturdily and of good heart through the steppes of Central Asia!

ARMINIUS VAMBÉRY.

HYMN TO THE NEW YEAR,

ON ITS BEING "RUNG IN" BY CHURCH BELLS ON NEW-YEAR'S EVE.

HAIL to the Infant of the Ages! hail!

Shout with the peal that consecrates his birth;
Time's youngest born! we claim thee in the gale

That bears thee on thy sounding wings to earth.

Thou from the womb of far Eternity,

Last of thy brotherhood, hast sprung to light.

Child of the past! hail for thy lineage high!

O, be thy sojourn, as thy advent, bright!

We claim thee, Stranger—claim thee, for His will,
And in His name, whose work are we and thou:
Angels, be near our purpose to fulfil
And stamp the hallowing seal upon thy brow!

By broken vows and penitential tears,
By sins forgiven, by joys and sorrows flown,
By voices of the past, by holy fears,
By trembling hopes, we claim thee for our own.

Young, lusty Infant! bind him as he lies,
Ere the first sunbeam, with a charm of prayer:
Cast flowers of love on his unopened eyes,
And crown with wreaths of hope his fragrant hair.

With wreaths of hope—but such as shall not fade
When his brief joys and woes have sank to rest;
With flowers of love,—but let their scents be made
Of airs breathed from the gardens of the blest.

As he on us, so we on him will smile;
All thanks to Him by whom such grace is given;
His face of love shall no true heart beguile,
That takes him, as he comes, a boon from heaven.

Yes, smile on him: yet, smiling, do not tear
The veil that hides him from too keen a gaze;
Scan not the myst'ries of the New-born Year,
Nor pierce, before the time, hope's golden haze.

Raise not his eyelids: tears may lie beneath;
Full quickly he will wake and gaze around.
Ere his closed lips their first faint accents breathe,
Pray that no heart need tremble at their sound.

Pray that no cloud of sin may darken o'er
The dreams that float above his waking eyes;
That, all unstain'd, the Angel Child may soar
With added glories back to Paradise.

Dread Child! ev'n thus thy new-born brother lay Whose parting sigh still mingles with thy glee; His race is run, his form is pass'd away; But Memory speaks in him, as Hope in thee.

She speaks of mercies, gladdening as the light, Rich as their Giver, free as heav'n above; Of softened griefs and darken'd hearts made bright, Of hopes fulfill'd, and life-redeeming love.

She speaks in warning; let her voice be heard,
Her still, small, voice; it may not sound in vain:
Sad tones are mingled in that solemn Word;
Catch the clear accents of her magic strain.

Hath it no sound that tells of guilt or fear?

No evil written on the iron leaf?

No frown upon the brow of Time, no tear

Shed for past sin, more sad than earthly grief?

Onward, still onward! diff'ring, yet the same, Shall this Year's story but the last repeat? O! yet, for love, for fear, for hope, for shame, Guide we in straighter paths our wav'ring feet!

Then come what may of pain, or toil, or woe,
Ev'n lonely sorrow come, and silent fear,
Our earthly Sun shall only set below
To rise in Light on heav'n's Eternal Year.

THE STORY OF JOHN HUSS.

By HENRY ROGERS, Author of "The Eclipse of Faith."

THE story of John Huss, the great Bohemian Reformer, has been often told, and is sufficiently familiar to the student of ecclesiastical history. But it may be doubted whether it has been so well known to ordinary readers, either as it deserves to be, or as that of Luther unquestionably is. This is partly to be ascribed to the remoteness of the age in which he lived.—it is now just 450 years since his martyrdom; partly to the character of the reformation he aimed at, and which did not touch the great doctrinal abuses, the correction of which, after all, was an essential preliminary to any radical reformation, such, in a word, as the Church required, and Luther achieved; partly to the fact that the heroic effort he made was not successful, and that his memory has been clouded by the subsequent excesses of his followers; lastly, and above all perhaps, to the circumstance, that the more illustrious name of Luther has eclipsed that of his great predecessor,-in the blaze of whose fame this bright morning star of the Reformation has almost faded from our eyes. For these reasons it may be well to say a little respecting the principal incidents of his life and the more striking traits of his character, in a periodical, which must have many thousands of readers who have not paid much, or, perhaps, any attention to the claims of the great Bohemian to the grateful homage and everlasting remembrance of mankind.

Nor can any who love and revere the name of Luther forget that it was probably due to Huss that Luther was able to do so much; nay, that he lived to do anything. We may say this, not merely because Huss was a pioneer in the same great work; that he shaped many of the stones, and hewed much of the timber, of that Temple he was not permitted to build; that he made an impression on the outworks of the fortress which it was reserved for Luther to storm; not merely because Luther derived some lights, and still greater stimulus, at an early period of his carcer, from the history and writings of Huss, as is seen clearly in his letters, and in the allusions he made to him at the Leipsic Disputation; * not merely, I say, for these reasons, (in fact, all the "Reformers before the Reformation," as they have been well called, are entitled to some of that praise,) but for a more special reason. In all likelihood, Huss was not simply the precursor of Luther, but literally paid down, in his martyrdom, the ransom of his life. That violation of the imperial safe-conduct which, to the eternal shame of Emperor, Pope, Cardinals, and the whole Council of Constance, involved the death of Huss, was the very thing which probably prevented the like crime in the case of Luther at Worms. Vehemently was Charles V. urged to imitate the conduct of Sigismund, and violate, for the sake of the Church, the safe-conduct granted to Luther; strongly was he plied by the same casuistry, namely, that "no faith was to be kept with heretics;" but Charles replied that "he had no wish to blush like his predecessor Sigismund,"-in allusion to the story of Sigismund's having manifested so much weakness, when Huss alluded to the subject of his safe-conduct, at the Council of Constance. The scandal of that iniquitous transaction of the previous century was Luther's ægis at Worms, and hence he safely quitted that place which he had entered with such dauntless courage in defiance of so many omens of evil. Thus was Huss probably the saviour of Luther-

Dipped in his fellow's blood The living bird went free.

The courage of Luther indeed was as great as though he too had died a martyr. During his whole progress to Worms, whither he went with such inflexible obstinacy against all the remonstrances of his friends and the muttered threats of his enemies, it is evident that he contemplated the too great likelihood of sharing the fate of Huss. The genius and maxims of ecclesiastical policy were unchanged; the terrors of Reformation at least as strong; and the inheritors of the persecuting principles of Constance equally unscrupulous. He would assuredly have died if Charles V. had not been afraid of "blushing."

And as Huss deserves the veneration of posterity. scarcely more for what he did in the cause of Reformation, than for the spell which his name and fate threw around Luther, so his history itself is full of deepest and most tragical interest. In the vast catalogue of martyrs there is hardly a victim whose fate awakens such uumingled admiration for the unflinching fortitude and constancy with which he adhered to what he deemed truth, and suffered for it; or which inspires such vivid, aud, indeed, exquisitely painful sympathy, as we read the story. Exposed, single-handed, to the concentrated enmity of the whole Roman Church and hierarchy, as embodied in the cruel Council of Constancee, -to Pope and Cardinals, Emperor and Princes; feeling that the whole might of prescription, both of the present and the past, was against him; doubtless often tempted to ask himself, as ^{* &}quot;When I studied at Erfurdt," says Luther, in the edition of the letters of Huss (1537), "I found in the library of the convent, a book entitled The Sermons of John Huss. I had a great curiosity to know what doctrines that arch-heretic had propagated. My astonishment was incredible. I could not comprehend why they burnt so great a man, who explained the Scriptures with so much skill and gravity. . . But as his name was held in such abhorrence that I imagined the sky would fall and the sun be darkened if I made honourable mention of him, I shut the book with no little indignation."

Juther sometimes did, and as Huss was still more likely to do in that earlier and darker age, "Whether it was possible that he alone should be right, and all the rest of the world wrong;" troubled with those tremors of heart which such a possibility could not but awaken, he yet held on his way-though darker and darker at every step-undaunted. Such was the mastery which the truth had over him, so gloriously imperious was conscience, so profound his reverence for Scripture, and so resolute was he, like Luther, to 'vield obedience to that alone, that he was proof alike against shame and ignominy, cajolery and adulation, promises and threats, and at last sealed his testimony by enduring death in the most appalling of all shapes. This last proof of heroism, indeed, many men have given, both before and after him. But very few, if any, ever passed such an ordeal of absolute abandonment to the "cruel mockings" and wrongs of a hostile world, with so majestic a patience as he did. Huss before the Council of Constance is one of the sublimest pictures in the whole gallery of history.

It is not my intention to give a full account of his life; but a slight sketch of its principal events is necessary for comprehending the significance of the closing scenes of it. It will not occupy much space, for the records of his early years are unusually meagre.

He was born about 1370, at Hassinetz, a village of Bohemia, not far from Prague. Huss is the Bohemian name for a "goose," and this furnishes both Huss and his enemies more than once with some rather clumsy pleasantry. It is hard to say whether he or they are more ponderously witty in availing themselves of it; he for the enhancement of his humility, and they as a term He was born of lowly but honest parents, who seem to have done all they could for his education.

He was first sent to the school of his native village, and afterwards to another of somewhat higher order, in a neighbouring town. He was noted from his boyhood for the acuteness and vigour of his intellect, and made good in his youth all the promise of his childhood. He was sent to the University of Prague at an early age; and in the dearth of authentic details, writers have garnished this event with some idle traditions. There is an absurd story, for example, which L'Enfant gravely relates from an old author, that "when his mother took him to Prague to enter him at the university, she took a goose and a cake with her as a present to the rector, and that by chance the goose flew away, an accident which the poor woman looked upon as an evil omen, and fell down on her knees to recommend her son to the Divine Protection" (the tutelary "goose," we may suppose, having left its namesake), "and went on her way with great heaviness of heart, that half her oblation to the rector was "He lived in times," says the same historian,

"that were very favourable to the improvement of his various talents," a proposition which it is somewhat difficult to accede to, considering that the shadow of the "dark ages" still lay upon them. and the crepusculum of a better time was just beginning to glimmer. But it may be conceded (and this is probably what is meant), that it was a period of literary and intellectual activity as compared with the preceding centuries; and his proximity to Prague certainly ensured him the advantages of one of the first universities in Europe.

Of his academic career we know little or nothing, except that it was honourable and successful. Certain dates preserved in the ancient memoir of him by an unknown author, prefixed to the folio edition of his works, inform us that in 1393 he became M. A. and B. D.; three years after was ordained priest, and began to preach; in 1400 was appointed to that function in the chapel of Bethlehem, at Prague, where he became the favourite court preacher of Sophia, the Queen of Wenceslaus. In 1401, he was elected Dean of the Faculty of Divinity and Confessor to the Queen; and some time after, Rector of the University.

In 1405 he had already become famous for his sermons at Bethlehem, preached in his native tongue, in which he insisted on forgotten evangelical verities, and inveighed energetically against the corruptions of the Church and the vices of the clergy. It was in the nature of things that this should expose him to the hatred of the Church. He had been equally fearless, indeed, against the vices of the laity; but King Wenceslaus sarcastically told the clergy, it was only when he began to attack similar vices in the Church that he became so obnoxious to them.

He gave great offence, also, to a large portion of the Bohemian clergy by the part he took in the great Papal Schism; strongly advocating the rejection of the claims of Gregory XII.

But his sermons were not the only cause of the fierce hatred which followed him from this time to his death. Strange to say, there were other reasons for the odium attached to him, perhaps as potent, or nearly as potent, as any of his imputed religious errors, though they had nothing to do with religion. Enthusiastically beloved by a large party of his countrymen, there was of course always a large part of the Romish Church, who, for the very same causes, were bitterly opposed to him; but, had he had no other enemies, it is pretty certain he might have remained safe in Bohemia (supposing it had been possible for him to evade the summons to Constance), as Luther in Saxony under the protection of Frederick. Of course, he had the dominant church party also against him, out of Bohemia; but their hatred was greatly strengtheued by the extraneous causes to which we have just adverted, and which it is necessary to bear in mind in order to understand his true position. The first is, the part he took in asserting certain rights of his countrymen to a just share in the government of the University of Prague, and by which he exposed himself to the hatred of Germany. The remembrance of that quarrel, in which the Germans were worsted, (and as they alleged, perhaps truly alleged), through the instrumentality of Huss, inspired them with a lifelong hatred of him. Having such important results, the quarrel may justify a few words of explanation.

The University of Prague was founded in the year 1347, by the Emperor Charles IV. It was modelled on the statutes of the universities of chief note in Europe, as Paris and Bologna, where, in questions involving university honours and emoluments, three votes were given to the native, and one vote to the foreign, members. But as, during the infancy of the University of Prague, there was a much larger number of students from various parts of the Germanic Empire than from Bohemia, this proportion was reversed. The consequence was that the university honours and rewards were almost monopolised by the Germans; and, as the native students increased in numbers, this naturally occasioned much chagrin and discontent. They sought to redress this wrong, and were successful, principally through the efforts of Huss and Jerome of Prague. Huss admitted that the provisional management was reasonable enough, as long as the foreign element in the university was so preponderant. But when that was no longer the case, "It is just," said he, "that we should have three votes, and that you Germans should be content with one." The Germans, however, as might be expected, were by no means content. On the contrary, so exasperated were they, that they agreed, should the alteration take place, they would leave the university en masse; and, it is further said, resolved that if any were obstinate enough to refuse taking a part in this exodus, he should expiate his guilt by the loss of two of his fingers! a curious illustration of the old saying as to the "humanising effects of polite learning," and not less of the strength of national hatred. Be this as it may. the Germans, (who doubtless thought, from their numbers, that their secession would leave the university as "frightful a solitude" as Tertullian says the Roman Empire would have been if all the Christians had gone out of it,) carried out their threat. And if their numbers had been as great as some accounts make them, no doubt the vacuum would have been all but complete. But the figures generally given are clearly fabulous, as is indicated by the enormous differences in the several accounts found in different writers. As reported in L'Enfant, one writer says the students were 44,000, which is about as probable as that there were at one time 30,000 students at Oxford. Another, a little more modestly, says 40,000; a third computes the roll at 36,000; a fourth comes down to 24,000; Æneas Sylvius reduces it to 5,000, which Count Krasinski thinks may have been the truth, though he hardly assigns any sufficient reason for preferring it to that of other writers who fixed it at 2000! In other words, we know little about the matter.

The secession of the foreign students took place in 1409, and led to the establishment of the University of Leipsic.

The seceding Germans spread and kept alive among their countrymen, a vivid and lasting hatred of Huss, which formed an appreciable element in the grand total of enmities combined against him in the Council of Constance.

It may be as well to add that there was probably also another adventitious cause of hostility to Huss. He was in philosophy a "Realist." Now between the Realists and their opponents, the Nominalists, the disputes were equally unintelligible and interminable, and turued upon refinements of abstraction so extremely subtle that (one would imagine) they could never stir in a single human bosom the faintest breath of passion! But this would be to credit human nature with far more good sense than it can claim. Whatever men can wrangle about, be it the idlest phantasm of the most crazy dreamer, that they can also fight about; and indeed often with an energy of passion in inverse proportion to the importance or clearness of the point in dispute. Accordingly, these two metaphysical sects often sought to decide by blows what they could not decide by reason; and shed blood and even sacrificed lives for the question, whether an abstract name (as man, for example) represented any one man in particular, or man in general. In short, they made more than one university of Europe a sort of metaphysical Donnybrook, where the combatants fought with about as intelligent understanding of what they were fighting for, and also with as much passion and obstinacy as any Irish "factions" whatsoever. Now it has been surmised that the fact that Huss was a Realist, and consequently hated by the opposite faction of the Nominalists, made him obnoxious to many of his judges at Constance. It is certainly not a little mournful, as well as curious, that in this and other cases, the fortunes of Truth and Humanity should often be imperilled by considerations which have nothing in the world to do with either the one or the other; that a man like John Huss may be made a martyr for religion, in a great measure because national animosities have set two communities by the ears, and opposite sects are blindly engaged in a night-battle about an incomprehensible dogma of metaphysics.*

Another fact which undoubtedly had much more to do with his fate, as really exercising a powerful influence over his theological opinions and exposing him to the rancour of Rome, was his attachment to the writings of Wickliffe. It is an interesting circumstance to Englishmen, that from our remote insular seclusion went forth the influence which gave the chief impulse to the Bohemian Reformer. It makes good the quaint words of Fuller in his "Church History of England," when speaking of the posthumous dishonour put on Wickliffe's ashes:—"They were cast into the Swift, a neighbouring brook, running hard by. Thus this brook hath conveyed his ashes into Avon, Avon into Severn, Severn into the narrow seas, then into the Main Ocean. And thus the ashes of Wickliffe are the emblem of his doctrine, which now is dispersed all the world over."

But that his doctrine should have been conveyed to Bohemia would have seemed as little likely as that any particle of his dust should reach it, in default of that "seaport on the coast of Bohemia," which Shakspeare has created there in spite of geography. Yet so it was; and by one of those incidents by which the Providence of God in the course of its ordinary working easily brings the strangest things to pass, and binds the most distant things together. Our Richard the Second's queen was Anne of Bohemia, daughter of the Emperor Charles IV. After her husband's death she returned to Bohemia, and some of her retinue took many of the writings of Wickliffe with them. Certain Bohemians, it is said, had sojourned for some time at Oxford, among whom was Jerome of Prague: while others add, that two English Lollards found their way to Prague, and were entertained for some time at the house of John Huss, and that from them he got to know the works of Wickliffe. However that may be, and whatever the mode, it is certain that he became well acquainted with several of those works, and that they produced a strong effect on his opinions. At his chapel of Bethlehem, he often spoke in terms of eulogy of the great English Reformer, and prayed that when he died his soul might be with that of Wickliffe, wheresoever that might be!

There is a tradition that the two English Wick-liffites asked Huss to allow them to paint the hall of his house, and that on his granting the request they depicted, on one side, Christ's lowly entry into Jerusalem, and on the other, in strong contrast with it, a splendid procession of the Pope and his cardinals, in all the pomp and glitter of pontifical pageantry. It is said these pictures excited much curiosity; that many came to see them, and went away divided in opinion about their propriety. But the generality of ecclesiastics understood the pictorial writing of these Wicklifite Mexicans too well, and it is said that the pictures created so much scandal that the Englishmen were compelled to quit Prague.

Whatever the truth of these traditions, it is certain that Wickliffe's writings were extensively circulated at Prague at this time, as we shall presently see from the crusade of the Archbishop of Prague against them. Cochleus tells us that many of the "manuscripts were beautifully written and splendidly embossed and bound—bullis aureis tegimentisque preciosis ornata." This not only shows the justice of Krasinski's remark, that they had been in the possession of wealthy and therefore influential persons, but it also shows how great value was put upon jewels which were enshrined in such costly caskets. Several of the Reformer's writings Huss himself translated into his native tongue, and took measures to circulate them widely in Bohemia and Maravia

By such proceedings, and especially by his bold invectives against the enormous corruptions of the Church, Huss had formed a considerable party throughout Bohemia intensely desirous of Reform, and disposed to accept him as their leader; not a little influenced, doubtless, by the fact that he had been the champion of their national rights in the great university quarrel, a circumstance which, though it might operate against him out of Bohemia, vastly strengthened his influence within it.

And now things were ripe for a conflict between Huss and the Church. In 1410 the Archbishop of Prague obtained a bull from the Pope (Alexander V.), authorising him to extirpate heresy in Bohemia, and as a means to that end, to burn the writings of Wickliffe wherever they could be found, and to prohibit preaching except in certain specified buildings, from which "chapels" were excluded; and therefore, (which was doubtless the real object,) the chapel of Bethlehem, where Huss preached. After much opposition to the bull, it was at last proclaimed.

On March 9th, 1410, Huss was cited before the Archbishop's Court on the charge of heresy. When he, and others similarly charged with possessing portions of the writings of Wickliffe, asked the Archbishop what part of the Reformer's writings were heretical? they were told that "all the writings of that arch-heretic were heretical," and the Archbishop burnt them accordingly wherever he could lay hands on them. At the same time he forbade all preaching in chapels, and thus gagged Huss. The University of Prague protested, but for the present protested in vain, against the violent measures of the Archbishop.

The ferment spread throughout Bohemia, and the country was divided into two great parties, which in many places threatened, and indeed broke, the public peace. This led to a series of struggles between King Wenceslaus and the refractory Archbishop, into which we have not space to enter, but which are amongst not the least memorable or instructive of the contests between the temporal and the spiritual powers during the middle ages. We can only notice them so far as they severally bear on the fate of Huss. The King, indolent and addicted to pleasure, is said to have cared very little about the dispute, if the disputants would but have left him alone; but if it went on to civil war, he felt that he could not be left alone. Huss also was a favourite with his queen, and to a certain extent with himself. He ordered the Archbishop to indemnify the folks whose books he had so summarily burnt. The prelate refused; and his estates were sequestrated. - Soon after, a papal embassy arrived at Prague to announce the election of the infamous John XXIII., afterwards deposed by the Council of Constance. The King thought it was a good opportunity to endeavour to obtain the repeal of the "bull" of John's predecessor, and to secure the restitution of the privileges of the chapel of Bethlehem. But the astute Archbishop sent back, with the embassy, emissaries of his own, who defeated the King's object. They procured the Pope's sanction of the Archbishop's proceedings, and a citation for Huss to appear at Rome to plead to the charges of heresy against him. The King declared that Huss could not go "without peril of his life," which no doubt the Pope and Archbishop knew as well as he, or even better; and refused to let him go. The Pope replied that the appearance of Huss was indispensable, and that the judges to try his cause were already appointed. short, the banquet was all prepared, and the Pope seemed to say, "Come, for all things are now ready." Thus backed by the papal authority, the Archbishop reiterated the excommunication of Huss, and claimed that his estates should be restored; the King would not comply with the last, and many of the clergy refused to read out the first. Higher and higher soared hawk and falcon, in the hope to gain a vantage point for striking. The Archbishop, nothing daunted, laid the terrors of interdict on Prague. The King retorted with equally vigorous measures; banished many of the clergy who had been conspicuously busy in the execution of the Archbishop's orders; seized (worse than all!) the treasures of the Chapter of Prague, and made the Estates of the Realm pass a law by which it was forbidden to carry certain causes before the ecclesiastical courts. These measures of retaliation touched what was more precious than doctrine, and finished for the present the contest between the temporal and spiritual powers; and the victory thus lay with the former. The Archbishop agreed to submit the controversy to a court of arbitration, which, on 3rd of July, 1411, decided that the Archbishop was "to submit to the King, to revoke his interdict, to cancel the proceedings he had commenced against heresy, and to send to Rome a declaration that in Bohemia there was no heresy." On the other hand, if the Archbishop complied, the King was to restore his estates, and was to bind himself to punish all heresies, -an easy task, since it seems the Archbishop was to declare at the same time that in Bohemia there were none! And so ended this notable passage of arms between the King and his refractory priest.

As the most illustrious of the successors of John Huss (who really achieved in the cause of Reformation, what Huss only attempted, and far more,) miraculously escaped martyrdom, so it is not a little remarkable that Huss's most illustrious predecessor, Wickcliffe, also escaped it. Both he and Luther died in their beds, contrary to all human probability. And so perhaps might Huss, could he have remained in Bohemia, amidst the tens of thousands who loved, and were ever ready to rally round him. He refused, like Luther and Wickliffe, to obey the citation to appear at Rome; no doubt feeling with them that it was not "good for the health" of a Reformer to go there. All seemed to feel as by instinct that, go where they might, to London, or Constance, or Worms, they had better not repair to Rome. Perhaps they felt like the fox in the fable, who declined the invitation to the lion's den, inasmuch as he had observed that the only footsteps in its vicinity were towards it, and none from it: nulla vestigia retrorsum. If (as already said) Huss could have escaped the invitation to Constance-if he had not severed himself from the thousands of zealous and faithful friends among his compatriots, -he might have remained as safe in their protection, as Luther under that of the Elector of Saxony. Luther indeed ran great risks in going to Worms, but still it was within the "fatherland," and he was surrounded by "troops of friends," not to repeat that the very name and fate of Huss probably proved a shield. Huss has been sometimes blamed for his rashness in going to Constance. But, as L'Enfant has shown in his History of the Council, he had little choice in the matter. When he refused to go to Rome, he appealed to a general Council, and pledged himself to appear before it and abide by it; he went not only with the consent of the King of Bohemia, but by his command; and, though like Luther on the way to Worms, he was not without forebodings and misgivings, he yet seemed to be amply fortified by the imperial safe-conduct with which he was furnished. Perhaps we may also say, with Waddington, that he felt not only an "intense conviction of the truth of his doctrines," but confidence also "in the integrity of the Council." He certainly seems to have hoped that he might be able to disabuse it of its impressions against him, and to reply satisfactorily to the charge of heresy. But though hoping the best, he was prepared for the worst, as is seen in that almost prophetic letter of farewell to his friends, written just before his departure for Constance, in which he touchingly says, "Perhaps you will never see me at Prague any more."

It was on the 11th. of October, 1414, that Huss commenced his journey to Constance: all through Bohemia, as was to be expected, his progress was a series of ovations. Nor was he unfavorably received even in Germany itself. At Nuremburg especially, the most flattering attentions were paid him, and he was conducted into the town by a vast concourse of people. He arrived at Constance, November 2nd, 1414. He was still without his safeconduct; but it came the next day, and was delivered by one of the three Bohemian nobles to whose care King Wenceslaus had committed him. It was couched in the most absolute and unequivocal terms.* No sooner had he arrived in Constance than those intrigues and machinations began which had his destruction for their object, and which were too fatally successful. His enemies, many of them from the party opposed to him in Bohemia, inflamed the minds of the people, spread abroad all sorts of accusations (most of them wholly false), and brought such pressure to bear on the Cardinalsonly too willing doubtless to be pressed-that they "promised he should never be set at liberty." His friend, John de Chlum, was summoned to surrender Huss. That noble Bohemian, indignant at this flagrant attempt to elude or infringe the safe-conduct, appealed to the Pope. The Pope was very polite; declared he had nothing to say against Huss, but that he could not control the Cardinals. De Chlum showed the safe-conduct to all the German princes, and to the magistrates of Constance, but without effect. John Huss was put under arrest, and after being confined for a week in the house of one of the Canons of Constance, was consigned on the 6th of December to a dungeon under ground in the Dominican convent. On the news of his imprisonment, the Emperor, still capable of shame at being compelled to palter with his word, and at the insolence of the lieges who thus set his commands at nought, ordered his instant release. The Council paid no more attention to it than to the expostulations of John de Chlum. On his arrival at Constance, finding his orders had not been obeyed, he threatened to leave the Council to itself, and actually set forth. Some of the Cardinals rode after him, overtook him. and to his own eternal shame so successfully plied him with their diabolical casuistry,—the chief articles of which were "That a General Council could deal with a herctic at its pleasure," and that "No man was bound to keep faith with heretics,"-that they persuaded him, January 1st, 1415, to seal his infamy by giving his consent that the Council should take its course unimpeded by him.

"Whem we have taken into our protection and safe-

Forty-four articles of accusation, all charging Huss with teaching doctrines contrary to those of the Church, were presented. The greater part of these he clearly showed were false; others, misrepresentations or exaggerations of his real opinions; and that the rest were not heresies at all, inasmuch as they had never been condemned by Pope or General Council, and were in harmony both with Scripture and reason. But there was one heresy of heresies of which Huss was guilty, which would have made orthodoxy itself heterodox. He did not acknowledge the Pope and the Cardinals, even with the Council to boot, to constitute the Church; and like Luther in the next century, appealed to the Scripture as the ultimate and supreme authority in guard, and into that of the empire, desiring you, when he comes among you, to receive him well and entertain him kindly, furnishing him with all necessaries for his despatch and security, whether he goes by land or water, without taking anything either from him or his, at coming in or going out, for any sort of duties whatsoever; and to let him freely and securely pass, sojourn, stop, and repass, for the honour and respect of His Imperial Majesty."

matters of faith. He accordingly refused throughout the entire struggle to abandon any opinion unless he was confronted by arguments drawn from Holy Writ. There is no doubt that while he held many opinions and practices opposed to the current superstitions, his chief offence was the unsparing and bitter invectives which he had fulminated from the pulpit of Bethlehem and elsewhere, against the corruptions of the Church, and the vices of the clergy. While they talked of heresy, this was in truth his great heresy.

Unconditional submission to the decisions of the Council was demanded of Huss, whether he believed them true or not. A curious, and almost incredible, instance of the implicit faith sometimes demanded of the individual conscience in those days is given in one of the letters of Huss, wherein he mentions one of the many visits made to him in prison, with the view of entrapping, cajoling, or terrifying him into submission. It was no less than a "certain doctor" who tried his rhetoric on this occasion. "He told me that, whatever I did, I ought to submit to the Council; and subjoined 'if the Council were to say that you have only one eye, while in fact you have two, you ought to confess with the Council that so the matter is.' To whom I said, Even if the whole world should tell me so, as long as I have my senses, I could not say this without doing violence to my conscience. And after some more talk, he gave up the point, and acknowledged that he had not given a very good illustration."

On his arrest, he had demanded "the privilege of a public advocate,"—the more necessary, as his bodily infirmities, cruelly aggravated by his imprisonment, made him very unequal to the task imposed upon him. This most reasonable demand was refused. A strong disposition was also evinced to deprive him altogether of a public trial, but this was found to be more than even the iniquity of the Council could compass.

Huss was brought before the Council three times; namely, on the 5th, 7th, and 8th of June, 1415, and each time was treated with the grossest injustice and cruelty. On the first occasion, the MS. of his treatise on the "Church" was presented to him. and he was asked whether the opinions contained in it were his? Huss avowed them, and his readiness to defend them; but also his readiness to retract everything which should be proved contrary to Scripture. Here he distinctly anticipates the Lutheran dilemma propounded at Worms. This was met by the no doubt sincere outcry, that the question was not what the Scriptures said, but whether he would retract doctrines which the Church, as represented by the Council, declared to be erroneous. Huss began to make a confession of his faith. His confession was not wanted, he was told; but simply that he should answer to the questions put to him, of which that one question just mentioned, was the principal, and admitted of but one answer. He again attempted to enter upon an explanation and defence of his opinions, but was met with rude shouts of derision; and the tumult became so great that Huss was compelled to say (and it was the only thing like rebuke which all his wrongs extorted from him,) that "he had expected more courtesy and moderation from such an assembly." Nevertheless, he defended himself with so much address that he demolished the first charge against him. But fighting thus singlehanded (for, as already said, he had been denied an advocate), and in so mortal a struggle, it is no wonder that his strength failed; he was conducted, exhausted and fainting, to his prison. One day of respite was granted to him, when he was again to be brought into the arena like the early martyrs, to face "the lions," or as St. Paul might have said, "to fight with wild beasts at Ephesus."

On the 7th he was accused of holding opinions contrary to the doctrine of transubstantiation. that old and approved test of orthodoxy, and trap for catching heretics; that grim Moloch of superstition, which brought more of the Reformers to the stake than all their other heterodoxies put together. Huss easily refuted this charge, as in fact he never dreamt of questioning this doctrine, any more than did Luther when he began to preach against indulgences. Other charges were brought forward, of which Huss demanded the proof. Instead of giving it, the Council pressed him with the only alternative, absolute submission to its decrees. On this day, the Emperor Sigismund consummated his own shame, by declaring that though he had given Huss a safe-conduct, yet being now informed by the Fathers of the Council that such a document given to a heretic was, ipso facto, null and void, he would no longer charge himself with his safety. Well might Huss say with David and with Strafford, "Put not your trust in princes." From that moment he saw his fate; but with that same beautiful patience for which he was distinguished, he began to express his thanks to the Emperor for the protection that had hitherto been granted

The last and final hearing, was on June the 8th. The charges were now more specifically those on which (as already said) his "heresies" really depended, namely, the opinions he had so often expressed at Prague, touching the Pope and Cardinals, and the invectives in which he had indulged against the vices of the clergy. He could not deny these charges, and if these could make him guilty, he could not deny his guilt. He might indeed have been wining to apologise for occasional needless intemperance of language, but he could not say that his allegations were false. The one alternative was once more put before him, of unconditional submission to the Council, or to be condemned as a heretic. He in vain implored once more that he might enter into a full exposition of his opinions. He was told that he must retract and abjure the doctrines contained in the forty-four articles, and swear to believe and teach the contrary. Huss then gave the noble answer "that he could not abjure those doctrines which he had never affirmed, and as to others which he did believe, he would not deny the truth against his conscience, until their falsehood was clearly proved to him." Here again he was pleading as Luther pleaded, that nothing can justify a man's saying anything against his conscience.

In vain he was admonished; in vain all sorts of menaces and blandishment were exhausted upon him in turn. He was inflexible; his truly adamantine temper would neither bend nor break. He was taken back to his prison, and as he left the Council, told them, "God must judge between him and them."

At this last appearance before the Council, finding himself brow-beaten and bullied on all hands, and utterly hopeless of obtaining a hearing, in reply to the charges made against him, Huss at last contented himself with reiterating what he had on a previous occasion urged, "a solemn appeal to Christ against the Council." This of course moved only the scorn and derision of this Christian assembly; on which he renewed and justified it. "Behold," he said, "O Christ, how thy Council condemns what Thou hast prescribed and practised. Yes," he continued, turning to the Council, "I have maintained, and still maintain, that there can be no surer appeal than to Jesus Christ; for He can be neither corrupted by bribes, nor deceived by false witnesses, nor cozened by any artifice."

He remained yet a month in his dungeon, and during that time various formulæ of abjuration were proposed to him. Several Cardinals visited him, and plied him with promises and threats by turns. It was still in vain, and on the 1st of July Huss sent to the Council his final resolution, that he neither could nor would abjure any of his opinions until his errors were demonstrated from the Scriptures. His execution was fixed for the 6th of July. But before that hour arrived one other trial, prolonged and ignominious almost beyond example, awaited him. Every ingredient that could add bitterness to that cup was infused into it. This was the public ceremony of his formal degradation. It is not possible to read the account of that scene without wondering at the majestic patience of the man, or without horror and indignation against the perpetrators of the iniquity, and at the system which made such things possible. The only thing that at all mitigates the feeling is contempt for many of the childish forms of spiteful mummery in which their malice embodied itself. He was commanded to assume the priestly vestments; he obeyed. He then ascended a lofty scaffold, prepared for the occasion, and made that remarkable and noble confession to the people: "The Bishops bid me confess that I am in error. If I could comply, with but the loss of the honour of a mortal man, they might perhaps have persuaded me to yield to them. But I stand here, face to face with Almighty God, and I cannot do this without dishonour to Him or without the stings of my own conscience.... How could I lift my eyes to Heaven, how face those whom I have taught, if I were thus to act? Am I to cast into doubt so many souls by my example?"

He was interrupted, and commanded to descend from the scaffold. The several priestly vestments were then successively taken from him by as many bishops, each of whom, as he took his part of the holy finery, (too holy for John Huss to wear,) addressed the poor victim by some too characteristic speech of orthodox irony or malice. The one who took the chalice from him out-heroded the rest: "O thou accursed Judas," said he, "because thou hast abandoned the council of peace, and conspired with the Jews, we take from thee this cup of salvation." Huss undauntedly replied, "But I trust in God the Father of all, and in our Lord Jesus Christ, for whose name's sake I am suffering all this, that He will not take from me the cup of His salvation. On the contrary I have a firm persuasion that I shall drink it to-day in His kingdom." At length came the obliteration of the tonsure, and how to manage this, -that is, (as one may say,) to shave a man already shaved, or rather to unshave him, -not a little puzzled these sacerdotal barbers. One proposed this, and another that. Huss quietly said to the Emperor, "Strange, that though they are all equally cruel, they cannot agree even in their cruelty." At last they decided, (it is said, but it is to be hoped falsely,) to cut with scissors a portion of the scalp. They had now, as they deemed, deprived him of all ecclesiastic symbols of honour and privilege, and nothing remained but to hand him over to the secular arm; but their childish malice suddenly recollected that one thing was still omitted. A large paper cap, painted with grotesque figures of devils, and inscribed with the word "HÆRESIARCHA," was placed on his head. When Huss saw it he said, "Our Lord wore a crown of thorns for my sake, why should not I wear this light, though ignominious cap for His?" The bishops in putting it on said, "We deliver thy body to the flames, and thy soul to the devil." Huss, lifting his eyes, replied, "Into thy hands, O Jesus Christ, I commend my soul which thou hast redeemed."

After this, he was led to the place of execution, just beyond the gate of Gottlieben, where carcases were usually flayed, and where much carrion had been recently strewn about, in order to add to the ignominy of the punishment. On his way, Huss had seen his more immortal part, -his books, -already burning. It only moved a smile, perhaps, at the childishness, perhaps at the futility, of the malice of his enemies. On arriving at the pile, his countenance we are told lighted up with animation. With a loud and clear voice he recited the 31st, and Slst Psalms, and prayed for some time. After one more vain attempt to extract a retractation from him, the fire was lighted. The fuel had only been piled up to his knees, and when burnt down, the upper part of his body was found unconsumed, and hanging on the stake by the chain; the flames were again kindled, and the heart of the refractory heretic having been torn from his body, and beaten and broken with clubs, was separately burnt. But happily, of this supplementary martyrdom, Huss knew nothing. He seems to have been suffocated, rather than burnt, shortly after the fire was kindled, and just after he had uttered with a loud voice his last words, "Jesus Christ, Son of the Living God, have mercy on me!"

The ashes were carefully collected and cast into the Rhine, whence, (as Fuller said of those of Wickliffe, cast into the Avon,) they have been carried into the "main ocean," and so are an "emblem of his doctrine, diffused throughout the world."

As the voluminous accounts of martyrdom scarcely present us with any scene that reminds us more strongly of our blessed Lord in the hall of Pilate and amidst the soldiers of Herod: so, there is none in which the example of the great Master has been more completely copied by the disciple. The patience, dignity, and fortitude of a Christian were marvellously displayed in the whole deportment of the martyr. He "partook of the sufferings of Christ" and "the glory of Christ rested on him." It was something wonderful, that, as he was of too high and hardy a spirit to quail under the accumulated wrongs and cruelties of his persecutors, this very spirit did not betray him into momentary passion or irritation: that after being so fiercely chased he did not at last turn on the hunters, and resent, with unseemly defiance, the insufferable indignities heaped upon him. Luther would certainly have raged like a lion in the toils; Huss was led as "a lamb to the slaughter."

But this is only half his praise; he was inflexible as gentle. Neither the open violence of the Council, nor the artful interrogatories with which he was plied in prison; neither threats and intimidations, nor promises and cajolery; nor, what was hardest to resist of all, the earnest importunities of friendly voices, could warp his steadfast spirit. And this inflexibility, conjoined with such meekness and patience, give to the character and conduct of Huss, an air of moral sublimity which the world has rarely seen equalled. Even the page of L'Enfant, the copious chronicler of the Council of Constance, one of the most honest and laborious, but also one of the dullest, of historians, lights up with a glimmer of animation, and is ruffled with something like energy and pathos, when he comes to depict the closing scenes of the life of the great Bohemian Reformer.*

^{*} One of the most touching and noble appeals made to the Reformer is that of John de Chlum; an appeal which, though it must have cost Huss a pang to part with such a friend, must have sounded in his ears, had he needed such a stimulus, like a trumpet. When every hope was lost, and De Chlum was about to separate from the martyr for the last time, he addressed him in these words:

"My beloved Master,—I am unlettered, and consequently unfit to counsel one so enlightened as you.

Nevertheless, if you are secrethy engaging of any ways.

[&]quot;My beloved Master,—I am unlettered, and consequently unfit to counsel one so enlightened as you. Nevertheless, if you are secretly conscious of any one of those errors which have been publicly imputed to you, I do entreat you not to feel any shame in retracting it; but if, on the contrary, you are convinced of your innocence, I am so far from advising you to say anything

Thus perished this man, after as terrible and prolonged a fight with the "principalities, and powers of this world," close leagued with those of "darkness," as ever was fought by martyr or confessor; -the more terrible that it was fought by him alone, the first of the long and illustrious procession of martyrs of Reformation who were destined, with "the unresistable might of weakness," (as Milton has it,) "to shake the Powers of Darkness, and scorn the fiery rage of the Old Red Dragon." Huss trod his dark path alone, unsupported by the example of that "cloud of witnesses" who gave courage to his successors: by himself was he to hush the doubts which could not but assail any man who undertook to assert his opinions against the voice of all prescription, armed with all power; and this, too, amidst imprisonment, sickness, "cruel mockings," and every form of wrong. In a word, he drank the cup of martyrdom drop by drop, with every conceivable ingredient of bitterness in it, -involving in all probability, a sum of suffering of which, after all, the last brief fiery agony was the least part. To the deep shadows which often rested on his soul, amidst his prison solitude, there are some touching allusions in his letters; he there speaks of the dark forebodings which troubled him, and of the terrible dreams which sometimes haunted his sleep.*

As we read the tragic story, it is impossible not to feel our indignation kindle against the corrupt Church which burned him, or murmuring with those souls beneath the altar, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

While it is true that John Huss was a pioneer of the Reformation, it is also true that the Reformation he sought was not of doctrine so much as of morals and of government. He pleaded, quite justly, that he was not guilty of the heresies of which his enemies accused him: he was, as already said. burned for very different reasons. He was orthodox on transubstantiation, believed in the intercession of saints, worshipped the Virgin Mother, held by purgatory and prayers for the dead; and, though he thought the cup ought to be given to the laity, did not make even that, (which was the bond and characteristic symbol of his followers,) an essential point. In inveighing against the monstrous evils of the great Schism, against the corruptions in the government of the Church, and the vices of her ministers, he had done little more than many others both before him and after him. Nay, at Constance itself almost equal freedom was used.

But, as Waddington justly observes, the offence of Huss consisted in this-that the "Bible," and not the "Church," was the source of his reforming zeal.

It would have been well if the Reformation that Huss contemplated had included dogma; for there could be no effectual reformation without it. Hence chiefly it was that Luther's was more durable and efficacious. Both reformers had their eyes first opened by those moral enormities which most readily struck the sense, and which were the ne plus ultra of the recession of the Church from Christian truth. Both spoke with almost equal vehemence against false miracles, indulgences, and the vices of the clergy. But Luther looked further, and saw deeper; and attacked, one after another, those corruptions of doctrine which were the secret roots of the evils in practice. So little force is there in the modern and too favourite notion, that dogma is of little or no consequence, or that one set of dogmas is nearly as good as another! Looking at men in general, as are their convictions, (supposing these firm and sincere,) such also will be their life, whether good or evil. The superstition which buries truth, and the scepticism which doubts whether there be any, are in the end almost equally pernicious to the morals of mankind; both alike tend to repress all that is noble and magnanimous in our nature. What we find true in politics, is certainly not less true in theology; and we all know what sort of patriot and statesman he is likely to prove who believes that it matters not what party-badge he wears or what political creed he professes; who doubts whether it be not wisest to let the world jog on as it will, and to acquiesce in any time-honoured abuse or inveterate corruption which it will give trouble and involve sacrifice to extirpate. But there is this difference in the two cases, that the world will tolerate in theology the character which it is too astute not to abhor inpolitics.

It is in vain, however, to blame Huss for not going deeper or further. He lived a century before Luther; and neither he nor his contemporaries were prepared in the fifteenth century to receive or act upon views which were feasible only in the sixteenth. But to this high praise he is unquestionably entitled, that he asserted the very same maxim on which Luther justified his resistance at Worms .the absolute supremacy of conscience, unless its errors be demonstrated by clear proof from what both of them affirmed to be alone the ultimate authority in matters of faith, -the Scripture. Though much more than this is required for a full and consistent system of religious liberty, it was a large instalment of it; and for vindicating so much of the great charter of the "Rights of Conscience," and ratifying it with a martyr's seal, John Huss is entitled to be held in lasting and grateful remembrance.

It has been seen that Huss really penetrated very imperfectly into the evils of Popery. By some, however, the contrary would seem to be assumed; against your conscience, that I exhort you rather to endure every form of torture than to renounce anything that you hold to be true." Huss replied with tears, that God was his witness, how ready he had ever been, and still was, to retract on oath, and with his whole heart, from the moment he should be convicted of any error by evidence from Holy Scripture.

* Especially in letters xxiii, xxxii, Huss, Oper.
In one, he speaks of a dream in which frightful serpents seemed to be crawling about him.

for he has been represented, not only as the precursor but the prophet of the Reformation; and an appeal has been made to certain medals, (supposed to have been struck contemporaneously with his death, or shortly after it,) inscribed with a prediction that "after a hundred years his oppressors should answer to God and to him—"Centum révolutis annis Deo respondebitis et mihi."

L'Enfant has examined this matter with his usual fullness and fairness, and shown that there is no ground for supposing these medals to be anterior to the Lutheran Reformation, and that there is nothing in any of the acknowledged remains of Huss, which show that he pretended to anything more than merely mortal presages as to the future of the papacy. It is true there are expressions which show that he felt convinced that the evils of the Church were so enormous that a time of Reformation must come: that a tree so rotten must fall. But they only prove that he saw what many a mind between Huss and Luther saw as clearly. Nor is it possible to read many of the satires on the clergy during the middle ages, without being convinced that those who wrote and read them must have divined that a system, the corruptions of which were so notorious. so odious, and so ridiculed, could not be very long maintained. It was a probability on which any mind of more than moderate perspicacity might safely speculate; just as we may now confidently predict from the present symptoms and position of the Papacy, that it will, within a very short time. perhaps in less than one brief year, be the subject of startling revolutions. There it stands, an anachronism in the world's history; with all its errors stereotyped; stationary amidst progress, and immutable amidst change; showing in the late Encyclical that it does not in the slightest degree recede from aspirations and pretensions to which it is impossible to give effect; regarding all that passes around it with a smile of senile madness: the patron still, so far as it can or dare act upon them, of the very principles which led it to persecute Huss and Luther; the lion still, but an old lion, with teeth broken and claws pared; with the worst possible government of its own, and acting as a universal obstructive (wheresoever it has influence) to the formation of others that are better: giving the world infinite plague, and a source of perpetual difficulty and worry to Europe; with its subject nations more and more divided as to the extent of their allegiance, and as to the measure of the faith to be reposed in its Decrees; while on the other hand, we see it about to be deserted by the secular supports which have so long upheld it, and challenged to try whether it can keep itself from tumbling down. If the French Emperor had studied, for ten years together, how to involve it in difficulties, and perhaps Europe with it, he could not have thought of anything better than his somewhat enigmatical "Convention." Whether fairly carried out with all its appendant conditions, or not, it offers almost equally perilous alternatives to Rome. It is impossible for any man not to presage—as Huss and Luther could in their day—that a time of startling change is at hand.

If we could put faith in what most of us must always be very distrustful of, -the interpretation of unfulfilled prophecy, it would be difficult not to be startled by the singular coincidence that the time fixed by many interpreters, (and some of them lived long ago,) for the dénouement of the great papal drama synchronises with that fixed for carrying out the imperial Convention, namely, the year 1866; for surely it is not easy to imagine the Emperor Napoleon determining his policy by conjectural interpretations of the Apocalypse! It is very certain. not only that some recent interpreters have fixed on that year as being a significant epoch for the Papacy, but that Fleming, more than a hundred and fifty years ago, predicted that either 1848 or 1866, according as we read the prophetic year by the Julian calendar, or otherwise, would be thus significant. In point of fact, both periods have been very significant,-the first as heralding the European Revolutions (and amongst them, that at Rome) which led to the occupation of Rome by the French; and the second as signalised by the imperial Convention which is to terminate it. But, as already said, it is impossible not to distrust minute interpretations of unfulfilled prophecy. While we hold with Bishop Butler, that it is impossible for any man who compares the history of the world with the prophetic pages of the Bible, not to be struck with the general conformity between them; and, while we may well believe that, as the scroll of the future is read by the light of events, that view will be strongly corroborated, it is difficult to imagine, from the very nature of prophecy, (addressed as it is to a world governed by moral laws, and yet predicting events which are to admit of no possibility of being either accelerated or frustrated,) that it can be otherwise than conjecturally interpreted. He who would pry too closely into unfulfilled prophecy, is like the too curious Athenian, who wished to know "what it was that the philosopher was carrying concealed under his cloak?" "I carry it there," was the reply, "for the very purpose of concealing it." It is much the same with the enigmas of unfulfilled prophecy till the event makes them plain. And if we too importunately inquire as to the future, that may be said to us, which was said to those who asked the Saviour, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power."

Meantime, it does not require any great sagacity to believe that startling changes are coming upon that wonderful fabric which it took so many centuries to compact, and has already taken so many to disintegrate; that, "after the Convention," chaos; and that none need particularly covet to be in Rome in the month of December 1866.

"IT WAS A HARD WINTER,"

Dignised of Microsoft III

THE CHILDREN'S CAROLS.

In the forest hamlet there lived a poet, and he laboured with his hands, singing as he laboured. He loved, as all poets must, the earth and the sky, with all their flowers and stars. In his youth he had wandered in the woods, full of love and joy. His spirit had gone up with the lark till he felt breathless with gladness, as if with flight. He had flung himself on a bank beside a tuft of primroses, and kissed them as passionately as other youths kiss the maidens of their choice, and he had lifted up his sweetly-moving lips to heaven, when no one witnessed, as if he would kiss the face of the sky. The mild old man still loved the flowers and the stars, but more than these he loved the children, and gathered them about his knees, and taught them. He taught them to sing sweet songs and merry glees, which some, who were counted wise. called foolish things. He taught them also to sing in church; and the voice of one child was as the voice of an angel, as it rose above all others in "We praise Thee, O God!"

In Advent, when Christmas was at hand, the little scholars met night after night to learn a new song, which no one else should hear till Christmas came; and, indeed, no one seemed to care except the singers who kept the secret.

Christmas came at last, and the children went out to sing the new carol whose words were to open every heart. It was a hard winter, and there was hunger in the hamlet. The children went out to sing, and what the rich gave was to be given to the poor. That was their secret.

First they went to the house of a rich farmer. He was a hard man, and had neither wife nor child. One who should have been his wife had been trodden down in the mire of a great city; and one who was his child had never known a father, and was in God's hand upon the sea.

The fir trees on the bank behind the house did not stir, and every bough of every tree stood still as if frozen while the children sang—

On this blessed eve we sing Glad tidings! Glad tidings! To men of goodwill we bring Glad tidings! Glad tidings!

Lo! The Prince of Peace and light
Lay in a manger:
Wouldst thou have Him here to-night,
House the poor stranger.

We are children of the Lord, Loving each other; Be thou His, by love restored, Father or brother;

Let us in, and let us bring
Glad tidings! Glad tidings!—
In the dark we pass and sing
Glad tidings! Glad tidings!

The light glanced out of the long low window, and flickered on the forms of the children as they sang. The one angel-voiced boy singing each line alone, and the others taking it up in chorus. And the man who sat within in the shadow heard the song. His barns were full; his purse was full; but his heart was empty and hard—hard with the fierce hardness of a night of frost. And it grew harder as he listened, and he rose and cursed the children, and took up his staff to go out and beat them, but his arm trembled, and he only cursed. And the children went away, sad and silent.

And after they were gone, a storm, as wild as ever tore the woods, raged in the man's heart, and he knew that his life was barren and desolate, and he cursed the day he was born. There were no glad tidings this Christmas for him.

Then the children came to a poor cottage in the wood, and began again to chant, and no sooner had they begun than the door was opened, and they were welcomed in. Then they made a circle about the father and mother and little ones, and went on:—

He who was the King of kings—
He and none other—
Came not borne on angels' wings
To His poor mother.

For He came to weep and smile, Humble and lowly; Came to share all pain and toil, Making them holy.

So we come this night to sing Glad tidings! Glad tidings! And to all this house we bring Glad tidings! Glad tidings!

And when the brief song was ended, the mother, with tears in her eyes, kissed her baby, and laid it in its father's arms, and went and took the apples that had baked on the hearth, and gave them to the little singers, who laughed as they burned their fingers, and blew with their breath to cool them. Then, warmed and comforted, they went on, richer in faith at least. The house they left behind was very empty of pleasant things, and the best of their poor supper was gone, but the man and woman there never felt their hearts so full of love before.

And now they came to the ale-house, and there was such a sound of noisy laughter, and rattling, and oaths, that they thought they must pass on, but the full light flashed upon them as the door swung open, and some half-drunken men came out and drove them in to make sport. Then a great noise was made crying "Silence," and at last there was silence, and they sang the verses they had been taught to sing when they came to that house:—

On this blessed eve we sing Glad tidings! Glad tidings! Unto sinful men we bring Glad tidings! Glad tidings!

Christ hath pour'd His blood like wine
For all the sinning—
He who came this night divine,
Our Salvation winning.

In our Father's house above All the lights are burning; He is waiting full of love For His sons' returning.

Come away; and let us bring Glad tidings! Glad tidings! While with us the angels sing Glad tidings! Glad tidings!

And there was one man whose heart burned, yet he was ashamed to rise up and go away, and he frowned on the fair boy who led the band, and who had the voice of an angel. The boy was thinking of his mother, who would have to wait for her husband's coming, and would tremble when he came,—so he forbore to speak; and the man took a deeper draught to drown the burning at his heart, and the boy went away, with the rest, sighing, though the half-drunken men gave him many pence.

Then they went through a great gate, and up among sweeping lawns silvered with frost and with moonlight. The long line of windows were all dark to-night. They were out—the gay lights that used to be seen for miles when Christmas parties met at the hall. The children crept round, for they had been summoned there, though the house lay in the shadow of death. She who lay dying was their friend. She used to play for them the church organ whose voice had been silent for weeks, and they were met at the door and taken up the stairs, treading softly. And she lay in her bed propped up with pillows, and her eyes were very bright, and her hands very thin. Then the boy with the silver voice sang sweeter than ever before, so that his voice pierced with sweetness like a sharp pain the hearts of all who listened save one, and she clasped her thin hands, and began smiling with the singing, and looking all over light, as if there were lamps under her closed eyelids. They sang—

He who took our mortal life,
This night with crying;
Victor in death's mortal strife,
He holds the dying:

In His arms He holds them fast, When they are failing! When the moment comes at last, Hush'd be our wailing.

For to us on earth they cry, Glad tidings! Glad tidings! O grave, where is thy victory! Glad tidings! Glad tidings!

And the children went near, one by one, and kissed the little white hand, and were led away and laden with Christmas gifts for the poor; and she—the dear young saint—lingered a little while in the frosty weather. But it was always Christmas with her, till the "Peace on earth" melted into the Peace of Heaven.

ISA CRAIG.

THE DREADFUL FOUR MINUTES.

THE policy of executing criminals, which at present agitates the minds of a large portion of the thinking community, has long been a subject of great interest to me. I have at different times, I believe, gone as deeply into the question as most men, but without coming to any definite conclusion. It was first forced on my mind by reading Victor Hugo's Le dernier jour d'un condamné; for in that admirable work the mental anguish of an unfortunate wretch under sentence of death is painted with such truthfulness, and in such vivid colours, that almost every chapter became indelibly impressed on my imagination. I verily believe I could even now narrate the substance of the book, although at least fifteen years must have passed over my head since I read it. Yet, on the necessity of capital punishment I am still undecided. That no possible good can accrue from legally killing one of our fellow-creatures I admit: still, from a sentiment of humanity, to allow a wretch to live who may have committed a diabolical murder, appears somewhat incongruous and very possibly is adverse to the principles of justice taught us in the Scriptures themselves.

Although the total abolition of the punishment of death remains an undecided point with me, I have always, in common I think with most men of average humanity, been free from doubt as to the obligation of terminating the existence of criminals with the least amount of mental or bodily torture. And a very grave question often arises in my mind, whether the punishment of death by hanging, as practised in England, is not one of gross cruelty. I am perfectly aware that at the very outset I shall have many opponents in my endeavour to prove my opinion to be correct. Our Legislature, I shall be told, is the most humane in the world, and that that very fact itself is a proof against me. To this I answer, that to have a bad opinion of themselves or their government has never been a fault of Englishmen. A fixed opinion of the great humanity of our code of criminal laws has always been a favourite theory with us, even in times when our punishments were far more severe than in the present day. I lately came across a work on the laws of England, by a barrister of the name of Lambard, published in the early part of the reign of James the First. On the subject of capital punishments he calls the attention of the reader to the superior humanity of the English code. "While other nations," he says, "practise many different modes of executing criminals, England confines herself to four—hanging, pressing, burning, and boiling; the two latter," he remarks, "being used, from motives of delicacy, principally for women."

Although in the present day we content ourselves with the first of these modes, it is doubtful whether the criminal is not longer dying with us than in any other country in Europe. The guillotine in France, the garotte in Spain, and even the foreign modes of hanging, deprive the criminal of life instantaneously. But we frequently read in our newspapers that "the prisoner struggled violently," or "in a few minutes life was extinct." Has any one calculated how long those few minutes were to the dying wretch, or what amount and what quality of thought passed through his mind during them? Physiologists will perhaps tell us that his struggles were simply spasmodic and painless; but was his mental torture less on that account? or is it not likely to have been greater? I hold the latter theory, and consider that if his bodily torture had been greater (though God forbid it ever should be so!), his mental sufferings might have been far less.

After reading the above-named work of Victor Hugo's, I determined if possible to discover what is the mental state of a criminal while being executed. I deliberated in what manner I should best make the experiment; and at last I determined to act as assistant to the hangman at an execution, so as to be able to gain as much knowledge as possible of the prisoner's feelings. But to obtain my wish was a far more difficult matter than I had imagined. The authorities rejected my application with, I must say, just disdain. At last I gave up the idea of applying to any but the fountain head.

I soon succeeded in making the acquaintance of the hangman himself, and proposed acting on some occasion as his assistant. At first he refused my request in the most decided manner, till an offer of five sovereigns proved to him that I was actuated solely by philanthropic and scientific motives. It was then arranged that I should assist him at a forthcoming execution at Lewes in Sussex. This case suited me exactly, as the crime of the culprit had shut him out from all personal sympathy on my part, and I should thus be the better able to judge of the results of the punishment. I bade the executioner farewell, promising him I would be in Lewes the day before the execution, whereby I avoided the acceptance of his kind offer of taking me under his protection on the road down. The only advice he gave me was to do myself up "rough," and then nobody would recognise from my appearance that I did not belong to his profession -a compliment I received with far less gratitude than perhaps it merited.

The day previous to the execution at last arrived, and, carpet bag in hand (I had in it a somewhat coarse-looking decent suit of clothes, with a fur cap and a pair of thick common-looking shoes), I proceeded to the Brighton Railway Station. I do not know why, but I had a singular suspicion that the persons who like myself were taking out tickets had some knowledge of the errand I was on. I however endeavoured to drive the thought from my mind, and had placed my money on the desk before the clerk, when somebody standing behind me said,

"There will be an execution to-morrow at Lewes. Shall you go and see it?"

"No," was the answer; "I have no taste for anything of the kind, and I have but little respect for those who have."

This remark, made purely at hazard and without the slightest allusion to me, annoyed me exceedingly. I coloured up, and was leaving the payingplace, when the clerk called out to me, "You have forgotten your change and the ticket, sir."

It was true, I had forgotten both. I took them up hurriedly, omitting even to thank him for his civility, and turned off to the train. I was lucky enough to get into a compartment with only another passenger in it, who fortunately for me slept all the way down.

As the train rolled on I brought my mind to bear on the approaching execution, and the probable behaviour of the prisoner. I particularly dwelt on the time which would elapse after the bolt was drawn before life was extinct, and what amount and quality of thought would pass through his mind in the interim. But I could arrive at no definite conclusion, for no sooner had I succeeded in getting my thoughts in proper train, than some object would pass before me and disturb the current of my reflections. I was for some time fairly puzzled how to carry out my experiment, until at length I remembered that we were approaching Merstham tunnel, where I should be for some time in the dark, without having anything to distract my attention, and thus be able to calculate the amount of thinking of which my mind was capable during the time. I had now to choose a subject for my reflections of such a description as would enable me to come to a just conclusion on the subject. I selected the week's trip I made to Paris with a party of three friends the year before Louis Napoleon was chosen Emperor. We had then enjoyed ourselves greatly, and every circumstance which took place on our journey remained firmly fixed in my memory.

Everything being now satisfactorily arranged, I waited, watch in hand, ready to commence my experiment as soon as we should arrive at the tunnel. The steam whistle announced that we were on the point of entering, and I glanced at my watch. It was exactly a quarter past three, and that moment, in imagination the bolt was withdrawn—and we landed opposite the Custom House at Boulogne.

We walked across the space roped in for the landing of passengers, undergoing the while the criticisms of the well-dressed crowd on each side on our forlorn appearance, for the passage had been a stormy one; we entered the whitewashed waiting room, and afterwards passed through the smaller room, containing its regiment of police and Custom-House officers. Our passports were examined, as well as every little article we held in our hands, and we were then permitted to leave.

We now engaged a coach, and drove off to the railway station, denouncing the absurd French police and Custom-House restrictions. time we were fairly seated in the train the miseries of our sea voyage were forgotten, the Custom-House regulations were forgiven, and we were a thoroughly happy party, bent on enjoying ourselves and being at peace with all the world. At Amiens we waited the accustomed twenty minutes, and afterwards proceeded to Paris. I remembered with particular clearness a conversation which took place, shortly after leaving Amiens, respecting the Counts of St. Pol, whose ruined castle is seen in the distance-whether they were English or French. and whether their castle had been within the jurisdiction of the Calais government at the time the English held it, or whether it was in the French territory.

At last we arrived at Paris, and drove to Meurice's, where we chose our apartments. Fortunately we were in time for the table d'hôte. There were but five guests at it, as at that time there were but few English in Paris, and those who were present were mostly wealthy young men with evidently fast tastes. There was one exception, however, and that was a well-dressed gentlemanly man about fifty years of age, a major in the army, of most attractive manners and conversation. All the party scemed well acquainted with each other, and a perfectly good-fellowship evidently existed between them. After dinner we walked to the Place du Carrousel. The moon was at its full and the night was lovely, and at about ten o'clock we returned to the Hotel thoroughly tired with our day's adventures.

At breakfast the next morning we heard that the troops were to be reviewed by General Cavaignac, in the Champs de Mars. We determined on being present, and after breakfast we strolled leisurely towards the scene of the review. When opposite the Hotel des Invalides we heard loud shouting behind us, and on turning round, we perceived a general with his staff advancing towards us. We stood aside to allow him to pass, and a bystander informed us it was General Cavaignac, then a candidate for the presidency of the republic. he passed he bowed most courteously to us in return for our salutation, and we continued our way to the review ground.

The whole manœuvres of the review then came clearly and vividly before me, even to the dresses of the troops, but it would be a useless waste of time and space to describe them here. In the afternoon we returned to the hotel, and made our preparations for dinner.

At table we found exactly the same company we had met the day before, with the addition of an army surgeon, a friend of mine, who had arrived in Paris for a few days' pleasure. He had been many years in the army and had seen a great deal of service, and was very much respected by all who knew him. He was apparently slightly acquainted with more than one of the company. Major Xthe senior of the party, spoke to him more than once; but although my friend answered courteously, I could perceive there was a want of cordiality in his manner. The dinner over, Major X- and his young friends left the table, after having taken a considerable quantity of wine; and my own party wishing to go to the theatre, for which I had but little inclination, I remained with my friend, Dr. Walsh, to talk over old times. As we were alone in the coffee-room, our conversation took a more confidential tone than it would have done had others been present. At last I casually asked him, as he appeared to be acquainted with the gentlemen who had dined with us, who they were.

"They are some young fellows in the army," he replied, "who, under the ciceroneship of Major X-, are on a visit to Paris."

"X- seems a very gentlemanly intelligent man," I remarked; "so much so that I wonder he would associate so intimately with such a thoughtless set as his companions appear to be-that is, with the exception of the one who sat beside him at table."

"If you knew him better your wonder would cease," said Walsh.

"How so?"

"Simply because he lives upon them, and in good horses as well, does not owe a shilling in the world. and yet has only his half-pay to rely on."

"He must be a very clever fellow," I said, laughing; "I wish you would give me a leaf out of his book."

"He is certainly a shrewd fellow, but hardly a clever one," said Walsh; "and if I were to give you a leaf out of his book, I am sure you would not only not be grateful for it, but would hold the fellow in as much contempt as I do myself."

"You pique my curiosity, Walsh. Tell me something about him."

"Well, then," said Walsh, "X-and some dozen like him are a disgrace to our service, War-Office authorities and all included. Only don't say I said so, or you will get me into the black book. The fellow entered a good regiment some twenty years since, by what patronage, for the honour of the service, I will not say. He was a man of but little education, but quick at figures; indeed, I have heard he was formally assistant elerk to an actuary in an insurance office, and in that capacity picked up a somewhat extensive knowledge of the doctrine of probabilities. As soon as he got his commission, he applied this acquirement to short whist and écarté, at which, without much difficulty, he acquired a very considerable amount of skill. Armed with a positive advantage in his favour, he brought his talents to bear in such a manner that he contrived to make a very handsome income out of those less experienced than himself."

"But still," I remarked, "he was always in danger of meeting with others as skilful as him-

"That in no manner altered his position. He possessed an immense advantage over the great majority of his brother officers, and by continually playing, he was in the end certain to win. The chances he held in his hand were far superior to the probabilities in favour of the tables at Homburg or Baden-Baden, and in his case they were excreised in a far less honourable manner. While at the public gaming-table the probabilities in favour of the bank were openly published, and the profits heavily taxed, he denied holding any advantages, although he possessed chances in his favour quadruple those of the public tables."

"But," I replied, "surely a system of the kind would soon be detected, and the perpetrator shunned by his brother officers."

"There you are in error," said Walsh. "In the first place, it is very difficult to persuade the majority of young eavalry officers that there are any persons in the world sharper than themselves; and, in the second, by far the greater proportion of the young men who join a good regiment are remarkably honourable, utterly above a dirty action themselves, and unwilling to believe in the possibility of a brother officer committing one. The mischief half-a-dozen such scoundrels as X-- are capable of accomplishing is very great. Not only do they style too. He keeps a brougham and two riding- in reality win most unfairly, but they imbue into the minds of their brother officers a love of gambling, which in many cases is never eradicated. The sad instances I have known of young men, who entered the army possessed of every honourable feeling which can adorn a man, falling victims to this vice of gambling, would fill a volume. At the present moment, X- has a victim in tow. Did you notice that young fellow who sat beside him at dinner? He is a Captain G--, who is now so thoroughly inoculated with a love of gambling, that nothing will cure him. He is the only son of a widow, whose husband was a colonel in the line, who left her with a very limited income. Her son is the idol of her heart, and she has already greatly diminished her small capital by paying his debts. Lately she has paid off every liability he had, and advanced him £200 to start him again in comfort. He left her with the best intentions, intending immediately to join his regiment; but in London he met X-, who persuaded him to accompany him and four or five others on a fortnight's trip to Paris; and I am sure, before the fortnight is terminated, G- will not have a shilling left of the money his mother with so much difficulty raised for him."

The next morning we visited the gallery of the Louvre. We stayed more than two hours among the pictures, leisurely examining the chefs dewire as we went along. Conversations which we had held opposite different pictures came to my memory with great vividuess. We afterwards visited the gallery of sculpture, and then amused ourselves in the Palais Royal till it was time to return to dinner.

At dinner we again met the party of officers. X- was in high spirits, as were the rest, with the exception of Captain G-, who talked but little, and appeared to me to be somewhat melancholy. Nor did he rally during the whole meal, although the quantity of champagne he drank was considerable. One thing I particularly noticed was that although X- pressed the wine on the others, he drank but very moderately himself. He joked G-- from time to time on his low spirits, and accused him of being in love-a theme which took immensely with the others, till G--showed evident signs of impatience. Good humour, however, was soon restored, and we left the party chatting very amicably together. We determined to pass the evening at the opera.

We hired a fiacre and proceeded to the theatre, where we arrived just in time for the overture to "William Tell," which was as usual admirably played. We were all delighted with the opera, which I had never heard more beautifully sung; and we walked home after the performance.

Next day we went to Versailles. The weather was magnificent, and we enjoyed the ride immensely. After spending a great portion of the day there, we afterwards visited the great and little Trianon, remaining some hours in the gardens, and speculating on the different scenes our guide informed us had there taken place, and visiting the grottos mentioned in Dumas's "Collier de la Reine." We dined that day in one of the restaurants adjoining the park, and afterwards returned to Paris, which we reached long after dark.

On arriving at the hotel, our attention was attracted by some gentlemen who had assembled in the court-yard, and were laughing and talking together in a very noisy manner. We easily recognised X—— and his party, all of whom it was evident had very recently quitted the dinner-table. One of the party alone seemed out of spirits, and that was Captain G——.

"Come with us, G-," said X-

"Not to-night," he replied, "I shall not go

"Nonsense, G——," said another; "what is the matter with you? Come now, be sociable. Besides, X—— wants to give you your revenge for last night's losses."

"No, I have made up my mind; I want to be alone to-night."

"What are you going to do, G--?" said

"Blow my brains out, perhaps," said G-, moodily.

"Well then," said X—, laughing, "you are a most unreasonable fellow if you do it before tomorrow. Come now, don't be silly. We shall have a very merry night of it together, and tomorrow you can do as you please."

After a little more bantering of the same description, G—— gave way, and we saw him go with the others towards X——'s rooms.

On entering the coffee-room I met Walsh, who apparently had been watching X—— and his party.

"That poor young fellow, G-," he said, "is

"How do you know that?" I inquired.

"By his behaviour, and the high spirits of X—. I am very sorry for his mother, though," he continued, "for a more amiable worthy woman I believe does not exist."

It was somewhat late when I left my room the next morning, for we were all desperately tired with our exertions the day before. Before entering the coffee-room to breakfast, where my party were to meet, I was much struck with the look of mystery on the faces of the servants, and their frequent whispering together. I inquired if anything particular had happened, but they told me they were not aware of anything, although I could easily perceive their answers were not truthful. At that moment Walsh appeared, and I advanced to meet him.

"It's all over with that poor fellow, G-," he

"What do you mean!"

"He destroyed himself about half-an-hour since, and they have sent notice of the event to the police. As soon as the commissary arrives, we will go up with him and ascertain how it happened. I suppose I shall have the unenviable task of breaking it to his mother. Poor thing! I believe it will be her death."

At that moment the commissary of police, accompanied by an assistant and a doctor, entered the court-yard, and Walsh and I joined them as they ascended the stairs. When we arrived at G---'s room, the door was unlocked, and we all went in. Poor G- was stretched on the ground beside his bed, one side of his head having been blown to pieces. Of course life was totally extinct. He had apparently risen from his bed, and partially dressed himself for the purpose of writing a letter to his mother, for on his dressing-table was a sheet of paper, and some pens and ink. All he had written were the words, "My dear mother," when his despair evidently would allow him to go no further. He must then have gone to his portmanteau near his bed, and taken from it his pistols. The one with which he had committed the deed was by his side, and had evidently been very recently fired; the other was in the case, which was open on the ground.

The commissary and his clerk then examined the servants as to their knowledge of the circumstances; a procés verbal was drawn up, and the commissary and the doctor quitted the house leaving a police agent in charge of the dead body.

It is hardly necessary to remark that this unfortunate event threw a gloom over us for the remainder of the day. We had no spirits to enjoy any of the sights, and we strolled almost purposeless about the town making a few purchases and at intervals commenting on the sad event of the morning.

The funeral of poor G—— took place the next day in the cemetery of Père La Chaise. Most of the Englishmen in the hotel, including Walsh and myself, attended it. X—— was not present. He said it would only make him feel unhappy if he went, as he really had a great respect for the poor fellow. I saw X—— that morning shortly before the funeral procession left the hotel. If he truly felt sorrow at the death of his friend, he contrived to conceal it in a very skilful manner.

As the cortège proceeded up the centre road of the cemetery, Walsh and I walked side by side conversing on subjects connected with the poor fellow's death. Walsh told me he had obtained a lock of his hair for his mother, and his watch, as well as a pocket Bible she had given him, in which was a somewhat long address to her son written by the old lady herself. From the date, she must have given the book to him when first he joined his regiment, possibly on that very day.

After the funeral, instead of returning to the hotel, Walsh and I walked about the cemetery, he pointing out to me the graves of different celebrated people who where interred there. Those connected with our own profession, I remember, claimed our attention more than any others. Poor Chaupier's struck me particularly, with his bust surmounting it, telling, by the admirable intelligence the sculptor had put into his work, more in favour of the philosopher than any lengthy written memorial could have done. As a conclusion, we visited the graves of Abélard and Héloise whose ancient gothic monument contrasted remarkably with those around it.

Tired at last we took a hackney coach and proceeded to the gallery of the Luxembourg, in which we spent some time examining the pictures and works of art, and occasionally talking of old times when we were students together in Paris, and the change which had since taken place in that capital.

At dinner we met X --- and his friends; but they were far less gay than usual, although nothing like sorrow was visible on the faces of any of the party. One difference I certainly noticed in their behaviour. Two days before X- took much less champagne than his companions; that day he drank far more than the others, without however its having any visible effect on him. He conversed with his friends occasionally, but not continuously. His efforts appeared rather instigated by a wish to conceal his frame of mind from observation, than any desire to communicate with the others. I had for the first time some feeling of respect for him, or rather the abatement of the sentiment of disgust which I had hitherto felt since Walsh had first given me an insight into his character. He now appeared to have some chagrin on his mind, which showed he was not altogether shut out from feelings of common humanity. But I was speedily undeceived in the favourable opinion I had formed of him. During dinner the conversation turned on poor G-'s suicide. It originated with the youngest man of the party, who spoke on the subject with sympathy and good feeling, and it was then taken up by the others in a like tone, till - spoke.

"Well, poor fellow," said he, "I am sorry he has gone, for more reasons than one."

"How so, X—?" said one of the party. "Because I am a great loser by the affair."

"A loser by G—? Well, I wonder at that," said the speaker with something like an ill-concealed sneer.

"Yes, a loser by him," said X——, somewhat angrily, for he had noticed the tone and manner of the last speaker. "I lose five hundred pounds by his death."

Then observing a look of incredulity on the faces of the others, he placed his hand in his coat pocket, and took from it a pocket-book, which he opened, and showed that it contained five one hundred pound promissory notes, accepted by G.——. "Of that amount," said X.——, "I shall not in all probability receive one farthing. His travelling things and clothes are to be sold here to-morrow, but I very much suspect they will not realise more than sufficient to pay his hotel bill."

"But he cannot owe much here," said one; "I should have thought that his watch alone, which was an excellent one, was enough for that."

"That is the mysterious part of the affair," said X-; "his watch can nowhere be found."

I looked at Walsh's face. He said nothing, but a very ominous frown was on it, and I augured that a quarrel was brewing.

"But, X-," said a younger man of his party, a cornet of dragoons, "why do you not apply to his mother? I suppose she is a person of respectability and would pay her son's debts, out of regard to his memory."

"Not she; I have been looking over some of her letters to him, and she speaks in them of your humble servant in no very amiable manner, I can assure vou."

"Try her at any rate, X-."

"Hang the hag!" said X-. "No, I shall write the whole off my books as a bad debt." and so saying he filled his glass with wine.

As soon as he had done drinking, Walsh said to him: "Major X-, I know poor G-'s mother well, and I believe a more amiable, excellent woman never lived. Oblige me by retracting the expression you made use of. You would not have done so had you known it, I am sure."

"I am not the man," said X-, "to retract an expression under compulsion from any one."

"I did not put it in that light," said Walsh. "It was simply to show you that you made the observation in error. She is an intimate friend of Mr. Gordon's mother," indicating a young gentleman who sat on X-'s right, "and I ask him if your designation is a just one."

"Certainly not," said Mr. Gordon, who had hitherto paid but little attention to the conversation. "If she is the Mrs. G- my mother is acquainted with, I willingly back your statement, doctor. The lady I mean is the widow of a colonel."

"The same," said Walsh.

"I willingly retract the expression I made use of, Gordon," said X-. "I should be sorry, indeed, to say one disrespectful word concerning any friend of your mother's."

"You spoke also of his watch," said Walsh. "As I knew it was a present to him from his mother, I have taken charge--"

The train now dashed from the darkness of the tunnel into broad daylight, and I glanced at my watch. The time was seventeen minutes past three, I had been in the tunnel no more than two minutes, little more than half the average time a culprit is dying under Mr. Calcraft's hands!

It will doubtless be objected, that it would be impossible for the quantity of thought which it has taken so many pages to describe, to have passed through my mind in the space of two minutes. But I have stated only the fact. It should be remembered, that the reminiscence of any scene or act is not brought to the mind in words, but by that rapid intelligence we obtain in picture reading. For at the time of his execution.

example, when gazing at Horace Vernet's magnificent picture in the Luxembourg, of the massacre of the Mamelukes, a scene is presented to us in an instant, which it would have taken pages to describe. The stern abstracted look of the pasha, the apparent indifference of the old minister beside him,the manner in which, at the same time, he clasps his sabre sheath till the muscles of his hand stand out like cords of iron. The anxious expression of the black slave, -the smoke from the firing below -the brilliancy even of the jewels on the pasha's dagger, all are read and understood in a moment. In like manner the various scenes 1 have narrated passed across my mind with equal vividuess and rapidity; and so far from having exaggerated the measure of thought which rushed through my brain, I have greatly under-stated it.

And must not the same phenomenon occur to a culprit when dying under the hands of the hangman? Or, from the peculiarity of his position, would not his thoughts flow with still greater rapidity? and of what a description must they be? Scenes long past-crimes he may have committed and not repented of-fear that the next moment he may stand before the great Judge of Heaven and earth, all press themselves on him. Even to the last moment this must coutinue, for the nearer his end approaches the more desperate must be the efforts of the mind to preserve its dominion, feeling but too strongly that the longer he thinks the longer is the terrible moment of his death postponed.

I would now candidly ask our rulers whether some steps ought not to be taken to abridge the terrible mental torture of the dying criminal, and whether we are justified in continuing our present method of execution? A short time since a man was hanged at Leeds or Sheffield, who it was stated was twenty minutes in dying. True it was afterwards attempted to be explained that this was an exaggeration; but the explanation was of the most clumsy description. Let it be granted that the poor wretch was only half that time in dying, and what must have been the state of his mind during it? Would it be possible for the ingenuity of a sensation novel-writer to invent anything more terrible?

To return to my experiment. After leaving the tunnel I felt as great a disgust at the idea of being present at the execution as I had felt curiosity before entering it. I resolved to show my friend Mr. Calcraft a clean pair of heels. This resolution I carried into effect, leaving him to find another assistant as he best could. The question of capital punishment I leave to wiser heads than mine; but I trust the reader will admit that we are totally inexcusable in not taking means to abridge as much as possible the sufferings of the criminal

WILLIAM GILBERT.

DISTINGUISHED SETTLERS FROM ABROAD.

COULD the illustrious author of the "Atlantis" revisit this earth, he would behold in Regent's Park that vision of his sagacious mind-the "tryal place for beasts and fishes," realised beyond his utmost hopes. In his day the fauna of the world was but little known, the great continents of the new world little unexplored, and the mighty group of islands in the Southern Ocean were wholly undreamed of. The whole of Africa, with the exception of Egypt and its northern coast, was equally a terra incognita—that mighty land of savage beasts and of animal life in its thousand forms. The zoology of Lord Bacon's days may be likened to the contents of a shilling Noah's Ark, as compared with the infinite variety of living things with which the science is now familiar, and the rarer varieties of which are now to be seen in a beautiful garden within a mile and a half of Regent Street. Indeed, the travelling menagerie of our younger days, in which a few typical animals of the more ferocious and terrible kind alone were to be found, constituted the principal knowledge the public possessed of the fauna of the globe. Now scarcely a day passes without finding these gardens enriched by some entirely new animal, or some rare variety of a well-known species. Here, caged and brought close within our vision, we have become familiar with their habits, and have learned to unlearn many of those marvellous travellers' tales we once so implicitly believed.

Here, too, is a "tryal place for beasts and fishes;" we have settled many matters which were once in doubt and obscurity. The Zoological Society indeed started into existence with a purely philosophical aim, such as "broad-browed Verulam" would have approved; but of late years the necessity of providing funds has led to a system of starring each season with some rare and strange animal. Yet, on the whole, it cannot be said that the Society has forgotten the demands of science, or that it has neglected its opportunities as compared with other nations.

In other countries we see features in their Zoological Gardens that we may copy with advantage. For instance, the fish-house at Hamburg is on a far nobler scale than our own. The walls are purely aquatic, and the spectator secs the denizens of the ocean and the lake surrounding him on all sides, and sporting about as he would see them supposing he were submerged in the deep, and quietly inspecting them with his eyes open. At Antwerp, again, instead of the miserable cage in which the royal Eagles are confined in our garden, not much bigger, comparatively speaking, than the wire cover with which we protect our viands from the flies, there is a magnificent aviary of great height, in which the uoble bird can at least air its wings; whilst at Cologne, the Bear dens are not merc pits, as with us, but splendid establishments, were Bruin is not obliged to live in the bottom of a well. And lastly, at Paris, the wild Sheep and Goats have splendid paddocks, filled with rock-work, on which the animals can be seen in their more picturesque movements when climbing or jumping; just such a place, in fact, as our own "great Cats" should have, if the promoters of the gardens were wise in their generation. Yet, on the whole, there can be no question that our own garden is by far the finest collection of beasts, and the arrangements are better than can be found in any other country.

No collection of animals in the world is for one moment, indeed, comparable with that to be found in Regent's Park; and if the Society has failed in its scheme of acclimatization, which was promised on its establishment, it has done so because Nature proved too strong for it. Another society has taken upon itself the duty of following out the plan where the Society has left off, and it remains to be seen if their labours will be any more successful—at all events, we wish them all success in their useful labours.

In these pages we wish to speak of the more recent arrivals from distant parts, and to note the more curious characteristics of the living things contained in these grounds with which the public are not perhaps very familiar. The more educated of the visitors are no longer satisfied, like children, with merely observing the form of the living creature: they are anxious to know something of its habits—to see, if possible, its instincts exercised (under such favourable conditions as can be afforded) as they are in a state of nature; and in many cases the director of the gardens has been able to satisfy these desires. Let us instance the Beaver lodge.

The original structure, as it stood a twelvemonth ago, seemed but a heap of mud, and nothing more; but to those only moderately versed in natural history, it presented a sight never before witnessed in this country, or in Europe, since the extinction of the Beaver from its rivers - the dwelling-place of the animal reared by its own sagacious labours, as in a state of nature. For a long time the male Beaver lived here a melancholy recluse; and when a female arrived, he showed such a savage spirit towards her, that it was thought best to separate their paddocks by a "Absence lends enchantment to the view," says the poet; and as the two animals watched and sniffed at each other through the palings, the lord and master seemed to have come to a better state of mind with respect to his future mate-at all events, one night the female took a very decided step to renew the acquaintance, by burrowing under the dividing railing, and presenting herself to her mate in the most unreserved manner. This proceeding, altogether contrary to the usual usages of courtship, was decidedly successful, and they lived for some time happily together.

The commencement of the first lodge, or hut-building operation, was inaugurated by Mr. Bartlett, the superintendent of the gardens, who placed in the paddock an old box, mouth downward, with one end knocked out. The Beavers at once took to this shelter, and commenced piling upon it and around it the puddled clay with which they had been supplied, in one corner of their enclosure. Of course the reader expects to be told about the wondrous dexterity with which they plastered the work with their tails; in truth, they did nothing of the kind, and all the stories about the animal using his tail as a trowel are pure myths, caused doubtless by the apparent applicability of that appendage to such a purpose. It is a rudder, and nothing more, to assist the animal in directing its course in the water, and is perfectly useless at plasterer's work. We regret to have to demolish a favourite notion respecting this rodent, but the truth must be told. But to return, however, to the Beaver's method of constructing his lodge. The clay, moistened with the little running stream close at hand, was carried by his fore paws, and dabbed on the roof he was making over the box; this process of daubing and puddling was alternated by carefully placing branches across and athwart the mudwork, interlacing the former, and then filling up the interstices with the puddled clay, making, in short, a kind of wattle and dabwork such as we find used in the construction of the cottages in Devonshire. With a recollection of his habits in some distant Canadian forest, where the Beavers, acting in association, speedily clear acres of ground of fine forest timber by the splendid action of their adze-like teeth, he commenced gnawing at an old piece of tough ash trunk left for his use. This trunk, eight inches in diameter, he nearly gnawed through with his powerful incisors in an hour and a-quarter, and he would have entirely detached it from the large bowl at its foot, but that it was rescued by the superintendent, and placed within an iron railing immediately in front of his lodge, as a trophy of his style of timber-felling, where it remained for some time, until it was removed to the new lodge. The tools with which they work are the two upper incisors, and they cut off chips with a crisp noise like that made by a ship carpenter with his adze. All the large pieces he was allowed to carry away to the lodge, he took and gallery was now driven, which led up to the sleeping-placed on the work where it required strengthening. The astonishing vigour of these animals may be estimated when we say that he rolled from one side of the enclosure to another a log of wood weighing half-a-hundredweight. Working away at all hours, at last the box was covered with a large mound composed of sticks, small trees, and mud, which must have weighed many tons weight, and which could not have been less than eight or ten feet at its base, and at least six feet high. The entrance to the lodge was as cunningly contrived as it would have been in the animal's native wilds: a hole was gnawed away at the back of the box, and in the earth behind a deep eavity was excavated, from which a shaft was run into the dam of water in front of the lodge. The water of course found its level, and flooded the excavation. From the back side of the excavation a place in the upper part of the mound. Here the bed was made where the pair bred about twelve months ago, a circumstance which was unknown to the superintendent until one morning the young one was seen through some air-holes at the top of the lodge.

The habit visitors have of feeding the animals, in the instance of the Beavers ended unfortunately. The male animal and its little one died, as the superintendent believes, of too much bread. In their native state they feed mainly on willow bark; but their bread diet, combined with the want of exercise consequent upon their enforced confinement, led to over-fatness, which produced disease, and ultimately carried them off. The superintendent probably thinking that the melancholy associations connected with the old lodge would be better broken by change of scene, removed the mourning widow to a new habitation which was partially constructed for her. In the midst of a circular pond, a well of masoury, some eight feet deep, was constructed, quite waterproof, into which sticks, broken up small, were rammed tight; on the top of this, an old box was placed, and the Beaver transferred to She speedily gnawed a hole in the bottom of the box as before, and burrowed into the bed of sticks, making two or three chambers and methods of ingress and egress. The box she covered over with earth and soil, as in the old house, binding the mound with large willow branches. But it is clear she pines to range a-field, for at the present moment she has cunningly conveyed sods to the corner of the railed-in enclosure nearest to the canal, clearly with the intention of getting over and escaping; the recollection of her escapade with her mate some time ago, when she managed to get into the canal, and remained swimming about there for several days, until captured by one of the bargemen and returned to the Gardens, no doubt still haunting her.

Walking along the gravel walk thronged with holiday people, one feels not a little startled at finding one's self within thirty feet of a Beaver lodge, and its inmate busy at work upon it, apparently as unconscious of being watched as though it was in the depths of some Canadian forest.

What lessons on natural history even this poor captive pent up here teaches us, which we should never realise from reading the books of the best naturalists. Here we see nature herself at work, which is more than many of our naturalists themselves have done. We bring savage life within our ken, and watch it as leisurely as the microscopist bringing to sight hitherto invisible animalculæ with his powerful lens. Twenty years ago the demand for the skins of the Beaver on to part of our hat manufacturers was so enormous, that the animal was threatened with extinction by the hunters. Of late years, however, silk has taken the place of Beaver in this manufacture, consequently the poor animal

Not far from the Beaver lodge are located the collection of Bears now in the possession of the Cashmere Goats, which afford the soft, silky hair of which the famed Cashmere shawls are made. These animals seem in excellent condition. If the gentleman, grateful for past favours, as he passes the lodge of the rodent, takes off his Beaver to the inmates, the lady, as an acknowledgment for her costly Cashmere, may salute these little Goats, whose ragged-looking but precious coats-more precious, indeed, than the fabled golden fleeces of antiquity-have contributed towards her adornment.

A male and female Rhinoceros, in addition to the old female which has been here for so many years, have lately been purchased. It is hoped they will breed, a hope also which extends towards the Hippopotami. The old female Rhinoceros has for years been labouring under a great infirmity of temper, so much so that for the safety of the keeper the corners of her den have been partitioned off and provided with staircases, to afford a means of escape for him when she attempts to attack him, which she often does. A few years since, in her rage, she attempted to tear up the paving-stones with her mouth, and in doing so put her jaw out, and it was months before she recovered the use of it, after most assiduous nursing.

These pachydermatous animals, sleepy and heavy as they look, are subject to seizures of frenzied rage of a most fearful kind. The old Hippopotamus some years ago nearly pulled down the iron railing running on one side of his enclosure, because he saw a workman who appeared to be his special aversion walking along it. Poor fellow, he has ceased to be the great star he was in the Great Exhibition year of 1851, when he cleared 10,000l. for the Society, and indeed did much to bring the Gardens into notoriety.

The Indian Elephant we are all familiar with crowned with his bouquet of smiling children swaying too and fro in his howdah; but the African variety of this sagacious beast is now for the first time represented in this Garden. There are two of these animals: one about nine years of age, and a tiny baby elephant of two years, that has not yet cut its milk teeth. A glance at these animals at once shows that they are a distinct species from the Indian specimen we see shuffling along with his living load outside. - The head of the African Elephant is much smaller; the forehead, instead of rising up in a rounded ridge over the eyes, retreats; the ears, on the other hand, are much larger, shaped almost like the shape of a kite, and folded flat on the top of the head. The orifice of the trunk, again, is very different; instead of possessing only one prehensile lip on the upper side, the African Elephant's proboscis opens like the mouth of a snake, with two distinct lips, upper and under. Its feet, again, are of a more oval form than those of its Indian congener. These differences of the two species are even more marked thau that existing between the African and the Asiatic Lion. Whilst touching upon the larger is not quite so disturbed as of old. () () mammalia, we must not forget to notice the rich Society. The fine old specimens have died off-Prince Menschikoff, to wit, who must have boiled down into many hundredweights of prime grease; also the fine black fellow, that consumed such an infinity of cakes in the pit; but several new kinds have been added. The Japanese Bears, for instance, queer little fellows, that amuse the children by their trick of turning a summersault every time they arrive at the end of their cage; and the very drolllooking Malayan Bears, smooth-haired creatures, with heads more like bull-dogs than any Bears we have ever seen. The baby European Brown Bear, on the other hand, has a quaint, innocent-looking face, not unlike the little mouse-like physiognomies of Sir Joshua Reynolds's children.

There has been a great mortality in the reptilehouse. The huge Pythons have died, but they have been replaced; not so, unfortunately, that curious animal the Cameleon. When alone, he refused to change his coat of ashen grey, but it was observed that when he was removed to fresh quarters he generally put on the tinge of colour of the place in which he was. The rapid change of colour for which he is traditionally famous was not observed whilst he was in the possession of the Society. Such is the power of association in our ideas received in early life, that a Cameleon without his attendant disputants, such as we read of in the old "Speakers," does not seem a Cameleon at all, and the grey little fellow who kept so still upon the branch, seemed to us an impostor.

In the adjoining room, where the Sloths are located, a strange little visitor from South America has lately been placed-the Armadillo. This singular creature, in its living cuirass, attracts attention by the extreme rapidity with which it runs about its cage, and the legs being almost entirely hidden by the covering shell of the body, its method of progression reminds the spectator of the mechanical mice we see in the toy-shops. But without the aid of the keeper we miss the most curious habit the beast has, of rolling itself into a ball on the least fright or apprehension of shock. We happened to have the attention of this worthy, who took the creature out for us when thus curled up with fear, and certainly its appearance was most extraordinary-the wedge-like head and tail fitting into each other as closely as a mortice and tennon joint. fact, the ball was so perfect that you might have played cricket with it; and by no effort could an enemy obtain an entrance into its perfectly fitting globe-like shell. In this habit of defence it resembles the Hedgehog and Woodlouse of our own land. Who does not remember the line in Tom Hood's "Haunted House"-

The woodlouse dropp'd, and roll'd into a ball, Touch'd by an impulse occult or mechanic.

It is a peculiarity of most of the curiosities in these Gardens, that the public never see them. The Apteryx, a nocturnal bird from New Zealand, she is specially routed out from her den for a moment for inspection, when she presents the appearance of a bunch of feathers, supported on spindle legs, which would allow the bird to topple over, were they not supplemented by a long bill, which rests upon the ground, and acts as a kind of supporting walking-stick. The olfactory nerves are situated near the extremity of the beak, and with this it probes the ground, scenting the worms upon which it feeds, far below the surface. The great interest of this bird consists in the fact that it is the last living representative of which we have any knowledge, of a gigantic race of wingless birds that once existed in New Zealand. visitor to the Museum of the College of Surgeons may have noticed the shank bones and the eggs of one of these birds, which must have been from twelve to fourteen feet in height, and an account of which has been given to the world by Professor Owen. It is asserted, indeed, that whalers whilst ashore in the more secluded part of the middle island, have seen and been scared by this gigantic bird, which they term "the fireman."

It would really seem as though nature had determined to construct a group of animals in Australia and the adjacent islands on a plan entirely different from that she employed in the old world; what an odd-looking animal, for instance, is the Ursine Dasyure, a marsupial, whose den adjoins those of the Kangaroos. This animal and the Tasmanian Thylacine are both most destructive to the Sheep, and are hunted to death, as the Wolf was in our own land, consequently they are becoming rarer every year. The Ursine Dasyure, as its name implies, belongs to the Bear tribe, but it undoubtedly more resembles a gigantic Mouse, with large and delicate This beast walks with a very odd motion of its hind legs, which arises from paralysis, and it is a singular fact that the same disease killed a former Dasyure in these Gardens. The stock-holders give it the name of the "Devil," in consequence of the devastations it commits among their flocks, and its determined method of showing fight when attacked, being a match for a powerful sheep dog. We must confess its size does not seem to warrant such an assertion, but its bite is, we hear, very vicious and severe.

The Tasmanian Thylacine is a very different animal; it is called the Tasmanian Wolf, not from any resemblance to that animal, but, we suppose, because it is so destructive to the Sheep. In its movements it is more like those of the Cat tribe, and, moreover, its coat has a greater resemblance to that of an Ocelot, than that of a Wolf; its supple and pliant action resembling the former animal very exactly. The shape of its head has that peculiar blunt appearance which so many of the animals possess in the Australian group. Although a most remorseless war is kept up against this animal, yet such is its agility, bounding as it does up heights of from ten to twelve feet, that it bids fair to located in the Ostrich house, is never seen unless | hold its ground for many years in the rocky glens of Tasmania, where it is found. There are some splendid specimens of Kangaroos in the adjoining shed, and they have nearly all bred freely since they have been in their present quarters. Mr. Gould, the distinguished naturalist, dwells upon the excellence of Kangaroo meat for the table, and recommends its introduction into our English parks in the midland and southern counties. But the Kangaroo has a very ugly habit of using its powerful hind quarters when angry, and his claws are so sharp, that he can with facility rip open a man, a contingency for which the best Kangaroo steak in the world would not afford any compensation. English parks would be turned into zoological gardens without the protection of cages and keepers, if all the animals we may be able to acclimatise were turned into them. The Wapiti Deer, for instance, would breed, no doubt, freely enough, if allowed to range our parks, but it is scarcely necessary to say that at rutting time they would be exceedingly dangerous occupants of our home parks. Those who have seen the anger of these splendid Deer at such seasons when any person goes near their inclosure, must admit that our parks with such occupants would be extremely dangerous to walk in. The vigour with which they charge the iron railings of their inclosure when any stranger approaches is "a caution," to use an American phrase, which we should not neglect. The Sambur Deer, which is highly recommended as a park ornament, is also very dangerous at times, one indeed nearly killed Lord Hill's son in a park where some of them had been located. We question much if the Highlands of Scotland would be suitable even for the hardy Wapiti Deer, knowing as we do that they are accustomed to a cold dry climate, such as Canada. At all events, if we could acclimatise these Deer, or any of the fourteen varieties in these gardens which are said to be capable of living in our island, they would be only articles of luxury, and would in no way contribute towards the food of the people.

The south side of the gardens, where the Llamas of old used to be accommodated, is now devoted to the fine collection of Cranes and Waterfowl: yet it seems to us that some of this space might be apportioned to the larger carnivora with advantage. The Lions and Tigers, except at feeding-time, seem now to be very unattractive, and this, we feel certain, is purely attributable to the manner in which they are cooped up in their narrow dens. It is positively painful to watch these noble beasts pace up and down their narrow inclosures and fret against the bars, whilst there is so much room which might be appropriated to their use. It has long been in contemplation to sand over a certain area as an exercising ground for the "great Cats," and we feel certain that if the Society were to do this, it would afford a public sensation which would be highly remunerative. We know nothing of the Lion or the Tiger as we now see them; the supple action of the Leopard is lost in his cage, where he is now confined more cruelly than is a lark. A quarter of an acre well palisaded, into which these animals could be turned at intervals, would prove an immense attraction to the public, who seem to have lost their faith in the king of the forest and his congeners.

A very curious bird, the Talegalla, or Brush Turkey, is now located in the south-western part of the gardens, which is quite secluded from the public eye, and consequently they know nothing about it. Yet in its habits it is one of the most singular of the feathered tribe the Society have in their Gardens. Of course this odd bird is an Australian; and of course it sets about the serious business of life in a manner totally different to that pursued by all other birds. It hatches its young, not by the warmth of its body, as is the ordinary method of incubation, but constructs a natural eccaleobion, by heaping together a mound of vegetable matter, in which it deposits its eggs, waiting patiently for the fermentive process to hatch them. Their eggs are at least four inches long, of an oblong form, not unlike, either in texture or form, an Alligator's The mound is scraped up by the male bird to a height of five or six feet; and then the eggs, which often amount to three dozen, are placed among the heated mass in a ring at regular intervals, with their smaller ends pointing downwards, at least eighteen inches below the surface. Lest the temperature of the fermenting heap should become too great, the male bird is constantly on the watch, giving them air when the weather is hot at least twice in the day, and at all times keeping open a circular aperture in the centre of the mound, to prevent any constant increase of the temperature. The birds, when hatched, lie still in the heap until the third day, when they are capable of strong flight; indeed, one of the young ones being frightened on the third day, on one occasion, at once mounted on the wing, and forced its way through the strong iron netting which covers the inclosure. Of the large number of eggs this bird lays, but three or four ever come to maturity. That the heated mound has some peculiar influence in hatching the birds, which other means will not accomplish, is proved by the fact that the common hen, which hatches the eggs of the swan, equally large with those of the Brush Turkey, cannot bring the young forth; neither can the artificial ecealeobion, which is so successful with the eggs of all other birds. These facts go to prove that there is some condition of heat which the fermentive process is alone capable of producing. The very small number of eggs hatched out in this country is attributable to the nature of the litter composing the heap. In Australia the grasses and vegetable matter are of a highly succulent nature, calculated to ferment and produce a much greater heat than the dry hay and other litter with which they are provided here.

There are at present three pairs of these birds in the enclosure appropriated to them, and they have made three huge heaps of litter, which are filled with eggs, but they have come to nothing. Mr. Bartlett, fancying that the absence of rain during the past season may possibly have prevented the fermentive process going on, and consequently that there was a deficiency of heat necessary to hatch the young, had one nest that was covered over regularly watered, but nothing came of it, and it is now ascertained that all the eggs are hopelessly addled.

The Monkey-house lately opened is a very great improvement upon the old one, the ventilation of which was so abominable that ladies were forced to avoid it. The present house is indeed a splendid conservatory, built entirely of iron and glass, and as light as day. The active Monkeys are no longer caged against the walls, but are located in the middle of the apartment, a perfect gymnasium fitted up with all the apparatus that even humanity could demand. That the building is intended literally as a conservatory as well as a Monkey-house, may be gathered from the creeping plants that are already making their way up the walls, and which will speedily cover the whole building. At present a profusion of potted flowers shed a perfume which keeps down the insufferable Monkey odour; but we fear a mixed perfume will by-and-by arise that will puzzle the nose. There is plenty of ventilation, however, and ample space, so we need not fear a return to the abominations of the old house. In the early days of that building it was heated by hot-air pipes, which so dried the atmosphere that the Monkeys died in large numbers. This was remedied by adopting an open fireplace, which answered admirably. We perceive that hot-water pipes are used in the new house, which are to be occasionally watered on the outside to afford moisture to the air. The plants will also exhale a certain moisture, which will correct the tendency of hot iron to burn the air. The new Monkey-house is not so thickly inhabited as the old one, but the inmates are more rare. In consequence of being perpetually teazed by visitors, many of the old fellows had become so spiteful that it was thought best to dispose of them. We wonder if these ill-conditioned brutes have fallen into the hands of the monkey boys, and are thus brought into still nearer contact with the public in quiet suburban districts? Some of the rare Monkeys and Lemurs are caged against the walls—the Capuchin, with his intelligent little face and beautiful brown and black fur, and the Squirrel Monkey, are both located here.

One of the latest arrivals in the Gardens is the Frugiverous Bat, a very singular creature, with a Fox-like head, and long black leathern wings, stretched upon an arm, at the end of which is a sharp claw, which it uses to climb with. The feet have five finger-like extremities, and by means of these claws and feet it crawls up the wires of its cage with great rapidity. It hangs suspended, head downwards, from a branch at night, folded about with its sombre wings. In India these Bats sometimes, with their numbers, blacken the trees as they roost at night, and when disturbed the whir of their wings is quite terrifying.

One of the large central compartments in the middle of the building has been appropriated for the use of the new Orang. A male and female came alive, but the male died, and now his widow is obliged to bear her bereavement as best she can, which she manages to do pretty well, being plentifully consoled with nuts. It is not a full-grown animal, but it appears to be in good health. It uses its hands and moves about in a slow deliberate manner. It now refreshes itself by some solemn exercise with the trapèze; or again, feeling a little cold, it returns to its house, entering in an erect posture, and pulling out a horse-rug, deliberately places it shawl-ways over its shoulders. Then again, the grand self-possessed way in which it slowly cracks nuts in the presence of a gaping crowd, sufficient to flurry the calmest man, must be envied by the self-conscious, nervous, human young monkeys who contemplate it with wonder from the other side of the iron netting.

A couple of Chimpanzees have lately been added to the collection—certainly a more human-looking beast than the Orang.

High over head—as a bust of Hercules may appropriately be placed in some gymnasium or stadium—a bronze bust of the terrible Gorilla looks down upon the little Monkeys, and for all we know, they look up at it in fear and wonder as their great king and master.

The grand curiosity of the Gardens at the present moment is contained within a closed box close at hand, labelled "The Aye Aye." This strange animal is from that unknown land, Madagascar. Its habits are strictly nocturnal, therefore it is never seen by the public unless the keeper opens its cage and takes it from its retirement. The Aye Aye is allied to the Lemur tribe, but with some singular differences. No living specimen of this animal has ever before been in Europe, and so little is known about it, that there is a grand dispute as to the food it eats in a natural state, and its method of procuring it. Professor Owen has theorised upon the matter, and drawn certain conclusions from its form and organization. It is distinguished by very large ears, and by long curved claws on the extremities, one of which is of a hooked nature. The Professor thinks the animal feeds upon grubs, the presence of which inside woody matter it is enabled to ascertain by means of its largely developed aural appendages -its ears being, in fact, out of all proportion to the rest of its body. When a grub is detected by sound, its teeth cut into the rind, and with its sharp claw it hooks the worm out. This is a purely theoretical view on the part of the Professor, for no one has ever seen the animal conduct itself in this way. On the other hand, Mr. Bartlett, the superintendent of the Gardens, who has taken the trouble to sit up for a fortnight with the animal, in order to watch its habits, asserts that it lives upon the juices of plants; that he has watched it gnaw the succulent food put into its cage, and that it persistently refuses to eat the meal worm, which he never knew any animal living on grubs yet refuse. So the matter stands at

The western aviary contains some small birds which have attracted some attention, and which are new to the British public. At its south-east corner, the male Satin Bower Bird, which is now pretty well known to metropolitans, still survives, but as a disconsolate widower. The playing Bower looks very desolate, and we hope it will not be long before a fresh companion is procured for it. In the corner of the aviary apportioned to it, the visitor will see a collection of broom twigs, which may not attract his attention looking casually, but if he observes closely, he will perceive that they form a portion of some regular construction; not a nest, certainly, for the twigs are not placed in a circle, as they would be in such a piece of bird architecture, but rather in the form of a tunnel open at the top. The twigs are bent in the form of a ship's ribs by the bird, and then the ends are stuck firmly into the ground. They are placed thickly together in a line with each other, having their concave sides opposite, and extending some foot and a-half or two fect. Thus a bower is formed, which the male bird ornaments with bright parrot's feathers, such as are to be found plentifully in Australia, bits of glass, cloth, or any other odd scrap containing colour which the bird can pick up. It is known as a regular thief by the natives, who always search "the bower" in case they have lost anything, just as we search a magpie's nest under similar circumstances. In this bower, or playing-place, in the mating season, the male bird paces to and fro with the most ridiculous action, putting on all the airs of a gallant in order to attract its mate. This is speedily done, and then the pair run in and out of the bower, just as our dancers perform the galop,this manœuvre looks ridiculous enough, but if we knew all things, we do not doubt there is some wise purpose even in this "pretty fooling." The Grass Parakeets, which are so plentifully distributed over the Australian continent, is well represented here. It is as hardy as it is beautiful, and it is confidently asserted that it is living in England in a state of nature.

The Wonga Wonga Pigeon is another bird that deserves the attention of the public, as its introduction into this country as a domestic bird has been spoken of as very probable by the Acclimatization Society. In size it is much larger than our common pigeon, and its flesh, we are informed, is far superior in flavour and whiteness to anything of the same tribe that we are acquainted with.

The Victoria Crowned Pigeon may also be seen here, a very beautiful bird, and well adapted by its habits to adorn the aviaries of this country. In contrast to these handsome specimens of the birds of the late discovered land, are the Laughing Kingfishers. The English Kingfisher possesses no beauty of form, but its brilliant colours redeen it. The Laughing Kingfishers of Australia, as big as pigeons, are still more ugly in form than the British variety, and are of an ugly drab colour marked with black. These birds are particularly large. They are, without doubt, powerful fishers, but they are anything but songsters; indeed, their note or chatter is very discordant, and when they all break out together, the noise is really horrid. But there is a very great rarity here which no casual visitor would ever discover-the Tooth-billed Pigeon, or the little Dodo. It is a shabby-looking little bird, and only derives its importance from its curious beak, which allies it to that extinct bird the Dodo of the Mauritius, the loss of which all ornithologists mourn with a grief that will not be comforted. There is no other example of this bird in Europe; it must therefore be inspected with all the curiosity of a Queen Anne's farthing.

Let us pass over to the fish-house, and inspect the bright little birds which flash about like gems in the pretty enclosure. Mr. Bartlett has composed this little bit of "framed nature," with the eye of an artist. It is now nearly two years since this inclosure at the end of the fish-house was constructed. but we have seen no notice taken of the clever effect it produces. The end of the fish-house has been fitted up as a little living picture of a river-side scene, with its appropriate feathered inhabitants. The oblong space is open to the sky, an iron netting only intervening. The back of this space is filled up with the bark of the silver beech and other trees, broken into ledges, on which ferns grow and luxuriate, and in the recesses of which the birds breed. The light falling as it does, is reflected with great brilliancy, and the mosses and verdure give the picture a complete air of nature. In the bottom of the inclosure is a pool swarming with fish, and margined here and there with sand; it is, in fact, a little piece of some bright river-side caught and caged, and exhibited to the public behind plate-glass. As we looked the Dab Chicks swam merrily about in the pool, and a Kingfisher, like a brilliant flashing jewel, fled past, skimmed the water, and returned to his perch with a glistening little silver fish in its beak; he swallowed it, and fished again, but this time his prey was too big for him, it wriggled vigorously; in vain he held it by the tail, and banged its head against a stone—it would not die, and even. tually fell into the water, where it was fast recovering, when a Dab Chick swimming by, espied it, and gobbled it up. 'A "cheap tripper" up from the country watched this little episode for a moment, then he burst out, "Well, I've a lived where kingfishers be all my life, and never seed such a sight as that; who'd a thought o' coming to Lunnon to see such as that." Beside the Kingfishers and the Dab Chicks, there are Water Wagtails, the little Grebe, and Pied Grallina, an Australian water bird, something like a Magpie, only more delicately formed; it is exhibited here for the first time. Of the zoophytes quietly feeding or throwing out their orange and white tentacles, a writer in this journal has lately afforded an admirable account. The fish, caged as it were in slices of the ocean and the river, we are sorry to find, are not doing as well as might be wished; there are very many dead, and those that survive look but sickly, if we except the young Salmon which have been hatched under the care of Mr. Frank Buckland, and which seem merry and vigorous, and afford a good prospect of ending this sublunary state in the best of all possible manners—on a dinner napkin.

In perambulating the gardens, the visitor cannot help observing the great advance that has been made in grouping animals of the same class together. The Antelope-shed now contains a splendid collection of the rarer animals of that order which travellers in South Africa have lately made known to us. The Hartebeest, a very rare animal, the Springbok, the Leché, another rare Antelope, and the Gnu, are all familiar to us by the volumes of Gordon Cumming, and Sir Cornwallis Harris. Close to the Antelopehouse is the Zebra-house, in which there are some new arrivals. Here we find an admirable representation of the Horse tribe. Few persons will fail to be struck with the noble appearance of the Kiang, or Wild Ass of Tibet, which stands at least fifteen hands high. The Wild Ass of Kutch, and of Assyria. and the noble Burchill Zebra, should be seen, as few persons know to what perfection of form the wild varieties of our own dull beast attains in his native wilds. The cattle-shed is equally curious, containing specimens of the genus Bos, the Brahmin cattle with their mild moonful eyes, and the Yac of Tibet, so overborne with its long fleece-like hair as to hide its legs, and make it look like a hobby-horse; its young one, on the other hand, is covered with a soft curly coat, which makes it look like a well-washed and combed poodle dog. Not far off is the American Bison, the very essence of clumsiness. Those who have not been abroad, will be struck with the grand proportions of the Tuscany and Piedmontese cattle presented to the Society by the King of Italy.

In the space which lies between the new Monkeyhouse and the Crane-paddock is the Whale-pond. awaiting the coming Whale. At present a Sturgeon some three feet long occupies the pond, but it is hoped that at least a Porpoise will take up its quarters here before long, if not one of the smaller species of Whales, one of which has been exhibited in the pond of the New York Gardens for some time. Several Porpoises have been placed here at different times, but they have never lived more than one month. This mortality, according to the superintendent of the gardens, is not attributable to the want of salt water, but to the diseased condition in which they are caught, the very fact of their being captured testifying to their feeble condition, and to their being beaten in-shore by their healthy companions.

That sea water is not imperatively required by animals living in it, is proved by the fine condition of the two Seals, which have now lived in their pond some four years, with only the addition to it of a little rock salt. The Sturgcon, a fish that lives in both salt and fresh water, seems quite content with the latter, as the one in the pond has been there for one year, and is flourishing and growing. The Seals have not arrived at the perfection of training which an animal of the same class has attained to at Boston, United States, which turns a barrel organ and plays a tune, but they are very tame, and they seem to suffer no dyspepsia from their daily meal of 10lb. of whiting—rather expensive provender at this season in London.

Whilst in the vicinity of the Whale-pond, we must not fail to visit the Swine-house, where there has been a new arrival from the Andeman Islands of a most eurious Masked Hog. This animal is supposed to have come originally from Japan, and certainly its singular countenance, completely masked by folds of skin, and its limbs covered with warty knobs, we have seen more than once represented in those grotesque carvings in ivory for which the Japanese are so famous.

The loud chattering of the Australian Kingfisher, which is so invariably heard towards the dusk of the evening that it is known at home by the name of the settler's clock, warns us that we must take our leave of these deeply interesting gardens.

As we go out through the upper park gate, the Sparrows hopping about remind us that whilst we are trying to bring in strange animals and birds from abroad to adorn our landscapes, please the eye, and add to our cuisine, these humble little grey birds are now introduced with tremendous applause by the inhabitants of Victoria, and the fact that many of them have been seen near the railway station in that city is chronicled in the papers with as much gusto as would have been the discovery of a rich placer there. Who would think that the unsentimental Englishman abroad would fall into such raptures about a bird for the destruction of which the farmers in the old country are still offering a reward of a farthing a head?

ANDREW WYNTER.

HEALTH OF BODY AND MIND.

"Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights." All gifts so characterised, and so derived, must be worth having, worth keeping, and worth enjoying. This is as true of the temporal as of the spiritual favours which we receive from the hand of God. Whatever He has bestowed upon man to supply his necessities, to promote his comfort, or to yield him pleasure, not only may be, but ought to be, used for the purpose for which it is given. "Every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused if it be received with thanksgiving." "He giveth richly all things to enjoy." In fact, earthly good is invested with a spiritual character, and becomes a spiritual blessing, when it is recognised as the gift of God; and this can only be when a Divine intention of benevolence towards the possessor is felt to be fulfilled in his distinct perception of the special benefit conferred. On the other hand, the value of earthly good is increased, and the satisfaction and delight which it is in its nature to afford greatly enhanced, by the consideration that it comes from God, that our possession of it is due to his will, and our enjoyment of it in accordance with his will. These are the sentiments of the author of the book of Ecclesiastes, expressed in language which has been sometimes misrepresented as if teaching the religion of mere secularism: "It is good and comely for one to eat and to drink, and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun all the days of his life, which God giveth him: for it is his portion. Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth, and hath given him power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour; this is the gift of God" (v. 18, 19). Life and health may be placed at the head of all God's earthly gifts to man. The first is universal; the second is more common than almost any other. Without the first no other is possible, without the second neither the first nor hardly any other can be enjoyed in perfection. They are blessings for our own use and advantage, and talents by which we are enabled to serve God, and benefit society; blessings, also, in the possession of which we may become more and more blested, talents which may ness in the service of God, and in our vocation and ministry among men. And as we instinctively seek means for the protection of life when endangered, and the restoration of health when lost or impaired, so, in the exercise of the reason and foresight with which we are endowed, if we can discover means for the prolongation of life, and the preservation of health, it is manifestly right, and our duty, to employ them. Whether long life be really desirable is a question which has often been debated, and often decided in the negative. Scripture may be appealed to on both sides; yet, undeniably, Scripture represents "length of days" as a blessing. There can be no difference of opinion, however, on the subject of health. Notwithstanding the admitted and very remarkable fact that many seem to find satisfaction in being accounted invalids, and take pains to convince themselves, as well as others, that they are subject to serious or frequent infirmities, it is certain that all without exception really desire health, and cordially agree in the sentiment that it is one of the greatest blessings of Providence.

At the same time it must be acknowledged that health is not estimated at its full value by the majority of those who possess it. The reason is, doubtless, that it is their normal and habitual condition, and one which they share with most of those with whom they are daily conversant. Such is the weakness, or perverseness, of human nature. Ordinary and universal blessings are slighted in comparison with some peculiar advantages, or possessions, which are objects of our desires, or subjects of our pride; while yet the former are in reality, and also in our own judgment when we consider the matter, infinitely more valuable than the latter. which is essential to the content and comfort of every day of our lives, to our capability and freedom of action, would, beyond all question, be preferred by every one of us, if we were allowed our choice, to whatever may minister to our gratification incidentally, or occasionally, even in the highest degree. Health is undeniably a more precious gift than riches, or honours, or power; for who would exchange it for either of these the chief objects of be improved to the continual increase of our useful- human ambition? A man would rather retain health, or recover it, than achieve any grand success upon which the heart is set, and the attainment of which may have appeared to him to be the perfection of earthly bliss. We, of course, leave out of consideration those cases, happily numerous, in which a noble nature would freely sacrifice not only health, but life itself, for the promotion of some good cause, or on the generous impulse of friendship, or gratitude, or love.

Other examples of ordinary and general blessings which are of superlative and acknowledged value, and yet are held in slight practical appreciation, may be found in the peace, and liberty, universally, and for so long a period, enjoyed by the inhabitants of our native land. Peace, in the sense of immunity from the actual presence of war, has been our inheritance for many generations. And our civil and religious liberty is such as has never been attained by any other nation, nor by our own until the present age. And to these national blessings we owe that security of property and life, and that sense of such security, which constitute a large portion of our domestic and personal happiness. And yet how often do we reflect upon our interest in them as a substantial permanent good? By how many persons are they habitually apprehended as a subject of congratulation and thanksgiving, and a compensation for the trials, disappointments and vexations of daily life?

It is a very trite observation that we learn the true value of any blessing by its loss. Happily, no such opportunity has been afforded us of arriving at a proper estimate of the benefits of peace and liberty. By contrast, indeed, we may approximate to it. A visit to the scenes of recent warfare in Schleswig, or Virginia, would improve our appreciation of peace; and a conversation with the subjects of the Russian or French empire, or of a German principality, or with the citizens of an American republic, if they would reveal to us their experience and their sentiments, would deepen our sense of the advantage of liberty. But we have, perhaps, all of us, been enabled, in a greater or less degree, to understand the comforts of health by the privation of them during a season of sickness. It needs but a fit of the toothache to make any one of us sensible of the actual blessedness of freedom from pain. And to the invalid enfeebled by disease, or to one who is disabled or detained in inactivity by some local affection or accident, how enviable appears the mere power of moving freely from place to place, and pursuing the ordinary business of the day, without hindrance from suffering or weakness. It is remarkable, however, how soon these effects pass away, and how health when restored becomes again a matter of no consideration, and is enjoyed without the consciousness of enjoyment.

Health, it has been said, is common. More than nine-tenths of our population, probably, are in good health for more than nine-tenths of their lives. The fact cannot but appear surprising to any one who reflects for a while on the numerous circumstances by which health is everywhere, and in every instance, endangered. If we glance through a general treatise on medicine, or the report of a Sanitary Commission, we must be painfully impressed with the multitude and variety of diseases to which our species is liable, and of the active causes of disease which are prevalent in all manuer of localities, employments, and conditions of life and action. Opening a newspaper, we are struck with the diversified forms of accident by which injuries to the person are occasioned. The perusal of a book on anatomy or surgery, or an hour's attendance at a lecture on the human frame, is enough to possess the unprofessional mind with an alarming sense of the frailty of our whole structure, and especially of its most important and vital organs. The natural effect of the contemplation of the innumerable tendons, ligaments, valves, ducts, fibres, tissues, and whatever other classes there may be of the constituents of our organisation, is to make one almost afraid to walk, or, run, much more to jump, or climb, and renders it incomprehensible how one survives a cough or a sneeze. And since it is undeniably true that the lesion or derangement of any portion of this delicate mechanism must cause pain or disease, and may cause death, the protracted continuance of health and life really becomes a marvel and a mystery-

> "Strange that a harp of thousand strings Should keep in tune so long."

But, common as health is in spite of the numberless risks to which it is in all cases exposed, it might be much more common. It is impaired and destroyed perhaps as frequently by men's own acts, as by causes independent of themselves, and beyond their control. Vice, self-indulgence, and folly, will account for a large proportion of occasional or chronic disease. And many of the dangers by which health is threatened would be either removed or greatly diminished by the exercise of prudence and common sense, and the practical use of so much knowledge of sanitary principles as all may easily acquire. The following observations on the means of preserving and improving health are offcred in the hope of promoting the consideration of various details of the whole economy of health by a large circle of readers, rather than with any pretension of increasing the information already possessed by them upon the subject. In this matter, as in others of equal or greater importance, it is not by the presentation of new truth to the mind, but by securing its attention to acknowledged truth, that the most satisfactory results are to be obtained.

It is proposed to make some inquiry into the health of the mind as well as the body. The outward and visible must, in order of discussion, take precedence of the inward and spiritual; for the body is more patent and accessible to investigation than the mind; it asserts a prior and more peremptory claim upon our notice in our personal experience; and the condition, action, and treatment of the mind will be most conveniently represented by illustrations, as they must necessarily be spoken of in terms, taken from the corresponding circumstances of the body.

The principal components of the human frame will naturally indicate and classify the topics for consideration in dealing with the subject of bodily health. The body may be roughly described as an organisation of bones and muscles, permeated by blood, covered with skin, and containing a breathing and digestive apparatus. A healthy condition of the bones, muscles, and blood, may be said, in general terms, to be chiefly or appropriately promoted by exercise; of the skin, by cleanliness; of the breathing organs, by sufficiency and purity of air; of the digestion, by food taken in due quantity, of good quality, and at right seasons. Each of these means for the preservation of health, however, produces its beneficial effects not only upon those parts of the system with which we have especially connected it, but more or less directly upon all the

Our attention is first due to the main process by which life and strength are constantly maintained—the support and nourishment of our whole material constitution by the ministry of the stomach in receiving and digesting food. If this be thought too ignoble an organ to be honoured with our primary notice, let it assert its own claims to precedence in the language supplied to it by Shakspeare in his version of the famous apologue of Menenius Agrippa preserved by Livy:—

"True is it, my incorporate friends, quoth he,
That I receive the general food at first
Which you do live upon: and fit it is;
Because I am the storehouse and the shop
Of the whole body: But if you do remember,
I send it through the rivers of your blood,
Even to the court, the heart,—to the seat o' the brain;
And, through the cranks and offices of man,
The strongest nerves, and small inferior veins
From me receive that natural competency Whereby they live: And though that all at once,
You, my good friends, though all at once cannot See what I do deliver out to each;
Yet I can make my audit up, that all
From me do back receive the flower of all,
And leave me but the bran."

Cortolamis, Act i., sc. 1.

Man is omnivorous. It is clearly indicated by the structure of his teeth that he is intended to feed upon both flesh, and fruits or vegetables; and an examination of his capabilities for digestion, both mechanical and chemical, confirms the evidence of the teeth. The first general inference to be drawn from this fact is, that a mixed diet must be good for us, as being in conformity with our animal nature. A diet consisting of meat alone, or of vegetable substances alone, does not duly exercise the functions with which our bodies are endowed for the purpose of their sustentation. We may apply the general principle thus obtained to the first question which meets us-the nutrition of early infancy. Before the human infant has teeth, it cannot receive solid food, of either animal or vegetable character. it is capable of receiving and profiting by mixed diet even at that period. The nourishment provided by nature in the mother's milk is undoubtedly to be relied upon chiefly for its sustenance. Yet it will be found advantageous to employ, almost from the first, the lighter kinds of farinaceous food. It is often matter of surprise that the offspring of a healthy mother, or the foster child of a healthy nurse, enjoying an abundance and rich supply of its first aliment, does not thrive, or is affected by various disturbances of the digestive organs; and, as often, that an infant whose mother, from feebleness, or peculiarity of constitution, cannot adequately minister to its necessities, grows rapidly, and is hearty and strong. The reason is that, in the former case, the child has been too long restricted to one, although the best kind of nourishment, and that, in the latter, a salutary change and mixture of diet has improved the appetite and relish for food, and variously exercised the powers of digestion.

During the early years of childhood, and before the first teeth, or at any rate the incisors, have been displaced by their permanent successors, it is not desirable to give children much animal food. Their bill of fare may be abundant, diversified, and attractive, without including in it meat, which they n'either will nor can sufficiently masticate; for meat being, of necessity, always prepared for their use in small morsels, is invariably swallowed as soon as taken into the mouth, and must, therefore, prove a frequent cause of pain and sickness. The different kinds of grain, of native and foreign growth, variously prepared, milk, vegetables-and of these, such as afford edible roots and stems, rather than leaves-should form the staple of human food from the weaning of the infant to the eighth or ninth year. Among the poor, bread is too uniformly the principal article of diet for children of this age. The chief objection to this is want of variety; but the bread itself is often bad in quality, from the mixture of improper materials, or from unskilfulness in its manufacture-imperfect kneading, or baking. It is much to be desired that oatmeal and rice should be more freely used than at present for the food of children. They would be found profitable in every sense, being cheap, wholesome, and nutritious. The Highlander's breakfast of oatmeal porridge would be a more substantial and digestible meal than several slices of bread and butter; and, with the addition of a little treacle, would be to most children's taste far more palatable. A similar use of treacle might be made in the preparation of rice, both for breakfast and for dinner; and indeed would form a desirable corrective to the effect of rice upon many infantile constitutions. Milk, and sugar, or treacle, should enter largely into th'e composition of children's food. And a little galculation would enable the poorest to procure the m in sufficient quantity by a diminution in their expenditure for bread.

It is most important in the physical nurture of children that their meals should be at regular hours, and with no long intervals. But there is no worse practice than that which is too prevalent, especially among the poor, of giving children small portions of food between meals, or whenever they choose to ask, or, after much asking, to get rid of their importunity. It has a bad moral effect, encouraging them to give way to every impulse of appetite, and to think much and often of eating; and so reuders them gluttonous. And it has a bad physical effect, inducing in the stomach a habit of perpetual craving, or keeping it in a state of perpetual repletion. Again, not only regularity of mealtimes, but comfort and good order at meals, will conduce in a great degree to the due and satisfactory enjoyment, and hence good digestion, of food. Hurry, confusion, general talking and clamour, chiding and quarreling, too often witnessed at the dinner-table of a disorderly family, must injuriously interfere with the processes of mastication and deglutition, and, consequently, with that of digestion. Indeed, such is the close connection of our mental and corporeal faculties, that these circumstances do, of themselves, immediately tend to impede digestion. It is a wellknown fact that fear, anger, vexation, anxiety, felt at the time of eating, prevent the proper decoction of food by the stomach; and so, to a certain extent, must all other perturbations of the mind. The observance of this rule is of course as necessary for adults as children; but since the passions of children are more easily excited, and less regarded, and their stomachs more delicate for the most part than those of their elders, they are the chief sufferers by its neglect.

Bread, the staff of life, claims the first consideration among the staple materials of our food. Bread should be home-made; and every cook, and every one who has to cook, should know how to make it. The family is thus secured against the evils arising from unwholesome ingredients, introduced by the unscrupulousness of trade, to improve the appearance, or the profit, of a loaf. The finest wheatflour, ground from the pure grain, produces the bread most in esteem, on account of its whiteness and closeness of texture, and it is doubtless excellent food, and very nutritious. But, if much bread is consumed, a more digestible, and therefore more nutritious article of diet, is provided by the coarser kind of flour, or a copious mixture of bran with the finer. The brown bread thus manufactured is generally popular; it has more taste than that made from the pure flour, and is, of course, much cheaper. Other ingredients may also be employed with similar advantage in making bread. Potatoes, in due proportion, and, still better, rice, will combine with wheat-flour to form a capital loaf, of good consistency and agreeable flavour, and retaining its moistness longer than that made of flour alone. By the use of these substances, especially the latter, the cost of bread in a large household will be very greatly diminished, at no sacrifice of its wholesome or palatable qualities.

The various kinds of butcher's meat, and of poultry and fish, commonly used for the principal meal of the day, differ much, no doubt, among themselves in wholesomeness and nutritiveness. But, always supposing the meat in a proper state for human food, the greatest difference in these respects is made by the cooking. Bad cooking renders a large proportion of the food consumed in this country indigestible; while good cooking would extract nourishment and enjoyment from much which is generally rejected as insipid or injurious. Many simple rules for the right preparation of food, especially animal food, rules for the most ordinary operations-boiling, roasting, baking, and frying-are either unknown to most of our cooks and housewives, or are wilfully and scornfully rejected by them as crotchets and whims of unpractical persons, meddling with what they cannot be expected to understand. Thanks, however, to the efforts of the late M. Soyer, supported by his professional reputation, a considerable amount of knowledge on these subjects has been of late years disseminated, and cheap manuals, containing manifold and useful instruction on the art and practice of cooking, conveyed in intelligible language, are now received with less prejudice than formerly, and are gradually producing an influence upon our domestic cookery which it may be hoped will extend, in due time, to our labouring population. One favourable result of the movement headed, if not originated, by that distinguished chef has been the multiplication of soups, and the more extensive diffusion of tastes for dishes of that class. Abundance of materials, animal and vegetable, is available for food, and capable of yielding much nourishment, or of imparting flavour and zest to a meal, if introduced into soup, which hitherto have either been never purchased, or, if forming a necessary part of a purchase, wasted, or deliberately thrown away. The value of soup for improving, augmenting, and economising the dietary of a poor family is much better understood on the Continent. In most French cottages the pot-au-feu is kept continually simmering, and ready to receive scraps of all kinds, which otherwise could not be converted into food. Many years ago the writer remarked, in the hearing of a person well acquainted with France. upon a subject much discussed of late-the paucity of small birds in that country. He explained it by saying that when a French peasant hears of a bird within a few fields of his cottage, he goes out and snares him, and puts him into the soup-pot. It is the same with almost everything else at all edible that can be caught, killed, or gathered. The same observing person also stated that, during the war with France, many French prisoners were on parole in a city in the Midland Counties near his residence, and having but a small allowance made them for their maintenance, and nothing to do, they were accustomed to sally forth every morning into the neighbouring fields and woods, and to return laden with an abundance of herbs, and other wild products of the country, which made savoury and wholesome additions to their potage, but which the English peasantry of the locality never dreamed of employing for food. It would hardly be safe to recommend to our agricultural poor, in their present ignorance of practical botany, to make free use of wild herbs; it is certainly not desirable that they should be encouraged in the extensive destruction of wild birds. And perhaps, upon the whole, they are better supplied with provisions than the corresponding class in most foreign lands. But many a cottage might furnish a more plentiful, and more nourishing, and more acceptable meal than at present to its hungry inmates by the free use of vegetable-forms, broths and soups, in the great variety of common vegetables, easily grown, or procurable, and of scrap meat, which butchers would be generally glad to dispose of at a nominal

Edible vegetable-forms of one kind or anotherroots, stems, leaves, flowers, fruit, or seeds-are so abundantly provided by the teeming earth, in almost every climate and soil, that it is evident they are intended to supply a very considerable proportion of the food of man. They differ much as to their nutritive qualities, but all have their uses; and many which are not very palatable or profitable by themselves, however dressed, become agrecable additions to various compounds, chiefly of the soup kind. A few rough experiments will soon instruct the unprofessional caterer for a household how to employ them. Fruits also may, with the greatest advantage, be liberally introduced, both raw and cooked, as portions of regular meals. There can be no doubt that all vegetables and fruits that are commonly eaten have special properties which render them individually beneficial, in some particular manner, to our corporeal system. The rule for availing ourselves fully of this provision made in them for our benefit is to use them in moderation, in combination with other food, and in season. It may reasonably be inferred from numerous analogies that, in its season of maturity, every product of the earth intended for our consumption is in itself really wholesome, and is then especially adapted to the state and requirements of the body, in some or other of its organs or functions. As the medicinal or sanitary plants, whatever other purposes they may serve, are evidently designed to be correctives, each of some particular abnormal condition of our organisation, so, probably, the alimentary and salutary plants are, exactly at the times when they are presented to us by nature, precisely the vegetable food most conducive to the maintenance of health. If the restoratives are efficacious by reason of their relation to certain states of disease, we may fairly suppose that the nutritives and preservatives produce their beneficial effects in virtue of their relation to certain phases of the state of health. And, obviously, it is most probable that these phases should occur at the season when the plants attain that development which renders them suitable for our food. But, without any deep analysis of its principle, the maxim will commend itself to most as founded upon common sense, that whatever food has a season is good for us at that season. Hence, instead of debarring ourselves from various vegetable productions when most plentiful and most inviting, from the notion that they are the cause or the promoters of seasonal distempers, we shall act most wisely and naturally in allowing ourselves the free use of them, in due proportion to other food, and always with careful consideration of the existing state of the bodily health, and of the idiosyncrasies of the individual constitution. Perhaps we may go farther, and say that, when any article of food is in season, the supply of which is naturally profuse, it would be generally for our benefit to give it a preponderance in our daily diet. During the prevalence of Asiatic cholera in 1832, people were so possessed with the conviction that vegetable food was likely to produce or predispose to the disease, that there was scarcely any sale in the great London markets for the principal productions of the season. The market-gardeners of London and its vicinity not only procured and published the testimony of all the most eminent medical practitioners of the day in favour of the proper use of their commodities, but also put forth statistics, of undeniable authenticity, which proved that the families of the labourers in the market-gardens, who were necessarily large consumers of whatever vegetables were in season, and in fact lived chiefly upon them, enjoyed in a remarkable degree immunity from the destructive epidemic.

The maxim of greatest importance in reference to the materials of human food is-mixture and variety; a maxim founded, as has been stated, upon man's omnivorous nature. Animal and vegetable substances, soups and solid meat, fish, flesh, and fowl, in combination, or succession, ought, if due advantage is to be takeu of the health-sustaining element in food, to form the dietary of every household. And this would be practicable to a great extent, even amongst the lowest class of our population, if a few simple principles of domestic economy, and domestic cookery, were but understood and believed in. The poor, when ill, have great faith in a "change of medicine;" they would in numberless cases have less occasion for changes of medicine if they would study change of food. And others far above them might profit by the same practice. An illustration of the too common indifference to sameness of diet, and the mischiefs arising from it, was offered in the hearing of the writer some years since by a gentleman of the medical profession, one of a party of tourists who spent a very pleasant evening together in intellectual conversation at an inn in the Highlands. person, he told us, had applied to him, or a friend of his, for advice, who was evidently labouring under a species of atrophy, the symptons being those which often indicate scarcity or poverty of food. On inquiring into his habits of life, it was found that he had daily business in London, which detained him in the city from morning to night, and that he invariably dined at a chop-house, on mutton-chops. On Sundays, his dinner, being left to the discretion of his landlady, was generally the same dish. The consequence was that he lost all appetite, his food ceased to nourish him, and in fact, said our informant, he was "starving upon mutton." A judicious and gradual alteration in his dinner fare restored him to health.

The question of the proper and most salutary beverage of man has been warmly discussed during the last quarter of a century; and many have, much to their own benefit and that of society at large, pronounced in favour of water. In the earlier stages of human life, water is unquestionably the best drink at meals, for the purpose of quenching thirst. But universal instinct has availed itself of the provision of nature for the production of stimulating liquors from the fruits of the earth by the process of fermentation. And it is not easy to refute the argument arising from this instinct, and provision, in favour of the general and moderate use of such liquors. It may be said that they are intended to be medicinal and not alimentary; but if they are medicinal, they are so, at least those of them the supply of which is most copious, by their preservative and preventive, rather than by their sanitary character. They act immediately upon the nervous and digestive systems, and upon the circulation; and, when not taken in excess of quantity or strength, act, in the majority of cases, beneficially.

When the corporeal structure of man is fully developed, and exercises its functions for the daily purposes of life, there appears to be, in all but the most excitable temperaments, a chronic tendency to inertia, or imperfect action, in various organs, of which the alcoholic stimulants are the most ready and sure correctives. And there are constantly recurring occasions of partial exhaustion, or lassitude, through excitement or labour, when the internal powers, nervous and digestive, require for their restoration a stimulus more active and diffusive than is supplied by any preparation of animal or vegetable food; when, in fact, such a stimulus is necessary in order that the system may derive real and full advantage from the food. Used with due regard to quantity, time, and circumstances, fermented liquors are salutary to most, necessary to a great many, and, at some seasons and periods of life, perhaps to all. But let it be carefully observed, that excess in these liquors is detrimental to both the nervous and digestive powers; and that, indeed, diluents of any kind, taken in large draughts at meals, are unfavourable to the decoction of food in the stomach, and tend to weaken that organ.

The caution just given applies to those very popular infusions-tea and coffee-which form so large a proportion of the beverage of the English people. It is now generally admitted that, if not in themselves nutritive, they are conducive to nutrition, and that their elements, called theine and cafeine, have properties which justify the abundant use which is made of them, and the high estimation in which they are held. There is no better preparation for a day of hard work, bodily or mental, than a cup or two of moderately strong tea; aud no more agreeable and wholesome restorative after fatigue. But the good effects of tea, and of coffee as well, are in countless instances neutralised, and bad effects produced, by the immoderate quantity which is imbibed at breakfast and tea time; the consequence of this over-indulgence being often chronic dyspensia.

Still worse results follow from the pernicious habit of drinking these liquids very hot. "Did you ever," said an eminent medical practitioner to one whom he was warning against the acknowledged practice,—"Did you ever take notice of the palm of a washer-woman's hand—pale, sodden, flabby, wrinkled; such will be the state of the inner lining of your stomach if you are constantly pouring hot tea into it. And you may easily understand how incapable it must then become of performing its functions."

It is most important to health that the daily meals should be taken at suitable times, and with regularity. Breakfast should not be delayed long after rising. Many hours have elapsed since the last meal, and sleep has promoted digestion, so that very soon a sensation of emptiness and craving for food is usually experienced; and these demands of nature ought to be satisfied. Work of any kind continued for some time in such circumstances is found to be exhausting. Persons who rise early, and cannot conveniently obtain their full morning meal for two or three hours, would do well to secure the provision of some slight refreshment of a light and simple kind, to be taken before they address themselves to the first duties of the day. They will ensure a better appetite for the more substantial breakfast, and derive greater benefit from it, than if they come to it with feelings of faintness and languor, which are the effects of too long a fast. For the same reason, there should not be long intervals between the meals, nor should the principal meal be taken late in the day. digestive organs partake of the weariness and reduction of power which the rest of the body experiences after the lapse of many hours of wakefulness and activity, and if then required to exercise their functions upon abundance of solid food, cannot perform their work satisfactorily. On the other hand, about midway between rising and going to bed, a moderate amount of labour and exercise has created an appetite without producing lassitude, and at this point the powers require sustentation and re-inforcement for the remaining moiety of the day's work. So that the natural time for dinner would appear to vary with the habits of life between the hours of twelve and three. As was urged in the case of children, plenty of time should be given to this meal; the food taken slowly, in small morsels, and ample use made of the teeth before swallowing. And, if practicable, a considerable period of rest for body and mind should be secured between dining and returning to the ordinary duties and labours of the day. The almost invariable habit of the lower animals to remain quiet, and generally asleep, after a full meal, is some evidence in favour of this recommendation. The dyspeptic condition of many of our operatives in town and country is clearly traceable to the necessity of hurrying from work to dinner, and from dinner to work, in consequence of living at a considerable distance from the place of employment. Hence the great importance of the establishment of dining-houses in every quarter of our large towns, which may be reached in a few minutes by the mechanic or labourer whose work lies far from home, so that he may be able to devote the latter part of his dinner hour to quiet talk, or quiet reading, to a nap of forty winks, or a gentle saunter. And the farm servant, or the navvy, who is employed at a distance of a mile or two from his cottage, would derive more nourishment and refreshment from the dinner which he has brought with him, or has had brought to him, and after eating which he can rest for half an hour, than from a meal more wholesome in itself, and better prepared, and enjoyed at the family board, but which he must hastily despatch, and rise from it the moment he has swallowed the last mouthful, and walk rapidly back to the resumption of his laborious occupation.

ON THE ENFORCED PAUSES OF LIFE.

IT seems that in old Scandinavia there were trolls, or lubber dwarfs, who were always busy; who never knew what it was to repose. A country fellowas I remember the story, which I quote upon the strength of a child's recollection-employed one of these trolls to assist him in stealing a quantity of wheat from another countryman's barn. "Take a little more, Mr. Troll, take a little more," says the thief, "by-and-by you shall have some rest," So the troll takes a little more, saying, however, "Rest, rest! What is rest?" Off they go, the pair of them, carrying heavy loads of the stolen goods. When they are at a safe distance from the scene of their theft, they sit down for a rest. "Oh," says the troll, "if I had only known how good rest is, I would have brought away the entire barn !"-

Most of us know how good rest is, and are ready enough to take it, though not always when we need it: on the other hand, it is sometimes forced upon us in a way that teaches more than one lesson. We find, in the compelled pauses of our lives, that the world can do without us, and that it is a good thing to be occasionally cut off from it. How nice it is to let alone; how nice to be let alone!

Nearly all forms of travelling give us some degree of this kind of feeling. Not, of course, riding in an omnibus, for there is no telling whom you may meet in it; but in some degree riding in a cab, and in a considerable degree, riding on the railway for any distance. In a cab you may lean back so that nobody can see you; and you may shut your eyes upon the hard faces, and squalid dresses, and filthy gutters, and frowsy corners of the streets. Nobody is likely to stop the earriage,—and nobody can stop a train! So that, unless you have unpleasant fellow-travellers, you are comfortably shut up from the rest of the world, with a delicious sensation that there is no drawbridge. It is an old remark that, from a similar point of view, a sea-voyage is delightful. Nobody can knock at the door. If you are ill, nobody can look in, to condole; and how delightful that is sometimes—to escape being reminded that you are not well! On the other hand, you have your own delicious incapacities. You cannot knock at anybody else's door. If something nasty occurs to you, you cannot write it, and post it to a friendwho would be vexed by it. A masterly inactivity is forced upon you. Your whole being lies fallow. Ceasing to plague and to be plagued; knowing that the great world gets on without your fretting and fuming about, it; and yet retaining a keen sense of your own vitality, -oh, it must be a pleasant situation. A keen sense of your own vitality you must have, for the mind puts forth an immense fresh elasticity of power in the presence of vast suggestive spaces, and magnificent sights and sounds, such as are round it on the great deep: and yet there is rest, and a triumphant immunity.

The forced repose which accompanies very severe illness, or confinement to the house on a wet day, or the recovery from a swoon, brings with it something of the same soothing effect. In the midst of a heavy personal trouble, or a serious enterprise, which seems to demand the most strenuous effort on your own part, you are suddenly stricken with illness. The oars drop from your hands, and the boat—does it stop? No, thank God, it pulls through, it gets safely past the rapids, and you have to reflect, amid the fretfulness of returning health, what a useless, unimportant fellow you are. Or again. For days past you have been carnestly working your affairs up to a certain point for a certain day, "sharp." Perhaps you have even fixed the hour at which a particular iron shall be hot, and shall be struck by your energetic hand. On that day it comes on to rain, thunder, and lighten so furiously that all the world stays indoors, and you, not being quite well, feel that you must. The next day, you go out with the intention of taking up the broken thread and working it into your scheme, but find that the course of events has superseded your ingenious activity, and your efforts are not required. Not unfrequently the new turn which things have taken is felicitous, but let it be clearly understood that this does not condemn your activity, or show that it could have been spared. It may not appear to have any connection with the result, but you and I do not know quite everything, and there may be a real though invisible connection between things the most remote.

Taking care not to draw the false moral from anything of this kind that happens in our lives, we may yet draw the right one. How much have we all suffered, as some French epigrammatist says, in rhyme, from evils that never occurred ! How exaggerated are some of our strivings! Napoleon, as we have all read, used to leave his letters unopened for days, and then find with cynical joy, on breaking their seals at last, that the majority had answered themselves. Of course this might and would happen in more ways than one. For instance, the poor sick man's letter, begging the loan of a sovereign to buy food with, has clearly answered itself, if at the end of a week you find the sick man is dead and are quite sure the widow will not come to ask you for a sovereign towards the funeral expenses. But, in the majority of the instances in which the letters no longer want answering, it is pretty certainly because the writers were overurgent about things which have arranged themselves without interference. The fact is, we get upon inclined planes in our little affairs, and become heated with the "wind of our own speed," and then of course we exaggerate the consequence of our own efforts, and of what others can do for us. But we must not allow this sort of reflection upon life to suggest the foolish and wicked paradox that indifference stands as good a chance as energy. Nobody who loves the truth ever pushes this suggestion beyond a joke. Drunkards and fools do escape strange pitfalls, and do fall into the laps of easy fortunes: but the very surprise the thing occasions is enough to indicate its place in the classification of events.

Scarcely anything in life is so sweet to me as the repose of Sunday—the soothing suggestions of its devouter offices, its silence, its calm, its immunities. Defoe, when he was in difficulties, was called the Sunday gentleman, because he only went abroad upon the day on which bailiffs had no power; but others, not in difficulties, may be permitted to rejoice in the certainty of being let alone on Sundays. For my part, I have never, since I can recollect at all, awoke on a Sunday morning without a sense of triumph in the quiet hours that were before me.

Sunday was always the day on which I rose early, in order to have as much as possible of its peace and sweetness. It is still the same with me. No postman comes to-day, with his double knock. No butcher rings the bell for orders. No carts go clattering through the streets. Even the doctor seems to find less to do. And now, in these soft, unfretted moments, causes of irritation seem less than they did yesterday: we pause upon the momentous step: the bent bow of half-angry energy is relaxed: the mist of passion has time to thin away a little: we come to the end of the gentle day with a pang, and go to bed with a regretful thought that to-morrow is Monday. I say we, feeling sure that my own experience cannot be solitary-but it is mine, and much more keenly mine than the peu can tell you. The influence of an enforced pause in clearing the mind may be great. How often does it happen that we fail to see because we look too hard. We look at the picture, or the landscape; we attack it, so to speak, with our eyes; and we miss the beauty of it. another day, when we are a little relaxed in our will, the landscape or the picture is permitted to look at us, and the calm receptivity of a languor, enforced it may be by illness, takes in the loveliness we missed when we were at pains to see.

These things are commonplaces of human experience, and to speak of them is not to teach, but to recite what is known. Not less familiar, and not less interesting as a topic of meditation, is the importance of placing a solid block of oblivion, if possible, between any great shock of pain or disappointment, and our next effort. True or not, that is a good story which relates how some one, suddenly overthrown and baffled in his career, told his valet to give him forty drops of laudanum, and let him sleep till he awoke of his own accord. That sounds very like suicide; but the truth is, if short enforced pauses could always be secured, the temptation to suicide would be removed. Believe it who please, I do not believe that the science of anæsthetics is even in its infancy, as yet. opium nor chloroform, not poppies nor mandragora, not drowsy syrups; but something, something has vet to be won from the secrets of the borderland upon which Psychology and Physiology knock their heads together in the twilight. It is, doubtless, a most shy and recondite something. mesmerist, the hypnotist, and the magician have not hit it. Nor did that celebrated gentleman, an Indian officer I think, who had acquired the knack of stopping the beating of his own heart, and at last performed the experiment once too often. But when, upon my pronouncing the exquisite word anodyne, some rude fellow speaks of ether on lumpsugar, or an opium pill, I own I feel a little insulted. I did once begin a recipe-Take equal quantities of rippling water, true love, falling roseleaves, firm faith, sweet music, swan's down-ah! I shall never finish it till some enforced pause in my affairs gives me the requisite leisure. But that so beautiful a word as anodyne must have an equivalent in fact and nature, is so highly probable that one cannot easily relinquish all hope of finding it. Can it lie concealed in the crypt which hides the squared circle, the philosopher's stone, and the elixir of life? There was a charm—but Merlin told it to Vivien in Broceliande! There was a charm—but it was a charm to waken, and not to soothe; so she awoke, and went across the hills with him, leaving the story of her slumber to fascinate the sweet poet:—

"Well, were it not a pleasant thing To fall asleep with all one's friends; To pass with all our social ties To silence from the paths of men; And every hundred years to rise, And leave the world, and sleep again, To sleep thro' terms of mighty wars, And wake on science grown to more, On secrets of the brain, the stars, As wild as aught of fairy-lore And all that else the years will show, The Poet-forms of stronger hours, The vast Republics that may grow,
The Federations and the Powers; . . . So sleeping, so aroused from sleep Thro' sunny decads new and strange, Or gay quinquenniads, we would reap The flower and quintessence of change."

There is a too-daring luxury in all this! There is an excess of certainty about it; and yet a terror of uncertainty. As for me, I should never sleep if I knew I was wound up, like an alarum, to wake at a given time. On the other hand, there might be a mistake: the prince might never find his way to the palace. No: my anodyne must be something far simpler. It must be uncertain in the duration of its effects, but it must not last longer than while one might stay in an easy-chair, or in bed, with deceucy, and without exciting the coroner to hold an inquest. As for sleeping a century, or five centuries-a "gay quinquenniad"-it seems absurd to go to bed for that: one ought to have a proper vault in a cemetery. Let us, as Sydney Smith said, take short views. Nathaniel Hawthorne maintained that what the world at present needed was a nap; and that moderate expression just hits off the purpose for which I want somebody to discover an anodyne. In the meanwhile, I am not always thankful to those who, in their anxiety to "save time," are skilful in shortening the enforced pauses of life. I am by no means always desirous to make a journey short; on the contrary, I often wish it to last as long as possible; and as for Sunday-if auybody could succeed in turning the one which will dawn to-morrow into a sabbatic year, I should thank him with every pulse of my being.

THE COVERT.

The eagle beats his way
Strong-winged through the burning blue:
All through the heat of the day
In the covert the wood-doves coo.
Take the wings of the dove, my soul!
Take the wings of the dove!
For the sun is not thy goal,
But the secret place of love.

Close to the earth and near,
And hidden among the flowers,
By the brink of the brooklet clear,
The dove in her covert cowers.
Take the wings of the dove, my soul!
Take the wings of the dove!
For the sun is not thy goal,
But the secret place of love.

Flee not afar, my soul!
Flee not afar for rest!
The tunult may round thee roll,
Yet the dove be in thy breast.
Take the wings of the dove, my soul!
Take the wings of the dove!
For the sun is not thy goal,
But the resting-place of love.

"IN THE COVERT THE WOOD-DOVES COO."

HALF-WAY down the Eastern shore of the Adriatic, reaching almost to within a stone's-throw of the sea, but cut off from it by narrow strips of Austrian and Turkish territory, lies the little principality of Montenegro. Four centuries ago, when Serbia and Bosnia were overrun by the Turkish armies, the sterile mountains of this principality received the refugees, who preferred independence with poverty rather than submission to the Sultan. For four centuries these people have cultivated the narrow valleys running up between the ranges of the mountains which give name to their territory and every available patch of land which lies on the slopes of the limestone hills, with their rifles slung at their backs, and have had to contend in perpetual warfare with their invaders. Once or twice their home has been swept over by the hordes of the Ottoman; but this has been but for a moment, and the substantial result of their heroism has been the preservation of that independence, to secure which they exchanged the more fertile plains of Albania and Serbia for the Black Mountains. The name of their principality, Montenegro in the Venetian dialect, Karadag in Turkish, and Tschernagora in the language of the people themselves, means the dark. or black mountains, a name said to have been given to this chaos of mountains because of the foliage with which they were formerly covered. Other derivations are suggested, but this, on the whole, appears to be the most probable one. Amongst the whole Serbian people, Montenegro is regarded as the cradle of the race. As, then, I had lately rambled over the greater part of the principality of Serbia, I determined when at Trieste, on my way home from Belgrade, to accept the pressing invitation of one of the Montenegrin senators, whom I had met in Serbia, and to visit him in his mountain

Good Words, Jan. 1, 1866.]

I left Trieste on Tuesday, July the 25th, in the Australia, a commodious steamer, with excellent accommodation, and a most agreeable captain. It is the custom of the Austrian Lloyd's steamers to stay for some hours at Zara, Sebenico, Spalato, and Ragusa, so that passengers are able to explore these ancient cities of Dalmatia. It was not, therefore, until Friday evening that I reached Cattaro, which is situated at the foot of the pass leading into Montenegro. Having found an hotel, arrangements were made for my departure on the following morning for Cettigne, the capital of Montenegro. At five o'clock in the morning I rose to prepare for my journey, but it was fully a quarter to seven before I had got clear of the tiny streets of this tiny city-for it has its bishop-which is built on the narrow strip of level land interposed between the mountains of Montenegro and the waters of the Bocca di Cattaro. As I looked upwards I caught sight of a number of sharply defined zig-zag lines on the face of the cliffs, along which lies the road into the principality. From the streets of the city the pass appears by no means formid-Indeed, the cliffs on the opposite side of the Bocca appear much higher. It is only when all that is at first visible of the road has been traversed that the real height of the pass into Montenegro is evident. As I mounted, I had to thread my way with care between files of mules and small ponies laden with wood and vegetables for the Cattaro market. The women who accompanied these animals, and sometimes, but more rarely, the men also, were almost as heavily burdened as the animals themselves. More usually the men were to be seen scated on jutting pieces of the rock, chatting or joking with the passers-by and smoking their morning pipe at their ease, whilst women old and young staggered down with their burdens. This early and excessive toil robs the Montenegrin women of their beauty, so that with them there appears but little interval between girlhood and ill-favoured old age. But this toil, often necessary, has another and more injurious effect than the loss of good looks. It has hitherto defeated the attempts of the present Prince and his predecessor to induce the Montenegrin parents to send their girls to school, and thus give them the opportunity of acquiring the simplest rudiments of After I had mounted some five or six learning. hundred feet of the ascent, the road passed almost close under the walls of a huge Venetian fortress, now useless and deserted. Passing this, the road still ascends, until leaving the fortress I looked down upon it, as in the distance it seemed to touch the houses in Cattaro, instead of being some hundred feet above it. And now my horse stood still from fatigue; so giving him up to the care of my attendants, a closely-clipped Bosniac and two active Montenegrins, I resolved to mount the rest of the pass on foot.

After nearly three hours of toil, partly on foot and partly on horseback, I reached the top of the pass, and was able to look down upon everything within sight. The view was one which will not be soon forgotten. Below me lay the Bocca di Cattaro, smooth as glass, and reflecting as clearly as in a mirror, the towers and white-fronted houses which rise far above the margin of the sea. Every mountain and ravine, every pathway winding to the top of the ridge opposite to me, every village or town, every vineyard and oliveyard, was sharply defined in the clear atmosphere, and the whole tract of country seemed more like a raised map than solid earth and deep sea. Turning from the road which I had passed over, I was now able to look inland, and the sight in this direction, though totally different from that behind me, was not less striking. I seemed to be looking on a turbulent sea of grey limestone, an ocean of rolling boulders and petrified breakers. The silent sterility was appalling.

At the first view there appeared no signs of inhabitants. As I rode on, however, I caught sight of pieces of cultivated land, and at length I pulled up my horse at a road-side hotel, consisting of two rooms, one wholly and the other partially cut out of the solid rock. Sheltering himself from the heat of the day under a rude covering of boughs, was seated the young lad who was the keeper of this frontier inn, busied at the moment of our arrival with skinning a sheep, the heart and liver of which hung dangling in front by way of a sign. On the bench by his side lay an imperfect, wellthumbed, and badly-greased volume of Serbian songs. After a glass of raki for each of my companions, and a tumbler of water for myself, we again mounted. Half an hour afterwards, during which the heat of the day had considerably increased, we arrived at the village of Tregosh, one of three villages which lie close together, and I there obtained my first glimpse of real Montenegrin life. Here I found half a dozen villagers, lads and old men, busily shooting at a mark, whilst one of the company kept a score of the shots fired. The houses here, and throughout Montenegro, resemble Irish or Highland cottages; indeed, I have seen some hardly as comfortable in the neighbourhood of Largs and elsewhere along the borders of Loch Lomond. And now I had again to dismount, for my Serbian companion suffered greatly from the heat of the weather. In front of one of the houses-I may call it an eating-house—we unpacked a small parcel of provisions which we had brought from Cattaro. After eating a morsel of ham and drinking a glass of cold clear water, I walked out to examine the village and the country around. Our little restaurant consisted of four small rooms, all in front, and two on each storey. In one of the upper rooms was the kitchen, the floor of which was made of slabs of stone, supported on a frame of beech timber. The hearth was simply a square hole of some two feet diameter, sunk about six inches below the rest of the floor. The smoke filled the room, until it managed to escape through the proper hole in the roof. The other room on this floor was the sleeping apartment, holding three beds. Next door to the restaurant was a shop-at least I judged it to be a shop from the scales and one or two parcels of goods which I saw there. In one part of the house, which consisted of only one room, dinner was preparing, and a pot of kitchen herbs, brussels sprouts, and kale, was simmering on the fire. Whilst looking round in this shop, a little girl came in, evidently on an accustomed errand, with a handkerchief of eggs for sale, which she was offering from door to door.

This village or collection of houses is the birthplace of the present Prince of Montenegro, the seat of the powerful family of Petrovitch. The houses are all built with a due care not to encroach on the small portion of land which admits of cultivation, and are therefore set down without any regard to order or appearance. Here, as in most other parts of Montenegro, as I afterwards found, are signs of progress and improvement. The little cottages, with their one long room divided, and often imperfectly divided, between the family of the owner and the cattle which it possesses, are giving way to houses which have a storey above the ground floor: whilst rough thatch is fast disappearing in favour of red tiles. In front of the houses lie little patches of garden ground, not trim and four-square, but of such shape as the rocky ground permits. Here I found potatoes, white and scarlet runners, melons, radishes, cabbage, maize, and capsicum, with a piece or two of horse-radish. The church lies about a stone's cast out of the centre of the village, and in front of the houses and facing the road is a school-house in progress. This is of hewn stone. After a rest of about three-quarters of an honr we again mounted our horses and pursued our journey. So rough was the ground that our horses slipped at every step on the hard polished limestone, so that it was necessary to keep one's eye upon the path; indeed, with all our care, we were absolutely compelled to dismount at times, as some of the descents were dangerously steep. We now passed through a chaos of limestone. Where, however, the rains of ages and the decay of the pine and beech woods have formed a soil out of the disintegrated rock and vegetable mould, the hollows are carefully cultivated. The fields thus formed are not only irregular in shape, but are often so small that I passed corn-fields twenty feet by twelve, and potato grounds less than six feet square. Such a spectacle of industry in the face of difficulties it would not be easy to parallel. Unlike Serbia, where the potato is rarely found, in Montenegro it is a staple article of food for all classes of the people, and is exported to Dalmatia, Albania, and to other parts of Turkey. Skirting our path at intervals were juniper bushes and wild fruit trees, beech and oak serub, whilst wild thyme, wild mint of various kinds, wild sage, and several other wild shrubs and flowers, springing from the midst of the stones over which we were scrambling, made the grey rocks gay with variegated colours. Then, after mounting for some time, we reached the highest point of our journey, and caught a distinct but distant view of the great Albanian lake, which forms part of the southern boundary of Montenegro, and in the foreground a plain girdled with jagged mountains, looking like the crater of a huge extinct volcano. On this plain, the most sterile and sandy of the small plains of Montenegro, stands Cettigne, the tiny capital of this small principality, the residence of the Prince, the abode of some of the chief inhabitants of Montenegro, and the place where the senate holds its meetings. Though the absolute distance from Cattaro is not great, yet the road is so rugged, and the journey consequently takes so long a time, that it was fully one o'clock before I reached the small inn where I was to stay for the two or three days during which I intended to remain at Cettigne.

Cettigne is, I suppose, the smallest capital city in the world. The last Prince was very desirous of removing the seat of government from the sandy sterile plain in which it stands, and to build a small city on the banks of the Zetta. The nearness, however, of this to the Turkish frontier, and the danger of such a position, has hitherto prevented the Court from removing from Cettigne. The city consists of two small streets, standing at right angles to each other, one or two scattered cottages, and the convent-the residence of the successive Prince-Bishops who, for nearly two hundred years, governed this principality. The street in which my inn was situated consisted of some five-and-twenty or thirty houses, exactly resembling those in a Highland village in Scotland; the central houses having each a storey above the ground floor, the houses at each end of the street having only apartments on the ground. The windows of my room in this little inn commanded the street, which is at right angles with the sole remaining street. This second street is composed of three or four houses of one storey, the rest are but cabins; some of which are tiled, the rest thatched. The larger houses are tenanted by three or four of the senators during their stay at the capital. One, which is distinguished by almost a pretence of a balcony, is the residence of the vicepresident of the senate, whenever he may be at Cettigne. Near this is the royal printing office, consisting of one room on the ground floor some twenty feet square, in which all the printing for the whole of Montenegro is executed. This house has apartments above for the very intelligent priest and poet, who is the superintendent. As the langnage of this mountain principality is the same, with the exception of slight dialectic differences, as that which is spoken throughout Serbia, and the mother lauguage of many millions of people in Dalmatia, Slavonia, Serbia, and Hungary, the printing presses of Belgrade, Agram, Pesth, and Trieste supply most of the literary wants of the Montenegrins. The books printed at Cettigne, though few in number, however, are very creditably executed. They consist mostly of small collections of Serbian poetry, the Cettigne Almanack, containing the Directory or list of officers in Church and State, and various educational books. Opposite the printing-office stands an unfinished palace, of moderate dimensions, of one storey-the ground-floor, however, being thrown up so as almost to give the house the appearance of having two storeys. This building is in the style of houses in Germany, and has external Venetian blinds. It is intended for the residence of the Princess Darinka, the widow of the late Prince Danilo. At the end of this street, which stands at the junction with the only other street, is a small triangular piece of green, on which is a small oil lamp only lighted on very dark nights, a plane-tree, and a well, round which two or three women, with baskets of fruit, eggs, and vegetables, are seated on most days. At the other end of the street is another plane-tree, under the shadow of which the Prince dispenses justice, and idlers hold I their daily court for gossip. On the green near this lie—for they are mostly dismounted—some eight or nine pieces of artillery of all dimensions and ages, the trophies of past wars with the Turks.

At present the hotel accommodation of the metropolis of Montenegro is but scanty, and a fastidious traveller would hardly reconcile himself to the apartments and fare to which he would have to submit during his stay at Cettigne. As, however, the hospitalities of the palace are freely rendered to all persons coming with a recommendation, and a large hotel is at this moment nearly finished, future travellers may safely reckon on finding a supply of all their wants and such attention as they will receive in most German towns.

Soon after my arrival at Cettigne, I received an invitation to the palace. This is a long building of one storey-that is to say, one above the groundfloor apartments-standing on one side of a quadrangle, the other three sides being formed by walls enclosing a small slip of green lawn. The lower apartments are occupied by the attendants of the palace, or used as domestic offices. The upper rooms are the residence of the Prince, his wife and child; his father-Mirko-and mother; two cousins; and the Princess Darinka, widow of the late Prince Danilo. On being shown by the attendant into a room furnished in the English drawing-room style. a young man of four-and-twenty came forward. and, introducing himself in French as "le Prince de Montenegro," welcomed me to his palace and principality. Prince Nicholas is handsome in person, frank and pleasing in manners, and possesses all the bearing of a true Christian gentleman. I speak of the impression which he left upon my mind in the first interview-an impression which was deepened and confirmed by subsequent acquaintance. This first interview was necessarily short, as it was almost time for dinner, to which I received an invitation. When we assembled in the drawingroom after dinner, I was introduced to the Princess Helena, the wife of the Prince, and to the Princess Darinka. The former Princess has been married about four years, but is not yet nineteen. A decided beauty, with dark flashing eyes, long nose, and sharply cut chin: her health, however, is apparently indifferent. The Prince's mother was also present, a grave-looking Montenegrin dame, without pretension, and with the bearing of the wife of a superior substantial farmer. Let not the reader suppose from this that I mean to imply that her manners were rustic, least of all that they were in the slightest degree vulgar. The Serbian race is remarkable for its freedom from pretentiousness or vulgarity. The Prince-mother is the wife of a landed proprietor of Montenegro, and doubtless at home superintends her maidens and overlooks them, if she does not assist them, in their agricultural tasks. The Princess Darinka, the widow of Prince Danilo, the uncle and predecesssor of the reigning Prince, is not yet eight and twenty years old. Her manners are very pleasing, and her reading is extensive. She speaks good English, French, German, and, of course, Serb-perhaps other languages. She is a very thoughtful, clever woman, who is devoting herself, at great self-denial, to the improvement of people with whom she can have, from the absence of intellectual society, but little The dinner would have caused no sympathy. remark in any city in Europe; it was simple in character, with a slight dash of Orientalism. There was soup, with good river fish; after which the first dish was a chicken served in rice. Beef, with potatoes and uncooked ham, followed; then, after other dishes, a good salad, roast fowl, preserved cherries, and rice-pudding. When this was over, those who smoked-the Prince, a young Austrian officer from the garrison at Cattaro, a Russian captain engaged in making a survey of Montenegro for the Prince, and an efficer of the Serbian army who had accompanied me-retired to an apartment apart from the ladies: a piece of civilisation which I had not met with in Germany.

The dress of the women throughout Montenegro varies but slightly, and, as no distinction of ranks exists, the only difference between the garments of the rich and the poorer classes consists in the superior fineness of the materials used, or in the quantity and quality of the ornaments. dress is simply a long flowing white camicia girdled by a black sash. Black and white are the national colours of the Montenegrins. Some of the women wear a heavy leathern girdle set with three or four rows of large cornelian stones, sometimes fastened in front by a massive antique silver clasp. A simple piece of black cloth is in addition worn on the head by the elder matrons. This was the dress worn by the Prince-mother at the dinner-table.

The sandy plain on which Cettigne stands is shut in on all sides by precipitous rocks. On the eastern side of the plain the little city is placed at the foot of the hills which bound the sandy level on that side. The convent, indeed, is situated on the abrupt ascent of the rocks themselves. Immediately behind this rises a round and partiallyruined tower, which, until last year, served the same purpose as the old tower at the foot of London Bridge and Temple Bar in more recent times. Here the Montenegrius placed the heads of their enemies slain in their various battles with the Turks. This custom, however, has been swept away by the influence of the late Prince Danilo; and the tower is, and for some time has been, as bare of skulls as our own civic gate. It was with some difficulty that the Prince persuaded them to abandon the practice of cutting off the heads of those of their enemies whom they had slain in battle; but so effectual were his commands and dissussions that, in the late war with the Turks, more than six hundred prisoners were kept at Cettigne until the termination of hostilities, and then sent to the camp of Omar Pasha. This is but one out of many instances which might be cited to show the power which Prince Danilo had 1/ But in speaking of the metropolis of Montenegro obtained over his subjects and the purposes for which his influence was exerted.

Next morning, Sunday, I went to church at the time the Liturgy is celebrated, and after the service was shown the coffin of the Vladika (or bishop) Peter the First, who died in 1830 and was buried in the church. His memory is greatly venerated by all the Montenegrins, who have canonized him by acclamation, and he is invariably spoken of as "the holy Peter." This church is modern, and was built in place of the dilapidated building which stood on the same spot, as a thank-offering to God, by Prince Danilo and the Princess Darinka on their marriage. It is small, though sufficient for all the inhabitants of Cettigne. After examining the church and being shown the body of the Vladika, I looked into the school-rooms adjoining. One of these is for infants, the other for older boys. For a long time this was the only school in the principality; now, however, there are several others, and school-houses are being built in two or three other places in Montenegro. 1 could only look at the school-rooms and examine the books used by the scholars, as it was vacation time. Adjoining to the school-room were the apartments of the Bishop Hilarion, and the Archimandrite, on whom I called a day or two afterwards. I arrived at Cettigne the bishop was absent, being engaged in conscerating a church some miles distant. Having seen the church and schools, I went to make a call upon Mirko, the father of the reigning Prince, and the beau ideal of Montenegrin chivalry. Bold, fiery, and of dauntless courage, his exploits are a favourite theme for Montenegrin gossips, and as he adds to skill as a commander of men very considerable poetic powers, his songs and ballads are very popular amongst the Serbs, not only of Montenegro, but also among those of Serbia, Dalmatia, and Bosnia. In a subsequent visit which I made to the Archimandrite he gave me a volume of the poems of Mirko, printed at the royal printing press. Mirko is President of the Senate and the first subject of his son the Prince. When his brother, Prince Danilo, was assassinated, he acquiesced in the nomination of his son to the vacant scat of power. He lives at the palace together with almost all the relatives of the Prince. This is in accordance with a patriarchal custom of Montenegro. The possessions of a man belong at his death to all his children, who usually continue to live together, and who share, not the land, but the productions of the land, which is held by them in common. Any child has a right to sever his inheritance and to separate himself from the rest; this however is not usual. A Montenegrin thus explained this custom to me, "With us the bad divide the land and live apart; the good keep the land undivided and live together." Where this is accepted as an axiom, of course "the good" predominate; and in houses of only two large rooms I often found three generations living together, and brothers with their wives and large families dwelling harmoniously in the same apartment.

I must not pass over unnoticed the senate-house and the senators of the principality. Although for the trial of offenders charged with great crimes the senators meet within doors and have the assistance of a secretary to make a record of the cause, yet in ordinary cases this is not resorted to. The senate-house is, as the Prince's secretary jocosely remarked to me, the largest in Europe, and indeed in the world. All ordinary assemblies, whether for counsel or for the trial of civil and criminal causes, are held under the plane-tree in front of the palace, the heavens its roof and the horizon its boundaries, if indeed it has The Sunday evening after my arrival, I strolled out of my lodgings about six o'clock, and found a court of justice then sitting. The Prince was seated on a low wooden stool under the shade of the tree, whilst around him were ranged all the senators who happened to be in Cettignè, conspicuous amongst whom was his father Mirko. A few attendants with their rifles stood ontside the circle of the senators, intermingled with a group of listeners, amongst the most interested of whom I may reckon myself. In the middle of the circle stood the plaintiff and defendant. The case was a disputed debt of a few piastres. Both spoke at once, and their pleadings were racy enough to elicit a joke or two from the Prince, and laughter from the spectators. In the midst of the examination of the two parties to the suit—the only witnesses who appeared on this occasion-the horses were brought out for the use of the Prince in his customary afternoon's ride. Thereupon he soon summed up and gave judgment, apparently to the satisfaction of both parties, though evidently more to the satisfaction of one than of the other; since, though both came forward and kissed his hand, the successful suitor kissed the hem of his coat also. It was a very patriarchal scene, and such, I suppose, as might have been witnessed in the Highlands of Scotland little more than a century The Prince told me afterwards that only trifling causes were thus disposed of, such in fact as required not so much the discrimination of a judge as the intervention of an arbitrator. The senators who assist the Prince, or who hear in the same unceremonious manner trifling complaints, and who are his council to advise with him on the most serious questions of home or foreign policy, are sixteen in number, and are nominated by the Prince at the recommendation of the people. These senators each receive the primitive salary of ten hundred florins, about 201. per annum. As I have already mentioned, the Prince's father is president of this senate. After my visit to him I called on the vicepresident, and then on two of the other senators. In doing so I was ushered up or at least walked up stairs, which in two cases out of the three had no balustrades, into rooms which-I describe one-contained a bed, a chest of drawers, a table, a pier-glass, two cane-bettomed chairs, an arm-chair, a sofa, two painted trunks, and a German stove. On the walls hung a picture of a saint with silver facing of the usual Byzantine or Russian type, large photographs, an engraved portrait of the late Emperor Nicholas, a splendid sabre, two or three pistols, a rifle, and a dress or two of Montenegrin manufacture, in fact the Court dress of the host. The senator, who was in his shirt-sleeves, helped me to raki, his son brought me a glass of water and cut up a fragrant melon, whilst I examined his library, which consisted of Millot's Universal History translated into Serbian. some religious works, and four or five collections of Montenegrin and other Serbian songs. There was no servant to be seen, but then we were not waited upon by the women, as we should have been in Serbia. For this is a custom derived from the Turk, and as Montenegro has never been held by the Turks long enough to introduce the customs of the East, female attendance will be found less often at least in Montenegro than in Serbia. I don't mean to say that a Montenegrin woman does not wait on her husband's guests, but that she does so far less frequently than women in the neighbouring pro-

I arrived at Cettigne, as I have already mentioned, on Saturday afternoon. In the course of my interview with Prince Nicholas he remarked that no doubt I was fatigued and should like to rest for a day or two. As my journey had been too easy for fatigue-four days on the Adriatic, which at that time of year had hardly a ripple on its surface—I replied that I was quite ready to set off next day, not remembering the next day was Sunday. The Prince quietly reminded me of this, and I of course apologised for my forgetfulness. Sunday throughout Montenegro is a real day of rest, and Prince Nicholas is anxious to preserve it for the purpose for which it has been set apart. One instance of his anxiety on this score will at the same time give a picture of the perfect obedience which the people render him. The market-day at Podgaritza, a town in Albania close to the Montenegrin frontier, had for some time past been held on Sunday. As this market was almost exclusively supplied by the Montenegrin peasants and by the Albanian Christians, Prince Nicholas a few months before my visit proposed to the Turkish Pasha in whose government the town is situated, that the day for the market should be changed. This the Pasha, seeing no reason, and not caring to humour what he looked upon as an unreasonable Christian prejudice, declined to do. Prince Nicholas urged it again, and his request was again civilly but firmly rejected by the Turkish officer. The Prince then notified his intention of forbidding any Montenegrins to attend the Sunday market. The Pasha was unmoved, and answered that though the Prince might forbid their attendance, he knew the Montenegrins well enough to predict that they would not lose their trade because of the Prince's wish. As his request had been thus useless, Prince Nicholas issued directions to all his subjects to abstain from visiting the market at Podgaritza. Sunday came, and the usual Turkish buyers came also, and one Montenegrin peasant, who finding himself alone in his disobedience, stole back ashamed without offering his goods for sale. The Pasha having had this convincing proof of the earnestness of the Prince, and of the ready obedience of the Montenegrins to their ruler, was compelled to accede to the Prince's wishes, and the market for the last six months has been held on Wednesday, and is, as I witnessed, well attended by both sellers and buyers.

One of the great objects of attraction in Montenegro is the summit of the Lovchen mountain. the lover of the picturesque the view from the top is the finest, as it is also the most extensive in the whole principality: to the Montenegrin it has another charm; it is the burial-place of the late Vladika, Peter the Second, great-uncle to the reigning Prince, and the last bishop who united in his person the civil and ecclesiastical power over Montenegro. Having arranged over night to visit this shrine, I got up at five o'clock in the morning, and by half-past five was in the saddle and on my way to the Lovchen, accompanied by M. Vaclick, the secretary of the Prince, and Captain Zegar, of the Austrian army. For the first half-hour of the journey our way lay across the sandy plain of Cettigne; at the end of that time we began to mount over a road which was a perfect chaos of stone, over which I left it to my horse to pick his way as he chose, satisfied that my reason was not equal to his sagacity in this matter. A road certainly there was, but one on which no constructive skill had ever been exerted. When I looked at it, all at once the thought flashed across my mind that the couplet of the Irish roadoverseer in the Highlands was after all very sensible. The appropriateness of the words was so great that I could not drive the jingle out of my head :-

"If you'd seen these roads before they were made, You'd have held up your hands and have bless'd General Wade."

Here certainly were the roads, but as yet wholly unmade; so that another generation of Montenegrins may have reason, like their brother mountaineers, to bless some future road-maker who will do for them what the luckless Hanoverian general did for the Highlands of Scotland. After about three hours' scramble over the boulders which strewed our path, past hazel hedges and through beech scrub and fern brake, up precipitous heights, along dangerously narrow ridges of rock, and down into sunless ravines, we reached the foot of the mountain which we were to climb. Our path now was across a limestone ledge, which at a distance looked as though it had been ploughed up by some gigantic plough, probably in the pre-historic age. A precipitous descent on one side, and a sharp slope on the other, without vegetation of any kind, compelled us to be cautious. At length we dismounted at the base of the precipitous height in which the mountain terminates. Rude stairs, partly worn by the course of time, and in part cut for this purpose. lead to the top of the ascent on which stands the small mortuary chapel which is the object of so many pilgrimages to Montenegro. This chapel was built by the Vladika, Peter the Second, and contained the tomb in which he left directions that he should be buried. When his death took place, his nephew and successor Danilo was absent in Vienna: and on his return he found, to his regret, that the difficulty of the ascent, and probably the wish that the body of their revered chief should rest in the midst of the people over whom he had ruled with so much advantage to them, had led the Montenegrins to disregard his wishes, and to inter his body at Cettigne. As a law inexorable as that of the Medes and Persians prohibits the removal or the disturbing in any way of a body until it has been buried five years, Prince Danilo was unable to carry out the wishes of the Vladika for that length of time. When, however, the five years had expired, the body was removed from Cettigne to its present resting-place at the top of the Lovchen. The chapel is a very simple one, and though built only in 1845 is, from defects in its construction, already partially in ruins. It consists of a vaulted dome surmounting a round chapel of some twelve feet diameter. with a small recess or sanctuary at the east end. In this is a small altar. There is no iconostasis or furniture of any kind. The tomb occupies the whole south side of the chapel, and from its size recalls the memory of the gigantic stature of the Vladika who lies buried within. The part of the mountain on which it stands seems intended as the base for some such building as this, for after rising gradually and at a moderate angle, the top of the Lovchen consists of a small rugged plateau resting on a precipitous base above the rest of the mountain, and apparently placed on it, rather than itself forming a part of the mountain. In fact it resembles a gigantic pedestal. This is the part which we found it necessary to ascend on our feet. pedestaled top is entirely destitute of vegetation, except that some few tufts of long coarse grass, and a wild thorn or two springing from the fissures of the rock, are found there. But however difficult and fatiguing the ascent, and however sterile the top, all is forgotten in the singular but magnificent view which bursts upon the sight of the traveller as he stands beside the chapel-tomb. The eye then roams over the tops of the mountains of Montenegro without sceing the plains which lie between their ridges or getting a glimpse of the crater-like hollows which are to be found on almost all the heights. Grey in its silent sterility, the spectator seems to be looking down upon a stony sea, in which, without hyperbole, the waves may be said to be running mountains high. The woods of stunted oak and beech, which clothe with a scanty robe the sides of the mountains, are lost to the sight; and the few traces of vegetation which may be seen appear like floating sca-weed on the surface of the ocean. one side the view embraces, as in a pauorama, the whole of Montenegro, several ranges of mountains in Bosnia, great part of the Herzegovine, the large lake of Skodra in Albania, and the adjacent plain veined with the silvery streams of water which fall into the lake. On another side is the Bocca di Cattaro, with every feature of its varied shore sharply defined; and beyond this the dark Adriatic, on the bosom of which can be seen the snowy sails of its merchant vessels, and the smoke of passing steamers. This is the general aspect of the scene. By going, however, to the edge of the precipice and looking down upon the country immediately below, the traveller gets a totally different view. He then sees not only solitary homesteads, but villages and fertile fields, and the bottom between the limestone ridge on the top of which he is standing and the opposite mountains alive with flocks of sheep and goats, and with men and women busied with the tillage of their fields. And now, when we had examined this singular scene, our attendants, whose number, by accessions from the farm-cottages which we had visited, had swelled to eight, brought us a pail of new milk, and a large lump of frozen snow from some caverns at the foot of the Lovchen. This, with the aid of provisions brought with us from Cettigne, some bottles of good Montenegrin wine, ham, cold chicken, and excellent cheese, supplied us with a meal, for which the long journey and the clear mountain air had duly prepared us. Then came the invariable mid-day slumber, or at least rest, our attendants skilfully availing themselves of projecting pieces of the rock, and thus finding shelter from the blaze of the noonday sun. At three o'clock we scrambled down to the point where we had left our horses, and, sometimes on horseback and sometimes on foot, as the nature of the ground compelled, we reached the base of the mountain,—it would be a misnomer to say that we reached the plain, as the low ground was nearly as rough as we had found the sides of the mountain in the course of our descent. On reaching the bottom we were invited to rest at the house of one of our attendants, and to eat roasted eggs and more ham, which for compliment's sake This enabled me for the first time to see a labourer's cottage. It consisted of one room built with stone without cement, the floor being the bare earth. When I entered, cooking was going on, and for a time the smoke, which escaped on all sides, prevented me from seeing anything. When I was accustomed to this I found two little children, half naked, crawling on the floor and trying to get away from the strauger. Children generally in Montenegro dread strangers. Besides these two children, my host had the care of two belonging to a brother killed in the recent war with the Turks, and also the mother of these children, so that there was no room to spare in the cottage; but then in this climate there is for the greater part of the year the "outof-doors," which is of unlimited dimensions. The little patches of corn, potatoes, and other vegetables in front of this cottage were, like similar pieces of ground throughout Montenegro, very clean; indeed, not a weed was to be seen. What the people of Serbia have no notion of-namely, the value of manure and the necessity of keeping the ground free from weeds-the Montenegrins generally seem to understand thoroughly. These little fields are usually fenced in with walls of uncemented stones. Behind the house was a good-sized pig-sty, and farther away some beehives. The little niece of my host was watching a goat and a few sheep, and preventing them from wandering into the potatogarden; and the bowl of milk which was placed before me indicated the possession of cows, though I saw no signs of them. After resting, and doing justice to the hospitality of our attendant, we again mounted, and reached Cettigne at seven o'clock in the evening.

The next day, Tuesday, was the feast day of St. Elias, a great holiday in Montenegro. I remained therefore at Cettigne for the morning services, and to see the Bishop and Archimandrite, who had now returned from the consecration of the church. After that agreeable visit to these ecclesiastics, who manifested the most lively desire to be informed on matters concerning the English Church, and who showed the most large-hearted appreciation of our Church, I left Cettigne accompanied by M. Vaclick, who had been one of my companions in my visit to the Lovehen mountain, and who kindly consented to go with me on the journey I proposed to take to the ruins of the Roman station at Dioclea and to the monasteries of Chelja and Ostrug.

"THERE SHALL BE NO MORE SEA."

"THERE shall be no more sea:"
So spake the Prophet of the golden lips,
Whose vision, clear and free,
Saw the far depths of that Apocalypsc.

From each cavernous deep,
Where storms come not, and tempest wave is dum',
The forms of them that sleep
Shall rise undying when the Judge shall come!

And then, its history o'er,
The great wide sea shall flee and pass away,
And many a golden shore,
Long hidden, greet the bright, eternal day.

"No sea!".... And will the earth
Lose his loved bride, with all her countless smiles?
Shall that diviner birth
Destroy the beauty of her myriad isles?

Shall that rich voice of praise,
Wide Ocean's anthem echoing to her Lord—
That hymn of ancient days,
A thousand parts all met in sweet accord—

Shall that be heard no more?
Shall all the beauty, all the glory flee?
Shall the new earth's rich store
Lack the bright marvels of th' encircling sea?

No! Far as man may dream The wondrous glory yet to be reveal'd, Still on the eye shall gleam The emerald waters as a crystal field;

Still on the golden isles
The brightness of the Lord of light shall shine,
And still the countless smiles
Illume the face of that clear hyaline.

Only the drear expanse
Of waters barren, stormy, fathomless,
Shall meet no more our glance—
Shall leave the new-born earth our souls to bless.

No more the treacherous wave
Shall whelm poor wanderers in the homeless deep—
The dark and lonely grave
Where thousand shipwreck'd souls have slept their sleep.

No more the billows wild
Shall hurl white breakers on the rock-bound coal;
By mightiest spell beguiled,
Slumbers each form of all the monster host.

Leviathan is tamed
Who scorn'd the waters in their pride of strength;
And now no more is named
Where once he measured all his monstrous length.

But still the ear shall greet
The music of the ever-rippling wave,
And where the waters meet,
The crystal tide the palm-girt shore shall lave.

Crown'd high with amaranth grove, The hills shall rise by man and angels trod; The ocean of His love Shall still make glad the city of our God.

When Eden's bowers were green
We knew not how the four great rivers wound
Those glorious fields between,
Or circling took their wide majestic round

To lands renown'd of old—Cush, Asshur, Havilah, whence came the spice,
The onyx, and the gold—
Yet water'd still the groves of Paradise.

We know not how the light
Shall flow when neither sun nor moon shall shine,
And yet no shade of night
Shall mar the glory of the blaze divine.

We know not how the streams
Of those great rivers shall flow wide and free,
And yet the Prophet's dreams
Proclaim aloud, "There shall be no more sea."

We know not . . . but the veil
Which hides it from our sight shall one day lift,
And, where in vision pale
As yet the darkness and the storm-clouds drift,

God shall make all things new,
And shoreless sea shall join with scaless shore;
And cleansed eyes shall view
Might, wisdom, mercy, met for evermore.

RELIGIOUS LIFE IN PALESTINE WHEN CHRIST APPEARED, AND HOW HE DEALT WITH IT.

OLD books on Jewish antiquities tell us all about the "sects" into which the Jews were divided in the time of our Lord-their rise, their opinions, their usages, and so forth. These facts are very useful, but they leave much unexplained. If you want to know, for example, whether and how far the modes of religious thinking then prevalent were analogous to those of modern times, and admit of being brought to any common test with them, you will get small satisfaction from such books. Yet without this, how can we estimate, to any practical purpose, our Lord's manner of dealing with them? Of what great consequence is it to me to know that He sympathised with this and inveighed against that, unless I know whether those things are still extant or are out of date? What is it that lends its charm to the modern way of treating secular history, but the critical spirit in which every fact is investigated and the life-like way in which those springs of thought and action which are familiar to us all are seen working to the production of certain results? Even so, the secret of success in the treatment of the Evangelic History lies in the power to reproduce and to vivify it, and he who can bring his readers or hearers into the midst of its wondrous scenes will rivet and enchain them. So true is this, that even those who distort and misrepresent it are greedily read by thousands, not merely for the fascinations which genius has succeeded in throwing around the false image, but in no small degree because they have hit upon the right mode of treatment; making their readers feel a human interest in the image which they have drawn-imparting to it the glow of historic life. And if we believe that the most glorious Reality that ever entered into human history was He who is the Subject of the Gospel History, should it not be our joy to put ourselves alongside of it? and as we look at the various phases of religious life with which our Lord came in contact, and on which He let fall the light of his sympathy or aversion, should we not take some pains to discover whether the great characteristics which He dealt with have not their counterparts in modern religious life-the difference lying in accidents rather than in essence?

"Sects," in the modern sense of that term-standing apart from each other in ecclesiastical fellowship and worshipping in a state of religious separation—there were none among the Jews. Their Religion was Divine, and the whole nation was at all periods of their history alive to the fact that it was so. All were in full communion (as we should say) with the Church of their fathers and with one another. They differed only in their modes of thought, particularly the principles on which the Scriptures were to be interpreted, and in the observance or non-observance of certain practices arising out of these; each party feeling itself, in social sympathies and intimacies, thoroughly at home only with those of their own school—but that was all.

To state the religious opinions of these parties in detail, or to sketch their history, is not the purpose of this paper. Our first object is to mark the progress and formation of the three great schools of religious thought among the Jews, and even this only in so far as to bring out their enduring characteristics. When this has been done it will be easy to see how in dealing with them our Lord was addressing Himself to no extinct parties, but to phases of religious life as alive now, in their essential characteristics, as ever.

The leading phases of thought and life were the following:—The TRADITIONAL, standing in the Pharisees; the RATIONALISTIC, represented in the Sadducees; the ASCETIC, to which belonged the Essenes, who, although they have no place in the New Testament, must not be quite overlooked in mapping out the primary tendencies of religious thought and feeling among the Jews; lastly, BIBLICAL FAITH AND EXPECTATION, in as many as hungered and thirsted after righteousness, waiting for the kingdom of God.

By far the most wide-spread, active, and influential of these was the traditional, which, though it stood represented in the Pharisees of our Lord's time, is far from being out of date. Let but true religion have its settled abode in any region long enough to subdue to itself the general mind, and give to its thought and feeling a colouring of its own, and we shall find it in more or less vigour. It begins in reverence for Divine truth and for those Oracles of God in which it lies. The very feet of them that preach us the gospel of peace are beautiful for their message' sake; the outward channels through which flows so much periodically that is precious in religious experience become dear to the heart; and forms and usages originating, it may be, in temporary circumstances and quite unessential, acquire sacredness from the hallowed associations which they awaken. As time advances, particular views of truth and interpretations of Scripture, with the very modes of expressing them, forms of religious life and usages of various sorts, are regarded with reverence apart from their intrinsic claims to approval; and, simply because they have so long obtained as to command the general acquiescence of the devout, come to be identified with true religion. At length this religious conservatism issues in the consolidation of a system more or less complex, extending to the regulation of the mechanical details of religious life, and the use of an approved phraseology as the only proper vehicle of strict orthodoxy; and the Divine and the human crystallizing into settled and sacred regard, the very ground of religion, under a Divine Revelation-"Thus saith the Lord"-is insensibly shifted out, to make way for "the precepts of men;" the healthy independence, freedom, and vigour of the mind in religion are impaired; and a crouching spirit of subjection to human authority is engendered. To remonstrate, however mildly, against this confounding of the human with the Divine-boldly to separate the two, and, while holding tenaciously to that which is God's, to disown the human admixture, in the spirit of the prophet's question, "What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord"-is to incur the charge of treason against religion itself, which to put down is to do

How was this state of things developed and displayed among the Jews? The great festivals which brought them in a body thrice a-year to Jerusalem were a bond of religious as well as political and social union immensely strong. Very hallowed were these religious gatherings, and the feelings of every devout Israelite were such as these-"I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go up into the House of the Lord. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem. Thither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord. For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand." In such a frame of mind the ministers of the sanctuary would be "very highly esteemed for their work's sake;" and the more devout the worshipper was the more fervently would he uplift the prayer, "Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness, and let thy saints shout aloud for joy." On their return from the festivals, as they gathered with their families around some prophet or Levite in their neighbourhood, their reverence for such instructors would be nourished; and even where there was little in their personal character to merit it, their superior position and intelligence would secure for them considerable influence, of which the ambitious would not be slow to avail themselves. The captivity, while it cured them effectually of idolatrous tendencies, made them yearn the more after the stately services of which they had so long been deprived, and intensified the delight with which they were renewed on their return. The people, whose instruction in the law had been so sadly neglected in a foreign land, had now to depend more than ever on their official guides, of whom it was said "The priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts" (Mal. ii. 7). But even before the last of the post-Babylonian prophets disappeared from the stage, the spirit of genuine religion had died down in priest and people alike; form took the place of life at once in teachers and taught, and sanctimonious hypocrisy had began to reign. From that time it is easy to see how religious duties would be reduced to the observance of a set of mechanical rules; how traditional maxims would come to be erected into authoritative laws and invested with the sanctions of religion; and how the Divine requirements - themselves burdensome-would be gradually overlaid by human prescriptions, some of which we know were childish enough; and how ill all this would prepare the chosen people for that expansion of the kingdom of God, committed to them, which under the wing of Immanuel was to make it a House of Prayer for all nations.

This deterioration of the chosen people had a chance of being arrested, when the wicked attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to crush their Religion roused the whole nation under the Maccabees, reinvigorating its piety and its patriotism at once, and after a struggle of six-and-twenty years led to the re-establishment of their independence and the full restoration of their religious services, a century and a half before Christ. But, strange to say, this very change opened the way, as would appear, for that which of all others constituted the worst feature of Pharisaic traditionalism. Not only was the ancient Faith endeared to the nation by the struggle which it had cost them to retain it; but since the doctrine of a future state-and even of the resurrection of the body-had been the grand support of the heroic sufferers for religion during the conflict, it diffused itself over the nation, after the war of independence, as a fixed tenet of their Faith as it had never been held before. When their teachers, however, sought to keep this truth alive among the people, after the necessity which had driven them to it had ceased, they were tempted to supply the lack of direct Scripture proof of it, especially in the primal portion of the Pentateuch, by calling in the aid of oral tradition; and when once this principle was systematically admitted, it seems to have grown rapidly into an elaborate system, embracing not only all that was to be believed, but all that was to be done in civil and social life, as well as religion. And, to give this the authority which they felt it wanted, it was traced back to Moses himself, who was said to have received along with the written law an oral interpretation of it on Mount Sinai, direct from heaven.* As a necessary accompaniment of so elaborate a system, there would be required a body of learned students and expounders of it; and just in proportion as the people were drawn within the subtle network of a Directory for almost every act of life, would the ecclesiastics who presided over it acquire dominion over their conscience, and bring them into mental bondage.

Before considering the aspects in which this body of ecclesiastics appear in the Gospel History, it will be necessary to glance at the rise, position, and characteristics of the only other party with whom the New Testament has to do—the Sadducees—whom we have designated the rationalistic school.

The Maccabean family, who were of the priestly line, having got into their hands after the war of independence the whole regal as well as sacerdotal power of the nation, there gradually arose an aristocratic class, to which the wealthy naturally attached themselves. In process of time a marked style of religious thought characterised this class, sharply distinguishing them from the Pharisees. They refused to recognise the oral law, and, as an anti-traditional school, professed subjection only to the written Word; not that they valued even it more than the other party, but because it left them greater freedom of religious thought. On the subject of the Resurrection, and even of a Future State, when pressed with the absence of explicit proof, especially in the Pentateuch, they seem tacitly to have accepted the consequence, and, with the nonchalance of men not over-burdened with religious convictions and impressions, to have not only repudiated the doctrine of a material resurrection, but looked on the whole subject of a future state. and of an invisible world of "angel and spirit," as belonging to the region of at least doubtful speculation. Such a negative school of religious thought, as it could spring only from an unspiritual tone of mind, would increasingly beget it. So that if the Pharisees resiled from and were irritated by teaching fatal to their whole traditional system, the Sadducees, bringing it to a standard of purely secular judgment, would reject it with cold scepticism.

In what proportion would these two classes likely be found when our Lord appeared? As the Sadduces would draw to themselves the most of the upper classes, and all who affected freedom of thought in matters of religion, so all the more devoutly disposed, the great body of the poorer and less educated classes, and as many as were of a strongly conservative turn of mind, would range themselves on the side of the Pharisees. Further, as the oral law, from its elaborate and complex character, would require "scribes and lawvers" to master and write it out, to explain and, with the chief priests who held to it, to see to the observance of it, a cloud of minor ecclesiastics would come to cover the land; the people would be brought under complete bondage to them; the consciousness of the power they wielded would dispose them to carry their heads high; and as their influence depended on the estimation they were held in as the guardians of religion, we might expect them to make up in show what they wanted in the substance of religion. The Sadducees, on the other hand, despising this sort of thing, and requiring no "inferior clergy" (as one might say) to bolster up a system in which they did not believe; but, professing to deem the Divine Law able enough to take care of itself, would be by much the more limited body, but would pride themselves on being the more select and enlightened class. At the same time, naturally desiring to stand well with their nation, they would probably conform to any ceremonies and observances which were popular and did not interfere too much with their liberty-and all the more from the want of depth in their whole religious character.

Now this is precisely the state of things, in all respects, that existed in Palestine in our Lord's time, with both the Pharisees and the Sadducees. The number of "scribes" of the Pharisaic party was such, that they seem to turn up everywhere and on all occasions; while the abject bondage of the mass of the people to this Pharisaic party reveals itself ever and anon. As for the Sadducees, while they present themselves but seldom to the reader of the Gospel History, not a trace is to be found of their having any popular following, of their courting popular favour, or having for their object to proselytise. In fact, the free-thinking liberty which they took to themselves was all they appeared to value; and, provided this were allowed them, they seemed willing to let the Pharisees cast the network of their spiritual influence over the people as they pleased. And have we not seen this state of things reappearing, though in different forms, within the Christian pale? In the Church of Rome, both before the Reformation and since, the sacerdotal caste has, like a cloud, covered all the territorics where it is dominant; the network of a vast traditional system, of equal sacredness with that of the written Word, they have with infinite subtlety cast around the great mass of the people, including all the more devout and conservative even of the educated classes; and, as a natural consequence, spiritual bondage characterises all the religion thus produced. But as the human mind resents such treatment, even in religion, there have ever been found, even within the pale of the Church of Rome, those who claimed, or at least took, the liberty of thinking for themselves. Some of these sought only liberty to protest against unscriptural errors and abuses; but this availed them nothing against the charge of being traitors therein to religion itself. The effect of this was that the cowardly, such as poor Erasmus, alarmed at the storm themselves had raised, were fain to creep back into their shell and die in peace with the Church, as it was called; while others, heroically standing out, got their eyes opened to the evil which lay at the root of all—the mixing up of man's authority with that of God, and, like Luther and other heroes, achieved the Reformation. But there was and is a class who, without any firm faith in the positive verities of Scripture, exercised their liberty of thought in all matters religious, and constituted a speculative, rationalistic party. This free-thinking class-consisting of the less devout and more secular vet reflecting order of minds-exercise an influence much beyond their numbers; but it is not a proselytising influence. Not that they are indifferent to public opinion. On the contrary, rather than stand alone and incur general obloquy, they go along with others in outward profession and worship. But latitude of religious thought is what they really care about, and under cover of this there is often a latent scepticism even as to the fundamentals of all religion. Nor do we need to go to the Church of Rome for these Pharisaic and Sadducean forms of religious thought. What a spirit of traditionalism has eaten into most Protestant Churches; a sacredness having gathered around the minutest features of their Church-government, as if it were in every particular Divine; around forms and usages not essentially better than others, but hallowed by long usage; and even around particular views of Divine truth and interpretations of Scripture and modes of expression, until they have come to be identified with the truth itself: insomuch that they would hardly be recognised as truth at all if arrayed in a different dress, and the attempt to change the dress is regarded as an insidious attack on all that is vital.

^{*} One may smile at so prodigious an assumption, in the total absence of historic proof; but it is scarcely six years since a French grand-rabbi published a learned work to show that in no other way can the facts be accounted for.

But it is time to observe how our Lord dealt with these rival schools of thought among the Jews of His day. Some of the facts are so striking and pregnant with instruction, that it will suffice to advert to these, leaving others alone.

Even before our Lord came upon the stage of His public work, His forerunner had held up both of the leading parties as alike poisoning the religious principles of the nation. "When he saw (to his amazement) the Pharisees and the Sadducees (alike) come to his baptism, he said unto them, O viper-brood, who hath prompted you to flee from the wrath to come?"* Antagonistic though they were in principles and in temper alike, they were both exercising a deadly influence on the public mind: the Pharisees, because they came in between the soul and God in all matters of faith and practice, lording it over and enslaving the conscience; the Sadducees, because they shook themselves, and as many as they infected with their spirit, loose from the authority even of Scripture itself, whenever it came in collision with what they deemed reasonable. The one so swathed the Scripture in the bands of their own traditional system as to all but deprive it of the breath of life: the other not only tore off these bandages, but subjected its authoritative dictates to the criticism of their own reason, which found much in them to question, and some things positively to deny. Which now, of these, was the more inimical to the spiritual interests of the people? One fact, now to be mentioned, will best answer this question.

Of all the accessions to the standard of Christ while here on earth, and to that of His apostles afterwards, we have no evidence that so much as one came from the ranks of the Sadducees. The high-priest Caiaphas, and Annas his father-in-law, who took the lead in the condemnation of our Lord, belonged to this party, as we are expressly told (Acts v. 17); and if they were virulent then against the spiritual religion taught by our Lord and His lofty supernatural claims, much more virulent were they when His resurrection was proclaimed by the apostles as attesting all His claims, believed by thousands in Jerusalem itself, and attested by fresh miracles before their own eyes. Thus-contrary to what one might expect, it was the more sceptical school who, when they had the power, proved the most active enemies of the Lord and His apostles. They could put up with Pharisaism and even conform to its usages in many things, provided it put up with their latitudinarianism. The traditionalism of the Pharisees, being essentially a human thing and inherently weak, they could afford to tolerate, claiming only the liberty of regarding it with indifference. But supernatural claims, such as our Lord and His apostles advanced, and demands such as they made on every man to surrender himself, body and soul, to these new views, left them no longer free to think on religion according to their own notions of what was reasonable, and live as circumstances might direct. It was too strait a gate for them to enter, and too narrow a way for them to walk in. So they deemed it necessary, in self-defence, to put it down, and did their poor best with that view.

In entire contrast with these, all the cases of sincere and "anxious inquirers" among the rulers belonged to the Pharisaic class. Nicodemus is the first and most notable of these—"a man of the Pharisees, a ruler of the Jews." That his companion in the burial of our Lord—Joseph of Arimathea—was of the same class we may reasonably conclude, because while a "counsellor," as Nicodemus was, his discipleship was, like Nicodemus's, "secret, for fear of the Jews;" because he is described as "a good man and a just," terms descriptive of the stricter and more honest class (compare Acts xxii. 12); and because it is said of him that he was one of the "waiters for the kingdom of God," a phrase not at all applicable to the Sadducean notions of religion. So much for the beginning and end of our Lord's public life. Towards the middle of it we have "a certain scribe saying to Him, Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest," and the answer shows that the spontaneous outburst of admiration and attachment to Christ only wanted the depth and reality which would endure the privations of discipleship. "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head."* The Pharisee with whom Jesus dined, when the woman that was a sinner stood weeping behind Him, seems to have been actuated by an honest enough desire to study His claims; though, not wishing to commit himself, he treated his guest with a coldness which He felt it necessary to remark on. The case of the rich young ruler, who was so anxious about eternal life that he came and knelt before our Lord in the highway and questioned Him about it, does not look like a Sadducean state of mind. In a word, it was "one of the scribes" who, when he asked our Lord in Jerusalem, within a few days of his death, which was the first commandment of all, and received that sublime answer, "The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord, and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart," &c., "and the second is like, namely this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: there is none other commandment greater than these,"-made this candid reply, "Well, Master, thou hast said the truth, for there is one God, and there is none other but He, and to love Him with all the heart . . and his neighbour as himself, is more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices." And it is of this Pharisaic scribe that it is added, "And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly" (or intelligently), "He said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God"-language which we believe He would never have applied to a lax-thinking Sadducee.

To us this opens up matter for solemn reflection with respect to the same two schools of religious thought in our own day. Those who sit upon the Scriptures in a rationalistic spirit of negative and sceptical criticism, not simply asking what they say, but whether even what they do say is not to be accommodated to more reasonable and general principles of religion—are in a far less hopeful state, or. as our Lord would express it, much further from the kingdom of God, than those who even overlay the Scriptures with a load of human traditions, provided they be sincere and open to conviction. Look at Luther, drawn into a cloister under the strong force of unenlightened but deep alarm about his eternal salvation, spending hours in fasting and mortifications, sweeping the floors and begging from door to door at the bidding of his monastic superiors, and ascending the Santa Scala at Rome on his knees. Look at Francis Lambert, of Avignon.

who did the same, and Bucer, and many of the chief Reformers, who issued from monastic establishments to become the leaders of a movement bringing peace to the conscience through the blood of the cross, breaking every yoke, and letting the oppressed go free. These trophies of the Reformation were the spoils of a traditional system, from whose meshes they with difficulty, and after many a hard struggle, at length escaped. But, on the other hand, what trophies of the rationalistic school of thought adorned the ranks of the Reformation? None that we remember. Not but that men more or less shaken in their faith of the Bible and Christianity itself would find it reassured and recovered when they beheld with what heroism it could inspire the delicate female and the humble artisan, as well as the cultivated student. But what we have said of that class of speculative and rationalistic thinkers will, we believe, commend itself to impartial readers; and if so, it is surely a serious thing for as many of that class as are found amongst ourselves, and who seem to be rather on the increase. So long as we sincerely and devoutly cling to what is God's, and along with this to much as His which is not so, all we need is better light, and docility enough to take it in. But when once we have allowed ourselves to sit in judgment on the contents of the Scriptures themselves, we have assumed a disloyal attitude, and until we are cured of that, whatever we believe is believed on wrong grounds, the foundations of positive belief are already sapped, and the mind, escaping out of one objective position after another, is in danger of settling down into a Christianity emptied of everything definite on which the heart can repose and hope be built—a cheerless negation.

This greater "nearness to the kingdom of God" in the sincere and earnest Pharisee than that of the Sadducee, is very strikingly expressed by our Lord Himself within a few days of His death; and what gives to this testimony peculiar weight is, that it forms the introduction to His most systematic and vehement denunciation of that very class-as if to preclude, at the outset, the natural inference that there was nothing but unmixed evil to be found among them. "Then spake Jesus to the crowd," gathered about the Temple buildings, "and to His disciples, saying, The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat. All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works, for they say and do not" (Matt. xxiii. 1-3). Beyond all doubt this must be regarded as a testimony to the scrupulous fidelity with which they preserved the Scriptures as a sacred Deposit, and inculcated the faith of their fundamental verities. So much so, that it looks like an imprimatur on their whole teaching, and a warning only against their own inconsistent conduct. That it was not so intended, is evident from His emphatic denunciations elsewhere even of their teaching, and may be gathered from the sequel of this very discourse. Yet it must have been intended to cover a good deal; and in our view, what it was intended to express was just that feature of the Pharisaic school which we have been dwelling on-their tenacious adherence to the written Word as Divine and allauthoritative. In reasoning with them and even in denouncing them. He had a purchase, so to speak, which was in a great measure wanting in His dealings with the Sadducees. They had common ground, and that was such a mighty advantage that He constantly availed himself of it. And it was the very success with which He wielded this weapon of Scripture, to which both gave implicit reverence, that stung the Pharisees to the quick. With the Sadducees-on the one occasion on which they deigned to enter the lists with Him-His procedure was very notable; and we are not sure that sufficient attention has been called to it. They seem to have enjoyed the dexterity with which He had outwitted the "spies" whom the Pharisees had sent forth to "entangle Him in His talk," and bethought them of some ingenious puzzle about the Resurrection by which they in their turn might put that doctrine to a ludicrous test. So, referring to one peculiar feature of the Mosaic marriage law. they asked Him, how, in the resurrection, a woman, who by that law had been the wife of seven husbands, would stand related to them-a question which lets us into the unspiritual, superficial, and frivolous character of their whole religion. Our Lord's answer is exceedingly beautiful, but peculiar in its cast. First, - "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, neither the power of God;" where the slight hold which the Scripture had upon their faith, and their superficial knowledge of it, are both indicated; and indeed they both go together. As to "the power of God," their ignorance of that is the most noticeable point in His charge against them. For what is it that lies at the root of all difficulty about the supernatural, but a reluctance to recognise "the power of God?" Men who live and think in a region of naturalism, even though they cannot quite shake off the faith of the Scriptures, sit very loose to whatever therein is of the unseen and supernatural, either explaining it away or virtually disbelieving it. With such minds what is wanted is, such an overpowering sense of God's superiority to His own works that whatever changes on them He designs to effect they shall see to be infinitely easy to His own "power." Now this was what the Sadducees as a class wanted, and this want is the bane of the sceptical mind in general.* How striking is it to find that in the one instance in which they brought their religious principles under the notice of our Lord, they displayed their negative and sceptical character, with respect to the future life; and that in replying to them our Lord begins by holding it forth as the vice of their whole way of thinking, that ne'ther "the Scriptures," which reveal the Divine intentions with respect to the future life, nor "the power of God" to make them good, had ever penetrated their minds, else all their difficulties had been overpowered.

But why, you may ask, since the Pharisees were on so much safer ground than the Sadducees, did our Lord come into such constant and deadly conflict with the one, and hardly at all with the other? Why did the Pharisees combine so early, systematically, and perseveringly to put Him down? while it was not until He stood on trial before the Sanhedrim, that the Sadducean members of that supreme court, perceiving that His claims were as subversive of their views as of their rivals', joined heartily with them in pronouncing Him "guilty of death." The answer to these questions, though not difficult, is very instructive.

What were the objects of our Lord's public ministry? To breathe life into the letter of the Scriptures, and sweep away the traditional rubbish which had gathered around the fundamental and enduring principles of religion therein contained; to encourage and draw around Him as many as hungered and thirsted after righteousness, and were looking for redemption; and to prepare the way for such an expansion of the kingdom of God as should make it fit to overshadow and bless the whole earth. Now this, though totally uncongenial to the Sadducean type of thought, would hardly ever bring Him into direct collision with its adherents. Theirs, in fact, was rather a mode of thinking-speculative, latitudinarian, negative-than any positive, objective, distinctive dogmas tenaciously They clung indeed to nothing but the clung to. liberty to question the positive dogmas of others. 'The liberty of the will,' for example, was a great point with them, but it was more in resistance to the predestinarianism of the Pharisees than as a dogma of their own; and when Josephus tells us that they spoke of the duty and dignity of disregarding all incentives to virtue drawn from the hope or fear of future rewards or punishments, and how virtue should be held to be its own best reward, one easily sees that their minds, so far from resting in positive dogmas, retreated out of them, and that their religious views, so far as they had any, were provisional and speculative rather than fixed and definite. As there was no solidity in them, one wonders not that they had no permanency; and the fact that after the first century of the Christian era they are, as a body, unknown to history-the Pharisaic party alone existing amoug the Jews-ought to be marked, as showing the religious death which lurks within the folds of a negative and sceptical turn of mind. The triumphs of Christianity, as an incarnation and resurrection of positive Divine truth, swallowed up, like the rod of Moses, the rods of those Sadducean magicians; and those Jews who declined to enter the Christian pale were driven, in self defence, to rally around the positive dogmas of the Pharisaic school, with all its traditions, as their only effectual bulwark against the inroads of the new Faith.

^{*} The rest of our Lord's answer to the Sadducees gives a beautiful glimpse—nothing more—of what the resurrection will not be, but inferentially of its positive character, and an argument for the resurrection from the Pentateuch; not because the Sadducees discoved the other Scriptures, but because they themselves had just appealed to the Pentateuch against the resurrection, and because this was regarded by every class as the fontal portion of all Scripture.

How different from this evanescence of Sadduceanism was the hard frout which the well-compacted system of Pharisaism presented to our Lord from first to last! As jealous conservators of the Scriptures, to the minutest jot and tittle, the sincere lovers of the oracles of God naturally rallied around them, though only to have the eternal truths which they embodied enervated and nullified by their traditions. 'The sanctity which they assumed as "the most straitest sect of their religion," attracted to them all the devout and earnest in the land, but only to be scandalised by the hollowness of their pretensions, as a body, or to become themselves familiarised with a religion of empty forms, and while inwardly sighing at first for the balm in Gilead, which only one Physician had to give them, at length to cease to sigh for it when they failed to find it. In short, their selfrighteousness, their spiritual pride, their hypocrisy, their avarice, their heartless usage of the poor on religious pretexts, and that hatred of spiritual religion which made them early and ever growingly feel that either they must rid themselves of Him or be themselves swept away; all this presented such a bristling front of point-blank opposition to all that our Lord came to teach, that none can fail to see what a huge task He undertook who came to break every yoke and let the oppressed go free.

And how did He proceed to it? With a simplicity and spirituality, a breadth and power, a loftiness and authority never before known, did He proclaim wherever He went the eternal verities of all true religion, as these were embodied in the Old Testament; in a style never assumed by mortal before did He invite all the weary and heavy laden to come under His own capacious wing, assuring them they should there find rest to their souls. But that was not all. For ever and anon He exposed the utter heartlessness of the Pharisaic religion, and withering as well as very explicit were many of these exposures. Near the outset of his ministry, in his Sermon on the Mount, He said before a vast audience collected from all parts of the land, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of God." About the middle of His ministry, after one of the most scorching exposures of their detestable traditions (Mark vii.), when told that the Pharisces were galled at His invectives against them, He replied, "Every plant which My heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up; let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch." And at the close of His ministry, He wound up one of the most awful denunciations of their hypocrisy as a body with words which are enough to make the ears of every one that heareth them to tingle: "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" He knew the consequences of such plain speaking, but he had counted the cost. The men of whom He spake were those who, when He had raised Lazarus from the dead, instead of being overpowered by such stupendous evidence of His claims exposed to their very senses, "sought to put Lazarus also to death," that they might stifle this testimony too. As nothing, therefore, could make the smallest impression upon them, He would speak out their real character in all its unrelieved blackness, and let them do their worst as they were already preparing to do.

We have no space left for adverting to the only remaining "sect," the Essenes, whom we set down as the representatives of the ASCETIC principle in religion. But there is, perhaps, no loss. For though theirs was certainly one of the phases of religious life existing among the Jews when Christ appeared, He had no opportunity of "dealing" with it at all. They lived in seclusion, shunning the society of their brethren, that they might neither be polluted by their ways nor interfered with in the observance of their peculiar mode of life. Celibacy was the rule among them, marriage the exception, and only for the weaker and inferior class. They did not join with others either in public worship or in the sacrificial services of the Temple. They, therefore, might be regarded as a "sect" in the modern sense of the term; and yet even to them it would not strictly apply. For they neither excommunicated others nor were themselves excommunicated. In fact, they stood in nearly the same relation to their outside brethren that the monastic orders do to the secular priests and ordinary members of the Church of Rome.* And their principles are only interesting for the purposes of this paper, as showing that while the traditional and the rationalistic phases of religious life were its dominating features, the ascetic was there too; and as it appears to date from about the time of the Maccabees, we thus see that all the characteristics of religious life now existing were in full vigour, though under very different conditions among the Jews when Christ appeared.

Nor have we been able to overtake the one thoroughly satisfactory state of mind and feeling which our Lord found existing among the Jews of His day—that BIBLICAL FAITH AND EXPECTATION which held properly of no existing school, though they would ^{*} Dr. Ginsburg, of Liverpool, in a learned paper on "The History and Doctrines of the Essenes," lately read before the Literary and Philosophical Society of that city, endeavours to identify the teaching of our Lord with that of the Essenes (though purged of their extremes), and even goes the length of affirming that He "Himself belonged to this holy brotherhood!" To us the asceticism of the Essenes appears, even from the learned author's own account of them, to be totally opposed to some of the most characteristic features of the Christian character, as delineated by our Lord.

outwardly attach themselves to the Pharisaic body. Divinely quickened and continually nourished by the oracles of God and the other "means of grace," that Biblical faith would be efficacious to overcome the world, to beget hungerings and thirstings after righteousness-to repel, as by a spiritual instinct, what was deadly in Pharisaic teaching, and to draw its subjects insensibly to Him who was alone able to speak to their hearts and heal all their spiritual maladies. Such souls it was "meat" to our Lord to welcome and cheer; He bore with their prejudices, and met their difficulties, not breaking the bruised reed nor quenching the smoking flax. And though some of these, perhaps not a few, would dread to cast in their lot with Him in the days of His flesh, there can hardly be a doubt that of the thousands who came trooping into the infant Church, after the Pentecostal descent of the Spirit had thrown such a flood of light on His claims, a goodly number were not far from the kingdom even before that, and wanted only that to ripen them into full discipleship.

What, now, is the conclusion of this whole matter? First, when once implicit and childlike faith in the testimony of God expressed in the Scriptures - as a supernatural communication of the Divine mind and will-is sapped and mined in any soul, and a spirit of distrustful, naturalistic criticism has taken its place; faith, in the biblical sense of that term-taking God . at His word and so overcoming the world - is impossible; and nothing remains but a feeble, fluctuating, speculative, provisional, and inoperative acquiescence in Christianity, and, at length, only a sentimental religiousness, stripped of every positive, objective belief. Such is the Sadducean type of religious thought. With so fluctuating and intangible a thing our Lord never went out of His way to grapple (as He did often with Pharisaism), nor did He ever volunteer an allusion to it. He left it to disappear-as in fact it did-under the bright beams of positive transparent truth, enshrined in His own incarnate Person, risen from the dead and alive for evermore. Nor shall we successfully meet the same type of thought, which in our own day is poisoning the religious atmosphere, but by holding forth in assured faith and living power the Story of the Cross, and the positive truths embodied in the risen Saviour; before which the clouds of what is called "free thought"-which just means freedom to sit loose to every positive, objective belief-will assuredly vanish. Secondly, as Pharisaic traditionalism had not in it an atom of scepticism as to the Scriptures themselves, and their great fundamental verities, but gave itself forthwith much earnest zeal as the proper guardian of both-by which it rallied around it nearly all who trembled at the word of the Lord-it was a thousand times more formidable than the rival way of thinking. As it all but crushed out the life of Divine truth by the human traditions in which they held it fast bound, and made use of religious observances as a cloak for its own hypocrisies and a stepping-stone to its own aggrandisement, it became necessary to deal with it unsparingly, asserting the majesty and sacredness of revealed truth, in defiance of every human addition, proclaiming the emptiness of all mere forms, and the sole reality of inward, living, spiritual religion, and pronouncing the doom of even the most venerable and cherished system which could not abide and would not rejoice in the beams of the Sun of righteousness, now risen on this dark world. And who can fail to find here the only reliable materials for successfully grappling with the corresponding traditionalism of our own day, not only as it exists in so gigantic and concrete a form in the Church of Rome, but as it has more or less encrusted itself around the Protestant Churches, until the human has come to be confounded with the Divine, and people can hardly recognise the latter when stripped of the former. "What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord. Let God be true and every man a liar." Thirdly, not only is asceticism in full vigour in the Church of Rome, but, like an intoxicating wine, it is dimming the vision and shaking the steps of some of the most cultivated and elegant minds in the High section of the Church of England. Thus every ancient phase of religious life thrives still. One thing alone will kill it-the liberty and love of a pardoned child walking before a reconciled Father in the assurance of His love, and yielding a manly, entire, and "reasonable" subjection to Him, in that newness of life which Christ Himself exemplified and taught. Finally, if all the preceding phases of religious life are as alive now as of old, we rejoice to be able to add that that Biblical faith and expectation which, when Christ came, found in Him all its salvation and all its desire, not only exists in our own day, but is far more widely diffused, and in character more intelligent, more lively, and more influential than it has been for many a long period. It is true that rationalistic scepticism is making frightful inroads upon our men of "modern thought;" that Popery is making converts of some in the highest classes of society, multiplying its machinery, and cherishing high hopes of the recovery of this Protestant island to its former allegiance to the man of the triple crown; and that some sickly people are making up their minds to a total, though temporary, triumph both of infidelity and of popery over western Christendom. But let us only, in simple faith and living power, hold up Him who came to preach deliverance to the captives, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound; let us but hold forth to all the weary and heavy-laden that Wing which is able to enfold them everyone; let us arise and shake ourselves from the dust, put on our beautiful garments, in His name rejoicing all the day and in His righteousness exalted; and, with the Spirit poured upon us from on high, we shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one, ready for the worst that may come, and overcoming the world.

"THE CHILD IS QUITE WELL, HUGH."

MADONNA MARY.

By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," &c.

PART II.

CHAPTER VI.

EVERYTHING went on well enough at the station for some time after the great occurrence which counted for so much in Mrs. Ochterlony's life; and the Major was very peaceable, for him, and nothing but trifling matters being in his way to move him, had fewer fidgets than usual. To be sure he was put out now and then by something the Colonel said or did, or by Hesketh's well-off-ness, which had come to the length of a moral peculiarity, and was trying to a man; but these little disturbances fizzed themselves out, and got done with without troubling anybody much. There was a lull, and most people were surprised at it, and disposed to think that something must be the matter with the Major; but there was nothing the matter. Probably it occurred to him now and then that his last great fidget had rather gone a step too far-but this is mere conjecture, for he certainly never said so. And then, after a while, he began to play, as it were, with the next grand object of uneasiness which was to distract his existence. This was the sending "home" of little Hugh. It was not that he did not feel to the utmost the blank this event would cause in the house, and the dreadful tug at his heart, and the difference it would make to Mary. But at the same time it was a thing that had to be done, and Major Ochterlony hoped his feelings would never make him fail in his duty. He used to feel Hugh's head if it was hot, and look at his tongue at all sorts of untimely moments, which Mary knew meant nothing, but yet which made her thrill and tremble to her heart; and then he would shake his own head, and look sad. "I would give him a little quinine, my dear," he would say; and then Mary, out of her very alarm and pain, would turn upon him.

"Why should I give him quinine? It is time enough when he shows signs of wanting it. The child is quite well, Hugh." But there was a certain quiver in Mrs. Ochterlony's voice which the Major could not and did not mistake.

"Oh yes, he is quite well," he would reply; "come and let me feel if you have any flesh on your bones, old fellow. He is awfully thin, Mary. I don't think he would weigh half so much as he did a year ago if you were to try. I don't want to alarm you, my dear; but we must do it sooner or later, and in a thing that is so important for the child, we must not think of ourselves," said Major Ochterlony; and then again he laid his hand with that doubting, experimenting look upon his boy's brow, to feel "if there was any fever," as he said.

"He is quite well," said Mary, who felt as if she were going distracted while this pantomime went on.

"You do frighten me, though you don't mean it; but I know he is quite well."

"Oh yes," said Major Ochterlony, with a sigh; and he kissed his little boy solemnly, and set him down as if things were in a very bad way; "he is quite well. But I have seen when five or six hours have changed all that," he added with a still more profound sigh, and got up as if he could not bear further consideration of the subject, and went out and strolled into somebody's quarters, where Mary did not see how lighthearted he was half an hour after, quite naturally, because he had poured out his uneasiness, and a little more, and got quite rid of it, leaving her with the arrow sticking in her heart. No wonder that Mrs. Kirkman, who came in as the Major went out, said that even a very experienced Christian would have found it trying. As for Mary, when she woke up in the middle of the night, which little peevish Wilfrid gave her plenty of occasion to do, she used to steal off as soon as she had quieted that baby-tyrant, and look at her eldest bey in his little bed, and put her soft hand on his head and stoop over him to listen to his breathing. And sometimes she persuaded herself that his forehead was hot, which it was quite likely to be, and got no more sleep that night; though as for the Major he was a capital sleeper. And then somehow it was not so easy as it had been to conclude that it was only his way; for after his way had once brought about such consequences as in that re-marriage which Mary felt a positive physical pain in remembering, it was no longer to be taken lightly. The consequence was, that Mrs. Ochterlouv wound herself up and summoned all her courage and wrote to Aunt Agatha, though she thought it best, until she had an answer, to say nothing about it; and she began to look over all little Hugh's wardrobe, to make and mend and consider within herself what warm things she could get him for the terminatiou of that inevitable voyage, and to think what might happen before she had these little things of his in her care again-how they would wear out and be replenished and his mother have no hand in it-and how he would get on without her. She used to make pictures of the little forlorn fellow on shipboard, and how he would cry himself to sleep, till the tears came dropping on her needle and rusted it; and then would try to think how good Aunt Agatha would be to him, but was not to say comforted by that-not so much as she ought to have been. There was nothing in the least remarkable in all this, but only what a great many people have to go through, and what Mrs. Ochterlony no doubt would go through with courage when the inevitable moment came. It was the looking forward to and rehearsing it, and the Major's awful suggestions, and the coustant dread of feeling little Hugh's head hot or his tongue white, and thinking it was her fault—this was what made it so hard upon Mary; though Major Ochterlony never meant to alarm her, as anybody might see.

"I think he should certainly go home," Mrs. Kirkman said. "It is a trial, but it is one of the trials that will work for good. I don't like to blame you, Mary, but I have always thought your children were a temptation to you; oh, take care!—if you were to make idols of them—"

"I don't make idols of them," said Mrs. Ochterlony, hastily; and then she added, with an effort of self-control which stopped even the rising colour on her cheek, "You know I don't agree with you about these things." She did not agree with Mrs. Kirkman; and yet to tell the truth, where so much is concerned, it is a little hard for a woman not to stop short, however convinced she may be, and think that, after all, the opinion which would make an end of her best hopes and her surest confidence may be

"I know you don't agree with me," said the Colonel's wife, sitting down with a sigh. "Oh, Mary, if you only knew how much I would give to see you taking these things to heart—to see you not almost, but altogether such as I am," she added, with solemn pathos. "If you would but remember that these blessings are only lent us—that we don't know what day or hour they may be taken back again—"

All this Mary listened to with a rising of nature in her heart against it, and yet with that wavering behind,-What if it might be true?

"Don't speak to me so," she said. "You always make me think that something is going to happen. As if God grudged us our little happiness. Don't talk of lending and taking back again. If He is not a cheerful giver, who can be?" For she was carried away by her feelings, and was not quite sure what she was saying—and at the same time, it comes so much easier to human nature to think that God grudges and takes back again, and is not a cheerful giver. As for Mrs. Kirkman, she thought it sinful so much as to imagine anything of the kind.

"It grieves me to hear you speak in that loose sort of latitudinarian way," she said; "oh, my dear Mary, if you could only see how much need you have to be brought low. When one cross is not enough, another comes—and I feel that you are not going to be let alone. This trial, if you take it in a right spirit, may have the most blessed consequences. It must be to keep you from making an idol of him, my dear—for if he takes up your heart from better things—"

What could Mary say? She stopped in her work to give her hands an impatient wring together, by way of expressing somehow in secret to herself the impatience with which she listened. Yet, perhaps, after all, it might be true. Perhaps God was not such a Father as He, the supreme and all-loving, whom her own motherhood shadowed forth in Mary's heart, but such a one as those old pedant fathers, who took away pleasures and reclaimed gifts, for discipline's sake. Perhaps—for when a heart has everything most dear to it at stake, it has such a miserable inclination to believe the worst of Him who leaves his explanation to the end,—Mary thought perhaps it might be true, and that God her Father might be lying in wait for her somewhere to crush her to the ground for having too much pleasure in his gift,—which was the state of mind which her friend, who was at the bottom of her heart a good woman, would have liked to bring about.

"I think it is simply because we are in India," said Mrs. Ochterlony, recovering herself; "it is one of the conditions of our lot. It is a very hard condition, but of course we have to bear it. I think, for my part, that God, instead of doing it to punish me, is sorry for me, and that He would meud it and spare us if something else did not make it necessary. But perhaps it is you who are right," she added, faltering again, and wondering if it was wrong to believe that God, in a wonderful supreme way, must be acting, somehow as in a blind ineffective way, she, a mother, would do to her children. But happily her companion was not aware of that profane thought. And then, Mrs. Hesketh had come in, who looked at the question from entirely a different point of view.

"We have all got to do it, you know," said that comfortable woman, "whether we idolize them or not. I don't see what that has to do with it; but then I never do understand you. The great thing is, if you have somebody nice to send them to. One's mother is a great comfort for that; but then there is one's husband's friends to think about. I am not sure, for my own part, that a good school is not the best. That can't offend anybody, you know; neither your own people nor his; and then they can go all round in the holidays. Mine have all got on famously," said Mrs. Hesketh; and nobody who looked at her could have thought anything else. Though, indeed, Mrs. Hesketh's welloff-ness was not nearly so disagreeable or offensive to other people as her husband's, who had his balance at his banker's written on his face; whereas in her case it was only evident that she was on the best of terms with her milliner and her jeweller, and all her tradespeople, and never had any trouble with her bills. Mary sat between the woman who had no children, and who thought she made idols of her boys-and the woman who had quantities of children and saw no reason why anybody should be much put out of their way about them; and neither the one nor the other knew what she meant, any more than she perhaps knew exactly what they meant, though, as was natural, that latter idea did not much strike her. And the sole strengthening which Mrs. Ochterlony drew from this talk, was a resolution never to say anything more about it; to keep what she was thinking of to herself, and shut another door in her heart, which, after all, is a process which has to be pretty often repeated as one goes through the world.

"But Mary has no friends—no female friends, poor thing. It is so sad for a girl when that happens, and accounts for so many things," the colonel's wife said, dropping the lids over her eyes, and with an imperceptible shake of her head, which brought the little chapel and the scene of her second marriage in a moment before Mary's indignant eyes; "but there is one good even in that, for it, gives greater ground for faith; when we have nothing and nobody to cling to—""

"We were talking of the children," Mrs. Hesketh broke in calmly. "If I were you I should keep Hugh until Islay was old enough to go with him. They are such companions to each other, you know, and two children don't cost much more than one. If I were you, Mary, I would send the two together. I always did it with mine. And I am sure you have somebody that will take care of them; one always has somebody in one's eye; and as for female friends ----

Mary stopped short the profanity which doubtless her comfortable visitor was about to utter on this subject. "I have only female friends," she said, with a natural touch of sharpness in her voice. "I have an old aunt and a sister who are my nearest relatives—and it is there Hugh is going," for the prick of offence had been good for her nerves, and strung them up.

"Then I can't see what you have to be anxious about," said Mrs. Hesketh; "some people always make a fuss about things happening to children; why should anything happen to them? mine have had everything, I think, that children can have, and never been a bit the worse; and though it makes one uncomfortable at the time to think of their being ill, and so far away if anything should happen, still, if you know they are in good hands, and that everything is done that can be done—— And then, one never hears till the worst is over," said the well-off woman, drawing her lace shawl round her. "Good-by, Mary, and don't fret; there is nothing that is not made worse by fretting about it; I never do, for my part."

Mrs. Kirkman threw a glance of pathetic import out of the corners of her down-dropped eyes at the large departing skirts of Mary's other visitor. The colonel's wife was one of the people who always stay last, and her friends generally cut their visits short when they encountered her, with a knowledge of this peculiarity, and at the same time an awful sense of something that would be said when they had withdrawn. "Not that I care for what she says," Mrs. Hesketh murmured to herself as she went out, "and Mary ought to know better at least;" but at the same time, society at the station, though it was quite used to it, did not like to think of the sigh, and the tender, bitter lamentations which would be made over them when they took their leave. Mrs. Hesketh was not sensitive, but she could not help feeling a little aggrieved, and wondering what special view of [ this time—for in so limited a community, everybody knew about everybody, and any little faults one might have were not likely to be hid.

Mrs. Kirkman had risen too, and when Mary came back from the door the colonel's wife came and sat down beside her on the sofa, and took Mrs. Ochterlony's hand. "She would be very nice, if she only took a little thought about the one thing needful," said Mrs. Kirkman, with her usual sigh. "What does it matter about all the rest? Oh, Mary, if we could only choose the good part which cannot be taken away from us!"

"But surely we all try, a little, after that," said Mary. "She is a kind woman, and very good to the poor. And how can we tell what her thoughts are? I don't think we ever understand each other's thoughts."

"I never pretend to understand. I judge according to the Scripture rule," said Mrs. Kirkman; "you are too charitable, Mary; and too often, you know, charity only means laxness. Oh, I cannot tell you how those people are all laid upon my soul! Colonel Kirkman being the principal officer, you know, and so little real Christian work to be expected from Mr. Churchill, the responsibility is terrible. I feel sometimes as if I must die under it. If their blood should be demauded at my hands!"

"But surely God must care a little about them Himself," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "Don't you think so? I cannot think that He has left it all upon you-"

"Dear Mary, if you would but give me the comfort of thinking I had been of use to you," said Mrs. Kirkman, pressing Mary's hand. And when she went away she believed that she had done her duty by Mrs. Ochterlony at least; and felt that perhaps, as a brand snatched from the burning, this woman, who was so wrapped up in regard for the world and idolatry of her children, might still be brought into a better state. From this it will be seen that the painful impression made by the marriage had a little faded out of the mind of the station. It was there, waiting any chance moment or circumstance that might bring the name of the Madonna Mary into question; but in the meantime, for the convenience of ordinary life, it had been dropped. It was a nuisance to keep up a sort of shadowy censure which never came to anything, and by tacit consent the thing had dropped. For it was a very small community, and if any one had to be tabooed, the taboo must have been complete and crushing, and nobody had the courage for that. And so gradually the cloudiness passed away like a breath on a mirror; and Mary to all appearance was among them as she had been before. Only no sort of compromise could really obliterate the fact from anybody's recollection or above all from her own mind.

when they took their leave. Mrs. Hesketh was and Mary went back to little Hugh's wardrobe not sensitive, but she could not help feeling a when her visitors were gone, with that sense of little aggreed, and wondering what special view of having shut another door in her heart which has her evil ways her regimental superior would take already been mentioned. It is so natural to open all the doors and leave all the chambers open to the day; but when people walk up to the threshold and look in and turn blank looks of surprise or sad looks of disapproval upon you, what is to be done but to shut the door? Mrs. Ochterlony thought as most people do, that it was almost incredible that her neighbours did not understand what she meant; and she thought too, like an inexperienced woman, that this was an accident of the station, and that elsewhere other people knew better, which was a very fortunate thought, and did her good. And so she continued to put the little things in order, and felt half angry when she saw the Major come in, and knew beforehand that he was going to resume his pantomime with little Hugh, and to try if his head was hot and look at his tongue. his tongue turned out to be white and his head feverish, then Mary knew that he would think it was her fault, and began to long for Aunt Agatha's letter, which she had been fearing, and which might be looked for by the next mail.

As for the Major, he came home with the air of a man who has hit upon a new trouble. His wife saw it before he had been five minutes in the house. She saw it in his eyes, which sought her and retired from her in their significant restless way, as if studying how to begin. In former days Mrs. Ochterlony, when she saw this, used to help her husband out; but recently she had had no heart for that, and he was left unaided to make a beginning for himself. She took no notice of his fidgeting, nor of the researches he made all about the room and all the things he put out of their places. She could wait until he informed her what it was. But Mary felt a little nervous until such time as her husband had seated himself opposite her and begun to pull her working things about and to take up little Hugh's linen blouses which she had been setting in order. Then the Major heaved a demonstrative sigh. He meant to be asked what it meant, and even gave a glance up at her from the corner of his eye to see if she remarked it, but Mary was hard-hearted and would take no notice. He had to take all the trouble himself.

"He will want warmer things when he goes home," said the Major. "You must write to Aunt Agatha about that, Mary. I have been thinking a great deal about his going home. I don't know how I shall get on without him, nor you either, my darling; but it is for his good. How old is Islay?" Major Ochterlony added with a little abruptness: and then his wife knew what it

"Islay is not quite three," said Mary, quietly, as if the question was of no importance; but for all that her heart began to jump and beat against her breast.

"Three! and so big for his age," said the guilty Major, labouring with his secret meaning. "I don't want to vex you, Mary, my love, but I was thinking perhaps when Hugh went—It comes to about the same thing, you see—the little beggar would be dreadfully solitary by himself, and I don't see that it would make any difference to Aunt Agatha...."

"It would make a difference to me," said Mary.
"Oh, Hugh, don't be so cruel to me. I cannot let him go so young. If Hugh must go, it may be for his good—but not for Islay's, who is only a baby. He would not know us or have any recollection of us. Don't make me send both of my boys away."

"You would still have the baby," said the Major.
"My darling, I am not going to do anything without your consent. Islay looked dreadfully feverish the other day, you know. I told you so; and as I was coming home I met Mrs. Hesketh——"

"You took her advice about it," said Mary, with a little bitterness. As for the Major, he set his Mary a whole heaven above such a woman as Mrs. Hesketh, and yet he had taken her advice about it, and it irritated him a little to perceive his wife's tone of reproach.

"If I listened to her advice it was because she is a very sensible woman," said Major Ochterlony. "You are so heedless, my dear. When your children's health is ruined, you knew, that is not the time to send them home. We ought to do it now, while they are quite well; though indeed I thought Islay very feverish the other night," he added, getting up again in his restless way. And then the Major was struck with compunction when he saw Mary bending down over her work, and remembered how constantly she was there, working for them, and how much more trouble those children cost her than they ever could cost him. "My love," he said, coming up to her and laying his hand caressingly upon her bent head, "my bonnie-Mary! you did not think I meant that you cared less for them or what was for their good, than I do? It will be a terrible trial; but then, if it is for their good and our own peace of mind-"

"God help me," said Mary, who was a little beside herself. "I don't think you will leave me any peace of mind. You will drive me to do what I think wrong, or, if I don't do it, you will make me think that everything that happens is my fault. You don't mean it, but you are cruel, Hugh."

"I am sure I don't mean it," said the Major, who, as usual, had had his say out; "and when you come to think—— but we will say no more about it to-night. Give me your book, and I will read to you for an hour or two. It is a comfort to come in to you and get a little peace. And after all, my love, Mrs. Hesketh means well, and she's a very sensible woman. I don't like Hesketh, but there's not a word to say against her. They are all very kind aud friendly. We are in great luck in our regiment. Is this your mark where you left off? Don't let us say anything more about it, Mary, for to-night."

"No," said Mrs. Ochterlony, with a sigh; but she knew in her heart that the Major would begin to feel Islay's head, if it was hot, and look at his tongue, as he had done to Hugh's, and drive her out of her senses. And that most likely when she had come to an end of her powers, she would be beaten and give in at the last. But they said no more about it that night; and the Major got so interested in the book that he sat all the evening reading, and Mary got very well on with her work. Major Ochterlony was so interested that he even forgot to look as if he thought the children feverish when they came to say good night, which was the most wonderful relief to his wife. If thoughts came into her head while she trimmed Hugh's little blouses, of another little three-year-old traveller tottering by his brother's side, and going away on the stormy dangerous sea, she kept them to herself. It did not seem to her as if she could outlive the separation, nor how she could permit a ship so richly freighted to sail away into the dark distance and the terrible storms; and yet she knew that she must outlive it, and that it must happen, if not now, yet at least some time. It is the condition of existence for the English sojourners in India. And what was she more than another, that any one should think there was any special hardship in her case?

CHAPTER VII.

THE next mail was an important one in many ways. It was to bring Aunt Agatha's letter about little Hugh, and it did bring something which had still more effect upon the Ochterlony peace of mind. The Major, as has been already said, was not a man to be greatly excited by the arrival of the mail. All his close and pressing interests were at present concentrated in the station. His married sisters wrote to him now and then, and he was very glad to get their letters, and to hear when a new niece or nephew arrived, which was the general burden of these epistles. Sometimes it was a death, and Major Ochterlony was sorry; but neither the joy nor the sorrow disturbed him much. For he was far away, and he was tolerably happy himself, and could bear with equanimity the vicissitudes in the lot of his friends. But this time the letter which arrived was of a different description. It was from his brother, the head of the house-who was a little of an invalid and a good deal of a dilettante, and gave the Major no nephews or nieces, being indeed a confirmed bachelor of the most hopeless kind. He was a man who never wrote letters, so that the communication was a little startling. And yet there was nothing very particular in it. Something had occurred to make Mr. Ochterlony think of his brother, and the consequence was that he had drawn his writing things to his hand and written a few kind words, with a sense of having done something meritorious to himself and deeply gratifying to Hugh. He sent his love to Mary, and hoped the little fellow strative man—but still, when you get at it, he has a was all right who was, he supposed, to carry on the warm heart. I am sure he would be a good friend family honours—"if there are any family honours," to you, Mary, if ever—-" the Squire had said, not without an agreeable sense that there was something in his last paper on the friend to me," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "He is your would not willingly let die. This was the innocent morsel of correspondence which had come to the Major's hand. Mary was sitting by with the baby on her lap while he read it, and busy with a very different kind of communication. She was reading Aunt Agatha's letter which she had been dreading and wishing for, and her heart was growing sick over the innocent flutter of expectation and kindness and delight which was in it. Every assurance of the joy she would feel in seeing little Hugh, and the care she would take of him, which the simpleminded writer sent to be a comfort to Mary, came upon the mother's unreasonable mind like a kind of injury. To think that anybody could be happy about an occurrence that would be so terrible to her; to think anybody could have the bad taste to say that they looked with impatience for the moment that to Mary would be like dying! She was unhinged, and for the first time perhaps in her life her nerves were thoroughly out of order, and she was unreasonable to the bottom of her heart; and when she came to her young sister's gay announcement of what for her part she would do for her little nephew's education, and how she had been studying the subject ever since Mary's letter arrived, Mrs. Ochterlony felt as if she could have beaten the girl, and was ready to cry with wretchedness and irritation and despair. All these details served somehow to fix it, though she knew it had been fixed before. They told her the little room Hugh should have, and the old maid who would take care of him; and how he should play in the garden, and learn his lessons in Aunt Agatha's parlour, and all those details which would be sweet to Mary when her boy was actually there. But at present they made his going away so real, that they were very bitter to her, and she had to draw the astonished child away from his play and take hold of him and keep him by her, to feel quite sure that he was still here, and not in the little North-country cottage which she knew so well. But this was an arrangement which did not please the baby, who liked to have his mother all to himself, and pushed Hugh away, and kicked and screamed at him lustily. Thus it was an agitated little group upon which the Major looked down as he turned from his brother's pleasant letter. He was in a very pleasant frame of mind himself, and was excessively entertained by the self-assertion of little Wilfred on his mother's knee.

"He is a plucky little soul though he is so small," said Major Ochterlony; "but Willy, my boy, there's precious little for you of the grandeurs of the family. It is from Francis, my dear. It's very surprising, you know, but still it's true. And he sends you his love. You know I always said that there was a great deal of good in Francis; he is not a demon-

"I hope I shall never need him to be a good "Coins of Agrippa," that the Numismatic Society brother, Hugh, but you know we never got on."

It was a perfectly correct statement of fact, but yet perhaps Mary would not have made it, had she not been so much disturbed by Aunt Agatha's letter. She was almost disposed to persuade herself for that moment that she had not got on with Aunt Agatha, which was a moral impossibility. As for the Major, he took no notice of his wife's little ill-tempered uneuthusiastic speech.

"You will be pleased when you read it," he said.
"He talks of Hugh quite plainly as the heir of Earlston. I can't help being pleased. I wonder what kind of Squire the little beggar will make: but we shall not live to see that—or at least, I shan't," the Major went on, and he looked at his boy with a wistful look which Mary used to think of afterwards. As for little Hugh, he was very indifferent, and not much more conscious of the affection near home than of the inheritance far off. Major Ochterlony stood by the side of Mary's chair, and he had it in his heart to give her a little lesson upon her unbelief and want of confidence in him, who was always acting for the very best, and who thought much more of her interests than of his own.

"My darling," he said, in that coaxing tone which Mary knew so well, "I don't mean to blame you. It was a bad thing to make you do; and you might have thought me cruel and too precise. But only see now how important it was to be exact about our marriage—too exact even. If Hugh should come into the estate—."

Here Major Ochterlony stopped short all at once, without any apparent reason. He had still his brother's letter in his hand, and was standing by Mary's side; and nobody had come in, and nothing had happened. But all at once, like a flash of lightning, something of which he had never thought before had entered his mind. He stopped short, and said "Good God!" low to himself, though he was not a man who used profane expressions. His face changed as a summer day changes when the wind seizes it like a ghost, and covers its heaven with clouds. So great was the shock he had received, that he made no attempt to hide it, but stood gazing at Mary, appealing to her out of the midst of his sudden trouble. "Good God!" he said. His eyes went in a piteous way from little Hugh, who knew nothing about it, to his mother, who was at present the chief sufferer. Was it possible that instead of helping he had done his best to dishonour Hugh? It was so new an idea to him, that he looked helplessly into Mary's eyes to see if it was true. And she, for her part, had nothing to say to him. She gave a little tremulous cry which did but echo his own exclamation, and pitifully held out her hand to her husband. Yes; it was true. Between them they had sown thorns in their boy's path, and thrown doubt on his name, and brought humiliation and uncertainty into his future life. Major Ochterlony dropped into a chair by his wife's side, and covered his face with her hand. He was struck dumb, by his discovery. It was only she revelation could come—who had been suffering, even angrily and bitterly, but who was now altogether subdued and conscious only of a common calamity; who was the only one capable of speech or thought.

"Hugh, it is done now," said Mary; "perhaps it may never do him any harm. We are in India, a long way from all our friends. They know what took place in Scotland, but they can't know what happened here."

The Major only replied once more, "Good God!" Perhaps he was not thinking so much of Hugh as of the failure he had himself made. To think he should have landed in the most apparent folly by way of being wise-that perhaps was the immediate sting. But as for Mrs. Ochterlony, her heart was full of her little boy who was going away from her, and her husband's horror and dismay seemed only natural. She had to withdraw her hand from him, for the tyrant baby did not approve of any other claim upon her attention, but she caressed his stooping head as she did so. "Oh. Hugh, let us hope things will turn out better than we think," she said, with her heart overflowing in her eyes; and the soft tears fell on Wilfrid's little frock as she soothed and consoled him. Little Hugh for his part had been startled in the midst of his play, and had come forward to see what was going on. He was not particularly interested, it is true, but still he rather wanted to know what it was all about. And when the pugnacious baby saw his brother he returned to the conflict. It was his baby efforts with hands and feet to thrust Hugh away which roused the Major. He got up and took a walk about the room, sighing heavily. "When you saw what was involved, why did you let me do it, Mary?" he said, amid his sighs. That was all the advantage his wife had from his discovery. He was still walking about the room and sighing, when the baby went to sleep, and Hugh left the room; and then to be sure the father and mother were alone.

"That never came into my head," Major Ochterlony said, drawing a chair again to Mary's side. "When you saw the danger why did you not tell me? I thought it was only because you did not like it. And then, on the other side, if anything happened to me—— Why did you let me do it when you saw that?" said the Major, almost angrily. And he drew another long impatient sigh.

"Perhaps it will do no harm, after all," said Mary, who felt herself suddenly put upon her defence.

did but echo his own exclamation, and pitifully held out her hand to her husband. Yes; it was true. Between them they had sown thorns in their boy's path, and thrown doubt on his name, and brought humiliation and uncertainty into his future life. Major Ochterlony dropped into a chair by his wife's side, and covered his face with her hand. He was struck dumb, by his discovery. It was only she who had seen it all long ago—to whom no sudden see that Churchill could have any hesitation in striking it out of the register—"

"Oh, Hugh, let it alone now," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "It is done, and we cannot undo it. Let us only be quiet and make no more commotion. People may forget it, perhaps, if we forget it."

"Forget it!" the Major said, and sighed. He shook his head, and at the same time he looked with a certain tender patronage on Mary. "You may forget it, my dear, and I hope you will," he said, with a magnanimous pathos; "but it is too much to expect that I should forget what may have such important results. I feel sure I ought to let Francis know. I daresay he could advise us what would be best. It is a very kind letter," said the Major; and he sighed, and gave Mary Mr. Ochterlony's brief and unimportant note with an air of resigned yet hopeless affliction, which half irritated her and half awoke those possibilities of laughter which come "when there is little laughing in one's head," as we say in Scotland. She could have laughed, and she could have stormed at him; and yet in the midst of all she felt a poignant sense of contrast, and knew that it was she and not he who would really suffer-as it was he and not she who was in fault.

While Mary read Mr. Ochterlony's letter, lulling now and then with a soft movement the baby on her knee, the Major at the other side got attracted after a while by the pretty picture of the sleeping child, and began at length to forego his sighing and to smooth out the long white drapery that lay over Mary's dress. He was thinking no harm, the tender-hearted man. He looked at little Wilfrid's small waxen face pillowed on his mother's arm-so much smaller and feebler than Hugh and Islay had been, the great, gallant fellows-and his heart was touched by his little child. "My little man! you are all right, at least," said the inconsiderate father. He said it to himself, and thought, if he thought at all on the subject, that Mary, who was reading his brother's letter, did not hear him. And when Mrs. Ochterlony gave that cry which roused all the house and brought everybody trooping to the door, in the full idea that it must be a cobra at least, the Major jumped up to his feet as much startled as any of them, and looked down to the floor and cried, "Where?-what is it?" with as little an idea of what was the matter as the ayah who grinned and gazed in the distance. When he saw that instead of indicating somewhere a reptile intruder, Mary had dropped the letter and fallen iuto a weak outburst of tears, the Major was confounded. He sent the servants away, and took his wife in his arms and held her fast. "What is it, my love?" said the Major. "Are you ill? For Heaven's sake tell me what it is; my poor darling, my bonnie Mary!" This was how he soothed her, without the most distant idea what was the matter, or what had made her cry out. And when Mary came to herself, she did not explain very clearly. She said to herself that it was no use making him happened to me."

unhappy by the fantastical horror which had come into her mind with his words, or indeed had been already lurking there. And, poor soul, she was better when she had had her cry out and had given over little Wilfrid, woke up by the sound, to his nurse's hands. She said, "Never mind me, Hugh; I am nervous, I suppose;" and cried on his shoulder as he never remembered her to have cried, except for very serious griefs. And when at last he had made her lie down, which was the Major's favourite panacea for all female ills of body or mind, and had covered her over, and patted and caressed and kissed her, Major Ochterlony went out with a troubled mind. It could not be anything in Francis's letter, which was a model of brotherly correctness, that had vexed or excited her: and then he began to think that for some time past her nerves had not been what they used to be. The idea disturbed him greatly, as may be supposed; for the thought of Mary ailing and weakly, or perhaps ill and in danger, was one which had never vet entered his mind. The first thing he thought of was to go and have a talk with Sorbette, who ought to know, if he was good for anything, what "I am sure I don't know in the least what is the matter," the Major said. "She is not ill, you know. This morning she looked as well as ever she did, and then all at once gave a cry and burst into tears. It is so unlike Mary."

"It is very unlike her," said the doctor. "Perhaps you were saying something that upset her nerves."

"Nerves!" said the Major, with calm pride.
"My dear fellow, you know that Mary has no nerves; she never was one of that sort of women. To tell the truth, I don't think she has ever been quite herself since that stupid business, you know."

"What stupid business?" said Mr. Sorbette.

"Oh, you know—the marriage, to be sure. A man looks very silly afterwards," said the Major with candour, "when he lets himself be carried away by his feelings. She ought not to have consented when that was her idea. I would give a hundred pounds I had not been so foolish. I don't think she has ever been quite herself since."

The doctor had opened de grands yeux. He looked at his companion as if he could not believe his ears. "Of course you would never have taken such an unusual step if there had not been good reason for it," he ventured to say—which was rather a hazardous speech; for the Major might have divined its actual meaning, and then things would have gone badly with Mr. Sorbette. But, as it happened, Major Ochterlony was far too much occupied to pay attention to anybody's meaning except his own.

"Yes, there was good reason," he said. "She lost her marriage 'lines,' you know; and all our witnesses are dead. I thought she might perhaps find herself in a disagreeable position if anything harmoned to me."

As he spoke, the doctor regarded him with surprise so profound as to be half sublime—surprise and a perplexity and doubt wonderful to behold. Was this a story the Major had made up, or was it perhaps after all the certain truth? It was just what he had said at first; but the first time it was stated with more warmth, and did not produce the same effect. Mr. Sorbette respected Mrs. Ochterlony to the bottom of his heart; but still he had shaken his head, and said, "There was no accounting for those things." And now he did not know what to make of it: whether to believe in the innocence of the couple, or to think the Major had made up a story—which, to be sure, would be by much the greatest miracle of all.

"If that was the case, I think it would have been better to let well alone," said the doctor. "That is what I would have done had it been me."

"Then why did not you tell me so?" said Major Ochterlony. "I asked you before; and what you all said to me was, 'If that's the case, best to repeat it at once.' Good Lord! to think how little one can rely upon one's friends when one asks their advice. But in the meantime the question is about Mary. I wish you'd go and see her and give her something—a tonic, you know, or something strengthening. I think I'll step over and see Churchill, and get him to strike that unfortunate piece of nonsense out of the register. As it was only a piece of form, I should think he would do it; and if it is that that ails her, it would do her

"If I were you, I'd let well alone," said the doctor; but he said it low, and he was putting on his hat as he spoke, and went off immediately to see his patient. Even if curiosity and surprise had not been in operation, he would still probably have hastened to Madonna Mary. For the regiment loved her in its heart, and the loss of her fair serene presence would have made a terrible gap at the station. "We must not let her be ill if we can help it," Mr. Sorbette said to himself; and then he made a private reflection about that ass Ochterlony and his fidgets. But yet, notwithstanding all his faults, the Major was not an ass. On thinking it over again, he decided not to go to Churchill with that little request about the register; and he felt more and more, the more he reflected upon it, how hard it was that in a moment of real emergency a man should be able to put so little dependence upon his friends. Even Mary had let him do it, though she had seen how dangerous and impolitic it was; and all the others had let him do it: for certainly it was not without asking advice that he had taken what the doctor called so unusual a step. Major Ochterlony felt as he took this into consideration that he was an injured man. What was the good of being on intimate terms with so many people, if not one of them could give him the real counsel of a friend when he wanted it? And even Mary had let him do it! The thought of such a strange dereliction of duty on the part of everybody connected with him went to the Major's heart.

As for Mary, it would be a little difficult to express her feelings. She got up as soon as her husband was gone, and threw off the light covering he had put over her so carefully, and went back to her work; for to lie still in a darkened room was not a remedy in which she put any faith. And to tell the truth, poor Mary's heart was eased a little, perhaps physically, by her tears, which had done her good, and by the other incidents of the evening, which had thrown down as it were the separation between her and her husband, and taken away the one rankling and aching wound she had. Now that he saw that he had done wrong-now that he was aware that it was a wrong step he had taken-a certain remnant of bitterness which had been lurking in a corner of Mary's heart came all to nothing and died down in a moment. As soon as he was himself awakened to it, Mary forgot her own wound and every evil thought she had ever had, in her sorrow for him. She remembered his look of dismay, his dead silence, his unusual exclamation; and she said, "poor Hugh!" in her heart, and was ready to condone his worst faults. Otherwise, as Mrs. Ochterlony said to herself, he had scarcely a fault that anybody could point out. He was the kindest, the most true and tender! Everybody acknowledged that he was the best husband in the regiment, and which of them could stand beside him, even in an inferior place? Not Colonel Kirkman, who might have been a petrified Colonel out of the Drift (if there were Colonels in those days), fer any particular internal evidence to the contrary; nor Captain Hesketh, who was so well off; nor any half dozen of the other officers. This was the state of mind in which Mrs. Ochterlony was when the doctor called. And he found her quite well, and thought her an unaccountable woman, and shrugged his shoulders, and wondered what the Major would take into his head next. "He said it was on the nerves, as the poor women call it," said the doctor. "I should like to know what he means by making game of people—as if I had as much time to talk nonsense as he has: but I thought, to be sure, when he said that, that it was a cock-and-bull story. I ought to know something about your nerves."

"He was quite right," said Mrs. Ochterlony; and she smiled and took hold of the great trouble that was approaching her and made a buckler of it for her husband. "My nerves were very much upset. You know we have to make up our minds to send Hugh home."

And as she spoke she looked up at Mr. Sorbette with eyes brimming over with two great tears—real tears, Heaven knows, which came but too readily to back out her sacred plea. The doctor recoiled before them as if somebody had levelled a pistol at him; for he was a man that could not bear to see women crying, as he said—or to see anybody in distress, which was a true statement of the case.

"There—there," he said, "don't excite yourself. What is the good of thinking about it? Everybody has to do it, and the monkeys get on as well as possible. Look here, pack up all this work and trash, and amuse yourself. Why don't you go out more and take a little relaxation? You had better send over to my sister for a novel; or if there's nothing else for it, get the baby. Don't sit working and driving yourself crazy here."

So that was all Mr. Sorbette could do in the ease; and a wonderfully puzzled doctor he was as he went back to his quarters, and took the first opportunity of telling his sister that she was all wrong about the Ochterlonys, and he always knew she was. "As if a man could know anything about it," Miss Sorbette said. And in the meantime the Major went home, and was very tender of Mary, and petted and watched over her as if she had had a real illness. Though, after all, the question why she had let him do so, was often nearly on his lips, as it was always in his heart.

CHAPTER VIII.

WHAT Mrs. Ochterlony had to do after this was to write to Aunt Agatha settling everything about little Hugh, which was by no means an easy thing to do, especially since the matter had been complieated by that most unnecessary suggestion about Islay which Mrs. Hesketh had thought proper to make; as if she, who had a grown-up daughter to be her companion, and swarms of children, so many as almost to pass the bounds of possible recollection, could know anything about how it felt to send off one's entire family, leaving only a baby behind; but then that is so often the way with those well-off people who have never had anything happen to them. Mary had to write that if all was well, and they could find "an opportunity," probably Hugh would be sent by the next mail but one; for she sneeeeded in persuading herself and the Major that sooner than that it would be impossible to have his things ready. "You do not say anything about Islay, my dear," said the Major, when he read the letter, "and you must see that for the child's sake-

"Oh, Hugh, what difference can it make?" said Mrs. Ochterlony, with conscious sophistry. "If she ean take one child, she can take two. It is not like a man-" But whether it was Islay or Aunt Agatha who was not like a man, Mary did not explain; and she went on with her preparations with a desperate trust in eireumstances, such as women are often driven to. Something might happen to preserve to her yet for a little while longer her threeyear-old boy. Hugh was past hoping for, but it seemed to her now that she would accept with gratitude, as a mitigated calamity, the separation from one which had seemed so terrible to her at first. As for the Major, he adhered to the idea with a tenacity unusual to him. He even came and superintended her at her work-table, and asked continually, How about Islay? if all these things were for Hugh?—

which was a question that called forth all the power of sophistry and equivocation which Mrs. Ochterlony possessed to answer. But still she put a certain trust in circumstances that something might still happen to save Islay—and indeed something did happen, though far, very far, from being as Mary wished.

The Major in the meantime had done his best to shake himself free from the alarm and dismay indirectly produced in his mind by his brother's letter. He had gone to Mr. Churchill after all, but found it impracticable to get the entry blotted out of the register, notwithstanding his assurance that it was simply a matter of form. Mr. Churchill had no doubt on that point, but he could not alter the record, though he condoled with the sufferer. "I cannot think how you all could let me do it," the Major said. "A man may be excused for taking the alarm if he is persuaded that his wife will get into trouble when he is gone, for want of a formality; but how all of you, with cool heads and no excitement to take away your judgment—""

"Who persuaded you?" said the elergyman, with a little dismay.

"Well, you know Kirkman said that things looked very bad in Scotland when the marriage lines were lost. How could I tell? he is Scotch and he ought to know. And then to think of Mary in trouble, and perhaps losing her little provision if anything happened to me. It was enough to make a man do anything foolish; but how all of you who know better should have let me do it—"

"My dear Major," said Mr. Churchill, mildly, "I don't think you are a man to be kept from doing anything when your heart is set upon it;—and then you were in such a hurry——"

"Ah, yes," said Major Ochterlony, with a deep sigh; "and nobody, that I can remember, ever suggested to me to wait a little. That's what it is, Churchill; to have so many friends, and not one among them who would take the trouble to tell a man he was wrong."

"Major Ochterlony," said the elergyman, a little stiffly, "you forget that I said everything I could say to convince you. Of course I did not know all the circumstances—but I hope I shall always have courage enough, when I think so, to tell any man he is in the wrong."

"My dear fellow, I did not mean you," said the Major, with another sigh; and perhaps it was with a similar statement that the conversation always concluded when Major Ochterlony confided to any special individual of his daily associates, this general condemnation of his friends, of which he made as little a secret as he had made of his re-marriage. The station knew as well after that, that Major Ochterlony was greatly disturbed about the "unusual step" he had taken, and was afraid it might be bad for little Hugh's future prospects, as it had been aware beforehand of the wonderful event itself. And naturally there was a great deal of discussion on the subject. There were some people who contented themselves with thinking, like the doctor, that Ochterlony was an ass with his fidgets; while there were others who thought he was "deep," and was trying, as they said, to do away with the bad impression. The former class were men and the latter were women, but it was by no means all the women who thought so. Not to speak of the younger class like poor little Mrs. Askell, there were at least two of the most important voices at the station which did not declare themselves. Mrs. Kirkman shook her head, and hoped that however it turned out it might be for all their good, and above all might convince Mary of the error of her ways; and Mrs. Hesketh thought everybody made a great deal too much fuss about it, and begged the public in general to let the Ochterlonys alone. But the fact was, that so far as the ordinary members of society were concerned, the Major's new agitation revived the gossip that had nearly died out, and set it all afloat again. It had been dying away under the mingled influences of time and the non-action of the leading ladies, and Mrs. Ochterlony's serene demeanor, which forbade the idea of evil. But when it was thus started again the second time it was less likely to be made an end of. Mary, however, was as unconscious of the renewed commotion as if she had been a thousand miles away. The bitterness had gone out of her heart, and she had half begun to think as the Major did, that he was an injured man, and that it was her fault and his friends' fault; and then she was occupied with something still more important, and could not go back to the old pain, from which she had suffered enough. Thus it was with her in those troubled, but yet, as she afterwards thought, happy days; when she was very miserable sometimes and very glad-when she had a great deal, as people said, to put up with, a great deal to forgive, and many a thing of which she did not herself approve, to excuse, and justify to others; this was her condition, and she had at the same time before her the dreadful probability of a separation from both of her children, the certainty of separation and a long, dangerous voyage for one of them, and sat and worked to this end day after day with a sense of what at the moment seemed exquisite wretchedness. But yet, thinking over it afterwards and looking back upon it, it seemed to Mary as if those were happy days.

The time was coming very near when Hugh (as Mrs. Ochterlony said) or the children (as the Major was accustomed to say) were going home: when all at once, without any preparation, very startling news came to the station. One of the little local rebellions that are always taking place in India had broken out somewhere, and a strong detachment of the regiment was to be sent immediately to quell it. Major Ochterlony came home that day a little excited by the news, and still more by the certainty that it was he who must take the command. He was excited because he was a soldier at heart, and liked, kind man as he was, to see something doing; and because active service was more hopeful and exhilarating and profitable than reposing at the station, where there was no danger and very little to do. "I don't venture to hope that the rogues will show fight," he said cheerfully; "so there is no need to be anxious, Mary: and you can keep the boys with you till I come back-that is only fair," he said, in his exultation. As for Mary, the announcement took all the colour out of her cheeks, and drove both Hugh and Islav out of her mind. He had seen service enough, it is true, since they were married, to habituate her to that sort of thing; and she had made, on the whole, a very good soldier's wife, bearing her anxiety in silence, and keeping a brave front to the world. But perhaps Mr. Sorbette was right when he thought her nerves were upset. So many things all coming together may have been too much for her. When she heard of this she broke down altogether, and felt a cold thrill of terror go through her from her head to her heart, or from her heart to her head, which perhaps would be the most just expression: but she dared not say a word to her husband to deter or discourage him. When he saw the two tears that sprang into her eyes, and the sudden paleness that came over her face, he kissed her, all flushed and smiling as he was, and said: "Now, don't be silly, Mary. Don't forget you are a soldier's wife." There was not a touch of despondency or foreboding about him; and what could she say who knew, had there been ever so much foreboding, that his duty was the thing to be thought of, and not anybody's feelings? Her cheek did not regain its colour all that day, but she kept it to herself, and forgot even about little Hugh's reprieve. The children were dear, but their father was dearer, or at least so it seemed at that moment. Perhaps if the lives of the little ones had been threatened, the Major's expedition might have bulked smaller-for the heart can hold only one overwhelming emotion at a time. But the affair was urgent, and Mary did not have very much time left to her to think of it. Almost before she had realised what it was, the drums had beat, and the brisk music of the band—that music that people called exhilarating-had roused all the station, and the measured march of the men had sounded past as if they were all treading upon her heart. The Major kissed his little boys in their beds, for it was, to be sure, unnaturally early, as everything is in India: and he had made his wife promise to go and lie down, and take care of herself, when he was gone. "Have the baby, and don't think any more of me than you can help, and take care of my boys. We shall be back sooner than you want us," the Major had said, as he took tender leave of his "bonnie Mary." And for her part she stood as long as she could see them, with her two white lips pressed tight together, waving her hand to her soldier till he was gone and out of sight. And then she obeyed him, and lay down and covered her head and sobbed to herself in the growing light, as the big blazing sun began to touch the horizon.

She was sick with pain and terror, and she could not tell why. She had watched him go away before, and had hailed him coming back again, and had known him in hotter conflict thau this could be, and wounded, and yet he had taken no great harm. But all that did her little good now: perhaps because her nerves were weaker than usual, from the repeated shocks she had had to bear.

And it was to be expected that Mrs. Kirkman would come to see her, to console her that morning, and put the worst thoughts into her head. But before even Mrs. Kirkman, little Emma Askell came rushing in, with her baby and a bundle, and threw herself at Mary's feet. The Ensign had gone to the wars, and it was the first experience of such a kind that had fallen to the lot of his little babywife; and naturally her anxiety told more distinetly upon her than it did upon Mary's ripe soul and frame. The poor little thing was white and cold and shivering, notwithstanding the blazing Indian day that began to lift itself over their heads. She fell down at Mary's feet, forgetting all about the beetles and scorpions which were the horror of her ordinary existence, and clasped her knees, and held Mrs. Ochterlony fast, grasping the bundle and the little waxen baby at the same time in the other

"Do you think they will ever come back?" said poor little Emma. "Oh, Mrs. Ochterlony, tell me. I can bear it if you will tell me the worst. If anything were to happen to Charlie, and me not with him! I never, never, never can live until the news comes. Oh, tell me, do you think they will ever come back?"

"If I did not think they would come back, do you think I could take it so quietly?" said Mary; and she smiled as best she could, and lifted up the poor little girl, and took from her the baby and the bundle, which seemed all one, so closely were they held. Mrs. Ochterlony had deep eyes, which did not show when she had been crying; and she was not young enough to cry in thunder showers, as Emma Askell at eighteen might still be permitted to do; and the very sight of her soothed the young creature's heart. "You know you are a soldier's wife," Mary said; "I think I was as bad as you are the first time the Major left mo—but we all get used to it after a few years."

"And he came back?" said Emma, doing all she could to choke a sob.

"He must have come back, or I should not have parted with him this morning," said Mrs. Ochterlony, who had need of all her own strength just at that moment. "Let us see in the meantime what this bundle is, and why you have brought poor baby out in her night-gown. And what a jewel she is to sleep! When my little Willy gets disturbed," said Mary, with a sigh, "he gives none of us any rest. I will make up a bed for her here on the sofa; and now tell me what this bundle is for, and why you have rushed out half dressed. We'll talk about them presently. Tell me first about yourself."

Upon which Emma hung her pretty little head, and began to fold a hem upon her damp hand-kerchief, and did not know how to explain herself. "Don't be angry with me," she said. "Oh, my Madonna, let me come and stay with you!—that was what I meant; I can't stay there by myself—and I will nurse Willy, and do your hair and help sewing. I don't mind what I do. Oh, Mrs. Ochterlony, don't send me away! I should die if I was alone. And as for baby, she never troubles anybody. She is so good. I will be your little servant and wait upon you like a slave, if you will only let me stay."

It would be vain to say that Mrs. Ochterlony was pleased by this appeal, for she was herself in a very critical state of mind, full of fears that she could give no reason for, and a hundred fantastic pains which she would fain have hidden from human sight. She had been taking a little comfort in the thought of the solitude, the freedom from visitors and disturbance, that she might safely reckon on, and in which she thought her mind might perhaps recover a little; and this young creature's society was not specially agreeable to her. But she was touched by the looks of the forlorn girl, and could no more have sent her away than she could repress the little movement of impatience and half disgust that rose in her heart. She was not capable of giving her any effusive welcome; but she kissed poor little Emma, and put the bundle beside the baby on the sofa, and accepted her visitor without saying anything about it. Perhaps it did her no harm: though she felt by moments as if her impatient longing to be alone and silent, and free to think her own thoughts, would break out in spite of all her self-control. But little Mrs. Askell never suspected the existence of any such emotions. She thought, on the contrary, that it was because Mary was used to it that she took it so quietly, and wondered whether she would ever get used to it. Perhaps, on the whole, Emma hoped not. She thought to herself that Mrs. Ochterlony, who was so little disturbed by the parting, would not feel the joy of the return half so much as she should; and on these terms she preferred to take the despair along with the joy. But under the shadow of Mary's matronly presence the little thing cheered up, and got back her courage. After she had been comforted with tea, and had fully realised her position as Mrs. Ochterlony's visitor, Emma's spirits rose. She was half or quarter Irish, as has been already mentioned, and behaved herself accordingly. She recollected her despair, it is true, in the midst of a game with Hugh and Islay, and cried a little, but soon comforted herself with the thought that at that moment her Charlie could be in no danger. "They'll be stopping somewhere for breakfast by a well, and camping all about, and they can't get any harm there," said Emma: and thus she kept on chattering all day. If she had chattered only, and been content with chattering, it would have been comparatively easy work; but then she was one of those people who require answers, and will be spoken to. And Mary had to listen and reply, and give her opinion where they would be now, and when, at the very earliest, they might be expected back. With such a discipline to undergo, it may be thought a supererogation to bring Mrs. Kirkman in upon her that same morning with her handkerchief in her hand, prepared, if it was necessary, to weep with Mary. But still it is the case that Mrs. Kirkman did come, as might have been expected; and to pass over conversation so edifying as hers, would, under such circumstances, be almost a crime.

"My dear Mary," Mrs. Kirkman said when she came in, "I am so glad to see you up and making an effort: it is so much better than giving way. We must accept these trials as something sent us for our good. I am sure the Major has all our prayers for his safe return. Oh, Mary, do you not remember what I said to you-that God, I was sure, was not going to leave you alone?"

"I never thought He would leave me alone," said Mrs. Ochterlony; but certainly, though it was a right enough sentiment, it was not uttered in a

"He will not rest till you see your duty more clearly," said her visitor; "if it were not for that, why should He have sent you so many things one after another? It is far better and more blessed than if he had made you happy and comfortable as the carnal heart desires. But I did not see you had any one with you," said Mrs. Kirkman, stopping short at the sight of Emma, who had just come into the

"Poor child, she was frightened and unhappy, aud came to me this morning," said Mary. "She will stay with me-till-they come home."

"Let us say, if they come home," said Mrs. Kirkman, solemnly. "I never like to be too certain. We know when they go forth, but who can tell when they will come back? That is in God's hands."

At this speech Emma fell trembling and shivering again, and begged Mrs. Kirkman to tell her the worst, and cried out that she could bear it. She thought of nothing but her Charlie, as was natural, and that the Colonel's wife had already heard some bad news. And Mrs. Kirkman thought of nothing but improving the occasion; and both of them were equally indifferent and indeed unaware of the cold shudder which went through Mary, and the awful foreboding that closed down upon her, putting out the sunshine. It was a little safeguard to her to support the shivering girl who already half believed herself a widow, and to take up the challenge of the spiritual teacher who felt herself responsible for their souls.

"Do not make Emma think something is wrong," she said. "It is so easy to make a young creature wretched with a word. If the Colonel had been with them, it might have been different. But it is you do not mean it." And then Mary had to whisper in the young wife's ear, "She knows nothing about them-it is only her way," which was a thing very easily said to Emma, but very difficult to establish herself upon in her own heart.

And then Mrs. Hesketh came in to join the

"So they are gone," the new comer said. "What a way little Emma is in, to be sure. Is it the first time he has ever left you, my dear? and I daresay they have been saying something dreadful to frighten you. It is a great shame to let girls marry so young. I have been reckoning," said the easy-minded woman, whose husband was also of the party, "how long they are likely to be. If they get to Amberabad, say to-morrow, and if there is nothing very serious, and all goes well, you know, they might be back here on Saturday-and we had an engagement for Saturday," Mrs. Hesketh said. Her voice was quite casy and pleasant, as it always was; but nevertheless, Mary knew that if she had not felt excited, she would not have paid such an early morning visit, and that even her confident calculation about the return proved she was in a little anxiety about it. The fact was, that none of them were quite at their ease, except Mrs. Kirkman, who, having no personal interest in the matter, was quite equal to taking a very gloomy view of

"How can any one think of such vanities at such a moment?" Mrs. Kirkman said. "Oh. if I only could convince you, my dear friends. None of us can tell what sort of engagement they may have before next Saturday-perhaps the most solemn engagement ever given to man. Don't let misfortune find you in this unprepared state of mind. There is nothing on earth so solemn as seeing soldiers go away. You may think of the band and all that, but for me, I always seem to hear a voice saying, 'Prepare to meet your God.'"

To be sure the Colonel was in command of the station and was safe at home, and his wife could speculate calmly upon the probable fate of the detachment. But as for the three women who were listening to her, it was not so easy for them. There was a dreadful pause, for nobody could contradict such a speech; and poor little Emma dropped down sobbing on the floor; and the colour forsook even Mrs. Hesketh's comely cheek; and as for Mary, though she could not well be paler, her heart seemed to contract and shrink within her; and none of them had the courage to say anything. Naturally Mrs. Hesketh, with whom it was a principle not to fret, was the first to recover her

"After all, though it's always an anxious time, I don't see any particular reason we have to be uneasy," she said. "Hesketh told me he felt sure they would give in at once. It may be very true all you say, but at the same time we may be reasonable, you know, and not take fright when easy just now for you to frighten us. I am sure there is no cause for it. Don't cry, Emma, you little goose; you'll have him back again iu two or three days, all right."

And after awhile the anxious little assembly broke up, and Mrs. Hesketh, who though she was very liberal in her way, was not much given to personal charities, went to see some of the soldiers' wives, who, poor souls, would have been just as anxious if they had had the time for it, and gave them the best advice about their children, and promised tea and sugar if they would come to fetch it, and old frocks, in which she was always rich; and these women were so ungrateful as to like her visit better than that of the Colonel's wife, who carried them always on her heart and did them a great deal of good, and never confined herself to kindnesses of impulse. And little Emma Askell cried herself to sleep sitting on the floor, notwithstanding the beetles, reposing her pretty face flushed with weeping and her swollen eyes upon the sofa, where Mary sat and watched over her. Mrs. Hesketh got a little ease out of her visit to the soldiers' wives, and Emma forgot her troubles in sleep; but no sort of relief came to Mary, who reasoned with herself all day long without being able to deliver herself from the pressure of the deadly cold hand that seemed to have been laid upon her heart.

AND Mary's forebodings came true. Though it was so unlikely, and indeed seemed so unreasonable to everybody who knew about such expeditions, instead of bringing back his men victorious, it was the men, all drooping and discouraged, who carried back the brave and tender Major, covered over with the flag he had died for. The whole station was overcast with mourning when that melancholy procession came back. Mr. Churchill, who met them coming in, hurried back with his heart swelling up into his throat to prepare Mrs. Ochterlony for what was coming; but Mary was the only creature at the station who did not need to be prepared. She knew it was going to be so when she saw him go away. She felt in her heart that this was to be the end of it from the moment when he first told her of the expedition on which he was ordered. And when she saw poor Mr. Churchill's face, from which he had vainly tried to banish the traces of the horrible shock he had just received, she saw that the blow had fallen. She came up to him and took hold of his hands, and said, "I know what it is:" and almost felt, in the strange and terrible excitement of the moment, as if she were sorry for him who felt it so much.

This was how it was, and all the station was struck with mourning. A chance bullet, which most likely had been fired without any purpose at all, had done its appointed office in Major Ochterlony's brave, tender, honest bosom. Though he had been foolish enough by times, nobody now thought of that to his disadvantage. Rather, if anything, it surrounded him with a more affec-perished and not left such a gap behind them as the Major did, who had been good to everybody in his restless way, and given a great deal of trouble. and made up for it, as only a man with a good heart and natural gift of friendliness could do. He had worried his men many a time as the Colonel never did, for example: but then, to Major Ochterlony they were men and fine fellows, while they were only machines, like himself, to Colonel Kirkman: and more than one critic in regimentals was known to say with a sigh, "If it had only been the Colonel." But it was only the fated man who had been so over careful about his wife's fate in case anything happened to him. Young Askell came by stealth like a robber to take his little wife out of the house where Mary was not capable any longer of her society; and Captain Hesketh too had come back all safe-all of them except the one: and the women in their minds stood round Mary in a kind of hushed circle, looking with an awful fellowfeeling and almost self-reproach at the widowhood which might have, but had not, fallen upon themselves. It was no fault of theirs that she had to bear the cross for all of them as it were; and yet their hearts ached over her, as if somehow they had purchased their own exemption at her expense. When the first dark moment, during which nobody saw the Madonna Mary-a sweet title, which had come back to all their lips in the hour of troublewas over, they took turus to be with her, those grieved and compunctious women - compunctious not so much because at one time in thought they had done her wrong, as because now they were happy and she was sorrowful. And thus passed over a time that cannot be described in a book, or at least in such a book as this. Mary had to separate herself, with still the bloom of her life unimpaired, from all the fair company of matrons round her; to put the widow's veil over the golden reflections in her hair, and the faint colour that came faintly back to her cheek by imprescriptible right of her health and comparative youth, and to go away out of the high-road of life where she had been wayfaring in trouble and in happiness, to one of those humble by-ways where the feeble and broken take shelter. Heaven knows she did not think of that. All that she thought of was her dead soldier who had gone away in the bloom of his days to the unknown darkness which God alone knows the secrets of, who had left all his comrades uninjured and at peace behind him, and had himself been the only one to answer for that enterprise with his life. It is strange to see this wonderful selection going on in the world, even when one has no immediate part in it; but stranger, far stranger, to wake up from one's musings and feel all at once that it is one's-self whom God has laid his hand upon for this stern purpose. The wounded creature may writhe upon the sword, but it is of no use; and again as ever, those who are not woundedthose perhaps for whose instruction the spectacle is tionate regret. A dozen wise men might have made-draw round in a hushed circle and look on.

Mary Ochterlony was a dutiful woman, obedient and submissive to God's will; and she gave no occasion to that circle of spectators to break up the hush and awe of natural sympathy and criticisc her how she bore it. But after a while she came to perceive, what everybody comes to perceive who has been in such a position, that the sympathy had changed its character. That was natural too. How a man bears death and suffering of body, has long been one of the favourite objects of primitive human curiosity; and to see how anguish and sorrow affect the mind is a study as exciting and still more interesting. It was this that roused Mrs. Ochterlony out of her first stupor, and made her decide so soon as she did upon her journey home.

All these events had passed in so short a time, that there were many people who on waking up in the morning and recollecting that Mary and her children were going next day, could scarcely realise that the fact was possible, or that it could be true about the Major, who had so fully intended sending his little boys home by that same mail. But it is on the whole astonishing how soon and how calmly a death is accepted by the general community; and even the people who asked themselves could this change really have happened in so short a time, took pains an hour or two after to make up little parcels for friends at home which Mary was to carry; bits of Oriental embroidery and filagree ornaments, and little portraits of the children, and other trifles that were not important enough to warrant an Overland parcel, or big enough to go by the Cape. Mary was very kind in that way, they all said. She accepted all kinds of commissions, perhaps without knowing very well what she was doing, and promised to go and see people whom she had no likelihood of ever going to see: the truth was, that she heard and saw and understood only partially, sometimes rousing up for a moment and catching one word or one little incident with the intensest distinctness, and then relapsing back again into herself. She did not quite make out what Emma Askell was saying the last time her little friend came to see her. Mary was packing her boys' things at the moment, and much occupied with a host of cares, and what she heard was only a stream of talk, broken with the occasional burden which came in like a chorus, "when you see mamma."

"When I see mamma?" said Mary, with a little surprise.

"Dear Mrs. Ochterlony, you said you would perhaps go to see her—in St. John's Wood," said Emma, with tears of vexation in her eyes; "you know I told you all about it. The Laburuums, Acacia Road. And she will be so glad to see you. I explained it all, and you said you would go. I told her how kind you had been to me, and how you let me stay with you when I was so anxious about Charlie. Oh, dear Mrs. Ochterlony, forgive me! I did not mean to bring it back to your mind."

"No," said Mary, with a kind of forlorn amuse. Mr. Churchill once more felt the climbing sorrow in ment. It seemed so strange, almost droll, that they his throat, and said in broken words, "Don't cry—should think any of their poor little passing words would bring that back to her which was never once out of her mind, nor other than the centre of all her thoughts. "I must have been dreaming when I said so, Emma; but if I have promised, I will try to go—I have nothing to do in London, you know—I am going to the North-country, among my own people," which was an easier form of expression than to say, as they all did, that she was going home.

"But everybody goes to London," insisted Emma; and it was only when Mr. Churchill came in, also with a little packet, that the ensign's wife was silenced. Mr. Churchill's parcel was for his mother who lived in Yorkshire, naturally, as Mrs. Ochterlony was going to the North, quite in her way. But the clergyman, for his part, had something more important to say. When Mrs. Askell was gone, he stopped Mary in her packing to speak to her seriously as he said, "You will forgive me and feel for me, I know," he said. "It is about your second marriage, Mrs. Ochterlony."

"Don't speak of it—oh, don't speak of it," Mary said, with an imploring tone that went to his heart

"But I ought to speak of it—if you can bear it," said Mr. Churchill, "and I know for the boys' sake that you can bear everything. I have brought an extract from the register, if you would like to have it; and I have added below—"

."Mr. Churchill, you are very kind, but I don't want ever to think of that," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "I don't want to recollect now that such a thing ever took place—I wish all record of it would disappear from the face of the earth. Afterwards he thought the same," she said, hurriedly. Meanwhile Mr. Churchill stood with the paper half drawn from his pocket-book, watching the changes of her face.

"It shall be as you like," he said, slowly, "but only as I have written below——If you change your mind, you have only to write to me, my dear Mrs. Ochterlony—if I stay here—and I am sure I don't know if I shall stay here; but in case I don't, you can always learn where I am, from my mother at that address."

"Do you think you will not stay here?" said Mary, whose heart was not so much absorbed in her own sorrows that she could not feel for the dismayed desponding mind that made itself apparent in the poor clergyman's voice.

"I don't know," he said, in the dreary tones of a man who has little choice, "with our large family, and my wife's poor health——I shall miss you dreadfully—both of you: you can't think how cheery and hearty he always was—and that to a down-hearted man like me——"

And then Mary sat down and cried. It went to her heart and dispersed all her heaviness and stupor, and opened the great sealed fountains. And Mr. Churchill once more felt the climbing sorrow in his throat, and said in broken words, "Don't cry—

God will take care of you. He knows why He has done it, though we don't; and He has given his own word to be a father to the boys."

That was all the poor priest could find it in his heart to say-but it was better than a sermon-and he went away with the extract from the register still in his pocket-book and tears in his eyes; while for her part Mary finished her packing with a heart relieved by her tears. Ah, how cheery and hearty he had been, how kind to the down-hearted man; how different the stagnant quietness now from that cheerful commotion he used to make, and all the restless life about him; and then his favourite words seemed to come up about and surround her, flitting in the air with a sensation between acute torture and a dull happiness. His bonnie Mary! It was not any vanity on Mary's part that made her think above all of that name. Thus she did her packing and got ready for her voyage, and took the good people's commissions without knowing very well to what it was that she pledged herself; and it was the same mail-"the mail after next"-by which she had written to Aunt Agatha that Hugh was to be sent home.

They would all have come to see her off if they could have ventured to do it that last morning: but themen prevented it, who are good for something now and then in such cases. As it was, however, Mrs. Kirkman and Mrs. Hesketh and Emma Askell were there, and poor sick Mrs. Churchill, who had stolen from her bed in her dressing-gown to kiss Mary for the last time. "Oh, my dear, if it had been meoh, if it had only been me !--and you would all have been so good to the poor children," sobbed the poor clergyman's ailing wife. Yet it was not her, but the strong, brave, cheery Major, the prop and pillar of a house. As for Mrs. Kirkman, there never was a better proof that she was, as we have so often said, in spite of her talk, a good woman, than the fact that she could only cry helplessly over Mary, and had not a word to say. She had thought and prayed that God would not leave her friend alone, but she had not meant Him to go so far as this; and her heart ached and fluttered at the terrible notion that perhaps she had something to do with the striking of this terrible blow. Mrs. Hesketh for her part packed every sort of dainties for the children in a basket, and strapped on a bundle of portable toys to amuse them on the journey to one of Mrs. Ochterlony's boxes. "You will be glad of them before you get there," said the experienced woman, who had once made the journey with half-a-dozen, as she said, and knew what it was. And then one or two of the men were walking about outside in an accidental sort of way, to have a last look of Mary. was considered a very great thing among them all when the doctor, who hated to see people in trouble, and disapproved of crying on principle, made up his mind to go in and shake hands with Mrs. Ochterlony; but it was not that he went for, but to look at the baby, and give Mary a little case "with some sal volatile and so forth, and the quantities marked," from her brother-in-law, Francis, full of sympathy he said, "not that you are one to want sal volatile. The little shaver there will be all right as soon as you get to England. Good-bye. Take care of yourself." And he wrung her hand and bolted out again like a flash of lightning. He said afterwards that the only sensible thing he knew of his sister, was that she did not go; and that the sight of all those women crying was enough to give a man a sunstroke, not to speak of the servants and the soldiers' wives who were howling at the back of the house.

Oh, what a change it was in so short a time, to go out of the Indian home, which had been a true home. with Mr. Churchill to take care of her and her poor babies, and set her face to the cold far-away world of her youth which she had forgotten, and which everybody called home by a kind of mockery; and where was Hugh, who had always taken such care of his own? Mary did not cry as people call crying, but now and then, two great big hot tears rolled out of the bitter fountain that was full to overflowing, and fell scalding on her hands, and gave her a momentary sense of physical relief. Almost all the ladies of the station were ill after it all the day: but Mary could not afford to be ill; and Mr. Churchill was very kind, and went with her through all the first part of her journey over the cross roads, until she had come into the trunk road, where there was no more difficulty. He was very, very kind, and she was very grateful; but yet perhaps when you have had some one of your very own to do everything for you, who was not kind but did it by nature, it is better to take to doing it yourself after. than have even the best of friends to do it for kindness' sake. This was what Mary felt when the good man had gone sadly back to his sick wife and his uncertain lot. It was a kind of relief to her to be all alone, entirely alone with her children, for the Ayah, to be sure, did not count-and to have everything to do; and this was how they came down mournfully to the sea-board, and to the big town which filled Hugh and Islay with childish enjoyment, and Mary bade an everlasting farewell to her life, to all that she had actually known as life-and got to sea, to go, as they said, home.

It would be quite useless for our purpose to go over the details of the voyage, which was like other voyages, bad and good by turns. When she was at sea, Mrs. Ochterlony had a little leisure, and felt ill and weak and overworn, and was the better for it after. It took her mind for the moment off that unmeasured contemplation of her sorrow which is the soul of grief, and her spirit got a little strength in the interval of repose. She had been twelve years in India, and from eighteen to thirty is a wonderful leap in a life. She did not know how she was to find the things and the people of whom she had a girl's innocent recollection. Nor how they, who had not changed, would appear to her changed eyes. Her own people were very kind, like everybody. Mary found a letter at Gibraltar and friendly offers. He asked her to come to Earlston with her boys to see if they could not get on together. "Perhaps it might not do, but it would be worth a trial," Mr. Ochterlony sensibly said; and there was even a chance that Aunt Agatha, who was to have met Hugh at Southampton, would come to meet her widowed niece, who might be supposed to stand still more in need of her good offices. Though indeed this was rather an addition to Mary's cares; for she thought the moment of landing would be bitter enough of itself, without the pain of meeting with some one who belonged to her, and yet did not belong to her, and who had doubtless grown as much out of the Aunt Agatha of old as she had grown out of the little Mary. When Mrs. Ochterlony left the North-country, Aunt Agatha had been a middle-aged maiden lady, still pretty, though a little faded, with light hair growing gray, which makes a woman's countenance, already on the decline, more faded still, and does not bring out the tints as dark hair in the same powdery condition sometimes does. And at that time she was still occupied by a thought of possibilities which people who knew Agatha Seton from the time she was sixteen had decided at that early period to be impossible. No doubt twelve years had changed this-and it must have made a still greater change upon the little sister whom Mary had known only at six years old, and who was now eighteen, the age she had herself been when she married; a grown-up young woman, and of a character more decided than Mary's had ever been.

A little stir of reviving life awoke in her, when the weary journey was over, and the steamboat at length had reached Southampton, to go up to the deck and look from beneath the heavy penthouse taken home.

of her widow's veil at the strangers who were coming-to see, as she said to herself, with a throb at her heart, if there was anybody she knew. Aunt Agatha was not rich, and it was a long journey, and perhaps she had not come. Mary stood on the crowded deck, a little apart, with Hugh and Islay on each side of her, and the baby in his nurse's arms—a group such as is often seen on these decks-all clad with loss and mourning coming "home" to a country in which perhaps they have no longer any home. Nobody came to claim Mrs. Ochterlony as she stood among her little children. She thought she would have been glad of it, but when it came to the moment-when she saw the cold unknown shore and the strange country, and not a Christian soul to say welcome, poor Mary's heart sank. She sat down, for her strength was failing her, and drew Hugh and Islay close to her, to keep her from breaking down altogether. And it was just at that moment that the brightest of young faces peered down under her veil and looked doubtfully, anxiously at her, and called out impatiently, "Aunt Agatha!" to some one at the other side, without speaking to Mary. Mrs. Ochterlony did not hear this new-comer's equally impatient demand: "Is it Mary? Are those the children?" for she had dropped her sick head upon a soft old breast, and had an old fresh sweet faded face bent down upon her, levely with love and age and a pure heart. "Cry, my dear love, cry, it will do you good," was all that Aunt Agatha said. And she cried, too, with good will, and yet did not know whether it was for sorrow or joy. This was how Mary, coming back to a fashion of existence which she knew not, was

THE ENDS OF LIFE.

Up to the time at which I write (it is necessary to be cautious in these rapid days), believe no one has ever succeeded in producing blue dahlia. Supposing some one were to become fanatical—fanaticus, or possessed—upon the subject, and give up his time and energies to the production of a blue dahlia, heroically casting away common pleasures and common gains, what should we think of him?

There was a witness before a Committee of the House of Commons who, being asked if he knew anything of drainage matters, replied, with indignation, "I should think I ought to know, for I've given my mind to sewers night and day for fifty years." Even supposing the malodorous devotion of this person had brought him profit, the world would praise him; having made up its mind that the study of the sewage question is within the circle of philanthropic labour.

Yet it is not always easy to determine when the energetic pursuit of any of the Ends of Life, common or uncommon, is praiseworthy. There must always remain over, when moral criticism has done its best, a large number of cases in which we can only trust our instincts (as we call them) to decide for us; and a large, perhaps a larger number, in which no decision at all can be come to. It is particularly disagreeable to the ill-trained mind to be told that it cannot "settle" anything; but, after all, it is scarcely possible to increase knowledge without increasing sorrow; though, to be sure, increase of misknowledge constantly increases self-satisfaction and uncharitable positiveness.

The whole question of the Ends of Life is, in truth, one of extreme difficulty. All the received commonplaces about ambition, wealth, fame, and the rest, break down under the pressure of conscientious analysis. You must read between the lines to make sense of them at all; and, even when they have become intelligible, you are stopped in the application of them to individual cases by the total impossibility of seeing into the individual soul. Let us, by degrees, endeavour to make our way through the intricacies of the subject. And let us begin by finding out where the difficulty is. We all know Paley said his great trouble as a teacher at college was to make his class understand the difficulty he wished to explain to them—the solution people take to easily enough, for the most part.

When a railway king has exploded before all the world, there is no scruple, on any hand, in repudiating and condemning him. Nor am I going to rest in the cynical commonplace about success, which is basely false as to its spirit, however plausibly supported. But suppose a commonplace man, with no particular character, to have set himself the task of achieving fortune, and to have succeeded, what have the commonplaces to say to him? Chiefly, that his ambition was an unworthy one, and that quite irrespectively of any use to which he puts the money he has acquired.

But now take a case like that of the late Mr. Samuel Budgett, of Bristol, who is held up in memoirs as a model man. It is quite plain that he belonged, as far as the ostensible aim of his life was concerned, to the same type as any railway king you like to name. He was a good man, measured by whatever standard is likely to be brought into court; but his speciality was the instinct of getting—that desire to possess, and to accumulate, which is the basis of the merchant-character. Supposing our railway king to be honest, there is no radical difference between him and Mr. Budgett of Bristol. They are both, by instinct and practice, getters and accumulators of material wealth; and the same commonplaces apply to both.

But with what sort of application? When I was a little fellow, a man was going on, in my presence, with these commonplaces, and pouring great contempt on "the wealth, and science, and wisdom of the world." I greatly angered him by saying, "Then, Mr. S-, what do you wear that Macintosh for?" Shortly afterwards he showed, with apparent pleasure, some new china which he had been buying. Once more I attacked him, and asked him how he could consistently take pleasure in what came from the potteries in which so much of the "wealth and science of this world" was sunk. The end of it was that I was turned out of the room crying, but utterly unable to see what wrong I had done, till an aged dependent of the household, to whom I flew for comfort, said: "My dear, you take people at a nonplush so, and they don't like it." But surely the way to get at the truth upon any subject whatever is to take the question "at a nonplush," if you can. We are all interested in promoting unmercifulness of that description, and may as well make this one of our opportunities.

la One of the Ends of Life that is talked about with of h glibness by people who do not care to see that their words stand for precise ideas, is ambition. Usually, I suppose, ambition means love of power. This is a matter upon which I have no sympathetic feeling to guide me; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that there have been, and still are, and (it is said) always will be, men who like to rule, -who find their bighest pleasure in controlling the wills of others. The instinct of the genuine statesman must be a case in point; and, partly so, the instinct of the conqueror. But the latter is a very complex case, for the soldier may become a conqueror by the mere force of circumstances, without making conquest (of territory) his aim. The taste for statesmanship, too, may be a very different thing, as it exists in different natures. We all remember the passage in "In Memoriam," in which the singer expresses his certainty that his friend would have chosen for himself the career of the statesman-"a life in civic action warm." But nobody supposes that the motives of Arthur Hallam would have been the same as those of Bonaparte, or even those of Pitt, Walpole, or Warren Hastings. The items that would go to make up the character of the model statesman are not difficult of enumeration:-the love of "combinations;" knowledge of human nature; delight in human sympathy; the desire to employ the knowledge and catch the delight by dealing with masses rather than individuals; physical and moral courage; a fine conscience; a kind heart; a vivid will; a persuasive wit,-and so forth. A man with these characteristics will naturally gravitate towards statesmanship as a carrière; and any design that, in that consequence, he takes deeply to heart, will become to him an End of Life. It is quite clear that he may (conceivably) exercise his natural function without having the love of power at all-except as a means of doing good. It is also conceivable that the love of dealing with masses of human interests may carry into statesmanship men who have neither love of power in any selfish sense, nor yet love of doing good. There are people who take to politics just as others take to farming, or pigeon-fancying; and who are, in so doing, neither moral nor immoral, so far as the spirit is concerned in which they act.

In the same way,—to go back for a moment, not without a logical purpose,—there are men who take to mercantile pursuits with as little "motive" as others take to cultivating tulips: they like active social intercourse; they enjoy the cross-play of brain which is necessary in the exchange of commodities; and they find an instinctive pleasure in getting-even though they spend directly what they gaiu. I have known several men who have been great gainers and great spendthrifts at the same time. I have in my eye, while writing these lines, a gentleman whose genius for exchange might have made a Baring or a Rothschild of him, if he had not spent fortunes as fast as he made them. Then, again, he makes them as fast as he spends them: be does it instinctively; just as a beaver will build an its dam as often as you knock it down. The winning of the money is, in and for itself, an end, without the least regard to keeping it or getting rid of it.*

The question of love of power, pure and simple, is not, for me, an easy one. Certainly it exists: it is one of the most powerful of common metives; and, where it is exercised to the injury of others, there is no difficulty felt about condemning it. But, no doubt, persons exist who feel as blind, as unmoral a pleasure, in controlling the conduct of their fellow-creatures, as a squirrel in turning his wheel, or a magpie in hiding a spoon. All that can be said about such cases is, that the pleasure is a dangerous one, and needs more, not less, than some others, to be enjoyed in the light of conscience, because it bears directly and immediately on one's relations with other people.

Strictly speaking, there is no object of human pursuit which can be made absolutely unmoral. I do not want to fall into trivialities of illustration. but there is no use in a principle which will not bear extreme weights, and survive being "taken at a nonplush." Supposing, then, that a man could produce a blue dahlia in absolute isolation from all other human ends and interests, he could not escape the law which, sooner or later, takes up everything into the sphere of right or wrong. His blue dahlia would produce some result, in which some human being would be concerned at some time. We all know what the little desert flower said to Mungo Park, whose eyes were perhaps the first and the last that ever beheld it. But we can push the matter beyond even the blue dahlia. Call up in imagination the intentness of labour with which the prehistoric savage whittled away at his flint arrowhead, or stone necklace, the production of the proper article being to him as much an ideal as the dome of St. Peter's to Michael Angelo, Fonthill to Beckford, or the suppression of Bornese piracy to Rajah Brooke. And then remember how the poor silly "unmoral" arrow-head turns up to-day, and finds itself mingled with the highest and the deepest of human thoughts and feelings. One need not push this: obviously the most indifferent tail in one of Cuyp's cows might have remote threads of moral relation.

Looking at the subject broadly, we may be content with saying that the purposes of God are worked out by every individual human creature following his special bent, under two limitations:—(1.) He must not permit his own ardours to make him unsubmissive to such disappointments as, coming after he has done his best, must be treated by him as discipline: and (2.) he must not deprive others of their rights. These are positive, primordial limitations, without which no pursuit can be called innocent. That is all. But, of course, it is an ignoble life which is wholly taken up with energetic effort for which nothing more can be said than that it is just beyond the pale of damnatory criticism. There is a vast difference between the man who gives his days and nights to blue dahlias, and the man who gives his days and nights to seeking a cure for consumption. The blue-dahlia man must be tolerated; not only because we have no right to interfere with the thing that does not hurt us, -no right to try to compel a fellow-creature to our ideal of goodness,but for another reason, which may be thus stated:-The displeasure excited in our minds by the bluedahlia man comes of our seeing that he has not sufficient intensity of nature to place him in voluntary harmony with the Morale which interpenetrates all things, whether we will or no. If we interfere by compulsion, we not only cannot tell what injury we shall do in so violating an elementary postulate of duty, but, also, we may (and sometimes do) cross the track of the laws by which that Morale works out its own ends without consulting us. God, in his beaven, says,-"All shall be moral, and your folly, as well as your wrath, shall praise Me." And so it befalls. Alchemy, then Chemistry. But there is more behind. For who knows what object of pursuit is trivial and what is not? The production of a blue dahlia, or a pigeon that can be drawn through a wedding-ring, or a pictorial history of the world in tent-stitch? Very likely. But what would have been the consequence, if it had been in the power of parents, teachers, rulers, and popular sentiment, to enforce its frequent command -Put away that nonsense and do something useful? How many young people have been told by their parents that prose, and poetry, and painting, and mathematics, were nonsense, and bidden to put away the book; the pen, the pencil, and yet have afterwards become kings of thought and benefactors in art! How many great discoverers have been scouted for the uselessness of their pursuits! How many martyrs, prophets, sages, philauthropists, have had the ends for which they lived treated as if those ends were of as little account as a blue dahlia!

So, then, we perceive that the human race would be an infinite loser if it could forcibly put down all strenuous effort of which it did not see the value—an infinite loser of direct, ponderable, estimable, practical results. But is that all? By no means; it would lose in another way: for unjust compulsion is destructive of moral power in the compelled, whatever may be the point to which the compulsion is directed. And here we are approaching a very interesting part of the subject.

You have heard of Bernard Palissy, the Huguenot potter. You know of his struggles, for many, many years of poverty and sorrow, to discover the enamel. You know he made furnace-fuel of the chairs, the tables, the house-flooring. Domestic trouble did not stop him:—his children died (six of them); his wife complained and scolded; the neighbours abused him. His trade he pursued only by fit and starts, when the needs of the home compelvi-him; he sweated at his furnace till the garters used to slide off his dwindled legs. All men condemned him, and tried to make him give up. It is the way of the world, you know! But, in spite of what people say with their tongues, in spite of the gossip of society, men and women cannot help having, at the bottoms of their souls, a little spark of sympathy with heroic effort. The meanest of them may be, at times, quickened into a suspicion that there is more in the case than they quite see. Whatever wrong there was in the noble persistence of Job, the wrath of God was kindled, not against him, but against the friends who had misunderstood and slandered him-as well as impeached, by the implications of their blunders, the whole spirit of the Divine policy. Human beings mostly stop at talk in cases of unintelligible heroism-and Palissy went on with his furnace-work. "My credit was taken away from me, and I was regarded as a madman. Under these scandals I pined away, and slipped with bowed head through the streets, like a man put to shame. I was in debt in several places, and had two children at nurse, unable to pay the nurses. Men said, 'It is right for him to die of hunger, seeing he left off following his trade.' But when I had dwelt with my regrets a little, because there was no one who had pity upon me, I said to my soul, 'Wherefore art thou saddened? Labour now, and the defamers will live to be ashamed." Yes, you all know that marvellous story, and how, at the last, Palissy won, and the defamers were at least silenced by the successes in which the struggle ended. But many of us have paused on the dreadful crisis of the narrative, to ask, Was Palissy right, to go on at such a cost?

Well, the majority of readers have probably stifled the question: many of them being reconciled to the story of the struggle by the splendour of the success; and many more by the constancy and courage of the Christian martyr in the sequel of

First, about the success. It did not, of course, alter the moral quality of what went before. But the fact that "the passionate patience of genius" does so often meet its reward, even in this life, must be taken as God's "answer out of the whirlwind" that there is in that passionate patience an element which He approves. The success which sometimes follows the passionate patience of the genius which is crime, may have in it the same accort of approval for that element, while it may become the means of chastisement, too.

What, then, is that element?

The answer lies near at hand. That element is the last analysis of conscience. It is the very pinnacle upon which every human soul meets, or some day must meet, God. Christianised, it makes the Christian martyr. In any case it makes the martyr, or the hero. It is the "point of honour" kindled in the fire of eternal ideas to a peak that lays its shining spire close under the very footstool of the Throne. Though it is I will towards men, it is I must towards Heaven. It is that last obedience of the soul which the world cannot but call defiance. It is the battle of the human spirit to redeem its hostages of self-denial, saying as it smites or bleeds, "Father of souls! You have so made me that the integrity of my very being stands impawned upon honourable persistence in this effort—not on success, for that, O Father, is in Your choice—but in keeping, so far as my will is concerned, the line of march, the orbit of movement upon which Your forming hand first set me."

It is so difficult for any outsider to judge positively when a man's soul can and does find itself in such a position with regard to any of the ends of life, that criticism is idle. It seemed very obvious, no doubt, for the friends of Palissy to say to him, "Go back to your trade, make your home comfortable, and give up the enamel." But Palissy might have replied, "You speak in the dark. My design has become impacted into my very soul. To give it up would be such moral disorganization to me that I could not work at my trade, -or exist at all, in fact. If Heaven by any extraneous action snatches the thread of my labour out of my hand, I shall know it, and shall resign myself; but if I give up whilst I have a hope of success, I am a coward -I sink-I perish-I die, -and it is idle to talk of working to a man who is dead." It is, no doubt, very difficult to get the average human being to understand this. The majority of people have no points of honour, and, indeed, no conscience, except towards persons. Enthusiasm they do not understand-though they are ready enough to take the benefit of anything that enthusiasm does for them. How many years did Collingwood spend at sea, without seeing his wife and family? The world applauded, and called that duty; but there was no reason whatever, except that enthusiasm of loyal courage which is the highest quality of a fightingman, against Collingwood handing over his sword to another, and coming home. Who shall judge him? Who shall judge Palissy? Who shall judge even poor Haydon, the painter, a much less man (probably) than either the Huguenot potter or the British admiral?

Nobody can possibly determine for another which out of all possible ends of life shall be to him his innermost point of honour, or how he shall deal with it. Let us, for a moment, use an illustration from a much lower class of facts. If a pugilist became convinced, in the middle of a fight, that it was wrong to go on, he would be bound to stop at once. But, supposing him not convinced, he would be a coward to give in till he was compelled, and if he did so, must lose his self-respect and become morally degraded. I have written thus far upon the principle of making every illustration advance the argument by a step, and have not used the last example in vain. Why do we not accord the same honours to the prize-fighter as to the heroic soldier? Because the former, taking up his position gratuitously, injures another as well as runs his own risk, for gain and for applause. The test by which we judge of the quality of a man's enthusiasm in ordinary cases may help us in cases less common :-Is the end held dear by him for its own sake, or for some purpose of personal enjoyment which he might, conceivably, secure by aiming at some other end? and again, Are the means by which he pursues his end such as, in themselves, under any conditions, must injure other people? If Palissy had aimed, through the enamel, at wealth and title for himself, or been careless of others in following out that aim, we should have had no difficulty in pronouncing him base. But it was not so. His enthusiasm was the enthusiasm of the artist, of the lover of the perfect in every form; what injury (if any) accrued, from his efforts, to others, was incident to the pursuit under unhappy circumstances, and not essential to it: and, lastly, since his moral integrity was bound up in persistence, he would have done them no less an injury than that of incapacitating and destroying himself if he had relinquished his struggles. It does not follow that any man should part with his freedom of will as to pausing in any pursuit whatever-that is madness, and may be crime. When the unhappy prince is confronted by the messenger from the other world, beckoning him on, he shakes off his interfering friends, as poor Palissy did.

By heav'n, I'll make a corpse of him that lets me!
Lead on—I'll follow thee!"

And he follows. But yet, when he thinks he has gone as far as is wise, he challenges the ghostly fate to declare his message—

"Speak now-I'll go no farther"- and his conduct, if it could be translated into a formula, would make the exact rule for every case in which personal enthusiasms seem to conflict with other things over which conscience claims to have authority. But outsiders must always lack one necessary element for dealing with such difficulties—the ghost will not speak to them, but only to him to whom it is sent.

Thus, we have, in reality, travelled over the subject. To make anything whatever an end of life at the cost of the rights* of others is morally wrong. To do so merely for personal pleasure is ignoble, though it may not be criminal. To do so without submission to the Divine will is profane. To do so when others cannot see anything good in the end, may often be the most sacred of duties, and a most imperative call for self-sacrifice. It is no man's right to judge Ulysses when he leaves Telemachus to do "his work," and, bidding his men "smite the sounding furrows," is off and away again into the sunset sea. Palissy the potter was Palissy the martyr, too; and the world cannot yet dispense, for its ends, with the —— "equal temper of heroic hearts, Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield."

At the risk of saying over again in another shape what has been already said, I must add a word about that kind and degree of success which, under the name of Respectability, is now made, especially in books+ for adolescent reading, such an overshadowing End of Life. To the average mind, respectability will long continue to be a symbol of worth, and the cases where the two things are disjoined will be held exceptional. So long as respectability keeps its place in the mind as a symbol only, it may, for default of a better, be an End of Life with the multitude—subject to the same limitations as any other. In point of fact it is such an end with the encrmous majority of our fellowcreatures; and to it is sacrificed quite as much as any artist in the world ever sacrificed to his enamel or other ideal. Daily we see it prove too strong for charity, for principle, for natural affectionwhich surely indicates that the sign has slipped away from the thing signified a little. The question then is, Cannot we dispense with a literature for boys which, making great pretensions to purity and even piety of tone, introduces them to the Cardinal Virtues—as caryatides to a dome of stuccoed respectability, all holding trays-full of visiting cards, and all carrying cheque-books?

This Doctor,—weary likewise of the press
Of dire disease and genuine distress

† The reference here is, of course, to the dozens of manuals for boys about "Men who have Got On," and the like.

^{*} I emphasize the word rights, because people are apt to confound rights with pleasures. We are always bound to consult the rights of others, but not always their pleasures or wishes.

Which, if he may not cure, he must beguile By that most gentle magic of his smile; Weary of crowded meetings, learned words, Popular triumphs, critical awards, Repute that loves to raise a daily tax Of pamphlets, medals, parchments seal'd with wax,-Left London just when sultry dog-days wane, Lock'd in his cupboard his gold-headed cane, And fled for refuge to the Scottish moor. Far from the painful calls of rich or poor, There might he hope to see the fair sunrise Broaden upon the verge of peaceful skies; There might he shoot, and fish, and sketch at ease, Or even, if so minded, climb the trees, (For he was young and agile, though so great!) With no one to object his place and state.

One trusty friend he took, of mutual mind,
Two small portmanteaux all their goods enshrined;
Their breeks were pepper and salt, their caps were grey,
Stout were their boots, their coats were cut away;
Their shapely legs in leathern gaiters cased,
Their button-holes with sprigs of heather graced;
Pipes in their mouths, and in their hearts a sense
That London smoked five hundred miles from thence!
Oh happy couple! men without a care!
Who that had seen him with that jaunty air
Had known that famous Doctor of Mayfair!

The nearest village was a Highland nest, The wildest nook in Scotland's hills confest. Three times a week a man on horseback rode Across the moorland to their lone abode, And brought the letters due from day to day, (Unless perchance he dropp'd them by the way,) Brought sundry papers, dusty, torn, or wet, A Punch perchance, or the Pall Mall Gazette; Half of the Times, the leaders stray'd or lost, Or Mayfair's oracle, the Morning Post. The Doctor read them: who so blithe as he, Stretch'd on the heather blossoms lazily After a day of grouse? his friend, beside, O'er a peat fire their moorland supper fried; A handy man was he; nicknamed in sport The Brief Authority of Garden Court!

The hour was six, but in that northern sky The wakeful sun with radiant beam rode high. The patient Doctor eyed that genial fire, And long'd for supper with a keen desire, Then lightly roved his eye (no eye-glass in it) Adown the stream, to wile the hungry minute.

What did he see! Help me, O Painter's art! And to my pen some dainty tints impart! He saw,—a maiden with a kindly face, And figure strong with Amazonian grace, Elue-eyed and yellow-hair'd, like Scotland's own, A plaid about her patient shoulders thrown, Who pick'd with bare white feet her cautious way, Across the stream where shallowest eddies play,

Bearing another girl, who faintly clung—
Whose listless head athwart her shoulder hung—
But tenderly with knotted scarves secured,
That this strange pilgrimage might be endured, Unharm'd, unwearied! And behind these two
Another lassic trudged, with eyes as blue
And hair as yellow;—in her arms a load
Wrapp'd in a cloth. The three pursued their road
Over the heather, to the very spot
Where our two friends, supper and fire forgot, Stared in amazement; and the Doctor saith,
"By Jove! Three Witches! Really—like Macbeth!"

The foremost girl advanced; untied with care
Her tremulous burden, and with modest air,
But much determination, fix'd her eyes
Upon the Doctor, silent in surprise;
Quoth she, "Guid Sir, my sister's vera ill."
Here the blue eyes with pleading moisture fill:
"We heard that ye were here, and a' the day
I've carried Mary a lang weary way.
Ye'll cure her, Sir? We winna grudge yer fees,
But pay ye honestly;—Jean's brought a cheese!"

The Doctor laugh'd, almost the Doctor cried,
The Brief Authority as vainly tried
To hide a rising moisture; both the men
Laugh'd and then cough'd, then cough'd and laugh'd again;
And, Nature of her simple tribute cheated,
Said to the girls, politely, "Pray be seated."

Be sure that famous man of far renown, That grave physician hight of London Town, Gave all his thought, his care, his timely store Of travelling drugs; no Princess had had more! Housed in a cottage with a Highland wife, Mary was tended into vigorous life, And when at length they saw her blithe and well, The sisters' joy what English tongue can tell! Who could translate their vivid mountain mood, Or sonorous flow of Highland gratitude! All three had dreams of wonderful portent,-Titles and honours with his future blent. Mysterious hints of bliss they held in store, -To wed the daughter of Macallum More! (They did not know he had a charming wife!) And dine from golden plates throughout his life! And when at last the fair procession went Over the brawling river, homeward bent, Their snooded locks were lightly backwards blown, Like some young group cut in immortal stone On the fair surface of a Grecian frieze-The Doctor-stay'd behind ;- and ate the Cheese!

BESSIE RAYNER PARKES

A FRENCHMAN'S IMPRESSIONS OF ENGLAND A CENTURY AGO.

BY HENRY ALFORD, D.D., DEAN OF CANTERBURY.

THE subject of this paper was brought to my | notice in the following manner. Being in Paris in 1862, I was looking at the bookstalls on the quais bordering the Seine, when my attention was attracted by a 12mo book in four well-bound volumes lettered on the back "Londres," offered for the low price of 60c., or 6d., a volume. On looking into it, I found it was an account of a visit to London in the year 1765, and, from the specimens which met my eye, appeared to be written in a lively and interesting style. I paid my 2s., and carried off my book. I may mention that when I was at Paris this spring, I saw the same book offered for 40c. (4d.) the volume. On examining the title-page, I found that the work was anonymous. Nor, on reading further, did I find any clue given to the name or quality of the author. He evidently was a man of education, and moved, as the expression is, in the best society. There was throughout the book not only an affectation of wit, which was but too apparent, but much real humour. A genuine wish to take things aright and to search into manners and character seemed quaintly blended with a habit of blundering and a want of sober judgment. The writer, whoever he was, must have been a curious specimen of a highly-educated capricious Frenchman.

In my puzzle, I wrote to that most useful periodical, Notes and Queries, and obtained an immediate answer. The "great unknown" was a Mons. PIERRE JEAN GROSLEY, born at Troyes, in Champagne, in 1715. He was originally intended for the Church, but ultimately, by the advice of a friend, changed to the bar. Having, however, a large private fortune bequeathed him by an uncle (half of which, it should be stated to his credit, he presented to his sister), he preferred the life of a dilettante and antiquary, travelling very much, and spending a great deal of his time every year at Paris, where he was intimate with all the great literary men of the day. He was an eccentric character, and of remarkable personal appearance: having a very long neck, an unusually small round head, piercing gray-green eyes, and a complexion so pallid that he gave himself the nickname of "Extreme Unction." Knowing these personal traits, we shall be the less surprised by-and-by to find that he did not escape disagreeable notice in the streets of London. He appears to have been but six weeks in England: but, if so, he certainly made very good use of his time and his eyes. His ears were not of much use to him, for he was totally ignorant of our language. His information was picked up entirely from those who could speak French. He died, we are told, in 1785, being then an Associate of the French Academy, and a Member of the Royal Society of London. His works are numerous, including several volumes of travels, and several on the antiquities and history of his native city.

M. Grosley crossed from Boulogne to Dover, Thursday, April 11, 1765. He found the Channel. which, he says, during the time before and after the equinox is in a "tourmente perpetuelle," covered with vessels of all nations, just let loose on the cessation of this turbulent weather. The sea still ran high, and our author, as well as a landsman could in such a situation, contemplated the lively spectacle, as his ship lay at anchor for three hours waiting for the tide to get into Dover harbour. Multitudes of French boats were in the same case. and entered Dover together: four being wrecked in the process. The vessel which conveyed M. Grosley, and was occupied in carrying wines in bottle to the bonded warehouses at Dover, was more fortunate. The custom-house officers were very much to our author's liking. On landing he saw two men approach him who looked like beggars. They had the manner, he says, of their condition, which in England is the basest and vilest of all conditions. They humbly requested permission to examine his trunk, which they half opened, and then retired with all humility, without putting their hands into his pockets, or his sac de nuit.

He describes Dover as inhabited entirely by sailors, fishermen, and innkeepers. The circumstances under which he arrived had brought thither an immense concourse of foreigners, more than the inns could hold, or the public carriages and post-chaises could carry away. He could get nothing to eat except by going himself into the kitchen and taking the beefsteaks from the gridiron: and he was knocked up at 3 A.M. to give up his bed to another man, who had been waiting half the night for it. In his explorations of the town, he saw nothing to remark, except the enormous size and absurd decorations of the signs of the inns, which bestrode the streets like so many triumphal arches. He was unable to discover in the whole town any place of worship, either Catholic or Protestant. This of course was the fault of his own observation, seeing that the old Norman church of St. Mary's must have been then just what it is now. He saw post-chaises going off, driven by little boys of twelve or thirteen, and was told that they made excellent postillions. He relates one particular before leaving Dover, which is worth quoting. During the passage, he had made common cause with a party consisting of an English lady resident at Boulogne, her agreeable daughter, and a tall old Irishman calling himself an officer. This last undertook to pay the captain for the four; but when our friend came, too late, to make inquiries at Dover, he found that he had paid twice the real fare. He says he mentions this only to observe that, to the honour of the English, it was the only attempt made to cheat him during his whole visit.

And now behold our traveller leaving Dover for London. The quantity of passengers crowded at Dover was, he says, the excuse for breaking an invariable law of the English police, that no public vehicle should travel on a Sunday. He, with seven others, filled two carriages, drawn by six horses each, and called "Original Machines," or "Flying Coaches," doing the seventy-two miles in one day, and at the fare of one guinea. The servants paid half this, and rode outside, on the top, or on the box, which held three. A vast magazine beneath the box held the luggage, for which each paid separately.

"The coachmen," he says, "whom we changed as often as we changed horses, were big men of good condition, and with good coats on their backs. When they were about to start, or were quickening the pace of their horses, I heard a noise as if a stick were being held against the spokes of a wheel in motion. I found out, afterwards, that it is the custom of the English coachmen to start and to quicken their horses by stamping in a sort of measured time on their foot-board. The whip is as seldom in their hands as a lady's fan in winter, and their horses hardly ever feel it."

Our Sunday travellers seem to have excited considerable attention along the road. On account of the day, they found no preparations for receiving them at the inns; but M. Grosley flatters himself that for this reason they also found none of the "gentlemen of the road," or highwaymen, who usually abounded on this route. Of these, the only specimens they saw were attached to gibbets here and there along the road: where, he says, they figure in perukes, and clothed from top to toe.

One curious inconvenience resulted from the Sunday journey, which throws some light from another side on the Sabbath observance of those days. tween Canterbury and Rochester, the inhabitants of a village on the road had chosen this day, when there would be nothing travelling, to transport a windmill from the left hand side of the way to a more advantageous position on the right. The body of these windmills, he says, was like a cage of wood lifted to a great height in order to catch the wind above the trees with which this part of the country is covered. This particular one was conical in form, about thirty feet high by twelve to fifteen in diameter. It was being moved along by twenty or thirty men, some pulling by ropes, others pushing behind, in a deep-cut part of the road, which it entirely filled. As it had some distance yet to traverse, the delay to our travellers was considerable. All alighted and lent a hand. After a quarter of an hour's work, they got it to a place where the cutting was not so deep, and then by ropes passed round the two coaches they drew them up over the bank, which they had lowered by working with pickaxes: and so got away. All the French present, he says, laughed "à gorge deployée" at this adventure: "but it made no impression on the phlegmatic English; old and young, they consulted long and gravely together how to get us on, they all put their hands to the work, and when it was done resumed their own with as much seriousness as if transporting windmills had been the business of their lives." A curious Sunday group this on the road between Canterbury and Rochester. I think we may flatter ourselves, at all events, that we understand engineering, and perhaps Sundays too, a little better in our day.

I am afraid the men of Kent must have been a very dull lot a century ago. "At Canterbury," says M. Grosley, "where we arrived very early in the day, I at once saw that I was no longer in France. A big man, who was just out of his bed, came forward into a kind of glazed lantern which was over his door" (a bow window, I suppose), "and there stood all the while we were changing horses, which process was considerably prolonged by our not being expected. All this time, this big man in his dressing-gown and velvet cap looked at us with his arms crossed, without changing his position, without winking, with an air of tristesse which is only seen in France on the faces of people coming from the funeral of their best friends. The same air was observable in the little boys and girls, who, in order to contemplate us at their ease, fixed themselves in the middle of the street, with the same immovable aspect in their arms, legs, eyes, and every feature of their physiognomy."

Our author has another story to tell of Canterbury, and rather a curious one. "I was shown," he says, "at Canterbury the house which once was the inn where M. the Duke of Nivernois, when he came to England to negotiate peace, was treated as an enemy. For his supper, and that of his suite, which consisted of but few, the innkeeper charged him forty to fifty guineas, and the duke paid them. The innkeeper had indiscreetly boasted of this piece of extortion, and the noblesse of Canterbury and the province of Kent, who were in the habit of holding their sessions every month at this inn, petitioned the duke to demand restitution. duke having absolutely refused, the Kentish gentlemen charged themselves in the name of the nation with the punishment of the extortion, which they carried out as follows:-they met together and agreed not to hold their sessions any more at this inn, nor to patronise it in any way. Their resolution being announced in the public journals, the English who passed through Canterbury made it a point of honour to do the same. The innkeeper in consequence was ruined and sold up in six months." I may add, that this circumstance still remains in the traditions of Canterbury. The inn was the old Red Lion, which once stood where now Guildhall Street debouches into High Street. The peace which the Duke de Nivernois came over to negotiate was the famous treaty of Paris in 1763, by which Canada was ceded to England. So that any persons of seventy years of age might have heard the story from their parents.

M. Grosley goes on to tell us that Canterbury has nothing remarkable except its metropolitan church, "built in the same style, at the same time, and perhaps by the same workmen, as the cathedral at Rouen." "Its form," he adds, "is that of an archiepiscopal cross: i.e. to say, it has two transepts which intersect its length: a refinement of Gothic whose effect is neither grand nor agreeable." He speaks of the woods which he traversed on his route, and states that he was told they belonged to the Archbishop and to the chapter of Canterbury: and describes a great number of commons covered with brushwood and gorse. Hearing that these commons were free to the poor, he concludes from their neglected state that there can be but few poor in these parts. The road was very good the whole way, and he notices the elevated footpath which ran by the side of it, marked off by white posts to guide the drivers of carriages. In places where the road is too narrow to admit of this trottoir, he says that the proprietors of the neighbouring fields are obliged to give it a passage through their land : and where it is interrupted by the strong green hedges, communication is given by means of hurdles about four feet in height. "These hurdles or stiles are crossed by a process of half climbing, half jumping, which the peasant girls, being trained to it by habit, perform with as much grace as speed."

It is curious to see such common details of our ordinary life dwelt upon in print. Yet matters like these are precisely those which to this day constitute, to an observant eye, the difference between our island and the Continent. M. Grosley, who always, right or wrong, finds a reason for everything he sees, proceeds to account for this remarkable attention shown for foot-passengers. It arises, he says, from three causes :- 1. The extraordinary value which is set, by the English, upon human life; which causes them to sacrifice to its preservation many considerations of interest and convenience: -2. The fact, that in England, the laws are not all made and carried out by people who ride in carriages: -3. The extreme speed at which the English vehicles drive in the country (contrary, he says, to their practice in the towns), never stopping to avoid running over and maining foot-passengers.

He saw very few farms or cottages thatched; almost all were tiled, and well appointed: and the waggoners, who presided, armed with their long whips, over the sturdy well-fed teams, had good cloth coats and substantial well-cleaned boots. All this appearance of prosperity he accounts for by observing that in England the welfare of the people is left to the people themselves, not interfered with and marred by the state.

Our traveller is full of admiration at the verdure of the banks of the Thames, and the bustling commerce of vessels which he saw on its bosom. He also praises highly the English inns as compared with those in France. These inns, he says, abounded in the towns and villages on the road; they were a little dear, to be sure: but in them the English lord might be as well served as at home, and better than in most of the private mansions in France.

And now we have spoken of most of the subjects of local interest noticed by our traveller, and find him arrived in London. It was about sunset as he crossed Westminster Bridge. The lamps were already lit, and the immense trottoirs covered with dense crowds. It was a spectacle which, he says, Paris might present also, if its best quarters were not frequented more by the equipages of the rich than by the people. We may remember that thirty years after this, the rich and the people in Paris rather suddenly changed places, by a concussion, the echoes of which have not yet ceased to vibrate.

He was lodged with a family in Leicester Fields, near to Westminster. His host was the royal cook, and charged him a guinea and a half a week for two first-floor rooms. The family was French; a matter of some consequence to M. Grosley, who knew but two words of English, "very good" and "very well." These words enabled him sometimes to appear interested, he tells us, throughout long conversations, but did not enable him to derive much profit from them.

The day but one after his arrival, when he had duly examined his map, he set out on foot, and explored through Oxford Street, Holborn, and thence by the Strand to St. Paul's and the Exchange; returning by the Tower, over London Bridge, and so by Southwark back to Westminster. This took him the whole day; and another such day among the quarters lately built on the north-west of the Thames completed, he says, his acquaintance with the whole of London.

We may well ask, what was London a hundred years ago?—in April and May, 1765? I will cull my description from different parts of M. Grosley's book, and from the map prefixed to it.

First, for extent. The south side of the Thames was for the most part still country. The ill-built town of Southwark (which he tells us must be pronounced Sudric), consisting of two streets only, and inhabited by tanners and dyers, was all that bounded London to the south. The rest consisted of lanes and rural beer-shops; but houses of a better sort were springing up here and there, and bid fair soon to cover the ground. The Five Fields lay open, where Belgravia now clusters its palaces. On the north, Marylebone Lane still meandered between green hedges; and our author tells us that if building went on at the present rate, London would soon extend to Maribonne, a village founded by the French refugees, and at that day composed of drinking-shops. These latter are, perhaps, the only noticeable feature which has subsisted to our time. At the time of our author's visit, there were but two bridges connecting London north and south of the Thames; a third was building, over the name of which the two political parties were disputing; the admirers of Mr. Pitt (the elder, afterwards Lord Chatham) wishing it to be called Pitt Bridge; his opponents, Blackfriars Bridge. It would seem from the result, that the majority was against him.

On the state of the streets, M. Grosley gives us some curious information. The largest and finest, he says, such as the Strand, Cheapside, Holborn, &c., would be impassable, were it not that they have for the accommodation of foot passengers, pavements on both sides four or five feet wide, and in order to communicate from one side of the street to the other, little paths raised, so as to throw off the wet, above the level of the street, and paved with very large stones selected for this purpose. "It may be easily imagined how inconvenient the frequent recurrence of these cross paths is for carriages. In the best part of the Strand, near the church of St. Clement's, I saw, the whole time of my stay in London, the middle of the street filled with a liquid and filthy mud, three or four inches deep: mud of which the splashing covered the passengers from head to foot, and plastered the whole lower story of the houses which are exposed to them. In consequence, every morning the apprentices are employed in washing the fronts of their shops to remove yesterday's plastering of mud. The English brave this state of things with their wigs of dark-red bristles, thin and curled, their brown stockings, and their long blue frock-coats cut like dressing-gowns."

What strange figures our ancestors must have been! It would be worth something to see, if it were just for a minute, the pavement by St. Clement's, near Mr. W. H. Smith's great railway book warehouse, and the office of the Illustrated News, peopled with such passengers. "To understand how constant these splashings are," continues our traveller, "it suffices to be told, that the pavé in London is formed of great boulders, just in the state in which they come from the quarry; these boulders, almost round, have neither base, nor head, nor tail: they roll and tumble about unceasingly on a bottom which is nothing but a mass of long-deposited mud. Granite pavement comes from the extremities of the kingdom, and is one of the dearest things imported into London. There is a story current, that Louis XIV. offered Charles II. granite enough to pave his capital, on condition that the English king would give him enough for his royal palaces of that beautiful gravel which the English use for their garden paths, and which, well beaten, hardens like a floor." Still, at this time they knew the use of granite pavement. It was already laid down in Parliament Street and part of Pall Mall, and they were beginning the Strand. These two granite-paved streets, he says, were dry in May, a time when all the rest of the city was buried under seas of mud. It was quite impossible to go through London in a carriage without both the windows up, on account of the splashing of this mud. The paviours used no rammers, but the office of these was performed by the heavy waggons, which were compelled by law to have their wheels six inches in breadth. In spite of the number and weight of these waggons, there never was any obstruction in the streets, because both sides went in close files, which were never interrupted. But how, we may ask, in case any carriage wanted to stop, or to turn? Each of these files was regulated as to speed by the slowest and heaviest vehicle in it, and the best-appointed equipage in London was obliged to be bumped about and kept back, though it might have never so much reason to press forward. "However," he adds, "the English have none of that hurry to arrive at their journey's end, which we see in other nations. They take into account all these delays in calculating the time requisite for their journey, and submit to them with the greatest resignation." Certainly we may say that a hundred years has wonderfully altered the English character. In the present day, it is just the business-like wish to get to the journey's end without hindrance, which distinguishes them among other nations. It is the French and Germans who interpose half-an-hour's delay before the journey in getting luggage weighed, and all kinds of unnecessary nonsense, and half-an-hour's more delay in getting away after arriving, from the ridiculous octroi regulations; and it is the English of all people who submit most reluctantly to these hindrances.

Our author dedicates a chapter to "New London." Here, as elsewhere, he says some curious things: as, e.g., that the parish of St. Giles, which in the time of Pope and Swift was nothing but a collection of small shops, was in 1765 an assemblage of palaces and great houses for the most wealthy. It is difficult to conceive how this can have been at any time, unless indeed he counted St. George's, Bloomsbury, in the parish of St. Giles. In the year after he was writing, he says, Oxford Street would see its shops converted into palaces. M. Grosley describes minutely the plan on which the houses in the new quarters of London are built: the underground kitchen, the areas, the contrivance for putting down the coals by lifting a stone in the pavement. Before each door there rose from the area railings an iron arch, or two iron pillars, carrying two lamps, which were lit sometimes half-an-hour before sunset, and thus enabled each house to contribute to the lighting of the streets. From this, he says, resulted a very pretty effect, accompanied by two inconveniences: first, that these being the only street lights, the foot-passengers only were benefited by them, and the middle of the way, especially in the wider streets, was left dark: and secondly, that it was impossible for passers-by to escape the oil which dropped while the lamps were being trimmed, and sometimes even worse than this. He saw a head broken by the lamp itself falling on a foot-passenger. However, he says, the affair passed very goodnaturedly on the part of the wounded man, who received most courteously the apologies of the lamp-

Consistently with the care taken for the accommodation of the people, he notices that all the public buildings, sacred as well as secular, bore clocks with conspicuous faces, to save people the trouble and expense of carrying watches. Of course the squares attract his attention, being a feature unknown to foreign towns, with their "boulingrins" (bowling-greens) or piece of water in the middle.

New London is quite as bad as the old, in respect of mud. The soil on which it is built being rich meadow land, and almost without slope, all the dirt lodges; and in spite of drains cut to carry the surface water into the river, in spite of the most rigid laws against throwing water into the street, in spite of large tumbrils employed all day in carting away the mud, even the finest streets, at the time of his visit, were mere canals of this liquid.

Of course the smoke comes in for its share of description. This enormous cloud, he says, hanging in a heavy and moist atmosphere, wraps London like a cloak; it is very rarely pierced by the sun: and these few escapes of a sunbeam or two into the midst of their darkness the Londoners call "glorious dai." He is amused at the way in which the taste of the English for la promenade carries them through this Egyptian darkness. On the 26th of April, St. James's Park was enveloped in smoke, fog, and rain, so that nothing could be seen at four paces off. Yet it was full of fashionable promenaders, who were his study and admiration all day long. London, he says, is continually liable to showers of ink from the carbonic particles which the smoke carries up with it, and as it is not the fashion to carry the French umbrella of oil-skin, the consequence is an immense preponderance of dyers' and scourers' shops, to clean and renew people's clothes. The buildings again, St. Paul's and Somerset House, though built of white Portland stone, look as if built of coal; and have their stones disintegrated like rusty metal. He dilates on the injury done by the smoke to furniture, and especially to books; the binding of which, in the best libraries, is in a state which could hardly be worse, if they had been exposed for years on the bookstalls in the quais of Paris. he winds up this part of his subject by remarking, that if London goes on increasing as it was then increasing, the inhabitants will have to make up their minds to do without the sun altogether. Certainly, as to this part of his remarks, we must own that he has truth on his side. The consequence which he predicted has very nearly happened. We have come now to a state of things in which the Houses of Parliament, not yet thirty years old, are blackened and eaten away by the smoke: and in which one's approach to London on a lovely cloudless day is marked by mist and darkness, increasing till it is impossible to tell whether the sun is shining or not. It is truly a disgrace to our science, or our legislation, or to our national character, -or to all, -that this state of things has not been long ago put an end to.

Then we have a chapter on the London police, which excited our traveller's undisguised astonishment. No spies, no bureaux of information, no soldiers here and there and everywhere: only a few venerable old gentlemen tottering through the streets with lanterns crying out the hour and the weather, and useful to call people who were going on early journeys: no control in the theatres; even in the famous O.P. riots, the authorities observing a strict neutrality: no censorship over the press: the ministers and principal men even caricatured in the shop windows. He tells a story how Lord Molesworth, on returning from his post as ambassador at Copenhagen, had published an unfavourable and caustic account of the court of Denmark. On this the King of Denmark, who was on very intimate terms with King William, sent to demand that the writer should be compelled to make public reparation, or should be delivered up to the Danish authorities. When the Danish minister had his audience to make the demand. King William replied, "I would advise you not to let this demand be known: its only result will be to bring out a new edition of Lord Molesworth's book, and to ensure its sale."

Our friend has also a chapter on combats, which seem certainly to have been frequent enough in London in his days, resulting from the exaggerated freedom of the person, and the indifference of the police. With his learning as an antiquary, and his philosophical turn, he traces these single combats down from chivalrous times: tells how Henry VIII. and Francis I. wrestled after the meeting on the Field of the Cloth of Gold, and the French king gave the English a tremendous fall: then, coming to modern times, relates a conversation he had with an Eton boy, who characteristically defended the practice; then describes some scenes which he had witnessed himself. He saw a street fight between a man and a woman, lasting for five or six rounds, the chief feature of which was that the woman had on her left arm a child of between one and two years old, who, so far from crying, did not even wink, and seemed to take very quietly the lesson which it would have one day to practise.

"The police," he says, "never interfere with a man redressing an insult, nor is such a one called to account by the law, though he inflict severe injuries, or even death, upon the offender."

"Still," he continues, "murder is with the English the greatest of crimes: and it is most rare even to find highwaymen committing it. And when once the fury of the national revolutions has passed, not only are the lives of those on the defeated side spared, but they continue in their position, and enjoy their rights."

He gives as instances Richard Cromwell, and Fairfax, and the other chiefs of the anti-regal party; and says he saw at court the lady of a peer, to whom it was regarded rather as an honour than a reproach, that she was the great-grand-daughter of Cromwell. What follows I will give in M. Grosley's own words:—

"And so the city of London, denuded, as I have observed, of troops, of guard, of surveillance of every kind, inhabited by unarmed people (for no one carries a sword, except doctors, who are always clothed in black,—and officers when in uniform), reduced during the night to the custody of old men without arms, is guarded only by the commandment of God, 'Thou shalt not kill,' and by the laws against murder, which are as severe as they are rigidly observed, without distinction of rank or person. It may be that the law has influenced the national character, or it may be that the national character aids and facilitates the exact observation of the law: but of all the great cities of Europe, London is the only one where assassination and murder are unknown." Then, after stating that he has proved this by his own experience, taking by preference at night the darkest and least considerable lanes and passages, he proceeds: -"In a word, the people of London, though high-spirited and quick-handed, are by nature a good-tempered and humane people, even in the lowest ranks. This is especially shown by their care to prevent those fracas which are almost inevitable in the perpetual flux and reflux of vehicles, in the most crowded and often very narrow streets. If, in spite of the care of the drivers and the waggoners to prevent it, any collision does occur, their prompt disposition to turn out of the way, to draw back, to open a path, to give their hand in case help is wanted, keeps these collisions from degenerating into the frequently fatal fracas which are so common in Paris. Let us add, to the honour of the London coachmen, that 400 carriages which I have seen at Ranelagh gardens together, draw up in line and cross and recross one another, and are always ready at the first call, without guards or any one to look after the arrangement. At the public fêtes, at any ceremonies which attract a crowd, however great, children, and persons of small stature, are sure to meet with every attention: all are eager to open a passage for them, and even to lift them up that they may see better. The avenues and gates of the place where the fête is given are guarded by men armed not with guns, partisans, or halberds, but with great hollow sticks" (i.e., I suppose, canes); "which if used, which is very rare, make a great noise, and do very little harm to any one."

With regard to the poor of London, our author makes the surprising assertion, that virtually there are none: the poor-rate (which he describes as cheerfully paid, especially by the lowest class, who regard it as a provision for their families after them) having abolished destitution and beggary. working classes, he says, are well fed and well clothed. He mentions that in crossing the river he had often had boatmen in silk stockings. fact, we all seem to have been in a state of enviable happiness in this Elysian fifth year of George III., when we were honoured by M. Grosley's visit. Now and then, however, symptoms peep out that he had not gone quite as deep as he might have done into the real condition of the people. He tells us that a peer ventured to say in Parliament, that the dearness of provisions was owing not so much to their scarcity as to the abundance of money; and that the speech occasioned serious riots up and down the country. The prices which he quotes as then generally prevailing in London are, with a few exceptions, somewhat below our present ones:—Bread, $2\frac{1}{2}d$. to 3d. a pound (this would be dear, being 10d. to 1s. the 41b. loaf): meat in general, $4\frac{1}{2}d$. a pound, but the choicer pieces 8d. and 9d.: butter, 1s. $0\frac{1}{2}d$. a pound: bacon, 10d.: candles, $7\frac{1}{2}d$.: a milch cow, 12 to 15 guineas: which last was also the rent of an acre of land near Loudon.

I pass rapidly his notices of the English provisions. Our bread he praises, adding that we were the first to use yeast from beer instead of leaven, and that the practice still encountered great opposition in France. The small quantity of bread eaten by us, and the thinness of the slices of breadand-butter, are noticed. This last, he says, does as much honour to the sharpness of the knife, as to the adroitness of the cutter. It surprises us to read that he thought the London milk and cream perfection: evidently we had not begun a century ago to breed cows with iron tails, which so generally furnish the metropolitan dairies in our days.

He devotes a whole chapter to "cleanliness." And here he seems in a bewilderment of admiration. No town in Holland can be kept cleaner than London, in spite of fog, and smoke, and mud. All is scrubbing and polishing all day long. Furniture, crockery, door-steps, door-handles, all rubbed and brightened incessantly. Even the houses where lodgings are to let, furnished with a line of carpet up the stairs to keep off the mud on one's boots from the wood-work: even the rooms themselves covered with similar carpets, so rarely found in France: no dogs prowling about streets and churches. True, he adds, this cleanliness is a matter of necessity, not of luxury as at Paris: for in London, life would be intolerable without it.

Next he comes to speak of our servants, on whom he bestows unqualified praise. He saw, at the studio of a sculptor, a chimney-piece beautifully and elaborately carved. He asked the sculptor whether he was not afraid to commit such delicate work to the tender mercies of domestics? The sculptor answered, that he had no such fear; in fact, that their treatment would rather benefit than injure his work. "In a word," he continues, "the exactitude of the servants is equal to the punctuality of their masters: who generally follow, in their daily lives, an invariable order. Every servant of the citizens of London is simply and solidly clad, and insolence is unknown in every rank of this order of persons. The maids of the 'petite bourgeoisie' and the femmes de.chambre of the noblesse, follow their ladies in the streets and public promenades: and their dress is such, that unless you have a personal acquaintance with the mistress, you cannot distinguish her from the maid. The assiduity, the attention, the toil, the punctuality, which the English expect from their servants, cause wages to be very high." A great French maid at M.

Grosley's lodgings, who could do nothing but wash, dust, and scour, had six guineas a year, besides a guinea for her tea. The wages of a cook were twenty guineas. And the profits of servants from other sources at least doubled their wages. Every time that his landlady's sister came to tea, she fee'd the maid: and M. Grosley was obliged to do the same, wherever he dined. A Scotch nobleman had set his face against this practice, and had organised a society to put it down. On dining with him, our friend was requested to abstain from feeing the butler, who accordingly did not appear in mendicant attitude when he left the door. It is somewhat singular that in our time the Duke of Sutherland should have begun a crusade against the practice, certainly infinitely worse, of dishonest tradesmen making dishonest butlers an allowance out of their masters' bills.

Our author also takes the rents of London houses into consideration. Here the difference between his time and ours is remarkable. Rents which he accounts excessively high, would now be ridiculously low. The house where he lodged was, he tells us, three stories high, had fourteen feet in frontage and sixty in depth, and let for thirty-eight guineas: to this were added two more for poor-rate, three for window-tax, street-sweepers, and watchmen, and one for water. Concerning this last, he mentions a fact, interesting in the history of the steam-engine. "The water," he says, "which is not good, comes from the Thames, from which it is lifted by pumps. Of these pumps the first was invented and placed at the foot of London Bridge in the reign of Elizabeth, by a German. Afterwards improved by a French refugee named Savari, it was described by Desaguilliar, and was applied by a French physician to the freshening of sea-water. The Count Heronville also used it for the drainage which he undertook some years ago in the neighbourhood of Dunkirk. The steam of water, lifted and rarefied by boiling, is the power which drives this machine: a power of which the force would be incomprehensible had not one seen the effect with one's eyes."

Now the first notice of steam power which I find in ordinary books of reference, is that of Savary's steam-pump in the year 1693. Of this prior existence of one erected by a German in the reign of Elizabeth, a hundred years before, I can see no mention. It is possible that our author may be mistaken in supposing that steam power was used before Savary. Previous to his time the pump may have existed there, but may have been otherwise worked.

It is worthy of notice, that James Watt's invention, separating the condensing vessel from the cylinder, which is the real birth of the steamengine, dates from this very year of which we are treating, viz., 1765.

M. Grosley gives a short account of the London parks. St. James's Park seems in his time to have been the worst kept. "In the part nearest Westminster," he says, "it is nature in a brute state, being nothing but a meadow irregularly intersected and watered by ditches, and planted with willows and poplars scattered without plan. Both here and in the part which is the rendezvous of the court, the 'boulingrins' are covered with cows, left to themselves, grazing or drinking or ruminating, some standing, others lying down: a circumstance giving to these promenades an air of life which banishes solitude, even when few people are present. When they are filled with company, it unites under one coup d'æil the crowd, the luxury, and the splendour of a city as wealthy as it is populous, in the most piquant contrast with rural simplicity.

"Quite in keeping with this simplicity, most of these cows, at noon and in the evening, come up to the gate by which the park communicates with Whitehall. Tied by a cord to the railings, at the edge of the boulingrin nearest the gate, they furnish their milk to the passers-by, which, milked on the spot, is served with true English cleanliness in large tea-cups at a halfpenny each."

This again is curious. Many of my readers are, I dare say, aware that this custom is yet to be traced in the three or four cows tied to the railings at the corner of St. James's Park next Whitehall, and milked by the keepers of the ginger-bread stalls.

I must hurry on: being very near the end of my space, and not yet half through M. Grosley's first volume.

The people of London, he says, astonished him even more than the city. First he speaks of the canaille, -the chairmen, porters, sailors, and beggars found evermore in the streets. These, he says, are the most insolent rabble imaginable. The French are the chief objects of their insults and raillery: but the respectable Euglish passengers are by no means free. Ask the way of them: if it is to the right, they direct you to the left, or pass you on from one to another of their comrades. These politenesses are seasoned with the most atrocious insults. You need not enter into conversation with them; it is quite enough to pass within their "My own French air, notwithstanding the simplicity of my attire, ensured me at every corner of the street whole litanies of abuse, among which I sneaked along, thanking Heaven that I did not understand English. The kyrie of these litanies was 'French dog,' and worse. To answer them, would have been to get involved in a row, and my curiosity did not carry me so far. The late Marshal Saxe had an affair with a scavenger, which ended in a 'tour de main,' amidst the applause of all the spectators. He stood and received the charge of his scavenger, seized him by the nape of the neck, and hurled him through the air, so aiming that he fell in the middle of his cart, which was filled to the brim with liquid mud."

M. Grosley was walking one day at Chelsea with an English friend, "when," he says, "twenty Thames bargees, leaving their work, ranged themselves in a line, and assailed my friend, in honour of me, with all the horrible things which the English tongue can furnish, relieving one another in turn, like bachelors of arts sustaining a thesis. At the third relay of this abuse, my friend stopped and shouted to them that their compliments were no doubt the most polite in the world, but that, unfortunately, he was deaf, and I did not understand a word of English, and so they were merely firing against a wall. This rejoinder quieted them: they burst out laughing and returned to their work.

"The day but one after my arrival, my servant had an awkward proof how far this canaille will go in maltreatment of Frenchmen, real or apparent. He had followed the crowd to Tyburn, where three scoundrels were to be hanged, of whom two were father and son. The sight was over, and he was returning by the 'grande rue d'Oxford' with the débris of the crowd who had assisted at the execution, when he was assailed by two or three blackguards; and very speedily, the crowd having gathered round, he became sport for them. Jack Ketch himself" (whom our author almost managed to conceal from me under the name of "Sir Jaquett, maître des hautes œuvres") "took part in the badinage, and hit the victim a blow on the shoulder. They began to pull him about by the skirts of his coat, and by the queues of his wig: when, by good fortune, he was espied by three Grenadiers of the French Guard, who, having deserted, and passed the Channel, were drinking in a pothouse within view. Taking up any weapons which came in their way, they made a sudden charge on the crowd, laying about the ears of every one in their reach, and got off their countryman, first to the pothouse, and then to my lodgings. Seven or eight campaigns which he had served with an officer of gendarmerie, and a year which he had passed in travelling through Italy, had not hardened him enough to reconcile him to encounter a second scene of this kind. The effect upon him was prodigious. Shutting himself up in the house, and not daring to put his nose outside the door, he passed a whole fortnight swearing at England and the English. Robust and vigorous as he was, and with some knowledge of the language and the country, he might have got brilliantly out of his scrape, by proposing a personal combat with the one of his assailants who might seem to him the weakest: and his victory would have got him the honour of being applauded, and even carried in triumph, by the very men who combined against him. This is the first law of this kind of combat : a law to which the English are faithful in the midst of the fire of battle. The vanquished will always find in the English, generous conquerors; which seems to prove, against Hobbes, that in the natural state, a state to which these London street fights closely approximate, the man who by circumstances is savage and cruel, is at heart good and generous."

Our author sets against all this brutality of the street rabble in London, the uniform and remarkable politeness and kindness of the gentry, the bourgeoisie, and even the most insignificant shopkeepers. If he asked the way of any of these, he found every one ready not only to tell him, but to go with him and show him. "Having," he says, "some one to find in Oxford Street, I presented his address at the first shop I came to; there came out a young man in silk stockings, with a very good coat, and his apron round his waist. When he had satisfied himself that I was the kind of man for him to be followed by, he made me a sign to follow him, and began to run before me. During the course, which was from one end of the street to the other, i.e. a good quarter of a league, I got ready a shilling, which I presented to him on reaching my destination: but he rejected it with indignation: and seizing my hand, which he shook vigorously, he thanked me for the pleasure which I had been the means of giving him. I met him on a subsequent occasion in the Tabernacle of the Methodists."

"By the way," continues M. Grosley, "this taking a man by the arm and shaking it almost to dislocate the shoulder, is one of the greatest signs of friendship which the English can show when they meet you. All is done with the greatest coolness: the features have no expression: the whole soul passes in the arm which shakes you. This shaking by the hand stands instead of our French compliments, obeisances, and embraces: a kind of coin not current in England. I found the same attention in all the public and private assemblies to which I had the honour to be admitted. In the Houses of Lords and Commons, a foreigner may, without offence, avail himself at hazard of any one who understands his language, and he will find that a point is made of answering all his inquiries. At the first sitting introductory to the trial of Lord Byron, I found myself placed in the middle of a family as amiable as it was distinguished. The men, the ladies, the young people, all were eager to satisfy my curiosity as to the different parts of the grand spectacle, to explain to me what was said, to tell me the origin of the most remarkable formalities, and at last to make me partake of the refreshments which the length of the session made it necessary to provide. At the visit of the King to the House of Lords, one of the Lord Bishops, at the door where I entered, offered himself as my interpreter, and courteously performed the office during the whole ceremony. At the meetings of the courts of King's Bench and Exchequer at Westminster, I placed myself among the barristers, and spoke French to my two neighbours. If one or other of them did not understand me, he rose up and put in his place one of his comrades, who, understanding my language, explained to me all that was said and done.

"In the theatres, I had the same resources. Every one who did not understand me was eager to look for and to bring to me some one who did: and my kind interpreter, often provided with a small flask of wine, never drank without afterwards presenting it to me. I drank too, because, having refused in the first instance, I was informed by my friend that such refusal was a breach of the laws of English politeness.

"It should be mentioned that these attentions and kindnesses are devoid of any of those demonstrations which accompany them in France. If an Englishman, not understanding me, went to find an interpreter, he rose and left me with an air rather of anger than of the politeness he was showing me: and I never saw him again.

"I found these attentions and kindnesses in every shop, great or small. The shopkeeper introduced to me his son or his daughter, who often served as my guide after having served as my interpreter. For some years past all the little schools in London have taught French as well as English: and, before long, French will be the language of the English by choice, as it was by necessity under the Norman kings."

It is quite time to bring this paper to a close. In doing so, I may say, that I have hitherto selected from the first volume only out of the four. M. Grosley's remarks extend over almost every part of our English life and institutions. The national melancholy and pride, the practice of toleration, the Anglican Church and the sects, science, arts, politics, colonies, and a dozen other subjects of interest, occupy the other volumes, and may perhaps, if opportunity should offer, furnish us with materials for another paper.

Meantime, we ought not to part without one or two observations on what we have heard. have been witnessing a strange state of things, considering that it was existing during the lifetime of many with whom we ourselves have spokeu. My own grandmother, who partly brought me up, might, as a child of five years old, have been one of the family who paid M. Grosley such kind attention in Westminster Hall.

Never perhaps has the world seen a century in which the conveniences and facilities of life have as rapidly advanced. During a busy day in London not long since, having my mind full of this book, I could not help putting myself into M. Grosley's place and viewing things with his eyes. What would he have thought of our least and worst streets now, better paved and cared for than the best and widest then? What of the order and quiet of our pavements,-no single combats, no insults to foreigners, no boisterous canaille? What would have seemed to him these tall slim men in dark blue with their queer helmets, looking like Greek warriors dipped in ink, standing immovable in places of resort, or marching like automatons, swinging their arms in measure? Quelle espèce de voiture, think you, would he have pronounced this Hansom cab, which is bowling me so pleasantly along to the Victoria Station? And the Victoria and gently correcting, its evil.

Station itself? Wonder of wonders! what would he have thought, or dreamed in his swoon of bewilderment, when its gigantic palace and its dragons vomiting steam smote his distended eyes? And the result of all this sputter-the breakfast in London and dinner in Paris the same day-could in his time only have been found set down in books of giants and fairies.

But to pass to the other side of the balance.-some few things seem to have been better then than they are now. A foreigner only once cheated during six weeks in England-could that be said in our day? These cheerful and delicate attentions which our friend met with from all ranks above the lowest. I am afraid could not be ensured to him now. We have become a far busier people: we lead two or three lives in one: the mere byplay of an active Englishman now would have been a fatiguing employment for one of the leisurely bas-de-soie men of those days: and as a consequence we have become more jealous of intrusion, and less prodigal of our services to strangers. Our shopmen have no time to accompany a chance Frenchman from Tottenham Court Road to the Marble Arch: and with the want of time has come in also, I fear, want of courtesy. We have transferred all these devoirs to the police, who, it must be confessed, perform them admirably.

Then as I read the chapter on English servants, I own it felt to me like a bit of the torments of Tantalus in the realms below. Many reasons might be given why our domestics are not now what they were then: the chief among them being, I believe, the ever-widening distance between master and man, mistress and maid, which has severed that confidential intercourse which then lingered in English households, and has destroyed their paternal character: producing hauteur and want of sympathy in masters and mistresses, and restlessness and want of attachment on the part of the servants.

Let us bear away the conviction that if, as it is natural we should, we have improved on our grandfathers and grandmothers in almost everything, there yet are a few matters in which they were better than we are. At the same time, let us not forget the wise advice, "Say not thou; Why were the former times better than these? for thou inquirest not wisely concerning this thing."

Each age has its advantages, and, inseparably interwoven with them, its disadvantages also. We must be men of our time. All undue admiration, and all imitation, of other days, is ridiculous, and aims beside the mark. He lives most usefully who lives up to the standard, and imbued with the ideas, of his own age: advancing it onward, by appreciating its good: and ameliorating it, by avoiding,

HOMEWARD.

BY THE EDITOR.

I .- FROM BEYROUT TO SMYRNA.

"The girls are at the tow rope!" So the sailors say when their vessel springs homeward over the waves. But both girls and boys, with their mother, and a larger family in my parish, were at my tow rope, or at my paddles, when the Austrian Lloyd's steamer began to roll in a heavy swell in the roads of Beyrout, and beat the waves as she turned her prow to the north.

Not without the emotions which the vivid remembrance of a short but glorious season of travel awaken, did we see the coast of Syria and the peaks of Lebanon become more and more dim, until the substance of "uplands prodigal with oil"—with field and forest, and the scattered white villas along the steeps, embowered in foliage, connecting the busy commercial town and the country seats of its merchants with the villages and mountain haunts of Druse and Maronite—was lost in masses of shadow relieved against the sky. These soon passed into cloud-land, and the blue expanse of heaven finally descended like a crystal dome, and ere the morrow's morn shut them out for ever from our sight.

The cabin was so hot and muggy, with port-holes shut because of the heavy swell, and with every state-room a hospital, that for the first time in my life I could not rise above the influences of the stifling atmosphere and the creaking ship in which every bit of timber and wainscoting seemed to be going off in a ceaseless round of small explosions. So I lay on the deck with my plaid-the beloved friend of many a journey-and other wrappers over me. I gazed on the magnificent stars above, among which the ship's mast-head was ever and anon describing arcs as the vessel rose and fell; heard more and more indistinctly the wash and hiss of the restless sea; felt less and less the pulse of the engines and beat of the paddles, until I slept as sound as the cabin "companion" beside me. The washing of the decks at early morn awoke me. My plaid was saturated with dew. But I felt refreshed from breathing the pure air; and a cup of coffee elevated me so as to be able to enjoy once more the shoreless sea with its crisp waves, and the glowing eastern sky, and the prospect of a pleasant voyage Homeward.

We arrived next day at Cyprus and landed at Larnaka. We had no time to visit anything of peculiar interest, except what was personal to myself, for I found here an old friend, and a true son of the Scotch manse, Mr. Lang. He was ginning cotton, and seemed very hopeful of greatly extending the cultivation and export of the plant. Cyprus is an island famous for its fertility. It has extensive and rich inland as well as scaboard plains, almost smooth as lakes, surrounded by high sheltering hills and mountains. Locusts are often a scourge here as elsewhere in the East, and I presume they do not make cotton an exception to their merciless attacks on vegetation.

The sail along the coast of this noble island is very beautiful and interesting, but to me it had but one kind of associations-those connected with the spread of Christianity by the Apostle Paul within its borders, and the names of those humble but immortal men who were natives of the place and disciples of Christ. We remembered how Paul, on his first visit to Cyprus, had travelled from Salamis to the east of Larnaka, in sight of those hills, along the whole island for a hundred miles, until he reached old Paphos on the sea coast, and beneath the shadow of Olympus, which towered above us, glowing in the golden hues of sunset, as we sailed along the shore. And we recalled that deeply interesting moment in the history of the Church, when for the first time he came into direct antagonism with Heathendom, and was opposed, in the presence of Sergius Paulus, the Roman governor, by Elymas the sorcerer; and how, as Peter had worked but one miracle of righteous punishment, in the case of the liars Ananias and Sapphira, so Paul worked but one of the same destructive but less severe kind, on Elymas, visiting him with bliudness for a season; and how the governor Paulus was converted-Saul from that day, and possibly for that reason, changing his name to Paul. Nor could we forget that this island was the birthplace of Barnabas the son of consolationsuch a man being a great gift to a sorrowing world. Cyprus also furnished Mnason, "an old disciple," and was among the first spots beyond Palestine to receive the Gospel. It thus became linked in our associations with the Holy Land, and reflected a few beams of that light which shines o'er all its hills and valleys.

The weather was glorious, and there was no seasickness on board, but perfect health, and a disposition on the part of the passengers-English, American, and German - to make one another happy. At times like this there is no such rest to be found upon earth as is found upon the sea. Our captain was a Dalmatian. He was full of humour. and made himself as agreeable as possible. day after dinner he tried to give us just impressions of the various nationalities with whom we might probably have dealings in our journey, and epitomised his information in the following table of wickedness:-"One Armenian = two Greeks; one Greek = two Jews; and all liars." The poor Jew had, in the captain's opinion, the best of it, which is not often the case.

harbour of Rhodes. Unquestionably one of the most interesting places which I have ever visited is this Rhodes. This small island-let those of my readers who know all about it and its knights skip my sketch-is illustrious chiefly from the fact of its once having been the home, the fortress, and the scene of the imperishable conflicts of its "knights." These knights originally belonged to the Hospital of St. John in Jerusalem. After being driven from Acre by the victories of the Saracens, they remained a short time in Cyprus, and then, with the Pope's cordial consent, suddenly attacked Rhodes (1310), at that time belonging to the Greek empire, and held it for two centuries almost as an independent kingdom, with half-a-dozen other islands of considerable size in its neighbourhood, and had even territory on the mainland of Asia Minor-the ancient Halicarnassus, the modern Budrun, having been under their rule. knights were in a certain sense an ecclesiastical body. They were a military order of the Church of Rome. Christianity in those days (and in those days only?) was not recognised sufficiently as a living power or principle which like leaven should pervade the daily life of every man; so that whether he was a soldier or a sailor, a sovereign or a servant, ou the bench or at the bar, a minister in the pulpit or a merchant behind the counter, in every place in which God in his providence placed him, he should adorn the doctrine of God his Saviour; he should let his light, strong or feeble, shine before man-and let his salt, whatever its quantity, if pungent and savoury in its quality, preserve all with whom it came into contact from corruption. Still good men and women, or those who professed to be such by loving "the Church" in its visible and corporate capacity as represented by the then only existing visible society, whose head was in Rome, were enlisted and divided into different regiments, and clothed in the uniform of the Church - whether as nuns, monks, friars (black, white, or grey), or as military knightseach to fight for the one end of defending and advancing the Church against the assaults of the devil, the world, and the flesh. The idea of such organisations was, to say the least of it, very noble, and perhaps in those days was necessary for the protection of the weak against the strong, and to ensure the union which is power. It manifests enormous pride and ingratitude in us, who live in a brighter day-which Roman Catholics, as Reformers thank God, have gained for us-and who receive innumerable benefits derived from such organisations, which did their work in their time, to hold them up as evidences of mere ignorance.

Let us not thus talk of the brave old knights of St. John! As well sneer at their armour because we have Armstrong guns. Alas! many a selfish coward who would fly from any real battle and shut his eyes in fear if he fired a pistol in it, now presumes to despise men who counted not their lives dear to them if they could only save Europe from the furious attacks and apparently irresistible power of the Moslem. Those knights of Rhodes were brave, self-sacrificing men, who consecrated such peculiar gifts as God had given to them, -the strong muscles in their arms, the undaunted look of their eye, the brave lion hearts which beat equably under their cuirasses, the noble blood which flowed in their veins, the glory derived from a heroic ancestry, the honour, the fame, the love of life,all to the Church which they loved, and the Saviour whom they professed to believe in and to adore. With holy ceremonies, which to us have little meaning and less power, they bent before the cross in many a hoary cathedral, and, amidst the gleam of tapers, the sweet voices of responding choristers, the rites performed by white-robed priests and venerable bishops, and under vows that ever after sounded in their ears whether in the silence of their distant island, or amidst the storm or shouts of battle, they laid their swords on the high altar and gave themselves unto death to battle for the faith. Oh, that their chivalry, with its generosity, its courtesy, its spiritual self-sacrifice, would but descend on us who have a more precious gift to answer for, in a fuller knowledge of the will of God!

With warmest sympathies I landed at Rhodes, where those old heroes, like sea kings, from every part of Christendom, had built to themselves a city, not large but wonderfully compact and beautiful—with its great towers and high walls, with fosse and rampart, drawbridge and portcullis, all to resist and beat back in the Levant, as the very Thermopylæ of Christendom, the turbaned savage, who with his scimetar was rushing, like a fierce tiger of lust and ambition to destroy the religion and civilization of Europe.

In spite of the destroying hands of Time and of Turk-and, still more, of earthquakes, that respect neither bond nor free-much remains of the old defences, testifying to their original grandeur. The noble old tower of St. Nicholas flanks the entrance of the harbour, and seems built to defy both Time and Turk. It was built by the Grand Master De Naillac in 1400. In three great square massive storeys, with a turret overhanging at each angle of the parapet, and above an octagonal lautern reached by an outside stair, it rises 150 feet above the harbour. Then comes the Arab tower, with strong battlements on every side; while within the town one ever and anon encounters walls like rocks, ditches broad and deep, gateways worthy of a king's palace, and everywhere memorials of taste and culture.

The whole past became alive—as if we awoke the old knights from a trance, with dim eyes, ragged garments, long beards, rusty armour, and decayed memories—when we walked up the famous "street of the knights." It is situated in a portion of the town called the Castello, and is separated from the other portions by a ditch and wall. Here are the old houses where they once lived—the auberges of the different langues; the palace of the Grand Master: and the hospital, yet roofed with cypresswood, showing few symptoms of decay, and still sheltering the rooms where the sick once lay greaning, thinking, some of them, of "Merrie England," or, maybe, of the "dowie dens of Yarrow," as they were being cured of wounds received in some dread encounter, or as they became wan and pale from fever. Here are the remains of the churches of St. John and St. Catherine where they worshipped, and halls where they sat in council; and here are the effigies beneath which they lie interred. No doubt these old palaces are defaced to some extent with the patchwork of their present poor inhabitants, as are the old houses in Edinburgh or elsewhere in which our noblesse once lived and held their courts, and played their parts whether of politics or of lovefor the Kirk or the State. But one can see at a glauce the structure of the fine old gentlemanly buildings, with the arched entrances, the inner courts, the fine carved windows, the coats of arms of France or of England, of Spain or Italy, with the dates and names as sharply cut as if done vesterday. The French Lodge has the arms of D'Amboise over the door, of date 1492, and the names of Mountjoie and St. Denis, of date 1495. Other inscriptions occur on other houses, as "Pour le maison, 1511"-"Pour l'oratoire, 1511." The Grand Master Capretto has left his escutcheon on another, with date 1519. The entrance gate (D'Amboise) to the castello, with its three-arched bridge, ditch, and drawbridge, is singularly massive and picturesque. Over it is inscribed the escutcheon of the Grand Master, held up by an angel sculptured in relief, and inscribed "Amboise, M.D.XII." In one of the old towers, assigned to the English for defence during the famous siege of Rhodes by the Turks, is an inscription in Latin, of date 1502, to an English knight, "Fr. Thomas Newport."

In walking along this street we met no one. The place was silent as the grave. The very stones which pave it seem to be the same as those which had rung to many a steeled limb. I have never seen any old street so unchanged. All is very real, though very dreamlike. But there was semething to as very peculiar about the whole town. It is not so much like an old citadel as an old university. It is full of quiet nooks, quaint old bits of picturesque architecture, fountains, arches, towers, gateways, buildings-one knew not for what purpose originally designed; with wonderful light and shade, beneath the brilliant sun and blue sky, from balconies, and palm trees, and green foliage of different kinds, flinging their shadows and their colours over markets for fruit and flowers, and all sorts of out-of-the-way looking people and picturesque dresses, wanting the usual accompaniments, however, of the dogs, the noise, and the jabber of an Eastern town. A knightly sense of quiet and a romantic touch of taste and culture rest on the whole place; so that it was with peculiar regret that we returned to the steamer in the evening. As | Hebrides. Let any one day's sail in the Levant to the old story of the Rhodes Colossus, I know no more about it than others, nor have I received any new light upon it from visiting the locality. The harbour is very small, almost entirely artificial: and the blazing giant must have been somewhere very near its entrance, probably where the great tower of St. Nicholas now stands.

As we sailed out of the harbour, and rounded its northern shore, we saw a new sight for the east, a dozen of wind-mills silently but rapidly doing their work. The island also began to reveal its rich luxuriance, and varied scenery of bold upland, green fields, with all the characteristic vegetation and foliage of a genial clime. We saw also more clearly the grand outlines of the coast of Asia Minor, which forms a constant picture of beauty to the people of Rhodes. And then we sailed on through the Archipelago, which has left on my mind an indistinct panorama, in which I can hardly trace the succession in due order of any cape, promontory, island, gulf, or strait. But there floats before my inner eye, and ever will float, a dream of grandeur and beauty; of a landscape made up inland of endless hills of every size and form, changing in their contour and relative position every moment, combining the broken knolls of the Trosachs, the precipices of Skye, with the far off peaks and snowy summits of the Alps; straits of all widths, from " narrows" to broad seas; islands of every size and shape, scattered in every direction, casting their shadows over us, or lost in blue haze; white villages and towns; "ruins famed in story"; long gulfs running into the bowels of the land; countries with old classic and Scripture associations discovered by the map, but with a strange mystery about them, to us at least who know little of their present condition except as the homes of a halfbarbarous, half nomade and robber population, having their dwellings, or dens, like wild beasts, among ruins and remains of ancient grandeur seldom visited, even by artistic Europe. But there was over all the same glorious sky which had shone on the successive races who had lived and died in these lands; and there was the same glorious sea, so fresh and blue, that had curled round the bows of every vessel since the days of the first ship, whether under au Egyptian or Phoenicean captain; and there were the same heavenly colours of gold and amethyst and lapis lazuli, and whatever a burnished rainbow of intensest colour could contribute to the splendour of sunset, such as must have greeted the eyes of the Apostle Paul when he passed to and fro from Europe or Asia to Tyre or Cæsarea.

The glory of the scenery of the whole Greek Archipelago, northwards to the coast of Greece, and eastward to the Dardanelles, has not been exaggerated by travellers. And yet when gazing on the finest portions of it, I was able "with a good conscience," though my good taste may possibly be questioned, to maintain the equal mcrits of my own Western be selected by its most enthusiastic admirers, and let it be compared with a day's sail, which I shall myself take the liberty of selecting, along our western shores, and I will not fear the comparison, but affirm rather that the former must yield the palm to the latter. I would for example choose as my specimen of scenery a sail from Oban to Portree. Let him who would follow that route gaze undisturbed, with a watchful eye, first on the landscape which unfolds itself when crossing the strait from Oban towards Mull, with the hills clustered around Ben Cruachan, and Glenco, and the rocky walls of Morven, Kingareloch, and Ardgour to the west, with the green and broken ridges of Appin that run parallel to them on the east, all trending northwards to Ben Nevis and hemming in the great Caledonian valley: then on the masses of the Mull mountains before him, and the sea channels that spread fanlike in every direction, up the Sound of Mull, the Linne Loch, among the islands towards Jura and Scarba, and the Slate Isles, until beyond the headlands of Mull the shoreless ocean gleams in the horizon; and let this be the first picture on whose beauty and grandeur he is to decide. Then let him voyage along the dark precipiees of Mull to Staffa, and note the scenery of the wild-looking islands fringing the edge of the Atlantic Ocean, that here sends its huge waves rolling in mountain ridges, or seething in tides that rush along in foaming eddies, and let Staffa, with its surroundings, be his second Yet how many more will he see as he rounds the westerly end of Mull, and passes the wild coast of Ardnamurchan, and the islands of Tyrec, Coll, Eig, Canna, Rum, and Barra, with the grand serrated ridges of the Coolin to the north, and gets glimpses of stern and lonely magnificence up dark lochs and inland bays, until he winds his way among the narrows between Skye aud the mainland, and, sailing along the most fantastic rocks, enters the secluded and beautiful harbour of Portree. There is nothing superior to this day's sail in the whole Levant. In one thing, however, the Levant is superior, and that is in atmosphere, which is no small element in the composition of the beautiful. Ah, it is this rain, this mist, this drizzle, which ever mars the glory, and somewhat affects the morals, of Scotland. True, there do occur some days in the year, in May and October, which are so very superb that one could patiently wait under an umbrella for weeks, or months even. until they were ready,-days when our skies are more blue than in the South, -when our clouds are more picturesque-when every scaur and rock are revealed, and the stones gleam and glitter on the far-off mountain side, and when there are colours, purple and golden yellow, from mountain, rock, and forest, with shadows on the lochs and on the sea, which can be surpassed nowhere on earth. But such days seem to be but moments of leisure for the manufacture of an extra quantity of rain; for after one of rare brilliancy, the next is sure to change the world into a shower bath and the most genial nature into miserable discontent wrapped in a steaming waterproof. It is otherwise in the Levant, where one can depend for days and weeks on that luminous atmosphere, in which the landscape is steeped in an indescribable delicacy of rich and varied colours, and a luxurious warmth gives delicionsness to the breeze, while the sea reflects the azure blue of the sky—and the old earth is one grand poem, and all nature, as "the art of God," seems to necessitate and to create art by man.

As we voyaged along from Rhodes to Smyrna, the first place we passed which suggested historical incidents was Cnidus. A view of it is given in the accompanying illustration, which is taken from Dr. Clarke's Travels, and is wonderfully correct. The bluff rugged rocks form the termination of Cape Crio, anciently called the Triopian promontory. This headland is united to the mainland, a mile or two off, judging from appearances, by a narrow isthmus, on each side of which, north and south, are two harbours, which owe whatever shelter they possess to the promontory that spreads its protecting rocky arms to defend both from the outer sea and gales. On the mainland the ruins of the old city are scattered, and were seen by us with great distinctness. One of the harbours, that to the north, is evidently small, and such as one sees on stormy coasts as a sort of refuge for fishing boats; the other, with moles or breakwaters, one of which remains, formed a most valuable harbour for all vessels sailing along the coast.

There was a time, three centuries or more before Christ, when there clustered over those rough rocks of the cape-like sea birds on the Bass or Ailsa Craig-the inhabitants of Cnidus, to witness the Trafalgar of their day, when Conon along with his Persian fellow commander, aided by Phænician vessels and sailors, destroyed the fleet of Sparta under Pisander, and established the naval supremacy of Athens over the islands of the Archipelago, thereby greatly affecting the future history of Greece. But again St. Paul comes before us! For it was from this promontory the ship in which he sailed had to bear away to the south-west for Crete. Previous to this he had been beating against an adverse breeze from the N.W. during the whole voyage from Cæsarea to Cnidus; first to the north of Cyprus, then to Myra, where he changed from one ship bound for the Hellespont to another bound for Rome. The heavy wind continuing they had to beat all the way to Cnidus, and there no doubt anchored under the lee of the land in the harbour on the south side of the isthmus. But they could not weather the cape, where the gale would meet them without any shelter whatever, and so they borc away before the wind to Crete and its fair havens-on to the shipwreck at Malta.

It was another living touch from the past to look at those far-spread ruins, at that silent and deserted harbour, and at that dark old headland, and feel assured that St. Paul had gazed on all. Weary of the long, cold, stormy voyage-a prisoner, too, and one whom few of the 260 people on board knew anything about, except as an apparently weak, sickly man-a Jew guilty of some offence of which they thanked God they were innocent, yet one who was wonderfully peaceful and kind withal to those with whom he conversed, he exercised a mysterious influence, which sprung like an unseen but felt electric force from his character, until at the end of the voyage, and at daybreak, when the ship was plunging and tearing at her anchors amidst the roar of the hurricane and the cataracts of whirling seas and spray, they saw him rise like a calm sun above the storm, and thank God with divine peace in the presence of them all for the food which, with brotherly love, he had requested all to receive for their health and comfort. Such thoughts as these may be pardoned when mentioning Cnidus, where began the second stage of that most famous voyage of danger and strange vicissitude.

After passing Cnidus and Cos—the birthplace, by the way, of Apelles the artist, and of Hippocrates the physician—we sighted Budrun, the ancient Halicarnassus, and saw with singular vividness its castle near the sea, and its scattered white houses and ruins, where we knew there were many deeply interesting remains of ancient art, but which, like many a "Yarrow," whether of poetry, history, or science, must be "unseen, unknown" to us. Let us not complain. Perhaps in a wider and deeper sense than most suspect, far less believe, it may yet hold true of many a subject of inquiry and scientific study even as regards this world, "what ye know not now ye shall know hereafter."

We had to change steamers at Smyrna.

The sail up the gulf of Smyrna is one of the most beautiful in the world. But of the famous city itself I have few associations worth recording; the reason being that—alas for my praise of the climate! -it rained very heavily the only unbroken day we had to spare for sight-seeing. I remember well how a boat intercepted us on landing, in which were two robbers calling themselves Custom-house officers, who demanded backsheesh, and I am sorry to say got it, in order not to examine our luggage, in which we had no contraband; and how we had to repeat the dose on landing; and how, when the same trick was attempted on departure, we had a long dispute, in which we carried the day by permitting the robbers to open every package, refusing, to their bitter anger, to give them a farthing. remember also a most kind and highly intelligent missionary, Mr. Coull, of the Church of Scotland, coming to comfort and guide us, and doing all that man could do for fussy travellers in wet weather. And I remember Dr. M'Graith, whom every one knows as doctor and friend: and I remember, too, the Deaconess' Institution. And here I must pause and say a word about this latter.

The "constant readers" of Good Words—if the world contains such sensible people—must remember more than one notice in its pages of the Dea-Asia Minor.

coness' Institution at Kaiserswerth, founded by that old saint, Dr. Fliedner, now gone to his rest! I visited it with some dear friends, as was noticed also in these pages, a few years ago. Well, one of its branches—that is to say, an establishment under Protestant deaconesses, taught where Miss Nightingale was taught-was established in Smyrna, as at Jerusalem and other places, for bestowing a Christian education (in the deepest and truest sense of the word) upon the young, and for educating orphans, attending the sick, and in one word preaching the everlasting Gospel of good-will to man, not by words only, but by the most real, impressive, and convincing of all kinds of preaching-a life which the human heart can in some degree appreciate and admire more than any other, and which is confessedly derived from, and sustained by, faith in Jesus Christ, and an entering into his love to man as bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh.

This Smyrna institution began with two deaconesses only. They had hardly any money, except what old Fliedner had lent them, to help to keep them alive for a time, and, according to his principle, to be repaid again to the common fund in the small but wisely and earefully managed treasury on the Rhine. The whole work of those two sisters was one of pure love. They had no income whatever. They had to furnish their own room, be their own servants. and teach all whom they could find willing to receive their services. Yet who can meet that sister who first began the work thirteeu or fourteen years ago, and who now superintends it, without feeling that we have met a noble Christian lady, fit in her humility, faith, and works of faith and love, to carry off the palm from many a knight of Rhodes! The institution, which had such a small and humble beginning, has had, like all God's works, a slow, steady growth. Having sown plentifully, because in faith, they have already reaped bountifully. Their present buildings are clean, airy, large, and beautiful; with pleasant grounds around them, and having that aspect of European comfort, order, and elegance, without tawdry expense, which of itself is a lesson to the East. They are worth 10,000l.! but are too precious as a history of the past to be sold. Dr. Fliedner raised much of the original cost, which was small, but every farthing borrowed has been nearly paid back. There are now twelve sisters connected with the institution. It educates 200 girls: 80 are boarders at the rate of 600 francs each per annum; 70 others are but day scholars, and pay 260 francs per annum when they dine, and but 150 francs for education merely. About twelve orphans are educated gratis; and, besides these, about 40 girls, among the 200 who dine together daily, do so gratis. The gross income of the institution is about 2,500l. per annum. As all the work in it is done by the sisters without any pay whatever, a noble monument is thus raised to the self-sacrificing power of Christian principle, and it must soon become a centre of influence to bless

We regretted much that it was impossible for us to visit Ephesus, to which there is a train from Smyrna! The journey can be performed to and fro very easily in a day, affording time to visit the place, and its immediate environs. Nor could we even visit the spots made illustrious by Polycarp, that angel verily of the Church of Smyrna. Little time, and especially much rain, destroyed plans which we would otherwise have carried out with little inconvenience.

We left Smyrna in the evening, and very soon it got dark as black marble, and began to blow with furious gusts which angrily tore the small waves of the inland sea into spindrift. The captain seemed nervous and fidgety, and every command he issued was obeyed with a rushing to and fro, and loud excited talk, which one never sees on any occasion whatever on board of a British ship. The result was that, having no lights on shore to guide us, and seeing nothing beyond the ship but "storm and darkness, which are wondrous strong," we slowly paddled back and forward all night, or stopped to breathe, while I as usual went below to sleep, but not to dream, for, as I always pay attention to the former, I have no time to devote to the latter.

Our next halting-place was Syra, en route to Athens. But we must stop here for the present—though for no reason that I know of, except that I have no time to write more.

THE JEW PEDLAR.

By no class of the community is systematic benevolence so scrupulously practised as by the Jews; at least, those resident in England. An exception might probably be made in favour of the Quakers; but, great as their philanthropy really is, that of the Hebrew possesses certain attributes which render it the more remarkable of the two. Both are equally liberal to those in distress out of the pale of their own communities, but among the Quakers the proportion of poor is particularly small, not exceeding two, or, at most, two and a-half per cent. of the whole body. Among the London Jews, on the contrary, the proportion of poor is very large, amounting to at least sixteen and a-half per cent., and yet they are all maintained without the help of the poor-law. Indeed the Jews frequently seem to consider the act of alms-giving as a sort of prudential investment, for which they will most probably be repaid in this world, and certainly in the next, with profit on the transaction. I have met with several instances of this; the following alone I will quote, as showing the sort of feeling I allude to.

I resided in a village about half way between two towns in the midland counties. One day I left home at a somewhat early hour to call on a neighbour. On my return I found my wife in a state of angry excitement at a trick, or swindle, which had been perpetrated on one of our servants, an ignorant country girl of about seventeen years of age, who had very lately quitted her father's cottage to enter our service. It appeared that a Jew pedlar had called at the side entrance, and had contrived to get into conversation with the girl. This ended in his showing her a quantity of mock jewellery, and selling her a large showy brooch, which he assured her was pure gold, and the stone genuine. The moment I saw it I perceived it was simply copper slightly washed over with gold, and as for the stone, it was, of course, nothing but a piece of coloured glass. The sum he had obtained from the silly girl for this tawdry ornament was certainly only five shillings; but as the thing was not worth more than one, the rascality of the transaction was the same. My wife's displeasure soon communicated itself to me; so without asking more questions on the subject than simply to inquire which road the fellow had taken, I left the house in pursuit of him, although he had had fully an hour's start of me. The day was close and sultry, and I had been considerably fatigued by my previous morning's walk. Still, my just indignation kept me from feeling any weariness, and I trudged manfully along, totally indifferent to the looks of curiosity and wonder those I met cast on me.

After more than an hour's rapid walk, I overtook the man I was in pursuit of. He was about forty years of age, slimly built, and very pale, evidently suffering either from illness or fatigue. On his back he carried a wooden box with little drawers in it; but, small as it was, he appeared to labour under its weight. As soon as I had somewhat recovered my breathing, I inquired of him if he was the man who had sold a brooch to my servant?

"Where do you live?" he asked, somewhat sharply.

I explained to him the position of my house, and he replied-

"Yes, I did; and a great bargain it was. It was worth double the money I got for it."

"How can you tell me such a barefaced lie?" I angrily remarked. "Why, I never saw a more trumpery thing in my life. You have swindled the silly girl out of her money, and you shall be well punished for it, I can assure you. Come back with me directly."

"What for, I should like to know?"

"Because I intend giving you in charge to the constable for swindling."

"Very likely indeed," he replied, continuing his

My anger now exceeded all bounds, and I seized him by the collar. I may here state that I am a very strong man, and that the Jew was no match

"If you do not come quickly," I said, "I will make you."

He seemed for a moment somewhat puzzled; but, recovering himself, he said,

"Let me alone; I will go with you quietly; but mark my words, you will get the worst of it."

We now turned towards the village, and I loosened my grasp of his collar. As we walked along, I from time to time looked at him, and perceived from the expression of his countenance that the tone of bravado he had assumed was entirely simulated, and that he was evidently most anxious about the termination of the affair. Soon his pace began to slacken, and I told him to walk faster. For a moment he obeyed me: but after continuing a few steps, he threw himself on a bank.

"If you want me to go with you," he said, "you must carry me. I am not well. I have had no breakfast this morning, and I am so faint I cannot walk any farther."

At first I thought he might be shamming, but a moment's glance at his countenance proved to me I was in error. His pallor had increased, and yet a heavy perspiration was on his brow. I now began to look on him with some sort of sympathy, and my anger began to abate; still my pride would not allow him to perceive it.

"Are you not ashamed of yourself," I asked him. "to rob a poor silly girl in the manner you have plundered my servant? You low Jews are a perfeet nuisance to the country."

"Low Jews are better than low Christians, at any rate," he said.

"Pray, in what way?"

"Did you ever hear of a low Jew being taken up for ill-treating his wife and family? I dare say you have heard of some Christians who have."

I made him no answer.

"Did you ever hear of a low Jew being taken up for being drunk and disorderly?"

"Still," I said, "you have not answered my question about my servant."

"I have a right to make a profit on what I sell as well as other people."

"And you consider charging five shillings for a thing that is not worth one a fair profit?" I

"I tell you it is worth more than a shilling; and have not I a right to be paid for my labour?"

"Your labour?"

"Yes, my labour. Look at those shoes," he said, lifting up his feet to show me how worn and dilapidated his shoes were. "Look at those. They were new when I left London, and now they will hardly hold together. How many failes do you think I must have walked? I have not walked less than ten miles this morning, and the brooch I sold to your servant is the only money that has passed through my hands this day. And what she paid me is the only ready money I have in the

The fellow said this with so much truthfulness of expression, that my heart fairly melted towards

"Listen," I said: "if you are really as poor as you say, I do not wish to be hard with you. Take back the brooch you sold my servant, and give me back the money she paid you, and I will let you

"I have no objection," he replied, "though I deny that I have dealt unfairly with her."

I now gave him the brooch, which he placed beside him, and he then put his hand into his pocket to find his money. He succeeded, however, in producing only four shillings and sixpence.

"There is still sixpence wanting," I said.

"I will give it you directly," he replied, and he drew out from another pocket a leathern bag, from which he took several small packets wrapped up carefully in paper, all of which evidently contained money, and, picking out the smallest, he drew off the paper envelope, and produced a sixpence. My anger now returned, and I asked him how he could tell me such a falsehood as that he had no more money than the sum my servant had paid him.

"I told you the truth," he said; "this is God's money and not mine. I don't know, after all," he continued, "why I should not use it for myself. Heaven seems to have forsaken me, and it's no use my setting the money aside. Nothing goes well with me, do what I will,"

He now bent his head forward and covered his eyes with his hands, and I could easily perceive he had great difficulty in restraining his tears.

"What do you mean," I inquired, "by Heaven having forsaken you?"

"Because nothing I attempt succeeds. I do all I can to get on, but it's no use. I am ill and starving myself, and my wife and children at home are nearly as badly off as I am."

"Perhaps if you took to dealing more fairly with your fellow-creatures things might not go so badly with you."

"If my fellow-creatures alone had to complain, I could go on well enough. I did not deal fairly with Heaven. I broke faith there, and I am now suffering for it."

"How did you break faith with Heaven?" 1

"It's somewhat of a long story," he said, "and I don't suppose it would interest you much if I told it to you."

"Try me," I said, "for you fairly excite my curiosity."

"Very well, I will if you wish it," he replied, wrapping up the brooch in paper. "It may be a lesson to you never to break a bargain you have made with Heaven."

"To begin at the beginning, I do not remember my poor mother. She died when I was very young. My father (I may as well tell the truth) was not then a very respectable man, and I am sorry to say he was very often in trouble."

"Was he unfortunate?" I inquired.

"Well, I don't know exactly about that, but he said he was always being persecuted by the police. I don't know what for, for I didn't see much of him. However, I went to school, and I managed to pick up some little learning."

"But if your father was such an indifferent parent, how was it he sent you to school?"

"He did not. A lady from the West End sent me there, and a good many other poor boys as well. Our rich people are very kind both to women and children. When I left school I tried to pick up a living in the streets, but not with much success. I was half starved, for I could earn but little, and father did nothing for me. This I will say, however, that if he did wrong himself, he always told me to behave honestly; indeed, I should always have thought him an honest man if I had not known of his being several times in prison. Things went on in this way till I was about fifteen years old, when father married again."

"Did he marry a respectable person?" I inquired.

"Yes, he did; and she was as excellent a woman as ever breathed. One that would never allow an unclean thing to come into her house, and always had a good wash every Friday, if water was ever so scarce, and it very often was where she lived. She kept the shop at the corner of Frying-pan Alley and Hand and Shears Court, Rosemary Lane. Perhaps you may remember the house?"

"No, I do not. Did she deal in old clothes?"

"No; she was in the fried fish and stuffed mon-key line."

"Stuffed monkeys!" I said, with astonishment.

"Yes; and very nice they are too—our children are very fond of them."

"You don't mean to say they eat such disgusting things as stuffed monkeys? And where can they possibly get them from?"

"No, certainly; I don't mean real monkeys," he said, in a tone of great indignation; "how could you think I did? Our people are quite as particular in what they eat as you Christians are, I can tell you. Stuffed monkeys are cakes filled with ground almonds and plums. We call them stuffed monkeys to induce the children to eat them. Bolas, bullseyes, wafflers, and stuffed monkeys are all called so because we must give names that will please, otherwise people would not buy.

"No sooner had my father married Mrs. Solomons than a complete change came over him. He now went to synagogue every Sabbath, although I believe he had never set his foot in it for ten years before; and he made regular offerings and gave gifts to the poor. But there was another change in him as well: good luck now seemed to follow him in everything he did. He dealt in job lots, while mother minded the business at home; and as I was not very strong I used to stop with her and help her, and very kind she was to me, and I was very fond of her. She was a fine large woman, very careful, and a capital hand at her business. All the week days she never stirred from the house, for father bought her fish for her, but on Sabbaths she always went out and took me with her. At home, like a good many of our women, she was not particular about her dress; but on Sabbaths it was very different. She used then to dress like a queen, and as she walked down Houndsditch of a fine afternoon, everybody would turn round and look at her, Christians and all; and not a little proud was I of being seen with her.

"Father contrived to get on and evidently made money; but he was very quiet about it, and if he spoke to mother on the subject it was never in my presence. But the thing which used to surprise me was that, although he could easily have afforded to move to a better neighbourhood, he would never quit the place we lived in, though it was certainly very inconvenient in many ways. In the first place, we had only two rooms, both on the ground floor. The front one served for the shop, and the back one for father and mother's bed-room, and to fry the fish in."

"Where did you sleep?" I inquired.

"In the front room."

"What! with the fried fish?"

"Yes, and the unfried too; and sometimes it was not pleasant. However, father would not move, and there we stayed.

"After father had been married about six years, my mother-in-law died suddenly. I was very sorry to lose her, for she was really a good woman and had been a real mother to me; but my sorrow was nothing to father's; he was pretty nigh brokenhearted about her. In fact he never held up his head thoroughly afterwards. He used to continue his business, but you could easily see he had no heart for it. Sometimes he would stop at home for days together, quite low-spirited. By degrees, however, he recovered a little, and he used to send me out to sell different lots he had bought, while he remained in the house and occupied himself in frying the fish, a thing he had never once done when poor mother was alive. By degrees he seemed to take quite an interest in this, and I believe he found a solace in it, as it reminded him of his wife. At last he got so fond of the occupation that he proposed moving, and starting in a better neighbourhood where he could extend the business. described to me the double plate-glass front he intended having for his new shop, with glass chandeliers inside, and fried fish ou one side as you entered, and confectionery and cakes on the other."

"'I know the sort of shop you mean,' I said, 'I saw a very handsome one the other day with sweets on one side, and fried plaice and ecl-pies on the other.'

"'No such thing,' he said, sharply; 'or if you did, it was not kept by a Jew.'

"' How do you know that?'

"Because of the eel-pies. No Jew would sell such beastly trifer as that, however poor he might be.'

" But I don't see why selling eel-pies is worse than selling fried plaice.'

"'I am sorry you have no more religion,' he said." "At first," he continued, "I was much pleased to hear my father speak in this manner, but at last I found the attractions of the old place were too much for him, and I let him talk on without taking much notice of what he said.

"One day I had been out trying to sell a job lot of pickles I had bought a bargain, without doing much good. As nobody would buy in any quantity, and as the weather was very wet, and I had got a cold, I determined on returning home. When I arrived I found father at the fire cooking some fish, as usual. I sat down by his side and noticed he was far paler than usual; something was evidently on his mind, for he did not appear to pay any attention to the bad luck I had had, and which I was describing to him, although generally he was most anxious on all business matters. When I had done he continued the same silence, making no remark whatever, but looking after his fish, while I was drying my cap, which was wet. Presently father says, 'Isaac, my son, I feel very ill,' and he got up from his chair, but he fell back in it again and fainted. I was dreadfully frightened at first, but I had strength enough to lift him up and place him on the bed. I then took the fish off the fire in case of an accident, and was on the point of leaving the house to fetch a doctor when father recovered enough to speak to me. Seeing I had my cap in my hand he asked why I was going to leave the house. 'Because you are so ill,' I said, 'I am going for the doctor.' 'Don't do anything of the kind, my boy,' he replied. 'It will only be throwing away money without any use. I know perfectly well I am going to die, and no doctor can do me any good.' I was very sorry to hear the old man talk in this way, for he was not one to be easily frightened. I said to him, however, 'Oh, you are alarming yourself without cause. You are only low-spirited, and you'll be better to-morrow.' 'I shall never leave this bed again,' he replied. 'But now I want you to make me a promise, and if you do not do so, it will make me very unhappy; but if you do as I ask you, I shall die contented.' 'What is it you want, father?' I said. 'I want you to swear to me that you will never miss going to synagogue, and that you will every year put by a tenth part of your profit as offerings for the poor. Never mind if it seems a large sum of money, God will pay it you back with interest. He is never in debt to anyone. You will make a good bargain of it in this world, or the next, or both, depend upon it. I have done it from the time I married my poor wife till to-day, and it has paid capital interest, for the money I have spent on God's poor has doubled itself over and over again, as perhaps you will find out some day. Before I did so, nothing ever as circumstances were altered, I boldly asked her went well with me; since that time, nothing in money matters has gone wrong.' 'Father,' I said, 'I will promise you what you ask.' 'But I want you to swear it,' he said, 'for it is not with me you are to make the bargain, but with God. Put on your cap, and do it solemnly.' I put on my cap, wet as it was, and reverently called Heaven to witness (my father dictating the words), that I would attend synagogue regularly every Sabbath; that I would give a tithe of my profits to the poor, and that I would never do a dishonest action, in the hope that God's blessing would be upon me, either in this world, or the next, or both. 'That will do, Isaac my son,' said my father. 'I shall now die happy. When I am gone, open the box under my bed. It has a false bottom. which you can open by pressing the top righthand corner, and you will there find God has returned with profit all that I had laid out on his poor in his behalf.'

"I ain't a very devout man, but I must say that after I had taken the oath I felt a sort of certainty that God had heard me, and would keep to his part of the agreement; and I felt both

"Poor father only lived a week longer, and after his funeral the first thing I did was to open the false bottom of the box, when to my great surprise, I found in it ten one hundred pound notes. For some time, I could hardly believe my eyes. I knew father had made some good bargains, and that he must have realised some money, but I had no idea of its being such an amount. a few days, however, I became more accustomed to my new wealth, and I began to consider how I should invest it. I soon determined to give up the fried fish line, and to enter into some better kind of business. I gave up the rooms, and took lodgings for myself in a decent house in Whitechapel. It was a very difficult matter to determine what trade I should follow, and the difficulty was increased by my mind being at the time occupied with another matter. I was, and had been, for some time, over head and ears in love with a Miss Miriam Cohen, whose father kept a clothes shop by the Tower. He was a very respectable man, although his business was a very small one. His wife was also a very good woman, and had brought up her family of fourteen children, with great care and affection. Miriam, her eldest, was about nineteen years of age. She was a very handsome girl, good-tempered, and an excellent manager in the house, and she was also of great use, to her father in his business. Of course she had no money, but I did not mind that, as with a capital of a thousand pounds I felt pretty sure I should be able to get on in the world. Miriam understood well enough that I loved her, but, of course, I had never proposed for her to her parents, unable, as I had been, up to that time, to keep a wife; but now, father's permission, which he readily granted, and we were shortly afterwards married.

"I did not, at the time, tell her father of all the money I had got, as I thought it more prudent to keep it to myself. After I was married, however, I told Miriam the truth, and she always kept my secret. We now took a house in the Commercial Road.

"The house was small, but at the back there was a large warehouse, which was very convenient, as I had determined on going into business, as a general dealer, especially in such things as emigrants were likely to require. I took great care in making my purchases, generally attending bankrupt sales, and buying large quantities of goods, which I sold at a good profit. Everything in fact seemed to prosper with me, so much so, indeed, that at the end of a year, after paying all expenses of living, house-rent, &c., I found I had a nett profit of 150l. The first thing I did was to put apart 15l. for offerings and the poor. Miriam thought it was a good deal of money, for our expenses might increase, and she wanted some new clothes for the baby, which would soon require to be short-coated. She also said she should herself want a new dress, and a good many other things, but I told her how well the system had paid with my father, and that I had promised to continue it myself, so she made no more objections, and all passed off pleasantly enough.

"My second year was more fortunate for me even than the first, and I made three hundred pounds profit, although my expenses had been increased by Miriam's presenting me with another child; however, she made no demur to the tenth of the money being set apart for offerings, and I placed 30l. aside for that purpose. Things continued to prosper with me for the next five years, although we had removed to the fashionable quarter of Bloomsbury. I must say this was rather against my inclination, but Miriam said as we were now getting quite genteel, we ought to mix with genteel people; besides that, I may as well tell the truth, she was rather fond of dress and jewellery."

"I beg your pardon," I said, interrupting him in his narrative, "but was she fond of the same sort of jewellery as that you sold my servant?"

"I am sorry to say it was not the same kind she was fond of," he said, slowly and sorrowfully; "quite the coutrary. But," he continued, in a pleading tone, "she was not much to be blamed for it after all, for all our women are fond of things of the kind. Besides, a better wife than she has been to me never lived. She is not one of those Jewesses who stuff themselves with oysters, and all sorts of unclean things, and then tell their husbands that they laid out the money in pickled salmon and salted cucumbers."

"You do not mean to say that Jewesses are ever guilty of such conduct."

"I am sorry to say they are," he replied, "though there is less of it now than there used to be." "How is that?"

"Well, formerly we had very few Jewish doctors, and Christian ones used to attend our women, who told them to say that different sorts of unclean food was necessary for them in their delicate state of health. But now we have a good many more Jewish doctors, and they ain't so easily humbugged.

"But to go on with my story. Things continued to prosper with me so well, that on balancing my accounts at the end of the ninth year I found I had made a clear profit of one thousand pounds. Up to this time, I had faithfully kept my word with Heaven, and I took up my pen to draw a cheque for one hundred pounds. As soon as I had filled it in, and before signing it, I looked at it for some time. At last, I said to myself, 'One hundred pounds is a great deal of money. My expenses are increasing. Miriam had another child last year (that made eight), and I can't afford this any longer.' I then tore up the cheque, hoping Heaven would take the same view of the case I did, and I drew another for seventy-five.

"I must say my conscience was not particularly easy with respect to the transaction, but I endeavoured to stifle any unpleasant feeling by plunging more deeply than ever into business speculations. Success still followed me, and I began to think I had been extravagant in the amount of charity I had already given. Before, however, the termination of the year had arrived, I met with a very heavy bad debt, which sorely reduced the amount of my profits. When balancing my accounts, I found that although my transactions had been on a far larger scale than usual, I had realised over and above my expenditure barely seven hundred pounds. This annoyed me greatly, and for some time I doubted whether I ought, all circumstances considered, to set aside anything; but better thoughts followed, and I resolved to devote a portion of my profits to good works, although I would be perfectly justified, remembering the heavy loss I had sustained, in greatly reducing the proportionate amount. For some time, I was undecided what the sum should be, and at last I drew the cheque for forty pounds.

"Another year followed, and my success was but small, so much so, in fact, that my nett profits did not exceed two hundred pounds. This terrible falling off made me resolve to give nothing. I endeavoured almost to persuade myself that Heaven had not acted fairly by me. Miriam also approved of my resolution, and told me it was far more natural for me to think of my own children, than give to those who were strangers to me. I also left off attending the synagogue, partly because I did not like to face the Rabbi, who, I was afraid, would remind me of my want of charity, and partly that I thought it was no use going there, as I got no good by it.

"To make a long story short, nothing ever afterwards succeeded with me, and in one year I lost almost all my capital. We sold off everything in the house at Bloomsbury, with the exception of my wife's jewellery, which she would not part with, urging as a reason that if things went worse with us, we could always raise money on it. This I knew was only an excuse, but I said nothing, as she had put up with our change in circumstances with great good humour.

"We now removed to a small house near the London Docks, and with the money I had left I opened a tobacconist's shop. But by it we hardly contrived to gain enough to keep body and soul together, so I determined to see if I could not earn a little more money by dealing in smuggled tobacco. For a time this succeeded tolerably well, and I thought I had got a lift again; but one morning some officers entered the house with a search warrant, and more than two hundredweight of foreign smuggled tobacco was found on the premises. The government prosecuted me, and, as I could not pay the fine, I was sent to prison, utterly ruined. When I was liberated, after six months' imprisonment, I found my wife and family in great misery, indeed they had hardly decent clothes to stand upright in; and their pale faces showed too well the want of food from which they had suffered. Everything belonging to me, with the exception of my wife's jewellery which she had contrived to secrete, had been seized by my creditors, and her jewels had been sold one by one to pay the cost of my defence, and the maintenance of herself and nine children during my imprisonment, till she had nothing left but a gold chain and a pair of gold ear-rings.

"I had now to begin the world again, without money, without friends, and without reputation; and these difficulties were again increased by my large and utterly helpless family. However, I determined not to be cast down, but to try what I could do to earn a livelihood. Before commencing any proceedings, I went up to my bed-room, put my hat on my head, and reverently prayed that I might be forgiven for the wicked manner in which I had broken through the bargain I had made, and entreated that, as I intended fully to keep to it for the future, a blessing might fall on my exertions.

"I must say, when I had finished my prayer I felt greatly encouraged, and on leaving the room I immediately began my preparations. I first went with Miriam into a little by-street leading out of the Commercial Road, and hired two small rooms in a house in it for my wife and family. I then took my wife's gold chain and ear-rings to a pawnbroker's, and on them raised seven pounds. Three of these I gave to Miriam, with two more I paid for this pedlar's case with its drawers complete; and with the remaining two, and three more which I borrowed from the Jewish Benevolent Society, I purchased a stock of jewellery, and my necessary shoes and clothing, and I then started on my journey on foot, resolving to put by a tithe of my profits for the use of God and the poor; and the money you saw in my bag was set apart for that purpose. But, although I have faithfully kept my oath, nothing has succeeded with me; I have hardly been able to send enough to my wife to pay for her bread alone, and to do that I have been obliged to live so poorly that I am half starved myself; and, as I told you before, I have not eaten a morsel of bread this blessed day. I begin to think Heaven did not listen to me, and refuses to have anything more to do with me. I am thoroughly down-hearted and broken-spirited, and I don't care what becomes of me."

The poor fellow here fairly burst into a flood of tears, and my sympathy for him and his troubles became very great.

"Do not despair yet," I said to him, almost adopting at the moment his own eccentric theological views on the subject of systematic offerings, "but continue your good resolutions a little longer. A change may yet come over your prospects; nor are you justified in thinking that the mercy of Heaven will not be extended to you, if your repentance be sincere. I will not change my resolution about my servant's brooch; but, as you say you have eaten nothing to day, I shall have much pleasure in offering you your breakfast. If you do not mind accepting half-a-crown, there is one for you."

The Jew looked wistfully for a moment at the money in my hand, and then with that courtesy which seems inherent in the Hebrew race, and which even the lowest Jew can bring into play when he pleases, he rose from the bank on which he had been seated, and said:

"No, thank you, sir, I cannot take it. It is very kind on your part, but I have never yet received nor asked for charity, and I will not begin now if I can help it. At the same time," he continued, in a cajoling tone of voice, "as I am very poor, and much in want of mouey, you would greatly oblige me if you would buy some article of jewellery of me. I have some beautiful things here," he said, opening successively two or three of the little drawers in his pack, and displaying some tawdry, flashy ornaments, "and I will sell you any of them very cheap. It's a job lot I bought a bargain, and all these things are worth twice as much to a dealer as I will sell them to you for."

I am almost ashamed to make the confession, gentle reader, but a quarter of an hour afterwards I was seen bending my steps homewards in deep thought, turning over anxiously in my mind what excuse I should make to the wife of my bosom for having ten shillings' worth of sham jewellery in my pocket, instead of bringing back in custody the rascally Jew who had swindled our maid-servant.

I was fated to meet my wandering Jew again. I had occasion to make a journey to Hull on some business matters, and on passing through one of the back streets my attention was attracted by the sight of a large showy Jew outlitter's shop. The collection of clothes and nautical necessaries, commonly to be found in establishments of the kind, was either visible inside the shop windows or exposed for sale on hooks on the outside. At the moment of my passing, the master of the shop was in deep conversation with a sailor, whom he was persuading to buy a most impracticable, uncomfortable, and apparently waterproof pair of trowsers. They were of a dull yellow colour, as if impregnated with some preparation of rosin; and, judging from their look, so utterly stiff and inflexible, that if their wearer should attempt to sit down it would be impossible for him to succeed without breaking his trowsers.

The momentary glance I gave at the Jew salesman on passing told me I had seen his face before, and the next instant I recognised the features of the pedlar. To be certain on the subject, I waited a short distance off till the conversation he was holding with the sailor should terminate. It lasted longer than I expected, and was carried on with great animation on both sides; but at last the sailor walked off without purchasing. I now advanced towards the Jew, but as I got nearer to him my conviction of his identity began to get very uncertain. The man I had met was thin, pale, sickly, and hungry looking. The one before me, though not florid, had a healthy countenance, with a somewhat jovial expression on it, and in person was rather inclined to be stout than otherwise. But if there was any doubt in my mind as to his being the pedlar, there was none in his that I was the individual he had had the conversation with. He seemed much pleased to see me, and expressed himself warmly to that effect.

"I should hardly have thought you would have remembered me," I said.

"Oh, there was no fear of my forgetting you," he replied. "From the moment I met you things took a change for the better with me, and a fortnight afterwards I had sold the whole of my stock. I returned to London and purchased a lot more, which also went off very rapidly. But as I got on I began to be tired of always being away from my wife and family, and I determined that as soon as I could get enough together I would start in the clothes line. Twelve months after our meeting I took a small house in Hull, and commenced that way of business. Things continued to prosper with me, till at last I rented these two houses, threw them into one, and put in that handsome glass front, and I tell you honestly I have no right to complain. Several of my children are now old enough to help me in my trade, and very good and useful children they are."

"Have you kept regularly to your bargain?" I said,

"I have," answered he, "although I don't like any longer to hear it called by that name. I have never missed a single attendance at synagogue, nor ever omitted my offerings for the poor; and if I have not got on as quickly as I did when I first started in life, I have every reason to be thankful. But come inside, and let me introduce you to my wife."

He now led the way into a little and somewhat dark back parlour, where I found his wife and some of the younger children. He rapidly explained to her who I was, for she appeared perfeetly acquainted with the whole adventure, and she received me in the most friendly manner. She was a tall and very bulky Jewess, had evidently been good-looking, and there were even still considerable remains of her former beauty left. I cannot without gross exaggeration say that she was neat in her person. She showed prominently, by her utter contempt for the utility and comfort of stays, one of the marks of the Eastern origin of her race. She showed also another characteristic-a love of jewellery; for in her ears were two large shining gold ear-rings, while a thick gold chain was round her neck. I sat chatting with her and her husband for some time. When I rose to depart. the latter conducted me to the shop door.

"My wife has often said she should like to see you," he remarked, "but she little thought when she got up this morning that her wish would come to pass."

"Perhaps," I replied, with proper humility, "she may be disappointed with me, after all. By-theby, what a handsome pair of ear-rings those were in her ears! Have not I heard something of them before?"

He laughed, and then said:

"Yes, you have; and there is a curious story connected with them. I told you we had been obliged to pledge them and the chain. Well, when things changed for the better, I determined that I would redeem them from pawn before I laid out a shilling on myself; and I succeeded, although the time had run out to the very day before I managed it."

I complimented him on his gallantry, wished him good morning, went on my way, and have not seen him since.

WILLIAM GILBERT.

HEALTH OF BODY AND MIND.

HAVING considered the primary process by which our material constitution is maintained, we now proceed to give our attention to another.

Air is as essential to life as food; and good air as essential to health as wholesome food. There are, perhaps, in every country, whole districts, of larger or smaller extent, in which the air is either permanently or periodically uoxious; its bad qualities arising generally from the miasma of fens, or the mud banks and mud deposits of rivers. In such regions the inhabitants are, for the most part, a feeble and sickly 'race; the maintenance of life and health being a perpetual struggle with the destructive tendency of the atmospheric influences to which they are exposed. It is more than probable that the time will come when the operations of science on an extensive scale will render even these localities comparatively salubrious. In many parts of our own country, thousands of acres, redeemed of late years from the condition of bog and swamp, and converted into arable or pasture land, now improve instead of corrupting the air; and yield an abundant supply of food for man and beast, instead of producing nothing but ague and fever. But there may be still found, almost everywhere, reservoirs of impurity, which, even in the most favourable circumstances of soil and climate, render their immediate neighbourhood unhealthy. Stagnant pools of water, surrounded in the hot seasons by margins of fetid mud, ditches, and open drains, and heaps of decaying vegetable matter, may often be observed in rural districts close by human habitations. Poisonous exhalations from these must diffuse themselves through the atmosphere, in most states of the weather, to a considerable distance and height, and cannot be breathed, especially at night and during sleep, with impunity. Hence the almost constant presence of typhoidal low fever, and the frequent occurrence of partial paralysis in such situations. In a hamlet at the foot of a hill, in the county of Middlesex, noted for its salubrity, low typhus of a peculiar type was some years ago so continuously prevalent that in the neighbourhood it went by the name of the R- fever. The adoption of an improved system of drainage, and the abolition of various flagrant nuisances, revealed the cause of the unhealthiness of the district; for after these measures had been effected, the fever disappeared, not to return. If any one, squire or cottager, desires to enjoy that purity of the atmosphere in which he habitually dwells and sleeps, which is absolutely necessary to the preservation of his health and that of his family, let him frequently and carefully examine the ground within a circle of at least two hundred yards radius from his own door-stone, and whatever accumulation of offensive matter, especially in a liquid state, he may discover, remove it, or agitate for its removal, without delay. Our senses were given us to minister to our preservation as well as our enjoyment. Our sense of smell, therefore, must be understood to be intended, in the fulfilment of its protective office, to warn us against injury from those substances which affect it unpleasantly or painfully. As a general rule it may be confidently affirmed that bad smells are unwholesome, dangerous to the health in proportion to their degree of virulence, and to the length of time during which they are inhaled. In towns, it is especially important to avoid a residence in the neighbourhood of gas-works, chemical works, soap manufactories, tan-pits, or slaughterhouses. Such establishments ought not, indeed, to be allowed to exist in the midst of our crowded populations. They are necessary evils, which must have their local habitation somewhere; but it should be where they can affect the sanatory condition of the smallest possible number.

In all our towns, large or small, there are to be found narrow streets, dark passages, small courts, and back yards, and sometimes large districts, which one cannot enter at any time without perceiving that the air is loaded with impurities. This arises, not only from imperfect drainage and accumulation of foul deposits, but from the actual position of the masses of buildings in respect of the rest of the town and of each other. They are mostly in low situations, and with very little open space between and among them. The air consequently is stagnant, affecting even the casual visitant with a suffocating sensation of closeness, more oppressive than the most pungent effluvia. It is for the interest not only of the inhabitants of such localities, but of the whole community in the midst of which they are placed, that all practicable means should be adopted to open them out for the admission and free circulation of pure air. But measures of this kind are often impracticable, from the nature of the ground, the peculiar grouping of the buildings, or the tenure of the property. In this case, all that can be done is by promoting the erection of suitable houses in better situations to tempt away the occupants of these reservoirs of foul gases, and nurseries of pestilence, to healthier abodes. Parochial clergymen, Scripture readers, town missionaries, district visitors, and Sunday School teachers may materially assist in this good work by diffusing special sanatory information in such neighbourhoods, and tendering direct advice to the heads of families on the subject of migration. Nor let any consideration of injury to pecuniary interests of particular persons be entertained as a valid objection to this line of conduct. A good example is afforded within the writer's knowledge, by the chairman and members of a Board of Guardians, who continually expose themselves to the wrath and hostility of owners of property, perhaps to the risk of actions at law, by telling applicants for relief, in the case of certain kinds of contagious or chronic sickness, that their maladies are due to the locality in which they live, stigmatising it as unfit for human habitation, and exhorting them to leave it with the least possible delay.

The air over every portion of the earth's surface is continually in motion, and cannot be correctly said to be the same in one place from one day or from one hour to another. Yet it is certain that local circumstances give a peculiarity or sameness of character to the atmosphere of every place. Hence, on removal from any district to another at a considerable, and often even at a short distance from it, a real change of air is sensibly experienced. And such a change of air, it is absolutely certain, is very beneficial in most cases of disease, especially in the convalescent stage. Science has not, perhaps, discovered a satisfactory reason for this. But, from the universally admitted fact, whatever may be its cause, we may infer the soundness of the opinion, popular, in every sense of the word, at the present day, that occasional change of air is also conducive to the preservation of health. we may here again adduce the analogy of food. As change of diet is desirable, indeed necessary, in order to maintain the body in health and strength, so we may suppose, in some corresponding degree, is change of air. If it is not found expedient that the digestive organs should always be employed upon the same food, however wholesome, it is probably not for our advantage that the respiratory organs should always breathe the same atmosphere, however pure.

The mischief arising from bad air, or the want of a sufficient supply of good and fresh air, is caused, in this country at least, much more extensively by the construction of dwelling-houses and rooms, and by the habits of families and individuals, than by the external circumstances of locality. A close or musty smell is perceived on entering an apartment, or on opening a closet, from which the outer air has been for some time excluded, indicating that the air contained in it is in a state of impurity. But the air of a room, or building, in which any number of human beings are shut up without free communication with the outer air, soon becomes charged with carbonic acid gas, generated by the breathing of the occupants; and this, which is an actual poison, must be inhaled by them in a constantly increasing proportion, with every respiration, as long as they stay in the place. In a bed-chamber, even of considerable size, the air becomes so thoroughly vitiated by the breathing of a single person during a whole night, that it is immediately felt to be noxious by any one entering it in the morning, and must of course have been so to the sleeper for several hours. These are well known admitted facts, yet people in general are far from being convinced by them of the absolute necessity of providing for the ventilation of their houses and rooms, and of the public buildings in which they are accustomed to assemble, or of availing themselves of such ventilation when it is provided for them. Many large houses are built without due regard to the principles of ventilation; so that it is quite impracticable to create in them a free circulation of air. But all houses have doors and windows; and by opening them at proper times, and keeping them open for a sufficient length of time, a considerable supply of pure air can be obtained in every dwelling. Bedroom windows, especially, should be open from morning to night; and the windows of every room in which a meal has been taken, for some time afterwards. Yet in passing down a street at nine or ten in the morning, except perhaps in the height of summer, we may observe generally more than half the upper windows closed, and nearly all the lower. And in many of the sleeping-rooms, especially those appropriated to servants, we should find that the fire-places, by which alone there could be any egress of foul, or admission of pure air during the night, are closely blocked up. Such habits, which are generally associated with others equally adverse to health, will account for the headaches, indigestion, lassitude, nervousness, and many other forms of disease from which so many are sufferers who yet possess what is called good constitutions. Nothing, it is obvious, can be more important than the due ventilation of bedrooms, since every person passes in them so large a portion of time continuously; and in many houses each has necessarily several occupants. In most, a window may be kept partially open, without danger or even inconvenience, and greatly to the benefit of the sleepers, nearly every night in the year. Or, at least, one pane might be of perforated glass, or composed of glass laminæ admitting air between them. An invention has lately been announced for the supply of pure, and at the same time warm air during the night in a bedroom. A gutta percha tubing, having at one end a bell-shaped orifice, and closely fitted at this end to a corresponding aperture in the window or wall, is carried round the room, if necessary, more than once, and the other end is open close by the bed. The air from without, entering by the orifice, is, in the course of its passage through the tube, raised to nearly the temperature of the room, and so is delivered for the consumption of the sleeper or sleepers, without occasioning a chill.

Simple as this apparatus is, comparatively few can afford to avail themselves of it. Most of us must rely on inexpensive methods, such as those before mentioned, for securing purity of atmosphere in our bedrooms. What is most needed is a more extensively prevalent conviction of the necessity of bedroom ventilation as a preservative of health. Were this as general as the national horror of a draught; adequate devices of a hundred different kinds would be invented for accomplishing the object in view, and there would be a great diminution of cerebral, pulmonary, and gastric affections, and no great increase of rheumatism and influenza.

In time of sickness, the admission and circulation of fresh air is one of the most efficient agents in aid of the efforts of nature, and the application of medical skill, for the recovery of the patient. It is surprising how soon persons who have suffered from the most malignant fevers regain their strength in hospitals provided with large and lofty convalescent wards, and wide and airy corridors. In the Dublin Lying-in Hospital, not long ago, the ventilation was observed to be defective; means were adopted to improve it—principally, strict regulations for keeping windows open; and the result was the reduction of the mortality among the infants by one-fourth.

Very slight attention to the construction and constitution of the human frame is sufficient to prove the essential importance of Exercise in order to maintain it in a sound and serviceable condition. Energetic bodily exertion excites into activity all the principal organs, the bones and muscles, the blood, the respiratory mechanism, and the skin. And analogy and experience testify, that thus their powers are improved, and their action rendered more salutary. It is found that, by the constant employment of particular muscles in any kind of work, they become highly developed, and acquire superior solidity and force. This is exemplified in the muscles of the arms of boatmen, of blacksmiths, and all workmen whose occupation involves continual pulling, and lifting, and striking. It is the same with the vocal organs of sailors and singers. We may expect, therefore, that all the muscular forces of the body will be proportionately strengthened if they are frequently and vigorously employed in their appropriate action. Exercise also promotes the free circulation of the blood, and so refreshes and invigorates every part of the system. It increases and deepens respiration, thereby causing the inhalation of a greater amount of oxygen, and the more rapid consumption of carbon-chemical effects which medical science affirms to be the greatest possible benefit to the whole organisation. It produces perspiration, opening the porce of the skin, and refreshing and purifying the fluids of the body. It diffuses a genial warmth over the external and internal frame, which is favourable to the healthy formation of all the secretions; and it sharpens the appetite for food, and, when moderate, stimulates and strengthens the digestive faculties. The instinct which prompts children and young persons to engage eagerly in games and sports teaches us that, in early life, abundant and varied exercise is necessary to the development of the bodily powers. That can be no true education which thwarts or neglects this instinct. Every facility and encouragement should be supplied to promote its operation. A play-ground is an essential appendage to every school, or rather an essential department of it; and recreation-grounds should be provided in every town, affording free opportunity to its youth in general to amuse themselves in athletic exercises and games. But, at all periods of life, exercise is indispensable to health; and when that age has been passed during which it is secured by the instinct of play, it ought to be regarded, by all those whose constant occupation is not in itself laborious, as a part of the business of the day, and as a duty to themselves, and to all who have an interest in their physical welfare. Regular exercise is far more serviceable to the body than longcontinued exertion at considerable intervals. It ought always, in order to ensure its real benefits, to be taken in the open air; and to be of that character which brings into use all the limbs, and gives play to the greatest number of muscles. Walking is certainly, upon the whole, the most profitable kind of exercise, as it is that which can always be most easily obtained, requiring only time and space to become practicable. There is a choice, however, between better and worse in regard to these. The right time for walking is before the principal meal, and the best place the open country, and, in the country, fields and rough ground rather than the hard smooth road. They possess great advantages who live in the neighbourhood of hills; for the difference of muscular action employed in their ascent and descent, and the efforts necessary in both movements, necessitate both varied and rigorous exercise; and the air abundantly inhaled during the process is always more pure and bracing than that of the plain. It is well to accustom ourselves to walk in all states of the weather. Heat and cold, wind and rain, are natural conditions of the atmosphere, each in its turn necessary to render the atmosphere beneficial to man and other living beings, and each producing its own peculiar beneficial effect; which effect, like every other due to the general constitution and characteristics of air, is experienced in its highest degree by the human system when every part of it is in a state of sensibility and susceptibility caused by active exertion. And, by taking out-of-door exercise in all weathers, we really obtain, in a great measure, while remaining in our usual place of residence, the advantages of change of air, or even of climate. Those who will fairly try the experiment will soon acknowledge the great enjoyment, and sense of immediate benefit, which is perceived in walking in such weather as is usually deemed disagreeable, or prejudicial to health. An hour or two's exposure to a high wind, during a brisk walk, with a sharp struggle against it for half the time, will give tone and elasticity to the nerves, diffuse a wholesome glow over the whole surface, cleanse and invigorate the lungs, and purify the blood by the copious and inspiriting draughts of air, in its best state, which must be imbibed. And above all things to be recommended, is the practice of taking long walks in showery weather, and even in heavy and steady rain. The lower atmosphere is refined and freshened by the descent through it of the moisture condensed and precipitated in its highest strata, and is filled, especially in warm weather, or after a dry season, with grateful effluvia from vegetation and the soil. Its influence upon those who can so far overcome early prejudice as to expose themselves freely to it, and for some time continuously, is both sedative and restorative, producing a thoroughly appreciable and satisfactory feeling of sympathy with the refreshment of universal Nature. It can be scarcely necessary to add, that all evil consequences to be apprehended from getting wet in such a walk are obviated by complete change of apparel on returning home.

Moderation is to be observed in exercise, as in everything else. Immoderate exertion, producing exhaustion or very great fatigue, in the earlier or middle hours of the day, so enfeebles the digestive organs that injury instead of benefit results from a hearty meal, and the body and mind are rendered unfit for any active employment during the rest of the day. The regular and periodical exercise should always cease at a point beyond which it could be continued for at least half as long again without any feeling of distress. But, occasionally, when a day is set apart wholly for the purpose of physical recreation, or during most of the time of an annual vacation, all the bodily powers will be benefited and improved by tasking them with somewhat severe and protracted labour, and subjecting them to considerable fatigue in walking, mountaineering, riding, rowing, or athletic games, or field sports. Care must be taken not to overload the stomach during, or at the close of, days thus vigorously employed; nor should any of these pursuits involving the certainty of fatigue be entered upon when, in the morning, a sense of lassitude is perceived, indicating that the body has not sufficiently been recruited from the exertions of the preceding day.

We are thus brought to the consideration of the subject of rest, one of the utmost importance in the economy of human life and action. Night is the natural season for entire and prolonged cessation from labour; and sleep is Nature's sweetest and best restorer. The amount of time to be passed in sleep is a question to be determined, in every case, by the character of the constitution, or the existing state of the body. In most cases of persons in ordinary health, six or seven hours of continuous repose or sleep are amply sufficient to refresh and recreate the bodily and mental faculties; and more, when so much is sufficient, must be rather injurious than beneficial. They whose days are always spent in laborious occupation, and always go to bed greatly fatigued, may require eight hours' sleep. But a greater proportion than a third of our whole life cannot be required by any. None should accustom themselves to remain in bed beyond the time during which they are able to sleep, or to enjoy real repose. It is recorded of the Great Duke that when some one expressed surprise at the narrowness of the crib in which he usually slept, with the remark that it was not wide enough to turn oneself in, he replied. "When one wants to turn in bed, it is time to turn out." The saying must not be understood or applied too literally, but it supplies a sound principle and a safe rule.

It is a common observation that change of employment is rest. This is true when a person's ordinary employment has not completely exhausted his strength. Thus the operative in a factory, or the artizan, or common labourer, whose work lies in the town, finds that, even after a day's hard toil, an hour or two's labour in the garden affords him real recreation. And the man of business, who comes home every evening, for eleven months in the year. fatigued in mind and body, profits more by his month's holiday, if equally fatigued, every day of it, by a long walk or a steep mountain climb, than if he spends it in absolute inactivity. But intervals of complete repose from exertion are a physical necessity to those who are every day occupied with business or labour. Provision is made for these by the Divine institution of the weekly day of rest. And universal experience attests the wisdom and beneficence of the ordinance. All who acknowledge the duty of endeavouring to retain unimpaired their own health and strength amidst constant and arduous toil, and of doing their utmost to improve the sanatory condition of our whole population, are bound to maintain personally, and promote by their example and influence, the observance of the Lord's Day in its Sabbatic character.

Among the personal habits conducive to the preservation of health none are more important or more essential than cleanliness. The skin of the human body is abundantly porous; and a primary object of such a constitution is to effect the discharge of useless matter which has been rejected by the secretive organs and which would be noxious if it remained in the system. This process is carried on constantly by means of what is termed insensible perspiration, and, of course, most rapidly when the perspiration is perceptible and profuse; and it is in close relation with the respiratory and digestive functions.

It is observed that if, from any cause, the perspiration over the whole or over a considerable portion of the surface of the body is checked, or retarded. the result is direct injury to the membranes of the air passages, and frequently to the alimentary canal, causing inflammatory colds or diarrhea. Hence we may be assured that whatever interferes with the freedom of the perspiratory function must be injurious to the general health, and whatever contributes to promote it must be salutary. It is therefore necessary to remove from the skin all accumulations, from within or without, which clog the pores, and obstruct the process of exudation. This can only be effected by the frequent application of water, with vigorous rubbing, to the whole surface of the body. And when we consider that from two to three pounds of refuse matter are discharged every day by insensible perspiration, and that much of this must be retained on the skin by the obstruction to its free passage offered by the clothing, it is clear that the body requires entire ablution daily. Thorough cleanness and perfectly healthy action of the skin can only be secured by washing from head to foot twice a day, immediately after rising from bed in the morning, and immediately before retiring to bed at night. It is safe, and for other sanatory reasons most beneficial, to use cold water for the early washing. The best mode of its application is perhaps the shower bath; but, when this cannot be had, a plentiful affusion first over the head and neck from a well-soaked and well-soaped towel, as rough as can be endured, is to be recommended in preference to sponging. night, a warm ablution is desirable, administered with a sponge and followed by hard rubbing. The flesh brush is of great use in stimulating the skin to action, opening and cleaning out the pores and promoting the circulation, producing a healthful and exhilarating glow, the sense of which sufficiently attests the benefit arising from the operation. Soap is serviceable, not only on account of its detersive qualities, but as aiding, by its oleaginous composition, in that lubrication of the skin which Nature supplies by the secretion called sebacine, and the object of which is to render the skin soft and supple, and to counteract the acidity of the perspiration. For this purpose the common and coarse kinds of soap are much more efficacious than most of those sold by perfumers.

In small houses, with few rooms, and occupied by large families, it is, doubtless, very difficult to secure for each person the privacy necessary for these daily complete ablutions; but, when their importance to health is duly appreciated, it will be found practicable to make some arrangement of time and place, even in the meanest dwelling, for their performance. In fact, when habits of personal cleanliness are established in a family, the self-respect which they are sure to promote in each individual will ensure that attention to the requirements of deconcy which never exists in households unconscious of the discomfort, and unwholesomeness and disgrace of dirt.

The institution of public baths in so many of our considerable towns is a most valuable and efficient auxiliary to the cause of national cleanliness, and therefore of national health. Thousands have been indebted to them for the frequent total immersion of their bodies in water, who, otherwise, would perhaps have washed little more than their hands and face for weeks together. And many of these, we must feel assured, having experienced the comfort and benefit of complete ablution, cannot return to their former uncleanly habits when the season or opportunity for bathing has passed away. public baths also afford facilities and inducements for learning the art of swimming, the knowledge of which may in many cases be the preservation of life, and the practice of which is in all cases of great service for the preservation of health. But bathing and swimming can only be enjoyed in perfection, and with full realisation of their good effects upon the system, in the open air, and in the free water of the sea or a river. Immersion should be immediate after undressing, sudden, and total

The salutary effects of cold bathing are indeed principally due to the plunge. It is highly dangerous to walk slowly into the water, or to bathe without immersing the head. It is a common error to suppose that there is any risk in jumping into cold water when the body is heated with exercise, or in a profuse perspiration. On the contrary, there is almost a certainty of taking cold, and danger of suffering from cramp, if we enter the water when chilled, or when the circulation of the blood is languid. At the same time, no one should remain long in the water, especially fresh water, when its temperature is low, especially after having been heated by exercise, or considerably fatigued. A plunge head-foremost, perhaps two or three, a vigorous swim of from two to five minutes, followed by hard rubbing, until the body is perfectly dry, and a brisk walk for at least a mile or two, will ensure all the salutary effects of the bathe.

Reverting to the operations of the toilette, we are bound to urge strongly the importance of careful attention to the head and hair. The application of cold water to the whole head, with brisk friction in drying it, is of the utmost service as a preventive of colds, headaches, and neuralgic affections. Physiologists are not agreed as to the precise functions of the hair: but it is certain that, whatever these may be, they are assisted by the frequent process of combing and brushing. There can be no doubt that the hair by friction is rendered negatively electric, and becomes a conductor and condenser of the electric fluid. It may be owing to this that when the head feels oppressed and heavy with study, or long and attentive watching, much refreshment may be obtained, in most cases, by vigorously brushing the hair in all directions for a few minutes.

Cold water may be used with as good an effect internally as externally, immediately after rising. The sense of taste sufficiently indicates that the mouth and throat require cleansing after several hours of sleep. The tooth-brush, followed by rinsing, will purify the teeth, gums, tongue and palate from sour and acid secretions; and water, as cold as can be borne, should be gurgled in the throat. And, to complete the clearance of the guttural passages, it is desirable that at least a wine glass full of water should be swallowed. The observance of these practices will contribute not a little to the comfort of the earliest hours of the day, as well as to the appetite for breakfast, and relish for the first taken food.

Next in importance to personal cleanliness, for the maintenance of health, is cleanliness in our habitations. It is necessary to secure the purity of the air which we breathe within doors, not only by good ventilation, but by the prevention or removal of every cause of contamination. Our houses are greatly improved in healthiness since the time when the floors were covered with rushes, and the walls with tapestry. The rushes, which were renewed at long intervals, covered all manner of abominations; and the tapestry was a repository of dust, of moths, flies, spiders, and beetles, living and dead. To these have succeeded thick carpets, and heavy window curtains, a substitution greatly to our advantage, but inheriting in some degree the evils of the former system of room furuiture. Our apartments would be cleaner and sweeter if the floors had no covering, or one that could be easily and frequently removed, and if the windows were free from every massive and dust-collecting obstruction to the admission of air, and of light, which is of scarcely inferior sanatory importance to air. sunbeams, however, take their revenge upon the morcen or damask that intercepts them, damaging its complexion and constitution as much as they would improve those of the inmates of the dwelling, if allowed to "visit their faces" freely. The periodical and frequent cleansing of all halls, passages, staircases, landings, and lobbies, with a lavish expenditure of soap and water, and with fierce scrubbing, cannot be too earnestly insisted on as a means of preserving the health of the whole household. And, wherever a limewash can be used, as a coating for walls, it should be renewed at least once a year, being a powerful purifier and disinfectant as long as it remains fresh, and a faithful indicator of the presence of dirt by the facility with which it can be sullied or stained. No house can be thoroughly clean and healthy which does not undergo an annual, or rather half-vearly visitation of all its cellars, its scullery, wash-house, garrets, lofts, cupboards, closets, and all dark places and corners, for the purpose of discovering and removing even the smallest accumulation of dirt, or any kind of "matter in its wrong place." This process, known as that of "turning the house out of windows," and which ought to approach as nearly as possible to the literal meaning of the expression, will be most advantageously effected at the time set apart for the operation of the whitewasher.

It is indispensable to the safety and health of a family that the house should possess sufficient drains for carrying off all impurities, and securing it against damp; and that the drains should be kept constantly in an efficient state. The testimony of the nose is always to be accepted, and no bad smell to be endured for a single day without a determined attempt to discover and remove its cause. much depends upon the good management of those parts of the house from which there must of necessity be effluvia, such as kitchen, larder, pantry, scullery. Every dwelling, above the dimensions of the very lowest class, might be so constructed that all smells arising from culinary processes and their accompaniments may be dissipated by ventilating arrangements, without being wafted into all the passages and apartments.

It is well understood how greatly our physical comfort (and comfort means health) depends upon our clothing. The want of suitable and sufficient clothing occasions a great amount of suffering, and consequently is the cause or aggravation of many maladies, among the poor classes of our population.

And not a few of those who can afford to dress as they please subject themselves to various discomforts, and mischiefs, under the influence of ignorance, carelessness, or fashion. In our variable climate, it is obvious that one great object in clothing ourselves should be to maintain an equable temperature of the body, disturbed as little as possible by the frequent and sudden changes of the weather, and the alternations of extremes of heat and cold. The most common mistake, abundantly productive of colds, and painful local affections of many kinds, is to dress too lightly in summer and too warmly in winter. A person thinly clad, wearing perhaps nothing but linen or cotton, on one of the chilly days which so often occur between May and September, or labouring under a mass of broadcloth on a close and mild day in December or January, can hardly fail to experience some ill effects from the check to the perspiration in one case, and its undue promotion, and prevention of its escape, in the other. Of course the right practice is to vary the amount of clothing according to the temperature of the air for the day. But it is a safe general rule to choose for the under habiliments, at any rate of male attire, a material at the same time warm and light, whatever may be the season, and to wear flannel next the skin all the year round. The flannel garment is of as much use for comfort and safety in hot weather as in cold, absorbing the perspiration and preventing the warmth of the body after exercise from escaping too rapidly; but it may, with advantage, be of less substantial texture in summer than in winter. For the same reason stockings of worsted, or some woollen material, ought to be always worn, especially by those who take, as all should, much walking exercise. Every part of the dress of men and women should be so loose and ample, that no sensation of restraint or pressure should anywhere be perceptible.

The serious and often fatal mischief arising from tight lacing is so notorious that there is reason to hope that the practice is much less common than formerly; but still the female population, of all classes, need to be warned against it. And it is most important to the preservation of the muscles and vessels of the throat in strength and activity, and in freedom from the affections to which they are peculiarly liable, that the covering of the neck should be perfectly loose, and as light as possible. It is to be borne in mind, also, that loose clothing is both cooler in summer and warmer in winter than integuments closely compressing the body and limbs, which obstruct the circulation of the blood, and prevent the free passage of air to and from the surface. At night, the person ought to be very lightly clad, to give effect to the relaxation natural to the state of sleep. The practice of wearing nightcaps, especially woollen ones, is most pernicious: for the head at all times, and most of all during sleep, should be kept perfectly cool. On the contrary, the feet should be kept warm. It is impossible to rest in comfort, or to obtain full benefit from sleep, if the extremities are cold. The feet are the only part of the person for which it is advisable to provide a warm covering in addition to the night-dress. In winter, all persons, and in other seasons those whose feet are naturally cold, would do well to put on at bed-time socks made of wool, loosely-knitted, and of large size, so that they may be easily, or involuntarily removed, if the feet should become too warm. Everything is of supreme importance to the health that tends to secure to us the perfect enjoyment of the blessings of sleep.

The principles and rules of cleanliness established with regard to the person and the habitation, necessarily apply to the use and management of clothing. However regular, and complete the daily ablutions may be, they will not dispense with the necessity of frequent change and washing of the under garments, -of all garments, in fact, that can be subjected to the operation of soap and water. All outer clothing, composed of broad cloth or stuffs of any kind, that is in constant use, should be well shaken, turned inside out, and shaken again, and brushed, before being hung up. Dresses of this description kept in drawers, or boxes, are sure to contract an unpleasant musty odour, which sufficiently iudicates their unwholesomeness. If practicable, they should be always kept in a room or closet in which they can be hung upon pegs. If not, it is necessary frequently to take them out of their receptacles, to be shaken and brushed, and exposed for some time to the air. Night dresses ought never to be folded, or rolled up, and put away in drawers; but after being well shaken should be suspended in some place accessible to the light and air. It is the duty of every occupant of a bed, immediately on quitting it, not only to throw it open, but to pull off all sheets and blankets, and turn and tumble pillows and bolsters; and equally the duty of every housekeeper to take care that beds and clothing are exposed thus for an hour or two at least to the action of the air before being made up for the next night. It is an edifying spectacle in many Swiss villages, although not otherwise remarkable for cleanly habits, to see the most substantial portions of bed furniture hanging out of window, or thrown across the window sills, to invite the purifying influences of the sunbeams and the breeze.

By attention to all the particulars on which suggestions have been offered,—the quantity and quality of food, both solid and liquid, the mode of preparation, and times of partaking of it, the state of the atmosphere around and within our habitation, the inhalation of the free and open air, exercise and rest in their due proportion, and cleanliness of person, houses, and clothing,—such provision may be made for the preservation and improvement of the health of the body as cannot fail, in the vast majority of cases, to secure the desired result. For the reasons already given in the introduction of our subject, it is the duty of every one to employ all practicable means for this purpose.

But there are still higher considerations which may teach us the obligations under which we are placed. If the organisation with which we are provided for the attainment of important objects which are proposed to us is not kept in good order, it is plain that those objects cannot be successfully pursued. The services of the body are required in order to the performance of the various tasks and labours in daily life which the providence of God has assigned to us. These services cannot be, for the most part, efficiently rendered, unless the functions and powers of the body are in healthy and vigorous condition. Hence it is essential to the fulfilment of our duties in society to give careful and constant attention to the state of the body. The argument employed by the Apostle to substantiate the necessity of preserving the body from defilement by the sins of sensuality has a legitimate application to the maintenance of its capability for exertion. "Ye are not your own; for ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body." Such a reason against the abuse of our bodily powers must be equally a reason for the right use of them. If, on the high ground that the instrument of a man's outward actions—his body—has become the property of God his Saviour, through redemption, he is warned not to pervert it to wrong or evil purposes. assuredly it is permitted to admonish him, on the same ground, to qualify and preserve it, as far as in him lies, for the purposes for which it has been designated by his Creator. The true Christian, therefore, who thankfully acknowledges his Saviour's personal right and interest in himself, and who desires to glorify God by all that he is and has, cannot, consistently with such acknowledgment and desire, neglect the body, or the means of its preservation in health and activity.

Let it be remembered too, in this connexion, that the human body has been dignified and consecrated by the Incarnation of the Son of God. And although as the symbol and emblem of our natural corruption, and the instrument by which the evil that is in our souls develops itself into deeds, the body is called vile (or rather "degraded"), and represented as a burden, and the means of our thraldom to sin and death, yet, as the medium by which the Divine Deliverer assumed our nature, it is to be regarded as closely connecting us with Him. "Your bodies," says St. Paul, "are members of Christ." And again, "We are members of his body, (being,) of his flesh, and of his bones." Physically and materially, the identity of his humanity with ours, while He was upon earth, was complete. Not so, morally and spiritually. He was subject to all the corporeal necessities and infirmities of our fallen state; but He was altogether without sin, "from which He was clearly void both in his flesh and in his spirit." And it is promised that our humanity shall be raised to perfect identity in all respects with His as it now is; and this with especial and marked reference to our physical organisation :- "He shall change our vile body, and make it like unto his glorious body." This is the change meaut when we are described as "waiting for the adoption, even the redemption of our body," and "earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven." It is entirely consistent with such representations as these, indicating a real though most mysterious relation of mutuality between our humanity in Adam and our humanity in Christ, that in the earliest portion of the book of God it should be declared, strictly in reference to the body, on occasion of the passing of the decree of blood for blood, that "in the image of God made He man." Such considerations may tend to hallow and spiritualise the natural instinct under the influence of which, as the Apostle testifies, "No man ever yet hated his own flesh, but loveth and cherisheth it." They teach us, at least, that it cannot be right, since it is not in accordance with Divine intentions or Divine dealings in regard to the body, to affect to despise it as unworthy of our notice; but that respect and honour, manifested in the care for its wants, and attention to its claims, are due to what we know of its origin, its history, and its destiny.

Another and equally powerful inducement to the systematic use, upon principle, of the means recommended for the preservation of life and health, may be derived from the habitual conduct of our Lord Jesus Christ. He came to save the souls of men. But He did not restrict the benefit of his advent. and his presence, to our spiritual being. He was continually employed in relieving the necessities of the body. "He went about doing good," restoring life, healing the sick, preserving the endangered, feeding the hungry. It is, therefore, our inestimable privilege in all maladies, perils, and wants, which may affect our material frame, to believe that, with respect to these trials, He careth for us, and to supplicate his gracious interference, in Providence, for their removal. It is undoubtedly no less our corresponding duty to be watchful against "all adversity that may happen to the body," doing our best to maintain it in that state to which, when lost or impaired, we feel that we have a perfect right, and every encouragement, to ask Him to restore us.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CITOYENNE JACQUELINE."

I.

TIME changes both employments and amusements. Now we have volunteer reviews in place of old yeomanry weeks. But it is worth while looking back on what was so hearty, quaint, and stirring in times bygone.

Beasts, as well as men, had their day in the past. The tramp of horses, their brisk neigh, and the flourish of their long tails added to the general attraction. The coats of the yeomen, too, were of the most sanguinary red. And there were other The calling out of the troop for ten days involved a muster from all the county for twelve or fifteen miles round. There was thus an inroad of country friends upon the townsfolks. The genial system of billeting was in vogue, too, so that every bed was full. And allies and satellites called, in happy succession, to share the bustle and glee. company of respectable theatrical stars, patronised both by officers and privates, visited the town; and a wonderfully brilliant yeomanry ball, attended alike by gentle and simple, wound up the successful interlude in ordinary life.

The little town of Priorton spruced itself up for its yeomanry weeks, and was all agog, as it never was at any other time. The campaign commenced by the arrival on horseback of a host of country gentlemen and farmers, in plain clothes as yet. But they carried at their saddle-bows, packages containing their cherished ensigns and symbols—in their case the very glory of the affair. Along with them in many cases came judicious presents of poultry and game.

There were such hand-shakings in the usually quiet streets, such groomings of horses at stables behind old-fashioned little taverns, such pipe-claying of belts, and polishing of helmets, and, above all, such joyous anticipatory parties in private houses!

The season was always the height of the summer: not, perhaps, in every respect the best for such a muster. Stout yeomen had even been known to faint while at drill; the combined influences of the fatigue, the heat, and the preceding night's hilarity, being too much for them. But farmers and farming lairds could not well quit their lands unless in the beginning of July, when the June hoeing of turnips and beans had been got through, the first grass cut, and while there was still a good three weeks before barley harvest. Trees were then dusky in their green, and gooseberries and currants tinted the Priorton gardens with rich amber and crimson. Roses, redder than the yeomen's coats, were in full flower for every waistcoat and waistband. The streets and roads were dusty under blue skies or black thunder-clouds; but the meadows were comparatively cool and fresh, and white with the summer snow of daisics. The bustle of the yeomen, like the trillings of wandering musicians, was heard only in the brooding heat of summer afternoons, or the rosy flush of summer sunset, the prime of the year lending a crowning charm to their advent.

It was delightful to be roused by the first reveillée of the bugle at five of the clock on a July morning. Youngsters whom nought else could have tempted out of bed so early, started up at the summons. They envied papas and uncles, brothers and cousins in the ranks of the yeomen. Comely blooming young faces joined the watch at the windows. Cloaks were loosely cast about rounded shoulders, and caps were hastily snatched up to hide dishevelled hair; while little bare pink feet would sometimes show themselves. But the young ladies only peeped out behind the window curtains, in the background of the noisy demonstrative band of youngsters.

Distant voices, excited and impatient, were soon heard; then the jingle of spurs, and the clank of swords, as half-bashful yeomen descended the stairs for their début on the street. At last appeared important familiar persons, now strikingly transformed by their martial dress, but terribly uncomfortable and self-conscious.

The horses were led to the doors; and to the women who stayed at home, the mounts were the events of the day. The return of the members of the troop, now broken to their work, and detached into groups of threes and fours, and chatting and laughing at their ease, was quite tame in comparison. The country gentlemen and farmers were, of course, generally well used to the saddle, and could get upon their Bucephaluses without difficulty, and ride cavalierly, or prick briskly out of sight, as they were in good time or too late. here and there a solicitor, or banker, or wealthy shopkeeper, ambitious of being among the yeomen, would meet with unhappy enough adventures. He might be seen issuing from his doorway with pretended unconcern, but with anxious clearings of the throat and ominously long breaths, while his nag, strange to him as John Gilpin's, was brought up to the mounting place. The worthy man would plant his foot in the stirrup next him, but, not throwing himself round decidedly enough, the horse would swerve and rear, while he looked on beseechingly and helpless. Then he would try the other side, still failing to swing himself into the saddle. He would grow more and more flustered. His wife, in her clear muslin cap and spotless calico wrapper, with her little lads and lassies-one, two, three-would then step out on the pavement to give cautious advice. The would-be yeoman would become more and more nervous, while his comrades rode by with jeering glances, and the passengers stood still. Little boys would begin to whoop and hurrah; and a crowd, even at this early hour, would gather round to enjoy the experiment. "Hey, Naucy! get me a kitchen chair," the town-bred yeoman at last would say, in desperation, to his elderly commiserating maidservant in the distance; and from that steady halfway stand he would climb into the saddle with a groan, settle himself sack fashion, and, working the bridle laboriously with his arms, trot off, to return very saddle-sick.

Then some stubborn young fellow, possessed with the notion of showing off a dashing horse, would insist on riding a vicious, almost dangerous, animal, which would on no account endure the sight of his flaming regimentals on the occasions of his mountings and dismountings. Once in the saddle, he would master it thoroughly, and pay it back in kind with whip and spur, compelling the furious beast to face a whole line of red coats, and wheel, march, charge, and halt with perfect correctness. But the horse would have its moment of revenge as its rider leapt to and from the saddle. If it encountered the scarlet, and the glitter of brass and steel at that instant, it would get quite wild, paw the air, fling out its hoofs, snort, and dash off wildly, to the danger of its own and its master's life. But the young soldier would not like to be beat. Day after day the contest would be renewed. At length he would resort to a compromise, and his groom would bring out the horse, with its head ignominiously muffled in a sack; and now the yeoman would mount with comparative safety.

But the bugle is sounding to drill in the early summer morning. "Tra-li-la," the clear music suits with the songs of the birds and the dew on the grass. The last lagging yeoman is off, gone to receive a public reprimand from his strict commanding officer, but sure to have the affront rubbed out next morning by a similar fault and a similar experience ou the part of a comrade.

The drill ends at the common breakfast hour, when the yeoman may be supposed to return and feast sumptuously. Then "civil" work begins, yeomen who had offices or shops attending them with slight relies of their uniform. A stranger might have been pardoned had he imagined an invasion was daily expected, or that an intestine war was on the point of breaking out. In consideration of the hot weather, undress uniform was permitted, on all save field days, and thus the toiling yeomen enjoyed a little cool in their white ducks and jackets, though the red mark, the helmet's line, was still to be traced on their sun-browned foreheads.

There was an afternoon's drill. It was a little of a fag, being in fact rather like a dish heated up a second time, as a duty twice done mostly always is. But the evening was particularly gay. Then the yeomen were supposed to be enjoying themselves. Pleasant, if they had always enjoyed themselves in an innocent fashion. That many of them did so, it is only charitable to believe. And while the fast and foolish, the gross and wicked were swilling and roystering in evil localities, the generous, manly, gentle souls gratified the matrons with whom they were billeted by walking with them and their daughters through the streets, or into the nearest meadow; or perhaps they treated them to the play.

I have only heard of those days. But I should have liked to have seen the bluff kind faces above the stiff stocks and scarlet coats, and the joyous smiles which shone upon them. I should have liked to have heard the quiet town ringing with such blithe laughter. Little jokes would cause the people to laugh, as little accidents would cause them to shake their heads. Sandy Hope's horse, for instance, lost a shoe while at the gallop, stumbled and threw its rider, dislocating his shoulder and breaking his arm. What a sensation the news created! It could scarcely have been greater even had Sandy's brains been dashed out. Not only Sandy himself but Sandy's kindred to the remotest degree were deeply commiserated. The commanding officer sent his compliments every morning, with inquiries after him. The troop doctor was besieged by anxious acquaintances. Sandy's comrades never ceased calling upon him, and would sit for hours drinking beer at his open window. Delicious messes and refreshing drinks a thousand times better than beer, were sent to Sandy. Then the nosegays, the books he got! Sandy received a perfect ovation. It was even proposed that the ball should be put off because Sandy was lying in pain; and it was certain that no fewer than three reputed sweethearts of Sandy stayed at home on the ball night. Yet the stupid fellow was so slightly hurt that within the fortnight he was walking the streets of Priorton, more briskly than ever!

Priorton was kindly in its gaiety, and each had an interest in the other. I should have liked to have known the old town when it was thus given up for ten days, half to military exercises, half to fraternity and feasting. I should have been sorry when the feasting was intemperate, but I would no more have condemned the general feasting because of that circumstance, than I would condemn the gift of speech because some of us are so left to ourselves as to tell lies or say bad words.

II.

It was a well known and accredited fact that in consequence of these festivities of the yeomen more marriages were made up in this brief interval than during any other period of the year. Match-making individuals seriously counted on the Yeomanry weeks; and probably far-seeing young ladies had fitting matches in their eye, as well as the fireworks and the introductory gaiety, when they came in troops to Priorton to entertain the lucky yeomen.

"My dear," said Mrs. Spottiswoode, the wife of the chief magistrate, who was likewise banker of Priorton, to her spouse, "your cousin Bourhope has asked his billet with us: I must have my sister Corrie in to meet him."

Mrs. Spottiswoode was a showy, smart, good-humoured woman, but not over scrupulous. She was very ready at adapting herself to circumstances even when the circumstances were against her. For that reason she was considered very clever as well as very affable among the matrons of Priorton. Mr. Spottiswoode was "slow and sure;" and it was because of the happy alliance of these qualities in him that the people of Priorton had elected him chief magistrate.

"My dear," deliberately observed long, lanky, Mr. Spottiswoode, "would it not be rather barefaced to have Bourhope and Corrie here together?"

"Oh, I'll take care of that," answered the lady, with a laugh and a toss of her ribands. "I shall have some other girl of my aquaintance to bear Corrie company,—some worthy, out-of-the-way girl, to whom the visit will be like entering another world," continued Mrs. Spottiswoode with a twinkle of her black eyes. "What do you think of Corrie and my cousin Chrissy Hunter of Blackfaulds? The Hunters have had such a deal of distress, and so much fighting with embarrassment—though I believe they are getting clearer now—that the poor lassie has had no amusement but her books, and has seen absolutely nothing."

Mr. Spottiswoode had no inclination to contradict his wife for contradiction's sake, and as he could rely on her prudence as on her other good qualities, he said, "Well, Agues, I have no objection; Hunter of Blackfaulds is an honest man though he is poor, and he is righting himself now."

The invitations were dispatched, and accepted gratefully. The guests arrived before Bourhope occupied his quarters; ostensibly they came so soon in order to prepare for him. Corrie had nothing Roman about her except her name, Cornelia. She was a tall, well made, fair-faced, serene beauty, the sole remaining maiden daughter of a Scotchman who had returned from the Indies with a fortune, as so many returned then. He had already endowed Mrs. Spottiswoode with a handsome "tocher," and since his marriage had settled within five miles of Priorton. Chrissy, again, was one of a large, struggling family,-a small girl, a very little crooked in figure, and with irregular features and a brown complexion. If she had not possessed a bright intelligent expression, she would certainly have been plain-as indeed she was to those who did not heed expression. It was a delightful chance to her, this brief transplanting into the flourishing, cheerful town house, amid the glowing gaiety of the yeomanry weeks. Accordingly she was constantly engaged in checking off every little detail on the finger-points of her active mind, in order that she might be able to describe them to her secluded sisters and her sick mother at home. She was determined not to miss one item of interest; never to sleep-in so as to lose the mount; never to stray in her walks and fail to be in the house for the return from the afternoon drill. She would pace the meadows among the gay promenaders even when the evening was cloudy, and would not care though she walked alone; she would enjoy the play when Mrs. Spottiswoode chose to take her, and not even object to a squeeze in the box. The squeeze was really part of the fun! But she did not care to have her attention distracted from the stage, even by the proffers of fruit from the yeomen. As to the ball, she did not allow herself to think much of that. Who would ever have dreamt of Chrissy figuring at a fine yeomanry ball! She would not trouble herself because she had only an old worked white frock of her mother's, taken up by tucks to suit her, and yellowed by frequent washing and long keeping; she would not fret because she could not spend money upon a hair-dresser. She must dress her own hair-which was scanty, like every other outward adornment of hers. This was little matter, she reflected, for it would not dress under the most skilful artist into those enormous bows on the crown of the head which everybody then wore, -it would only go into comb-curls like little hair-turrets on each side of her round, full forehead, which was by no means scanty. She had no ornaments in the way of jewellery, save a coral necklace; while Corrie had a set of amethysts-real amethysts,-ear-rings, brooch and necklace, and a gold cross, and a gold watch which she rarely wound up, and which was therefore, as Chrissy said, "a dead-alive affair." But Corrie was a beauty and an heiress, and ornaments became her person and position; while on Chrissy, as she herself admitted with great good sense, they would only have been thrown away. And what did Chrissy care for her appearance so long as her dress was modest and neat? She could walk about and listen to the ravishing music, and study the characters she saw, from Corrie up to the Countess, wife of the one Earl who came to Priorton, aud who was Colonel of the yeomanry. The day or two before the veomanry arrived was spent by the two girls in walking about, shopping and making calls. Corrie, though a beauty, proved herself a very dull companion for another girl to walk with. Very pretty to look at was Corrie, in a fair, still, swan-like style of beauty; and she had a great many pretty dresses, over which she became a little more animated when Chrissy, as a last resource, would ask her to turn them over and show them again. Corrie, of course, never dreamt of offering poor Chrissy a loan of any of those worked pelerines or aprons, which would have fitted either equally well. But Chrissy did not want them, and she got a use out of them as they were brought out one by one and spread before her. Ere the yeomanry came, Chrissy knew the stock by heart, and could have drawn them and cut out patterns and shapes of them, and probably did so, the little jade, when she got home.

Bourhope came with his fellows, and was specially introduced to Corrie and Chrissy. He had had some general acquaintance with both of them before. He gallantly expressed his pleasure at the prospect of having their society during his stay at Priorton. He was a farmer, whose father had made money at war prices. He had bought his own farm, and thus constituted his son a small laird. He had an independent bearing as well as an independent portion of the world's goods; he was really a manly fellow, in his brown, ruddy, curly, strapping comeliness. But, better still, was an intelligent fellow, who read other things than the newspapers, and relished them. He was a little conceited, no doubt, in consequence of comparing himself with others, but he had a good heart. Corrie and Chrissy both regarded him with scarcely concealed interest and admiration. Chrissy wished that the lads at home would grow up to be as comely and manly; Corrie made up her mind to have just such a husband as this Spottiswoode of Bourhope.

It was evident the very first night that Bourhope was taken with Corrie. He stared and stared at her, admiring her waxen complexion, the bend of her white throat, and the slope of her white shoulders; and even changed his seat at one time, as it seemed, in order to see her better. He quickly claimed her as his partner at loo, and engaged her to walk out with him to hear the band practising next evening. Chrissy thought it all very natural, and all the more enjoyable. But she caught herself fancying Bourhope and Corrie married, and rebuked herself for carrying her speculations so far. Only she could not help thinking how Bourhope would weary after the marriage-say when there was a snow-storm, or a three days' fall of rain at the farmhouse. But that was Bourhope's affair : if he was pleased, what business was it of hers? Bourhope had this in common with Chrissy-he could entertain himself.

During the first three days of the week, Bourhope was zealous in attaching himself to Corrie. But a sharp observer might have remarked that after this he flagged a little, taking more as matter of course and politeness the association he had established between her and him at tea, loo, and the evening promenade. He would even stifle a yawn while in Corrie's company, though he was a mettlesome and not a listless fellow. But that was only like men, to prize less what they had coveted when it was half won.

Thus for a short time matters stood. Corrie, fair and swan-like, Bourhope reasonably impressionable, Mr. and Mrs. Spottiswoode decidedly favourable, Chrissy Hunter harmless, if not helpful. Mrs. Spottiswoode knew that those who dally with a suggestion are in great danger of acting on it, and had very little doubt that the next ten days, with the crowning performance of the ball, would decide the desirable match between Bourhope and Corrie.

AT this juncture it struck Bourhope, riding home from the morning drill, to ask himself what could possibly take Chrissy Hunter out so early every morning. He had already seen her once or twice keeping out of the way of him and his companious, and returning again from the opposite end of Priorton, which was flanked by the doctor's house. Corrie, he noticed, was never with her. Indeed, Bourhope had a strong suspicion that Corrie retreated to her pillow again after showing him her lovely face-lovely even in the pink curl-papers. But Chrissy certainly dressed immediately and took a morning walk, by which her complexion, at least, did not profit. Not being a very strong little woman, her brown face was apt to look jaded and streaky when Bourhope, resting from the fatigues of his drill, lounged with the girls in the early forenoon in Mrs. Spottiswoode's drawing-room. So it was worth while, he thought, to spur up to Chrissy and inquire what took her abroad at such an untimely hour.

"CHRISSY WAS GRATEFUL FOR HIS EVIDENT SYMPATHY."

When Bourhope caught a nearer glimpse of Chrissy he was rather dismayed to see that she had been crying. Bourhope hated to see girls crying, particularly girls like Chrissy, to whom it was not becoming. He had no particular fancy for Cinderellas or other beggar maids. He would have hated to find that his kinsfolk and friendly host and hostess, for whom he had a considerable regard, were mean enough and base enough to maltreat a poor little guest of their own invitation. Notwithstanding these demurs Tom Spottiswoode of Bourhope rode so fast up to Chrissy as to cause her to give a violent start when she turned.

"Hallo! Do you go to market, Miss Chrissy, or what on earth takes you out in the town before the shutters are down?" pointing with his sheathed sword to a closed shop.

Chrissy was taken aback, and there was something slightly hysterical in her laugh, but she answered frankly enough, "I go to Dr. Stark's, Mr. Spottiswoode. Dr. Stark attends my mother, and is at Blackfaulds every day. I wait in his laboratory till he comes there before setting out: he goes his rounds early, you know. He lets me know how mother was yesterday, and as he is a kind man he carries our letters,-Maggie and Arabella and I are great writers, and postage comes to be expensive -a great deal too expensive for us at Blackfaulds; but the doctor is a kind man and he 'favours' our And Mr. Spottiswoode," she said, warming with her subject, and impelled to a bit of confidence, "do you know, Dr. Stark thinks my mother will be about again in a few months. You are aware her knee-joint has been affected. We were even afraid she would never put down her foot again. It would have been a dreadful trial to all of us." Chrissy spoke simply, in a rather moved voice.

Bourhope was slightly moved, too. He had never heard much about Mrs. Hunter of Blackfaulds, except that she was a woman who had been long ailing; and also occasional remarks about the consequences of her being lost or spared to her family.

Chrissy was grateful for his evident sympathy, and gratified by it; but, as if half ashamed of having elicited it, she at once began to prattle to him on 'other subjects. Bourhope had leapt from his horse, and was doing her the honour of walking at her side, his beast's bridle over his arm, and his spurs ringing on the pavement. A sparkling prattle that was, of Chrissy's, about the fine morning, the town and the yeomanry,—few topics, but well handled, and brilliantly illustrated. Bourhope dared to confess to himself how sorry he was when he reached Mr. Spottiswoode's door.

Next morning Bourhope detached himself from his comrades when he approached the town, and looked narrowly for Chrissy. It would be but civil to inquire for poor Mrs. Hunter. So bent was he on being thus civil that though Chrissy was far in advance he knew her by the pink gingham trimming of her morning bonnet, fluttering like rose leaves in the moruing sun. He came up to her, and politely asked after her mother. Chrissy was a little confused, but she answered pleasantly enough. She was not nearly so talkative, however, as on the preceding morning, though Bourhope made witty comments on the letter she held in her hand, and pertinaciously insisted on her telling him whether she mentioned him in her return letters! He reminded her that they were cousins in a way. This was the first time Chrissy had known of any one hunting up a relationship with her, and though pleased in her humility-Chrissy was no fool in that humility of hers-Bourhope she knew was destined for her cousin Corrie. He was out of Corrie's way just now, and was only courteous and cordial to her as living for a time under the same roof. She liked the ruddy, curly, independent, clever fellow of a farmer laird who, out of the riches of his kindness, could be courteous and cordial to a poor, plain girl. But Bourhope could never overtake Chrissy coming from Dr. Stark's again. He spied and peeped and threw out hints, and hurried or loitered on the way to no purpose. Chrissy took care that people should not notice the fact of her being escorted home in the early morning by Bourhope.

A chance conversation between Mrs. Spottiswoode and Corrie was overheard one day by Bourhope. when they imagined him deep in Blackwood; for it was the days of the "Noctes." Mr. Hunter of Redcraigs, Corrie's father, had not been well, and a message had been sent to that effect to her. But she was philosophic and not unduly alarmed. "Papa makes such a work about himself," she said candidly to Mrs. Spottiswoode. "Very likely he has only taken lobster to supper, or his Jamaica rum has not agreed with him, and he is bilious this morning. think I will send out a box of colocynth, and a bit of nice tender veal, to put him in good humour again. You know, Agnes, if I were to drive out, I could not get back in time for the evening walk in the meadows. Besides, I was to see Miss Aikin about the change in the running on of my frills. It would overturn all my plans to go; and my head gets so hot, and I look so blowsy when my plans are disarranged," Corrie concluded, almost pitcously.

"Yes; but, Corrie," hesitated Mrs. Spottiswoode, "you know Dr. Stark is not easy about papa just now. I think I had better go out myself. It is unlucky that Spottiswoode is to have several yeomen, who do business at the bank, at dinner today with Bourhope; but I daresay Mary will manage that, as Chrissy will mix the pudding for her. So I will go myself to Rederaigs; all things considered, it would be a pity for you not to be in your best looks—"

Bourhope, at this point, fell into a fit of coughing, and lost the rest of the dialogue; but perhaps his occasional snort of disapprobation was called forth as much by this interlude as by the audacious judgments of the Shepherd and Tickler.

The day unluckily turned out very rainy, and the drill was gone through in a dense white mist which caused every horse to loom large as an elephant, and every rider to look a Gog or Magog. The young ladies, so fond of a change of costume at this time in Priorton, could do no shopping: the walk in the meadows at sunset with the lounging yeomen had to be given up. The green meadows were not inviting, the grass was dripping, the flowers closed and heavy, and the river red and drumly. All was disappointing, for the meadows were beautiful at this season with their summer snow of daisies-not dead-white snow either, for it was broken by patches of yellow buttercups, crow'sfoot, lady's finger and vetch, and by the crimson clover flowers, and the rusty red of sorrel, and the black pert heads of the nib-wort plaintain, whose black upon the white of ox-eye daisies has the rich tone of ermine.

Instead of walks there were gatherings round shining tables; and bottles and glasses clinked cheerily in many a parlour. But Mr. Spottiswoode was sober by inclination. The impressiveness of office, which had quite the contrary effect on many provosts of his era, only added to his characteristic caution. The yeomen, too, knew well where hilarity ended and excess began. So there was little fear of excess in Mr. Spottiswoode's house. Mrs. Spottiswoode, a genius in her own line, had a cheerful fire in her drawing-room, and sat by the hearth, with her children tumbling round her, while Corrie, fairer than ever in the blinking fire-light, and Chrissy, brown and merry, sat on either side of her. She invited the farmer laird to enter that charmed ring, which of course he could not help contrasting with the loneliness and comfortlessness of Bourhope. But though he sat next Corrie, a certain coldness crept over the well-arranged party. He caught himself glancing curiously at the book Chrissy Hunter had been almost burning her face reading by the fire-light before he came in. Mrs. Spottiswoode did not much care for reading aloud, but she took the hint in good part, and called on Chrissy to tell what her book was about, and so divert Bourhope, without wholly monopolising his attention.

Chrissy was rather shy at first. She never told stories freely away from home; but she was now pressed to do it. After a little, however, she put her own sympathetic humour and pathos into the wondrous narrative, till she literally held her listeners spell-bound. And no wonder. were the days of Scott's early novels, when they were greatly run after, and the price of a night's reading was high. Chrissy's cousin "Rob" was a bookseller's apprentice, and his master, for the purpose of enabling Robbie to share his enthusiasm, would lend the apprentice an uncut copy. Robbie brought it out to Blackfaulds, and then all would sit up, sick mother among the rest, to hear it read aloud, till far into the small hours.

Who can tell what that cordial of pure healthful intellectual diversion may have been even to she was a shrewd, observant woman.

the burdened father and sick mother of Blackfaulds, and to Chrissy! The very speaking of it made her clasp her hands over her knee and her grey eyes to shine out like stars-as Bourhope thought to himself.

How suggestively Chrissy discoursed of Glendearg and the widow Elspeth Glendinning, her two lads, and Martin and Tib Tacket, and the gentle lady and Mary Avenel. With what breadth, yet precision, she reproduced pursy Abbot Boniface. devoted Prior Eustace, wild Christie of the Clinthill, buxom Mysie Hopper, exquisite Sir Percy Shafton, and even tried her hand to some purpose on the ethereal White Lady. Perhaps Chrissy enjoyed the reading as much as the great Enchanter did the writing. Like great actors, she had an instinctive consciousness of the effect she produced. Bourhope shouted with laughter when the incorrigible Sir Percy, in the disguise of the dairy-woman, described his routing charge as "the milky mothers of the herd." Corrie actually glanced in affright at the steaming windows and the door ajar, and pinched Chrissy's arm when she repeated, for the last time, the words of the spell :-

> "Thrice to the holly brake,-Thrice to the well;—
> Wake thee, O wake,
> White Maid of Avenel."

The assembly paid Chrissy the highest compliment an assembly can pay a speaker. They forgot their schemes, their anxieties, themselves even, to fasten their eyes and hearts on the brown girl-the book dropping from her hand but the story written so graphically on her memory. Corrie was the first to recover herself. "Oh! dcar!" she cried, "I forgot I was to take down my hair for Miss Lothian to point it at eight o'clock," and hurried out of the room.

Mrs. Spottiswoode roused herself next, and spoke a few words of acknowledgment to Chrissy. "Upon my word, Chrissy, your recital has been quite as good as the play. We are much obliged to you. I am afraid your throat must be sore; but stay, I have some of the theatre oranges here. No, bairns, you are not to have any; it is far too late for you to be up. Dear me; I believe you have been listening to Chrissy's story like the rest of us!" But Mrs. Spottiswoode was not under any apprehension about the success of Chrissy's reading. She proved this by immediately leaving Chrissy tête-à-tête with Bourhope while she went to put the children to bed, and see if Mr. Spottiswoode, who was doing a quiet turn of business in his office, would have a game of cards before supper. She had really never heard of a girl being married simply for her tongue's sake! Perhaps she knew the line in the song too :-

"Very few marry for talking," and had found its truth in her own experience, for

Bourhope, it should be understood, was longest subjected to the influence of Chrissy's story-telling power. Indeed, when he did somewhat recover from it, his fancy created fine visions of what it would be to have such a story-teller at the farmhouse during the long, dark nights of winter and the endless days of summer. Bourhope was no ignoramus. He had some acquaintance with "Winter's Tales" and summer pastorals, but his reading was bald and tame to this inspiration. He thought to himself it would really be as good as a company of players purely for his own behoof, without any of the disadvantages. He stammered a little in expressing the debt he owed to Chrissy, and she could only eagerly reply by saying :- "Not to me, not to me the praise, Mr. Spottiswoode, but to the Great Unknown. Oh! I would like to know him."

Bourhope was stimulated to do at once what he was sure to do ultimately-he presented his hospitable entertainers with a box at the play. No doubt this was a great delight to Chrissy, for it was in the days when actors were respectable artists, and play-going was still universal. Chrissy in her freshness enjoyed the provincials as well as if they had been first-rate performers, took the good and left the bad, and sat quite entranced.

Bourhope, although he was decidedly intellectual for his calling, watched Chrissy rather than the stage. He read the feeling of the moment reflected in her sagacious yet sensitive face. Once he turned round and tried the same experiment with Corrie. He might as well have expected to borrow a living soul from well moulded stucco or marble. now realised in a more lively manner than ever that geese may look as fair and white and soft and shapely as swans till they expose their waddling. He tried in church the process he had learned at the play, and, it must be confessed, not without effect-Chrissy's expression giving a fair notion of the good Priorton minister's earnestness and eloquence.

But at length Chrissy, aware of the liberty Bourhope took in thus making her his study, got restless and troubled in her sound head and warm heart. She was no fool in her simplicity. She knew that Bourhope did not in any sense belong to Mrs. Spottiswoode and Corrie, and she had shrewdly suspected of late that their anticipated projects would not be carried out. She could not help occasionally turning over in her mind the circumstance that Cecilia was very plain, but that depressed Mortimer Delville nevertheless bestowed his heart on her, though the gift like her fortune was disastrous to her for many a long day. Chrissy thought that if Bourhope were independent and original enough to like her-to love her, he was his own master, there was nothing between him and his inclination save her inclination and her father and mother's will. And there was little doubt about their will with respect to a man so worthy, so unexceptionable, and so well endowed as Bourhope.

Nor was there anything like duty to the Spottiswoodes to stand between Bourhope and Chrissy. But still Chrissy's nice sense of honour was disturbed, for had she not a guess that a very different result had been expected? Nay, she had even a half-comical notion that she herself had been expressly selected as a companion to Corrie Hunter during the gaieties of the yeomanry weeks, to prove a sort of harmless foil. A dream of love was a grand shock to Chrissy's quiet life, making wild, yet plaintive music, like all nature's true harmonies. within her; and filling her mind with tremulous light which glorified every object and was fain even to dazzle herself. It was not unnatural that Bourhope should excite such a dream. But Chrissy was not completely dazzled. It was only a dream as yet. and she would be the mistress of her dream; it should not be the mistress of her. So she resolved, showing herself a reasonable, thoughtful, conscientious woman, as well as a loving, fairly proportioned, and lovely human spirit.

Chrissy retained all her sober senses. She recollected what was due both to the hero and to the others concerned. She was neither a weak victim. nor a headstrong, arrogant, malicious conqueror. Like all genuine women, she struggled against yielding herself without her due-without a certainty that there was no irreversible mistake in the matter. She was not a girl to get love-sick at the first bout, nor one to run even at a worthy lover's beckoning, though she would sacrifice much, and do it proudly, joyously, for true affection, when once it had confessed itself. So she shrank from Bourhope, slipped away from him, and managed to avoid him. He was puzzled and vexed and almost exasperated by doubts as to whether she cared for or wished to accept his notice and regards. Little brown Chrissy taught the bold yeoman a lesson in her own quiet way. She slowly forced upon him the conviction that any gifts or attainments of his - the prosperous, cultivated farmer laird-were as dross compared with the genius and acquirements of Chrissy Hunter, whom many shortsighted men called insignificant and plain amid the poverty and cares of Blackfaulds. Bourhope was not radically mercenary; he had no certainty that his superiority in worldly estate would secure the strange good upon which he set his heart, and he was at once stimulated and incensed by her indifference to his advances. So he had no communication with Chrissy, apart from a demure interchange of words in general conversation, for three days before the grand review and the ball, except in a single incident touching the pipeclaying of his belts.

The gentlemen of the old yeomanry who had not servants to do it for them, did their own pipeclaying, and might generally be seen doing it very indifferently to the accompaniment of private whistling, or social bawling to each other over adjacent walls, in the back courts and greens of Priorton. Bourhope was one day doing his rather gloomily in the back court, and succeeding very ill, when Chrissy, who saw him from a window, could endure it no longer. Chrissy was not what most intellectual women are described as being-an abstracted, scared being, with two left hands. The exigency of her situation as eldest daughter at Blackfaulds had rendered her as handy as other girls, and only unlike them in being a great deal more fertile in resource. How could such a woman stand and see Bourhope destroying his accoutrements, and in danger of smearing himself from head to foot with pipe-clay? She therefore came tripping out, and addressed him with some sharpness :- "That is not right, Mr. Spottiswoode; you will never whiten your belt in that way; you will only soil the rest of your clothes. I watched the old sergeant doing it next door for Major Christison. Look here"-and she took the article out of his hands and proceeded smartly to clean it. Poor Bourhope bowed to her empire, though he would much rather their positious had been reversed :- he would rather a thousand times have brushed Chrissy's shoes than that she should clean his belts. She was gone again the moment she had directed him. A portion of his belt was now as white as snow; but nothing would have induced her to stay.

Bourhope was new to the humiliations as well as the triumphs of love-that extreme ordeal through which even tolerably wise and sincere spirits must pass before they can unite in a strictness of union deserving the name. He was not exactly grateful for the good suggestion; indeed, he had a little fight against Chrissy in his own breast just then. He told himself it was all a whim; he did not really care for the girl, one of a large family in embarrassed circumstances. No: it would be absurd to fall in love with a little coffee-coloured girl, one of whose shoulders was a fraction of an inch farther out than the other. He was not compelled to marry either Corrie or Chrissy-not he! Pooh!he was not yet half through with his bachelor days. He would look about a little longer, enjoy himself a little more. At the word enjoyment Bourhope stopped short, as if he had caught himself tripping. If Chrissy Hunter was ugly, she was an ugly fairy. She was his fate indeed; he would never see her like again, and he would be a lost and wrecked man without her.

IV.

THE review and the ball were still in store. Bourhope would not be beaten with that double shot in reserve. It would go hard with the brown, curly, independent laird if he were beaten, for already he was shaken more in his pride and confidence than he had ever thought to be.

The review, for which all the drilling had been undertaken, went off without serious effect on the contesting parties. The only thing was, that Bourhope was so disturbed and so distracted in his mind that he could not attend to orders, and thus lost his character as a yeoman and all chance of being future fugleman to his corps. And this, although the Major had said, when the drills began, that there was not a finer man or a more promising dragoon in the regiment than Bourhope.

Chrissy's bright, tranquil satisfaction in contemplating from the box of Mrs. Spottiswoode's phæton the stand of county ladies, with their gorgeousness and grace, was decidedly impaired. The review, with its tramping and halting, its squares and files, its shouting leaders, galloping aides-de-camp, flashing swords and waving plumes, was certainly very fine. All the rest of Priorton said so and proved so, for they stood or sat for a whole day witnessing it, under a scorching sun, on foot and in every description of vehicle from a corn cart to a coronetted carriage. Yes, the review was very fine to the mass; but it was but a confused, bollow, agitating play to Chrissy as to Bourhope. Still she lost sight of the grand, general rank and file by concentrating her regard on one little scarlet dot. It was to her a play with its heart awanting, and yet the whirl and movement were welcome for a moment as substitutes for that heart.

The ball remained, and Bourhope was resolute it should settle the question for him. It was the commendable fashion at Priorton that no young lady should refuse to dance with an acquaintance without the excuse of a previous engagement, under the penalty of having to sit during the rest of the night. Bourhope would get Chrissy to himself that night (balls were of some use after all, he thought), and have an opportunity of hearing a terribly decisive word, and of getting a reason for that word too, should it prove unfavourable. In short, he would storm the fortress and beat down its faltering guard then or never.

Others, besides Bourhope, had determined on making the ball a theatre of explanations. Mrs. Spottiswoode was not pleased with the aspect of things as between Bourhope and Corrie. Their affair made no advance, and the ball was the conclusion of the yeomanry weeks. The yeomen were already, to all intents and purposes, disbanded, and about to return, like Cincinnatus, to their reaping-hooks. Corrie was evidently not coutented. She was listless and a little peevish, unless when in the company of other yeomen than Bourhope-a rare thing with Corrie, who was really a very harmless girl. But she looked elegant in her ball-dress, and had always a train of admirers on such occasions. And then, of course, many men needed the spur of jealousy to induce them to take the bold leap of matrimony. Chrissy, too, had her own fears and doubts about this ball. Bourhope hitherto had only pursued her, if he had pursued her, in rather a secret manner. She would now see how he would treat her on a public occasion. His conduct would then be marked and conspicuous, and even Mrs. Spottiswoode's and Corrie's eyes would be opened to it. Then, again, he would have an opportunity of contrasting her personally with all the girls about Priorton. Chrissy gazed wistfully into the glass, as she fastened her yellowed scrimp old white frock and sighed. But she did not look so much amiss as she supposed: she was young, slight, and full of subtle character. And with her scarlet coral beads twisted among her dark little turret curls and bows, there was piquancy and attraction in her. But her first purely disinterested and unbounded pleasure in the gaiety was grievously chequered, and it was to be feared the account she would carry home of her first ball to expectant Blackfaulds would be disappointing.

There were only two chaises in repair in Priorton, to convey the whole town's-people in rotation to the ball. It was thus unavoidable that some should be very early as well as some very late. Mr. Spottiswoode, as provost, was of course among the first after the Colonel and his lady—old country people, who stood arm-in-arm, bluff and bland, under the evergreens over the door, and shook hands with everybody, great and small—a family of pretty girls, meanwhile, laughing behind them

Mrs. Spottiswoode wore a splendid bunch of white feathers tipped with straw colour in her blue gauze turban. Even Chrissy's dazed eyes noticed that, as well as the white riband in Provost Spottiswoode's bottle-green coat which pointed him out an honorary steward. But how handsome brown curly Bourhope looked in his red coat!

A strange thought came over Chrissy. She did not wish Corrie, in her white crape and French ribands, and so tall and straight and fair, to be blighted in her beauty. No, not for a moment. But Chrissy was cruel enough to cherish a passing wish that, by some instantaneous transformation, Bourhope might be pitted with small pox, or scarred with gunpowder, or have premature age brought upon him as with the wave of a wand—the soul within being left unchanged, however.

Mrs. Spottiswoode, unlike Chrissy, was quite alive to the practical. She remarked everything with keen eyes, and determined now to be at the bottom of the business. She should either go in and win triumphantly, or take a sudden tack and sail away with flying colours, as if she had never entertained the most distant intention of coming to close quarters, and thus give the impression that she never had any intention of promoting a match between Bourhope and Corrie.

Mrs. Spottiswoode thought Bourhope looked as if he were going to do something desperate. His first blunder had been to hand, or rather lift, Chrissy into the chaise, instead of Corrie, at starting from their own door. He repeated the unaccountable blunder at the County Rooms, which compelled him to take Chrissy into the ball-room; and while Chrissy was still gazing in bewilderment and admiration at the evergreens, and chalked floors, and laughing couples, Mrs. Spottiswoode could scarcely believe her ears when she distinctly heard Bourhope ask Chrissy's hand for the first dance, saying that he would have engaged it before if he had got the opportunity.

Now Mrs. Spottiswoode had no doubt that Bourhope would solicit her sister Corrie for this dance, and therefore she had peremptorily forbidden Corrie to engage herself in any other quarter, even when Corrie had demurred at the certainty of the arrangement. It was very odd of Bourhope, unless he thought Chrissy would have no chance of any other partner and wanted to spare a plain little girl's mortification at the very commencement of the evening. "That must be it," Mrs. Spottiswoode said to herself, and was consoled by Corrie's hand being immediately requested for the Colonel's nephew.

The Colonel's wife opened the ball with the most popular and oldest private for partner, and of course Chrissy and Bourhope stood below Corrie and the Colonel's nephew. But Bourhope and Chrissy did not mind Corrie's precedence, and were talking to each other quite intimately. Bourhope was forgetting the figure and bending across to Chrissy, though he was saying nothing particular and speaking out quite loud. But he looked engrossed and excited. If it had been any other girl than Chrissy, Mrs. Spottiswoode would have called it a flirtation, and more than a flirtation. Chrissy looked well in her shabby dress, almost pretty indeed in the new atmosphere. Mrs. Spottiswoode was aggrieved, disgusted in the first instance, but she would not just yet believe such an incredible contradiction to her well-laid Match-making involves many parties, there are such numerous wheels within wheels of calculation and resource. She glanced at Corrie, who was dancing very complacently with the Colonel's nephew, and exchanging passing words with yeomen who tried to get speech with her. In her white crape and teeth as white, and her dimples, she was safe, heart-whole, and prosperous, a beauty who might pick and choose a suitable husband, even though infatuated Bourhope should throw himself away.

Mrs. Spottiswoode gave a sigh of relief. Failure now would only be comparative.

The dance being over, Bourhope sat down beside Chrissy. No, she turned her head the other way, and he rose up and strolled through the room. But he was soon back in his old place.

He wanted to dance with Chrissy again. She hesitated, grew nervous, and east her eyes on Mrs. Spottiswoode. He went straight across to their hostess, and said, "Mrs. Spottiswoode, you have no objection that I dance this dance again with Miss Chrissy Hunter?"

"None in the world, Bourhope," said Mrs. Spottiswoode, with a spasmodic smile; "why should I?"

"Why, indeed:" he returned, "or every dance? May I tell her so?"

"That is as she and you may agree. You are aware that would appear something serious;" she said, trying to laugh.

"I will take the consequences," he significantly assured her, and went back and told Chrissy so;

and then he drove her to her inmost citadel, and beat her there.

Other eyes than Mrs. Spottiswoode's were attracted to the pair. Half-a-dozen matrons' heads went wagging significantly; girls whispered and tittered; gentlemen opened their eyes, shaped their mouths, as if about to whistle, strolled up and took their observations of the pre-occupied, unconscious couple quite coolly, and then speculated and gossiped.

Mrs. Spottiswoode read these comments as well as what had gone before, and was ready with her magnanimity. It was this which constituted her a truly able tactician. She shifted her tack before the shout of malicious exultation and ridicule could have been raised at her discomfiture. By a dexterous sleight of hand, she shuffled her cards, and altered her suit. In a moment, Mrs. Spottiswoode was winking and nodding with the matrons interested in the news of the night. She arrested a good-humoured yeoman, and crossed the room on his arm, to express and receive congratulations. "You have found out the secret? Foolish fellow, Bourhope: he cannot conceal his feelings, though their display is premature. I must scold him for exposing himself and her. Poor dear! She is not accustomed to this sort of thing. But I am so delighted-so nice, isn't it? Such an excellent marriage for my cousin Chrissy: a good girl, a very clever girl: such a fortunate beginning for the Blackfaulds family. I often say the first marriage makes or mars a family of girls. It is so lucky that I invited Chrissy for the yeomanry weeks this summer. It is a great deal better than if it had been Corrie, because Corrie can wait," with a careless wave of her hand in the direction in which Corrie moved, deliberately followed by her train. "Corrie has too many admirers to make up her mind speedily, yet she takes it all very quietly. But this is so appropriate, Mr. Spottiswoode's cousin and my cousin—nobody could have planned it better."

She turned round and heard a blunt booby of a farmer speaking out his mind. She at once took him up :- "You would not have thought You cannot comprehend what has come over Bourhope, or what he sees in that thin yellow mite, Miss Hunter of Blackfaulds, even though she were as good as a saint, and as wise as the Queen of Sheba? Oh! come, Balquin, you do not allow sufficient latitude to goodness and cleverness. I tell you Bourhope has neither eyes nor ears for anybody but that mite; he counts his colourless daisy far before the gayest painted face. He knows that we are remarking on them now, and he is holding his head as high as if he had sought and won a queen. He is right; she will prove a sensible, cheerful wife to him. Bourhope will have the cleverest, best wife in the county, for all your swaggering. And that is something when a man comes to be old, and has an old wife, like me. Not old! Balquin? away with you. I wish the Provost heard you. Do you think to flatter me because I am in spirits about my cousin's match? No, it is not lost a friend gets, Balquin."

The public of Priorton did not know whether most to admire Mrs. Spottiswoode's diplomacy, or this rare instance of poetic justice.

SHETLAND AND THE SHETLANDERS.

In a former number of this magazine, * I endea- | voured to give some account of Orkney and the Orcadians. I propose now to do the same by the sister group, the Shetlands. Further removed from the mainland than Orkney, and enjoying less frequent intercourse with it, with a moister climate and less promising soil, they have fewer of the elements of commercial and agricultural prosperity than the nearer group. They have, however, an interest of their own. The early history of both groups is very obscure, and it is unnecessary to go into it further than to state what is, perhaps, not generally known, viz., that they have been ours for only 400 years, that for five centuries previous to that time they belonged to Norway, and were handed over by the king of that country to James III. of Scotland, as security for the dowry which he had engaged to give to his daughter on her marriage with the Scottish king. Orkney and Shetland being thus pledged, not sold to Scotland, and consequently liable to redemption, the Norwegian laws and taxes continued in force for a long time. The Norwegian land-tax, called skatt, has now been very generally commuted into a fixed sum, and bought up by the landowners; but in some cases it still continues to be paid, and so late as the reign of George IV. it was exacted in kind. A small farmer in the island of Westray, in Orkney, seeing the yearly shipping off of the "king's debt," as these payments are still called, and hearing a friend say that the king was in debt, exclaimed, "Gude hae me, man, hoo can he be in debt? He micht be rich and fat too wi' a' the meal, butter, and maut he gets oot o' the island o' Wastray."

This reference to their Norwegian origin is necessary, inasmuch as it accounts for many peculiarities in language, habits, dress, and physical appearance, and explains what would be otherwise inexplicable, viz., why these are the only islands round the coast of Scotland, in which there is not the slightest trace of Gaelic.

At one time, the Norse was the language generally in use, but for seventy years no one has spoken it, though a number of words are still retained. The accent is peculiar, and leaves on a Scottish ear the impression that the speaker is a foreigner who has lived long enough in Scotland to acquire perfect fluency, but to whom his native twang still clings. There are also peculiarities which I have not observed elsewhere, the substitution of am for have, as an auxiliary verb—I am been, for I have been—that of d for th—dou for thou—and the softening of t, to a compromise between t and th, which must be heard to be understood.

Their Norwegian origin probably also accounts for the fact, that an Orcadian or Shetlander invariably speaks of going to or coming from Scotland, as if he were of a race apart.

Starting from Orkney in the ordinary way, viz., by the Prince Consort steamer, a well-appointed vessel, commanded by Captain Parrot, a most agreeable travelling companion, we may find some things to interest us during our eleven or twelve hours' sail. Having got clear of the Orkneys, it is not very long till we come in sight of Fair Isle, midway between the two groups, one of the most lonely and unapproachable of human habitations, of which I shall speak more particularly by-and-by. Meanwhile, if our voyage is made by day, we shall see, as we come abreast of it, that our course is dotted over with ten or a dozen little boats, which seem in a fair way of being either run down by the steamer, or swamped by the wash of her paddles. The boatmen evidently have no such fear, for instead of avoiding the apparent danger, they pull close up, and amid the roar and rush of the steamer, which has not slackened speed, they are heard addressing the passengers hurriedly, but eagerly and clearly, with "Throw a paper, throw a paper." Such an appeal is of course irresistible to every man with a Scotsman in his pocket, and a particle of kindliness in his composition, and the poor Fair Isle boatmen get the benefit of both. Dozens of papers may be thrown overboard, but every one is picked up. The plunge made by the little sharp-pointed boats into the rough waters in the wake of the steamer seems perilous, and resembles nothing so much as the bobbing up and down of ducks in a very stormy pond; but the capabilities of the boats, and the skill of the rowers, are well known, and have been tried in many a wild sea. This little incident causes quite a commotion on board, and those of the passengers to whom it is new, are very much interested by it, and receive, I have no doubt, a livelier impression of the loneliness and isolation of that almost unvisited island, than anything else could give them. Every paper is accompanied, tacitly or in words, according to the mood of the giver, with "Poor fellows, take it and welcome. It would indeed be hard to resist the Throw a

Two or three hours more and we are in Sumburgh roost, and are lucky if we escape a severe tossing. And now with Sumburgh Head in front, and the much grander Fitful Head to the left, we begin to contrast the quiet and comparatively tame beauty of Orkney with the rugged grandeur of Shetland, which, for rock scenery, is perhaps unsurpassed in Scotland. We are now fairly in Shetland territory, and a little further on pass the island of Mousa, with its famous Pictish tower, the most complete specimen of this structure in existence. It is more curious than picturesque, as may be inferred from its striking likeness to a glasswork chimney with a part of the top broken off. It is about fifty feet in diameter, and between forty and fifty feet high. It consists of two concentric walls, between which a winding stair leads up to a number of small apartments. The inner circular space enclosed by the walls seems to have been an open court. The use and origin of these towers, remains of which are numerous in Shetland, are uncertain. Each is said to be in sight of the other, so that intelligence of the approach of enemies might be conveyed by beacons lighted on the various summits. The peculiar shape, wide at bottom, tapering towards the middle, and again widening towards the top, seems to indicate that scaling was one mode of attack which the architect meant to guard against.

I was greatly indebted to an old gentleman belonging to Shetland who was returning from a visit to the south, for much interesting information and many a tradition about the islands, which want of space prevents me from reproducing. He had a quiet humour of his own, which however never ceased to be imposingly grave. He retailed his own little jokes, and listened to those made by others with a gravity of demeanour and a serious pursing of the lips, which, while it was provocative of fun, seemed to leave no other inference than that he never allowed his own features to expand into a smile. Life, it is said, is a tragedy to those who feel. To this class he belonged. His tone in telling his best jokes never fell below the melodramatic; his ordinary conversation was oracular, and had a smack of tragedy in it. As we came near the south end of Bressay, he took me by the arm in a very solemn way, and, pointing to a headland, said, "You see that rock?" "Yes," I replied. "Well," he continued, becoming still more impressive, "a fortnight ago a vessel was driven right against that rock, and" (here he raised his right hand and made a rapid and effective vertical sweep) "down!!!" "Indeed," I said, looking much concerned; "and were all on board drowned?" "No," he said, still most gravely, "the crew were all saved, but there the coals lie still."

In another half hour the steamer's gun is fired to announce to the Shetlanders that their weekly messenger, which keeps them en rapport with the centres of civilisation, has arrived. The anchor is dropped and you are placed face to face with the most irregular-looking town that ever was built. A stranger will not soon forget his impression on seeing Lerwick for the first time, especially if he has been taking a snooze in the saloon, and is wakened by the gun so that its peculiarities burst full upon him at once. He sees nothing but gables, and these so huddled together in the most happy-golucky style that he cannot see how locomotion through the place is possible, unless it be on the tops of the houses. The town is situated on a very steep slope, and the houses on the shore are built right down into the sea. Most of them are unpretending; but lately some very fine ones have been built in positions that meet the eye, and give the town an air of comfort and solidity. Two or three churches crown the hill, but the most striking object is the Educational Institute, a very handsome building, erected and endowed by the munificence of Mr. Anderson of the Peninsular and Oriental Company. for the benefit of his native county. In connection with it he has founded two bursaries for Shetlanders attending any Scotch University. The same gentleman is now building an almshouse or hospital for disabled fishermen.

And now what a scramble there is at the side of the steamer! Boats by the dozen are clamouring for passengers, and jostling each other in the most unceremonious way in their eagerness to get close to the steps. At such a time the native accent comes out strong. You hear one lad saying to another, who is in danger of being displaced, "Hing dou in, Tam. else dou'll be oot." Tam hings in as ordered, and calls to another Tam to do the same by the boat in front, and so on. Amid all the hubbub you are sure to hear the name "Peter" called out several times, and you begin to wonder who Peter can be. The answer is but a word. He is a boatman, I know his appearance and his palm as well as I know those of any man to whom I ever paid a shilling, but the rest of his name I know not. It is probably lost in the haze of a remote antiquity. I think it questionable if he ever had a surname. It is certain that he needs no more distinctive appellation than Peter. He is Peter par excellence.

Meantime you get ashore somehow, though you are sure to find on landing that your luggage has come by one boat, and yourself by another. This is more annoying than at first sight appears, for every house on the shore has a pier to itself, and to join company with your luggage may thus require a long search.

On taking a walk through the town, you find that your first impression as to its irregularity was pretty correct. If one could fancy all the houses in a town of upwards of 3000 inhabitants engaged in dancing a Scotch reel, and that just as they were going through the reel the music had ceased and the houses had suddenly taken root, he would form a pretty accurate impression of the plan of Lerwick. He would ere long, however, find that there was a method in it all. He would observe that the main passage follows the line of the shore, the sinuosities of which prevent him, for the most part, from seeing more than a few yards ahead, while a number of lanes, more or less crooked, lead from the higher part of the town into this principal passage. He would also find that the houses, examined individually, improve on a nearer acquaintance, and are neither better nor worse than are to be found in towns of the same size elsewhere. He would find a great many good shops, in some of which the commodities for sale are more miscellaneous than usual, Shetland hosiery being a very common part of the stock-in-trade. If he continue his walk through and around the town, he will see six or seven churches, the Educational Institute, an excellent parish school and schoolhouse, the county buildings and Fort Charlotte, which still can boast a few cannon, though in these peaceful times the garrison has been reduced to a solitary officer. He will find no inn: a want much felt by strangers. There are plenty of comfortable lodging-houses, but there is a capital opening for an innkeeper and gig hirer, now that good roads are being made. Lerwick is therefore a very creditable metropolis for an archipelago of 100 islands.

Besides comfortable lodgings there is boundless hospitality. Any man with a decent coat on his back, and a fair appearance of respectability, can count not only on hearty, but, if necessary, prolonged entertainment at a Shetland fireside. Some one has called hospitality a savage virtue. Be it so; then some savage things are very lovely, estimable, and of good report, furnish memories that will stand the tear and wear of many a long year, and, amid a desert of, it may be, polished, but often meaningless, conventionalities, retain a freshness unfading and unchangeable, like all things good and genuine. Let it not, however, be supposed that the hospitality, though hearty, is necessarily, or even generally, rude. The man who has been used to a good dinner nicely served, and regards it as a sine qua non of tolerable existence, will find many houses in Shetland where life is wonderfully endurable, and where he will have no fault to find with the whiteness of the table-linen, the polish of the plate, or the excellence of the fare. In cases of surprise-and they are very common-and at particular seasons, the hostess may fail to procure all the etceteras of a city dinner, but in nine cases out of ten she will furnish a repast well worthy the steel of any man who needs or deserves hospitality; such a repast that the man who grumbles at it is sadly in want of home and nursing, and should keep sedulously near his cellar, armchair, and warmingpan. I have on various occasions formed one of parties, ranging from four to eight or ten, who have made an unexpected inroad on a country house, and while not dreaming of any prepared meal, have had set before them in a marvellously short time a dinner, or perhaps a "touzie tea," which no moderately hungry man could do otherwise than heartily enjoy. The worthy minister of Tingwall, Mr. Turnbull, now well stricken in years, and who had the honour of entertaining Sir Walter Scott on the occasion of that Shetland tour to which we are indebted for the "Pirate," is a very good exponent of this unquestioning hospitality. friend of mine was with him one day when a stranger was seen passing; whereupon, turning to his daughter, he said, "Hey, Grace, there's a gentleman gaun by. Cry him in, and see if you have anything for him to eat, for he'll be hungry."

Shetland contains between 500 and 600 square miles. The number of the islands is about 100, and of these nearly 30 are inhabited. The population is upwards of 30,000. The extreme length from north to south is about 70 miles. The Mainland is by far the largest. It is 55 miles long, and probably no equal extent of land on the face of the earth has such a large seaboard. It is everywhere cut into by long voes, which stretch for miles inland and threaten ere long to repeal the union, cut the mother's apron strings and cast adrift a few nursling islands to fight their own way in the world. In some places, as at Mavisgrind, the sea has only a hundred vards to wear down; and no spot of ground in the Mainland is three miles from the sea in all directions. This latter fact was proved too clearly to the satisfaction of a gentleman who some time ago proposed to build a snuff mill in the Mainland, and who, after purchasing land for the purpose, was compelled to abandon his project, no spot being the requisite three miles from the sea. Whether snufftaking, which used to be very general in Shetland, has given place to smoking owing to the failure of this plan, or to the almost universal preference of smoke to dust, I do not presume to determine. The climate is very variable, and there is great liability to sudden and sometimes violent storms. Of this two Crimean officers had good proof a year or two ago. They paid a visit to Shetland for the purpose of shooting and fishing, and called on a friend of mine with letters of introduction. They had supplied themselves with patent pots and pans for cooking, and a portable tent, under cover of which they meant to rough it during their sojourn. My friend, who knows Shetland well, told them that none but the sappers and miners had tried the experiment, and that they had great difficulty even with their substantial house-like tent.

"Oh," said one of them, who lisped very much, "bleth you, we've been uthed to all that thort of thing in the Crimea. We'll get on nithely, no doubt."

They went accordingly and pitched their tent in the neighbourhood of some fishing ground, and got on pretty well for a couple of nights. During the third night, however, a gust came suddenly sweeping down the gully where they were encamped and asleep, and carried off their tent bodily, poles and all, leaving them completely al fresco on the ground. The tent was never more seen. The one who lisped ended a good-humoured description of the way they were left out in the cold by saying, "It ith a deuthed queer climate thith of yourth."

Shortly after this he went off to fish on a raw and rainy day, and was advised by my friend to put on warmer clothing. "Oh, bleth you, no," he said, "I never wear anything but thith in thummer weather. Thethe troutherth are all wool, thir, all wool. Bleth you, I'm all right."

My friend joined him in the course of the day, and found him wading in a loch, with his nose very blue, and indicating rain.

"Well, how do you get on?" asked my friend.
"Why," he replied, "the fithing ith pretty fair."

"I'm afraid you feel cold.".

"Oh, bleth you, no," he replied, with a shakiness of voice that sadly belied his words.

"Won't you take a sip of this brandy?" said my friend, handing him a flask.

"Well, I don't mind if I do;" saying which he glued the flask to his lips with uncommon gusto, adding, as he handed it back, "The fact of the matter ith, thith water of yourth ith rather colder than we've been uthed to."

Along the voes there is much alluvial soil that would well repay cultivation, if only the climate were less moist and variable. Several very good farms have already been made in the vale of Tingwall, and in Bressay and Whalsey, where agriculture has been pursued with very fair success; but the uncertainty of the returns from grain crops is a great bar to extensive agricultural projects, and the feeling is yearly gaining ground, that improvement of land should proceed in the direction of grazing and green crops. The harvest in average years is generally so late, and the weather so uncertain, that crops which promise all that could be wished to-day, are to-morrow blackened and blasted by an unexpected change to rain, sleet, or snow.

No single cause, however, is so injurious as the drift which, in stormy weather, is blown from the sea over the land, carrying ruin in its train. The lateness of the harvest is not universal. In the south part of the island of Bressay there is a farm on which the crops are as early as in any part of the north of Scotland. Dunrossness, also, the south part of the Mainland, has some fine land. With the exception of this, and the alluvial soil already referred to, the Mainland generally and Yell do not hold out much promise to agriculturists.

There is abundance of excellent pasture land in Unst and Fetlar. The former has little peat-moss; the latter has scarcely any, and has been long famous for its cattle and sheep. Both are celebrated as butter-producing districts. An Australian proprietor says, that he has seen no pasture land in Great Britain that can compare with that of Australia, except Sir Arthur Nicolson's enclosures in Fetlar. This island was also famous for its ponies, which, being reared with great care and judiciously crossed, produced a first-class breed, which realised large prices. Latterly little or no attention has been paid to them; and from the promiscuous intercourse of all sorts of horses, a really good pony is almost as great a rarity in Fetlar as a Moa in New Zealand, or a Dodo in New South Wales.

Unst, the most porthern spot over which her Majesty bears sway, is chiefly remarkable for its quarries of chromate of iron, a mineral pointed out by Dr. Hibbert in 1817, as existing largely in the serpentine of that island, and which, from its valuable properties as a pigment and alloy, has brought in many thousands of pounds to the proprietors. There were two principal quarries in the island, Balliasta and Haroldswick. The former was exhausted many years ago, and recently the working of the latter has not been very remunerative. The mineral when first brought into the market fetched as much as 25l. per ton; but of late years, in consequence of importations from America and Russia, it has not realised more than from 61, to 81, and at one time even less.

The nature of the relation between landlord and tenant in connection with fishing and farming is a very difficult and somewhat delicate subject to discuss. I have found great difficulty in ascertaining facts. Some gentlemen, who ought to be well informed, and on whose word I should place implicit reliance, allege that it is by no means general for the tenant to be bound by his lease to fish for the proprietor; and that where he is so bound, the current price is paid for the fish. Others, equally trustworthy, allege precisely the reverse in both respects; the fair inference from which seems to me to be that of one district the one statement is true, and of another the other; each informant speaking of the district he knows best. I have on each of my six visits to Shetland directed my attention to this point, and I find myself unable to arrive at any other conclusion. I recognise fully the necessity of conceding a great deal to the peculiar circumstances of the country, and I should most anxiously avoid making any broad or unguarded statement; yet, with all this, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that, in the present state of the poorer classes, self-reliance does not exist to any satisfactory extent. Further, it may, I think, be fairly foster self-reliance. On comparing accounts written fifty years a gowith the results of present observation, it is, however, evident that self-reliance is on the increase, and that the relation of landlord to tenant is much improved and is steadily improving.

Pictish Tower on the Island of Mousa,

Let us look at this matter more closely, and see what the difficulty really is. Orkney and Shetland differ in this very important respect—that the former can exist on agriculture alone, the latter cannot. The small crofts in Shetland-by far the largest portion of the soil-pay, and must continue to pay, a great part of their rents from the sea. If fishing and farming could be shaken free of each other, as has been very generally done in Orkney, the difficulty would admit of an easy solution. But it is, I believe, generally admitted that in Shetland said that many proprietors do not endeavour to the two pursuits are the natural complements of each other. Both are precarious: both supply only partial employment.

Granting, then, the necessity of conjoining them, how is the condition of the small crofter to be improved? By supplying a motive for continuous exertion, and inspiring the element of hope, which can only be done by giving him an interest, prospective as well as present, in his croft; in other words, by granting leases. Here, again, there is conflicting evidence, some asserting that, as a rule, leases are not granted: others that, as a rule, tenants refuse them when offered. Both statements are so far true. Besides immemorial custom. the landlord feels that he has more power over a crofter who is simply a tenant at will. On the other hand, the tenant, alarmed probably by the experience of a bad year or two, during which he would have starved but for the care of a kind landlord, hesitates to hind himself to what may prove a series of bad years, throughout which he must stand on his own feet. Experience also tells him that he will not, as a general rule, be expelled from his holding against his will, and he consequently prefers to reserve the right of going or staying as he may think fit.

The erratic character of all fishing communities is also opposed to the binding nature of leases. Be the cause what it may, it is, I believe, certain that leases are not the rule; and the inevitable consequence is that a croft which, if the tenant had a prospective interest in it for ten or fifteen years, might be cultivated so as to be remunerative, is thriftlessly worked, and is only saved from hopeless deterioration by the importation of fresh soil, a practice which is worse than robbing Peter to pay Paul. What is meant by the introduction of fresh soil is this: the land is peeled, and, with the turf thus procured, the cow is bedded. Layer after layer is put in, and allowed to mix with the accumulations of the byre, which is never cleared out from Spring to Spring, the cow gradually rising in the world, till it is at last difficult' for her to get out or in. Sometimes, also, large quantities of solid earth are thrown into the dunghill to increase the quantity of manure. Both plans entail great labour, and are most ruinous to the land from which the fresh earth is taken. The practice, however, is very general, although it has been put a stop to on one estate, at least.

Crofts are let in three ways. A fair rent may be charged, the tenant being allowed to employ his time and labour to the best advantage. This is the best plan, but it is not always practicable. Again, a fair rent may be charged, while the tenant is not allowed to dispose of his fish as he pleases, but must deliver them to the landlord. He probably gets the current price for them, but even if he does, the plan is a bad one, subversive as it must be of open dealing, persevering industry, and manly self-reliance. In the third place, crofts are, not uncommonly, rented very low, it being understood that, in consideration of the low rent, the tenant is VII—10 bound to fish for the proprietor. Such a bargain may be perfectly equitable, and, in the circumstances, has certain advantages. It may be equitable, inasmuch as the landlord may calculate honestly how much of the profit of his tenant's industry may be required to make up for the low rent, and so secure to himself what he is evidently entitled to—a fair per centage on the value of his property. It has an advantage for the tenant, inasmuch as his landlord supplies him with his fishing apparatus, and is morally bound to stand between him and want, should the fishing prove unsuccessful.

Some proprietors do not themselves engage in fishcuring, but let their lands and tenants' industry to tacksmen to whom they look for the rent, who again make the tenants fish for them-a system from which it is universally admitted many evils flow. On almost all such estates there is a fishing station, and a shop, the property of the tacksman, from which the tenants receive goods in exchange for their fish, but often on such disadvantageous terms that every opportunity of selling elsewhere to yaagers is taken advantage of.* Hence the deceit and cunning by some attributed to the Shetlander. If the allegation of deceit is well founded—and I am not aware that it is -it is only fair to say, that it is just what might be expected from such a state of things.

The home-fisheries are chiefly under the management and control of the proprietors or tacksmen. Under the fostering care of a liberal landlord or tacksman, the system works, if not well, at least smoothly; but, as a general rule, it is most pernicious and destructive to the morals, independence, and activity of the tenants. The landlord has all the power, the tenant feels all the dependence. The former may, and frequently does, use his power kindly and well, but it is possible that he may not; and this ought not to be possible. Besides, it is manifest that, even in the best view of it, the tenant, under such a system, can never have the feeling that he is walking alone, or cultivate the self-reliance which is essential to any permanent improvement of his condition. Some proprietors become, as it were, factors for their tenants in the disposal of their fish. After the fish have been sold, the bill of sale is handed to the tenant, and the rent is deducted from the amount. This plan is mutually advantageous, securing, as it does, to the landlord payment of his rent, and to the fisherman a better market than he could obtain for himself.

It must in fairness be mentioned that some proprietors have refused to give their tenants liberty in the matter of fishing, on the satisfactory ground that, with such liberty, they leap from the frying-pan into the fire. Though free so far as the landlord is concerned, their thraldom is increased, inasmuch as they deliver their fish to curers who have no interest in their prosperity, instead of to their landlords, who have. Owing to improvidence, they need in a bad season money or goods in advance. In the following good season they revel in fatness, and leave the former advance hanging about their neeks, and so remain in the power of the curer who has no connection with the landlord.

A tenant may be asked to give security for his rent. If so, he goes to the fish-curer, who gives it on condition of his fishing for him. The tenant accordingly brings "twa lines"—that is, a note of security from the fish-curer to the laudlord—and so doubles the weight of his chains. Several successful attempts have been made by the fishers to unite and cure their own fish. It is much to be regretted that this is not universal.

The late Mr. Gifford, of Busta, was so convinced of the evils of employing tacksmen, that in 1822 he released the whole of his tenants from the thraldom in which they had been kept for generations, and would not have a tacksman on his estate. They were told that they were at liberty to turn their energies and produce to the best account, and that all that was expected of them was the payment of their rents when due. Perhaps the rents were too much and too suddenly raised, and the first fruits of the change were not very satisfactory; but the beneficial result of his liberal policy became ultimately apparent in the improved condition of the tenantry and the more regular payment of rents, so that this estate at the present day is comparatively prosperous.

Several other proprietors have pursued a similar course, and with an equally favourable result. This policy will doubtless ere long become universal, and the sooner the better, for not till then will Shetland soil and Shetland crofters have a fair chance of proving to what extent they possess the elements of material prosperity.

It must not, however, be inferred from this that the Shetland poor have greater hardships to undergo than the poor elsewhere. On the contrary, there is perhaps no county in Scotland where the crofter suffers less from cold and hunger-the bitterest drops in the cup of poverty. The land may be niggardly, but the sea is ever bounteous. Wholesome, palatable fish he has always in abundance; and though it is possible to have too much of even the most wholesome fish, yet that is greatly better than too much of nothing. He has as much fuel as he can burn. As a rule he has his cow, or perhaps two, and a few sheep. There is usually no limit to the pasturage. If a man can buy an additional cow, or a few more sheep, he will find pasture for them without further expense. A pig or two are invariable appurtenances of a Shetland hut. Then he has the greater part of his dress for the making; wool from his sneep, and skill to knit or weave it into almost every necessary article of clothing. He may have all this, however, and yet his life may stagnate; he may vegetate, rather than live. He may be-indeed

I believe he is-content, but it is a contentment which is not great gain. The gain of such contentment is one of the numberless instances in which a gigantic fallacy takes shelter under the shadow of a great truth. Contentment is great gain only when it is acquiescence in a result which is as high as reasonable effort can make it, or which no effort, however strenuous, could improve. All contentment short of this is a loss and a misfortune. It is no merit in the proprietor to be content with immemorial custom, simply because it is immemorial; nor in the tenant to be content with making both ends meet with difficulty, simply because his father, grandfather, and great-grandfather did the same. It is difficult to see the value of a kind of contentment illustrated by the following answer to a question in a proof of teind valuation in Shetland. A tenant was asked how much he paid to the landlord, and replied, "I dinna ken what I pay. I just gang to him at Martinmas, and he tells me whether I owe him or he owes me."

To discuss fully the landlord and tenant question would far exceed the limits of a short paper. I have touched on what seem to me its leading features. It is a question of paramount importance to Shetland, and one on which its future prosperity depends. I may have treated it imperfectly; I know I have not wilfully mis-stated anything, but have recorded honestly the impression left by the aggregate of my inquiries. Possibly some things I have said may give offence. I shall be sorry if they do, but I cannot help it.

To the Shetlauder the pony-by the way it is always called a horse, unless you wish to lay yourself open to the charge of speaking disparaginglyis invaluable, and yet, from the small amount of care bestowed on it, one would infer that it is not much valued. Generally, grooming is unknown, and corn an untasted luxury. He must pick up his food as best he may, at least in ordinary seasons. During snow-storms, when it is impossible for him to do so, he is supplied with some scanty fodder. And yet what a wonderful creature he is for endurance! His height ranges from thirty to between forty and fifty inches. A pony, to whose diminutive size and apparently slender build you would think it a risk to entrust yourself, will carry you pluckily, and sometimes rapidly, over forty miles a-day of the worst roads without a stumble, and without more refreshment than half an hour's nibbling at stunted grass midway. It is a rare thing to see him with broken knees. Over shingle, bog, or quagmire, uphill or down, leave him to himself and you are tolerably safe. Experience teaches the Shetland pony, and he is no fool to begin with.

Extensive use is made of him during the annual visit of the Dutch fishermen.

The herring fishing on the coast of Shetland has been pursued by the Dutch for a very long time. Two hundred years ago the fishing fleet consisted of 1500 sail: a century later it consisted of about 400. Now it is much reduced, but from 40 to 60 "busses," as the Dutch fishing-vessels are called, come to Shetland every year in June. This makes an important addition to the shipping in the harbour, and Lerwick is enlivened by large bodies of the fishermen, who come ashore to traffic in hosiery, the staple manufacture of Shetland, and perhaps do a little underhand business in the matter of smuggled brandy and tobacco. The week or ten days during which the Dutchmen are in the harbour is quite a gala time for Lerwick, and a walk along the streets is very amusing. There they go parading up and down with great wooden shoes, called "clampers," in the oddest dresses, and with terrible want of uniformity. Most have earrings. Some have very wide trousers-genuine knickerbockers down to the kuee-with every variety of colour in the article of stockings. Some have large pinaforelooking rigs made of oil cloth. The more sedate walk about smoking and staring at the shop windows, the younger seek a more exciting exercise, viz., riding on horseback. One day-mutually and immemorially agreed upon-is devoted to this. Ou that day dozens of those who have horses assemble, steeds in hand, on a piece of ground above the town, and thither too betake themselves the horsey portion of the Dutchmen for twopence worth of equestrianism, which consists of a gallop out for half a mile or so and back again. For the most part women and boys are in charge of the steeds, with every conceivable kind of halter, from the decent leather to the old and apparently rotten rope; some with saddles and stirrups, some with saddles without stirrups, some with an unambitious piece of coarse cloth or straw mat. Here a great tall fellow goes up to a very little pony, pays his twopence-it is always prepaid-and prepares to mount. But how is he to get the sabot, with a point like the prow of his own buss, into the stirrups? It evidently can't be done. Off go the sabots-a shake is all that is necessary—and he gets into the saddle. At first he grasps only the bridle, but as the pace quickens-and it soon does that, for he means to have his twopence worth-you see his hand slip round to the back part of the saddle and take a firm hold. This is all very well, but the saddle itself is shaky, and the pony's back short; so he must have more leverage by grasping the tail. There, now he's all right; but the motion is neither graceful nor easy, and his hat flies off. This was expected, for the woman or boy in charge follows behind for the double purpose of increasing the pace by whipping, and picking up anything that may be shaken loose. And now that he gets toward the end of his ride, heel, bridle, and lash are pressed into service. One hand is required to hold on either by saddle or tail, the other is needed for the lash. How then can he dispose of the bridle? In his teeth of course, and there he holds it. On he comes full swing. The road is very rough and downhill now. His legs are well extended, and he is making no prehensile use of his knecs. This can't last long. Hallo! there he's off rolling, with little harm done.

And there for the present we must, if you please, let him lie till we can pick him up with the thread of our discourse in some future paper, when we finish up what remains to be said about the Northern Archipelago.

JOHN KERR.

THE ORDER OF NATURE AND THE EFFICACY OF PRAYER.

"Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.

State of the last place of the last of the "Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much [or rather, the supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its operation].

"Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain: and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the carth brought forth her fruit."

Two things are very plainly declared in this passage of Scripture. The one is, that there is a close connection between sin and punishment, so that a man's sickness may be the chastisement for his sin; the other is, that prayer for the averting of temporal calamities and for the obtaining of temporal blessings is with God effectual.

Both these propositions have of late been peremptorily denied. We have been told, on the one hand, that it is folly to see in the cattle-plague or in the cholera, the hand of God's righteous judgment punishing us for our national transgressions; and we have been told, on the other, that it is folly to suppose that prayer, even the prayer of a suppliant nation, can arrest the one disease, or avert the other.

With the former of these assertions I have at present no concern. I merely remark, that though we may not be justified in connecting a particular punishment with a particular sin, we may, if Scripture is to be our guide, look upon calamities, whether national or individual, as warnings from God calling us to repentance and amendment of life. It is the latter assertion that I propose now to examine; the assertion, namely, that to ask of God, as we do now in our public services, to defend us from cattle-plague and from pestilence, is to ask an impossibility. For this is the assertion. The doctrine has been laid down, that the whole scheme of God's material universe has been ordered from the first hour until now; that it is carried on by fixed and unalterable laws, laws which have been always what they are now; that the chain of antecedents and consequents is unbroken; that all that happens now in the world about us is the result, the inevitable result, of all that has been going on from the beginning. Hence to pray to God to alter that which He has thus irrevocably fixed is folly, if it be not profanity or presumption. We are fixed, according to this philosophy, in a fatal groove. Health and disease result from atmospheric conditions. Atmospheric conditions are determined by a thousand causes, which have been in ever active operation since the world began. They could not be otherwise than they are now, without changing every current of wind, every cloud, every drop of moisture, every atom of electricity which has ever floated in the universe. Our ignorance, we are told, is the measure of our prayer. Universal law holds; but, in fact, we do not believe law to be universal. And therefore it

The man who prays earnestly that his sick child may be restored to health, would not dream of praying that that child should be given back to him from death. The farmer who is anxious to save his crops might pray that the sun would shine on the harvest, but he would not venture to pray that the day should be prolonged a single hour that he might gather the wheat into his barn. But he prays for the one because he believes it to be uncertain; he does not pray for the other because experience tells him that his petition would be presumption.

Medicine and wise care and thoughtful skill have restored many a child to life, even from the very edge of death; but experience forbids us to believe that when once the breath has left the body, any power of man can compel it to return and flush again the pale cheek with life. We have seen the threatening clouds disperse and the heaven return to the soft radiance and glow of its summer serenity; but we have never seen the sun stayed in mid heaven, or hasting not to go down for an hour, and we believe that the age of miracles is past. Thus we are reminded that where we can test it by our experience, we admit the presence of unchangeable law, and therefore ask for no interference.

But the law, we are told, is just as unchangeable in other regions where our eye fails to trace its operation.

It is just as much a part of the necessary machinery of the universe, that a certain wind should blow, or that rain should fall at a certain time, or that death should walk with the pestilent miasma in the summer's heat, as it is that the sun should rise and set, or the tide cbb and flow at certain seasons. Throughout the universe consequents are linked to their antecedents. They cannot be separated. No power of man can break their solemn, undeviating, steadfast march. Their goings forth have been from all eternity, none of them breaks or thrusts his ranks; God Himself cannot arrest or alter them, for to do so He would change his nature. This is the creed of many honest thinkers, of many undoubtedly able and scientific men. They do not, perhaps, in terms, deny a living personal God, but they give us as the only proof of his being, unchanged and unchangeable law.

Now statements like these, made, as they constantly are, by men whose acquaintance with science seems to give them a right to speak, have produced, in many minds, much anxiety and much uneasiness and much alarm. They have shaken and unhinged the faith of some, they have robbed others of comfort and of confidence in prayer; and I have felt it right, therefore, to attempt some auswer to those arguments which go to deny the efficacy of prayer. I feel, indeed, that the task is beset with difficulties. I feel that the problem, like every problem which involves the infinite, is really beyond our feeble logic. I do not pretend to grasp it all. I know I see but a very little way into it; others, I doubt not, see much further and can speak with more fullness and more authority. I will only venture to mention some considerations which have given some satisfaction to my own mind, and which I would fain hope may be of service to others.

1. And first, though it would be folly to deny the uniformity of visible nature—a lesson forced upon us by every day's experience—though I admit that, as far as our observation extends, Nature has always proceeded in one invariable order, yet it does not follow that no other order is conceivable, or that no other laws are possible. Here is, I cannot help thinking, one capital error of which some scientific men are guilty. They hold language which, to say the least of it, is rash. They assert more than they are able to prove. They speak of the laws of the universe with the same confidence with which they speak of the abstract truths of pure science; and this they have no right to do. They talk of those laws as if they were self-existing, necessary, universal, eternal; as if they were so impressed upon matter that the very existence of matter could scarcely be conceived of apart from them.

Now, our knowledge of the laws of nature is, from first to last, a matter of experience. We observe, and we draw conclusions from our observations. But after all, those conclusions are probable, not demonstrable. It is quite true that that probability may in some instances amount almost to certainty. It is quite true that if our experience be wide enough and various enough and continued enough, we may feel sure, practically, that a law is established. We may act upon it, we may take it as a guide of life. But after all, such a law is not the only law conceivable. Other and different laws may at least be possible; and we have no right to assume that our limited and partial experience measures the boundlessness of the universe of God. "The law of gravitation, for instance, is an explanation of many phenomena in this world and in the solar system. Does it hold also in other worlds which lie beyond the reach of sight, beyond the power of our most powerful telescopes? Does it affect all matter and all kinds of matter alike, or is it like magnetism, special, elective, not universal? Is the force permanent, or does it decay with time? Such questions men of science have asked, and such questions remain, many of them, yet unanswered." "Whether gravitation be coeval with matter we do not know,"-I quote the words of an able mathematician *-"whether it prevail throughout the universe we do not know. It does on this earth and throughout the solar system. Recent observations of double stars give indications of gravitation so far. But most of the stars are silent, and beyond the regions of sight we know nothing. On what ground, then, can we assert natural laws, such as we know them, to be essential, unalterable, universal? We can imagine them changed or suspended without any shock to our reason + . . The laws of matter appear accidental and separable, not necessary and inherent. If so, the Power which causes them, or impressed and maintains them, can suspend or modify them. Or we may, as ages roll on, ourselves pass into new conditions, where laws obtain different from those of former experience."

The assertion, then, often made as to the necessary character of the laws of matter, is, to say the least, unwarrantable and unfounded.

2. But, again: it might serve further to lessen our perplexity, if we were to ask ourselves what we mean by cause and effect, and what we mean by the laws of matter? Surely matter does not originate its own laws. Surely, if we use the word cause as of some power inherent in matter, we use it improperly. The profoundest thinkers, even of the Positivist school, admit this. The author of that philosophy, dealing only with material phænomena, knows of nothing but sequence. ‡ He refuses to use the word cause: and, confining himself only to material phænomena, he is right; for from matter we shall never derive the idea of cause at all. It is rather one of those ultimate facts of existence, the idea of which belongs to us as rational beings. The idea lies outside and beyond and above mere matter. That we are able to form such an idea is a privilege of our spiritual nature. Unless we choose to sink down into a blank naked materialism, then we must rise to the conception of One who is the Great First Cause of all. We must believe that all this universe is the work of God's fingers, that it is what He has made it, and that what we call its laws are but the outward manifestation of his wisdom, the visible expression of his sovereign will. It is an impropriety of speech to apply the term cause to matter. The sap is not the cause of the germination of the plant, the bud is not the cause of the flower, nor the flower of the fruit, nor the fruit of the seed, nor again, the seed of the plant. Day is not the cause of night, nor light of darkness, nor is the revolution of the earth on its axis the cause of either; the ebb is not the cause of the flow, nor the flow of the ebb, nor any natural influence the cause of either the one or the other. All that we see in these cases is simply succession, order, sequence, a perpetual unbroken chain, link succeeding link, antecedents and consequents, call it what you will, but not in any true sense cause and effect.

There is but One Cause, God Himself. And practically, I suppose, it makes but little difference whether we conceive natural powers as lodged in matter by his fiat and so maintained, or whether we regard them as the immediate work of his fingers. To me certainly the last view seems the truer, the grander, the more worthy of God, as well as the more simple and the more intelligible. It is that to which our Lord Himself leads us when He says :-"My Father worketh hitherto, and I work."

But on the other hypothesis we are not at liberty to assume that the powers of nature are independent. They are revocable at the pleasure of Him who appointed them, and so long as they are not revoked He is the author of their effects. The world is not a machine left to itself. It is not a clock wound up and set a-going on some principle of perpetual motion. I can conceive of no theory of the universe more miserable, more heartless than this. It is not only repugnant to Scripture-I venture to say it is repugnant to the common consciousness of men, to believe that once in the infinite ages God came forth out of the mystery of his Being, as it were, to create the material universe, and to give it laws independent of Himself, and then, withdrawing Himself into the far depths of his own eternity, left the creation of his fingers to pursue its dreary and desolate path for ever, uncheered by one smile of his love, unguided by a Father's hand, unwatched by a Father's

And as I hold this to be a heartless, and freezing, and practically Atheistic creed, so, on the other gratefully acknowledging how much I owe to him.

† "Adequate testimony might assure us that in a Lyrae, the laws of matter were other than on the earth; no testimony would make us believe in a triangle with its base greater than the sum of its sides."

† Mr. J. S. Mill finds this a defect in Comte's system. "He fails," says Mr. Mill, "to perceive the real distinction between the laws of succession and co-existence, which thinkers of a different school call Laws of Phenomena, and those of what they call the action of causes: the former exemplified by the succession of day and night; the latter, by the earth's rotation which causes night; the latter, by the earth's rotation which causes it."—Comie and Positivism, p. 56. I cannot think that in this last case the word cause is used in its strict sense as originative.

hand, I cannot sufficiently wonder at the presumption, which would assert that God must be tied and bound by the rules which He has been pleased to make, and which He is pleased generally to observe. This is to place the law above the Law-giver. This is to deny to the Lord of all the exercise of that discretionary wisdom which we profess to value so highly in the wise ruler, the sagacious statesman, the judicious father of a family. This is to deny to the Highest the power of free self-determination, which we profess to claim and demand to exercise for ourselves. It is, in fact, to deny freedom of will anywhere, absolutely, altogether, and to drag man as well as matter, yea, God Himself, at the chariot-wheels of an inexorable

This theory rests upon two assumptions, neither of which can be proved, and one of which is repugnant to our deepest consciousness. First, absolute unbending sequence is by a partial induction asserted of the material world through all time and space; and, next, this is extended to the spiritual world, as if matter and spirit were homogeneous and commensurable. The first of these assumptions, as I have already shown, is incapable of proof. The other contradicts the testimony of my inmost nature to itself. I know I am not a machine. I know I am free, subject indeed to the limitations of matter; but, nevertheless, in the inmost centre of my being conscious of a will, and of a power to exercise that will. Say that I cannot reconcile the privilege of perfect freedom with the fore-knowledge and the omnipotence of God, and I admit that I cannot. Nor can I reconcile the existence of evil with the all-holiness and the all-power of God. But as I can believe in the perfect holiness of God, at the same time that I am forced to acknowledge the existence of evil, so I may hold the freedom of man, at the same time that I believe in the absolute sovereignty of God. But I, as a free agent, within certain limitations, do modify, suspend, control the laws of matter. This produces no irregularity, no disturbance, in the order of the universe. Why should I presume to question that God, the Author and the Source of all, should have reserved to Himself the right of intervening wherever He thinks proper, of modifying, suspending, controlling, according to the good pleasure of his will? I must admit it, or fall back into the old heathen notion that fate is higher than the Most High God; I must admit it, or believe that my nature mocks me when she asserts her freedom.

3. But whilst I think it right to point out what I conceive to be unwarrantable assumptions on the part of some men of science who have touched on this subject, and to protest against them, there is another view of the efficacy of prayer which must not be lost sight of. Why is it that we pray? What do we mean when we put up a specific petition to God, such as that He would remove the famine or stay the pestilence? Is there not an error lurking often, if not distinctly conceived, as to our object in putting up such petitions? It is too often assumed, tacitly at least, that our object in praying is to change the will of God, that when we ask Him to take away the cattle-plague, we are prescribing to Him what is best, something other than what He sees fit for us; that when we pray Him to stay the cholera, we are imploring Him to change his purpose, which, for aught we know, was to send it. But surely this is altogether a wrong notion. If we thus pray, our prayers are assuredly wrong prayers. If we thus pray, we imply that we are wiser than God, or we should not venture to ask Him to change his purpose. No Christian man would be guilty of such presumption. But cannot I go to God and tell Him what my wishes are, without presuming to dictate to Him whether He is to gratify them or not? Prayer is the converse of the soul with God: it is the coming really and consciously into his presence: it is the reverential yet childlike utterance to Him of our wants, and it is the means appointed by Him for visiting our souls with his blessing. But that blessing may come in other ways as well as in the immediate granting of our petitions. Take the nearest earthly parallel. The child goes to his father with the natural, spontaneous, unchecked expression of all his childish wishes. How does a wise father deal with his child? Does he gratify every whim, does he yield to every desire? Certainly not. One of the most precious lessons he can teach his child, one most necessary part of his discipline, is that he is not to have his own way. Even the wish, reasonable in itself, of one child a parent may refuse to grant, if he feels that to do so would be injurious to another, or would disturb the general order of the household. And so it is with the family of God. He is the allwise and loving Father, who gives to us or withholds what we ask, according to the good pleasure of his own righteous and holy will. We may not presume to ask or expect that his pure and perfect will is to be bent and twisted and swayed to and fro to suit our everchanging humours and caprices. We are in no case judges of what is best for ourselves. And hence, when we go to God with any desire in our hearts, with any petition, either for ourselves or for others, we ought not to be too specific as to the matter, still less as to the manner of the answer. But we may freely and fully, without hesitation, without fear, without reserve, lay our cares, our sorrows, our trials, our earthly wants and necessities, as well as our spiritual wants and necessities, before our Father which is in heaven, in the fullest and most childlike trust that He will hear and answer our petitions. We may rest assured that if not in our way, yet in his, we shall obtain what we ask, that He who encourages us by the example of an earthly parent will not mock us, that for bread He will not give us a stone, nor for a fish a serpent.

The boon we crave, the relief we seek, may come in the ordinary and regular operation of God's providence, or it may come indirectly. It may come in what we call the course of nature, or God may be pleased to work on the spirits of our fellow-men, and through them on the material world. He who has access to all hearts may touch the secret springs within. He may inspire others with courage, wisdom, generosity, devotion, which shall turn to our good. He may give them the desire, and clothe them with the power to succour, and so accomplish for us, if it seemeth Him good, the deliverance or the blessing which we crave. Here indeed I can see no limit to the operation of God, to the putting forth of his power on our behalf. The direct action of his Spirit upon our spirits, I hold to be as real a fact as any fact in the material world. It is the law of all spiritual life. And therefore I can believe anything that meets me, however wonderful, in the shape of recorded answers to prayer, which may be explained on such a principle as

Some of us who may have seen the report of one of our great missionary societies,* little more than two short years ago, may recollect an instance in point of this kind of answer to prayer. The armies of one of the most fierce and bloodthirsty and relentless of heathen monarchs, the King of Dahomey, were encamped before the walls of the city of Abbeokuta, in Western Africa, defended by a garrison weak in numbers and equipment, but strong in the power of believing prayer. For eight days the invaders threatened the city, and for eight days the Christian missionaries and their converts did not cease to supplicate the Lord of Armies that they might be delivered out of the hands of their enemies. They expected the attack, they asked for deliverance or for victory, but they did not prescribe to God how the victory or the deliverance should come. It was a time of terrible suspense. On the ninth morning when they rose, the army whose formidable array had so long filled their hearts with uneasy forebodings, had vanished like a mist. The rising sun shone not on helmet and shield, on plume and lance, but on a silent, untenanted plain. Was that, or was it not, an answer to prayer? We need not suppose a miracle. It was not here, as it was with the armies of Sennacherib. No angel of the Lord went forth and smote the camp of the enemy. And yet the deliverance was no less real, no less manifestly given in answer to prayer. Why it was that the King of Dahomey struck his tents and retreated so suddenly from the beleaguered city has never been explained. But I believe that God, acting directly by the law of his spiritual working, touched the monarch's heart, sent upon him the blast of a sudden panic, or caused him to hear a rumour, or in some other way changed his purpose, and that this was the answer to his children's supplication.

Or again, no deliverance may come, no succour be vouchsafed, and yet the answer may be no less real, no less efficacious. We may have read not long since in the newspapers another narrative which may have seemed to teach us a lesson the very opposite to that of which I have been speaking. I refer to the account of that terrible butchery in Jamaica, when the rebels, who had surrounded the Court-house, at last completed their horrid work by setting it on fire. The narrative * runs that at the time "it was already dark, and a heavy cloud overhead gave judications of rain. The doomed inmates prayed fervently for a good shower, which would in all probability, had it come down, have dispersed the mob, or damped their ammunition, or afforded in some way opportunity for escape. But that hope soon fled, the clouds dispersed, and a beautiful starry sky, such only as the tropics can offer, shed its calm light upon the deeds of blood below." Who shall venture to say that that prayer was unanswered? I, for one, dare not. Who can tell how faith was sustained, who can tell how heroic firmness and resignation came? Who can tell whether God's best answer to that prayer was not in taking to Himself those who prayed?

And so it may be in other cases. The answer may come, not in the removal of pain, or sorrow, or suffering, but in the gift of inner strength to bear, of patience and resignation and devout submission to, the will of God. Many of us may have seen how truly God does thus grant us our petition. Many of us may have felt it in our own experience, or seen it strikingly exemplified in the experience of others. Many of us may have found here the solution of a difficulty which otherwise would have perplexed us: Why is it that God's truest and saintliest are so often doomed to bear the burden of perpetual disappointment? Why is it that they pour out their hearts for some blessing, but it comes not; for the removal of some evil, but it is not taken away? Does God mock his own dearly beloved children when He thus deals with them, -when, in spite of most anxious and long-continued pleadings, He inflicts the dreaded blow, -when He leaves the young children orphans, or takes away the wife from the husband, or the husband from the wife,-when He visits with sickness, with pain, with weariness, and refuses to remove the chastisement? No, these are the bitter arrows from the sweet and loving hand of God (sagittæ amaræ ex dulci manu Dei); this is the wise discipline of a Father who knows what is best for us, and who would make us partakers of his holiness. When St. Paul was vexed with the thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet him, he tells us that for this thing he besought the Lord thrice that it might be taken And what was the answer? Was it taken away? No: but strength was given him to bear: "My grace is sufficient for thee." He was taught this most precious lesson of life, that the end of all prayer, as of all our Christian life, is to bring our rebellious wills into harmony with, and submission to, the will of God. Yes, there is the solution of the mystery. There is the interpretation of what we so often stumble at. God does answer his children, but God does not give us the very thing we ask, because if He did it would make us selfish and proud, and careless and self-satisfied. We should begin to think ourselves the special favourites of heaven, and prayer a charm or talisman to secure us from all evil. God does not give us what we ask, but He gives us what is far better, patience and submission, the spirit of the cross, and the mind of Christ. He does not forbid us to utter our petitions, but He grants them as He thinks fit. He may even promise that we shall sit with Him on his throne, if that be our ambition, but He may make us first drink of the cup that He drank, and be baptised with the baptism that He was baptised with.

"Not my will, but thine be done." Such was the greatest prayer that the world has ever heard. There was the distinct expression of the human wish on the lips of Christ our Lord: "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." That was the petition. There was the shrinking of his human nature from the terrible hour of his agony. But there was also the devout submission to his Heavenly Father's will: "Not as I will, but as thou wilt." His prayer was answered, not in the removal of the cup, but in the succour vouchsafed. There appeared unto Him an angel from heaven, strengthening Him. In this spirit, may God give us all grace to pray. May He teach us to still our too selfish and passionate longings for earthly good, by the recollection that what we covet so earnestly might not be good for ourselves, or might be injurious to others. May He teach us by the discipline of our daily life ever to go to Him as a Father who is wiser and more loving to us than we are to ourselves. May He give us the holy confidence of children, and yet withal teach us in all things to bow our will to his. This, believe me, is the great lesson of life for every one of us. He who can say truly from the bottom of his heart, not in a mere perfunctory way, or as the expression of a merely passive resignation-he who can say from the bottom of his heart, knowing and meaning what he says,-"Not my will, but thine be done," has done life's greatest work; he is nearest to God, has most of the mind of Christ, is ripest for heaven.

THE LOST PIECE OF SILVER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

Holy Lord Jesus, Thou wilt seek till Thou find The lost piece of silver, the treasure enshrined By hearth or in bosom, once of such store— Now lying under the dust of Thy floor.

Gentle Lord Jesus, Thou wilt move through the room Light-kindling—light-bearing—and banish its gloom: The lost piece of silver which no man can see, O merciful Jesus, is beheld clear by Thee!

Defaced and degraded, and trampled in dust, Its superscription Thou know'st yet, we trust. Thou wilt reclaim it and make it re-shine, For it was silver, pure silver of Thine.

Loving Lord Jesus, though the house is all dark, With no hand to aid Thee, and no eye to mark, Though now "clean forgotten, as a dead man out of mind"— This lost piece of silver Thou wilt search for—and find.

MADONNA MARY.

PART III.

CHAPTER X.

AUNT AGATHA had grown into a sweet old lady; not so old, perhaps, but that she might have made up still into that elderly aspirant after youth, for whose special use the name "old maid" must have been invented. And yet there is a sweetness in the name, and it was not inapplicable to the fair old woman, who received Mary Ochterlony into her kind arms. There was a sort of tender misty consciousness upon her age, just as there is a tender unconsciousness in youth, of so many things that cannot but come to the knowledge of people who have eaten of the tree in the middle of the garden. She was surrounded by the unknown as was seemly to such a maiden soul. And yet she was old, and gleams of experience, and dim knowledge at second haud, had come to her from those misty tracts. Though she had not, and never could have, half the vigour or force in her which Mary had even in her subdued and broken state, still she had strength of affection and goodness enough, to take the management of all affairs into her hands for the moment, and to set herself at the head of the little party. She took Mary and the children from the ship, and brought them to the inn at which she had stayed the night before; and, what was a still greater achievement, she repressed Winnie, and kept her in a semi-subordinate and silent state-which was an effort which taxed all Aunt Agatha's powers. Though it may seem strange to say it, Mary and her young sister did not, as people say, take to each other at that first meeting. It was twelve years since they had met, and the eighteen-year-old young woman, accustomed to be a sovereign among her own people, and have all her whims attended to, did not, somehow, commend herself to Mary, who was broken, and joyless, and feeble, and little capable of glitter and motion. Aunt Agatha took the traveller to a cool room, where comparative quiet was to be had, and took off her heavy bonnet and cloak, and made her lie down, and came and sat by her. The children were in the next room, where the sound of their voices could reach their mother to keep her heart; and then Aunt Agatha took Mary's hand in both of hers, and said, "Tell me about it, my dear love." It was a way she had of speaking, but yet such words are sweet; especially to a forlorn creature who has supposed that there is nobody left in the world to address her so. And then Mary told her sad story with all the details that women love, and cried till the fountain of tears was for the time exhausted, and grief itself by its very vehemence had got calm; which was, as Aunt Agatha knew by instinct, the best way to receive a poor woman who was a widow, and had just set her solitary feet for the first time upon the shores which she left as a bride.

And so they rested and slept that first night on English soil. There are moments when sorrow feels sacramental, and as if it never could be disturbed again by the pettier emotions of life. Mrs. Ochterlony had gone to sleep in this calm, and it was with something of the same feeling that she awoke. As if life (as she thought) being over, its cares were in some sense over too, and that now nothing could move her further; unless, indeed, it might be any harm to the children, which, thank God, there was no appearance of. In this state of mind she rose up and said her prayers, mingling them with some of those great tears which gather one by one as the heart fills, and which seem to give a certain physical relief when they brim over; and then she went to join her aunt and sister at breakfast, where they had not expected to see her. "My love, I would have brought you your tea," said Aunt Agatha with a certain reproach; and when Mary smiled and said there was no need for that, even Winnie's heart was touched,wilful Winnie in her black muslin gown, who was a little piqued to feel herself in the company of some one more interesting than even she was, and hated herself for it, and yet could not help feeling as if Mary had come in like the prodigal, to be feasted and tended, while they never even killed a kid for her who had always been at home.

Winnie was eighteen, and she was not like her sister: She was tall, but not like Mary's tallnessa long slight slip of a girl, still full of corners. She had corners at her elbows, and almost at her shoulders, and a great many corners in her mind. She was not so much a pretty girl as a girl who would, or might be, a beautiful woman. Her eyebrows were arched, and so were her delicate nostrils, and her upper lip-all curved and moveable, and ready to quiver and speak when it was needful. When you saw her face in profile, that outline scemed to cut itself out, as in some warm marble against the background. 'It was not the beauté du diable, the bewildering charm of youth, and freshness, and smiles, and tints. She had something of all this, and to boot she had features-beaux traits. But as for this part of her power, Winnie, to do her justice, thought nothing of it; perhaps, to have understood that people minded what she said, and noticed what she did because she was very handsome, would have conveyed something like an insult and affront to the young lady. She did not care much, nor mind much at the present moment, whether she was pretty or not. She had no rivals, and beauty was a weapon the importance of which had not occurred to her. But she did care a good deal for being Winifred Seton, and as such, mistress of all she surveyed; and though she could have beaten herself for it, it called her involuntarily to find herself thus all at once in the presence of a person whom Providence seemed to have set, somehow, in a higher position, and who was more interesting than herself. It was a wicked thought, and she did it battle. If it had been left to her, how she could have petted and cared for Mary, how she would have borne her triumphantly over all the fatigues of the journey, and thought it nothing to take the tickets, and mind the luggage, and struggle with the porters for Mary's sake! But to have Mary come in and absorb Aunt Agatha's and everybody's first look, their first appeal and principal regard, was trying to Winnie; and she had never learned yet to banish altogether from her eyes what she thought.

"It does not matter, aunt," said Mary; "I cannot make a recluse of myself—I must go among strangers—and it is a great blessing to be able to practise a little with Winnie and you."

"You must not mind Winnie and me, my darling," said Aunt Agatha, who had a way of missing the arrow as it were, and catching some of the feathers of it as it flew past.

"What do you mean about going among strangers?" said the keener Winnie. "I hope you don't think we are strangers; and there is no need for you to go into society that I can see—not now at least; or at all events not unless you like," she continued with a suspicion of sharpness in her tone, not displeased perhaps on the whole that Mary was turning out delusive, and was not so interesting as she appeared to be, and was thinking already of society—for which notwithstanding she scorned her sister, as was natural to a young woman at the experienced age of eighteen.

"Society is not what I was thinking of," said Mary, who in her turn did not like her young sister's criticism; and she took her seat and her cup of tea with an uncomfortable sense of opposition. She had thought that she could not be annoyed any more by petty matters, and was incapable of feeling the little cares and complications of life, and yet it was astonishing how Winnie's little, sharp, half-sarcastic tone brought back the faculty of being

"The little we have at Kirtell will be a comfort to you, my love," said the soothing voice of Aunt Agatha; "all old friends. The vicar you know, Mary, and the doctor, and poor Sir Edward. There are some new people, but I do not make much account of them; and our little visiting would harm nobody," the old lady said, though with a slight tone of hurry and apology, not quite satisfied in herself that the widow should be even able to think of society so soon.

Upon which a little pucker of vexation came to Mary's brow. She saw now what she would have to encounter, and it seemed to her hard that she should have to encounter it while she was but trying painfully to do her duty. As if she cared or could care for their little visiting, and the vicar, and the doctor, and Sir Edward! she to whom going among strangers meant something so real and so hard to bear.

"Dear Aunt Agatha," she said, "I am afraid you will not be pleased—but I have not been looking forward to anything so pleasant as going to Kirtell. The first thing I have to think of is the boys and their interests. And Francis Ochterlony has asked us to go to Earlston." These words came all confused from Mary's lips. She broke down, seeing what was coming; for this was something that she never had calculated on, or thought of having to bear.

A dead pause ensued; Aunt Agatha started and flushed all over, and gave an agitated exclamation, and then a sudden blank came upon her sweet old face. Mary did not look at her, but she saw without looking how her aunt stiffened into resentment. and offence, and mortification. She changed in an instant, as if Mrs. Ochterlony's confused statement had been a spell, and drew herself up and sat motionless, a picture of surprised affection and wounded pride. Poor Mary saw it, and knew it was she who had done it, and was grieved to the heart and yet could not but resent such a want of understanding of her position and sympathy for herself. She lifted her cup to her lips with a trembling hand, and her tea did not refresh her. And it was the only near relative she had in the world, the tenderest-hearted creature in existence, a woman who could be cruel to nobody, who thus shut up her heart against her. Thus the three women sat together round their breakfast-table and helped each other and said nothing for one stern moment, which was a cruel moment for two of them at least.

"Earlston!" said Aunt Agatha at last, with a quiver in her voice. "Indeed it never occurred to me—I had not supposed that Francis Ochterlony had been so much to—— But never mind, if that is what you think best for yourself, Mary."

"There is nothing best for myself," said Mrs. Ochterlony with the sharpness of despair. "I think it is my duty—and—and Hugh, I know, would have thought so. Our boy is his uncle's heir. They are the—the only Ochterlonys left now. It is what I must—what I ought to do."

And then there was another pause. Aunt Agatha for her part would have liked to cry, but then she had her side of the family to maintain, and though every pulse in her was beating with disappointment and mortified affection she was not going to show that. "You must know best," she said, taking up her little air of dignity; "I am sure you must know best; I would never try to force my way of thinking on you, Mary. No doubt you have been more in the world thau I have; but I did think when a woman was in trouble that to go among her own friends—"

"Yes," said Mary, who was overwhelmed and did not feel able to bear it, "but her friends might understand her and have a little pity for her, Aunt, when she had hard things to do that wrung her heart—"

"My dear," said Aunt Agatha, with, on her side, the bitterness of unappreciated exertion, "if you will think how far I have come, and what an unusual journey I have made, I think you will perceive that to accuse me of want of pity—"

"Don't worry her, Aunt Agatha," said Winnie, "she is not accusing you of want of pity. I think it a very strange sort of thing myself; but, let Mary have justice, that was not what she meant."

"I should like to know what she did mean," said Aunt Agatha, who was trembling with vexation, and with those tears which she wanted so much to shed; and then two or three of them dropped on the broad-brimmed eambric cuff which she was wearing solely on Mary's account. For to be sure Major Ochterlony was not to say a relation of hers that she should have worn such deep mourning for him. "I am sure I don't want to interfere, if she prefers Francis Ochterlony to her own friends," she added, with tremulous haste. She was the very same Aunt Agatha who had taken Mary to her arms the day before, and sat by her bed, listening to all the sad story of her widowhood. She had wept for Hugh, and she would have shared her cottage and her garden and all she had with Mary, with the goodwill and bounty, eagerly -but Francis Ochterlony was a different matter; and perhaps it was not in human nature to bear the preference of a husband's brother to "her own friends." "They may be the last Ochterlonys," said Aunt Agatha, "but I never understood that a woman was to give up her own family entirely; and your sister was born a Seton like you and me, Winnie :- I don't understand it, for my part."

Aunt Agatha broke down when she had said this, and cried more bitterly, more effusively, so long as it lasted, than she had cried last night over Hugh Ochterlony's sudden ending: and Mary could not but feel that; and as for Winnic, she sat silent, and if she did not make things worse, at least she made no effort to make them better. On the whole it was not much wonder. They had made great changes in the cottage for Mary's sake. Aunt Agatha had given up her parlour, her own pretty room that she loved, for a nursery, and they had made up their minds that the best room was to be Mary's, with a sort of sense that the fresh chintz and the pictures on the walls-it was the only bed-room that had any pictures-would make up to her if anything could. And now to find all the time that it was Francis Ochterlony, and not her own friends, that she was going to! Winnie sat quite still with her fine profile cut out sternly against the dark green wall, looking immoveable and unfeeling as only a fine profile can under such circumstances. This was what came of Mary's placid morning and the dear union of family support and love into which she thought she had come. It was harder upon Mrs. Ochterlony than if Aunt Agatha had not come to meet her. She had to sit blank and silent like a criminal, and see the old lady cry and the young lady lift up the stern delicacy of that profile against her. They were disappointed in Mary, and not only were they disappointed but mortified,—wounded in their best feelings and embarrassed in secondary matters as well; for naturally Aunt Agatha had told everybody that she was going to bring her niece, Mrs. Ochterlony, and the poor dear children home.

Thus it will be seen that the first breakfast in England was a very unsatisfactory meal for Mary. She took refuge with her children when it was over. and shut up, as she had been forced to do in other days, another door in her heart; and Aunt Agatha and Winnie on the other hand withdrew to their apartment and talked it over and kindled each other's indignation. "If you knew the kind of man he was, Winnie!" Aunt Agatha said, with a severity which was not entirely on Mary's account; "not the sort of man I would trust those poor dear fatherless children with. I don't believe he has any religious priuciples. Dear, dear, to think how Mary should have changed! I never could have thought she would have preferred Francis Ochterlony, and turned against her own friends."

"I don't know anything about Francis Ochterlony," said Winnie, "but I know what a lot of bother we have had at home making all those changes; and your parlour that you had given up, Aunt Agatha—I must say when I think of that—"

"That is nothing, my love," said Aunt Agatha; "I was not thinking of what I have done, I hope—as if the sacrifice was anything." But nevertheless the tears came into her eyes at the thought. It is hard when one has made a sacrifice—a real sacrifice—with a liberal heart, to have it thrown back and to feel that it is useless. This is hard, and Aunt Agatha was only human. If she had been alone, probably after the first moment of annoyance she would have gone to Mary, and the two would have cried together, and after little Hugh's prospects had been discussed, Miss Seton would have consented that it was best for her niece to go to Earlston; but then Winnie was there to talk it over and keep up Aunt Agatha's indignation. And Mary was wounded, and had retired and shut herself up among her children. And it was thus that the most trifling and uncalled-for of cares, came with little pricks of vexation and disappointment, to disturb at its very outset the new chapter of life which Mrs. Ochterlony had imagined herself to be entering upon in such a calm of tranquillizing grief.

They were to go to London that day, and to continue their journey to the North by the night train: but it was no longer a journey in which any of the party could take any pleasure. As for Mary, in the great revulsion of her disappointment, it seemed to her as if there was no comfort for her anywhere. She had to go to Earlston to accept a home from Francis Ochterlony, whom she had never "taken to," even in her young days. And it had occurred to her that her aunt and sister would understand why, and would be sorry for her, and console her under this painful effort. When, on the contrary, they proved to be affronted aud indiguant, Mary's heart shut close, and retreated within itself. She could take her children into her arms, and press them against her heart, as if that would do it some good; but she could not talk to the little things, nor consult them, nor share anything with them except such smiles as were practicable. To a woman who has been used to talk all her concerns over with some one, it is terrible to feel her yearnings for counsel and sympathy turned back upon her own soul like this, and to be struck dumb and feel that no ear is open to her, and that in all the world there is no one living to whom her affairs are more than the affairs of a stranger. Some poor women there are who must have fellowship somehow, and who will be content with pity if sympathy is not to be had. But Mary was not of this kind of women. She shut her doors. She went in, into herself in the silence and solitude, and felt her instinctive yearning to be helped and understood come pouring back upon her like a bitter flood. And then she looked at her little boys in their play, who had need of all from her, and could give her back but their childish fondness, and no help, or stay, or counsel. It is hard upon a woman, but yet it is a thing which every woman must confront and make up her mind to, whom God places in such circumstances. I do not know if it is easier work for a man in the same position. Mary had felt the prop of expected sympathy and encouragement and affection rudely driven from under her, and when she came in among her innocent helpless children she faced her lot, and did not deceive herself any more. To judge for herself, and do the best that in her lay, and take all the responsibilities upon her own head, whatever might follow; to know that nobody now in all the world was for her, or stood by her, except in a very secondary way, after his or her concerns and intentions and feelings had been carefully provided for in the first place. This was how her position appeared to her. And, indeed, such was her position, without any exaggeration. It was very kind of Francis Ochterlony to be willing to take her in, and very kind of Aunt Agatha to have made preparations for her; and kindness is sweet, and yet it is bitter, and hard, and cold, and killing to meet with. It made Mary sick to her heart, and filled her with a longing to take up her babes and rush away into some solitary corner, where nobody would ever see her again or hear of her. I do not say that she was right, or that it was a proper state of mind to be in. And Mary was too right-minded a woman to indulge in it long; but that was the feeling that momentarily took possession of her as she put the doors to in her heart, and realised that she really was alone then, and that her concerns were hers alone, and belonged to nobody else in the world.

And, on the other hand, it was very natural for Aunt Agatha and Winnie. They knew the exertions they had made, and the flutter of generous excite. | valley among the grey folds of the Shap Fells. It

ment in which they had been, and their readiness to give up their best for the solace of the widow. And naturally the feeling that all their sacrifices were unnecessary and their preparations made in vain, turned the honey into gall for the moment. It was not their part to take Mary's duty into consideration, in the first place; and they did not know beforehand of Francis Ochterlony's letter, nor the poor Major's confidence that his brother would be a friend to his widow. And it was natural that she should go to her own friends. And then Aunt Agatha's parlour, which was all metamorphosed, and the changes that had been made through the whole house! The result was, that Aunt Agatha, offended, did not so much as offer to her niece the little breathing-time Mary had hoped for. When they got to London, she reopened the subject, but it was in an unanswerable way.

"I suppose your brother-in-law expects you," she said. "I think it will be better to wait till tomorrow before you start, that he may send the carriage to the station for you. I don't ask you to come to me for the night, for it would be a pity to derange the children for so short a time."

"Very well, Aunt," said Mary, sadly. And she wrote to Mr. Ochterlony, and slept that night in town-her strength almost failing her at the thought that, in her feebleness and excitement, she had to throw herself immediately on Francis Ochterlony's tender mercies. She even paused for a moment to think, might she not really do as her heart suggested-find out some corner of refuge for herself with which nobody could intermeddle, and keep apart from them all? But Mary had come "home to her friends," as everybody said at the station; and she had a woman's prejudices, and it seemed unnatural to her to begin, without any interposition of the people belonging to her, that strange and solitary life of independence or selfdependence which was what she must decide upon some time. And then there was always Mr. Ochterlony's letter, which was so kind. And she had settled on this, and had not thought about the other, nor did she know where to go to. Thus it was fixed by a few words, and could not be changed. Aunt Agatha had a terrible compunction afterwards, and could not get Mary's look out of her head, as she owned to Winnie, and would have got up out of her bed in the middle of the night, and gone to Mary and begged her to come to the cottage first, if it had not been that Winnie might have woke up, and that she would have to cross a passage to Mary's room; and in a hotel where "gentlemen" were continually about, who could tell whom she might meet? So they all slept, or pretended to sleep, and said nothing about it: and the next day set off with no further explanations, on their way "home."

CHAPTER XI.

EARLSTON is a house which lies in a little green is not an inviting country, though the people love it as people do love everything that belongs to them; and it has a very different aspect from the wooded dell a little farther north, where strays the romantic little Kirtell, and where Aunt Agatha's cottage smiled upon a tufted slope with the music of the cheery river in its ears day and night. The rivers about Earlston were shallow and ran dry in summer, though it was not because of any want of rain; and the greyness of the hills made a kind of mist in the air to unaccustomed eyes. Everybody, who has ever gone to the north that way, knows the deep cuttings about Shap, where the railway plunges through between two humid living limestone walls, where the cottages and the fences and the farm-houses all lead up in level tones of grey to the vast greyness of the piebald hills, and where the line of pale sky above is grey too in most cases. It was at one of the little stations in this monotonous district that Mrs. Ochterlony and her children and her. ayah were deposited-Aunt Agatha, with an aspect of sternness but a heart that smote her, and eyes that kept filling with tears she was too proud to shed, looking on the while. Winnie looked on too without the compunction, feeling very affronted and angry. They were going further on, and the thought of home was overcast to both these ladies by the fact that everybody would ask for Mary, and that the excitement of the last few weeks would collapse in the dreariest and suddenest way when they were seen to return alone. As for Mary, she looked grey like the landscape, under her heavy veil-grey, silent, in a kind of dull despair, persuading herself that the best thing of all was to say nothing about it and shut only more closely the doors of that heart where nobody now had any desire to come in. She lifted her little boys out and did not care even to look if the carriage was waiting for her-and then she came to the window to bid her aunt and sister good-bye. She was so disappointed and sick-hearted, and felt for the moment that the small amount of affection and comprehension which they were capable of giving her was so little worth the trouble of asking for, that Mary did not even ask to be written to. She put up her pale face and said goodbye in a dreary unexpectant tone that doubled the compunction in Aunt Agatha's bosom. "Oh, Mary, if you had but been coming with us!" cried that inconsistent woman, on the spur of the moment. "It is too late to speak of it now," said Mary, and kissed her and turned away; and the heartless train dashed off, and carried off Aunt Agatha with that picture in her eyes of the forlorn little group on the platform of the railway station—the two little boys clinging close to their mother, and she standing alone among strangers with the widow's veil hanging over her colourless face. you see the carriage, Winnie?-look out and tell me if you can see it," said Aunt Agatha. the engine that carried them on was too quick for Winnie, and had already swept out of sight. And they pursued their journey, feeling guilty and wretched, as indeed, to a certain extent, they deserved to feel. A two months' widow with a baby and two helpless little boys-and at the best it could only be a servant who had come to meet her, and she would have everything to do for herself and to face her brother-in-law without any support or helper. When Aunt Agatha thought of this, slic sank back in her corner and sobbed. To think that she should have been the one to take offence and be affronted at Mary's first word, and desert her thus ; when she might have taken her home and comforted her, and then, if it must have ended so, conveyed her to Earlston. Aunt Agatha cried, and deserved to cry, and even Winnie felt a twinge at her heart; and they got rather angry with each other before they reached home and felt disposed to accuse each other, and trembled both of them before the idea of meeting Peggy, Miss Seton's domestic tyrant, who would rush to the door with her heart in her mouth to receive "our Miss Mary and the puir dear fatherless bairns." Mary might be silent about it, and never complain of unkindness; but it was not to be expected that Peggy would have the same scruples; and these two guilty and miserable travellers trembled at the thought of her as they made their wretched way home.

When the train had disappeared, Mary tried to take a kind of cold comfort to herself. She stood all alone, a stranger with the few rustic passengers and rustic railway officials staring at her as if she had dropped from the skies, and no apparent sign anywhere that her coming had been looked for, or that there was any resting-place for her in this grey country. And she said to herself that it was natural, and must always be so henceforth, and that it was best at once to accustom herself to her lot. The carriage had not come, nor any message from Earlston to say she was expected, and all that she could do was to go into the rude little waiting-room and wait there with the tired children till some conveyance could be got to take her to her brotherin-law's house. Her thoughts would not be pleasant to put down on paper, could it be done; and yet they were not so painful as they had been the day before, when Aunt Agatha failed her or seemed to fail. Now that disappointed craving for help and love and fellowship was over for the moment, and she had nothing but her own duty and Francis Ochterlony to encounter, who was not a man to give any occasion for vain hopes. Mary did not expect fellowship or love from her brother-in-law. If he was kind and tolerant of the children, and moderately considerate to herself, it was all that she looked for from him. Perhaps, though he had invited her, he had not been prepared to have her thrown on his hands so soon; and it might be that the domestic arrangements of Earlston were not such as to admit of the unlooked-for invasion of a lady and a nursery on such very short notice. But the most prominent feeling in Mrs. Ochterlony's mind was weariness and that longing to escape anywhere, which is the most universal of all sentiments when the spirit is worn out and sick to death. Oh that she had wings like a dove !- though Mary had nowhere to flee to, nobody to seek consolation from; and, instead of having a home anywhere on earth awaiting her, was herself the home, the only shelter they understood, of the little pale fatherless children who clustered around her. If she could but have taken possession of one of those poor cottages, grey and homely as they looked, and put the little ones to bed in it, and drawn a wooden chair to the fire, and been where she had a right to be! It was July, but the weather was cold at Shap, and Mary had that instinct common to wounded creatures of creeping to the fire as if there was a kind of comfort in its warmth. She could have borne her burden bravely, or at least she thought so, if this had been what awaited her. But it was Earlston and Francis Ochterlony that awaited her-a stranger and a stranger's house. All these thoughts and many more were passing through her mind as she sat in the little waiting-room with her baby in her arms and her two elder boys pressing close to her. The children clung and appealed to her, and the helpless Hindoo woman crouched at her mistress's side; but as for Mary, there was nobody to give her any support or countenance. It was a hard opening to the stern way which had henceforward to be trodden alone.

Francis Ochterlony, however, though he had a certain superb indifference to the going-out and coming-in of trains, and had forgotten the precise hour, was not a wretch nor a brute, and had not forgotten his visitors. While Mary sat and waited, and while the master of the little station made slow but persevering search after some possible means of conveyance for her, a heavy rumbling of wheels became audible, and the carriage from Earlston made its tardy appearance. It was an oldfashioned vehicle, drawn by two horses which betrayed their ordinary avocations much in the same way as the coachman did, who, though dressed, as they were, for the occasion, carried a breath of the fields about him, which was more convincing than any conventionalism of garments. But such as it was the Earlston carriage was not without consideration in the countryside. All the people about turned out in a leisurely way to lift the children into it, and shoulder the boxes into such corners as could be found for them-which was an affair that demanded many counsellors-and at length the vehicle got under way. Twilight began to come on as they mounted up into the grey country, by the winding grey roads fenced in with limestone walls. Everything grew greyer in the waning light. The very trees, of which there were so few, dropped into the gathering shadows, and deepened them without giving any livelier tint of colour to the scene. The children dropped asleep, and the ayah crooned and nodded over the baby; but Mary, who had no temptation to sleep, looked out with steady eyes, and, though she saw nothing distinctly, took in unawares all the comfortless chill and monotony of the land-

It went to her heart, and made her shiver. Or perhaps it was only the idea of meeting Francis Ochterlony that made her shiver. If the children, any one of them, had only been old enough to understand it a little, to clasp her hand or her neck with the exuberance of childish sympathy! But they did not understand, and dropped asleep, or asked with timid quivering little voices, how long it would be before they got home. Home ! no wonder Mrs. Ochterlony was cold, and felt the chill go to her heart. Thus they went on for six or seven weary miles, taking as many hours, as Mary thought. Aunt Agatha had arrived at her cottage, though it was nearly thirty miles further on, while the comfortless party were still jogging along in the Earlston carriage; but Mary did not think particularly of that. She did not think at all, poor soul. She saw the grey hill-side gliding past her, and in a vague way at the same moment seemed to see herself, a bride, going gaily past on the same road, and rehearsed all the past over again with a dull pain, and shivered, and felt cold - cold to her heart. This was partly perhaps because it is chilly in Cumberland when one has just come from India, and partly because there was something that affected a woman's fanciful imagination in the misty monotony of the limestone country and the grey waste of the hills.

Earlston, too, was grey, as was to be expected; and the trees which surrounded it had lost colour in the night. The hall was but dimly lighted when the door was opened—as is but too common in country houses of so retired a kind-and there was nobody ready at the instant to open the door or to receive the strangers. To be sure, people were called and came—the housekeeper first, in a silk gown which rustled excessively, and with a certain air of patronising affability; and then Mr. Ochterlony, who had been sitting, as he usually did, in his dressing-gown, and who had to get into his coat so hurriedly that he had not recovered from it when he shook hands with his sister-in-law; and then by degrees servants appeared and lifted out the sleepy, startled children, who, between waking and sleeping, worn out, frightened, and excited, were precisely in the condition which it is most difficult to manage. And the ayah, who could hold no Christian communication with anybody around her, was worse than useless to her poor mistress. When Mr. Ochterlony led the way into the great, solemn, dark dining-room-which was the nearest room at hand—the children, instead of consenting to be led upstairs, clung with one unanimous accord to their mother. Little Wilfrid got to her arms notwithstanding all remonstrances, and Hugh and Islay each seized silently a handful of her black dress, crushing the crape beyond all remedy. It was thus she entered Earlston, which had been her husbaud's birthplace, and was to be her son's inheritance-or so at least Mary thought.

"I hope you have had a pleasant journey," Mr. Ochterlony said, shaking hands with her again. "I dare say they are tired, poor little things—but you have had good weather, I hope." This he said after he had indicated to Mary a large easy-chair in carved oak which stood by the side of the fireplace, and into which, with little Wilfrid clinging to her, and Islay and Hugh holding fast by her dress, it was not so easy to get. The master of the house did not sit down himself, for it was dreary and dark, and he was a man of fine perceptions; but he walked to the window and looked out, and then came back again to his sister-in-law. "I am glad you have had such good weather—but I am sure you must all be tired," he said.

"Yes," said Mary, who would have liked to cry, "very tired; but I hope we did not come too soon. Your letter was so kind that I thought——"

"Oh don't speak of it," said Mr. Ochterlony; and then he stood before her on the dark hearth, and did not know what more to say. The twilight was still lingering, and there were no lights in the room, and it was fitted up with the strictest regard to propriety, and just as a dining-room ought to be. Weird gleams of dull reflections out of the depths of old mahogany lay low towards the floor, bewildering the visitor; and there was not even the light of a fire, which, for merely conventional motives because it was July, did not occupy its usual place; though Mary, fresh from India and shivering with the chill of excitement and nervousness and grief, would have given anything to be within reach of one. Neither did she know what to say to her almost unknown brother-in-law, whose face even she could see very imperfectly; and the children grasped her with that tight hold which is in itself a warning, and shows that everything is possible in the way of childish fright and passion. But still it was indispensable that she should find something to say.

"My poor little boys are so young," she said, faltering. "It was very very good of you to ask us, and I hope they won't be troublesome. I think I will ask the housekeeper to show us where we are to be. The railway tires them more than the ship did. This is Hugh," said Mary, swallowing as best she could the gasp in her throat, and detaching poor little Hugh's hand from her crape. But she had tears in her voice, and Mr. Ochterlony had a wholesome dread of crying. He gave his nephew a hurried pat on the head without looking at him, and called for Mrs. Gilsland, who was at hand among the shadows rustling with her silk gown.

"Oh!" he said hurriedly. "A fine little fellow I am sure;—but you are quite right, and they must be tired, and I will not detain you. Dinner is at seven," said Mr. Ochterlony. What could he say? He could not even see the faces of the woman and children whom it was his dread but evident duty to receive. When they went away under Mrs. Gilsland's charge, he followed them to the foot of the stairs, and stood looking after them as the procession mounted, guided by the rustle of the housekeeper's gown. The poor man looked at them in a bewildered way, and then went off to his library, where his own shaded lamp was lit, and where everything was cosy and familiar. Arrived there, he threw himself into his own chair with a sigh. He was not a brute, nor a wretch, as we have said, and the least thing he could do when he heard of his poor brother's death was to offer a shelter-temporarily at least-to the widow and her children: but perhaps a lurking hope that something might turn up to prevent the invasion had been in his mind up to this day. Now she was here, and what was he to do with her? Now they were here, which was still more seriousthree boys (even though one of them was a baby) in a house full of everything that was daintiest and rarest and most delicate! No wonder Mr. Ochterlony was momentarily stupefied by their arrival; and then he had not even seen their faces to know what they were like. He remembered Mary of old in her bride-days, but then she was too young, too fresh, too unsubdued to please him. If she were as full of vigour and energy now, what was to become of a quiet man who, above all things, loved tranquillity and leisure? This was what Francis Ochterlony was thinking as his visitors went up-stairs.

Mrs. Ochterlony was inducted into the best rooms in the house. Her brother-in-law was not an effusive or sympathetic man by nature, but still he knew what was his duty under the circumstances. Two great rooms gleaming once more with ebon gleams out of big wardrobes and half-visible mirrors, with beds that looked a little like hearses and heavy solemn hangings. Mrs. Gilsland's silk gown rustled about everywhere, pointing out a thousand conveniences unknown at the station; but all Mary was thinking about was one of those grey cottages on the road with the fire burning brightly, and its little homely walls lighted up with the fitful, cheerful radiance. If she could but have had a fire, and crept up to it and knelt on the hearth and held herself to the comforting warmth. There are times when a poor creature feels all body, just as there are times when she feels all soul. And then, to think that dinner was at seven! just as it had been when she came there with Hugh, a girl all confident of happiness and life. No doubt Mr. Ochterlony would have forgiven his sister-in-law, and probably indeed would have been as much relieved as she, if she had but sent an apology and stayed in her room all the evening. But Mary was not the kind of woman to do this. It did not occur to her to depart from the natural routine, or make so much talk about her own feelings or sentiments as would be necessary even to excuse her. What did it matter? If it had to be done, it had to be done, and there was nothing more to be said. This was the view her mind took of most matters; and she had always been well, and never had any pretext to get out of things she did not like, as women do who have headaches and handy little illnesses. She could always do what was needful, and did always do it without stopping to make any questions; which is a serviceable kind of temperament in life, and yet subjects people to many little martyrdoms which otherwise they might escape from. Though her heart was sick, she put on her best gown all covered with crape, and her widow's cap, and went down to dine with Francis Ochterlony in the great diningroom, leaving her children behind, and longing unspeakably for that cottage with the fire.

It was not such an unbecoming dress after all, notwithstanding what people say. Mary was worn and sad, but she was not faded; and the dead white of the cap that encircled her face, and the dead black of her dress, did not do so much harm as perhaps they ought to have done to that sweet and steadfast grace, which had made the regiment recognise and adopt young Stafford's fanciful title. She was still Madonna Mary under that disfigurement; and on the whole she was not disfigured by her dress. Francis Ochterlony lifted his eyes with equal surprise and satisfaction to take a second look at poor Hugh's widow. He felt by instinct that Phidias himself could not have filled a corner in his drawingroom, which was so full of fine things, with a figure more fair or half so appropriate as that of the serene woman who now took her seat there, abstracted a little into the separation and remoteness of sorrow, but with no discord in her face. He liked her better so than with the group of children, who made her look as if she were a Charity, and the heavy veil hanging half over her face, which had a conventual and uncomfortable effect; and he was very courteous and attentive to his sister-in-law. hope you had good weather," he said in his deferential way; "and I trust, when you have been a few days at Earlston, the fatigue will wear off. You will find everything very quiet here."

"I hope so," said Mary; "but it is the children I am thinking of. I trust our rooms are a long distance off, and that we will not disturb you."

"That is quite a secondary matter," said Mr. Ochterlony. "The question is, are you comfortable? I hope you will let Mrs. Gilsland know if anything is wanted. We are not-not quite used to these sort of things, you know; but I am sure, if anything is wanted-"

"You are very kind," said Mary; "I am sure we shall be very comfortable." And yet as she said so her thoughts went off with a leap to that little cottage interior, and the cheerful light that shone out of the window, and the fire that crackled and blazed within. Ah, if she were but there; not dining with Mr. Ochterlony in solemn grandeur, but putting her little boys to bed, and preparing their supper for them, and cheating away heavy thoughts by that dear common work for the comfort and service of her own which a woman loves. But this was not a sort of longing to give expression to at Earlston, where in the evening Mr. Ochterlony was very kind to his sister-in-law, and showed her a great many priceless things which Mary regarded with trembling, thinking of two small barbarians about to be let loose among them, not to speak of little Wil- are well," she said to herself-and went down-frid, who was old enough to dash an Etruscan vase to the earth, or upset the rarest piece of china, though he was still only a baby. She could not tell how they were so much as to walk through that drawingroom without doing some harm, and her heart sank within her as she listened to all those loving lingering descriptions which only a virtuoso can make. Mr. Ochterlony retired that evening with a sense always agreeable to a man, that in doing a kind thing he had not done a foolish one, and that the children of such a fair and gracious woman could not be the graceless imps who had been haunting his dreams ever since he knew they were coming home; but Mary for her part took no such flattering unction to her. She sighed more and more for the cottage and the fire as she went upstairs sad and weary to the great sombre room, in which a couple of candles burned like tiny stars in a world of darkness, and looked at her sleeping boys, and wondered what they were to do in this collection of curiosities and beauties. She was an ignorant woman, and did not, alas! care anything at all for the Venus Anadyomene. But she thought of little Hugh tilting her and her pedestal over, and shook and trembled at the idea. She trembled too with cold and nervous agitation, and the chill of sorrow in her heart. In the lack of other human sources of consolation, oh! to go to that cottage hearth, and kneel down and feel to one's very soul the comfort of the warm consoling fire.

It had need to be a mind which has reached the last stage of human sentiment which can altogether resist the influence of a lovely summer morning, all made of warmth, and light, and softened sounds, and far-off odours. Mrs. Ochterlony had not reached this last stage; she was still young, and she was only at the beginning of her loneliness, and her heart had not sickened at life, as hearts do sometimes which have made a great many repeated efforts to live, and have had to give in again and again. When she saw the sunshine lying in a supreme peacefulness upon those grey hills, and all the pale sky and blue depths of air beaming softly with that daylight which comes from God, her courage came back to her in spite of herself. She began the morning by the shedding of those silent tears which are all the apology one can make to one's dead, for having the heart to begin another day without them; and when that moment was over, and the children had lifted all their daylight faces in a flutter of curiosity and excitement about this new "home" they had come to, after so long talking of it and looking forward to it, things did not seem so dark to Mary as on the previous evening. For one thing, the sun was warm and shone in at her windows, which made a great difference; and with her children's voices in her ears, and their faces fresh in the morning light, what woman could be altogether without courage? "So long as they stairs a little consoled, to pour out Mr. Ochterlony's coffee for him, thanking heaven in her heart that her boys were to have a meal which had nothing calm nor classical about it, in the old nursery where their father had once eaten his breakfasts, and which had been hurriedly prepared for them. "The little dears must go down to dessert; but master, ma'am—well, he's an old bachelor, you know," said Mrs. Gilsland, while explaining this arrangement. "Oh, thank you, I hope you will help me to keep them from disturbing him," Mary had said; and thus it was with a lighter heart that she went down-stairs.

Mr. Ochterlony came down too at the same time in an amiable frame of mind. Notwithstanding that he had to put himself into a morning coat, and abjure his dressing-gown, which was somewhat of a trial for a man of fixed habits, nothing could exceed the graciousness of his looks. A certain horrible notion common to his class, that children scream all night long, and hold an entire household liable to be called up at any moment, had taken possession of his mind. But his tired little guests had been swallowed up in the silence of the house, and had neither screamed, nor shouted, nor done anything to disturb its habitual quiet; and the wonderful satisfaction of having done his duty, and not having suffered for it, had entered Mr. Ochterlony's mind. It is in such circumstances that the sweet sense of well-doing, which is generally supposed the best reward of virtue, settles upon a good man's spirit. The Squire might be premature in his self-congratulations, but then his sense of relief was exquisite. If nothing worse was to come of it than the presence of a fair woman, whose figure was always in drawing, and who never put herself into an awkward attitude-whose voice was soft, and her movements tranquil, Mr. Ochterlony felt that self-sacrifice after all was practicable. The boys could be sent to school as all boys were, and at intervals might be endured when there was nothing else for it. Thus he came down in a benign condition, willing to be pleased. As for Mary, the first thing that disturbed her calm, was the fact that she was herself of no use at her brother-in-law's breakfasttable. He made his coffee himself in a pretty glass machine, which he took pains to explain to her, and then he went into general conversation in the kindest way, to put her at her ease.

"That is the Farnese Hercules," he said; "I saw it caught your eye last night. It is from a cast I had made for the purpose, and is considered very perfect; and that you know is the new Pallas, the Pallas that was found in the Sestina Villa; you recollect, perhaps?"

"I am afraid not," said Mary, faltering, and she looked at them, poor soul, with wistful eyes, and tried to feel a little interest. "I have been so long out of the way of everything—"

"To be sure," said the Squire, encouragingly, "and my poor brother Hugh, I remember, knew very little about it. He went early to India, and had few advantages, poor fellow." All this Mr. Ochterlony said while he was concecting his coffee in his pretty machine; and Mary had nothing to do but to sit and listen to him with her face fully open to his inspection if he liked, and no kindly urn before her to hide the sudden rush of tears and indignation. A man who spent his life having easts made, and collecting what Mary in her heart with secret rage called "pretty things!"—that he should make a complacent contrast between himself and his brother! The suggestion filled Mrs. Ochterlony with a certain speechless fury which was born of her grief.

"He knew well how to do his duty," she said, as soon as she could speak; and she would not let her tears fall, but opened her burning eyes wide, and absorbed them somehow out of pride for Hugh.

"Poor fellow!" said his brother, daintily pouring out the fragrant coffee. "I don't know if he ever could have had much appreciation of Art; but I am sure he made a good soldier, as you say. I was very much moved and shocked when I heard—but do not let us talk of such painful subjects; another time, perhaps—"

And Mary sat still with her heart beating, and said no more-thinking through all the gentle flow of conversation that followed, of the inconceivable conceit that could for a moment class Francis Ochterlony's dilettante life with that of her dead Hugh, who had played a man's part in the world, and had the heart to die for his duty's sake. And this useless Squire could speak of the few advantages he had! It was unreasonable, for, to tell the truth, the Squire was much more accomplished, much better instructed than the Major. Numismatic Society and the Society of Antiquaries. and even, on certain subjects, the British Association, would have listened to Francis Ochterlony as if he had been a messenger from heaven. Whereas Hugh the soldier would never have got a hearing nor dared to open his lips in any learned presence. But then that did not matter to his wife, who, notwithstanding her many high qualities, was not a perfectly reasonable woman. Those "few advantages" stood terribly in Mary's way for that first morning. They irritated her far more than Mr. Ochterlony could have had the least conception or understanding of. If anybody had given him a glass to look into her heart with, the Squire would have been utterly confounded by what he saw there. What had he done? And indeed he had done nothing that anybody (in his senses) could have found fault with; he had but turned Mary's thoughts once more with a violent longing to the roadside cottage, where at least, if she and her children were but safely housed, her soldier's memory would be shrined, and his sword hung up upon the homely wall, and his name turned into a holy thing. Whereas he was only a younger brother who had gone away to India, and had few advantages, in the Earlston way of thinking. This was the uppermost thought in Mrs. Ochterlony's mind as her brother-in-law exhibited all his collections to her. The drawing-room, which she had but imperfectly seen in her weariness and preoccupation the previous night, was a perfect museum of things rich and rare. There were delicate marbles, tiny but priceless, standing out white and ethereal against the soft, carefully chosen, toned crimson of the curtains; and bronzes that were worth half a year's income of the lands of Earlston; and Etruscan vases and Pompeian relics; and hideous dishes with lizards on them, beside plaques of dainty porcelain with Raphael's designs; the very chairs were fantastic with inlaying and gilding-curious articles, some of them worth their weight in gold; and if you but innocently looked at an old cup and saucer on a dainty table wondering what it did there, it turned out to be the ware of Henri II., and priceless. To see Mary going over all this with her attention preoccupied and wandering, and yet a wistful interest in her eyes, was a strange sight. All that she had in the world was her children, and the tiny little income of a soldier's widow-and you may suppose perhaps that she was thinking what a help to her and the still more valuable little human souls she had to care for, would have been the money's-worth of some of these fragile beauties. But that was not what was in Mrs. Ochterlony's mind. What occupied her on the contrary was an indignant wonder within herself how a man who spent his existence upon such trifles (they looked trifles to her, from her point of view, and in this of course she was still unreasonable) could venture to look down with complacency upon the real life, so honestly lived and so bravely ended, of his brother Hugh-poor Hugh, as he ventured to call him! Mr. Ochterlony might die a dozen times over and what would his marble Venus care, that he was so proud of? But it was Hugh who had died; and it was a kind of comfort to feel that he at least, though they said he had few advantages, had left one faithful woman behind him to keep his grave green for ever. For one thing, her fatigue and excitement were by no means over, although she thought herself quite well and recovered of all that; and perhaps they had more to do than she thought with all those fantastic reasonings in her heart.

The morning passed, however, though it was a long morning; and Mary looked into all the cabinets of coins and precious engraved gems, and rare things of all sorts, with a most divided attention and wandering mind-thinking where were the children? were they out-of-doors? were they in any trouble? for the unearthly quietness in the house seemed to her experienced mother's ear to bode harm of some kind-either illness or mischief, and most likely the last. As for Mr. Ochterlony, it never occurred to him that his sister-in law, while he was showing her his collections, should not be as indifferent as he was to any vulgar outside influence. "We shall not be disturbed," he said, with a calm reassuring smile, when he saw her glance at the door; "Mrs. Gilsland knows better than that;" and he drew out another drawer of coins as he spoke. Poor Mary began to tremble and had to sit down to steady herself; but the same sense of duty which made her husband stand to be shot at, kept her at this painful post. She went through with it like a martyr, without flinching. though longing, yearning, dying to get free. If she were but in that cottage, looking after her little boys' dinner, and hearing their voices as they played at the door-their servant and her own mistress, instead of the helpless slave of courtesy, and interest, and her position, looking at Francis Ochterlony's curiosities! When she escaped at last, Mary found that indeed her fears had not been without foundation. There had been some small breakages, and some small quarrels in the nursery, where Hugh and Islay had been engaged in single combat, and where baby Wilfrid had joined in with impartial kicks and scratches, to the confusion of both combatants: all which alarming events the frightened avah had been too weak-minded and helpless to prevent. And, by way of keeping them quiet, that bewildered woman had taken down a beautiful Indian canoe, which stood on a bracket in the corridor, and the boys, as was natural; with true scientific inquisitiveness had made researches into its constitution, such as horrified their mother. Mary was so cowardly as to put the boat together again with her own hands, and put it back on its bracket, and say nothing about it, with devout hopes that nobody would find it out-which, to be sure, was a terrible example to set before children. She breathed freely for the first time when she got them outout of Earlston-out even of Earlston grounds-to the hill-side, where, though everything was grey, the turf had a certain greenness, and the sky a certain blueness, and the sun shone warm, and nameless little English wild flowers were to be found among the grass; nameless things, too insignificant for anything but a botauist to classify, and Mrs. Ochterlony was no botanist. She put down Wilfrid upon the grass, and sat by him, and watched for a little the three joyful unthinking creatures, harmonised without knowing it by their mother's presence, rolling about in an unaccustomed ecstacy upon the English grass; and then Mary went back, without being quite aware of it, into the darker world of her own mind, and leant her head upon her hands and began to think.

She had a great deal to think about. She had come home obeying the first impulse, which suggested that a woman left alone in the world should put herself under the guidance and protection of "her friends:" and, in the first stupor of grief, it was a kind of consolation to think that she had still somebody belonging to her, and could put off those final arrangements for herself and by herself which one time or other must be made. When she decided upon this, Mary did not realise the idea of giving offence to Aunt Agatha by accepting Francis Ochterlony's invitation, nor of finding herself at

Earlston in the strange nondescript position-something less than a member of the family, something more than a visitor-which she at present occupied. Her brother-in-law was very kind, but he did not know what to do with her; and her brother-inlaw's household was very doubtful and uneasy, with a certain alarmed and suspicious sense that it might be a new and permanent mistress who had thus come in upon them-an idea which it was not to be expected that Mrs. Gilsland, who had been in authority so long, should take kindly to. And then it was hard for Mary to live comfortably in a house where her children were simply tolerated, and in constant danger of doing inestimable mischief. She sat upon the grey hill-side, and thought over it till her head ached. Oh, for that wayside cottage with the blazing fire! but Mrs. Ochterlony had no such refuge. She had come to Earlston of her own will, and she could not fly away again at once to affront and offend the only relation who might be of service to her boys-which was, no doubt, a sadly mercenary view to take of the subject. By-and-by she took them home again, wondering a little, with a timidity that did not belong to her character, what arrangement had been made for them by that housekeeper in the rustling gown, upon whom, for the moment, she found herself dependent. This difficulty was so far solved for her by the appearance of the nursery dinner, and an intimation that master never eat any luncheon. "And I was to say, please, ma'am, that the young gentlemen's dinner would be sent up regular at half-past one," said the maid who served. Thus everything was taken out of Mrs. Ochterlony's hands. She bowed her head in assent, but it cost her some trouble, for Mary was not naturally a meek woman who could sit still and let other people decide for her. She stayed beside her children all day, feeling like a prisoner, afraid to move or to do anything, afraid to let the boys play or give scope to their limbs and voice - terrified to be subject, perhaps, to the housekeeper's suggestions, which had something of the force of orders, or to disturb Mr. Ochterlony. And then Hugh, though he was not old enough to sympathise with her, was old enough to put terrible questions. "Why shouldn't we make a noise?" the child said; "is my uncle a king, mamma, that we must not disturb him? Papa never used to mind." Mary sent her boy back to his play when he said this, with a sharp impatience which he could not understand. Ah, how different it was! and how stinging the pain that went to her heart at that suggestion. But then Hugh, thank heaven, knew no better. Even the Hindoo woman, who had been a faithful woman in her way, but who was going back again with another family bound for India, began to make preparations for her departure: and, after that, Mrs. Ochterlony's position would be still more difficult. This was how the first day at Earlston-the first day at home, as the children said-passed over Mary. It was, perhaps, of all other trials, the one most calculated to take from her any strength she might have left. And then she had to dress at seven o'clock, and leave her little boys in the big dark nursery, and go down to keep her brother-in-law company at dinner, to hear him talk of the Farnese Hercules, and of his collections, and travels, and, perhaps, of the "few advantages" his poor brother had had: which for a woman of a high spirit and independent character, and profound loyal love for the dead, was a very hard ordeal to bear.

The dinner, however, went over very fairly. Mr. Ochterlony was the soul of politeness, and, besides, he was pleased with his sister-in-law. She knew nothing about Art; but, then, she had been long in India, and was a woman, and it was not to be wondered at. He meant no harm when he spoke of poor Hugh's few advantages. He knew that he had a sensible woman to deal with, and of course grief and that sort of thing cannot last for ever; and on the whole Mr. Ochterlony saw no reason why he should not speak quite freely of his brother Hugh, and lament his want of proper training. She must have known that as well as he did. And to tell the truth he had forgotten about the children. He made himself very agreeable and even went so far as to say that it was very pleasant to be able to talk over these matters with somebody who understood him. Mary sat waiting with a mixture of fright and expectation for the appearance of the children, who the housekeeper said were to come down to dessert; but they did not come, and nothing was said about them; and Mr. Ochterlony was fond of foreign habits, and took very little wine, and accompanied his sister-in-law upstairs when she left the table. He came with her in that troublesome French way with which Mary was not even acquainted, and made it impossible for her to hurry through the long passages to the nursery and see what her forlorn little boys were about. What could they be doing all this time, lost at the other end of the great house where she could not even hear their voices, nor that soft habitual nursery hum which was a necessary accompaniment to her life? She had to sit down in a kind of despair and talk to Mr. Ochterlony, who took a seat beside her and was very friendly. The summer evening had begun to decline, and it was at this meditative moment that the master of Earlston liked to sit and contemplate his Psyche and his Venus, and call a stranger's attention to their beauties, and tell pleasant anecdotes about how he picked them up; which however was the strangest kind of penance to Mary, who was thankful that her children were not there, and yet mortified and vexed that they had not been sent for, and in the most restless state of uneasiness about them. For to be sure it was not a well-regulated nursery under proper supervision, but three little forlorn boys in charge of a speechless Hindoo ayah, and subject to the invasions of Mrs. Gilsland in her rustling gown, whom Mrs. Ochterlony had left. She sat by her brother-in-law's side and listened to his talk about Art with her ear strained to the most intense attention, prepared at any moment to hear a shrick from the outraged housekeeper, or a howl of unanimous woe from three culpable and terrified voices. There was something comic in the situation, but Mary's attention was not sufficiently disengaged to be amused.

"I have long wished to have some information about Indian Art," said Mr. Ochterlony. "I should be glad to know what an intelligent observer like yourself, with some practical knowledge, thought of my theory. My idea is—— But I am afraid you have a headache; I hope you have all the attendance you require, and are comfortable? It would give me great pain to think that you were not perfectly comfortable. You must not feel the least hesitation in telling me——"

"Oh no, we have everything," said Mary. She thought she heard something outside like little steps and distant voices, and her heart began to beat. But as for her companion he was not thinking about such extraneous things.

"I hope so," said Mr. Ochterlony; and then he looked at his Psyche with the lingering look of a connoisseur, dwelling lovingly upon her marble beauty. "You must have that practical acquaintance which, after all, is the only thing of any use," he continued. "My idea is—"

And it was at this moment that the door was thrown open, and they all rushed in-all, beginning with little Wilfred, who had just commenced to walk, and who came with a tottering dash striking against a pedestal in his way, and making its precious burden tremble. Outside at the open door appeared for an instant the ayah as she had set down her charge, and Mrs. Gilsland, gracious but formidable, in her rustling gown, who had headed the procession. Poor woman, she meant no harm. She knew that her master did not care for children, but it was not in the heart of woman to believe that in the genial hour after dinner, when all the inner and the outer man was mollified and comforted, the sight of three such "bonnie boys" all curled, brushed, and shining for the occasion, could do Mr. Ochterlony any harm. Baby Wilfred dashed across the room in a straight line with "flichterin' noise and glee" to get to his mother, and the others followed, not however, without stoppages on the way. They were bonnie boys-brave, little, erect, clear-eyed creatures, who had never known anything but love in their lives, and feared not the face of man; and to Mary, though she quaked and trembled, their sudden appearance changed the face of everything, and made the Earlston drawing-room glorious. But the effect was different upon Mr. Ochterlony, as might be supposed.

"How do you do, my little man," said the discomfited uncle. "Oh, this is Hugh, is it? I think he is like his father. I suppose you intend to send them to school. Good heavens! my little fellow, take care!" cried Mr. Ochterlouy. The cause of this sudden animation was, that Hugh, naturally facing his uncle when he was addressed by him, had leant upon the pillar on which Pysche stood with her immortal lover. He had put his arm round it with a vague sense of admiration, and as he stood was, as Mary thought, a prettier sight than even the lovely group above; but Mr. Ochterlony could not be expected to be of Mary's mind

"Come here, Hugh," said his mother, anxiously. "You must not touch anything; your uncle will kiudly let you look at them, but you must not touch. It was so different, you know, in our Indian house -and then on board ship," said Mary, faltering. Islay, with his big head thrown back a little and his hands in his little trousers pockets, was roving about all the while in a manly way inspecting everything, looking, as his mother thought, for the most favourable opening for mischief. What was she to do? They might do more damage in ten minutes than ten years of her little income could set right. As for Mr. Ochterlony, though he groaned in spirit nothing could overcome his politeness; he turned his back upon little Hugh so that at least he might not see what was going on, and resumed the conversation with all the composure that he could .

"You will send them to school of course," he said; "we must inquire for a good school for them. I don't myself think that children can begin their education too soon. I don't speak of the baby," said Mr. Ochterlony, with a sigh. The baby evidently was inevitable. Mary had set him down at her feet, and he sat there in a peaceable way, making no assault upon anything, which was consolatory at least.

"They are so young," said Mary, tremulously.

"Yes, they are young, and it is all the better," said the uncle. His eye was upon Islay, who had sprung upon a chair, and was riding and spurring it with delightful energy. Naturally, it was a unique rococo chair of the daintiest and most fantastic workmanship, and the unhappy owner expected to see it fall into sudden destruction before his eyes; but he was benumbed by politeness and despair, and took no notice. "There is nothing," said the poor man with distracted attention, his eye upon Islay, his face turned to his sister-in-law, and horror in his heart, "like good training begun early. For my

"Oh, mamma, look here. How funny this is!" cried little Hugh. When Mary turned sharply round in despair, she found her boy standing behind her with a priceless Etruscan vase in his hand. He had just taken it from the top of a low, carved bookcase, where the companion vase still stood, and held it tilted up as he might have held a driuking mug in the nursery. "It's a fight," cried Hugh; "look, mamma, how that fellow is putting his lance into him. Isn't it jolly? Why don't we have some brown sort of jugs with battles on them, like this?"

"What is it? Let me see," cried Islay, and he gave a flying leap, and brought the rococo chair down on its back, where he remounted leisurely after he had cast a glance at the brown sort of jug. "I don't think it's worth looking at," said the fouryear-old hero. Mrs. Ochterlony heard her brotherin-law say, "Good heavens!" again, and heard him groan as he turned away his head. He could not forget that they were his guests and his dead brother's children, and he would not turn them out of the room or the house, as he was tempted to do; but at the same time he turned away that at least he might not see the full extent of the ruin. As for Mary, she felt her own hand tremble as she took the vase out of Hugh's careless grasp. She was terrified to touch its brittle beauty, though she was not so enthusiastic about it as, perhaps, she ought to have been. And it was with a sudden impulse of desperation that she caught up her baby, and lifted Islay off the prostrate chair.

"WHY DON'T WE HAVE SOME BROWN JUGS LIKE THIS?"

"I hope you will excuse them," she said, all flushed and trembling. "They are so little, and they know no better. But they must not stay here," and with that poor Mary swept them out with her, making her way painfully over the dangerous path, where snares and perils lay on every side. She gave the astonished Islay an involuntary "shake" as she dropped him in the sombre corridor outside, and hurried along towards the darkling nursery. The little flock of wicked little black sheep trotted by her side full of questions and surprise. "Why are we coming away? What have we done?" said Hugh. "Mamma! mamma! tell me!" and Islay pulled at her dress, and made more demonstratively the same demand. What had they done? If Mr. Ochterlony, left by himself in the drawing-room, could but have answered the question! He was on his knees beside his injured chair, examining its wounds, and as full of tribulation as if those fautastic bits of tortured wood had been flesh and blood. And to tell the truth, the misfortune was greater than if it had been flesh and blood. If Islay Ochterlony's sturdy little legs had been broken, there was a doctor in the parish qualified to a certain extent to mend them. But who was there among the Shap Fells, or within a hundred miles of Earlston, who was qualified to touch the delicate members of a rococo chair? He groaned over it as it lay prostrate, and would not be comforted. Children! imps! come to be the torture of his life as, no doubt, they had been of poor Hugh's. What could Providence be thinking of to send such reckless, heedless, irresponsible creatures into the world? A vague notion that their mother would whip them all round as soon as she got them into the shelter of the nursery, gave Mr. Ochterlony a certain consolation; but even that judicial act, though a relief to injured feeling, would do nothing for the fractured chair.

Mary, we regret to say, did not whip the boys when she got into her own apartments. They deserved it, no doubt, but she was only a weak woman. Instead of that, she put her arms round the three, who were much excited and full of wonder, and very restless in her clasp, and cried-not much, but suddenly, in an outburst of misery and desolation, and anger and resistance. After all, what was the vase or the Psyche in comparison with the living creatures thus banished to make place for them? which was a reflection which some people may be far from acquiescing in. but that came natural to her, being their mother, and not in any special way interested in art. She cried, but she only hugged her boys and kissed them, and put them to bed, lingering that she might not have to go downstairs again till the last moment. When she went at last, and made Mr. Ochterlony's tea for him, that magnanimous man did not say a word, and even accepted her apologies with a feeble deprecation. He had put the wounded article away, and made a sublime resolution to take no further notice. "Poor thing, it is not her fault," he had said to himself; and, indeed, had begun to be sorry for Mary, and to think what a pity it was that a woman so unobjectionable should have three such imps to keep her in hot water. But he looked sad, as was natural. He swallowed his tea with a sigh, and made mournful cadences to every sentence he uttered. A man does not so easily get over such a shock ;-a frivolous and volatile woman may forget or may dissimulate, and look as if she does not care; but a man is not so lightly moved or mended. If it had been Islay's legs, as has been said, there was a doctor within reach; but who in the north country could be trusted, so much as to look at the delicate limbs of a rococo chair?

CHAPTER XIII.

THE experience of this evening, though it was only the second of her stay at Earlston, proved to Mary that the visit she was paying to her brotherin-law must be made as short as possible. She could not get up and run away because Hugh had put an Etruscan vase in danger, and Islay had broken his uncle's chair. It was Mr. Ochterlony who was the injured party, and he was magnanimously silent, saying nothing and even giving no intimation that the presence of these objectionable little visitors was not to be desired in the drawingroom; and Mary had to stay and keep her boys out of sight, and live consciously upon sufferance, in the nursery and her bedroom, until she could feel warranted in taking leave of her brother-in-law, who, without doubt, meant to be kind. It was a strange sort of position, and strangely out of accord with Mrs. Ochterlony's character and habits. She had never beeu rich, nor lived in such a great house, but she had always up to this time been her own mistress-mistress of her actions, free to do what she thought best, and to manage her children according to her own wishes. Now she had, to a certain extent, to submit to the housekeeper, who changed their hours, and interfered with their habits, at her pleasure. The poor ayah went weeping away, and nobody was to be had to replace her except one of the Earlston maids, who naturally was more under

Mrs. Gilsland's authority than Mrs. Ochterlony's; and to this girl Mary had to leave them when she went down to the inevitable dinner which had always to be eaten downstairs. She had made attempts several times to consult her brother-in-law upon her future, but Mr. Ochterlony, though very polite, was not a sympathetic listener. He had received the few details which she had been moved at first, with restrained tears, to give him about the Major with a certain restlessness which chilled Mary. He was sorry for his brother; but he was one of those men who do not care to talk about dead people, and who think it best not to revive and recall sorrow-which would be very true and just if true sorrow had any occasion to be revived and recalled; and her own arrangements were all more or less connected with this (as Mr. Ochterlony called it) painful subject. And thus it was that her hesitating efforts to make her position clear to him, and to get any advice which he could give was generally put aside or swallowed up in some communication from the Numismatic Society, or questions which she could not answer about Indian art.

"We must leave Earlston soon," Mrs. Ochterlony took courage to say one day, when the housekeeper, and the continued taboo of the children, and her own curious life on sufferance, had been too much for her. "If you are at leisure, would you let me speak to you about it? I have so little experience of anything but India—and I want to do what is best for my boys."

"Oh—ah—yes," said Mr. Ochterlony, "you must send them to school. We must try and hear of some good school for them. It is the only thing you can do-"

"But they are so young," said Mary. "At their age they are surely best with their mother. Hugh is only seven. If you could advise me where it would be best to go—"

"Where it would be best to go!" said Mr. Ochterlony. He was a little surprised and not quite pleased for the moment. "I hope you do not find yourself uncomfortable here."

"Oh, no," said Mary, faltering; "but—they are very young and troublesome, and—I am sure they must worry you. Such little children are best by themselves," she said, trying to smile—and thus, by chance, touched a chord of pity in her brother-in-law's heart.

"Ah," he said, shaking his head, "I assure you I feel the painfulness of your position. If you had been unencumbered, you might have looked forward to so different a life; but with such a burden as these children, and you so young still——"

"Burden!" said Mary: and it may be supposed how her eyes woke up, and what a colour came to her cheek, and how her heart took to beating under her crape. "You can't really think my children are a burden to me. Ah! you don't know——I would not care to live another day'if I had not my boys."

And here, her nerves being weak with all she had come through, she would have liked to cry—but did not, the moment being unsuitable, and only sat facing the virtuoso, all lighted up and glowing, brightened by indignation and surprise and sudden excitement to something more like the former Mary than ever yet had been seen underneath her widow's cap.

"Oh!" said Mr. Ochterlony. He could have understood the excitement had it been about a Roman camp or a newly discovered statue; but boys did not commend themselves in the same way to his imagination. He liked his sister-in-law, however, in his way. She was a good listener, and pleasant to look at, and even when she was unintelligible was never without grace or out of drawing, and he felt disposed even to take a little trouble for her. "You must send them to school," "There is nothing else to be done. will write to a friend of mine who knows about such matters; and I am sure, for my part, I shall be very glad if you can make yourself comfortable at Earlston-you and-and the baby, of course," Mr. Ochterlony said with a slightly wry face. The innocent man had not an idea of the longing she had for that cottage with the fire in it. It was a notion which never could have been made intelligible to him, even had he been told in words.

"Thank you," said Mary, faltering more and more; indeed she made a dead pause, and he thought she had accepted his decision, and that there was to be no more about it-which was comforting and satisfactory. He had indeed just riseu up to leave the room, breakfast being over, when she put out her hand to stop him. "I will not detain you a minute," she said, "it is so desolate to have no one to tell me what to do. Indeed we cannot stay here -though it is so good of you; they are too young to leave me, and I care for nothing else in life," Mrs. Ochterlony said, yielding for an instant to her emotion; but she soon recovered herself. "There are good schools all over England, I have heard; in places where we could live cheaply. That is what I want to do. Near one of the good grammar schools. I am quite free, it does not matter where I live. If you would give me your advice," she added, timidly. Mr. Ochterlony, for his part, was taken so much by surprise that he stood between the table and the door with one foot raised to go on, and not believing his cars. He had behaved like an angel, to his own conviction, and had never said a word about the chair, though it had to be sent to town to be repaired. He had continued to afford shelter to the little ruffian who did it, and had carefully abstained from all expression of his feel-What could the woman want more ?-- and what should he know about grammar-schools, and places where people could live cheaply? A woman, too, whom he liked, and had explained his theory of ancient art more fully to than he had ever done to any one. And she wanted to leave Earlston and his society, and the Psyches and Vcnuses, to settle down in some half-pay neighbourhood, where people with large families lived for the sake of education! No wonder Mr. Ochterlony turned round, struck dumb with wonder, and came slowly back before giving his opinion, which, but for an unexpected circumstance, would no doubt have been such an opinion as to overwhelm his companion with confusion, and put an instant stop to her foolish plans.

But circumstances come wildly in the way of the best intentions, and cut off the wisest speech sometimes on a man's very lips. At this moment the door opened softly, and a new interlocutor presented herself. The apparition was one which took not only the words but the very breath from the lips of the master of Earlston. Aunt Agatha was twenty years older than her niece, but so (almost) was Francis Ochterlony; and such a thing was once possible as that the soft ancient maiden and the elderly solitary dilettante might have made a cheerful human household at Earlston. They had not met for years, not since the time when Miss Seton was holding on by her lingering youth, and looking forward to the loss of it with an anxious and care-worn countenance. She was twenty times prettier now than she had been in those days-prettier perhaps, if the truth were told, than she ever had been in her life. She was penitent, too, and tearful in her whitehaired sweetness, though Mr. Ochterlony did not know why-with a soft colour coming and going on her cheeks, and a wistful look in her dewy eyes. She had left her home at least two hours before, and came carrying all the freshuess and odours of the morning, surrounded with sunshine and sweet air, and everything that seems to belong to the young. Francis Ochterlony was so bewildered by the sight that he stepped back out of her way, and could not have told whether she was eighteen or fifty. Perhaps the sight of him had in some degree the same effect upon Aunt Agatha. She made a little rush at Mary, who had risen to meet her, and threw herself, soft little woman as she was, upon her niece's taller form. "Oh, my dear love, I have been a silly old woman-forgive me!" said Aunt Agatha. She had put up with the estrangement as long as ever it was in human nature to put up with it. She had borne Peggy's sneers, and Winnie's heartless suggestions that it was her own doing. How was Winnie to know what made it so difficult for her to have any communications with Earlston? But finally Aunt Agatha's heart had conquered everything else. She had made such pictures to herself of Mary, solitary and friendless ("for what is a Man? no company when one is unhappy," Miss Seton had said to herself with unconscious eloquence), until instinct and impulse drove her to this decided step. The hall door at Earlston had been standing open, and there was nobody to announce her. And this was how Aunt Agatha arrived just at the critical moment, cutting off Mr. Ochterlony's utterance when he was on the very point of speech.

The poor man, for his part, did not know what to do; after the first moment of amaze he stood dumb and humble, with his hand stretched out, waiting to greet his unexpected visitor. But the truth was, that the two women as they clung together were both so dreadfully disposed to cry that they dared not face Mr. Ochterlony. The sudden touch of old love and unlooked-for sympathy had this effect upon Mary, who had been agitated and disturbed before; and as for Aunt Agatha, she was not an old maid by conviction, and perhaps would not have objected to this house or its master, and the revival of these old associations was hard upon her. She clasped Mary tight, as if it was all for Mary's sake; but perhaps there was also a little personal feeling involved. Mr. Ochterlony stood speechless for a moment, and then he heard a faint sob, and fled in consternation. If that was coming, it was high time for him to go. He went away and took refuge in his library, in a confused and uncomfortable state of mind. This was the result of having a woman in the house; a man who had nothing to do in his own person with the opposite half of humanity became subject to the invasion of other women, and still worse, to the invasion of recollections and feelings which he had no wish to have recalled. What did Agatha Seton mean by looking so fresh and fair at her age? and yet she had white hair too, and called herself an old woman. These thoughts came dreadfully in his way when he sat down to work. He was writing a monograph upon Icelandic art, and naturally had been much interested in a subject so characteristic and exciting; but somehow after that glimpse of his old love his mind would not stick to his theme. The two women clinging together, though one of them had a bonnet on, made a pretty "subject." He was not mediæval, to speak of, but rather classical in his tastes; yet it did strike him that a painter might have taken an idea for a Visitation out of that embrace. And so that was how Agatha Seton looked when she was an old woman! This idea fluttered in and out before his mind's eye, and such reflections upon his paper came dreadfully in the way of his monograph. He lost his notes and forgot his researches in the bewilderment produced by it; for, to tell the truth, Agatha Seton was in a very much finer state of preservation, not to say fairer to look upon, than most of the existing monuments of Icelandic art.

"He has gone away," said Aunt Agatha, who was aware of that fact sooner than Mary was, though Mrs. Ochterlony's face was towards her brother-in-law; and she gave Mary a sudden hug and subsided into that good cry, which is such a relief and comfort to the mind; Mary's tears came too, but they were fewer and not by any means so satisfactory as Aunt Agatha's, who was crying for nothing particular. "Oh, my dear love, don't think me a wretch," the old lady said. "I have never been able to get you out of my head, standing there on the platform all by yourself with the dear children; and I, like an old monster, taking offence and going away and leaving you! If it is any comfort to you,

Mary, my darling, I have been wretched ever since. I tried to write, but I could not write. So now I've come to ask you to forgive me; and where are my dear, dear, darling boys?"

Her poor little boys! Mary's heart gave a little leap to hear some one once more talk of those poor children as if they were not in the way. "Mr. Ochterlony is very kind," she said, not answering directly; "but we must not stay, Aunt Agatha, we cannot stay. He is not used to children, you know, and they worry him. Oh, if I had but any little place of my own!"

"You shall come to me, my darling love," said Aunt Agatha in triumph. "You should have come to me from the first. I am not saying anything against Francis Ochterlony. I never did; people might think he did not quite behave as was expected; but I am sure I never said a word against him. But how can a Man understand? or what can you look for from them? My dearest Mary, you must come to me!"

"Thank you, Auut Agatha," said Mary, doubtfully. "You are very kind—you are all very kind"—and then she repeated, under her breath, that longing aspiration, "Oh, that I had but any little place of my very own!"

"Yes, my love, that is what we must do," said Aunt Agatha. "I would take you with me if I could, or I would take the dear boys with me. Nobody will be worried by them at the cottage. Oh, Mary, my darling, I never would say anything against poor dear Hugh, or encourage you to keep his relations at a distance; but just at this moment, my dear love, I did think it was most natural that you should go to your own friends."

"I think when one has little children one should be by one's-self, said Mary, "it is more natural. If I could get a little cottage near you, Aunt

"My love, mine is a little cottage," said Miss Seton; "it is not half nor quarter so big as Earlston -have you forgotten? and we are all a set of women together, and the dear boys will rule over us. Ah, Mary, you must come to me!" said the soft old And after that she went up to the dim Earlston nursery, and kissed and hugged the tabooed children, whom it was the object of Mary's life to keep out of the way. But there was a struggle in Aunt Agatha's gentle bosom when she heard of the Etrusean vase and the rococo chair. Her heart yearned a little over the pretty things thus put in peril, and she had a few pretty things herself which were dear to her, and the thought of putting them in daily jeopardy was alarming. Her alarm, however, was swallowed up by a stronger emotion. It was natural for a woman to care for such things, but it went to her heart to think of "poor Francis," once a hero, in such a connection. "You see he has nothing else to care for," she said-and the fair old maiden paused and gave a furtive sigh over the poor old bachelor who might have been so different. "It was his own fault." she added to herself, softly; but still the idea of Francis Ochterlony "wrapped up," as Miss Seton expressed it, in chairs and vases, gave a shock to her gentle spirit. It was righteous retribution, but still Aunt Agatha was a woman, and pitiful. She was still more moved when Mary took her into the drawing-room, where there were so many beautiful things. She looked upon them with silent and reverent admiration, but still not without a personal reference. "So that is all he cares for, now-adays," she said, with a sigh; and it was just at the same moment that Mr. Ochterlony, in his study disturbed by visious of two women in his peaceable house, gave up his monograph on Icelandic art in despair.

This, it may be said, was how Mrs. Ochterlony's first experiment terminated. She did not leave Earlston at once, but she did so shortly afterwithout any particular resistance on the part of her brother-in-law. After Aunt Agatha's visit, Mr. Ochterlony's thoughts took a different turn. He was very civil to her before she left, as indeed it was his nature to be to all women, and showed her his collections, and paid her a certain alarmed and respectful deference. But after that he did not do anything to detain Mary in his house. Where one woman was, other women were pretty sure to come, and nobody could tell what unseen visitants might enter along with them, to disturb a man in his occupations, and startle him out of his tranquillity. He never had the heart to resume that monograph on Icelandic art-which was a great loss to the Society of Antiquaries and the aesthetic world in general; and though he had no advice in particular to give to his sister-in-law as to her future movements, he did not say anything further to deter her from leaving Earlston. "I hope you will let me know what your movements are, and where you decide upon settling," he said, as he shook hands with her-very gravely at the carriage door, "and if I can be of any use." And this was how the first experiment came to an end.

Then Mrs. Ochterlony kissed her boys when they were fairly out of the grey shadow of their uncle's house, and shed a few tears over them. "Now at least I shall not have to keep my bonnie boys out of the way any more," said Mary. But she caught sight again of the cheery cottage, with the fire burning within, and the hospitable door open, as she drove down to the railway; and her heart longed to alight and take possession, and find herself at home. When should she be at home? or was there no such place left in the world? But happily she had no maid, and no time to think or calculate probabilities—and thus she set out upon her second venture, among "her own friends."

QUAKER MILLINERY.

OF all the various religious and social communities in England, there is none more worthy of our respect than the Society of Friends. From whatever point we view them, we may nearly always discover something to call forth our admiration. Their first great principle of peace and good-will towards men, is one which ought to endear them Their brotherly love, which they carry further than any other body of men; their unflinching courage and resignation under the most formidable persecutions; their consistent abhorrence of war, and all its atrocities; their love of freedom, carried even to the verge of republicanism; and their detestation of slavery in all its forms, are qualities to be held in high estimation by all who call themselves Christians. Again, the cause of philanthropy is much indebted to them. They were the first who carried out reforms in what were at one time dens of cruelty and ignoranceour Lunatic Asylums; and they closed the mouths of those who ridiculed their theories as to the humane treatment of the insane, by the simple process of establishing the model and type of all well-managed mad-houses in this country-the Friends' Retreat at York. Here, under their system of kindness, they cured ten times the number that the old system of brutality could have killed; and that is saying a great deal. Their plan, also, for the general education of all the children of their community, without stamping the badge of charity on even the poorest, and their noble and munificent contributions to all benevolent objects, ought to place them in the highest position in the eyes of their fellow-citizens. Even their quaint Bible phraseology has in it something exceedingly

Yet among this community, so dignified by their virtues, may be found a weakness which renders them almost ridiculous in the sight of those not within the pale of their own sect, and now even to many within it. By the last, we allude to what are generally known as the new school of Quakers,-men who believe there are yet many desiderata to be obtained, many reforms to be carried out and abuses abolished, before the shape of a bonnet, the breadth of the brim of a hat, or the cut of a coat, should be considered as subjects of such importance as to occupy any very considerable portion of their thoughts. It is an error to imagine, that what is technically known as the Quaker's dress was the original distinctive costume of their community. On the contrary, George Fox and others of their founders appear to have held that the question of dress was one of utter insignificance; so much so that they did not even speak of it, beyond advising simplicity of attire, and the absence of all that absurd and expeusive ornament which was in fashion in the time of VII-12 common leather suit. We have searched in vain for any ancient documents to prove that the Friends were expected to wear a garb of any particular cut or fashion. One of the earliest Printed Epistles on the subject was published in the year 1691, and it merely advises all Friends "to avoid pride and immodesty in apparel, and all vain and superfluous apparel of the world." Another, published in 1703, regrets that "the vain customs and fashions of the world prevail over some of our profession, particularly in the excess of apparel; and we do earnestly recommend that all who make profession with us, take care to be exemplary in what they wear, so as to avoid the vain customs of the world, and all extravagancy in colour and fashion."

The ladies come in for their share of advice and remonstrance, yet without the slightest attempt to impose upon them any restrictions as to the peculiar shape or method of wearing their dress. The Printed Epistle published in 1739 says, "It is also our concern to exhort all Friends, both men and women, to watch against the growing sin of pride, and to beware of adorning themselves in a manner disagreeable to the plainness and simplicity of the truth we make profession of. Oh! that they would duly consider that reproof which the Lord, by the mouth of his prophet, pronounced against the haughty daughters of Zion, when he describes their dressings and ornaments so displeasing to the Lord, and drawing down his judgment upon them." Many other quotations might be made from the Printed Epistles of those days, in relation to neatness of attire, but we have not found one which dictates to the Friends any particular style of costume.

Any one who will take the trouble to compare the dress of the gentlemen in the seventeenth century with the costume in vogue among Quakers at the commencement of the present century, will perceive that the latter bears a strong resemblance to the former in shape, but is destitute of braiding and ornamentation. And no person with the taste for simplicity in dress which characterises gentlemen in the present day, will deny that the Quakers when they abolished all embroidery on their coats carried out a bold and useful reformation; for at that time the value of many a broad acre of land was frequently expended on the gold lace alone of the coat of a fop. And the money the Quakers thus saved by the simplicity of their costume gave them greater power to exercise that charity which has been always one of their noblest characteristics, as well as allowed them to subscribe with greater liberality and good effect to their "Sufferings Committee," established to relieve the families of those imprisoned for their religious opinions, or whose goods George Fox himself used to wear a had been seized for refusal to pay tithes and other ecclesiastical and fiscal impositions. But those days of costly dress have fortunately long gone by, for with the advance of civilisation, simplicity and economy in dress among men have kept pace, till in the present day the ordinary costume of the English gentleman is far less expensive than the collarless coat and waistcoat of the Quaker. Nor do we make this statement without sufficient data to go upon. We have inquired of several Quakers what was the cost of the coats they wore, and found they averaged from twenty-five to fifty per cent. more than our usual frock coats.

It should be borne in mind also, that considerable modifications have taken place in the dress of the Quaker ladies, since they adopted a peculiar costume of their own. The neat, attractive bonnet, worn by them in the present day, differs vastly from the tunnelshaped abomination worn by their predecessors a century since. In former days, if the prints and portraits of Quaker ladies at present extant do not "lie consumedly," nothing possibly could be more ugly than their dress. And the faces of their Elders seem to have been singularly in keeping with it. It would be difficult to imagine faces less attractive than those of the old women; while in the present day it would be equally difficult to find a more dignified, or attractive specimen of women in the autumn of life than may now be met with in the Quaker community. It is also stated, that, in their own particular fashion, the modern Quakeresses indulge in dress in a far more expensive manner than is generally imagined. Although their dress is most becomingly simple in fashion, at least in our opinion. its quality is always the best that can be procured; and if they abjure the "purple" in their colours, there is no class of her Majesty's female subjects who indulge more unrestrainedly in a love for "fine linen."

But though, as we have seen, the regulation of dress was no part of the principles of the early Friends, yet their determination to succeed in all justifiable enterprises (which seems to be an essential principle in Quakerism) has never been more apparent than in the manner in which they have mastered that most terrible of all difficulties-the regulation and control of female attire. This has hitherto proved an impediment which no despotic government has been able to cope with. The first Napoleon, in the plenitude of his power, imprisoned a celebrated dressmaker, who ruled the female fashions in Paris, and at whose house the wives of some of those disaffected to his government used to How little did he know of female human nature when he attempted this! Even the wives of those who were the most loyal of his court entered into a combination against him; and so powerful and dangerous did they become, that he who ruled the destinies of three parts of Europe, and had more than a million of soldiers at his command. was obliged to succumb to the influence of the milliner, and to release her unconditionally. Even difficulties in this matter, although the habitual caution and tact of the man have induced him to bend before a power he could not resist. For some time, he quietly applied all the ingenuity he was master of to abolish the fashion of crinoline, without, however, the slightest success attending his efforts. The ladies of the court regarded his interference in the matter with perfect indifference; and it is, indeed, vaguely hinted that the wife of his bosom was among the number. But what did this great man do? Instead of imprisoning the disobedient, as his less politic uncle might possibly have done, he let the crinoline have its full sway, and merely relieved the inconvenience its size caused in the palace at Compiègne by ordering all the doorways to be enlarged!

In England have not female fashions been a source of incessant bickerings and heartburnings in many a household, even where the husband on every other point reigns supreme? With all our national perseverance have we not been obliged to shut our eyes on many occasions to absurdities in female dress, which it was impossible for us to reform? Yet the smallest community among us—the Quakers—have positively proved that to regulate female fashions is not impossible, but perfectly practicable: and that, too, while preserving their reputation as kind husbands and good fathers.

But it would be diminishing the glory of the victory the Quaker gentlemen have obtained to say, that it was altogether gained without difficulty or resistance on the part of the ladies. So far from this being the case, entries are frequently to be found in the minutes of many of their older committees showing that considerable opposition, if not something very nearly approaching rebellion, was shown by the ladies when their lords and masters attempted to draw the line too tightly. It would far exceed our limits to go deeply or minutely into these records of the past, and we shall content ourselves with describing one little émeute which took place, about a century ago, in a certain Quaker community not a hundred miles from the ancient city of York. We may premise that while the broad facts of the case are absolutely true, some of the details are traditionary; and may, we admit, be treated as apocryphal or otherwise in proportion to the amount of faith the reader chooses to place in the narrative.

fashions in Paris, and at whose house the wives of some of those disaffected to his government used to visit. How little did he know of female human nature when he attempted this! Even the wives of those who were the most loyal of his court entered into a combination against him; and so powerful and dangerous did they become, that he who ruled the destinies of three parts of Europe, and had more than a million of soldiers at his command, was obliged to succumb to the influence of the milliner, and to release her unconditionally. Even the present Napoleon, it is said, has met with great and the contracted door of the meeting-house in which the event we allude to took place, was approached by a flight of some half-a-dozen stone steps. Moreover the building was situated in a stormy and windy weather. A report reached the ears of some of the Elders, that more than one of the young female Friends had, on mounting the steps leading to the entrance door, been incautious enough not only to allow their feet to be seen, but (we have great pain in quoting the minute) their ankles also. This intelligence, as may naturally be supposed, caused great dismay and sorrow in the breasts of several of the male Elders; but unwilling to judge too hastily or uncharitably of their young friends, one of the committee undertook the delicate task of ascertaining whether it were really a fact, or only "a weak invention of the enemy." The approaching First Day was fixed upon for his investigation. It was somewhat windy weather at the time, and therefore a fair experiment could hardly be made; but this circumstance did not appear to strike him. When the meeting was over he reported to the committee of Elders the sad intelligence that in three distinct cases he found the information to be perfectly correct.

It now remained for the committee to ascertain whether the display was intentional or simply accidental; and if the latter was the case, whether sufficient and justifiable caution had been exercised. The windy state of the weather induced them to adopt the latter conclusion, but that again was partially invalidated by the fact that in all three cases the feet and ankles seen were what the worldlyminded would have considered exceedingly neat and well-made. Ignorant as the committee of Elders were of the anatomy of the female foot and ankle, yet certain of them knew that all ladies do not possess these equally well formed, and as none but well-formed ankles were exhibited, there was a strong primd facie reason to believe that the damsels accused were somewhat to blame in the Unwilling, and very properly so, to take so serious a responsibility on themselves as to come to a definite conclusion on the subject, without further and good advice, they determined on submitting the affair to a committee of female Elders, with a request that they would report to the committee of male Elders when they had finished their labours. Conscientious anxiety did the female Elders show in their investigation. They called before them the young ladies complained of, and questioned them severely on the subject, but the answers they received were hardly satisfactory, and we regret to state that in more than one instance they might almost be called flippant.

After the young ladies were dismissed, the committee of female Elders, with somewhat ruffled bosoms, occasioned by the behaviour of the young ladies, considered the question before them. They were unanimous in their opinion that sufficient caution had not been shown, and a report embodying the same was forwarded to the committee of male Elders, who resolved that on future First Days it would be advisable that all young female Friends should present themselves before a committee of male Elders prior to entering the meeting-house, that it might be seen whether their dresses were sufficiently long, and in other respects conformable to the rules of the committee. Here we must protest against any accusation of exaggeration being laid to our charge in respect to this order or advice.

at present in existence in the archives of the Quaker community of the town alluded to.

Great was the agitation and mutinous was the spirit of the young ladies when this order reached them. There was, however, no alternative: it had to be obeyed; and with good sense and discretion they submitted to the ordeal. It is satisfactory to add that they were complimented on the propriety of their costume. But the self-glorification of the Elders at the victory they had obtained met with a singular rebuff. When they met their young friends in the meeting-house after the inspection, great was their consternation to find that each of them had put on her bonnet and cap in such a manner as to allow a portion of her hair to be seen beneath. Indignation seized the Elders, and it was with difficulty they restrained themselves from reproving the iniquity during the very time of the meeting. As soon as it was over, however, they gave way to their just wrath and indignation, and a conference of the whole body resident in the town was called to take the subject into serious consideration. How it ended we have no means of knowing except from tradition, as no further entry in the matter appears in the minute-book. It is said, however, that the deliberations were conducted with considerable warmth, the younger male Friends taking a somewhat different view of the question from the elder. At last, however, we are happy to say, their differences were made up, through the good sense of the men themselves, it being impossible, in the circumstances stated, for the young ladies to please all parties in the affair.

In the United States of America, where the Quakers are more numerous, this question of dress seems to have occupied a far greater amount of thought than it has done in England. It has there. on divers occasions, been carried to such an extent as almost to usurp the importance of an article of faith. "Their peculiar style," says Mr. William Tallack, in his "Friendly Sketches in America," "does not, by any means, imply inexpensiveness, but rather the reverse; there is neither simplicity of pattern, nor even convenience to the wearer, but a tacitly understood and prescribed form-so clearly laid down as a 'religious fashion' that its uniform minutiæ have rendered it almost as much a ceremony as those against which the Society has been in the habit of protesting in the observances of other Christian communities."

Some of the regulations regarding the male Quaker dress in America are exceedingly absurd, and the trifling deviations allowed to suit the taste of the wearer render them still more so. Friends, they say, should be peculiar in dress in certain respects-but be peculiar in the collar above all things. Change your buckles to straps, alter your sleeves and loops, substitute (but we do not advise it) a black stock for a white cravat: or you may wear black in place of drab, if you can We have simply quoted the substance of the minute afford it, but, above all things, you must preserve the collar of the coat in its peculiar shape. "A 'Friend,'" Mr. Tallack informs us, "who is well known in Indiana, was nominated for the appointment of clerk to a large meeting, but it was objected to him in the committee of nomination that his hat-brim was not so broad as was generally considered 'consistent.'" The "Friend" stated in his defence that the hatter of whom he had purchased it had not one in stock with a wider brim. It is with feelings of sincere pleasure we are able to state that the excuse was considered satisfactory.

But rigid as are the Friends in America with regard to the dress of the men, they are much more severe in matters of female costume. Mr. Tallack quotes, among many others, a case in Indiana, where a minister nominated a young woman to some unimportant office in the meeting-house. Immediately rose an Elder, who said that only "consistent Friends" should be appointed to offices in the Society. It appeared that this young woman, who usually wore a "peculiar" bonnet, had omitted to do so on two or three occasions-such as in harvest time, and some other exceptional seasons-and she was, therefore, judged "inconsistent," and was refused the appointment. He also quotes another and stronger case of a female Friend, who is now an acknowledged minister. When her friends were considering the propriety of recognising her as such, it was objected that her bonnet, although a "peculiar" onc, was not of the most approved style of peculiarity: being straight behind, like the quasi-schismatic innovation in bonnets lately made among the English Quakers, instead of being rounded off, after the manner of the orthodox American female Friends. Not wishing to give offence, the lady gave up her objectionable bonnet, and got a round-backed one instead. Her orthodoxy was then considered perfect, and she was soon afterwards received into the ministry.

But the Quaker authorities in America have not always found so amiable and pliant a female minister to deal with as in the last-named case. An instance to the contrary, not mentioned by Mr. Tallack, came under our notice which deserves to be quoted. About twenty years ago, in a certain remote town in the States. which for particular reasons we forbear naming, there resided a numerous and highly respectable Quaker community. A talented and remarkably pretty young woman, whom we will call Ruth, was a candidate for the ministry. She had been influentially nominated, and had passed the preliminary meeting without opposition, but it was necessary that her appointment should be ratified by a second meeting to be held at a certain time, we believe six months, after the first. In the interim, Ruth, for the first time in her life, paid a visit to New York. There one morning she accompanied a friend, not a Quakeress, to the establishment of a first-rate milliner. As soon as Ruth entered the sanctum of the dress-maker, Madame gazed at he for a moment, and then becoming exceedingly pale, sank into a chair. She soon recovered herself, however, and burst into a fit of voluble anger at the indignity which had been put upon Ruth, by placing on her head so detestable a bonnet. To see so charming a face concealed by such a monstrosity was a spectacle too terrible to be endured.

Although Madame's rage was without doubt far greater than the exigencies of the case justified, she was not altogether without some excuse for her displeasure. The bonnet in fact was of the genuine tunnel-shaped order, and ugly in the extreme. Struck by Madame's remarks, poor Ruth began to be discontented with her bonnet, and the milliner perceiving the effect she had made, brought under her notice one of the smartest and latest importations from Paris. This, however, made no impression upon Ruth, and Madame finding she could not do better, proposed altering the one Ruth then wore, from its original shape to one more in accordance with the French milliner's notions of the sublime and beautiful. After some discussion, it was agreed that Madame should try her skill upon it, under strict conditions, however, not to place on it any ribbons or other ornamentations belonging to the pomps and vanities of this wicked world. The bonnet was at last sent home, and a most becoming little bonnet it was, strongly resembling those we are accustomed to see during the May meetings, in the vicinity of Exeter Hall and Bishopsgate Street.

Ruth returned home, and on the Sunday after her arrival, she wore her altered bonnet at the meeting. Great was the excitement it produced, especially among the male Elders, whose faces expressed an amount of acerbity which not even the sourest of sour ciders could have caused. A few days afterwards a meeting of Elders was held to take into consideration the danger likely to be produced by Ruth's bonnet, and the best means of averting it. Strong indignation was expressed at the alarming innovation, and one Elder spoke of it as not being a Gospel bonnet. A meeting was afterwards held of the whole body of male Quakers, but they proved to be far from unanimous on the subject, the Elders stigmatising the bonnet in the strongest terms, while many of the younger men saw nothing heterodox in it. The result was that, to avoid the scandal of a division, it was agreed that the matter should be referred to a committee of the female Elders, whose report should be received and adopted by the general body.

The committee met and immediately afterwards Ruth made her appearance. All eyes were directly turned on the bonnet, and it evidently created a favourable impression. She seated herself opposite the lady who occupied the chair, and without the slightest hesitation addressed the committee in her own defence. She informed them that nothing could be farther from her intention than to do anything which might offend the consciences of the Friends, or act in any way contrary to the strict principles of Quakerism in which she had been educated, and which were dearer to her than life itself. At the same time she did not consider herself called upon to submit to any unreasonable prejudices, or masculine tyranny, and she was most thankful that the question had been submitted to a committee of women, who were alone able to come to a just conclusion on the subject. She insisted on her right of wearing the bonnet for two special reasons, which she trusted the committee would consider valid-its greater comfort and convenience, and its saving in cost. On the latter point there could be no dispute, for it was self-evident that it did not contain half the quantity of material of those generally worn. With regard to the question of comfort, she said, taking the bonnet from her head and placing it on the table, any of the Friends present might come to a conclusion by the simple process of trying it on. These two points being granted, there could be no reasonable objection, she submitted, to her election as a minister being confirmed.

The minute manner in which the Friends examined the bonnet proved how rigorously and impartially they were resolved to fulfil the duty imposed on them, without favour or affection. No one among them allowed it to pass without personally inspecting it; indeed such pains did they take in the matter that Ruth, at last, began to tremble for the fate of her bonnet. They examined first its outward shape and strings, and then its internal arrangements. They inspected the lining and the manner in which it was inserted, and, that nothing might be wanting in the performance of their duty, they examined even the quality of the sewing. As each passed it to her neighbour, Ruth noticed from the expression of her face that she held the bonnet in high favour. After its shape and make had been severally investigated, the question of its greater amount of comfort and convenience was next gone into. The president, to assure herself on the subject, took off her bonnet, and tried Ruth's on her own head. She moved her head to and fro, and from side to side, and the fit appeared to afford her perfect satisfaction. Still she resolved to act conscientiously, and to leave no stone unturned to arrive at the truth; so she rose from her chair and proceeded to a small mirror on the wall to see that it fitted comfortably. Now finding nothing objectionable in the bonnet as far as regarded the two points of economy of stuff and comfort in the wear, she gave it her unqualified approval. All the others, to Ruth's great annoyance, took the same steps to arrive at the truth; and all agreed with their president in the conclusion she had arrived at.

Ruth now congratulated herself that the affair was on the point of terminating, when a grave difficulty presented itself to the president. She admitted that in the bonnet itself there was nothing to be reproved; still it had the attribute of novelty attractions, she feared would be likely to divert too much the attention of the younger Friends from her discourse, when Ruth, as a minister, addressed them. Ruth got out of the dilemma with considerable tact and ingenuity. She submitted that the president had considerably exaggerated the danger. She (Ruth) believed that her ability in preaching was not inferior to the average, and she had no occasion to stir from the room to prove that those whose personal attractions had been far greater than her own had frequently addressed the meeting without any disaster of the kind occurring. So she argued that with her minor attractions, and with her gift of eloquence, the danger was only imaginary. This reasoning appearing both candid and conclusive, it was resolved that the bonnet was orthodox; and a copy of this resolution was forwarded to the general meeting of the male Friends, to the intense annoyance of the elder portion of it, and the great satisfaction of the younger.

In England a wonderful change has come over the minds of a large portion of our Quaker fellow-citizens on the subject of dress; the new school regarding it as trivial and contemptible, the others holding to its importance with great tenacity. As an instance, we will give a short notice of a tract at present held in high consideration by the old school, and which has a large circulation among them. It is entitled A Letter to Christian Women on Ornamental Dress, written by Dr. Adoniram Judson, the Baptist missionary in Burmah. In it he narrates with great plaintiveness the difficulties he experienced with the Burmese women in this matter. He mentions that he had made considerable reformation among them when he was obliged to leave his mission on a visit to America. On his return he was horrified at the relapse which had taken place among his congregation. "On my meeting the church," he says, "after a twelvemonth's absence I beheld an appalling profusion of ornaments, and saw that the demon of vanity had been laying waste the female department." He was in doubt for some time what course to take, fearing opposition on the part of some of his coadjutors. After long deliberation on the subject, he determined to try whether he could not by private exhortation again effect a reformation among them. With great joy he believed he was succeeding; but, alas! he was terribly deceived. He found that out of respect to his feelings some of his converts "took off their necklaces and ear-ornaments before they entered the chapel, tying them up in the corners of their pocket-handkerchiefs, and on coming out, as soon as they were out of sight of the missionhouse, they stopped in the streets to array themselves anew."

He then narrates that he was called away to visit the Karens, a wild people several days' journey to the north of Moulmein. Horrible indeed appears to have been the power of the Evil One in that about it, and that, combined with Ruth's personal locality. "On one Karen woman," says the worthy

Doctor, "I counted between twelve and fifteen necklaces of all colours, sizes, and materials. Three was the average. Brass belts above the ankles, neat braids of black hair tied below the knees, rings of all sorts on the fingers, bracelets on the wrists and arms, long metal instruments perforating the lower parts of the ear, fancifully constructed bags enclosing the hair and suspended from the back of the head, not to speak of ornaments on their clothing, constituted the fashion and ton of the Karenesses. I saw that I was brought into a situation which precluded all retreat—that I must fight or die."

Great was the reformation Judson seems to have worked among these misguided young women. One by one they gave up their ornaments, and perfect success appeared to be on the point of crowning his labours, when an evil he had long dreaded fell upon him. One of the Karen men, who had been on a journey to Moulmein, informed him on his return that there he had actually seen one of the great female teachers wearing a string of gold beads around her neck! "Lay down this paper, dear sisters," continues the Doctor, "and sympathise a moment with your fallen missionary. Was it not a hard case? However, though cast down, I was not destroyed, and I resolved to maintain the warfare as long as I could."

Now actuated by a courage and devotion rarely met with in mortal man, since the days when Jack the Giant Killer started off to exterminate the Giant Blunderbore, he marched upon Moulmein. The enemy met him in great force. "Notwithstanding these beads," was the reply of the sister when he commenced the fight, "I dress more plainly than most ministers' wives in our native land. These beads are the only ornament I wear; they were given to me when quite a child by a dear mother, whom I never expect to see again, and she enjoined me never to part with them, but to wear them as a memorial of her."

Rebuffs such as these had but little effect on the determined Adoniram, and he besieged the erring sister with such an unceasing battery of texts, expostulations, arguments, and exhortations, that she at last gave up the beads, and he returned in triumph to the Karens.

It must not be imagined that, although ourselves of the "lords of the creation," we look with unworthy triumph or satisfaction on the victory gained by our Quaker fellow-citizens over the milliner and dressmaker. Neither would we be thought to disparage our Quaker sisters on account of their comparatively ready acquiescence, for it would be impossible to point to women more worthy to be held in high estimation. In every womanly relation of life they have hitherto been justly held as models of their sex; and their good sense in keeping their fashions in some sort of moderation gives them, in our opinion, an additional charm. We hold the neat little Quaker bonnet of the present day in far higher estimation than the wretched caricature of a head-dress which fashion now calls beautiful. On subjects of this kind many different opinions may be formed, we admit; but if our reader should happen to be a "Cœlebs in search of a wife," we would advise him to station himself some fine Sabbath morning in the month of May in Bishopsgate Street, at the hour the Friends leave their meeting-house in Devonshire Square, and mark the dress and countenances of the Quakeresses. Let him also go, some fine afternoon in the course of the following week, to the Park, and there let him notice the features, and especially the costume, of the fashionable throng he will meet with; and then let him ask himself, soberly and quietly, from which class he would choose a help-meet.

It is much to be feared, however, that the despotism the Quakers have shown in this matter has occasionally had a most prejudicial effect upon the interest and numbers of their community. There is little doubt that the peculiarity of the dress, and the amount of ridicule attaching to it, has hindered many female recruits from joining the body. Besides this, the love of personal adornment being a natural weakness in most women, as wealth increased among the Friends the wish to enjoy it, in the common acceptation of the term, naturally predominated in the minds of many of the female Quakers, and caused them to leave the Society. Indeed many of the principal bankers, merchants, and financiers of the country, owe the secession of their ancestors from the Quaker community to the love of display developing itself in the breasts of the women.

We would not willingly say one disrespectful word against the Quaker community, yet at the same time we cannot help sorrowing when we find men, who have always stood in the front rank of every good, liberal, and philanthropic movement, occupying themselves with so much earnestness in the little details of female dress. And we would ask them whether, by so doing, they are not carrying out the truth of the old proverb, that "there is but a step from the sublime to the ridiculous."

THE SPEAKING BELLS.*

Once upon a Sabbath day, As I pass'd the time away, Weeping skies were dark with show'rs, Sadly went the drooping hours.

Yet not all was sad and darken'd:
Thrice to sounds of cheer I hearken'd—
Sounds of cheer, but not all lightness;
Warning sounds, yet mix'd with brightness.

Thrice I heard, from neighb'ring steeple,
Tongues that spoke to all the people:
In and out with order pealing,
Fancy gave them life and feeling.
Out and in their changes ringing,
Seem'd they like to spirits singing.
Scarce I thought them sounds of earth,
Blended so were holy mirth,
Kindly welcome, solemn warning,
Grief for those the welcome scorning.

Sweetly sounded they in chorus, As if angels that watch o'er us Spoke aloud from heights of air, Calling men to praise and pray'r; On the Sabbath coming near us, With their very voice to cheer us; Often in their order changing, Various arguments arranging; Ev'ry kind persuasion choosing, Ev'ry strongest motive using; Seeming still on high to say: "Stop, poor sinner, stop and pray, Turn aside from sin's broad way; Come to worship, come to pray." . Then, with voices breathless growing, Fainter, faster, still out-throwing Words of sweetest invitation, Words of peace and consolation;

Words of peace and consolation;
Faster each on axle swinging,
Fainter still the voices singing—
Fainter, as in speed increasing,
Now their voices almost ceasing—
Almost ceasing, as despairing,
Yet for mortals sadly caring.
Ceased their loving words at last.
—Turn who will—the warning's past.
Not yet:—two solemn tones

Still call the careless ones:

"From sin—come in.

My son,—well done!

No more:—'tis o'er.

'Tis past—at last."

Three times thus the speaking bells
Threw in air their holy spells.
Once at noon, and once at even,—
Once between,—their charge was given.

Weeks and months have pass'd away Since I heard them on that day; Yet the music of the bells Often with my spirit dwells, Often speaks of God above, Man's great need, and God's great love.

In the silent midnight waking,
When our thoughts account are taking
Of the present, and the past,
And the judgment day at last—
Then I've heard their silver strain
Echoing in the air again;
Then again I've heard them ringing
As if angel tongues were singing;
While my fancy brought them near us,
Still to counsel, still to cheer us.

With the words thus spoken nigh me, Thus my fancy did supply me; Thus they ran, and thus I write them As my fancy did indite them:

"Hear the joyful tidings given, Open is the door of heaven; All that will may come unto it, All that hearken may pass through it; Christ is waiting to receive you, God is ready to forgive you. Come, your misery confessing; Come, inherit all His blessing."

As a mortal sinner, then Answer'd one for mortal men:
"Lord Almighty, God of heaven!
Let our sins be all forgiven.
Hear and save us, blessed Jesus;
From the chains of sin release us;
Save and guide us, save and guide us;
In Thy ark of mercy hide us.
May we feel Thy presence near us;
Let Thy blessing ever cheer us."

"Welcome, welcome, erring mortals! Heav'n doth open wide its portals.
All your dearest sins forsaken,
To the light of life awaken;
All, whom penitence doth chasten,
To the arms of Mercy hasten.
They alone are here forbidden,
In whose hearts proud sin is hidden."

"Thus we come, in Christ confiding, In His word by faith abiding; On our many sins reflecting, Our own righteousness rejecting.

^{*} These lines were suggested by the music of eight bells, of remarkable sweetness, and rung rather fast. In the seven-syllables the last syllable may be prolonged. The dissyllables will be recognised as the last strokes of one bell, or two, employed, in some places, as a notice that the service is about to begin.

Thus we come, no merit having, Jesus' merit only craving! Through Him all our sins forgiven, Thus receive us, Lord of heaven."

Then it seem'd as if, glad-hearted, Upward soaring, they departed,—
They, the angel spirits, winging
To God's throne their way, and singing
Notes of joy and exultation—
Words that spoke of man's salvation,
Of more wanderers brought in
From the ways of death and sin.

Fainter, but in swifter measure,

Breathing fast with holy pleasure, Hasting, as with bosoms swelling With the tidings they are telling— Swifter, fainter, they are gone Up to heav'n at last—save one. He remains on earth a space, Thus to tell God's work of grace:

"Not vain — our pain.
God's word — is heard
By men — again.
And still, — to fill
Christ's fold — behold
A host, — once lost,
Now blest — with rest
From scathe — of death."

F. B. TATE.

A HALF-HOUR IN A CELL IN HOLLOWAY PRISON.

A FEW weeks since I had the pleasure of meeting at a dinner party the Chaplain of the City Prison at Holloway. He sat near me at table, and after dinner our conversation turned on the interesting subject of the treatment of prisoners and the power of reformation contained in our prison discipline. As I appeared much interested in the question, the Rev. gentleman asked me if I had ever seen the City Prison, adding that, if I had not, he should have great pleasure in conducting me over it. I had heard much of the excellent arrangements and discipline of the Holloway prison, but I had never seen it; so I accepted the invitation with much pleasure, and a day was fixed for my visit.

Great as was the satisfaction I anticipated from my visit, it was small indeed compared to what I really experienced. The discipline appeared admirable; the prisoners well clothed, well fed, and also well worked. The whole of the immense building was in a perfect state of cleanliness, and every sanitary precaution seemed to be taken to insure the health of the inmates.

After we had made the tour of the building I remained chatting for some time with the chaplain on subjects connected with the prisoners.

I inquired to what class they principally belonged. "Our prisoners," said he, "differ considerably from those of most other prisons. We have very few among them convicted of brutal crimes, and those we have have generally to thank drink for their incarceration."

"For what crimes are your prisoners convicted

"Generally for dishonest actions committed without violence. A great proportion of them are educated."

"But do you not consider the fact of their being educated increases rather than diminishes their crime?"

"To a certain extent it indisputably does, I admit; and again, their criminality is further increased by a large number of them not being in necessitous circumstances at the time of their arrest."

"It is very sad," I said, "to find so much crime among those of decent position."

"It is indeed, but they fall victims to that weakness which is common to a large proportion of our respectable English society—the love of imitating others richer than themselves."

"Do you really mean that that is the cause of much demoralisation among those in easy circumstances?"

"The wish to appear richer than they really are is almost as common a cause with our respectably educated criminals as drink is with the lower, and does as much mischief. Did you notice that fairlooking young fellow that just passed us with a pail of water in his hand? He was clerk in an insurance company with an income of one hundred and twenty pounds a-year. For the first two years he behaved remarkably well, but then a young man entered the office who was nephew to one of the directors, and who possessed in addition to his salary an independent income of a hundred a-year. An intimacy sprang up between the two clerks, and they were always together. But the director's nephew spent much more than the other, who, not liking to be behind his friend, attempted to vie with him in expenditure. The result was, he soon got into debt. and at last was guilty of purloining some of the office money. He was arrested, tried, and found guilty, and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment."

"Do you not find," I inquired, "this unhappy wish to vie with others richer than themselves quite as strong in women as in men?"

"Far more so, and their love of display frequently impels their husbands to commit acts of dishonesty which in all probability they would not otherwise have thought of. If you will come with me to a cell a little farther on, I will show you an example of this."

The chaplain preceded me to nearly the end of the corridor, and there opeued the door of a cell. It was occupied by a man about fifty years of age, attired in the costume of the prison. After a few introductory sentences, the chaplain asked him how much of his term of imprisonment remained unexpired.

"Eleven months," was the answer.

I inquired what occupation he intended following when he left the prison.

"God knows, sir," was the reply. "I cannot return to my old trade as a weaver, for nobody would employ me. I would willingly emigrate to Queensland if I could, with my children who are, I am happy to say, all respectable; but I have no friends, nor do I know from whom to ask assistance."

"Is this your first offence?" I inquired.

"It is, sir; up to a year of my being arrested no one can say I ever wronged him to the value of a farthing."

"For what crime are you here?"

"For robbing my employer, sir."
"How came you to do that?" I said; "were you in distress?"

"No, sir; at any rate not till I got foolishly into debt. Gentility, sir, has been my ruin."

I looked at him with astonishment, for he had the appearance of an intelligent handicraft workman, and nothing more.

"But in what manner," I asked, "can gentility have been your ruin?"

"It's rather a long story, but I will tell it you if you like, sir."

"Pray do," I said; "if the chaplain has no other occupation at present."

The Rev. gentleman told me his time was at my service, and the prisoner commenced his narrative.

"I was brought up a weaver, as my father was before me. I was a good hand at my trade, and I worked steadily at it. When about twenty-four years of age I married a girl who was also a weaver. She was quiet, amiable, and industrious, and made me an excellent wife. We soon had a family, but as we were in constant and good work we not only contrived to keep the wolf from the door, but lived in comfort and respectability as well. We worked for many years for the same firm, one of the largest in England, doing our work well, and never during the whole time wronging our employers to the value of an ounce of silk.

"When I was about thirty-five years of age the head partner sent for me saying he wanted to speak to me on a matter of great importance. I, of course, presented myself at the office, and shortly afterwards was ushered into his room.

"'C—,' he said, 'we have always been much satisfied with your behaviour, and now we are going to advance you. The under-foreman in our receiving-room is going to leave us, and you may have his appointment, if you like. Your wages will be thirty-five shillings a-week, and your wife can work for us as before.'

"You may easily believe I was overjoyed at the offer, which I immediately accepted; and two days afterwards I entered on my duties. They were very light, and consisted principally in receiving the work brought home by the weavers, examining it to see that it was properly done, and giving out the bobbins for fresh work. Times were now very flourishing with us, and we earned sufficient to give our children a good education. My employers were perfectly satisfied with me, and I worked on soberly and honestly.

"After I had been seven years under-foreman, the foreman one day died suddenly; and I was most anxious to know who was to succeed him, as he had been a very good friend to me, and we had worked on very amicably together. My doubts at last terminated in a very satisfactory manner. The head partner sent for me one morning, and told me the firm were so pleased with my steady behaviour, that they had determined to offer me the situation of foreman. with a salary of two hundred a-year, to be paid quarterly. I was, naturally, delighted at the intelligence, as I considered my fortune was as good as made. I thanked the head of the firm most gratefully for his kindness, and assured him that every effort should be made on my part to give him satisfaction.

"'Of that I am assured, Mr. C—,' he said (it was the first time he had called me 'Mister,' and I was not a little flattered by it); 'you can now enter on your duties as soon as you please.'

"When, in the evening, I told my wife of our good fortune, she was completely overwhelmed by it, and for some time could hardly realise it; but when I told her that the head partner had called me 'Mr. C—,' she was even more pleased at that than I had been myself.

"'And why should you not be called "Mr. C—?"'she said. 'I am sure you would make as good a gentleman as the best of them.'

"'Fair and softly, my dear,' said I. 'Let us first feel our feet, and then we will talk of that afterwards.'

"My duties now were not more severe than formerly, but far more responsible; for I was entrusted with considerable sums of money to pay the workmen. I had also an under-foreman to assist me, who was a sharp, clever fellow: and we got on very well together. Once a week my books were audited by the firm, and I was frequently complimented, not only on my exactitude, but also, as I was a good penman, on the neat manner in which they were

"Although my income was now two hundred ayear, it had not increased much in reality, for it had been suggested to me that, now I was in a situation of trust and responsibility, it was hardly just that I should allow my wife to drudge like a common weaver. I, without hesitation, admitted the justice of the remark, but I hardly thought my wife would agree to it: however, I was determined to try her, so I told her when I went home in the evening that I hardly thought it right she should continue at the loom, considering the position in life we were now in. To my great surprise, my wife not only made no objection, but positively told me she had already thought so; and she had wished to speak to me on the subject, but did not like, as she was afraid I should think her lazy.

"Although my wife had now given up the loom, she was by no means idle. Unlike most weavers' wives, she was an expert needlewoman, and she occupied herself in making the children's dresses. True, she had always done so before, and had had time for the loom as well; but now we were in a more genteel position, the children had to be better dressed, and, of course, a good deal more needlework had to be done: but, as my daughters were now old enough to help their mother, it was no great increase of expense, after all.

"After I had been a few months in my new position, my wife one night said to me, 'Our landlord called to-day, and I paid him for the quarter. He talks about increasing our rent. He says you have had the house too cheap for some time past, considering the rate of rents in the neighbourhood.'

replied, 'and it is a shameful thing for him to want it, considering how long I have been his tenant. I would rather look for another house than pay a shilling more than I do at present.'

""Well, dear,' said my wife, 'and I think you are right. Besides, there's another thing strikes me. We are living here with common weavers, and mixing with them, which is not quite right considering the difference in our position. And then the girls are growing up, and they ought to do something better than marry weavers.'

"I was struck with the justice of my wife's remark, and requested her to look out for another lodging or house, which she promised to do.

"The next day when I returned home I found my wife had busied herself in finding a new dwelling for us. She had set her mind on one in the Hoxton Road. It was certainly considerably larger than our own and much more expensive. We were paying twenty-five pounds a year, and this was forty without taxes. It was, however, far more respectable, my wife said, than the one we were then living in in Fleur de Lis Street, and she had hit upon a plan to make it less expensive than it appeared at first sight. It was to let off the first floor to some single gentleman who was employed in the city in the day time, so that in point of fact we should have all the credit for the appearance of the house and not be at any higher rent than we then were.

"I complimented my wife on her excellent arrangements; the house was taken, and in a few weeks we were in possession.

"But although the rent of the house would not be more than our old one when we had let off the first floor, and the appearance we should create would be far greater, there was the expense of furnishing to be taken into consideration. This somewhat crippled us for the moment, but my wife said in a short time she would make up the amount by the rent of the rooms.

"We found without difficulty a tenant for our first floor, a young man, clerk in an insurance office. He was a quiet, orderly young fellow enough, paying regularly his rent every week. I now proposed that we should begin economising the money we had paid for the extra furniture, but my wife objected to do so till later, as she had other expenses to meet at the moment. I inquired what they might be.

""Why, my dear,' said my wife, 'it is utterly impossible that the girls and I can dress now in the manner we did in Fleur de Lis Street-when we were living among weavers. The people about here are very genteel, and I don't like to dress different from our neighbours. We are now in a good position, and we ought to make a better appearance.'

"I foolishly admitted her arguments, and we not only put off saving the money for the furniture, but we got somewhat into debt for the purchase of new clothes as well. When my wife had obtained the new dresses for herself and children they certainly looked very well in them, and I was, I admit, very proud of my family; but unfortunately, after the purchase had been made, we did not save the money we had expended on the furniture. We continued to live on quietly enough; but we spent, I am sorry to say, somewhat more than our income, though not to such an extent as to cause us any uneasiness. I however was obliged to apply to a loan office for assistance, which I had no difficulty in obtaining; and as I contrived to pay up the interest, the affair gave me very little trouble.

"I have told you the commencement of our misfortunes, I will now tell you how our gentility ended. My wife's love of dress increased, and with it our expenditure, but our income remained the same. At last my wife confided to me that the clerk on the first floor had begun to show great attention to Charlotte, our eldest daughter, and she had every reason to believe it would end in an offer. His family, she said, were very respectable, and it would be an excellent match; and she considered the best thing we could do would be to get acquainted with them. I told her we must be careful what we did. I had no objection to make the acquaintance of the young fellow's family; but at the same time we must be careful not to increase our expenditure, as I had already great difficulty in keeping up the payment of the interest of the money I had borrowed from the loan office.

"'My dear,' said my wife, 'what nonsense you talk. How is it possible we can mix with people in a better position of life than ourselves, and spend no more than we do now?'

"'How much money should you want?' I inquired.

"I do not exactly know. I must get the girl some new dresses, and we must cut a dash a little. You know, after all,' she said, 'that if he marries Charlotte, you will not be at the expense of maintaining her; so, in the long run, it will be no loss to us.'

"I gave in to her plan, and I applied at the loanoffice for more money, but to my great annoyance I experienced this time considerable difficulty. However, I got the money at last, and my wife bought Charlotte some new things; and we got intimate with the clerk's family, who appeared very genteel people, and took to us immensely. We visited at each other's houses occasionally, and at last the young fellow proposed for Charlotte.

"Evcrything, with the exception of my increasing debts, went on flourishingly. On one occasion, we went to a dinner-party at the house of the clerk's grandfather, an old solicitor, for the purpose of introducing Charlotte to him. My wife, as we were preparing to leave home, appeared very nervous, and after fidgeting about for some time, said.

"'The old gentleman is a very sharp fellow, my dear. Take care you do not let anything fall that will show that we were at one time only weavers, because he imagines we are far higher folk than you suppose.'

. "'I do not wish to speak about family matters at all,' I said; 'at any rate, you need not be afraid of me. But what makes you think they believe we are better off than we are?'

""Well, my dear,' said my wife, colouring slightly,
'I don't know how it occurred, but they all believe you are likely to be taken into the house as a partner.'

"I was exceedingly angry when I heard this, and I inquired of my wife from what source such an infamous falsehood proceeded?

"She replied that she did not know; but implored me so strenuously, and at the same time with so guilty a look on her countenance, that in case it were mentioned I would not contradict it, that I fully perceived it was a piece of boasting of her own. I scolded her severely on the matter, and told her that if it were spoken of, I should certainly contradict it. Fortunately, nothing on the subject was mentioned during the evening, and although it was a source of quarrel between me and my wife for some days afterwards, the affair at last died away.

"We had now to invite the old solicitor and the family to dine with us; but before the day arrived, I found my wife had got considerably into debt in the neighbourhood, and I was again obliged to apply to the loan-office for assistance. The secretary told me they would consider my application, and let me know the result; and in a few days their decision came. It was not only that they refused to advance me any more money, but that when my outstanding bills were due, they should certainly press for the full amount.

"This news came like a clap of thunder on me. What to do I knew not; or where to find the money. To add to my sorrow, six months' rent was owing on the house, and the landlord was pressing for it. However, I shut my eyes to the circumstance for the moment, resolving that as soon as the dinner-party should be over, I would turn over a new leaf, and insist on far greater economy being practised in the house.

"The day arrived for the dinner-party, for which my wife had made great preparations. Before leaving the house, I took the opportunity of requesting her to be as moderate in all this as she could, and was on the point of leaving her, when a knock was heard at the door, and a broker's man entered with a distress warrant for the six months' rent. I was perfectly aghast when he told me his errand; but I was powerless, I had not twenty shillings in the house, and it wanted a month before my next quarter's salary would be due. I had no alternative but to leave him in possession; and with a heavy heart I proceeded to business.

"I got on as I best could till the time arrived when I was accustomed to take my dinner. Being to dine at home that day, I went to a neighbouring public house to get my lunch. As I was seated at the table, the gloomy aspect of my affairs came before me, and my eyes filled with tears. Ashamed of my low spirits, and seeing the necessity of my rousing myself, I called for a glass of spirits and water, although ordinarily a most sober man. As I drank it my courage revived, and I began to think in what way I could retrieve myself. But one way presented itself to my mind, and that was a most rigid retrenchment. This I firmly resolved on practising. even against any opposition on the part of my wife; but still the disagreeable fact presented itself to my mind, that a broker's man was in possession, and that the same day we were going to give an extravagant dinner-party. Something must be done, but what? To brighten up my thoughts, I called for another glass of spirits and water. As I drank it the idea came to my mind that a considerable sum of money was at that moment in my possession, but it was my employers'. Why could I not borrow some without their knowing it? If I could pay out the broker's man I should redeem to a certain extent my credit. To-morrow, I argued, I will sell off everything and replace the amount. The sale of my furniture would be enough for that, and the payment of the money I owed to the loan-office as well. The idea then occurred to me, that my wife might oppose me, but I silently and solemuly swore that no persuasions of hers should induce me to alter my determination.

"I now returned to the house of business. There was a considerable sum in the till, of which I kept the key—more than one hundred and fifty pounds. I took from it, trembling the while like a leaf, the money I required and not a shilling more, and shortly afterwards, pleading a violent headache, I returned home and paid out the broker, to the great joy of my wife.

"The dinner passed off in a most satisfactory manner, although perhaps it appeared more so to me than it really was from the quantity of wine I was obliged to drink to drown the thought of the action I had committed. The next morning I rose with a severe headache; and my wife was so overcome with her exertions the day before that I left her in bed when I went to business. However, I argued, it mattered but little; the next day would be Sunday, and then I should have ample time and opportunity to express my determination to my wife, for I was fully resolved I would sell every stick of furniture I possessed, and enter some cheap ready-furnished lodgings nearer to the house of business. On the Sunday I told my wife the resolution I had come to, and a terrible scene we had of it. She accused me of gross cruelty and meanness. She told me I might at least have waited till the wedding was over, and then she would have offered no objection. Many times I was on the point of telling her of the desperate action I had committed, for I would not acknowledge to myself it was a dishonest one, although I should have considered it infamous in another. Charlotte at last came to my wife's aid, and her tears quite subdued my courage. As the licence for her marriage had already been obtained, I at last gave way; and it was understood between us, that as soon as the marriage came off, which was to take place in a fortuight, my plan would be adopted.

"One morning in the next week I received a message from the firm to attend at the City house of business about some alteration in my duties. I immediately suspected there was some change to be made in the manner of paying the weavers, which had already been hinted at once or twice, and that my accounts would be audited on the next Saturday, the last in the mouth. When I arrived, there was no one in the counting-house, and on the desk was a new blank cheque-book. The devil prompted me, and I neatly abstracted from it a blank cheque and put it in my pocket. When I saw the head partner he received me very coolly, and told me that on the next Saturday my books were to be examined, and a new system was to be adopted. I promised everything should be in readiness, and left him.

"I was now desperate, and I resolved on forging my employers' name to a cheque for one hundred pounds; but when I took the pen in my hand, I lost all courage. Still, I argued, it must be done; and I went to the public-house, and after drinking two glasses of gin-and-water, I had sufficient nerve to commit the forgery.

"But now, how was I to get the cheque cashed? At last I remembered that my daughter's suitor was to call in the evening, and I resolved to make him my tool. When I arrived at home I again applied to the bottle for courage, and as he was leaving the house I told him I should be obliged to him if he would get a cheque cashed for me at the London and County Bank the next day, and bring me the money in the evening. He readily promised to do so, and kept his word; but unfortunately he was personally acquainted with the cashier, and they had some little conversation together on indifferent subjects. To shorten a sad story, the fraud was detected, and I was tried and found guilty. My employers recommended me to mercy on account of my previous good character, and I was sentenced to only three years' imprisonment. My daughter's marriage was of course broken off, and my wife has since died of a broken heart. Some weavers kindly assisted my children, but the youngest were sent to the workhouse and my family broken up. I have paid dearly enough," he said, with tears in his eyes, "for a couple of years' gentility. When I leave here, God only knows what I shall do; my character is gone, and nobody will employ me."

We then left the poor fellow in his cell. "That," said the chaplain as I left the prisoner, "is no exceptional case. The efforts at present made to put a stop to driuking are worthy of all praise; but, be assured, there is no passion more productive of dishonesty than the love of appearance; and when a society shall be established to work against it, they will have as terrible an evil to contend with as drinking itself."

HOMEWARD.

BY THE EDITOR.

II.—ATHENS.

We changed steamers at Syra, which is the great steam-boat station in the Levant, and the centre from whence passengers depart on their respective routes to every point of the compass within the shores of the Mediterranean. We did not land, but admired the picturesque view of the town from the sea, with its tier above tier of streets scaling the hill-side. The great traditional fact about Syra is, as I was informed, that its females are the most beautiful in the East. They may be so, and yet possess commonplace countenances. The conclusion I have come to about female beauty and comeliness is, that in no part of the earth are there any faces to be compared with those seen within the British Isles. In most countries I have visited—except America, where, however, the bloom soon dies—the good-looking are very rare. And let me observe, by the way, that there are many current sayings about the characteristics of various countries and their people, from which I must dissent. Among these are such as, that the French are the merriest nation, and the English the dullest,—the very reverse of the assertion being true; and that the Greeks and Italians have the "bonniest lasses,"—the fact being that they are in general wizzened scarecrows as compared with our own.

From Syra we proceeded to Athens. The very name of Athens makes one shrink from attempting to describe it. I am disposed to say nothing about it. But as I have only professed to deal with the outside of things—what the eye can see and the ear hear—I may attempt, as one who wishes to share with others as much as possible the impressions which he himself received, to describe the tomb of the once-thinking Athens, just as I did that of the once-worshipping Jerusalem.

We left Syra late in the afternoon, and knowing that at daybreak we should be wheeling past "Sunium's marbled steep" and coming in sight of Athens, I rose early and went on deck. It was a fresh, breezy morning, with topping, curling waves, which, the wind being astern, sent our little steamer merrily along. This merriment was added to, or perhaps expressed, by our happy-looking, dumpy captain, who, while he balanced himself on the slippery deck, sang what seemed to be the chorus of a song of his own making, for it was but a constant repetition of "Ring ding ding, diddle ring," &c., and was by no means classical, but essentially tarry, even though interlarded with descriptions of each successive point which opened upon us: "Sunium-Diddle ding, ding, dong;" "Ægina-Ding, ding, de diddy." And the round jolly tar kept time to his ditty on the wet planks, smoking eigarettes and smiling graciously, as we went pitching and rolling up the Ægean The morning was rather damp and cold, and it was not easy to get up enthusiasm from the actual aspect of "the Isles of Greece." But as we approached Athens the atmosphere became more luminous under the increasing power of the sun, and nature began to wear an aspect more in harmony with what one wished or expected. As we passed the old harbour of Phalerum, Hymettus towered to our right; in the centre of the plain the Acropolis rose crowned with the Parthenon, with the summit of Lycabettus immediately above it; while in the same line but higher still rose Pentelicus, which to the east looks down on Marathon; and to the left again the ridge of Mount Parnes walled in the plain, with the pass of Phyle and its precipice clearly seen, and ending, further to the left, beyond the harbour of the Piræus, in the ridge of Ægaleos, on whose rocky brow Xerxes sat as he "looked o'er sea-born Salamis."

And did Athens look like Edinburgh? we have been asked. In both cases there is a high rock crowned with buildings: but in the one case the rock rises above a plain, in the other from a ridge; and the one rock is a ridge crowned by the Parthenon, while the other is covered by ugly barracks. The Calton Hill has no doubt some likeness to the Acropolis; but neighbouring chimneys and smoke, and the absence of all association, make the dissimilarity greater than the resemblance.

We soon entered the harbour, in full sight of Salamis. But when one hears the name of such a famous spot suddenly uttered, as a finger is pointed to indicate it, there is a strange disposition to look on listlessly to put away the attempt to take in the full impression which we feel it ought to make, as if a feeble impression were a confession of one's incapacity to realise the dignity of the object, and as if .time must therefore be secured, and a calm, solemu mood of mind be acquired, in order to our dealing worthily with its grand associations. And thus it is that our after-thoughts of places holy in the world's history are really more true and just than those suggested at the moment. We photograph the scene in our minds, and afterwards study it, and enjoy it perhaps more than when it first suddenly burst upon us. I often felt this, and more so in Athens than in Jerusalem, the history of the latter city being more fresh, living, present,-more personal, so to speak, to a Christian and a minister, than that of Greece with all its glory can possibly be.

The distance from the Piræus to Atheus is about five miles. These five miles seem to me to afford the traveller an opportunity of forming an opinion regarding the state of modern Greece, which a further acquaintance with the country will confirm and illustrate rather than contradict. The mere fact that an indifferent, Macadamised road has not been superseded by a railway, connecting the city with its harbour, is itself a noteworthy fact, as showing the state of the kingdom. There is not, indeed, a mile of railway in all Greece! Why is it so? There may, for aught we know, be some reason for it, which may be uttered in Parliament with all the emphasis of Greek eloquence; but prosaie travellers cannot suggest any sufficient reason for such slow-coach travelling. We stopped half way at a miserable wine-shop, where the driver paused to refresh his horses and himself. The disreputable-looking publican suggested that we should also indulge in liquor, and looked insolent because we refused to try his cellar.

Fortunately for us, our friend Principal Tulloch was at Athens, and, finding him on our arrival, we went at once to the Acropolis. The morning, as I have said, had been showery; but when we reached the summit of the hill, and sat down on the steps near the Temple of Victory, and in silence gazed on the scene, the rain had quite cleared away. A few clouds remained to beautify the sky, and to relieve the eye from the wide expanse and infinite depth of its blue. There was a freshness in the gentle breeze, a coolness on the earth, a transparency in the atmosphere, for all of which I felt deeply grateful when looking for the first time on this singular landscape. Around us were the remains of the most magnificent buildings of the ancient world. At our feet was the Areopagns, on which Paul stood; and the Pynx, with its Bema, from which the greatest orators of the world had spoken: further down was the Temple of Theseus, the most perfect remains of the ancient world of art, dating, as it does, centuries before the Christian era (B.C. 465); and beyond, the Ægean Sea, whose white waves were visible curling beneath the breeze; with Salamis to the right, and Ægina to the left; and in the far distance before us, mountains, promontories, shadowy inlets, with the Acropolis of Corinth clearly seen rising up amidst an amphitheatre of hills, beautified and glorified by every delicate shade of colour, first speckled with white, and then touched up with hues borrowed from the rainbow. I never saw such blues and purples, except on Deeside; and there were indescribably delicate thin veils of nameless lights, just like the reflections of angels' wings which Fra Angelica paints. The landscape was no doubt seen in the best possible circumstances as to light and shade, and it will for ever remain in my memory unmatched—must

Remains of the Theatre of Dionysius.

I say, even by the view from Ediuburgh Castle on one of our choicest northern days? Yes! for I never saw in Edinburgh, or anywhere else, anything like that view on that day from the Acropolis of Athens.

"And what struck you most in Athens after that?" is the sort of question which one has sometimes put to him by fireside travellers, to please whom I chiefly write. Now to attempt to speak about Greek art, and to assume the professor's chair, even if I had the professor's knowledge, which most certainly I do not pretend to, and to presume to write about "Athens and the Athenians," whether ancient or modern, or about their philosophy, art, literature, or anything else, simply because I was, as a passing traveller, for two or three days in Greece, would prove me to be as wise as the Yankee who landed one day in Liver, pool, returned the next day to New York, and declared, as he felt himself authorised by his long voyage to do, that he saw "no difference atween the old and new country, except it might be perhaps in the ferry steamers, that were bad, and in the mint juleps, that were worse."

But I may mention with reference to Athens some things with which every traveller is familiar. The Parthenon and its buildings far surpassed my expectations. They give the deepest and most lasting impression I ever received, or can receive, of the grandeur, serene simplicity, and perfect beauty of ancient architecture. The worth which men attached to art, the refined and dignified tastes which it expressed and gratified, came upon one almost like a revelation. There was a world of feeling, of genius, of conceptions of the beautiful for its own sake embodied in the glories of this hill, which has never since been reproduced on earth. I do not attempt to describe the glorious work of Pericles, assisted by Phidias. We wandered among the ruins of the exquisite Erichtheium; paced round and round the grand columns of the Parthenon; tried to reproduce the past, when this hill shone with all the glory of perfect art, but utterly failed to do so. We sat down again on the steps of the magnificent Propylea, with the exquisite little temple, the Unwinged Victory, beside us, and the glorious landscape before us, and in silence rejoiced in the matchless wonders.

But there are in Athens links which irresistibly connect us with the men of that immortal past, in which it, under God, was the teacher of the world in the culture of taste and of intellect. On the one side of the Acropolis, at its base, the Theatre of Dionysius has during these last few years been exhumed. Here, beneath the open heavens, and to thousands of eager and intelligent listeners, who sat on the wide amphitheatre around, the great tragedians and comedians-Sophocles, Æschylus, Aristophanes, and others-first spoke their immortal dramas. The remains of the theatre are very perfect. The marble floor for the orchestra, between the stage and the audience, is unbroken: so are the marble chairs, at least about thirty of them, sweeping round the semicircle, where sat the priests and priestesses of Bacchus, the patron of higher inspiration than comes from wine. Their titles are yet inscribed on the seats which were officially allotted to them. Is it nothing to stand there, and to revivify that audience, and to hear again the words spoken which, in God's providence. were never more to die?

The Bema is another place which links the present with the living men of the immortal past. This is a square stone platform, cut out of the living rock (which like a wall, from which it projects, extends to the right and left), and is ascended by a series of steps. Ascend it; stand there, and look around! That open space, as on a bare rocky hill, was often filled by the Athenian citizens, and where you stand Demosthenes and Pericles stood, and the greatest orators of the world, and thence uttered the words and poured out the sentences which have ever since been the unapproached and unapproachable models of the art of cloquence. Is it nothing to occupy such a spot?—nothing to recal the wordous past from it?

But what of the Areopagus, or Mars' Hill? The question is natural; for although the visit of St. Paul played but a small and insignificant part in the conscious or recorded history of Athens, yet it looms large, nevertheless, in the history of that "kingdom which ruleth over all." The spot is certain. It is a rough mass of limestone rock, which rises from what was once the Agora, an open-air Exchange surrounded with objects of art, where merchants and philosophers and artists met; or a sort of Athenian club where all might come and go, chat, gossip, dispute, make bargains, talk politics, religion, philosophy, or scandal, to kill the time, and improve as they best could their purse, or their information. Of the once-famous Agora there are few traces left, except its gate of entrance; but the rock of the Areopagus, as old as creation, remains very much as it was in the days of the Apostle. Sixteen steps, partly worn and broken, cut out of the rock, lead to the summit, fifty feet or so above the plain. Stone benches, forming three sides of a quadrangle, also remain on the top, immediately above the stair; and eight blocks of stone are indicated where those who were tried before the august tribunal were examined on their respective heresies. It was very touching to ascend those very steps which must have been trod by the great Apostle; and up which Dionysius the Areopagite also ascended, a very different man in his convictions and life from what he was when he descended them after the address of the Apostle. It was most solemnising to stand on the summit of this famous hill, a spot where again we met, as in a foreign land, the great missionary, with whom our previous journey had at so many points been associated. cannot help here quoting, for the sake of those who have not read the passage, the picturesque and truthful reproduction of the whole scene which on that memorable day presented itself to the eye of St. Paul; and in doing so I express the hope that, for their own good, they will read one of the noblest contributions to the history of Christianity as it existed in the days of the Apostle, - I mean, "The Life and Epistles of St. Paul" by Conybeare and Howson :-

"One characteristic of the Agora was, that it was full of memorials of actual history. Among the plane-trees planted by the hand of Cimon were the statues of the great men of Athens—such as Solon the law-giver, Conon the admiral, Demos-thenes the orator. But among her historical men were her deified heroes, the representatives of her mythology—Hercules and Theseus—and all the series of the Eponymi on their elevated platform, from whom the tribes were named, and whom an ancient custom connected with the passing of every successive law. And among the deified heroes were memorials of the older divinities-Mercuries which gave their name to the street in which they were placed-statues dedicated to Apollo, as patron of the city, and her deliverer from plague-and, in the centre of all, the Altar of the Twelve Gods, which was to Athens what the Golden Milestone was to Rome. If we look up to the Areopagus, we see the temple of that deity from whom the eminence had received the name of Mars' Hill; and we are aware that the sanctuary of the Furies is only hidden by the projecting ridge beyond the stone steps and the seats of the judges. If we look forward to the Acropolis, we behold there, closing the long perspective, a series of little sanctuaries on the very ledges of the rock-shrines of Bacchus and Æsculapius, Venus, Earth, and Ceres, ending with the lovely form of that Temple of Unwinged Victory which glittered by the entrance of the Propylea above the statues of Harmodius and Aristogeiton. Thus, every god in Olympus found a place in the Agora. But the religiousness of the Athenians went even further. For every public place and building was likewise a sanctuary. The Record-House was a temple of the Mother of the Gods.

The Council-House held statues of Apollo and Jupiter, with an altar of Vesta. The Theatre at the base of the Acropolis, into which the Athenians crowded to hear the words of their great tragedians, was consecrated to Bacchus. The Pynx, near which we entered, on whose elevated platform they listened in breathless attention to their orators, was dedicated to Jupiter on High, with whose name those of the Nymphs of the Demus were gracefully associated. And, as if the imagination of the Attio mind knew no bounds in this direction, abstractions were deified and publicly honoured. Altars were erected to Fame, to Modesty, to Energy, to Persuasion, and to Pity. This last altar is mentioned by Pausanias among 'those objects in the Agora which are not understood by all men; for,' he adds, 'the Athenians alone of all the Greeks give divine honour to Pity.' It is needless to show how the enumeration which we have made (and which is no more than a selection from what is described by Pausanias) throws light on the words of St. Luke and St. Paul; and especially how the groping after the abstract and invisible, implied in the altars alluded to last, illustrates the inscription 'To the Unknown God,' which was used by apostolic wisdom to point the way to the highest truth."—

Vol. i., pp. 380-382. "The place to which they took him was the summit of the hill of the Areopagus, where the most awful court of judicature had sat from time immemorial, to pass sentence on the greatest criminals. and to decide the most solemn questions connected with religion. The judges sat in the open air, upon seats hewn out in the rock, on a platform, which was ascended by a flight of stone steps immediately from the Agora. On this spot a long series of awful causes, connected with crime and religion, had been determined, beginning with the legendary trial of Mars, which gave to the place its name of 'Mars' Hill.' A temple of the god, as we have seen was A temple of the god, as we have seen, was on the brow of the eminence; and an additional of the Furies, in a broken cleft of the rock immediately below the judges' seats. Even in the political decay of Athens, this spot was regarded by the people with superstitious reverence. It was a scene with which the dread recollections of centuries were associated. It was a place of silent awe in the midst of the gay and frivolous city. Those who withdrew to the Areopagus from the Agora, came, as it were, into the presence of a higher power. place in Athens was so suitable for a discourse on the mysteries of religion. We are not, however, to regard St. Paul's discourse on the Areopagus as a formal defence, in a trial before the court. The whole aspect of the narrative in the Acts, and the whole tenor of the discourse itself, militates against this supposition. The words, half-derisive, halfcourteous, addressed to the Apostle before he spoke to his audience, 'May we know what this new doctrine is?' are not like the words which would have been addressed to a prisoner at the bar; and still more unlike a judge's sentence are the words with which he was dismissed at the conclusion, 'We will hear thee again of this matter.' Nor is there anything in the speech itself of a really apologetic character, as any one may perceive on comparing it with the defence of Socrates. More-over, the verse which speaks so strongly of the Athenian love of novelty and excitement is so introduced as to imply that curiosity was the motive of the whole proceeding. We may, indeed, admit that there was something of a mock solemnity in this adjournment from the Agora to the Areopagus. The Athenians took the Apostle from the tumult of public discussion to the place which was at once most convenient and most appropriate. There was everything in the place to incline the auditors, so far as they were seriously disposed at all, to a reverent and thoughtful attention. It is probable that Dionysius, with other Areopagites, were on the judicial seats. And a vague recollection of the dread thoughts associated by poetry and tradition with the Hill of Mars, may have solemnised the minds of some of those who crowded up the stone steps with the Apostle, and clustered round the summit of the hill, to hear the announcement of the new divinities.

"There is no point in the annals of the first planting of Christianity which seizes more powerfully on the imagination of those who are familiar with the history of the aucient world. Whether we contrast the intense earnestness of the man who spoke, with the frivolous character of those who surrounded him, -or compare the certain truth and awful meaning of the Gospel he revealed, with the worthless polytheism which had made Athens a proverb in the earth, or even think of the mere words uttered that day in the clear atmosphere, on the summit of Mars' Hill, in connection with the objects of art, temples, statues, and altars, which stood round on every side,—we feel that the moment was, and was intended to be, full of the most impressive teaching for every age of the world. Close to the spot where he stood was the Temple of Mars. The sanctuary 'of the Eumenides was immediately below him; the Parthenon of Minerva facing him above. Their presence seemed to challenge the assertion in which he declared here, that in TEMPLES made with hands, the Deity does not dwell. front of him, towering from its pedestal on the rock of the Acropolis-as the Borromean Colossus, which at this day, with outstretched hand, gives its bene-diction to the low village of Arona; or as the brazen statue of the armed angel, which from the summit of the Castel S. Angelo, spreads its wings over the city of Rome—was the bronze Colossus of Minerva, armed with spear, shield, and helmet, as the champion of Athens. Standing almost beneath its shade, he pronounced that the Deity was not to be likened either to that, the work of Phidias, or to other forms in gold, silver, or stone, graven by art, and man's device, which peopled the scene before him." Wherever his eye was turned, it saw a succession of such statues and buildings in every variety of form and situation. On the rocky ledges on the south side of the Acropolis, and in the midst of the hum of the Agora, were the 'objects of devotion' already described. And in the northern parts of the city, which are equally visible from the Areopagus, on the level spaces, and on every eminence, were similar objects, to which we have made no allusion—and especially that Temple of Theseus, the national hero, which remains in unimpaired beauty, to enable us to imagine what Athens was when this temple was only one among the many ornaments of that city which was 'wholly given to idolatry.'"-Vol. i. pp. 401-404.

After reading this vivid description of the scene and circumstances in which the immortal oration was given, our readers should again peruse the oration itself (Acts xvii. 22—34), as we did on the Areopagus.

It is difficult to realise the importance to Athens of that day, when St. Paul addressed his inquiring assemblage. Seemingly, and judging by sense only, it was nothing, as we have remarked, in the history of Greece or the world. We can well conceive what a slight impression the Apostle must have made on most in the city. The men and women of fashion, the distinguished and elite of society, if they heard his name at all would not likely be moved by it, or lose "ten tickings of their watch," or miss this or that "important engagement," for the sake of the Jewish tent-maker. The men of commerce had nothing to learn from "Common sense," him about the state of trade. and "practical wisdom," would dissuade others from ascending the Areopagus, -a step which might lead to remark, and make them be suspected of countenancing romantic novelties. The philosophic sects, Stoics and Epicureans, the representatives of pride and pleasure, what could they learn from a poor unknown stranger? And if they heard of salvation to their souls by faith in the Son of God who died on the cross but was alive again, and of humility and self-denial as being essential to the kingdom of heaven, would they deem it necessary to reply to such a philosophy as that? One can fancy how, had newspapers existed, the Apostle would have been passed by as unworthy of notice among the memorabilia of the day; or if any had deigned to dedicate a "leading article" to the poor stranger, it would only have been to supply food for the scorn of the wise, the prudent, and sagacious. How much could have been said, with a show of profound sense and discernment, as to his fanaticism, presumption, absurdity, and folly. How poor Dionysius would have been twitted and ridiculed! How any man would have been laughed at who dared to treat "the affair" as "worthy of serious criticism"! and how soon the memory of this "setter forth of strange gods" would pass away, as a bubble in the world's history! Had Athens thus judged, the world's history since then could not say Amen to her judgment. But so it will be till the world ends. Truth is greater than even those who speak it know. God takes care of it. The breath of Stoics and Epicureans, Pharisees and Sadducees, and all the more or less ignorant and honest who oppose truth. passes over it in coldness, as the storms of winter howl over the living seed, which nevertheless lives and grows, snatching strength from all the elements in God's world, which are by His wisdom and power made to be kindly disposed to all He loves; for truth is as imperishable and immortal as the mind of God from whom it comes.

I have mentioned several places in Athens, such as the theatre of Dionysius, the Bema of the Pynx, and the Areopagus, which vividly recall the living men of the past-who alone make the past living. I do not at this moment remember any spots in the world where we can thus locate men with such precision as in Palestine and Greece. In Palestine, certainty, that here, within a few yards of where we stand, once stood Jesus and the Apostles. This can be said with an accuracy that can hardly be questioned at that point in the road to Bethany where our Lord wept over Jerusalem; and again, without any question whatever, at Jacob's Well. And so in Athens, we can say, with different thoughts indeed, yet with most stirring feelings, here, by this marble floor, the great dramatists first repeated their immortal words, and gazed on those now empty and silent benches :- here, on this rocky platform of the Bema, stood Demosthenes and Pericles, and to them the faces of thousands of Athenian citizens were often turned, with such a gaze of eagerness, cultivation, intelligence, and critical taste, as no popular assembly has ever since exhibited: from this platform they heard such words as no orators have ever since addressed to mortal ears. Here again, on the Arcopagus, St. Paul must have stood; it may have been on that block of stone, or ou this side or that, but within the circumference of a few yards, or even feet, he must have uttered the most truthful, significant, and important words which ever fell from the lips of man in Athens. Where can such spots as these be found anywhere else in the world?

I have no wish to set up Athens and Jerusalem as representing necessarily antagonistic agencies in the education of mankind. In the cultivation of the taste and intellect of man, Athens has, under the Creator and Governor of all men, done more even than Jerusalem. But it was in the old inartistic land of Palestine, among her little insignificant villages and her humble peasantry, by the shores of her inland sea, in the bosom of her silent hills, and within the walls of Jerusalem, that Jesus revealed in His own person, by His life and death, and imparted since then by His Spirit, this, which neither Rome nor Athens ever dreamt of-that God is our Father, that all men are brethren, and that the name of Jesus is the only one given among men whereby we can be saved, by realising through faith in Him crucified and love to Himself our high and glorious relationship!

We visited, of course, the noble old Temple of Theseus. Though built nearly five centuries before the Christian era, it is in perfect preservation. It need not be described by me, any more than other well-known works of art or classic scenes in Athens. What struck me most among the beautiful though ill-arranged and crowded works of noble art within its walls, were the alto-relievo tablets from old tombs. The story of sorrow is touchingly told on them. A group of sorrowing friends around one who is about to depart; a child looking back to a weeping mother; a husband departing from his wife and family; an old man sailing away on an unknown sea, in a boat oared by love. There are no inscriptions beyond the one word yaips ("Farewell.") It was affecting to see here recorded human affections and sorrows of ages long past, and for example, we can affirm with almost perfect one with our own-yet, alas! without our comforts, without "the life and immortality brought to light"—without the solemn notes from the trumpet of Hope sounding "I am the Resurrection and the Life, whoseever believeth in me shall never die." But "the Lord reigneth—let the earth be glad!" It is equally true, indeed, that "the Lord reigneth, let the people tremble!" But has Athens more cause to tremble than Capernaum? or Socrates than the Sadducees, or Plate than the Pharisees?

The old city clock, as I may dare call "the Temple of Winds," is another of those monuments which connect us with the living past. This is a building situated beneath the Acropolis to the north, and surrounded by the houses of modern Athens. It is an octagonal tower between forty and fifty feet high. On each of the sides—on the frieze and the entablature-is a sculptured representation of the wind which might blow on that particular point; and to which a revolving bronze figure of a Triton on the summit once pointed with a staff, the wind of course determining its position like that of a weathercock. On each of these eight sides, and below the figures of the winds, are still seen the lines of a dial, with the iron gnomen preserved which indicated the time of day. Within the tower was also a water clock, the remains of which may yet be traced. So we have still preserved for us the old tower clock which as far back as the Christian era, and probably before it, registered time for the Athenian citizens. Up to those lines and shadows the slave and his master once looked, the one to know the hour of labour or of rest, the other of festivity or of pleasure. The merchant expecting the return of his vessel from her voyage; the sailor about to proceed on his; the people eager for the coming or going of their fleet, gazed with interest on the Triton's staff which showed the prevailing wind. The Apostle Paul may have looked up with an enquiring eye to that old tower ere he departed for Corinth. How blew the wind? Was it time to go to the port?

There are no remains in Europe which help one better to realise the immense size of a giant—or give a grander impression of the magnificent proportions of an old temple, than those of the Olympeium, or temple once dedicated to Olympian Jove. Of its 120 marble columns which once existed sixteen only with their architraves remain. But each of these is about twenty feet in circumference, and sixty feet high. They rise out of a solitary spot near the Illysus, and to the east of the Acropolis. It is a most majestic and imposing ruin. Not a vestige of the other columns remains—they have, I suppose, been a quarry for Athenian buildings.

Of course we visited Marathon. The drive to it is abouttwenty-two miles; the road we followed crosses the isthmus, between Mount Hymettus and Pentelicus. This road is one of the few great thoroughfares of modern Greece, yet it is so bad that more than once we had to get out of the carriage and walk, in order to save its springs and our necks. The country is on the whole picturesque, but very lonely. In no part of Palestine did the aspect of things inspire us with a greater sense of danger from an attack of banditti. Under a proper government it might be a well peopled and thriving land.

The scene of the battle of Marathon is very easily understood. There is no mistaking its leading features. This is by no means the case with most great battle-fields. In our modern system of campaigning, from the number of men engaged, and the employment of artillery, an army covers such an extent of territory, that what with intervening woods. villages, streams, and hills, which break up for miles the scene of operations, it is seldom easy to get a bird's-eye view of any of our famous European battle-fields. Waterloo is a singular exception to this. But Marathon is more easily understood than Waterloo even. A bay with deep water and a steep sandy beach sweeps like a gently bent bow for six miles, and is bounded by low rocky headlands. A dead flat plain extends along the bay, with a morass at each end, dry in summer but muddy and impassable in winter. This plain is about two miles broad, and is surrounded on the land side by a low range of hills, which descend into it by a number of small valleys and rocky steeps. The present road cuts across the plain near the base of the hills, while between the road and the sea is a large mound of earth, marking, we believe, the centre of the battle-field. The ten thousand Greeks, with their backs to the hills, faced the immense Persian army on the plain, with their backs to their ships and the sea. The thin line of the Greeks extended for about two miles, and was well flanked by the hills. They were separated by about a mile from the dense army of the Medes, which was flanked by the morass at either end, while about a thousand yards in their rear was the great fleet along the shore of the bay. What a spectacle for all times were the pluck and patriotism of the Atheniaus, their selfsacrificing devotion to country, to liberty, and to duty, the union on that day of the several generals and the people, and the absence of all jealousy and fear! How grand to witness with the eye of imagination the gallant charge of those Greeks, as with a run across the plain they threw themselves, like impulsive Highlanders, upon the invading host, and dared for the first time to attack an enemy at whose name the world trembled, and who were twenty to one against them; and then though broken, to see them rally and attack the enemy in their ships, to be repulsed again, but yet to fight on, until, over less than two hundred of their own dead, they see upwards of six thousand of the foe slain, and the rest driven to their fleet. And how grand again their forced march back to Athens, merely to overawe by their presence every mean and selfish traitor, and to fight again if necessary with the foe, should he, ignorant of their return, dare to land at Phalerum, beneath the shadow of the Acropolis. Such deeds of self-sacrificing bravery never die. They live as long as the world lasts, a strength to the heart and arm of every true man fighting for the right against the wrong.

The day we sat on the mound of Marathon was verily a day to be remembered by us. Beneath us lay the 190 Greeks, who fell at Marathon, and who, according to their respective clans, were buried side by side, more than twenty-three centuries ago. We gazed on the long sweep of the bay, watching the waves which, under an evenly blowing wind, decked the beach with a snowy wreath; and looked over the dark silent plain, and on to the Highland hills beyond, and moreover picked up a flint arrow-head -though whether used at Marathon or not is unknown to us-and thought of "the long results of time," of the slow progress of liberty, of the contrast presented between the Greece of Miltiades and that of King Otho or King George; and we in vain conjectured as to all that must yet be ere the Lord reigns in justice and mercy over a renovated church and world.

But I must, before I conclude, say a few words about modern Athens. Modern indeed! The town is formal and new, the palace is dull and new, and the government is always new; and there is nothing striking, settled, solid, or venerable, about any of them. Some of the Greek churches are out of sight the most striking objects among modern works of art, and are well worth studying. The newest ones are gaudy and unimpressive; but there is newness in all one sees, which, however, when contrasted with the older time of the Turks, is admitted on all hands to be a vast improvement.

Among other things we went to visit parliament, then in session. It was in one sense a pleasing sight. It was pleasing to see the signs, and we hope the germs of future liberty in the free discussion of a large assemblage of sufficiently outspoken men. It was interesting to see the Greek dress, of white kilt, tasselled hose, and red cap, all of which have a look not free from associations of bandits as seen on the stage. A debate in the Greek language was also worth hearing, though I did not understand a word of it. What the debate was about I forget. But it was conducted with an enthusiasm, a fervour. and a violence of gesture, and interruptions, surpassing anything I ever witnessed, and all about nothing vital or important to the commonwealth, as far as I could learn. But this is the only place in the country where patriotic steam can be let off, such steam, it is alleged, being generated by a large amount of fuel contributed by personal ambition, vanity, party spirit, and above all a scramble for loaves and fishes. That there are in this assembly educated men, and sensible, noble-minded patriots, there can be no doubt; but they are we fear but a small minority. Had not the municipal corporations been abolished, a great quantity of steam would have blown off in town elections, and in local assemblies, but, wanting such wholesome safety valves, every boiler comes up to parliament under high pressure, ready to burst, and generally causing many blisters with their scalding water. As I listened to this debate, with the swelling words and rhetorical attitudes, I constantly remembered the bad roads, and thought what a step it would be towards true national prosperity could all parties for a short time forget place and power, Constantinople and the Turks, and be induced to "mend their ways," erect schools, get an educated clergy, develop trade through self-interest, and secure bags of gold to the peasantry more numerous and heavier than any bandit could ever seize, -a booty resulting from the cultivation of their fields, the rearing of cattle, the pruning of their vine and fruit trees, the getting of good machinery, and the general opening of lines of easy communication with the seaports. Were Political Economy chosen as the patron saint of Greece, they would very soon find it, under a gracious Providence, so blessed, as to insure higher blessings.

There are two non-official gentlemen, whose open door and kind hospitalities are known to almost every visitor to Athens, the Rev. Dr. Hill and Mr. Findlay. In common with all travellers I record my sense of their kindness. Dr. Hill, the worthy Episcopal clergyman, has laboured faithfully in Athens since before the expulsion of the Turks. Mr. Findlay, the historian, is well known throughout the whole republic of letters. It is my deep regret that being indisposed the only evening I had the happiness of spending with him, I could not avail myself, as I had hoped to do, of all his treasures of information respecting the past and present of his adopted country. He stands alone as an authority on these matters

I had thus but a passing glance at Athens. But even a day there is worth years in most other places. It has left a picture behind that can never die, and is a dream for life.

HEALTH OF BODY AND MIND.

If it were only for the purpose of effectually securing the object which alone we have hitherto kept in view-the health of the body-it would be necessary to give some consideration to the character and condition of the mind. So close is the connection between our corporeal and mental personality, that whatever affects the one, advantageously or injuriously, has a tendency in a greater or less degree similarly to affect the other. Disturbances of the right action of the mind directly occasion, in many instances, derangement in various parts of the bodily system. Anger, or any considerable excitement, increasing unduly the rapidity of the circulation of the blood, and creating agitation of the nerves, will cause palpitation of the heart, feverishness, headache; indeed, a fit of passion, or of terror, has frequently proved fatal. Such emotions impede the functions of the digestive organs while they prevail, and permanently impair them if they are Anxiety and fretfulness are attended with the same result; and when characteristic or constitutional, are generally found to be connected, either as cause or effect, with chronic dyspepsia. We say as cause or effect, for an anxious or fretful disposition is often to be traced to permanent bodily disorder. The body acts upon the mind as powerfully as the mind upon the body. The influence of the bodily upon the mental temperament is indicated by the very language in which we describe various classes of character. The sanguine, the choleric, the phlegmatic, the splenetic, the nervous, the melancholic, are all denominated from a generally observed and acknowledged correspondence of certain states and affections of the mind with the states and affections of the body which these terms originally express. We must all have noticed in our own experience, as well as in our observations of others. the effect of temporary derangement of the bodily functions upon the temper and spirits; some disturbances of the system produce irritability, others depression. Weak health, or an imperfect physical development is, indeed, often associated with great mental power and activity; but in most of such cases, there exists some peculiarity of character which, whether we can or cannot discover its appropriate relation to the bodily condition, is unundoubtedly like it, morbid, or abnormal. In fact, as a general rule, the disorders and infirmities of the body affect the soul morally much more than intellectually.

The health of the mind, however, as well as that of the body, demands separate consideration. The mind has an independent existence; its phenomena are utterly inconsistent with the notion that it is a mere result of our material organisation; they cannot be adequately or intelligibly discussed, much less accounted for, upon such a hypothesis. But, for this very reason, in approaching this part of our subject, we have not the advantage of which we availed ourselves for the purpose of investigating the conditions necessary to the health of the body. The answer to the question, "What is the body?" given by the enumeration of its principal constituents, supplied a convenient and sufficient classification of the particulars to which our attention was due. The question, "What is the mind?" admits of no such answer. No similar account can be given of its constitution and construction. We cannot, by inspection or intuition, discover in it compouent parts affording us independent suggestions as to the various processes of intellectual and moral self-management. The brain is the organ by which the mind acts and is acted upon; but the brain is not the mind. There is no more reason for identifying this material substance with the intellectual principle than there is for identifying the blood with the animating principle—the life. The mind or soul is a simple, uncompounded, indivisible essence-pure spiritual being.

It will be, however, most convenient for the popular treatment of our subject, and in entire accordance with our metaphysical phraseology, which necessarily speaks of functions and operations of the mind in terms literally applicable to those of the body, if we follow, as in a kind of parallel, the arrangement adopted from our corporeal structure, for the discussion of the means available for the promotion of our physical well-being. We shall show that we may hope to maintain the mind in health by providing it with the equivalents of food, air, ventilation, exercise, clothing, and cleanliness

Let it first be noticed that the mind is liable to disorders of different kinds, which also may be illustrated from those of the body. Some mental diseases are congenital, or innate, others are contracted or communicated; some are chronic, others are temporary. There are minds which, from the first dawn of reason, manifest feebleness of memory, poverty of thought, slenderness of judgment, irresolution, fickleness, volatility. Some persons are possessed of a very small amount of moral power; others seem to be naturally incapable of self-control. There are, again, those who, although by no means to be accounted imbecile, are characterised by great dulness or slowness of perception, or by intellectual inactivity. And there is a large variety of constitutional defects in temper, disposition, sentiment, which we are accustomed to class, appropriately enough, under the term "weaknesses." Indeed, as the mortality of our physical nature shows itself, in numerous instances, by a tendency, more or less cognisable through observed symptoms, to certain particular forms of bodily disease, so, it is probable that the corruption of our spiritual nature is indicated in almost every individual by liability to special mental errors, or moral failings. And many of the more active and definite among the diseases which infest man's material frame, have their exact counterpart in the distempers of his soul. There are the fevers of the passions, the ague of pusillanimity, the jaundice of envy, the lethargy of indolence, the paralysis of selfishness, the cancer of sensuality.

It follows from these considerations that, in order to secure to a human being health and soundness of mind, his mental and moral welfare must be kept in view from early infancy. A judicious education, consisting of instruction and discipline, teaching and training, is necessary for the due development and strengthening of the powers of mind, and for the repression of its tendency to evil. It should be the object of all education to establish and improve the mental constitution, and to provide a remedy for its defects as soon as discovered. The temperament and disposition, the appetencies, predilections, and capabilities of the child must be watched and noted. In most cases they will manifest themselves very early, and so as not to be mistaken by any parent or teacher who is in earnest in his intention to educate thoroughly, and who is persuaded of the necessity and the efficacy of a real education. When the strong and weak points of the character, both intellectual and moral, are ascertained, it requires but the exercise of common sense and conscientious attention to duty, to pursue a course of training precisely adapted to the case, and sure, if persevered in, to produce a satisfactory result. It is the conviction of the supreme importance of such a knowledge of each child's order and peculiarities of mind which has introduced the principle of individualisation, chiefly through the example and efforts of the illustrious Arnold, even into our publicschool system of 'education.

Following now the track of our former inquiry into the materials and means for preserving bodily health, we first have to consider the nature of the food of the mind, and the mode of its administration.

Mental food is, of course, whatever may form a subject of knowledge—information of every kind, whether derived from oral instruction, from conversation, from observation, or from books. The mind, in its natural state, craves knowledge, especially in childhood. But at that period it is capable of receiving and digesting only a very limited amount, and that, too, of limited quality.

The mental health of childhood, and herein the foundation of a sound mental constitution for after years, depends greatly upon the sufficiency, the economy, and the suitableness of the provision made for direct instruction; and perhaps as much also upon the nature of the circumstances by which, indirectly, information is conveyed to the mind. If the intellectual aliment, administered formally and periodically in the character of lessons be too abundant or too scanty, too light or too solid, too insignit or too stimulating, the mental system will receive no nutriment. If the materials for thought which the child gathers, and appropriates, from the conversation and habits of the society in which it is placed are gross, corrupt, or frivolous, a healthy condition of mind cannot be the result. Hence the necessity for a careful selection of elementary books and subjects in early education, and for the jealous protection of children against the evil influence of bad or foolish nurses and servants, or ill-taught and ill-mannered companions of their own age. Books must necessarily form the principal food of the mind, that, at least, the supply of which is most capable of regulation. The distinction drawn by the Apostle, in the case of spiritual instruction, between "milk" and "strong meat," is evidently applicable at once to books, teaching us to adapt them to the age and capabilities of readers. same distinction is also useful to those who are at an age to choose their own line of reading. It is not good for our minds to be always occupied with the study of books on abstruse, difficult, or even grave and serious subjects, answering to "strong meat" in the Apostle's figurative language; nor, on the other hand, with the perusal of books which require no effort of thought and reflection to master them-light reading, as it is called, and much of which, as well as of many works professedly of a very different character, may less aptly be represented by milk than milk and water.

Variety and mixture of food is desirable for the mind as well as the body; and solid and light literature may with great advantage be intermixed. "Much study," saith the preacher, "is a weariness to the flesh;" and we may add, "to the spirit." Hard and heavy reading, without relaxation and change of thought, often becomes a burden to the student, and still oftener to his daily or casual companions in life. It indisposes and unfits for ordinary pursuits, and tends to make men absent, supercilious, and dictatorial. On the other hand, those who read little else but works of fiction and amusement may be compared to persons who should choose to feed upon pastry and sweetmeats, and drink nothing but drams; their taste is entirely spoiled for the serious and useful, and their mental faculties enervated by perpetual stimulants, which excite without employing them.

The books which are to be entirely rejected as the diet of the mind, may be classified as the unwholesome, the indigestible, and the innutritious. Some are positively deleterious and poisonous; all books that deprave the moral sense by their open or covert, characteristic or occasional licentiousness, and all that tend to injure the soul by undermining or assailing religious faith, and religious principle. Others present, in the confusion of their arrangement, the ponderousness and perplexity of their style, the intricacy or incoherency of their arguments, a mass of matter and words which can only encumber and fatigue, instead of edifying the mind. And there are those in abundance which, although in many cases pretending to an instructive character, especially in reference to religious doctrine and practice, are so utterly jejune and barren, that no real nutriment, intellectual or spiritual, can be extracted from them. Their meaning and moral, like Gratiano's reasons, are "as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all day ere you find them; and when you have found them they are not worth the search." Unfortunately, however, such books, being usually very liberally seasoned with conventional phraseology and piquant sentimentalism, delude readers by thousands into the belief that it is possible to become wiser and better by their perusal.

The benefit which we derive from our mental aliment depends, also, very much upon our manner of reading. And this ought to be in a great degree regulated by the quality of our food-the character of the books themselves. Lord Bacon, adopting the analogy we are pursuing, says, in a well-known passage, "Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some to be chewed and digested; that is, some books are to be read only in parts, others to be read, but not curiously; and some few to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention." It is evidently the opinion of this wise man that by far the greater number of books which had been written, up to his time, deserved only a partial or a cursory reading; and that it was only a small minority that could with advantage be made subjects of study. He would not materially modify his observations if he lived in this age of abundant writing and reading. We have not so many standard works on any important subject, that it would be impossible for one who desires to become fully acquainted with it to master them all, by the expenditure of a moderate amount of time and labour. And such an employment of the mind would undoubtedly tend to consolidate and invigorate its faculties, and enlarge its capability. But modern readers are exposed to the temptation of endeavouring to secure the acquisition of knowledge, even in some very deep and extensive subjects, by means of books written on the "learning made easy" system; books which offer to the mind for the process of swallowing that strong meat which can only nourish by being chewed and digested. Not that they, for the most part, really contain the solid and substantial material which they profess to hold compressed within a narrow compass. It is too often painfully discovered by the reader, after his rapid meal, that he has been feeding upon husks, if not upon ashes. Unhealthiness of mind was, in former times, very commonly produced by intense study bestowed upon matters unworthy of intellectual effort, as exemplified in the subtleties of the ethical and theological schools. It is, in our own age, more frequently the result of a slight and hasty, and superficial examination of matters of supreme importance in philosophy, morals, and religion.

To promote soundness and vigour of mind, measures should be adopted, and habits formed, analogous to those recommended for supplying the body with fresh air, and change of air, and securing to it the advantages of free ventilation. We often, and very intelligibly to all, speak of the "atmosphere" in which a person lives; meaning by the term the moral and intellectual influences to which he is constantly subjected, in the family, or in society. And we as often, and most justly, attribute to these influences the improvement or deterioration of his character. Above all things, it is essential to a good education that the sentiments and principles, the demeanour and habits, of those with whom a child is in daily intercourse, should be such as, by the force of example, and the necessity of conforming to circumstances, may contribute to the repression of the evil, and the development of the good instincts of our nature. These are advantages which it is very difficult to secure; impossible, perhaps, to secure to entire satisfaction. Especially is it found impracticable, in most cases, to select for a child such juvenile associates as may merely do him no harm, to say nothing of such as may promote his progress in intelligence and virtuc. We must be contented, and thankful, if we can effect an approximation to the best state of things, by keeping or placing our children under guardianship which shelters from the assault of the open and grosser forms of evil, and under such a system of association with their fellows as shall ensure the minimum of corrupting communication, and the maximum of respect for the principles of honour, justice, and truth.

It may be considered, in some respects, a counterpoise to the difficulty of preserving the mind in an altogether pure atmosphere, that much good is to be expected from what may be termed mental ventilation. A person who should restrict himself to company and connections in which nothing would occur that is objectionable, or other than edifying, would so limit his sphere of observation, or range of thought, that he would inevitably become narrowminded, prejudiced, illiberal, and uncharitable. A close and secluded habit of life, or system of education, will also produce, in most cases, a morbid reserve and shyness, very unfavourable to progress in practical knowledge, and the development of the moral qualities, and often quite unfitting a man to take his place, and perform his part, on the stage of business and duty. On the other hand, by going into society, and entering into free intercourse with persons of different opinions on all subjects, and of varying shades of character, we can hardly fail to improve in quickness of apprehension, and accuracy of discernment, to acquire a spirit of candour and openness, to attain a facility of recognising truth and goodness wherever they may really exist, and to strengthen ourselves in those convictions which have successfully stood the test of exposure to inquiry, and conflict with their total or partial opposites. But, although the practice of frequenting general and promiscuous society may be recommended, for the purpose of airing the mind, and giving it holiday excursions into various regions of thought and seutiment, it is impossible to insist too strongly upon the importance to its health and soundness of a calm, pure atmosphere at home, and the selection of a limited number of habitual and intimate associates, in whose communications we may be perfectly assured there will be nothing unprofitable or evil.

Our next consideration, taken from the parallel afforded by the body, is that of exercise. Without exercise, the mind cannot be maintained in full possession of all its capabilities for action, or preserve its alertness, watchfulness, and vigour. Mental exercise, however originated or prompted, or on whatever material employed, must consist of independent exertion; the mind must act for itself, and not passively receive impressions. This position may be illustrated by the nature of those occupations of youth while under education which are distinguished from others-from lessons, for example, by the title "exercises." They consist not in the mere observation or discovery of rules, but in the application of them; and they imply a certain amount of construction and invention. First under this head may be recommended meditation upon books, or portions of books, of an instructive kind. which have been recently read; the endeavour to make mentally an analysis of the order and progression of thought, if the subject admits of it; reflections upon the information given, or incidents related; the connection of them with facts or events of a similar description; the consideration of the principles enunciated or involved in the statements made; inquiry into the reasonableness of the opinions advanced; self-catechising as to any suggestions that have risen out of what has been read, any inferences that may be drawn, any lessons that may be learned from it. All this is somewhat difficult to the untrained mind. But the habit of keeping a slip of paper in the book, and making brief notes in the course of reading, will greatly facilitate such subsequent operations as have been described. And it is an excellent practice to make a brief summary or abstract, and sometimes a continuous analysis of a work, or of an article in a periodical, on any subject of importance, or in which for any reason a deep interest is taken.

Learning by heart is of the nature of mental exercise; requiring, of course, greater effort than reading; and is of much use in assisting the mind to fix its attention on the ideas supplied to it, to appropriate them, to ruminate upon them, and so to amplify and extend them, and to connect them with others which may be suggested from various quarters.

The readiest and most available mode of exercising the mind, and perhaps the most generally useful, is conversation. Of course the topics best adapted for the purpose are those commonly understood by the term intellectual; but almost any topic will afford active employment to the mind, and will therefore tend to freshen, and strengthen, and improve its powers, in which the interlocutors are really interested, and especially one on which they are thoroughly united, or thoroughly opposed, in opinion. It is rather the continuous and protracted action of the mind than a severe strain upon it that produces the effect desired. But that action must consist in the evolution of successive ideas. and not in the mere repetition of one or two in the same words, which is too often the characteristic of the very earnest talk of the vulgar, or ignorant, or frivolous. Books, again, supply the best occasion and materials for this kind of exercise. There is no better method of examining oneself on a book, or of securing an accurate or well-digested knowledge of its contents, or a just appreciation of its value, than the discussion of it with a companion of intelligent and congenial mind. And the process is emineutly conducive to the invigoration of the faculties thus brought into operation-memory, attention, reflection, judgment. The discussion-classes which are frequently attached to reading-rooms, Mechanics' Institutés, and literary associations of various kinds, afford excellent opportunities for putting the mind under this discipline and training. Judiciously regulated as to choice of subjects, and judiciously conducted by an experienced chairman acting as moderator, such a class becomes an intellectual gymnasium, in which persons of ordinary intelligence and education may be sure to profit by the development and direction of their mental energies, and may also learn something of the art of their management and control.

Writing is essential to complete satisfactorily the course of exercise through which the mind should be passing continually. "Reading," says Lord Bacon, in his well known essay, "makes a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man." Writing serves to concentrate and consolidate thought, to regulate and render accurate its expression, and is at the same time the surest test and most effectual promoter of mental digestion. Few, however, it is to be feared, who have passed the ordinary educational age, or who are not employed in literary or professional pursuits, will take the trouble habitually to commit to writing their ideas upon the subjects which may come under their notice, even when they feel a deep interest in them. But all moderately welleducated persons might, in some degree, exercise their minds in writing, without any amount of severe application, by the practice of keeping a common-place book, in which to enter, not only extracts from books, or the sayings and communications of others, but also their own thoughts on passing events or topics, their criticisms on the works they have lately read, their recollections of impressions made upon them by persons, scenery, or productions of art. Nor is ordinary letterwriting to be despised as a means of mental exercise. A person who keeps up an extensive correspondence, or an active correspondence with several intimate friends, cannot fail to derive considerable benefit from the practice, provided the subjects of inter-communication are not of an absolutely unintellectual or frivolous character. The remarkable energy of many female minds, and the power of accurate and forcible description so often observable in women, are probably due to the fact that the habit of writing long letters is more prevalent among them than among the male sex. At the same time, our young ladies, and all others, require to be seriously admonished that the good effect of the habit is entirely neutralised, and indeed the mind enervated, if their letters, however long and numerous, consist principally of the effusions of morbid sentimentalism, or if they are written with that carelessness of composition with which we are too often familiar under its significant title of "slip-shod."

It is very important to secure the combination of mental aliment and mental exercitation. The salutary result of each, as in the case of the body, depends upon this combination, and upon the due proportion of each to the other in which it is maintained. Coustant reading and learning, without frequent intervals of pure meditation, continuous and self-sustained thought, without conversation, and without writing, or in some way making application of the knowledge gained, is to the mind what feeding without exercise is to the body. And it must produce mental repletion and indigestion. The mere student, or bookworm, becomes incapable of profiting by the mass of facts or truths with which his memory is loaded, or of employing it in any way for the benefit of others. On the other hand, there are those whose unhealthiness. and weakness, and uselessness of mind results from exercise without feeding; a practice which would produce similar effects upon the body. We frequently meet with persons who talk incessantly and volubly, and with some who scribble letter after letter, and even book after book, but who are truly said, in current and expressive phraseology, to "have nothing in them." Not having, for want of capability, or patience, or humility, or opportunity, possessed themselves of a stock of solid and well-arranged knowledge, they are destitute of mental stamina; their conversation and compositions are characterised by absence of matter, poverty of thought, and feebleness of expression.

Our observation of the defects arising from a disproportion in the employment of the receptive and communicative functions of the mind has an obvious bearing upon plans and systems of education. The work of education will be only half performed if it be limited to teaching. It must consist in an equal degree of training. The youthful mind must not only be stored with information, but it must be subjected to discipline. It must be abundantly instructed—furnished with supplies of knowledge—but it must also be constantly impelled to active exertion, that it may really be improved by its acquirements, and become capable of employing them for the benefit of the individual and of society. The same remark applies to moral as well as intellectual culture. It is not enough to teach children and young people their duty, to inculcate upon them, and make them learn and understand, righteous principles and precepts, but attention must be given to their actual conduct, and every opportunity seized, and often opportunities created, for encouraging and facilitating their practice of the moral and religious lessons which they have been taught. In a word, to ensure the healthy growth of the mind in wisdom and in virtue, it must be exercised as well as fed.

On the other hand, it is most necessary to beware of the error, to which we are perhaps peculiarly liable in our time, of exacting premature or too violent exercise-exercise for which the mind has not been sufficiently prepared by abundant and nutritious food. It was at one time said of a celebrated University, the students of which usually entered upon their course, as now, at a very early age, that one could hardly find an undergraduate who was not an author. Far better would it have been for the undergraduates, for society, and the credit of the University if, like the disciples of the Grecian sage, they had been required only to listen and learn, and not allowed even to ask a question, while in statu pupillari. Children are too frequently encouraged by fond parents and mistaken teachers, in unlimited garrulity, and in asking questions on the subjects of their lessons, upon the supposition that these practices conduce to quicken and enlarge their intelligence. But their general effect is to make education desultory and superficial, to give children a dislike for their ordinary intellectual aliment, and to render them conceited, forward, and intractable. Nor, in the moral and religious education of our children, can we expect success, if we rely too exclusively upon the formation of habits, or the excitement of feeling. Extraordinary activity and developments are sometimes witnessed in childhood, which are, after all, due principally to its imitative faculty, and in most cases amount to nothing more than playing at goodness and religion. It is by no means an established fact that these phenomena, whether spontaneous or artificially produced, usually terminate in permanent or progressive excellence of character. In all cases, and especially in such as these, it is of the utmost importance to lay a deep foundation of knowledge and principle. To continue the use of the parallel of the body, the youthful mind must be well fed with facts and truths; care must be taken that it be constantly nourished with all that forms the subject of elementary instruction in morality and religion. Such mental and spiritual nutriment should be provided as may be suitable to the assimilative and digestive powers of the individual system, from the "sincere milk" to the "strong meat of the word" of external nature, the word of conscience, the word of reason, and the word of revelation. If this be done, and the aliment of the soul thus provided be administered in regular meals with due attention to quantity, quality, and variety, so that the appetite may not be clogged, nor the relish impaired, we may expect that the constitution of the inner man will be so established and strengthened, that it may, without danger, or even with profit, be subjected to the test of exercise, exposed to the trial of practical endurance and exertion in the performance of personal, domestic, and social duty.

Our analogy next leads us to the consideration of the clothing of the mind. We clothe our bodies when we are prepared to go forth into the society of our fellow creatures. We have our ordinary dress for our every-day life, appropriate dresses for particular employments, occasions, and company. That by which we present or exhibit ourselves to others as rational and spiritual beings, by which we assume a certain character as absolutely our own, or in relation to those with whom we associate, corresponds to bodily clothing. Manners-our behaviour in speech and action-must be regarded as the dress of the mind. This connection of ideas is indicated by some forms of human speech. Thus the Latin word in common use for character, mores, means also, and originally, "manners," the way or wont of deporting himself which a person generally assumes; the substance and the form, the inward and moral and the outward and visible, being expressed by the same term. Again, habitus, haviour, holding, deportment of body, came to signify "quality," and character, in an intellectual and moral sense, and was also in use for "dress," especially of a distinguishing kind. Hence, in our own language, habit signifies dress, as well as custom or usage appropriately belonging to, or voluntarily adopted by, an individual or a class. We may advantageously be guided by this observed similitude in our notice of manners as affecting healthiness or well-being of the mind. "Men's behaviour," says Lord Bacon, "should be like their dress, not too strait or point device, but free for exercise and motion." Stiffness of manner, whether it take the form of reserve and closeness, arising from self-esteem and a sense of superiority, or of shyness, caused by self-distrust or over sensitiveness, prevents a person from fully enjoying the benefits of social intercourse, and a genial interchange of sentiment and feeling. His restraint in looks, speech, and movements, hinders the exhibition of his own sympathies, if it be not a symptom of his possessing none, and effectually checks the exercise of those of others, not only towards himself, but often towards all with whom he is in company. The opposite error of excessive openness and freedom of manner is another exhibition of selflove; or, if not, it is a symptom of weakness. And, although the unreserved and affable are most agreeable in themselves, and set at ease all who converse with them, the extreme of such a character, those who are utterly without reticence, who talk unrestrainedly and carelessly about themselves and others and upon subjects of all kinds, are both personally odious, and create embarrassment and alarm in every company into which they enter. It is impossible to respect them, or indeed not to be ashamed of them, as one is of a woman in loose and insufficient, or of a man in coarse and slovenly, attire.

With the fop, or dandy, or the excessively punctilious of either sex in the material, workmanship, and arrangement of costume, we may compare those who evidently court distinction by excessive refinement of diction and utterance, by fastidiousness of sentiment, and by strained and affected courtesy. Persons of such manners by nature are, necessarily, both conceited and of inferior intellect; but the assumption of these forms of behaviour in youth, a too frequent occurrence, spoils many a good understanding by occupying it with trifles, and many a good disposition by perverting, or confusing the apprehension of what is right or wrong, noble or mean, praiseworthy or censurable. Allied to this character is that of those who, like the slaves of fashion in dress, adopt the tones and accents, modes of utterance and pronunciation and phraseology, which may happen to be in vogue among certain classes in society. They conform at once to any personal or domestic habit the example of which may have been given by those whom they deem to possess high authority. Their tastes, sentiments, and even creed, are assumed, and continually modified, not upon conviction, but in deference to the approved models of the day, the imitation of which, essentially a vulgarity, appears to them to be a reflued distinction. Such persons are usually indebted to some particular oracle-a review, or magazine, or newspaper-for their existing phases of opinion, and modes of expression. Their mental attire, in material, pattern, and arrangement, is regulated from time to time by the announcements of these their literary or theological tailors and milliners. Minds of this order are not in a sound state. A man may be a fop, or a woman a votary of fashion, without injury to the body; but affectation and servile imitation are symptoms of a weak or diseased mind.

Lastly, cleanliness is as essential to the health of the mind as to that of the body. The right and vigorous action of the intellectual and spiritual functions, as well as the corporeal, is impeded by the presence, and may be destroyed by the accretion, of foulness and impurity. And it is necessary for us, as in the case of the body, to be on our guard against defilement from without, by contact with that which is base or vile in the conduct or communication of those with whom we necessarily have to do, and also against defilement from within, by the exudations from the passions and propensities of our common and fallen humanity. Purity must be scrupulously maintained in thought and feeling. Delicacy of the moral sense must be carefully cultivated and cherished, in our education of youth, in our management of ourselves. Whatever is offensive to its most refined perceptions must be repelled, or immediately removed. The Great Teacher has told us what are "the things which defile a man," and, moreover, has warned us that these uaturally proceed "out of the heart of man." Gross and sensual imaginations; sordid, mean, and dishonourable desires or intentions; selfish principles and motives; envy, jealousy, suspicion, uncharitableness, whether suggested by the language and example of others, or emanations from innate corruption, are equally to be abhorred as uncleanness of the soul. Some or other of these are perpetually rising from the depths to the surface of our consciousness, or are forced and impressed upon it from without; and if allowed to remain and accumulate will be absorbed into the system, and originate moral disease, or at least render the whole mind and spirit readily susceptible of infection.

It is not, however, sufficient to rid ourselves of every foulness to which our nature is liable, as soon as it is contracted. He is not a clean man who only washes when he is perceptibly dirty. constant habit of self-purification, a daily process of moral and spiritual ablution, is necessary to preserve the cleanliness of the soul. We have insisted on the importance to the bodily health of a total and energetic washing with water every morning and evening. More than equally important to the purity, and therefore to the health, of the soul is morning and evening prayer; - prayer, sincere and earnest (it need not be long), offered in the name of the Lord Jesus, with simple trust in Him, consisting of free and full confession, with supplication for pardon for the past and grace for the future. Such prayer, followed as it is sure to be by perfect absolution and remission, and the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, is the most effectual preservative of the soul against the outbreaks of a corrupt nature, and the contaminating influences of an evil world. One so washed is "clean every whit." To him thus made pure, "all things are pure." But he will not for that reason-rather, for that very reason he cannot -forego, after the labours and varied associations and contacts of the day, his bath of evening prayer. His very purity renders him sensitive to the presence of the slightest stain of sin, and apprehensive of every possible danger of defilement; but independently of consciousness or fear of guilt, his mere love of cleanliness will impel him to seek the refreshing streams that flow from the fountain open to all the household of faith, and ever accessible by

We cannot better conclude our counsels for the daily regimen of the mind with a view to its preservation in spiritual health and vigour, than in the rules given by the saintly George Herbert:—

"Sum up at night what thou hast done by day,
And in the morning what thou hast to do;
Dress and undress thy soul; mark the decay
And growth of it; if with thy watch that too
Be down, then wind up both: since we shall be Most surely judged, make thy accounts agree."

The condition of body and mind which it should be our constant desire and endeavour to secure is vividly represented in the affectionate and fervent prayer offered by the venerable Apostle John for his beloved friend Gaius, "Beloved, I wish (pray) above all things that thou mayest prosper, and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth." The Apostle prayed that his friend's spiritual prosperity might be the standard and measure of his temporal well-being and bodily health. Possessed of the gift of the discernment of spirits, he was well assured that Gaius was growing in grace, strengthened for every good work, vigorously and successfully making progress in the way to heaven; and in this confidence he petitioned that he might receive proportionate earthly blessings, -a happy course and issue in all his undertakings, and especially, continual and increasing health and strength of body.

The Apostle's prayer corroborates the position maintained in the introduction of our subject,—that earthly good, and above all things health, the chief earthly good, may be consistently desired, pursued, prayed for by the true Christian. But it also subordinates temporal to spiritual blessings, and supplies a powerful and accurate test for the purpose of self-examination.

Is the reader of these observations prepared to accept the letter of the Apostle as addressed to himself? Will he acquiesce in and adopt the petition and abide by its results, that his success in life, and his health of body, may be in exact proportion to the prosperity and health of his soul? If this prayer were offered and answered, in all our assemblies of Christian worshippers, how many would return to their homes in the enjoyment of robust and confirmed and joyous health, and how many in a state of infirmity, sickness, and decay, suffering from "divers diseases," and in immediate danger of perishing by "sundry kinds of death"? But why should we have reason to fear, for ourselves or our brethren, the worst of these alternatives? Inward and spiritual can be more certainly secured than outward and temporal good; health of mind and soul, more certainly than health of body. Even the prayer of an Apostle for the bodily health of a friend - and such a friend as Trophimus, or Timothy-or for his own bodily health, as in the case of St. Paul's thrice-repeated petition for the removal of the "thorn in the flesh," may not be granted; but the supply of the life-giving Spirit for the recovery and maintenance and increase of spiritual health, and growth in grace, will never be denied to the supplication of the humblest believer. Encouraged as we are to make everything a subject of prayer, we are never sure that it is the will of God to grant continuance of health, recovery from sickness, or prolongation of life in answer to prayer; but we are quite sure that it is His will to bestow every grace and every blessing that is essential to the well-being and salvation of the soul. Of the two classes of God's good gifts the more valuable is guaranteed to us by absolute promises. It is unquestionably with reference to spiritual blessings that our Divine Master uttered the reiterated invitations, and the thrice-repeated, and again thrice-repeated assurances, "Ask and ye shall have, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be open to you: for every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." At the same time, so great is His mercy, so free and open His bountiful hand, that even by the pursuit and acquisition of the lesser good we may obtain possession of the greater. After the example of those who came to Him for the cure of bodily disease, and found healing and life for the soul, we may hope that many who, impelled, perhaps, in the first instance, by danger or fear, have sought the renewal or continuance of the health of the body in earnest prayer, who have enjoyed the blessing when granted in heartfelt thankfulness, and have employed it consciously and conscientiously, for the purpose for which it has been given, are recognised by Him as "not far from the kingdom of God," and will receive from Him the fulness of His grace enabling them to pray to Him and trust in Him for the gift of that life spiritual which is life eternal, and to glorify Him by the dedication of both body and mind to his service.

W. F. WILKINSON.

PROFESSORS AND STUDENTS AT THE REFORMATION.

"THOU art called Paulus; therefore I admonish thee, that thou study constantly to follow the example of Paul, and to defend the doctrine which Paul hath handed down." Luther spoke with warmth, and with unusual solemnity. It was on St. Martin's Eve, the year before he died, and the guests at his table were the chief Wittenberg theologians. The conversation had taken a peculiar turn, tinged with much foreboding and anxiety about the struggles of the immediate future, and Luther had begun to predict the schism that would follow his death. There would be little danger while he lived: but there was the Council of Trent, and Loyola marshalling his Jesuits, and the Smalcald war was brewing; "Pray therefore," he broke out, "pray fervently after my death." Then turning abruptly round, he delivered himself of the above solemn charge. The person he addressed was by appearance the least likely to be singled out. He was crippled, almost a dwarf, shy and nervous, with delicate sensitive features, not unlike the description of his leader before the Diet of Worms, "so emaciated by care and study, that you might count every bone in his body." He shrunk back from the words among his fellow guests; yet Paul Eber was an ornament of his university, when Luther and Melanchthon were professors.

He was the son of a tailor in Bavarian Kitzingen, but his biographers are careful to say, a tailor of good family; a gentility that is surely superfluous, when his greatest contemporary was a miner's son, and another-of some pretensions to fame-was a cobbler in Nuremberg. Returning one vacation from school, a good-natured butcher gave the tired lad a mount upon his horse, and the horse, running off, dragged young Eber by the stirrup for more than a mile. The disaster was kept secret at home, an illness ensued, and the scholar was left a misshapen cripple for life. Finding him thus debarred from other professions, his father decided on the Church, which the family councils of the time usually left open for a case of desperate emergency; and as soon as he was able, he entered at the gymnasium of St. Lawrence in Nuremberg. Luther had just blown one of those shrill blasts that wakened Germany. His appeal for Christian schools to the town councillors of the land, had thrown the cities into a ferment. "What have we learnt in the High School and Cloister till now," he cried, "but to be asses and blockheads? Men have learnt for twenty, ay, forty years, without knowing either Latin or German . . . The prosperity of a city does not depend on the treasury you gather into it, nor on the strength of the walls, the stateliness of the houses, the guns and swords. Though you have much of all these, if you have fools over and above, the town will go down. The truest prosperity of a town, its real safety and strength, lie in its having many wise, honourable, and well-educated citizens. These you can neither build of stone, nor hew of wood, nor will they grow of themselves; for God will do no wonders as long as men may use His own offered means . . . If men say, We must have schools, but why should we teach Latin, Greek, and Hebrew? can we not teach the Bible in plain German, and what more is nceded for salvation? then, I answer, Were there no other use in the study of languages, we should rejoice abundantly in knowing that it is such a noble and rare gift of God, wherewith He has so graciously visited and enriched us Germans above all other people. . . Let us say finally, that we are not likely to hold the Gospel without study of the tongues. The tongues are the sheath wherein this knife of the Spirit is sheathed. They are the casket wherein this jewel is shrined. They are the vessel wherein this drink is stored. And as the Gospel shows, they are the basket that holds the loaves, fishes, and crumbs. If we let the study of languages decay, we shall not only lose the Gospel, but it will come to this, that we shall not be able to speak or write either Latin or German." And other plain, and righteous, and fiery words he printed, that net the restless enthusiasm for knowledge already springing up, and baptised it with a holier purpose, and kindled it in far-off places, and made glad the hearts of some old Simeons among the schoolmasters—like Hermann of Joachimsthaland sowed the seeds of truth in more than one Reformer. Nuremberg was one of the first cities to respond. In two years it had completed its High School, which Melanchthon opened, and where the brilliant Camerarius, then only twenty-seven, was a professor. And there Eber achieved the highest repute, was supported by the Nuremberg burghers against "his enemy, poverty;" and when his father "could not give him a penny," was sent, by the help of Nuremberg bursaries, to the goal of his ambition, the University of Wittenberg.

Eber was more fortunate in his passage through the schools than many of his contemporaries. Before the Reformation, a school in Germany was rather a place of punishment than education. was the worst house in the town; the walls and floors were filthy; wind, rain, and snow beat in through the doorways and unglazed window-spaces; the children were covered with vermin, and halfnaked. There were few books, and the scholar had frequently to write out his own copy. The Latin was monkish and barbarous; the grammar no better: the teacher often worse than either. There was no system, but a scramble for learning, where the strongest came off best. A lad was often twenty before he understood his grammar, or could speak a word or two of such Latin as was then in vogue; "and which is as different from ours," writes a schoolmaster in 1560, "as the rumbling of wheels from the sweetest organ." The elder boys, or Bacchanten, tyrannized over the younger, or Schutzen, -an elaborate and cruel system of fagging. A Bacchant would have three or four fags, who begged and stole for him, though they were sometimes so hungry themselves that they would fight with the dogs for a bone. The Bacchant claimed all their earnings, and compelled them to give up even what had been bestowed on them for their own use. Singing salves and requiems, whimpering false stories to the tradesmen's wives, thieving if there was a chance, sleeping in winter on the school hearth and in summer in the churchyard, "like pigs in straw;" assisting at mass, chanting the responsoria, frozen in the cold churches till they were crippled, trying to get by heart a clumsy Latin syntax, and wandering, vagabond like, from school to school, would sum up the life of thousands of scholars. Their constant occupation was singing, so constant that it scarce left time for anything else. "When they were sufficiently tortured in the school, and frozen in the church," says old Nicholas Hermann, "they were driven out in all weathers to sing in the street;" and the only hymns they sang were to the Virgin and the saints.

One Thomas Platter, a Swiss from the Valley of the Visp, and who ended his days as rector of a Latin school at Basle, has left in his autobiography a most vivid picture of these miseries. "In Dresden there was no good school; and the rooms for strange scholars were full of lice, so that we heard them at night crawl in the straw. . . The city of Breslau has seven parishes, and each has its school.

No scholar of one parish dared sing in another; if he did, the cry of Ad idem, Ad idem was raised. and the Schutzen assembled and fought. It is said there were at the time thousands of Bacchanten and Schutzen who all lived on alms; it is also said that some of the Bacchanten who were twenty or thirty years old or more, had their Schutzen who supported them. I have often of an evening carried home to the school where they lived, five or six meals for my Bacchanten. . . In the school of St. Elisabeth, niue bachelors always read together at the same hour in one room: for there were no printed Greek books in the country at that time: the preceptor alone had a printed Terence: what was read therefore had first to be dictated, then parsed and construed, and lastly explained; so that the Bacchanten, when they went away, carried with them large sheets of writing." At Strasbourg, it being at the time of the Diet of Worms, the learning of languages was gaining ground, and Sapidus presided over his nine hundred students with some order and dignity. But Platter does not say much more of him than that he amused himself after the fashion of the time by latinizing the barbarous names of the country lads; and that there was a bachelor with him "who plagued the Bacchanten so grievously with the Donat, * that I thought it must be such a good book I had better learn it by heart." At Einsiedeln he found that other reforms than in languages were penetrating the schools; for Myconius, the master, "read the Holy Scriptures, and to these readings many of the laity came." To Einsiedeln also belongs a curious story in which Zwingle appears. "As custos I had often not enough wood to burn in the school, so I observed which of the laymen who came to it had piles of wood in front of their houses; there I went about midnight and secretly carried off wood to the school. One morning I had no wood; Zwingle was to preach at the monastery early that morning, and when they were ringing the bells I said to myself 'Thou hast no wood, and there are so many images in the church that no one cares about them.' So I went to the nearest altar in the church and carried off a St. John, and took him to the stove in the school, and said to him 'Jogli, now thou must bend and go into the stove.' When he began to burn, the paint made a great hissing and crackling, and I told him to keep quiet, and said, 'If thou movest, which however thou wilt not do. I will close the door of the stove: thou shalt not get out unless the devil carry thee away.' Myconius said to me in the course of the lesson, 'Custos, you have had good wood to-day.' When we were beginning to chant the mass, two Pfaffs were disputing together in the church, and the one to whom the St. John belonged said to the other, 'You rogue, you have stolen my St. John;' and this dispute they carried on for some time."+

crowded to the university, it was but natural that the students should be rude and often violent. Their corporations bound them under demoralizing rules and customs; their vagabond habits and freedom from restraint bred in them a reckless and adventurous lawlessuess; and the vast numbers resident in one place helped them to be defiant and powerful. At Paris, Luther says, with some exaggeration, no doubt, there were over 20,000 students, "and the theologians there have the pleasantest spot in the whole city, having a street to themselves, with a gate to each end." The education had sunk to the lowest point of the scholastic tradition, and had lost whatever strength and mental discipline the scholastic theology possessed. Up till the sixteenth century all that could be learnt was theology, medicine and law, with Latin, and rarely Greek. It was only then that, with the classical revival, the study of the ancient languages began to find a place; and mathematics, music, history, geography, and poetry followed. Much time was still spent in disputation, useful enough once in helping to awaken thought that the rigid authority of the Church had oppressed, but that had degenerated into mere dexterous play of words and hair-splitting of logical subtleties. The Doctor fought for his degree by "sitting a whole day, and disputing with every comer, from six in the morning till six in the evening." Masters of Arts disputed every Saturday, the Bachelors on Sunday; general studentdom once a month, and every academic honour had its celebration. "They dispute," wrote Vives, in 1531, "before dinner, at dinner, after dinner; publicly and privately; in every place, and at any hour." And so late as 1580 it was declared in ecclesiastical ordinances that more could be learnt by one disputation than by twenty lectures. Yet "they bawl," said Luther, "like drunken peasants, so that the auditors are obliged to stamp them into silence with their feet."

At Wittenberg and in Eber's time the student life was some way mended. Wittenberg was a new university, founded only in 1502, and confirmed by papal bull, to the uttermost confusion, as it turned out, of the papal power, which sought in vain to quench the light that it had incontinently kindled. It was one of those featureless places that have often become the theatres of great events. Rescued from commonplace only by the Reformation, the flat wide banks of the Elbe, the bare and ragged fields, the thin trees buffetted by the unbroken winds, the low horizon, inspire no interest. The very men whose names are identified with its greatness were surprised that it was pitched on for a university. Few students frequented it at first; and before it drew many, the Reformation had affected student life. Luther's name, moreover, inspired great respect, and the students would bend down as he entered the classroom. Yet orchards were robbed, doors broken open, houses roughly entered and the inmates insulted. Men swaggered about with arms, brawled and grew drunken, fought duels in the public street, acted "like beasts" at the funerals of their teachers, and committed scenes that "the heathen would have shrunk from." The rector of the university was stabbed by a student in 1512, and Melanchthon narrowly escaped the same fate a little more than forty years after. Eber himself when he came to be rector closed one of his appeals with the sharp words, Haec fulmina coerceant ferocium impetus, ut modestius vivant! But the great trouble of the time was the tailor. Academic edicts sought in vain to fix the proprieties of dress. If the senate forbade short clothes the students wore them wide: if high hats were abolished, the broadest brims obstructed the streets. Tailors were at war with learning, and were supposed to be actuated by the devil. Small clothes were held to be immodest; and the baggy pantaloons that followed were so much worse that the tailor who made, and the student who wore them were fined ten gulden a-piece. The dress was certainly extravagant. When one of Eber's pupils died, his new Holofernes hat was sold for sixty groschen, and paid the expenses of the funeral. But the extravagance of the censors must have been as great, when Musculus put forth a philippic against the Trowsersdevil. If such clothes should be worn, he cried, it would not surprise him that the sun should never rise, nor the earth bear fruit, or the last day come. They "were an offence to God, the blessed angels, and all pious folk." Even the devil could not bear them; for "not long ago a Christian man bespoke a picture in which the artist was to paint the horrors of the judgment day, and to make the devil especially terrible. Whereupon he painted Satan in those wide trousers that our students wear. And the devil, taking offence, did come, and strike the painter hotly on the cheek, and vowed that he had done him wrong, for he had never looked so ill as in those baggy trousers." Nevertheless Musculus maintained that the devil was in the trousers, and was a stubborn and presumptuous devil, not to be cast out unless by arm of the civil magistrate. Nor does even this functionary seem to have succeeded in curbing liberties that our modern Teufelsdrockh deems manifestly sacred; for, soon after, buttons were worn as large as children's heads; and linen collars were sewed to shirts: an innovation that was met in many quarters by the prayer that God would restore the generation to a sound mind.

Such questions were warmly agitated when young Eber, made shy and sensitive by his deformity, found his way to Wittenberg: but other questions possessed a deeper interest for him, for the motley crowd of students was stirred by the bold, earnest, revolutionary words of one man. Luther's repute had raised the number of students from hundreds to thousands.* They poured in from all countries, so that there were French, Spanish, Italian, English, Scotch, and even Huns and Scythians. Melanch-

thon wrote one day to Menius that "he had had eleven languages to dine, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, German, Hungarian, Sarmatian, Turkish, Arabic, modern Greek, Indian, and Spanish." Luther's fiery sermons in the town church, and his lectures in the old Augustinian convent were moulding them all: and though Melanchthon's classical enthusiasm, transparent exegesis and mild wisdom were only less attractive, the impulse came from the stronger man. When the greatest questions in theology were in debate, and the whole structure of society was in process of rebuilding, it was Luther that swaved this world of fresh young thinkers as one man had never swayed such world before. Men studied for ten or twelve years, and even eighteen. Friendships were formed that brightened the rest of life. "When I see one of that old time," Eber wrote two years before his death, "I am like Demea in Terence at sight of Hegio." Living was so cheap that a hare could be had for 2d., and a salmon for 10d.; mutton and venison for a halfpenny the pound, and pork for three farthings; and a student might have board and lodging with a tutor for 3l. The fees were proportionately small, ranging from 5d. to 1s. 3d. Professors of theology had a salary of from 15l. to 18l.; of Hebrew and Greek, 9l.; and the scale ranged down to 3L In other universities theology had 71., and medicine between 31. and 41.* But if the fees were small, the number of the students was great: and the professors had other ways of eking out their incomes. dedication of a book was paid back in a substantial present to the author; and the theologian often became a pastor in the town. As minister in Wittenberg Eber had 181., and 50 bushels of rye. Melanchthon also sent him boarders, for whose expenses rules were laid down by electoral edict: not always a happy way of increasing his means, especially if the parents expected, as one, indeed, wrote to him, that he would direct his boy's studies, keep a constant watch over his conduct, take him as much as possible to be alone with him, and procure him private lessons towards his own support. And the relation the learned men bore to princes was a source of irregular help. Presents of wine came almost yearly that were worth the salary of a minor professor; largess of a hundred or three hundred crowns; gold and silver cups made by cunning artists; and more perishable venison. Sometimes the professors were invited to spend a festival at the Elector's castle, or with genial scientific Duke Albert: and they seldom left emptyhanded. With the students their relation was frank, intimate, and homely. Many of the students sat at their tables listening to their conversation with the famous men who were constantly visiting the town. When the lecture was over, the professor remained close by the hall to answer such questions as a student might put to him. He was helper as well as teacher, and something of a family tie bound them together. He would ask for their prayers on his marriage; they would consult him about their books and their friends.

Entering this university life, and kept by his misfortune from much idle fellowship, Eber studied to such purpose that in four years he was allowed to take his Master's degree. He had learnt to know most of the professors: to have his reverence for Luther deepened by intercourse, and to love Melanchthon. An offer of a travelling tutórship was made to him, and declined after some struggle with himself-for it fell in with that longing to see the world that he felt with all the keenness of his age, and held out the hope of a residence at foreign universities. But though he "would make experiment of riding to his friends after Easter," he shrunk from horseback, and still more from the aversion that the sight of his dwarfed figure might rouse in strangers. He clung to Wittenberg, where he took out his Doctor's degree in 1559. We learn nothing of the ceremonies beyond the disputation and the "brilliant banquet," which was given in the parsonage, and to which a present of wine from his native Kitzingen pleasantly contributed. It was commonly a stately and curious festival. At Bourges, in France, the Doctor had a net put into his hand. Even before Masters of Arts, torches were borne through the streets: but the Doctor, specially dressed, paraded the town on horseback; and in the next century he was addressed as Excellence. The degree was of so much honour that it was seldom given: Calixtus affirmed that in Königsberg it had not been more than thrice bestowed from the foundation of the university. At Jena there was disputation and sermon, and a gilded cup to the President of the Faculty, and for every stroke of the bell that pealed the ceremony from the great clock-tower the candidate paid 9d. Each professor handled him in turn: the examination lasted for days, steadily increased in severity, and wound up with a learned harangue for which only a quarter of an hour was given to prepare; with also about 151. to pay. On the day of the promotion the bells were rung, wax candles lighted, and princes, and people of the Court, and the magistrates took their seats as spectators.

The taking of his degree was Eber's passage into the theological faculty; for he had already served with distinction as a professor. Nor was there anything so remarkable about him as his command of the most various learning, and his skill to teach widely different subjects. He began by reading Pliny; and we find him investigating specimens of ore that Matthesius had sent from Joachimsthal, and making excursions into the mining districts. Hesiod and Plutarch, Cicero and Ovid and Proclus, followed. The Dioscorides suggested to him a course of popular lectures on botany, for he "thought it a shame that men did not know the names of what they ate, nor of the wayside flowers." In Melanchthon's absence he read dialectics and catechetics, and was appointed Professor of Hebrew in Forster's place. His idea of exegesis was large and profound. Instead of mere grammatical exposition, he would seize the historical spirit and bearing of the whole book; and in this temper he read Proverbs, Isaiah, the Gospels, and the Acts, and finished Melanchthon's Lectures on the Romans. This was his work in the class-room; but he had also work at the press. He wrote a History of the Jews, a Historical Calendar, a Natural History, an Exposition of the Sacrament of the Supper, a Commentary on the Psalms, and a Latin-German Bible. The most popular was the Calendar; the most laborious was the Bible. translate the Bible back again indeed from Luther's German into Latin was more a scholarly toil than a public gain; but it was scholarly performed and miserably rewarded. He preached for thirteen years in one of the town churches, became a general superintendent, and examined 925 candidates for the ministry. He was rector of his university, and therefore burdened with the most serious charge of near 3000 students, with the order and teaching, and with a thousand questions of detail. Books were submitted to him by untried authors, and faithfully read before he pronounced his opinion: his good-nature was even taxed to see them through the press, or to hurry a dilatory printer. Besides all this, he flung himself into the controversies of his age with a vigour and sharpness that made him a dangerous opponent, and drew upon him a cloud of adversaries. He was the champion whom, next to Luther, men dreaded most. Yet his temper leant to peace. If two ministers fell'out, or an ecclesiastical strife rose among the clergy, it was Eber that was sent for to reconcile them: it was such a journey that cost him his life.

Life was on a large scale then; and men undertook and accomplished more than would be thought possible now. They were acting under the pressure of a great need, and stirred by the most wonderful thoughts. It is after making allowance for this, that Eber's life stands out so conspicuous for its amount of labour. It was not even the uninterrupted work of a student that he did; for the plague that was moving restlessly through Europe smote Wittenberg three times, and war raged round the town, and there were times when the university was either closed or forced to migrate. The situation was one of extreme anxiety, and the graphic picture Eber drew of Wittenberg after the Battle of Mühlberg truthfully presents it. "Yesterday," he wrote to Melanchthon, "between four and five of the afternoon, our cavalry was routed at Mühlberg. About the first hour of the night they arrived before the town. Our people feared a hostile attack, and armed themselves. Sentinels were placed upon the walls, until by the glimmer of the dawn we saw that the troops were our own, when we let them in through the gate, and heard from their own lips that the rout was complete. The two young Electoral Princes have come back, and Duke Otto of Brunswick, but our pious and sorely-afflicted Sovereign, the Elector, is missing. Some will have it that he is a prisoner, but most of us hope for his happy return. May God, the everlasting Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, restore him to us unhurt! I cannot tell you what disturbance, anxiety, and mourning, reign in the whole town; how sad the looks of those that have escaped; how openly men speak of carelessness, foolish security, and treachery. I congratulate you and our colleagues that you are so far from these perils. As for me, pressed down by anxiety, I must hold on, and wait here what the Father in heaven, our gracious God, will send. I know that He has charge of me, that He loves me. I hold that fast; though the enemy should rush in and draw his knife across my throat, or murder my children before my eyes. Moreover, the sun seems to prophesy evil and to sorrow with us: for these last three days he has shone with a steady blood-red glare, and the sky has been veiled in mourning, as if it suffered and sighed with our-selves." The letter is mournfully dated "On the day of the capture of Troy;" for Eber was not free from the superstition of his age, which sought an omen in every coincidence. An eclipse of the moon which followed a change of rectors, and was longer than the almanack had predicted—the flooding of the Elbe or the Pegnitz-a double sun, or any unusual phenomenon in nature, excited the liveliest apprehensions. Poet Fincelius wrote that there had been seen in the heavens a grave veiled with a black cloth, and over which floated a cross; and Eber agreed with him it must signify the plague. Pastor Keyser informed him that a peasant in his parish had cut a loaf till the blood poured out; and the more he cut, the more it bled. Eber replied in terror: he had no doubt it signified "our punishment for our sins, the pouring out of blood through Turks, Muscovites, and others, our enemies. Since the rude world so shamefully misuses the bread, that is, the gift of God, and tramples under foot the heavenly bread, God will mingle our bread with blood; and since it befel a peasant, it is the nobles that are threatened, who draw their income from the peasants, and grind them down by un-Christian behaviour." When the comet of 1556 appeared, he interrupted his class to tell them that comets. usually foretold great public ill, and that he would give them many illustrations in his next lecture. And when Luther had a cold, "on the same day fearful claps of thunder were heard, and the pavement in the Castle church, where some of the canons lay buried, sunk down at least a span."

The omen was innocent; but at last, unpreceded by omens, Luther died, and Eber's happiest days were over. He could never forget this sorrow: nineteen years after, he wrote to the Margrave, "It was on this day that we brought the body of the hononrable Doctor Martin Luther from Eisleben in the grim cold;" to the last he dated his letters by it.

Almost at the same time, Myconius, the dreamer of the Reformation, sank under sickness; and it was not long till Melanchthon was laid to rest. Eber had been drawn to him most: he wrote as good a hand as Melanchthon's was bad, and did much secretary's work for him; he was known among the students as Philip's faithful Achates; he stood by his bedside in the last hour, prayed "beautifully" and comforted him; and "we all knelt down together," says an eyewitness, "and prayed with him:" with an aching heart he preached his funeral sermon. He had already announced the death of Cruciger to his absent colleagues, and narrated the fearful disputation that the sick man acted in his dream the night before his death. He had seen Luther's wife poor, neglected, deceived, and a wanderer; and he had made arrangements for her funeral. With Luther and Melanchthon gonethe Elijah and Elisha of the Reformation-with the rest falling quickly about him like autumn leaves, Eber fought his way on. Luther's death sounded to his ears the knell of the Reformation; Melanchthon's "would be the ruin of the university." But the students came and listened to younger men; there was as much to do as ever; the Reformation would not be silenced nor stayed; and questions within its pale became more important and absorbing than its relations to the powers without. So Eber fought his fight, with the memories of the past crowding about him like a veil, through which he saw and cared less for the present; fought out his controversies, and preached his sermons, and lectured, and added little touches to his Calendar, and became careless even about his omens-for was not life one vast omen ?-- and did whatever was to be done with a resolute and gallant spirit.

Melanchthon and his circumstances had persuaded him to marry. In the epithalamium that graced his wedding, Helena Küffuerinn, his wife, is described as beautiful, slender, and adorned with every virtue. She was a pious and excellent woman, for whom, after twenty-six years of their life, he says he daily blessed God. It may be taken as a frank opinion, for he confessed himself honestly afraid of the "wrath, pride, imperiousness, loquacity, and quarrelsomeness of the sex." One of his friends says they lived amantissime et suavissime. He is never tired of praising marriage as one of the most blessed of God's ordinances. In the depth of ecclesiastical strife and learning his letters are brightened with the merry laugh of his children and his longing to see them after any absence. As we enter his house we hear him say, Let them come in; we see his pet Timothy springing the first into his father's arms, and Mary "fighting with voice, hands, and whole body" for the same embrace. He had bought a roomy house after much quest and disappointment, and the household, where the Luthers and Melanchthons were the most frequent guests, was one of the happiest in Wittenberg. Numerous pupils were boarded with him, for whom he sometimes advanced money that was never paid. When any of them died, they were wept as sadly almost as if they had been children. He had them painted by Master Lucas Cranach, and sat himself by their bedsides and wrote the tenderest letters of consolation to their homes. His mother-in-law lived with him: and the servants, of whom "two were maids, and one a man," were reckoned of the family. When the cook was married, all the household took part in the two days' festival. They brewed their own beer; and presents of Eber's favourite Silesian cheese, and of wine and venison, helped them to show hospitality. He never tired of telling his children of his native place: when a waggon rattled over the street, they would say, Shall we jump in and ride to Kitzingen? The marriage arrangements were summary in his time, and he managed for his daughter as authoritatively as was no doubt managed for his wife. She had two suitors, to one of whom she had given her heart, and to the other her parents would give her hand. While the first was on a studious journey through Europe, they pressed the claims of the second, and the wedding was celebrated in due time; but not until warning of Eber to the favoured suitor that the old affection had worn away, though if of itself, or in obedience to orders, is not clear. A goodly company was invited; Eber sued on all hands for game and fish to entertain them, "seeing that the great flood had left nothing eatable in the neighbourhood;" there was a festive procession to and from the church: and after the service, Eber accompanied the bride and bridegroom to their home at Zwickau. There, also, he would occasionally bespeak of his daughter. "a soft bed," and "some fastnight cakes."

This is the bright side of his home life; the dark grew dark only with advancing years. One child followed another to the grave, and the most tenderly loved the first, until, out of fourteen, there were left but four. His letters became clouded with heavy sorrows. "We give ourselves up to the will of God," he writes; he tries to think that Timothy "is not far away from us;" he bewails the weakness and impurity of his love. His thoughts pour their sadness into soft and tender hymns. If, with a scholar's fancy, he builds up his wife's name into an acrostic, it is the heart of a weary man that lies under the verses. He surrounded himself with images of death, and became the special poet of the dying. Even Roman Catholic churches sang his heretic hymns on Good Friday, while all the bells were tolling. He had never been strong though he had done a strong man's work; and when he felt his energy sinking, he longed for rest that he might think a little of death before he faced it. For his powers were overtaxed. His house was full of visitors; his brain weary with the endless questions he had to solve; and if the students were less troublesome, the burden of the Wittenberg theology was heavier to bear. And outside, the world seemed hurrying to ruin; the last things, he fancied, must be at hand; the prospects of the Reformation were slowly darkening. At home his wife was ailing of dropsy. "There is nothing to sustain us two weak married folk but the Word of God, and the hope of His help, or of a speedy removal from this world." His wife was taken first; and almost at the same time, two of his children; and he never recovered the blow. He sat at home "as in a hermitage;" he went out only to church; he complained that his friends passed by the house, that no one told him the news:—"I never know anything till it has happened." He signed his letters "Paul Eber, lonely and weak," for his disease made rapid progress; even the affectionate sympathy of his students and former boarders touched him with little but a stronger desire to be away. He grew mild in his judgments, dropped the strong words of controversy, and spoke of his opponents, not only with courtesy, but with respect and gentleness.

On the last day of November, 1569, he sat at his desk to congratulate the Electress on the birth of a son, and to thank her for a present of liqueur. On the 10th of December he died, wishing to the end that his university might continue to be what it had been, the foremost in theology. "Wittenberg," wrote Crell, "lost in most evil days both Luther and Melanchthon, and recovered neither back. Now, in much more evil and perilous times hath she lost her Eber. Him, also, I fear, she will not easily recover."

W. FLEMING STEVENSON.

WHAT FAITH IS, AND HOW IT COMES.

It has often been remarked that the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews does not give a definition of faith, but only a description of it. Yet I hardly know how a definition could be given which would represent the thing more correctly. "Faith," he says, "is the substance (hypostasis) of things hoped for, the evidence (elenchos) of things not seen." It has been asserted that faith implies much more than is expressed in these words, as, for instance, confidence in God, dedication of the heart to God, &c. Nor can it be denied that in the New Testament the word "faith" (pistis) often bears this wider meaning. But it ought to be observed that the writers of the New Testament often use the word metaphorically by giving the name of the cause to its effect, or objectively, by giving the name of the subjective or inward operation of the mind to the objects upon which it works. Thus "faith" is often used as synonymous with "religion," as in Acts vi. 7: "A great company of the priests were obedient to the faith:" or with the whole body of the doctrines believed, as in 1 Tim. iv. 1, where the Apostle speaks of "some who shall depart from the faith giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils." And in the same sense we too speak of the Roman Catholic faith, the Protestant faith, &c., or we call a document in which the doctrines we believe are prescribed, a confession of faith. All these various ways of using the word "faith" must be put aside when we have to determine what the simple Scripture meaning of the expression is. They may give us an idea of the sphere of thought in which the believer moves, and of the effects which his faith may produce; but they do not tell us what it means "to believe." Hebrews xi. 1, above quoted, is the only passage in Scripture which gives us a direct answer to the question.

Now, it must be observed that, owing to the frequent use of the word "believe," at the present day it has in the mouth of the people been reduced to a shallow meaning which it never had in Scripture, nor among the ancient Hebrews and Greeks. The popular signification of "to believe," is simply "to be of opinion, to suppose, to admit a thing as being likely," &c. Thus we say: "I believe it will be a rainy day to-morrow;" "I believe there were about 300 people in the crowd," &c. Used in this sense the word conveys always more or less an impression of uncertainty. The sentence, "I believe it will be a rainy day," if analyzed into its constituent parts amounts to this: "I am not sure that it will rain, but, from circumstances I have observed, I think it likely that it may." Now this is a signification which the word "believe" not only never had among the ancients. but it is one which expresses almost exactly the reverse of what it invariably signified among them. Of course the ancients had their words for expressing supposition, surmise, or opinion; but they never used the word "believe" for that purpose as we now do. The Hebrew words, amuna, faith, and heëmin, to believe, exclude every thought of uncertainty. They come from the root aman, which means "to be fixed, to be fast and confirmed." Hence the word Amen,—i.e., "So it is," it is fixed, it is certain and established. The Greek words pistis (faith) and pisteuein (to believe), likewise convey the meaning of firm persuasion. The pistis commences where doubt and uncertainty end. Thus when Abraham, in Gen. xv. 6, is said to have believed (heëmîn) in Jehovah, what is meant is that he had accepted Jehovah as the firm and immoveable foundation upon which his soul's hopes and expectations were henceforth to rest. might be translated: "He placed his firm, strong hold in Jehovah." Accordingly St. Paul, in Romans iv. 20, when referring to Abraham's faith, describes it as something opposite to "staggering" or "doubting," (diakrinesthai,) since this belongs to the region of unbelief. It is true a man may have faith, or at least he may not be altogether void of faith, and yet doubt, as appears from Matthew xiv. 31, where the Lord says to St. Peter: "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" But this proves nothing against the signification of the word faith as a firm, unstaggering persuasion. It only proves that human nature is incapable of steadily maintaining even its firmest conviction, if left to itself in its fierce battle with the tempting agencies which oppose that conviction. It proves that a firm persuasion, like everything else pertaining to a man's mind, may operate well or ill according to the use the man makes of it. Thus, for instance, a man may have acquired a great deal of historical knowledge, and yet for want of the power of distinct arrangement his knowledge may be of little use to him. It would be unjust to say that such a man's learning was weak or of small extent. It is the man's mind which for the time being is too weak to give effect to his knowledge. In the same way we may have strong convictions, and yet, under the sudden and overwhelming attacks of bewildering temptations, we may feel as though we had no conviction at all. Yet it would plainly be unjust to put our weakness to the account of our conviction. Our conviction may have remained strong as ever, and this perhaps may have been shown by the fact that as soon as the temptation disappeared, it immediately emerged in full power.

Faith, therefore, is nowhere in Scripture represented as having anything to do with staggering or doubting. We are accustomed to speak of "a weak faith, a staggering faith;" but we do not find these expressions in Scripture. Scripture only tells us that we may be weak in faith or strong in faith (Rom. iv. 19, 20), that we may stagger or doubt (Matt. xiv. 31); but this only proves that, firm and substantial as the staff which we hold in our hand may be, we may yet, from want of watchfulness or self-control, leave it unused; and thus we drop down, not because the staff breaks under our weight, but because we neglect to lean upon it. This was clearly illustrated by the conduct of St. Peter when walking on the sea. (Matt. xiv. 28-31.) Even when he began to sink, his conviction that Jesus was as able as He was willing to keep him from sinking, continued as unshaken as ever. And it was shown by the fact that he immediately applied to Jesus for help; and that he had no sooner done so, than he found himself, as it were, replaced on a pavement as solid as granite. How then, you ask, was it that he sank? Why, he simply neglected to carry his conviction into practice. He left it in abeyance. At sight of the waves, he forgot all about Jesus and His almighty power, about heaven and earth, the past and the future; in short, everything disappeared from his mind, except his own personal danger. But the moment his eye caught a glimpse of Jesus again, the whole of his conviction as to the Saviour's power returned, and, being brought into practice, did its duty as before. In the same way it happened once that a good swimmer, falling into the water on a sudden, was so bewildered, that he forget he was possessed of the power of keeping himself afloat, and would certainly have been drowned, had not a friend on shore reminded him of it by crying, "Swim, swim!" This was all that was needed to make him throw out his arms at once, and demonstrate the existence of his talent, and that it was powerful enough to bring him out of his danger.

That certainty, and such certainty, too, as excludes every shade of doubt, is essential to the nature of faith, is nowhere more strongly expressed than in the above-mentioned definition or rather description of faith. There faith is spoken of in relation to things hoped for and things not seen. Now hoped for and unseen things are, to us creatures of flesh and blood, exactly those things which, more than any other, are characterised by uncertainty. To say, "I hope such or such a thing will take place some day," is tantamount to saying that it is an uncertain thing. To say of a thing that nobody has seen it, is almost the same as to say that it has no existence. As to the hoped for things, since they only exist in the future, they have no substance to us; they are as yet merely imaginary. As to the unseen things, whether they are or are not real things, whether they do or do not exist, we cannot tell, since there is no direct evidence for their existence, and since they never prescut themselves to the test of our senses. All men hope at some future period, after death to find themselves in a happy glorious place, which they call Heaven, Elysium, Walhalla, &c. Some think it will be a beautiful garden with evergreen trees and never-drooping flowers. Others expect to witness an immense city built of the most splendid materials. But after all we must confess that we know nothing about it; that we are only playing with the unsubstantial images of our fancy; that, in fact, we do not know whether such a place, be it garden or city, will ever be perceived by us as a real existence. Some think that such a place already exists, although hid from our sight. Others again answer that it may be so, but that there is no proof for it; and that until there be evidence of its real existence, they must look upon it as questionable.

This is the light, or rather the mist, in which those hoped for and unseen things are placed before our mind apart from faith. They may be possible, they may be likely—but they are uncertain. The history of infidelity in our age confirms this observation, as it has done in all previous ages. The final result at which the philosophy of Hcgel, Strauss, Renan, Reville, &c., has arrived, is that the existence of a personal God and of a life after death, can at the very utmost only be shown to be probable.

Now faith, according to the definition in the Epistle to the Hebrews, puts an end to these uncertainties. Through it, the hoped-for things obtain substance, the unseen things become evidence, to our mind. That is to say, they become really existing things to our conviction, so that we look upon the future things as being as real as present things, and upon the invisible as being as real as the visible. Nor is such realisation of apparently unreal objects by our inward perception at variance with the laws of our mental life. All things which exist outside ourselves, no matter whether visible or not, are, it is true, real, and have substance independent of what we think about them; but they are not real, and have no substance to us, until our mind has received a clear and indelible impression of their real existence. So the reality and substance of these objects, so far as we are concerned, exist not in the objects themselves, but in the impression which our mind has received from them. Take away that impression, and the objects lose at once their reality and substance to us, however real and substantial they may be objectively. Now the impression of the reality and substance of an object upon our mind may be produced by various means. The most common one is the perception of our senses. The least common one, happily, is the deceptive operation of an uncontrolled imagination. To a delirious, fever-stricken invalid, the lion which he fancies he sees at his bedside is as real and substantial as the bed upon which ho is lying. It must, in passing, be observed here, that every impression of the reality of an object is not trustworthy. All depends upon the soundness of the mind which perceives it. A very common means through which we receive impressions of the reality of objects outside us, is the word, the medium by which one man transfers the impressions which he has received to another. It links our mind with objects which, from various circumstances, are not within the reach of our own personal perception. It is, as it were, a means which enables us to see, to hear, to touch, to smell, and to taste by proxy. In the common order of things, the impression produced by this means upon our mind is almost equal to the impression produced by the perception of our own senses. Though millions of us never saw or touched the pyramids of Egypt, yet the pyramids are as real and substantial to us as though we had seen them with our own eyes, and touched them with our own hands. Their evidence is to us beyond doubt. Now, how is the reality, the substance, the evidence of the pyramids conveyed to our mind? Solely through the word of men, who say that they have seen and touched them. They describe the impression the pyramids made upon their minds, and at the same time try to impress it on ours. We accept that impression; we do not repel it, but we assimilate it; and so the pyramids are as real to us as they are to those who report of them to us. This operation of our mind, through which we accept the impression which the word of another conveys to us, is called faith, or belief. So our daily experience, even in the most secular sphere of life, confirms the saying of the Apostle, that faith is the evidence of things not seen. There is not one rational being, from the child up to the most learned scholar, who does not through faith every day, nay, every hour of the day, gather evidence of stance of things hoped for. There is a logical regularity in the way the Apostle connects the expression "substance" with the hoped-for things, whereas he speaks of the evidence of the unseen ones. Things which are not seen may nevertheless be supposed to have substance, i.e. to exist already. All that is required is the evidence of that unseen existence. But things hoped for are, as a rule, supposed not yet to exist; they are expected to come into existence at a future period, if they are to exist at all. What we want with respect to them is certainty, that some day they will no longer remain merely imaginary, but take shape in a substantial way. A poor man hopes one day to become the owner of a hundred pounds, and pictures the bank-notes or sovereigns which are to realise his hopes. But, enchanting as these dreams may be, they are after all mere dreams. What he looks for, is the moment when those imaginary pieces of paper or of gold will respond to the touch of his fingers; and until that moment arrive he continues to look upon himself as a poor man. Now, suppose a wealthy banker, whom he knows to be a generous and true man, promises to present him with the desired sum next day. What will be the effect of that banker's word upon the poor man's mind? Quite the same as though the banker had dropped a hundred substantial sovereigns into his hand. His dreams are realised, his imaginary hundred pounds have become a reality. He is no longer a poor man, but the owner of what is a large sum in his estimation. Still, he has nothing tangible in his hand. True; but the banker's word is as good to him as money. That word is the authentic and trustworthy representative of the thing he hopes for, and is sure to obtain. His cares are gone. It is true a day has yet to elapse before he will himself hold the money. But that makes no difference to him. It is only a question of time, not of substance. He has, as it were, passed from one world into another, and the partition between the two worlds is the banker's word. Before that word was spoken the things which he hoped for had no existence to him; no sooner however was it uttered than they did exist.

How could that banker's word have such a wonderful effect? Through the poor man's faith in that word. Faith is a wonderful telescope which enables us to see absent things as if they were present; it is a magic wand which calls future things into existence as if they were already.

The description of faith so often alluded to has been reduced to a definition in this form: "Faith is the acknowledging a thing as true—that is, as having real existence—on the testimony of somebody clse." This reduction is attended with considerable loss. The definition which we thus obtain, covers only the latter of the two propositions of which the description in the Hebrews consists. It is quite correct as a definition of a purely intellectual faith, but it leaves the notion of faith as a moral faculty of the human mind quite untoucled. In other words, it is not a correct definition of faith in the Christian sense of the word. The Gospel does not merely contemplate man in part but in the whole of his existence: and therefore it does not acknowledge this definition of faith as complete and normal. All the powers of the human mind which ought to contribute towards producing the state of belief have not been allowed under it to come into play. The mere acknowledgment of a fact on the authority of somebody who has seen it, with nothing more, may be called faith (and so it is called in the daily conversation of men), but properly speaking it is only a partial application of our power of believing, since our intellect alone has been put into operation, the other faculties of our mind being left in abeyance. Nor can it be denied that in hundreds and thousands of cases in our daily life such a partial application of our power of believing is quite sufficient—the only thing needed in fact. In purely scientific and historical researches for instance, any other sort of faith would be out of place. For here the only purpose is to know what really is or was, independently of the question whether there is, besides this testimony of the intellect, any evidence from the other faculties of human nature upon which the acknowledgment of the facts may be based. A loving son, for instance, no sooner hears the report that his father has done an admirable deed than he believes it: and for two reasons: first on account of the testimony of him who reports, and secondly because of the testimony of his loving heart, which tells him that this is exactly like his father. Now with the latter testimony the purely historical inquirer has nothing to do. He seeks after no such thing as an inward testimony; all he wants and all he can admit as a ground for his belief, is the outward testimony of trustworthy witnesses.

But there is such a thing as an inward testimony in human nature, where we have to deal with moral and religious truths. We are God's offspring, and we were created with affections and aversions similar to those which exist in the nature of God. These affections and aversions may, since our fall, have been considerably weakened and confused. Still an innate sense is left of what God loves and hates, and of what He must love and must hate. Though we have allowed a hostile spirit to master us, so that we often think and act in opposition to what He loves or hates, yet a voice dwells in our bosom; and when we see the works of His hands, or hear of His mighty deeds, it whispers, "That is just like Him!" Even the prodigal son, when he had sunk to the level of the swine, had not forgotten the blessings of his father's house, nor the tender feelings of his father's heart. This innate sense of the divine, the true, the good, and the beautiful, is the inward witness, the testimony of which, combined with that of the outward witnesses, constitutes the foundation upon which Christian faith is based. That inward testimony manifests itself to us, not in the form of a mere knowing, but as an instinctive consciousness, as an intuitive perception, which, while the outward testimony makes us understand the truth reported, makes us feel it in its moral necessity and in its perfect harmony with the whole symphony, of which God's will is the key-note. It expresses itself, with reference to divine objects already existing, in the form of love; with reference to divine objects still to be expected, in the form of hope. Therefore the Apostle, to whom no real faith was imaginable without the consent of that inward witness, describes faith as the substance of things hoped for. Had it only been a merely scientific or historical faith which he had in view, he would have written, "things expected."

A merely intellectual acknowledgment of facts in matters of a purely material kind, though deserving the name of faith, is no faith at all in the sphere of religion. The devils acknowledge the fact of the existence of God, and tremble. Could they get so far as to rejoice, their cold intellectual acknowledgment would at once enter into the sphere of true faith, because coming down from the elevation of the proud understanding to the depth of a humble and loving heart. But then they surely would come to believe in something more than merely the existence of God, and even that existence itself would to them become something altogether different from what it was before. A merely intellectual acknowledgment of the existence of God must be a dead thing, because it proves the death of the vital part of such a believer's being-of his sense of love and hope and joy; it proves the death of his heart, out of which are the issues of life. For "with the heart," St. Paul says, "man believeth unto righteousness" (Rom. x. 10); and not until his heart has taken part in his acknowledgment of the fact does it deserve the name of faith in the scriptural sense of the expression. To admit, for instance, the Resurrection of Christ merely as an historical fact, in the same way as one admits the victory at Marathon. is no operation of the mind which an Apostle would have praised as an act of faith. "If thou shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead," says Paul, "thou shalt be saved." If you only admit the fact because the historical testimony compels you to do so, because you cannot help admitting it, where, then, is your sense for the divinely great, the divinely good, the divinely true, which sense is as much a constituent part of your humanity as your intellect? Where is your innate desire for happiness, for deliverance from all evil? You have read the biography of that wonderful Son of Man in the Gospels; and having arrived at the bloody and shameful close of that life, so full of love, of truth, of divine power, did you feel nothing in you prompting at least the hope and the wish that He would rise from the grave again? Well, you read ou, and historical testimony assured you that He really rose from the dead. And you-what did you say to it? "Why," you said, "I believe it on that historical ground." But there came no outburst from your lips; such as, "Oh! of course, it must be; I could expect nothing else!" You are yourself a dying man, just about to be buried; you have read of a fellow-Man who promised to raise us out of the dark gloomy grave; and the historical testimony tells you that He has by His own resurrection proved His ability to fulfil His promise: and all you say is, "Well, I cannot deny the fact; I believe it." No, that is no faith; for, if you really believed, you would leap for joy, as if you were yourself risen already. Your intellect may believe, but you yourself are yet an infidel.

It is averred that such expressions as, to believe with the heart, a cordial faith, &c., are only metaphors, in the same way as are a mental eye, a spiritual ear, &c. It is further averred that the act of believing is practicable only to the intellect; and that what is called faith of the heart is only an expression denoting the effect which the truth received by our intellect has upon our passions, our desires, and our will. Faith, it is said, being the acknowledgment of the truth of a report, concerning an object absent from our senses, the intellect only is competent to examine the trustworthiness of the reporter, and to judge whether his report should be admitted as true. And when it has thus arrived at its conclusion, the act of believing, that is of acknowledging the truth of the statement, must ensue; and there is no help for it. even though all our passions and desires should be opposed to it. Thus we must believe in manythings which we never hoped for, but, on the contrary, dreaded with all our heart. The effect of such a faith upon our mind is sadness. Now, sadness and joy are correlate feelings; both are supposed to spring from our heart; and if it is correct to say, "I believe with all my heart that Christ rose from the dead," it ought to be admitted to be equally correct to say, "I believe with all my heart that Paul was beheaded." Still, nobody would call the latter a correct expression. This shows that the phrase "to believe with the heart" is, properly speaking, incorrect, and only to be understood as an abbreviation of the more correct phrase, "I feel in my heart the effect of the joyful truth which my intellect has accepted."

Now, against this reasoning it may be observed that it sounds strange to speak of a cordial faith in a sad or dreadful thing, but it does not follow that it would be incorrect to speak in that way. Daily usage has accustomed us, when speaking of "the heart," to think of love, hope, &c., more than of the reverse; but there is nothing incongruous in the thought of a cordial hatred or a cordial fear—that is, a hatred, or a fear, which engrosses all the feelings of our heart, or which proceeds from the deepest recesses of our nature. Nor is there anything inconsistent in saying that such or such a man believes with his heart that he will be lost for ever. The expression is unusual, but it conveys, nevertheless, a clear notion. In that case faith is the substance of things dreaded by the heart. In that sense, the devils, too, might be said to believe with the heart, for their trembling shows that their heart has decidedly to do with the matter. But, as I observed before, it is against the common use of language to call such a faith a faith of the heart. Cordial heartfelt feelings are, as a rule, understood to be sympathetic, affectionate, or agreeable emotions.

But the real question at issue is this :- Is it true that the act of believing is limited to the intellect, and that the heart can only receive the effect of the belief of the intellect, but not contribute towards establishing that belief? Of course we here only speak of faith concerning moral and religious things, leaving purely scientific matters alone, since from their nature they lie outside the sphere of the feelings of the heart. Now, I not only do not scruple to answer the question in the negative, but I assert that the conclusion of the intellect with reference to the truth of a report can never conduct man to that firmness of conviction which is essential to faith, unless the heart give its consent and confirmation. Not until the heart accepts the conclusions of the intellect can man be said truly to believe. It has often been experienced that the truth of a report as to matters of great importance, was so demonstrated, that the intellect could say nothing against it, while yet the man continued doubting, or even unbelieving. We have here only to remember the case of Thomas. An instance of a similar nature was that of the women who went out to the grave with their sweet spices. They continued to disbelieve that Caiaphas could be right, though at the moment he had convinced their intellects. Were our heart a blank sheet of paper, certainly nothing would be left to us but simply to accept the conclusions of our intellect, and to write them upon our heart. But it is no such tabula rasa. It is like a sheet of paper upon which there are still noticeable many words which originally formed parts of eternal truth, written by the finger of God.* Many words have been effaced, and there are sentences scarcely legible, in consequence of the blanks. But those sentences which remain admit of no dubious reading. They stand clear and convincing. On the other hand, our parents, our friends, our teachers, have also written their sentences on our hearts, many of which may be wrong, but they, too, are there-alas! oftentimes as incffaccable as those written by God. Now, when through the intellect some truth is proposed to us, we cannot really accept it, unless we find that there is a fit place for it among the various sentences still extant in our heart. Sometimes no place can possibly be found unless several sentences, often of long standing, be rubbed out; for we cannot admit contradictory propositions. Sometimes we cannot see at once how the new proposition can possibly adjust itself to those truths which we know to be from God, and as such are undeviable. All this requires time for examination, for inquiry, and for comparison; and many painful struggles often attend these operations. But not until those struggles are at an end, and harmony restored, is it possible for us to accept the new truth as a truth. until theu can we be said to really believe. For the first and essentially characteristic mark of faith is-rest, perfect rest, issuing from an instinctive perception that what we have admitted into our stock of convictions is the thing that was lacking; that it is a piece of that same eternal, solid rock, upon which we know we can alone rely; and that through its introduction the whole sum of our convictions has gained in firmness, in order, and in beauty. The coming of faith is like lighting the gas. There is the ignitable vapour inside the tube, and there is the little flame outside. Sometimes the slightest touch is sufficient to elicit flame; sometimes it requires a length of time, there being foul substances in the gas, or the air having got in, or there being something the matter with the meter; and not until these obstacles are removed can the light pour forth in its splendour. Now the gas in the tube may be taken as an emblem of the convictions, desires, and hopes already existing in our hearts; and the little flame of the match may be taken for the new truth which our intellect has acknowledged. The moment when the light blazes up represents the moment when faith begins. Those who aver that the mere acknowledgment of a truth by our intellect is faith, resemble the child who took the little flame of the match for the gaslight. It is I who am to believe. You think I believe already, because my intellect believes. are mistaken. My name is not intellect.

The old divines used to say that faith consists of three parts—viz., agnitio, assensus, and confidentia.

Confidence, however, does not, properly speaking, form a constituent part of faith. It is rather one of its foundations, inasmuch as confidence in the reporter is essential to belief in his report; or it is one of its sequels, inasmuch as faith no sooner accepts a truth than we rely upon it as a ground for our further reasonings. The connexion between faith and confidence, however, is so close, that both in Scripture and in daily conversation the former is often used in the signification of the latter. Hence the connection of the words faith and to believe with the preposition in. To believe in Christ, in God, means undoubtedly not only to acknowledge the truth that Christ is what He assures us He is, or to acknowledge the existence of God as a fact, but also to place our confidence in Christ and God, to rely upon Christ and God with all our heart. In fact, it is impossible to imagine faith as having life apart from confidence; and in that respect, confidence may be acknowledged as essential to faith. The reason why faith without works, as it is described by James, is dead lies in this, that the believer puts no confidence in the truth which his intellect acknowledges. He believes that there is a God, and he even believes that that God is almighty, all-merciful, omniscient, just and holy; but he refuses, from some reason or other, to confide himself to that God. He does not receive all the consequences of the truth which his intellect acknowledges, but rather continues to expect more profit or happiness from something else. This is a glaring inconsistency, no doubt. But to this state has the human heart come through sin. The power of sensuality is often so strong that even the most convincing truth is unable to weaken it. And there is such a thing as carnal habit, to which the heart may be so enslaved that everything proves inefficient to deliver it. Experience has, in hundreds of instances, shown that a man may be so addicted to the habit of drinking that, while acknowledging in his sober moments its palpably pernicious effect, he yet continues his ruinous practice till he dies. Here, indeed, is no want of conviction. Every day tells its sad truth with such awful eloquence that we might ask how is it possible not to submit to its voice at once and for ever? If truth, where it is so visible and palpable, is not able to overcome the resistance of the flesh, let us not wonder that things not seen, though acknowledged as true, prove often unable to free a miser from the thraldom of mammon or a prodigal from the fascinations of sensuality.

And yet it has often been found that the simple proclamation of things not seen has brought about a change in a man's life which demonstrations the most exact and experiences the most painful could not effect. Nay, it has often been observed that a man could for years know and acknowledge the truth of things not seen without manifesting any sense of their effect, till suddenly his belief, so long dead and powerless, rose as an irresistible power unto conversion and salvation. How is this? Of course we acknowledge the finger of a merciful Saviour, and the operation of the Holy Spirit in such a wonderful event. But the Spirit works in a reasonable way, and what we want to know is, what spring in the man's mind the Spirit touched to set him moving on in that happy direcrhaps it was fear, roused by some event that made a startling impression upon him, and reminded him of the future judgment. But fear alone could not explain the fact. It drives the sinner away from God, unless a still stronger power is brought into play drawing him towards his Saviour. Now that drawing power can only be confidence. Not until man comes to confide, to trust that God will accept, help, rescue, pardon, and bless him, will he take one step towards God. Not until that confidence lays hold of his heart will the things not seen take substance, reality. and life, to his mind. Here, again, we meet the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews where he speaks of things hoped for. Unless a man comes to hope that the things not seen will lead him to happiness, he will leave those things alone, though acknowledging the truth of their existence. This is the reason why the proclamation of the law, as a rule of life, proves insufficient to turn a sinner towards God. "For the law worketh wrath," and not hope. The faith of the devils is dead, because nothing is left to them but to tremble. There is no hope for them; they believe that there is a God, but no God in whom they can confide for salvation. Let a man have sunk ever so deep into the Slough of Despond, if you can succeed in instilling one drop of confidence in God into his mind, you will see him rise at once. The proverb is true: "As long as there is life there is hope." But read backwards it is equally true: "As long as there is hope there is life."

THE CROSS.

There fell on Calvary's hill
The shadow of the Cross,
Bearing the whole world's ill!
The whole world's loss!
The Holy and the Just Judged worthy to be slain:
The heart of tender trust
Forsaken: Truth denied:
Compassion crucified:
Pain overshadowing death—death ending pain!

Bearing the whole world's gain!
The whole world's good!
The sign of death and pain
Rose o'er a world renew'd!
On shield and banner borne Aloft, and set above
The kingly crown, and worn
Upon the heart of love:
Until upon the Cross arose the shrine
Where men sought and adored a sacrifico Divine.

THE MINSTER.

STONE upon stone! Each in its place, For strength and for grace, Rises stone upon stone!

Like a cluster of rods,
Bound with leaf-garlands tender,
The great massive pillars
Rise stately and slender;
Rise and bend and embrace
Until each owns a brother,
As down the long aisles
They stand link'd to each other;
While a rod of each cluster
Springs higher and higher,
Breaking, up in the shadow,
Like souls that aspire.

While here in the midst,
'Neath the great central tower,
The strength and the unity
Mingles in power,
And the mystery greatens:
No-where in the place
Can the eye see the whole
Or the sun light the space.
And here the gloom gathers
And deepens to dense,
While yonder the white light
Breaks sharp and intense.
Unity! Mystery!

Unity! Mystery!
Majesty! Grace!
Stone upon stone,
And each stone in its place.

THE CHURCH.

AH! this building which we see Is a type—a prophecy, Living Church of God, of thee ! Of thy grace and majesty! Thy diviner mystery! Thy more perfect unity! One by one thy stones arise, And thy pillars stand apart, Until bending from the skies They embrace-link heart to heart. So thine aisles are generations Into generations blending; Place of prayer for all the nations, Widening still, and still ascending. Thou art hidden in the light Inaccessible and full Of darkness: thou art from our sight Hidden, O most Beautiful! Being builded day by day By the souls that love and pray. Though we see not now the whole, Nor the part of soul and soul, In thy mighty plan, we know Thy foundations laid below Bear love's sign, and thou shalt rise Crown'd by Love's great sacrifice.

THE SUN'S ATMOSPHERE.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR CHALLIS.

A FEW years ago it might have been thought presumption to speak of a solar atmosphere as of an ascertained reality. Recent observation and experiments seem to have removed all uncertainty on this point, the indications which have come from various and unexpected quarters giving on the whole conclusive evidence that the sun has an atmosphere. To state and describe the phenomena from which this interesting fact is inferred, and to explain the grounds of the inference, will be the main object of this essay; and it is hoped that, as affording a good example of philosophic induction, the subject will be found to be instructive as well as interesting. I shall endeavour to exhibit the process of induction in a strictly logical manner, and with as little use as possible of scientific technicalities. Happily, the nature of the subject is such as to admit of this kind of treatment.

For the sake of distinctness in conducting the argument, and in accordance with a usual method in physical research, we shall commence with assuming that the sun has an atmosphere, and then proceed to give explanations of phenomena on this hypothesis. The evidence for the truth of the hypothesis will accumulate with the number and variety of the explanations. Also, for the better comprehension of the solar phenomena, reference will occasionally be made to analogous terrestrial phenomena, and such reference will be regarded as a legitimate means of confirming and elucidating the views that may be taken of the nature of the former. In fact, it may be recognised as a good general rule in natural philosophy, to look for the occurrence of analogous phenomena under great diversities in respect to details, magnitudes and proportions.

When a telescope, such as the large refractor of the Cambridge Observatory, the use of which I have had the advantage of during the last twentyseven years, is turned upon the sun's face, the most noticeable phenomena are such as the following. The general brightness, which is pretty evenly distributed over the whole disc, is usually interrupted at places by small dark spots, approximately round, some of which appear singly and others in groups. Most of these spots, the larger especially, consist of a central part almost black, surrounded by a broad border, comparatively bright, but still much less bright than the sun's general surface. The border has been named the penumbra of the spot, and the central part the nucleus. These appellations we shall frequently have occasion to make use of. Sometimes spaces are seen having the appearance of penumbra without a central black spot, and sometimes also a small dark spot will present itself without penumbra. Besides the dark spots, there are appearances of an opposite character, consisting of bright spots and streaks (faculæ), often seen in the neighbourhood of groups of dark spots. They are most visible towards the sun's border, where they frequently appear unaccompanied by dark spots. In addition to the phenomena of these two kinds, the whole face of the sun has a mottled appearance, arising from a vast number of minor alternations of dark and brighter spaces. There are other phenomena, but it will suffice for the present to mention these.

Now a first sight of the appearances above described might suggest the idea that we are looking at certain features of the sun's face of a fixed character, as are those presented by the full moon. But the repetition of the observation after a day or two, or even some hours, would reveal the fact that the phenomena undergo changes. One known cause of change is an ascertained rotation of the sun about its axis in about twenty-five days, which necessarily produces difference of appearance from mere change of position relative to the observer's line of vision. But after this effect has been taken into account, there remain variations and movements which the motion of rotation will by no means explain. The majority of observers who have long and carefully surveyed the sun's disc with good optical means, agree in the conclusion that the superficial solar matter has the property of accumulating and separating by reason of motions of transference, which are accompanied sometimes by a whirling motion, first recognised by the nature of the changes of phase which large spots were seen to undergo. Also it has been noticed that the fresh spots, which break out suddenly from time to time, commence usually at points situated in the duller parts of the general mottled surface; that old spots either separate into fragments, or appear to close up, the nucleus first vanishing; and that after their disappearance, bright faculæ often occupy their places. In short, the aspects of the sun's face are as variable as are, proverbially, wind and weather.

This remarkable variability is a property which seems at once to point to the nature of the substance which constitutes the sun's outer coating. As our designations of the qualities of substances are necessarily restricted to terrestrial nomenclature, we cannot call a substance having the aspects and movements which this solar matter is observed to have by any other name than cloud. This term does not necessarily affirm anything respecting the constituents of the cloud. For instance, we speak of clouds of dust, or of smoke, because dust and smoke are observed to put on appearances, and to be capable of movements, like those of the clouds of the sky. The name, however, does imply that the constituents are very minute particles (I do not mean atoms), borne up in the atmosphere, and liable to be driven by winds. In the case of terrestrial cloud and fog, these minute parts are very small spherical drops of water. In proof of this assertion, it may suffice to state that a fog-bow, seen in moonlight, takes the form and position which are consistent only with its being composed of minute spherical globules of water. But what are we to suppose that the solar clouds consist of? If we said that they are of aqueous composition like the clouds of the earth, it would probably be objected that any aqueous matter in the visible form of cloud would be immediately dissipated by being converted into vapour of the invisible form by the great heat of the sun. are, however, reasons for not coming hastily to this conclusion. Steam, which consists of very minute globules of water, remains such under very high temperatures. Many experiments have established the fact that a drop of water will retain its spherical form when exposed to an enormous amount of heat; for instance, when put into a red-hot crucible. It appears to be the case, whatever may be the explanation of it, that the great amount of heat developes a force which at and near the surface of the drop acts just like capillary attraction, and is powerful enough to maintain the spherical shape, while at remoter distances it becomes a strong repulsive force. Assuming that the solar cloud has an aqueous composition, it is quite conceivable that like forces may be developed by the sun's heat, and that while the repulsive force keeps the constituent globules asunder, the attractive force maintains them as globules. And since, as the experiments show, the drops subject to this capillary action may be of considerable size, it is by no means an impossibility that the solar clouds may by the coalescing of the constituent particles engender rain-drops. We have also to take into account that the pressure of our supposed solar atmosphere would in the cloud-region most probably far exceed the pressure of the air in the analogous cloud-region of the earth, and that this pressure would tend greatly to prevent the dissipation of the drops. If it should be urged that if there be rain-cloud in the sun's atmosphere, there must be an ocean below by evaporation, from the surface of which the cloud is supplied, on the grounds just stated, we may still reply that it is not impossible this may be actually the case. Both by an increment of superficial capillary attraction, due, as before stated, to the high temperature, and by an enormous atmospheric pressure on the surface of the ocean, the tendency to ebullition may be so repressed as to result in a gradual evaporation, by which the invisible vapour may be generated, which, at a certain elevation, is condensed into cloud. The cause which would thus operate to prevent the dissipation of the ocean in steam, is precisely of the same kind as that which allows water to boil at the top of a mountain at a lower temperature than when under the greater atmospheric pressure at its base. It would only require an adjustment as to magnitude and proportion of known causes to produce at the sun the phenomena we witness on the earth of "waters above" separated by au expanse from "waters below." The causes, however, operating at the sun, must be such as to generate a much more continuous and unbroken cloud-stratum than that of the earth under its actual condition.*

The course of our argument now requires a more particular consideration of the nature of the solar spots. I am well aware that great difference of opinion exists among physicists as to the character of these objects; but in order not to interrupt the train of the present reasoning, I shall only give here the theory of the spots which is alone compatible with the foregoing views, and shall defer the consideration of an opposite theory to a subsequent part of the essay. The above conceptions and inferences respecting the nature of the sun's visible envelope are quite consistent with the theory given in the "Transactions of the Royal Society" for 1774 (p. 1) by Dr. Wilson, at that time Professor of Practical Astronomy in the University of Glasgow. According to Wilson the spots are depressions, or excavations, through a certain variable substance which surrounds the solid globe of the sun; their form approximates more or less to that of a segment, or frustum, of a right cone, the larger end of which is on a level with the upper boundary of the envelope, and the smaller end on a level with the lower boundary; and the penumbra corresponds to the slanting interior surface of the frustum, the nucleus being the space inclosed by the lower circular termination, through which is seen the comparatively dark body of the sun. The argument he chiefly insists upon as confirmatory of this form is purely geometrical. He inquires what changes of apparent form a spot of the supposed conical shape would undergo in consequence of change of position by the sun's rotation, relative to the line of vision of a terrestrial spectator, the apparent form at the centre of the solar disc being a dark circular nucleus surrounded by a circular and concentric penumbra, and he finds that the observed changes, as the rotation carries the spots towards, or from, the sun's border, present a remarkable general conformity with the geometrical deductions. In the great majority of cases, as the spot approaches, or recedes from, the border, the penumbra appears broader on the side of the nucleus which is turned towards the borde: than on the opposite side; which is just what the geometrical reasoning would lead us to expect. Wilson rightly argues that only a general conformity is possible, on account of the deviations of the forms of the spots from the supposed exact form of the conical frustum. Farther, he deduces by an ingenious piece of geometry the depth of a spot from the estimated breadth of the penumbra on the side towards the sun's limb just when the nucleus and the boundary of the penumbra are in contact on the other side. The result given by the selected instance was, that the depth of the spot-that is, according to our theory, the thickness of the cloudstratum-was little less than four thousand miles. Professor Secchi, the eminent astronomer at Rome, who adopts without hesitation Wilson's theory on the ground of its general agreement with observation, found by the very same process of measurement the depth of a spot to be about fifteen hundred miles.* Neither of these measures has pretensions to accuracy. It is very likely that the depth is variable both at a given position and from one position to another at a given time. Probably we shall not be far wrong in concluding that the average thickness of the stratum lies between the results of these two measurements.

^{*} Is it unreasonable to infer from the evidence of uniformity of temperature at the earth's surface in remote geological periods, that formerly the condition of the earth as to light and heat resembled the present condition of the sun; and that when, by the subsequent attenuation of its cloud-stratum, it ceased to be an independent source of light and heat, its "days and seasons" began to be regulated by the sun?

The preceding geometrical argument is independent of any views respecting the physical nature of the substance in which the spots are formed, and should be kept apart from such views. This distinction has been carefully attended to by Wilson, who sums up the inferences from the geometrical theory in the following passage :- "It appears then that the solar spots are immense excavations in the body of the sun, and that what hitherto hath been called the nucleus is the bottom, and what hath been called the umbra [i.e. penumbra], the sloping sides, of the excavation. It also appears that the solar matter at the depth of the nucleus does not emit light, or emits so little as to appear dark compared to that resplendent substance at the surface; that this beauteous substance is at the surface most fulgid, and when any of it is seen below the general level, forming the sides of an excavation, that then its lustre is somehow impaired, so as to give the appearance of a surrounding umbra. Here our induction ends."+ He has, however, ventured upon a conjecture as to the consistence of the luminous envelope in the following terms :- "As to the particular nature and qualities of this luminous matter, we have been sometimes apt to imagine that it cannot well be any very ponderous fluid, but that it rather must resemble as to consistence a very dense and thick fog which broods over the surface of the sun's dark body." It will be seen that this view comes 'very close to that which is maintained in this essay, viz., that the luminous envelope consists of aqueous cloud. After calling attention to the above distinction, I now resume the inquiry into the qualities of the cloud-stratum.

If so much of analogy with what is going on at the earth's surface be admitted as is implied in the formation of aqueous cloud in the sun's atmosphere, we cannot stop here, but must proceed a step farther. If matter be continually ascending from the sun's surface by evaporation, there must, on the principle of compensation, be an equivalent descent of the same matter; and the analogy with terrestrial processes would lead to the inference that it descends in the form of rain. Such a fact will not appear to be incompatible with the existence of an intense degree of solar heat, if consideration be given to the experimental reasons before adduced for concluding that water may retain the form of small spherical drops under the influence of extremely high temperatures. Now by these premises we are brought to a natural and simple explanation of the origin and formation of the solar spots. For it is not an unreasonable supposition that the spots break out where, by electric discharges between contiguous portions of the cloud matter, there has been a copious down-fall of rain; -that, in short, they are phenomena bearing an analogy with the clearance of our sky after a storm. The form of the excavation might be accounted for by an action similar to that which produces the conical form of the water-spout, and the observed rotary motion might arise from the prevalence of a solar atmospheric cyclone.

It may here be mentioned that, in common with other observers, I have noticed that the nucleus of a spot is not uniformly dark, but that faint luminous streaks are distributed about it, sometimes surrounding an intensely black space not concentric with the circular boundary of the nucleus. These appearances, which are like fleecy clouds suspended in the lower regions of the atmosphere, seem to justify the inference that considerable space intervenes between the under surface of the cloud-stratum and the surface of the sun's body. Possibly they may be this very surface, exhibiting different degrees of illumination at different parts. Farther observations made with powerful optical means may be expected to clear up this interesting question.

There is, however, a difficulty besetting the foregoing theory of the solar spots which must now receive consideration. The whole area of the penumbra of a spot is observed to be of a brightness nearly uniform, but much inferior to that of the general luminous surface, and consequently it is separated from the latter by a very definite boundary line, like that which separates it from the

^{*} I am here referring to an article "On the Solar Spots, and on the Mode of Determining their Depth," in No. 1148 of the "Astronomische Nachrichten."

As of the "Astronomische Nachrichten."

I have taken advantage of the present opportunity for bringing Wilson's theory into particular notice, because I am of opinion that it has hardly obtained the place which it deserves. His paper, for which he received a prize from the Academy of Copenhagen, is an excellent example of cautious and exact induction, treated according to the method of the Newtonian school. It did not, however, meet with approval from Lalande, who passed some strictures upon it in the volume of the "Mémoires" of the French Academy for 1776 (p. 508), and proposed a theory of his own, the inadequacy of which is exposed by Sir J. Herschel in Article 389 of his "Outlines of Astronomy." Wilson replied in a second paper in the "Philosophical Transactions" of 1783 (p. 144), in which, as well as in the first paper, his treatment of the subject contrasts very favourably with that of the French astronomer.

darker interior nucleus. Why is the transition from the one degree of luminosity to the other so abrupt? There is no difficulty in accounting for the abruptness in passing from the penumbra to the nucleus, on the supposition that the body of the sun, towards which we look through the nucleus, is not self-luminous. But, on the other hand, there appears no obvious reason why the transition from the brightness of the penumbra to that of the surrounding surface is not gradual. With respect, however, to this question a general law may be laid down which in some degree removes the difficulty. It seems that at all points where the direction of the surface is inclined to the general surface there is a loss of light, and so much the more as the inclination is greater. We have seen that Wilson, as quoted above, noticed this effect of a sloping from the general level; and Secchi has remarked that when a spot is filling up, so that the slope becomes less and less, the brightness of the penumbra gradually approaches to that of the surrounding surface. It is, then, in conformity with this law of the effect of inclination, that the slanting interior face of the conical depression forming the spot is less bright than the adjacent surface, and seems to be separated from the latter by a definite line of demarcation. Also if it may be supposed that the superficial parts of the cloudstratum consist of a vast number of cloudy cumuli, which by the intersection of their slant sides form depressions, according to the same law these depressions will be less bright than the crests of the cumuli, and thus the mottled appearance which is observed to be spread over the whole of the sun's face will be readily accounted for. The bright faculæ must be due to cumuli and ridges of more than ordinary magnitude and elevation, and probably owe some of their brightness to their being raised above the denser parts of the sun's atmosphere. What the reason may be for this law of the relation of diminution of brightness to inclination of the surface, is a very delicate question, involving considerations of the origination and properties of light, which do not admit of being introduced into an essay of this kind. Suffice it to say that such a law must be intimately connected with the cause, whatever that may be, of the generation of the principal part of the sun's sensible light and heat at the upper boundary of the cloud-stratum, and will, I venture to affirm, eventually be a clue to the discovery of the explanation of that mysterious operation.

Upon the whole, from the preceding discussion, it may be inferred, that on the hypothesis of a solar atmosphere the phenomena of the sun's face admit of being ascribed, with more or less evidence, to causes and operations which may be understood by their terrestrial analogues. Though it would not be good philosophy to conclude from such explanations alone that the sun has an atmosphere, they may be regarded as a first instalment towards this conclusion. I proceed now to a second argument.

When describing the phenomena of the sun's face, revealed by the telescope, I purposely omitted the statement of one of a very significant kind, intending to reserve it for special consideration. The phenomenon I refer to will be most conveniently seen by receiving on a white sheet of paper the image of the sun's disc formed by rays which have passed through the eye-piece of the telescope. This is really an image of the solar image which is formed by the object-glass, or object-mirror, at its focus. By drawing out, or pushing in, the eye-piece, and adjusting the white paper for distinct vision, this second image may be made of any desired magnitude. This arrangement being effected, on looking at the image on the paper it will soon be apparent that the sun's disc towards the border, all round, is less bright than at and near the centre. The difference is so obvious that it is surprising the fact was for a long time not noticed, or not generally admitted. Recently the variation of brightness has been submitted to photometric measurement; and Professor Secchi has found that the heat from the sun's disc also decreases gradually from the centre to the circumference,-a result that might have been anticipated from the known connection between solar light and heat. Now, assuming, as we may do, that the sun's spherical photosphere (that name designating the superficial light-giving portion of the cloudstratum) is in general equally luminous at all parts, the plane circular disc into which it is projected ought also to appear uniformly luminous, notwithstanding the different inclinations of different parts to the lines of vision. A red-hot poker furnishes direct experimental evidence of this law, inasmuch as two of its adjacent surfaces, when differently inclined to the direction of vision, appear equally bright. What, then, is the reason that the sun's disc is obscurer towards the border than towards the centre? This question may be immediately answered by the hypothesis of an atmosphere. although the photosphere be considerably elevated above the body of the sun, it must, just as in the case of the cloud-region of the earth, be very much below the upper boundary of the atmosphere. Thus rays from parts near the sun's border will pass, to a spectator on the earth, through more atmosphere than those from parts near the centre; and, as light is lost in passing through the atmosphere, the former will appear less bright than the other. For a similar reason, by the absorption of light and heat in the earth's atmosphere, the sun at setting is not so bright and heating as when overhead at mid-day. This argument for the existence of a solar atmosphere is much more cogent than the former one. The explanation of the observed phenomenon is, in fact, so direct and simple on our hypothesis, and so impossible does it seem to account for it in any other way, that we might almost conclude, from this argument alone, that the sun has an atmosphere.

A third reason for such a conclusion would be given by any discernible indications of solar atmospheric refraction. That there are really such, will, I think, appear from the following considerations. We know, from astronomical observation, that when a celestial body is setting, it is actually below the horizon of the observer, its visual direction being raised by the refraction of the rays from it as they pass through the earth's atmosphere. happens that in terrestrial refraction the rays from a setting object graze tangentially the earth's surface; which shows that the earth's surface is more curved than the path of the ray, it being a geometrical law that a continuous line which lies wholly within another, must, at positions where they have a common tangent, have the greater curvature. But, in the case of a body much larger than the earth, and possessing a more refrigerant atmosphere, the curvature of the path of a ray might well be greater than that of the surface of the body. In that case what would happen? A ray from an external object, after entering the atmosphere, could not pass out of it, or graze the surface of the body, but would strike the body at a certain angle of inclination to the surface, and there be arrested. Supposing the atmosphere to have for its superior boundary a spherical surface concentric with that of the interior globe, -a supposition which, for reasons that will be presently given, it is allowable to make, -a ray whose course is tangential to that boundary will, after entering the atmosphere, strike the globe in a direction which makes, with the surface, a minimum angle. That is, every other ray entering the atmosphere will infringe on the surface in a direction making a larger angle than this. Consequently, under these circumstances, the sun, or a star, would not sink below the horizon, but would disappear when its angular elevation above the horizon is the limiting angle just mentioned.

Let us now apply these considerations to the supposed atmosphere of the sun. In the first place, that the sun's atmosphere must have a definite upper boundary, like that of an ocean, may be affirmed for the following reasons, which are equally applicable to the terrestrial atmosphere, or that of any planet. Conceive the atmosphere to be in a state of equilibrium, and to be divided into a very large number of thin layers concentric with the globe which it surrounds, the density of the layers being always less the greater the height above the surface of the globe. Then a particle situated at the common boundary of two contiguous layers will be urged upwards by the elastic force of the lower layer, and downwards by that of the upper layer, and will on the whole be urged upwards, because the lower layer is of greater density than the other, and has, consequently, greater elastic force. This excess of upward action is, in the supposed case of equilibrium, just counteracted by the gravitating force of the globe. Now, it is evident that by proceeding upwards we must at length reach a point where the elastic force of a layer on a superficial particle only suffices to counteract the downward gravitating force, and that there can be no layer above this height, at which, consequently, the atmosphere terminates.

Again, considering the vast size of the sun, and the effect of its gravitation on the atmospheric layers in determining their density and refractive power, we may at once pronounce, from terrestrial experience, that the path of a ray would be more curved than the sun's surface, and that the refraction would, therefore, be of the kind which has a limit to the angle of incidence. But, instead of the case of rays entering into an atmosphere from an external object, we have now that of rays originating within the atmosphere and issuing from it. The previous reasoning, however, still applies; it being a general optical law that if light travels along any path in one direction, it can travel along the same in the opposite direction. Thus, for rays originating in the solar atmosphere and issuing from it, there will be a limiting course making a minimum angle with the sun's surface. originating in any point of this course and travelling along it, will all emerge in a direction tangential to the superior boundary, so as to appear to a spectator at a great distance, for instance at the earth, to come precisely from the sun's periphery. Rays starting from points situated beyond the limiting course cannot reach the spectator, and those starting from points within the same will seem to come from points within the periphery.

I come now to the main inference relative to the sun's atmospheric refraction, to which the above reasoning conducts. Admitting, as we have already done, that the body of the sun is surrounded by a cloud-stratum upborne by the atmosphere, and that at the superior limit of this stratum there are enormous ridges and depressions, these inequalities, according to our reasoning, will all disappear at the sun's periphery, being brought by the refraction to the level of the top of the atmosphere. Such an effect of refraction may be well represented by the simple experiment of placing a coin in a basin of water, filling the basin to the brim, and then looking along the water-surface. The coin will be seen at the level of the surface independently of its actual depth below. Accordingly the sun's border should appear perfectly even and circular excepting so far as variations may be produced by disturbing causes giving rise to variations in the height of the atmosphere. Now this general regularity of the sun's contour is matter of actual observation, cases of exception having been very rarely noticed, and those that have been recorded being apparently such as may be referred to abnormal atmospheric disturbances. Consequently, as the general evenness of the sun's periphery is a fact admitting of explanation by the hypothesis of an atmosphere, we have thus an additional reason for concluding that the sun has an

Before proceeding to another argument it will be proper to notice certain objections that may be

raised against the foregoing one. It is well known that during a total eclipse of the sun, peculiar red protuberances and patches of light have been seen contiguous to the border, and in some instances actually separated from it, so as to have the appearance of cloud suspended in an atmosphere. These phenomena would, therefore, seem to be contradictory to the above conclusions, according to which no cloud can appear above the sun's periphery. We know, however, so little about the nature and origin of these protuberances, that instead of pronouncing them to be cloud, it would perhaps be the truer course to admit, in reliance upon the foregoing induction, that they are outside the sun's atmosphere, and must therefore essentially differ in quality from cloud. If this be admitted, it is not difficult to make a conjecture as to their nature by reference to analogous terrestrial phenomena. From personal observation I can say that the light of an Aurora Borealis sometimes takes the form of nebulous patches, not distinguishable from ordinary cloud except by suddenly waxing and waning; and, what is still more to the purpose, I have never witnessed from the Cambridge Observatory any great display of Aurora without seeing large portions of the sky, situated towards the W.N.W. and N.E. points of the compass, covered with ruddy nebulous light, which could easily be distinguished from that of the streamers by its comparative permanence as to position and intensity. By comparison with observations made at other localities I have ascertained that these auroral clouds are at an elevation considerably greater than that usually assigned to the earth's atmosphere, and it seems probable that one portion, the larger, was over the Atlantic, and the other over the German Ocean. To this light, in common with all auroral light, we may ascribe a magnetic origin. With respect to the solar red lights, observation has suggested to several observers that some relation exists between their positions and those of spots that have either broken out, or are on the point of breaking out, on the sun's photosphere. It is at least reasonable to suppose that they are related to certain conditions of the photosphere and its underlying stratum of cloud. If, then, it be admitted that, like the terrestrial lights, they have a magnetic origin, may we not suppose that the solar magnetic currents to which they would be due, are caused by different thermic and electric conditions of contiguous portions of the cloud-stratum?

It may, again, be objected that during a total solar eclipse the sun is seen to be surrounded by a corona of considerable brilliance, which appears to owe its origin to reflected light dispersed in all directions from an atmosphere extending beyond the apparent disc. But the accounts and delineations of the corona do not accord with this view. It is very variously represented by different observers at different times, and seems for the most part to consist of large pointed masses of light, stretching to very unequal lengths from different parts of the sun's circumference. The absence of all regularity, symmetry, and constancy in this light seems wholly irreconcileable with its being due to reflections from a solar atmosphere. There are, however, terrestrial phenomena which may help us to a conception of its nature. The ascertained altitudes of auroral arches and streamers prove that light may originate in parts of space elevated far above any height we can reasonably give to the earth's atmosphere. Seemingly the magnetic currents at these elevations are liable, under abnormal terrestrial, or cosmical, conditions, to be jostled and interfered with in such a manner as to become sources of light. If, then, the ætherial medium, in which all light is considered to be generated and propagated, and in motions of which magnetic currents may consist, be supposed to be similarly disturbed in the regions above the sun's atmosphere, we shall thus ascribe the corona of a total solar eclipse to the operation of such causes only as have their analogies at the earth. With respect to the sun, the disturbing causes would have like relations to all parts of the surface. and the corona would consequently entirely surround the sun, as is observed to be the case.

The fourth, and last, evidence of the existence of a solar atmosphere which I propose to adduce, is of a peculiar character, depending both on the ordinary analysis of sun-light by the prism, and on recent discoveries respecting properties of the light of incandescent gases. A spectrum of sun-light, elongated horizontally, is found to be traversed by a large number of vertical dark lines, which, having been carefully studied and mapped by Fraunhofer, are called after his name. That philosopher also made the singular discovery that the flame of sodium vapour exhibits in its spectrum a double bright yellow line exactly in the position of the double dark line in the solar spectrum, which he designates by the letter D. Many like accordances have since been found by analyzing the light from the incandescent vapours of various metals; and, in particular, a large number of the characteristic bright lines of the vapour of iron coincide exactly as to position with dark lines of the solar spectrum. These facts seemed to afford a clue to the discovery of the nature and origin of Fraunhofer's lines. But there was the puzzling circumstance, that whereas these lines are dark the artificially-produced lines are bright. This difficulty has been in great measure overcome by the experiments of Professor Kirchhoff of Heidelberg, who on viewing the spectrum of the Drummond lime-light, which contains no dark lines, simultaneously with the spectrum of a suitable flame coloured by common salt (chloride of sodium), saw dark lines in the places of the usual bright sodium lines. Thus he had obtained artificially the very same phenomenon as the solar line D. To explain the reversion from brightness to darkness he supposes that "the sodium flame absorbs rays of the same refrangibility as those it emits, while it is perfectly transparent for all other rays." To a certain extent this supposition accounts for the observed facts; for the Drummond light, consisting of light of every refrangibility, contains some light of the same refrangibility as the sodium flame, and the absorption of this portion by the flame produces a dark line, which the proper light of the flame is unable to obliterate, being too feeble when contrasted with the bright rays from the lime-light which are contiguous to the dark line. To explain fully why the line is dark, a physical reason should also be given for the assumed law of absorption. But an investigation of this kind would not be suitable to these pages; and, moreover, for our present purpose it will suffice to accept the law as a mere result of experiment.

The application of the preceding experimental results in explaining the dark lines of the solar spectrum is very obvious. The Drummond light corresponds to the intense light which emanates from the solar photosphere. This, like all other original light, has at its origin no dark lines. The dark lines are produced, as the experiments show, by transmission of the light through incandescent vapours. These vapours must be held in suspension in the sun's atmosphere, which, it may be presumed, extends very far beyond the cloud-stratum and photosphere. The incandescence of the vapours may well be attributed to the intense heat which accompanies sun-light. In the spectrum analysis the proper light of the vapours in the sun's atmosphere is received simultaneously with the sun-light from the photosphere, and thus the natural circumstances of the experiment are exactly like the before mentioned artificial circumstances. may therefore conclude that the dark lines of the solar spectrum are caused by the absorption, in incandescent vapours suspended in the solar atmosphere, of rays of the same refrangibility and colour as those which are characteristic of the vapours. So fixedly and peculiarly are incandescent vapours. or coloured flames, characterized by the bright lines of their spectra, that we may with certainty infer from the lines the presence of the substances. In this way, according to Kirchhoff,* experiment has demonstrated that the material of the sun contains iron, nickel, sodium, calcium, magnesium, chromium, and, with more or less certainty, various other metals. Now it is to be noted that the preceding explanation of the production of the fixed lines of the spectrum, with which these results, so unlooked for and of such extreme interest, are intimately connected, rests on the hypothesis of a solar atmosphere. We may therefore, from this argument, superadded to those that have gone before, confidently conclude that the sun has an atmosphere.

It remains to notice the views respecting the nature of the solar spots which were previously referred to as being at variance with those maintained in this essay. I allude to the theory of the spots proposed by Kirchhoff in that portion of his memoir on the solar spectrum which relates to the physical constitution of the sun. According to that theory, the sun consists of a solid or liquid nucleus, heated to a temperature of the brightest whiteness, and surrounded by an atmosphere of somewhat lower temperature. Local diminution of temperature gives rise to the formation of clouds of chemical composition different from those of the earth. When a cloud is once formed it receives accretions in consequence of the cooling of the at. mosphere above it by its cutting off the sun's rays. The same depression of temperature always produces in some unexplained manner a larger and more transparent cloud at some elevation above the first. The primary cloud corresponds to the nucleus of a solar spot, and the other to the penumbra. If these two clouds be supposed to occupy the positions of the circular ends of the conical frustum in Wilson's theory, and to be of the same size, the explanations of the changes of appearance that occur as a spot recedes from, or approaches, the sun's border, will be the same in both theories .- with this important difference. According to that of Wilson, when a spot is very near the border, the portion of the nucleus which in visual direction lies outside the penumbra would be invisible; according to the other theory, it would be visible. From my own observations I can say that instances not unfrequently occur, which, to all appearance, agree with the former inference, and consequently contradict the other, whilst I do not remember to have ever witnessed an instance of conformity to the latter. Moreover, a phenomenon has been noticed by Scheiner, Wilson, and other observers, and of which I saw a remarkable example with the Northumberland telescope on July 26, 1862, which appears to be inconsistent with Kirchhoff's theory. The nucleus of a large spot is seen to be divided into two parts by luminous matter considerably exceeding in brightness the general luminosity of the sun's surface, while, on the contrary, that theory would require the position of this lucid substance to be occupied by the second cloud, which has only the brightness of penumbra. The fact, which is thus contradictory to the one theory, appears to admit of being explained as follows by the other. According to Wilson's views, the luminous partition may be considered to be of the same substance as that which constitutes the photosphere generally, and being either drifted across the mouth of the excavation, or generated there by the meeting of different atmospheric currents, to be rendered brilliant by a direct intensifying action passing from the body of the Sun uninterruptedly through the conical opening. The phenomenon has all the appearance of matter intervening between the nucleus and the spectator, and has accordingly been usually described by observers as a bridge across an excavation.

Whatever credit the eminent German physicist may have gained by his admirable experimental researches on the solar spectrum, his theoretical explanations can be accepted only so far as they accord with phenomena; and this test, as I think I have shown, they do not bear. In the part of his memoir already referred to he has thought proper to make some strictures upon what he considers to be Wilson's theory, but by a singular oversight has confounded it with one proposed subsequently by Sir W. Herschel. He has, consequently, omitted all reference to the "sloping sides" of the "excavations," on which Wilson's explanation of the penumbra essentially depends, and thus his arguments, as against that explanation, are entirely aimless. If we receive Kirchhoff's theory, we must be content to regard the superficial parts of the sun as consisting of molten matter in a state of perpetual agitation,-a fiery waste, wholly incompatible with the life of either vegetable or animal organisms. On the other hand, if the views and explanations advocated in this essay be true, or near the truth,-and I think I may say that they are at least as consistent with observed facts and scientific principles as any others that have been proposed, -we shall have reason for entertaining the belief that the sun, while it is the source of light and life to distant worlds, is itself the abode of life. We cannot be supposed to know all the conditions under which life is possible; but inasmuch as scientific research has led to the conclusion that the sun has really an atmosphere, and that it is not improbable that any organic bodies that may exist on its surface are protected from the direct impact of its fiery rays by a beneficent canopy of cloud, suspended in the atmosphere, and capable at the same time of dispensing on the land beneath the blessing of rain, the opinion will appear to be not altogether unfounded that "the great orb of day" may be the habitation of sentient and intelligent beings, breathing the breath of life, and possessing faculties proper for understanding the works of their great Creator and giving Him praise.

WILLIAM COWPER.

BY THE LATE A. H. CLOUGH.

WILLIAM COWPER was born in the year 1731, in the Rectory, Great Berkhampstead, Hertfordshire. His family was ancient, and had latterly been distinguished in the person of Lord Chancellor Cowper, the poet's great-uncle: on the mother's side he belonged to the family of Donne, the divine and satirist of the times of Charles I. Cowper lost his mother at the age of six; and was at that early age sent from home to his first school, where he suffered greatly from the cruelty of one of his schoolfellows. But the greater part of his schooltime was spent at Westminster, where he remained from 1741 to 1749, eight perhaps of the pleasantest years of his life. His animal spirits were still lively and undisturbed, and he was enjoying opportunities which he did not neglect for forming friendships and cultivating letters. These friendships he did not carry with him far into after life; but the books he there studied were with his mind to the last; and the influence of the public school was very great, if not on his character, at any rate on his tastes and capacities.

At the age of eighteen, in the year 1749, he left Westminster; a succeeding period of fourteen years he spent in a somewhat desultory study of the law—three in a solicitor's office, where his fellow-clerk was Thurlow, afterwards Lord Chancellor, the rest in the Temple.

Intimate domestic intercourse with the family of his uncle, who had two daughters, and some literary society, formed his enjoyments. With Theodora, one of the two cousins, he formed an engagement which the father refused to sanction: apparently a great distress to both. His literary friends were his former schoolfellows: Thornton, a translator of Terence, and Lloyd an occasional magazine-writer, and Colman the dramatist.

This was the second era of British essayists.

The old fashion of the Guardian, Tatler, Spectator, Freeholder, &c., had been re-introduced. Johnson was writing the Rambler, Dr. Hawkesworth the Adventurer, Lord Chesterfield the World, and Cowper contributed a few papers to the Connoisseur, which his immediate friends were conducting.

In 1756 he lost his father, and three years after was made a Commissioner of Bankrupts; but law seems not to have had much of his attention. The enjoyments of domestic society and literary amusements were broken only by occasional anxiety for his future means of subsistence, and something of religious dejection and fear. One passing fit of this kind he has recorded, during his schoolboy years; another much more severe befell him when he first began to live alone at the Temple. It was dissipated by an excursion with his relations at Southampton.

The crisis of his life came in his thirty-third year, 1763. It found him disappointed in his attachment for his cousin; and anxious about approaching pecuniary difficulties.

The appointment to the office of Clerk of the Journals of the House of Lords was in the hands of his relation, Major, afterwards General Cowper. He had casually expressed a wish, which he afterwards regarded with horror as a crime, that on the death of the present official he might receive the place. This death shortly after did occur; and Cowper was nominated to fill a vacancy which it caused. This of itself seems to have disturbed him, but the appointment was disputed; and it was determined that Cowper's competency should be tested by an examination at the bar of the House of Lords. The prospect of this public trial worked with such force on Cowper's mind, that he was driven to more than one attempt at suicide, the last of which was only defeated by the breaking of the garter with which he was hanging himself. This was shortly followed by a long fit of lunacy, during which he was placed under the charge of a physician at St. Albans.

But though restored by this care, to return to London was naturally most distasteful to him. His relatives subscribed to raise a fund for his support, and with a view of being near his brother, a fellow of a college at Cambridge, he took lodgings at Huntingdon. He visited his brother from thence occasionally, but otherwise withdrew from personal intercourse with his relations, and was forgotten by his old literary friends and schoolfellows, some of whom were now dead. It was in the solitude of this common country town, and in connections apparently accidental, but as he thought specially providential, that he found the atmosphere in which he could breathe freely, and took the course and character of life which he thenceforth never deserted. Religious feelings, of the strongly devotional and personal kind, revived in England by Wesley and Whitfield during Cowper's childhood, had since then permeated far through middle, lower, and even upper classes. One of Cowper's near relations had imbibed something of them, and a distant cousin a great deal. Cowper's own mind, sensitive and self-introspective, timid, reflective, and affectionate, was peculiarly open to this new epidemic influence; his recovery from insanity had been attended with the highest religious enthusiasm; in fact he believed it to be an immediate divine interposition; and to the development of such a temper of mind his present circumstances gave great scope.

At Huntingdon after some time he made the acquaintance of the Unwins, a clergyman with a wife and son and daughter. Mr. Unwin and the son in particular attracted him; he presently arranged to lodge in their house; and in their society found his devotional feelings and habits cherished and his separation from the outer world more and more completely established.

In the serenity of this domestication he passed about two years; but a change was suddenly caused by the accidental death of Mr. Unwin in July 1767. Cowper continued to live with Mrs. Unwin, and removed with her from Huntingdon to the village of Olney in Buckingham. The object of this choice was to attend the ministrations of John Newton, at that time curate of Olney, who was already well known and was afterwards famous as an evangelical preacher.

His introduction to this friend (for such he henceforward was) is another epoch in Cowper's life. Of a far severer and more exacting religious temper than the gentle family of the Unwins, his influence tyranny, and the discipline he imposed to have been the main cause of Cowper's subsequent dejection and relapses into lunacy. Originally the captain of an African slave-ship, he had at Olney a popular repute for preaching people mad. Cowper, bowing with his natural timidity to a will far stronger than his own, was yet incapable of overcoming the repugnance of his nature. Employed by him during the long years of their daily intercourse as a sort of assistant curate, attending the sick and the dying, and called upon continually, in spite of his horror of publicity, to offer up extempore prayers, yielding up as he did his will in perfect submission to the directions of his spiritual master, Cowper's nature had no other refuge or defence but a second fit of insanity.

This occurred in 1774, seven years after the first removal to Olney. When it passed off it left the patient with impressions exactly the reverse of those which attended the previous recovery. A religious despondency far more determined than the religious confidence of the first occasion followed the second, and was henceforth never entirely removed. Mr. Newton had overstrained him, and his elasticity of spirit on this point was gone for ever. He now refused to join in devotional exercises, for which he deemed himself unworthy; and all conversation on topics of personal religion appears henceforth to have been a distress to him. the burthen, for such it must have been, of his friend's society was taken away: Mr. Newton was removed to a more important pulpit in London, and Mrs. Unwin was now his sole companion.

Seeking in this solitude to divert his morbid melancholy by a variety of petty occupations, gardening, carpentering, keeping hares, drawing, &c., Cowper at last fell upon making verses, a task not indeed new to him, for during his earlier life in London he had produced love verses to his cousin Theodora, and other small pieces, sufficient, after his death, to fill a small volume; and under Mr. Newton's discipline he had contributed largely to the Olney hymns; but he now upon Mrs. Unwin's encouragement set himself to compositions of greater bulk and more purpose. She set him the subject of the Progress of Error. Mr. Newton approved of his performance, and others quickly followed. It was not long before he found himself sufficiently stocked to be able to propose a volume for publication, and correspondence with his publisher, correction of proof-sheets, and correction of the poems themselves were found more efficacious than any previous occupations in calling off his interests from the subjects which saddened him, and in relieving his diseased imagination.

The book appeared, and presented him for the first time to the public in the 52nd year of his age, 1782. It was not very successful. Franklin, then at Paris on American business, sent the author his thanks and approbation; but this was the highest homage he received. One of the great reviews of over Cowper seems to have bordered upon a the time was extremely severe upon it. Cowper, however, was well pleased with the pleasure expressed in it by his immediate friends, and was attracted, at the same time, and forced to continued composition by his own impulses and necessities. An incident also had occurred whilst he was still employed on the volume, which led the way most happily to the next publication. A certain Lady Austen chanced to come to the neighbourhood, and to accompany a relative to call on Mrs. Unwin. She was lively, had seen much of the world, and vet was natural and easy enough to please and not to alarm the recluse of Olney. She was admirably qualified to incite him to that interchange of light and happy pleasantry, in which he took particular pleasure and particularly excelled. On the whole their intercourse was so agreeable on both sides that Lady Austen resolved to take a house at Olney, and at Olney accordingly, in the vicarage deserted by Mr. Newton, with its garden adjoining, and opening into that of Mrs. Unwin and Cowper's house, she passed a considerable portion of the years '82 and '83. Her influence in prompting Cowper's literary exertions was most fruitful and well directed; his happiest compositions are almost all due to her. It was she who told the story of John Gilpin; her music suggested the dirge for the Royal George, and she set the "Task." What he might have done under other inspiration, we of course do not know, but certainly without the poems which he did write under her inspiration, his works would present little that could hope to live. "From a scene of the most uninterrupted retirement," he says to Mr. Unwin, "we have passed at once into a state of constant engagement. Not that our society is much multiplied; the addition of an individual has made all the difference. Lady Austen and we pass our days alternately at each other's chateau. In the morning I walk with one or other of the ladies, and in the afternoon wind thread. Thus did Hercules, and thus probably did Samson; and thus do I. And were both those heroes living, I should not fear to challenge them to a trial of skill in that business, or doubt to beat them both. As to killing lions and other amusements of that kind with which they were so delighted, I should be their humble servant, and beg to be excused."

It was one of these afternoons, when Cowper was beginning to sink into one of his fits of depression, that Lady Austen told the story of John Gilpin, which told by her lips seized his fancy, and the next morning he reported that he had been kept awake most of the night by the story, which he had turned into a ballad. The ballad was sent to Mr. Unwin, and was published in a newspaper anonymously. There it lay dormant for about three years, and then strangely enough blazed into a sudden flame of immense popularity. Henderson, a celebrated actor, gave it in a course of recitations during Lent; and, comparatively unknown before, it caught the taste of the audience, and thenceforth was in every one's mouth.

But this did not come about till 1785, when the "Task" was already on the eve of publication. The occasion of the "Task" and the explanation of the title bring us back to Lady Austen. What should be his subject? he asked of his lively lady friend when he had promised to comply with her often-urged request, that he should try the composition of blank verse. "Oh, you can never want a subject," was her answer; "you can write upon anything—write upon this sofa." Such was the task imposed; and to the subject thus given him, the poet applied himself in the well-known exordium,

"I sing the sofa."

To begin with a light and casual, unambitious and seemingly frivolous theme, and floated thus, as it were, into the waters, gradually to gather courage for severer topics and more difficult undertakings, was just the sort of style which suited Cowper's timid and feminine genius. The "Task" was begun early in the summer of 1783. It is characteristic of the poet, also, that he never named it to his most intended in the friends and continual correspondents, Mr. Unwin and Mr. Newton, until it was finished. It gave him delight to surprise them, whereas to feel that they were conscious of what he was doing, and expecting the produce of his capricious powers, would probably have crippled if not paralysed them.

The autumn of the following year, 1784, found the magnum opus complete and transcribed ready for the press. In this condition it was now sent to Mr. Unwin; and information of its existence given to Mr. Newton. In the summer of 1785 it appeared before the public; John Gilpin figuring among some miscellaneous poems appended. And John Gilpin, now first claimed by Cowper as his, had, it is said, a considerable share in producing the popularity which presently attended the "Task." The fame of the ballad induced people to read the new moral poem; as again the beauties they found there led them to read further the poet's hitherto little noticed first volume. But the intrinsic merit of the "Task" was quite sufficient to maintain a popularity once, by whatever means, attracted. It fell in with, while at the same time it headed and led, the feelings and taste of the time. It was what people wanted to hear said, and more, it developed a taste which it found nascent only as yet, and hardly formed. It was found generally delightful, and generally elevating and purifying.

1785 is Cowper's culmination; rather a late one, for he was now 54 years old. To him personally the results were extremely agreeable; without being much persecuted in modern style as a wonder, or finding his country seclusion invaded and his privacy intruded on by inquisitive visitors, he was drawn into cheerful communication with relations, old friends, and new ones.

This is the period of his exuberant correspondence with the sister of that Theodora whom he was attached to in his youth, his other cousin, Harriet Lady Hesketh, the wife and now the widow of a Sir Thomas Hesketh. Through her he received continual gifts and presents from an unnamed benefactor, not improbably his cousin Theodora herself. With General Cowper also (who had been the giver of the ill-omened situation in the House of Lords) he resumed a familiar correspondence. His mother's relatives wrote to him and sent him her picture, which was in their possession; an incident which was the occasion of the most admired of his minor poems. Another, a young man named Johnson, sought him out, and once introduced soon became intimate and dear to him. Two old schoolfellows claimed an interest in him, with the view to serve him, and at last even his taciturn and severe sometime fellow-clerk, Lord Thurlow, communicated with him.

Lady Hesketh came to Olney to stay with her cousin (occupying part of the neighbouring vicarage), in 1786. Through her kind assistance he and Mrs. Unwin were in a few months' time removed from a dwelling which seems to have been far from commodious to one far more convenient in the pleasantest situation of the whole neighbourhood—the Lodge, at Weston, a small village close by the house and domain of Mr. and Mrs. Throckmorton, who for some time back had shown Cowper great friendliness, that had ripened into intimacy, whose grounds had long been his pleasantest resort and are often alluded to in his letters and poems.

Before the "Task" had issued from the press, and within one week of the conclusion of his last composition for that volume, Cowper urged by the need of employment had found out for himself a new task sufficient to employ every leisure moment for some years to come.

Under the pressure of a fit of despondency he sat down and translated the first twenty lines of the Iliad; the same evil again drove him to the same remedy, and so he proceeded on his way, till at last, when he revealed his occupation in a letter to Lady Hesketh just a year from the date of its first commencement, he was completing the 21st book of the Iliad. "Tully's rule," he says, "nulla dies sine lined, will make a volume in less time than one would suppose. I adhered to it so rigidly in composing the 'Task, that though more than once I found three lines as many as I had time to compose, still I wrote, and finding occasionally and as it might happen a more fluent vein, the abundance of one day made me amends for the barrenness of another."

But of Homer he set himself 40 lines regular piecework per diem. While he was yet hardly more than a boy he had joined a friend in going through the whole of Pope's translation with the original before him; and the two students had satisfied their minds as to the flagrant discrepancy and unfitness of the English Homer. And his old Westminster acquirements were tolerably adequate to carry him through the Greek with very small help from commentators, to whom, living as he did without books (for he had sold his small hibrary when he quitted London), he had no easy means of access. The Iliad and Odyssey together, he says, consist of about 40,000 verses. To translate these will furnish me with occupation for a considerable time. But as his letter at the end of the first year shows, he went on very rapidly with it in the first copy. With the revision he took infinite pains, and this occupied him long.

In this work and in the enjoyment of intercourse, face to face or by letter, with Lady Hesketh, and a few other newly-found or re-found relatives and friends, Cowper spent the seven years between 1784 and 1791. In 1791 the Translation was published.

Friends who had regretted that in his eagerness to seek employment he had taken refuge in translation, without awaiting the occurrence of some original subject, now were forward to suggest what they thought might produce a worthy successor to the "Task." But the Mediterranean or the Four Ages of Man's Life were topics too ambitious to kindle his inspiration. The latter indeed pleased him so well that he commenced upon it, But another and after theme had taken his fancy, an oak in Yardley Chase near enough to be reached by a walk and believed to be as old as the Norman Conquest. "He never bestowed more labour," says his not judicious biographer, "on any of his compositions, than on the commencement of a poem on this tree, nor did he ever labour more successfully." The style is certainly maturer and more simply powerful than that which prevails in the "Task," with more labour perhaps there is less appearance of effort. No hint of his intentions was ever given to any of his friends, that he might have the pleasure of surprising them, and he probably looked forward with the more confidence to completing it, as it would not have naturally extended beyond a few hundred lines. But he had already set himself an employment in an edition of Milton which he had engaged to superintend, with translations of the Latin and Italian poems, an employment which as it proved was more than enough to occupy all the literary leisure that was henceforth to be allowed him. For shortly after this commences the gloomy and overcast evening and nightfall of the life whose afternoon had been so sunny and cheerful.

In 1792 Mrs. Unwin had two strokes of paralysis, which also affected her mind. She who had so long been taken up in providing for Cowper's bodily and mental comforts suddenly became helpless and dependent, and worse than all, impatient and despotic in exacting those attentions which his affection and gratitude made him only too ready to tender with devotion and forgetfulness of himself. This state of things, a sad change indeed, was not at first so grievous in its effects. Cowper was able to proceed with his new task, which had had one pleasant result, in obtaining him the acquaintance of Hayley, a poet now forgotten except in connection with Cowper, but in his day of great celebrity. Mrs. Unwin was able to accompany him on a visit to this new friend at his country house on the south coast in Sussex. Here he spent some time in a literary atmosphere that must have been new and strange to him. Here his portrait was taken by Romney, Flaxman's friend and Sir Joshua Reynolds' competitor; here he met Hurdis and Charlotte Smith, and was not far from meeting Thurlow. On his way back he met his aged relative, General Cowper, and actually revisited, after an interval of twenty-nine years, his little-loved London, and re-entered the dusky purlieus of the law to breakfast in chambers in Chancery Lane, with Rose, one of the young admirers who had sought him at Olney.

Some sunlight still was shining for him in this visit: vet whilst he was living amongst the literati of Eartham, and receiving the homage of affectionate admirers, it appears that he was in constant correspondence with a poor schoolmaster at Olney, whom Cowper believed to be visited by divine communications respecting himself and his spiritual condition and prospects. It was only on encouragement received from this quarter that the journey to the south was undertaken; and Mrs. Unwin in her enfeebled condition unfortunately was only too ready to join in her companion's belief. The religious cloud of gloom was evidently gathering. Visits which Hayley made repeatedly at this time to Weston (Lady Hesketh was kept away by circumstances) helped to keep it off. But in 1794 it settled never again to be removed.

The confinement and want of exercise, which his attention to his helpless charge now enforced on him, of themselves were enough to depress him. His engagement to edit Milton was even felt to be a burden. Mrs. Unwin's son, one of the most cheerful and happyminded of his friends, had died a year or two before; Lady Hesketh, as I said, was kept away, household expenses also, which he now had to arrange, were an annoyance and an anxiety. Early in 1794, a pension of 300l. a year was granted him, and Lady Hesketh was already at Weston. But it was now too late.

In order to protect him from the despotic humour of Mrs. Unwin, in which, as supposed mistress of the house, she was at Weston more likely to indulge, and also to get rid of certain dependents who took advantage of the feebleness of their benefactors to pillage them, it was thought desirable to remove the two invalids from the neighbourhood they had so long been attached to. This was effected, not without difficulty, by Lady Hesketh and Mr. Johnson, to whose house in the country of Cowper's maternal relations they were conveyed.

He was moved about to various places in Norfolk with the hope of some benefit from change, and at last was settled at East Dereham, Mr. Johnson's living. No change however of place, or scene, or circumstance, during his five remaining sad years was found to avail, not even the death, in the second of the five, of Mrs. Unwin. His Homer was laid before him and he was thus induced to revise it once again, but when that was completed, an attempt to replace it by the Four Ages was made in vain.

The well-known pathetic stanzas to Mrs. Unwin were written not long before leaving Weston; his last original poem was "The Castaway," founded on an incident in Anson's Voyages, which seems to have struck him by its figurative applicability to his own supposed spiritual state.

They took at last to reading his own poems over to him. Beginning with the first volume, Mr. Johnson went through them, and he listened in silence till they came to John Gilpin, which he begged not to hear. His unpublished poems followed; he heard them willingly, but without remark.

His last employment was translating some of Gay's Fables into Latin verse. He died on the 25th of April, in the last year of the century, and the 70th of his age. He was buried in East Dereham church.

The "Task" is undoubtedly Cowper's greatest poem, as the ballad of John Gilpin was the most popular. Amongst his minor pieces should be mentioned the commencement of the unfinished poem on the "Yardley Oak," the "Stanzas to Mrs. Unwin," "The Castaway," the "Lines on Receiving his Mother's Picture," the "Soliloquy of Alexander Selkirk," the "Dirge on the Sinking of the Royal George," and the "Address of Boadicea."

"SPIDERS!! What a subject for an article! Let us skip it, and get on to the next!" exclaims some one after reading the heading. But be in no hurry, my reader! Try to read this article. The subject is striking. In all creation there exists not a more remarkable set of beings than spiders. I will try to be brief in their story.

Let me venture to alter a word in the song of the Second Fairy, in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and follow me, as the said Fairy calls, Shakespeare, in these two lines, has touched with his Master eye a leading peculiarity of the race.

Spiders are weavers. Who has not wondered at their webs?

A glance at any of our cuts will show that spiders have a body very different from that of insects, properly so called. They have their head and breast welded, as it were, into one piece,* while the body is in another piece, or division. To the first piece is attached that formidable apparatus, their mouth (fig. 2); on its upper surface are generally six or eight eyes; the latter number prevailing, although one genus is said to have only two eyes. To the under side are attached eight legs. The breathing apparatus of spiders, and indeed their general structure, from their palpi to their spinnerets, would take many papers to describe. Their very curious legs, with their combs, spines, and brushes, would alone furnish matter for columns. These structures must only be alluded to incidentally in this paper.

The figures will show parts of these in sufficient detail to point out the curious arrangement of eyes, claws, and spinnerets, at least in two of the genera. But let us glance at the webs of spiders for an instant.

to that well-known point in Strathearn, called Whitehill, on an autumn morning. The sun is breaking through the mist, which conceals the lovely prospect all around. The view of the country, from the Ochils to the Grampians, from "fair" Perth to the woods of Strathallan and Drummond Castle, is spread out before you, but hidden. So having no scenery to engage your attention, on this autumn morning, the many pretty fungi, springing up all around, attract your notice. The whin and broom bushes are a mere mass of close webs. The sun is shining on these. At a distance they are seemingly grey and dull. You go near to examine them more closely, and to make acquaintance with their makers and tenants, and, perhaps, also to see what prey their webs contain.

As you look on them, the webs shine with the lustre of mother-of-pearl, or opal. If an entomologist, you might fancy that the colours somewhat resemble the lovely hues that may be seen on the backs of some eastern beetles, found by Mr. Wallace. Naturalists like to be particular; and this last resemblance, at the time, occurred to me as being exact. The sheen on these webs, on the autumn morning of 1865 when I viewed them, exactly resembled at a short distance that on the back of a species of Weevil, of the genus Eupholus, brought from Celebes or some other Eastern island. As you approached more closely, the twinkling iridescence became more glorious. The rainbow hues glittered and glowed. Seldom had I seen anything more delicately beautiful; although the general impression was such as I had often witnessed in similar circumstances. This iridescence, however, did not entirely arise from the reflection of the sun on the dewy drops. I observed that the threads, on webs that appeared quite dry, glittered as my eye closely approached them. Sir David Brewster*has described this, and gives Sir John Herschel's explanation of it: "These colours," says he, "may arise either from the cause that produces colour in a single scratch or fissure, or the interference of light reflected from its opposite edges, or from the thread itself, as spun by the animal, consisting of several agglutinated together, and thus presenting not a cylindrical but a furrowed surface."

If the reader examine the cut (fig. 3), he will find that each thread of a spider's web is formed by the combination of threads many from their spinnerets, so that each thread has lines throughout its length, which can cause the light of the sun. reflected to the eve. show to the prismatic colours. But whether this be the explanation or not, I had never seen a more fairy-like vision. William Blake or Noel Paton could have peopled it with airies. The glittering webs would have become the magic carpet of the "little people," whom a gifted fancy might have conjured up.

I was on my way to examine for a second time, the curious library of Lord Maderty at Innerpeffray. where are many books that belonged to the great Marquis of Montrose. I walked on, leaving the webs to entrap the flies, and the spiders to pounce on them from their secret recesses, while those gifted with fancy, like Shakespeare, might see or imagine. what they chose. Any spider's web is well worth examination. Whoever cares to look at them. will soon find that there are many different kinds of these very curiously fabricated net-like or woven webs. Some are close and dense; some loose and irregular: a perfect maze of lines. Many are geometric and concentrical. All are wonderfully and most skilfully constructed. Some have long tubes connected with them; others are only tubes. Several of the foreign kinds, as we shall see, have regular trap-doors.

The habits of spiders are as various as their forms. Some spiders are essentially wanderers, regular vagabonds indeed! Naturalists in their books even call the Wolf spiders Vagabondæ. These Wolf spiders in summer and autumn may be seen wandering over fields or heaths, generally carrying their bag of eggs with them. The specimens you meet with are chiefly females. They are most careful of their precious charge of eggs. These eggs are enveloped in a cocoon, which is attached to the spinners by means of short threads of silk; on a summer or autumn day, one when walking can scarcely fail to see on a heath or in a garden, a specimen of some species of Wolf spider carrying this precious burden. If my memory does not deceive me, Pollok, the author of "The Course of Time," has referred to it in his delightful story of the persecutions, "Helen of the Glen." He had often seen a spider of this kind (Lycosa) on the hills and heaths of Renfrewshire and Ayrshire, and he introduces it as a characteristic object of the scene.

Many of the Crab spiders have such an arrangement of the legs that they can move backwards, forwards, or to the sides, with equal readiness. A slight search under stones or round their edges, such stones especially as are slightly imbedded in the ground or among grass, will be sure to reward you with one or more species of this genus. In the valley above lovely Dunira in Perthshire I found a pretty species of the group (Thomisus), and witnessed its peculiar motions with renewed pleasure.

But, see! what little black spider is this on a sunny wall! How prettily spotted and banded he is with white! He stops, then goes on again, and stops, as if with these clear eyes of his he saw some ogre ready to arrest him. No doubt he has seen you, and tries to make you believe that he is only a black dot of a lichen on the wall. Do not look at him too closely, and you will soon see him, as Mr. Blackwall describes him, "moving with great circumspection, and occasionally elevating his front half or 'cephalo-thorax,' by straightening the anterior legs, for the purpose of extending his sphere of vision."

He runs with ease on the most perpendicular surface, for he has an apparatus below his toes by which he can take firm hold (fig. 4). Look how he jumps on his prey, some little fly or other insect! He drew a line of silk from the spinners while in the very act of springing, and from the very point whence he vaulted. So that our friend, Salticus scenicus, has well earned his name Salticus, the leaper. If he has lost the object he jumped at, he has not lost his hold of the ground. It would be well for us to look always before we leap. We have not, like the spider, a cord to attach us to our places.

Figs. 1 and 2 exhibit the form of a species of Salticus, and the peculiar arrangement of the of the manners of wandering spiders, or to describe the Vaulters, the Jumpers, the Crawlers and the Pouncers. There are many varieties of them. Reference must be shortly made to a sedentary race, who spread a net for the wings and feet of their enemies.

These spiders are the commonest of our garden spiders-the spider which constructs the geometric web. These "symmetrical snares," as our great spider lover, Mr. Blackwall, calls them,* are described distinctly by him in words which sound somewhat "Johnsonian;" but for which it would be difficult to substitute anything more short, simple, or clear. "They consist," he writes, "of an elastic spiral line thickly studded with minute globules of liquid gum, whose circumvolutions, falling within the same plane, are crossed by radii converging towards a common centre, which is immediately surrounded by several circumvolutions of a short spiral line devoid of viscid globules, forming a station from which the toils may be superintended by their owner without the inconvenience of being entangled in them. Examine the strong moveable spire near the end of the last joint of each hind leg in this spider, and you will find that they are of great use in the economy of the creature." "By the contraction of the flexor muscles," I again quote Mr. Blackwall, "they are drawn towards the foot, and are thus brought into direct opposition to the claws, by which means the animals are enabled to hold with a firm grasp such lines as they have occasion to draw from the spinners with the feet of the hind legs, and such also as they design to attach themselves to."

. How true is Shakespeare's epithet, applied to Cardinal Wolsey in "King Henry VIII.":—

"spider-like,
Out of his self-drawing web, he gives us note,
The force of his own merit makes his way."
Act i., scene i.

The assiduity, the patient working and watching of spiders are most note-worthy traits. The story of Robert the Bruce and the spider—and there seems to be little doubt of its truth—is even classical. The perseverance of a spider to fix its line, notwithstanding many failures, attracted the attention of the Scottish King, and stimulated his courage in very adverse circumstances.

Watch the sudden issue of the spider from her recess when a fly is entangled in her web, and how soon she can secure her prey beyond possibility of escape!

But let me just allude to a fact mentioned by Mr. Blackwall, with regard to the web of Epeira apoclisa. He says that upwards of 120,000 viscid globules are distributed upon the elastic spiral line in a net of large dimensions, and that yet under favourable circumstances the time required for its completion seldom exceeds forty minutes! There is a wonderful weaver! Why, it beats any spinning jenny in the world, and yet the constructor is only a simple spider. Truly has the poet written:

"The spider's touch, how exquisitely fine!"

In the month of May or June, you may see against palings, or on the posts of a garden door, a little agglomerated mass,—a ball of yellow points. Touch it: and down drop the little creatures from the loose web amidst which the little vellow ball was These hung. yellow balls are spiders just hatched. Their mother carefully enclosed them in a silken cocoon. and now warm spring has brought them out. How they drop, carefully suspended by their thread! The black spot on their abdomen sets off the yellow very nicely. If you look nearer, you will find a few members of the nest with a go-a-head tendency, like a Scot or a Saxon Yankee-commencing business for themselves-spinning very passable geometric webs; rather too near for savage nature to tolerate, when size has developed their powers. Pretty innocents! their strength is in combination. Midges are their prey; not blow-flies or buzzing Volucellæ: light filmy flies, juicy enough for their baby fangs, and with no struggle in their wings or legs. I have often noticed this species, it is one of the Epeiræ. Space warns me, however, that this is a paper, and not a book, on spiders. How wonderful, again, is the bell of the water-spider! and how clever the constructor of that rare production! Read Professor Bell's observations on the habits of the Argyroneta, or water-spider, and if you have an aquarium you may test them for yourself.

But I must conclude this too brief notice of the habits of spiders with a mere allusion to the trapdoor spider (fig. 1). There are many species of these; I have seen only one alive. It was brought from Algeria. The nest was constructed in a clay bank, excavated by the cunning Cteniza or Actinopus. The tube, excavated to some depth, was lined with a dense web. The top of this tube, where it was flush with the ground, had a door so constructed as to close, or rather to fall down, after the tenant had quitted it on some foraging excursion (fig. 2). It was thinnest at the hinge, and gradually thickened, and became heavier, towards the outer edge. It is described as a curious sight, to see the spider suddenly escaping down this silken tube. I know he can hold down the door with his feet, so that it requires some force to raise it. The spider had actually holes on the under side of the lid, into which he must have placed his legs to resist any attempt at opening it. In the British Museum, we had two or three different specimens, which showed that, like a cunning workman, the trap-door spider could make a second door, when he had worked his way through the angle of a bank and had come out unexpectedly at the other side. Another spider of this group had evidently added a piece to his nest, and constructed a second door above the other. The fact was, some débris had fallen on the other door, and covered it up for an inch or so. Like a clever engineer, he had tunnelled through this, and to save trouble had left the old gate outside his work.

Had I space, I would be tempted to describe the great Mygales of the tropics, one of which, named by a naturalist Mygale Emilia, is most beautifully coloured. Another, almost as finely coloured, is named M. Zebra. Some of the Mygales, as Mr. Bates has seen them, can certainly destroy birds. I have seen a live Mygale tear a large Cockroach to pieces in double quick time.

A remarkable power that some, indeed many, spiders possess, is that of making themselves invisible. Any one may test this for himself. It has been described in so lively and admirable a way, by an author I had the privilege of knowing, that my readers will be sure to prefer his description to any that I could produce. Hugh Miller, when a boy, observed the habits of insects and spiders on Cromarty hill and its woods. He writes :- "The large Diadem Spider, which spins so strong a web that, in pressing my way through the furze thickets, I could hear its white silken cords crack as they yielded before me, and which I found skilled, like an ancient magician, in the strange art of rendering itself invisible in the clearest light, was an especial favourite; though its great size, and the wild stories I had read about the bite of its congener, the Tarantula, made me cultivate its acquaintance somewhat at a distance. Often, however, have I stood beside its large web, when the creature occupied its place in the centre, and, touching it with a withered grass-stalk, I have seen it suddenly swing on the lines 'with its bands,' and then shake them with a motion so rapid, that, like Carathis, the mother of the Caliph Vathek, who, when her hour of doom had come, 'glanced off in a rapid whirl, which rendered her invisible,' the eye failed to see either web or insect for minutes together. Nothing appeals more powerfully to the youthful fancy, than those coats, rings, and amulets of Eastern lore, that conferred on their possessors the gift of invisibility; and I deemed it a great matter to have discovered for myself, in living nature, a creature actually possessed of an amulet of this kind, that when danger threatened, could rush into invisibility." *

To Gossamer Spiders, those most ancient of aeronauts, and to Tarantulæ, exaggerated accounts of the effects of whose bites are given in most popular natural histories, I can only allude in passing. The wonderful forms of spiders, especially of some of the exotic Epeiridæ, whose bodies are covered or ornamented with spines and warts, may be seen in museums. The brilliant colours of some Saltici and species of Eresus, are very striking and remarkable. But to these and other things belonging to the history of spiders, an allusion must suffice.

The use of the threads of their cocoons by the optician would form an interesting subject. micrometers, constructed for the astronomer and microscopist, have spiders' threads for their most essential parts. The finest lines yet obtained are those of a spider's thread.

Spiders' webs have also other uses, such as stanching the flow of blood, and even making pills. Mrs. Colin Mackenzie says, "After a very pleasant summer and rainy season at Chikaldah, I was attacked with Birar fever at the beginning of November, 1851, and continued for a year, having one or two attacks every month; after some time it became a regular intermittent fever, but set quinine at defiance. Cobweb pills, made of common cobwebs, and taken in doses of ten grains three times a day, not only stopped it, but greatly improved my general health, though they did not prevent my being ordered to Europe. They have been given with wonderful success in Labuan, and recently at Elichpur, in the hospitals."+ Those skilful architects, the smaller British birds, often use spiders' webs and lines too in their beautifully constructed nests.

The web of the spider has at times afforded to the artist something to help him in illustrating his story. I need not refer to the wonderfully minute copies of groups of flowers and insects in which some of the Dutch painters excelled, although spiders and their webs are occasionally introduced. In this place I may, however, allude to the introduction of Arachne, or her web, by two British artists, William Hogarth and Noel Paton, R.S.A. In the fifth picture and plate of the "Rake's Progress," that in which the hero goes through the marriage ceremony with an antiquated dame, in the old church of St. Mary-le-bone, Hogarth has very cleverly introduced a dusty cobweb over the lid of the poor's box, a convincing proof that not even the widow's mite had for some time disturbed its repose. In the original drawings to illustrate the "Ancient Mariner," Mr. Noel Paton has very admirably given, in three of them, bits of spiders' webs on the ropes and wood-work of the becalmed ship. In the fine engraving by Mr. Ryall, of the touching picture called "Home," you may see on the rafters webs of the House Spider hanging over that feeling group, as mother and wife welcome home the Crimean soldier. These webs and spiders' works are intreduced in the most natural and unobtrusive way. When observed, they strike you as being a true, though a very feeble part of the scene depicted. Mr. Noel Paton has a keen eye for objects of nature, and a rare power of drawing and painting them as accessories. He has ably introduced the story of two spiders into his great picture of "The Quarrel of Oberon and Titania," having every authority in Shakespeare's page for doing so. See that little imp on the side of the terminus of the statue of Pan; how aghast he looks at the great female spider who has left her fine concentric web over the fox-glove. Notice how the male Epeira is left on the web, in vain seeking for his mate who has wandered away. In the same picture he has introduced the tube of another British Spider, the Agelena labyrinthica, on the under side of a mosscovered stone. See how its tenant and maker drags in the Ichneumon fly through the entrance, covered with the wings and other remains of older captures.

With a quotation from a letter of the Poet Keats * to his friend Reynolds, I must close this paper. He writes, "The points of leaves and twigs on which the spider begins her work are few, and she fills the air with a beautiful circuiting. Man should be content with as few points to tip with the fine web of his soul, and weave a tapestry empyrean, -full of symbols for his spiritual cye, of softness for his spiritual touch, of space for his wanderings, of distinctness for his luxury."

MADONNA MARY.

By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," &c.

PART IV.

CHAPTER XIV.

AUNT AGATHA'S cottage was very different from Earlston. It was a woman's house, and bore that character written all over it. The Pysche and the Venus would have been dreadfully out of place in it, it is true, but yet there was not a spot left vacant where an ornament could be; little fanciful shelves nestled into all the corners-which it was a great comfort to Mary's mind to see were just above her boy's range-bearing little vases and old teacups and curiosities of all kinds, not valuable like Francis Ochterlony's, nor chosen with such refined taste, but yet dear to Aunt Agatha's heart. Nothing so precious as the ware of Henri II. had ever come in Miss Seton's way, but she had one or two trifling articles that were real Wedgewood, and she had some bits of genuine Sevrés and a great deal of pretty rubbish which answered the purpose quite as well as if it bad been worth countless sums of money; and then there were flowers, wherever flowers could find a place. The rooms all opened out with liberal windows upon the garden, and the door stood open, and sun and air, sound and fragrance, went through and through the little house. It was the same house as that in which Mary had felt the English leaves rustling and the English breezes blowing as she read Aunt Agatha's letter in India, ages ago, before any of those great events had happened which had thrown such a shadow on her life. The two ladies of the cottage went to the railway to meet their visitors, and it was Peggy, the real head of the establishment, who stood in her best cap, in a flutter of black ribbons and white apron to receive "Miss Mary." And the glowing colour of the flowers, and the sunshine and the open house, and the flutter of womanish welcome made the difference still more marked. When Mrs. Ochterlony was placed in the easiest chair in the brightest corner in that atmosphere of sunshine and sweetness, and saw her forlorn little boys take their place in the foreground of the picture, elected autocrats over the household in general, the sense of relief and difference was so sweet to her that she no longer felt that yearning for some place of her own. The greatest infidel, the most hard-hearted cynic, could not have felt otherwise than at home under such circumstances. The children were taken out of Mary's hands on the instant, she whose time had been entirely devoted to keeping them invisible and inaudible, and out of the way-and Peggy took possession of the baby, and pretty Winnie flashed away into the garden with the two boys, with floating curls and flying ribbons, and all the gay freedoin of a country girl, taking the hearts of her little companions by storm. Her sister, who had not "taken to her" at first, sat in Aunt Agatha's chair, in the first moment of conscious repose she had known in England, and looked out at the fair young figure moving about among the flowers, and began to be in love with Winnie. Here she was safe at last, she and her fatherless children. Life might be over for her in its fullest sense-but still she was here at peace among her own people, and again some meaning seemed to come back to the word home. She was lingering upon this thought in the unusual repose of the moment, and wiping some quiet tears from her cheeks, when Aunt Agatha came and sat down beside her and took Mary's hand. She had been partially incoherent with satisfaction and delight until now, but by this time any little tendency to hysterics which might be in Aunt Agatha's nature had been calmed down by the awe-inspiriting presence of Peggy, and the comfort of perceiving nothing but satisfaction in that difficult woman's countenance. The baby had behaved himself like an angel, and had made no objections whatever to the cap or features of his new guardian; and Peggy, too, was visible from the open windows walking up and down the garden with little Wilfrid in her arms. in all the glory of content. This sight brought Miss Seton's comfort to a climax, as it did Mary's. She came and took her niece's hand, and sat down beside her with a tearful joy.

"Ah, Mary, this is what ought to have been from the very first," she said; "this is different from Francis Ochterlony and his dreary house. The dear children will be happy here."

"Yes, it is very different," said Mary, returning the pressure of the soft little white hand; but her heart was full, and she could not find much more to say.

"And you, too, my dear love," Aunt Agatha went on, who was not a wise woman, looking into the new-comer's face—"you, too, Mary, my darling—you will try to be happy in your old home? Well, dear, never mind answering me—I ought to know it is not the same for you as for us. I can't help feeling so happy to have you and the dear children. Look at Winnie, how delighted she is—she is so fond of children, though you would not think so just at first. Doesn't it make you feel the difference, Mary, to think you left her a baby, as one may say, and find her grown up into such a great girl?"

"I have so many things to make me feel the difference," said Mary—for Miss Seton was not one of the people who can do without an answer; and then Aunt Agatha was very sorry, and kissed her, with tears in her eyes.

"Yes, my love—yes, my dear love;" she said, as if she were soothing a child. "It was very foolish of me to use that expression; but you must try not to mind me, Mary. Cry, my dear, or don't answer me, or do just as you please. I never mean to say anything to recall—Look at the dear boys, how delighted they are. I know they will be fond of Winnie—she has such a nice way with children. Don't you think she has a very nice way?"

"She is very handsome," said Mary, whose momentary rest was over, looking out wistfully upon the young imperious creature whose stage of existence seemed the very antipodes of her own. They were sisters, but there was little, very little likeness between them, and the presence of the one seemed to bring into fuller prominence all the individual features of the other's mind and lot.

"My dear love, she is beautiful," said Aunt Agatha. "Sir Edward told me he had never, even at court—and you know he was a great deal about the court in his young days—seen any one that promised to be such a beautiful woman. And to think she should just be our Winnie all the same! And so simple and sweet—such a perfect child with it all! You may wonder how I have kept her so long," continued Winnie's adoring guardian, "when you were married, Mary, before you were her age."

Mrs. Ochterlony tried hard to look up with the look of inquiry and interest which was expected of her in Aunt Agatha's face; but she could not. It was difficult enough to struggle with the recollections that hung about this place, without having them continually thrust in her face in this affectionately heartless way. Thus the wheel turned softly round again, and the reality of the situation crept out in bare outline from under the cloak of flowers and tenderness, as hard and clear as at Earlston. Mary's grief was her own concern, and not of very much consequence to anybody else in the world. She had no right to forget that fact, and yet she did forget it, not being used yet to stand alone. While Aunt Agatha, on her side, could not but think it was rather hard-hearted of Mary to show so little interest in her own sister, and such a sister as Winnie.

"It is not because she is not appreciated," Miss Seton went on, feeling all the more and more bound to celebrate her favourite's praises, "but I am so anxious she should make a good choice. She is not a girl that could marry anybody, you know. She has her own little ways, and such a great deal of character. I cannot tell you what a comfort it is to me, Mary, my dear love, to think that now we shall have your experience to guide us," Aunt Agatha added, melting into tenderness again.

"I am afraid experience is good for very little in such cases," said Mary, "but I hope there will be no guidance needed—she seems very happy now."

"To tell the truth, there is somebody at the Hall—" said Aunt Agatha, "and I want to have your opinion, my dear. Oh, Mary, you must not talk of no guidance being needed. I have watched over her since ever she was born. The wind has never blown roughly on her; and if my darling was to marry just an ordinary man, and be unhappy, perhaps—or no happier than the rest of us," said

Aunt Agatha, with a sigh. This last touch of nature went to Mary's heart.

"She is rich in having such love, whatever may happen to her," said Mrs. Ochterlony, "and she looks as if, after all, she might yet have the perfect life. She is very, very handsome—and good, I am sure, and sweet—or she would not be your child, Aunt Agatha, but we must not be too ready with our guidance. She would not be happy if her choice did not come spontaneously, and of itself."

"But, oh, my dear love, the risk of marrying!" said Miss Seton, with a little sob-and she gave again a nervous pressure to Mary's hand, and did not restrain her tears. They sat thus in the twilight together, looking out upon the young living creatures for whom life was all brightly uncertain-one of them regarding with a pitiful flutter of dread and anxiety the world she had never ventured to enter into for herself. Perhaps a vision of Francis Ochterlony mingled with Miss Seton's thoughts, and a wistful backward glance at the life which might have been, but had not. The other sat very still, holding Aunt Agatha's soft little fluttering hand in her own, which was steady, and did not tremble, with a strange pang of anguish and pity in her heart. Mary looked at life through no such fanciful mists-she knew, as she thought, its deepest depth and profoundest calamity; but the fountain of her tears was all sealed up and closed, because nobody but herself had any longer anything to do with it. And she, too, yearned over the young sister whose existence was all to come, and felt that it was hard to think that she might be "no happier than the rest of us." It was these words which had arrested Mary, who, perhaps, might have otherwise thought that her own unquestionable sorrows demanded more sympathy than Winnie's problematical future. Thus the two elder ladies sat, until Winnie and the children came in, bringing life and commotion with them. The blackbird was still singing in the bushes, the soft northern twilight lingering, and the dew falling, and all the sweet evening odours coming in. As for Aunt Agatha, her heart, though it was old, fluttered with all the agitation and disturbance of a girl's-while Mary, in the calm and silence of her loneliness, felt herself put back as it were into history, along with Ruth and Rachel, and her own mother, and all the women whose lives had been and were over. This was how it felt to her in the presence of Aunt Agatha's soft agitation-so that she half smiled at herself sitting there composed and tranquil, and soothing her companion into her usual calm.

"Mary agrees with me that this is better than Earlston, Winnie," said Aunt Agatha, when the children were all disposed of for the night, and the three who were so near to each other in blood, and who were henceforward to be close companions, yet who knew so little of each other in deed and truth, were left adone. The lamp was lighted, but the windows were still open, and the twilight still lingered, and a wistful blue-green sky looked in and put itself in sweet comparison with the yellow lamplight. Winnie stood in one of these open windows, half in and half out, looking across the garden, as if expecting some one, and with a little contraction in her forehead that marred her fine profile slightly—giving a kind of careless half-attention to what was said.

"Does she?" she answered, indifferently; "I should have thought Earlston was a much hand-somer house."

"It was not of handsome houses we were thinking, my darling," said Aunt Agatha, with soft reproof; "it was of love and welcome like what we are so glad as to give her here."

"Wasn't Mr. Ochterlony kind?" said Winnie, with half contempt. "Perhaps he does not fancy children. I don't wonder so very much at that. If they were not my own nephews, very likely I should think them dreadful little wretches. I suppose Mary won't mind me saying what I think. I always have been brought up to speak out."

"They are dear children," said poor Aunt Agatha promptly. "I wish you would come in, Winnie, my love. It is a great deal too late now to go out."

And at that moment Mary, who was the spectator, and could observe what was going on, had her attention attracted by a little jar and rattle of the window at which Winnie was standing. It was the girl's impatient movement which had done it; and whether it was in obedience to Miss Seton's mild command, or something more urgent, Winnie came in instantly with a lowering brow, and shut the window with some noise and sharpness. Probably Aunt Agatha was used to it, for she took no notice; but even her patient spirit seemed moved to astonishment by the sudden clang of the shutters, which the hasty young woman began to close.

"Leave that to Peggy, my darling," she said; "besides, it was nice to have the air, and you know how I like the last of the gloaming. That is the window where one can always see poor Sir Edward's light when he is at home. I suppose they are sure to be at home, since they have not come here tonight."

"Shall I open the window again, and let you look at the light, since you like it so much?" said the undutiful Winnie. "I closed it for that. I don't like to have anybody staring down at us in that superior sort of way—as if we cared; and I am sure nobody here was looking for them to-night."

"No, my dear, of course not," said Miss Scton.
"Sir Edward is far too much a gentleman to think of coming the night that Mary was expected home."

And then Winnie involuntarily turned half round, and darted upon Mary an inquiring defiant look out of her stormy eyes. The look seemed to say, "So it was you who were the cause of it!" and then she swept past her sister with her streaming ribbons, and pulled out an embroidery frame which stood in a corner, and sat down to it in an irritated restless way. In that pretty room, in the soft evening atmosphere, beside the gentle old auut, who was folding her soft hands in the sweet leisure that became her age, and in the fair, mature, but saddened presence of the elder sister, who was resting in the calm of her exhaustion, a beautiful girl bending over an embroidery frame was just the last touch of perfection needed by the scene; but nobody would have thought so to see how Winnie threw herself down to her work, and dashed at it, all because of the innocent light that had been lighted in Sir Edward's window, or, at least, so it seemed. Aunt Agatha did her best, by impressive looks and coughs, and little gestures, and transparently significant words, to subdue the spoilt child into good behaviour; and then, in despair, she thought herself called upon to explain.

"Sir Edward very often walks over of an evening," she said, edging herself as it were between Mary and her sister. "We are always glad to see him, you know. It is a little change; and then he has some nice young friends who stay with him occasionally," said the deceitful weman. "But to be sure, he has too much feeling to think of making his appearance on the night of your coming home."

"I hope you will make no difference for me," said Mary, with her heart settling down a little deeper into her breast.

"My love, I hope I know what is proper," said Aunt Agatha, with her little air of decision. And once more Winnie gave her sister a defiant, accusing glance. "It is I that will be the sufferer, and it is all on your account," this look said, and the beautiful profile marked itself out upon the wall with a contraction across the forehead which took away half its leveliness. And then an uncomfortable silence ensued. Mrs. Ochterlony could say nothing more in a matter of which she knew so little, and Aunt Agatha, though she was the most yielding of guardians, still came to a point of propriety now and then on which she would not give way. This was how Mary discovered that instead of the Arcadian calm and retirement of which the cottage seemed an ideal resting place, she had come into another little centre of agitated human life, where her presence made a jar and discord without any fault of any one. Her heart sank. Was she always to be a mistake and failure wherever she went, -she, who had once made home so sweet? And in spite of herself, the lonely little thatched cottage came back to her mind, and moved her once more to a longing so profound that it took entire possession of her. No palace was ever so wished and yearned for. It seemed to Mary that the stone floor, and the beds in the wall, and the rude hearth, would be Paradisc itself, so long as they were her very own.

But it would have been worse than ungrateful, it would have been heartless and unkind, to have expressed such a feeling. So she, who was the stranger, had to put force on herself, and talk and lead her two companions back, so far as that was possible, from their pre-occupation; but at the best it was an unsatisfactory and forced conversation, and Mrs. Ochterlony was but too glad to own herself tired, and to leave her aunt and sister to themselves. They had given her their best room, with the fresh chintz and the pictures. They had made every arrangement for her comfort that affection and thoughtful care could suggest. What they had not been able to do was to let her come into their life without disturbing it, without introducing forced restrictions and new rules, without, in short, making her, all innocently and unwittingly on both sides, the discord in the house. Thus Mary found that, without changing her position, she had simply changed the scene; and the thought made her heart sick.

When Mrs. Ochterlony had retired, the two ladies of the cottage said nothing to each other for some time. Winnie continued her work in the same restless way as she had begun, and poor Aunt Agatha took up a book, which trembled in her hand. The impetuous girl had thrown open the window when she was reproved for closing it, and the light in Sir Edward's window shone far off on the tree tops, shedding an irritating influence upon Winnie when she looked up; and at the same time she could see the book shaking in Aunt Agatha's hand. Winnie was very fond of the guardian of her youth, and would have indignantly declared herself incapable of doing anything to vex her; but at the same time there could be no doubt that Aunt Agatha's nervousness gave a certain satisfaction to the young tyrant who ruled over her. Winnie saw that she was suffering, and could not help feeling pleased, for had not she too suffered all the evening? And she made no attempt to speak, or take any initiative, so that it was only after Miss Seton had borne it as long as she was capable of bearing it, that the silence was broken at last.

"Dear Winnie," said Aunt Agatha, with a faltering voice, "I think, when you think of it, that you will not think you have been quite considerate in making poor Mary feel uncomfortable the first night."

"Mary feel uncomfortable?" cried Winnie. "Good gracious, Aunt Agatha, is one never to hear of anything but Mary? What has anybody done? I have been sitting working all the evening, like—like a dressmaker or a poor needlewoman; does she object to that, I wonder?" and the young rebel put her frame back into its corner, and rose to the fray. Sir Edward's window still threw its distant light over the tree tops, and the sight of it made her smouldering passion blaze.

"Oh, my dear, you know that was not what I meant," said the disturbed and agitated aunt.

"I wish then, please, you would say what you mean," said Winnie. "She would not come with us at first, when we were all ready for her, and then she would not stay at Earlston after going there of her own will. I dare say she made Mr. Ochterlony's life wretched with her trouble and her widow's cap. Why didn't she be burnt with her Major, and be done with it?" said Winnie. "I am sure it would be by far the most comfortable way."

"Oh, Winnie, I thought you would have had a little sympathy for your sister," said Aunt Agatha with tears.

"Everybody has sympathy for my sister," said Winnie, "from Peggy up to Sir Edward. I don't see why she should have it all. Hasn't she had her day? Nobody came in upon her, when she was my age, to put the house in mourning and banish all one's friends. I hate injustice," cried the young revolutionary. "It is the injustice that makes me angry. I tell you, Aunt Agatha, she has had her day."

"Oh, Winnie," cried Miss Seton, weeping, "Oh, my darling child! don't be so hard upou poor Mary. When she was your age she had not half nor quarter the pleasures you have; and it was I that said she ought to come among her own friends."

"I am sure she would be a great deal better in some place of her own," said Winnie, with a little violence. "I wonder how she can go to other people's houses with all that lot of little children. If I should ever come home a widow from India, or anywhere else—"

"Winnie!" cried Aunt Agatha, with a little scream, "for heaven's sake don't say such things. Sorrow comes soon enough, without going to meet it; and if we can give her a little repose, poor dear—— And what do a few pleasant evenings signify to you at your time of life?"

"A few pleasant evenings!" said Winnie; and she gave a kind of gasp, and threw herself into a chair, and cried too, for passion, and vexation, and disgust, -perhaps a little, too, out of self-disgust, though she would not acknowledge it. "As if that were all! And nobody thinks how the days are flying, and how it may all come to an end!" cried the passionate girl. After having given vent to such words, shame and remorse seized upon Winnie. Her cheeks blazed so that the scorching heat dried up her tears, and she sprang up again and flew at the shutters, on which her feelings had already expended themselves more than once, and brought down the bar with a clang that startled the whole house. As for Aunt Agatha, she sat aghast, and gazed, and could not believe her eyes or her ears. What were the days that were flying, or the things that might come to an end? Could this wild exclamation have anything to do with the fact that Captain Percival was only on a visit at the Hall, and that his days were, so to speak, numbered? Miss Seton was not so old as to have forgotten what it was to be thus on the eve of losing sight of some one who had, as she would herself have said, "interested you." But Aunt Agatha had never in her life been guilty of violence or passion, and the idea of committing such a sin against all propriety and good taste as to have her usual visitors while the family was in affliction, was something which she could not take into her mind. It looked a breach of morals to Miss Seton; and for the moment it actually seemed as if Winnie, for the first time in her life, was not to have her way.

CHAPTER XV.

"EVERYBODY has sympathy with my sister," was what Winnie had said-and perhaps that was the hardest thing of all to bear. She was like the respectable son who came in disgusted into the midst of a merry-making all consecrated to the return of his disreputable prodigal brother. What did the fellow mean by coming home? Why did not he stay where he was, and fill his belly with the husks? Though if Mary had but been left to her young sister's sympathy. Winnie would (or thought she would) have lavished tenderness upon her. But the fact was, that it was very very hard to think how the days were passing by, and how perhaps all the precious evenings which remained might be cut off for ever, and its fairest prospect taken from her life, by Aunt Agatha's complaisance to Mary. It was true that it was Captain Percival's visit that Winnie was thinking of. Perhaps it was a little unmaidenly of her to own as much even to herself. It was a thing which Aunt Agatha would have died sooner than do, and which even Mary could not have been guilty of; but then girls now are brought up so differently. He might find himself shut out from the house, and might think the "family affliction" only a pretence, and might go away and make an end of it for ever-and Winnie was selfwilled and passionate, and felt as if she must move heaven and earth sooner than let this be so. It seemed to her as if the happiness of her life hung upon it, and she could not but think, being young and fond of poetry, of the many instances in books in which the magical moment was thus lost, and two lives made miserable. And how could it harm Mary to see a strange face or two about, she who had had the fortitude to come home all the way from India, and had survived, and was in sufficiently good health after her grief, which of itself was a thing for which the critic of eighteen was disposed to despise a woman?

As she brooded over this at night in her own room with the window open and her long hair streaming over her shoulders like a romantic heroine, and the young moonlight whitening over the trees, turrets, and windows of the Hall, a wild impatience of all the restrictions which were at that moment pressing upon her came upon Winnie. had been very bright and pleasant with the little boys in the garden, which was partly because her heart melted towards the helpless children who were her own flesh and blood, and partly because at that time nothing had occurred to thwart or vex herbut from the moment when she had seen Sir Edward's window suddenly gleam into the twilight, matters had changed. Then Winnie had perceived that the event which had been the central point of her daily life for some time back, the visit of Sir Edward and his "young friend" was not going to happen. It was the first time it had occurred to her that Mary's arrival was in any way to limit or transform her own existence; and her pride, her independence, her self-love and self-will were all immediately in arms. She, who had a little scorned her sister for the faculty of surviving, and for the steadiness with which she bore her burden, now asked herself indignantly, if Mary wanted to devote herself to her grief why she did not go into some seclusion to do it, instead of imposing penance upon other people? And what harm could it possibly have done Mary to see some one wandering in the garden by Winnie's side whose presence made the world complete, and left no more to be desired in it? or to look at poor Sir Edward talking to Aunt Agatha who took an innocent pleasure in his talk? what harm could all this do to the ogress in the widow's cap who had come to trample on the happiness of the cottage? What pleasure could it be to her to turn the innocent old man, and the charming young one, away from the little flowery bower which they were so fond of ?--for to be sure it did not occur to Winnie that Mrs. Ochterlony had nothing to do with it, and that it was of his own will and pleasure that Sir Edward had stayed away. Such were the thoughts which ran riot in the girl's mind while she stood in the moonlight at her open window. There was no balcony to go forth upon, and these were not sweet musings like Juliet's, but fiery discontented thoughts. Winnie did not mean to let her happiness slip by. She thought it was her happiness, and she was imperious and self-willed, and determined not to let her chance be stolen from her, as so many people do. As for Mary she had had her day. Let her be twenty times a widow, she had once been woord, and had tasted all the delights of youth, and nobody had interfered with her-and Winnie too had made up her mind to have her day. Such a process of thinking could never, as has been already said, have gone through the minds of either of the other women in the cottage; but Winnie was a girl of the nineteenth century in which young ladies are brought up differently-and she meant to have her rights, and the day of her delight, and all the privileges of her youth, whatever anybody might say.

As for Aunt Agatha on the other side, she too was making up her mind. She would have cut herself up in little pieces to please her darling, but she could not relinquish those rules of propriety which were dearer than herself-she was making up her mind to the struggle with tears and a kind of despair. It was a heartrending prospect, and she did not know how she could live without the light of her pretty Winnie's countenance, and see her looking sulky and miserable as she had done that night. But still in consideration of what was right, Miss Seton felt that she must and could bear anything. To expect a family in mourning, and who had just received a widow into their house, to see visitors, was an inhuman idea; and Aunt Agatha would have felt herself deeply humiliated could she really have supposed that anybody thought her capable of such a dereliction of duty. But she cried a little as she considered the awful results of her decision. Winnie disappointed, sullen, and wretched, roused to rebellion, and taking no pleasure in her life, was a terrible picture to contemplate. Aunt Agatha felt that all the pleasure of her own existence was over, and cried a few salt tears over the sacrifice; but she knew her duty, and at least there was or ought to be a certain comfort in that.

Sir Edward came next day to pay a solemn visit at the cottage, and it gave her a momentary gleam of comfort to feel that this was the course of conduct which he at least expected of her. He came and his "young friend" came with him, and for the moment smiles and contentment came back to the household. Sir Edward entered the drawing-room and shook hands tenderly with Mrs. Ochterlony, and sat down beside her, and began to talk as only an old friend could; but the young friend stayed in the garden with Winnie, and the sound of their voices came in now and then along with the songs of the birds and the fragrance of the flowers-all nature conspiring as usual to throw a charm about the young creatures, who apart from this charm did not make the loveliest feature in the social landscape. Sir Edward, on the other hand, sat down as a man sits down in a room where there is a seat which is known as his, and where he is in the way of doing a great deal of pleasant talk most days of his life. This was a special occasion, and he behaved himself accordingly. He patted Mary's hand softly with one of his, and held it in the other, and looked at her with that tender curiosity and inquiry which comes natural after a long absence. "She is changed, but I can see our old Mary still in her face," said the old man, patting her hand; and then he asked about the journey, and if he should see the children; and then the ordinary talk began.

"We did not come last evening, knowing you expected Mary," Sir Edward said, "and a most unpleasant companion I had all the night in consequence. Young people will be young people, you know—indeed, I never can help remembering, that just the other day I was young myself."

"Yes," said Aunt Agatha faltering; "but you see under the circumstances, Sir Edward, Winnie could not expect that her sister——"

"Dear aunt," said Mary, "I have already begged you to make no difference for me."

"I am sure, my love, you are very kind," said Aunt Agatha; "you always were the most unselfish—But I hope I know my duty, whatever your good heart may induce you to say."

"And I hope, after a while," said Sir Edward, "that Mary too will be pleased to see her friends. We are all friends here, and everybody I know will be glad to welcome her home."

Most likely it was those very words that made Mary feel faint and ill, and unable to reply. But though she did not say anything, she at least made no sort of objection to the hope; and immediately the pleasant little stream of talk gushed up and ran past her as she knew it would. The two old people talked of the two young ones who were so interesting to them, and all that was special in Sir Edward's visit came to a close.

"Young Percival is to leave me next week," Sir Edward said. "I shall miss him sadly, and unless I am very much mistaken it will cost him a heartache to go."

Aunt Agatha knew so well what her friend meant that she felt herself called upon to look as if she did not know. "Ah," she said, "I don't wonder. It is not often that he will find such a friend as you have been, Sir Edward: and to leave you who are always such pleasant company—"

"My dear Miss Seton," said Sir Edward, with a gentle laugh, "you don't suppose that I expect him to have a heartache for love of me? He is a nice young fellow, and I am sorry to lose him; but if it were only my pleasant company—"

Then Aunt Agatha blushed as if it had been herself who was young Percival's attraction. "We shall all miss him, I am sure," she said. "He is so delicate and considerate. He has not come in, thinking no doubt that Mary is not equal to seeing strangers; but I am so anxious that Mary should see him—that is, I like her to know our friends," said the imprudent woman, correcting herself, and once more blushing crimson, as if young Percival had been a lover of her very own.

"He is a very nice fellow," said Sir Edward; "most people like him; but I don't know that I should have thought of describing him as considerate or delicate. Mary must not form too high an idea. He is just a young man like other young men," said the impartial baronet, "and likes his own way, and is not without a proper regard for his own interest. He is not in the least a hero of romance"

"I don't think he is at all mercenary, Sir Edward, if that is what you mean," said Annt Agatha, blushing no longer, but growing seriously red.

"Mercenary!" said Sir Edward. "I don't think I ever dreamt of that. He is like other young men, you know. I don't want Mary to form too high an idea. But one thing I am sure of, that it will be a terrible pull for him to drag himself away."

And then a little pause happened which was trying to Aunt Agatha, and in the interval the voices of the two young people in the garden sounded pleasantly from outside. Sitting thus within hearing of them, it was difficult to turn to any other subject; but yet Miss Seton would not confess that she could by any possibility understand what her old neighbour meant; and by way of escaping from that embarrassment plunged without thought into another in which she floundered helplessly after the first dash.

"You knew that I think, Sir Edward—It has grown quite a museum, do you know?—every sort of beautiful thing, and all so nicely arranged. Francis—Mr. Ochterlony," said Aunt Agatha, in confusion, "had always a great deal of taste—Perhaps you may remember——"

"Oh, yes, I remember," said Sir Edward—"such things are not easily forgotten—but I hope you don't mean to suppose that Percival——"

"I was thinking nothing about Captain Percival," Miss Seton said, feeling ready to cry—
"What I meant was, I thought—I supposed you might have some interest—I thought you might like to know——"

"Oh, if that is all," said Sir Edward, "of course I take a great interest—but I thought you meant something of the same kind might be going on here. You must never think of that. I would never forgive myself if I were twice to be the unfortunate occasion—"

"I was thinking nothing about Captaiu Percival," said Aunt Agatha, with tears of vexation in her eyes; "nor—nor anything elsc—I was talking for the sake of conversation; I was thinking perhaps you might like to hear——"

"May I show you my boys, Sir Edward?" said Mary, ringing the bell—"I should like you to see them; and I am going to ask you, by-and-by, what I must do with them. My brother-in-law is very much a recluse—I should be glad to have the advice of somebody who knows more of the world."

"Ah, yes, let us see the boys," said Sir Edward.
"All boys are they?—that's a pity. You shall have the best advice I can give you, my dear Mary—and if you are not satisfied with that, you shall have better advice than mine; there is nothing so important as education; come along, little ones. So these are all?—three—I thought you had had more than three. Ah, I beg your pardon. How do you do, my little man? I am your mamma's old friend—I knew her long before you were born—come and tell me your name."

And while Sir Edward got at these particulars, and took the baby on his knee, and made himself agreeable to the two sturdy little heroes who stood by, and stared at him, Aunt Agatha came round behind backs, and gave Mary a quiet kiss-half by way of consolation, half by way of thanks-for, but for that happy inspiration of sending for the children, there was no telling what bog of unfortunate talk Miss Seton might not have tumbled into. Sir Edward was one of those men who know much, too much about everybody - everything he himself thought. He could detect allusions in the most carcless conversations, and never forgot anything even when it was expedient and better that it should be forgotten. He was a man who had been unlucky iu his youth, and who now in his old age, though he was as well off as a man living all alone, in forlorn celibacy, could be, was always called poor Sir Edward. The very cottagers called him so, who might well have looked upon his life as a kind of paradise; and being thus recognised as an object of pity, Sir Edward had on the whole a very pleasant life. He knew all about everybody, and was apt by times to confuse his neighbours sadly, as he had just done Aunt Agatha, by a reference to the most private bits of their individual history; but it was never done with ill-nature-and after all there is a charm about a person who knows everything about everybody. He was a man who could have told you all about the Gretna Green marriage which had cost poor Major Ochterlony so much trouble, as well, or perhaps even better, than if he had been present at it; and he was favourable to marriages in general, though he had never himself made the experience, and rather liked to preside over a budding inclination like that between Winifred Seton and young Percival. took little Wilfrid on his knees when the children were thus brought upon the scene, in a fatherly, almost grand-fatherly way, and was quite ready to go into Mary's plans about them. He thought it was quite right, and the most suitable thing she could do, to settle somewhere where there was a good grammar-school; and he had already begun to calculate where the best grammar-schools were situated, and which would be the best plan for Mrs. Ochterlony, when the voices in the garden were heard approaching. Aunt Agatha had escaped from her embarrassment by going out to the young people, and was now bringing them in to present the young man for Mary's approval and criticism. Miss Seton came first, and there was anxiety in her face; and after her Winnie stepped in at the window, with a little flush upon her pretty cheek, and an unusual light in her eye; and after her-but at that moment the whole party were startled by a sudden sound of surprise, the momentary falling back of the stranger's foot from the stop, and a surprised, half-suppressed exclamation. "Oh! - Mrs. Ochterlony!" exclaimed Sir Edward's young friend. As it happened all the rest were silent at that moment, and his voice was distinctly audible, though perhaps he had not meant it to be so. He himself was half hidden by the roses which clambered all over the cottage, but Mary naturally turned round, and turned her face to the window, when she heard her own name—as indeed they all did—surprised at the exclamation, and still more at the tone. And it was thus under the steady gaze of four pairs of eyes that Captain Percival came into the room. Perhaps but for that exclamation Mary might not have recognised him; but her ear had been trained to quick understanding of that inflection, half of amusement, half of contempt, which she had not heard for so long. To her ears it meant, "Oh, Mrs. Ochterlony! -she who was married over again, as people pretended-she who took in the Kirkmans, and all the people at the station." Captain Percival came in, and he felt his blood run cold as he met all those astonished eyes, and found Mary looking so intently at him. What had he done that they should all stare at him like that? for he was not so well aware of what he had given utterance to, nor of his tone in giving utterance to it, as they all were. "Good heavens, what is the matter?" he said; "you all look at me as if I were a monster. Miss Seton, may Lask you to introduce me-"

"We have met before, I think," Mary said, quietly. "When I heard of Captain Percival I did not know it was the same I used to hear so much about in India. I think, when I saw you last, it was at——"

She wanted by sudden instinct to say it out and set herself right for ever and ever, here where everything about her was known; but the words seemed to choke her. In spite of herself she stopped short; how could she refer to that, the only great grievance in her life, her husband's one great wrong against her, now that he was in his grave, and she left in the world the defender and champion of all his acts and ways? She could not do it—she was obliged to stop short in the middle, and swallow the sob that would have choked her with the next word. And they stood all gazing at her, wondering what it was.

"Yes," said the young man, with a confidential air-"I remember it very well indeed-I heard all about it from Askell, you know; -but I never imagined when I heard you talking of your sister that it was the same Mrs. Ochterlony," he added, turning to Winnie, who was looking on with great and sudden interest. And then there was a pause -such a pause as occurs sometimes when there is an evident want of explanation somewhere, and all present feel that they are on the borders of a mystery. Somehow it changed the character of the assembled company altogether. A few minutes before it had been the sad stranger in her widow's cap, who was the centre of all, whom all present paid, willingly or not, a certain homage to, and to whom the visitors had to be presented in a half apologetic way, as if to a queen. Aunt Agatha, indeed, had been quite anxious on the subject, pondering how she could best bring Sir Edward's young friend, Winnie's admirer, under Mrs. Ochterlony's observation, and have her opinion of him; and now in an instant the situation was reversed, and it was Mary and Captain Percival alone who seem to know each other, and to have recollections in common! Mary felt her cheeks flush in spite of herself, and Winnie grew pale with incipient jealousy and dismay, and Aunt Agatha fluttered about in a state of the wildest anxiety. At last both she and Sir Edward burst out talking at the same moment, with the same visible impulse. And they brought the children into the foreground, and lured them into the utterance of much baby nonsense, and even went so far as to foster a rising quarrel between Hugh and Islay, all to cover up from each other's eyes and smother in the bud this mystery, if it was a mystery. It was a singular disturbance to bring into such a quiet house; for how could the people who dwelt at home tell what those two strangers might have known about each other in India, how they might have been connected, or what secret might lie between them ?-no more than people could tell in a cosy sheltered curtained room what might be going on at sea, or even on the dark road outside. And here there was the same sense of insecurity-the same distrust and fear.

Winnie stood a little apart, pale, and with her delicate curved nostril a little dilated. Percival was younger than Mary, and Mary up to this moment had been hedged round with a certain sanctity, even in the eyes of her discontented young sister. But there was some intelligence between them, something known to those two which was known to no one else in the party. The young man was astonished to find it the same Mrs. Ochterlony, and Mary that it was the same Captain Percival. This was enough to set off the thoughts of a self-willed girl, upon whose path Mary had thrown the first shadow, wildly into all kinds of suspicions. And to tell the truth, the elder people, who should have known better, were not much wiser than Winnie. Thus, while Hugh and Islay had a momentary struggle in the foreground, which called for their mother's active interference, the one ominous cloud of her existence once more floated up upon the dim firmament over Mary's head; though if she had but finished her sentence it would have been no cloud at all, and might never have come to anything there or thereafter. But this did not occur to Mrs. Ochterlony. What did occur to her in her vexation and pain was that her dead Hugh would be hardly dealt with among her kindred, if the stranger should tell her story. And she was glad, heartily glad, that there was little conversation afterwards, and that very soon the two visitors went away. But it was she who was the last to be aware that a certain doubt, a new and painful element of uncertainty stayed behind them in Aunt Agatha's pretty cottage after they were gone.

CHAPTER XVI.

THAT night was a painful night for Winnie. The girl was self-willed and self-loving, as has been said. But she was not incapable of the more generous emotions, and when she looked at her sister she could no more suspect her of any wrong or treachery than she could suspect the sun shining over their heads. And her interest in the young soldier had gone a great length. She thought he loved her, and it was very hard to think that he was kept apart from her by a reason which was no reason at all. She roved about the garden all the evening in an unsettled way thinking he would come againthinking he could not stay away-explaining to herself that he must come to explain. And when she glanced indoors at the lamp which was lighted so much earlier than it needed to be for the sake of Mary's sewing, and saw Mary seated beside it in what looked like perfect composure and quietness, Winnie's impatience got the better of her. He was to be banished or confined to a formal morning call, for Mary's sake, who sat there so calm, a woman for whom the fret and cares of life were over, while for Winnie life was only beginning and her heart going out eagerly to welcome and lay claim to its troubles. And then the thought that it was the same Mrs. Ochterlony came sharp as a sting to Winnie's heart. What could he have had to do with Mrs. Ochterlony? what did she mean coming home in the character of a sorrowful widow and shutting out their visitors, and yet awakening something like agitation and unquestionable recognition in the first stranger she saw? Winnie wandered through the garden asking herself those questions while the sweet twilight darkened, and the magical hour passed by, which had of late associated itself with so many dreams. And again he did not come. It was impossible to her when she looked at Mary to believe that there could be anything inexplainable in the link which connected her lover with her sister-but still he ought to have come to explain. And when Sir Edward's windows were lighted once more and the certainty that he was not coming penetrated her mind, Winnie clenched her pretty hands, and went crazy for the moment with despite and vexation. Another long dull weary evening with all the expectation and hope quenched out of it-another lingering night-another day in which there was as much doubt as hope. And next week he was going away! And it was all Mary's fault, however you took it-whether she had known more of him than she would allow, in India, or whether it was simply the fault of that widow's cap which scared people away. This was what was going on in Winnie's agitated mind while the evening dews fell upon the banks of Kirtell, and the soft stars came out, and the young moon rose, and everything glistened and shone with the sweetness of a summer night. This fair young creature who was in herself the most beautiful climax of all the beauty around her, wandcred among her flowers with her small hands clenched and the spirit of a little fury in her heart. She had nothing in the world to trouble her, and vet she was very unhappy, and it was all Mary's fault. This was the first consequence of that coming home among her own people, which Aunt Agatha had been so deeply affronted with her niece for not doing Probably if Mary could but have seen into Winnie's heart she would have thought it preferable to stay at Earlston, where the Psyche and the Venus were highly indifferent and had no hearts, but only arms and noses that could be broken. Winnie was more fragile than the Etruscan vases or the Henri II. porcelain. They had escaped fracture, but she had not; but fortunately this thought did not occur to Mrs. Ochterlouy as she sat by the lamp working at Hugh's little blouses in Aunt Agatha's chair.

And Aunt Agatha, more actively jealous than Winnie herself, sat by knitting little socks—an occupation which she had devoted herself to, heart and soul, from the moment when she first knew the little Ochterlonys were coming home. She was knitting with the prettiest yarn and the finest needles, and had a model before her of proportions so shapely as to have filled any woman's soul with delight; but all that was eclipsed for the time by the doubt which hung over Mary, and the evident unhappiness of her favourite. Aunt Agatha was less wise than Winnie, and had not eyes to perceive that people were characteristic even in their wrongdoing, and that Captain Percival of himself could have nothing to do with the shock which Mary had evidently felt at the sight of him. Probably Miss Seton had not been above a little flirtation in her own day, and she did not see how that would come unnatural to a woman of her own flesh and blood. And she sat accordingly on the other side of the lamp and knitted, with a pucker of anxiety upon her fair old brow, casting wistful glances now and then into the garden where Winnie was.

"And I suppose, my dear, you know Captain Percival very well?" said Aunt Agatha, with that anxious look on her face.

"I don't think I ever saw him but once," said Mary, who was a little impatient of the question.

"But once, my dear love! and yet you both were so surprised to meet," said Aunt Agatha with reasonable surprise.

"There are some moments when to see a man is to remember him ever after," said Mary. "It was at such a time that I saw Sir Edward's friend. It would be best to tell you about it, Aunt Agatha. There was a time when my poor Hugh——"

"Oh, Mary, my darling, you can't think I want to vex you," cried Aunt Agatha, "or make you go back again upon anything that is painful. I am quite satisfied, for my part, when you say so. And so would Winnie be. I am sure."

"Satisfied?" said Mary, wondering, and yet with a smile; and then she forgot the wonder of it in the anxiety. "I should be sorry to think that Winnie cared much for anything that could be said about Captain Percival. I used to hear of him from the Askells who were friends of his. Do not let her have anything to do with him, Aunt Agatha; I am sure he could bring her nothing but disappointment and pain."

"I—Mary?—Oh, my dear love, what can I do?" cried Miss Seton in sudden confusion, and then she paused and recovered herself. "Of course if he was a wicked young man, I—I would not let Winnie have anything to do with him," she added, faltering; "but—do you think you are sure, Mary? If it should be only that you do not—like him; or that you have not got on—or something——"

"I have told you that I know nothing of him, Aunt," said Mary. "I saw him once at the most painful moment of my life, and spoke half-a-dozen words to him in my own house after that—but it is what I have heard the gentlemen say. I do not like him. I think it was unmannerly and indelicate to come to my house at such a time——"

"My darling!" said Aunt Agatha, soothing her tenderly. Miss Seton was thinking of the major's death, not of any pain that might have gone before; and Mary by this time in the throng of recollections that came upon her had forgotten that everybody did not know.

"But that is not the reason," Mrs. Ochterlony said, composing herself: "the reason is that he could not, unless he is greatly changed, make Winnie otherwise than unhappy. I know the reputation he had. The Heskeths would not let him come to their house after Annie came out; and I have even heard Hugh-

"My dear love, you are agitating yourself," cried Aunt Agatha. "Oh, Mary, if you only knew how anxious I am not to do anything to recall-

"To you," said Mrs. Ochterlony with a faint smile; "it is not so far off that I should require anything to recall all that has happened to mebut for Winnie's sake-"

And it was just at that moment that the light suddenly appeared in Sir Edward's window, and brought Winnie in, white and passionate, with a thunder-cloud full of tears and lightnings and miserable headache and self-reproach, lowering over her brilliant eyes.

"It is very good of Mary, I am sure, to think of something for my sake," said Winnie. "What is it, Aunt Agatha? Everything is always so unpleasant that is for one's good. I should like to know what it was."

And then there was a dead silence in the pretty room. Mary bent her head over her work, feeling her position very bitter and painful, and Aunt Agatha, in a flutter of uncertainty and tribulation, turned from one to the other, not knowing which side to take nor what to say.

"Mary has come among us a stranger," said Winnie, "and I suppose it is natural that she should think she knows our business better than we do. I suppose that is always how it seems to a stranger; but at the same time it is a mistake, Aunt Agatha, and I wish you would let Mary know that we are disposed to manage for ourselves. If we come to any harm it is we who will have to suffer and not Mary," the impetuous girl cried, as she drew that unhappy embroidery frame out of its corner.

And then another pause, severe and startling, fell upon the little party. Aunt Agatha fluttered in her chair, looking from one to another, and Winnie dragged a violent needle through her canvas, and a great night moth came in and circled about them. and dashed itself madly against the globe of light on the table. As for Mary, she sat working at Hugh's little blouse, and for a long time did not speak.

"My dear love!" Aunt Agatha said at last, trembling, "you know there is nothing in the world I would not do to please you, Winnie, -nor Mary either. Oh, my dear children, there are only you two in the world. If one says anything, it is for the other's good. And here we are, three women together, and we are all fond of each other, and surely, surely, nothing ever can make any unpleasantness!" cried the poor lady, with tears. She had her heart rent in two, like every mediatrix, and yet the larger half, as was natural, went to her darling's

"Winnie is right enough," Mary said, quietly. "I am a stranger, and I have no right to interfere; and very likely, even if I were permitted to interfere, it would do no good. It is a shame to vex you. Aunt Agatha. My sister must submit to hear my opinion one time, but I am not going to disturb the peace of the house, nor yours."

"Oh, Mary, my dear, it is only that she is a little impatient, and has always had her own way," said Aunt Agatha, whispering across the table. And then no more was said. Miss Seton took up her little socks, and Winnie continued to labour hotly at her embroidery, and the sound of her work, and the rustle of Mary's arm at her sewing, and the little click of Aunt Agatha's knittingnecdles, and the mad dashes of the moth at the lamp, were all the sounds in the room, except, indeed, the sound of the Kirtell, flowing softly over its pebbles at the foot of the brae, and the sighing of the evening air among the trees, which were sadly contradictory of the spirit of the scene within: and at a distance over the woods gleamed Sir Edward's window, with the ill-disposed light which was, so to speak, the cause of all. Perhaps, after all, if Mrs. Ochterlony had stayed at Earlston, where the Psyche and the Venus were not sensitive, and there was nothing but marble and china to jar into discord, it might have been better; and what would have been better still, was the grey cottage on the readside, with fire on the hearth and peace and freedom in the house; and it was to that, with a deep and settled longing, that Mary's heart and thoughts went always back.

When Mrs. Ochterlony had withdrawn, the scene changed much in Aunt Agatha's drawingroom. But it was still a pretty scene. Then Winnie came and poured out her girlish passion in the ears and at the feet of her tender guardian. She sank down upon the carpet, and laid her beautiful head upon Aunt Agatha's knee, and clasped her slender arms around her. "To think she should come and drive every one I care for away from the house, and set even you against me!" cried Winnie, with sobs of vexation and rage.

"Oh, Winnie! not me! Never me, my darling," cried Aunt Agatha; and they made a group which a painter would have loved, and which would have conveyed the most delicate conception of love and grief to an admiring public, had it been painted. Nothing less than a broken heart and a blighted life would have been suggested to any innocent fancy by the abandonment of misery in Winnio's attitude. And to tell the truth, she was very unhappy, furious with Mary, and with herself, and with her lover, and everybody in the wide world. The braids of her beautiful hair got leose, and the net that confined them came off, and the glistening silken flood came tumbling about her shoulders. Miss Seton could not but take great handfuls of it as she tried to sooth her darling; and poor Aunt Agatha's heart was rent in twain as she sat with this lovely burden in her lap, thinking, Oh, if nebody had ever come to distract Winnie's heart with love-making, and bring such disturbance to her life; oh, if Hugh Ochterlony had thought better of it, and had not died! Oh, if Mary had never seen Captain Percival, or, seeing him, had approved of him and thought him of all others the mate she would choose for her sister! The reverse of all these wishes had happened, and Aunt Agatha could not but look at the combination with a certain despair.

"What can I do, my dear love?" she said. "It is my fault that Mary has come here. You know yourself it would have been unnatural if she had gone anywhere else; and how could we go on having people, with her in such deep mourning? And as for Captain Percival, my darling--"

"I was not speaking of Captain Percival," said Winnie, with indignation. "What is he to me ?or any man? But what I will not bear is Mary interfering. She shall not tell us what we are to do. She shan't come in and look as if she understood everything better than we do. And, Aunt Agatha, she shan't-she shall never come; not for a moment, between you and me!"

"My darling child! my dear love!" cried poor Aunt Agatha, "as if that was possible, or as if poor Mary wanted. Oh, if you would only do her justice, Winnie! She is fond of you; I know she is fond of you. And what she was saying was entirely for your good."

"She is fond of nobody but her children," said Winnie, rising up, and gathering her bright hair back into the net. "She would not care what happened to us, as long as all was well with her tiresome little boys."

Aunt Agatha wrung her hands, as she looked in despair at the tears on the flushed cheek, and the cloud which still hung upon her child's brow. What could she say? Perhaps there was a little truth in what Winnie said. The little boys, though Miss Seton could not help feeling them to be so unimportant in comparison with Winnie and her beginning of life, were all in all to Mrs. Ochterlony; and when she had murmured again that Mary meant it all for Winnie's good, and again been met by a scornful protestation that anything meant for one's good was highly unpleasant, Aunt Agatha was silenced, and had not another word to say. All that she could do was to pet her wilful darling more than ever, and to promise with tears that Mary should never, never make any difference between them, and that she herself would do anything that Winnie wished or wanted. The interview left her in such a state of agitation that she could not sleep, nor even lie down, till morning was breaking and the new day had begun-but wandered about in her dressinggown, thinking she heard Winnie move, and making pilgrimages to her room to find her, notwithstanding all her passion and tears, as fast asleep as one of Mary's boys-which was very, very different from Aunt Agatha's case, or Mary's either, for that matter. As for Mrs. Ochterlony, it is She went to bed with a heavy heart, feeling that | judiced, or have heard a false account, and it might

she had made another failure, and glad, as people are when they have little comfort round them, of the kind night and the possible sleep which, for a few hours at least, would make her free of all this. But she did not sleep as Winnie did, who felt herself so ill-used and injured. Thus, though her friends were so kind, Mary's arrival among them carried but little comfort with it; and it was heavy and hard to think so; and she could not go away again immediately from them any more than from Earlston, leaving a sense of pain behind her. but must stay on and make the best of it for the moment. Thus, Mrs. Ochterlony's return, a widow, brought more painful agitation to Miss Seton's cottage than had been known under its quiet roof since the time when she went away a bride.

CHAPTER XVII.

AND after this neither Sir Edward nor his young friend appeared for two whole days. Any girl of Winifred Seton's impetuous character, who has ever been left in such a position on the very eve of the telling of that love-tale, which had been all but told for several weeks past, but now seemed suddenly and artificially arrested just at the moment of utterance -will be able to form some idea of Winnie's feelings during this dreadful interval. She heard the latch of the gate lifted a hundred times in the day, when, alas, there was no one near to lift the latch. She was afraid to go out for an instant, lest in that instant "they" should come; her brain was ringing with supposed sounds of footsteps and cchoes of voices, and yet the road lay horribly calm and silent behind the garden hedge, with no passengers upon it. these two evenings the light came early into Sir Edward's window, and glared cruelly over the trees. And to be turned inward upon the sweet old life from which the charm had fled, and to have to content oneself with flowers and embroidery, and the canary singing, and the piano, and Aunt Agatha! Many another girl has passed through the same interval of torture, and felt the suspense to be killing, and the crisis tragic-but yet to older eyes perhaps even such a dread suspension of all the laws of being has also its comic side. Winnie, however, took care to keep anybody from laughing at it in the cottage. It was life and death to her, or at least so she thought. And her suppressed frenzy of anxiety, and doubt, and fear, were deep earnest to Aunt Agatha, who seemed now to be living her own early disappointments over again, and more bitterly than in the first version of them. She tried hard to remember the doubt thrown upon Captain Percival by Mary, and to persuade herself that this interposition was providential, and meant to save her child from an unhappy marriage. But when Miss Seton saw Winnie's tragic countenance, her belief in Providence was shaken. She could not see the good of anything that made her darling useless to enter into any description of her feelings. suffer. Mary might be wrong, she might be prebe simply herself who was to blame for shutting her doors, or seeming to shut her doors, against her nearest and oldest neighbours. Could it be supposed that Sir Edward would bring any one to her house who was not a fit associate or a fit suitor, if things should take such a turn, for Winnie? Under the painful light thrown upon the subject by Winnie's looks, Aunt Agatha came altogether to ignore that providential view which had comforted her at first, and was so far driven in the other direction at last as to write Sir Edward a little note, and take the responsibility upon her own shoulders. What Miss Seton wrote was, that though, in consequence of their late affliction the family were not equal to seeing visitors in a general way, yet that it would be strange indeed if they were to consider Sir Edward a stranger, and that she hoped he would not stay away, as she was sure his company would be more a comfort to Mary than anything else. And she also hoped Captain Percival would not leave the Hall without coming to see them. It was such a note as a maiden lady was fully justified in writing to an old friend - an invitation, but yet given with a full consideration of all the propricties, and that tender regard for Mary's feelings which Aunt Agatha had shown throughout. It was written and despatched when Winnie had gone out, as she did on the third day, in proud defiance and desperation, so that if Sir Edward's sense of propriety and respect for Mary's cap should happen to be stronger than Aunt Agatha's, no further vexation might come to the young sufferer from this attempt to set all right.

And Winnie went out without knowing of this effort for her consolation. She went down by Kirtell, winding down the wooded banks, in the sweet light and shade of the August morning, seeing nothing of the brightness, wrapped up and absorbed in her own sensations. She felt now that the moment of fate had passed, -that moment that made or marred two lives ;-and had in her heart, in an embryo unexpressed condition, several of Mr. Browning's minor poems, which were not then written; and felt a general bitterness against the world for the lost climax, the dénouement which had not come. She thought to herself even that if the tale had been told, the explanation made, and something, however tragical, had happened after, it would not have been so hard to bear. But now it was clear to Winnie that her existence must run on soured and contracted in the shade, and that young Percival must stiffen into a worldly and miserable old bachelor, and that their joint life, the only life worth living, had been stolen from them, and blighted in the bud. And what was it all for ?because Mary, who had had all the good things of this life, who had loved and been married in the most romantic way, and had been adored by her husband, and reigned over him, had come, so far, to an end of her career. Mary was over thirty, an age at which Winnie could not but think it must be comparatively indifferent to a woman what happened—at which the snows of age must have begun to benumb her feelings, under any circumstances, and the loss of a husband or so did not much matter; but at eighteen, and to lose the first love that had ever touched your heart! to lose it without any reason—without the satisfaction of some dreadful obstacle in the way, or misunderstanding still more dreadful; without ever having heard the magical words and tasted that first rapture!—Ah, it was hard, very hard; and no wonder that Winnie was in a turmoil of rage, and bitterness, and despair.

The fact was, that she was so absorbed in her thoughts as not to see him there where he was waiting for her. He had seen her long ago, as she came down the winding road, betraying herself at the turnings by the flutter of her light dress-for Winnie's mourning was slight-and he had waited, as glad as she could be of the opportunity, and the chance of seeing her undisturbed, and free from all critical eyes. There is a kind of popular idea that it is only a good man, or one with a certain "nobility" or "generosity" in his character who is capable of being in love; but the idea is not so justifiable as it would seem to be. Captain Percival was not a good young man, nor would it be safe for any conscientious historian to claim for him generous or noble qualities to any marked degree; but at the same time I am not disposed to qualify the state of his sentiments by saying, as is generally said of unsatisfactory characters, that he loved Winnie as much as he could love anything. He was in love with her, heart and soul, as much as if he had been a paladin. He would not have stayed at any obstacle, nor regarded either his own comfort or hers, or any other earthly bar between them. When Winnie thought him distant from her, and contemplating his departure, he had been haunting all the old walks which he knew Miss Seton and her niece were in the habit of taking. He was afraid of Mary-that was one thing indisputable-and he thought she would harm him, and bring up his old character against him; and felt instinctively that the harm which he thought he knew of her, could not be used against her here. And it was for this reason that he had not ventured again to present himself at the cottage; but he had been everywhere about, wherever he thought there was any chance of meeting the lady of his thoughts. And if Winnie had not been so anxious not to miss that possible visitor; if she had been coming and going, and doing all she usually did, their meeting must have taken place two days ago, and all the agony and trouble been spared. He watched her now, and held his breath, and traced her at all the turnings of the road, now by a puff of her black and white muslin dress, and then by a long streaming ribbon catching among the branches-for Winnie was fond of long ribbons wherever she could introduce them. And she was so absorbed with her own settled anguish, that she had stepped out upon him from among the trees before she was aware.

"Captain Percival!" said Winnie, with au involuntary cry; and she felt the blood so rush to her cheeks with sudden delight and surprise, that she was in an instant put on her guard, and driven to account for it.—"I did not see there was any one here—what a fright you have given me. And we, who thought you had gone away," added Winnie, looking suddenly at him with blazing defiant eyes.

If he had not been in love, probably he would have known what it all meant—the start, the blush, the cry, and that triumphant, indignant, reproachful, exulting look. But he had enough to do with his own sensations, which makes a wonderful difference in such a case.

"Gone away!" he said, on the spur of the moment—"as if I could go away—as if you did not know better than that."

"I was not aware that there was anything to detain you," said Winnie, and all at once from being so tragical, her natural love of mischief came back, and she felt perfectly disposed to play with her mouse. "Tell me about it. Is it Sir Edward? or perhaps you, too, have had an affliction in your family. I think that is the worst of all," she said, shaking her pretty head mournfully—and thus the two came nearer to each other and laughed together, which was as good a means of rapprochement as anything else.

But the young soldier had waited too long for this moment to let it all go off in laughter. "If you only knew how I have been trying to see you," he said. "I have been at the school and at the mill, and in the woods—in all your pet places. Are you condemned to stay at home because of this affliction? I could not come to the cottage because, though Miss Seton is so kind, I am sure your sister would do me an ill turn if she could."

Winnie was startled, and even a little annoyed by this speech—for it is a fact always to be borne in mind by social critics, that one member of a family may be capable of saying everything that is unpleasant about another, without at the same time being able to hear even an echo of his or her own opinion from stranger lips. Winnie was of this way of thinking. She had not taken to her sister, and was quite ready herself to criticise her very severely; but when somebody else did it, the result was very different. "Why should my sister do you an ill turn?" she said.

"Oh!" said young Pereival; "it is because you know she knows that I know all about it——"

"All about it!" said Winnie. She was tall already, but she grew two inches taller as she stood and expanded and looked her frightened lover into nothing. "There can be nothing about Mary, Captain Percival, which you and all the world may not know."

And then the young man saw he had made a wrong move. "I have not been haunting the road for hours to talk about Mrs. Ochterlony," he said. "She does not like me, and I am frightened for her. Oh, Winnie, you know very well why. You know I would tremble before anybody who might make you think ill of me. It is cruel to pretend you don't understand."

And then he took her hand and told her everything-all that she looked for, and perhaps more than all-for there are touches of real eloquence about what a man says when he is really in love (even if he should be no great things in his own person) which transcend as much as they fall short of, the suggestions of a woman's curious fancy. She had said it for him two or three times in her own mind, and had done it far more elegantly and neatly. But still there was something about the genuine article which had not been in Winnie's imagination. There were fewer words, but there was a great deal more excitement, though it was much less eleverly expressed. And then, before they knew how, the crisis was over, the dénouement accomplished, and the two sitting side by side as in another world. They were sitting on the trunk of an old beech-tree, with the leaves rustling and the birds twittering over them, and Kirtell running, soft and sweet. hushed in its scanty summer whisper at their feet; all objects familiar, and well-known to them-and yet it was another world. As for Mr. Browning's poems about the unlived life, and the hearts all shrivelled up for want of a word at the right moment, Winnie most probably would have laughed with youthful disdain had they been suggested to her now. This little world, in which the fallen beech-tree was the throne, and the fairest hopes and imaginations possible to man crowded about the youthful sovereigns and paid them obsequious court, was so different from the old world, where Sir Edward at the Hall and Aunt Agatha in the cottage were expecting the young people, that these two, as was not unnatural, forgot all about it, and lingered together, no one interfering with them, or even knowing they were there, for long enough to fill Miss Seton's tender bosom with wild anxietics and terrors. Winnie had not reached home at the early dinner-hour-a thing which was to Aunt Agatha as if the sun had declined to rise, or the earth (to speak more correctly) refused to perform her proper revolutions. She became so restless, and anxious, and unhappy, that Mary, too, was roused into uneasiness. "It must be only that she is detained somewhere," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "Shenever would allow herself to be detained," cried Aunt Agatha, "and oh, Mary, my darling is unhappy. How can I tell what may have happened?" Thus some people made themselves very wretched about her, while Winnie sat in perfect blessedness, uttering and listening to all manner of heavenly nonsense on the trunk of the fallen tree.

Aunt Agatha's wretchedness, however, dispersed into thin air the moment she saw Winnie come in at the garden-gate, with Captain Percival in close attendance. Then Miss Seton, with natural penetration, saw in an instant what had happened; felt that it was all natural, and wondered why she had not foreseen this inevitable occurrence. "I might have known," she said to Mary, who was the only member of the party upon whom this wonderful event had no enlivening effect; and then Aunt Agatha recollected herself, and put on her sad face and faltered an apology. "Oh, my dear love, I know it must be hard upon you to see it," she said, apologizing as it were to the widow for the presence of joy.

"I would be a poor soul, indeed, if it was hard upon me to see it," said Mary. "No, Aunt Agatha, I hope I am not so shabby as that. I have had my day. If I look grave, it is for other reasons. I was not thinking of myself."

"My love! you were always so unselfish," said Miss Seton. "Are you really anxious about him? See how happy he looks—he cannot be so fond of her as that, and so happy, and yet a deceiver. It is not possible, Mary."

This was in the afternoon, when they had come out to the lawn with their work, and the two lovers were still together—not staying in one place, as their elders did, but flitting across the line of vision now and then, and, as it were, pervading the atmosphere with a certain flavour of romance and happiness.

"I did not say he was a deceiver—he dared not be a deceiver to Winnie," said Mrs. Ochterlony;

"there may be other sins than that."

"Oh, Mary, don't speak as if you thought it would turn out badly," cried Aunt Agatha, clasping her hands; and she looked into Mrs. Ochterlony's face as if somehow she had the power by retracting her opinion to prevent things from turning out badly. Mary was not a stoic, nor above the sway of all the influences round her. She could not resist the soft pleading eyes that looked into her face, nor the fascination of her young sister's happiness. She held her peace, and even did her best to smile upon the spectacle, and to hope in her heart that true love might work magically upon the man who had now, beyond redemption, Winnie's future in his hands. For her own part, she shrank from him with a vague sense of alarm and danger; and had it been possible to do any good by it, would have felt herself capable of any exertion to cast the intruder out. But it was evident that under present circumstances there was no good to be done. She kept her boys out of his way with an instinctive dread which she could not explain to herself, and shuddered when poor Aunt Agatha, hoping to conciliate all parties, set little Wilfrid for a moment on their visitor's knee, and with a wistful wile reminded him of the new family relationships Winnie would bring him. Mary took her child away with a shivering sense of peril which was utterly unreasonable. Why had it been Wilfrid of all others who was brought thus into the foreground? Why should it be he who was selected as a symbol of the links of the future? Wilfrid was but an infant, and derived no further impression from his momentary perch upon Captain Percival's knee, than that of special curiosity touching the beard which was a new kind of ornament to the fatherless baby, and tempting for closer investigation: but his mother took him away, and carried him indoors, and disposed of him carefully in the room which Miss Seton had made into a nursery, with an anxious tremor which was utterly absurd and out of all reason. But though instinct acted upon her to this extent, she made no further attempt to warn Winnie or hinder the course of events which had gone too fast for her. Winnie would not have accepted any warning-she would have scorned the most trustworthy advice, and repulsed even the most just and right interference-and so would Mary have done in Hugh Ochterlony's case, when she was Winnie's age. Thus her mouth was shut, and she could say nothing. She watched the two with a pathetic sense of impotence as they went and came, thinking, oh, if she could but make him what Hugh Ochterlony was; and yet the major had been far, very far from perfect, as the readers of this history are aware. When Captain Percival went away, the ladies were still in the garden: for it was necessary that the young man should go home to the Hall to join Sir Edward at dinner, and tell his story. Winnie, a changed creature, stood at the garden-gate, leaning upon the low wall, and watched him till he was out of sight; and her aunt and her sister looked at her, each with a certain pathos in her face. They were both women of experience in their different ways, and there could not but be something pathetic to them in the sight of the young creature at the height of her happiness, all-confident and fearing no evil. It came as natural to them to think of the shadows that must, even under the happiest conditions, come over that first incredible brightness, as it was to her to feel that every harm and fear was over, and that now nothing could touch or injure her more. Winnie turned sharp round when her lover disappeared, and caught Mary's eye, and its wistful expression, and blazed up at once into momentary indignation, which, however, was softened by the contempt of youth for all judgment other than its own, and by the kindly influence of her great happiness. She turned round upon her sister, sudden and sharp as some winged creature, and set her all at once on her defence.

"You do not like him," she said, "but you need not say anything, Mary. It does not matter what you say. You had your day, and would not put up with any interference—and I know him a hundred—a thousand times better than you can do; and it is my day now."

"Yes," said Mary. "I did not mean to say anything. I do not like him, and I think I have reason; but Winnie, dear, I would give anything in the world to believe that you know best now."

"Oh, yes, I know best," said Winnie, with a soft laugh; "and you will soon find out what mistakes people make who pretend to know—for I am sure he thinks there could be something said, on the other side, about you."

"About me," said Mary-and though she did not show it, but stood before her sister like a stately tower firm on its foundation, she was aware of a thrill of nervous trembling that ran through her limbs, and took the strength out of them. "What did he say about me?"

"HER AUNT AND HER SISTER LOOKED AT HER."

"He seemed to think there was something that might be said," said Winnie lightly. "He was afraid of you. He said you knew that he knew all about you; see what foolish ideas people take up! and I said," Winnie went on, drawing herself up tall and straight by her stately sister's side, with that superb assumption of dignity which is fair to see at her age, "that there never could be anything about you that he and all the world might not know!"

Mary put out her hand, looking stately and firm as she did so—but in truth it was done half groping, out of a sudden mist that had come up about her. "Thank you, Winnie," she said, with a smile that had anguish in it; and Winnie with a sudden tender impulse out of her own happiness, feeling for the first time the contrast, looked at Mary's black dress beside her own light one, and at Mary's hair as bright as her own, which was put away beneath that cap which she had so often mocked at, and threw her arms round her sister with a sudden thrill of compassion and tenderness unlike anything she had ever felt before.

"Oh, Mary dear!" she cried, "does it seem heartless to be so happy and yet to know that you——"

"No," said Mary steadily—taking the girl, who was as passionate in her repentance as in her rebellion, to her own steadfast bosom. "No, Winnie; no, my darling—I am not such a poor soul as that. I have had my day."

And it was thus that the cloud rolled off, or seemed to roll off, and that even in the midst of that sharp reminder of the pain which life might still have in store for her, the touch of nature came to heal and help. The enemy who knew all about it might have come in bringing with him sickening suggestions of horrible harm and mischief; but anything he could do would be vain here, where everybody knew more about her still; and to have gained as she thought her little sister's heart was a wonderful solace and consolation. Thus Mary's faith was revived again at the moment when it was most sorely shaken, and she began to feel, with a grateful sense of peace and security, the comfort of being, as Aunt Agatha said, among her own friends.

HIS NAME.

BY THE VERY REV. WILLIAM ALEXANDER, DEAN OF EMLY.

O Wonderful! round whose birth-hour Prophetic song, miraculous power, Cluster and burn, like star and flower,

Those marvellous rays that at Thy will, From the closed Heaven which is so chill, So passionless, stream'd round Thee still,

Are but as broken gleams that start, O Light of lights, from Thy deep heart, Thyself, Thyself, the Wonder art!

O Counsellor! four thousand years, One question tremulous with tears, One awful question, vex'd our peers.

They ask'd the vault, but no one spoke; They ask'd the depth, no answer woke; They ask'd their hearts, that only broke.

They look'd, and sometimes on the height Far off they saw a haze of white, That was a storm, but look'd like light.

The secret of the years is read, The enigma of the quick and dead By the Child voice interpreted.

O everlasting Father, God!
Sun after sun went down, and troil
Race after race the green earth's sod,

Till generations seem'd to be But dead waves of an endless sea, But dead leaves from a deathless tree.

But Thou hast come, and now we know Each wave hath an eternal flow, Each leaf a lifetime after snow.

O Prince of Peace! crown'd yet discrown'd, They say no war nor battles' sound Was heard the tired world around;

They say the hour that Thou didst come, The trumpet's voice was stricken dumb, And no one beat the battle-drum.

Yea, still as life to them that mark Its poor adventure seems a bark, Whose track is pale, whose sail is dark:

Thou who art Wonderful dost fling One ray, till like a sea-bird's wing The canvas is a snowy thing,—

Till the dark boat is turn'd to gold, The sunlit-silver'd ocean roll'd With anthems that are new and old,

With noble path of luminous ray From the boat slanting all the way To the island of undying day. And still as clouding questions swarm Around our hearts, and dimly form Their problems of the mist and storm:

And still as ages fleet, but fraught With syllables, whereby is wrought The fullness of the Eternal thought; And when not yet in God's sunshine, The smoke drifts from the embattled line Of warring hearts that would be Thine;

We bid our doubts and passions cease, Our restless fears be still'd with these— Counsellor, Father, Prince of Peace!

A DAY WITH THE OUT-PATIENTS OF A HOSPITAL.

ABOUT a couple of months ago, in running back by train to Town after a consultation, I chanced to get into a carriage containing, amongst others, one of those men to be met with in every grade of society, who are always complaining of their share of the "ills that flesh is heir to," who live in an atmosphere of gall and bitterness, and who never appear to absorb, or at any rate retain for any time, one single genial ray. They have, too, the unenviable faculty of hunting out, with peevish haste, some unsatisfactory state of child or wife, until at last, by force of habit, microscopic fancies become positive creations. If you reason with such men, they will, hesitatingly, admit that a principle of compensation is at work to some extent, in the existence of many blessings; but such is the power of the demon Discontent, that they very speedily lapse into the old grumbling mood again. The character of our fellow-traveller was detected in this wise: a gentleman sitting next to us had asked for his neighbour's family. He did this, we presume, from sheer politeness, and with an evident dread of consequences; for the malcontent on entering had loudly complained of the stuffy carriage, the damp seats, and the horrid weather; and only needed the key-note to be sounded, when pellmell and glibly there slipped out a host of grievances. To the rescue came a grey-headed gentleman-one whom ladies would call a dear old man. With peculiar coolness he recounted the simple tale of a thrice-performed horrible operation he had undergone, with an addendum of "Thank God, I believe I'm much better for it." For the nonce, my discontented friend was forced to admit that some of his fellow-men were worse off than himself; but whether the stern fact worked any lasting change in his feeling, I know not.

A few days after this occurrence, a friend just starting on a tour called, and asked me to take charge of the out-patients of one of the hospitals for a month. It soon occurred to me, that I could thus become acquainted with a class of the community of which the public knows but little,—the poor folk who attend the out-patient departments of our large hospitals, and that I might also be able to give information regarding them which would deserve the appellation of truthful, and be free from personal prejudice. In contrast to the case of my grumbling friend, there is an utter want of compensation in the great majority of deserving cases. Theirs is a scant existence without comfort; disease and distress in all their varied forms go hand in hand. I will just outline my picture, and send my readers (and my discontented fellow-traveller could I but find him) away with a thankful realisation of their comparative happiness.

Now it is a serious mistake, though it is one frequently made, to take what is known in regard to the condition of the in-patient, as a criterion of that of the out-patient. The former, if he chances to meet with a serious accident, or gets "knocked down" by an acute disease, is provided with most comfortable quarters, good nursing, food in all quantity and kind he may require; in fact, finds a home probably far superior to what he has ever had before. Everything conducive to cleanliness and comfort is attended to. The chaplain pays visits and makes inquiries; the lady visitors attend frequently, scanning each nook and corner with approving eye and gesture; and on visiting days friends flock around his bed, and help to blunt the sharpest edge of misery and pain. But it is not so with the out-patients: they suffer from ailments almost but not quite incapacitating them, and the germs of these have been steadily growing for months and years. Ties of home, large families of little ones, and the like, stimulate these poor creatures to drudge along till within an inch of their lives. Their home is damp and cheerless, they have no nurse, bread and bread alone for food, and no word of comfort, but the harsh voice of Bumbledom -that guardian of starvation-looming in the distance; a weariness of spirit is stamped upon each feature, and besides this, there is a cultivated negation of pain. You will perhaps reply that improvidence and the "tippling" habits of the poor, have eaten up the "provision for another day." I deny that this is in any degree the average truth.

The physician has the best opportunities of seeing all grades of social life, and patients at the hospital as a rule come to him divested of all trickery. For the most part they have a natural manner, and tell a plain tale which is borne out by every circumstance. Indeed there can be no reason for deception; most of the cases show that when the food supply falls off, the enemy Disease stalks in at the door. Our clients shall speak for themselves.

The different modes in which the patients enter are amusing. Domestics are flaunty, and assert those notions of female dignity which are peculiar to the more uneducated; the widow is respectful and quiet; the mother with the young daughter is sharp, short, to the point, but peculiarly attentive to every word that is dropped, and very thankful; the old man pulls his front locks, if he has any; and the youngster, cap in haud, is very vacant, and stands in very considerable awe of the "doctor."

Patient No. 1 is a farrier, as you detect from the aroma about him. He tells you that he has a pain in his side aud a "fluttering at his 'art." He looks like a man pallid from drink, and on being questioned admits taking "three or four pints a day; but he's a good deal over the fire; and it's very 'ot in his trade; in fact in summer he wants six or seven pints, tho' it don't agree with him." He works fourteen hours a day, and in the winter he is "out in the draughts a good deal and gets chilled." He is married, and has one child. Here is a brawny fellow, nearly fifty, who has simply been experimenting as to how long Nature will last without a break-down, when liberties are taken with her. He has been what he considers a healthy man, and the ill effects of the beer system have been apparently worked off, so to speak, by the hard exercise demanded by his trade. He has lasted well so far, but having now begun to fail, he will find his powers are exhausted; some organ of importance will get out of order, and he will not unlikely die pretty soon.

No. 2 is a single woman, twenty-nine years of age. She casts a doubtful glance as she enters, as much as to say, "I wonder if you will be unkind or harsh to me." She speaks timidly, and presents her letter as required by the rules. In reply to the question, "What is the matter?" she tells you that she has been bad a long while, has had great pain in the chest, with a troublesome cough, and can't get any sleep at night; has never been well since sleeping in a damp bed at Liverpool three years ago; and has been a patient at the Brompton Hospital, where she got a little better. She understands that she is in a decline; was so weak on Sunday that she fainted away; is unable to do anything except "about the house," but is pretty comfortable, and is living with her parents. This is a case that will probably go from worse to worse; and it is one which brings out a very common phenomenon in medical practice, -the migration of patients from one hospital to another. One frequently meets with persons who have been to almost all the institutions in London in turn. In the end they often seem to become afflicted with an incurable hypochondriasis or mania for "walking the hospitals," which they do after their own fashion. They will tell you the opinions of eminent men in technical language, offer a lucid and clear explanation of their case, oftentimes accompanied by amusing yet really sensible suggestions; but their many crotchets entirely bar their chances of cure. They know too much, in fact, and have dwelt so long upon their own state, that there would appear to be an almost tangible imprint of their maladies upon their very brains. I am acquainted with one poor fellow who, unfortunately for his own comfort, once heard a physician pronounce the name of his disease; and from that momeut he was doomed to a life of selftorture. He procured and read the various treatises which had been written about his peculiar malady. really coached himself up in the literature of the subject, tried to balance the bearings of his own case, and at last resigned himself almost entirely to the study of each particular symptom. At last this habit intruded itself upon him under all circumstances. His imagination coined so many hypotheses, that ideas became facts which no amount of reasoning could dispel. At last, the most horrid spectres and illusions were seen by him in his sleep. and the man's existence became a prey to phantoms even in the daytime.

No. 3 is the case of a child eleven months old, brought by the mother, with a story of "two teeth cut last week," and a rash following which turns out to be chicken-pox. This is soon disposed of. Mothers attribute no end of things to teething, and rightly so in some cases; but no common sense could tolerate the absurd remedies used, and one finds it better among the poorer people to encourage the most simple and harmless practice.

No. 9 begins his story at once. "Please, sir, I ain't got no letter; it's my fust time of atten-I got a werry bad cold; had my feet wet thro' last week, and different times this snowy weather; my 'ead feels awful bad, enough to split: my throat's sore, and I got pains in all my limbs." We write on his card-after seeing that he has a glistening eye, a hot skin, a quick pulse, and trembling tongue-"Severe cold." We find he drives a horse and cart, is eighteen years of age, is not in any club, and will have no means of support if he gets knocked up. He has no father nor mother, and is lodging by himself. In about a week's time he may get well, or an attack of low fever may set in, and then a six weeks' illness and convalescence must be accompanied by much want and distress.

No. 10 is a mother, a supplicant for her baby eight months old, ill with bronchitis. No letter. The woman says she has failed to get one, having been to several places, and "she can't drag him about in the cold and wet, and can't leave him behind." Circumstances more fitted to ensure or, at any rate, help on the death of her babe could not be desired.

The next three that enter are better; the fourth is much worse. Several slight ailments follow.

No. 18 is a young married woman, eighteen years of age, with a decided pout, and a closely-set pair of lips. She reminds one of a snappish terrier. Last week a prescription for an ordinary cold had been given her; to-day she at once tackles your "Well?" with—"The medicine didn't do me any good at all, and my throat's uncomfortable." She has an unhappy and dissatisfied aspect, and by the exercise of a little tact you make out that she has not a very good temper, "often gets put out," and that it is not at all unlikely she and her husband look at matters through very different coloured glasses. The husband is a bricklayer, and, like the majority of his class, has a propensity to visit the publichouse. This is in nowise counteracted by the fact that she is wont to be constantly at her mother's in the evening, "to take care of the children, because there's no one else to do it." Under these circumstances, she is putting the cart before the horse, in seeking cure through the medium of remedies applied to the body. Perhaps, in the course of a few visits, one might be able to give a little good advice of a moral kind, for the hospital Pharmacopæia does not happen to contain any remedy for the peculiar affection of temper from which she suffers.

No. 19 is a very sad case. It is that of a woman forty-one years old, who sobs a little as she enters, trembling with nervousness. The medicine she had has made her feel a little better. She almost cries as she speaks. This you can stop, if you like, by speaking harshly to her, and thus driving her back again upon the old smoulderings in her heart. A kind word or two, and she is overcome; but even that loss of force relieves her, and she plucks up courage to tell her tale. She has had great trouble and hard times for the last three years, and has not been well during all that time. Her husband was a lighterman, earning from thirty shillings to two pounds a week, a hard-working, kind fellow. He fell and injured himself whilst carrying a sack of corn; this was followed by a long illness, the formation of an ancurism, and death. She has been a widow now these fifteen months, with six little ones; the eldest, about sixteen, "does what little he can." The poor soul, when able, used to go out washing, but that is now an impossibility. She sleeps badly, and lives still worse, scarcely ever eating anything but bread. The parish allows her five loaves a week. How well these troubles have painted care upon her face! But with it all, she still has an air of great respectability. These are the cases where one wishes for the power to second the use of the pen of the prescriber by a tonic from another dispensary—the pocket.

No. 20 is a Mrs. MacSomething, thirty-seven years of age, one of the descendants of the aborigines of the Emerald Isle, who for the life of her can't tell her own name, and never could. One need not ask many questions; the only thing absolutely necessary is to attempt to gather from her loquacity (either the result of studious preparation for the "dochthor" or a natural peculiarity) a carefully calculated diagnosis, by dividing the facts by four, and accepting one part. She didn't sleep this month, has got the rheumatism all over, and was up "all last night walking the floor wid' the baby, and it's more than a month since he's complaining. I got four childer, and I'm delicate since my third:" all of which really means, that the child has a little cough, is fretful in the night, and has been so occasionally for the last month; that her children are troublesome, and that she, a very strong healthy-looking woman, has a little more to do than usual. She blarneys you, and you blarney her, and, as a parting word, she utters a blessing upon "you dochthor."

No. 21 is always at the wash-tub, is about forty-nine years old, and suffers from nervous debility. It appears that in the court where she lives there was a "row." She had been in bed a couple of hours, and was suddenly awakened by a noise. On looking out of the window she saw two men stabbing each other, and "it turned the whole of her blood," so that she has not been well since. Poor people are not supposed to have any nerves; these are only allowed to exist in high society. Our experience is, that the nerves of the luxurious are sources of positive enjoyment, in comparison with those of the lower orders. Lady A-Lady B- can recline on her couch, receive the sympathies of her friends and beau idéal of a doctor, and have every wish attended to by lackeyed menials. This poor woman has to earn her bread by an extra strain upon a shattered mechanism, each movement of which is torture.

No. 22 will require the doctor's kind offices byand-by. Her parents were in good circumstances, but she preferred, ten years ago, to run away and marry a poor man for love. Her father would never have her home again, and recently, on his death-bed, would not even see her, which has depressed her. Judging from her general demeanour, her story would appear to be quite true.
Her husband is very kind to her, and her sisters also, but still she "feels very low" since her father's death. A little tonic upon which to fix her attention will soon prop her up again.

No. 23 is the wife of a man-servant, and the two once lived in service together. They married, and one result has been that the wife fares much less sumptuously than she did before. The husband passed before marriage as a widower with one little child, which turns out to be illegitimate. He is in out-door service, and stays generally at some distance from his wife's home. This arrangement he justifies on the ground that "he does not like to let the people he serves know that he is married." The poor wife gets very little money, and lives as she can. She has just opened a school. Of course, the husband drinks. The woman has simply got out of health from want of proper food and attention. The domestic arrangements, and the plea given in their justification, would probably be interpreted by a shrewd person to mean the existence of a couple of wives, or some such thing.

Case 24 is a young fellow who has had some eruption on the skin for nine months, which might originally have been cured in a few days.

No. 25. An old woman, aged seventy, has "bin bad all the week, and could creep into a egg-shell; she has terrible nights, and can't get no rest." She has had twenty children, but "a great many of 'em went off in fits. Bless ye! there's no inside of me, I be so holler." Her husband is bedridden, and "a-getting out o' bed o' night kills me, and I wants a drop of something nice then, for I'm all of a shake and tremble." She says moreover, in answer to your remark that it is very hard at seventy not to be comfortable, "Ah, 'tis hard to think I should want in my old age!" She has had a cough for two months, always has fits two or three times a day, and had "the airysiplas" a twelvemonth ago, and then came here. She makes special request for some pills she had before, because "she can't sleep without 'em," and for "a little bit of a note to take to the minister, to get a little wine. They won't give me any at the parish, because I come here to the infirmary; but I've been here this eight year, and don't like to leave." It appears that her husband has been ill for two years. The parish give him a little wine and beef, but she has "got rid of everything but what I stand upright in, and that's how I get on with, for I don't like to see him die for want. It is impossible to move him about, his breath is so bad. He do have his bed made once a day, but then it's a hard matter to get him in again," and she "wishes the Lord would take 'em both." What can medicine do here? Food is the remedy.

The next two cases are minor ones. A husband comes for a repetition of his wife's physic—a case of mild bronchitis; the other is a boy with bad eyes, who is a pupil at a National School, and is punished for non-attendance.

Next comes a young woman (No. 28), aged eighteen, who looks as though she had lost every drop of red blood, and had been turned into wax. She works very hard in a laundry, at skirt ironing and drying. The room has a red-hot stove in it, whilst lots of clothes are steaming over it all the while. Her worst troubles are that she is weak, has a headache, and a bad "stitch" in the side. She works from seven in the morning till eight at night; gets about ten minutes at 10 a.m. for lunch, as she calls it, viz., half a pint of beer and a bit of bread, and about half an hour for dinner at mid-day. She is on her legs the whole day, besides walking to and from home. She is an orphan; has an uncle, but he can't help her. Her earnings are about one-and-ninepence a day; if she were better she might earn more. Should she fall ill she has no one to support her. On Sunday she gets out for a walk with some young friends. Now this is a very common case. A nice-looking, respectable young woman, without friends, tries to gain an honest living; by-and-by she breaks down; want comes on; the consumptive tendency shows itself too plainly, and either the workhouse is the inevitable termination, or the girl gets better, temptation meets her, and she falls. Happily this one is coming round, and, be it by medicine or chance, the hospital at any rate is the means whereby the devil is defeated.

No. 29 is the mother of four children. She is aged twenty-six, is suffering from nervous debility, and cries when spoken to. Her husband is a soldier, but she "did not marry him a soldier." He was a wheelwright. After she had had two children "he fell into company, and into drink, and enlisted." Before that she was doing well, and at the time of his enlistment she was expecting her confinement, and had a child in arms. After he left her she started a laundry business, and failed, and now goes out to work when she can; but her children are a burden to her, and besides, she is not well, and unfitted for work. She can get no intelligence of her husband, whom she believes to be in —. Sometimes he sends her a trifle. Her children are of the ages of eight, seven, four, and two. "If any one," she adds, "had told me before I was married I'd come to this! But then we don't know what we're born to."

No. 30, the case of a child, three months old, is a terrible illustration of that portion of the second commandment which declares that the sins of the father shall be visited upon the children.

No. 31 is a servant, twenty years old, out of place, who has received her congé in consequence of illness, and is suffering from influenza. She has saved nothing, is in lodgings, but hopes to get a situation soon. This is one road to prostitution, and a well-trodden one; but, luckily, another place has turned up for her should she be able to go to it next week, which she will likely be.

We have then, in succession, a sugar-refiner, suffering from bronchitis; a candidate without a letter, attacked with dyspepsia, and a great admirer of pil acotia; another without a letter, with headache; a little boy suffering from typhoid fever, who is well taken care of by a sharp, intelligent sister; another "no letter;" a baby with water on the brain; one who has tried eight or nine places, and can't get a letter; a woman "very weak in the back."

No. 41, a very distressing case indeed; a woman about thirty-four, who is "in a flurry all over," and whose "legs is so bad and swells up as big as her body." She is the wife of a market-gardener, who earns fifteen shillings a week; there is a family of six children, the eldest is twelve years old, the youngest eleven months. She has the appearance of being very seriously ill; there is a short cough, apparent difficulty of breathing, a distressed and anxious countenance, but her pulse is good, and there is no weakness in the chest. Her disease is hysterical in character, and you write as the diagnosis :- General debility from want of food (for all she lives on is bread-and-butter and tea) and hysteria. Inquiring more fully into the case, you find that she can't sleep, and has horrid dreams, and she feels at times inclined "to jump right out of the house-occasionally she fancies she can hear the child still." This gives you the clue to all her misery. "Five years ago core. •• 9th of next month," her child was run over, under her own eyes, by a train, and suffered great agony till the third day, when it died. The nights are always worse than the days; she tries to pluck up, but can't. This case is a type of a host, in which debility is the occasion for the play of sorrows and griefs. Given a man in health, he has his resistant power strung up; but depress him, and the blue-devils have him at an awful advantage. Feed this poor woman and put more flesh on her bones, and for a while the sharp edge of her misery is blunted.

Several "no letter" cases follow: the standing orders are to prescribe once or twice, but after that a letter must be produced. An old man, aged sixty-five, is "bilious;" has a little annuity, lives as closely as he can, so much so that he "never has a pint of beer unless it will do him good."

No. 47 follows in the shape of a stableman, a rheumatic subject. "Last night, when in bed, something rolled about in his head like a wheel, and so it does now, and he has got to mind he don't fall; his head feels as big as two heads." He is forty-nine years old, and has consumed a very respectable amount of beer, the daily average being about four or five pints. Six hours abed is as much as he gets, and he works under the influence of changes of temperature from six a.m. till twelve or one. He is a thorough muddler in his household, and tells you he has had very bad luck in the shape of the erysipelas last spring, which laid him up seven or eight weeks, and then, as he has never joined any club, he's been badly off, and so have his family, of whom there are five-two at home and three out. His logic is unassailable: "If I comes to have three or four bouts a year, I gets pulled back, of course, very much." Here is a specimen, then, of improvidence in young days, and of effects that might have been entirely prevented ;-first of all, want; and, secondly, as a consequence of drinking, threatened apoplexy, and disease elsewhere, which will probably give him dropsy, and he will linger on, now better, now worse, not fit for any hard or continuous work, till, by-and-by, he enters a hospital and dies.

The next patient is a young woman with rheumatism, followed by another trivial case, a woman (No. 50), aged forty-nine, "who feels all to pieces," and whose side has been "terrible bad" these two days. She is the mother of ten children, six of whom are at home. She has "to do for" her husband, who works in the brickfields, is not kind, and has been away three weeks, not having sent her anything. She cannot go out to work because of her house; two of the children go to school. When she rests she is better, but the washing knocks her up. "She has worked hard for her children all her life, and they can't help her much now."

Three "no letter" cases succeed—a case of dyspepsia; a laundress out of health; a little boy four years and a half old, suffering from inflammation of the ear. These bring us to the case of an older boy with threatened fever,—"delirious tremors" as the mother calls it,—seven years old, who had always been a deal of trouble, and, according to the mother's notions, is very delicate.

No. 57 is a married woman, aged thirty-two, who has lost her voice, and has a violent cold "all over her." Her husband is a labourer, out of work at present, and she is acting the part of cook in a family.

No. 58 is a woman who does not look you straight in the face, and keeps her hands covered up with her shawl. She has all the appearance of a dram-drinker. She can't eat, feels debilitated, and so on, but declares that she is almost a tectotaller. However, one must take the liberty of not exactly believing her.

The day's work finishes up with another example of improvidence. An engineer, bronchitic, aged thirty-five, married, and with a family of three. He is out of work, and allows that he has been a drinker. His earnings have averaged 34s. to 36s. a week; but he has not cared to keep his club payments up, and now that illness has overtaken him he is unable to derive any benefit from former payments.

You now imagine you have quite done. To chat to some sixty people, and to guess the exact remedies for each case, are no easy matters. Give them three minutes apiece, - which is decidedly below the average, - and you will have been at work for three consecutive hours. But on your exit from the consulting-room you are beset by half-a-dozen or more of your clients, who put all manner of questions to you about things they have "forgotten to ask you." One wishes just one word about her daughter; another shows a huge orangewine bottle, and wants to know whether "this is the right medicine;" a fourth puts in a claim to know whether you said "before or after meals," and so on. Now, it is no little puzzle to recollect the exact detail you have recommended to the whole sixty, or heard from them. Still, this is expected of you; and it is wonderful how easy it becomes after a little practice. You leave the hospital, and never fail to see several of your friends consulting over their cases, comparing notes, giving vent to their views on the doctor, the treatment, and the quality of the physic, with a stray suggestion to "ask next time for the stuff as he give me for my cough." Occasionally there is a dose taken in the open air, and an interchange of friendly physic between two parties (generally old women). One never fails to get a smile of recognition, and one should never fail to return it. I believe this does as much good as the physic, and gives a body to it. as it were. Such is a true picture, without a grain of exaggeration.

I admit the existence of intemperance in some of the applicants, but these are the minority. One has no need to be harsh even if it were more frequent, for sobriety is inconsistent with the want of various

The last case mentioned is one that deserves retribution-that of a mechanic who earns good wages, and deliberately drinks away his bread-and-cheese; but can we not make some excuse for the hard-working, scantily-paid labourer who tries to drown his privations, and to make up for the cheerless comfort of his home, by a visit to the public-house on a Saturday night? We have our comforts-cleanliness, a decent bed, plenty of food, intellectual recreation, the sympathy of friends, interchange of sentiment, charming conversation, correspondence, and special amusements. But everything of a wholesome nature is crushed in him and his, who "awake to toil, and sleep the sleep of the exhausted." One may carry one's head with a jaunty toss as one taxes the applicant for the letter of recommendation, and attach, in fancied superiority, the epithet "degraded;" but we cannot fairly expect that, upon a soil which is tilled by no healthy process, any virtue should flourish. But the majority of applicants have no such failing, and most of them are women. How they bear up against such a tremendous weight of adverse circumstances, as is pictured by some of the histories I have given, is a marvel beyond my comprchension. In many cases where illness incapacitates the husband, home and the little it contains are kept together by the strivings of a poor weak woman in fight with terrible odds against her. The public disburses with a liberal hand, and it must be a certain satisfaction to it to be assured that the great mass of the deserving poor are greatly benefited thereby. Very near the Broadway, Hammersmith, stands the West London Hospital, which casts the shadow of its good deeds many miles around; and it has at its credit a large sum total of relief afforded to human miseries of mind and body. Should any inveterate discontents feel disposed, I will take them with me on my next visit to it, and after our consultations are over, I am sure their parting wish shall be that the Hospital were ten times larger and ten times better known.

TILBURY FOX.

OUR COMMON FAITH.

"I BELIEVE IN GOD THE FATHER ALMIGHTY, MAKER OF HEAVEN AND EARTH."

THE title of the series which opens with this paper, and the names of the writers with whom I am associated, bear witness that we believe that there is, below all the discords and divisions of Christendom, a ground on which we can stand, as belonging to us all, a faith in the strength of which, in spite of the inherited antagonisms and antipathies of many centuries, we can claim each other as brethren. To some, it may be, that belief may seem visionary and unreal, synonymous with the rejection of all distinctive truths. I must assert my own conviction, hoping hereafter to give the reason of the hope that is in me, that, just in proportion as we believe this, we can maintain our distinctive truths with boldness and freedom, without panic, and therefore without bitterness.

Signs that we who undertake to write in this series do not stand alone in our convictions, have of late multiplied around us. They seem at first, indeed, to point in very different directions. The acknowledged leader of one great theological party in the Church of England has published an Eirenicon, or Peace Manifesto, in the hope of showing that the documentary standards of that Church and of the Church of Rome are not incompatible with each other, however wide may be the chasm between the statements of individual teachers, however great may be the practical corruptions on the one side and the practical defects on the other, and of opening, if it be possible, negotiations for a treaty of peace. A society for promoting the union of Christendom, reckoning a considerable number of clergy and laymen among its members, has been working for two or communion and brotherhood with the Churches of the East, as well as with the great Latin Church of the West. An actual overture towards negotiation has been made in an address to the Pope, signed by about one hundred and eighty clergymen, and has been met, as was indeed to be expected, by an answer rejecting all terms but those of absolute submission. Few tasks would be easier than to try to gain the applause of popular Protestant feeling by denouncing these and all other like attempts as treacherous and disloyal. The phrases already ring in one's ears, and come to the tip of one's tongue, and the point of one's pen, which most men would look upon as natural, justifiable, necessary. I own that I for one cannot use them. I cannot look ou these movements with any other feeling than that of sympathy and respect. I may have very little hope of any immediate practical result for good. Men may seem to me to be pursuing a very unlikely path to union when they seek to find a basis for it in documents that bear in every page the impress of the time of hottest conflict, and try, with fruitless efforts, to turn declarations of war into a treaty of peace. But the feeling that Christendom is crippled and trammeled by disunion, that many of our disputes are questions of words and names, that many more rise out of usages and customs that may and ought to vary with the "diversities of countries, times, and men's manners,"-this deserves respect and sympathy wherever it shows itself.

And therefore I am prepared to watch with no different feeling the tokens of its presence in quite three years past, and has endeavoured to seek inter- | another quarter of the theological firmament. For some years past, I believe, two great divisions of the Christianity of Scotland-the Free Church and the United Presbyterians, conscious of the evil of the multiplied growth of sects, and differing but little, if at all, from each other in doctrine and in worship, have been endeavouring to bridge over the chasm, and effect an amalgamation. I am informed by a printed circular, issued last February, that the desire for union has shown itself on a wider scale, and that it is proposed to hold in the course of the present year a "Catholic Church Congress," with a view to promoting the restoration of the "visible unity of the Church." It is stated that "bishops, deans, and clergy of the United Church of England and Ireland, the chairman of the Congregational Union, the chairman of the Baptist Union, the president of the Wesleyan Conference, the moderator of the United Presbyterian Church in England, the moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, the principal of the Irish Presbyterian College, and others, have expressed their warm interest in the proposal." I have no further knowledge of this movement. It may be the work of a man of enthusiastic and sanguine temperament, looking at the vision of a glorious future, and not able to estimate its distance from us or the difficulties that have to be overcome before we can attain to it, taking the civil answers of persons in official positions as tokens of a deeper interest than the writers ever dreamt of. But so far as there is such a feeling at work, so far here also it claims respect. If it takes any outward form, if it embodies itself in any document, it should be met by us of the English Church with the most patient consideration. But there is, I believe, an evil very likely to insinuate itself, even if it has not done so already, into all these movements. The predominating motive in those who originate or join them may be fear and not love. Those who contemplate the union of the Greek, Roman, and Anglican Churches, may do so in order that they may more effectually check and crush the spirit of free inquiry which they regard with so much alarm, and the popular Protestantism against which they cherish so longstanding an antipathy. Those who urge the union of the Free Church and the United Presbyterians, may do so only or chiefly in order that they may make a final stand against what seems to them the growing laxity and latitudinarianism of the Establishment. Those who take a wider range, and think it possible to unite all such Churches and sects within the Queen's dominions in a new Evangelical Alliance, may be hoping for a more effective machinery to put down what they would describe as Romanism and ritualism on the one hand, and rationalism on the other. If so, and in proportion as it is so, they will one and all of them fail, as they deserve to do, and as other like attempts have failed before. The alliance will last just as long, and no longer, perhaps not so long, as the enemies are still formidable, and then the discords and divisions will show themselves again. The foundations of the city of a new Catholic Christendom are not to be laid in the hatred or the fear of a common foe. If its builders and defenders concentrate their attention on the construction of catapults, the walls which they erect will be daubed with untempered mortar, and when the overflowing storms and the great hailstones come, they will bring it down to the ground, and men will point to it, as they point to other dreams and delusions, and say, "The wall is no more, neither they that daubed it."

The object of the writers of this series of papers is, I believe, to point to a more excellent way. They are less ambitious-it may be, less hopefulthan others. They do not see their way to any organised union of the Christian societies with which they are severally connected. They do not expect that any amount of negotiation and diplomacy would bring about such an union in their own time. They doubt if it would do so at any time. They are content to wait and do their work, each in his own place, and possess their souls in patience. But, in the meantime, they wish to lay aside, at least, the prejudices and dissensions of the past: to ask what they have in common-what ground for mutual esteem, sympathy, co-operation, that common element supplies. Something, at least, is gained-one step taken towards the more distant unity-if we learn to think how many share our belief rather than how few. They feel that even where that common element sinks to a minimum, or seems to sink (for men's words do not always adequately express their faith, and there may be a real acceptance latent under an apparent denial), it is still truer and therefore wiser to recognise its existence. That common faith they find in what has embodied, almost from the very first, the faith of Christendom. In the truths of which the Apostle's Creed is the witness, and which may be and are held even by societies and individual men who do not receive it as a symbo, they see what may unite all who hold them as with the sense almost of a common nationality, though they live in different provinces, and speak in different dialects, with more or less patois, of the one heavenly speech.

The first of these truths is that which the Creed expresses in the words, "I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of Heaven and Earth." The subject of this paper is, "the Fatherhood of God." If I might preach as from a text, I should choose the words of the Apostle to whom that truth was revealed in all its wonderful fulness, and who carries on his thoughts of unity as in an ascending scale, through the "one body," and the "one spirit," and the "one hope," the "one Lord, one faith, one baptism," to the "one God and Father of all." In these words we may at least find that which gives us a point of contact with every Church in Christendom. Wherever men utter that "I believe," wherever they pray in the words or after the pattern of the great prayer of Christ, there are those whose primary religious convictions are one We may go further, and say that this with ours. belief supplies a common ground on which to stand, even with the great heathen world, which, to the shame of Christendom, still includes by far the greater part of the human race. So far as they have risen above the merest fetiche worship, or the adoration of a tyrant whom they fear, so far as they turn to a "great Father," so far as they have that faith which from the beginning of the world has justified the belief that "God is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him;" so far as that faith brings forth its fruit in works of truth and love; so far they, too, are one with us: and as we believe that He does not refuse to own them as his children, we, on our part, need not be ashamed to call them brethren. Appealing to this belief, we cau say to them, "Whom ye ignorantly worship, Him declare we unto you." This is the first step upwards, out of the lowest degradation and most brutal ignorance, to a true and complete theology. If we do not find men on this level, we must lead them up to it before they can advance one step further. It may exist even where it is overlaid by superstition, polytheism, idolatry. Our onward progress, so far as it is into the truth, and under the guidance of the Spirit of Truth, does but bring out its meaning with fuller clearness till we reach that complete revelation of the Fatherhood of God which "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past to the fathers by the prophets, hath, in these last days," given to us "through His Son."

The name "father," like all other names which men have used to express their thoughts of God, or by which God has revealed Himself, is of immense significance. Starting as it does from a primary human relationship, it testifies that it is through such relationships that man mounts upwards to true thoughts of God. It is not merely from "the things that are seen," though they reveal the "eternal power and Godhead," but from his own personal feelings, that he gains, as he becomes conscious of them, a glimpse of the Divine perfections. While men need to be taught, as God has taught them, the limits of this likeness, and to be warned of the danger of thinking that God is even such an one as themselves, in outward form, or in what in themselves they recognise as evil, it yet remains true that man is made in the image of God, and that it is only through human affections that we learn to think of God as one in whom there is the pattern and archetype of all our excellence, of whatever in ourselves we recognise as good. As soon as men have come to see that the relation of fatherhood is something more than a merely animal one, they have also come to think of it as a parable of the relation between themselves and God. It follows that the thoughts which men connect with the Fatherhood of God will vary according to the feelings with which they look upon human fatherhood. In proportion to the variety of emotions and thoughts in the latter case, will be the variety also in the former. Out of the immense range of such thoughts which the history of mankind presents, I select three, as representative examples—as having been held by large and influential portions of the human race, and as being traceable, in greater or less purity, in many others.

1. The poetry of Greece gives abundant proof of the strength of fatherly affection in its earlier and better days. Hector's loving glance at the babe who shrinks from his gleaming helmet, and the tender farewell of Ajax to his infant boy, belong to the touches of nature that make the whole world kin. But the household life of the Greeks-of the Athenian and Asiatic Greeks especially-was predominantly one of enjoyment. The work of educating was either essentially public, as at Sparta, or handed over to masters, sophists, slaves. very scanty measure did the father enter into his work as the trainer and teacher of his son. relation was one chiefly of kindness and rejoicing, varied at times by fits of passion and caprice. reasoning upward from their own experience, men thought of a Father of gods and men, dwelling on the Olympian heights, giving them rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with food and gladness. Their worship was one of revelling, dancing, riot, the full exuberance of merely animal life, of mental life so far as it did not reprove or restrain the animal. Sometimes dark thoughts of the gods, as arbitrary or vindictive, crossed their minds, and then they had recourse even to human sacrifices to appease them. thought of a God who should be the God of the barbarians as well as of the Greeks, of a Father who should show no forgetfulness of any of His children, who trained them and watched over them-this was hardly in their thoughts at all. Here and there a spirit rising to a loftier height than his fellows might get a glimpse of it, and then it died away.

Very striking was the effect of the later systems of Greek thought, first on their estimate of human, and then on their thoughts of the Divine fatherhood. The Stoic crushed parental affection as he crushed all other emotions, as incompatible with the lofty serenity after which he strove. The Epicurean looked on it as in most cases a disturbance of the ease and enjoyment which seemed to him the In proportion as both systems supreme good. broke down the old reverence for the natural sanctities of home, they also came as a thick cloud between the souls of men and the glimpses they had once had of the Fatherhood of God. The Stoic stripped Him also of all personal affection, and made His will but part of an inevitable succession of events. The Epicurean in his heart denied a God when he had ceased to acknowledge a father, and if at times he assumed a conformity to popular religious language, it was to speak of the gods as beings we could not know, finding their supreme good in their own enjoyment, careless of mankind.

belief in a Father in heaven had so utterly died out under the influence of the two systems, that it needed a new revelation to restore it.

2. Among the Romans the case was very different. Reverence for the fatherly relationship was the groundwork of their life, their character, their institutions. The obedience of a son to his father was almost as unconditional and entire as that of a slave. He was absolutely in his father's power, originally even to the extent of life and death. He was as his father's chattel, and during his father's lifetime could neither hold property nor possess slaves of his own, might even be sold or emancipated as a slave was. As was the household life, so also was the theology. At first the groundwork of the national religion was the acknowledgment of a Father. The thought entered, as it nowhere did among the Greeks, into the very name of their supreme God. Jupiter was the "heavenly father." He gave victory in battle, and was the guardian of law, and watched over oaths and covenants. There was doubtless an element of strength in this, but in proportion as the principle of slavish obedience was substituted for filial love in human life, their thoughts of God also became slavish. them too came, in their later days, deteriorated and in coarser forms, the influence of the two Greek sects. They, with the craving for sovereignty which they could not get rid of, welcomed an Imperator, a mere commander of the legions, as the father of his people, and so the Emperor was to them the type and pattern, not of the true fatherly relation, but of the extremest denial of it. And, in like manner, Imperialism infected their theology. At the best their thought of the supreme God was, that He was, like the Emperor on earth, tolerant of all creeds and systems so long as His own sovereignity was acknowledged. The gayer, easier Epicureans, like Horace, shut Him out of their thoughts, and dreamt that He took no heed. Sterner souls, like Lucretius, denounced belief in Him as the most hurtful of all superstitions, the root of all evil. Rome could not have supplied this element to a new religion any more than Greece.

3. With the Israelites the case stood differently. Among no people are there more touching proofs of the strength of the fatherly affections. The deep interest of every part of the patriarchal, and even later, history turns on it. Abraham and Isaac, Isaac and Esau, Jacob and Joseph, David and Absalom, are all familiar to our memories. fifth commandment gives to the obedience of sons a place among the foremost duties. It stands, according as we divide the Decalogue, either as the last of the obligations which come under the head of devotion, or as the first of all the duties which man owes to man. And yet, strange to say, the idea of fatherhood is not prominent in the early thoughts of the Israelites, nor in the early revelations of the Divine name. The acts are the acts of a father, and here and there He claims His people as the children whom He has begotten, but it is not yet the name by which He reveals Himself. To the patriarchs He is chiefly the Almighty God (El Shaddai). To Moses He is revealed as Jehovah, I AM THAT I AM, the source of all life, the absolute and eternal Being. The fact is every way significant. The theology of Israel was not merely the reflection of their national character and life. They were not at first to think of God as being such an one as themselves, even in what was good, lest they should be led on to identify His character with their own in what was evil. They must first learn to think of His name as "great and terrible," and of Him as infinitely above them, the supreme King, the Judge, "merciful and long-suffering," and yet One that "will by no means clear the guilty."

The thought of the Divine Fatherhood comes out. like other great truths, with increasing prominence in the writings of the Prophets. But it appears with a singular and almost startling sadness. speak of the blessedness of sons as something which they have lost, which they are hoping at some distant day to regain. The complaint of Jehovah to His people is, "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me." "If I be a father, where is mine honour?" The promise for the remote future of the Messiah's kingdom, of the new covenant, is, that "It shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the children of the living God." "Ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." And with this hope of a new covenant, resting on this relation, there was also in the closing words of the best of the Prophets of the Old Testament, a wonderful and striking indication of the way in which it was to be established. The restoration of the life of the family, the elevation of the fifth commandment to its true position, was a necessary prelude to it. Elijah the prophet, who was to be sent "before the great and dreadful day of the Lord," was to "turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to the fathers." And such a mission, such a conversion, were indeed necessary. The traditions of the Scribes, with their Corban casuistry, were setting at nought the obligation of the reverence and love due to their fathers upon earth. It was no wonder that they forgot that which was due to their Father in heaven, and practically did not believe that they had one, or translate their human experiences into a pattern of things divine. In proportion as they thus denied or forgot it for themselves, the thought that it could be claimed by others irritated them to frenzy.

Our Lord came with the message of glad tidings, and side by side with the Gospel of forgiveness was that of the Fatherhood of God. If we were judging of Him as men judge of a human teacher, we could not otherwise describe His preaching than by pointing to this as the key-note of all, the thought which filled His soul and would find utterance. When He speaks to the whole multitude in the Sermon on the Mount, it is to tell them of a Father in Heaven who maketh His sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust. They are to strive to be perfect in forgiveness, that they may be the "children of their Father," and are to trust in His care and love. They are taught to reason upward from their experience of earthly fatherhood to the belief in that of God. "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much shall your Father which is in heaven give good gifts to them that ask Him?" When they pray, it is to be with the opening words, "Our Father." True it is that before men can enter into the blessedness of that relationship they must claim it, must admit God's claim to them. The sensual, selfish, worldly, could not enter into His kingdom. "To as many as received Him to them gave He power to become the sons of God," There was an inner circle of conscious inheritance, children knowing their Father, born again of water and the Spirit; but the more they entered into that blessedness, the closer they drew to the mind and will of God, the more clearly they would discern that what was true there was true in varying degree of all eircles exterior to their own. As Christ is the Saviour of all men, specially of them that believe, so there is one God and Father of all, whom some "ignorantly worship," whom some "see as through a glass darkly," and some again behold as "with unveiled countenance." Every convert that was baptised into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, entered into the inner circle of the kingdom. Within that there was the innermost and most blessed of all, taking in those whose life was according to that beginning-who, being led by the Spirit, were truly the children of God, children of light. This, the universal Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of mankind in Christ, was the mystery which had been hid from ages and generations, and was now revealed to prophets and apostles by the Spirit, and was given to St. Paul as his special trust. Of this St. John speaks when he calls on his disciples to "behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God." There was no longer any limit of race or country. The family of God was catholic. The human relationship was ennobled by the fuller revelation of the Divine. Of Him, the God and Father of all, every fatherhood, every fatherland, in Heaven and earth, was named. That was seen to be the archetype and pattern of all paternal authority and love, of all true government in the Church or in the world.

What then does this Fatherhood of God involve? In what relation does it stand to our belief and to our life? I dare not attempt to throw into formal statements and definitions all that the answers to these questions would imply. I dare not leave them altogether unanswered. What follows must be received as of the nature of hints, VII—13 suggestions, outlines, which those who read and think may develope and fill up for themselves.

If we believe in God the Father, we believe in One who "has made us and all the world." We assign the whole order and beauty of the universe, its complicated structure, its marvellous design, to a personal and sovereign Will. That Will may work by laws, wide, permanent, reaching through the ages. But the laws are the expression of a Will, and are in their operation but uniform modes in which the Will acts. They are not forces themselves, nor are they mere symbols of the uniformities of the self-evolving powers of Nature. It may be that in proportion as "knowledge grows from more to more," we shall trace Law where at present we see an apparent absence of it. The abnormal and the irregular are but untravelled, unexplored regions of God's great domain. But in proportion as we ascend to the height from which we look out upon the past, the present, and the future, in that proportion-if we are true to our belief in God the Father Almighty-we shall acknowledge that that Will has never abdicated its functions, that it keeps the forces of Nature and the laws which regulate them, as under its own control. The true spirit of scientific inquiry is not that of weary travellers groping through the dark, nor of searchers for hidden treasures baffled in their pursuit and dashing themselves, in their disappointment, into the abyss of the Unknown and Unknowable, but much more that of children who seek to read their Father's will and trace His wisdom. The very beauty that is so profusely scattered over creation has in it a token of a fatherly tenderness, distinct from the majesty of a Sovereign or a Creator, inviting men to the wonder in which all knowledge begins, and mingling that wonder with delight and joy.

I can but barely touch here upon the bearing of this thought on the great question of miracles as probable or possible. It is manifest that the whole problem turns on the question whether we may start with the belief in God as more than a name for the unknown forces of the universe, or for the universe itself, or may recognise a Will, with a character, purpose, plans, like those which we identify with human wills. I am more concerned now to show how this truth bears on another analogous set of questions-those, I mean, connected with what we commonly speak of as the providential government of God. Here there is no manifest suspension of law, or interference with it. May we recognise guidance and direction? Does the rain from heaven fall, are the fruitful seasons given, in subservience to any moral ends, or are they governed only by material laws which work blindly, irrespectively of any such reference? The scientific spirit of the present time tells us that to introduce that thought is to throw confusion into everything. "Prayer cannot stay the order of the seasons, or the rising and the setting of the stars, think that it affects the clouds as they float filled with rain, or can arrest the progress of pestilence or murrain? To believe that eclipses or pestilences were signs of the wrath of God, His judgments upon a guilty land, was but the first and lowest stage in the progress of knowledge, from the night of ignorance, through the twilight of conjecture, to the clear day of certainty. We have left it far behind. To interpret the facts of nature or history on that theory now is to go backwards into darkness, not forward into light."

So it is that when disasters of this kind come upon a land, men who thus think betake themselves with all their strength to the work of investigating their phenomena. They can all but ascertain their laws, and calculate their movements, and stay their onward march. True, the "all but" remains. Something there is which ever more baffles them. They advance a certain distance, and are thrown back. Beyond all discoveries, there lies a region yet undiscovered. If they believe in uniformity of succession everywhere, it must be by an act of faith, by reasoning from analogy, arguing from the known to the unknown. Actual experience is against it. They supplement it by belief.

I am constrained to say that I believe many have been thrown back upon that kind of faith by the want of faith in the Fatherhood of God in those who are the appointed witnesses of it. Shocked at what seems to them the boastful pride of intellect, they have said, "No; your search into physical Laws is vain. You cannot here act on the methods which succeed elsewhere. Unwonted suffering must come upon nations and individual men as the punishment of unwonted sins. The only way to deal with calamities like these is to receive them as judgments. We must try to discover what the sins are, and put them away. must deprecate the wrath of the Judge by prayers and fasting. The more solemn and public our fasting and humiliation the better." So oftentimes those who ought to work in counteracting evils with the means which God has put into their hands, sit down in inactive submission, almost as blind and unloving as the fatalism of Mohammedans. So our very prayers are confined too often to mere deprecations of physical evil, mere vague acknowledgments of the moral evil which we look upon as its one explanation. But seldom do such prayers rise, as surely they ought to do, for wisdom to see what the evil calls for, courage to do it thoroughly, patience to bear the suffering meekly, illumination to read its lessons rightly. We too often cease to pray as to a Father in whom we trust, and turn with a lip-homage to propitiate a Sovereign whom we dread.

And then there comes, often in men otherwise good and kind, a very subtle and perilous temptation. Having assumed, not only that the physical suffering is subservient to a moral end, but that it must be the special punishment of a special sin, they proceed to ask, as some did of old concerning the man that was born blind, "Who has sinned? Where is he that troubleth Israel?" And then, with a marvellous variety, and jarring discord, and yet with astrange identity underlying them all, we hear on every side different conjectures. Each sect, party, and teacher fixes on the evil that they are not inclined to themselves, that they stigmatise and condemn in their opponents. "The pestilence or the murrain comes," we are told, "as the punishment of national apostacy because we have admitted Papists and Jews to Parliament. It is a judgment on our Erastianism and Latitudinarianism, or our tolerance of free thought and unbelief, or our postal and railway labour on the Sabbath, er on our non-observance of Lent, or on our ritualism and sacerdotalism." So the judgments of God, instead of humbling all men before the judgment throne, or bringing them into a deeper sense of their common brotherhood, are turned into occasions of angry railing and bitter recrimination. Each man who so acts practically says within himself, "This is what I would have sent the pestilence for, had I been seated on the throne of God or wielding the rod of His sovereignty." And then, reasoning as if God were altogether such an one as himself, he assumes that as the explanation of His action whose way is in the sea, and his paths in the great waters, and whose footsteps are not known. No, the confession of sins, to which all suffering calls us, is the confession of our own transgressions, not that of our neighbours'. Each man, as in the sight of One from whom no secrets are hid, must unveil the plague of his own heart, his share in the great accumulated guilt of the nation's sin. At the best, this rash interpretation of the Divine will darkens and bewilders men. In proportion as any one interpretation gains possession of the minds of great multitudes, and suffering passes into panic, and panic into frenzy, it may lead to yet worse evils. If men come to believe that the cattle plague is owing to the Papists, they will take to burning Popish chapels, or churches that they think Popish, as an effectual remedy. So it was that men interpreted what they thought the wrath of the gods of old, and when crops failed, or the Tiber overflowed, or pestilence smote down its thousands, shouted out, "The Christians to the lions! the Christians to the lious!" as their one hope of deliverance.

Mere scientific scepticism will not avail, I believe, to save us from these wild confusions of thought and the atrocities in which they issue. Men will not and ought not to assent to the mere denial that there can be a Divine purpose in such calamities. But in proportion as we believe in the Fatherhood of God as the true completion and explanation of His sovereignty, we shall recognise that He gives us, often in the very character and laws of the calamity, so far as laws are traceable, a clue to the sins which it visits, and the duties to which it calls us. Typhus, cholera, all forms of disease which are generated or propagated in the foulness and squalor of our large towns, or our neglected villages—do not these point to our selfishness, sensuality, luxury, our sloth, indifference, procrastination (evils not of one class or party, but of all), as the besetting sins with which we have to wrestle? Diseases which affect brute life may remind us that there, too, we have neglected duties, acquiesced in cruelty, been satisfied so long as our appetites were pampered, or our wants supplied. The lesson which we have to learn is that a nation's life as well as a man's life, "does not consist in the abundance of the things that it possesses," that "man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." In proportion as we acknowledge a Father, and not a despot, we shall strive to act after His will who remembered in the great heathen city the "three score thousand" who in their helpless infancy knew not "their right hand from their left," and the "much cattle" which were fattening in their stalls. We shall believe that if we ask for wisdom, He will give it liberally. We shall welcome all inquiries and experiments made with the hope of ascertaining the physical laws which may be, at least, self-imposed limits and conditions of the working of the Divine Will; and believe that it may be one purpose of that Will, through these visitations, to lead us, as our forefathers were led by the terrible scourge of smallpox, to new facts and undiscovered laws of human or of brute life which may be fruitful in blessings for the future.

But the thought of a Father in Heaven, as it involves the thought of one who gives and who chastises, and whose love we recognise in both, so does it also involve the truth that He educates and trains. He makes each man's ontward life a discipline for the inward. And in proportion as any man enters into the sense of worship, and claims its blessedness, he enters also into the purpose of the education, and it does its work, however unpromising his outward circumstances may at first appear to him. If the Greek poet could put into the mouth of one who thought of the sons of God with heathen thoughts,

" For who hath seen in Zeus forgetfulness Of those He children owns?"

we may rest upon the assurance that here also of the meekest and lowest of the children of our Father in Heaven, it is true that not one of them is forgotten before God. Life itself, with its joys and its sorrows, its losses and its gains, its friendships and its bereavements, its affections and its strivings, is an education without which we could not attain to the perfection of which we are capable, and to which the Father of our Spirits calls us as the condition of eternal life. And then, too, if the education has seemed fruitless-if we have thrown aside the lessons of infancy and youth. and gone into a "far country" with what we madly claimed as "our portion of goods," and there "wasted our substance in riotous living" We may accept the Divine names, because they have -if then we are conscious of the measureless degradation of a wasted life, and talents squandered, and trusts abused, and affections slighted, then, too, it is in the thought of the Fatherhood of God that we find the starting point of repentance and restoration. When the prodigal came to himself, and thought of all the blessings he had forfeited, the new starting point of life was found in the cry, "I will arise, and go to my Father." If the thought added, as it did, to the bitterness of his sorrow, it made the sorrow nobler and more purifying. When he claimed that relationship which he seemed to have forfeited so utterly, there was a marvellous and rapid restoration to it: "When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him."

I have spoken hitherto of the Divine name of "Father" as disclosing the relation in which God stands to the creatures of His hand and the children of His adoption. I have no wish to draw a veil over the fact that in the "common faith" of Christendom, in all its confessions of faith, the word has yet another meaning. The names "Father" and "Son" correspond, we are taught, to realities within the Divine nature itself. In the unity of the Godhead we recognise a distinctness of which these two names are partly, though not completely. the expression. Of that other name of the "Spirit of God," which is wanted for the completeness. another will speak hereafter. I will confine myself to the two that connect themselves with the truths of which I am now writing.

It is not my purpose in treating of them to bring together a large aggregate of texts such as are usually adduced in proofs of doctrine. proofs are familiar enough to most of us. The name by which our Lord for the most part spoke of Himself might be the "Son of Man," but that in which He recognised the highest and fullest revelation of the truth was that of the "Son of the living God." He claimed God as His Father, one with Himself, dwelling in Him; He came from His Father into the world, and went from the world unto His Father. There was here a Sonship transcendent, incomparable, wonderful, beyond that of all other children of God that had been or ever could be. And that Sonship we might show by the same process to have been from everlasting, not the growth of any beginning or origination, conceivable within true limits. The glory which He had with the Father before the world was, the manifestation of that glory in order that all men should honour the Son even as they honour the Father, -all this is incompatible with the thought of any lower sense. and can admit of no other interpretation than that of the Apostles' Creed, as expanded and interpreted in the Nicenc.

We may receive this as a revealed fact to be believed on the authority of Him who reveals it. been given us as from the mouth of God. But it.

may add strength to the convictions and clearness to the thoughts of some if they ask themselves to what conclusions the names themselves point-what cravings and yearnings of man's heart they satisfy? We recognise the truth that we must mount upward from man's excellence to God's, from whatever is most perfect in the human to that which is Divine. We find the type and pattern of all fatherly goodness in the Divine Fatherhood. But when we think of human excellence, can we look on the filial virtues, willing obedience, perfect love, unvarying submission, as less lovely, less glorious, less heavenly than the paternal? Do we not feel as if something would be wanting to the Divine perfection unless these also found their archetype and exemplar there? Must there not be a Divine Sonship as well as a Divine Fatherhood? Must we not believe in a Son coming into the world to do His Father's will, speaking the things which He had seen the Father do, sharing the Father's glory? And if this be essential to our thoughts of the Divine perfection, can we think of that as ever having been less perfect, and at any point of time becoming more so? If the relation indicated by the manner of the Father and the Son be a true relation at all, must it not have been from everlasting? Words may fail to describe adequately that which transcends the limits of all thought and all language. Men may have used many words without knowledge which darken counsel, but if we believe in God the Father Almighty, are we not led ou to believe in the Son of God, as of one substance with the Father, co-equal and co-eternal?

A NIGHT WITH THE RAMSGATE LIFE-BOAT.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY LIVES SAVED.

I.—DISASTERS AT SEA. THE LIFE-BOAT TO THE RESCUE.

How impressive it is to lie awake listening to the storm, -to hear the rush of the wind, now moaning in the chimney, now thundering at the windows, against which the rain beats and hustles, -to feel or fancy that the house trembles, shaken in the rude hurry of the blast, -to hear the waves breaking on the beach, a half suppressed tumultuous uproar, like the faintly-heard riot of a distant angry mob, -to get yet further to sea in one's thoughts, and to picture a noble ship with close-reefed topsails running before the gale, or beating away from the dread neighbourhood of dangerous sands, while the pilot, anxious and watchful, and the crew eager and alert, peer through the darkness to catch the welcome guidance of some bright warning light, or the fainter rays of some ship's light hovering perilously near, the passengers all the time wistful and anxious, asking many questions, and receiving cheering answers, but given with that unreality of tone that makes the hearer fear the sound more than he can believe the sense! Or to imagine a vessel at anchor, the cables swinging out at their full length, the sails all closely furled, but the gale beating against the hull and rigging with a power that seems more than able to drag the ship and its living freight to a speedy destruction, -to picture the ship lifting and pitching and surging in a cloud of spray, the hungry waves leaping at it as if to devour it before its time, the anchors yielding inch by inch, or the cable giving, and the terrible sands under the lee, -to fall into an uneasy sleep oppressed by the weight of undefined horrors, and in the morning to look from the tall cliffs upon a golden beach, then upon the fretting surf beyond, and upon the sea bright in the sunshine, smooth-browed but like a great giant rolling his huge limbs in uneasy sleep, quick with great billows rising and falling in restless heavy swellings. Then to look at the distant Goodwin Sands, and see the white leaping surf, the fangs in the jaws of death, still guashing and mumbling after their midnight meal, in which they ravened on a goodly ship and mangled many brave sailors, weeping women, and trembling wondering children.

Such pictures are often suggested by the midnight gale, and such after-scenes are witnessed in the morning's calm at Ramsgate, as at many another spot on the bold coast of our sea-girt island home, where each howling wind as it rushes on breathes the trumpet blast that calls to the struggle of life and death. Our narrative has for its date the 3rd of December. During the whole of the day the wind has been blowing hard from the west-northwest; the weather has been very unsettled for some days, squally, with the cloud-scud low and flying fast; now it is becoming worse, and the blasts more frequent and more fierce, rapidly growing iuto a continuous-rising and heavy gale. The Fitzroy signal hangs ominously from the flag-staff, giving a warning (for which experience has gained respect) of the dangerous winds which may be expected. The Downs anchorage is crowded with shipping, so much so, that the lights of the vessels anchored there shed a glow upon the darkness, like the lights of a populous town. Every now and then a vessel leaves the fleet and running before the gale seeks surer refuge; or perhaps one homeward bound swiftly threads her way through the crowd of vessels, the crew half rejoicing in the gale which at every blast bears them nearer home.

On Ramsgate Pier rumours of disasters bring the watchful lookers-on together in anxious gossip; many partially disabled vessels have already found refuge in the harbour; and now a schooner is brought in by some Broadstairs boatmen. When they boarded her in answer to her signals of distress they found that the mate with a woman and child alone remained in her. She had been in collision during the previous night, and whether the rest of the crew had escaped to the other vessel or had been lost overboard was left a matter of dread uncertainty.

As it is a stirring sight to see the vessels making through the heavy seas for the harbour, so it is an exciting and withal a gallant sight to watch the luggers, heavily freighted with anchors and chains to supply vessels that have slipped their cables, bearing away bravely in all the rush of the storm upon their errand of daring enterprise. The afternoon creeps on: it is half past three; a puff of smoke is seen coming from the Gull Light-ship, but the wind is too strong, and in the wrong direction for the report of the gun to be heard. But the signal is accepted, and soon the steamer and life-boat are away in the hurricane. They make for the light-vessel, that they may learn for what their services are required. A squall of thick rain hides the Downs and south end of the Goodwin Sands from view. Suddenly the squall clears away, passing rapidly to windward; and from the pier and cliff, although not from the lower level of the steamer's deck, or from the lifeboat, it is seen which vessel is in danger. A large light schooner has driven from her anchorage, and is now dragging perilously near the sands. She is too near, with the wind as it is, to have any chance of escaping by slipping her cable and trying to sail clear: she is driving fast, and we can plainly see from the cliffs the large flag she has hoisted at her main-topmast head as a signal of distress. It is an alarming sight. By taking her bearings it is plain to the watchers on shore that she is fast dragging her anchors and nearing her doom, and the nature of the terrible sea she is in is also very evident. She is light, buoyant, and lifts to every wave; she looks like a gallant charger taking a succession of desperate leaps, as first her bow is thrown up in the air and for a moment rides high on the top of the wave, and then again her stern is thrown up and her bow almost buried as the huge short waves pass under her stern. Repeatedly our fears, as we watch her, make us fancy that her cable has at last parted, and that she is in full career for the waiting and deadly sands. The spray clouds drift to leeward, and again we are assured by finding from carefully-taken bearings that her position has not much changed for the worse. We only take our eyes off her to look occasionally at the steam-boat and life-boat, as they are making their way with all speed to the rescue. The steamer rolls and plunges on, nothing daunted, nothing disturbed by all the buffeting she gets; the life-boat rises like a cork to every wave, and plunges through the crests as she feels the drag of the steamer, while the foam spreads out on either side like a fan, and the scud and spray fly over her in a cloud. We see them making their way to the Gull Light-ship, where they learn that a schooner was seen in distress bearing south-south-west, supposed to be on the South Sand Head. On through the giant seas and driving surf, in the very teeth of the gale, they make gallant way, and are about to take up a position from which the life-boat can plunge in through the broken water to the rescue of the crew. A large Deal lugger is beating up to windward from the neighbourhood of the Sands: they speak her, and learn that she has rescued the crew of the schooner. The lugger, one of the finest of all the noble boats that sail from Deal beach, had some time before the schooner had got into her present dangerous position, sheered alongside at no slight risk, and as she shot by the crew had jumped into her for their lives, forgetting in their hurry and excitement the flag of distress which they had left flying high, pleading still, and not unheeded, for help that was no longer required. Nothing could be done for the schooner; driving fast she soon began to thump on the Sands; darkness settled down upon her, the fierce waves had her for their prey, and in the morning not a vestige of her was to be seen. The steamer and life-boat having left her to her fate, now made for a barque which, with main and mizen masts cut away, had still a chance of weathering out the gale. The wind was too heavy, and the tide too strong to tow her to a safer position: her crew had already made their escape, and she was left in turn, but not, as it proved, to meet the sad fate of the schooner, for she successfully rode out the gale.

A further cruise round the Sands, to see if their services are required by any distressed vessel, and they make again for Ramsgate, which they reach about half-past six. The steamer and life-boat are moored, ready for any fresh call which may be made for their services, the probability of which seems very great.

In such a storm, anxious watchers are on the alert on all the stations of the coast. Boatmen under the lee of boat-houses and boats, are grouped together at friendly corners. One or two every now and again take a few strides in the open for a wider range of view, and then back again to cover. The coastguard-men, sheltered in nooks of the cliff, or behind rocks, or breasting the storm on the drear sands as they walk their solitary beat, peer out into the darkness, watching the signals from sea, - the gun-flash, or the rocket's light, which, while they speak of hope to the imperilled, tell to those on shore of lives in danger and of waiting death. Or the watchers listen for the dull throb of the signal gun, the sign of wild warfare and struggles for life mid breaking waves and dashing seas, and calls for the rescuers to rush into the contest that they may snatch their powerless brethren from the very jaws of death. Often, too, the whisper runs along the telegraph wires telling of some distant scene of sad distress. It is so in this case. About a quarter-past eight in the evening, the harbourmaster of Ramsgate receives a telegram. It intimates that far from Ramsgate-away round the stormy North Foreland, some miles to the westward of Margate, the Prince's Light-ship is firing signal guns and rockets. The Tongue Light-ship repeats the signals: the vigilaut coastguard-men hurry to bear the tidings on to Margate, but there the fine life-boats are powerless to help. The wind is blowing a hurricane from the west-north-west, and drives such a tremendous sea upon the shore that neither life-boat nor any other boat can possibly get off. The coastguard officer at Margate sees at once how hopeless any attempt of that kind would be, and hurries to send a telegram to Ramsgate. The harbour-master there receives it; and in a few minutes hurried action takes the place of wistful anxious waiting. For hours the steamer and life-boat have rested quietly in the sheltered harbour, lifting gently to the small waves that have been playing against their sides; the men for hours have been gazing out into the darkness, listening to the roar of the gale, and the murmur and tumult of the tumbling waves. The expected challenge comes-a call to action that they do not one moment hesitate to accept. They know the hardship and peril, but do not think of these, for they know what it is for brother sailors to cling perhaps to a few spars of still-standing wreck, while the wild waves leap around, and only a few inches of creaking, yielding timber shield them from their fury. They know the power of the waves to tear the strongest ship to fragments in a few hours; and they are ready for any stern deadly wrestle, to rescue their drowning fellow creatures. The order is given, and directly there is a rush to the life-boat. Ten Ramsgate boatmen, the coxswain, and two men from the revenue cutter "Adder," which happens to be in the harbour, speedily man her. The men on board the ever-ready steam-tug "Aid" are no less prompt; and within half-an-hour both steamer and boat are again making their way through the broken seas, and breasting the full fury of the gale. Imagine the picture that was hid in the pitch-darkness of that wild night. The steamer, strong and powerfully built, and which has never failed in any of its tussles with the storms, but in its every part worked true and well, when failure in crank, rod, or rivet might have been death to many lives, is thrown up and down by the raging sea, now half buried in the wash of surf, or poised for a moment on the broad crest of a huge wave, and again shooting bows under into the trough, rolling and pitching and staggering in the storm, but still true to her purpose. Still onward and onward she goes—the beat of the paddles, the roar of the steam-pipe, the throb of the engines mingling with the hoarse blast of the gale, and the lash and hiss of the surf and fleeting spray; while to the watchers on shore her light alone tells of her progress. The life-boat is almost burrowing its way through surf and sand. Each man bends low on his seat, and holds on by the thwart or gunwale; the wind has changed, and the boat being towed in the face of the gale and sea; does not ride over the waves as she would do if she were under canvass only, but is dragged on and on, cleaving their crests. "It was just like as if a fire-engine was playing upon your back, not in a steady stream, but with a great burst of water at every pump," said one of the men, whose station was in the bow. The ends of the life-boat are high. the air-tight compartments in the bow and stern giving her the self-righting power; the waist is low, that she may hold as little water as possible. When a sea comes on board, it is rolled out over the low sides, or escapes through the valves in the floor of the boat, so that within a few seconds of being full of water, even up to the gunwales, she frees herself to the floor. In a wild sea, when the waves and surf break over the bows of a big ship. and send the spray flying up almost to the topmast head, the life-boat, towed on in the teeth of the storm, is constantly deluged with water, or buried in surf and spray. At times, indeed, the water runs over the boat in volume sufficient to wash every man out of her who is not holding on. Now, the waves rush over the bow, and again a cross wave catches the side of the boat, staggers her, and fills her with water, while she pitches and rolls with a motion quick as that of a plunging horse. But the men know her well, and trust her thoroughly, and with a firm hold and stout hearts they resolutely journey onwards.

The wind has veered a little, and the high cliffs somewhat break its force; the men do not feel the full power of the gale until they are well round the North Foreland. The tide is strong, and on its ebb, the wind is dead on end, and they work their way with great difficulty.

The rain ceases, the clouds of flying seud lift a little; it is still pitch dark, but free from mist and rain. The men see the Margate Pier and town lights, which shine out steadily and clearly, and it seems strange to look, from their rough post of danger, action, and hardship, upon the town resting in quiet peace, scarce conscious of the storm. They make for the Tougue Light-ship, nine miles off Margate.

Every five minutes the darkness of the horizon is broken by a rocket from the light-ship. It goes flying up against the gale, and, bursting, gives a moment's flash, as its stars, caught by the fierce wind, go in a short stream of light to leeward. The steamer's crew make for the light-ship, looking anxiously the while in all directions for any signal which may guide them more directly to the vessel in distress. But they see none, and therefore make for the light-ship. The captain is told that signals had been seen from the high part of the Shingles sand-bank, and that they were supposed to be from a large ship in distress. The life-boat sheered near as she passed and the crew heard the same report. Again they urge their way onward against tide and wind, but can see no sign of any vessel, and no vestige of wreck. Perilous and anxious work this, for they actually feel their way in the tempest, and skirt the very edge of the dangerous

Sands. The roar of the gale is too great for any cries of distress to be heard. The hull of the vessel may be overrun with the sea, and the crew, clinging to the masts and rigging, be utterly unable to give any signal by firing rockets or guns, or showing lights, for the night is so dark that nothing can be seen except the steamer's light ahead, and the gleam of the feam within a few yards of the boat. Thus the men on board the steamer and life-boat are doubly auxious, not liking to leave the neighbourhood without thoroughly examining it, and fearing that they may leave behind, to a despair rendered the more bitter by the false hopes that had been excited, some poor fellows clinging desperately, with their remaining strength, to some few trembling fragments of wreck.

They can see nothing, and hear nothing. vessel must either have gone utterly to pieces, or the men on board the Tongue Light-ship have been mistaken in the position of the signals they had seen. Intently they listen, and fancy they hear the boom of a gun fired at intervals; in a lull in the storm they hear it more plainly, and see in the far distance the flashing of rocket lights. They soon discover that the Prince's and Girdler Light-ships are at the same time repeating signals of distress. They think it best to make for the Prince's light first; and on arriving there, they are told that a large ship had been seen, on the Girdler Sands, they think, but it might be on the Shingles. Away again, in the darkness, they speed on their noble mission. At last they plainly discern a light on the south part of the Shingles; they make for it, and are again disappointed-it is the light of the steam tug, "Friend of all Nations," which is layingto under the Shingles for protection from the rush of the sea. But here they are somewhat repaid for their efforts, for they learn beyond doubt that the vessel in distress is a large ship on the Girdler Sands, and, more than this, that another large ship, disabled and in great distress, has been seen driving down the "Deeps"-a very narrow channel between the Shingles and Long Sand: it must have been the signals from this vessel that were seen by the men on board the Tongue Light-ship. They are unwilling to pass on their way to the Girdler without making an effort to find the vessel which had been seen in such great distress, and which in every probability had gone ashore somewhere in the neighbourhood. So they make a cruise in the direction of the Deeps. They search narrowly, but in vain, and at last hurry away, as the Girdler Light-ship still continues to fire heavy guns, leaving, as they afterwards found, a ship's crew clinging to a remnant of wreck and in the most deadly peril. of whom in the darkness they could see nothing and hear nothing, although not very distant from them. At last their long, persevering, and hazardous search is crowned with success. Upon nearing the Girdler Light-ship they see on the Sands the flare of blazing tar barrels, signals made from the vessel on shore, and they at once make preparations for going to the rescue. The steamer is obliged to steer clear of the broken water-not only owing to the danger of grounding on the Sands, for the surf from the clashing waves would be enough to sweep her decks and almost swamp her. She skirts the Sands, and tows the life-boat well up to windward. The men on board the boat cast off the tow rope. and the wind and sea at once swing the boat's head round, and she plunges into the broken water which is rushing over the sand. It is indeed a wild waste of water. It boils and foams in tumultuous uproar, as, checked by the Sands, the waves break and rebound and dash together, leap high in air, and then recoil and fall with the roar of an avalanche, while their curling crests, caught by the gale, fly far away in broad feathers of cloud-like spray. It is a desperate strife of waters, and into the midst of it the boat rushes. All the men dare to do is to hoist a close reefed foresail, the gale is so strong. But swiftly it bears the boat along; the waves battle around like hungry wolves, and at times the boat is so overrun with broken water and surf that the men can scarcely breathe. They cling resolutely to the boat, however, and again and again she shakes herself free of water, rises buoyantly over the tops of the waves, and the men are free for one moment again: the next wave comes, and down she plunges into the trough of the troubled seas, which from all sides break on board her, and thus she undauntedly works her way in to the wreck.

II. -THE EMIGRANT SHIP.

It is one o'clock in the morning; the moon gleams out through gulfs in the dark deep clouds which sweep swiftly across her.

The men see a large ship hard and fast on shore, and in a perfect boil of waters. The tremendous seas are surging around, and shaking her from stem to stern, as they wildly leap against her. The spray is flying over her in all directions, and mingles with the dark masses of smoke which rise in thick clouds from the flaming tar barrels, while the smoke and spray are swiftly swept to leeward. She is making all possible signals of distress. The fierce wind had driven her at each lift of the sea higher on the Sands, until she reached the highest part, and there she has been left. When the tide fell, the waves could no longer lift the vessel, and let her crash down upon the sand, else long since she would have been utterly broken to pieces.

The boat makes in for the ship, the people on board see her, and cries and cheers of joy greet her approach. The foresail is lowered, the anchor thrown overboard, and the boat fast sheers in towards the ship. The cable goes out by the run and is too soon exhausted, for with a jerk it brings the boat up within sixty feet of the vessel, which they see to be an emigrant ship crowded with passengers. As the poor people see the boat stop short their cries for help are frantic, and sound dismally in the men's ears as slowly and laboriously they haul in the cable, and get up the anchor before making another attempt to fetch alongside the ship. In the meantime they answer the people with cheers, and the moon shining out, the emigrants see that they are not deserted. The sea is so heavy, and the boat's anchor has taken so firm a hold, that it is a long time before they can get it up; and they now sail within fifty fathoms of the ship before they heave the anchor overboard again. It is necessary to let the anchor down as far as possible from the ship, that they may get plenty of sea room when they haul up to it again. This is done in order that they may set sail and get away from the wreck, upon which they must of necessity be driven if they have not allowed themselves sufficient room to sail clear of her. They let the cable out gradually and drop alongside; they get a hawser from the bow and another from the stern, and by these they are enabled to keep the boat in pretty good position, the men on board hauling and veering to keep the boat sufficiently near without letting her strike against the sides of the vessel; and this, in the broken seas and rapid tide, is a matter of no little difficulty. The captain and pilot of the vessel, (the "Fusilier,") shout out, "How many can you carry? -we have more than one hundred on board, more than sixty women and children." It was with no little dismay that the passengers looked down upon the boat half buried in spray, and wondered how she could be the means of rescuing such a crowd of people. The men shout from the boat that a steamer is near, and that they will take off the passengers in parties to her. Two of the boatmen spring as the boat lifts, catch the manropes, and climb on board the ship. "Who comes here?" cries the captain, as the two boatmen, clad in their oilskin overalls, and pale and half exhausted with their long battling with wind and sea, jump from the bulwarks amid the excited passengers. "Two men from the life-boat," is the reply, and the passengers crowd around them, seize them by the hands, and some even cling to them with such an energy of fear as requires force to overcome. The light from the ship's lamps and the faint moonlight reveal the mass of people on board, -some deadly pale and terror-stricken, some fainting, others in hysterics, while many are more resigned. It had been a long, long night of terror and most anxious suspense, and many who during its terrible hours had held up bravely, now broke down at the crisis of the life-boat's arrival. But the night had not been one of unreasoning fear to all. There were those on board who, filled with a calm heroism, had by their example of holy faith exerted great influence for good, -one woman especially, who had been for some time employed by a religious society in London visiting among the poor, proved herself well-fitted for scenes of danger and distress. Gathering many around her, she read and prayed with them; and often, as the wild blasts shook the vessel to its keel, there mingled with the roar the strains of hymns, and many a poor creature gathered consolation and confidence, and learnt to look from his, or her, own weakness to the Almighty arm of a loving God; and many who had already learnt those truths which take the sting from death, were encouraged to draw hearer, in more full reliance upon the sufficient atonement of Him who has declared, "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth, and believeth in me, shall never die." Thus there was light in the darkness, and songs in the night, and the voice speaking in the tempest said, "Peace, be still;" and many felt, although the warring elements still raged, a calm which recklessness may assume, but which faith alone can give at such an hour.

This is no fancy sketch, no bit of imagined and attempted pathos dragged in. One hundred immortal souls were expecting momently the summons which should launch them into eternity, and a most terrible shade in the tragic picture it would indeed have been had none of that throng been prepared for the summons by the exercise of humble and earnest faith,-if by all of them the expected messenger was thought of as the King of Terrors, and by none as the Messenger of Peace. Now, as the prospect of safety dawns upon all, a wild excitement for a moment prevails, and there is a rush made for the gangway :- mothers shriek for their children, husbands strive to push their wives through the throng, and children are trodden down in the crowd. It is a few moments before the captain can exercise any authority, but the passengers, checked for a minute, regain self-control, fall back from the side of the vessel, and wait for orders. "How many will the life-boat carry?" the captain asks. "Between twenty and thirty each trip," is the answer. "There is a very nasty dangerous sea and surf over the Sands; if too crowded we may get some washed out of her."

It is at once decided, of course, that the women and children are to be taken first, and the crew prepare to get them into the boat. Two sailors are slung in bow-lines over the side of the vessel to help the women down. The boat ranges to and fro in the rush of the tide; though the men do their best to check its swing with the hawsers which are passed from the ship to the bow and stern of the boat. But still she sheers violentlyis now lifted on the crest of a wave to within a few feet of the vessel's deck, and again falls into the trough of the sea after the waves pass under her, and, suddenly dropping many feet below, or, sheering away, leaves a dismal yawning gap of water between her and the vessel's side. It is a terrible scene, most dangerous work, and calling for great courage and nerve. It would have been difficult, even though all had been active men, but how much more so when many are frightened and excited women, some aged and very helpless. The mothers among the women are called for first. One is led to the gangway, and shrinks back from the scene before her. The boat is lifted up, and she sees men standing on the thwarts with outstretched arms, ready to catch her if she falls, and the next moment the boat is in a dark gulf many feet below, and half covered with the fleeting spray. The frightened woman is urged over the side, and now hangs in mid-air, held by either arm of the two men, who are suspended over the side. As the boat again lifts, the boatmen cry, "Let go!" The two men do so, but the poor woman clings to one of them with a frantic grasp. One of the men standing on the thwarts of the boat springs up, grasps her by the heels, which he can just reach, drags her down, catches her in his arms as she falls, and the two together roll down into the boat, their fall broken by the men below, who stand ready to catch them. It is no time for ceremony, but for quick, prompt, unhesitating action. The number to be rescued, and the time that must of necessity be occupied in going to and from the steamer, make all feel there is not a moment to be lost. The next woman makes a half spring, and is got into the boat without much trouble. Now the boat lifts, but does not rise enough, she rather falls and sheers off. A woman is being held over the side by the two men; she struggles, the men in their awkward position can scarcely retain their hold, and she is slipping from them, while the mad waves leap beneath, a ready grave. Just as she falls the boat sheers in again, and she is grasped by one of the active boatmen: by a great effort her course is directed into the boat, and she is saved. Another, who is very near her confinement, cries out piteously, "Oh, don't shake me, don't hurt me!" but she falls from the hands of the men holding her, is caught by the boatmen, and rolls over with them into the bottom of the boat. Some of the men on board throw blankets down to the half-dressed women, many of whom are crying aloud for their children. A passenger rushes frantically to the gangway, cries "Here, here!" and thrusts a big bundle into the hands of one of the sailors, who supposes it to be merely a blanket, which the man intends for his wife in the boat. "Here, Bill, catch," the man shouts, and throws it to a boatman standing up in the boat, who just manages to catch it as it is on the point of falling into the sea, and is thunderstruck to hear a baby's cry proceed from it, while a shriek, "My child, my child!" from a woman, as she snatches the bundle from him, tells further of the greatness of the danger through which the child has passed. In spite of all their care, the boat, every now and then, lurches against the ship's side, and would be stove-in but for the cork fenders which surround her. Still she is flying and tossing about, now high as the main chains, now deep in the trough of a big sea, whose hollow leaves little water between her and the sands; but in spite of all this, about thirty women and children, one after another, are taken on board, and the boat is declared to be full. They cast off the hawsers from the bow and stern, and all hands begin to haul in upon the cable. They get the anchor up with much difficulty, and as the range of cable gets shorter, the boat jerks and pitches a great deal in the rush of sea and tide. The anchor is at length up, the sails are hoisted, the boat feels her helm, gathers way swiftly, and shoots clear of the ship. half-hearted cheer greets them as they pass astern -the remaining passengers watching them with wistful and somewhat anxious glances as they plunge on through sea and foam. Away the boat bounds before the fierce gale—on through the flying surf and boiling sea-on, although the waves leap over her and fill her with their spray and foam. Buoyantly she rises and shakes herself free, staggering as the waves break against her bows, and then tossing her stem high in the air as she climbs their crests. She pitches almost bows under as the waves pass under her stern, and rolls as she sinks in the trough of the seas. The poor emigrants. trembling with cold and excitement, crowd together, and hold on to the boat, to each other, or to anything, scarcely realising their safety as the boiling seas foam fiercely around them, and the rising waves seem to threaten at any moment to overwhelm them. They take a more convulsive and firm grasp, as the cry of warning from the men to "hold on" every now and then is heard, and bend low as the broken seas make a clean sweep over the boat, filling her and threatening to wash all out of her. The steamer, as has been said, towed the life-boat well to windward, that she might have a fair wind in for the wreck; but as soon as the life-boat left her she made her way round the sands to leeward, that the boat might have a fair wind to her again, and now waits the boat's return. On she comes: the broken water is now passed, the scud and spray fly all around her; but the cross seas overrun her no longer, and the emigrants lift their heads and rejoice as the lights of the steamer are pointed out to them shining brightly and very near. Thirty women and children are on board, and with this first instalment of the shipwrecked emigrants the boat runs alongside the "Aid." The steamer is put athwart the sea, to form a breakwater for the boat, which comes under her lee; the roll of the steamer, the pitching of the boat, the wild wind and sea, with the darkness of the night only a little broken by the light of the steamer's lanterns, render it a somewhat difficult matter to get the exhausted women into the steamer. As the boat rises, the men lift up a woman and steady her for a moment on the gunwale, two men on the steamer catch her by the arms as she comes within reach, and she is dragged up the side on to the steamer's deck. There is no time for ceremony here either: a moment's hesitation, and the poor creature might have a limb crushed between the steamer and the boat. Each woman is thus got on deck, and two men half lead, half carry her to the cabiu below. One struggles to get back to the boat, shrieking for her child; the men do not understand her in the roar of the gale: there is no time for explanations, and she is gently forced below. Again the rolled-up blanket appears; it is handed into the steamer, and is about to be dropped on the deck, when half-a-dozen voices shout out, "A baby in the blanket!" and it is carried below and received by the poor weeping mother with a great outburst of joy. "God bless you!—God bless you!—God bless you!—God bless you! be exclaims to the man, and then blesses and praises God out of the abundant fulness of her heart.

Many, who during the hours of danger had been comparatively calm and resigned, can no longer restrain their feelings. They at last feel themselves safe, and at the same moment realise the greatness of the peril they have escaped and that which those left on board the ship still encounter. Some throw themselves on the cabin floor, weeping and sobbing; some cling to the sailors, begging and entreating them to save their husbands or children who are left behind; while others can do little else than repeat some simple form of praise and blessing to God for his great mercy. The boat is towed to windward again, and when the straining cable is let go, her sails are hoisted cheerily, she heads round, swiftly gathers way, and bounds in like a greyhound through the troubled seas towards the ship. A slant of wind comes however and drives her from her course; they find that they cannot reach the ship, and make out into the open water. The steamer soon picks her up, tows her into a more favourable position, and the boat speedily runs in again alongside the vessel. There are still on board more women and children than would fill the boat, and they have to leave some half-adozen behind. All the old difficulties in getting the women down the side of the vessel are repeated, although the wind has now fallen a little. They make for the steamer, and as each new-comer is handed down into the cabin, the anxiety of those who are eagerly looking for some loved one is great indeed, and the greetings, when such are met with, are very earnest. For the third time the boat reaches the stranded ship, and brings away the remaining passengers. The cabin of the steamer is full of women and children, in every stage of exhaustion and excitement. They are very thankful to God for the full answers vouchsafed to the earnest prayers of the last night. It has taken more than three hours to get the emigrants on board the steamer, and there has been additional delay by the boat twice failing to reach the ship; but this very delay, which at the time seemed so unfortunate, was, under God's providence, the means of saving further life.

The life-boat again makes for the "Fusilier," to see what the crew of the ship will do. The gale has now gone down very considerably, and the tide has been falling fast for some time. The ship being light is firmly settled on the sands, and there is now no immediate danger, although should the wind get up again with the returning tide, the ship may be very speedily knocked to pieces.

The captain of the vessel thinks it very probable that, if the gale continues to abate, the ship, as she has not been much knocked about, may be got off at the next high tide; but while he is unwilling to abandon the vessel as long as there is a chance of her rescue, he feels the greatness of the risk, and wishes the life-boat to remain with him. It is nearly day-light, the night is clear, and the wind is still blowing very hard; the life-boat takes an order to the steamer to send luggers with anchors and cables, that they may make every effort to get the ship off, if the weather continues to moderate. She then returns and lies by the ship, while the steamer, heavily freighted with the rescued emigrants, makes the best of her way towards Ramsgate.

III. THE "DEMERARA,"

The emigrants describe their perils, and mention that during the previous evening, while their ship was driving, and some time before she struck, they saw a large ship in great distress and apparently drifting fast upon the sands: that darkness set in, and they lost sight of her.

The crew of the steamer keep a sharp look-out for this vessel, or any signs of her wreck. It is evidently the one of which they heard, and for which they searched before they discovered the "Fusilier." They see part of a mast, and other wreckage entangled in the sands, and conclude that the vessel must have gone entirely to pieces, with the loss of all hands, during the night. But for the delay that had been occasioned, they would have proceeded to Ramsgate before there was sufficient light to scan the sands so narrowly as they did; but now, as they proceed down the Prince's Channel and get near to the light-vessel, they see the small remnant of a wreck, which they think may be the bowsprit and jib-boom of a vessel dismasted and on her beam-ends. They get nearer to her, and find that she is well over on the north-east side of Girdler or Shingle Sands; some of the crew wish to launch the steam-tug's small life-boat, eighteen feet long, and make in through the surf to the wreck, to which, they think, they can see some of the crew clinging. But it is thought too great a risk to take so small a boat through such a broken sea, and it is agreed that they had better go back for the large life-boat. They put back, and, passing to windward of the "Fusilier," strike their flag half-mast high, as a sign that the boat is to join them: this she speedily does, and they together make for the newly-found wreck. As they approach her they can see that it is a vessel on her beam-ends, with only her foremast

The life-boat, having been towed into a favourable position, makes in for the vessel. The men wonder that she has held together so long, for she is broken and torn almost to pieces, the copper peeled off her bottom, the timbers started, broken, and twisted, the planking is torn off, almost all the cargo is washed out of her shattered hull, and here and there the light to be seen through her bottom.

There was now little more than a portion of the skeletou of the ship that a few hours before, taut and trim, had buoyantly bounded over the seas.

The foremast, feebly held in position by a remnant of the deck, lay stretched a few feet above the water. The crew and pilot had been lashed to it for many hours, and for that time had seemed trembling over their fearful and ready grave. The heavy waves foam up and beat against the hull, and the doomed ship is, bit by bit, being torn to pieces. The crew, as they cling on, hear the timbers creaking and snapping. The deck has been blown up by the force of the waves, and the fragments of wreck are swept away in the swift tide, the heavy seas making more and more a breach over the ship. Sometimes the ship lifts a little from the mere force of the blow given by the tremendous seas; at any moment she may snap the foremast and roll right over; the mast quivers at every shake and heave of the wreck, the fierce tide rushes five feet beneath them, and the waves leap up and beat over them, and still they hold on. An hour passes, and they are spared; still another and another: they see a steamer's lights in the distance: it nears, it hovers beside them. A few of the trembling storm-beaten sailors shout once or twice, but the rest smile grimly at the folly of supposing that any voice can be heard, even a few yards off, in the roar of such a gale. They watch the steamer's lights in a very agony of suspense, but without any hope that they can be discovered in the darkness. They see the smaller light astern of the steamer, and imagine it to be that of the life-boat; they hear the dull throbs of the heavy guns from the light-ships, they see the faint flashes of light from the rockets, they know that these signals are calling for the steamer and life-boat to speed on elsewhere to the rescue of other drowning ones, and they watch the steamer's lights grow fainter and fainter until they are lost in the darkness. So they are left alone to their desolation and despair, while the wild winds roar, and the raging waves hunger around them. The moon goes down, the darkness thickens, the gale rushes by more furiously than ever; then comes a slight lull, and a faint light streaks the eastern horizon. They tighten their grasp upon the trembling mast and torn rigging, and speak a few words of hope. They may yet see another sun-rise; for in the dull grey light of the early dawn they faintly see a steamer in the distance, but her course will not bring her quite near to them. Intently they watch her: she alters her course and makes directly for the sands upon the edge of which their frail wreck rests: they begin to hope again, and joy comes in upon them like a flood. They shout aloud, and wave a rag of canvas, the only means of signalling that is left to them; the steamer sees them, she dips her flag as a signal, and then slowly turns round and steams away full speed in the direction from which she came. An agony of fear comes over them again; but they shudder as the creaking mast trembles beneath them, and look at the yawning gulf of wild waters which gapes so close below, and in their hearts they fear that the steamer on her return with aid may find no trace of them left. A short time, which however seems long indeed to them, measured as it is by their danger and the greatness of their suspense—a short time, and they again see the steamer, and soon are enabled to make out, to their great joy, that she has the lifeboat in tow. Still the flying surf beats upon them and drives them with its sheer weight closer to the mast: still the water rages around, while they cling with all their desperate energy to the quivering shrouds: but the time of despair has passed.

The life-boat comes swiftly on, running before the still heavy gale, now rising like a cork to the mounting seas, or again plunging boldly through the surf or broken water. Her men forget the long night-struggle of fatigue and danger through which they have passed: much noble work have they done, but they have still noble work to do,-more lives to save by the help of God: and with cool determination they cheerfully proceed to their new labours. They find the water more and more broken as they near the vessel, the waves are flying high over the lost ship, the ebb tide is running strongly. From the breaking seas and from the position of the ship, now on her broadside with her keel to windward, they cannot anchor on the windward side, and let the boat gradually drop in upon the wreck : their only chance is to run with the wind abeam right in upon the fore-rigging. It is true there is considerable danger in this; but at such times they cannot stop to calculate danger, and must be ready to risk much in their attempts to save life. They charge in amid the floating wreckage, and the boat hits hard upon the iron windlass which is hanging still to the deck of the vessel. A rope is thrown round the fore-rigging, and the group of exhausted sailors shout with joy as they greet the glad friendly faces coming in upon them out of the storm of desolation which rages around. The crew, sixteen in number, including the pilot and a boy of about eleven years of age, are pale and exhausted, and drop one by one from the mast into the boat, and leave the storm-torn fragment of the "Demerara" to her speedy fate. "Oars out" is the cry, and by hard pulling the boat is got clear of the raff of the wreck. There is then a moment's waiting ere they hoist the sail, and a great shaking of hands all round, and warm greetings, and heartfelt thanks from the saved ones.

sands upon the edge of which their frail wreck rests: they begin to hope again, and joy comes in upon them like a flood. They shout aloud, and wave a rag of canvas, the only means of signalling that is left to them; the steamer sees them, she dips her flag as a signal, and then slowly turns round and steams away full speed in the direction from which she came. An agony of fear comes over them again; they feel that they cannot be altogether descreted, hands in both hers, and shakes them with might and main, sobbing out, as the tears roll down her cheeks, "I'll pray the Holy Father for you the longest day that I live." Many fell on their knees, and out of full hearts poured forth thanks to God.

The steamer is now full of people; the cabius are given up to the women and children, and are crowded in every part; and the poor people, wet and shivering, are full of thankfulness for their safety; while the steamer, with quick motion, rolls and pitches as she makes her way through the cross seas, which still run high and broken, although the fierceness of the tempest is past.

It is no unusual occurrence at Ramsgate for a crowd of people to be grouped at the Pier-head, watching with interest for the appearance of the steamer, with her flags flying in token of the goodly freight which she bears with her; but with deeper interest than ever such summer scenes excited is the steamer waited for now.

It is one of those bright genial winter mornings of which Ramsgate has so goodly a share. Many have been attracted to the Pier to take, on that pleasant promenade, a good instalment of the fresh breeze, and to watch the sea bright with sunshine, and the waves glistening and flashing in their turmoil of unrest. The rumour spreads that the steamer and life-boat have been away all night, and are every minute expected to round the point and appear in sight. The throng on the Pier increases, for long there has been an anxious lookout eastward for the appearance of the returning steamer, and great is the feeling of gladness and deep the murmur of satisfaction as the gallant "Aid" appears, with her flags flying at the lifeboat's masthcad, telling the glad tale of successful effort. The crowd rejoices greatly in the good work done, and as the steamer comes nearer it is seen that never on a summer's day did steamer bear through calm seas a fuller freight of holidayseekers. From the Pier the crowd looks down upon the multitude on board, and knows that they are just snatched from the very jaws of death, and a thrill of wonder and gladness passes through them all, with that half-formed sense of fear which a realisation of danger recently escaped either by ourselves or others always gives. The crowd waves, and shouts, and hurrahs, and gives every sign of glad welcome and deep congratulation; and as the steamer sweeps round the Pier-head, the pale upturned faces of one hundred and twenty rescued men, women, and children smile back a glad acknowledgment of the hearty welcome so warmly given. It is a scene almost overpowering in the deep feeling it produces.

The emigrants land, they toil weakly up the steps to the pier, all bearing signs of the scene of danger and hardship through which they have passed. Some are barely clothed, some have blankets wrapped round them, and all are weary and worn, and faint with cold and wet and long suspense. There are some aged women among them, who had been unwilling to be left behind when those most dear to them were about to seek their fortunes abroad; others had been sent for by their friends, and to them the thoughts of the terrors and trials of a sea-voyage had been overcome by the longing to see once again before they died the faces long loved and long missed-to see perhaps the grandchildren who, although they had never looked upon them, yet they had thought of until they had become almost part of their daily life. It is piteous to see some of the aged women totter from the steamer to the Pier. But young men and young women are there too, who, crowded in the race at home, had sought in a wider field to make better way. Here a poor sorrow-stricken mother, deadly pale and sobbing bitterly, looks wistfully upon the white face and almost closed eyes of the baby in her husband's arms. This is the poor child that was so nearly lost overboard, as it was thrown into the boat wrapped up in a blanket. (The mother's fears were not realised: the baby speedily recovered.)

It now became the glad office of the people of Ramsgate to bestir themselves on behalf of those thus suddenly thrown upon their charity. agent of the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Society at once took charge of the sailors. Accommodation was found for the emigrants in houses near the Pier, and a plentiful meal was at once supplied; many of the residents busied themselves most heartily; and clothes, dresses, coats, boots, hats, bonnets, stays, and other garments were liberally given. Subscriptions were at once raised to pay all expenses, and to put into the hands of the poor creatures some little ready money. In the meantime one of the shipping agents telegraphed to the owners of the wrecked emigrant ship, and was empowered by them to render all required aid. therefore found the emigrants all needed board and lodging, and next morning forwarded them to London; a crowd of Ramsgate people bade them good-bye at the station, and received grateful acknowledgments of the kindness and sympathy which had been shown.

The emigrants were cared for in London by the owners of the "Fusilier." The weather moderating the morning after the wreck, the emigrants' things were get out of the vessel and sent on to them; and the owners of the "Fusilier" soon obtained another ship in which they forwarded the passengers, and they had a prosperous voyage to Melbourne.

The good old Ramsgate life-boat has done some good work since; but her time has come, and she is now condemned, and I fear will soon be broken up. A most noble substitute, a present to the Life-boat Institution from the people of Bradford, supplies her place. She is named the "Bradford;" and our wish is that she may have as noble a career, and ever find ready to speed her on her errands of mercy as many stout hearts and strong hands as have fallen to the lot of the good old Ramsgate Life-boat.

THE FRENCH CHURCH IN CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL

THE stranger who visits Canterbury Cathedral, in making the ordinary round of the place under charge of the verger, is usually pointed to an apartment walled off from the crypt in the south sideaisle, which he is informed is "the French Church." If the visitor be curious, he will be taken up to a window overlooking the interior, through which he will observe that the place is fitted up with pews, and furnished with a pulpit and precentor's desk, like a dissenting place of worship. His attention will probably also be directed to the long table, round which the communicants sit when receiving the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, after the manner of the Geneva brethren; and he will further be informed that the entire service is conducted in the French tongue. If the visitor's curiosity be further roused, and he inquire how it is that a Calvinistic congregation should be found carrying on their worship here in the high Cathedral of England, almost within sound of the choral service of the Episcopal Church overhead, he will obtain little further information beyond that the French Church has met there, and that successive congregations of Calvinists of foreign descent have carried on their worship undisturbed there, for a period of more than three hundred years.

The circumstances connected with the origin of this church are nevertheless full of curious interest to such as love to tread the by-paths of history. Though now but a mere vestige of an institution once full of life and vigour, it has lessons to teach not without their value; for it will be found that the asylum which the English nation, as well as the English Church, have afforded to men of other countries persecuted for conscience' sake in past times (of which this French Church is one of the very few remaining instances) has contributed in no small degree to the establishment of our own religious liberty, as well as to the growth and development of the skilled industry of the nation.

The first foreign immigrants who sought asylum in this country in any large numbers were Flemings. For many centuries, Flanders had been the chief seat of commercial and manufacturing industry in the north of Europe. English monarchs at various times endeavoured to induce Flemish artizans to settle among us, and teach our people to work up the English wool into cloth, instead of sending it abroad for the purpose. Early colonies of them settled at Gower in South Wales, at Worstead near Norwich, at Norwich itself, at Cranbrook in Kent, and in other parts of the west and south of England, where they established and carried on various branches of manufacture. But it was not until the accession of Philip II. to the throne of Spain, on the abdication of Charles V. in 1556, that the foreign immigration began to assume an important aspect.

The provinces of the Netherlands had greatly prospered under the comparatively mild sway of the Burgundian dukes. They were inhabited by a hard-working and intelligent race, -great alike as artists and artizans, painters and weavers, architects and tradesmen, agriculturists and ironworkers, as the decayed glories of Antwerp, Bruges, and Ghent testify to this day. Many of these skilled men were, however, Protestants; and Philip II., who had succeeded to the rich inheritance of Burgundy, determined to stamp out Protestantism wherever found throughout his dominions. With this object he proceeded to establish a branch of the Spanish Inquisition in Flanders, appointing Cardinal Granville, his favourite minister, Inquisitor-General. Notwithstanding, however, the extraordinary powers put in force by the king, he found, to his intense mortification, that the Protestants would not conform. Sir Thomas Gresham wrote to Cecil from Antwerp in 1566,-"There are above 40,000 Protestants in this towne, which will die rather than the word of God should be put to silence." At length the discontent of the people broke forth, and a civil war ensued, which extended over many years. The king's armies were led by the bravest of his generals-by the Duke of Alva. the Prince of Parma and others; and though they eventually failed in establishing the Inquisition in the Netherlands, they succeeded in ruining its commerce, destroying its manufactures, and reducing the great mass of the people to destitution and beggary.

At an early period in the civil war, the merchants, tradesmen, and artizans began to fly the country, leaving their property a prey to the spoiler; and it is said that for some years the plunder of the proscribed Protestants brought into the royal treasury about twenty millions of dollars annually. Many, however, contrived to escape with part of their possessions, crossing the frontier into Holland, or putting out to sea from any port that was open. The Duchess of Parma, the Governess, wrote to Philip in 1567, "that in a few days 100,000 men had already left the country with their money and goods, and that more were following every day." Clough, in the same year, wrote Gresham from Antwerp,-"It is marveylus to see how the pepell packe away from hense; some for one place, and some for another, as well the papysts as the protestants; for it is thought that, howsomever it goeth, it cannot go well here; for that presently all the wealthy and rich men of both sydes, who should be the stey of matters, make themselves away." *

The exodus continued for many years. The best and most industrious fled in all directions, carrying with them into other countries their skill, their intelligence, and their spirit of liberty. Only the weak, the helpless, and the hopeless remained The greater number passed into Helland, then gallantly struggling for independence against the dominant power of Spain; but large numbers also passed over into England, which they hailed as "asylum Christi." It was then a turning point in the history of England. The balance of tendencies in favour of the old and the new religions was not very decided either way. Philip II. yet hoped to force England back into the old faith; and he was actively employed in building his sacred Armada for the purpose. The influx of the persecuted Protestants which now occurred may possibly have had considerable influence in turning the scale. Settling in various parts of the kingdom, they would serve as so many missionaries to rouse the people to resist the tyranny of the persecutors who had driven them forth from their homes abroad. Alva boasted that he had put to death 18,000 heretics in the Low Countries alone; so that England knew what she had to expect if Philip succeeded in his daring attempt on England. But every reader of history now knows what was the end of his sacred and invincible Armada.

The first of the persecuted Flemings who made their escape by sea landed at that part of England which is the nearest to the Flemish coast. They put in at Sandwich, near Deal, where we find a body of them established as early as the year 1561, in the third year of the reign of Elizabeth. When the Queen was informed of the landing of the foreigners, she wrote enjoining the mayor, jurats, and commonalty to give liberty to the foreigners to settle in the place and carry on their respective callings. She further recommended the measure as calculated to benefit the town by "plantynge in the same men of knowledge in snudry handicrafts," in which they were "verye skilfull;" and she more particularly specified that the trades they were to follow were "the makinge of says, bays, and other cleth, which hath not been used to be made in this our realme of Englande." The local authorities readily responded to the wishes of the Queen. They did all that she required, and appointed two markets to be held weekly for the sale of cloths; and, as the number of Flemings was considerable, the eld church of St. Peter's was appropriated for their special use, but at the same time they were enjoined not to dispute openly about their religion.

Before the arrival of the Flemish Protestants, Sandwich was a poor decayed place. It had originally been a town of considerable importance, and was one of the chief Cinque Ports. But when the river Stour became choked up with silt, the navigation, on which it had chiefly depended, was interrupted, its trade decayed, and great poverty fell upon the inhabitants. No sooner, however, had the first colony of Flemings, above four hundred in number, settled there under the Queen's protection, than the town at once became instinct with new life, and was restored to more than its former importance.

The London merchants resorted to the bi-weekly markets, and bought up at remuncrative prices all the goods that the foreign artizans could manufacture. The people of the town shared in the general prosperity; and the native working folks learned from the strangers the new arts of making says, bays, and flannel, from which they greatly profited. Before many years had passed, the townspeople, forgetful of the benefits they owed to the strangers as the authors of their prosperity, became jealous, and sought to impose heavy local taxes on them, against which the Dutch congregation stoutly expostulated; * and it was not until the intercession of the Queen on their behalf that they were relieved from the unequal burden.

Another body of the Flemish refugees shortly after settled in like manner at Canterbury. While these at Sandwich were Flemings or Dutch, the Canterbury settlers were Walloons, from the provinces situated along the French frontier. Early in Elizabeth's reign, we find eighteen families, led by their pastor, Hecter Hamon, "minister verbi Dei," memorialising the mayor and aldermen for liberty to worship God within the city according to the dictates of their conscience. They represented that they had fled from their own country, leaving goods and property behind them, for the sake of the Truth which they prized; and they prayed that they might have a place assigned them for worship, as well as a burial-place for their dead. They further requested that, in order to prevent the settlement amongst them of profane and evil-disposed persons, none should be permitted to join their body without exhibiting sufficient testimonials of probity and good character. They also selicited permission to maintain a teacher for the instruction of their children in the French tongue. The trades which they specified as those which they intended to carn their living by, were the weaving of various kinds of fabrics, such as silk brecade, bembazin, orleans, serge, bays, and moucquade.

All that the poor immigrants requested was readily conceded. The mayor and aldermen gave them full permission to carry on their trades within the precincts of the city. The eminent and liberal-minded Matthew Parker, then Archbishop of Canterbury, with the sanction of the Queen, granted them the free use of the undercroft of the cathedral: and there "the gentle and

The under-croft or crypt is of great extent, though damp and ill lighted. In former times it was dedicated to the Virgin, and was known as the "Chapel of our Lady Under-croft." The open stone-work which surrounded the shrine is still to be seen, stripped of its former gorgeous decorations. The wealth of this shrine was indescribable; and only a few magnates were permitted to see it.* Over the statue of the Virgin, in gold, was a royal-purple canopy, starred with jewels and precious stones; and from the roof in front of the shrine were suspended a row of silver lamps from rings, which are now all that remains of them; for the gold and silver, the jewels, and all the treasures of the shrine were seized and carted off to London in Henry the Eighth's time, so that when the Walloons took possession the crypt must have been comparatively desolate.

The Walloons not only carried on their trade, but they held their school and their church also in the crypt. Over the capitals of the columns on the north side are several texts of scripture still to be seen in old French, written up for the instruction of the young people, and doubtless taught them by heart. The texts are from the Psalms, Proverbs, and New Testament. At other times the place was used for purposes of worship. The poor strangers needed no golden star-canopied shrine, nor silver lamps, to lead their minds and hearts up to their Creator. Morning and night they "sang the Lord's song in a strange land, and wept when they remembered Zion."

The immigrants prospered. They maintained themselves; they supported their own poor; and they succoured the destitute refugees, still flying from the persecution in Flanders, who from time to time joined them. Most of the Walloons came from Lille, Nuelle, Turcoing, Waterloo, Darmentures, and the intermediate towns. Among those who came over from Lille in 1567 was one Lawrence des Bouverves, who first settled at Sandwich as a maker of bays, but in the following year he joined the French congregation at Canterbury. The Bouverye family prospered, and eventually arrived at distinction and honour, their lineal descendant now sitting in the House of Lords as Earl of Radnor. Hugessens came over about the same time from Dunkirk, settling first at Dover and afterwards at Sandwich, which place the representative of the family, E. Knatchbull Hugessen, Esq., now represents in Parliament.

Meanwhile the settlers at Sandwich continued to prosper in like manner as those at Canterbury had done, and in the course of a short time they were found to constitute about one-third part of the population of the place. Although the principal occupation of the strangers was the making of bays, linsey-wolsey, and such-like fabrics, they did not confine themselves to weaving. Some were hat-makers, and others carpenters, brewers, and shipwrights. Windmills were erected for grinding, and two potters introduced the pottery trade. The town soon became more prosperous than it had ever been before; new buildings arose on all sides; and Sandwich almost became transformed into a Flemish town. Though now fallen into comparative decay, the quaint, foreign-looking aspect of the place never fails to strike the modern visitor with surprise. The foreign element in its population long continued to be recognisable, though in every succeeding generation it necessarily became less marked. As late as 1713-1737. Gerard de Gols officiated at the same time as rector of St. Peter's and minister of the Dutch congregation. He was an able English writer, and was so much esteemed by his fellow-kinsmen that he was one of the persons appointed by the corporation to support the canopies at the coronation of George II. and Queen Caroline. At length the Flemings and their descendants, becoming absorbed in the general population, ceased to form a separate part of the Sandwich community, though a considerable number of the inhabitants to this day bear the names of their Flemish ancestors.

In addition to the several branches of industry above mentioned which were introduced by the Flemings, that of gardening is worthy of passing mention. The people of Flanders have always excelled in horticulture, and one of the first things the settlers did at Sandwich was to turn to account the excellent qualities of the soil there for garden purposes. Until then, gardening was almost unknown in England; and cabbages, carrots, turnips, and ordinary vegetables were scarcely to be had. It is said that Queen Katherine could not obtain a salad for her dinner in all England, and that her table was supplied from the Low Countries. Hartlib, writing in 1650, says that some old men then living, "remembered the first gardener who came into Surrey to plant cabbages and cauliflowers, and to sow turnips, carrots, parsnips, and early pease, -all of which at that time were great wonders, as having few or none in England but what came from Holland or Flanders."

The first cabbages were grown at Sandwich from seed brought from Artois, from which province were also brought the first hops grown in Kent. The gardens proved very prolific, and the Flemings readily sold the produce they raised at high prices. Their cabbages, carrots, and celery were sent to London in large quantities; and "Sandwich celery" still maintains its reputation. In course of time a body of gardeners removed from Sandwich to the neighbourhood of London, more particularly to Wandsworth, Battersea, and Bermondsey, where the rich garden grounds, first tilled by the Flemings, continue to be the most productive in the neighbourhood of the metropolis.

So long as the persecution abroad continued to rage, successive bodies of emigrants flocked into the kingdom. The city of Norwich having fallen into decay, the greater number of the houses in the place being unoccupied, the corporation took steps to induce a body of the Flemish artizans to settle there; and in 1564 we find three hundred Dutch families settled at Norwich, where they began the manufacture of bays, arras, moucquade, and other stuffs.

When Philip II, found that his subjects continued to fly from the blessings of the Inquisition which he had set up, he endeavoured to check the emigration by preventing the fugitives from obtaining asylum elsewhere. The Pope accordingly proclaimed the Protestant Walloons to be "drunkards and schismatics," and warned the faithful against giving them help or succour in any form. In 1569, he launched a bull against Queen Elizabeth, in which he denounced the refugees whom she protected as among the worst of mankind, -declaring the Queen herself to be a heretic, and absolving her subjects from all further allegiance to her authority. This was a strong measure to adopt against the Queeu, at a time when probably as many of her subjects were Catholics as Protestants; but she was not dissuaded from her course, and wherever the fugitives landed, the royal protection was at once extended to them. Bishop Jewell thought it right to justify the Queen's policy in his "View of a Seditious Bull," wherein he defended the refugees as worthy, well-conducted, "They are," said he, and industrious citizens. "our brethren. They live not idly. If they have houses of us, they pay rent for them. They hold not our grounds but by making due recompense. They beg not in our streets, nor crave anything at eur hands, but to breathe our air and to see our sun. They labour truefully, they live sparefully. They are good examples of virtue, travail, faith, and patience. The towns in which they abide are happy; for God doth follow them with his blessings."*

The immigration continued, until in the course of about ten years, we find about five thousand Dutch and Walloons settled at Norwich, fifteen hundred at Canterbury, four hundred at Sandwich, and various other bodies of them planted in different parts of the country, besides about ten thousand in London, of whom we will presently speak. At Norwich, as elsewhere, the immigrants were organised in congregations, and the authorities granted them places for holding public worship; the choir of the Friars' Preacher's Church being assigned for the use of the Dutch portion of the settlers, and the Bishop's Chapel, and afterwards the church of St. Mary's Tombland, for the use of the Walloons.

Many new branches of industry were now introduced into Norwich. The striping and flowering of silks and damasks became a large branch of trade. Anthony Solen set up the first printing office in the city, for which he was awarded the freedom. potters from Antwerp, Andries and Janson, started a pottery. Others began the manufacture of felt hats, which had before been imported from abroad. The result was, that the prosperity of the place was completely restored, and there was ample employment for all; Bishop Parkhust declaring his persuasion "that these blessings from God happened by reason of the godly exiles who were here kindly harboured." But this state of contentment with the foreigners did not last long. The sour native heart grew jealous; and more artizans flocking into the place to take refuge among their fellow exiles, the Norwich people began to mutter discontent against them. A conspiracy was even set on foot for the purpose of expelling them by force; but it was discovered in time, and Throgmorton, the leader, was executed, with two others; after which the strangers were permitted to continue their peaceful callings as before.

The Queen continued the fast friend and protector of the foreign artizans. In a letter written by her from Greenwich, dated the 19th March, 1570, she strongly expostulated with the townspeople of Norwich against the jealousy entertained by them against the authors of their prosperity. She reminded them of the advantages they had derived from the settlement amongst them of so many industrious and intelligent artizans, who were inhabiting the houses which before had stood desolate, and were furnishing employment to a large number of persons who must otherwise have been destitute. She therefore entreated and required the inhabitants to continue their favours "to the poor men of the Dutch nation, who, seeing the persecution lately begun in their country for the trewe religion, hath fledd into this Realm for Succour, and be now placed in the city of Norwich, and hath hitherto been favourably and jintely ordered, which the Queen's Majestie, as a mercifull and religious Prince, doth take in very good part, pracing you to continue your favour unto them so long as they shall lyve amongste you quyetlye and obedyently to God's trewe religion, and by Her Majestie's laws, for so one chrystian man (in charitie) is bound to help an other, especially them who do suffre afflixion for the gospell's sake."

Large numbers of Dutch and Walloon exiles also settled in London about the same time, and introduced various new branches of industry. They abounded in Southwark, which continues the principal manufacturing district of the metropolis to this day. There was a quarter in Bermondsey called "The Borgeney," and "Petty Burgundy," by reason of the number of Flemings who inhabited it. Joiners Street, which still exists in name, lay in the district, and was almost wholly occupied by Flemish joiners, who were skilled in all kinds of carpentry work. The foreigners also introduced the new art of tanning into Bermondsey, and the establishments which they founded still exist. One Henry Hock, from Wesel, who afterwards changed his name to Leeke, started a brewery, which proved exceedingly successful; and he bequeathed a portion of his wealth for the purpose of founding the Free School of St. Olave's, one of the best educational institutions of the kind in London. The school originally stood near the south end of London Bridge, and close to it was the place of sepulture long after known as "The Flemish Burying-ground." But the school has since been pulled down and rebuilt on another site, while the burying-ground has been obliterated by the approaches made to the London Bridge railway station.

Other Flemings settled at Bow, at St. Catherine's (where they had another burial-ground), and in various suburban districts. At Bow, De Croix and Kepler introduced the art of dyeing cloths, which before had been dyed abroad, and the "Bow dye" soon became famous. At Wandsworth other Flemings established a brass-work and a felt-hat manufactory. Another little colony carried on the manufacture of tapestry. That the Flemings accumulated wealth is obvious from the circumstance that when Queen Elizabeth raised a loan in the city, forty-one Flemings subscribed sums of 100l. and upwards. As at Sandwich, Canterbury, and Norwich, churches were set apart for the use of the foreigners in London; the church of St. Austin's, in Broad Street, still known as "The Dutch Church," having been specially granted for the use of the poor Dutch refugees who "had fled out of the Netherlands and other parts beyond seas from Papal persecutors;" while St. Anthony's Hospital, in Threadneedle Street, was set apart for the use of the Walloons.

It would occupy too much space to enter into a detailed account of the settlement of these industrious strangers in different parts of the kingdom, and to describe the various branches of manufacture which they introduced in addition to those above described. But a brief summary may suffice. Hasted says, "the foreign manufacturers chose their situations with great judgment, distributing themselves with the Queen's licence throughout England, so as not to interfere with one another." * One of the most important settlements in its consequences, was that of a body of Flemings at Manchester, and another at Bolton, in Lancashire, where they began the manufacture of "coatings" or "cottons," since become the great staple trade of that county. Other bodies settled at Halifax in Yorkshire, where they established a branch of the cloth trade; at Kendal, where they made coatings, cloth caps, and woollen stockings; at Maidstone, where they carried on the manufacture of thread (flax spun for the thread-man being still known there as "Dutch work"), at Worcester, Kidderminster, Stroud, and other towns in the west of England, where they gave a great impulse to the woollen manufacture; at Yarmouth, where they introduced the arts of salt-making and fish-curing; at Shotley Bridge, near Newcastle, where they carried on steel making, and the manufacture of edged tools; and at Sheffield, where a body of them settled under the protection of the Earl of Shrewsbury, and shortly after brought the manufacture of cutlery to great perfection; in short, wherever the Flemings settled, they served as so many missionaries of skilled work, who taught the English people the beginnings of many of those industrial arts by which they have since acquired so much distinction and wealth.

Time passed, the Flemings prospered, and they gradually ceased to remember that they were exiles. They struck their roots deep into the soil of their adopted country. Their children grew up with English tastes and habits, spoke the English tongue. and wished rather to forget than to remember that their parents had been strangers and foreigners in the land. The young men married English wives, and the young women English husbands; and thus their distinctive existence as a Dutch-speaking or French-speaking part of the community gradually ceased. Their blood eventually mingled with that of the best in England. The late Prime Minister. Lord Palmerston, was lineally descended from the daughter of one of the Houblons, who furnished the Bank of England with its first Governor. The Vansittarts and Vanmilderts, once great names in the city, intermarried in the peerage. The Vannecks, merchants, are now represented by their lineal descendant, Baron Huntingfield. Among knights and baronets sprung from the Flemish immigrants. we may mention Sir Matthew Decker, the London merchant and author; Sir Cornelius Vermuyden, the engineer; Sir John Vanburgh, the architect; and Sir William Hoste, Bart., the lineal descendant of Jacques Hoste, governor of Bruges in 1569. Among other well-known names, are the De la Prymes, the Tyssens (of Foulden), the Crusos, and the Corsellis. But many of the immigrants changed their foreign-sounding names in the second generation, and are no longer traceable.

One word more as to the Walloon Church at Canterbury. About a hundred years after its formation, a great immigration of Huguenots from France took place, on the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes; and many of the refugees settled at Canterbury, when the crypt in the Cathedral became more crowded than ever. Other French churches were, however, opened in the city, and the French settlers at length came to constitute a large proportion of the population. The new immigrants were principally silk-weavers and makers of lace. Factories were built in the city, and Canterbury became exceedingly prosperous. But, at length, Spitalfields, being found more convenient and central, came to engross the greater part of the silk trade; and the Canterbury weavers, dyers, and manufacturers for the most part removed to London. The congregation of the Walloon Church also fell off; and it would loug since have become extinct, but for an endowment of about 200l. a-year, which serves to keep it alive. The members do not amount to more than twenty, of whom two are elders and four deacons. M. Miette, the reader, performs the usual service on Sundays; and the Rev. T. Marzial, of London, the pastor, officiates every last Sunday in the month. But though the congregation has become a mere shadow of what it was, we think it will be admitted that it commemorates an epoch of great importance to England. Three hundred years have passed since the Church was formed; generations have come and gone, and revolutions have swept over Europe, and still that eloquent memorial of the religious history of the middle ages survives; bearing testimony alike to the rancour of the Papal persecution, the heroic steadfastness of the Walloons, the broad and liberal spirit of the English Church, and the glorious asylum which England has always been ready to afford to foreigners flying to her for refuge against oppression and tyranny.

SAMUEL SMILES.

PEGGY MELVILLE'S TRIUMPH.

T.

In the winding streets of the ancient burgh of Crail, with its posts and gates formed of drift-wood and whales' jaws, and itself as salt flavoured as the neighbouring German Ocean, there walked, in the time of good Queen Bess, a grave young man of thirty, in a sober but richly embroidered cloak and velvet cap. He was one of those Melvilles whose names are so famous in the history of the Scottish kirk-James, nephew of the courageous Andrew. They were men of learning, condition, and birth, and claimed not only kinship with the Melvilles of Carnbee and Dysart, but even a distant share of kingly lineage through John of Gaunt, "time-honoured Lancaster." They had spirit and wit, too, though small in body, that famous uncle and nephew. Andrew was fiery and irresistible, "a blast," as he was sagaciously defined; while James was regarded by the time-servers and doubledealers, the cowards and traitors of the day, as still more dangerous, though he was the hope of the milder and more peaceable patriots of all opinions, because he was a "crafty byding man." They were like each other in person, and warmly attached with the reverential relation of father and son, and the confidential bond of an equal friendship. James, with loving vanity, writes that he "would to God he were as like Mr. Andrew in gifts of mind, as he is thought to be in proportions of body and lineaments of face; for there is none that is not otherwise particularly informed, but takes me for Mr. Andrew's brother." Slight, spare men, but tough in warfare, stanch in endurance, with faces full of intellect and will. Trained not only to play the part of mental athletes, but to make the best of their scanty flesh, they were as noble-looking men as any specimens of robust Christianity. There was nothing of the scarecrow or thread-paper about Andrew when he led the belligerent Assembly, or about James when he addressed the secretly sympathising English Council, who might accept and honour a bench of bishops of their own free will, but whose mingled Norman and Saxon blood formed a puddle far too saucy for the doctrine of this or that form of worship in the teeth of the worshippers.

That strange little town of Crail was grey and still enough nigh three hundred years ago, and the keen searching air was snell indeed this ripe October. But Mr. James, though he drew his cloak around him, faced it with the enjoyment of a persevering, wholesome spirit, and passed on, acknowledged respectfully on all sides, and looked after occasionally as a man to be seen on a white day. Men of influence and authority were in particular request at that moment, for the times were especially precarious. The terror of the Armada rested on the land, and Andrew Melville had been speaking and preaching against the dreaded invasion to students and burghers, before the king and the foreign ambassadors, until town-house and countryplace, farm and cottage, were awake to the formidable news, and warned of the danger.

But probably Mr. James was then less troubled at the thought of a struggle with the captains of the Armada than at the spectacle of an old lady, of precise and stately aspect, who sallied forth from a large square house, with many broad windows, set in the wide, weather-beaten, grass-grown street, and near to the cross, not yet plucked down. She approached as if to arrest his progress. He might escape the Armada, but he could not avoid his second cousin, Mistress Peggy Melville of Carnbee, and he would certainly be detained a while by her to receive her family confidences. He had been hurrying to the beach beyond the town, by the bracs of prickly whins, to take counsel of nature as to the prospects of a storm. Peggy Melville's straightforward, pertinacious, somewhat overbearing statements and demands would sadly entangle the thread of his ideas; but James Melville was more accustomed to be interrupted than let alone, and would as soon have thought of being haughty and pettish to his mate Elizabeth Dury, or to his little Andrew or Anne, as to Mistress Peggy, one of his mothers, as he called her pleasantly.

but whose mingled Norman and Saxon blood distress Peggy Melville, of the Melvilles of formed a puddle far too saucy for the doctrine of Carnbee, was as imposing a specimen of spinster-the divine right of kings, and the imposition of hood, as Mr. James was of his calling of a divine.

She was big-boned and harsh-featured, but with a certain native nobility about her large proportions which explained how it was her contemporaries insisted on her claims to good looks in her time. But now, truly, she was but a striking relic of the past. She wore the fashion of her day, which was calculated to exaggerate her peculiarities of size and air. Her dress was of green velvet, somewhat faded but still rich in texture, with a plaited farthingale bulging out her quaint sides above the long, armourlike, peaked stomacher encasing her waist. A ruff with its supertasse supported her neck, and the light red hair, which was still profuse and unstreaked with grey, was frizzled, crisped, and laid in a rope from ear to ear, and wreathed with silver; and over the whole, with some regard to her years, she had the kircher of russet pinned beneath her Thus attired, Mistress Peggy sailed along the street of Crail, with her maiden in flocket, hood and pinners, bearing her fan, her velvet-bound gold-clasped Bible, and a basket of such donations as she might distribute on the instant to any of her dependants.

"I wish you gude day, Mr. James," cried the old lady, stopping short at once; "a sicht of you is like the gift of a cordial, or essence more precious than common. I was on my way with Mariot to measure out the widow Auchterlonie's duds, but the dead will keep while you and I take the air and hold some converse; which may the Lord send to our mutual edification."

"Amen, Mistress Peggy," answered James Melville, without the slightest shade of ridicule or insincerity. "Well met, madam, what is your will with me to-day?" said he, as he offered her his ruffled hand. So leading her carefully and tenderly, the two took their way to one of the promenades of Crail.

"I've muckle to tell you, Mr. James, and muckle to hear of your doings; but first, Captain Joshua is to be in within eight days, and I'm thinking to beat up your quarters and wait him there, for the 'Lord Henry' will not pass Anster; there is not water in the hole here to float her."

Mr. James was almost relieved that she did not dash at once into the hackneyed bugbear of the Armada, but at the same time he could not resist drawing out her opinion on the subject. "You'll be heartily welcome; my Lizzie will count herself highly honoured to have our brave, modest kinsman, Captain Joshua, again appearing to windward, as the nautical folk term it; but will he not run some danger of falling in with the van or rear of King Philip's monster squadron, that is to bear down upon these islands and annihilate them, unless the Lord interpose in our behalf?"

Mistress Peggy stopped short in indignation. "The Lord will hinder; and even if He do not so—grant that He pardon me for speaking my mind, if it be presumption—do you think Joshua Melville and his Protestant crew are not enough for a third, or a half, or the whole rout of these idolatrous cattle?"

"I believe it, if need were," James Melville assured her. "Mistress Peggy, I admire thy constancy."

"There sud be no admiration going, sir; there sud only be derision and wrath at the puny cubs, who are ready to flee to the hills and the caves because the King of Spain launches his hulks. Shame on them! I cry, shame on them for Scotsmen and Reformers!"

"But none are so far left to themselves as to speak of flight; the question is only the keeping ourselves in readiness for an immediate engagement, or the propriety of a timely retreat, till we collect our forces for a fair encounter—a right tug of war."

"Retreat! quo he—a beggarly blush for running awa; but you'll no propose it, Mr. James, you'll no abet it, nor will Mr. Andrew, though he's made the loons ower proud already with his notice."

"Na, na, Mistress Peggy, we stand at once by our creed; we've enough to do treating with prelacy, let alone Popery. But what would you do yourself, Mistress Peggy, in case of a strait? would you bide quiet with my wife and bairns in the manse of Anster?"

"Troth, no, James Melville," answered she, grimly; "I would ride back to my ain house here in Crail, and I would mount a guard of the auld Carnbee men, and the bodies here that I've served, and that have a liking for me and my name, and I would take my father's auld blunderbuss, and I would point it at the first Don who rode up the street, and shoot him dead, as sure as I'm a stout woman, and though I should be dragged through the town at the cart-tail within the hour. Eh! James Melville, it is a hard blow to my pride that I maun stand behind biggit wa's, just because I'm a woman, and a scrap of a man like you-a jimp lad, though you've a great soul, I'll no deny that—every Melville has pith either in mind or body-to walk out with sword and pistol even aneath your Geneva gown."

"You dinna grudge me my birthright, surely, Mistress Peggy; mind though Deborah went down to the battle, it was Barak she bade lead the Lord's hosts."

"But it was Jael that slew Sisera, lad; you're halting there."

"Be thankful, madam, it was not a bishop who got that advantage; but you would not have the heart to slay and kill, Miss Peggy, and I'll stand to the death on the fact that Judith only exists in the Apocrypha."

"Na, I dinna need to appeal to Judith; but though I maun keep house with my lasses, and only bind your wounds and part your spoil, I can send you a brave recruit, Mr. James—Captain Robert is at hame with us this week or more."

"A gathering of friends for some work," exclaimed James Melville, for a Scrymgeour was an uncle of James Melville's, and this Captain Robert of the "Beacoun" was a Scrymgeour from the Scrymgeours of Dudhope, constables of Dundee, and hereditary standard-bearers. "Has Captain Robert come in to aid us, or has he taken prizes in his last run?"

Mistress Peggy bent her brows discontentedly. "I cannot flatter you men folk of the family with any sie wiselike errand in this fellow's person. Captain Robert was wont to be a gallant spirit, fonder of the salt water, the quarter-deck, his ship's cargo, and his enemies' faces, than any vain diversion on shore. Joshua thought well of him, very well of him, but he's lost his credit—clean."

"Peradventure he may protest-

'O Melibœe, Deus nobis hæc otia fecit.'

I hope he'll redeem his character in time."

"I understand none of your Latin," asserted Mistress Peggy, sharply; "but you've heard that he's making his suit to young Eppie Melville?"

"I confess Lizzie entertained me the other morning with some such gentle prospect; but I fear you disapprove of the match."

"I," cried Mistress Peggy, vehemently; "who said I disapproved? The matter is neither here nor there to me; but if bairns will take upon them the troubles of life, and marry and be given in marriage at sic a season, I say Eppie Melville has no cause to be aught but very thankful for the offer of a decent lad, a brave, active gentleman, a Scrymgeour allied to her ain clan."

"Then, is it Eppie that says No to her wooer?" inquired James Mclville, certain that something was wrong, and wishing to ascertain the obstacle from so ready a judge as his cousin.

"Do ye consider your speech, Mr. James? That young Eppie is a bairn that owes Joshua and me a bairn's duty—honour and obedience. What business has she with Noes if we think fit to grant

Ayes?"

"But, Mistress Peggy," urged James Melville, "when God instituted marriage, he brought Eve direct to Adam for his approbation, acceptance, and peculiar portion. It is therefore written, A man shall leave father and mother, and cleave to his wife; and again, vice versâ, let a woman make her own selection and abide faithful, body and soul, to her kusband. I would not encourage contumacy in bairns, but to deny their freedom of choice, partakes of that provoking of the children to anger, which is expressly forbidden to all parents and governors."

"I like not such splitting of straws, Mr. James; there were no parents to the fore in Adam's case. What had parents to do with Adam and Eve?"

"The rib was taken from Adam's side, my dear madam, to imply that he alone was concerned."

"I want none of the logic of the schools, Mr. James; I wonder to hear you sae loose in your doctrines, and you a father yoursel."

"I do assure you, madam, I exact all obedience and reverence from my children, particularly while they are in a state of infancy and pupilage." "Fell-like obedience and reverence! The last time I was yont, I spied Andrew refusing his parritch, and Anne tiring herself, like a little Jezebel, with a pair of your cast-off bands."

"Bless the bairns! The one had been sick, and the other frolicsome," commented the imperturbable minister, probably, in his heart, relieving himself by a breath of the good-natured scorn usually vented on the fantastic progeny of bachelor and spinster; but he amended his reply with a sober bit of manliness, that discomfited even Mistress "We are frail humanity; Lizzie and I are inconsistent enough; but it was the Lord that filled our quiver, and it is to our Master that we are answerable for the temper of the arrows. At the same time, Mistress Peggy, among great public concerns I behove to feel a near private interest in the affairs of my kinsmen. Will you tell me why young Eppie Melville is contrary to Captain Robert? He, a man of grace, virtue, and parts, a tall lad and a frank cheild, and come to honour on the What would Eppie have more?"

"Mr. James, Eppie has been nurtured on the Word itself, and the sound interpretation of the catechism. Ye ken, that examined her, whether or no she was well drilled in her answers, and here she is, as sour a crab as if she had been rooted in vanity and ignorance. What excuse has she to set the lad Captain Robert's teeth on edge, but just that he is a tall lad, and has won renown on the seas? Auld! he's but sax-and-twenty, and small chance that I would be so far left to myself as to trust her to any beardless varlet."

"Tell her I had thought she had a more correct and elegant judgment than to prefer a youth to a man, or a silken courtier to a king's officer, a valorous man with a high charge over his fellows, a true man full of his work and his duty."

"Well said, James Melville. You'll speak to her as in your office, and bring her to her senses. I'll have no fulish woman cast scaith at Robin, were it only for the sake of Captain Joshua."

"I respect your motives, madam," put in James Melville hastily, "but I decline the commission, that is, in my character of minister of the Gospel; I will not be art and part in the confessional. What would my zealous uncle say to such backsliding? But if you bring the lass in your train to the manse of Auster, I can speak a friendly warning word to her as a brother."

Mistress Peggy was forced to be content with this support. Though she could turn all Crail round her finger, she was well aware she could not move Mr. James a hair's breadth beyond his conscience.

Mistress Peggy now suggested that they had better get back to the town, and also that she would have barely time to reach widow Auchterlonie's, with her duds, before the hour of noon. She therefore prayed Mr. James to ask a blessing, and eat a bit of her diuner.

Mr. James excused himself on the ground that John Melville's spouse had his plate set. He was nothing loth to terminate the promenade, and be restored to his own ruminations. But the couple parted very cordially at the entrance of the street, to which Mr. James had courteously returned with his old cousin.

II.

It was evident that a gale was rising, such as frequently swept the coast, and strewed it with It roared among the old chimneys of Mistress Peggy's house, and up and down her wide staircases and passages; it hissed in its rapid accumulation of spray on the thick, small-lozenged window panes, and whistled angrily in at the shaking wooden framework. It is possible that Mistress Peggy affected not to hear it, since she astounded young Eppie by denominating it a chance puff of air, when she complained of the soot descending in the midst of her pastry. The pilots, retired captains, and idle sailors, were already lounging down to the pier, with heads inclined scientifically so as to balance bonnet or cap on shaggy hair without support-a performance which no land lubber, accustomed to faint zephyr stealing round the lee of a solid hill, could hope to emulate. But Mistress Peggy would not admit the fact of a storm, until James Melville rode by unflinchingly through the gathering blast he had anticipated, to his manse in the Tolbooth Wynd of Anstruther. "That wilful lad," she said, "he'll be wet to the skin, or slung from the saddle."

"Madam," spoke Captain Robert, consolingly, "I've walked the quarter-deck in a stiffer wind, and had the spray on every side, and ne'er been a grain the worse for the airing and the ducking."

"And though you had been as ill as you could be, Captain Robert," said Mistress Peggy, rather pettishly, "that would have been a sma' matter to James Melville's being in the least degree mazed, or chilled, or spent in an autumn tempest."

"I believe it," averred the big, brown young man, with some earnestness; "a sea-calf is not to be compared to a lion; but I'll away to the harbourhead, where I can be of use in my own calling." And with a gusty sigh, heard even above the tempest, and certainly directed in no way to Mistress Peggy, he quitted the apartment.

This Captain Robert, or Robin Scrymgeour, was a young man of only about five and twenty, but by exposure, and hard work on the sea, he looked as though middle-aged. He was a square, sunburnt, imperative man. Loud, unceremonious, and peremptory, as his profession disposed him to be, he was an autocrat on deck; still he was decidedly soft in one region of the heart, and shy and sensitive, as well as ardent. Poor Captain Robert had the disadvantage of possessing a case which did not well correspond with his inner works. It was difficult to conceive the big, brusque, unconsciously noisy man as ever being bashful, tender, and touching. Yet Captain Robert had both delicacy and fancy; and one proof of this was that he felt keenly, at present, his own surface defects, and began, thus late in the day, to regret bitterly his rough and old-looking exterior. "She'll have naught to say to a man who looks like a widower of forty; and what grace can I command, to approach her with smiles, and bows, and soft words, when my cheek is as dark as mahogany, and my very beard is more bushy than Captain Joshua's, and my lightest footfall shakes the room, and all my sentences form themselves into orders and commands?"

It was all the worse for Captaiu Robert that young Eppie Melville was acting in perfect sincerity and ingenuousness, while their mutual relatives and friends would have had the banns published off-hand between the man and woman as an exceedingly fit pair, since they were both members of the righteons kirk, and the one a Scrymgeour, the other a Melville.

Unfortunately, young Eppie was not of this mind, as she sat darning on the bunker or window-seat of her aunt's parlour at Crail. She was a beautified edition of Mistress Peggy; looking at the one, you could revive the young life of the other. Eppie too was big and large-featured, but so sonsy (anglicé, plump) and so fair that there was nothing unwomanly in her size. How could there be? When were there ever such peach-like cheeks? There was positively a pearly bloom on them, like the impalpable soft mealiness on the grape and the plum. In this same fairness there was a youthfulness that only faded when the tender rose grew into the streaked red which yet kindled Mistress Peggy's high check-bones. Perhaps there would have been a babiness about that pure, creamy bloom, had it not been for the decided features and their decided expression.

Still Eppie was no queen, any more than Captain Rebert was an ogre. But in spite of her size, she had a pleasant liveliness, even amid the gravity of a Scotch presbyterian household. She had a foot as light as ever danced a saraband, if the General Assembly and Mistress Peggy would have allowed profane dancing; and an arch humour too, though she had been bred in an atmosphere of sermons, and had a liking for them, as a good, unsophisticated girl likes what she imagines is wholesome and profitable, even when she cannot always rise to its presumed earnestness.

Eppie was not Captain Joshua's daughter; she was the child of another brother of Mistress Peggy's—a brother the old lady had contended with all his violent life, and nursed fondly on his quiet deathbed. The girl was completely an orphan, and entirely under Mistress Peggy's tutelage; but she paid her aunt a higher compliment than to allow her to make her miscrable.

So the young girl was undignified enough to peep slyly after Captain Robert as he went out, for the purpose of saying satirically, quite low to herself—"Ho rolls like a grampus. Now! what would I do with a brown sea-captain? I've enough ado to keep myself cheery and perform my duty, without plaguing myself with sic a terrific burden. If I'm ever to have a man of my ain, he maun be gracious and learned like our Mr. James, or at least easy and pleasant like that sorry young Learmont. Why should the sinners always win the ball for pleasantuess? The Apostle bids us be courteous, and is aye minding us to rejoice, but we're ower stark and ower dowff to heed his injunctions. I'll wait till I meet a gude man, and a soft tongued, young, brisk, and bonny ane like mysel', an' such as Mistress Peggy hersel' sometimes thinks there's no ill in singing about. Let them say or do what they will, our ballants will go on hand in hand with our psalms; they are often doleful enough to be clean out of the category of light sangs. I'H not ballast myself with a great, roaring sea-captain."

The gale rose with the night tide and blew in those trumpet blasts and sudden fierce roars that presage the wildest of coast storms. The sea raised its voice, and all Crail echoed with the tumult of earth and sky, until by the early morning few lay abed but hurried up and out to learn what damage had been done, but principally to look on the tossed, tormented sea, all bare, save where some poor vessel, with naked poles, seudded on the crests of the seething waves, fretted already with sad tokens, and bringing in a harvest the most mournful that human avariee can claim.

There was reason enough that Crail should be astir this October morning. One ship had been laid on the Car Rock, and then lifted up and driven in upon the town, and was now being beaten to fragments; and another was still holding off, and making for Anstruther, round the breakers off the point. Captain Robert had been aroused, by break of day, to lend his skill and strength. Even Mistress Peggy, though this was the very day she was to travel to Austruther to await her beloved brother Captain Joshua, donned her hood, and hurried with her niece Eppie, and the whole population of Crail-man, woman, and child-to witness the disaster and its end. Notwithstanding her spirit and strength, it required all her breath to supply her lungs as she stood in the place of honour on the shore, respectfully backed by two of the principal men in Crail—the inukeeper and the mercer-with the minister, Mr. John Melville, at one elbow, and Eppie Melville fluttering at the other.

An east-coast gale must be the likest to a hurricane of anything in Britain. Few would believe the extent of its power if they had not fought it, or been foiled by it in pitched battle. The storm spends itself for the principal hours of its duration in prolonged gusts that rush with the concentration of a blast in a Highland gorge, and actually oppose a solid violence to the toiling wayfarer. This incensed, unappeasable opponent, is further strengthened by the wrack with which it is laden, and which can be plainly seen by the eye—a stream or reversed pillar of vapour approaching to engulf the traveller, the nearest to a water-spout or the sandy whirlwind of the desert of all the wide phenomena of nature. This wrack divides at its edge into the minutest dust of rain, which, mingling with the lashed spray, and the shifting sand, and the flecks of foam, renders the air dense, and enwraps the whole wild stage of the sea-shore where the breakers are thundering, and where the central figure of a ship is stretched in sad motionlessness, or only quivers now and then from stem to stern, until at length one mightier sea-wolf than the rest springs on its side, to rebound again howling.

The ship, though unknown, was not of foreign build, yet the seamen swore she was manned by foreigners, as they neither comprehended non answered signals. Her crew was very numerous for her size, too; for they clustered like bees fore and aft, while she was fixed on the shore, and the waves shook and twisted and ground her rib from rib. Had she not swung inland, head foremost, with an impetus that launched her far inshore, and had the tide not been low, she would have been under water long before a man could come out of Crail to her aid. As it was, the tide was rising, and her dauger was every moment on the increase.

At the mention of foreigners, there had been a significant glance and pause, and the fatal word Armada trembled on several tongues. But Captain Robert summoned the best men to follow him, and his appeal stirred other feelings in them. No boat could live down there; for the great sea billows, broken by the cruel rock, where the spray fell again like a linn, did not so much advance rank by rank, as they bubbled and raged and lashed each other like demons. But there was a hope of shooting a rope through the surf, and by that narrow causeway landing the drowning crew. For this purpose picked men advanced as far as possible into the water, and endeavoured to cast the line where it could be caught by those on board the

This is not so dangerous a service as the attempt to rescue by a boat, but it is sufficiently hazardous, and very striking in its features to the anxious eyes of the spectators. Five or six men formed a chain, and waded hand in hand into the turmoil. Their progress was siekeningly slow; and they stood and yielded at intervals, while wind and water, as if infuriated by their courage and coolness, whirled and spouted against them with fresh violence. Homely, curt, careless fellows, they think nothing of their deed, even when they feel their feet slipping from beneath them; and they have seen, ere now, some of their number hurried off as in a chariot. One man breaks the slender chain, and advances alone. He is chief in muscle and nerve, or he has the responsibility of command. If that swaying line, which shows like a thread against the roused elements, is fixed, what will hinder it even then from snapping-exposed to so fearful a strain? And if it snaps, away go the men who are paying it out and those who are clinging to it as to salvation.

Captain Robert was the man who cast the rope to the ship on the shore at Crail, and well for him that his stature was full, his sturdy vigour established, and his presence of mind and authority acquired. He stood singly in advance; he made the throws, under which even his balance wavered, and he caught again the rope when it fell wide of the mark. The spray went over and over him, and round and round him, and whether it blinded him or no. it blinded the spectators. Once it dragged him down, and he swam for a minute and a half till he regained his depth. No Hercules could have struck out five minutes in that whirlpool. Once again he was dragged down, and an eager shout arose, "Come back, Captain Robert, you're ower venturesome; you'll be swamped as sure as you're alive." The whole crowd held their breath for him, counted his feats, and blessed his gallantry.

Mistress Peggy did not turn away, she gazed steadfastly, and murmured through her shrivelled lips, "Robin, Robin Serymgeour, you're playing the man this day." She envied him. When he succeeded in his aim, and a great shout on shore joined the faint cheer of the seamen on board, Mr. John Melville, the minister of Crail, who was holding converse with the infirmity and timorousness of age, bared his white head to the blast, and uttered aloud a thanksgiving and a petition for further protection, and the people joined silently in his prayer with a hush of reverent faith, and glistening, grateful eyes.

Poor young Eppie's feelings were roused to the utmost pitch. At first she had plucked her aunt energetically by the gown, and sobbed out, white and scared—"Let me gang hame, auntie, I canna stand to see it."

"Stay where you are, bairn," Mistress Peggy answered, emphatically, "and learn the vanity of life."

"But, auntie," groaned Eppie again in a few moments, forced by the torture she was undergoing to be explicit, "I cannot bide it, since—since Captain Robert is the foremost man. You ken, you ken I've no right to watch him, clasp my hauds and set my teeth till he come back—though I never meant to abuse him, and it was not my wyte, you ken, auntie; I dare not witness his danger, or his destruction."

"I command you not to lift a foot, Eppie Melville; if you stir from my side, I'll send some of the menfolk after you. It serves you weel, you vain lass, and you shall see what stuff gude Robin Scrymgeour's made of before he is done with you, as he ought to have been lang syne."

So Eppie had no resource left her but to stand and look. Soon eager curiosity and tremulous interest robbed her of the cowardly impulse to escape the contemplation of his triumph; for now Captain Robert triumphed over every detractor. Who could call to mind his roughness and loudness, and heavy set manhood, while he stood there with his life in his hand for the sake of his neighbour? Who could waste a thought on the absence of lightness and elegance, in the immediate presence of the stern realities of life and death?

But Eppie remembered distinctly her own objections to Captain Robert on these counts-her own flouts at his awkwardness and unwieldiness. She remembered how she had clouded his clear eyes with reproach by running away from his company to the psalm-singing, and had dulled his best narrative by her indifference when he spun his yarns to her Aunt Peggy and Mr. John Melville over the lamp, by the hearth, or at supper. And he had never blamed her; but had laboured to make himself less loud and gruff, if not less big and brown. He had attended to her whims, and courted her with every conceivable gift from his stores. But she scorned to be propitiated by them. and would even have returned them if she could have dared. He was her kinsman, however, and Mistress Peggy was in the way, and she had no choice but to receive, and then disparage and neglect them. He had forgotten her now, as he stood there swinging and rocking as he had never swung and rocked in his hammock; he had, for the moment, forgotten his mistress, and the pain she had cost him, and would have been impatient to be reminded of her, as men turn from women in their peculiar combats. Yes, he loved her, he knew that too well; but he was a man, and must do his duty; she should not come between him and it. It would be hard, if after embittering all else, she should thwart him here.

But there was no cause why Eppie should forget; and she remembered all, and with notable results. First, she prayed with all her heart to the merciful God not to punish her lightness and foolishness, by slaying her cousin, Captain Robert, in his nobleness, before her eyes. Then she said to herself, that she had not known Captain Robert in his bravery and gallantry, and she had not dreamt how proud she should be of his deeds. She would listen to no other suitor, wed no likelier man. How could she give the preference to a glib tongue, a smooth courtesy, a red and white cheek like her own, when she had seen Captain Robert thus faithfully risk his life for strangers? The heroic vision would rise and humble her in all ordinary circumstances. Oh! she wished Captain Robert could receive her resolutions and hear her vow. Thirdly-and this was when Captain Robert swam that minute and a half, buffeting those water mountains-Eppie suddenly struck her colours and laid down her arms. In her desperation she cried, unheard by any mortal it is true, but registered in her own soul and conscience: "I will wed you, Captain Robert; I'll never say you nay again, man; I'll go before the minister to-morrow, if you'll but come back to dry land."

The moment young Eppie took that magnanimons resolution, her cheeks began to burn less painfully, and her heart to throb less overpoweringly. She could exert her eyes and ears again; indeed, her sight and hearing seemed to have been magically touched by some precious ointment, as when Cinderella underwent the touch of the fairy's kind wand. Captain Robert, among the waves, looked grand and goodly, a man for a silly woman to be proud of and to cherish upon her knees. His face, when he turned it for a second, was as dauntless and as true a face as could give comfort and protection to a weak woman; and his voice, when he shouted his orders, was as sweet in its persistence as it was manly in its power.

But the chance of withdrawing her protest, and allowing her consent, was not swift to come. There was Captain Robert still straining every nerve, and perilling his valuable life to relieve his fellowcreatures, in perfect ignorance of her intention. She felt it would be so hard if he should never learn it, so dreadful if, his delusion unbroken, he should fall a sacrifice. And she felt that now she was bound to interfere, when for the third or fourth time he traversed the rope with his passengers. They were so slow, those stupid, staggered, slight-built strangers. With dilating, beseeching eyes, she appealed for the last time to her aunt. "Must he continue to go? Is he to be worn out? Will no person take Captain Robert's place, or is he to get his death of cold, if he be not clutched by some drowning man, or swallowed up by the hindmost wave?"

Mistress Peggy shook her off afresh, though this time more gently: "Whisht! ye silly bairn, Captain Robert is the captain, and that tow is his vessela captain never quits the ship till every living soul is delivered. I, mysel, would not suner leave my house in the circumstances." Young Eppie could have stamped with impatience, and then cried with contrition and fear. But at length the weary task was ended, and Captain Robert escorted his last half-helpless charge over the gangway, and staggered on shore himself. The Crail men raised some plaudits for their captain, since the step between them and eternity had again widened out to a lifetime. But then came cold glances and rising murmurs against the rescued crew-a swarm of dark-haired, sallow-faced men, with oddly-cut jerkins, high hats, and long beards. Out of the jaws of the great deep, they were hovering on the brink of another danger. What business had such as they near the coast, when men were looking for the Armada? The Armada! the word was a test; stop them! pinion them! gag them! apply to them their own tortures. Think of the cursed Inquisition, and the peaceful British subjects - the faithful Protestants-burnt at the stake like savage Red Indians. But Captain Robert interfered and allayed the sudden panie. He could hardly be said to reason, but then he hectored like a brave man who had played his part, and like an unsophisticated man who never doubted his right to dictate terms. stiff, pugnacious townsmeu looked glum, and muttered a little, but they bent to the claims of gentle birth, the influence of the Melvilles, and the deeds of Captain Robert. The waifs he had rescued were stowed away safely enough, both as regarded themselves and the townspeople, for they were locked into the empty church, which the zealous mob had stripped, and in which they were yet to sign the Covenant amidst tears and prayers, and the most solemn oaths ever nation swore.

TIT.

CAPTAIN ROBERT in his beaver, and with dry hose and doublet, prepared to start for Austruther. "Tush! it's a daft emergence," he protested, not caring to be praised, and certainly a little spent with his efforts, though he would hardly own it. He was perfectly unconscious of the change of fortune that was awaiting him. This was no time to approach him with overtures, and Eppie grew frightened and anxious. It was a comfort that they were to travel in company, for no fatigue or stress of weather would induce Mistress Peggy to fail in her appointment, when Captain Joshua was expected in port. Even on that howling, tempestuous day, roads were open, and sure-footed East Neuk beasts paced them, and hardy East Neuk folks journeyed to their destination.

It was a simple cavalcade. Mistress Peggy, in her hat and mantle, sat on a pillion behind one of her old, stolid, sure Carnbee men, on a work-day horse. She travelled so seldom now-a-days that she indulged in no palfrey. Eppie rode on her own brisk pony, which she managed perfectly; and Captain Robert, who, being a cadet of family, rode indifferently well for a sailor, was mounted on a fresh horse, hired from the Arskine Arms, of size to suit his own proportions. He towered above his companions, and though he was in such good eompany, seemed, shame upon him! eager for the road, and perplexed and abstracted, rather than attentive and painstaking, as had been bis wont. Eppie did not know what to make of him, and it appeared to grow more and more difficult to proffer to him a hint of her soft relenting. She was nervous, she was not herself; yet she was more fascinating in her soul-breathing heats and tremours than in the undimmed, unmoved lustre of her fairness and stateliness. But that horrid, brown sea-captain, only made to strive for drowning men, or stamp up and down on deck, or blurt out his truthfulness, and blush, got no benefit from this "lovely woman's agitation."

In his old white Manse, in the Tolbooth Wynd of Anstruther, James Melville, through the sough and shriek of the wind and the dash of the waves, dreamt of his captive kirk, the lady of his vision, and slept away the fatigues of his daily duties. He was rather rudely roused from his slumbers by the startling announcement that the Baillies of Anster waited to have speech of him anent a matter of mighty importance to the burgh.

This matter of mighty importance was the disposal of a ship-load of distressed men whose vessel had foundered off the Ockneys, and who now, with their captain, Don Jan Gomez, were waiting in sorry plight the decision of the magnates. The first outburst of indignation at the thought of the Armada was soon lost in the contemplation of the helplessness of the strangers; and they were very soon as well bestowed as circumstances would allow, Mr. James Melville having showed such tenderness as to make him say to himself, as Captain Robert knocked with his riding-whip at the Tolbooth door, and Mistress Peggy's riding-skirt was seen fluttering down the street-"I must be able to repress my relentings at my ain hearth, else Mistress Peggy will play my Lady Makgill of Rankeillour, and I will be forced to banish her belyve out of my hearing."

But Captain Robert also told his tale, and to his great relief Mr. James wrung his hand in token of the utmost sympathy—"You have done well, sir; you have excelled. I envy you that you were sent to deliver them. I have no fear of my kinswoman since she has cast een on their grievous plight, and trembled for their near destruction. Aha! Mistress Peggy, there is no word of the blunderbuss now, but of roaring fires and warm duds and cordial drinks to heap on the head of the foe."

Mistress Peggy was ready at his call. "Mr. James, I would scorn to strike a fallen man. Poor lads, poor lads! they are far frae their mothers and sisters; drowning the ae moment, in durance the next, and it's a lang word to hame. Eppie, bestir yoursel, ye selfish lass; what can we do to comfort these forlorn and desolate men?"

Mr. James chose for that evening's homily—not the blessed text: "If thine enemy hunger, feed him," for that would have seemed to savour of the self-commendation which "in privity" his soul abhorred—but the conscience-stricken address of David to Abigail: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me. And blessed be thou which hast kept me from coming to shed blood, and from avenging myself with mine own hand."

Ere evening there was a grand gathering in Anstruther. The arrivals were such as caused Mistress Peggy and her niece, and even shy Mrs. Melville, to put themselves in proper apparel, shake out their wimples and their standing collars, fasten the jewelled drops to the band above the brow, and the ouches on their girdle. Yet, it is true, young Eppie's gaze was wondrously distraught and dim from a window in the principal street, where they could enjoy the rare sight of so many old friends, and the general show of horse and rider, groom and hound, as they defiled to the grim Tolbooth door.

Mistress Peggy looked, admired, and nodded her head, with its ponderous pile, which rose like a beehive in the centre, with fans at each side. "A pretty sight! It minds me of what my mother was wont to tell of the grand gala day when Queen Mary, our luckless Mary's mother, landed at Balcomie Point, and every laird and lady of the East Neuk rode in her train to St. Andrews to meet my lord the king."

But the autumn afternoon was drawing to an end. The gentlemen about Anstruther, having dined at noon and finished their sitting, were thinking of riding cannily home again, or dropping aside into little convivial parties, to eat their supper, and, it is to be feared, depart from the straight road of sobriety, by entering upon those orgies which King Jamie himself, highly decorons in other respects, always countenanced, and which neither Knox nor Melville, for all their wise kindly moderation in meat and drink, could quell.

These Fife gentlemen were nevertheless brave men and honourable, and could not disgrace themselves by a dastardly revenge. They rather experienced a mereiful or a supercilious satisfaction in extending charity to this strange and stray debarkation of the Armada. So my lord of Austruther carried off Don Jan Gomez de Medina to taste his high hospitality, and half-a-dozen more gregarious lairds trotted home in the gale to consult their puzzled dames, and make arrangements for similar receptions. But the main body were stowed in the Tolbooth, which had just been used as a council-chamber, and somewhat like wild beasts did the dark-eyed, long-haired, southern-tongued strangers appear, peeped at as they were, halfcuriously, half in seorn, by the townsfolk.

Eppie Melville, amongst the rest, would see the strangers. So Captain Robert escorted the girl a little discontentedly, for he said to himself with irritable jealousy: "Now, I would not wonder though my lass were taken with a craze for these wrecked prisoners. Women aye side with the weak and vanquished, and the more wizened and ill-conditioned they are, perhaps the women are all the readier to be smitten. But she maun have her way."

Eppie walked round the dismal guard-room, and glauced shyly at the olive-skins, the lustrous eyes, the slender limbs, and the emphatic gestures, and picked out the chief men, as much by their proud look and endurance and composure as by their scarfs and rings. And the gallant Spaniards gazed in their turn, and were charmed by the tall fair beauty, so statue-like, but rose-tinged as if the setting sun had shot its last rays on the snow of her cheek, perhaps fancying at the same time with what a noble motion she would tread in their dances, how her long firm fingers would swing and crack the castanets.

"They are comely youths, though they be black and slim, Captain Robert," whispered Eppie.

Captain Robert ground and shouldered his bulk. "They are new-fangled, Eppie," he muttered scornfully.

"I'm wae for them, Captain Robert."

"Lass," said the captain, "you need not tell me that."

"And I would like to solace them."

at Balcomic Point, and every laird and lady of the "Eppie, you had better try it. I have borne many a thing, but this I will not bear. I was willing to ware my life for the like of them, papists and heathens as they are, not six hours syne; but I fear they had better have gone to the bottom after all!"

To Captain Robert's utter amazement and discomfiture Eppie now began to cry. She had expected this turn, and led the way to it.

"I wonder at you, Captain Robert. You saved such poor souls, and you are a grand man, and they but beardless boys; but you should not grudge them a woman's pity."

"Now, now, forgive me, Eppie, I would not hurt you; but ah! woman, you flung away on these strangers what you have never yielded either to my service or to my prayers."

"It is not true," sobbed she, passionately; "though I laughed, I was vexed at your courtship. I tried to stop it to save you pain, and every now and then I was blaming myself hardly that I should cause you to suffer, until—only—until this morning."

"God forgive you, Eppie; what was there in a simple act of duty that could rob me of your scant esteem ? "

"Oh! Captain Robert, dinna you see that from the moment I saw you performing your duty you had no need of my pity?"

He did not see it; he had some thought that she was mocking him.

"Would you prefer my pity to my admiration?" Eppie demanded with great stateliness. But he had brought her to the verge of another word, and, having submitted herself to be humbled so far, she cried behind her kerchief more vehemently than ever.

Captain Robert was now indeed blessed; his honest eyes were opened to the simple fact, and he accepted it with the most profound gratitude. Ay, of course, he preferred the warm love pressed close to his bosom, to the pity which, like charity, is pale and cold, and hovers at a distance. It was sweet to the sailor that these familiar, rude waves had so unexpectedly struck the first peal of his wedding bells.

What remains to be told? Mistress Peggy was an authoritative mother to those silly, transhed, hungry men, and though they could not interchange a word, they impressed her with their dignity, for she described Don Jan as "a buirdly man of a sedate walk and conversation."

Mr. James Melville, in spite of his downright declaration that "there could be little friendship between them," had frequent friendly intercourse with the commander, gifting him with the few bottles of rich wine, presented to him by his kinsman, Henry Scrymgeour.

In due time the party were honourably embarked and despatched to their master, who had made himself the laughing-stock of bluff Drake and Hawkins, with Europe at their back.

Captain Joshua in the "Lord Henry" had come into port the day after the landing of the Spaniards, and had immediately sailed again, along with Captain Robert in the "Beacon," to hang as privateers on the skirts of the yet unmet Armada.

Naturally enough, Captain Robert completed his work smartly, and glided into Austruther harbour with the boom of the last Autworp gun, to claim his bride before the winter storms should strew the coast with wrecks. But Captain Joshua tarried in the chase of the defeated enemy, and Mistress Peggy was resolved that the wedding which would make two pier-heads gay should not be concluded without his august countenance.

This Captain Joshua, on whom the old lady laid such stress, was not so indispensable a personage to others. He was a little man, Mistress Peggy's junior in everything; quiet and subdued on shore, though a trusty guide on the inconstant element, on which he had sailed so long that it was almost as native to him as to the swift careering curlew or curtseying little wild duck. But he was the head of Mistress Peggy's family, the sole remnant of her generation, and for full fifty years she had insisted ou paying him deference. There was something touching in Mistress Peggy's fidelity, and in the eagerness with which the independent old lady bent the head and wore the coif to unexacting Captain Joshua, chinging to the vestige of her womanly allegiance, although so cased in the armour of selfreliance, stubbornness, and sarcasm.

Captain Joshua did not return, though there were eager hearts awaiting him. Magnanimous Captain Robert grow urgent in his suit. No, Mistress Peggy was obdurate, the "Lord Henry" was safe, Captain Joshua had never seen the dungeons of the Inquisition, his merry men sang out nightly "All's well," and Anster had not succoured the benighted Spaniards in vain.

"Mistress Peggy," urged Captain Robert, "I maun sail with the spring winds, and I would fain wed my Eppie. You would not send a man abroad in his honeymoon. If we be parted as we stand, I'll not be less stout, but I'll maybe grow grey ere I halt, and likelier lads may woo my lass when my back is turned."

"Awa' with you, man; gin ye cannot depend upon her for ae voyage, how will ye trust her for twa lives?"

Mistress Peggy was white aud restless as she overwhelmed her persecutors with reproaches; but she would not be overborne by their longings or by their terrors. So the bridegroom tarried for his bride, until on one white, watery November dawn the "Lord Henry" rode within hail, and the boat from its side had Captain Joshua in the stern, and Roger Swanson was rowing the first oar, that he might the sooner present his child to the Lord, and, at the same time, slip into the long-handled wooden ladle his thank-offerings from his prizemoney. And young Eppie Melville, in the flush of her strength and delicate bloom, was selected to carry the babe in his caul and mantle all the way up the church aisle, blushing and bridling in a bewitching maidenly fashion, all because she was a sailor's niece, and about to become a sailor's wife.

But where had the loiterers lingered? They had brought home a rare experience. They had followed in the wake of the ruins of the Armada, and, following too far, had floundered into the circle of six gallcons, and been captured and towed under the white walls of Cadiz. There they had heard the salute of cries of vengeance and oaths of retribution, till the stalwart figure of Don Jan Gomez rose upon their glad sight, and forced a passage to their side. Don Jan was not ashamed to own them; he entertained them like a frank sailor, he pleaded and prayed for them, and so they were ont of the gloomy grip of Philip. They were now here with casks of purple raisins, and barrels of snow-white flour, and boxes of oranges and figs, and American sugar, and runlets of wine; and they told how Don Jan and his captains had inquired "for the Laird of Anstruther and the minister," and every good man of the Anster towns.

Mistress Peggy was a happy woman in her triumph, and proud beyond easy bearing, till Captain Joshua was sly enough to whisper a private message from her strange friend. Then, indeed, Mistress Peggy started up, her stately face in a flame, and working with half-angry, half-confused laughter. "The presumptuous peat! the lightheaded auld fule! to mint sic madness. An East Neuk woman of douce years to be Donna to a philandering, doited Don; he had better speer my hand in the dance next. A hantle more fitting he were ordering his burial, like his King Charles. And though he had been in his prime, like Captain Robert, and I had been youthfu' and glaiket, like that weathercock Eppie, would a woman of the Covenant have cast an ee on a besotted son of the Pope of Rome? It is an idle jest, Captain Joshua, and it sets you no that weel to repeat it."

HOMEWARD.

BY THE EDITOR.

III. -- CONSTANTINOPLE AND THE DANUBE.

I NEVER sailed in a more comfortable steamer than the French "Messageries" screw "Mainham" which conveyed us from Athens to Constantinople. The "state rooms"—so designated, I presume, by some cynic in the agonies of a sleepless hot night—had neat iron bedsteads, instead of those shelves, or coffins without the lid, which seem to be the approved nautical model of "berths" in passenger ships. And in all other respects our comforts were amply provided for.

At the time of our departure there were anchored in the harbour of the Piræus, French, British, and Russian men-of-war, as if some émeute had been dreaded, and they had come to keep the peace. The young King was dining on board one of the ships. There was, therefore, the usual display of flags, with barges passing to and fro, whose many oars rose and fell with man-of-war precision. Officers, consuls, and members of the diplomatic corps, sat in their sterns; while salutes were fired from grim iron frigates, and a general phiz of excitement pervaded the whole harbour, in which our passengers would have joined had they not been already sufficiently occupied in looking after their portmanteaus and carpet-bags, and in the all-important duty of gaining the purser's attention so as to secure good

We started in the evening, gazing for the last time, as some of us felt, on Athens and Hymettus. We steamed on into the darkness, thus again missing a sight of Sunium. Our sail by daylight revealed but a repetition of what we had already seen. We passed the Troad close in shore, and had an admirable view of this memorable spot, consecrated by a genius which still moves the world; and of course the one thought was of that — "blind bard, who on the Chian strand Beheld the Iliad and the Odyssey Rise to the swelling of the voiceful sea."

The outline of the geography of the Troad, as seen when passing along, is easily made out. A low coast, like an upraised beach, extends about ten miles along shore from one bay, or projection of the land, to another; then inland, there is a dead plain for some miles, broken by more than one great tumulus: and beyond, wooded hills ascend from lower to higher until in the sky towers Mount Ida. This is about all one sees of the Troad from the steamer's deck, even when his eyes are strained to aching to catch every feature of a scene which has been a romance to him since the time he first opened his Virgil. It is a most ideal spot: the great plain, as if made for battle; the sandy shore, as if made for landing troops; the short but steep sea-beach, as if made for resisting them; the grand scenery, as if made for the poet, with its almost ocean sea; Tenedos, to break its monotony; with the superb background of woods, hills, and mountains,—the white foam lining the shore below, and the white snows lining the sky above. The description given of the plain by Lord Byron is excellent :-

"High barrows, without marble, or a name,
A vast, untilled, and mountain-skirted plain,
And Ida in the distance, still the same,
And old Scamander, (if 'tis he,) remain:
The situation seems still form'd for fame—
A hundred thousand men might fight again
With ease; but where I sought for llion's walls,
The quiet sheep feeds, and the tortoise crawls."

I do not wonder that Constantine should have thought of making this site the seat of empire before fixing on Constantinople; but, in spite of its classical associations, he was wise in preferring the latter to the former.

Soon after passing the Troad we entered the Dardanelles. Whatever interest may be attached to its stupid-looking forts, or to the Narrows at Abydos, which Leander swam from love of beauty, and Byron from love of fame, the strait itself as a whole made no impression on me. One sees how formidable it is as a defence of the capital from any attack by sea from the west, though it is possible, I presume, that an iron fleet could sail through it unscathed. It is about sixty miles long, and on an average three broad. We sailed through most of the Sea of Marmora at night.

The moment we near Constantinople, the magnificence of its situation and the marvellous beauty of the whole scene makes an indelible impression.

Rough Plan of Constantinople and its Environs.

There is the long Seraglio Point, (not too high to be a promontory, nor too low to be a spit,) the end of the undulating ridge of "the seven hills," gently sloping to the sea, so as to reveal all its buildings; and then the wonderful breaking up of the city itself by the water which separates what is after all but one city-Constantinople, Pera, and even Scutari on the Asiatic shore. No one building, as we sail along and new portions of the city open up to view, arrests the attention. There is nothing imposing in any of the details, although the general effect is so wonderful. This is produced, as far as I could determine, in the first place, by the many minarets which rise like white palms from the ridge. and which seem to lift it up as if to hold converse with the sky. The superbly gilded crescent of St. Sophia is about 150 feet in diameter! No wonder it should be seen 100 miles off when glittering under the sun's rays. The buildings without the minarets would look flat, and by no means imposing. Indccd whatever may be said of the minaret as an element in the beauty of architecture, yet those pinnacles clustering the ridge of the Scraglio Point, as they gleamed in the suushine, produced upon me a sense of fairy lightness and grace which no towers or steeples could do. Such an effect have they on the city landscape that, were they removed, it would be like cutting away the masts from a ship of the line.

Another peculiarity of the scene was the variety and mingling of colour everywhere. Houses white, brown, and yellow; white minarets with tall cypresses, like black attendants; trees and shrubs of every hue of green blossoming with the flowers of spring; a picturesque confusion of gardens, palaces, mosques, and humble dwellings;—all, framed by the cloudless sky above and the emerald green sea below, and gilded by the sunshine gleaming from the waves, and from the burnished ornaments on domes and minarets, made up an unrivalled picture of exquisite beauty.

Like all travellers who have landed on this shore, at the ugly-looking Custom-house, with its jabber and bustle, we were first struck by the Hammels, or common porters—shock-headed, broad-shouldered, strong-limbed—who might have originated the idea of the Centaur, with the man's head and the borse's back and legs. The burthens which they pile upon their backs, and manage to carry up the steeps of Galata, are almost incredible. Their appearance as they lead the way is something like this:—

There are no such human beasts of burthen anywhere else upon earth.

Constantinople from without is more picturesque than from within. The streets are narrow, and wretchedly paved with small round stones. They are without footpaths, are full of dust or mud, according to the state of the weather, and some of them, as from Galata to Pera, are so steep as to require to be cut into steps. Such houses as one sees possess no feature of interest. As for those concealed within gardens and behind walls, I know nothing of them. Wooden houses everywhere abound; and in many parts of Stamboul there are great vacant places, rough and wild, as in an American city which has been working its way through a wilderness. Here the wilderness is infested by dogs, and has been occasioned by fires, sloth, and a decreasing population. Everywhere there are signs of squalor and confusion, and the absence of taste, neatness, and comfort, with the presence, moreover, of many things to call forth a protest from eye and ear, nose and foot, and from the whole man-soul, spirit, and body. Stamboul is more orderly than most Oriental cities, but in every respect, and in the best quarters, it is very inferior to any European ones. bazaars, in point of interest, are not to be compared with those of either Cairo or Damascus, but being sheltered by roofing and glass from the rain and heat, they are comfortable as arcades, and contain tolerably good shops. The chief article inquired for by travellers, especially ladies, is the attar of roses. It is hardly possible to get it genuine; and whether the transparent or the opaque be the better is a matter of dispute. I believe in the latter. But under the guidance of some one who is initiated in the mystery, and with patience and a determination not to be taken in by mere appearances, it is possible to get a vial of such scent as will diffuse a delicious odour around it for years. The cost, as far as I remember, is about a napoleon.

The people one meets with in the streets are always a chief source of interest to the traveller in the East, and here they are, as might be expected, a mixture of East and West, with the costumes of both so modified by intercourse as to produce what, in contrast with those of Damascus for instance, must be called commonplace. Yet there is nothing like them elsewhere in Europe. Ever and anon, there appear individuals or groups that attract one's attention as peculiar, and out-of-the-way looking; -merchants or travellers from different parts of Asia, with Tartar, Circassian, Wallachiau, or Arab features and dresses. Old-fashioned vellow coaches are also met with, hung on large antiquated leather springs. They have veiled ladies within, and the horses or mules are led cautiously along the rough streets by some confidential servant, Turk or A large number, too, of magnificent horses are to be seen, with fat Greek or Turkish riders, who look world-commanding and dignified. either from possessing a large purse, large power, or large person; - while everywhere the stream of life is dotted with thin American faces with imperials, and, if clergy, silk waistcoats, and the universal surtout and wide-awake.

The hotels are very comfortable, unextravagant, and quite European from the landlord to the boots.

The finest view of Constantinople is from the Seraskier Tower in Galata. It rises almost immediately over the bridge, and commands a view to the right of the Golden Horn, an arm of the sea, about seven miles in length, and so called from its shape and the riches it carries. The bridge and harbour are seen below; Stamboul crowus the opposite height, with its stately mosques and skyey minarets; and to the left is the Asiatic shore, with the bright Bosphorus and shipping between. The waters of the Golden Horn seem as if frozen in their calm brightness, and the innumerable boats which cross it in all directions look like so many skates left behind by the skaters.

The bridge, which connects the north side with the south, is a wooden one, supported by poutoons, and opening to let vessels pass. To give an idea of the number of passengers who cross it, I may mention that, although the toll is less than a farthing for each, the annual revenue amounts to about 20,000l. The bridge is the wharf also for the ferry steamers which constantly ply to every part of the Bosphorus within fifteen miles. There is another bridge further up the Horn.

Of all the remains of antiquity in Stamboul, the most interesting is the Hippodrome. In the days of Constantine this was a grand circus, in which took place those chariot races which were among the most favourite amusements of the Byzantine population, and hence its Turkish name, Atmeidan, or horse-course. The space thus once occupied is now without any enclosure, and is about 900 feet long and 450 broad. The statues which once filled it are gone; but there remains at one end an old Egyptian obelisk, and not far from it is one of the most interesting memorials of the old heathen world—the Bronze Serpent.

The story of the serpent is this: - There existed in the sacred enclosure of the Temple of Delphi in Greece-which, as every one knows, was the most illustrious spot in the heathen world for supernatural revelations or oracles given by the Pythian Apolloa bronze serpent, commemorative of the living one slain there by Apollo, and some of whose remains were preserved in the temple, and were associated with the responses given by the "inspired" Priestess. After the great battle of Platæa, between the Spartau general Pausanias and the Persian Mardonius (B.C. 476), the tithe of the spoils taken from the Persians was dedicated, in the form of a golden tripod, to the Temple of Apollo, and placed on the three heads of the Bronze Serpent. Thucydides informs us that Pausanias had inscribed on the golden tripod his own praises only, which so irritated the Lacedemonians, who had taken a worthy part in the battle, that they erased it, and in its stead had recorded the names of all the Greek states which had shared in the battle. The golden tripod was taken as spoil, but two centuries after Christ the bronze intertwined serpent on which it stood remained in its original place. Authentic history, moreover, records that Constantine removed, with other spoils from heathen temples, this very bronze serpent from Delphi, and had it erected in the Hippodrome at Constantinople. For the last three centuries travellers have described it; and in the opinion of Gibbon, even before late discoveries, there could be little doubt as to its authenticity.

There stands now in the Hippodrome the same bronze column, made up of three serpents wound together so as almost to appear one. It rises about twelve feet above the ground, which is an accumulation of rubbish, but eighteen feet in all from the stone plinth in which the joint tail is fixed, six feet below the surface of the ground. The three heads, however, in which the twisted column once ended, and on which the golden tripod once rested, are gone, but the history of their destruction is given with high probability; and one of the heads, shown in the Seraglio Museum as having belonged to the original group, is probably, if not certainly, authentic. It was always asserted that Mohammed II. the last conqueror of the city, had broken off the lower jaw of one of the heads with his iron mace; and this head, discovered in digging about St. Sophia when under repair, is wanting in the lower jaw. Another tradition states that the three heads were destroyed in the fifteenth century by the followers of Count Lisinsky, ambassador from Poland to the Porte. But what beyond doubt connects the history of the bronze column of the Hippodrome with what existed nearly 3000 years ago at the Oracle of Delphi, is a discovery made a few years ago by Mr. Newton, when he dug round the column and explored its base,-a discovery afterwards confirmed by two learned Germans, Drs. Frick and Dethier, who ten years ago, by means of acids, brought out on the column the names of the Greek states which had fought at Platæa, as narrated by Thucydides! There can, therefore, be no doubt whatever as to the authenticity of the "Pythian" pillar of Delphi, and there are few remains of antiquity in the world, associated with human beliefs, feelings, and actions, of greater interest.*

Every traveller visits the grand old Christian Cathedral of St. Sophia. Alas! it has been for some centuries a mosque, although the noblest mosque in which Mohammedans worship. The only exchange which we have made with the Moslem, that may almost be called "fair" in so far as architecture is concerned, is in the case of what was once the Mosque of Cordova, but is now its Cathedral Church.

St. Sophia was built thirteen centuries age at an enormous cost, by Justinian. For four centuries it has been in possession of the Turks. There is nothing imposing in its massive exterior, which gives the impression simply of vast size. But its interior, in spite of the decay of its minute details, and the absence of all "furniture" (in accordance with the simplicity of Moslem worship,) is one of the grandest and most stately in the world. All the essential portions of the original architecture still remain: there is the light and airy dome, as great in diameter as that of St. Paul's, rising 182 feet above the pavement, and reposing apparently on its forty windows which light up the centre of the church; the splendid pillars of porphyry and marble, some of which once belonged in all probability to the Temple of Diana at Ephesus; the roof of mosaic, greatly defaced it is true, but yet as a whole retaining much of its ancient splendour; with the noble space afforded for worshippers on the plain-like floor below, and the vast galleries above, formerly occupied by women only. It is said that 30,000 people can be accommodated within its walls. It would be a grand church to preach in, for it is nearly a square of about 250 feet. On the payment of a large fee we were permitted to view the building from the galleries, whence we looked down as from a hill upon the worshippers on the plain below. Our Moslem guide pointed out to us in the apse, behind where the altar once stood, what he called a large portrait of Constantine in mosaic, but whitewashed over, so as to be but dimly perceived. It is the form of Christ, no unlike that by Cimabue in St. Mark's in Venice-and how strange to see it here! It seems to keep possession of the church amidst all changes, until the building be once more occupied by Christian worshippers, as it may be ere many years go round. The Christ is not effaced, but only concealed for a time-a prophecy of the future!

The Mosque of Suleiman the Magnificent is acknowledged to be the finest in the whole Moslem world. But I must refer all travellers who wish details on these and other sights in Constantinople to "Murray." To describe them would be but to

I must, however, say something about the "Cistern of Constantine," or the thousand and one pillars, which we visited. The entrance to it is by a series of wooden stairs, which, at an easy incline, descend from a bit of rough wilderness of huts, dogs, and squalor. We found a number of pillarsit is said 424—half buried in the earth, with a high roof overhead. The light was from some torches. The ground was rough and undulating, like the old workings in a stone-quarry or gravel-pit. It was once a huge cistern, and must have been very magnificent. It is now employed as a sort of ropework, though silk, instead of oakum, is the twisted substance. It is a horrid hole, and should be left to the rats. A more fitting scene for a murder, or for the meeting-place of the banditti of a sensation novel, could not be conceived than this Yerebatan Serai, or "subterranean palace."

I must also say something about the whirling Dervishes. We had missed seeing either the whirling or dancing portion of this sect during the previous portion of our journey, though we had made every endeavour to be present at their peculiar worship. I was glad that in Constantinople we were more fortunate, as the Dervishes belong exclusively to the East, and are one of its most remarkable though most fantastic institutions. After some difficulty we discovered the place of their meeting, about a mile from the hotel, and somewhere in the heart of the many streets behind Haskioi. The mosque, or rather hall, in which they met, had ou its floor a circular space railed off, with a little standing room beyond, and small galleries above, for spectators. The Sultan pays, I believe, a weekly visit to this brotherhood, in order to please the ultra orthodox, who have a peculiar veneration for the Dervishes as a genuine type of Islam in its holiest days. In the centre of the circle stood the leader, or priest, and in a recess sat the players with their few instruments emitting those strange. monotonous, sharp complication of sounds which constitute Turkish music. There were, I think, about twenty or so of Dervishes present. Their feet were bare; their heads covered with grey felt hats, like inverted flower-pots; and their clothing was a light-grey flannel petticoat, with a "body" that reached to the throat. The exercise consisted in all the Dervishes, with arms extended horizontally and the tips of the fingers bent downwards, whirling rapidly with a regular motion, steady as that of a spinning-top (their garments extended like crinoline around them), and advancing at the same time round the enclosed platform in a circle, no one ever knocking against the other. Each man's countenance was intensely grave, and his eyes were fixed on the ground. At intervals they paused, while the priest repeated a prayer in which one sometimes caught the name of Mohām-ed and Allah. The Dervishes themselves seemed low-bred and commonplace, with pale faces, and a semi-sensuous, semi-nervous, and hysterical look about them. I was told that their characters were not the most moral, but I had no means of testing the truth of this assertion. I must confess that, to me, there was nothing ludicrous in their exhibition. The apparent earnestness of the men, and the visible connection between their "bodily exercises" and religion, removed it from the sphere of the ridiculous into one full of interest, pity, and sober questionings as to its causes and origin. All religion, even in its false forms-whatever indeed is supposed to connect us in any way with God and the unseen world-cannot but stir the emotions and stimulate both the fancy and imagination. The tendency to express or to relieve those stirrings and tumults of the soul by outward signs of joy-such as singing, shouting, dancing, or the like-is natural, though these often pass into the hysterical. Who of us has not been prompted to sing or dance when any sudden emotion of joy has possessed him? The deep quiet and reticence of the North only evidence the supremacy of other powers, whether of pride or reason; but the tendency to emotion is there, and it manifests itself among the Shakers even in intellectual Massachusetts, where dancing forms a part of their religious ceremonies. We all know how, on the same principle, dancing entered into other forms of worship, even into the purer form of Judaism, as when David danced before the ark. But we also know how the sign of a true religious feeling may remain long after the feeling itself has passed away, and, being dissociated from it, become a meaningless nonentity. It is so with the whirling or dancing Dervishes. Yet, looking at their countenances, the impression they conveyed to me was that of men under subdued excitement, rather than of suffering of any kind; and the transsition from this mere animalism, unchecked by a trne religious or moral feeling, to what is grossly sensual is a very natural one. Such transitions do not belong exclusively to Mohammedan excesses: they are not an unusual product of strong feeling kindled by religion, when religion itself does not possess the spirit. But, wishing to judge charitably of these whirling tops, with their pale faces and empty heads, I repeat that I felt no contempt for them, nor any disposition to smile at them.

We visited the English churchyard at Scutari, and in crossing the narrow strait formed our first acquaintance with the caique. It is not unlike the Venetian goudola, and is doubtless either its parent or child in the genealogy of this kind of smooth-water boat. It is long and shallow, with a great tendency, so at least it seemed to me, to upset. Great caution is required when entering, and steadiness when seated or reclining on the cushions in its stern. It is paddled along like the gondola by from two to a dozen rowers, according to size, and is on the whole wonderfully expeditious and comfortable in these inland seas, though the breeze and tide even here tell greatly upon its motion and progress. We landed some distance to the north of the place of burial, and in walking to it passed the famous graveyard of the Mohammedans; and also the great hospital which during the Crimean war was the scene of so much dreadful suffering by our brave officers and men, and the scene also, let me add, of so much noble self-devotion on the part of holy men and women who ministered to soul and body, and did good which will live when time shall be no more.

There is, I presume to think, no more beautiful burial-place on earth than that of Scutari, where the beloved dead of many an English home lie interred. The ground is enclosed by a high wall. A lodge, with an English keeper, stands at the entrance-gate. The sacred spot itself is beautifully kept. In its centre towers the noble and simple granite monument erected by our Queen-whose sympathies are with all that touches the hearts of her people. It is surrounded by many graves, and many memorial tombstones, bearing inscriptions which vividly recall old familiar names, and the days of combat already dimmed by distance, except in the memory of those sufferers, to whom this little spot is the whole world. It was touching and strange to walk through this large place of tombs, and to remember that every one here had died from wounds received in battle, or from disease engendered by the campaign. And though the large graves—the tumuli—contained too many common soldiers to have their names and deeds recorded, yet one like myself, who, as a parish minister, had been called to comfort the widow and the orphan, the mother or the father, of the soldier,—to read his last letters, or the simple story from some comrade telling how he had fallen or died,—could realise more than most men the sad family histories which were connected with the large green sod covering hundreds of the unknown and unnamed, as well as with the more elaborate monuments over better known and more illustrious dead. There was to me over this "Gottes acker," the ever holy light of self-sacrifice—of death for interests not personal, but affecting humanity, and hallowed by the assurance that many a saint of God lay here interred, whose dust was precious.

The view from this spot is almost unequalled—the minarets of Constantinople in the background to the right; the far-spreading sea of the Propontis, with the Princes Islands before, and the magnificent mountains of Asia Minor to the left, in the distant background, all forming a magnificent panorama.

Very different is the Mohammedan graveyard, which we again passed on our return. How far it extends I cannot tell. It covers acres upon acres, and seems endless. Every spot of earth in it is occupied by a tomb or tall-growing cypress. Hardly a ray of sunlight can pierce the vast forest, or a sunbeam fall upon its graves. All is dismal as death. I would be afraid to attempt to penetrate its dark and interminable shades. A feeling of fear made me retrace my steps the moment I forced my way round the crowded stems of trees and tombs, out of sight of the daylight. One shuddered to think of being lost in this endless cemetery of midnight gloom and corruption. It is like the visible sign of Hades; an earthly capital of king Death. Millions lie here; and if more space can be found on hill or in valley, millions more will likely join them, to lie until the resurrection morning dawns in glory.

The contrast presented between this and the sleeping-place of our English dead is very striking. The one so confused, the other so orderly: the one so black and loathsome, the other so green and fresh, so open to the blue sky, and full of sunshine: the one without an inscription or word to light up the valley of death or to comfort the mourner, the other inscribed everywhere with words of faith, hope, and love, inspired by Him who is "the resurrection and the life," "who was dead, is alive, and liveth for evermore."

made me retrace my steps the moment I forced my way round the crowded stems of trees and tombs, out of sight of the daylight. One shuddered to think of being lost in this endless cemetery of of the Sultan or in that of some of the numerous steamboat companies. It is at such times that one realises the blessing of a Christian missionary like Mr. Christie, who, although sent to be by life and doctrine a witness for Christ to "the Jews first," is also helpful to the Gentiles, and becomes the paster of many who without him would be as sheep without a shepherd. But for such services how apt professing Christians, not strong in the faith, would be to forget the Lord's day altogether, and to sink down to the dead level around them, instead of rising far above it, and endeavouring by their characters to attract others to search for and to find the Saviour. The fearful rebuke administered to the Jews in the days of old, may, alas! be repeated with greater force to some professing Christians-"And when they entered unto the heathen, whither they went, they profaned my holy name, when they said to them, These are the people of the Lord, and are gone forth out of his land."

On Monday forenoon it was with no small regret that we sailed from Constantinople. We felt that we were leaving the East, and parting from all the visible signs of that old romantic world. But the joyous homes which were ready to welcome us, made our parting less sad than in other circumstances it would have been. There was some difficulty in raising the anchor of our steamer, and this chiefly from the opposition of a strong tide, although tides, I know not why, are assumed to have no existence in the Bosphorus. What its rate of flow may be I know not, but it appeared to be at least three or four knots an hour. Its force is not spent in rising and falling, but in rushing steadily on from the Black Sea to the Sea of Marmora. As we were attempting to weigh anchor, our steamer came into contact, but by no means dangerously, with a small screw plying between Constantinople and the Danube; and when standing near the quarter, I was saluted by the engineer of the screw with "Hoo's a' wi' ye, Doctor?" I soon discovered that he was an acquaintance from Glasgow, who, a few years before, when walking with his wife at Copenhagen, had denied the accuracy of her vision on her pointing me out as "the minister," at a distance. But afterwards, finding that she was correct, he promised her that if he ever met me again he would introduce himself to me; and now he had kept his word. I too had heard the story, and had also promised his wife to see her husband, should I hear of his being at Constantinople. Thus we met; and after a few kind greetings, parted. He is now in China. "Such is life."

Our homeward journey was by the Danube. This is at once the easiest and most agreeable route which links Turkey to Northern Europe. The sea passage, strictly so called, is from the entrance of the Black Sea to Kustandjie, and occupies but about sixteen hours. A railway connects this small seaport with the Danube at Cernavoda—about thirty-four miles across—and the distance is traversed in about two hours, thus cutting off the otherwise very. long and wearisome detour of two hundred miles by the mouth of the Danube. Once at the Danube by the short railway, swift steamers, provided with every comfort and luxury, convey passengers as far as Vienna. But most stop at Basiasch in Huugary, from whence there is a railway direct to Vienna, viā Pesth. So expeditious and easy is this route, that a traveller by it can reach Constantinople in six days from London. The return is a little longer, being against the stream of the Danube. We left Constantinople on Monday forenoon, and were in Vienna on Saturday morning, without trouble or difficulty of any kind, but enjoying every possible comfort and convenience.* Once out of the Bosphorus, there is nothing to be seen until Kustandjie is reached.

Before leaving the Bosphorus it might be well to attempt an answer to the question, What are its chief elements of beauty? They are very many, and very palpable. The strait has all that look of snugness characteristic of a river. banks are so near as to be seen in almost their minutest details by the voyager. They are picturesque in the highest degree, and crowded with human dwellings, these being seldom huddled together in villages, but scattered everywhere-on heights and points, in little valleys, round winding bays, and on the sca-shore-and of every variety of form, from the hut of the peasant to the kiosk and country-seat of the rich and luxurious. Mingled with them is a profusion of rich cultivation and colour from every tree and flower that can rear its graceful form, or display its exuberant foliage in this genial clime of sunshine and warmth. And then, as in the mediæval remains of old forts and castles of Europe, there are groupings of towers and walls which are indescribably picturesque, and such as the Rhine cannot in any point equal.

But no river can be compared to the Bosphorus for its life. The St. Lawrence alone, and perhaps the Neva, of all the rivers I have ever seen, possess the same clear water. Owing, I suppose, to the mud of the upper lakes being deposited long ere it reaches even Niagara, there is an ocean transparency and greenness in the Canadian river which cannot be surpassed on the clearest sea-shore, and is one of its most striking features. But while the Bosphorus possesses this quality of sea greenness and freshness, with a tide which ever gives it life, sweeping with considerable swiftness from the Euxine to the Propontis, there is a brisker life still imparted to it by the vessels of every size and rig which go to and fro on its waters, and which no river, or even sea, on earth can match. This shifting panorama is the more remarkable from the depth of the water even close to the rocks, enabling the largest vessels to hug the land with such a fond embrace as cannot be seen elsewhere. Their bowsprits seem to poke with a curious inspection into the very windows of the houses, and to scent the fragrance of the rose gardens. There is a familiarity with the land displayed which in any other part of the world would be counted dangerous. An impression is thus given of enjoyment on sea as well as on land, and of a happy, careless, and easy sailor life. A pleasant peep of the country and visions of rural retirement are afforded to Jack Tars accustomed to the shoreless sea and its rough usages-all of which add much to the beauty and social happiness of the whole scene. Each of us wearied in marking spots -some fixing on Therapia, more on Buyukderè-to which he would like to retire for the luxury of quiet thought and the perfect enjoyment of nature, and where undefined visions of a romantic past would be lost in the fairy cloudland of the mediæval West and of the older East, and be mingled with stories of the Crusaders and Saracens, of the Arabian Nights, and probably of Sindbad the Sailor, more than of Constantine and the Greek empire.

^{*} Those vacation tourists who have "done" most of Northern Europe, may enjoy a six or even four weeks' singularly interesting tour to Constantinople and Athens, via Trieste or the Danube. They must arrange so as to see the rapids on the Danube and the Bosphorus by daylight, or stay at home. For aught I know this may be always done, but inquiries should be made at Vienna or Constantinople. The sail down the Danube is of course more rapid than up, yet this is no advantage unless time be an object, the scenery being so magnificent. The sea voyage is nothing; the steamers admirable; the difficulties few; and the sights to be seen, on land, sea, and river, of the old world and the new, incomparable. So ends my advertisement.

To whatever root the impressions derived from the Bosphorus can be traced, or to what extent its charms were "borrowed from the eye" or supplied by faney, I know not, but it remains in my memory as by far the most exquisite bit of scenery I have ever seen.

The first person I saw on landing at Kustandjie,—the end of our journey—was a Wallach, who made me feel I was no longer in the land of Greeks, Turks, or Arabs. He looked in this wise—

Kustandjie is an ugly point, and in its harbour are a few wrecks, with stumps of masts appearing above the surface of the water, which do not suggest ideas of either beauty or safety. The pleasantest sight about it is the railway which carries one speedily out of it; and the prevalent sound in it is that sign of civilisation, the steamwhistle, which, when it becomes rapid and eager in its demonstrations, is the modern interpretation of the "all right" of the old coaching times.

The day was beautiful when we landed, so, having a few hours to spare before starting, we walked along the shore and enjoyed a bathe. It did not add to our comfort when a resident engineer expressed his wonder at our boldness, telling us that he would not take twenty sovereigns and follow our example, as he would certainly be laid down in fever next day. He was not "trotting" us. But I presume new arrivals are not so easily affected as old residents. Anyhow, we had no fever, nor did we experience any but the most agreeable sensations. There is a large engineer's workshop connected with the railway, in which Englishmen alone are employed. They have excellent wages, and seem a superior class of men. The only Scotchman among them, a young gentleman laying out a new line, whom I met with accidentally, I discovered to be the son of an old acquaintance in the Highlands. That stupid shore of the Black Sea presented a sad and depressing contrast to his old happy home among the blooming heather and "braes o' Lochaber." I hope he has prospered.

We were soon puffing across the dead flat plain, almost along the same line as that once marked by the wall of Trajan. The wall began at Kustandjie, the site of the old Roman town of Constantina, founded by Trajan. Many remains of Roman buildings have been exposed in railway cuttings, where remains of ancient Roman meats still project into the sea. The other end of the wall touched the Danube about five miles above Cernavoda. Its remains can be traced in a well-marked mound across the whole isthmus.

The country which we passed on our way from the Black Sea to the Danube, and that seen also over the river banks, until the mountains are reached, is flat and tame in the extreme. Let me remind the reader that on the right bank is, first Bulgaria, and then Servia (both Sclavonic); on the left Wallachia, and afterwards Hungary. The principal features of the scenery are dead flat grassy plains, like an ocean vanishing in the horizon. Now you come upon low-roofed, brown villages, with windows in which no glass appears, but perpendicular bars with cloth blinds; again upon small marshy lakes, with wild duck and geese in abundance; then upon fields, without fences, ploughed by odd-looking teams of eight oxen, or six horses and two oxen, or six oxen and two Baetrian camels; then upon flocks and herds; then upon Wallachs or Bulgarians, with sheep-skin coats, fur caps, and large, soft, round faces, like toasted brown cheese, and marked by a broad nose and dots for eyes;these are what one sees passing along the railway, or over the clay banks of the river, while the river itself flows broad and muddy, amid osier-covered islands, and bearing long barges, with large squaresails, stemming its current, or floating with it.

The steamer did not keep us waiting long at Cernavoda. We found her a splendid boat, not unlike those on American rivers-which, let me say in passing, have never been equalled in the old world, either for size, speed, or thorough comfort, to say nothing of splendour. There was a large and handsomely-furnished saloon on deck, carpeted, and provided with an excellent pianoforte; above was a spacious saloon-deck; below was the cabin, with roomy, comfortable berths. If our fellow-traveller, Lord N-, reads these lines, let him know that neither he nor his music are forgotten. Those who wished a separate cabin could have one off the smoking or coffee-room, between the saloon and main-deck; but each cabin costs about 71. for three days' isolated dignity. We found, as we might have expected, a very mixed multitude among the passengers-citizens of every civilised nation in the Among them were Russians, French, Germans, Americans, English, Scotch, and Irish, with sprinklings from the Danubian provinces and the Turkish empire. With that delightful freemasonry and genuine humanity which belongs to travellers, we soon began to group together, and talk, -to become acquainted, and wonderfully familiar. Frank and free was the conversation in the smoking saloon, and indeed all day long; and one could gather much information at such times from intelligent men who had long lived in "those parts," and whose sentiments were openly expressed in the presence of others who had had ample opportunities of learning the truth for themselves. But the unanimity was remarkable. On most points all seemed agreed-such as that the Turks were dying out, and that their vices were excessive; -that the Greeks were, as a whole, great liars, but that with some education, a better clergy, and Church reform, (all' of which were both possible and probable,) they had still the elements of becoming a free aud influential nation :- that the whole trade and commerce of the country were passing rapidly into the hands of the Christian population; -that the Armenians were covetous screws;—that there was in the Danubian provinces a marked, increasing, and decided love for national independence; that this must end in free government, and also in a national Greek Church, which would recognise neither the Czar of Russia nor the Patriarch of Constantinople as its head;that not a Turk was permitted to reside in Wallachia, though it was nominally under the suzerainship of the Sultan; that the morals of the upper classes, in Wallachia at least, for I heard not of the other provinces, were the lowest conceivable; and that Prince Couza was utterly unprincipled.

These were among the chief facts or opinions which seemed to prevail in the smoking committee, made up of most intelligent men, who had every opportunity of knowing the real state of the country.

The continued supremacy of the Turks is certainly a surprising fact, which even the influence exercised by "the European Powers" cannot quite account for. It is not 600 years since Othman, the chief of a wild nomadic tribe, with 400 teuts only, wandered from Mesopotamia into Asia Minor. In less than two centuries they had become a great people, and taken Constantinople; and have since then founded a great empire, and made Europe tremble. But though wise, just, united, and brave at first,-presenting a remarkable contrast to the moral corruption, the dead orthodox church, and the confusion of the Greek empire,-they have reached the period of decay. The glacier is receding and melting, leaving only barrenness behind. It has no permanent source of supply from heaven, to give it force and progress. But yet the wonder is, that the Christian population, so much more numerous than the Turkish, gives so few signs of real power, except that of money-making and talk. What might not be done with a talented clergy (educated in England, or in Athens), promoting schools, and training other clergy for their work, with a wise Government which would develop at the same time the material resources of the country, leaving politics alone! There cannot be a new Greek empire until there be a renewed Christian people fitted to be its governors and citizens.

We had among us a most agreeable American and his wife, whom I remember with happy feelings. He had travelled far and wide among the wildernesses, moral and physical, of America, from San Francisco to New York. It was amusing and interesting to notice how his old experiences of danger and difficulty had become an almost familiar habit of mind; so much so, that he could not see the extreme oddness of some of the questions which he put to me, and the advices he gave me with all gravity; as, for example :- "What would you do, Doctor, supposing that in a small room a man rose up to shoot you?" The difficulty I confessed had never occurred to me. "I'll tell you: throw your hat in his face, bend your head, rush at him, punch or kick him where you best can, but in the stomach if possible, and, once you close with him, it is your own fault if you are shot." Or, again, after a few meditative whiffs, he would suggest another difficulty, with the friendly wish to advise me how to act in such puzzling circumstances. would you do, Doctor, supposing you were crossing a prairie, and a villain on horseback threw his lasso at you, and fixed it, say, over your body? Remember, he won't miss; and if he succeeds in dragging you off your horse and along the ground, you are a dead man." In vain I conjectured what I, or even a moderator of the General Assembly, or one of the bench of bishops, would do on such an occasion, by means of any motion he was likely to construct or propose. "Well, sir, this is your only chance of safety," my kind friend went on to say: "set your horse to his utmost speed, stick your spurs into his flanks, and never let the rope get tight, or you are done for; and, while the rascal is galloping ahead, keep firing with your revolver all the time to kill him. If you manage this, he dies; if not, you die: and the difference to either of you is great." And thus we paddled up the stream with every kind of talk, stories of the Russian war, new versions of old defeats and victories, gossip from Bucharest, Church politics and State politics, until the scenery became fine, and then one became too deeply interested in what he saw to care much for what he heard.

We lay for nine hours at Turnu Severin. This spot is interesting as having been near the place (it is a short way further down the stream) where the famous Bridge of Trajan crossed the Danube. Few grander bridges have ever been built. It crossed the stream, which is here upwards of a mile broad, and in some places nearly twenty feet deep, and subject to descents of masses of ice in winter; yet it was built 1700 years ago, had piers surrounded by blocks of stone, and wooden arches, so that Roman armies could march across it. By it Dacia, the modern Wallachia, was united to Rome, and the influence of Rome was so great and abiding that the Wallachian peasant still calls himself Romanu, and his language Romanesce, -a language as closely allied to Latin as Italian is. The remains of Trajan's bridge are yet visible, both on the land and under the water. There are also remains of old towers, which flanked the bridge. It was destroyed by the Romans themselves, but it marks the period of the utmost advance of the Roman power, and of its decay; and it might have borne the inscription as regards conquering Rome "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further." No other stone bridge crosses the Danube—until far above Vienna, at Ratisbon, where it is comparatively a narrow stream. The bridge at Pesth is of iron.

Orsova, the frontier town of Austria, is about eighteen miles higher up the stream. We arrived early in the evening and remained all night, having to change steamers for Basiasch. This small town is beautifully situated, and one is struck; in walking through its streets and open places, with the order, cleanliness, and general appearance of comfort everywhere visible. There is an apparently excellent hotel in it, superior gasthauses, bierbraueries, wooden houses nicely painted, and many of them with trim flowerpots in the windows. It was quite delightful to have a saunter once more on green grass, among neat, clean, scattered cottages, and under the shadow of low, broken, picturesque hills clothed in wood; with droves of pigs scampering along from their day's feeding and grubbing, driven by the "schwein general;" and, what was more pleasing, the "lowing herd" of cattle returning with their full udders and tinkling bells, whose music recalled the uplands of Switzerland. The Danube, too, was glorious, rolling along in smooth, curling eddies; at first with the golden gleams of evening playing over it, and, as night came on, crossed by the silvern bridge flung over its trembling waters by a full-orbed moon.

As we walked through Orsova remarks were made by some of our party, who were above national or provincial prejudices, in favour of the Austrian peasants as contrasted with those at home, and especially in Scotland. And these it was not easy to reply to with a good conscience in the presence of so many visible signs of comfort and prosperity. But it was some relief to find that this was a military town, in which neatness, cleanliness, order, &c., were all carried out at the point of the bayonet, and not under the influence of mere individual taste or personal conviction. This leads me to notice, by the way, the remarkable military government of Austria along its extensive frontier of six hundred miles, which separates the empire from Turkey and Wallachia, and stretches from the Adriatic beyond the Danube, having a border all the way of forty miles in depth. All the inhabitants of this border-land, without one exception, belong from birth to the army. Every man, woman, and child is claimed as being born in a regiment, and subject therefore from childhood to military organisation and government alone. Within this belt the civil law has no existence. Every male is, in virtue of the place of his birth, enrolled as a soldier as soon as he can bear arms, and he remains a soldier for life. "There is no discharge from that war" into civil life, which belongs only to the empire. Each man is numbered as belonging to the first, second, or third class of the "Reserve" according to his age. And no man or woman can leave the district, without special permission from the commanding officer, any more than a soldier can leave his regiment. The military commandant, and each captain even, I believe, has the power of life or death. The women are subject to the same discipline, and it is lawful to lash them by military authority alone. The head of each household is responsible to his officer for the conduct of its members. All the civil duties required by the custom-house, police, &c., are performed as duties of the army. The results are, that 40,000 men are always ready along the frontier in time of peace; and that this army in time of war can be at once raised to 100,000 disciplined troops. This is a terrible system of slavery, and is felt as such by very many subjected to it. Yet it costs the nation nothing. Land and houses are apportioned to the whole inhabitants. Out of the proceeds of their labour they are obliged to contribute a fixed support to the regiments to which they severally belong.

The "order" and regularity of Orsova were thus easily accounted for, like the well-cut clothes, clean belt, polished boots, and neatly set off cap of the soldier-machine, as contrasted with the less artistic clothing of the free artisan.

We heard a gipsy band in one of the restaurants. There were about eight or ten performers. The only other of the kind I ever heard was at St. Petersburg. Both greatly impressed me with the energy, passion, and taste of the performers. It was quite delightful to watch the expression of their countenances, the thorough carnestness with which they played, and the personal gratification which it seemed to give themselves. They were all respectably dressed; yet each bore in every feature, and especially in the piercing black eye and olive complexion, the half-weird look of the genus "ne'er do weel," which marked them out as peculiar. I shall never forget the spirit, and splendid time, with which they played the Zerngorurka, a Servian air, and the Juliana waltz or galop-I forget which, but I shall feel much indebted to any one who sends me the music of either! I had no time to get it at Vienna.

On our way to the steamer a tall gipsy passed us, with bare feet, and a mantle flung over her shoulders. I have seldom seen such a picture of stately dignity and commanding beauty, combined with strength and determination. Her look as she passed, so full of piercing inquiry and pride, photographed itself on our minds. She might have been a Roman queen.

We left Orsova at five in the morning, and until twelve o'clock passed through the finest river scenery I ever saw. It is probably the finest of the kind in the world. Every one knows the Rhine, and verily it has its glories; but these consist chiefly in its romantic castles, without which it would on the whole be comparatively commonplace. The upper Danube, down which I once floated on a raft from Lintz to Vienna, is in some places—as at the "whirlpool" and about Düsenstien-finer than the Rhine; the Elbe is beautiful as it sweeps round the Bastein, but it is not grand: the Hudson about Crown Point is fine; and "the Lake of the Thousand Islands" in the St. Lawrence is beautiful without any grandeur, and chiefly from the contrast which it presents to the monotonous scenery of the rest of the rivers above Quebec. But for upwards of fifty miles between Orsova and Moldova, the Danube stands alone. Even our American friend admitted this when comparing it with all the rivers he had seen. either in the Old World or the New World. To a stream broad and majestic as those of America, add a succession of rapids-which once seemed to bid defiance to steam itself; then add the splendid scenery of rocky precipices and wooded hills, rising to a height of 2000 feet, with the most varied and picturesque forms changing every moment in their outlines and groupings; add again bold promontories seeming to bar the way, and hemming in the river, that rushes and foams between them, or recedes so as to leave a lake-like expanse surrounded by winding shores, and opening into green sequestered valleys;—add all these, and then you may have some idea of the unsurpassed scenery of this portion of the Danube.

We could distinctly trace on the right bank the line of Trajan's wonderful road. It here passed along the face of a precipice, and was constructed by laying planks on horizontal beams driven into holes cut for them in the rock, and propped from below. What wonderful road-makers those Romans were, when one could from such a wild spot as this have journeyed along a line of good road, unbroken save by the Straits of Dover, until he reached the mountains of Scotland! We could perceive also "Trajan's Tafel," on which a mutilated inscription still remains, which records the making of the road, commemorative, it is supposed, of Trajan's first Dacian campaign in A.D. 103.

We left the steamer at Basiasch. There is nothing worth seeing on the river between it and Pesth, a sail of about 400 miles,—the stream flowing through alluvial and interminable plains. These we traversed by railway, viá Temisvar. We had time to visit the iron bridge at Pesth, which is upwards of 50 feet broad, and crosses the river, 1700 feet wide, to Buda. Truly it is a magnificent work of art, far surpassing anything of the kind to be seen elsewhere, whether as regards extent, strength, general elegance, or massive grandeur of appearance. The old fortress of Buda, which looks more business-like than beautiful, covers the ridge which rises immediately at the other end of the bridge, and gives character to Pesth. This city is built on a dead flat, with that regularity of streets and squares seen in modern German towns; which, however wide and elegant, are far from picturesque. They seem to have been planned by an architectural drill-serjeant. Even Paris is assuming this look more and more every day.

We reached Vienna upon Saturday; received happy letters from home; paid a brief visit to some old familiar haunts in Schönbrunn; left on Monday; stopped at Prague once more to see perhaps the finest architectural view in the world -from the old gateway onwards to and across the bridge; enjoyed the railway along the Elbe: passed most of a day in the dear old Gallery of Dresden; and on Friday evening, on the twelfth day after leaving Constantinople, I rang my door-bell in Glasgow—and, such are the arrangements of modern travel, I did so on the very day, and at the very hour, I promised to do when leaving home in February. The door was opened, and all my family received me; and while meeting them in peace within, I take leave of my kind readers without; for "Homeward" ends where home begins!

A PLEA FOR CRIMINAL BOYS.

At the very probable risk of being charged with morbid or pseudo philanthropy, I propose offering a few observations in favour of a very unfortunate class among us-young thieves. That their livesat least those of a great part of them-have been infamous, their crimes great, and their punishments richly deserved, I admit; but at the same time I hold that their cases, when inquired into, often prove these boys to be worthy of great pity. In the first place, a large proportion have received no education, moral or religious, but, on the contrary, have frequently been instructed in vice by those whom Nature designed to protect them from it. Others again have been forced to steal in the first instance by sheer hunger; while some have been the dupes of cowardly villains, who, not having the courage themselves to steal, profit by the crimes of the ignorant and starving children whom they make their tools. For my own part, I believe that the incorrigible young thief of newspaper reporters does not exist; that all children, unless suffering from a taint of insanity, are capable of reformation, if properly treated. And I propose to prove this proposition by data taken from those two admirable institutions for the correction and instruction of criminal boys-the Middlesex Magistrates' Industrial Schools at Feltham, and the Philanthropic Society's Farm Schools at Redhill.

To begin, let me trace out the sources from which young thieves are taken. On this subject a very erroneous impression prevails. It is assumed that our crowded courts and alleys are filled by families living in a most degraded condition, whose male children are habitually thieves; and sensation paragraph writers' endeavour to keep up the fallacy. That there exists in these localities degradation enough is true, but want of integrity in children, as a rule, is far from being correct. I hold rather that, considering their ignorance and the vice existing around them, the integrity of the London street boy is remarkable, especially when his own half-starved condition and the temptations spread around him are taken into considera-All those lads we see jumping up on the foot-boards of omnibuses offering newspapers for sale, and hazarding the breaking of their necks a hundred times a day, in the hope of carrying home a shilling honestly earned in the evening; all those imps throwing catherine-wheels (we believe that is the proper name), or throwing summersaults on the pavement, to the annoyance of the foot passengers and their own especial danger; are surprisingly honest. Perhaps the most perfect argument that could be offered in proof of the habitual integrity of the London boy, is to compare the numbers at present in confinement for theft in the various metropolitan prisons and reformatories, with the number of children of the working classes given in the Census. It will be found that the proportion of young thieves is very small, when compared with the vast multitude from which they are taken.

The supply of young London thieves is fed from three separate and distinct sources-namely, the drunkenness of parents or guardians: the keeping of bad company; and the parentless and homeless condition into which so many boys are thrown. Of these three causes, the first is by far the most prolific. In a paper read lately before the Social Science Congress in Edinburgh, it was stated that sixty per cent, of the young London thieves undergoing imprisonment are the children of drunkards. As this proportion seemed enormous, I submitted it to the chaplains of the Redhill Reformatory and the Middlesex Industrial Schools at Feltham, for their opinion. Mr. Walters, of the Redhill Reformatory, said it was by no means overstated; and Mr. Pilkington, of Feltham, stated that he had himself made many inquiries into the subject, and he was convinced that in the schools under his supervision seven out of nine of the whole of the boys were, directly or indirectly, indebted to the drunkenness of their parents for the punishment they were undergoing.

A father's drunkenness and a mother's, affect a child very differently, although the ultimate effect -imprisonment of the child-is the same. drunken father generally ill-uses his son, frequently beats him brutally. Paternal affection dies within him, and he is totally indifferent to the actions of his child. If he bears he is arrested for a theft it gives him no uneasiness, perhaps induces a feeling of satisfaction, as during the boy's imprisonment he will be relieved from the slight expense he is at in supporting him. He generally attends at the police court and gives his son a bad character, as being an incorrigible boy, utterly insensible to all the good advice and kind treatment given him. The boy makes no answer to this: in nine cases out of ten he could tell a very different tale, but he seldom or never retaliates on his parents. He is committed to prison, and the father, under the pleasing impression that he has done his duty, is often seen entering the first gin-shop for consolation. Drink appears simply to brutalise men. In hardly any case do we hear of a drunken father encouraging his boy to steal, or find him receiving any portion of the profits of his son's crime. He is indifferent to the result of the boy's course of life, but his evil influence is purely of a negative character. In the case of the drunken mother, however, it is very different. In woman, intoxication scems to absolutely reverse the natural maternal instincts, and even induces her to take an active part in the demoralisation of her child. She generally leads him on, not by threats or compulsion, but by the external appearance of great kindness, till she acquires perfect control over the mind of the child. Unlike the man in his coarse brutality, she takes from the boy the whole of his plunder, repaying him with lavish caresses, sweatmeats, and other childish indulgences. No other plan would succeed. It would be impossible to frighten a boy into the commission of an act of dishonesty : severity would destroy the cool nerve required for its perpetration. And the wretch knows this full well, and with a woman's tact adopts the other course. It may be thought that this horrible statement cannot be true, but a visit to either of the schools named would prove that, dreadful as it may appear, the fact is of very common occurrence. When such a woman's son is arrested, she generally attends at the police court, gives the boy the best of characters, as being a hard-working, industrious lad, and asserts that if he is sent to prison it will break her heart. Tears she has in abundance, and she deceives all but the magistrate, the policemen, and the reporters. They, having seen it so often, look upon the whole scene without the slightest surprise or remark. After the committal of the boy, she leaves the Court, and lives as she best can till the time of his punishment has expired, when she attends to receive him as he leaves prison. Every blandishment and caress is then heaped on him; he is taken home and petted, and in a short time is again found practising his former mode of life.

A singular feature in the pyschology of the young thief is the love he bears his mother, and, indeed, his affection for his family generally. And this endures long after a radical reformation in his character has taken place. Nor is this much to be wondered at. For the young thief is generally disliked and avoided by poor boys of his own age, while on his side he fears their acquaintanceship, as bringing with it the danger of detection. He knows perfectly well that he is pointed out by the respectable poor women in the neighbourhood as a character to be avoided. He feels he is detested by society, but there is still in him the childish necessity of reposing confidence in some one. His mother, even when an honest woman, and gricving in secret over the degeneracy of her child, is usually his champion. And even when drunken and dishonest, she pets and humours him to the utmost of her power, and thus obtains over his mind such an influence as is seldom wholly subdued. Some of the examples of this feeling we met with were exceedingly beautiful, notwithstanding their eccentricity. A poor child about twelve years of age died lately in the Redhill School. He knew perfeetly well his end was approaching, and he was prepared to meet it in a proper state of mind. But in spite of his reformation, his love for his mother, a worthless drunken creature, continued to the last. Almost with his dying breath he mentioned her with intense affection, although he had been committed nine times for crimes perpetrated at her instigation.

Another case may also be mentioned of a lad, about seventeen years of age, whose three years' probation had expired, and who was about to leave the school. His mother, who resided in the south of England, wrote to him to come home as soon as he left Redhill. But the boy was in doubt upon the subject. His mother was a drunken disreputable woman, who had herself been imprisoned twice for felony'; while the school chaplain, Mr. Walters, had procured for him a free emigration order for the Cape of Good Hope. The mother, when she heard there was a probability of losing her son. wrote two letters. One was to the school authorities, threatening prosecution if the lad left England without her permission as his natural guardian. The other was to her son, couched in terms of the greatest affection, telling him it would break her heart if he left England, as she was sure she should never see him again. The poor boy was for some days fairly puzzled how to act, and he wandered about the farm moody and abstracted. At last he came to the chaplain, and informed him that he had made up his mind to go to Africa.

"I think you are right," said the chaplain; "but what induces you to leave England?".

"Why, sir," was the reply, "I know well enough, if I go home to mother, there is nothing but Taunton gaol before me; and now I am honest, I may as well remain so."

On speaking of his previous life to a boy, and finding that his mother was a drunken virago, and his father a costermonger of honest character, we asked why his father did not correct him when he committed dishouest actions.

"Well, sir," he said, "the truth is, father's afraid of mother. However, father did use to lick me sometimes when mother was too drunk to interfere."

It would seem as if such a home could possess but few attractions, and yet the boy was evidently very fond of his mother.

The second cause of dishonesty in boys is the effect of bad example, and the teaching of adult professional thieves. Of late years there has been, fortunately, a considerable diminution in the number of boys sent to the reformatories from this cause. This has been noticed during the last few years at Feltham, and I was informed that at Redhill the number of expert pickpockets is less by one half than it was ten years ago. For this happy change we are principally indebted to the vigilance of the metropolitan police in following up and prosecuting the wretches who used to teach these children the art of scientific pocket-picking. There are now among these lads very few expert thieves. Those who are sent for reformation are generally clumsy and inexperienced, and are far more easily detected than formerly. They are, however, quite capable of learning habits of industry and integrity, and many of them, especially if sent abroad, turn out remarkably well.

The lot of the third and last class is much to be pitied. Generally orphans, or deserted by their parents when quite young, they appear to have led, in this centre of civilisation, a life as savage as that of a young South Sea Islander. Many of these boys, before their conviction, seem to have undergone the most terrible privations. One stated that he had lived in the streets for two years; occasionally, when he had a few halfpence, he obtained shelter for a night in some common lodging-house. Another had not slept "in what you'd properly call a bed" for eight months. A lady of our party asked an innocent-looking child who, in a respectable family, would hardly have been out of the nursery, where he lived when he was at home. "About the streets, ma'am, generally," was the reply. Cases have been known where boys had not for two years slept on a bed or known a friend, but had supported life by eating the raw vegetables and cast-off meat in Newgate and other markets. Strange as it may appear, this mode of life, at last becomes so attractive to the boy, that his instructors have great difficulty in breaking him away from it.

It may be remarked also that these boys are, in a religious point of view, utterly ignorant. One knew a church only as a place "swells" go to on a Sunday; and another only knew the name of Christ as a word used in swearing.

A short description of the raw material which the governors and teachers of these schools have placed in their hands has been given; we will now follow them through their work of reformation. At first sight the task would appear unpromising enough, but the result of the wonderful skill and ability shown, proves that the worst boys can be made honourable and useful members of society. When the boys arrive, they appear utterly bewildered for the first few days. Instead of the severity they had anticipated, they find themselves spoken to and treated with great kindness. They soon begin to imagine that under such treatment they can set orders at defiance, but they very soon find that the kindness is so mixed with perfectly strict discipline, that such a thing as disobedience to orders without punishment is unknown in the school. This is about the most difficult stage in their reformation. They continue rebellious for some time, but each successive punishment proves to them the futility of such a course, and at last they quietly conform to the established regulations. The different phases of their gradual submission are exceedingly curious. Unfortunately, want of space prevents me from going into details, and I content myselves with quoting one example I met with on the occasion of a recent visit to Feltham. Accompanied by the chaplain, I was inspecting the tailor's shop, where a number of boys were at work. The trade-master mentioned that in consequence of the incorrigible behaviour of one of the newly-arrived boys he had been obliged to report him to the inspector, who had sentenced him to confinement in a solitary cell for some hours. He had several times thrown his work aside, and at last broke out into open rebellion. I inquired whether I might be allowed to see the boy, and the chaplain immediately conducted me to the solitary cell. He opened the door and requested the prisoner to come out. The lad immediately obeyed. He was a dark-eyed, sturdy-looking fellow, about eleven years of age, and a more truculent little villain could hardly be imagined. He glared at us with a look of unmistake-able and open defiance.

"What a pity it is," said the chaplain to him, with great kindness of tone, "that you will be such a bad boy. You must know perfectly well there is no disobedience allowed here, and yet I understand you are continually getting yourself punished for it. Now, why do you not try and be a good boy?"

The kind tone of the reverend gentleman acted in a most extraordinary manner on the lad. His savage look vanished, and he burst into tears.

"I am very sorry, sir," he said, "but I cannot help it, do what I will."

"Do not talk in that silly manner. You can be as good as the other boys if you please."

"No, indeed I can't, sir; it's no fault of mine. It's the corruption of my blood."

The worthy chaplain seemed for the moment puzzled, as hardly aware whether his pupil spoke in a theological or a physiological sense. "Pray," said he at last, "what has the corruption of your blood to do with your refusal to work?"

"It breaks out all over me, sir, legs and all," said the boy, pulling up his trousers, and showing a slight cuticular eruption on the leg, as a proof that his disobedience did not arise from any fault of his own.

The chaplain for the moment refrained from explaining the difference between the moral and physical nature of man, and contented himself with remonstrating in a most kind manner with the boy. He received at last a positive promise that for the future he would be industrious and obedient.

A singular feature in these boys, even when they first arrive, is their dislike to the words "thief" or "stealing." They never use either. I questioned several boys on the crime for which they had been convicted, but even then they avoided the words. "What were you sent here for, my lad?" I inquired of one. "Four and sixpence, sir," was the answer. Another said "for a pair of boots," and a third "for a book." Even in their most savage state they appear to have some notion, of right and wrong.

It is some time after they have joined the school before a step towards reformation is distinguishable. It develops itself generally in a willingness to play at boyish sports. Your genuine London thief has no disposition for play. He seems to look upon it as profitless bodily exercise. As soon as he takes to cricket, football, or bounders, his instructors accept it as a good sign and act upon it. Another great humaniser is singing, and of this they are very fond, and study it assiduously. The service of the chapel is performed by them in a manner perfectly astonishing, considering the kind of life they have hitherto led.

There is considerable difference between the system of reformation practised at Feltham and that at Redhill, although it would be difficult to say which is the best. At Redhill the boys live in different houses, about twenty being in each house, under the superintendence of a schoolmaster or trade instructor. At Feltham they reside in one large building. The family system is in favour at Redhill; while military organisation predominates at Feltham. In the latter school the boys are admirably drilled. Very few militia regiments could equal them, and even some of the line regiments are not superior, in military evolutions. Everything is regulated with soldierlike exactness. Although drill is taught at Redhill, it is by no means the important feature in the system which it is at Feltham. At Redhill a large proportion of the boys are from the provinces, and although the most incorrigible are generally sent for reformation, they are usually not only of a better bodily constitution, but their minds have not acquired the wild lawlessness and intractability of the London thieves who are sent to Feltham. On these last, the exactitude of military discipline which is practised by Captain Brooks, the governor of the schools, seems to act with admirable effect. Under it they appear to contract habits of regularity and obedience far more rapidly than under any other method. Nor is the psychological effect of excessive military regularity observable only in children. Some years since we found it practised in a hospital at Venice, with excellent results. One large ward was set apart for patients suffering under a disease called "Pellagre," which results from leading a vagabond life, combined with great privation. It generally showed itself in a cutaneous eruption on the body, together with aberration of the mind. The physicians judged that as the disease was engendered by these causes, good living combined with great regularity of life would be the best method of cure, to a generous diet they added a military system of drill in all the commonest actions of life. At a given signal the patients simultaneously arose from their bcds, at another they all sat down at the same moment to breakfast or dinner, and rose at another. Every movement was executed simultaneously with the greatest precision, and the good effect on the mind rapidly showed itself by the restoration of the patients to reason. Similar results are seen at the Feltham schools, and the greatest credit is due to Captain Brooks for the kind yet strict manner in which he carries out the system.

To the honour of the Middlesex magistrates they have obtained a special Act of Parliament, by which young London thieves can be sent to their Reformatory without being first committed to prison. It would be impossible to exaggerate the admirable effect this system has upon dishonest children. The boy who has been once in prison is a very different character, and is far more difficult to reform than the one sent direct to the Reformatory. It has also another excellent effect, it prevents the drunken father from assisting in the conviction of his son. In prison, the boy is no expense to his parent; but in the reformatory the parent is obliged to contribute something to his child's support, and he gains nothing by the punishment of the latter. I am fully convinced that if this system were practised all over England, it would facilitate immensely the reformation of juvenile offenders.

A very unjust prejudice appears to exist in the public mind against these unhappy children, the more so as nothing is easier than to prove from the records of these schools, that dishonest children are reclaimable. An artist of great celebrity has an estate adjoining the Philanthropic Society's schools at Redhill. When it was proposed to remove the schools from St. George's Fields, Southwark, to their present site, this gentleman, with others in the vicinity, strongly opposed the project. argued, naturally enough, that the establishment of a reformatory without even a wall round it, would put the neighbourhood at the mercy of a gang of some 300 juvenile thieves, with some of the most notorious young villains in England among them. The schools however were removed to Redhill, and this gentleman is now one of the warmest friends of the institution. Although there is neither hedge nor ditch to separate his grounds from the school farm, yet he has lost nothing. He even employs these lads to work in his pleasure-grounds and about his house, when he can get them, in preference to any others. I saw more than one of the boys in the town making purchases or on errands, and inquired of the chaplain if they ever were insulted or annoyed by people who met them, or whether the surrounding gentry and the shopkeepers of the town made any objection to them. He said, "No; on the contrary, I am constantly annoyed by their being petted, a thing I strongly object to; and for that reason I do not encourage their being employed by private families in the neighbourhood." In one gentleman's grounds four boys (all of whom had been convicted at least six times) might have been seen working, without the slightest supervision on the part of the family.

At Feltham the residents in the vicinity show the same readiness to employ these boys. During the last harvest the farmers around the school engaged them in preference to other boys in the neighbourhood, paying them the same wages. On inquiring the reason, I was informed they were better liked owing to their superior docility and industry.

Last year I had the pleasure of being present at the "harvest home" of the Redhill farm, cultivated entirely by the reformatory boys, under the supervision of skilful agriculturists After the inspection, prizes were distributed according to the different degrees of merit, and all seemed delighted with the rewards they received. In the latter part of the day especially, the scene was a most singular one. The boys were then allowed to play at any game they chose, and they entered into their amusements with right good will. Mixed with them was a large concourse of ladies and gentlemen from the neighbourhood and from London, who had been invited to witness the distribution of the prizes. They all mingled readily with the boys, watching them at their games, and conversing with those who were not playing. Although the visitors, both male and female, were exactly of the class who would have been the prey of these boys before their reformation commenced, not a single thing was lost by any one, nor was the slightest act of dishonesty attempted. It was difficult to realise the fact, that these ladies and gentlemen were mixing, without the slightest fear or suspicion, with three hundred of the most desperate young thieves that England could produce.

A certain honourable member of Parliament during a recent session remarked, when the Mount Saint Bernard Refermatory was under discussion, that such establishments were always objectionable to the honest inhabitants surrounding them. I therefore took occasion to inquire what was their effect in the vicinity of the Feltham and Redhill schools; and was told that, with one solitary exception, no cases of theft had occurred since either of them had been established. Yet there were in them no fewer than eight hundred notrious young thieves—many, perhaps the majority, of whom had been convicted half-a-dozen times—enjoying a certain amount of liberty, and without a wall or barrier of any description to confine them.

The system of education at the Feltham and Redhill schools, although somewhat different, is in both cases admirable. It is religious and practical. without the slightest admixture of cant. Although the religious services are conducted with great solemnity and regularity, the boys are taught from the very first that excellent precept that labour is an integral portion of religion, and that work is as necessary as prayer. A boy indeed finds it fully as difficult to evade his turn in the workshop or on the farm, as to absent himself from chapel. On the occasion of a recent visit to Feltham, when I was in conversation with the Rev. Mr. Pilkingtou, the chaplain, he noticed a boy in one of the yards idle, while the others were at work. He immediately called him, and inquired why he was not in the workshops. "I have just been chosen, sir, a choir boy in the chapel, and I did not think I was called upon to work." The reverend gentleman soon assured him of his mistake, and sent him immediately to his task, informing him that, though he had much pleasure in seeing him in chapel, he was equally pleased to see him employed in learning some honest means of earning a livelihood.

At Redhill the system of instruction in labour is especially admirable. Here the boys—the majority of whom, being taken from the country, are more robust than the London-bred children at Feltham—go through a course of instruction especially adapting them for emigrants. They are taught farming, carpentering, brick-making, tailoring, and shoe-making. Each boy is taught to mend his own clothes; and all the shoes and clothes required, are made on the premises. In a very short time industry appears to become a pleasure to the boys, and they work with a will rarely met with at their age.

We now come to the most difficult part of our subject-what to do with the boys after the term of their sejourn in the schools has expired. They generally leave just at the age most requiring care and supervision in order to prevent a relapse. In spite of all the kindness and attention of those interested in their welfare, many of those who remain in England relapse into crime. Fully twenty-five per cent. of those whose friends reside in London are soon again found in the annals of the police courts. The majority of our young London thieves reside in three localities, Bethnal Green, St. George's, Southwark (at least that portion of it around Kent Street), and the purlieus of Drury Lane. Here they are soon found out by their old associates, and receive from them a cordial welcome while they are scorned by the industrious and honest. They are now on the verge of manhood, and imitate men in their amusements; and as the public-house unfortunately ranks amongst the most favourite of these, they generally date their relapse from it. With those who emigrate the case is far different; with very rare exceptions, they do well. Of fifty boys, principally from Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, who emigrated to Canada and Australia, not one turned out badly. They are, on the contrary, much liked by the settlers for their steady habits and superior industry. The agent of the Redhill Schools in Upper Canada writes home, "All the boys you sent me have turned out well, and are in high favour. Send me fifty more, and I will engage to find situations for them in a week." The reports from the Cape of Good Hope, Port Natal, and Australia are equally favourable. It is both amusing and instructive to read the letters sent by those boys to the secretary and the chaplain of the Redhill Schools. Without the slightest obligation to write, except from gratitude, their correspondence is most voluminous, and their letters are filled with thanks, evidently genuine, for the kindness they received during the period of their reformation. One letter contained a very beautiful sentiment. It was from a boy who was deemed irreclaimable. He belonged to a town in the midland counties, and had been six times convicted of robbery from the person, some of the cases presenting features of peculiar atrocity. When first sent to Redhill, he appeared as savage a young rascal as could possibly be found. A marked alteration was soon apparent in his behaviour. He became docile and industrious. He was taught the trade of a carpenter, and soon acquired a very considerable amount of skill at his trade. Last April, the Rev. Mr. Walters, for the first time, received a letter from him. He stated that he liked the country extremely. The situation which had been provided for him he had kept since his arrival, and his master and mistress were both very kind to him, and paid him liberal wages, so much so that he had been enabled to put fifty pounds in the bank. The letter also contained a ten pound note. Half the amount he requested might be sent to his sister, who was in bad circumstances; and the remainder he wished to be spent in decorating the school chapel in which he had learned to be an honest man.

Mr. Baynes Rankin, the Honorary Secretary of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, told me an anecdote of a boy who had been convicted of felony, and was sent by them to Canada. He succeeded remarkably well, and at the height of the cotton famine sent a most liberal donation to the distressed operatives of his native town. Blackburn.

One of the best methods of preventing a relapse in these boys is, by a recent order of the Admiralty, shut out from them—their employment in the Royal Navy. This appears to me exceedingly cruel. I quite approve of the desire to preserve intact the purity of the British tar, but surely, when a child is reformed, it is hard to throw his original fault in the way of his earning an honest livelihood in an honourable service.

There does not appear to be the slightest reason for the prohibition of reformatory boys entering the Royal Navy. In the reports of the Feltham Schools before the order was issued, the opinions of the captains of the ships in which these boys were employed are quoted, and their characters seem to have been singularly good. In them we constantly meet with the phrase, "a very good boy;" "no complaint whatever;" "the leading boy in the ship;" and others equally complimentary.

I have now endeavoured, shortly, to show that these poor children are worthy of pity, and that they are perfectly capable of being reclaimed if proper means are taken. The principal thing necessary, after they leave the Reformatory, is to find employment for them as distant as possible from their old haunts and associates. There is no doubt the best method to secure their continuing honest is emigration; and any of our readers who possess interest in the colonies, and who, directly or indirectly, can assist these poor children to find employment in them, will do a most charitable and Christian action.

A SABBATH VISIT TO A JEWS' SYNAGOGUE.

THERE are few things going on in the very midst of us, which, in this "newsy" age, can long preserve the air of mystery peculiar to scenes that are dimly imagined rather than completely understood. Yet there are at least two such things from which, for the majority of Englishmen, the veil remains undrawn. One is the mystic secret and ceremonies which distinguish the ancient and worshipful Order of Freemasons; and the other, the solemnities enacted in a modern synagogue of Jews. Upon the mention of either, curiosity is always on the stretch to glean the tiniest scrap of information, and to the uninitiated about as much is known of each as there is of the rites at a Parsee funeral.

Finding myself at leisure on a recent Saturday, in one of these great cities sufficiently important, and sufficiently remote from London to have the character of a local metropolis, and learning that a congregation of Jews assembled there, I resolved that in my own case the romantic vagueness of imagination should be exchanged for the certitude of experience. Accordingly to the synagogue I went; I must confess, with some misgiving. How should I be received? Was it usual for them to see strangers amongst them? Would they resent the visit of a solitary Christian as an impertinent curiosity? Occupied with such doubts as these, and with much hesitation, I ventured to thrust open the swing-door, and, in the meekest possible manner, slipped mysclf just inside. Here I should have been glad to collect my thoughts, and to make my observations unperceived. But in a moment I had upon me the eyes of several bearded gentlemen, of reverend mien, who were chanting Hebrew from a central rostrum in fine sonorous voices. The glances, however, were far from being those of indignation and hostility. With the utmost politoness I was beckoned to take one of the best seats, in a position from which I could command a view of everything that went on.

Naturally the first thing was to make myself a little acquainted with the noveltics of the building, and its quaint decorations of Hebrew letters and texts. I soon discovered that the ground-floor of the synagogue was reserved for male worshippers; while a gallery running round three sides of the building was appropriated exclusively to the other sex. The seats upon the ground-floor were arranged in an upper and a lower row, against the two opposite walls, somewhat after the fashion of the double row of stalls so commonly to be seen in the choirs of our own cathedrals: so that the men sat facing each other on opposite sides of the house, each man's seat being made perfectly separate from those of his immediate neighbour by arms, which did the same duty as those of a first-class railway carriage. Hanging flat against the wall, at the back of each man's head in the upper row of stalls, was a small board of about eight inches square, which could be pulled out as a desk for the book of the occupant, at those parts of the service where he required to stand and turn his face to the wall for his devotions. In the centre of the open floor, thus left between the rows of stalls, was a raised desk or pulpit, furnished with a railed platform so large, that at one period of the service as many as five or six men were upon it at once. This was of course occupied by the Rabbi or minister of the synagogue, and others who were called up to take part in the reading of the Law. Against the end wall, in place of the altar-piece or east window of an English church, there hung what had once been a handsome, but is now a rather seedy-looking curtain of green silk. This apparently marked a spot of some peculiar sanctity: for in front of it was, a small semicircular space, slightly raised and railed off from the rest of the area. The curtain was afterwards drawn aside, and disclosed the double doors of a huge chest, about eight feet high, let into the wall, whose appearance reminded me very forcibly of the fixed iron chests in a lawyer's office. This chest, I was informed, is called The Ark. When the doors were subsequently opened, I saw that it was fitted inside with a brass-bar framework for receiving the parchment rolls upon which the Holy Scriptures are written. Above the Ark was a tablet, inscribed with two initial words of each of the ten Commandments in gilt Hebrew letters. And on the architrave there was painted, in imperfectly-formed Hebrew characters, a text, which was obviously meant for (but certainly was not) a portion of Psalm v. 7:- "In Thy fear will I worship toward Thy holy temple." This curtain, tablet, and text were the only attempts at decoration in this singular building, which had its only light from above through a vaulted skylight, somewhat resembling the hatchway of a ship. One other thing only in the appointments of the place, indicative of a very strange custom, arrested my attention. This was a flat circular cake, about nine inches in diameter, having very much the appearance of a northcountry oat-cake, and resting in the corner upon the moulding against the front of the gallery. It was, as I afterwards learned, the Passover-cake; and at the Feast of the Passover it is solemnly deposited in this extraordinary position, where it remains until the Feast in the following year, when it is taken down and burned with fire, and a fresb cake is substituted in its place.

Scarcely less striking to Christian eyes, was the appearance of the men themselves. Of course it was de rigueur that the black chimney-pot hat of decent society should be retained upon the head throughout the service. But besides this, every man—congregation as well as officiating minister—had a vestment. After the lawn and silk of Christian ritual, it did not strike me as a very elegant one either. I must speak with diffidence if I try to name the material,—for I had no opportunity of feeling it, or scrutinising it very closely. However, as far as I could discern, it was a sort of brown holland. The vestment was about six feet in length, and a vard and a-half in breadth. It was crossed at each end by seven stripes of blue, of varying widths, and grouped in a manner which no doubt has some mystical significance (for Jews have a symbolism in everything), but which I was unable to interpret. Thus: - farthest from the edge of the garment was a group of five stripes, the central one of these being considerably wider than the two outer ones on each side of it, which were about an inch in breadth: while close to the edge were two other very much narrower bands separated from each other by the merest suggestion of the brown holland. Beyond the stripes, the ends of this very inelegant vestment were garnished with a shallow scanty fringe of the same materialso scanty, indeed, as to be scarcely anything more than a few knots of thread.

This strange garment was thrown over the shoulders and passed in front over the arms, much as a lady wears her light gauze scarf in summer; though, it must be owned, with very little of her elegance and grace. I saw but one exception to the use of this not very "goodly raiment." In the case of one man, who, I think, was a subordinate official of the synagogue, the mystic stripes I have described were replaced by a mclancholy-looking border of black, about four inches broad, on the edge of the inevitable brown holland. Inevitable—for with this slight variation the seven-striped apparel was worn by every male in the place, from the meanest up to the Rabbi, who, by the way, had superadded to it the extremely modern adornment of a pair of bands.

At the moment when I entered the synagogue they were engaged in reading, or rather chanting, the portion of the Pentateuch appointed for the day. This reading of the lessons is not from a book, bound and paged in modern fashion, but from the more ancient parchment-roll, prepared and written out for public use in the synagogue with the greatest care and reverence. In the Ark of this particular synagogue I saw several such rolls. They are made of the skins of beasts which are clean according to the Law of Moses. The skins, which are of great length, are prepared with an almost superstitious punctiliousness, after a prescribed manner, by a Jew who must be neither an apostate nor a heretic, and who prepares them with an intention for the Law to be written upon them.

Even the mode of ruling these, and of writing upon them, is determined by certain inviolable rules. Not only must the length of the skins bear a certain proportion to their breadth, but the length of the lines is limited to a certain unmber of letters, and the distance between them is fixed. The ink even must be made of certain ingredients. The characters are large and handsome, but one must not, by any inadvertence, be made longer than another; they must not be joined together; and the slightest mistake vitiates the whole manuscript. When written upon, the skins are fastened to two rollers longer than the breadth of the skins, and by the projecting ends of these the roll of the book is held. As I saw one of these handsome rolls spread out upon the desk of the pulpit, I could not help feeling it to be no small satisfaction to us Christians, for whom as well as for Jews these Scriptures were written, that such scrupulous care had been taken to hand them down in their integrity without addition or diminution. This care, moreover, is not a thing of recent date, rendered necessary by lapse of time. From the days of Ezra downwards the number of verses, the number of letters even, the middle letter of each of the sacred books, and other such minute particulars have been successively noted down in the Rabbinic writings, so as most effectually to hedge in the Scriptures against all chance of foreign accretions. In these days, also, when there is so much public discussion about the authorised selection of Scriptures for use in the Church, there is certainly some interest, possibly some instruction also, in the mode of selection adopted in the synagogue. The Hebrew Pentateuch, then, is divided into fifty-four sections; so that there is one section for each of the fifty-four sabbaths in the longer (or intercalary) Jewish year. When the year has a less number of Sabbaths. two of the shorter sections are lumped together, so that in any case the law is read completely through in the year. Corresponding to each of these sections of the Pentateuch is another selected passage of Scripture (mostly from the Prophets), whose connection with, and bearing upon, the former is more or less obvious. Thus, for example, the section which begins with the first chapter of Genesis, and treats of the creation of the world, has associated with it Isaiah xlii. 5-21. Such a passage from the Prophets is known as the Haphtarah.

At the conclusion of the section from the Pentateuch the corresponding Haphtarah is always recited as a sort of commentary upon it; so that no portion of the Law is ever publicly presented to the people without some attempt at an authorised biblical exposition of it. It must not be supposed that it devolves upon the officiating minister to recite the whole of these long passages from the Scriptures. On the contrary, there is a usage, which may have been the origin of, and the warrant for, a practice not uncommon in the English Church—that of appointing a layman to read the lessons. The presiding Rabbi in the synagogue calls up to the rostrum those whom he may desire to take part in the recitation. The custom is alluded to (Luke iv. 16) in the history of our Lord, who "went into the synagogue on the sabbath-day, and stood up for to read," as having been called upon probably by the ruler of the synagoguc. To further this arrangement the several sections of the Pentateuch are subdivided into smaller portions (marked in most Hebrew Bibles), which mark the assigned limits for successive readers. Having taken his staud upon the rostrum, the man who has been called up first recites from the service-book a form of benediction, and then proceeds to deliver his portion of the day's lesson. Not, however, with the colloquial intonation of modern reading. Such a thing is not known in the synagogue: but with a loud voice in a very solemn, yet much varied, chant. Most modern English listeners would, in fact, say that the Scriptures in the synagogue are not read, but sung. The process is certainly rather a lengthy one. For each word of the Law is articulated with great distinctness, each syllable having a separate note, and the last syllable of each word being long dwelt upon, and having generally a whole string of notes upon it, such as those versed in the mediæval music of the Christian Church would call a neuma.

All this time the congregation remained in perfect silence, until, just at the end of the lesson, the whole assembly broke in with a roar-whether it was, as I suspected, the last three or four words of the lesson, or something else, the intense noise prevented me from making out, but with such a roar that the howl of ten thousand dervishes could not possibly have been worse. The reading of the Scriptures being fairly at an end, the roll was folded up, and a sort of cap, made of green silk, was drawn over it. Those who had been reading then came down from the rostrum, and in solemn procession accompanied the roll back to the ark. It was held up by the ends of the projecting rollers in the hands of the Rabbi; and, as it passed them, devout Jews reached forward from their seats to kiss the silken cap, or, if that were not possible, to touch it with their hands, which were then kissed instead. Having reached the rails the procession fell into a single line in front of the Ark; another form of benediction was then chanted, and the roll was carefully deposited in the brass frame-work inside the Ark. The Ark was then closed, the green curtain drawn, and the procession returned, the lay-readers to their several seats, and the Rabbi to his rostrum, to proceed with the prayers and hymns which form the remainder of the service.

These prayers of the Jews are very voluminous. and some of them very ancient. The most sacred in the cyes of an Israelite are a series of eighteen, which have been in use in the synagogue not only on the Sabbath, but day by day, since the time of Ezra. This long chain of devotions consists of three elements :- First, Praises of the holiness, the beneficence, and the mercy of God; secondly, Petitions for the necessaries of life, for pardon, for the restoration of Israel, and for the re-building of Jerusalem; and thirdly, Thanksgiving for the loving-kindnesses of God. These prayers, and indeed all Jewish prayers, are for the most part deeply impressive. But when heard by Christian ears there is naturally about them an air of singularity. They are things quite sui generis. I remember to have been more than once struck with this when special prayers for national wants have been simultaneously issued by the Primate of All England, and (with responsive loyalty) by the authorities of the Israelitish synagogue. A translation of the last of the celebrated "eighteen" will supply an admirable example, not only of the character of this most sacred series, but of the tone of Jewish prayers generally. Here it is ...

"Send peace, beneficence, and blessing, grace, and mercy, and loving-kindness upon us and upon all Israel, Thy people. Bless us, O our Father, even all of us together, as one man, with the light of Thy Countenance: for in the light of Thy Countenance hast Thou given unto us, O Jehovah our God, the law of life and love, of mercy and righteousness, and blessing and loving-kindness, and life and peace. And let it seem good in Thine eyes to bless Thy people Israel at all times and in every moment with Thy peace. In the book of life is blessing, and peace, and security; may we be remembered and written in Thy presence, we and all Thy people, the house of Israel, for blessings of life and for peace.

"Blessed art Thou, O Jehovah, who makest peace."

Perhaps the chief interest the Hebrew service-books possess for us lics in the fact, that in the usages of the synagogue we find the remote origin of practices and forms of worship now so familiar in the Christian Church. First and foremost amongst illustrations of this there occurs, of course, the well-known circumstance, that even the expressions of the Lord's Prayer itself are traceable to the phraseology of ancient Jewish devotion. The very earliest pages of our Book of Common Prayer present other examples of our obligations to Jewish liturgies.

I left the Rabbi in his rostrum, about to begin the prayers. Before doing so he has to say a form of words called "Kaddesh"—a form which, I believe, is said, in whole or in part, by all those who have any sacred office to discharge, both before entering upon and after the conclusion of their function. Hence this "Kaddesh" plays rather a conspicuous part in the synagogue-worship. Men seemed to be perpetually saying "Kaddesh." It is strongly marked by that common feature of Hebrew prayers—the heaping up of synonyms and particulars to such an extent as to make it difficult to find separate English words for each of them. Here is a translation of it:—

"And now may the strength of God be great, as Thou hast spoken, saying, 'Remember Thy tender mercies, O Jehovah, and Thy loving-kindnesses, for they have been from everlasting.'

"May His great name be exalted and sanctified in the world, which He created according to His will; and may He establish His kingdom in your lifetime, and in your days, and in the lifetime of all the house of Israel, speedily and in the appointed time near at hand, and say ye—Cong. "Amen. May His great Name be blessed for ever, and for generations of generations.

"May His hallowed Name (blessed is He) be blessed, and praised, and glorified, and extolled, and honoured, and adored, and hymned, for ever and for ever, above every blessing and song of praise and consolation that is uttered in the world, and say ye, Amen.

Cong. "In mercy and favour receive our prayer. "May their prayer be accepted, and the supplication of all Israel before their Father which is in heaven, and say ye, Amen.

Cong. "May the Name of Jehovah be blessed from this time forth for evermore.

"May there be great peace from heaven, and life upon us, and upon all Israel, and say ye, Amen.

Cong. "My strength is from Jehovah who made heaven and earth.

"May He, that maketh peace in His high places, make peace upon us and upon all Israel, and say ye, Amen."

Only the first half of this form, which is written not in pure Hebrew, but in a sort of Chaldee, was said at the commencement of the prayers. And so rigorous is the 'ceremonial of the synagogue, that when this is said the reader in the desk plants his feet together, and he must not even move them till the whole is over—a considerable trial of physical endurance one would think, seeing that the prayers on some of the days extend over a period of not less than four or five hours. The prayers were pronounced so rapidly that it was difficult for a stranger to follow. And though one gentleman was most polite in lending me his book, and pointing me, when any change took place, to another part of it, vet the rapidity of the articulation caused me no small discomfort. Fortunately for me, the Israelites do not forget their leyalty to the country of their residence, as the expression of it gave me my bearings again; for once, when I was at a loss, I was suddenly surprised in the midst of a perfect torrent of Hebrew, by the familiar English words, uttered with a decidedly German accent, "Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, the Princess of Wales," &c., and this was a perfectly intelligible landmark. At intervals during the recitation of the prayers by the reader, the congregation, one and all, kept breaking out into a stentorian chant; but whether it was the last few words of the prayer then being said, or some one of their many interpolated benedictions, I could not tell.

There were also periods of silence for the reader; and during these the several men of the congregation, standing up, pursued their own private devotions with the utmost earnestness and assiduity. Indeed, the intensity of their worship was most striking. Sometimes they faced towards the Ark, sometimes towards the wall at the back of their stalls; frequently they made reverent bows, now in front of them, now towards each side, every man the while muttering his prayers with great rapidity in a subdued voice, so that I could compare the confused noise made by them all together to nothing better than the low buzz produced by a lot of schoolboys diligently learning lessons by heart. After what was described to me as "the most sacred of all prayers," they said "Kaddesh" privately, and then a hymn was recited. This hymn was constructed mainly out of the Psalms, and was not sung as hymns usually are by Christians, but was recited professedly in alternate verses by the reader and the congregation. I say professedly, for in reality they tripped upon one another so, fast—the reader having scarcely spoken the first word or two of his verse when the congregation shouted out theirs—that, practically, two verses of the hymn were always going on together. The result, as may be supposed, was to a stranger a perfect Babel.

Of course the long hymn was soon disposed of. When it was finished, the man wearing the brown-holland vestment with the four-inch black border, went and opened the Ark once more, having first privately said "Kaddesh;" another brief form of words was chanted, and the whole of the service was at an end.

After the men had folded up their vestments, and packed them into small bags, I walked away not a little satisfied with my visit. In the intervals when their own private devotions were completed, it must be owned, certain little ways of theirs-a proneness to conversation, a licence of walking about, going out, and so forth-had a tendency to give rather a free-and-easy air to the whole performance in the eyes of one accustomed to the more rigid and sober decorum of English Christendom. But while the prayers were actually in progress, the general aspect of the congregation was, as I have said, one of great earnestness and piety. This fact is all the more creditable to the religious feeling of the Israelites, inasmuch as many of them must have been able to follow the business of the synagogue but imperfectly. Except at the mention of our own Royal family there was not a word of English spoken throughout the whole service. Everything was in Hebrew, which for many of them must certainly be "a tongue not understanded of the people." Scattered over the world as the Jews have been, and in a measure cut off from intercourse with their fellow-countrymen, Hebrew has ceased, in Western Europe at all events, to be their vulgar tongue. The mastery of it must be with most of them, as it is with all of us, the acquisition of study. And therefore what was told me as a fact must obviously represent the real state of the case; namely, that there are a great many of the men, and the larger majority of the women, whose knowledge of the language in which they worship is very slender indeed. It is to meet this difficulty that editions of some of their service-books are printed with the Hebrew text on one side, and an English translation of it (often a very indifferent one, judging from the specimens I have seen) on the opposite page. But of course this expedient only partially meets the difficulty. Crutches are never so good as sound limbs.

If outward deportment be any index of inward emotion, it may safely be said that the religious feeling of the average Jew will very well bear comparison in reality and depth with that of the average Christian. Indeed it is, I should think, impossible for any reasonable person to see the Israelite at his worship, and not think of him with very much more respect than he ordinarily obtains in this country of his exile. He loves his worship, and thoroughly believes in it, no less heartily than we do in ours. He is not to be mistaken for one obstinately acting a singular part just to preserve a nationality; for he will point with tears in his eyes to the touching majesty of his prayers; the thought of them appeals to the deepest feelings of his nature; and he will, almost passionately, demand that, as you have the heart of a man, you should acknowledge that, with him, you feel their power.

You cannot refuse him what he claims: it is all true enough. Almost all the way he goes, you go with him; only you go much further. You do not diverge from him, as you would from some forms of religion, at the very beginning. On the contrary, you have a large mass of material in common with him. For a long distance you travel on the same road with him. The error of his worship (a mighty and a fatal one, alas!) is an error of defect. rather than of utter misdirection. You believe with him in the One True and Eternal God, the Maker of heaven and earth; you can join heartily in his frequent and impassioned benedictions of the Adorable Name; you can share his prayers for the restoration of Israel as the fulfilment of prophecies which you accept yourself; you can listen reverently and thankfully to the Scriptures that were given to his fathers: but when you have got so far in his company, there comes the fatal severance, by deficiency, of that which would complete the whole -the Messiahship of The Nazarene.

MADONNA MARY.

PART V.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE announcement of Winnie's engagement made, as was to be looked for, a considerable commotion among all the people connected with her. The very next morning Sir Edward himself came down to the Cottage with a very serious face. He had been disposed to play with the budding affection and to take pleasure in the sight of the two young creatures as they drew towards each other; and Percival, though in love, was not without prudence (his friend thought), and Winnie, though very open to impressions, was capricious and fanciful, and not the kind of girl, Sir Edward imagined, to say Yes to the first man who asked her. Thus the only sensible adviser on the spot had wilfully blinded himself. It had not occurred to him that Winnie might think of Percival, not as the first man who had ever asked her, but as the only man whom she loved; nor that Percival, though prudent enough, liked his own way, and was as liable to be carried away by passion as a better man. These reflections had not come into Sir Edward's head, and consequently he had rather encouraged the growing tenderness, which now all at once had turned into earnest, and had become a matter of responsibility and serious concern. Sir Edward came into Miss Seton's pretty drawing-room with care on his brow. The young people had gone out together to Kirtell-side to visit the spot of their momentous interview, and doubtless to go over it all again, as people do at that foolish moment, and only Aunt Agatha and Mrs. Ochterlony were at home. Sir Edward went in, and sat down between the two ladies, and offered his salutations with a pensive gravity which made Mary smile, but brought a cloud of disquietude over Aunt Agatha's gentle countenance. He sighed as he said it was a fine day. He even looked sympathetically at the roses as if he knew of some evil that was about to befall them :- and his old neighbour knew his ways and knew that he meant something, and with natural consciousness divined at once what it was.

"You have heard what has happened," said Aunt Agatha, trembling a little, and laying down her work. "It is so kind of you to come over at once; but I do hope that is not why you are looking so

"Am I looking grave?" said Sir Edward, clearing up in an elaborate way; "I did not mean it, I am sure. I suppose we ought to have seen it coming and been prepared; but these sort of things always take one by surprise. I did not think Winnie was the girl to—to make up her mind all at once, you know—the very first man that asked her. I suppose it was my mistake."

"If you think it was the very first that asked her!" cried Aunt Agatha, who felt this reproach go to her heart, "it is a mistake. She is only eighteen—a mere child—but I was saying to Mary only yesterday, that it was not for want of being admired——"

"Oh, yes," said Sir Edward, with a little wave of his hand, "we all know she has been admired. One's eyes alone would have proved that; and she deserves to be admired; and that is generally a girl's chief stronghold, in my opinion. She knows it, and learns her own value, and does not yield to the first fellow who has the boldness to say right out—"

"I assure you, Sir Edward," said Aunt Agatha, growing red and very erect in her chair, and assuming a steadiness which was unfortunately quite contradicted by the passionate quiver of her lip, "that you do Winnie great injustice—so far as being the first goes——"

"What does it matter if he were the first or the fiftieth, if she likes him?" said Mary, who had begun by being much amused, but who had ended by being a little indignant; for she had herself married at eighteen and never had a lover but Hugh Ochterlony, and felt herself disapproved of along with her sister.

Upon which Sir Edward shook his head.

"Certainly, my dear Mary, if she likes him," said the Baronet; "but the discouraging thing is, that an inexperienced girl—a girl so very well brought up as Winnie has been—should allow herself, as I have said, to like the very first man who presents himself. One would have thought some sort of introduction was necessary before such a thought could have penetrated into her mind. After she had been obliged to receive it in that way—then, indeed —But I am aware that there are people who have not my scruples," said Sir Edward, with a sigh; for he was, as all the neighbourhood was aware, a man of the most delicate mind.

"If you think my dear pure-minded child is not scrupulous, Sir Edward!" cried poor Aunt Agatha—but her emotion was so great that her voice failed her; and Mary, half amused and half angry, was the only champion left for Winnie's character, thus unexpectedly assailed.

"Poor child, I think she is getting very hard measure," said Mary. "I don't mean to blame you, but I think both of you encouraged her up to the last moment. You let them be always together, and smiled on them; and they are young, and what else could you expect? It is more delicate to love than to flirt," said Mrs. Ochterlony. She had not been nearly so well brought up as her sister, nor with such advanced views, and what she said brought a passing blush upon her matron cheek. Winnie could have discussed all about love without the shadow of a blush, but that was only the result of the chronological difference, and had nothing to do with purity of heart.

"If we have had undue confidence," said Sir Edward, with a sigh, "we will have to pay for it. Mary speaks—as I have heard many women speak—without making any consideration of the shock it must be to a delicate young girl; and I think, after the share which I may say I have myself had in Winnie's education, that I might be permitted to express my surprise; and Percival ought to have shown a greater regard for the sacredness of bospitality. I cannot but say that I was very much vexed and surprised."

It may well be supposed that such an address, after poor Aunt Agatha's delight and exultation in her child's joy, and her willingness to see with Winnie's eyes and accept Winnie's lover on his own authority, was a most confounding utterance. She sat silent, poor lady, with her lips apart and her eyes wide open, and a kind of feeling that it was all over with Winnie in her heart. Aunt Agatha was ready to fight her darling's battles to her last gasp, but she was not prepared to be put down and made au end of in this summary way. She had all sorts of pretty lady-like deprecations about their youth and Winnie's inexperience ready in her mind; and had rather hoped to be assured that to have her favourite thus early settled in life was the very best that anybody would desire for her. Miss Seton had been so glad to think in former days that Sir Edward always understood her, and she had thought Winnie's interests were as dear to him as if she had been a child of his own; and now to think that Sir Edward regarded an event so important for Winnie as an evidence of indelicacy on her part, and of a kind of treachery on her lover's! All that Aunt Agatha could do was to throw an appealing look at Mary, who had hitherto been the only one dissatisfied or disapproving. She knew more about Captain Percival than any one. Would not she say a word for them now?

"He must have thought that was what you meant when you let them be so much together," said Mary. "I think, if you will forgive me, Sir Edward, that it is not their fault."

Sir Edward answered this reproach only by a sigh. He was in a despondent rather than a combative state of mind. "And you see I do not know so much as I should like to knew about him," he said, evading the personal question. "He is a very nice fellow; but I told you the other day I did not consider him a paladin; and whether he has enough to live upon, or anything to settle on her——My dear Mary, at least you will agree with me, that considering how short a time they have known each other, things have gone a great deal too far."

"I do not know how long they have known each other," said Mary, who now felt herself called upon absolutely to take Aunt Agatha's part.

"Ah, I know," said Sir Edward, "and so does your aunt; and things did not go at railroad speed like this in our days. It is only about six weeks, and they are engaged to be married! I suppose you know as much about him as anybody—or so he gave me to understand at least; and do you think him a good match for your young sister?" added Sir Edward, with a tone of superior virtue which went to Mary's heart.

It was a trying moment for Mrs. Ochterlony, who disliked young Percival, and even in a way feared him, and yet at the same time felt herself called upon to uphold him as champion for her aunt and her sister. Mary was too true a woman not to be a partisan, and had the feminine gift of putting her own private sentiments out of the question in comparison with the cause which she had to advocate; but still it was an embarrassing question, especially as Aunt Agatha was looking at her with the most pathetic appeal in her eyes.

"I know very little of Captain Percival," she said; "I saw him once only in India, and it was at a moment very painful to me. But Winnie likes him—and you must have approved of him, Sir Edward, or you would not have brought him here."

Upon which Aunt Agatha rose and kissed Mary, recognising perfectly that she did not commit herself on the merits of the ease, but at the same time sustained by her support. Sir Edward, for his part, turned a deaf ear to the implied reproach, but still kept up his melancholy view of the matter, and shook his head.

"He has good connections," he said; "his late mother was a great friend of mine. In other circumstances, and could we have made up our minds to it at the proper moment, she might have been Lady—— But it is vain to talk of that. I think we might push him a little if he would devote himself steadily to his profession; but what can be expected from a man who wants to marry at five-and-twenty? I myself," said Sir Edward, with dignity, "though the eldest son——"

"Yes," said Aunt Agatha, unable to restrain herself longer, "and see what has come of it. You are all by yourself at the Hall, and not a soul belonging to you; and to see Francis Ochterlony with his statues and nonsense!—Oh, Sir Edward! when you might have had a dozen lovely children growing up round you-"

"Heaven forbid!" said Sir Edward, piously; and then he sighed—perhaps only from the mild melancholy which possessed him at the moment and was occasioned by Winnie's indelicate haste to fall in love; perhaps, also, from some touch of personal feeling. A dozen lovely children might be rather too heavy an amount of happiness, while yet a modified bliss would have been sweet. He sighed and leant his head upon his hand, and withdrew into himself for the moment in that interesting way which was habitual to him, and had gained him the title of "poor Sir Edward." It might be very foolish for a man (who had his own way to make in the world) to marry at five-and-twenty; but still, perhaps, it was rather more foolish when a man did not marry at all, and was left in his old age all alone in a great vacant house. But naturally, it was not this view of the matter which he displayed to his feminine companions, who were both women enough to have triumphed a little over such a confession of failure. He had a fine head, though he was old, and his hand was as delicate and almost as pale as ivory, and he could not but know that he looked interesting in that particular attitude, though, no doubt, it was his solicitude for these two indiscreet young people which chiefly moved him. "I am quite at a loss what to do," he said. "Mrs. Percival is a very fond mother, and she will naturally look to me for an account of all this; and there is your uncle Penrose, Mary-a man I never could bear, as you all know-he will come in all haste, ef course, and insist upon settlements and so forth; and why all this responsibility should come on me, who have no desire in this world but for tranquillity and peace-"

"It need not come on you," said Mrs. Ochterlony,; "we are not very great business people, but still, with Aunt Agatha and myself——"

Sir Edward smiled. The idea diverted him so much that he raised his head from his hand. "My dear Mary," he said, "I have the very highest opinion of your capacity; but in a matter of this kind, for instance——And I am not so utterly selfish as to forsake my old neighbour in distress."

But here Aunt Agatha took up her own defence. "I don't consider that I am in distress," she said. "I must say, I did not expect anything like this, Sir Edward, from you. If it had been Mr. Penrose, with his mercenary ideas—— I was very fond of Mary's poor dear mamma, and I don't mean any reflection on her, poor darling—but I suppose that is how it always happens with people in trade. Mr. Penrose is always a trial, and Mary knows that; but I hope I am able to bear something for my dear child's sake," Aunt Agatha continued, growing a little excited; "though I never thought that I should have to bear ——" and then the poor lady gave a stifled sob, and added in the midst of it, "this from you!"

This was a kind of climax which had arrived before, in the familiar friendship so long existing between the Hall and the Cottage. The two principals knew how to make it up better than the spectator did who was looking on with a little alarm and a little amusement. Perhaps it was as well that Mary was called away to her own individual concerns, and had to leave Aunt Agatha and Sir Edward in the height of their misunderstanding. Mary went away to her children, and perhaps it was only in the ordinary course of human nature that when she went into the nursery among those three little human creatures, who were so entirely dependent upon herself, there should be a smile upon her face as she thought of the two old people she had left. It seemed to her, as perhaps it seems to most women in the presence of their own children, at sight of those three boys-who were "mere babies" to Aunt Agatha but to Mary the most important existences in the world-as if this serio-comic dispute about Winnie's love affairs was the most quaintly-ridiculous exhibition. When she was conscious of this thought in her own mind, she rebuked it, of course; but at the first glance it seemed as if Winnie's falling in love was so trivial a matter-so little to be put in comparison with the grave cares of life. There are moments when the elder women, who have long passed through all that, and have entered upon another stage of existence, cannot but smile at the lovematters, without considering that life itself is often decided by the complexion of the early romance, which seems to belong only to its lighter and less serious side. Sir Edward and Aunt Agatha for their part had never, old as they both were. got beyond the first stage-and it was natural it should bulk larger in their eyes. And this time it was they who were right, and not Mary, whose children were but children, and in no danger of any harm. Whereas, poor Winnie, at the top of happiness-gay, reckless, daring, and assured of her own future felicity-was in reality a creature in deadly peril and wavering on the verge of her fate.

But when the day had come to an end, and Captain Percival had at last retired, and Winnic, a little languid after her lover's departure, sat by the open window watching, no longer with despite or displeasure, the star of light which shone over the tree-tops from the Hall, there occurred a scene of a different description. But for the entire change in Winnie's looks and manner, the absence of the embroidery frame at which she had worked so violently, and the languid softened grace with which she had thrown herself down upon a low chair, too happy and content to feel called upon to do anything, the three ladies were just as they had been a few evenings before; that is to say, that Aunt Agatha and Mary, to neither of whom any change was possible, were just as they had been before, while to the girl at the window everything in heaven and earth had changed. The two others had had their day and were done with it. Though Miss Seton was still scarcely an old woman, and Mary was in the full vigour and beauty of life, they were both ashore high up upon the beach, beyond the range of the highest tide; while the other, in her boat of hope, was playing with the rippling incoming waters, and preparing to put to sea. It was not in nature that the two who had been at sea, and knew all the storms and dangers, should not look at her wistfully in her happy ignorance; perhaps even they looked at her with a certain envy too. But Aunt Agatha was not a woman who could let either well or ill alone-and it was she who disturbed the household calm which might have been profound that night, so far as Winnie was concerned.

"My dear love," said Aunt Agatha, with a timidity which implied something to tell, "Sir Edward has been here. Captain Percival had told him, you know——"

"Yes," said Winnie, carelessly, "I know."

"And, my darling," said Miss Seton—"I am sure it is what I never could have expected from him, who was always such a friend; but I sometimes think he gets a little strange—as he gets old, you know—"

This was what the unprincipled woman said, not caring in the least how much she slandered Sir Edward, or anybody else in the world, so long as she gave a little comfort to the child of her heart. And as for Winnie, though she had been brought up at his feet, as it were, and was supposed by himself and others to love him like a child of his own, she took no notice of this unfounded accusation. She was thinking of quite a different person, just as Aunt Agatha was thinking of her, and Mary of her boys. They were women, each preoccupied and absorbed in somebody else, and they did not care about justice. And thus Sir Edward for the moment fared badly among them, though, if any outside assailant had attacked him, they would all have fought for him to the death.

"Well?" said Winnie, still very carelessly, as Miss Seton came to a sudden stop.

"My dear love!" said Aunt Agatha, "he has not a word to say against Captain Percival, that I can see—"

"Against Edward?" cried Winnie, raising herself up. "Good gracious, Aunt Agatha, what are you thinking of? Against Edward! I should like to know what he could say. His own godfather—and his mother was once engaged to him—and he is as good as a relation, and the nearest friend he has. What could he possibly have to say? And besides, it was he who brought him here; and we think he will leave us the most of his money," Winnie said, hastily—and then was very sorry for what she had said, and blushed scarlet and bit her lips, but it was too late to draw back.

"Winnie," said Miss Seton, solemnly. "If he has been calculating upon what people will leave to him when they die, I will think it is all true that Sir Edward said."

"You said Sir Edward did not say anything," cried Winnie. "What is it you have heard? It is of no use trying to deceive me. If there has been anything said against him, it is Mary who has said it. I can see by her face it is Mary. And if she is to be heard against him," cried Winnie, rising up in a blaze of wrath and indignation, "it is only just that he should be heard on the other side. He is too good and too kind to say things about my sister to me; but Mary is only a woman, and of course she does not mind what she says. She can blacken a man behind his back, though he is far too honourable and too—too delicate to say what he knows of her!"

This unlooked-for assault took Mary so entirely by surprise, that she looked up with a certain bewilderment, and could not find a word to say. As for Aunt Agatha, she too rose and took Winnie's hands, and put her arms round her as much as the angry girl would permit.

"It was not Mary," she said. "Oh, Winnie, my darling, if it was for your good, and an ease to my mind, and better for you in life—if it was for your good, my dear love—that is what we are all thinking of—could not you give him up?"

It was, perhaps, the boldest thing Aunt Agatha had ever done in all her gentle life-and even Winnie could not but be influenced by such unusual resolution. She made a wild effort to escape for the first moment, and stood with her hands held fast in Aunt Agatha's hands, averting her angry face, and refusing to answer. But when she felt herself still held fast, and that her fond guardian had the courage to hold to her question. Winnie's anger turned into another kind of passion. The tears came pouring to her eyes in a sudden violent flood, which she neither tried to stop nor "No!" cried Winnie, with the big to hide. thunder-drops falling hot and heavy. "What is my good without him? If it was for my harm I shouldn't care. Don't hold me, don't look at me, Aunt Agatha! I don't care for anything in the world but Edward. I would not give him up-no, not if it was to break everybody's heart. What is it all to me without Edward?" cried the passionate girl. And when Miss Seton let her go, she threw herself on her chair again, with the tears coming in floods, but still facing them both through this storm-shower with crimson cheeks and shining eyes. As for poor Aunt Agatha, she too tottered back to her chair, frightened and abashed as well as in distress; for young ladies had not been in the habit of talking so freely in her days.

"Oh, Winnie—and we have loved you all your life; and you have only known him a few weeks," she said, faltering, and with a natural groan.

"I cannot help it," said Winnie; "you may think me a wretch, but I like him best. Isn't it natural I should like him best? Mary did, and ran away, and nobody was shocked at her; and even you, yourself——"

"I never, never, could have said such a thing all my life!" cried Aunt Agatha, with a maiden blush upon her sweet old cheeks.

"If you had, you would not have been a——as you are now," said the dauntless Winnie; and she recovered in the twinkling of an eye, and wiped away her tears, and was herself again. Possibly what she had said was true and natural, as she asserted; but it is an unquestionable fact, that neither her aunt nor her sister could have said it for their lives. She was a young lady of the nineteenth century, and she acted accordingly; but it is a certain fact, as Aunt Agatha justly observed, whatever people may think now, that girls did not speak like that in our day.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE few weeks which ensued were the most stormy and troublous period of all Miss Scton's life; and through her there was naturally a considerable disturbance of the peace of the Cottage. Though she lived so quietly, she had what is called in the country "a large circle," and had dwelt among her own people all her life, and was known to everybody about. It was a quiet neighbourhood, but yet there never was a neighbourhood so quiet as not to have correspondents and relations living out in the world, to whom all news went, and from whom all news came. And there were a number of "families" about Kirtell, not great people certainly, but very respectable people, gentry, and well-connected persons, hanging on by various links to the great world. In this way Winnie's engagement, which nobody wanted to conceal, came to be known far and wide, as such facts are so apt to get known. And a great many people out in the world, who had once known Miss Seton, wrote letters to her, in which they suggested that perhaps she had forgotten them, but hoped that she would excuse them, and attribute it to the regard which they had never ceased to feel for her, if they asked, Did she know Captain Percival very well, who was said to be engaged to her pretty niece? Had she heard what happened in the Isle of Man when his regiment was stationed there? and why it was that he did not go out to Gibraltar after he had got that appointment? Other people, who did not know Aunt Agatha, took what was after all the more disagreeable step of writing to their friends in the parish about the young man, whose career had certainly left traces, as it appeared, upon the memory of his generation. To rise every morning with a sense that such an epistle might be awaiting her on the breakfast table-or to receive a visitor with the horrible conviction that she had come to look into her face, and hold her hand, and be confidential and sympathetic, and deliver a solemn warningwas an ordeal which Aunt Agatha found it hard to bear. She was a woman who never forgot her character as a maiden lady, and liked to be justified by precedents and to be approved of by all the world. And these repeated remonstrances had no doubt a great effect upon her mind. They filled her with terrible misgivings and embittered her life, and drove her now and then into so great a panic that she felt disposed to thrust Captain Percival out of the house and forbid his re-appearance there. But then, Winnie. Winnie was not the girl to submit to any such violent remedies. If she could not see her lover there, she would find means to see him somewhere else. If she could not be married to him with stately propriety in her parish church, she would manage to marry him somehow in any irregular way, and she would by no means hesitate to say so or shrink from the responsibility. And if it must be done, would it not be better that it should be done correctly than incorrectly, and with all things decent and in order? Thus poor Aunt Agatha would muse as she gathered up her bundle of letters. It might have been all very well for parents to exercise their authority in the days when their children obeyed them; but what was the use of issuing commands to which nobody would pay any attention? Winnie had very plainly expressed her preference for her own happiness rather than her aunt's peace of mind; and though Miss Seton would never have consented to admit that Winnie was anything less than the most beautiful character, still she was aware that unreasoning obedience was not her faculty. Besides, another sentiment began to mingle with this prudential consideration. Everybody was against the poor young man. The first letters she received about him made her miserable; but after that there was no doubt a revulsion. Everybody was against him, poor fellow !- and he was so young, and could not, after all, have done so much harm in the world. "He has not had the time, Mary," she said, with an appeal to Mrs. Ochterlony for support. "If he had been doing wrong from his very cradle, he could not have had the time." She could not refuse to believe what was told her, and yet notwithstanding her belief she clung to the culprit. If he had found any other advocate it might have been different; but nobody took the other side of the question: nobody wrote a pretty letter to say what a dear fellow he was, and how glad his friends were to think he had found some one worthy of him-not even his mother; and Aunt Agatha's heart accordingly became the avvocato del diavolo. Fair play was due even to Captain Percival. It was impossible to have him assailed as he was by so many, and left without one friend.

It was a curious sight to see how she at once received and ignored all the information thus conveyed to her. A woman of a harder type would probably, as women do, have imputed motives, and settled the matter with the general conclusion that "an enemy hath done this;" but Aunt Agatha could not help, for the moment at least, believing in everybody. She could not say right out, "It is not true," even to the veriest impostor who deceived and got money from her, and their name was legion. In her own innocent soul she had no belief in lies, and could not understand them; and it was easier for her to give credence to the wildest marvel than to believe that anybody could tell her a deliberate falsehood. She would have kissed the ladies who wrote to her of those stories about Captain Percival, and cried and wrung her hands, and asked, What could she do ?- and yet her heart was by no means turned against him, notwithstanding her belief in what everybody said; which is a strange and novel instance, well enough known to social philosophers, but seldom remarked upon, of the small practical influence of belief upon life. "How can it be a lie, my dear child? what motive could they all have to tell lies?" she would say to Winnie mournfully; and yet ten minutes after, when it was Mrs. Ochterlony she was speaking to, she would make her piteous appeal for him, poor fellow!—"Everybody is against him; and he is so young still; and oh, Mary, how much he must need looking after," Aunt Agatha would say, "if it is all true!"

Perhaps it was stranger still that Mary, who did not like Captain Percival, and was convinced of the truth of all the stories told of him, and knew in her heart that he was her enemy and would not scruple to do her harm if the chance should come in his way-was also a little moved by the same argument. Everybody was against him. It was the Cottage against the world, so far as he was concerned; and even Mrs. Ochterlony, though she ought to have known better, could not help feeling herself one of a "side," and to a certain extent felt her honour pledged to the defence of her sister's lover. Had she, in the very heart of this stronghold which was standing out for him so stoutly, lifted up a testimony against him, she would have felt herself in some respects a domestic traitor. She might be silent on the subject, and avoid all comment, but she could not utter an adverse opinion, or join in with the general voice against which Aunt Agatha and Winnie stood forth as stedfastly. As for Winnie, every word that was said to his detriment made her more determined to adhere to him. What did it matter whether he was good or bad, so long as it was indisputably he? There was but one Edward Percival in the world. and he would still be Edward Percival if he had committed a dozen murders, or gambled twenty fortunes away. Such was Winnie's defiant way of treating the matter which concerned her more closely than anybody else. She carried things with a high hand in those days. All the world was against her, and she scorned the world. She attributed motives, though Aunt Agatha did not. She said it was envy and jealousy and all the evil passions. She made wild counter-accusations, in the style of that literature which sets forth the skeleton in every man's closet. Who could tell what little incidents could be found out in the private history of the ladies who had so much to say about Captain Percival? This is so ordinary a mode of defence, that no doubt it is natural, and Winnie went into it with good will. Thus his standard was planted upon the Cottage, and however unkindly people might think of him outside, shelter and support was always to be found within. Even Peggy, though she did not always agree with her mistress, felt, as Mrs. Ochterlony did, that she was one of a side, and became a partisan with an earnestness that was impossible to Mary. Sir Edward shook his head still, but he was disarmed by the close phalanx and the determined aspect of Percival's defenders. "It is true love," he said in his sentimental way; "and love can work miracles when everything else has failed. It may be his salvation." This was what he wrote to Percival's mother, who, up to this moment, had been but doubtful in her approbation, and very anxious, and uncertain, as she said, whether she ought not to tell Miss Seton that Edward had been "foolish." He had been "foolish," even in his mother's opinion; and his other critics were, some of them, so tolerant as to say "gay," and some "wild," while a few used a more solemn style of diction;—but everybody was against him, whatever terms they might employ; everybody except the ladies at the Cottage, who set up his standard, and accepted him with all his iniquities upon his head.

It may be worth while at this point, before Mr. Penrose arrives, who played so important a part in the business, to say a word about the poor young man who was thus universally assailed. He was five-and-twenty, and a young man of expectations. Though he had spent every farthing which eame to himself at his majority, and a good deal more than that, still his mother had a nice estate, and Sir Edward was his godfather, and the world was full of obliging tradespeople and other amiable persons. He was a handsome fellow, nearly six feet high, with plenty of hair, and a moustache of the most charming growth. The hair was of dull brown, which was rather a disadvantage to him, but then it went perfectly well with his pale complexion, and suited the cloudy look over the eyes which was the most characteristic point in his face. The eyes themselves were good, and had, when they chose, a sufficiently frank expression, but there lay about the eyebrows a number of lurking hidden lines which looked like mischief-lines which could be brought into action at any moment, and could scowl, or lower, or brood, according to the faucy of their owner. Some people thought this uncertainty in his face was its greatest charm; you could never tell what a moment might bring forth from that moveable and changing forehead. It was suggestive, as a great many persons thoughtsuggestive of storm and thunder and sudden disturbance, or even in some eyes of cruelty and gloom -though he was a fine young man, and gay and fond of his pleasure. Winnie, as may be supposed, was not of this latter opinion. She even loved to bring out those hidden lines, and call the shadows over his face, for the pleasure of seeing how they melted away again, according to the use and wont of young ladies. It was a sort of uncertainty that was permissible to him, who had been a spoiled child, and whom everybody, at the beginning of his career, had petted and taken notice of; but possibly it was a quality which would not have called forth much admiration from a wife.

And with Winnie standing by him as she did—clinging to him closer at every new accusation, and proclaiming, without faltering, her indifference to anything that could be said, and her conviction that the worse he was the more need he had of her—Captain Percival, too, took matters very lightly. The two foolish young creatures even came to laugh, and make fun of it in their way. "Here is Aunt Agatha coming with another letter; I wonder if it is to say that I poisoned my grandmother, this time?" cried the young man; and they both laughed as if it was the best joke in the world. If ever there was a moment in which, when they were alone, Winnie did take a momentary thought of the seriousness of the position, her gravity soon dissipated itself. "I know you have been very naughty," she would say, clasping her pretty hands upon his arm; "but you will never, never do it again?" and the lover, thus appealed to, would make the tenderest and most eager assurances. What temptation could he ever have to be "naughty," with such an angel by his side? And Winnie was pleased enough to play the part of the angel-though that was not, perhaps, her most characteristic development—and went home full of happiness and security; despising the world which never had understood Edward, and thinking with triumph of the disappointed women less happy than herself, who, out of revenge, had no doubt got up this outery against him. "For I don't mean to defend him out and out," she said, her eyes sparkling with malice and exultation; "I don't mean to say he has not behaved very badly to a great many people:" and there was a certain sweet self-glorification in the thought which intoxicated Winnie. It was wicked, but somehow she liked him better for having behaved badly to a great many people; and naturally any kind of reasoning was entirely ineffectual with a foolish girl who had taken such an idea into her mind.

Thus things went ou; and Percival went away and returned again, and paid many flying visits, and, present and absent, absorbed all Winnie's thoughts. It was not only a first love, but it was a first occupation to the young woman, who had never felt, up to this time, that she had a sufficient sphere for her energies. Now she could look forward to being married, to receiving all the presents, and being busy about all the business of that important moment; and beyond lay life-life without any one to restrain her, without even the bondage of habit and the necessity of taking into consideration what people would think. Winnie said frankly that she would go with him anywhere, that she did not mind if it was India, or even the Cape of Good Hope; and her eyes sparkled to think of the everything new which would replace to her all the old bonds and limits: though, in one point of view, this was a cruel satisfaction, and very wounding and injurious to some of the other people concerned.

"Oh, Winnie, my darling! and what am I to do without you?" Aunt Agatha would cry; and the girl would kiss her in her laughing way. "It must have come, sooner or later," she said : "vou always said so yourself. I don't see why you should not get married too, Aunt Agatha; you are perfectly beautiful sometimes, and a great deal have Mary to be your husband," Winnie would add, with a laugh, and a touch of affectionate spite: for the two sisters, it must be allowed, were not to say fond of each other. Mary had been brought up differently, and was often anuoyed, and sometimes shocked, by Winnie's ways: and Winniethough at times she seemed disposed to make friends with her sister-could not help thinking of Mary as somehow at the bottom of all that had been said about Edward. This, indeed, was an idea which her lover and she shared; and Mary's life was not made pleasanter to her by the constant implication that he, too, could tell something about her-which she despised too much to take any notice of, but which yet was an offence and an insult. So that on the whole-even before the arrival of Mr. Penrose-the Cottage on Kirtell-side. though as bowery and fair as ever, was, in reality, an agitated and even an uncomfortable home.

CHAPTER XX.

MR. PENROSE was the uncle of Mary and Winnie. their mother's only brother. Mrs. Seton had come from Liverpool originally, and though herself very "nice," had not been, according to Aunt Agatha's opinion, "of a nice class." And her brother shared the evil conditions, without sharing the good. He was of his class, soul and body, and it was not a nice class-and, to tell the truth, his nieces had been brought up to ignore rather than to take any pleasure in him. He was not a man out of whom, under the best circumstances, much satisfaction could be got. He was one of the men who always turn up when something about money is going on in a house. He had had to do with all the wills and settlements in the family, though they were of a very limited description; but Mr. Penrose did not despise small things, and was of opinion, that even if you had only a hundred pounds, you ought to know all about it, and how to take care of it. And he had once been very kind to Aunt Agatha, who was always defective in her arithmetic, and who, in earlier days, while she still thought of a possible change in her condition, had gone beyond the just limit of her income in her expenditure, and got into difficulties. Mr. Penrose had interfered at that period, and had been very kind, and set her straight, and had given her a very telling address upon the value of money: and though Miss Seton was not one of the people who take a favour as an injury, still she could have forgiven him a great many ill turns sooner than that good one. He had been very kind to her, and had rufiled all her soft plumes, and rushed up against her at all her tender points; and the very sound of his name was a lively irritant to Aunt Agatha. But he had to be acquainted with Winnie's engagement, and when he received the information, he lost no time in coming to see about it. He was a large, portly, well-to-do man, with one of his hands always younger than-many people; or, at least, you will in his pocket, and seemed, somehow, to breathe money, and to have no ideas which did not enter in it; and yet he had a good many ideas, and was a clever man in his way. With him, as with most people in the world, there was one thing needful, and that one thing was money. thought it was a duty to possess something-a duty which a man owed absolutely, to himself, and to all who belonged to him-and if he did not acquit himself well on this point, he was, in Mr. Penrose's opinion, a very indifferent sort of person. There is something immoral to most people in the fact of being poor, but to Mr. Penrose it was a crime. He was very well off himself, but he was not a man to communicate of his goods as he did of his advice : but then he had himself a family, and could not be expected to give anything except advice to his nieces-and as for that one good thing it was at their command in the most liberal way. He came to the Cottage, which was so especially a lady's house, and pervaded the whole place with his large male person, diffusing through it that moral fragrance which still betrays the Englishman, the man of business, the Liverpool man, wherever he may happen to bless the earth. Perhaps in that sweet-smelling dainty place, the perfume which breathed from Mr. Penrose told more decidedly than in the common air. As soon as you went in at the garden-gate you became sensible that the atmosphere was changed, and that a Man was there. Perhaps it may be thought that the presence of a man in Aunt Agatha's maiden bower was not what might be called strictly proper, and Miss Seton herself had doubts on the subject; but then, Mr. Penrose never asked for any invitation, and it would have been very difficult to turn him out; and then Mary was there, who at least was a married lady. He came without any invitation, and asked which was his room as if it had been his own house-and he complained of what he called "the smell" of the roses, and declared he would tear down all the sickly jasmine from the side of the house if it belonged to him. All this Miss Scton endured silently, feeling it her duty, for Winnie's sake, to keep all her connexious in good humour; but the poor lady suffered terribly under the process, as every body could see.

"I hope it is only a conditional sort of engagement," Mr. Penrose said, after he had made himself comfortable, and had had a good dinner, and came into the drawing-room the first evening. lovers had seized the opportunity to escape to Kirtell-side, and Mary was with her boys in the garden, and poor Aunt Agatha, a martyr of civility, was seated alone, awaiting the reappearance of her guest, and smiling upon him with anxious politeness. He threw himself into the largest and most solid chair he could find, and spread himself as it seemed all over the room-a Man, coarse and undisguised in that soft feminine paradise. Poor Sir Edward's graceful presence, and the elegant figure of Captain Percival made no such impression. hope you have not settled it all without consulting anybody. To be sure, that don't matter very much; but I know you ladies have a summary way of settling such affairs."

"Indeed, I—I am afraid—I—I hope—it is all settled," said Aunt Agatha, with tremulous dignity. "It is not as if there was a great deal of money to settle. They are not—not rich, you know," she added, nervously. This was the chief thing to tell, and she was anxious to get it over at once.

"Not rich?" said Mr. Penrose. "No, I suppose not. A rich fellow would not have been such a fool as to entangle himself with Winnie, who has only her pretty face; but he has something, of course. The first thing to ascertain is, what they will have to live on, and what he can settle upon her. I suppose you have not let it go so far without having a kind of idea on these points?"

"Oh yes," said Aunt Agatha, with a very poor pretence at composure; "oh, yes, Mr. Penrose, that is all quite right. He has very nice expectations. I have always heard that Mrs. Percival had a charming little property; and Sir Edward is his godfather, and very fond of him. You will see it will come all right about that."

"Yes," said Mr. Penrose, who was nursing one of his legs—a colossal member, nearly as big as his hostess—in a meditative way, "I hope it will when I come to look into it. But we must have something more than expectations. What has he of his own?—and what do his mother and Sir Edward mean to do for him? We must have it in pounds, shillings, and pence, or he shan't have Winnie. It is best that he should make up his mind about that."

Aunt Agatha drew a frightened, panting breath; but she did not say anything. She had known what she would have to brave, and she was aware that Winnie would not brave it, and that to prevent a breach with her darling's only rich relation it was necessary and expedient as long as she was alone to have it all out.

"Let me see," said Mr. Penrose, "you told me what he was in your letter—Captain, aint he? As for his pay, that don't count. Let us go systematically to work if we are to do any good. I know ladies are very vague about business matters, but still you must know something. What sort of a fellow is he, and what has he got of his own?"

"Oh, he is very nice," cried Aunt Agatha, consoled to find a question she could answer; "very, very nice. I do think you will like him very much; such a fine young fellow, and with what you gentlemen call no nonsense about him," said the anxious woman; "and with excellent connexions," she added, faltering again, for her enthusiasm awoke no answer in Mr. Penrose's face.

"My dear Miss Agatha," he said, in his offensive way—and he always called her Miss Agatha, which was very trying to her feelings—"you need not take the trouble to assure me that a handsome young fellow who pays her a little attention is always very nice to a lady. I was not asking whether he was nice, I was asking what were his means—which is a very much more important part of the subject, though you may not think so," Mr. Penrose added. "A charming little house like this, for instance, where you have everything within yourself, and can live on honey and dew I suppose, may be kept on nothing perhaps—though you and I, to be sure, know a little different—"

"Mr. Penrose," said Aunt Agatha, trembling with indignation, "if you mean that the dinner was not particular enough-"

"It was a charming little dinner," said Mr. Penrose, "just what it ought to have been. Nothing could have been nicer than that white soup; and I think I am a judge. I was speaking of something to live on; a pretty house like this, I was saying, is not an analogous case. You have everything within yourself, you know—eggs, and vegetables, and fruit, and your butter and milk so cheap. I wish we could get it like that in Liverpool; and—pardon me—no increase of family likely, you know."

"My niece Mary and her three children have come to the cottage since you were last here, Mr. Penrose," said Aunt Agatha, with a blush of shame and displeasure. "It was the only house of all her relations that she could come to with any comfort, poor dear—perhaps you don't call that an increase of family; and as for the milk and butter——"

"She must pay you board," said Mr. Penrose, decisively; "there can be no question about that; your little money has not always been enough for yourself, as we both know. But all this is merely an illustration I was giving. It has nothing to do with the main subject. If these young people marry, my dear Miss Agatha, their family may be increased by inmates who will pay no board."

This was what he had the assurance to say to an unmarried lady in her own house—and to laugh and chuckle at it afterwards as if he thought it a capital joke. Aunt Agatha was struck dumb with horror and indignation. Such eventualities might indeed, perhaps must, be discussed by the lawyers where there are settlements to make; but to talk of them to a maiden lady when alone, was enough to make her drop through the very floor with consternation. She made no attempt to answer, but she did succeed in keeping her seat and to a certain extent her self-possession, for Winnie's sake.

"It is a different sort of thing altogether," said the family adviser. "Things may be kept square in a quiet lady's house—though even that is not always the case, as we are both aware; but two young married people who are just as likely as not to be extravagant and all that—— If he has not something to settle on her, I don't see how I can have anything to do with it," Mr. Penrose continued, "and you will not answer me as to what he has of his own."

"He has his—his pay," said poor Aunt Agatha.
"I am told it is a great deal better than it used to be; and he has, I think, some—some money in the Funds. I am sure he will be glad to settle that on Winnie; and then his mother, and Sir Edward. I have no doubt myself, though really they are too young to marry, that they will do very well on the whole."

"Do you know what living means, Miss Agatha?" asked Mr. Penrose, solemnly, "when you can speak in this loose way? Butchers' bills are not so vague as your statements, I can tell you; and a pretty girl like that ought to do very well, even though she has no money. It is not her fault, poor thing," the rich uncle added, with momentary compassion; and then he asked, abruptly, "What will Sir Edward do for them?" as if he had presented a pistol at his companion's head.

"Oh, Mr. Penrose!" cried Aunt Agatha, forgetting all her policy and what she had just said. "Surely, surely you would not like them to calculate upon Sir Edward! He is not even a relation. He is only Edward's godfather. I would not have him applied to, not for the world."

"Then what have you been talking to me all this while about?" cried Mr. Penrose, with a look and sense of outraged virtue. And Aunt Agatha, seeing how she had betrayed her own position, and weary of the contest, and driven to her wits' end, gave way and cried a little—which at that moment, vexed, worried, and mortified as she was, was all she could do.

And then Mr. Penrose got up and walked away, whistling audibly, through the open window into the garden, leaving the chintz cover on his chair so crumpled up and loosened out of all its corners, that you could have told a mile off that a man had been there. What he left behind him was not that subtle agreeable suggestion of his presence which hung around the footsteps of young Percival, or even of Sir Edward, but something that felt half like an insult to the feminine inhabitants-a disagreeable assertion of another kind of creature who thought himself superior to them-which was an opinion which they did not in the least share, having no illusions so far as he went. Aunt Agatha sank back into her chair with a sense of relief which she afterwards felt she ought not to have entertained. She had no right to such a feeling, for she had done no good; and instead of diverting the common enemy from an attack upon Winnie or her lover, had actually roused and whetted him, and made him more likely than ever to rush at those young victims as soon as ever he should have the chance. But notwithstanding, for the moment to be rid of him and able to draw breath a little, and dry her incipient tears, and put the cover straight upon that ill-used chair, did her good. She drew a long breath, poor soul, and felt the ease' and comfort of being left to herself: even though next moment she might have to brace herself up and collect all her faculties, and face the adversary again.

But in the meantime he had gone out to the garden, and was standing by Mary's side, with his hand in his pocket. He was telling Mary that he had come out in despair to her, to see if she knew anything about this sad business-since he found her Aunt Agatha quite as great a fool about business matters as she always was. He wanted to know if she, who knew what was what, could give him any sort of a reasonable idea about this young fellow whom Winnie wanted to marry-which was as difficult a question for Mrs. Ochterlony as it had been for Miss Seton. And then in the midst of the conversation the two culprits themselves appeared, as careless about the inquiring uncle as they were about the subject of his anxiety. Winnie, who was not given to the reticences practised by her aunt and her sister, had taken care to convey a very clear idea of her uncle Penrose, and her own opinion of him, to the mind of Percival. He was from Liverpool, and not "of a nice class." He was not Winnie's guardian, nor had he any legal control over her; and in these circumstances it did not seem by any means necessary to either of the young people to show any undue attention to his desires, or be disturbed by his interference; for neither of them had been brought up to be dutiful to all the claims of nature, like their seniors. "Go away directly, that he may not have any chance of attacking you," Winnie had said to her lover; for though she was not self-denying or unselfish to speak of, she could be so where Percival was con-"We can manage him among us," she added, with a laugh-for she had no doubt of the co-operation of both her aunt and sister, in the ease of Uncle Penrose. And in obedience to this arrangement Captain Percival did nothing but take off his hat in honour of Mary, and say half a dozen words of the most ordinary salutation to the stranger before he went away. And then Winnie came in, and came to her sister's side, and stood facing Mr. Penrose in all the triumph and glory of her youth. She was beautiful, or would be beautiful, everybody, had long allowed; but she had still retained a certain girlish meagreness up to a very recent date. Now all that had changed, like everything else; she had expanded, it appeared, as her heart expanded and was satisfied-everything about her looked rounder, fuller, and more magnificent. She came and stood before the Liverpool uncle, who was a man of business and thinking of no such vanities, and struck him dumb with her splendour. He could talk as he liked to Aunt Agatha, or even to Mary in her widow's cap, but this radiant creature, all glowing with love and happiness, took away his breath. Perhaps it was then, for the first time in his life, that Mr. Penrose actually realised that there was something in the world for which a man might even get to be indifferent about the balance at his banker's. He gave an involuntary gasp; and though up to this moment he had thought of Winnie only as a child, he now drew back before her, and stopped whistling, and took his hand out of his pocket, which perhaps was as decided an act of homage as it was in him to pay.

But of course such a manifestation could not last. After another moment he gave a "humph" as he looked at her, and then his self-possession came back. "So that was your Captain, I suppose?" he said.

"Yes, uncle, that was my Captain," said the dauntless Winnie, "and I hope you approve of him; though it does not matter if you don't, for you know it is all settled, and nobody except my aunt and his mother has any right to say a word."

"If his mother is as wise a judge as your aunt—" said Mr. Penrose; but yet all the same Winnie's boldness imposed upon him a little. It was impossible to imagine that a grand creature like this, who was not pale nor sentimental, nor of Agatha Seton's kind, could contemplate with such satisfaction any Captain who had asked her to marry him upon nothing a year.

"That is all very fine," Mr. Penrose added, taking courage; "you can make your choice as you please, but it is my business to look after the money. If you and your children come to me starving, twenty years hence, and ask how I could possibly let you marry such a--- "

"Do you think you will be living in twenty years, Uncle Penrose?" said Winnie. "I know you are a great deal older than Aunt Agatha;—but if you are, we will not come, I promise you. We shall keep our starvation to ourselves."

"I can't tell how old your Aunt Agatha is," said Mr. Penrose, with natural offence; "and you must know, Miss Winnie, that this is not how you should talk to me."

"Very well, uncle," said the daring girl; "but neither is your way the way to talk to me. You know I have made up my mind, and that everything is settled, and that it does not matter the least to me if Edward was a beggar; and you come here with your money, as if that was the only thing to be thought of. What do I care about money?—and you might try till the end of the world, and you never would break it off," she cried, flashing into a brilliant glow of passion and vehemence such as Mr. Penrose did not understand. He had expected to have a great deal of difficulty, but he had never expected to be defied after this fashion; and the wildness of her womanish folly made the good

"You silly girl!" he said, with profound pathos, "if you only knew what nonsense you were speaking. There is nobody in this world but cares about money; you can do nothing without it, and marry least of all. And you speak to me with such an example before your eyes: look at your sister Mary, how she has come with all those helpless children, to be, most likely, a burden on her friends——"

"Uncle Penrose!" cried Winnie, putting up her two beautiful hands to stop his mouth; but Mr. Penrose was as plain-spoken as Winnie herself was, though in a different way.

"I know perfectly well she can hear me," he said, "and she ought to hear me, and to read you a lesson. If Mary had been a sensible girl, and had married a man who could make proper settlements upon her, and make a prevision for his family, do you think she would have required to come here to seek a shelter—do you think—"

"Oh Mary, he is crazy; don't mind him!" cried Winnie, forgetting for the moment all about her own affairs, and clinging to her sister in real distress.

And then it was Mrs. Ochterlony's turn to speak. "I did not come to seek a shelter," she said; "though I know they would have given it me all the same. I came to seek love and kindness, uncle, which you cannot buy with money; and if there was nothing more than want of money between Winnie and Captain Percival——"

"Mary!" cried Winnie, impetuously, "go in as long as I am sorry for you, and mad to hear you insulted: for you have been insulted, and none of us will permit it. But, go in—go in before you begin to tell tales, and I forget you are my sister. You have done harm enough already. Leave me to have it out with Uncle Penrose, and go away."

And somehow Mary obeyed. She would not have done it a month ago; but she was wearied of contention, and broken in spirit, and, instead of standing still and defending herself, she withdrew from the two belligerents, who were both so ready to turn their arms against her, and went away. She went to the nursery, which was deserted: for her boys were still outside in the lingering daylight. None of them were able to advise, or even to sympathise with their mother. They could give her their childish love, but nothing else in the The others had all some one to consult, some one to refer to, but Mary was alone. Her heart beat dull and low, with no vehement offence at the bitter words she had just heard, but with a heavy despondency and sense of her solitude, which her very attitude showed—for she did not sit down, or lie down, or try to find any fictitious support, but stood up by the vacant fire-place with her eyes fixed upon nothing, holding unconsciously the little chain which secured her watch, and letting its beads drop one by one from her fingers. "You have done harm enough already," said Winnie. - "Mary has come home to be a burden on her friends," said Uncle Penrose. She did not resent it wildly, as she might have done some time before, but pondered it with wondering pain and a dull sense of hopelessness. How did it happen that she, of all women, had come to such a position? what correspondence was there between that and all her past? and what was the future to be? which, even now, she could make no spasmodic changes in, but must to some extent accept-for the moment at least. This was how Mary's mind was employed while Winnie, reckless and wilful, defied Uncle Penrose in the garden. For the time, the power of defying any she could do was to think and wonder, with a dull aching, what was to come of it all, as she stood by the fireless hearth.

CHAPTER XXI.

Mr. Penrose, however, was not a man of very lively feelings, and bore no malice against Winnie for her defiance, nor even against Mary, to whom he had been so cruel, which was more difficult. He was up again cheerful and full of energy in the morning, ready for his mission. If Winnie began the world without something to live upon, or with any prospect of ever being a burden on her friends, at all events it would not be his fault. As it happened, Aunt Agatha received at the breakfast-table the usual invariable letter containing a solemn warning against Captain Percival, and she was affected by it, as she could not help always being affected; and the evident commotion it excited in the party was such that Mr. Penrose could not but notice it. When he insisted upon knowing what it was, he was met by what was, in reality, very skilful fencing on Miss Seton's part, who was not destitute altogether of female skill and art; but Aunt Agatha's defence was made useless by the impetuosity of Winnie, who scorned disguise.

"Oh, let us hear it, please," she said, "let us hear. We know what it is about. It is some new stery—some lie, about my poor Edward. They may save themselves the trouble. I would not believe one of them, if it was written on the wall like Belshazzar's feast; and if I did believe them I would not care," said Winnie, vehemently; and she looked across, as she never could help looking, to where her sister sat.

"What is it?" said Mr. Penrose; "something about your Captain? Miss Agatha, considering my interest in the matter, I hope you will let me hear all that is said."

"It is nothing, absolutely nothing," said Aunt Agatha, faltering. "It is only some foolish gossip, you know-garrison stories, and that sort of thing. He was a very young man, and was launched upon life by himself-and-and-I think I may say he must have been imprudent. Winnie, my dear love, my heart bleeds to say it, but he must have been imprudent. He must have entangled himself and -and- And then there are always so many designing people about to lead poor young men astray," said Aunt Agatha, trembling for the result of her explanation: while Winnie divided her attention between Mr. Penrose, before whom this new view of the subject was unfolded for the first time, and Mary, from whom she had taught herself to suppose it all had come.

what was the future to be? which, even now, she could make no spasmodic changes in, but must to some extent accept—for the moment at least. This was how Mary's mind was employed while Winnie, reckless and wilful, defied Uncle Penrose in the garden. For the time, the power of defying any one seemed to have died out of Mary's breast. All all over with Sir Edward, and see what can be done. This sort of penniless nonsense makes me sick," the rich man added; "and you women are the most unreasonable creatures-one might as well talk to a stone wall."

Thus it was that for once in their lives the two Miss Setons, Agatha and Winnie, found Uncle Penrose for the moment half divine; they looked at him with wide open eyes, with a wondering veneration. They were only women after all, and had been giving themselves a great deal of trouble about Captain Percival's previous history; but it all sank into mere contemptible gossip under the calm glance of Mr. Penrose. He was not enthusiastic about Edward, and therefore his impartial calm was all the more satisfying. He thought nothing of it all, though it had been driving them distracted. When he went away on his mission to the Hall, Winnie, in her enthusiasm, ran into Aunt Agatha's

"You see he does not mind," said Winnie,though an hour before she had been far from thinking Mr. Penrose an authority. "He thinks it is all gossip and spite, as I always said."

And Aunt Agatha for her part was quite overcome by the sudden relief. It felt like a deliverance, though it was only Mr. Penrose's opinion. "My dear love, men know the world," she said; "that is the advantage of having somebody to talk to; and I always said that your uncle, though he is sometimes disagreeable, had a great deal of sense. You see he knows the world."

"Yes, I suppose he must have sense," said Winnie; and in the comfort of her heart she was ready to attribute all good gifts to Mr. Penrose, and could have kissed him as he walked past the window with his hand in his pocket. She would not have forsaken her Edward whatever had been found out about him, but still to see that his wickednesses (if he had been wicked) were of no consequence in the eyes of a respectable man like Uncle Penrose, was such a consolation even to Winnie as nothing can express. "We are all a set of women, and we have been making a mountain out of a molehill," she said, and the tears came to her bright eyes; and then, as Mary was not moved into any such demonstrations of delight, Winnie turned her arms upon her sister in pure gaiety of

"Everybody gets talked about," she said. "Edward was telling me about Mary even-that she used to be called Madonna Mary at the station: and that there was some poor gentleman that died. I suppose he thought she ought to be worshipped like Our Lady. Didn't you feel dreadfully guilty and wretched, Mary, when he died?"

"Poor boy," said Mrs. Ochterlony, who had recovered her courage a little with the morning light. "It had nothing to do with Our Lady as you say; it was only because he had been brought up in Italy, poor fellow, and was fond of the old Italian poets, and the soft Italian words."

"Then perhaps it was Madonna Laura he was all may be well."

thinking of," said Winnie, with gay malice, "and you must have felt a dreadful wretch when he died."

"We felt very sad when he died," said Mary,-"he was only twenty, poor boy: but, Winnie dear. Uncle Penrose is not an angel, and I think now I will say my say. Captain Percival is very fond of you, and you are very fond of him, and I think, whatever the past may have been, that there is hope if you will be a little serious. It is of consequence. Don't you think that I wish all that is best in the world for you, my only little sister? And why should you distrust me? You are not silly nor weak, and I think you might do well yet, very well, my dear, if you were really to try."

"I think we shall do very well without trying." said Winnie, partly touched and partly indignant; "but it is something for you to say, Mary, and I am sure I am much obliged to you for your good advice all the same."

"Winnie," said Mrs. Ochterlony, taking her hands, "I know the world better than you doperhaps even better than Uncle Penrose so far as a woman is concerned-I don't care if you are rich or poor, but I want you to be happy. It will not do very well without trying. I will not say a word about him, for you have set your heart on him, and that must be enough. And some women can do everything for the people they love. I think, perhaps you could, if you were to give your heart to it, and try."

It was not the kind of address Winnie had expected, and she struggled against it, trying hard to resist the involuntary softening. But after all nature was yet in her, and she could not but feel that what Mary was saying came from her heart.

"I don't see why you should be so serious," she said; "but I am sure it is kind of you, Mary. I-I don't know if I could do-what you say; but whatever I can do I will for Edward!" she added hastily, with a warmth and eagerness which brought the colour to her cheek and the light to her eye; and then the two sisters kissed each other as they had never done before, and Winnie knelt down by Mary's knee, and the two held each other's hands, and clung together as it was natural they should, in that confidence of nature which is closer than any other except that between mother and daughterthe fellow-feeling of sisters, destined to the same experience, one of whom has gone far in advance, and turning back, can trace, step by step, in her own memory, the path the other has to go.

"Don't mistrust me, Winnie," said Mrs. Ochterlony. "I have had a little to bear, though I have been very happy, and I could tell you many things -though I will not, just now; but, Winnie dear, what I want is, that you should make up your mind to it; not to have everything you like, and live in a fairy tale, but to keep right and to keep him right. If you will promise to think of this, and to take it bravely upon you, I will still hope that

Her look was so serious that for the first time Winnie's heart misgave her. Neither jealousy, nor ill-temper, nor fear of evil report on her own side could have looked out of Mary's eyes at her little sister with such a wistful longing gaze. was moved and troubled in spite of herself, and thrilled by the first pang of uncertainty that had yet touched her. If Mary had no motive but natural affection, was it then really a hideous gulf of horrible destruction, on the verge of which she was herself tripping so lightly? Something indefinable came over Winnie's face as that thought moved her. Should it be so, what then? If it was to save him, if it was to perish with him, what did it matter? the only one place in the world for her was by his side. She had made her choice, and there was no other choice for her, no alternative even should she see the gulf as Curtius did, and leap conscious into it in the eye of day. All this passed through her mind in a moment, as she knelt by Mary's side holding her hauds-and came out so on her face that Mary could read something like it in the sudden changing of the fair features and expansion of the eyes. It-was as if the soul had been startled, and sprang up to those fair windows, to look out upon the approaching danger, making the spectator careless of their beauty, out of regard to the nobler thing that used them for the moment. Then Winnie rose up suddenly, and gave her sister a hearty kiss, and threw off her sudden gravity as if it had been a cloud.

"Enough of that," she said; "I will try and be good, and so I think will-we all. And Mary, don't look so serious. I mean to be happy, at least as long as I can," cried Winnie. She was the same Winuic again-gay, bold, and careless, before five minutes had passed; and Mary had said her say, and there was now no more to add. Nothing could change the destiny which the thoughtless young creature had laid out for herself. If she could have foreseen the distinctest wretchedness it would have been all the same. She was ready to take the plunge even into the gulf-and nothing that could be said or done could change it now.

In the meantime, Mr. Penrose had gone up to the Hall to talk it over with Sir Edward, and was explaining his views with a distinctness which was not much more agreeable in the Hall than it had been in the Cottage. "I cannot let it go on unless some provision can be made," he said. "Winnie is very handsome, and you must all see she might have done a great deal better. If I had her over in Liverpool, as I have several times thought of doing, I warrant you the settlements would have been of a different description. She might have married anybody, such a girl as that," continued Mr. Penrose, in a regretful business way. It was so much capital lost that might have brought in a much greater profit; and though he had no personal interest in it, it vexed him to see chooses to marry, and nobody else," said Sir Edward, testily; "and she is not a girl to do, as you seem to think, exactly as she is told."

"We should have seen about that," said Mr. Penrose; "but in the meantime, he has his pay and she has a hundred a year. If Mrs. Percival will settle three hundred on him, and you, perhaps,

"I, two!" cried Sir Edward, with sudden terror; "why should I settle two? You might as well tell me to retire from the Hall, and leave them my house. And pray, Mr. Penrose, when you are so liberal to other people, what do you mean to give vourself?"

"I am a family man," said Uncle Penrose, taking his other hand out of his pocket, "and what I can give must be, in justice to my family, very limited. But Mrs. Percival, who has only four sons, and yourself who have none, are in very different circumstances. If he had had a father, the business matter might have been entered into more satisfactorily-but as you are his godfather I hear-

"I never understood before, up to this minute," said Sir Edward, with great courtesy, "that it was the duty of a godfather to endow his charge with two hundred a year."

"I beg your pardon, Sir Edward," said Mr. Penrose; "I am a plain man, and I treat things in a business way. I give my godchildren a silver mug, and feel my conscience clear: but if I had introduced a young man, not otherwise very eligible, to a handsome girl, who might have done a great deal better for herself, that would make a great difference in the responsibility. Winnie Seton is of very good family by her father's side, as you know, I suppose, better than I do; and of very good business connections by her mother's; and her beauty is first-rate,-I don't think there can be any doubt about that. If she had been an ordinary pretty girl, I would not have said so much; but with all her advantages, I should say that any fair equivalent in the shape of a husband should be worth at least five thousand a year."

Mr. Penrose spoke with such seriousness that Sir Edward was awed out of his first feeling of amusement. He restrained his smile, and acknowledged the logic. "But I did not introduce him in any special way," he said. "If I can negotiate with Mrs. Percival for a more liberal allowance, I will do. it. She has an estate of her own, and she is free to leave it to any of her sons: but Edward, I fear, has been rather unsatisfactory-"

"Ah, wild?" said Mr. Penrose; "all young men are alike for that. I think, on the whole, that it is you who should negotiate with the mother. You know her better than I do, and have known all about it from the beginning, and you could show her the state of the case better. If such a mad thing could be consented to by anybody in their people throwing their chances away.

"That may be, but it is Edward Percival she would bring twice as much as the other into the common stock. If she were with me in Liverpool she would not long be Winnie Seton; and you may trust me she should marry a man who was worthy of her," the rich uncle added, with a confirmatory nod of his head. When he spoke of a man who should be worthy of Winnie, he meant no sentimental fitness such as Aunt Agatha would have meant, had she said these words, nor was it even moral worth he was thinking of. What Mr. Penrose meant, was a man who would bring a fair equivalent in silver and gold to Winnie's beauty and youth, and he meaut it most seriously, and could not but groan when he contemplated the possibility of so much valuable capital being thrown away.

And he felt that he had made a good impression when he went back to the Cottage. He seemed to himself to have secured Mrs. Percival's three hundred, and even Sir Edward's more problematical gift to the young people; and he occupied the interval in thinking of a silver tea-service which had rather caught his fancy, in a shop window, and which he thought, if his negotiations succeeded, he would give to his niece for a wedding present. If they did not succeed it would be a different question -for a young woman who married upon a captain's pay and a hundred a-year of her own, would have little occasion for a silver tea-service. So Mr. Penrose mused as he returned to the cottage. Under the best of circumstances it was now evident that there could be nothing to "settle" upon Winnie. The mother and the friends might make up a little income, but as for capital-which after all was what Mr. Penrose prized most—there was none in the whole matter, except that which Winnie had in her face and person, and was going to throw so lamentably away. Mr. Penrose could not but make some reflections on Aunt Agatha's feminine idiocy and the cruel heedlessness of Sir Edward, as he walked along the rural road. A girl who had so many advantages, whose husband, to be worthy of her, should have had five thousand a-year at the least and something handsome to "settle"-and yet her natural guardians had suffered her to get engaged to a captain in a marching regiment, with only his pay! No wonder that Mr. Penrose was sad. But he went home with a sense that, painful as the position was, he had done his duty, at least.

This was how Winnie's marriage got itself accomplished notwithstanding all opposition. Captain Percival was the second of his mother's four sons, and consequently the natural heir of her fortune if he had not been "foolish," as she said; and the thought that it might be the saving of him, which was suggested by Sir Edward, was naturally a very moving argument. A beautiful young wife whom he was very fond of, and who was ready to enter with him into all the risks of life,—if that did not keep him right, what would? And after all he was only five-and-twenty, an age at which reformation was quite possible. So his friends thought, persuading themselves with natural sophistry that the influence of love and a self-willed girl of eighteen would do what all other inducements had failed to do; and as for her friends, they were so elated to see that in the eyes of Uncle Penrose the young man's faults bore only the most ordinary aspect, and counted for next to nothing, that their misgivings all but disappeared, and their acceptance of the risk was almost enthusiastic. Sometimes indeed a momentary shadow would cross the mind of Aunt Agatha—sometimes a doubt would change Sir Edward's countenance—but then these two old people were believers in love, and besides had the faculty of believing what they wished to believe, which was a still more important circumstance. And Mary for her part had said her say. The momentary hope she had felt in Winnie's strength of character, and in her love-a hope which had opened her heart to speak to her sister-found but little to support it after that mement. She could not go on protesting, and making her presence a thorn in the flesh of the excited household; and if she felt throughout all a sense that the gulf was still there, though all these flowers had been strewed over ita sense of the terrible risk which was so poorly counterbalanced by the vaguest and most doubtful of hopes-still Mary was aware that this might be simply the fault of her position, which led her to look upon everything with a less hopeful eye. She was the spectator, and she saw what was going on as the actors themselves could not be expected to see it. She saw Winnie's delight at the idea of freedom from all restraint—and she saw Percival's suppressed impatience of the anxious counsels addressed to him, and the look which Winnie and he exchanged on such occasions, as if assuring each other that in spite of all this they would take their own way. And then Mrs. Ochterleny's own relations with the bridegroom were not of a comfortable kind. He knew apparently by instinct that she was not his friend, and he approached her with a solemn politeness under which Mary, perhaps over-sensitive on that point, felt that a secret sneer was concealed. And he made references to her Indian experiences, with a certain subtle implication of something in them which he knew and nobody else did-something which would be to Mrs. Ochterlony's injury should it be known-which awoke in Mary an irritation and exasperation which nothing else could have produced. She avoided him as much as it was possible to avoid him during the busy interval before the marriage, and he perceived it and thought it was fear, and the sneer that lay under his courtesy became more and more evident. He took to petting little Wilfrid with an evident consciousness of Mary's vexation and the painful effect it produced upon her; not Hugh nor Islay, who were of an age to be a man's plaything, but the baby, who was too young for any but a woman's interest; and Captain Percival was not the kind of man who is naturally fond of children. When she saw her little boy on her future brother-iu-law's knce, Mary felt her heart contract with an involuntary shiver, of which she could have given no clear explanation. She did not know what she was afraid of, but she was afraid.

Perhaps it was a relief to them all when the marriage day arrived-which had to be shortly, for the regiment was ordered to Malta, and Captain Percival had already had all the leave he could ask for. Mr. Penrose's exertions had been crowned with such success that when he came to Winnie's wedding he brought her the silver tea-service which in his heart he had decided conditionally to give her as a marriage gift. Mrs. Percival had decided to settle two hundred and fifty pounds a-year upon her son, which was very near Mr. Penrose's mark; and Sir Edward, after long pondering upon the subject, and a half-amused, half-serious consideration of Winnie's capital which was being thrown away, had made up his mind to a still greater effort. He gave the young man in present possession what he had left him in his will, which was a sum of five thousand pounds-a little fortune to the young soldier. "You might have been my son, my boy, if your mother and I could have made up our minds," the old baronet said, with a momentary weakness; though if anybody else had suggested such an idea po doubt Sir Edward would have said. "Heaven forbid!" And Mr. Penrose pounced upon it and had it settled upon Winnie, and was happy, though the bridegroom resisted a little. After that there could be no doubt about the teaservice. "If you should ever be placed in Mary's position, you will have something to fall back upon," Uncle Penrose said; "or even if you should not get on together, you know." It was not a large sum, but the difficulty there had been about getting it, and the pleasant sense that it was wholly owing to his own exertions, made it sweet to the man of capital, and he gave his niece his blessing and the tea-service with a full heart.

As for Winnie, she was radiant in her glow of beauty and happiness on that momentous day. A thunder-shower of sudden tears when she signed the register, and another when she was taking leave of Aunt Agatha, was all that occurred to overcloud her brightness; and even these did not overcloud her, but were in harmony-hot, violent, and sudden as they were-with the passionate happiness and emancipation of the married girl. She kissed over and over again her tender guardian-who for her part sat speechless and desolate to see her child go away, weeping with a silent anguish which could not find any words-and dropped that sudden shower over Aunt Agatha's gown; but a moment after threw back the veil which had fallen over her face, and looked back from the carriage window upou them in a flush of joy, and pride, and conscious freedom, which, had no other sentiments been called for at the moment, it would have done one's heart good to see. She was so happy that she could not cry, nor be sentimental, nor think of broken links, as she said—and why should she pretend to be sad about parting? Which was very true, no doubt, from Winnie's point of view. And there was not the vestige of a cloud about her when she waved her hand to them for the last time as she drove away. She was going away to the world and life, to see everything and enjoy everything, and have her day. Why should not she show her delight? While poor old Aunt Agatha, whose day was so long over, fell back into Mary's arms, who was standing beside her, and felt that now at last and finally, her heart was broken, and the joy of her life gone. Was it not simply the course of nature and the way of the world?

THE CHILD'S FLOWER LESSON.

How mild it is this morning, dear—Almost a summer-day;
It hasn't been so fine this year,
Although it's nearly May.
Now, don't you think, dear, that we ought,
Just while it keeps so bright,
To sow those seeds that father brought
From town the other night?

He dug the beds on Saturday,
And had the grass-plot mown,
And said that we should try to-day
To get the flower-seeds sown.
We put them all away, you know,
Upon the schoolroom shelf;
Just run and fetch them, while I go
To get the rake myself.

Well, dear, then you have found them all;
And now what shall we sow

Against the house, and near the wall
Where George's grape-vines grow?
I think it would be nice to set
A row of double stocks,
And then a row of mignonette
Between them and the box;
For then their scent will come indoors,
And make the air so sweet,
Whenever we have windows up
In time of summer heat.

How nicely father's dug and raked
The beds where we've to sow;
He knows when ground is rough and hard
Seeds cannot quickly grow;
Indeed, if it is very hard,
And seeds uncover'd lie,
They often do not grow at all,
But shrivel up and die.

And now, I think, beyond the stocks,
Before the schoolroom wall,
We ought to sow some hollyhocks:
There should be something tall.
And here we'll put some candy-tuft,
And blue nemophily,
And there, to climb upon the fence,
Canary-flowers must be.

The evening primroses shall come Against the garden gate,
That they may welcome father home
When he's at office late.
We'll put some larkspurs down this way,
Beside the middle walk;
And then we'll sow no more to-day,
But have a little talk.

For, do you know, dear, in the seeds, I think that I can see
A loving lesson that our God
Would teach to you and me.
Do you remember we are told
He sows year after year
Within our hearts, as we have sown
Within the garden here?

You know those Scripture parables
That father often reads,
Wherein our Lord compares the truth
To precious garden seeds.
And just as father gave all these
We sow'd to-day to you,
So God is giving seeds of truth
Day after day anew.

Within the Bible everywhere
These precious seeds abound,
And in a thousand other books
They also may be found.
We find them often in the books
We read at home ourselves,
Just where you found the flower-seeds—
Upon the schoolroom shelves.

We find them, too, on Sabbath-day
In what the preachers preach;
We find them every working-day
In what our teachers teach;
And whene'er we read or hear true things,
However small, each one

Is a seed that comes from God, as all The light comes from the sun.

And just as flower-seeds grow to flowers,
So should the truth's good seeds
Grow up in us to noble thoughts
And loving words and deeds;
Till we become as gardens fill'd
With things as sweet and fair
As yonder hidden violets,
Whose perfume fills the air—
Till all our life is fill'd with love
And truth and righteousuess,
With joy, and peace, and purity,
And gentle lowliness.

But often, through our sinfulness,
The truths sown in us lie
Just like the seeds in hard dry earth,
And wither up and die.
But just as father made our ground
Ready on Saturday,
God will prepare our souls—will take
The sinfulness away.

If we will ask Him, He will make
Within each one a place
Soften'd and fit for all His seeds,
By His good Spirit's grace.
And when they're sown that grace will come
Like gentle rain and dew,
And water them with tender care
Day after day anew.

And on them like the glorious sun
His rays of love will fall:
He is, in Christ, the Sun of Love,
Whose light enlightens all.
And thus each little seed of truth
Within our souls will grow,
And make them full of flowers of grace
Through all our life below.

And He will send to us at last
The messenger of love
That we call Death, to plant the flowers
Within His home above.
There they shall grow more beautiful
Than all that earth has known,
And shall be woven into wreaths
And laid before His throne.

A VISIT TO THE ANDAMAN ISLANDS (THE CONVICT SETTLE-MENT FOR INDIA).

BY A GOVERNMENT COMMISSIONER.

FOR many years the great highway to our mighty Indian Empire was round the Cape and through the Bay of Bengal: the latter a region subject to the most violent cyclones. In the very centre of the track traversed by our ships, lie a group of islands with magnificent harbours and protected headlands -provided as it were by an all-wise Providence to shelter the tempest-driven mariners. It might naturally be supposed that the security of so valuable a possession as these islands would have been one of the earliest acts of a generous natiou possessing such an important principality as India. But, no! the islands remained, until lately, in their primitive state of nature, without any attempt being made to civilise or reform the savage and barbarous people inhabiting them, who rejoiced in the discovery of a wreck, and gloried in the destruction of such unfortunates as happened to be cast on shore Far better had this natural harbour of refuge been sunk a hundred fathoms beneath the ocean, than that it should remain, attracting by its currents the shattered bark, whose navigators strove hard to avoid it, knowing full well the cruel death that awaited them if, peradventure, they drifted thither.

That the Andaman Islands should have been permitted to remain in this state since our first connection with India is a reproach to our rule; and had it not been for the mutiny amongst our native soldiers in 1857, the probability is that they would still have been in their natural barbarous condition. On this occasion, however, it became necessary to secure a locality for the reception of those dastards who had forgotten their allegiance, and, a careful exploration of these coasts having been made, it was resolved, in January, 1858, that henceforth the penal settlement for all India should be formed there.

Having resolved to visit this interesting locality, I took a passage in an American sailing ship of 1200 tons burden, chartered for the conveyance of troops from the coast of India to Burmah: whence there is regular communication with Port Blair, the position fixed on as a convict settlement. The ship was well adapted for the conveyance of troops, but, unfortunately for us, she had been employed in conveying elephants from Burmah for the use of the army in the field. With the food for these animals, myriads of auts of every variety and size, tarautulas, centipedes, scorpions, and a numerous fraternity of insects, had been conveyed into the hold, and these now tortured all on board. Cockroaches were so numerous and ravenous, that they devoured our nails and hair. All this was bad enough, but we were destined to suffer still more: for a horrible stench from animal and vegetable matter, in a state of compound decomposition, permeated the ship from stem to stern. Our voyage otherwise was unlucky, for, instead of making a direct passage across, which occupies eight days, adverse winds and currents, alternating with calms, kept us boxing about the bay for a month. We had about 600 souls on board, water and provisious being supplied for fifteen days for that number. In the second week, it being evident that our passage would be a long one, all were put on half rations. When we got to the north of the Andamans, the current ran like a sluice: and, had there been a breeze on to the island, we must have gone on shore. In the third week, our allowance of food and water was still further reduced. About this time we spoke a Dutch craft, which, like ourselves, was losing the one day what she had made the previous one. We offered her captain 100l. for a couple of days' water: but he said he was sixty days from the Cape, and his supply was also nearly exhausted. He further observed that he had been for eighteen days trying to force the Cocos passage, (a dangerous channel between the islands of that name and the North Andamans,) but the current was so strong that it had broken his sextant. On being asked to explain, he replied that, finding the observations at noon the very same day after day, he had that morning, in a fit of rage, dashed his instrument on the deck, and shattered it!

Failing in our endeavours to cross the bay, at the end of the third week we turned the ship's head to the Coromandel coast; for sickness as well as starvation now threatened us. The native soldiers, too, began to grumble, asserting that Government had sent them to sea to die. Our skipper alone took the matter philosophically. The ship was in a great measure his own property: he had bought it a bargain, and it had repaid him over and over again since he had had the good fortune to get Government to charter it, at the rate of 1000l. per month. When we were about thirty miles from the coast it became a dead calm. What with "cat's paws" (a term which sailors apply to a gentle puff just sufficient to ruffle the surface of the water) and currents, it took us six days to reach this place from the Cocos channel. Our water was now exhausted, and our food was nearly so. The water-casks and a portion of our spars had been burnt as fuel. Moreover the foul air had become so strong, that it issued in the form of steam from every open crevice, blackening the white paint in the cabins, smarting the eyes, causing nausca and sickness amongst all, and even threatening spontaneous combustion in the hold. Matters had now assumed a very serious aspect, for if no breeze sprang up we might still be kept at sea for days to come, and the distance was thought too great for us to communicate with the shore in an open ship's boat on that surf-beaten coast. At length, however it became imperative that something should be done; and knowing the coast better than any other on board, and being permitted to call for volunteers, the best boat was launched and I undertook to guide it and send relief from shore. Fortunately we fell in with a fisherman in his catamaran, about a couple of miles from the beach, and through his assistance our boat was safely landed in a creek, and the wants of all on board were speedily supplied. Soon after this I reached Burmah by another opportunity, and proceeded by a steamer to the Andaman Islands.

We reached Barren Island on the second day. This very singular volcano, which is always in a state of activity, lies in a direct line between the island of Java, wherein there are some twenty volcanoes in an active state—Sumatra, where also similar phenomena are known to exist—and that portion of the provinces of British Burmah which exhibits extinct craters, and where hot springs and moud volcanoes are now seen. Our first account of this volcanic rock is by Lieutenant Blair of the Indian Navy, who, writing in 1789, states that "it is in a state of violent eruption, ejecting large masses of rock and volumes of smoke and vapour from its summit." Horsburgh, in 1803, relates that "it exploded every ten minutes, save at the N.W. side, where there is a breach in the external wall, exposing a cone, ascending about 1000 feet in the centre of the original wall or outside shell of what once formed a crater of depression—the cone and great loose blocks of lava around it converting it now into a crater of elevation, from the summit of which there is a continuous flow of steam and occasional sulphur flakes, which fall over its side like snow." Both Lyell and Humboldt state that "the sea fills the circular valley around the cone." It is not so now: the space varies in breadth from fifty to one hundred feet, and has a general elevation of full twenty feet above the sea level. It consists of black basaltic, honey-combed masses, exceedingly difficult to walk over owing to their loose texture and innumerable spiculæ. The diameter of the island is said to be 2970 yards; that of the base of the ascending cone is 2000 feet. This latter describes an angle of forty degrees, its side being formed of loose scoria and fine ashes, rendering it a matter of no small difficulty to ascend and descend its sides. As our boat approached the shore the water gradually increased in heat; and steam ascended from apertures on the beach into which the salt water flowed and was ejected with force. A large Newfoundland dog leapt from the boat to swim on shore, but when he got into the hot water he whined piteously, turned round and made for sea. A thermometer inserted into one of the apertures rose to 170°, and in the fissures on the summit of the cone it marked 210°. Here there is a small crater of depression, on the sides of which are great vents encrusted with sulphur aud gypsum or sulphate of lime. The surface is disagreeably hot even to stand on, and sulphurous acid in the form of steam oppresses respiration. Externally, on the sea face, the rock dips from the centre outwards on three sides beneath the surface of the ocean, and no soundings have been found at 150 fathoms, except at the time of our approach on the N.E. angle, where, at a quarter of a mile from the shore, the depth varies from four to fourteen fathoms. The valley round the cone, except that part which is filled with masses of rugged lava, upon which no vegetation grows, is covered with long coarse grass, a few stunted shrubs, and miserable ferns.

There is a brilliant transparency in the sea about midway between Barren Island and the Andaman group. On the occasion of my voyage, the surface was like a mirror, and in one place fishes were seen swimming about over the bright sand at the bottom: and rocks, shells, and beautiful coral trees were as distinctly visible as if only a few feet of water intervened, whereas the depth on sounding was found to vary from ten to fourteen fathoms. The appearance of this garden, for it really was so, at such a depth beneath the ocean, was grand, and we had an excellent opportunity of observing it; for, imagining that the ship was working into shoal water, she steamed along at slow speed until the bank was passed. All around the archipelago of islands in this quarter, navigation is renhazardous by coral dered banks approaching the surface; and that referred to probably exhibits the early formation of one.

The Andaman archipelago may be said to consist of, first, the Great Andaman group, situated near the meridian of 93° east, and between the tenth and fifteenth parallels of north latitude-divided by narrow channels into north, middle and south, the length of the three being about 140 miles and the extreme breadth twenty, and representing a probable superficial area of some 2000 square miles; second, the Cocos Islands, thirty-five miles to the N.E., consisting of a larger island, whose diameter is six miles by two, and a smaller one, three miles long by one bread; and third, the Nicobar Islands, lying on the opposite side, distant seventy miles, and numbering nine in all—the most southern of which is twenty miles long and eight across.

The general contour of the Andaman Islands proper is an undulating surface of hills, descending in elevation from Saddle Mountain, 2400 feet, on the south island, to hills of 800 feet, 500 feet, and so on, to the sea level, with apparent plane surfaces of some extent in the intermediate spaces: the whole being clothed with a dense forest of gigantic trees, underwood, and twining creepers.

Silicious sandstone crops out from the banks, and is seen in masses all along the sea shore, encrusted with coral wherever exposed to the sea. The shores everywhere are of coral formation, and as far inland as the ground has been turned over by the convicts, shells and coral are found at varying depths beneath the surface—sometimes in agglomerate masses, with granite, limestone, and varieties of compact lava intermixed. The surface soil resembles that of Burmah and our possessions in the Straits of Malacca, and so open is it, that in sinking wells roots of trees are found at a depth of forty feet. Much rich mould is washed down, which, mingling with the sand, causes mangrove to spring up in many places along the shores into trees of considerable elevation.

There are no villages or permanent residents in any part of the islands, the tribe inhabiting them being in constant motion from one locality to another in search of food. They go in groups of from fifty to several hundreds, and seldom remain above a few days in one place. Their numbers are supposed not to exceed five thousand.

An Andaman hut may be considered the rudest attempt of the human species to seenre shelter from the weather. It consists of a few sticks, fastened together at the top, the other end being fixed in the ground. A thatch composed of branches and leaves completes the structure. Or the long reeds that grow all along the coast are bound together in the form of a cone, and the space cleared beneath: an opening being left in each case on the sheltered side, just large enough to creep into. The floor is strewed with dry leaves. In these huts we found the skulls of wild hogs suspended from the roof, but little else, for when they move they bear away with them their weapons.

Ages ago, Ptolemy designated the inhabitants of these islands anthropophagi or man-eaters; and two Mohammedan travellers of the ninth century have left the following description of them: "They eat human flesh quite raw, their complexion is black, their hair frizzled,* their countenance frightful." But the following picture of their personal appearance, partly drawn by Colonel Symes, is precisely as I found them: "In height they are rather under than over five feet; their limbs are slender, their bellies protuberant, they have high shoulders and large heads, flat noses, thick lips, small red eyes, frizzly hair, skin of a deep sooty black, long white irregular canine teeth, and a countenance exhibiting a horrid mixture of famine and ferocity." Until recently these miscrable savages were supposed to be cannibals, but this idea has been satisfactorily refuted; and if they ever do eat human flesh, they do not do so by preference, but from starvation and hunger. It is known that they bury their dead; and the bodies of those killed by them have been sometimes found untouched, although occasionally they have been discovered in a torn and mangled condition. Moreover they have of late been frequently found roasting their fish over a fire on bits of bamboo. Nevertheless, when it is considered that they do not cultivate the soil, that the only animal in their forests is the hog, that they are dependent for food on fish, fruit, and esculent roots, and that they are among the very lowest in the savage scale of eivilization, they may be presumed to have been sometimes driven to the necessity of eating human flesh. They have no pot or vessel that will bear the action of fire; they eat the fruit of the hard mangrove and esculent herbs and roots, after steeping them in an embanked puddle of mud and water.

Their principal food, however, is fish and shell-fish, rats, guanas, lizards and snakes. They are expert fishers in their own way; they have haud nets and wicker baskets, but do not appear to use hook and line or large nets. When the tide retires they seize the fish left in pools ou the irregular coral beach, or spear and shoot them with arrows in the water by the light of a torch; and sometimes two or more, armed with a sharpened bit of hoop iron, will dive into deep water and even seize the shark.

When they fail to obtain a sufficient supply of food at one spot, they proceed to another part of the coast. Their canoes are usually hollowed out by fire and sharp implements made of stone, coral, and shell: the largest seen could contain eight persons, and had an out-rigger to steady it in the water. Spears and arrows are their only weapons, both being barbed and headed with hard wood, fish bones, or sharp shells.

Both sexes go quite naked; but some of them wear a cord and tassel of fibre round their waist. Attached to the cord is a boar's tusk, sharp shell, or sharpened bit of iron. They pass their whole time in search of food or in sleep. In the morning they plaster themselves with mud from head to foot, or wallow in it like buffaloes, to prevent the annoyance of insects. While the women repair to the reefs at the recess of the tide, the men hunt in the woods, or perch themselves on rocks ready to shoot large fish at a distance, or to spring upon those that happen to approach them. Practice has rendered them unerring marksmen both with the bow and spear. Their hostility to strangers is unremitting. Sometimes they express their aversion in a loud and threatening voice and with contemptuous signs. At other times, with the most insidious intent, they assume a show of humility, appearing quiet and docile, and affecting to enter into a friendly conference. After accepting with greed such articles as are presented to them, they set up a shout of defiance and discharge their arrows at the donors.

On the approach of a boat they frequently lie in ambush, sending one of their gang to the water's edge to endeavour to allure the strangers on shore. The moment they succeed they rush out of their hiding-places. Some plunge into the water to secure the boat, while others, with cruel and savage treachery, exhibit their sanguinary disposition, by rushing on their unfortunate victims, seizing their throats with their hands and teeth, piercing their bodies with their sharp weapons, and pounding them with stones.

Such has been and still is to a great extent the true character of this barbarous race. Their unremitting hostility to those whom they suspect of desiring to invade their land, has been ascribed to two causes, both being perhaps correct. The one is that they retain a tradition of their origin as once being in a state of slavery, and originally cast ashore on these islands from a wrecked slaver, the master and crew of which they put to death; and the other is, that becoming isolated from their kinsmen on the peninsula, they believe that there is a general desire on the part of those who visit them to kidnap and bear them away into slavery, for it is known that during the north-east monsoon, parties from the Malay coast of Sumatra visit the Andamans in their prahus for the purpose of collecting edible nests and sea-slugs, or biche-de-mer, and that they really do enslave such as they can seize.

"Their religion," observes Colonel Symes, "is the simple but genuine homage of nature to the incomprehensible Ruler of the universe, expressed in adoration of the sun, the moon, the genii of the woods, &c. In the spirit of the storms they confess the influence of a malignant being, and during the south-west monsoon, when tempests prevail with unusual violence, they deprecate his wrath with wild choruses, which they chant in congregations on the beach or on some rock that overlangs the ocean." Let us hope that an all-wise Providence which has entrusted Great Britain with the humanising of these islanders, will bless and prosper the good work entered on after a century of inaction. Under the merciful orders of the Government of India, which directs that musketry is on plunge in the water, and seeing his prisoner rise at no occasion to be had recourse to against the aborigines, except in extreme cases, there is now less rancour shown by them towards us; and although there has not yet been any general attempt on their part to fraternise, they have already passed from open hostility to robbing and pilfering in daylight before the eyes of our people; or, cat-like, stealing in at night, usually for articles of food. Even occasional timid and voluntary approaches are made by some one of their tribe.

During one of these encounters four men and a woman were scized: the woman, by means of her agility and the free use of her nails and teeth, contrived to slip from her captors. One of the men, also, although heavily handcuffed, managed to get out of his guard-room unseen by the sentry, who was only made aware of his escape by hearing a some distance to the surface to breathe, then dive again and reappear on the main shore beyond. The following notes relating to the three others captured on this occasion, drawn up by Lieutenant Hillard of the Indian Navy, will repay perusal:—

"Thursday, 10th January.—Went up in the launch, and found the three aborigines captured at Viper Island in the stocks, and apparently quite indifferent; taken to the boat, handcuffed with their hands behind their backs. In beating down, they seemed to expect to be landed whenever we neared the shore: they instantly asked for punno (water), and all three at the same moment managed to bring their hands in frent. On landing at Ross Island they were very sullen, but ate plaintains freely, or anything else that was given them. During the night one remained awake, and two out of the three managed to get off their handcuffs, their wrists being remarkably small. A man was appointed to look after each, and they named them Punch, Friday, and Crusoc, with the surname of Blair. They did not appear the least astonished at anything they saw, and they do not like the men over them to leave them.

"11th.—Fish being brought for them, Crusoe turned 200k, opening and cleaning them with his teeth, and, when done, dividing all equally; this finished, he roasted green plaintains, and they all ate enormously. During the night the one on watch, Punch, fancied the sentry was asleep, and awoke the others to be ready for a run. He then crept to the bottom of the bed, but a box on the ear soon convinced him that if Jack did sleep, it was with his weather-eye open. When taken they were quite in a state of nature, but to-day they were fressed and taken up to the Superintendent's house. Here they appeared somewhat surprised, particularly at a large mirror, at which they grinned. Mr. Punch wished to take ornaments from the neck of one of the native women. They now are not the least afraid, although at times very sullen.

"13th.—Being Sunday, all three were nicely dressed in white, with straw hats with 'I. N. Brigade' on the ribbon, which was a vast improvement. Their height is: Friday Blair, 4 feet 10 inches; Punch Blair, 5 feet 4 inches; Crusoe Blair, 5 feet 2½ inches. In the afternoon they went for a walk on the beach, and went over the gun-boat, walking after their keepers in a quiet orderly manner. Everything like metal they admire and want, and when the handcuffs were removed they did not wish them to be taken away, and at the black-smith's shop they wanted to take away all the bar iron. In the evening, seeing the new moon for the first time, they called out 'Auckalarcoo,' and commenced dancing, and insisted on the men doing so with them, clapping with their hands to keep time, so that this is no doubt a great day with them.

"14th.—They seem to improve daily, and their health is good. They all went to see the men at work at their different trades, but seemed only to care for the blacksmith and tinker. Punch seeing an English woman wished to kiss her, and Friday took the chain, a silver one, off an ayah's neck, which was of course returned. Seeing me he came up, and taking hold of my beard, put his hand inside my shirt collar, to see whether I had a chain of any kind. He also made signs to another officer, that he would cut his throat for his gold chain and ring. They are apparently fond of all animals, and have constantly a cat or a dog in their arms. They are very suspicious of our food, will take anything uncooked; and share all they get equally. At one meal they will eat a bunch of plaintains weighing nine seers, or eighteen pounds, besides meat. When the natives of India are near them they mutter at them: it is impossible to catch the words, but it appears from their manner to be abuse. They were asking for their fish today, and having none, a pigeon was given to each, which they cleaned and boiled, but they were very much puzzled to see four killed at one shot. Crusoe seeing a spyglass took it up, and brought it to the ready, taking aim at the same time; he then made a noise with his mouth, and threw his head back, as if he was killed. The working party at Aberdeen were attacked to-day, and driven in with the loss of all their tools, and a party of men were sent but saw nothing of the aborigines, although they recovered some of the axes, &c. The officer states that he should say about twenty had been there; the natives report fifty. A strong guard will be in future sent to protect the convicts. The savages are evidently accustomed to food the instant they awake, and if anything is left they roll it up in a piece of cloth; in the same way they hide away bits of iron of any kind. They seem quite resigned, and do not appear to care for their own free land.

"15th.-The aborigines again attacked and wounded the convicts working in the jungle, also one of the Schundy Guard, but three were taken prisoners, and brought over. Two are old men, and the other a nico-looking lad. One of them, the oldest, who has been injured in the back, apparently by a shot some time before, knocked over eight natives before he was taken prisoner. Some bows and arrows were taken with these men; who are nearly the same as the others, and all about the same height. Their teeth appear to be all worn down flat, not sharp, like other people's. On their being taken to the barracks their friends came to meet them, but they are not of the same party apparently, and they did not show any sign of pleasure at seeing them. Signs were made to take them to the wash-house, and here they were scrubbed, except the injured man, who was carefully placed on a cot until the arrival of medical aid, when he was fomented on the back, and had some medicine, and he slept for some time, and could then eat a good supper. At night these three were taken to another part of the barracks, when they all became frightened, and clung to the men in charge, and begged them not to let them go. To make them quite easy they were shown where they were going, and they went to bed quite contentedly. They dance and they went to bed quite contentedly. They dance and sing every evening, but they require to be constantly watched, as they want everything they see. One of the men passed during the day with some fresh pork, and they caught hold of him, and insisted on having some, calling out 'Rhogo! Rhogo!' (pig. pig.) The instant food is given to them they eat it; and if you tell them that they do not want it, they draw in their stomachs as though they wished you to understand they were sometre. The they wished you to understand they were empty. The men taken to-day are very much thinner than the others, and their heads are all shaved: one has the great toe of his right foot ent off, and he says it was taken off by a large clam. He is named Toeless Blair; the other has a long scar extending from the knee down to the ankle, and is named Tuesday Blair: the other is named Jumbo Blair. Crusoe was most anxious to have them dressed, and without being told they took off all the wild ornaments and threw them down. One man had a large quantity of rubbish about his neck, also a convict's ticket, and a Brahmin's thread, and two old rusty nails.

"16th.—This morning they were in sad tribulation because they had no fish, and the beef and vegetables given by the steward did not satisfy them; but before eleven some came up, and they were perfectly frantic, dancing and caressing the man who brought it up. Mr. Crusoe turned doctor. He got the sick man up, washed his back with cold water, and punctured it all over with a sharp piece of glass, which appeared to relieve him vastly, and he then washed off the blood, and turned to clean and cook the fish, eating all the small ones first, and leaving the coarser kind for the evening meal. In the evening they danced to the fiddle, and appeared in high glee.

"17th.—About half-past three Punch made his escape, taking his handcuffs, for these were too precious to be left behind. Every search was made immediately, but the jungle gave him shelter until he swam to the mainland, to fetch which he must be an expert swimmer, as it was blowing hard and a good sea rolling in. Friday had his irons off his hands, and was evidently ready to start, but the first noise caused an alarm, and to his no small anneyance all his hopes were frustrated. On the principle of locking the stable door after the steed is stolen, the whole of them were placed in slight leg irons, which will at least prevent their removing far. All day they have been very sullen, and when out their eyes seem to be constantly fixed on Atalanta Point, as though they expected aid from that quarter.

"18th.—This morning, when raining, they went out, and took their clothes off first, so that they might not get wet. They still keep sullen, and are evidently ready for wet. They still keep suiten, and are evidently ready for a bolt, provided they see a favourable opportunity; and with no place of security, and their well-known cunning, it is impossible to keep them, however strongly watched. Shortly before sunset, the air being cool and damp, I found them sitting round the fire.

"19th.—No fish being caught to-day they had only plaintains, and in the evening Crusoe went up to H. Smith and kissed him, at the same time pointing to the barracks, and making signs he was hungry, for sometimes they went to the men's messes of an evening, but since the escape it has not been allowed.

"20th.—Irons are not at all pleasant, and to hear them growl is not bad. They are very anxious to have them taken off, and towards dark they pretended to have pains in all their limbs. Crusoe asked, so as to be understood, when he would be let go.

"21st.—To-day they beg hard to have the irons off, and promise, as well as they can, not to run away, but it must not be done.

"22nd.—Not at all pleased at having to clean their room out; the beds they are almost too lazy to wash, but would eat all day if allowed.

I frequently observed these three men, who were sent to Rangoon, and afterwards to Moulmein to be educated. On landing, and seeing a man on horseback, they were in ecstacies of delight, all three desiring to get on the horse's back at the same time. They minutely examined his eyes and mouth, and crept under him. It was found impossible to instruct them, for although they possess strong imitative powers, attempts to impart knowledge of any sort proved fruitless. At length they began to pine in health, and kept continually gazing at the ocean, and pointing in the direction of their island home. One fierce night, when the wind blew so strong that no boat could venture out, they disappeared from their keeper at Moulmein, and a boat having been missed by some one, it was presumed that they had taken it. Next day they were brought back by the guardboat-men at the month of the river, who, perceiving the little bark deliberately putting to sea in such tempestuous weather, put out and seized it. Shortly after this one of these savages died, and finding it utterly hopeless to instruct the two others, who were also unwell, they were taken back to their island, and landed on the exact spot where they were captured, loaded with such articles as would likely be acceptable to others of their tribe. They exhibited great joy at being again set free, carefully removed bundle after bundle from the boat to an open spot on the beach, shook hands with the boat's crew, and disappeared in the thicket with as much on their shoulders as they could bear with them.

I will now give a translation of a report made by an intelligent native officer, one of the convicts, of an interview of a friendly character which he chanced to have with a body of the aborigines :-

"On the 19th of the present month I went to the hospital in Viper Island. After nine o'clock of that day a convict came and informed me that a boat of savages was going from north to south. As I had never seen savages before, and wished to see them, I went to the north-west point of the island, where there were a house and gardens which were under the care of a native doctor.

"When I reached the north of the gardens, I saw at a short distance a new boat with four savages in it, going from the western jungle toward the east. They replied in their own language, and came towards us half the distance they first were. I began to think what their intention could be, and, suspecting mischief, I and the others who were with me concealed ourselves behind some trees that had been previously felled, so that if they shot at us with their arrows we should be concealed behind their trunks.

"They, in the meantime, with gestures and signs made known to us that they intended landing towards the west, and asked us to go there. A hundred convicts had been employed on work at a station called 'Poordoogan,' and also to watch the savages. I had doubts in my mind that they would send their arrows after us. but the savages went to the spot they had pointed out. I dispersed the convicts, who were before collected in "The savages brought their boat as near as they could, that is, till they were stopped by stones, and we could then see that they had several bows and arrows with them. One of the savages came down and walked up to the beach, and all our party, as well as the convicts pre-sent, thought a great object had been gained in getting one of them to land, and all were exceedingly anxious to go and see him. But I thought that if we approached him, it was probable that the others would take up their bows and arrows immediately and shoot at us, which might cause loss of life. On this account I forbade anybody's going near him, and made signs to the others to come down also. When they saw from the convicts having dispersed to a distance from the beach, and from our leaving alone the one who had landed, that we intended them no harm, two more landed from the boat and joined the one who had done so previously. These three, who were unarmed, called to us by signs and gestures to come near. Thinking that as three were on shore and only one in the boat, if the latter even should choose to shoot arrows at us, we might easily catch him and possess ourselves of the boat, I went near them, upon which a swarm of three or four hundred collected in a circle round to see what was going on.

"In the meantime one of the three took hold of my cloth and said Kupra, and pulled it. Then we saw that they desired to have clothes. Upon which I took red 'doopattas' from my orderlies, Bhuggoree, Sikka, and Buggoonundum, and others, and put them on their heads as turbans, and dressed them with 'mirzaes' and 'dhoties.' They now (in their dress) presented to us the appearance of Madras men, and began dancing with district their custom.

"To gratify them farther, I sent for some sweet 'luddoos,' and gave some to each and told them to eat them. First of all they smelt them and then ate them, and whatever was left they tied up in their clothes. From the appearance of their forehead and eyebrows we could see that they relished what they were eating. But from not being accustomed to such things, they could not eat much, and consequently kept the remainder.

"Then, hand to hand, they went with us wherever we wished. At length they saw a stream of fresh water, and made signs to us that they wanted to drink. I sent for some water in a lota, out of which the one who drank did it in such a manner as to show us that he was not unaccustomed to its use. One of the savages then made signs to us to send water and other things to the man that had remained behind in the boat. We did not understand what he meant, but the man in the boat evidently understood the signs. We thought all he meant to say was that the man who had remained in the boat was left behind in charge of it.

"At length, after I had made signs several times, the "At length, after I had made sight several lines, the man called out something or other which sounded like 'Thurma-na,' which we thought meant, 'Shall I bring my bow?' To which we replied, 'Don't bring it.' At last he also got down from the boat and came nearer. We then sent him clothes, water, and sweetmeats.
"'We showed them a field of 'cucumbers' to see whether they knew anything about them, and I plucked and gave one to one of them. The savage smelt it, but did not eat it. Then the native doctor broke and ate it, and put it also with his own hands into the mouth of the savage. Each ate a piece, and then they seemed delighted with the field, and asked us by signs whether the field contained what they had just ate. We saw from their wearing clothes, and also from having eaten the sweetmeats, that they had acquired a taste for them. The savages seeing the convicts with irons round their necks and about their legs, desired to possess them also, and asked us for them. Whatever they wanted we gave them, and they put them round their necks and seemed quite delighted with their possession. They in their turn gave us what ornaments they had round their necks. We then gave them, besides what we had already given some log irons and other simple constants. given, some leg-irons and other similar ornaments. "We asked them to come to the house. They came with us as far as the garden, where a very large crowd assembled to see them. The savages did not seem to wish to go into the house. I did not, after having before treated them kindly, wish to force them to go into the house. At length one of them found a piece of a broken bottle; he thought it something valuable, and hid it in his cloth. "When we went up to one of the houses, we were followed by the savages, who, perceiving things in it, wished to possess every green thing they saw,—from which we concluded they wanted pieces of glass and iron.

"Wherever they saw red or any very white cloth, they immediately asked for it; everybody gave them something, according to his means.

"We thus, for about two hours and a half, were in friendly intercourse with them; and the savages ceased to be afraid of us. Some of our people were anxious to put them back into their boat and take them to Captain Haughton, the superintendent of the settlement. I thought it would be against our chief's wish to compel the savages to do so, and nobody molested them. We thought the ages of two of the savages the same as our native doctor, which was not more than sixteen. faces were covered with red sand, like the faces of Hindoo idols, and their arms were tattooed like the Burmese.

"I have not the slightest doubt from my interview with these people that, even after I leave the island, should these people ever return from friendship to the spot and receive the same civility, that the objects of our chief in sending me to the spot will be fully accomplished."

We have had several severe conflicts with the savages. In April, 1858, a party of 248 convicts, engaged in clearing the jungle, were attacked by 200 natives. Five were killed and five wounded; and the rest being driven away, the savages seized their tools. Some time after this, another party of 1500 savages, armed with axes and other weapons stolen from the settlers, in addition to their own bows and arrows, made an attack on a party of 446 workmen; when three of the latter were killed on the spot, and six severely wounded. The rest retreated to their boats, under the fire of the naval guard-boat moored close by for their protection, leaving the savages in possession of their encampment, working implements, and utensils.

During our early occupation of the island, convicts absconded in large gangs, under the impression that they would be admitted into the service of the Rajah whom they supposed governed it. Few lived to return, and those who did had each their doleful tale to tell of the sufferings they underwent. One, Doodnath, formerly a sepoy of the 14th Regiment B.N.I., who resided with the savages for a year, made his appearance one day, and gave notice of an intended attack which actually did take place at Aberdeen, one of the chief convict settlements, by a body of 1500 natives. This man's interesting narrative is as follows:-

"I was landed at Port Blair on the 6th of April, 1858, and escaped on the 23rd, with 130 others, to take service with the Rajah of Burmah whom we supposed governed the country. We took as much food with us as we could carry, but lost the greater part of it in forcing our way through the tangled jungle. For fourteen days we kept together, and were greatly distressed for want of food and drink, and nearly devoured by leeches and other vermin. On the fourteenth day we were surrounded and ettaked. On the fourteenth day we were surrounded and attacked by a large body of the aborigines, and although by sup-plicating attitudes we did all we could to conciliate them, they rushed with fury upon us and appeared to destroy all. I received three wounds, a blow on the head which knocked me down, a stab in the chest, and a deep cut in my arm. Assuming death till the party left, I rose, and along with three others also badly wounded, moved on I knew not where. Seeing savages approaching we hid ourselves, but perceiving us they fired their arrows. My two comrades were killed, and I was wounded in two more places. The savages then came up, and finding me still alive they made me leave my hiding place; and after talking a great deal amongst themselves, for some reason unknown to use they dressed my wounds with red reason unknown to me they dressed my wounds with red earth, raised me by putting their arms under mine, removed me to a boat, and took me to an island distant about two hours, where they placed me in a hut and I soon got better. During the entire time I was with them I lived as they did, wearing no clothes, and having my hair always cut close by a bit of glass, by one of their women. At first they regarded me with suspicion; if even I took up one of their bows they would remove it away from me, and make me sit down. But after four months one Pooteah made over his daughter, Leepah, twenty years of age, and another man, Herah, made over his daughter, Jejah, sixteen years old, to me in marriage

"I think I must have seen in all 15,000 inhabitants, men, women, and children, in the different islands; and usually encountered one of their encampments every three or four miles: their chief abodes being on or near the coast. But parties go daily into the forest for fruit, wild coast. But parties go daily into the forest for fruit, wild pig, &c. All appear one tribe, and speak one language. They are not cannibals, nor do they eat uncooked food, and although savage to strangers they are kind to one another. They did not appear to me to have any religion. They have no knowledge of shame, and are bold and fearless. Their few wants are 'easily satisfied'; subsisting entirely on wild fruit and fishing. The women seldom go into the jungle along with the men, but remain on the beach cooking, and carrying water, sometimes several miles, in hollow bamboos. They are always the barbers of the tribe, shaving and tatooing with a bit of glass ground in the shape and size of a bean, as sharp as a penknife. They are also the doctors, applying red of glass ground in the shape and size of a bean, as sharp as a penknife. They are also the doctors, applying red earth and turtle oil externally, and scarify freely with the sharp glass in every case of sickness. They carry their children slung over the shoulder by means of the bark of a tree, and are very much attached to their offspring, exhibiting intense grief when a child dies. Burials generally take place the day after death, with weeping and marked signs of emotion on the part of the near relatives. The body, being tied up in a bundle of thongs, so as to occupy a small space, is placed in a hole thongs, so as to occupy a small space, is placed in a hole and covered up. Some months afterwards, the bones are disenterred, and divided amongst the deceased's relatives.

"Four days is a long period for a party to occupy an encampment. They are a powerful race: climb trees like monkeys, swift runners, dexterous fishers and hunters, monkeys, swift runners, dexterous assers and nunters, great swimmers and divers, some four or five dive together and bring up a large fish. They have keen senses, eyes, nose, and ears; their vision penetrating great depths into the sea and jungles. I never saw them at a loss for food, so cannot say anything about their endurance in this respect. I never saw them suffer from epidenic, as cholera, although they often have bowel disorders and favores.

"Having resided with them one year and twenty-four days, I got very tired of their society; a great longing possessed me to rejoin my comrades, and I always looked for an opportunity to do so, although I was fond of both my wives, especially Leepah. A chance soon occurred, for I learned that a great body of the savages plotted a descent on the settlement of Aberdeen in the hopes of destroying all there. After many days, about 2500 collected for this purpose, and I succeeded in deserting the day before the threatened attack, and prepared the authorities to repel it, which they have done; for which act the Sircar has given me my liberty and permitted me to return to my home in Hindostan."

A vocabulary of the language of the savages has been prepared, so that now some communication can be carried on with them. The following is a specimen:—

The marked progress in the development of the resources of these interesting islands, and the praiseworthy efforts that have been made by the small band of Europeans stationed there since the Sepoy revolt, to conciliate the aborigines, invest the subject with an abiding interest. Probably the day is not far distant when we shall find them by no means a despicable adjunct to our insular possessions in the East. Ages ago Ptolemy singularly enough designated them the insula bona fortuna. By what prophetic process of reasoning in those remote times he hit upon so apposite a nomenclature, it is beyond our slender classic lore to penetrate. Such, however, is the fact. Possessing, as we now discover, very many of the essential natural elements of a prosperous land, it is only a matter of surprise that the fertile soil has so long been suffered to rest in wild sterility, and the nomade inhabitants to continue bereft of the benefits and blessings of civilized life. Under our energetic rule we may confidently look for the rapid advancement of the former, and although the civilisation of the latter may, in the outset, prove an uphill and possibly a somewhat disheartening undertaking, its accomplishment is now simply a question of time.

Our settlement is formed in the exact locality where Lieutenant Blair failed to establish his upwards of seventy years ago; because, as was not unusual in those days, he set nature's laws at defiance, and gave perhaps little or no heed to sanitary precautionary measures. On the present occasion, not only were well-skilled officers, who had made this important science their study, selected to fix upon a locality, but an experienced medical officer was also first sent there as general superintendent over the new convict settlement.

He first fixed the headquarters of the establishment on three islets in a magnificent land-locked bay, denominated Port Blair, which opens to the east, and extends to the west and north seven miles, having a varying breadth of from one to three miles. Ross Island lies right across the entrance into the port. It is one mile in length and three-quarters of a mile in breadth. Chatham Island is at the centre of the bay, and the water here is so deep that a 1000-ton ship can run along its shore loaded; Viper Island is further up the bay. These islets were first cleared as abodes for the convicts, and from thence they were sent to work on the mainland.

Port Blair is on the extreme south of the group of Andamans, and on the opposite or west side is another spacious bay, with an intermediate forest of about five miles in extent. When this space is opened up, a wholesome percolation of pure sea breeze will be secured to the settlement, free from the influence of the force of the monsoons passing over a sterile extent of uncleared jungle. Reasoning therefore from analogy, everything promises well for the future success of this important settlement.

The great subject which at present engages the attention of statesmen and reflecting men in this country is the best means of disposing of that unfortunate class of our population whose determined career in crime resists all attempts at reformation.

During the last two years the public have been discussing the merits of the present system of penal servitude in this country, contrasted with our old experience of transportation with hard labour abroad, and the conclusion appears universal, that both plans are so beset with faults that they can continue no longer; and in this view the Government appear also to concur.

By the present system we send the most profligate and hardened criminals to associate with those who, by hunger or other powerful temptations, have fallen for the first time, so that these last may be made perfect in crime; and by this system we have colonised some of the most valuable spots on the face of the earth with the lowest dregs of our population and their descendants, who are trained up in an atmosphere of vice, and deter by their presence wholesome emigration. The beneficent wisdom of Providence, which appears to have provided those valuable and sparsely-peopled places as resorts for the superabundant population of the more civilised world, has thus been thwarted.

What we want therefore is a happy medium between the two extreme systems; and recognising the absolute necessity of possessing the power to banish a certain class of criminals to a penal settlement abroad, I would select for this purpose a locality possessing the following advantages:—

1st. An insular position of moderate dimensions, capable of being effectually guarded and of being kept under complete sanitary control, and affording an extensive field for hard labour of a productive character.

2nd. It ought to possess either no aboriginal population at all, or only a scanty savage race, who would hold no communication with the convicts.

3rd. It should be strictly a settlement for convicts alone, male and female, and be contiguous to rich and extensive British possessions, which require a population to develope their resources, and where the progeny of the convicts might be transferred at an early age for the purpose of being trained up under Government as settlers, far removed from the deteriorating proximity of their parents.

The Andaman Islands appear to possess these necessary qualities—their proximity to Burmah affording an outlet for the surplus convict population. The military garrison in Burmah is chiefly composed of Europeans, and there are a large number of European civilians congregated at the several seaports. The natives of the country are a frank and genial race, free from that caste prejudice and bigotry, which impose a bar to all association with our Asiatic subjects elsewhere. The country everywhere is thinly peopled. Wars in former days had decimated the male inhabitants, and there is a continual struggle for existence owing to the scanty population being unable to keep down the exuberant vegetation. Here are extensive mountain ranges, which if cultivated would far surpass our tea, coffee, and cinchona fields in India; and thousands of square miles of well watered rich delta, where the labour of the cultivator alone is necessary to turn it into a perennial garden of cotton, sugar-cane, and rice.

To this land I would remove the convict progeny in early infancy from the abode of their parents on the Andaman group, and would train them under Government in all mechanical arts—as tradesmen, engineers, land surveyors—in the common principles of medicine and sanitary science, and as cultivators of the soil; and selecting the most healthy localities, would lay down fixed plans for their dwelling-places, with grants of land apportioned to each of them.

As regards the salubrity of the Andaman group, I may state, that on our early occupation of these islands, when there was as yet little or no shelter. when drainage received little consideration, and when such huts as were raised were surrounded with standing jungle, or, what was worse, felled jungle, the mortality amongst the convicts was excessive. The European guard over them also suffered much from bowel disorders and febrile affections; but gradually, as the islets first occupied became cleared and cultivated, the sickness lessened. When I visited the settlement, immediately after the rains. which is the most unhealthy period of the year, the sickness was not inordinate; and in no part of India did I ever see Europeans in more robust health than the hundred men of the Naval Brigade who kept guard over the convicts, there being none on the sick list. Officers and children also had an appearance of health which, except on the hills, is never seen in India.

QUAKER PHILANTHROPY.

Whatever opinion the public at large may have as to the theological doctrines or the manners and habits of the Society of Friends, there can be but one opinion about their philanthropy. Of all bodies calling themselves Christian, there is certainly none that possesses the most excellent gift of charity in a greater degree. However exclusive the Quaker body may be in its organisation; however dogmatic, and, in the eyes of the great mass of the Christian community, even narrow the theological views of the Quakers may be; in the exercise of their benevolence they are, in the fullest acceptation of the term, catholic.

WHEN THE REST WATER

Throughout the whole history of the Society of Friends, from its earliest formation to the present day, the practice of charity may be traced in a singularly clear and beautiful manner. It commences with their Committees for Sufferings appointed to aid those of their number enduring persecution for their religious and political opinions; and it afterwards expands till it embraces the whole human race, without respect either of country or creed. The first complete organisation appears to have been formed in the year 1675, when perse-eution was strong against them. At one of their general meetings it was "agreed that certain Friends of this city be nominated to keep a constant meeting to consider about sufferings four times in a year, with the day and time of each meeting here settled. That at least one Friend of each county be appointed by the quarterly meeting thereof to be in readiness to repair to any of the said meetings of this city, at such time as their urgent occasions or sufferings shall require." From that time till 1794 these meetings for sufferings appear to have been held weekly for the purpose of succouring those among them who were in distress, and for legally defending others unjustly oppressed.

Instead of diminishing their philanthropic efforts as persecution ceased and wealth increased among them, they seem to have extended their benevolence in proportion as their means augmented. There can be no doubt that much of their objection to ostentation and personal adornment arose from the idea that the amount saved by simplicity of attire and mode of life might be applied to useful and benevolent purposes. "The trimmings of the vain world would clothe the naked one," said William Penn; and admirably do the members of the Society appear to have carried out the suggestion. Inculcations of the practice of charity are continually to be found in their printed Epistles. In that of 1709 we find it is advised "that where Friends want ability in the world, the monthly and quarterly meetings should assist them, that the children of the poor may have due help of education, instruction, and necessary learning."

In that of 1710, these words occur: "Let the Christian duty of visiting the sick be timely remembered and practised, it having often left comfort, ease, and swectness on the spirits of many to their very end."

Again, in 1718: "With respect to the poor among us, it ought to be considered that the poor, both parents and children, are of our family; and although some may think the poor a burthen, yet, be it remembered, when our poor are well provided for, and walk orderly, they are an ornament to our Society. And the rich should consider 'It is more blessed to give than to receive,' 'He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord; and that which he hath given He will pay him again."

Again, in the printed Epistle of 1720, it is written: "As mercy, compassion, and charity are eminently required in this new-covenant dispensation which we are under, so, respecting the poor and indigent among us, it is the advice of this meeting that nothing be wanting for their necessary supply."

The first philanthropic movement beyond the pale of their own sect in which the Society of Friends interested themselves was indisputably that for the abolition of slavery. From their first organisation, the well-being of the negro seems to have been a cherished idea with them. George Fox frequently spoke against every form of slavery, and the Epistles, from their earliest date, not only strongly advised Friends against trafficking in negroes, but also protested against all attempts to make money, directly or indirectly, from the compulsory labour of the slave. In the Epistle of 1727 there is a clause to the effect "that it is the seuse of this meeting that the importing of negroes from their native country and relations by Friends is not a commendable nor allowed practice, and is, therefore, censured by this meeting." Again, in that of 1758: "We fervently warn all in profession with us, that they be careful to avoid being in any way concerned in reaping the unrighteous profits arising from the iniquitous practice of dealing in negroes and other slaves; whereby, in the original purchase, one man selleth another as he doth the beast that perisheth, without any better pretension to a property in him than that of superior force; in direct violation of the Gospel rule which teaches all to do as they would be done by." Again, in 1761: "This meeting, having reason to apprehend that divers under our name are concerned in the unchristian traffic in negroes, doth recommend it earnestly to the care of Friends everywhere to granted as compensation to slaveholders for the discourage, as much as in them lies, a practice so repugnant to our Christian profession."

These repeated censures on the practice of trading in negroes, certainly proves that the Friends were not altogether blameless in that respect. Their leaders, however, do not appear to have ceased their efforts, in consequence of the obstinacy of certain mercenary individuals among them. Gradually the English Quakers not only relinquished the traffic, but also began to discourage the system among others. In the Epistle of 1772, we find the following clause: "It appears that the practice of holding negroes in oppressive and unnatural bondage hath been so successfully discouraged by Friends in some of the colonies, as to be considerably lessened. We cannot but approve of these salutary measures, and earnestly entreat they may be continued; so that, by the favour of Divine Providence, a traffic so unjust and so unmerciful in its nature, may come to be considered by all in its proper light, and be utterly abolished, as a reproach to the Christian profession."

From that date, till the total abolition of slavery in the English colonies, the efforts of the Friends were unceasing in the cause. Almost every one of their Epistles from that time contained some censure of the practice of slavery, or some strong exhortation to energy in suppressing it. About the year 1790, they made common cause with many leading philanthropists not of their own sect; and this new combination in process of time gained considerable power. Still, for many years, owing to the strenuous opposition of the Government, and especially the House of Peers, their exertions were attended with but little success, beyond awakening men's minds to the iniquity of the whole system of negro slavery. Singularly enough, while a sect of Dissenters, the Quakers, were indefatigably exerting themselves for the suppression of negro slavery, the bishops of the Established Church in their places in the House of Lords were exerting themselves with scarcely less pertinacity and vigour for its continuance; and it was not till after Lord Eldon's death, and when the doubts of the Government themselves as to the eligibility of maintaining slavery in the colonies became apparent, that the opinion of the prelates began to waver on the subject.

It would far exceed our limits to trace the history of the abolition of slavery in the British colonies: suffice it to say, that most desirable end was at last attained. The upholders of the system, finding that slavery was doomed, vented their spite in the grossest abuse on all those concerned in its suppression, and on the Quaker body particularly, consigning them very emphatically to public hatred and contempt for having first called the attention of the world to the condition of the unhappy negroes. They also accused them of being participators in the traffic, stating that no inconsiderable portion of the twenty millions of money, loss of their slaves, went directly or indirectly into the pockets of divers of the Quaker community. This accusation was indignantly repelled by many admirers of the philanthropy of the Society of Friends, who challenged their slanderers to produce a single instance in which a Quaker had received a farthing of compensation. This challenge was frequently repeated, and although no lack of energy was shown by the upholders of the slave-trading interests, not a single case could be found to justify the statement.

Although the Society of Friends in America was, as a body, by no means so energetic as their English brethren in the cause of negro freedom, yet many among them took up the matter with great activity and courage. As early as the year 1796, the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends, in the State of Pennsylvania, entertained the question of the slave trade as a subject of public concern, and advised the members of the Society to guard against the future importation of African slaves. In the year 1811, the same body exerted itself once more in the Christian duty of denouncing the slave trade; but slavery, in a mitigated form, still continued to exist in the province.

Though the Friends in England never ceased to interest themselves in the welfare of slaves in other countries, they do not appear to have taken a very prominent part in any public movement on the subject, from the time of the abolition of slavery in the British colonies, to the late terrible civil war in America. On the publication of Mrs. Beecher Stowe's admirable tale of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," a large subscription was raised by them for the aid of slaves in America, but it was principally confined to their own body, and little was known of it by the public at large. Since the abolition of slavery in America, however, they have exerted themselves in a wonderful manner to assist the liberated negroes. They established a Central Committee, with corresponding societies in all parts of England, to collect subscriptions in behalf of the freedmen, and their appeal was responded to with great liberality. We have before us the report of the Central Committee, for the three months ending June, 1865. From it we find that in the year 1863-64, the subscriptions of the English Quakers for this object alone, amounted to 8000l. Of this, 4000l., in sums of 500l. each, had been forwarded to eight different district associations in America. In addition to the amounts specially reported to the Central Committee, very considerable sums had also been collected by private means, and dispatched at once to the United States, or expended in clothing or necessaries for the negroes by different local committees. These isolated collections appear, to a great extent, to have been aided and stimulated by the publication of a little work, the production of Mr. John Hodgkin, called "The Case and Claims of the Emancipated Slave." Of this work, no fewer than 15,000 copies were printed, all of which were rapidly disposed of. The English Quakers, as a body, while they maintain their own distinct organization, also co-operate willingly and energetically with the "Freedman's Aid Society," in London.

Although well aware of the munificence of Quaker liberality, the amounts subscribed by individual members to this movement caused us no little surprise. In the report of the Central Committee we find several persons contributing sums ranging from two to five hundred pounds each; there are eight subscriptions of one hundred pounds each, and many ranging from thirty to fifty pounds each. In the list of the Bristol local committee there were three of one hundred pounds each, and eleven ranging from twenty to fifty pounds each. In the Liverpool list are thirteen ranging from twenty-five to one hundred pounds each; and in several smaller towns, in which there are but few Friends, the individual subscriptions are equally liberal. It appears that since the year ending 1863-4, the sums received by the Central Committee, and by the local committees of Bristol, Liverpool, Worcester and Yorkshire, amounted to 6684L, making a total to June, 1865, of 15,684l. Altogether, up to this date, it is computed that the public and private subscriptions of the Society of Friends in England towards the relief of the liberated slaves in America, does not amount to less than 11, 10s, a head of their whole community, rich and poor, women and children. Nor has the money thus sent by the English Quakers in aid of the freed blacks in America been without its good effects. From some letters written from that country by Mr. Joseph Simpson of Manchester (who appears to have been acting in America as a delegate from the Society of Friends in England), which are printed in the report of the Central Committee, we take the following extracts. Speaking of the free schools for negroes in the city of Baltimore, he says :-

"There was an evident feeling of interest prevalent among the scholars; they seemed eager to learn, and it is the universal testimony of all the teachers with whom I have yet conversed, that in point of intelligence and aptitude for learning, the black child is not one whit behind the white, but, if anything, he is the quicker of the two. The teacher who is looked upon as the best in this city, has been seven years teaching in Boston (Mass.), and is now in these free schools. Her testimony was very clear: 'I have taught this class the same lesson which I taught in Boston to white children, and I can safely say the lesson has been much more quickly mastered here than there, and with much less labour to myself.'"

The reader will be pleased to hear that the names of a thousand children are upon the books of the coloured free-schools in Boston, and the average daily attendance is from six hundred and fifty to seven hundred. It may be added that on the receipt of this letter by the Central Committee of Friends in England, five hundred pounds was immediately granted by them to "The Baltimore"

Association for the Moral and Educational Improvement of coloured people."

To dispel any alarm which might be felt in England as to the demoralizing effect of so much charity bestowed upon the negro, Mr. Simpson, in another letter, writes:

"So far I see no likelihood of the freedmen being demoralized by the efforts which are being made on their behalf. All I have spoken to unite in the statement that they don't want alms. Give them work and protection from injury, and they will be satisfied."

Even within the past few weeks, the interest taken by the Quaker body in the welfare of the negro has shown itself in the formation of a society to amcliorate the present condition of the coloured people in the Island of Jamaica. The committee charged with the management of the Negro Education Fund, brought under the notice of the Meeting for Sufferings the depressed state of education in Jamaica, and the great impoverishment of the coloured people from drought and other causes. Several letters were also read from missionaries, giving details of the late outbreak, and the harsh means used for its suppression. The recital of these affecting circumstances called forth the sympathy of the meeting especially on behalf of the families of many of those who, it is to be feared, had suffered innocently at the hands of the soldiery. After long deliberation, the meeting resolved "that a personal visit to the island by an independent deputation from the Society of Friends would be advisable, as a practical evidence of their sympathy with the coloured people, and as a means of helping in various ways, which, under Providence, might prove a lasting benefit." Two gentlemen, Mr. Thomas Harvey of Leeds, and Mr. William Brewin of Cirencester, immediately volunteered their services to act as the deputation, and their offer was thankfully accepted by the meeting. But as moral sympathy without material assistance would have been of little avail, the committee expressed their opinion that while the national stock might be applicable in aid of the movement, a distinct subscription would be preferable. A list for contributions was opened, which was responded to with great liberality; considerably more than a hundred persons directly entered their names, and the sum of 1891l. was subscribed in amounts varying from two pounds to one hundred. What the total reaches at present we are unable to say, but the list is still open, and contributions we understand are flowing in daily.

Civilization is also indebted to the Quaker community in England for another benefit, which, if less extensive in its operations than the abolition of slavery, was certainly not less philanthropic in its intentions, and was in the end as perfectly successful in its results. We allude to the amelioration of the treatment of the insane. To understand the reformation they have effected in lunatic asylums, it is necessary the reader should call to mind the mal-practices which were formerly common in those institutions. Till the beginning of the present century, and for some years afterwards, the generality of both public and private lunatic asylums were simply dens in which the worst abuses were allowed to be practised with perfect impunity. The self-styled physicians who superintended them were generally men with the slightest possible scientific education, and who had adopted that branch of the profession solely as a means of earning money, without the least love for the occupation. In many cases patients, even females, were placed in the charge of men who had no pretensions whatever to medical knowledge. If, at the commencement, they had any feelings of humanity, these, in a short time, generally vanished, and habit rendered them hardened. They became dead to the misery around them, and frequently allowed the grossest cruelty to be inflicted by their subordinates on the unhappy beings under their charge, without even the slightest attempt at interference on the part of the legal authorities. It is singular to reflect that in England, with a code of criminal law unsurpassed in Europe for severity, under which theft to the value of five shillings from a shop, or to the value of forty shillings from a dwellinghouse, was punished by death, such institutions as mad-houses then were should have been tolerated. A poor insane creature might be subject to the brutality of an under-keeper, who, with practical impunity, and under the slightest possible pretext, would treat him with such cruelty as would often cause death. The system of gentle restraint was then wholly unknown. Terror alone was the means used to maintain discipline, and the gag, the irons, and the whip, were the principal materia medica for the cure of raving insanity.

About the year 1790, Mr. Tuke, a Quaker gentleman of ability, residing near York, had occasion to visit a relative who was confined in a lunatic asylum. He was disgusted at the cruelty and stupidity of the system he saw practised in it, and justly argued that such incessant provocation and irritation was far more likely to increase the excitement of the violent maniac, and still further to depress the melancholy lunatic, than to relieve them. He proposed the establishment of an institution for the reception of those of his own community who were affected with mental disorders, in which kindness should take the place of severity, and common sense, if not medical science, that of the brute force then generally employed. Admirable as his scheme was, he found great difficulty in carrying it out. This arose not from any want of liberality or humanity on the part of his Quaker brethren, but from their doubts as to its practicability. They admitted that if kindness could replace severity an immense advantage would be gained, but however humane the theory might be, it was setting at nought all preconceived scientific opinions, and was therefore in the end likely to prove a failure. Nothing daunted by the objections thrown in his way, he persevered in his philanthropic intentions, and by degrees he gained over several influential members to his views. result was that in the year 1796 the "Friends' Retreat," near York, was opened. It has ever since continued in full operation, and continues to do a vast amount of good. In a very short time the advantages arising from the gentle system became apparent, and the new institution was liberally supported by the whole Quaker community. Admirable as the results of the new system proved to be, it was not, to the great disgrace of the medical profession at large, till ten or fifteen years afterwards that it was generally adopted. Even then a large proportion of what were termed maddoctors submitted to it with the worst possible grace, and it was only when the general public began to entertain the question that the old system was abolished. Unfortunately our space will not allow us to go so deeply into the Quaker treatment of the insane as it deserves, but the following short abstract from the recent returns of some of the principal Lunatic Asylums in England, when compared with that of the "Friends' Retreat," will prove how successful is the system they adopt.

The question of education not only among their own sect, but among the community at large, has, since the days of George Fox, been one of importance among the Quakers. They hold, in the words of one of their Printed Epistles that, "education in the largest and most comprehensive sense of the word, constitutes an important branch of Christian discipline. It was strongly enjoined in the precepts of the Old Testament; it held a conspicuous place in the church of Christ in its earliest days; and in our own society it has ever been an object of concern and solicitude." Admirable, indeed, are the arrangements of the Quakers for the instruction of the poor of their own community, by which every child among them is able to obtain a good education. They have in all twelve public schools. In these the parents are expected, according to their means, to contribute something towards the tuition of their children. In Ackworth, for example, the parents pay for each child about sixteen pounds a year, board, lodging, and instruction combined. At Croydon, the parents pay about twelve pounds a year for each child, and at Lisburn and Brookfield, the sum is as low as five pounds ten shillings. The average cost of each child at these schools is about twenty-eight pounds per head, the difference between the sum paid by the parents and the actual cost of the child's instruction and maintenance, being made up by private subscriptions from the wealthier members of their community, and from vested funds in the hands of trustees. Many of these schools are well endowed. The balance of back streets, and I am tolerably well conversant the property of eight of these institutions in the year 1863 amounted to 126,000l.

But while general education is held in high importance among the Quakers, that of religious instruction, especially the study of the Holy Scriptures, is far more so. From the end of the seventeenth century to the present day, their Printed Epistles are full of advices and exhortations to their brethren on the subject. In that of 1709, they "recommend it as an incumbent duty on Friends, to cause their children to be frequent in reading the Holy Scriptures, and to point out to them the example of such children as in Scripture are recorded to have early learned the fear of the Lord." That of 1720 has these words: "Let the Holy Scriptures be early taught our youth, and diligently searched and seriously read by Friends, with due regard to the Holy Spirit, by which they are truly opened." Again, in 1728: "And, dear friends, inasmuch as the Holy Scriptures are the means of preserving and conveying to us an account of things most surely to be believed, concerning the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ in the flesh, and the fulfilling of the prophecies relating thereto, we therefore recommend to all Friends, especially Elders in the Church, and masters of families, that they would both by example and advice impress upon the minds of the younger, a reverent esteem of those sacred writings, and advise them to a frequent reading and meditation therein."

Since those days their interest in the religious education of children seems rather to have increased than otherwise. In all parts of the kingdom in which there reside even a few families of the Quaker community, they have established excellent First-Day (Sunday) Schools. Some of these are admirable specimens of organization and management. We lately visited one in Liverpool, which in beauty of architectural elevation, and the excellence of the course of instruction pursued in it, might challenge competition with any institution of the kind in the United Kingdom. But the sympathies of the English Quaker community are not confined solely to the children of their own sect. From a recent report of their First-Day Schools we find there are at present in England more than ten thousand children receiving religious instruction in the Quaker Sunday Schools. In proof of the wonderful energy shown by the Quaker body in carrying out any of their benevolent operations, we may point to the First-Day Schools lately erected at the corner of Wheeler Street, Spitalfields. Nothing could exceed the demoralized state of many parts of that locality before their immediate attention was directed to it. Perhaps an idea of these dens of infamy and misery may be best conveyed to the reader by quoting a short extract from a speech made by Mr. William Tyler on the occasion of the opening of the schools :-

"It happens that for somewhere about thirty years I have been ploughing up and down these with, I was almost going to say, every room in the whole district. May I say, not to alarm you or intimidate you, that you have not as a meeting any conception at all of the character of the district you now are in. Some years ago I opened a little schoolroom in Little Pearl Street. It had been previously occupied by a chimney-sweep. One day I was passing through, and I said, 'I want such and such a house.' 'You want Little Hell,' said the man. 'Little Hell!' I thought, 'well it's rather an odd address.' I said to some one else in the street, 'What do you call that house?' 'Little Hell, sir.' That house still stands. Now, sir, in that particular street, not very long since, there were upwards of seven hundred thieves and bad characters living. That is a fact. I just mention that circumstance to give you some idea of the particular locality where you now are."

A few quotations from the subscription-list printed at the end of the report of the meeting, will give some idea of the liberality of the English Quakers in support of those good and charitable works in which they may be interested; at the same time, we are fully persuaded the smaller contributions were fully as liberal, in proportion to the means of the donors, as those of the individuals we mention :- Alfred Tyler, Stoke Newington, 25l.; Joseph Sharples, Hitchin, 40l.; Joseph Pease, South End, Darlington, 50l.; John Kitching, Stamford Hill, 100l.; Executors of John Kitching, 1001.; George Thomas, Bristol, 1101.; William Pollard, Hertford, 1201.; Joseph J. Lister, Upton, Essex, 1201; Smith Harrison, Upton, 1001; Henry E. Gurney, Reigate, 150l.; Samuel Gurney, M.P., Carshalton, Surrey, 450l.; William Fowler, Tottenham, 60l.; Joseph Gurney Barclay, Leytonstone, 600%.

The Quaker community, both in purse and personal exertion, have also been among the foremost in their endeavours to mitigate our great national curse-intemperance. They were among the first who joined the Temperance Alliance for the suppression of the liquor traffic, nor have they since in the least abated their zeal. On looking over the list of the subscribers to the Alliance, we find them contributing with their proverbial liberality. Among other generous Quaker donors are the names of Joseph Thorp, 75l.; Mrs. M. Martindale, 100l.; Caleb Wilson, Sunderland, 1001.; George Tatham, Leeds, 100l.; William Hargreaves, Sheffield, 100l.; James Cadbury, Banbury, 1001.; Mrs. Eliza Beakbane, Seaforth, 1251.; Edward Backhouse, Sunderland, 1501.; Robert Charlton, Bristol, 3001.; and John Priestman, Bradford, 500%

The kindred movement, the Metropolitan Free Drinking-Fountain Association, established in 1859, owes its origin and no small portion of its ultimate success to the exertions of a Quaker gentleman, Samuel Gurney, Esq., M.P. Observing the practicability and the good results attending a similar institution in Liverpool, established by Charles P. Melly, Esq., Mr. Gurney determined on trying an experiment of the kind in London. By his liberality, the first free drinking-fountain in the metropolis was erected on Snow Hill in 1859. Its success was greatly doubted while being constructed, but on its being thrown open to the public its advantages were immediately admitted. For many weeks after its completion it was found that no fewer than an average of 5000 persons drank at it daily, and a memorial from the working men in the neighbourhood was presented to Mr. Gurney expressing their gratitude for the inestimable boon. and imploring him to secure the erection of other similar drinking-fountains in different parts of London. Several leading philanthropists now joined Mr. Gurney, and the organization of the Metropolitan Free Drinking-Fountain Association was the result. The benefit this society has secured for the public, especially for the working classes, may be estimated from the fact that, while seven years since not a single drinking-fountain was to be found in the metropolis, eighty-nine are now erected through the exertions of the Association, and thrown open to all, besides some thirty or forty others erected by private individuals, no doubt stimulated by the good effects arising from those opened by the Association.

Nor have the efforts of the Association been confined solely to the welfare of mankind: dumb animals have experienced great benefit from it as well. The Association has established in different parts of London a large number of drinking-troughs for dogs, and five large troughs for oxen, sheep, and horses. The erection of many other drinking-fountains and troughs is also contemplated, but unfortunately the Association has not always met from the parochial authorities the patronage and assistance it so richly deserves. True, many of the vestries have aided it in a most praiseworthy manner, but still the majority of the metropolitan parishes have either been indifferent to the subject or directly hostile to it. Of the advantages arising from the establishment of drinking-fountains, perhaps the most remarkable are to be found in the immediate vicinity of the East India Docks. Around the entrance-gates of the import docks, where labourers and seamen are accustomed to congregate, there is a perfect colony of public-houses and beershops, and to these establishments no small number of the accidents and wounds which are attended to in the Poplar Hospital may be directly or indirectly traced. Since the opening of the drinking-fountain at the Dock-gates, these have diminished to a remarkable extent, and several of the beer-shops have even been closed. The publicans as a rule dread the opening of one of these fountains near them, far more than the establishment of a rival ginpalace. A publican a short time since threatened legal proceedings against one of the west-end vestries for allowing a drinking-fountain to be opened near his house, alleging that it had diminished his returns more than twenty-five per cent. Of course he did not carry out his threat, but the anecdote may serve to show how great the counter-attraction of a drinking-fountain may be to a flourishing ginpalace.

One word more of Mr. Gurney before we quit the subject, as it may help to prove how great Quaker liberality and philanthropy frequently are. Not only has he been unceasing in his personal exertions in the cause of the Drinking-Fountain Association, but from the commencement he has, in addition to his annual subscription of fifty guineas, contributed to it four separate donations—two of 500l. each, one of 552l., and another of 600l.

The Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment was also of Quaker origin. It started under great difficulties, the prejudices of the public being strong against the theory of the members. In spite of all the impediments thrown in their way, they have, however, at last succeeded in bringing the subject under the notice of the public, and have also to a considerable extent enlisted its favour. It was mainly through their efforts that the Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the provisions and operations of the laws of the United Kingdom by which capital punishment is inflicted, and into the manner in which it is carried into effect, and generally to state whether any alterations are required in such laws, and the mode of executing them. A sum was collected sufficient, not only to agitate the question generally, and to collect evidence for the Royal Commission, but also to publish many admirable tracts and pamphlets in support of their theory, that capital punishment tends rather to demoralize than to deter or to reclaim criminals. The Friends have been unremitting in their personal exertions, and if they do not succeed in obtaining the total abolition of death-punishment, there is but little doubt that the effects of their exertions will be to lessen the frequency, and greatly to modify the manner of public executions. In looking down the list of members of the association, we find that a large majority of them are members of the Society of Friends, and among them many of their leading men: the names of Samuel Gurney, M.P.: J. Gurney Barclay, Joseph Spence, John Pease, William Malcomson, Edward Smith, the Backhouse family, and many others appear there. No small portion of the credit due to the success of the society should be accorded to Mr. William Tallack, the secretary, whose efforts to promote the success of the association have not only been unceasing, but marked by an energy and talent difficult to surpass, and but rarely equalled.

The Peace Society, and the Aborigines Protection Society, were both originated, and are almost entirely supported by the Society of Friends. In all works of public beneficence, their names may be found among the most liberal subscribers. To the distressed operatives in the cotton famine, their subscriptions as a body, apart from private benefactions, far exceeded those of any other community in England, being considerably more than 1l. per head on their whole numbers.

But liberal as the subscriptions of the Society of Friends are to all public philanthropic objects, it must not be imagined that they fall behind in private beneficence. We have had many instances placed before us which would fully prove the contrary, and which we would willingly have published, were it discreet to do so. The names we have mentioned are to be found in published printed lists, and are public property, which may be quoted without any abuse of confidence.

The most remarkable fact, however, in connection with the Quakers remains yet to be told. We refer to the fewness of their numbers when compared with the sums they are in the habit of contributing to charitable works. The whole Quaker community of England together does not exceed 13,000 souls, or, in other words, their numbers are about equal to one-tenth part of the population of the metropolitan parish of Bethnal Green.

In the exercise of charity in England, it is certainly singular to find that the two religious communities which are the most opposed to each other in theology, manners, and habits-the Jews and the Quakers-are the most liberal. Both not only maintain and educate their own poor, considering it a disgrace for them to come upon the parish funds for relief, but they are also among the most charitable donors to the poor of other denominations. The Jew is exceedingly ostentatious and expensive in his habits; the Quaker, on the contrary, is noted for his simple method of living, and. without the slightest approach to parsimony, is in most things economical. The only general point of resemblance between them, apart from their great benevolence, is their love of sobriety and their temperate habits. We believe it would be almost an impossibility to quote au instance in which a Jew or a Quaker made his appearance at the bar of a police-court for being drunk or disorderly. The poor among the Jewish community are far more numerous than among the Quakers, being nearly one in six of their gross numbers: while those of the Quakers will not average more than one in thirty-three. At the same time it should be borne in mind that the wealthy Jews rarely or never quit their community; while the wealthy Quakers frequently desert theirs. Altogether, without any disrespect to the Hebrew community, who are certainly most bountiful, we prefer the method of charity exercised by the Quakers. There is more system in it, and they appear to co-operate together with greater energy. The Jews seldom take any very active part in public philanthropic movements, contenting themselves with liberal donations. The Quakers, on the contrary, not only give as liberally as the Jews, but are also untiring in their personal exertions to carry out the object in view, even although, as in the case of the abolition of slavery, the abolition of the punishment of death, and other enterprises, it may be many years before they reap the reward of their labours.

Both Jew and Quaker are occasionally accused of exercising their charity with an eye to self-interest; but, judging of the tree by its fruits, we are inclined to think transactions of the kind must be exceedingly rare. There is no doubt that the greater portion of the tales extant about these two classes are simply the inventions of persons envious of good qualities of which they themselves are destitute. At the same time, it must be admitted that some of these anecdotes are exceedingly quaint. One we have heard was of a Jew furniture-dealer, who had received an order for the board-room table of a certain charitable society. He waited on the committee at the appointed hour, but it was some short time before he was admitted into their presence. In the interim he entered into conversation with a clerk in the outer office. Among other things spoken of was the object for which the society was instituted. He listened with much interest to the details, and was so much pleased with all he heard that he determined to become a subscriber. Wishing, however, to do so with the least possible loss to himself, he raised the price of the table from 201. to 251., and then liberally gave 5l. to the charity. Another anecdote, perhaps still more absurd, is told of a certain Quaker gentleman resident in the outskirts of a large country town, who had resolved on assisting the Free Drinking-Fountain movement. Outside his garden wall and close to his house he erected a pump with an iron cup attached to it, so that any thirsty passenger could drink without the necessity of resorting to a public-house. He received many compliments on his benevolence, all of which he took with becoming modesty. At last two mechanics, who had been engaged in a factory in the town, were passing to their work, when, feeling thirsty, they stopped at the pump to drink. After they had satisfied their thirst, one remarked to the other that the leverage of the pump appeared exceeding heavy for the quantity of water it threw up. A few days afterwards, having some work to perform in the Quaker gentleman's house, they discovered the clue to the mystery of the heavy leverage. A crank, it seemed, had been applied to the pump inside the garden wall, so that every stroke of the piston cast up as much water into a cistern at the top of the house as was yielded to those on the outside who pumped it up to satisfy their thirst.

But to be serious again. It may now fairly be asked, how it comes that, if the rich Quakers not unfrequently quit their community, and the body obtains its recruits from those possessing but moderate means, the Friends have the wealth necessary to give with such wonderful liberality as we have seen they do? The question is easily answered. It is in great part to be attributed to their commou-sense adaptation of the proverb, "Waste not, want not." The simplicity of their habits precludes their spending their money on theatres, balls, concerts, expensive dress, and fashionable luxuries in general. To this should also be added the absence of all cost in maintaining their religious observances. All Quaker ministers are unpaid, and the money thus saved is applied by them to benevolent purposes. These, with a talent for co-operation by organizing societies and committees, combined with the importance they attach to works of charity as commanded of Christ, enable them to perform acts of benevolence to a far greater extent than any other religious community in the country.

UNCHANGING.

THE Poet singeth like the bird that sitteth by the rose,
While dews are chill, and on the hill the first red sunbeam glows,
While through the buds' thick-folded green the first red rose-streak shows.

Sing, Poet, sing, of Hope and Spring—
Still sing beside thy rose.

The Poet singeth like the bird that sitteth by the rose,
While on the golden summer-noon her golden heart o'erflows;
And now she waxeth red, now pale, yet ever is the rose.

Sing Poet, sooth, of love and youth—
Still sing beside thy rose.

The Poet singeth like the bird that sitteth by the rose,
When from the drooping stalk her brief sweet glory earthward goes,
And the red is kindling on the leaf that fadeth from the rose.

Sing, Poet, sing, remembering—
Still sing beside thy rose.

DORA GREENWELL

LONELINESS SELF

BY THE EDITOR.

"Verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone." - John xii. 24.

WE are all familiar with this fact in the vegetable kingdom. We must part with the seed corn and bury it out of sight, or it can never increase itself into a full ear of many grains clustered round the one head. If we keep it, it will remain unproductive, like that held for ages in the shrivelled hand of the mummy. If, on the other hand, we cast it into the ground, it will be lost for a time in death, but will re-appear in richer form, and bring forth fruit, in some thirty, in some sixty, and in some a hundred-fold. And so it is, through a constant dying and rising again to newness of life, that there are ever waving more plenteously golden harvests of fruitfulness and blessing.

And by this fact Our Lord illustrates His own death and resurrection, with the glory which was to follow. In the verses which immediately precede the one quoted, we read "that certain Greeks had come up to the feast, and desired to see Jesus." This was a great moment in His life, for these Greeks were the earliest representatives of that Gentile world which would one day believe in Him. They were the first fruits of that great harvest, which was ultimately to be gathered from all lands into the garner of the Lord. The long expected hour had therefore come when "the Son of Man was to be glorified." But, ere this glory could be realised, He himself must die. How would He feel when contemplating this death and burial, with all the mysterious woe by which they were to be accompanied? Would He say "Father, save me from this hour"? No! For if He should refuse to die, He would be doomed to remain alone and solitary. In such a case, there would be no gathering of men to Him, as their living Root and Head. "But for this cause," He adds, "came I unto this hour;" and instead, therefore, of saying, in the love of self, "Save me from this hour," He would rather say, in the spirit of self-sacrificing love to God and man, "Father, glorify thy name!" "Then came there a voice from Heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again," after which Our Lord exultingly exclaims, in seeing the grand results of His death, and all the glory that would be, "Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the Prince of this world be cast out: and I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This he said, signifying what death he should die." Jesus himself, then, was the corn of wheat.

By this fact our Lord further illustrates a great law in the moral world, and that is, the indispensable necessity of each man dying to a life of mere self, before he can possess and enjoy that which can bring forth that kind of fruit which is necessarily demanded from him, as the very end of his existence-love to God and love to mau. We are, moreover, taught that this law, when broken, visits the transgressor with the righteous punishment of being left alone in the solitariness of his own being. Our own corrupt, selfish nature is thus the grain of wheat which must be buried in the grave with Jesus Christ, if we would rise with Him, and share His own true life of fellowship with God and man. Hence He says, "He who loveth his life shall lose it;" that is, he who loves his life of self without God, refusing to part with it and to bury it out of sight, must lose true life in God, even as he whorefuses to part with the seed must lose the harvest. On the other hand, "he who hateth his life in this world, shall keep it unto life eternal;" that is, he who parts with and buries this false life in time. shall possess that true life which from its nature is eternal. And thus we see that, as by a law in the world of material things, a corn of wheat, unless it fall into the ground and die, is doomed to abide alone; even so by a similar law in the world of spiritual realities, the man who refuses to die to self is also doomed to remain for ever solitary, and to abide alone.

This teaching of Our Lord shows us that loneliness is the necessary and righteous punishment of a selfish or unloving soul.

It is quite possible that, at the first blush, loneliness will not strike one as being a very dire or terrible suffering. But it must appear in this light on a more correct view of the case, and I hope to be able to help towards this more correct view.

Let me at the outset observe that there are various kinds of loneliness. There is, for example, the loneliness occasioned by physical distance from our fellowmen; as when we wander along the shore of the great ocean with nothing to disturb the awful silence, except the beat of the sea-wave, or the lonely cry of the sca-bird; or when, penetrating far into the deeper solitudes of the mountains, we reach at last the bare and breezy ridge, and from thence look down into the valley with its small, clear stream, or gaze around upon the dark moorland or the wild tumult of the hills, and hear only the wild piping of the wandering wind, or the echo of the distant cataract. But there is no painful sense of loneliness in such scenes, for fellowship with God may be enjoyed in them.

There is another kind of loneliness, arising from intellectual distance. This is experienced by the man who, having ascended some high peak is alone true life; or, in other words, before he of thought, or of scientific discovery, must necessarily leave the crowd far beneath him for a time at least. In the thoughts which must possess and absorb his intellectual being, he remains alone. Still the affections of this man can all the while have full play. He can enjoy fellowship with God and man, and possess all that is essential to his well-being when he can thus love and be beloved.

There is again the loneliness of a holy and a loving heart, -a sense of isolation, which is profoundly realised by one who, from the very purity and disinterestedness of his life, meets with inadequate sympathy. This was no small ingredient in the suffering of our blessed Lord. In the circle of His followers, even within the narrower circle of His Apostles, He was often alone-alone in His serrows and in His joys, because alone in the perfection of His love. Nevertheless He said, "I am not alone, for the Father is with Me." But for this fellowship with His Father, He was And thus it is, indeed lonely and solitary. in a greater or less degree, with all who are like Him. Love will ever be lonely amidst sin. Yet while thus sorrowing it is always rejoicing, for such solitude is but the dark shadow cast from the body of sin, on which the bright light of love is ever shining. It is thus impossible that there can be any real loneliness to a loving soul while a God of love exists with whom it can hold communion.

And there is a loneliness of spirit arising from selfishness that is wholly different from any of the kinds I have alluded to, and is perhaps the only real solitude which exists and expresses a condition of being, the misery of which it is impossible adequately to conceive, far less to describe. The more we ponder over it, and try to comprehend and measure the magnitude of this dread conscquence of sin, the more does it awe and solemuize the spirit. There is no image which can fully picture a state so unutterably dreary and forlorn. The sailor upon his one solitary plank, the sole survivor of his foundered ship, and drifting hopelessly on a shoreless sea; the prisoner in his solitary cell, separated for life from the busy tide of human existence which flows ever past his prison-house; -what are such lonely beings when compared with him who, in his idolatry of self, has separated himself in spirit from God and man, and is doomed for ever to abide alone?

But the truth will be perceived more clearly when it is realised that there are just two conditions of being, either of which must constitute our character. We must either love God and our brother, or not love them. Let it be carefully noticed that neutrality or indifference in this case is a moral impossibility. For, indeed, not to love God and our brother is positively to possess the elements of hate to both. "He that loveth not his brother is a murderer:" "He who loveth not his brother abideth in death: "He who loveth not, knoweth not God:" and "This is life eternal, to know Thee the only living and true God." "He who is not with me is against me:" thus every man is poor who "lays up treasure for himself and is not rich towards God." Love and self represent therefore two different kinds of character, or antagonistic principles, either of which marks each man as he is known to God, and determines as a whole whether he is good or bad. I have called them antagonistic principles; for while love seeks its life out of its self and beyond itself, self seeks to find life in itself. Love, in order to possess, sacrifices self; self, in order to possess, keeps itself, and would sacrifice love. Love seeketh not her own; self always seeks her own. Love is humility; self is pride. Love is the moral attraction of souls, and by it they become one without losing their individuality; self is the repulsion of souls, even when they outwardly associate together. Hence love is the eternal law of order, with its consequent blessedness; while self is the eternal law of disorder, with its consequent misery. Accordingly, love from its very nature draws like to like-the loving to the beloved; while self from the opposite pole of being repels self, even as hate repels hate. The one is the Omnipotent gravitating power which unites all orders of moral beings, and makes them move in harmony with each other and with all, as they circle around the loving God; and the other is a destructive force which separates worlds, ever tending to scatter them "as wandering stars, to which are reserved the blackness of darkness for ever."

I notice, then: -(1) that an unloving soul is without God in the world. The question here is not as to the reality of God's love to us: that is certain. But what if this love of God to man is neither believed in, nor appreciated, nor returned by man? Of what avail is all this divine beauty, if the eye be blind which should perceive it? What can it profit, that the divine music rolls through the universe, if there be no ear opened to receive its glad sounds? It is evident that without mutual love, fellowship is an impossibility. Mutual love is the mutual possession of living souls. It is that alone which constitutes their oneness .- which enables each to say, "Thou art mine, and I am thine." It is thus Jesus Christ unites God and man: "All mine are thine, and thine are mine." We are in Him thus "made perfect in one." Now, if we do not love God, we do not know Him: for "he who loveth not knoweth not God." He may be, as He is, everywhere present, laying his hand upon us, besetting us behind and before, pouring down upon us ten thousand proofs of His good will, and revealing His glory to us; but unless the heart receives this love and returns it, it is practically the same to us as if God did not exist. To us, in this case, the universe is without a Father, even as it is without a sun at noonday to a blind man. "God is light, and with Him there is no darkness at all": "If we say that we have fellowship with Him and walk in darkness, we lie, and know not the truth."

(2) The unloving soul is without Christ in the world. Jesus is one with God in being, in character, and in love to man. To prove His knowledge of us individually, His interest in us, His love to us, would be to recall every feature of His character, and to record every word and action of His life. He came into the world, not merely to atone for our sins, but to impart to us, through His Spirit, that life of love which He had from eternity with his Father; so that, in the possession of the same life, we might "have fellowship with the Father and the Son, and with one another." He represents Himself accordingly as standing at our door knocking, and saying, "If any man open unto me. I will come in and sup with him, and he with me." This supping with Him is the very symbol of the fellowship of brotherly love. But how is it possible for such intercourse to be realized, if Self bars the door and there is no Love to open it and bid Jesus welcome? Jesus may be as physically near to us as He was to Satan for forty days in the wilderness, and yet between us, as between Jesus and Satan, there may be an impassable moral gulf. Judas was not really further from Christ, when he sat beside Him at the Last Supper, and saw His face, and heard His words, and had his feet washed by Him, than when he went forth from that upper chamber, as the son of perdition, to his own place. So, "we may speak with the tongue of men and of angels, understand all mysterics, and have all knowledge, yet without love we are nothing." So long, therefore, as a man peither believes in Christ, nor returns the love of Christ, he is "without Christ in the world:" and on such a man Christ even now passes this sentence: "I know you not."

(3) The unloving soul is without the Spirit,without "the communion of the Holy Ghost." The Spirit of God, in His whole character, and in His love towards us, is one with the Father and the Son. "He sheds abroad upon our hearts the love of God." "The fruit of the Spirit is love." It is His work to glorify Jesus as the Son and to impart to us the same spirit of adoption and of brotherly affection. And hence "He strives with man," and in manifold ways seeks, in consistency with His own perfect love, and with man's perfect freedom, to deliver him from the bondage of self, and to set him free in the glorious liberty of the children of God. But, what if the sinner "receives the grace of God in vain?" What, if he "always resists the Holy Ghost," and is consciously "disobedient to the heavenly vision," and "prefers the darkness to the light?" What if he refuses to be "led by the Spirit," to "walk in the Spirit," to "bring forth the fruits of the Spirit," and despises the comfort of the Holy Ghost, so that the thought of God's Spirit ceasing to strive with him, and of His threatening to leave him alone, fills him with no alarm, nor excites the agonising cry, "Take not thy Holy Spirit from me!" In such a case, is it not evident that, whatever the love of the Spirit may be, however constant His ministrations, however unwearied His pleadings, however touching His appeals, yet if we will not yield ourselves to these, it surely may be said of us with perfect truth, "These are they which separate themselves, having not the Spirit." Though the Eternal Wisdom cries without. saying, "Turn ve at my reproof, behold I will pour out my Spirit unto you, I will make known my words unto you," yet if "scorners will delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge," to them the awful words may be addressed, "Because I have called, and ve refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded: but ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof, . . . therefore shall ye eat the fruit of your own ways, and be filled with your own devices," "Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone."

(4) The unloving soul is without the Communion of Saints. As we believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, in Jesus Christ His only Son, our Lord, and in the Holy Ghost: so do we believe also in the Catholic Church, and in the Communion of Saints. There is but one family in heaven and in earth; and one mind, one spirit, pervades all. Now there is nothing more real on earth, than the love of the true church to the world. It reflects, in this, the character of its living Head. As He was, so are they, the members of His body in the world. Nothing can prevent Christians from loving. They cannot choose but do so. And thus the Christian wife loves the godless husband with a depth and reality which he, the selfish man, cannot understand; and so does the Christian parent love the so-called worthless child. In like manner, the Christian missionary, touched with that love which makes the mighty angels rejoice over one repentant sinner, labours to induce others to share this love, and is willing to die to accomplish his object. But what if the object of all this love remains unmoved by it? What if he checks, and by every means banishes, the rising emotion in his bosom, which would return this blessed affection? The unloving may, indeed, in some respects admire the possession of Christian love in others, from their experiencing as human beings some of the good which it bestows; but beauty, intellect, genius, wit, or fashion may be the real object of attraction, and not the spiritual beauty and grandeur of Christian love for its own sake; and so long as there is no fellowship or communion in this, there is no fellowship or communion in what is real and eternal. Two beings may thus grow up in the same family side by side, and may be called brother and sister, parent and child; or they may be united in the closest earthly bonds as husband and wife; yet if they do not possess that true love which begins and ends in God-Father, Son, and Spirit-there is no real abiding union between them.

Now, it is surely very important to observe the position which the unloving soul thus occupies in relation to all holy and loving personalities. He is not rejected by them, but they are rejected by him: they do not shut him out from their hearts, but he shuts them out from his heart; they do not refuse to lavish upon him all the riches of their affection, for love necessitates this bestowal of all their treasures, but he refuses to be enriched by them; they do not say "Depart from us," they say, "Come to us, be one with us, and we will do thee good," but he replies "Depart from me, I seek not you but myself."

Well, what could I say to such a man? What words could I use to express my sense of the reality of his sin? He has given up. fellowship with the Holy Trinity, and with the saints, and fallen back upon himself, and upon other persons who sympathize with him in his iniquity. In doing this, he has done a deed of terrible evil in the universe of God! He has shut out from his heart the God who created him to glorify and to enjoy Him for ever, and who in love sent His Son to seek and save him; he has shut out the Saviour, who in love left heaven and came to earth, who died on the cross, and who lives for evermore to redeem him; and he has shut out the Holy Spirit, who would be his sanctifier, his comforter, his joy for ever; and he has excluded all the holy ones, who loved or would have loved him as they loved themselves: and he has exchanged all these for-himself! Could I address such a man personally, I would ask him with all that earnestness for his recovery and fear for his loss which is prompted by love :-How dare you lose your soul? How dare you rob your God, your Saviour, and your Sanctifier of that which belongs to them, and not to you? How dare you rob all the loving ones in the universe of yourself, whom they seek to possess and love for ever? How dare you add another wicked and miserable soul to the wickedness and misery already so dreadful? You have done a deed of fearful wrong, for which you must answer to your

And what is to become of such a man? Whither can he flee for life? He must live for ever, but alone and solitary. If he ascends to Heaven, to him God is not there; if he makes his bed in the grave, He is not there; if he flies to the uttermost parts of the sea, He is not there; for no eye but love can see God and live. How inconceivably dreadful is this condition! To live for ever without any object or pursuit worthy of the immortal spirit: to live without hope, without fellowship, without love. Yet whither can he fly to be delivered from his insupportable burden? Who will have compassion upon the outcast? He thinks, perhaps, that there is one who will. The Godhead, he may imagine, is mysterious to him; angels are of another nature; and the saints are strangers; but in that hely company there is one to whom he may fly when the shadows of the eternal night are falling around his lonely spirit. That one is the sainted mother who bore him, who bent over his infant-couch with many prayers and longings unutterable, whose whole life was an intercession before the throne of God with supplications and tears for his good, who would have died to save him, and whose spirit ascended to God with the petition that her orphan child might meet her in a happier world. Alas! alas! that child's struggle has been a life-long struggle against eternal right. And could she meet him now, her eyes would be turned away from him. What shadow from the old past might darken her radiant brow I know not; -what pang from old memories might once more throb in her holy and peaceful bosom I know not; but certain it is that even she could not love one whose heart was at enmity with her God and Saviour, and with all she loved and rejoiced in. But it is after all a contradiction to suppose that a soul lost to the sense of good would ever seek to have communion with anyone whose very life consisted in fellowship with God. The cry of "me miserable! which way shall I fly?" might still be heard amidst the society and glories of Heaven, so long as the soul could feel "myself am Hell." Oh how true is it that-"He who shuts out love shall be Shut out from love, and on her threshold lie Weeping in outer darkness."

He who will not seek his God, whose name is Love, would not seek his earthly parent, though glowing in the possession of the same Divine attribute. Whither then, I again ask, can the unloving one fly for fellowship? In the wide universe, where can he find it? He has rejected the love of the Holy Trinity and the Saints, where can he discover hearts more affectionate? Does he fly to himself! Self cannot sustain self. Does he seek to satisfy himself with things? All the things in the universe of God cannot from their nature satisfy persons, any more than dust can satisfy the eye. To what persons, then, can he fly? To those like-minded with himself, who may open their doors and receive him into their everlasting habitations? But, alas! there can be no union, no fellowship with them. Whatever may be the condition of any world in the eternal deep which contains the outcasts from the earth-whatever may be the way in which its inhabitants employ and pervert their powers, and attempt to satisfy their false life-whatever proofs it may bear in its forms of material beauty, and in its immunity from physical torment, of the direction of a God who will not take from, but rather give all that is possible even to the wicked-yet no picture can be more terrific to the imagination than that of a society of responsible beings possessing everything except the love of God, the love of Christ, the love of the Spirit, and, therefore, possessing undying hate to God and to one another. In such society no fellowship is possible in the nature of things. Self must repel self; and, in the midst of the crowd, whatever may give a semblance of uniou, self must for ever remain alone in the gloom of its own unlovingness.

This conclusion I acknowledge is a very awful one. It seems at first almost impossible that such a state of things can be realised by any human being. We start back with an involuntary shudder as we reach the brink of that abyss to which we are led in following the track of the man who departs from God and walketh in darkness. We gaze into the impassable gulf which separates wrong from right, enmity from love, and recoil from the dreary spectacle. But is it not true? And if so, what aspect can sin and its consequences ever present save one which must fill every holy and loving soul with horror? That must be indeed dreadful which makes God angry, and compels the loving Jesus Christ as Judge to say, "Depart from me!" That state must needs be dreadful which compelled the most loving heart on earth to say of one man who was possessed of it, that it were better he had never been born.

Now, if I have dwelt long upon the character and consequences of self-idolatry or enmity to God and man, it is because I believe that a deeper sense of the evil, a more thorough realisation of it, will help to make men fly from the wrath now present and to come, and induce them to take refuge in the only place of safety, because the only state which is right—that is, in the knowledge and love of God through faith in Jesus Christ and Him crucified.

I readily admit that the view which I have been presenting may appear to some as if it were a coloured or exaggerated picture. It may be alleged, for example, that I attach to a mere affection greater powers than can possibly belong to it as bearing on our happiness. But can it be so, if that affection constitutes the very essence of character, and if character constitutes the essence of our life and peace? If God himself is love, what can be worse than to be "alienated from the life of God?" And surely our own experience might convince us of the power of a right or wrong state of being to change all persons and all things to us, when we were ourselves changed to them? The opening or shutting of the eye to the sun is apparently insignificant, yet this, like the opening or shutting of the heart to God, determines whether the world shall be to us all light or all darkness. In the every-day case of human love, or human passion, does not the world and all things become veiled in darkness or become full of light as the object of affection rejects or accepts the proffered love? In this instance we perceive how life itself, with all its pursuits and enjoyments, is affected by the fact of fellowship or no fellowship with another person. And if our relationship to a poor frail creature can have this marvellous power on our existence here, why should it seem strange that our relationship to God, the fountain of all true and pure love, should have an overpowering effect on our existence for ever? Have we never witnessed the change produced in a single day on the life of a man who might possess all the world could give, yet who became indifferent to everything, so that nothing could soothe or charm him, and his very existence became a burthen to him. And why? because he had lost his dear child. But if the extinguishing of this one little light of love glowing in a babe's heart, or expressed in its affectionate embrace, could produce such an effect as this on another person, why again, I ask, should we deem it an exaggeration to suppose that a soul separated, from whatever cause, from all love, should be most miserable.

Again, it may be alleged that the view I have expressed does not harmonize with other facts of life and of man's history on this side of the grave : and seems therefore to be a mere arbitrary act of punishment for sin rather than the necessary and natural result of sin itself. We see nothing like this, it may be said, in human history; any approach to such self-worship, any such exclusion of the love of others from the heart, is a monstrous and unnatural supposition. Alas! I wish I could form so pleasing an estimate from observation or experience of human nature, as to believe in its incapacity to sink down by its own depravity to be a devil, as firmly as I believe in its capacity to risc up by the grace of God to be a saint. I will not add to the pain occasioned by dwelling on the night-side of life, by attempting to illustrate the depth of utter selfishness, and the corresponding development of hate, to which a human being may reach, even in this world, so full of God's glory, and the manifestations of His love and grace. The annals of crime too frequently reveal to us, as by flashes of lurid light, what is within the volcano of the depraved heart. And how much more is open to God, who alone can search its hidden recesses, and to whom alone each human being is known as he is!

This being admitted, it may next be questioned how far we can see evidences in this world of the selfish spirit being always accompanied by the dark shadow of loneliness, or even by a shade of it. The reverse of this-indeed a hearty and jovial fellowship, seems more frequently to be the result of a consistent selfishness. In cases where there is even the open denial of what is termed religion, or an utter indifference to its claims, without any conscious faith towards God, and little faith in unseen persons or things, there are often no signs of solitude or loneliness being experienced. Nay, it may often be said of many such men, "They are not in trouble as other men. Their eves stand out with fatness. They have more than their hearts can wish, and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them." But without any wish to dim the brightness of this picture of life, yet I must make one or two brief observations upon it, to enable us to reconcile it with the darker one suggested by the principles we have been considering.

Our present life, it must be remembered, is a

Good Words, May 1, 1866.] period or dispensation of peace and of mercy to the very worst. Where tares exist, they are not rooted out, but allowed to mingle and to grow up with the wheat until the harvest, receiving in the meantime the same genial influences from Him who causes His sun to shine on the evil and the good, who never leaves Himself without a witness in that He does good, filling our hearts with food and gladness, and who is merciful to the unthankful. These mercies from Heaven, which the selfish man perverts, and turns into the very aliment of his sinfulness, are yet intended by God to lead him to Himself in love. There are many merciful props, moreover, outside as it were of the man, to hinder him for a time from falling back on himself alone, and to help him to seek after God. The pleasurable sensations derived through the body; the labour required to sustain it; the ten thousand things which occupy the mind, with the abundant supplies which wealth furnishes to nourish a life without God, and which "consists in the abundance of things possessed;"-all this world, as it now is, can to a great degree draw men from the loneliness of themselves, so as to make them imagine they are increased in goods and in need of nothing, even when poor and needy and blind and naked. In forming our estimate of the power of the present world and the constitution of society to save men' for a time from experiencing the natural consequences of their deeds, we must also take into account the many checks imposed by consistent selfishness on itself and for its own more intense gratification; with the absolute necessity of surrounding ourselves with other personalities, -to make even some sacrifices of self in one form to gain it in another-to gratify, for example, selfish vanity, pride, ambition, or sensual indulgence. And thus even the very graceful manners of society-the proper desire to be agreeable and to give pleasure to others, the deference shown to their opinions, feelings, and prejudices,-all this looks like love, and pleases the eye; although, on closer investigation, it is seen to be only the garb of essential selfishness. For while love and self start from different points in the soul within, they lead, as far as appearances go, to the same results in the world without. The only difference between true Christian society inspired by genuine love, and society without it, is, that the fellowship between man and man, with all its tenderness, considerateness, gentleness, grace, and courtesy, is in the one case the expression of real goodwill and self-forgetfulness, while in the other case it is but the expression of a refined and cultivated self-seeking.

Both are alike in outward colour and form, but the one is a bouquet of flowers gathered from nature, while the other is the product of mere art. A near inspection soon detects the difference between life and death-the work of God and the work of man-and we perceive in the one group only the delicious aroma, which is the product of the sun of heaven and of its refreshing dew.

Neither must we overlook the fact that our present life is one in which the consequences of good and evil are very imperfectly developed; and this fact forms a part of our system by which we are trained to love the one for its own sake, and to hate the other. It may be said therefore, with reference to the future history of both the righteous and the wicked, that "it doth not yet appear what we shall be." We see the beginnings, the tendencies of things, rather than their growth and full development-prophecies rather than fulfilments. We discern the loath someness of the leprosy by anticipation, knowing what the white spot must one day become, unless the disease be eradicated from the system by the power of God. But if we walk by sight only, it is not to be wondered at that appearances should deceive us, and that the contrast should appear to be exaggerated between the selfish man in the midst of ease and affluence, without fear or anxiety, and the same man left with himself alone. But this very fact it is which makes many of the narratives of our Lord so alarming. Who would imagine that a selfish Dives could this day be clothed in scarlet and faring sumptuously, and to-morrow be separated by an impassable gulf from the unselfish Lazarus? Who could believe that the farmer, who to-day is lapped in comfort, saying to his soul "Take thine ease," should this night go forth into the eternal world as a fool and a beggar, leaving all he possessed behind him because he had laid up treasure for himself only! Who, having seen Judas seated at the paschal supper, forming one of that holy society, and breathing the atmosphere of that scene of heavenly calm, could have supposed it possible that the traitor carried within his bosom at that moment a selfishness of spirit which in a few hours would seal his doom, and for ever separate him from Christ and His church.

But I have been arguing on the supposition that loneliness and isolation are a species of suffering seldom if ever experienced in this world. Still a knowledge of ourselves and of other men might, I think, warrant a conclusion the very opposite, and convince us that the more we live to self alone, the more we must live alone with self. Even in those ranks of society whose arrangements and manifold adaptations are most calculated to withdraw the unloving man from himself alone, there ever and anon occur moments of reflection, lucid intervals, when the gayest votary cannot choose but feel how, in spite of all these refuges, he is a lonely being amidst the crowd. No man realises this more intensely than he who prides himself on being what is called a man of the world, and on knowing the elements which compose his society, and the secret springs that guide its movements. "Self-sacrificing love, that seeks not her own!" he is disposed to exclaim in the bitterness of his soul, "where is this, for sooth, to be found in any of the fine cement which binds man to man? For myself, I neither pretend to show it, nor expect to receive it. I live to please myself, and enjoy myself, and I assume that others do the same. We are necessary to each other in order to our mutual gratification; and we are united, not by what we are, but by what we can give in order to receive our own back again with usury. Men love the things I can give them. They relish my wines and enjoy my dinners—but myself? Let misfortune overtake me, and let me have nothing but myself to give, and who would care to receive me!" Thus confessed one, at whose feet the world worshipped, and who worshipped himself supremely:—

"Tho' gay companions round the bowl Dispel awhile the sense of ill, Tho' passion fire the maddening soul, The heart, the heart is lonely still!"

As years advance, the conviction steals over the soul of the mere man of the world, like frost at midnight, that his companions are falling away from himthat he is becoming more and more isolated-more and more thrown back on himself, without the sympathy or brotherhood of human hearts. Old age comes, and it separates him more and more from the world without, while the world within becomes more and more to him as a cell where he must suffer solitary confinement. The spirit of loneliness hems him in, and ever confines him within a narrower circle whose centre is himself, deluded, disappointed, irritated; and he, like the scorpion when surrounded by fire, turns the sting upon himself. The death-bed is at last reached, and as he lies there at midnight, with the winds blowing coldly without, or the snow falling like a shroud around him, he sees that he must go forth alone into the unknown world beyond-O how sad and dreary! Cable after cable is snapping which bound him to the outward and visible, and like a disabled and forsaken wreck he is about to drift on the bosom of a mysterious and shoreless sea! Where could I point to a more remarkable illustration of this in modern times than the latter days of a once famous man of fashion, an account of whose life, -poor, useless, and selfish, -has been published, if not for edification at least for warning. Could the fancy picture such a scene as the reality presents? The man who once ruled as a very despot over that world which was presumed to contain within its charmed circle all that was refined, tasteful, and notably aristocratic-he who attracted peers and princes by his combined powers of wit, irony, flattery, and cultivated taste in the art of playing the perfect gentleman, became in the end poor and bankrupt-was deserted, trampled on, no man going to him, the very children in the street mocking him, until, as his mind began to waver, and he acted all alone the plays of the past, and smiled, and bowed, and paid compliments to the ghosts of the great and fashionable who flitted before his wandering eye, he owed to some charitable nuns the kindly ministrations which they were wont to extend to the pauper outcast.

Or take another instance—that of a man whose crimes and miserable suicide were familiar to the country and filled it with pain some years ago, and which were thus described at the time by one of the ablest of our journals :- "With dishonest appropriation of assets on every side-with forged deeds, fictitious securities, and illegitimate shares to the value on a single 'transaction' of a quarter of a million, closing their inextricable meshes around him-each day brought with it only a new crime and a more inevitable certainty of detection. And yet all went on smoothly, calmly, and respectably with this enormous and increasing mass of roguery and wickedness. Not a scratch on the skin betrayed the hidden cancer-not a ripple ruffled the smooth tranquillity of the Dead Sea within him. The decorous statesman - the worthy chairman—the genial sportsman—in all shone the well-regulated and polished mediocrity. In the committee-room, in the board-room, at the cover-side, the even smile and ordinary speech never betrayed the hell seething, scorching, and raging within. No fiercer woes could the imagination of poets devise, or the severity of divines anticipate, than such a life as he doomed himself to lead. At any rate, man could not visit him with heavier vengeance than was the daily punishment which he inflicted on himself."

And, to pass from the real to the ideal-yct, after all, the real still-what a terrible picture is drawn by our great dramatist of the selfish spirit when it has reached its last stage, where habitual selfishness has developed into habitual crime, and become so tyrannous and strong, that with a daring hand it endeavours to break down every barrier of law which would restrain its wild excesses, and seeks to sacrifice every person to its own unprincipled desires. This dread condition of spirit is embodied in the history of the man who, to gain his own ends, murdered all those who stood between him and a throne. But having done so -having gained self-he thereby becomes a terror and a curse to himself. His own fear and troubled conscience create the spectres which crowd around him, bend over him at midnight, glare on him with their accusing eyes, point to him with their icy fingers, and petrify him by their looks of righteous condemnation. Yet these are but self punishing self. He starts up in horror from his terrible nightmares, and what to him is the kingdom which he governs, the soldiers who are massed around him, or the crowd of courtiers who are ready in the morning to bend to him the obsequious knee? He is alone -alone amongst the crowd-alone with himselfand that is agony unendurable.

"Cold fearful drops stand on my trembling flesh.
What, do I fear myself? there's none else by:

Is there a murderer here? No;—yes; I am: Then fly. What, from myself? great reason: why? Lest I revenge. What, myself, upon myself? Alack, I love myself. Wherefore? for any good That I myself have done unto myself? O, no! alas, I rather hate myself, For hateful deeds committed by myself!

I shall despair: there is no creature loves me; And if I die, no soul shall pity me."

One other illustration. In the Old Testament we have a real picture, to me most awing and solemnising, of the loneliness of a proud selfseeking heart. It is that of Saul. He had separated himself from his most loving friends: Samuel had stood by him as long as possible, and at last departed with a sorrow which mourned bitterly in secret for the fallen king. But Samuel is now A ghastly gloom settles over the spirit of Saul. The harp of the sweet singer of Israel can no longer silence the jarring discords of unruly passion by its cunning minstrelsies. The tender and womanly love of Jonathan can no longer soften his father's heart, or refresh its withered affections, as drops of dew falling into an aged thorn. Saul the king, the Pride of Israel, is alone! At last the hosts of the Philistines have mustered on the sides of Gilboa, and on the morrow a great battle must be fought. What an unutterably tragic spectacle is that of the king passing, in darkness, to the foul cave of the witch of Endor; his spirit bowed down like a pine-tree bent beneath the midnight gale, yet willing to hold converse with even the mysterious world of the dead, if he can only find one there whom he once called friend, who pitied him when alive, and who may yet retain some gentle and sympathising remembrances of the olden time. And when the miserable man sees, or thinks he sees, in the gloom of the cave, and with the eyes of a broken heart and distempered imagination, the form of old Samuel, oh! what a wailing cry is that out of the depths of an utterly desolate and lonely spirit-"I am sore distressed! The Philistines make war upon me, and God has departed from me, and answereth me

Such is the selfishness of sin, and the loneliness which, even in this world, it is doomed to endure!

There is no escape except in coming within the circle of abiding and eternal love. God's moral law is as unchangeable as His own being, and it is "fulfilled" in this alone,—in loving the Lord our God with all our heart, and our neighbour as ourselves. But only through faith in Jesus, and in the possession of His Spirit, can this law of righteousness, peace, and joy be fulfilled in us. "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh."

Look, then, to Jesus Christ! In Him behold the love of God revealed to His enemies. "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." Believe in that love as forgiving all our sius through Him who died for us. was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. We then, as workers together with him, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain." Lock to Jesus as himself possessing as a man that life of true love to God and man, which he died and lives to impart to every one who will believe in Him and abide in Him by simple trust. "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." Finally look to the Holy Spirit of Love promised to all who believe, to be as a constant and all-sufficient power, to soften the heart, to deliver it from the burthen of self, and to set it free in the liberty of love, by which we shall live, not to ourselves, but to Him who died for us, so that in us the Lord may see, as He has done already in a countless multitude of souls, an answer to his prayer. "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou has sent me. And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are one: I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me." I conclude with the sublime prayer of St. Paul, coming from the same eternal "For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, that he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fullness of God. Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen."

THE OLDEST STORY IN THE WORLD.

I HAVE ventured to call this "The Oldest Story in the World," because it is the oldest which has actually come down to us in writing. That the human imagination had been active and fruitful for centuries, even before the remote period to which this story belongs, there can be no question. Possibly some of those strange traditions, which so often repeat themselves in different parts of the globe, with merely local variations of colour and form, and which float to us we know not whence, may boast a higher antiquity. But if so, the earliest records of them have perished. They have passed from mouth to mouth, they have rooted themselves here and there, like winged seeds finding a resting-place in different soils, and there shooting up, as if of native growth, and defying every attempt to ascertain their exact origin; the books in which they have at last taken definite shape being centuries later than the myth, the tale, the fable which they preserve.

But the story which is here presented to the reader, comes with better credentials. There is no doubt as to its age or its authorship, it remains to this day as it was originally written. The old papyrus, brown and crumbling, covered with mysterious characters, traced two-and-thirty centuries ago by the hand of the Egyptian scribe, Annana, may be seen in the British Museum. It has been read, it has been deciphered, it has been printed, and its contents, so long hidden in darkness, have been brought into "the light of common day."

Two-and-thirty centuries! It requires a strong effort of the imagination to carry us back so far. We must transport ourselves to the ancient Egyptian Thebes, to the spot where the ruins of gigantic temples now rise on either bank of the Nile, near the miserable villages of Karnak and Luxor, telling of a splendour and a civilization long since passed away. There, at the time of this story, the great Pharaoh Ramses Miamun Keld his court. There he lived in his palace, surrounded by his family, his nobles and great officers of state. On many accounts he is one of the most justly celebrated of Egyptian monarchs. According to some interpreters of the monuments, he is the king mentioned in Scripture as "another king who knew not Joseph," the oppresser of the Israelites, the builder of Pithom and Ramses, the monarch at whose court Moses was brought up. What is more certain is, that he was the restorer of the native dynasty after the longcontinued irruptions and usurpations of the Shepherds. His riches, the splendour of his court, his victories and triumphs, form the theme of many poems, still existing, which were composed and sung in his honour. But he was not only famous for his warlike exploits, or for the vast works which he accomplished: he was the munificent patron of literature, he gathered about him the most distinguished poets and men of learning to be found in his kingdom, and enrolled them in the College of the Hierogrammateis, or Sacred Scribes. Their works were carefully collected, and were not only intended to be deposited with the mummy in the sarcophagus, but to form part of the treasures of the royal library, over whose portal, as an ancient writer informs us, stood the inscription, "The Hospital of the Soul."

Among the illustrious literati who were to be seen at the court of Pharaoh, nine were held by common consent to occupy the foremost rank. At the head of these, distinguished by the splendour of his style, an Egyptian Burke or Gibbon, was a certain Kagabu, who, with the title of "Keeper of the Rolls," presided over the royal library. The names of some other of these literary coryphæi have come down to us, together with their writings. These embrace many topics: some are hymns to the gods, others epic poems in honour of King Ramses II., others exhortations to a virtuous life in this world, with constant reference to the rewards of the life to come; others again, histories or travels clothed in a poetical garb. Another, and a very considerable portion of these writings, is occupied in discussing a question, which we may suppose was the question of the day, viz., - Which caste is the most important in the state? What opinions the priests, the soldiers, or the artisans held on this vital subject, we have now no means of ascertaining. The authors had it all their own way. And they, or at least those of repute, are all agreed, with a wonderful unanimity, that their own caste holds the foremost place, that "the Scribe" is the very flower of humanity-

"Liber, honoratus, sapiens, rex denique regum."

And the very rational ground on which this preference rests is this: that his work is not labour and travail, but, in the strictest sense, recreation and enjoyment. Happy times! Centuries were to elapse before the Jewish Preacher drew the reverse of the picture: "Of making many books there is no end, and much study is a weariness to the flesh."

Wide, however, and varied as was the field of Egyptian literature, one portion, it was supposed, had never been cultivated. Though every museum in Europe had its rolls of papyrus, amongst none of these was there any work of imagination in the shape of a tale or romance till, in the year 1852, this want was happily supplied. In that year, Mrs. D'Orbiney, an English lady, travelling in Italy, became the fortunate purchaser of this unique papyrus. On her return, she submitted it to the inspection of one of the first of living Egyptologists, the Vicomte de Rougé, Superintendent of the Egyptian Collection at Paris. He at once recognised the value of the discovery, and described the general character of the roll. In a short account of it, which was printed in the Revue

Archéologique he drew the attention of French savans to this remarkable production, and at the same time gave a translation of some passages of the tale. A complete version was published in German by M. Brugsch, two years ago, and this we have followed throughout.

It only remains to add, that the story was written "in usum Delphini," for the Prince Seti Mernephtah, son of Pharaoh Ramses Miamun, and was regarded as one of the masterpieces of Egyptian literature. At the end of it is this critical notice:—

"Considered good enough to be associated with the names of Pharaoh's scribe, Kagabu [the leading writer of the day], and the scribe Horu, and the scribe Meremapu [two other stars of the first magnitude in the great literary constellation]. It was composed by the scribe Annana, the possessor of this roll. May the god Thoth preserve from destruction all the words which are contained in this roll."

- 1. There were two brothers, sons of one mother and one father. Ancpu was the name of the elder, Batau that of the younger. Now Ancpu had a house and a wife;
- 2. But his younger brother was with him as a child, and he made garments for him. He followed his oxen to the field.
- 3. [Only when] the labour of ploughing was done, then was he obliged to assist in all manner of work in the field. And lo! his younger brother
- 4. Was a good workman; there was none like him in all the land.... After many days were accomplished, afterwards the younger brother was

- His wife, that he might drink and eat, whilst the younger brother was in his stall with his oxen.
- 8. Now, when the earth became bright, and a new day dawned, and the lamp [no longer burned], then he arose before his elder brother, and carried
- 9. The loaves of bread to the field, to give them to the labourers, that they might eat with him in the field. Then he went after his oxen;
- 10. And they always told him where the good herbage was, and he hearkened to all their words. And he drove them to the spot

[after the overflowing of the Nile], and the season is fair for ploughing. Therefore, come thou

- 4. To the field with the seed, for we will busy ourselves with the plough Thus he spake to him. And his
- 5. Younger brother did, in all respects, as his elder brother had said unto him.... And when the earth grew bright and
- 6. A new day arose, then they went to the field with their [team], and were very busy with their labour in the field, and
- 7. Were full of gladness, because of the accomplishment of their work Now, it came to pass,
- 8. After many days, that, when they were in the field, they wanted seed, and he sent his
- 9. Younger brother, saying: Haste thee, and fetch us seed from the village. And his younger brother found the wife
- 10. Of his elder brother sitting braiding her hair. Then he spake unto her, saying: Arise, and give me seed:

- 1. For I must haste to the field, because my brother hath bidden me return without delay. Then she said unto him, Go
- 2. Open the granary, and take what thy soul desireth, for [if I went] my hair might become unbraided by the way. Then went the youth
- 3. Unto his stall, and he took a large basket, because he wished to carry much grain; and he laded himself with
- 4. Wheat and barley, and went out. Then she said unto him: How much carriest thou? And he answered her: Three measures of barley,
- 5. And two measures of wheat; in all, five measures, which are upon my arm. So he said unto her—

[The story then goes on to relate how this false and licentious woman, like Potiphar's wife, foiled in her wickedness, like her, took her revenge by bringing a malicious charge against the young man; and to give greater colour to the accusation, wounded herself, and pretended that the wounds had been inflicted by her husband's brother.]

- 7. ... Now her husband returned home at even,
- 8. According to his daily custom, and he entered into his house and found his wife lying there, as though she had suffered violence at the hands of an evil-doer.
- And she gave him no water for his hands as was her custom, neither did she light the lamp before him, and his house was dark. And she lay
- 10. There uncovered. And her husband said unto her, "Who hath spoken unto thee? arise." Then she answered him: "No man hath spoken unto me except thy younger brother.".... Then did his elder brother become
- 5. Like a panther, and he made his axe sharp, and took it in his hand. And his elder brother placed himself behind the door
- 6. Of his stall, to slay his younger brother on his return at evening, when he drove back his oxen into the

7. Stall. Now when the sun set, and he had laden himself with all manner of herbs of the field according to his daily custom, then

8. Came he, and the first heifer entered into the stall. Then she spake to her keeper, (saying) "Beware of thine elder brother who standeth there

9. Before thee with his axe, to slay thee. Remain thou far from him." And he heard the words of his first heifer.

- 1. Then went the second in and spake likewise. And he looked under the door of his stall,
- 2. And he caught sight of the legs of his elder brother, who stood behind the door with his axe in his hand.
- 3. And he cast down his load to the ground and fled instantly thence, and his
- 4. Elder brother followed him with his axe. And his younger brother prayed to the sun-god, Harmachis
- 5. (saying): "Gracious Lord, Thou art He who dost sever between the lie and the truth." And the sun-god stood
- 6. To hear all his complaints, and the sun-god cansed a mighty stream to arise between him and his elder brother, and it was
- 7. Full of crocodiles. And the one of them was upon the one bank, and the other upon the other.
- 8. His elder brother dealt two blows with his hand, but he could not slay him. So did he. And his
- 9. Younger brother cried to him from the bank, saying, "Remain, and wait till the earth be bright, and when the orb of the sun appeareth above the horizon then will I

- 1. Discover myself to thee before it, that I may give thee to know the truth; for never have I done any wrong unto thee.
- 2. But in the place where thou art will I not tarry, but I will go to the mountain of cedars." When the earth grew bright, and the next day arose, then
- 3. The sun-god Harmachis appeared, and they looked one upon another. And the youth spake to his elder brother, saying:
- 4. "Wherefore pursuest thou me, to slay me unrighteously? Hearest thou not, what my mouth uttereth, namely, I am of a truth thy younger brother, and
- 5. Thou wert unto me as a father, and thy wife as a mother."

[He then clears himself of the charge that had been laid against him, and satisfies his brother of his innocence. The story continues-]

Page 8. 1. But the soul of his brother was sore troubled. And he stood there, weeping and lamenting, yet

- could he not pass over to his younger brother because of the crocodiles.
- 2. And his younger brother cried to him, saying : "Behold thou didst devise evil, and hadst not good in thy mind instead thereof. But I will tell thee one thing which theu must do. Go to thine house.
- 3. Tend thy cattle, for I shall no longer tarry there where thou dwellest, but I shall go to the mountain of cedars. This now shalt thou do for me, when thou comest, in order to seek for me.
- 4. Know then that I must separate myself from my soul that I may lay it in the topmest blossom of the cedar. And as soon as ever the cedar tree shall be cut down, theu will it fall to the earth.
- 5. When thou comest to seek it, then tarry thou seven years, to seek it, and if thy soul endureth this, then wilt thou find it. Then place it in a vessel with cold water. So shall I again come to life, and shall give an answer
- 6. To all questions, to make known [to thee] what more must be done with me. . . . Take also a bottle of barley-water in thine hand, cover it with pitch, and tarry not therewith, that thou mayest have it with thee [when thou comest]." And he went
- 7. To the mountain of cedars, and his elder brother betook himself to his house, laid his hand upon his head, and strewed earth thereon. As soon as he entered into his house, he slew
- 8. His wife, cast her to the dogs, and set himself down to mourn over his younger brother. After many days his younger brother came to the mountain of cedars.
- 9. And no one was with him; and he passed the day in hunting the wild beasts of the land, and came in the evening to lay himself down to rest beneath the cedar tree in whose topmost blossom his soul lay. Many

1. Days later he built for himself a hut with his hands upon the mountain of cedars,

2. And filled it with all the good things that he would have in his house. When he went out from his hut, there met him the nine gods,

3. Who had gone forth to provide for the wants of the whole land. And the company of the gods spake one to another [and] said to him,

4. "O Batau, thou bullock of the gods, why art thou thus alone, why hast thou forsaken thy land because of the wife of Anepu, thine elder

5. Brother? Behold his wife is put to death. Return home to him; he will answer thee all questions." And their heart was moved with com-

6. Towards him very greatly. Then spake the sun-god Harmachis to Chnum: Fashion thou a wife for Batau

7. That he may not abide alone. And Chnum fashioned for him a wife, and as she sat there she was more beautiful in person than all women

8. In the whole country; all divinity was in her.

And the seven Hathors came and beheld her, and they said with one

9. Mouth: "She will die a violent death." And he loved her very greatly, and she sat in his house, whilst he spent the day

- 1. In chasing the wild beasts of the country, and laid the spoil at her feet. And he said unto her, "Go not forth, lest thou meet the Sea
- 2. And he carry thee away: for I could not rescue thee from him because my soul lieth
- 3. In the topmost of the cedar-blossoms. If another findeth it, then must I fight for it." And he opened unto her his whole heart.
- 4. Many days later Batau went forth to hunt,
- as was his daily custom.
- 5. Now his young wife also went abroad to walk beneath the cedar which stood beside her house, when, lo! the Sea beheld her
- 6. And rose u. behind her, but she ran hastily from him and leaped and gat her into her house.
- 7. But the Sea cried to the Cedar, saying: "Oh, how I love her!" Then the Cedar gave him a lock of her hair. And the
- 8. Sea carried it to Egypt; and laid it down on the spot where were the washers of the house of Pharach. And the fragrance
- 9. Of the lock of hair imparted itself to the garments of Pharaoh, and there arose a strife among the washers
- 10. Of Pharaoh, because they said, "There is a fragrance as of anointing oil among the garments of Pharaoh," and every day there was a strife among them concerning it.

- 1. And they knew not what they did. But the chief of Pharaoh's washers went to the Sea and his soul was troubled
- 2. Very greatly because of the daily strife concerning this matter. And he posted himself and stood upon the shore opposite the lock of hair
- 3. Which lay in the sea. Then he stooped down, and seized the lock of hair; and there was found therein an extraordinary sweet odour.
- 4. Then he brought it unto Pharaoh. And the experienced scribes of Pharaoh were summoned. And they spake unto Pharaoh: "This is the lock
- 5. Of a daughter of the sun-god, and all divinity is in her. The whole land doeth homage to thee. Therefore send now messengers
- 6. Into all lands, to seek for her, but the messenger who shall go to the cedar mountains, let him be accompanied by many people,
- 7. That they may fetch her hither." And behold, the King said: "The thing is very good which ye have spoken." And they were sent forth. Many days later
- 8. Came the people who had gone to the [different] lands to bring tidings to the King, but they came not

- 9. Who had gone to the cedar mountains, for Batau had slain them, and had only left one of them alive to bring the King word again.
- 10. Then the King sent forth people, many warriors on foot and on horseback, in order again to fetch her.

- 1. And there was also a woman amongst them. In her hand were placed all manner of women's ornaments. Then came the woman [Batau's wife] to
- 2. Egypt with her, and there was great rejoicing because of her in the whole country. And the King loved her very greatly,
- 3. And he reared her to wondrous beauty. And they spake to her that she should disclose the history
- 4. Of her husband. Then she said to the King: "Let the cedar-tree be cut down, that he may perish." Then
- 5. Were sent armed men, who carried their axes with them to cut down the cedar-tree. And they came
- 6. To the cedar, and they cut the blossom off, in the midst whereof the soul of Batau was.
- 7. Then it fell away, and he died shortly. When the earth grew bright, and a new day arose, then was
- 8. Also the cedar-tree cut down. And Anepu, Batau's elder brother, went into his house, and
- 9. Sat himself down to wash his hands. And he took a vessel with barley-water, which he closed with pitch,
- 10. And another with wine, which he closed with clay. And he took his staff

- 1. And his shoes, together with his garment, and provision for the journey, and set out on his way
- 2. To the mountain of cedars. And he came to the hut of his younger brother, and found his younger brother lying stretched out
- 3. Upon his mat. He was dead. And he began to weep when he beheld his younger brother lying stretched out like one dead. Then went he forth
- 4. To seek for the soul of his younger brother beneath the cedar, beneath which his younger brother laid himself down in the evening.
- 5. And he sought for it three years without finding it. And when the fourth year came, then his soul longed to return to Egypt,
- 6. And he said: "I will go to-morrow morning early." Such was his purpose. When the earth grew bright, and a new day arose, he took
- 7. His way under the cedar, and he busied himself all the day in seeking for the soul. And as he returned home at evening, and again looked round about him to seek for it,
- 8. Then he found a fruit, and when he returned home with it, lo! there was the soul of his younger brother. Then took he

9. The vessel with cold water, placed it therein, and sat himself down, as was his daily custom. Now as soon as it was night,

- 1. Then the soul sucked in the water, and Batau stirred himself in all his limbs, and looked at his elder brother,
- 2. But his heart was incapable of motion. And Anepu, his elder brother, took the vessel with the cold water, wherein the soul
- 3. Of his younger brother was, made him drink it up, and lo! the soul was restored to its old place.
- 4. Then was he the same as he had been before. They embraced one
- 5. Another, and they spake one to another. And Batau said to his
- 6. Elder brother: "See, I will change myself into a sacred bullock with all the sacred marks, the mystery thereof shall no man know, and do thou set thyself upon my back. And so soon as the sun is arisen, we will be at the place where my wife is. Answer me
- 7. Whether thou wilt lead me thither: for all favour will be shown unto thee, as it is fitting. Thou shalt be

8. Laden with silver and gold, if thou leadest me to Pharaoh, for I shall be in great good fortune;

9. And they will hail me with shouts of joy throughout all the land. But go thou to thy village." When the earth grew bright,

Page 15.

- 1. And a new day dawned, then had Batau assumed the form which he had described to his brother. And Anepu,
- 2. His elder brother, sat himself upon his back at the dawn of day. And when he drew nigh to the place, they

3. Informed the King: but he, when he beheld him, rejoiced greatly, and celebrated in his honour

- 4. A feast, greater than can be told, for it was a great good fortune. And there was joy because of him in all the land. And they
- 5. Brought thither silver and gold for his elder brother who abode in his village, and they gave him many servants
- 6. And many [other] things, and Pharaoh loved him greatly, more than any man in all the land.
- 7. After many days later the bullock went into the sanctuary and stood on
- 8. The same spot where the beautiful one [his wife] was. Then he spake unto her, saying: "Look hither, I am still alive, of a truth." Then
- 9. Spake she: "Who art thou?" And he answered her, "I am Batau; thou didst then,
- 10. When thou causedst the cedar to be felled, teach Pharaoh where I was, that I might no longer live.

1. Look at me: I am still alive, of a truth, only

- I am in the form of a bullock." Then was his beautiful wife in great fear when she heard this that
- 2. Her husband had spoken unto her. And then she went forth from the sanctuary, and the King sat down by her side,
- 3. And she found herself in favour with the King, and she obtained grace in his sight beyond all measure. Then spake she to the King:
- 4. "Swear to me, by God, that thou wilt fulfil all that I shall ask of thee." Then he promised to fulfil for her all that she asked, and she said: "Let me eat of the liver of this bullock,
- 5. For thou hast no need of him." Thus she spake unto him. Then was he exceeding sorry because of what she had spoken, and the soul
- 6. Of Pharach was troubled above measure. When the earth grew bright, and a new day arose, then they made ready a great feast
- 7. To offer sacrifices to the bullock. But then went forth one of the chief servants of the king to slay the bullock. And it
- S. Came to pass hereupon, that when they would slay him, the people stood by his side. And when he gave him a blow upon his neck
- 9. There leaped forth two drops of blood on the spot where the two doorposts of the king's palace are; the one fell on the one side
- Of Pharach's door, and the other on the other side. And they grew up into two beautiful Persea trees.

- 1. And each of them stood apart by itself. Then they went to the King to tell him: "Two fine
- 2. Persea trees have, to the King's great good fortune, sprung up in the night on the spot where the great gate of the King's palace is, and there is joy
- 3. Because of it in all the land." After many days later, the king was
- 4. Adorned with his collar of lapis-lazuli, and beautiful garlands of flowers were about his neck. He was in a golden chariot.
- 5. And when he came forth from the King's palace, then he spied the Persea trees. And his beautiful wife also had gone forth upon a chariot behind Pharach.
- 6. And the King placed himself under one of the Perseas. But it said to his wife, "Ah! thou false woman. I am
- 7. Batau; I am yet alive, I have transformed myself. Thou didst teach Pharach where I dwelt,
- 8. That I might be put to death; I was the bullock, and thou didst cause me to be put to death." Many days later
- 9. The beautiful woman stood in the favour of the King, and she found grace in his sight. Then she said to the King: "Come
- 10. Swear to me, by God, that thou wilt do all that I shall say unto thee." Then also he promised to fulfil

- 1. All she should ask, and she said: "Let the two Persea trees be hewn down, that beautiful boards made be made thereof."
- 2. And they did all that she desired. After many days later, the King commanded
- 3. Skilful workmen to come and cut down Pharaoh's Perseas, and the beautiful Queen stood by and looked on.
- 4. And there flew a chip of the wood, and went into the mouth of the beautiful lady.
 - 5. And it came to pass, after many days,
- 6. That she brought forth a son, and they went to carry tidings to the King: "To thee is
- 7. Born a son." And he was brought forward, and they gave him a nurse, and women to take charge of him; and there was
- 8. Joy in all the land. They sat themselves down to keep a festival; they gave him
- 9. His name; and the King loved him greatly from that hour; and he appointed him

Page 19.

- 1. Prince of Ethiopia. After many days had passed hereafter, the King made him
- 2. Viceroy of the whole country. After many days had passed hereafter, when he had fulfilled
- 3. Many years as Viceroy, then the Kiug died, and Pharaoh flew to heaven.
- 4. And the other said: "Now let me summon the mighty ones, and the great ones of the royal court; I will make them know the whole history
- 5. Of all that has happened, with regard to me and the Queen." And his wife was brought to him, and he made himself known unto her before them, and they uttered their sentence.

- 6. And they brought to him his elder brother, and he made him Viceroy over all his territory. He reigned thirty years as King of Egypt.
- 7. When he had lived these thirty, then his brother stood in his place on the day of his burial.

So ends this tale of three thousand years ago. How many reflections it suggests! How many points of contact it presents with the tales and traditions of other times and countries! What a curious light it throws on the manners and customs and opinions of the ancient Egyptians! In particular, how clearly it implies a belief, not only in the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, but also in the separate existence of the soul from the body! Whether the tale was in the strictest sense original. or whether it was drawn from existing sources, is a matter of little importance: whether the merit of invention or only the merit of embellishment is due to the scribe Annana, the interest is the same. The simplicity, the freshness, the almost biblical style of the narrative, cannot fail to strike the mind, even in a translation. If, as M. Brugsch thinks, the author was the contemporary of Moses, such a circumstance adds another feature of interest to the discovery of the papyrus. The resemblance between some portions of the narrative in Genesis and the style of the Egyptian writer may be accounted for by the fact, that Moses was trained by men like Annana and Kagabu in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. This story, this papyrus, may have been in his hands. Writings such as these may have contributed to his education. They help us, at least, to realise more vividly the fact that the great Jewish lawgiver was prepared for his mission, not first in the solitudes of Horeb, but in the court of Pharaoh, and in the schools of Egypt.

SUMMER IN THE CITY.

Who is it comes in robes of fiery amber,
With languor in her hot and heavy breath;
Who's felt, not seen, within the poor man's chamber,
Wherein she dealeth fell disease and death?

O brothers, sisters, in these stagnant alleys
Lift up your voices, let your cry resound
Of longing for the breezy hills and valleys,
Where lavish flowers bestrew the happy ground;

Where birds are singing, and a thousand voices
Send forth the psalm of thanksgiving and praise;
Where waving wood and rippling rill rejoices
Through the fair length of these sweet summer days.

Cry ye, "Our Summer-time is joyless, dreary;
There is no gladness in the lengthening light,
That only makes the loud long day more weary
Before it falls into the swoon of night.

"No azure skies for us, no daisied meadows: Beauty's forgotten in this world of ours; Our darkling lives are lived amid the shadows, Heaven's stars scarce farther from us than Earth's flowers!"

O Father! fill men's hearts with helpful pity For these. Thy equal children as they are: Poor haggard prisoners in the monster city, That maketh prey of all things pure and fair.

For, if we happier ones could bring these others Some of the blessings shower'd on us to share-If we could lead our sisters and our brothers Into Thy precious sunshine and sweet air,-

If we could make their darken'd eyes see clearer The light that to this lower world is given, Then might their starved souls at length feel nearer Unto Thy Love-the other name for Heaven.

WEATHER OF MAY.

IT has been remarked that our language "teems with medico-meteorological apophthegms." Among these we have a good old Scotch one, which refers to the month of May, and gives us this warning:

> " Ne'er cast a cloot Till May be oot.'

Similar cautions abound in other tongues. With a heavy kind of wit we are counselled in German, "To stick to our winter things till the 40th of May;" and in the northern countries of Europe generally, the matter-of-fact form of the proverb is simply this: "Don't put off your great-coat in May." It is the same idea too which underlies the advice: "Who has a big log of wood, let him keep it for May." Even the people of Venice and Milan, in more southern latitudes, have a proverb, casting a slur on merry May-times. It has a little more fancy in it, and runs thus: "May! lovely May! to thee thy roses, but to me my furs!"

It would appear from these proverbs that in spite of its cowslips, buttercups, and daisies; in spite of its nightingales, cuckoos, and ringdoves: in spite of its bright sunshine, and clear sky, and lengthening day, and growing warmth; in spite of all its brilliancy and charms, there is broadly in the people's mind a suspicion of May-a feeling that its weather is not what it seems to be, and that it should not be trusted.

Let us see to what extent this is well founded.

mer through the months of May and June, and back again into winter through October and November. In the rise of temperature from winter to summer the great strides take place in May and June, and in the progress back the great falls occur in October and November. May is a warmer month than April by 7°, and June than May by 64°. Except in October and November no such leaps as these are made from month to month. The intervening spaces of winter and summer are comparatively equable. These four months, therefore, may be called transition months. They are the steps by which we reach and leave the warm regions of our year. But they are not equal steps. for the first of the ascent and the last of the descent -May and November-are deeper and more abrupt than the others.

The great rise of temperature which occurs in May depends on the rapid rate of increase in the power of the sun's rays at this period of the year, and the same influence is stretched over June. It depends on this solely, and not on any greater prevalence of warm winds. Indeed, the very opposite of this holds, for the rise of temperature takes place in spite of the fact that, at no season of the year are cold winds more frequent or more steady.

Taking the year as a whole, we have in Scotland twice as much wind from the south-west as we have from the north-east, but the proportion varies greatly in the different seasons. In April, for instance, the mean of the north-east actually exceeds that of the south-west, while in May and June they nearly balance each other. The body of the stream from the north-east flows over us in March, April, May, and June, during the whole of which period we have the wind nearly as often from the cold north-east as from the warm south-west. It is quite otherwise both in our months of great heat and of great cold, for then the south-west winds have their greatest frequency. Thus it happens that in the very dead of winter, our prevailing winds blow from those very quarters from which they blow in the height of summer; while in spring and early summer, -when our weather is becoming rapidly warmer and warmer, -keen cold winds from polar regions stream over us for more than half the time. What our winters would be, if the south winds loved them less, it would be hard to tell. What our springs are because the south winds love them so little, it is our present purpose to try to show.*

RAIN.+

It need scarcely be said that these months of northerly winds are sure to be the driest of our year. It should be so; and that it is so, the subjoined tables, constructed on an average of five years, will show at a glance. Less rain falls in April, May, and June, and it also falls on a smaller number of days, than in anyof the other months of the year. The month of least rain during this period of five years was May, 1859, when at many stations no rain fell and the mean rainfall for all Scotland was about one-third of an inch. In the same year no rain at all fell at one station from the 19th of April to the 23rd of May.

Our south-west winds come from equatorial regions heated by a vertical sun, and charged with the moisture they have licked up from the oceans of the southern hemisphere.

They pass us on their way to arctic regions. where the last of their moisture is squeezed out of them; and, cold and arid, they take their way back to the tropics. Of these two great and constant currents-north and south-sometimes the one and sometimes the other is uppermost. So far as Scotland is concerned, the general tendency which they exhibit to change places at certain seasons has been pointed out. Every such change will be accompanied by a change in the rate of rainfall, since, for reasons and in a manner known, the one current is wet and the other dry. The first, at its outset loaded with moisture, in its progress north, loses its heat, approaches the point of saturation,* and readily parts with some of that moisture with which it was charged, and which it easily held in solution at a higher temperature. So it is that it is a rainy wind. The last again, the north-east wind, dry when it begins its southward course, gets warmer as it goes on, and acquires a higher power of holding vapour in suspension. And thus it is that it is not a rainy wind-so far otherwise, indeed, that it is not only a dry but a drying wind-it has an actual thirst which it greedily quenches at every wet surface over which it blows. A property of this kind cannot be without its influence on life and health.

HYGROMETRIC CONDITION.

It will be understood from what has already been said, that in April, May, and June, the air is further from saturation than during any other season. Of the three mouths, May is almost always the driest.

temperature—we should expect much sunshine and little cloud. And such is the fact. You will find the proof of it in the Tables which are subjoined. They show that sunshine and cloud rise and fall respectively in the months of April, May, and June—giving us for that time dry, clear, bright days.

RANGE OF TEMPERATURE, *

The general character of the mean temperature of the mouth of May has already been described, but we get little insight into the temperature phenomena either of a mouth or a year from the simple study of mouthly or annual means. For instance, the mean annual temperatures for all the various stations in Scotland do not differ greatly—the range not exceeding four and a half degrees.

It would be a great error, however, to conclude from this that there is little difference between the climates of the different stations. The same mean may come from very different columns of figures. The temperature may be very differently distributed over the year at two stations, yet their mean temperature may be nearly or exactly the same. Thus, for instance, the mean temperature of Sandwick is 45.5°, and of Thirlestane 45.1°, yet there are no two places in Scotland whose climates are more opposed to each other. And so it is with months. The mean temperature of a month may not differ much from that which precedes or that which follows it, yet each may have had the temperature spread over it in a way strikingly at variance with the other two. In like manner, it may be observed that the mean temperature of one month is every year a certain number of degrees above that of its precursor. But it would be quite a mistake to infer that this is the result of a steady rise of both day and night temperatures. The mean may have been brought up by higher day temperatures alone, or night temperatures alone may have risen, or there may have been unusual fluctuations in both. It is clearly not a matter of indifference in what way the rise is accounted for-out of what elements the mean flows. On the contrary, both to the animal and vegetable world it is a point of very great importance. Though the mean of a month be high, yet if a few days of great cold occur during its course with such frequency and regularity as to be a character of its weather, or if the mean flow from excessive daily or monthly fluctuations, we may look for an influence on health differing from that which we would expect to attend the mean of the month as a whole.

Now, as regards daily range of temperature, May stands apart from all the other months of the year in this—that the range culminates in that month. It does so every year, and it does so for every part of Scotland—for the east coast, west coast, and inland districts.† So far as the physician is concerned, this is another feature of the weather of May, the importance of which is beyond question. For the inland stations the mean daily range becomes as high as 17.5°, and for all Scotland it is 15.6°; and for particular stations, such as Thirlestane and Stobo, it sometimes goes up to 20.5° and 20.9°.

It thus appears that the daily fluctuations of temperature are excessive in this month, and greater than in any other.

On examining the figures which enable us to arrive at this conclusion, we find that the great rise of temperature, which has been pointed out as occurring in May, is produced more by a rise in the day than in the night temperature; for the mean day temperature of May exceeds that of April by 8.2°, while the mean night temperature of May only exceeds that of April by 6.1°. In other words, there is less difference between the nights of April and those of May, than there is between the days of the one and the other.

The mean temperature for April, 1859, was 41.3°, and the mean for May, 51.0°, giving the very great monthly increase of 9.7°. It is remarkable, however, that in spite of this extraordinary rise, the night temperatures of May were unduly low, while the daily range rose to 19.7°.

The extreme monthly ranges are also great, but perhaps not greater than occur in some of the other months of the year. On the 19th of May, 1861, at Taymouth, there was a maximum temperature in the shade of 85°. Temperatures so high as this are rarely recorded in Scotland in any month of the year. At the same place, on the 10th of the same month, the thermometer fell to 22°, giving the extraordinary range of 63° at one station during one month. At Drumlanrig, in the same year, the temperature fell to 20.7°, and rose to 77.2° on the 10th and 22nd of May. At Smeaton, in 1865, on the 17th of May, the maximum temperature was 84.5°, and at the same place on the last day of the month, the thermometer was as low as 32°. Indeed, some of these readings are so high as almost to lead to the suspicion of error.

In 1861, there occurred in London, on the 16th and 23rd of May, two maximum readings (79.7° and 80.2°), which were higher than any recorded temperature in any month of the previous year: yet, in the same month of May, 1861, there was one minimum reading as low as 29.1°. It has been observed that these extreme temperatures are of more probable occurrence in the beginning of May than towards its end.* We shall, by-and-by, see to what extent this is correct.

The careful study of these extreme temperatures has disclosed to us that, in all the inland and eastern districts, frost may every year be confidently expected to occur some time in May; and in the islands and on the west coast the chance of its occurring equals the chance of its not occurring. But, more than this, somewhere or other in Scotland, frost is sure to occur every week in May, up to its very end. Indeed, we must have fairly seen the face of June, before we can count on having escaped from frost; that is, if we live in inland or eastern districts of our country—the islands and the west being some ten or fourteen days earlier.+

So much for our chances of frost in May. What chance have we of high temperatures-say 70° and upwards? The answer to this is that on the mainland we need not look for a temperature of 65° till the last week of April, or the first week of May; and for each of the next four weeks the chances are equal for and against its occurring. In the west and in the islands, heat as great as this will be a fortnight later of making its appearance.

COLD WEEK IN MAY.

In his valuable papers on "Weckly extreme temperatures in Scotland," Mr. Buchan observes that if we compare the lowest temperatures at the different stations for the week beginning 17th of May with those of the preceding week, a remarkable rise will be found: in most cases about 6°. A similar rise, though not so great a one, takes place in the day temperatures. It would appear from this that it is the rule for the week before that beginning with the 17th to be unusually cold—that is, colder than the week before or the week after. Now, it happens that Dove, # the captain of living meteorologists, pointed out, some years ago, that a remarkable cold occurs generally in Europe about the 11th of May. And Dove's eye is not the only one which has caught sight of this singular periodical phenomenon. M. Maedler stated in 1845 that a lowering of the temperature occurred steadily about the 12th of May, and he thought that it was accompanied by a barometric rise, and a change of wind from west round by the north to north-east.*

M. Charles Martins, also a meteorologist and philosopher of high repute, pointed out in 1849 that he had found, from thirty years' observations at Paris, that there are not in the month of May three consecutive days whose temperature is as low as that of the 13th, 14th, and 15th; and he also states that Brussels observations show a regularly recurring depression of temperature coincident with that at Paris. +

M. Crahay, in the same year, announced to the Brussels Academy that his researches for Louvain and Maestricht led to the same conclusions as those formed by M. Martins. ±

Nor has M. Quetelet been silent on the subject. He says that this cold May week appears to occur in Belgium between the 14th and 23rd of the month, and that it is better marked in the north than in the south of Europe. §

It was not left, however, to philosophical research to detect this feature of the weather of May. It is well disclosed in our folk-lore. Not a few of the curious sayings of the common people are founded on accurate observation. They hang round facts, and the hat of respect must accordingly be raised to them. They give the wisdom of the many in the trite, quaint, or witty words of one-and often cover truths of value.

We have seen that among scientific men there is a general belief that a few days of great cold reproduce themselves periodically-from year to yearsomewhere between the 8th and 15th of May-probably between the 10th and 14th. Now there is a common saying among the French :-

> " A la mi-Mai, Queue d'hiver"

- "in the middle of May comes the tail or trail of winter." The Germans have a saying exactly to the same effect :-

"Um Mai mitte-Wintersehleppe"- and they have another which runs thus: "Who shears his sheep before Servatius' day, loves more his wool than sheep." Now, Servatius' day falls on the 13th of May, and it is interesting to find that he, St. Mamert, St. Pancras, and St. Boniface, whose festival-days run from the 11th to the 14th, are called in some parts of Germany and Holland "Eisheiligen," and in others "Eismänner," that is, frost-saints or frost-men, because they are believed to bring cold with them. It appears, too, that this pirie May-winter is called "the gentleman's winter" by the people of North Italy-but not, we imagine, because it makes gentlefolk shiver less than common folk.

It thus appears that men of science, and men of none, have equally observed and noted the periodical occurrence of this cold May week, and that all have placed it nearly at the same point of the month.

Let us now take a look at our Scotch May, to see whether it occurs in it, whether it is well or ill marked, and on what days it usually falls. For this purpose, we shall have to examine the weather of the month more minutely than we have yet done. Hitherto we have been comparing May with other months, and monthly means have been sufficient. But now we must compare one bit of May with another; and for this purpose we must have the daily means, or means of successive short periods. We shall make no selection of years, but take the four last. For the first of these years we shall examine the mean daily temperature for all the stations in Scotland. We choose 1861 because it is the only year for which these daily means have been calculated and published. In addition to this, we shall examine for each of the four years the daily means for each of two stations-keeping to the same two. These two stations were fixed on in this way: the secretary of the Meteorological Society was asked to furnish daily thermometric readings for a few of the Society's stations. He gave those of four, and the two to be examined were chosen by lot. The witnesses are thus fairly selected; they are sufficiently numerous; and we may fairly conclude that they are able to teach the truth of this matter. All the facts thus collected were condensed and embodied in a Table-much too large and complicated to be reproduced here. As the language of Tables is sometimes difficult to read, the facts were then made to address themselves to the eye in a series of curves. We cannot present these to the reader, but we hope to have no difficulty in making him fully understand what was thus brought out of the facts.

The curves represented the daily course of the temperature during the month of May, rising and falling as it rose and fell, and they were arranged in two groups.

The first group consisted of three curves, one of which was coloured red, the others being blue. The red curve represented the mean daily temperature for May, 1861, being a mean calculated on all the Scottish Meteorological Society's stations; and it showed in a remarkable manner that this period of May cold, of which we have been speaking, occurred in that year generally over Scotland, and embraced the period between the 7th and 13th inclusive; - the temperature being lowest generally in Scotland on the 8th. The two blue lines, which give the daily mean temperatures of May, 1861, for the two special stations of Elgin and Milne Graden, showed that there the minimum was later, not occurring till the 9th and 11th. At one of these stations-Elgin-hail, suow, and hoarfrost, occurred on the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th; and at the other—Milne Graden—on the 11th the young shoots were killed by frost.

The second group consisted of three sets of curves — two black, two blue, and two red showing the daily mean temperature for May at the two stations already named: the black for 1862, the red for 1863, and the blue for 1864. Looking at the black first, it was observed that they both exhibited the same depression, but a little further on in the month-stretching from the 10th to the 15th, and having the minima on the 12th and 14th well marked in this case. In the blue and red curves it was less so; but there also the tendency of the temperature at that time to go down was apparent. The indication was feeble comparatively, but still evident. The two red curves were for May, 1863-a month characterised by a low temperature during its whole course. Nevertheless, there was observed a trough in the curve between the 6th and 13th. The same feature was found to a rather greater extent in the blue curves for 1864—but a day or two further on in the month-between the 8th and 14th. The four curves of 1861 and 1862 were very like each other in all their characters. The curves again for 1863 and 1864 differed from these, and differed still more widely from each other. The feeble marking of the cold week in 1863 might have been thought to be accounted for by its accord with the feature which characterised the temperature of the whole month-viz., its unusual lowness and equability. But the same feeble indication of a cold week occurred in 1864, when the fluctuations of temperature were excessive, and when a period of great cold, with mean daily temperatures as low as 39°, occurred at the very end of the month-justifying the caution of the Scotch saw of which we spoke at the outset. Hail and snow fell at Elgin on the 28th, 29th, 30th and 31st, and hail fell at Milne Graden on the 15th and 31st.

The course of temperature in one May differs much from that in another, and it seems particularly uncertain and irregular towards the close of the month, though probably if we extended and widened the research we might even find something like method in its seeming madness there—a thing, indeed, which has actually been suggested by M. Martins. What we have distinctly seen is, that between the 8th and 14th of May the temperature will very probably be lower than it was before the 8th, or than it will be after the 14th,—that is, that a short period of cold reproduces itself in the second week of that month from year to year.*

While examining the meteorological records for May, it was observed that a change of the wind from north-east to south-west did not always bring a rise of the daily mean. On the contrary, it sometimes depressed it. The high and increasing temperature of May depends on the increasing power of the sun, and the south wind clothes our sky with a curtain of cloud which both absorbs the sun's heat during the day, and prevents radiation during night; thus lowering the day temperature and raising the night oue.*

Similar periodical recurrences of exceptionally hot or cold days have been shown to occur in other months. There is, for instance, a remarkable period of heat between the 22nd of February and the end of that month-which month is anomalous in this also, that it is perplexingly dry. Then there appears to be a regular tendency to a fall of temperature between the 9th and 22nd of April. But perhaps November exhibits periodical weatherphenomena more strikingly than any other month. The east wind suddenly becomes prevalent in it, and brings rain, which that wind seldom does in spring-thus, in spite of its east winds, making November one of our wet months. Simultaneously with the east wind we have a high barometric pressure, "and the passage across the country of the well-defined November waves."+

As yet we have scarcely guessed at the cause of the periodicity of these phenomena, which are probably more numerous than we are accustomed to suppose. The day, however, will come when we shall be able to account for them all, and to expound the law which determines them. There is a vigour and vitality now in meteorological inquiries which inspires faith and hope in the future. Hitherto meteorology has had enough to do to keep its place among the sciences, but its head is now quite above the water, and it will carry itself proudly on the day when it finds itself able thoroughly to explain all this periodicity-to tell us, for instance, quite satisfactorily why that great atmospheric wave passes over our country with each returning November.

INFLUENCE OF MAY WEATHER ON HEALTH.

We now come to the second part of the subject, and we shall endeavour as briefly as possible to point out the influence which May weather appears to exercise on the health and life of the people of our country.

The relations of mortality to temperature are constant and intimate in all climates, but they are not the same in all. In some the mortality rises as the temperature rises, and in others it falls as the temperature rises. In the first the greatest mortality takes place in the hot, and in the second in the cold season of the year. Our country, to a marked degree, is in this last condition. By far the largest number of our deaths occur during winter, and for eight or nine months of our year at least mortality and temperature are related inversely to each other. Wherever this inverse relation holds, men have a tendency to die of diseases of the organs of respiration. In those countries again, where the tendency to death is through disease of the abdominal viscera, the relation is different, and it is the hottest month there and not the coldest which opens the mouth of the grave to its widest.

We have thus climates, like our own, which we might conveniently speak of as having a thoracic constitution, that is, considered pathogenically; and others, like those of the tropics, which we might describe as having an abdominal constitution—according to the tendency which they respectively exhibit to influence injuriously the viscera of the thorax or abdomen.

Our climate, as has been stated, kills preferentially by the thorax, taking the year as a whole; but the force of this preference is modified by the seasons, and it decliues considerably when we reach the hottest months of our year, during which we find the climate displaying a certain tendency to assume an abdominal constitution. In other words, during our hot weather the deaths from diseases of the respiratory organs fall, and those from diseases of the digestive organs rise. This takes place whenever the mean temperature reaches 60°. But as soon as it falls below 55°, the mortality increases as the temperature goes down.

Our chances of death by certain diseases vary with the seasons, and it is the march of temperature through the year which in this country regulates in a great measure the mode of the people's dying. We say the march of temperature, because it is that element of climate which has the chief power in the matter. This may be regarded as a fact well established. Yet the close and remarkable manner in which temperature influences mortality is not generally and to its full extent realised. Let us draw attention to one or two facts illustrative of this intimate connection. During the winter of 1856, from the 26th of November to the 5th of December, there occurred in London a period of ten days* when the temperature fell considerably—the mean day and night temperatures for this period being respectively 33.6° and 26.9°, while the corresponding means calculated for the days immediately preceding and following this fall were 51.1° and 46.9°. We have thus a series of mild and cold days-not at different seasons of the year, but at the same season and in juxtaposition—the cold series being parenthetically embraced by the mild. Now, during the ten cold days the total mortality reached the sum of 1844, while during the warmer ones it did not exceed 1505, giving a difference of 339, or about 34 daily. It is interesting, also, to know that this excess was caused chiefly by deaths from diseases of the ^{*} Other things were observed—such as that May often sets in with a temperature above the mean for the whole month, and that it does not appear that the week of cold is due to an increased prevalence of north-east winds.

respiratory organs. The striking manner in which the mortality rose and fell inversely with the temperature is well seen in the following table.

1856.	Deaths from all Causes in London.	Mean Daily Temperature.
Nov. 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 Dec. 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13	144 166 140 171 170 166 173 191 196 172 211 200 194 150 167 150 151 151 138 146	51·7° 48·8 34·6 35·0 40·7 35·2 29·3 28·5 29·1 27·7 31·3 31·9 47·6 52·2 56·0 55·3 55·1 51·9 47·3 48·7

Again, there occurred in London, during the winter of 1855, a period of six weeks of unusual cold, that is, they were much colder than the weeks which went before or followed them-giving us, as it were, a winter occurring during winter. Now, if we examine the rate of mortality from phthisis and diseases of the respiratory organs during these twelve weeks, we shall have evidence of the same intimate connection between death and temperature. As the thermometer fell, these diseases, as the rule, increased the number of their victims, and as it rose the City enjoyed something like a comparative immunity from these forms of death. The coldest week was that ending Feb. 17, and it was extremely cold. The week ending Feb. 24 was also cold, but in the following week the temperature rose considerably. Now the deaths from phthisis rose from 159 to 204 in the second week, and fell again to 167 in the third.

It would appear, in short, that temperature influences mortality in a greater degree than does any other element of climate. This is more or less true of all climates, and it is particularly true of ours, where the whole number of deaths always falls as the temperature rises.

But the general mortality does not fall in exact proportion to the rise of temperature; for, if we look at the daily deaths for every month of the year, we shall find that in those months which are characterised by great upward strides in warmth, there are not corresponding great downward falls in the number of deaths. This is true, for instance, of April, May, and June. The temperature goes rapidly up during each of these months, but the mortality does not go rapidly down. It goes down, but not rapidly down, not so rapidly as we should expect, if temperature alone influenced the results.

The increase of heat in these months is sudden and great, but the fall in the mortality is comparatively slow and slight. An examination of the mean daily number of deaths in all Scotland during the last five years, and of the mean daily number of deaths in our eight principal towns during the last three years, will show this.

The smallness of the fall of mortality in May would not be so remarkable if the previous month's temperature had not also decidedly risen, and if, further, the comparatively high mortality were not prolonged into June. To some extent, of course, the deaths in May are an expression of the weather of April, and those in June of the weather of May; but only to some extent, for we have seen that mortality, in extreme cases at least, obeys the state of the temperature as it existed a week or so before. In some instances, indeed, the obedience is almost immediate.

It follows from what has been said, that some thing in their weather, in addition to temperature, must influence the mortality of these three months, something which neutralises the health-giving effects of sunshine and warmth. Or, it may be that the mortality from particular diseases rises during those months, just as the mortality from diarrhea and dysentery rises in August and September, so keeping the general mortality above what it would be if it rose and fell just as the thermometer fell and rose—a statement which, in the broad and general sense, is true for Scotland. Now, both of these things appear to happen: there do exist climatic conditions in these months which are inimical to health, and which lessen the good that otherwise would flow from the increasing warmth; and there are also certain diseases which reach their maximum of fatality in these months. Of these last we shall speak first.

FATAL DISEASES OF MAY.

"All diseases," says Hippocrates, "occur at all seasons of the year, but certain of them are more apt to occur and be exacerbated at one season than another." We have already seen to how great an extent this is the case with two classes of diseases -those of the respiratory and those of the digestive organs. If we take, as representing the first class, bronchitis, pneumonia, and pleurisy, we shall find a remarkable obedience to the course of temperature in the extent of death produced by them. These diseases, therefore, are not those which influence the mortality of May in the manner pointed out. But there is another disease, commonly regarded as allied to them, which as clearly does so. We refer to Consumption-that "great, constant, inexorable destroyer of our men and women in the prime of life," "the cause of nearly half the deaths which happen between the ages of 15 and 35."* March, April, May, and June, are the months when this dreadful disease exacts from us its heaviest tribute, and our payments in each of these four months are nearly equally heavy. In the height of summer its demands are at their lowest, and they remain comparatively low all through the cold, and snow, and frosts of winter. The daily deaths from phthisis, for the eight principal towns of Scotland, in November, December, January, and February, are to the daily deaths from the same cause in March, April, May, and June, as 8½ to 10½.

There is still another class of diseases which appear to obey the same law, though certainly not in so marked a manner. Like consumption, diseases of the brain show their maximum mortality in the spring months; April and May being usually the highest. This fact is one of great interest, as we may conclude from it that the nervous system generally is liable at this season to derangement and disorder, the occurrence of which in the course of other diseases may influence them to a fatal issue, and so swell the general mortality. The injurious effect of spring weather upon the nervous system is moreover in accordance with popular belief.

If the tables of mortality are examined with the view of determining the way in which spring weather influences the mortality of the young and of the aged, it will be found that with regard to both of these, especially with regard to the young, the influence of temperature appears to be close and constant.

INJURIOUS PECULIARITIES OF THE WEATHER OF MAY.

We come now to the consideration of some peculiarities in the weather of May which do probably interfere with the heathful action of its greater warmth.

Keeping in mind the occurrence of the cold week about the middle of the month-a thing which appears to be unequally, but still more or less well marked every year-let us recall what was said of the remarkable effect on the death-rate which resulted from a week of extreme cold in January. If that be the usual effect of unseasonable depressions of temperature, then we should expect that the cold week of May would not come and go without marking its passage by an increased mortality. It is not easy to prove that such is the fact, for, though we have the temperature from day to day, we have not the mortality from day to day with which to institute a comparison. We happen, however, to possess the weekly mortality for London, and its mean weekly temperature, and if we examine and compare these for a series of years, we shall find that this cold week of May does appear to influence mortality, and so justifies our expectation. Let us take the year 1862, when the depression of temperature was tolerably well marked, and we shall have evidence of this :-

Ending	May	10		lean Temp. for Week 57.5°.	Deaths from Phthisis.
21	,,	17		51.9 .	139
22	,,,	24	٠	55.6 .	176 30
		31		57.6	146

Here we have the usual depression of temperature between the 10th and 17th, with an increased mortality following it. We have chosen deaths from phthisis to illustrate this point, because they do so most forcibly; but the deaths from all causes also rose during the week ending on the 24th.

There are other peculiarities, however, in the weather of May, which probably exercise a greater influence on the death-rate. It has been shown that less rain falls in that month than in any other month of the year, that it falls on a small number of days, that the atmosphere is at no time further from the point of saturation, and that we have no month more cloudless and sunny. Now most of these characteristics depend on the prevalence of winds from the north-east, in association with a rising temperature; and it has been already shown that these winds are cold and arid-not only dry but drying-licking up moisture greedily from everything they touch-from the skin and from the mucous membrane of the lungs-thus robbing the body of an enormous quantity of heat, which is absorbed and rendered latent in the conversion of the moisture into vapour, and thus also tending to lower the temperature of the moist surfaces over which it passes below its own temperature, low though that may be.

That these easterly winds destroy tender vegetable life, all practical men admit. They cause the young shoots and buds to wither and die. That they are injurious to human health and life is a common belief, and a well-founded one. That they interfere with comfort of body and contentedness of mind, he is a robust man who will not assert from his own experience. In short, they have a bad reputation,—and they deserve it.

On the authority of Major-General Harding, they appear to have a peculiar effect on oils. He says that it is commonly observed that meat will not keep during an easterly wind; and he tells us that if you float a divided leaf of the terebinthus-tree on water, the oil comes out in jets or beads from the pores of the leaf when the wind is westerly, and causes it to move about as if of its own will; but with an east wind, the oil comes out so liquid that it rises to the top of the water, and the leaf remains motionless. It would be well if we had more observations of this kind, disclosing peculiar actions of this lll-famed wind.

To it, beyond a doubt, much of the unhealthiness of May is due. Poets generally have sung the praises of that month as no meteorologist would have done—as no statistician would dare to do. One of them, however,—Cowper, I think,—tells us that May gets credit for much that belongs to June. And another thinks we ought to reckon the May of the poets by the old style, and so begin it later. Of our actual May, he indignantly asks,—

The sickly daughter of th' unripen'd year,

With showers and sunshine in her fickle eyes, With hollow smiles proclaiming treach'rous peace, With blushes, harbouring in their thin disguise The blast that riots on the Spring's increase?

If Chaucer be right, May weather is to be perpetual in Heaven, for on the gate of his "Happy Park" he writes,—

"There greene and lusty May shall ever endure."

For the sake of the amiable Mr. Jarndyce let us hope that Chaucer may be wrong. The nearest thing to Heaven he ever found on earth was the home of Esther Summerson, for there, he tells us, the east wind never blew.

Sir Henry James gives us a poem by the Hon. Mrs. George Wrottesley, in which the easterly winds are blamed for almost all the ills that flesh is heir to, and her abuse of them reaches a ludicrous height in this stanza—

"Ask why such a one murdered his brother,
For the act if a reason you'd find,
'Tis the same cause that serves every other,
'Tis that horrible easterly wind."

But, horrible as most men think it, it has found a bard in Kingsley, who hails "the brave North-Easter," and says that"Tis the hard grey weather Breeds hard English men."

We do not know how he arrives at this. Perhaps he thinks that it thins the ranks by picking the sensitive and weakly out. But to this way of getting a strong race there are not a few of us who would seriously object. If it were the right way, society should hail a good many other lethal influences as well as the brave North-Easter, and all efforts to lower the rate of mortality and lengthen the average life should be discouraged.

For all he sings, perhaps Kingsley may have often sighed with the rest of us for the staying of the rough wind in the day of the east wind, and we can even fancy that Cockburn's shepherd of the Pentlands, when he got a little older and feebler, may have given his assent to the popular belief that,—

"When the wind is in the east, It's neither good for man nor beast."

One thing at least seems pretty clear, that it will be folly in no one to listen to this warning:—

" Ne'er cast a cloot Till May be oot."

THE HADJI CARAVAN FROM DAMASCUS.

It is the duty of every Mohammedan to visit the holy places at Mecea and Medina at least once in his lifetime. Many perform the pilgrimage more than once; but from a very common saying it may be inferred that, whatever may be its advantages in regard to the pilgrim's state in the next world, it has not a salutary moral influence on his present "Keep your eyes open upon a man who has hadjied once, suspect him who has been to Meeca twice, and fear him who has been there three times," is not without some grounds. The pilgrim is often proud and bigoted, and sometimes, under a garb of religious zeal, is most unscrupulous in his general Numbers of people now avail themselves of the facilities offered by the steamboat and other companies, to proceed to Mecca, viá Alexandria, Suez, and Jeddah; but many still prefer to go by land across the desert, and accompany the sacred mahmal, or ancient camel-saddle, the representative of that in which the prophet's wife 'Avesha rode, The departure of this caravan claims the attention of the tourist and the student of ancient usages. It embraces people of all classes, whose distinguish. ing characteristics are prominently developed on such an occassion. I hardly know, however, whether the description of the procession itself, or that of the motley crowd of spectators, would be the more interesting to the general reader.

The procession leaves the military Serai at about ten or eleven o'elock A.M., some time during the second week in the month of Shawal.* On the appointed day, as early as six or seven o'clock, a large concourse of people gathers together in the road it is to traverse, namely by the Dervishiyeh, Jamia as Suaniyeh, Bab Mosalla, the Meidan, and out at Bowabet Allah on to the 'Asseily, an open space about a mile distant from the southersmost gate of the city. The street Meidan is more than a mile long, and although it preserves one direction, and is comparatively straight, the houses are irregularly built, and its width varies from about forty to more than a hundred feet. Along the middle of the road there is a regularly paved causeway in a straight line of about thirty feet wide, over which roll the cannons and the carriages of the grandees.

In the crowd almost every imaginable variety of character and costume is to be seen; and all are dressed in their best clothes and gayest colours. Some ride on handsomely caparisoned horses, others on well-trained mules or white asses, some stand or lounge about, others walk, whilst some are seated and smoke or sip coffee. The cleared shops are now stocked with women instead of wares, and little children are seated on the shelves that they may see over the heads of the crowd. The windows and roofs are also crowded with spectators, whilst seated on carpets in little groups, just out of the line of the march, are women in their white or blue cheeked izars, many of them earrying infants or accompanied by children. Among these groups a wandering Dervish may be seen; he approaches one little assembly of women after another to sing or recite for their benefit blessings on the prophet, or verses in commendation of charity. His dishevelled hair mingles with his flowing beard, and streams over his shoulders and down his back. On his head is a felt cap, He wears a ragged, patched garment of divers colours. and a leopard or stag skin is loosely tied over his shoulders. His neck is ornamented by several strings of enormous wooden beads that hang down over his chest as far as his girdle. He holds in his right hand a javelin about six feet long, and a real calabash, or a tin imitation of one, is suspended from his left arm. Into this receptacle the women drop small coins or pieces of bread in payment for the recitations. Other Dervishes wander about in the crowd with drums or tambourines and fifes, reed-pipes or bag-pipes, and collect alms.

A little way off, some gipsies with a large tambourine exhibit the feats of a performing donkey, who nods his head or shakes it in answer to questions addressed to him by his master. He lies down as if dead when asked what would become of him if he got no more food, and he allows himself to be dragged about by the tail or ears or leg, just as though he were really dead. Amongst the spectators are Turkish soldiers in their zouave uniforms, Some of these may be seen talking to women of doubtful character, whose veils are drawn aside to display olive complexions, cheeks painted red, and black pigment around their eyes to heighten their shameless lustre. There are also Persian pilgrims with their tall lambskin caps, and their flowing beards dyed red, or purple, or black, and wearing close-fitting long-skirted tunics of shawl-pattern or coloured cloth, generally some shade of green, and braided more or less richly; and Bedawy Arabs, in their faded kefiyehs bound round the head with a rope of wool or camel hair, and enveloped either in a sheepskin or a striped cloak called the albai.

A Druze chief rides by: he looks like a feudal lord in his dignified and somewhat haughty manner, and the willing obedience tendered to him by his suite of retainers. He is mounted on a richly caparisoned mare; his garments are of fine cloth, elaborately embroidered with silk braid; and his cloak is of dark-blue cloth, the collar being embroidered with gold thread. His followers wear white turbans neatly wound round red skull-caps, but scrupulously deprived of the usual blue tassels. They have blue cotton or cloth under garments, and black cloaks.

Now we approach a man who has improvised a tent to protect him and his wares from the rays of the sun. Three poles of eight or ten feet long have been set just as the infantry pile their muskets, and over them a ragged piece of canvas has been thrown. Under this extempore tent he is seated in the middle of a carpet, surrounded by wooden boxes and trays containing sweetmeats, parched peas, dates, and other eatables.

Men carrying buckets of pickled turnips and beetroot also wander about, and find ready customers for their acid wares, which are eaten in slices without-bread.

Men and boys go about selling toys for children, such as rattles, windmills, and especially long-necked bottles like chemists' retorts: they are made in the glass factory in Damascus, especially before the festivals, for sale to children, who fill them with liquorice-water or some kind of sherbet, and amuse themselves by inviting each other to drink from the mouth of the long-necked vessel.

Bread, cakes, sherbet, fruits, and other eatables are also carried about for sale amongst the crowd, each veudor using his particular appeal in praise of his wares, and all vieing with each other in strength of lung. But above all, the clatter of the brass saucers of the seller of liquorice-water is distinctly heard. He has a skin of the sweet beverage slung on his back and coming under his right arm; he holds the brass spout in his right hand, and in his left a few thin brass saucers, which he dexterously clatters and knocks together on the tips of his fingers, as he cries out, "O bountiful! cool and refreshing, purify your blood."

Now we see some Mohammedans from Bokhara and Samarkand, with fat faces, flat noses, small long eyes, and short straggling yellow or pale-brown hair, which is so scanty and pale that they look almost beardless. They wear ragged turbans of immense size and of an indescribable colour. These are carelessly wound round a felt cap, or else they wear a fur cap that resembles a peculiarly shaggy stock. They look at the scene around them with a vacant stare.

Near-by stands a Jew with pale face and scanty beard, sharp eyes and shabby Oriental garments.

Then we see proud Damascene Moslems in their large fur-pelisses and bright-coloured garments.

Near the gate are the custom-house officers and guards surrounded by numerous bales of merchandize—Manchester cotton goods and prints, readymade clothes for the Bedawy Arabs, Swiss kerchiefs, Damascus kefiyehs, Baghdad Abbais, and Persian carpets, all awaiting examination.

Foot-soldiers are stationed at convenient places along the road to preserve order and to keep spaces clear for the cortige.

In the military Serai the camel destined to the honour of carrying the sacred saddle is arrayed in head-stall, and other trappings, to match the covering of the mahmal. It is then laden and is consigned to the Pasha or Emir of the Hadji, who duly gives a written receipt for the precious consignment. This document is restored on his return from the pilgrimage.

The camel devoted to this work of honour is never afterwards put to drudgery or work of an ordinary kind; and so long as he remains in good health, he is allowed the same honour year after year.

The procession is preceded by a party of artillerymen, with several dismounted field-pieces on the backs of camels. Then follows a band of music, playing martial airs; the instruments are fifes, drums, horns, cornets, cymbals, and those peculiar pagoda-like instruments in brass hung round with little bells. Some field-pieces are drawn by mules and stationed at different points between the southern gate and the place of rendezvous at Asseily. After a few minutes, a party of about fifty guards, called "kalaajees" or "castlemen," rush along the road. It is their duty to keep watch over the caravan during the night-halts, and they are called castlemen because they encircle the camp and, as it were, form the walls around it. They are desperate-looking young fellows, chiefly Damascenes, and wear a dress which is something between the town costume and that of the Arabs of the desert. They are all shouting, running, jumping, skipping, and playing antics. Every two or three hundred yards they stop and form a ring, in the middle of which some of them dance the sworddance, others fight sham fights, and cut and parry to the cadence of the song and chorus sung by those forming the ring. Others, again, dance and twirl their guns in a most astonishing manner to the same tune. Suddenly all shout out at the top of their voices, and point their matchlocks to the earth, discharge them, and then skip away in a state of wild excitement.

Indiscriminately mingled with the crowd, both before and after the procession, are mules and camels, laden with merchandize for the annual fair at Mezerib; and the children of the merchants, being out for a holiday, ride on the tops of the huge bales. Some of the merchants are mounted on ambling ponies, others on mules or dromedaries.

The formal procession is varied. First comes a regiment of cavalry, called "'Auniyeh," enrolled expressly for the protection of this caravan. They are not regulars, as they are almost without discipline or regular evolutions; neither are they irregulars, because they wear a uniform and are supplied with arms by the government,-a short rifle and a revolver to each ;-but their horses are their own. They ride in double file, and four of those who are foremost are each supplied with a pair of tamtams or kettledrums, fixed one on each side of the saddle-bow; and they strike them with short pieces of thick strong leather, producing a very peculiar sound which is heard at a great distance. They hold the reins between their teeth, as both hands are engaged with the leathern drumsticks.

Then follows the Pasha's takhterawan, a handsomely decorated litter carried on poles by two mules. The Pasha or Emir of the Hadji is comfortably seated inside, and can at pleasure either survey the crowds through the glass windows, or can shut them out from gazing by drawing the silken curtains. Four extra mules for exchange accompany the litter, and they are distinguished from the others by pointed saddles of red cloth embroidered with bright yellow braid.

Next a double file of mounted local police; then the Mohammedan officers of the local civil and military staffs in their glittering uniforms and brilliant decorations, and the grandees and nobles of the city in their distinguishing costumes and flowing robes of bright-coloured cloth, lined with fur. The Mufti, or legal adviser and expounder of the law, in his purple cloak and white turban, over which is folded a piece of green silk ribbon embroidered with gold fringe at the ends, comes next. Then the Mullah Effendi, or supreme judge, in his wide-flowing robe of purple and delicate white turban, over which is folded a strip or band of plain gold lace. He is supported by ulemas and students, whose turbans, decorated with bands of different widths and colours, indicate to the initiated their respective offices or the college degree to which they have attained.

Then we see a small company of Moolawi Dervishes, with their peculiarly shaped sugar-loaf drab felt caps. Their sheikh wears the same kind of cap, but is distinguished from the rest of his order by having a green turban neatly bound round it.

The principal feature in the procession is that which comes next; namely, the mahmal, or camelsaddle, with its tent-like cover. It is a frame of wood fitted to the camel's back, and rising up to a peak, so that, when covered, the rider can sit at his ease, being at once thoroughly protected from the rays of the sun and from the gaze of the crowd. The official covering is made of green silk, embroidered with inscriptions in gold thread, with massive gold fringes. It hangs down all round as far as the camel's knees; the upper point and corners being surmounted by gilt balls and crescents. The camel is led by footmen. Then comes the holy flag, of green silk, embroidered with gold inscriptions and gold fringe. Next a camel, on which rides a Dervish, who is swaying to and fro and singing praises. His only dress is a coarse albai tied round his waist, and a light piece of dirty white muslin or calico thrown loosely over his head and shoulders. This man has been for many years past an attendant on the mahmal, and performs the annual pilgrimage in this state of nudity on a camel supplied by the authorities. He is much venerated. An ordinary military band marching at the head of a regiment of regular infantry succeeds. Then follows a troop of about a hundred wild-looking fellows mounted on dromedaries. They are the guides and guards of the caravan, and belong to the tribe called the 'Agail. They are armed with matchlocks, swords, and a variety of weapons. Their swarthy complexions, wild expressions of feature, and incongruous variety of costume, -some flowing, some scanty; some old and grimy, others bright-coloured and new, -and their voices in harsh chorus, whilst their ostrich-like beasts struggle and push against each other like scared sheep, their soft feet producing not the slightest sound on the pavement,-altogether make the spectator fancy he is in a dream, or witnessing some vivid representation of a tale of witches or fairies.

Then follow some pilgrims riding in panniers suspended on camels, and neatly covered by an awning. Some of the more wealthy pilgrims are riding in litters rather less gaudy than that of the Pasha of the Hadji.

The civil and military governors of Damascus ride in an open carriage.

The rear of the procession is brought up by a string of camels laden with hide-covered boxes, containing the presents of carpets, &c., for the mosques at Mccca and Medina, dresses for the Arabs, and cash for the expenses of the caravan.

These boxes are fastened with padlocks, each of which is separately tied up in calico, and sealed with the Pasha's seal. Those containing the precious objects are additionally ornamented with little brass bells.

From the moment the mahmal leaves the military Serai till its arrival at Asseily, before the Pasha's tent, guns are fired at intervals. On its arrival at a mosque in the Meidan street, containing the tomb of Sheikh Saad ed din Jibbawi (a celebrated man, who founded the sect of Dervishes called the Saadiyeh), the camel is led up to a window, through which the sheikh in charge of the mosque has the special privilege of giving it a ball of kneaded dough, sugar, and almonds. Sometimes the camel seems to relish the sweetstuff; at other times he will drop it all; but, whether little or much falls to the ground, it is eagerly scrambled for by the assembled Mohammedans, who devour it as if it were heavenly food.

Arrived at Asseily, the mahmal is taken off the camel and placed on a stand opposite the Pasha's tent. The green silk cover is carefully packed up, and is not again displayed till within a short distance of the holy places. An ordinary blue cotton cover is placed over the wooden frame during the march through the desert.

The local pashas and troops then return to Damascus. The small camp remains at Asseily for a few days, that purchases and arrangements may be effected or completed; and when all is ready they start for Mezerib, an open plain about sixty miles distant.

This first instalment of the caravan consists only of the officials and a few pilgrims; but a fair is held at Mezerib for about ten days, during which time the pilgrims flock together, and all start for Mecca and Medina on the appointed day, which is generally about the 25th or 27th of Shaval.

When all are congregated together at Mezerib, the camp consists sometimes of about four or five thousand tents; two or three hundred are pitched side by side in two rows by the merchants, and thus form a street of shops, in which almost anything can be purchased, from cooking-utensils to silk dresses and gold or silver watches; and along the centre, between the rows of tents, are stalls for the sale of eatables, fruits, &c. On a slight eminence, in the middle of the camp, is the Pasha's tent. The mahmal and holy flag are placed just opposite its door, and between them is a light wooden cross about twenty feet high, on which are suspended lanterns at night-time, that all in the camp may know the exact position of the sacred objects, and of the Emir of the Hadji, to whom complaints may be made. Near at hand are the tents of the various officers of the caravan. Next are the pilgrims' tents, arranged with some degree of regularity in rows, and parallel with them are lines of picketed animals-camels, horses, mules, and donkeys; and the whole is surrounded by the patrolas. The scene is very exciting and amusing; for, besides this company, a great many Arab sheikhs assemble with their retinues, either to receive the Sultan's black-mail-politely called a voluntary contribution,-or to sell their camels, of which many thousands are browsing on the plains and hills within sight.

On the 25th of Shaval, a gun is fired, by the Pasha's order, and then, within the space of about an hour, this immense camp is in motion. Everything is packed up, and the caravan gradually disappears in the distance, like a monster serpent winding its way amongst the undulations of the plain in the direction of the shrines at Mecca and Medina.

Unfortunately, thousands of these people die on the road, and they sometimes suffer severe privations; but he is envied whose time of departure comes whilst on this pilgrimage, for he dies a happy martyr.

E. T. ROGERS.

VILLAGE HOSPITALS.

In the year of grace 1859, in the small village of Cranley, in Surrey, a little seed was planted, which is, we think, destined to bear fruit throughout the length and breadth of the land. The village surgeon bethought him that it was certainly a mistake that the means of ministering to the accidents and diseases of poor human nature should be confined to great cities and populous places, and that the intermediate country, sometimes fifteen or twenty miles distant, should be altogether left out of the reckoning. In the great metropolis, and in every large city and county town, there is a hospital, or dispensary, in which nearly every malady to which the human frame is liable is specially attended to; but in the large tracts of country between these centres of civilisation there is, or was, no refuge to which poor creatures suffering from the terrible accidents consequent upon the introduction of steam-machinery into agricultural pursuits, and the railway, could be taken but the Union workhouse. And to that refuge the peasantry, who are in any degree above the condition of paupers, decidedly objected to go. The consequence was, that the severe cases of injury were either removed to the County Hospital, or to the nearest city where similar establishments could be found. Even paupers were, and are still, hurried up to town, with a view to save the rates; and many a poor creature has, after much preliminary agony, lost his life, lest the parish should have to pay the extra fee allowed to the Union surgeon under such circumstances. Where it is possible, the sufferer can be treated, it is true, in his own cottage; but imagine a poor wretch with a fractured leg, or some accident involving the nervous system, shut up in the single sleeping-room of his cottage with noisy children, subject to the barbarous, because untutored, nursing of his wife. In either case, his chances of making a rapid recovery are not encouraging. If taken to the nearest town hospital, often from fifteen to twenty miles' distance, in a rough cart, the injury necessarily becomes so aggravated, that in many cases the limb is lost, and, with the limb, the patient's life, as the atmospheric conditions of large towns are always adverse to the recovery of unacclimatised country patients. If, on the other hand, he is left to the better air of his cottage, he is, possibly, miles away from his doctor; and a case that requires watching every hour, under the best circumstances gets a visit from that hard-worked individual once a day. It was not an unnatural idea that led Mr. Napper, of Cranley, to the conclusion that we might bring the hospital system, so to speak, to the door of the poor man, and-a matter of no less importance-to his own door also. The Rector of the parish, the Rev. J. H. Sapte, worthily seconded him by giving him a cottage rent-free, which, with the aid of the neighbouring gentry, was furnished and fitted up to receive six patients. As this hospital is the model on which all the subsequent establishments have been founded, it may be as well to describe it. The outside the photographic art pictures for us at a stroke. (See p. 352). It is a Surrey cottage, and nothing more, with a sound roof and sound walls. The interior is in the same homely style. The walls are whitewashed, the ground-floor is paved with brick: even the gudeman is sitting by the fireside, taking his rest after his day's labour; for the woman who attends to the patients is wisely permitted to have the "encumbrance" of a husband. There is a patent kitchener, it is true, but this is provided for the convenience of cooking, or for the purpose of supplying a hot bath, which we see through the half-open door of a closet. In the sitting-room there is a poor boy playing on the floor, suffering from a disease in the bone of his leg. He looks very unlike the poor squalid town child, under such circumstances, primly sitting on his bed. At the side is a little room, in which the doctor sees out-patients. Upstairs are the wards for men and women. They can boast nothing beyond those in the simplest cottage, but they are scrupulously clean, and you can sec that, where possible, ventilation is carried out. The nurse is a better-class countrywoman. Her homely gown, her homely speech, remind the poor sufferer of those he has left behind. He looks out of the latticed window upon a little garden, and when the wind blows, the roses tap against the window-pane. We miss altogether the long prim ward, the prim nurse, the bare, dismal walls of the regular hospital. The patient, if his anguish would only leave him at ease, feels as much at home as though he were visiting a friend's cottage, and he entirely loses the idea, so painfully thrust upon him in the regular hospital, that he has ceased to become a man, and is simply looked upon as a disease. Can the reader wonder at the repugnance of the countryman to be in a town hospital, when he knows that he will no longer be John Stiles, but "a case of necrosis," or "a fatty tumour"? Is it strange that he loses his identity when mixed up with a long row of sufferers, upon whom a grim silence is enjoined; that he longs for the sight of a familiar face amid the crowd of students, who watch him as they would watch the experiments made upon a mouse in the exhausted bell-glass of a lecturer; and, finally, is it surprising that poor Hodge, when hit hard, begs the doctor to let him die at home. where at least he has friendly sympathy? Such a home, socially, is the Village Hospital, with the addition of all the appliances of art necessary to his case, and the doctor within call when his services are required. That the scheme was a success the moment it was practically at work was only a consequence of the simplicity of its arrangements, and its harmony with all the previous habits of the patients. At the outset it was determined that no cases should be admitted that could be treated at their own homes, and that, as far as possible, the hospital should be self-supporting. The Englishman, untouched by the degrading influence of pauperism, does not care about being tended gratuitously; at all events it is found that the charge for his maintenance is cheerfully paid according to his means. The charge varies in various hospitals from 3s. 6d. to 10s, per week, This sum is contributed by friends, and by the club, and in this manner almost a third of the weekly payments is made up, leaving a very moderate sum to be subscribed by those charitably inclined in the neighbourhood, in the form of donations and annual subscriptions. The lively sympathy of friends is always a matter to be checked rather than encouraged. We all know what trash visitors are eased of, by the hall porters in our Metropolitan hospitals, which they would surreptitiously convey to their friends. In the country, however, this willingness to tender aid is turned to account: the newly laid egg is permitted, with the approval of the surgeon, to reach the patient; the pat of butter, the wine sent by the mistress, the beef-tea coming to an old servant from the "big house," are not ruthlessly withheld; and the patient in these little attentions finds that he is still linked to friends outside by all the ties of affection. Who shall say what is the value of these natural aids to recovery? We certainly do not under-estimate their value, neither do we think the reader will. In looking over the annual reports of those Village Hospitals which have been established some little time, we cannot help being struck with the willingness which neighbours exhibit in supplying the needs of the sufferers. The tradesman, for instance, gives his time for some little odd job; the gentry supply wines or delicacies in abundance, and books; and the housewife supplies old linen. The classes in a village and its neighbourhood are so linked together that the thrill of sympathy runs swiftly through the whole chain. How much more we feel inclined to help those we know something about than strangers, and in the country we all know one another. In great aggregations of men, sympathy is lost by diffusion; who thinks of interrogating the poor crouching creature on the door-step in Belgravia on a bitter winter night-is there not the Union for her to go to?

Even the furnishing of the Village Hospital is effected, in many cases, by the direct contributions of friends. Thus, at the East Grinstead Village Hospital, a lady supplied the entire furniture of one room, and others gave all kinds of medicinal and surgical appliances, and small matters that go to ease the pain of the invalid. This willingness to aid in the good work renders it comparatively easy to establish and maintain these useful institutions, the value of which is so apparent that they are rapidly spreading throughout the length and the breadth of the land. It is not more than seven years since the first Village Hospital was established, and now there are sixteen in full work, and sixtyseven in course of establishment.

It may be as well perhaps if we mention the villages in which hospitals are now established. They are as follows: -Bourton-on-the-water. Gloucestershire; Bungay, Suffolk; Cranley, Surrey; Dorking, Surrey; Capel, Surrey; East Grinstead, Sussex; Fowey, Cornwall; Great Bookham, Surrey; Harrow, Middlesex; Ilfracombe, Devon; St. Andrew's, Fifeshire; Tavistock, Devon; Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire; Weston-super-Mare, Somerset-shire; Wellow, Notts; and Wrington, Somerset-Whilst they are already in course of formation in the following places: - Ampthill, Beds; Aylesford, Kent; Bishops Lydiard, Somerset; Beverley, Yorkshire; Bertley, Durham; Bedford, Beds; Bunbury, Cheshire; Burbage, Wilts; Blackheath, Kent; Clevedon, Somerset; Chilampton, Somerset; Cowes, Isle of Wight; Carlisle, Cumberland; Cheltenham, Gloucestershire; Cockermouth, Cumberland; Congleton, Cheshire; Devizes, Wilts; Daventry, Northampton; Dudley, Worcestershire; Dorchester, Dorset; Erdington, Warwick; Frome, Somerset; Falmouth, Cornwall; Folkestone, Kent; Gainsborough, Lincolnshire; Grantham, Lincolnshire; Harpenden, Herts; Halesworth, Suffolk; Hurstpierpont, Sussex; Highgate, Middlesex; Harrowgate, Yorkshire; Hatfield, Essex; Hartley Row, Herts; Holywell, Flintshire; Iver, Berks; Knutsford, Cheshire; Kilsyth, North Britain; Luton, Beds; Lewes, Sussex; Leamington, Warwick; Lichfield, Stafford; Middlesborough, Yorkshire; Marlborough, Wilts; Market Raseu, Lincolnshire; Malvern, Worcestershire; Northwich, Cheshire; North Cray, Cheshire; Newton Abbott, Devonshire; Nantwich, Cheshire; Penrith, Cumberland; Redditch, Worcestershire; Richmond, Surrey; Walbury, Dorset; Stoken Church, Oxford; Loutham, Warwick; Savernake, Wilts; Southwill, Notts; Tavistock, Devon; Thetford, Norfolk; Tipton Green, Stafford; Ulverstone, Lancashire; Worthing, Sussex; Walker, Northumberland; Yoxford, Suffolk; Zealand Conyers, Lincolnshire; and possibly others with which we are not yet acquainted.

As many persons, on charitable thoughts intent. will be glad to know the expense of working one of these admirable institutions, we cannot perhaps do better than give the balance-sheet of the working expenses of the Cranley Model for four years, beginning in 1859 and ending in 1863. During this period one hundred patients were treated, their stay varying from a few days to months, and in one instance to nearly an entire year. Many of the surgical cases were of a very severe nature, and we have no doubt whatever that in every case they made far more rapid recoveries, owing to the good air and immediate treatment, than they would have done in the best regulated Metropolitan hospitals, possessing the pick of the surgical skill of the country :-

If we divide the total expenditure by four, we find that the annual cost, including furniture and repairs, was but little more than 150l. per annum. Of course the two last items of expenditure cannot be looked upon as an annual charge. If we take the mere cost of the patients it but little exceeds a hundred a year for the treatment of twenty-five cases, or five pounds per case. This gives a fair view of the extremely economical method in which these institutions are worked. One of the most encouraging items of receipt is the sum of 131l. 4s. 6d., contributed by the patients themselves. It is very creditable to our rustic population, that they have set an example to the Metropolitan artisans in this respect, which we trust will not be overlooked. If the peasant with his comparatively low rate of wages can manage to give so much towards his own support whilst debarred from labour, it strikes us that the highly paid artisan in London, leaning upon rich friendly sall, Staffordshire; St. Austell's, Cornwall; Shaftes | societies, should not certainly allow themselves to depend entirely upon charity. It will be seen that the extremely manageable yearly charge of the Cranley Hospital depends upon the total absence of a "staff," that dead weight, which sinks more imposing hospitals to the earth. One motherly woman of average intelligence, whose annual salary ranges from 121. to 201. per annum, is found amply sufficient, with a little occasional help, to nurse, whilst a second is employed to do housewifery and cook the food for the inmates, the number of which never exceed six, and but seldom reaches that number. As long as the hospitals can be kept within six or eight beds we have no fear whatever but that they will go on successfully; but we agree with Mr. Napper, that any attempt to get beyond the capabilities of a cottage and a single nurse, with occasional help, will imperil the success of the experiment.

Fowey was the second Village Hospital, established in 1860. A great number of the cases admitted here are seafaring men, suffering from serious accidents, such as "falling from the mast-head of a ship," "brought on shore from a wreck in a state of great exhaustion," "fracture of a thigh-bone in two places in consequence of falling over the town quay," "falling from the mast-head of a vessel and pitching on his heels." Such cases as these show the value of Village Hospitals, situated in outlying maritime districts. Dr. Davis, the founder, says that during one year, only 19l. 0s. 10d. was paid out of the funds of the institution for fifteen patients. "owing to many of them entirely supporting themselves, and partly in consequence of friends supplying dinners, &c., to the sick when required; indeed, I have scarcely ever to ask for broth, wine, and other necessaries, but rather to be careful lest my patient gets too many good things, as sympathy is quickly excited, because the cause of it is more brought home to our minds, and soon bears fruit among our townspeople." This is the gist of the matter. When we know the patient and the circumstances of his accident, it is difficult to restrain sympathy and active aid; but directly a poor creature becomes removed far from home the chain of sympathy is broken and lost. Help, in fact, to those in distress is always in a direct ratio to the nearness of the object.

We have shown, we think, pretty clearly that the difficulties in the way of founding a Village Hospital are not by any means formidable, and that we may depend upon the charity of the country-side for the means of establishing and maintaining it. In nearly every instance with which we are acquainted, some gentleman of the district has been found ready to give the free use of a cottage, and by the aid of a bazaar sufficient is speedily raised to furnish the wards. Where there is no cottage conveniently situated, we have no doubt that some one will be found willing to raise up one for so good a purpose. Indeed we only fear that the simplicity of the movement will suffer from the too generous gifts of those who give in the name of charity. At the present moment a charming little structure is being raised as a memorial Village Hospital by Mrs. Broadwood at Capel, in Surrey, in memory of her late husband. the Rev. John Broadwood, of Lyne. "It is in the style of the fourteenth century; the walls of Leith Hill sandstone, with Bath stone window-dressings and mullions, and red brick groins; and is calculated to hold twelve beds. We hear it is just finished, and we only hope it is not too fine for the poor countryfolk it is intended to succour." That a memorial cannot take a better form than that of a Village Hospital we thoroughly admit, but there is a fear lest such a structure be too pretentious, too unlike the homes of the patients themselves to be agreeable to them. At the same time it cannot be denied that the ordinary arrangements of a cottage can be improved upon for the purpose intended, and we must only hope that with the fourteenth ceutury work we may not also get an attempt at fourteenth century habits in the form of nursing sisters, who we do not believe would work altogether satisfactorily in Village Hospitals.

Bourton-on-the-Water, established in 1861, was the third Village Hospital. As the letter we have received from its energetic surgeon and founder, Mr. Moore, supplies so many characteristic and instructive particulars, we need make no apology for giving the following quotations from it:—

"The number of beds originally was six, but a new bed-room and convalescent room have been fitted up since, and we can now accommodate eight patients. We have had, up to January 1st, 1866, 164 in-patients, who have contributed, on an average, about 14s. each towards their maintenance (in weekly sums, varying from 2s. 6d. to 5s.), but many subjects of accident or acute disease have been admitted without any payment.

"During the past year we have admitted fortyfour new cases, and the daily cost of each patient (every expense inclusive) has been 1s. $5\frac{1}{2}d$.

"We have one nurse, whose wages are 8s. 6d. per week, who has occasional help when the Hospital is full, or when sitters-up are required. She was formerly employed at charing and field-work, but has now become an efficient nurse, keeps the house very clean, and is generally liked by the patients.

"Written orders are sent by Mrs. Moore to the different tradespeople every Monday for the weekly supply of provisions, and she pays the accounts, which are audited by the committee at their fortnightly meetings.

"Wines and spirits are kept under lock and key at the Hospital, and are issued by me, a bottle at a time, to the nurse when required.

"Our dietary list is as follows:—Meat, 3lb.; sugar, ½lb.; butter, 6 oz.; for each adult male per week. Milk, rice-pudding, bread, vegetables, and cocoa, at the discretion of the nurse. Wine, spirits, beer, and other diet only by special order of the medical officer.

"Medicines are supplied by a druggist in the village at the rate of 3s. 6d. per case admitted.

"The rent is 12' per annum, in addition to interest on money (the produce of a bazaar) expended in alterations. There are four sleeping rooms, one convalescent room, a kitchen, a committee-room (with dark-closet for ophthalmoscopic examinations, &c.), in which out-patients are seen and prescribed for every Monday from 10 to 12. There is also a nurse's room and bathroom, in the latter of which are a hot and 'cold bath (supplied by a force-pump from the back kitchen below), and a shower bath and a vapour bath."

Mr. Moore was most ably seconded in his efforts by the Rev. C. W. Payne Crawford, who afterwards removed to East Grinstead, and afforded invaluable support to the founder in the establishment of that hospital; thus illustrating the value of clerical aid when given with a will. The East Grinstead Hospital has indeed had a great fight for it, and had it not been for the determination of Dr. Rogers and his worthy coadjutor, it would probably have fared but badly. It was the fourth established in order of date, and is a little more pretentious in appearance—as will be seen by the accompanying photograph (see p. 353)—than the Cranley model, but it retains all the characteristics of a Surrey cottage of the better class, with the addition of a spacious room at the back of the house, amply lighted by two large windows. This addition was made at the expense of its founder, Dr. Rogers. The poor rustic brought here in his hour of trouble must look upon it as a little paradise, surrounded as it is by its well kept little garden, and overlooking a perfect bower of flowers, the culture of which appears to be the hobby of the Doctor. This hospital makes up seven beds, and its working expenses are pretty much the same as those at Crawley. The report for the year ending 1865 is now on our table, from which we gather that during the last year, thirty-four cases were treated, against which we find the result "well" recorded in the great majority of cases. The receipts and expenditure of this hospital for the year 1865, are equally satisfactory with those of the Cranley Hospital.

It will be seen that the receipts from patients were fully a third of the expenditure, bearing out the statement of Mr. Napper that in calculating the means of support, that rate of support from the patients may always be depended upon.

The Tewkesbury Hospital, which was established twelve months ago, appears to be making great way, as we mayindeed expect it would, considering the size of the town. Dr. Devereux, the founder, informs us it is a simple double-cottage, cleaned and whitewashed, but he adds some particulars which are very instructive:—

The Cottage Hospital, East Grinstead.

"We commenced with five beds; but within four months the institution was so well appreciated by patients, and its usefulness was so well recognised by the tradesmen of the town, and by the gentry and clergy of the neighbouring parishes, that the number of beds was increased to seven. At the preliminary meetings the great objection urged against a Village Hospital was, that their introduction and general adoption would rob the County Infirmary both of patients and funds. As regards the first, I can safely say that not one of our patients would have found his way to our neighbouring large hospital; and as for the second part of the objection, I am sure that not one of the subscribers to the large hospital who also subscribe to our Village Hospital, would think for a moment of withdrawing it from the Infirmary. And the tradesman of the town, who subscribes his guinea, half-guinea, five shillings, or two-and-sixpence to our Village Hospital, would never think of subscribing to any of the county infirmaries.

"Each patient pays a weekly sum towards his maintenance during his stay in the hospital. This sum of course varies according to circumstances, and is fixed by the committee. We find this rule very much appreciated by the patients. We are quite full at present. One patient, a footman, with peritonitis, pays 5s. a week; a boy, aged six, with strumous disease of the knee-joint, requiring splints, &c., whose mother is enabled to visit him daily, 2s.6d.per week; a man, with a compound comminuted fracture of leg, whose removal to a large hospital at a distance from the place of accident would probably have rendered amputation necessary, pays 2s. 6d. per week; a young blacksmith, with skin disease, requiring medicated baths, which he could not have had at home, pays 7s. per week; a boy with rheumatism, 2s. 6d. per week; and the cook from a gentleman's family, with carbuncle of the leg, 3s. 6d. per week. These sums are paid very willingly, and it is very gratifying to find that former patients frequently visit the hospital, and bring vegetables, flowers, &c., and even money for the hospital money-box. Only last month a poor woman, whose breast was removed on account of carcinoma, gave a donation of one guinea, besides having paid a weekly sum during her stay in the institution."

This gratitude on the part of old patients is one of the most charming features of the institution. We hear from other sources that it is very common for the friends of convalescent patients to bring flowers to adorn the wards, and to put donations in the box towards the expenses of the hospital.

The question of nursing is the most important matter connected with this movement. As a rule, trained nurses from towns do not work well. They are willing to nurse, but that is only one part of the duty of the motherly person required in a Village Hospital; she must be able to lend a hand to anything, and at the same time be obedient and willing. We should look in vain for such mixed qualities in the highly-trained sisterhoods affiliated to some of our Metropolitan hospitals. Mr. Napper is, we hear, engaged upon a nursing scheme, which will, he thinks, meet the wants of the rural districts. His own experience leads him to believe that the staff of nurses he seeks to establish must be selected from the ordinary peasant women of the country, who know the wants of the patients, their habits, and perhaps their failings; and we think there can be no doubt that Mr. Napper is right. Whilst we express this opinion, however, we cannot, in justice to the trained nurses, refuse the testimony of Mrs. Tyrill, of Sunnyside, Ilfracombe, who interests herself so much in the Village Hospital of this charming watering-place. She speaks most highly of the nurse in that establishment, who was trained for seven years in King's College Hospital. But the hospital must indeed be the beau ideal of its class, "standing alone on the hill-side, in a garden of roses and myrtles."

Another question, much discussed, with relation to Village Hospitals, refers to the advisability of establishing fever wards. As we well know, gastric and typhoid fevers are of very common occurrence in the country, and as they are but slightly infectious there appears to be little objection to their admission. It is widely different, however, with scarlet fever, typhus, and small-pox. The general opinion seems to be that if such cases were taken in it would be a death-blow to their success. The hospital would be looked upon as a centre of infection—much, in fact, as the pest-houses were of old—and would be deserted accordingly. We fear there is much truth in this. lation could not be sufficiently sustained, even supposing a separate ward were employed for the purpose, with a separate entrance and nurse. We know that such fever cases are admitted into a separate ward of the Children's Hospital in Great Ormond-street, without any evil results; but we fear that two nurses, in an isolated cottage, could not be kept apart so effectually as in a town, for obvious reasons. Moreover, outbreaks of contagious fever are few and far between. When they do happen, they would overtax the supply of nurses: and during periods of freedom from an outbreak the ward would be standing idle, at no small expense. Indeed, if fever cases were to be admitted, we do not see why there should not be a ward for contagious skin diseases, for consumption, &c. Once depart from the simple cottage hospital, with one nurse, and the movement would be

Whilst the importance of these institutions to the labouring poor cannot be over-estimated, the resident gentry will equally participate in the benefit. Under the old style of things, the country was drained of all serious surgical cases. guardians of the poor, rather than incur the expense of treating severe accidents, and of performing the more serious operations in the workhouses, sent the patients, often suffering the most excruciating agony, to the nearest county or town hospital. The private practitioner, knowing how useless it was to treat such cases in the homes of the patients, often miles away from their own abodes, also recommended their transport to the centres of medical skill. In this manner the county suffered a complete drain of all instructive cases, and the art of the country surgeon became rusted with

In saying this much we by no means wish to cast a slur upon the skill of the country practitioner, as we well know that in mining and manufacturing districts, where accidents are of frequent occurrence, the resources, the skill, and the quickness of the single-handed surgeon are often of the highest kind, and would put to shame many a hospital surgeon working with all the appliances of his art, with unlimited help at hand. But manufacturing and mining neighbourhoods are one thing, agricultural neighbourhoods another; and without indorsing the expression we lately met with in a country paper, that country practitioners sooner or later "degenerate into mere pill-making machines," we do not think it can be denied that he gradually loses the greater part of the surgical skill and anatomical knowledge he acquired in the schools; and there are but a small proportion of them who would care to be practically tested, knife in hand, as they were before obtaining their diploma at the College of Surgeons. The knowledge of this fact ou the part of the public is, without doubt, one great drawback to a country residence to persons suffering from any bodily affliction which requires constant attention. It is not every man that can afford to summon a celebrity from town. Such persons should hail the establishment of Village Hospitals as a boon to themselves, certainly not less than it is to the poor. The country gentleman who gives his annual subscription to maintain one of these valuable institutions must consider that, whilst he is ministering to the wants of the poor, and relieving the parish rates, he is at the same time keeping the village surgeon at school against the time when some terrible accident overtakes him in the hunting field, or when some sudden emergency to those near and dear to him, calls for the trained and skilful hand.

We cannot conclude this paper, however, without cautioning those inclined to found Village Hospitals—and there should be one in every village ten miles distant from a town or county hospital—that it is not to be done, unless under very favourable circumstances, without great tact and temper. There is rarely any difficulty in procuring sufficient funds, but there are always jealousies to be assuaged and social difficulties to be met and conquered. The surgeon, for instance, who is adventurous enough to establish one is pretty sure to find that his brethren in the neighbourhood look coldly upon him, if he has been unwise enough to do so in direct opposition to their interest or influence; and brother surgeons, it must be remembered, have the ear of the local clergy and gentry, without whose aid it is indeed a hard fight. Not that we think a little wholesome persecution is a bad thing; on the contrary, it always acts as a stimulant. But it should not be too fierce; and this it will be, unless care is taken in interesting as many medical men as possible in its working. In all the most successful institutions of this kind it is a rule to invite every surgeon who sends in a case to attend it himself, and to give him the option of operating. This rule at once disarms a great deal of jealousy. Union surgeons, by an arrangement with the guardians, are in many cases induced to perform operations in these establishments in preference to doing so in the workhouse; of course receiving the extra fees they are entitled to receive. As a rule, these hospitals are instituted for those above the pauper class, and for such as cannot be properly treated at their own homes; but there are many that receive patients chargeable to the parish, in which case the parish allowance is guaranteed by the parish officers.

We have said enough to show, in the language of the mechanic, that there are "hot bearings," at starting, in the working of the machinery of these invaluable refuges for the afflicted, which require a little of the oil of address and persuasion to mollify; and where this is forthcoming on the part of the founder, all is sure to go well.

ANDREW WYNTER.

PREJUDICE IN MATTERS OF RELIGION.

WE should certainly be offering to the earnest religious spirit of the age an uncommon dish of flattery, if we were to pronounce it free from an influence that has operated with marked effect in every age of the Church. It was the most guileless of men that asked, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" At every turn of the Gospel history we find prejudice erecting her bristles against the sayings and doings of our Lord, not merely in the person of enemies, but in that of devoted friends. Peter was horrified at the announcement of the crucifixion, and Thomas seems to have fairly lost patience when told of the resurrection. All the disciples marvelled that our Lord talked with the woman of Samaria; and if everything had been told, it would probably be seen that in their secret hearts they were astonished at many of his other proceedings, and perhaps a little ashamed of them. It is not likely that a force which was so powerful in the first age of Christianity has ever ceased to play an important part among the factors that have moulded religious opinion and action, even in the most sincere and enlightened circles. In fact, one can hardly resist a feeling of deep depression when one thinks of all the activity of prejudice during the conflicts of eighteen centuries, and the extent to which it has robbed the Church of her heritage of truth and holiness. In the heat of so many controversies, in the antagonisms and antipathies of so many sects and parties, in the collisions of good men of such diverse nationalities, education, connections, favourite modes of thought and feeling, and so forth; in the tremblings of so many fceble old Elis for the ark of God; in the suspicions so easily roused in many sincere hearts by any proposal of change, how often has the inward vision been distorted, and, as Bacon puts it, the clear ideas of the divine mind transformed into the poor idola of the human! And what an untold amount of needless bitterness of feeling and bitterness of language, and positive injustice too, has sprung from the distortion, and how much of courage and energy worthy of the noblest cause has been worse thau wasted! One wonders less at the incompleteness of our practical Christianity, at the failure of the leaven to leaven the whole lump, when one thinks how much prejudice and her mischievous family have been allowed to influence the Christian counsels. And in proportion to the intensity of one's longing for a purer, more complete, more pervading Christian spirit, is the measure of one's desire that this unwholesome intruder were fairly banished, and, to quote Bacon again, the lumen siccum were substituted for the lumen madidumlight uncontaminated by human frailty, for light tinctured with prejudice and passion.

Certainly there is nothing in the characteristics of the present age to show that prejudice has lost its power, or that it needs no longer to be guarded against. In some forms, no doubt, it is weaker, but not in all. Even our philosophers (with deference be it written), with all their unfeigned regard for the inductive method, and all their diligence in the interpretation of nature, often show that they have not left prejudice behind them, when they come to touch the domain of religion. Is it unfair to say of an influential section of scientific men at the present day, that they are prejudiced against belief in the supernatural, in the efficacy of prayer, or in the speciality of divine providence? That is to say, they assume that these things cannot be held by any one who believes in the uniformity of nature, or who understands anything of the system of natural law that prevails in the world. They assume that there is an inevitable connexion between such beliefs. and an utterly confused and superstitious conception of the mode in which the affairs of the world are regulated. Yet, if they would listen calmly to intelligent believers they would find that their faith in natural law is as strong and complete as their own, and that the real difficulty lies, where difficulty inexplicable ever must lie, at the point where the Infinite will comes into contact with the finite. In the more peculiar domain of religion, many causes of prejudice are as active as ever. Our age is not remarkable for conscientious self-discipline. Few men take pains, when addressing themselves to religious questions, to purge their minds of the bias of party, system, personal antipathy, or personal predilection, in order that their conclusions may be come to in the lumen siccum, free from all distortion and false colouring. There is a peculiar excitability on religious questions, a nervous sensibility in itself most worthy of commendation, considering the awful issues which religion involves, but extremely unsafe and likely to be very mischievous when it is dissociated from deliberation, candour, and equity. There is a tendency to religious panic,-the very hot-bed of prejudice, because implying a state of feeling when the ordinary measures for protecting religion are counted insufficient; the Habeas Corpus Act is suspended, a state of siege is proclaimed, and no method is spared of exciting a feeling of horror against the unhappy individuals who have caused the commotion. We have got, too, in this age a remarkable faculty of constructiveness or development, by which from a single view of any man we can construct or develop a whole system of opinion. Cuvier probably has given us the hint. From a tooth we can infer the mastodon. And if at any time we seem to be teo severe in the vehemence with which we attack au opinion, we can show that it is connected, by the consanguinity of logic, with twenty other opinions of a most dangerous kind. There is, beyond doubt, much truth in this consideration, and it deserves to be taken into account, especially when any doctrine is under discussion that has a place in the great scheme of grace. But loosely or carelessly held, the position affords cover for no end of prejudices, and might tempt one to do grievous injustice to persons who would repudiate with horror the conclusions that we draw from their premises.

On the other hand, it must not be assumed that everything which currently passes under the name of prejudice really bears that character. It may be mere prejudice in me to ascribe prejudice, in some point, to my neighbour. His ideas may seem to me to be idola, while in reality they are nothing of the kind. This seems to be particularly true of opinions that have a local or sectional connection. It is too readily assumed that these are all idola specas-idols of the cave; that is, distortions caused by our viewing truth in our local cave, as it were, and not under the wide canopy of heaven. But there may be true ideas as well as false idola in the cave. In this northern part of the island, we are accustomed to have most of our peculiar views, on religion and otherwise, treated as idola by our southern neighbours. A writer in the Times or in the Saturday Review could hardly compose an article on a Scottish topic without an unlimited use of "Scotch prejudices." We do not claim exemption -if we did, we should not be writing this paperbut we protest against the assumption that whatever views are peculiar to Scotland are necessarily prejudices. In fact, there are some of our peculiar opinions that, when taken out of the cave and placed under the canopy, become more convincingly true than ever. We have long been suspected of a very prejudiced opinion in favour of John Knox, whom the rest of the world has been accustomed to look on as somewhat of a savage. In Edinburgh, during the present winter, two of our greatest writers, Mr. Carlyle and Mr. Froude, have taken Knox out of the cave and set him up under the open sky, and they have found him a greater man than even his countrymen dreamt. Froude has pronounced him not only the reformer of his Church but the former of his nation; and Carlyle sets him down as the head and progenitor of Oliver Cromwell and the whole race of heroes that did such deeds in England in her days of struggle. We are believed to breathe an atmosphere of undiluted bigotry; yet Professor Thompson, of Galway, in one of his "Odds and Ends," extols our educational system as the most liberal under the sun, and asks in what other country will you find public schools and universities where the teachers are chosen irrespective of Church connection, and boys and young men of every creed, as well as of every rank, sit on the same benches and join in the same play? The perfervidum ingenium is no doubt often perfervidum in its prejudices as in other things; but it must be claimed on its behalf, that many of its religious opinious and practices, which are often promiscuously condemned as baseless, rest firmly, nevertheless, upon the rock-foundation.
