Remember that monopoly of the means of life is that which enslaves mankind, and bars the way to their freedom and happiness; that the real power of monopoly lies in the supineness of the working-class, and their inability to combine; that they are supine because hopeless, and unable to combine through mutual mistrust. To rouse their hope then and conquer their mistrust is the task that each must set himself. Their hope is already rising, but their mistrust remains. It is no marvel that it should be so, for they see the rats among them prosperous, and no man making them afraid; they see trade isolated from trade and people from people, each eager for its own apparent interest and reckless of any wider good. Each one, then, should set himself not only to the propaganda of principle and the redemption of ideas, but also to the propaganda of application and the redemption of daily life. There is no more pressing need of his effort than along the line indicated in this article; nor any department of life in which whatever he does can have greater effect. To cultivate in himself an ineradicable hatred and contempt of rats; to impart all he may of the same feeling to others; never to himself handle, purchase, or deal with any of their products, or consent in the doing of these things by others; never to miss a chance anywhere in his own daily doings, or through the Vestry, the School Board, or the County Council, of crushing a rat and discouraging his kind. These are things that come within the scope of the most uneventful life, and no opportunity should be allowed to pass without being taken the fullest advantage of. In these ways one may not only purge himself of complicity in the exploitation of his fellows, but do much toward ending that exploitation altogether and remodelling the world in fairer wise. S.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

SPAIN.

TORRELLÓ.—The efforts of a few Socialists here, helped by some comrades from Barcelona, have resulted in the formation in this locality of a Socialist Group, which promises to become numerous shortly.

LERIDA.—The same propagandist work is going on in Lerida. Moreover, the masons and stonemasons here have lately formed a League of Resistance to protest against, and protect themselves from, their exploiters. The contractor of some building works in the town expected the employes to work eleven hours a-day, being an increase of two hours on the customary working day. The town is very full of beggars, most of whom, says a correspondent to El Socialista, are bona fide workmen driven to this extreme by want of work. It is said that the authorities display an absolute apathy in face of the unemployed question thus showing itself in their midst.

ITALY.

SAVONA.—A correspondent writes to Il Fascio Operaio, “The propaganda work among the labouring classes carried on by our friends here has produced a remarkable awakening, considering that the workers have been so long bound within the limits of political mystifications. The Fascio dei Lavoratori, a branch of the party formed by about twenty companions last August, now counts already seven hundred active members.” M. M.

The Seventeenth National Congress of the United Italian Working-men Societies will be held in Naples on the 20th to 24th of this month. As the manifesto with the agenda will be published in a few days, we can say nothing at present; but if we may judge from the names on the acting committee, we must say, with regret, that this congress will be a great failure, as those gentlemen are nothing but Mazziniani, or enthusiastic believers in god and property! IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE life of our esteemed citizen, the greatest thief on earth, Jay Gould, is not a happy one. It may be an open question whether the life led by the mighty Czar of all the Russias is not more pleasurable and more secure from a speedy "removal" than that of poor Jay. A reporter of a capitalistic paper has lately watched the daily habits of the "little financial wizard from Wall Street," and he tells us that:

"Just as a shade begins to drop over the west side of Fifth Avenue on these afternoons of May, a very small, dark-whiskered man can sometimes be seen pushing along uptown, his glittering eyes fixed straight ahead, a general air of perfunctoriness in his movements, as if he was walking simply to create an appetite for dinner. It is Jay Gould on his way home from business. By his side walks a big, square-shouldered individual, an unmistakable 'bruiser,' the protector of this physical atom, who carries with him a very good sized arsenal."

One thing may be said very greatly to the credit of Jay Gould: he is no hypocrite. His cynical contempt for the folly, the stupidity, and the gullibility of the public is well known. The last number of Liberty brings this splendid specimen of Gould's cynicism:

"The recent remark of Jay Gould that the weaker railroad companies will eventually fall into the hands of the old and strong companies, in consequence of the Interstate Commerce law, or, to use his own words, because they will not dare to violate the law, and on even terms with the stronger companies they will hardly be able to secure traffic to support them, reveals a striking fitness to relations of vastly greater scope, and might serve as a text for an enquiry into the causes of the present state of labour, together with suggestions for its relief. The fate so confidently predicted for the weaker companies of eventually being eaten up by the larger ones has certainly long ago overtaken labour: it also is a prey to the strong and powerful. And the reasons are the same in the one case as in the other. The inability of labour to come to its own is directly traceable to the laws made by moneylords and landlords for its exploitation, by laws which it will not dare to violate, while on even terms with its exploiters it cannot secure enough to maintain itself. Heretofore the Anarchist stood alone in pointing out the law (the respect for it, the lack of spirit to violate it) as the principal source of all the economical trouble. Now Jay Gould confirms him. I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word."

It would be a matter of great advantage to the cause in general if some schools of Socialists, for instance the Christian Socialists and the "Nationalists," were to imitate the example of Gould and to cast off their cloaks made of whole cant and to boldly proclaim their adherence to scientific Socialism, as distinct from sentimental gush.

The Dawn is the title of a Boston monthly, the organ of the newly evolved party of Christian Socialists. Motto: "Christian Brotherhood."

The Knights of Labour Advocate, as a new paper issued by the Massachusetts Knights of Labour is called, is a large four-paged sheet filled with labour news.

To purify the morals of America and to elevate Yankee civilisation to a higher plane is the object of the Standard Oil Trust. This syndicate of Christian and philanthropic gentlemen has just ordered 200 bulldogs to be shipped to their newly-acquired oilfields in Ohio, ostensibly for the purpose of protecting them against the "tramp nuisance," but more than probably these eminently civilising agents are intended to be utilised as aides-de-camp to the Pinkerton detective agency in case of a possible strike. It may be advisable for certain people who express abhorrence for the "atrocious cruelty of the plans of Bakounine and his school" to send a special agent to the oil trust and try to moralise this octopus out of its bulldogs. For charity's sake I should feel inclined to advise this agent, however, to be provided with plenty of padding about his person.

The army of the United States only numbers twenty-five thousand men, and yet during the last fifteen years more than forty-three thousand men have deserted. Only eight thousand of the deserters have been captured. A Yankee is nothing if not patriotic.

British capital is buying up rapidly all the breweries in the States. Already a dozen of the biggest establishments have been absorbed by the British syndicate, and more are wanted. This is a fine illustration, considering the ever increasing influence of the prohibition and temperance people, that after all capital is not so very easily frightened.

About the downfall of the copper corner a good many wrong opinions have been formed. Especially is that the case in England. So I observe that even Mr. Hyndman believes himself justified to conclude from the failure of this combination that trusts sooner or later will come to grief. Now, to begin, the copper corner has been as unlike a trust as pitchbeck is like gold. The principal strength of any trust lies in an efficient organisation and in the good will of the different parties forming this kind of combination to adhere to arrangements agreed to; and the organisation of the copper corner has been as inefficient, as crude and as primitive as it is possible for any organisation to be. When the corner was formed, all the copper mines in the swim agreed to raise only a certain quantity of ore. But there was no arrangement made to check the faithfulness of the American mines. So some of the largest mining companies in the States took advantage of a technicality in their contracts and smelted many more thousand tons of ore than they had pledged themselves to. The European bankers soon found that they had more copper on hand than they had bargained for or could dispose of, and not being willing to continue to enrich Yankee sharps at their expense, a smash was unavoidable. Cacterum censeo: trusts are here to stay; they cannot be controlled by law, consequently they must be confiscated and used by the whole community for the good of each.

The executive committee of the American Federation of Labour held a secret meeting in New York City recently. It is reported that the meeting has been devoted to a discussion of the eight hour movement, and the formation of leagues to prepare for the expected agitation in May, 1890. It is also said that the meeting decided to issue a circular to be sent to all economic and historical societies, to conventions of clergymen of all denominations, and to the secretaries of political organisations, expressing the principles of the eight hour movement. Another circular will be distributed calling on all workmen, irrespective of unions, to join the Eight Hour League.

The general executive board of the Knights of Labour has ordered one million copies of the declaration of principles of the order for distribution among French working people during the exhibition. Steps should be taken at once to inform our French comrades of the present true character of this organisation, so as to prevent the poor French workers to be exploited for the benefit of a scoundrel like Powderly.

Owing to the big coal strikes in the west, a number of collieries in the Pittsburgh district, employing about 10,000 "hands," have resumed work after an idleness of about four months.

Andrew Carnegie has given his men notice that a new sliding scale will go into effect on the 1st of July. The new scale will amount to a reduction averaging 20 per cent. The workmen had previously notified the firm that they would demand on July the 1st an advance averaging 68½ per cent. Andrew Carnegie—sly dog. If the Carnegies are successful in introducing the scale, it will be "adopted" in all the other steel mills.

The strike of the railroad coal miners in the Pittsburgh district has been settled by a compromise.

The same fate has happened to the strike of the Illinois miners.

Twenty girls in a factory at Rockville struck for fresh air. The windows were allowed up only three inches.

The wages of 1,000 girl shoeworkers in Cincinnati have been cut down 50 per cent. during the last year.

Recent arrivals of foreign glass-blowers have alarmed the Window Glass Workers' Association. This organisation has issued an order to all its local associations to black-list all foreign glass-workers who hereafter come to this country for work. More Chinese spirit. Next!

Number of strikes from May 1st to 18th—40. Number of strikers from May 1st to 18th—22,836.

Under the existing law in Ireland, magistrates at petty sessions are empowered to inflict a penalty of £5 or three months' imprisonment on any domestic servant who is summoned for non-fulfilment of his or her contract. Ireland was excluded in this respect from the Labourers' and Workmen Act of 1875. Mr. T. Healy has put down an amendment to a bill now before the House—the Master and Workmen Bill—assimilating the law. It will be interesting to see whether Mr. Madden will assent to the reform.

THE PRICE OF COAL.—The strike among the miners in Westphalia created an unusual demand for coal for Germany, both in South Wales and Northumberland. At Cardiff, as much as 14s. per ton was paid for the best steam-coal, and 8s. freight. On the Tyne steamers were chartered at 6s. 9d. for Hamburg; Rotterdam and Amsterdam, 7s. 6d. Coke was scarce and 40 per cent. dearer. If only workmen would be wise and pull together, those of one country would not be seen cutting the ground from under the feet of those of another!

WAGES OF SEAMEN.—The National Sailors' and Firemens' Association, has issued a circular to shipowners throughout the country intimating that after June 3 the following rates will be demanded:—Western Ocean, passenger steamer, seamen and firemen, £5 per month. Cargo steamers to the Brazils, West Indies, the West Coast of Africa, and the Suez Canal, firemen, £4 10s.; seamen, £4 5s. To the Mediterranean and Black Sea, £4 10s. each. To the Baltic, £5 each; cooks, £5 15s.; stewards, £6 10s. Sailing vessels to the Baltic and Mediterranean, sailors, £4. To the southward, £3 10s. The Union now numbers about 60,000 members.

THE ENGLISH REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENT, 1815 TO 1817.

SPA-FIELDS RIOTS AND DERBYSHIRE INSURRECTION.

Concluded from p. 171.)

THROUGHOUT the evening of the 9th of June Nottingham was plunged into great excitement and disorder. Groups of people gathered in the streets, and rumours of insurrection were rife on every hand. The excitement spreads through the neighbouring villages, and everyone is expecting something remarkable to happen. The troops are confined to their barracks, and at ten o'clock at night groups of men leave the town and gather in Nottingham Forest a hundred strong. Here they wait patiently till two o'clock, and Brandreth and his men not arriving owing to occurrences that have delayed them on the road, and a troop of horse coming from the town and galloping down upon them, they disperse in disorder, leaving the ground covered with weapons of all kinds.

As morning dawns and the first rays of the sun fall upon the earth, a magistrate of Nottingham, Mr. Rolleston, gallops out from the town and sees Brandreth's party approaching, their weapons glittering in the sun. He spurs back to the barracks and arouses the troops, who have just retired to rest after being up all night. Captain Phillips arises, grumbling, and mounts at the head of his hussars. They gallop out of the town, and as they reach Eastwood they see some men flying across the fields, carrying pikes. The cavalry pursue, but cannot reach them owing to the nature of the ground. They return to the road, and between Langley Mill and Eastwood they come upon Brandreth and his party, now melted away to some fifty or sixty men, and already wavering in panic at the sight of the troops. The hussars dash upon them, sabre in hand. Brandreth tries to form his men in military order to receive their onslaught, but it is useless; they flee in disorder into the fields, and the insurrection vanishes like an empty dream. The hussars pursue them and capture some fifty prisoners; six men are taken with arms in their hands. Brandreth escapes and remains in hiding for some time, but is afterwards betrayed by a friend to Government for a reward of fifty pounds.

Now, having given you an account of these attempts at insurrections which disturbed England, let me tell you the secret history of the whole business. The truth was that a Government agent, a scoundrel as wicked as he was clever, was at the bottom of the whole business. This man Oliver was a carpenter and builder by trade. For some years he had been connected with the advanced wing of the Radical party in London, and knew most of their principal leaders. He had been in prison for debt, and in the year 1817 was very hard up. It was then that he applied to Lord Sidmouth for employment as a spy, offering to reveal the designs of the more revolutionary among the Radicals. His offer was accepted. The Government at that time had only obtained the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act for a matter of six months, and they wanted a renewal of their Coercion Act, so Oliver was sent down into the country as what the French call an agent-provocateur, or provoking agent. As there was no rebellion, no uprising, he received orders to make one, to hurry the men forward who were contemplating an outbreak into premature and ill-advised action. To render his mission more successful, he took as his colleague a man named Mitchell, who had been very active in the agitation in the northern counties. Whether Mitchell was his dupe or a fellow-spy is still a doubtful matter, rendered more doubtful by the fact that he was arrested at Huddersfield in course of his expedition and kept in prison for several months. This may only have been done to qualify him for future service as employé of the Government, but still it is a point that probably will never be cleared up.

The plan of campaign of these two gentlemen was as follows: Wherever there was a body of Radicals inclined for revolutionary courses, they presented themselves in their midst and urged them forward. Their tale was always the same. Oliver would state that he came from London, that there a mighty confederacy was mustering against the Government; thousands were armed and ready to revolt, under the leadership of the most eminent Radicals of the day. But the people were heartbroken at the apathy and indifference of the people of the town he was now visiting. While thousands of men in other large towns were determined to drag down by force the tyranny of the Government, in this town the people were doing nothing; they must awake from their sleep and act. Mitchell as a delegate from Birmingham, or Manchester, or anywhere else, would back up everything his companion said. Both these men were well dressed, and looked like people of respectability. Oliver especially had plenty of money, and both were well acquainted with the ideas and persons of the leaders of the Radical movement. What wonder, then, that many simple and warm-hearted people fell into the trap prepared for them, and consented to join in the insurrection, which was fixed by Oliver for a date in the beginning of June, just a little before the Government wanted to renew the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. It was Oliver alone—for his companion by that time had been arrested—who deceived Brandreth. He was in Nottingham on the 7th of June, the day before Brandreth appeared in Pentridge and repeated the stories which he believed, and which were the coinage of the active brain of Mr. Oliver. It was Oliver who arranged the rising at Huddersfield, and who called together and arranged the arrest of the delegates at the village Thornton Lees in Yorkshire. Moreover, it is impossible to acquit the Government of complicity in the actions of this dastardly scoundrel.

In the course of his journeys through the manufacturing towns of England, Oliver was informed upon by a gentleman in the same honourable employment, but who did not know him, and a magistrate of Sheffield wrote to London to Lord Sidmouth informing him that there was a person going up and down the country inciting people to acts of treason: what was he to do? This was in effect the reply: Leave him alone; he is an agent of the Government. So it was the Government that incited the men in Derbyshire to insurrection, and then hung them for it. What a blessing is a government! how kind and paternal and anxious for the welfare of the lower classes.

Well, you may ask how did Oliver get found out? I will tell you. It was over the Thornton Lees business. Here is an extract from the Leeds Mercury, edited by Mr. Edward Baines, that was read by Sir Francis Burdett in the House of Commons on June 16th, 1817—a statement which you will find in Hansard Debates. The debate which followed is entitled "Debate on the employment of spies and informers." Here is the extract:

"Since the first edition of our paper was prepared for the press, the highly important fact has been communicated to us from a respectable quarter that the plot at Thornton Lees referred to in the above statements has been got up by an agent from London, and that the principal offender has been allowed to escape with impunity. The statement rests on the authority of Mr. Williams, a bookseller in Dewsbury, and was corroborated by Mr. John Dickson, a linendraper in the same place. Mr. Williams stated that two months before a person of the name of Oliver called upon him and introduced himself as a parliamentary reformer sent from London to ascertain the disposition of the people in the country. This man he describes as a person of genteel and good address, nearly six feet high, of erect figure, light hair, red and rather large whiskers, and a full face a little pitted with small-pox."

Anything more unlike the popular conception of spy it would be hard to imagine.

"After one of his first calls he said it was quite obvious that the Government would not listen to the petitions of the people, and that they should be compelled to attend to their demands. He afterwards, on the Friday morning on which the ten persons were arrested, called at Mr. Williams' shop and begged his wife to tell him that a meeting of delegates would be held on that day at Thornhill, and earnestly begged that she would prevail upon her husband to attend. Before Oliver quitted Dewsbury to attend the meeting, he called again at the shop, when he found Mr. Williams had returned. He accordingly renewed his solicitations to Mr. W. to attend the meeting, telling him at the same time that his friends in London were heartbroke because the people were so quiet. At the same time he informed him that he had walked over from Leeds that morning, and two persons supposed to be Leeds men appeared in his train. Unmoved by Oliver's solicitations, Mr. Williams persisted in his resolution not to attend the meeting. At the appointed time the meeting was held at Thornton Lees, and the toils being set, eleven deputies were taken by a detachment of cavalry, and all except Mr. Oliver, who had the good fortune to be liberated, were conveyed to Wakefield in custody."

According to the same statement, it appears that Oliver was afterwards seen by Mr. John Dickson at the Stafford Arms, Dewsbury, and this gentleman asked him why he was free when his associates had been sent to London. He returned a shuffling reply, and hurriedly withdrew to take a seat in the Wakefield coach to Leeds. As he entered, a servant in a livery touched his hat to Oliver, and entered into conversation with him. After the coach had gone, Dickson spoke to this servant, and found out that Oliver was on very intimate terms with the servant's master, General Byng, who was then in command of the Government forces in that district, and who had arranged the arrest of delegates along with Oliver, that highly accomplished government spy of respectable appearance. The result of this exposure was that the Government had to release the unfortunate men captured at Thornton Lees, and information rapidly poured in to the editor of the Leeds Mercury from all parts of the country concerning the operations of this redoubted spy. Thus it was discovered that Oliver had also planned the Derbyshire insurrection; but this did not save the lives of the unfortunate men concerned in that affair. Isaac Ludlam, William Turner, and Jeremiah Brandreth were condemned to death by special commission at Derby, and were sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered for the crime of being led into insurrection by a spy of the Government.

Brandreth and Ludlam died with inflexible courage at Derby on 17th of November. Poor Turner seemed overpowered by the fate that had fallen upon him, and could only ejaculate on the scaffold, "This is all Oliver and the Government." After they were hanged, the hangman proceeded to mutilate the corpses according to the sentence. A yell of horror burst from the people, but the yeomanry and javelin men drew near, and the heads of the murdered men were hewn from their lifeless trunks. However, the Government did not think it safe to further mangle the dead bodies, so that part of the sentence was graciously remitted by the kind permission of his majesty's representative, the Prince Regent. What admirable lessons in civilisation and refinement do governments teach their subject peoples—lessons taught by those potent preceptors, the jailer, the policeman, the spy, and the hangman!

Well, my story is now concluded. After the events of the summer of 1817 there was a lull in the agitation. The revolutionary party was shattered and broken up by the betrayal of its best men. The moderates were silenced, for their leaders were in prison. There was also a good harvest, and a slight improvement in trade. So there was a lull in the agitation till 1819. Here, then, I will conclude, with but little comment on the story which I have told you. There are many lessons which all may draw from it; but I think the chief is that if ever you are forced into secret revolutionary agitation, as you may be some day, be quite certain that all your comrades are as honest and as determined as you are. Beware above all things of mysterious loud-talking strangers; and be certain before you plan a revolt that the masses of the people are with you, or perhaps you may share the fate of the humble men who died with courage upon the murderous scaffold at Derby. For with all their courage and self-devotion, they only enabled a base and treacherous Government to continue their system of coercion for some time longer. Yes, the mistakes of these men should teach us much, and their bravery and forgetfulness of self should urge us forward in the battle of the future. D. J. NICOLL.

WORKING TWENTY HOURS A DAY.—An extraordinary instance of long hours of labour was related the other day before the Sweating Committee of the House of Lords. A Roumanian Jew stated that at Manchester he works from five o'clock in the morning until twelve at night, and sometimes until one or two in the morning, making an average of twenty hours a day for six days in the week, leaving only four hours for sleep. He earned 3s. a day in the busy time, lasting about ten weeks, and from 6s. to 8s. per week in the slack season, and on this he had to support a wife and six children.

THE MODERN LAZARUS AND THE CONSOLATORY CAT.

Lo, Dives, fearful of burglarious raid,
Invokes stern Law-and-Order to his aid,
And threatens Lazarus and his starveling pack
With cat-o'-nine-tails pendent o'er their back.
"Begone!" he cries, in tones of strenuous hate,
"Begone, ye lawless beggars, from my gate
Else have I vowed with patriotic zeal
To make your hides, howe'er unfeeling, feel
That one supreme corrective of all wrong—
Six dozen lashes from a leathern thong.
Begone, and quit my charitable doors,
With all that gruesome licking of your sores
By philanthropic dogs—no more of that!
Ye shall be licked henceforward with the Cat."

CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. GEORGE'S FARM.

The letter of M. A. Maloy throws light upon the cloud, and how it came against the wind at Totley. The man who was master got his foot between the door and the doorpost by means of the usual levers.

To accumulate subscriptions of a shilling for the equipment of 20 acres of garden-farm being an heroic undertaking, deserved success, as the man who was master will find ere long.

It surprises some people that the necessity for cultivating by co-operative effort is not met, and such difficulty as exists overcome. This difficulty differs in important details from those which confront co-operative manufacture. In the latter case the plans and specifications relate to things about which knowledge is not quite so much boxed up, and more, not so much under the influence of the elements which no man can control, though the bare mention of them forms some part of the stock-in-trade of the tools of the land-thieves whose Royal and other agricultural societies, which might be made real and true schools, are positively part of a system of fraud.

In commencing operations on a piece of land, it is necessary to have a tolerable stock of three articles: (1) Results of previous labour (material); (2) Results of previous thought (knowledge); (3) Patience. These things abound, but they are boxed up; to get them unboxed by shilling subscriptions is heroic. For my part, I confess I should have attached the £100 donation to the undertaking, but my view of that part of the case may arise from having been brought up on the soil, and worked on and in it, being in fact a delver, and recognising the difficulty under present circumstances of supplying thirty-seven millions of people with fairly mixed food from land which has been robbed as much as the workers upon it have been.

The system of profit-grinding in rents, etc., has reduced the bare face of the earth to a state of confusion. The nitrates have been got out and have gone down the sewers of ugly cities, and cannot return to the earth through the thick coat of weeds which the avarice and ignorance of the man who is master have allowed to accumulate; he neither knows nor cares whether the winds bring back resources of nature, and consequently does not cultivate for their reception.

The general condition of the food-producing districts of England is one of deplorable poverty, both of soil and people, which it will take years of free work to restore: under such circumstances £100 donations ought to be taken in, and chance the settling of accounts.

That the inhabitants of any part of the globe ought to be exclusively employed in agriculture I for one totally deny. It is work which, in a properly organised society, would come as a relief to all at its proper season, and yet be a primary rather than a supernumerary occupation. Its very nature requires the quick concentration on a given spot of all the available strength of a community, at certain seasons. We see this in the gooseberry pickers at Wisbeach and hop-pickers elsewhere, and the bare mention of the fact makes us shudder at their condition before they pick, while they pick, and after they pick both fruit and hops.

To have the necessary force at hand the workshops of all sorts must be in villages, and the workers should not be under factory-hell pressure, fearing loss of market or loss of dignity by changing from one kind of work to another for mutual advantage.

The cultivation of the soil is easier to do than to describe by pen and ink. It has suffered so much from the stupidity of the man who says he is master that it is not easy to interest the general reader by a description of Earthwork. If we could have a proper co-operative garden in some villages it would help to teach the workers who ought to be "in possession." The "allotments" of garden ground have not as yet served the purpose of schools, unless it be schools of the Primrose League sort. JOHN GREENWOOD.

"SEAFARING."

SIR,—The correspondence anent Seafaring in your issue of last week has attracted my attention. I considered it a bounden duty of mine to read it to the members of the Hull branch, and I did so. The branch has, therefore, directed me to communicate with you and our executive, relative to the charge against our journal. In answering for myself and the members of my district, I can assure you, sir, we have been kept in ignorance as to our journal being printed by non-unionists, and, if such is the case, as a trades' unionist of a true stamp I will refuse to have any connection with the paper. If Mr. Cowie has deluded us, I say he could not have thrown a greater insult upon us. What must the feeling of union printers be to us, when they hear of us refusing to sail with non-union men and yet contributing to the support of a "rat ship"? I, therefore, wish to inform the readers of the Commonweal that both I and the members of the Hull, Goole, Grimsby, and Lynn branches are indignant as to what you have brought to light. I will immediately communicate with union printers of Hull and our executive, and I have no doubt, sir, but that this grievance will be speedily rectified. Our general secretary, Mr. J. H. Wilson, of Sunderland, and most of our delegates I know are thorough trades' unionists, and I know they would never consent to get Seafaring printed in a rat shop. I trust all trades' unionists who read this will communicate with our general secretary, and prove to him that such is the case, and you will find he will be the first to put a stop to it.

The non-unionist is a creature not worthy of consideration, able to look after his own interest but too lazy and ignorant to do so; he stands on neutral ground watching the cruel fight between capital and labour, ready like any coward to take the part of the strongest. The capitalist having the power to-day he supports him, but the dawn is about to break, then the scales will fall from his eyes and he will see the injury he has done his own class.—I am, sir, yours fraternally,

GEO. W. REID, Secretary (Humber District),
National Sailor's and Fireman's Union.

Unity Hall, 3, Prince Street, Dagger Lane, Hull, June 31, 1889.

SIR,—Allow me to state in your columns that the printing of Seafaring at the National Press Agency was arranged for before I was aware that it was not a Society house, and that the work cannot—for at least the present—be given to another house.—Yours, etc.,
EDITOR, Seafaring.

NEW LABOUR CLUB, 5 Victoria Park Square, Bethnal Green.—Thursday June 13th, H. Halliday Sparling, "Evolutionary Cannibals."

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

Glasgow dock labourers have been instructed by their union to decline contracts at less than 27s. per week of 60 hours.

The plumbers at Fairfield have struck for an increase of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per hour. They have at present 7d. per hour, and all other firms are paying 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Some months ago the National Sailors and Firemen's Union numbered only five in Liverpool and Bootle, and now there are over 7,000 members. The Union now numbers about 60,000.

The report of the Sliding Scale Revision Committee of the South Wales coal trade was received at the collieries on Thursday 30th. It provides for a reduction on the advance of 1 $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in wages.

The dock labourers in Belfast have struck for an advance in wages; the present rate is 17s. per week, they demand 22s. At a crowded meeting, held on Wednesday in the Lancastrian School, it was decided to hold out until the demand was conceded.

HORSE-NAIL MAKERS.—The horse-nail makers in Old Hill and Hales Owen districts are still out for an advance of 3d. per thousand. The Midland Counties Trades Federation have granted the strikers £10, and an appeal for support has been issued to the public.

Labour troubles are assuming larger and more significant proportions in Scotland. A large demonstration of seamen and dock labourers was held on Saturday at Glasgow, and an enormous strike is threatened. A proposal to import foreign seamen finds some apparent acceptance from shipowners, but it is "too thin" to hoodwink the men. The tramway men hold mass meetings every Sunday at present, and they have also midnight meetings.

IRISH RAILWAYMEN.—On the northern division of the G. N. R. of Ireland, the engine-drivers start from 4s. 6d. per day, and rise to 7s. They work on the 60-hour system, and if they cannot make 12 days per fortnight, they work on Sunday and make it up. This is on the Banbridge job. Firemen start at 2s. 4d. per day, and rise to 3s. 6d. By the agreement between directors and men in 1872, the wages should start—firemen, 2s. 6d., and drivers, 5s., but the men have allowed this to drop, and also let the six months' system for increase of wages drop. At one time a fireman got full money in 12 months, but now gets 3d. rise every six months. There have been some nice disputes about wages here since 1885, and but for the fighting of a few energetic men, who are termed restless spirits, things would have been worse.

WALSALL BIT-MAKERS.—An agitation for an increase is now going on, and in support of it the men say the wages do not average £1 per week, and some are barely keeping body and soul together. If a man works piece-work he has to buy his own files, amounting to at least from a shilling to two in a week, and in winter fourpence for gas, so this considerably reduces his already low wages. Besides, he has to pay a penny in the shilling for polishing; according to the rule, if a bit was 4s. filing, that would cost 4d. for polishing, and that could be accomplished in a quarter of an hour, so if a man polished four an hour he would earn 1s. 4d. an hour, whereas at the filing he might get sixpence. In small shops the men do their own polishing, but in the factories the penny in the shilling has to be paid without option. But the chief cause of the dispute is the 15 per cent. It seems some years ago the operatives won 15 and 25 per cent. on their wages—15 per cent. on best work: 25 on common,—but as the trade has been so completely revolutionised, the common work is nearly all done now by day-workers. But the best work is generally done piece-work. During the slackness of trade the men allege that the 15 per cent. has been taken from them, and now they demand it back again to be paid all round.

MIDLAND MINERS.—The following is a copy of the amended sliding-scale adopted at the meeting of the Wages Board held at Dudley last week. Two pence per ton rise or fall in average selling price varies thick-coal miners' wages one penny per day. Two pence per day rise or fall in thick-coal miners' wages varies thin-coal miners' wages 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per day:—

THE MINERS.—The National Miners' Conference was resumed at Manchester Wednesday 29th. The proposals of the Yorkshire coalowners that 5 per cent. advance be given on 1st July, and another 5 per cent. in October, on condition that no further advance be asked for till July next year, were considered. After a prolonged discussion, it was unanimously resolved to advise the Yorkshire colliers to accept the offer, but without the condition attached. All the other districts represented at the conference were advised to accept the same conditions. It was decided to make a levy to support any miners who may strike for the advance. The men have since agreed to the masters' offer of 5 per cent. advance on July 1, with another 5 per cent. on October 1; and the owners will not press their condition that the wages question should not be reopened for a year. The difficulty is therefore practically at an end, and the decisions to be laid before Tuesday's conference avert what threatened to be a determined strike.—The miners of Oakengates on the 31st held a meeting to consider the question of a further advance of wages, and to hear the report of their delegate to the Manchester Conference. Mr. Latham said that it was considered at the conference it would be the best thing they could do to accept the concessions of the Yorkshire coalowners. He trusted they would endorse that decision. After a little discussion the meeting passed a resolution in favour of so doing, with only one dissident. A communication was received from the agent of the Lilleshall Company, in which an advance of 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per day was offered. This offer it was decided to reject.

INTERNATIONAL SOCIALIST WORKING-MEN'S CONGRESS.

14TH TO 21ST JULY, 1889.

WORKERS AND SOCIALISTS OF EUROPE AND AMERICA.—

The Bordeaux Working Men's Congress, held by the delegates of upwards of 200 trades unions from all the industrial centres of France, and the Troyes Congress, constituted by the delegates of 300 workmen's and Socialist groups representing the French working class and revolutionary Socialism at large, have resolved to convene an International Congress in Paris, during the Exhibition, that shall be open to the workers of the whole world.

This resolution has been joyfully welcomed by the Socialists of Europe and America, happy to be able to meet and to clearly formulate the demands of the working-class on the subject of international labour legislation, which question will be treated at the Berne Conference, to be held by the representatives of the Governments of Europe in September.

The capitalists invite the rich and mighty to the Universal Exhibition, to contemplate and admire the achievements of the workers, doomed to misery in the midst of the most colossal wealth ever possessed by any human society. We, Socialists, whose aim is the emancipation of labour, the abolition of wage-slavery, and the creation of an order of things in which all workers—without distinction of sex or nationality—shall have a right to the riches produced by their common toil; it is the producers whom we invite to meet us on the 14th July in Paris.

We call on them to seal the bond of fellowship that, by consolidating the efforts of the proletariat of all countries, will hasten the advent of the new world.

"Working-men of all countries, unite!"

The adhesions from America and elsewhere that have been announced, but are not yet to hand, will be published in a future circular.

Delegates are requested to announce their time of arrival at least one week before the opening of the Congress, to enable the Organising Commission to make the final arrangements for their board and lodging and reception at the station.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE dam above what was once Johnstown in Pennsylvania turns out to have been the crowning triumph of what we call in England jerry-building—i.e., building not for the use of the public but for the profit of the speculator. The crowd of unfortunate people who were lost in that stupendous tragedy have in fact been sacrificed to the demon of profit-mongering to which hundreds and thousands of the disinherited classes are sacrificed every day, whether the kind of sacrifice be the actual death caused by privation, or the living death of hopeless poverty.

To the demon of profit they were sacrificed, and also to the demon of waste: for it seems that that huge mass of water, held temporarily in check by its jerry-built dam, was in fact a pleasure lake, the property of a fishing-club; so that this gigantic threat of sudden death to thousands was simply one of the means of wasting the riches which the idle class wring by force from the workers, and which they cannot use but can only waste.

I do not wonder at the anger of the survivors from this artificial deluge, this subsidised terror, against the owners or holders of the pleasure-lake; but if there be any members of the class which lives on the enforced labour of the workers amongst these angry men, their anger is illogical; because they themselves are doing the same kind of thing (unconsciously maybe) every day. Let Keats speak to it:

A thousand men in troubles wide and dark:
Half-ignorant, they turned an easy wheel
That set sharp racks at work to pinch and peel.”

On the other hand, those of the disinherited classes who have shown their anger are abundantly justified in being angry; but if they understood their position better, their anger would seek wider afield, for they would know that the profit and pleasure of the masters of slaves does not produce mere spasmodic accidents only of death and misery, but is and must be the constant and necessary cause of continuous death and misery.

Will you say, “How do I know that there was a slave class in and about Johnstown?” If I did not know it otherwise, I should be sure of it by the token that after the catastrophe there were people found so miserable and brutalised that they used the occasion to rob the dead bodies—and were shot for doing it by others (doubtless maddened by the terror that surrounded the place) who did not, and we will say could not, remember the words of a great teacher, “Let him who is without sin amongst you lift up the first stone against her!” O shooters of the robbers of the rich dead, is it not a worse crime to rob the living poor, and that not now and again, but constantly, systematically, and legally?

The “large employers of labour in the printing trade,” who have just lately published a circular to prove that they are the true friends of labour, “protest too much.” We don’t need to be told that they will do what they think best to bring them in a profit; but surely workmen don’t need to be told that this must mean their paying the lowest wages they can safely pay. We shall have more on this subject.

Advanced Radicals boycotting Socialists is a sight which would please Tories more than any other party. Reynolds please take note of this, and do not refuse to publish our lecture-lists. Star please take note also, since you seem to be beginning that game. The Dispatch has not the same terror of us as other Radical papers have, but publishes our places and times of meeting regularly.

A poor little boy was run over and killed the other day in getting out of the way of a tram-car. The driver of the said car was arrested and brought before Mr. De Rutzen. But the evidence that the man was not in the least responsible was so clear, that the magistrate remarked that “no doubt what had been done by the police was in accordance with police regulations, but why the person before him should be taken into custody he was utterly at a loss to understand.” The reason, I think, is rather clearer to us; it is in accordance with police regulations to badger and bully poor men on every possible occasion, and even on what would seem to ordinary persons impossible occasions. W. M.

The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland has been again throwing off some feverish yammerings—prognostics of death—respecting the non-church goers and “lapsed masses.” The Rev. Donald McLeod has emphasised the fact “that this, like other countries, was passing through what he might call a cold wave of religious indifference arising from many causes, but certainly affecting the religious interests of the people to a very enormous extent.” The fact of the existence of the cold wave referred to is beyond dispute, but the new birth which it forbodes is what really alarms the leisured professional prattlers in our churches, presbyteries, and assemblies. Its cold calm characteristics are guarantees of the coming cyclone which will sweep away the sham sentimentalists who, while preaching of honesty, holiness, and love, subtract from the sum of social wealth more than they render an equivalent for, and whose honesty of purpose is as the inverse ratio of “the cold wave of religious indifference.”

The Rev. Dr. D. McLeod confesses that “Bible women, missionaries, and students are not the persons to deal with working-men. These working-men needed good strong teaching.” The necessities and miseries of the workers have too long been the playthings of pious pretenders and moneyed sensation-seekers, who have other objects in view, as the fruits of their “labours,” than those actually professed; and because “these working-men” refuse such stuff as the pious pretenders provide, it does not follow that they will shut their eyes and open their mouths and take the “strong teaching” of the church. What does the church propose to do, or what can it do, to secure for “these working-men” the full results of their work? If the “strong teaching” of the church can reach those who steal from “these working-men” now, so as to make them steal no more, then it will be able “to deal with working-men.”

But it is clearly evident the church does not intend to reach those who steal from “these working-men,” and the burdens which the church sanctions to be laid on the backs of the latter by the former, as by the design and will of God, are such that “these working-men” are physically unable to look towards heaven. It is in the nature of man to stand erect, and nature must have its way. It is the knowledge of this fact that has aroused the bats of the church, for they know when the workers throw off the burdens that deform them, the church, as it now is, will be in the lot. Until the church renders an equivalent to the workers for what it takes from them, the church will be in danger. G. McL.

The L.P.D.L. has issued another circular, soliciting “your opposition to the following bills,” etc. Considering the hopelessness of the business, either from the point of view of the devoted M.P.’s who introduce these wicked bills, or of the unhappy idiots who think them worth opposing, it is a matter that calls for our pity rather than for our anger. It is a dispiriting spectacle, this of the old watch-dog of property scratching so incessantly to keep down the fleas. Poor beast! He is terrified, but they will never cause his death (indeed, it wouldn’t suit them to do so); nor, again, will he ever be clear of them, till his miserable life is summarily cut short by the triumph of Socialism.

Some of the flea-bites of bills are certainly large of their kind, and must be sufficiently terrifying to the wretched dog. But that is no reason why the fleas should shriek, as some of them have lately done, for Socialists to come and help them. We desire to kill the dog, and neither can share the feast with his Liberal and Radical parasites, nor can look on them as our allies. Their bites only touch the skin, and we, who have decided he shall die, must find some more effectual means of killing him; which, indirectly, will be bad for the fleas as well.

Perhaps it might be instructive to be the owner of property for a day or two, or say a week at the most—one could hardly stand more of it—just to see where the fun comes in. To an outsider it seems dull past all defending, a very desert which no living thing can hope to cross without falling a prey to vultures and other devourers of carrion. The liberty we desire for all, of fully developing all our faculties of personal enjoyment, and by pleasant arts sharing our delight with friends. All this is by property restrained, so that but few have, and fewer make use of, the chance of self-culture; and these miss the full fruition of happiness for lack of the sympathy of those others, who, trained for property's purposes into a sort of cattle, must forego all that makes life good to live if they would obtain permission from property to live at all.

On the whole it would be amusing, were not the circular so fearfully dull, to observe the high moral ground taken up by the earls and dukes who are responsible for it. Under the mildest proposals they seem to see the cloven hoof, and are plainly ready to prove, with the very best of economical logic, that its owner must be the devil. But their logic need not concern us, who can answer to it all: "You may have argued well, but we know a better way of living." Meanwhile, we may rejoice to see property refusing to bend; it will presently be the more easily broken.

G. S.

DREAMS AND NIGHTMARES.

It is well known that we Socialists are dreamers—at least we have been told so over and over again by our opponents. Our ideals are impracticable, our proposals visionary, and we ourselves are dreamy enthusiasts. If it be true, there is some satisfaction even in that. At least in our dreaming we have entered a protest against the inferno which the realists seek to make us believe is unchangeable. And we could scarcely imagine anything more horrible than that which is. Misery everywhere; in the mansion and in the garret alike. The misery of greed and the misery of want; the torture of not having enough, and the satiation of having too much. The toiling of one class from morning to night with but the slightest intermission, and never a chance to exercise their mental and physical faculties as nature meant them to be exercised; the idleness of the other class giving them no incentive to rational enjoyment, and, often assisted by the helplessness of those whom they have made poor, rendering them an easy prey to vice. Such is the reality which we are asked to believe endureth for ever! For my part, I do not hesitate to say that those who really believe in the lasting of this chaos of unhappiness are suffering from nightmare.

Notwithstanding the evil state at which we have arrived in the course of the evolution of society, in spite of our surroundings, which are certainly calculated to make us have very gloomy ideas of the condition of posterity, it is easy enough for dreamers such as we are to look into the future and see a poetic vision of coming grandeur and beauty. Basing our dreams upon such real things as tendencies, previous events, and science, and, if you will, being optimistic rather than pessimistic, we see the cities of the coming time full of architectural splendours, in the place of the squalid low-roomed brick hovels of to-day. Only those who have themselves felt the influence of a magnificent building can imagine the effect upon men of a beautifully constructed city. I remember well how impressed I was myself when I saw for the first time the great temple of Themis at Brussels standing out like a giant among the surrounding buildings, as a monument to the glory of humanity and a promise of the future capacity of the race, seeming to encourage mankind to press onward to the conquest of the treasures which science and art have in store. It is of course only dreamers who can imagine a regenerated humanity in a rejuvenated city full of beautiful parks and palaces and dwelling places, into which every man, woman, and child can enter and enjoy themselves to the full of their desire. And then the forests and mountains and valleys, the fertile plains and meadows, the joys of a rural life, which are to hundreds of thousands in London and our other great cities incomprehensible. We dreamers can imagine under the new order of things the dwellers in the city and the village mingling together and living each other's lives in healthful change. We can imagine the people drinking in to the full the delights of life in a rational and freely organised society. We can see how much superior to us the men and women will be who are born in an environment favourable to the development of their best qualities. All this is manifest to us. And, though the wise men who are careful not to look beyond their noses do not believe it, we dreamers have not the slightest shadow of a doubt that what we see in our dreams is as real as the promised land which Moses saw from Mount Pisgah. We may not enter therein, but those who follow after us will assuredly do so.

And so at least our dreams would be pleasant even if they were only dreams. But the nightmares of our opponents, what shall we say of them? If a man never ventured out of his house for fear the slates on the roof would fall upon him and kill him; if he never crossed a street for fear a brewer's dray or a cab, or a tramcar would run over him; if he never entered a railway train for fear of a collision, or a steamboat because he dreaded shipwreck; if he was afraid to eat or drink anything because of what the Lancet man has said,—you wouldn't be content with saying he was in a highly nervous state or calling him an idiot, you would unhesitatingly say he was mad. Yet the arguments of the enemies of Socialism and progress are very often pretty much on the same level as those of the individual I have instanced. Admiral Maxse—who is one of those persons who call themselves Radicals because they never go to the root of anything—had an article in a daily paper the other day, in which he said he was against Home Rule for Ireland because it would lead to separation, and then we should have an independent country at the disposal of a foreign power seeking to invade us. No doubt the gentleman in his unpleasant nightmare had seen vast armies of Frenchmen, Germans, Russians, Austrians, and Italians landing on the coasts of the tight little island, using Ireland as a huge barracks and assisted by American cruisers. I pity the Admiral. A grain of common sense should assure him that a friendly nation is a far better neighbour than an enslaved country. Then again, the Admiral opposes Home Rule because it might lead to Home Rule for Scotland, Wales, and even Cornwall. Terrible thought to this excellent Radical! He imagines that it is necessary for every individual and every county to be bound together by chains, and for the four divisions of the United Kingdom to be united by force. We consider this a foolish dream on his part—a nightmare in fact. Any union which is based upon coercion instead of upon community of interest must necessarily defeat its own ends. Indeed the compulsory co-operation which exists to-day between England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland prevents the development of the people. When the interests of two or more individuals, towns, or districts are such as to require combination, they will certainly unite without any coercion whatever as soon as they understand the necessities of the situation.

The Malthusian delusion is another form of nightmare to which those who oppose us are subject. We are increasing at such a tremendous rate that in a few years there will be nothing to eat. That is the burden of their perpetual dreary song, which appears to be inspired by the crowded cities of which London, Glasgow, and Manchester are types. Listen to one of these unfortunate croakers: "We punish a man with death for killing his fellow; but a little reflection should make the dullest understand that the crime of bringing a being into the world exceeds by a thousand, a million-fold that of putting out of it. Men are to-day as thick as flies in a confectioner's shop; in fifty years there will be less to eat but certainly some million more mouths. I laugh, I rub my hands! I shall be dead before the red time comes. I laugh at the religionists who say that God provides for those he brings into the world. The French Revolution will compare with the revolution that is to come, that is inevitable, as a puddle on the roadside compares with the sea. Men will hang like pears on every lamp-post; in every great quarter of London there will be an electric guillotine that will decapitate the rich like hogs in Chicago." The amiable lunatic who writes in this pleasing strain is the well-known novelist, Mr. George Moore. Mr. Moore needn't frighten himself any longer. That there is going to be a revolution is true enough; that some lives may be sacrificed is probable; but the cause of the coming revolution is not too many mouths, but monopoly and tyranny. The bloodshed which may take place will be trifling compared with the number of lives which are sacrificed in commercial wars, and it will be solely due to the attempts of the capitalists and landlords to maintain the present order of things. Nobody wants any electric guillotines: if the Socialists want any particularly murderous weapons to use against the powers that be, they could well be content with the murder-machines designed by the military inventor. But the workers wish to put a stop to the present reign of terror, not to inaugurate a new one. They seek to establish Liberty, Equality, and Brotherhood, and don't wish to punish the ruling classes for being foolish; they recognise that nature is to blame for that. But nevertheless the workers will not stand any nonsense from those who oppose them in the days of struggle. Mad Malthusians really ought to read up their geographies, and try to form some idea of the vast areas of land which are out of cultivation. A course of agricultural chemistry sufficient to teach them that the land in cultivation can be made to produce a great deal more than it does now, a course of Socialism to show them that the causes of the present crisis are not what they believe them to be, and a course of history to show them that population really doesn't increase in the way they imagine, would probably complete their cure, and the nightmare would vanish.

There are a vast number of other unpleasant delusions which non-Socialists suffer from. There is the Chinese invasion mania, the foreign conquest bogey, and very many others which will suggest themselves to various comrades. But they are all specimens of what may be termed capitalistic nightmare. I prefer the dreams of Communism.

Coal miners in the Gallitzin region, Pa., have accepted a 10 per cent. reduction in wages.

Bradstreet reports strikes in the United States from May 1st to 25th at 63; number of strikers, 24,962.

The question of admitting coloured men to membership in the Amalgamated Iron and Steel Association is receiving attention.

THE YANKEE-BRITISH BEER TRUST.—The British capital, now on the tramp after big and easy made profits, seems not to content itself with the look-out of being able to buy up the entire beer-brewing industry in the United States. It wants more. The syndicate in charge of this unemployed mammon has sent some agents to Minneapolis, Minn., with the instruction to obtain a controlling interest in the flour mills of that city, the greatest producers of flour in the world. Dame Rumour and her vigilant representatives, the reporters, know not as yet whether the agents have been successful.—H. F. C.

WE LIFT THE BANNER RED.

We lift the banner red,
Like the brave men who have bled
For the liberty of man ;
As they've gone we will go,
With our faces to the foe,
And finish what they well began.
Wrong we know is strong,
The upward path is long,
But through danger undismayed march we ;
So we all, young and old,
The red flag uphold,
And cheer for it with three times three.

Stout-hearted men are here,
And women without fear,
Who flinch not from the fray ;
Though Death do us take,
At his terrors we'll not quake,
Nor waver in our upward way.
Right is often weak,
And Justice far to seek,
But we'll alter that when we are free.
So we all, young and old,
The red flag uphold,
And cheer for it with three times three.

Before our flag shall fall
With a crash the prison wall,
And the slave shall snap his chain ;
Then Labour free from toll,
Of its fruit shall have the whole,
And Plenty through the world shall reign.
Free and happy then,
Shall be the lives of men,
And the earth a merry place shall be.
So we all, young and old,
The red flag uphold,
And cheer for it with three times three.

A LETTER FROM AUSTRALIA.

NOTICING in a late number of the Commonweal, dated March 2, 1889, that you are apparently at a disadvantage in not knowing the state of affairs regarding employment and wages in Australia, and kindly requesting the Australian Radical for information on that subject, I herewith send you a brief letter, roughly showing you the condition of the working classes in this country.

The position of the toilers is very bad indeed; and things are fast drifting to a crisis; workers from other countries (chiefly Britain) have been wrongfully deceived by immigrant agents advertising in newspapers the great advantages that Australia affords, which necessitates their selling off what goods they have to pay for conveying them this far, and immediately on landing—work is found in abundance and good wages too.

Looking over some back numbers of the Northumberland Morpeth Herald, England, I find in its columns a "standing ad.": "Special Notice!—2,000 female servants, miners, farmers, labourers, quarrymen, and others wanted for Queensland, Australia. Immediate employment on arrival." The above is the plausible style in which these agents and shipping companies (who are making heaps of money out of it) gull the minds of the working-classes at "home"; and the people who have immigrated to this country these past few years, and living in this district, have found it out to their cost; anyhow, suffice it to say that the information given by unscrupulous advertisers in British papers about Australia is, undoubtedly, untrue.

I cannot refrain from adding a little more about the doings of these agents. When rumour has it that certain individuals are thinking about journeying to Australia or other countries, the immigrant agents make no delay in attending to their wants,—as in the matter of selling off what furniture they possess, and seeing them dispatched to the ship. I have conversed with several persons here who have come from the "old country," and they state that they were treated with mean cunning trickery by their agents. The latter gentlemen being generous and hard-working in their way, gave the intending immigrants to understand that they need not necessarily put themselves to much trouble, for that they would see after and procure auctioneers if they chose (let me say here that many of these agents are auctioneers themselves). But here is the trickery: the immigrants' kind advisers, finding that they possessed good furniture, made no hesitation in uniting with the auctioneers to buy up the greater part of it, if possible; by the latter men employing different persons to stand and bid, they were thus able to gain the goods very cheap; by such deceitful dealings these sharpers were able to get plenty of money by selling the articles out again at their real value.

It is to the interest of the upper classes that Britain should dispossess some of the lower classes—whom the former have barbarously robbed of their rights—by exiling them to shores which are fast becoming themselves cumbered with the wreckage of monopoly.

The winter that is coming on will prove disastrous to the workers in our large cities. As it will be seen through J. A. Andrews' report, "Unemployed in Melbourne," published in the Australian Radical of April 6th, armies of unemployed are tramping the streets of that city, and the same in Sydney. Notices are appearing every day in our dailies, being the opinions of people in many of our districts, stating that "they are indignant at the action of the immigration department in sending a continuous stream of penniless unemployed up country by the free pass system. . . . Even though all were respectable, yet it is unjust to send penniless men into districts where there are already too many unemployed." Swagmen may be seen everywhere tramping in great numbers in search of employment; workers from other countries come here for the greater part to starve; heartrending cases are occurring every day, ending in suicide and other fatalities through destitution. The other day a poor girl committed suicide in Melbourne, the reason being that she was only earning 2s. 6d. per week, and had to support her aged father besides herself on that small sum. She would rather cease living suddenly than by slow starvation.

Of the late strike amongst the miners in the district of Northumberland, and which comrade W. H. McNamara explained at length in the Commonweal, some months back, the outcome was a great reduction of wages. Men working some pits have suffered a loss of 1s., 1s. 6d., and 2s. per day, through the "agreement" they were forced to come to. The majority of the miners are greatly dissatisfied over their defeat, and some pits are making an attempt to come to a more reasonable settlement by arbitration; but the coal-getters will not, I think, be benefitted by these proceedings, for their masters are too cunning to be "had." It is to be feared that another fight will take place between capital and labour, in which the former will rely upon the Government for protection; for it is certain that they will employ soldiers and Nordenfeldts to keep law'n-order in the time of trouble.

At the present time work is slack amongst the mines; many pits are working three and four days per fortnight—men scarcely obtaining the necessities of life, instead of "saving a little for their old days," as the thrift people tell them they ought to.

While the people on an average get a little more in wages than the workmen in Britain, it is taken from them again by their being charged exorbitant prices for the things they eat and wear. I have lived at "home" and know it. Rents are very high; tenants living in small cottages in the suburbs are forced to pay 8s., 10s. 12s., and upwards per week, also paying dear for light and firing. Sports took place at Maitland the other day, in which the public were charged 1s. for admittance into shows where only 2d. and 3d. would be the price for the same amusement at home.

Yes, Australia is drifting fast into a bad state—fast following in the footsteps of Britain and other countries. The monopolists have the land locked up in N.S.W., and production is therefore checked. "It is protection that we want," cry the majority; and protection they are going to get; the policy of restriction will come sooner or later, worse luck for the workers of this colony in the future.

One good thing could be brought about in Britain (if it is not being carried out now): if Socialists and others would warn the toilers against the notorious lies put forward by immigrant agents and other individuals, both in newspapers and pamphlets, about the "great advantages" in Australia, thus causing the people to break up their homes, leading them astray to far distant shores where there is every likelihood for the greater number of them to hopelessly starve.

The three Irish members, Dillon, Deasy, and Ormonde, have arrived in Australia; they have started their lecturing campaign, and intend to visit every prominent city in this country.

The Socialists and Anarchists are going ahead in Melbourne. They have formed a branch of the League, and all have worked tremendously hard, both in speaking on the wharfs and other places and writing on the social question, this last summer. They deserve unlimited praise.

The League in Sydney is all alive, carrying on their weekly debates, and so on, but they seem not to be so active as the newer branch in Melbourne. From over-pressure of work they have not been able to keep up constant correspondence with the Commonweal, and this letter has been penned to repair the breach a little.

COMPETITION AND WAR.

COMPETITION has been termed the bloodless war of civilisation. This, to the Socialist at least, looks suspiciously like and means much the same as another phrase we often hear—Killing no murder. It may be that it does not maim or slaughter in the same manner as on the battlefield; yet it would be difficult to form an estimate of its victims. Actual war, its horrors intensified by modern murderous inventions, is a spectacle indeed that would make the angels weep; but the misery inflicted and the lives sacrificed in this struggle of militarism, gigantic though they are, would be dwarfed if the half could only be told of the evil effects of modern industrialism. In the military phase of this necessary evil, so called, there are times of peace. But in the industrial conflict nation is ever against nation, industry against industry, man against man, wives and children against their husbands and fathers. We as a Christian nation make a great outcry when two rival nations are at war. Philanthropists of the John Bright type shriek out in holy horror at the waste of human life, the horrors of the battlefield and of war in general; yet they will uphold a system that slays its tens of thousands for every one that is destroyed in actual warfare.

Further, we Socialists declare that this slaughter directly due to war, when traced up to its primary cause, is but an effect of competitive commercialism. As this is rather a serious indictment, proof will be necessary to support the assertion. Take the recent history of this country for instance; and as the most of history is but an account of the wars engaged in, with a few particulars concerning the principal actors engaged mixed through it, so a brief survey of the recent history of Great Britain will be but a catalogue of recent wars. And they were all without exception due to this industrial conflict: forcing our shoddy goods and our shoddy civilisation, our missionaries and our rum, or some other commercial matter, on an unwilling people, has been at the root of all the trouble this last half century or so the whole world over. The late Burmese War originated through British capitalists and traders forcing their markets and wares on a people who wanted neither. The late Egyptian War is another instance. What but the commercial interests involved in the Suez Canal and the route to India, and the British bondholders' twenty per cent., lay at the bottom of the trouble there? The Afghan War originated somewhat similarly—the commercial interests of this country at stake in India. And that shortly means the exclusive right of the British plutocrat to exploit the masses of India, and to prevent the Russian from having his finger in the pie. Those so-called interests demanded what they call a scientific frontier; hence the trouble. The wars we had with China originated through us, a Christian nation, forcing the opium traffic on the heathen Chinese. The petty wars we were engaged in on the west coast of Africa had their origin somewhat similarly. This eternal Eastern Question that crops up now and again and that keeps all Europe one vast armed camp, has its root in commercial rivalry. Who is to hold the key to the East, this mighty field for exploitation, after the sick man takes his departure bag and baggage—this is the question. In support of this commercial theory of the causes of war, hear what John Ruskin says:

"The first reason for all wars and for the necessity of national defences is, that the majority of persons high and low in all European nations are thieves, and in their hearts greedy of their neighbours' goods, land, and fame. . . . And the guilty thieves of Europe, the real source of all deadly war in it, are the capitalists; that is to say, people who live by percentages on the labour of others instead of by fair wages for their own."

It is an ill wind that blows nobody good. This old saw applies with full force to this question of war; for under existing conditions and in the present constitution of society, if a great war was to break out it would be a positive blessing in those times of depression—at least to all those not directly engaged in the melee. It would cure for the time being at least both over-production and over-population, two very serious ills that at present afflict society. The over-production would be used up in providing the over-population with the means of exterminating each other. This would be killing two dogs with one bone. There is no cure for dull trade like a good war: how often do we hear that given expression to. A good war, save the mark! Under a rational and just constitution of society, it would just be as sensible to speak of a healthy plague or a benevolent earthquake; but as in the existing order, or disorder rather, everything is upside-down, we can speak of and justly appreciate the benefits of a good healthy war. Most of us can remember the good times that accompanied and followed the last Franco-German war. Why, everyone in this country at least, from Rothschild down to the little boys that vended the evening papers, was, to use current phraseology, "getting on immense." The French and Germans having all their energies engaged in exterminating each other, we had the markets both home and foreign all to ourselves. Trade enlarged, as Gladstone told us, by leaps and bounds; wages ruled high, profits still higher, millionaires got to be plentiful amongst us, whilst working people got double the quantity of beer to drink. Yes, there is nothing like a good war. A great deal of hypocritical cant is given vent to when wars are engaged in; the time is prayed for when men shall know the art of war no more, when they shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks. A certain book we profess to believe in, theoretically at least, lays it down as the right thing to do; but when we consider the time and place it was written in, it shows clearly the truth so well put by the author of the Biglow Papers, that they didn't know everything down in Judee. And apparently they failed to see the blessings that flow from a good war. Yet we who know better nowadays are hypocritical enough to ring the bells, burn bonfires, fire cannon, and so on, and make believe we are extremely glad when peace is proclaimed, when we know quite well that it means a return to hard times again. This is surely the height of insincerity. The Orkney minister who petitioned the Lord to send plenty wrecks that way through the winter was sincere and honest. Candour like that can be appreciated. But to make great demonstrations of joy when the hard times that follow peace are on us again is hypocrisy indeed. To be honest and consistent, we should wear mourning and go about lamenting, in the words of Robert Owen, our best friend the war is dead.

If anyone should think these remarks on the blessings of war callous and cold-blooded, let him bethink himself whether they are not justified in our present way of living; and if even after having done so, he still feels uncomfortable, I hope he will be rational, and join with us in our efforts to crush the competition that makes war.

WILLIAM DAVIDSON.

TWEEDLEDUM AND TWEEDLEDEE.—That it really does not and cannot much matter to the capitalists which party is in office, must in our days be plain to every watcher of the political game. In 1880 Jay Gould contributed 100,000 dollars to the late Mr. Garfield's (a Republican) fund, on the condition that Jay should have the choice of a Supreme Court judge, which of course he had later on. Before Mr. Cleveland's (a Democrat) election in 1884 Gould still continued to support the Republicans because the Democrats were then as yet an unknown quantity in politics, and considered by the monopolists to be disposed rather in favour of labour. Since then the Democrats have been in power, and in 1888 Jay Gould subscribed 50,000 dollars to the national Democratic committee, because "Mr. Cleveland's administration has not disturbed the vested interests, and that was enough for him." Republican or Democrat, Tory, Liberal, or Radical, it all comes to the same. They must serve the supreme boss of politics, Capitalism, or be turned out. And to regard it as possible that the workers can ever obtain control of the political machine on parliamentary lines is equal to believing that our capitalistic antagonists are noodles—which they are not.—H. F. C.

TO BATTLE!

SOUND the alarum-bell, sound,
Dash all your tools to the ground,
And strike,
And strike!

Ere toil in this iron age,
With hunger and cold for wage,
The grave,
The grave!

Nay, comrades, never give in;
To battle! until we win
The world,
The world!

LOUISE MICHEL, translated by LAURA LAFARGUE.

SOCIALISM IN LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE.

It would be a very clever man who could tell exactly how much headway Socialism is making in the country, but one who takes events as they come, and looks at them from a Socialistic point of view, has every reason to rejoice in the progress that is being made. I have not yet visited a very large number of towns, but I intend doing so, and shall give my experiences from time to time in the Weal. Both in Lancashire and Yorkshire the movement is "marching on," far better than I expected to see them from the reports that reach London. Let us take Manchester; here great things are being done, and fresh converts being made at every meeting. The branch of the League has carried its propaganda into the little outlying villages around the town, and have spread the light of Socialism among the dark and dreary "homes" of the workers. It will, I fancy, take a great deal of the cant and hypocrisy of the politicians to make the villagers believe in or have much to do with them any longer. Such a strong hold are our ideas taking, that one has only to take up a local paper to see which way the wind is blowing; articles and debates on Socialism are to be found therein for and against. A County Councillor has been advising working-men not to stop at street corners listening to "Socialistic ranters," a "Liberal" too! All this points to the good result of the work being done by the comrades in Manchester. I don't say this to flatter them, but they really deserve all they can get in the way of praise.

From Manchester to Leeds, in Yorkshire, is 38 miles by train and only 37 by road. As I didn't patronise the railway monopolists, but walked it, I saw many sights on the road I should have missed otherwise. Horrible sights, some of them; hundreds of men and women tramping with pinched and haggard faces in search of work, with hardly any covering on them; clothing it could not be called. Little children along with them, half starved, no boots or covering to their feet. All obliged to sleep out in the open-air of a night, having no money for beds; afraid to beg for fear of getting locked up, and the parents sent to prison, the children to the workhouse, to become thieves or something worse after the fashion of this "Christian" country. I wish that the lying "Christian" scoundrels who teach the workers to slave and sweat in producing wealth for others to rob them of, and then ask them to live contentedly in dirty filthy slums, eating muck or starving, could be made to go through the same mill, and then they wouldn't after that talk so much bosh about consolation in the sky. As for me, the sights that I have seen since I left London have made me even more incensed than ever against the present system.

In Leeds the summer propaganda has begun, and on Sunday morning I went to see the League meeting in Vicar's Croft. This is one of the local historical spots, and it is always easy to get an audience of over 600, who listen attentively. No interruptions take place, and here good work is evidently being done. There is a good Socialist club, and I doubt not that before long Leeds will be to the front. Horrible details could be given of the sweating carried on in this town; vest making for a halfpenny, a pair of trousers made for three-halfpence. Match-box making is also carried on, and the women are paid a penny a gross. One can guess how they live, when a mother and her four girls, two of them grown up, earn 1s. 8d. per day between them, twenty gross being as much as they can make. All of these things are impressing the workers, and showing them the sort of system under which they live. Leeds, like most places nowadays, is discontented, and the workers will soon be flocking around the red flag, the emblem of their liberty.

JOHN MCCORMACK.

PROVERBS.

THE following saws were picked up from an old collection, but are worth a niche in the memory of workmen to-day, if workmen have such a thing:

He that hath but a little, he shall have less,
And he that hath right nought, right nought shall possess.

A jailer's conscience and his fetters are made of one metal.

A hunger-starved belly hath no ears.

Trim up a hedgehog, he looks like a lord.

Who makes himself a sheep the wolf devours him.

What, shall we starve in a cookshop, and a shoulder of mutton by?

THE TRADES UNION CONGRESS.—On Saturday the Trades Union Parliamentary Committee issued a notice to the officers of trade societies and trade councils throughout the United Kingdom, stating that the twenty-second annual Trades Union Congress will be held in the Gilfillin Memorial Hall, Whitehall Street, Dundee, on Monday, September 2, and five following days. In the notice the trade societies and the trade councils of the United Kingdom are invited to send representatives to the Congress, the delegates to which shall only be such persons as are or have been bonâ fide workers at the trade they represent and who, in the case of trades councils, represent upon such councils their own particular trades. The Parliamentary Committee "expect the gathering at Dundee will be a large one, well representing all parts of the United Kingdom."

CORRESPONDENCE.

COURNET'S GRAVE.

It will interest most of your readers to hear that Cournet's grave is in Egham Churchyard, where, after some difficulty, I have succeeded in finding it to-day (in a very neglected condition). Cournet, the Socialist hero of the barricade Saint-Antoine of '48, was killed by Barthélemy, the hero of the barricade du Temple, in a duel at Priest's Hill, near Englefield-Green, and died at the Barley Mow Hotel in this village. This happened in 1852. Old inhabitants still remember the great funeral and the red flags. The part played by the two in the days of June 1848, and the fact of the disastrous duel, are mentioned by Victor Hugo in the last part of 'Les Misérables,' entitled Jean Valjean, book I. ch. i.

ST. GEORGE'S FARM.

Dear Sir,—Mr. Ruskin's name having been freely mentioned by a correspondent of yours re the Sheffield affair in your issue of 25th ult., and thinking Mr. Ruskin might have somewhat to say in the matter, I submitted the article in question to him, and have received the following replies.—

Faithfully yours,
27, Portland Row, Dublin, June 1st, 1889.

H. SUTTON FRIZELLE.

[COPY.]

My Dear Sir,—Not only am I grateful for your letter and enclosed bit of newspaper, but they come precisely at the moment when I want to learn all I can of what has been doing, or undoing, since I was last at Sheffield. I will answer the main points you enquire about to-morrow, having no time to read the articles to day, but in glancing at it I see one statement which should be corrected at once. I am not the owner of the farm in question. The St. George's Guild is. What legal forms exist inconveniencing my action, or yours, I don't know—and never could know—as I waste no moment of life that I can save in reading the obscure language of British law; but assuredly I get no good of the land, but have, on the contrary, paid constantly annual losses on it.

Secondly, Mr. Riley was no friend of mine. I tried him as an exponent of modern liberalism, and was as little pleased with the result as those members of your League were!

I will complete my reply to-morrow. You may print this beginning of it—and the end I shall print myself if you do not—when and wherever you like, as anybody else may whatever I write, at any time, or say, if only they don't leave out the bits they don't like!

Ever faithfully yours, JOHN RUSKIN.

Brantwood, Coniston, Lancashire, May 29th, 1889.

[COPY.]

Dear Sir,—I have now read the cutting enclosed in your favour of the 27th inst. My letter yesterday contains all the notice of it which I think needful.—Believe me always, your faithful servant,
JOHN RUSKIN.
May 30th, 1889.

"SEAFARING."

SIR,—In reply to former letters, allow me to state that I believe the editor of Seafaring and the "rat type-stickers" are "birds of a feather." Paid servants (not the executive committee) made an agreement with Mr. Cowie to take ten thousand copies per week, providing the paper advocated the Union's interest. The paper has not fulfilled that contract by giving employment to "rat" printers. The members of Tower Branch do not want Seafaring, for when reports are sent to that paper from us they have to be sent to Sunderland before being published, if there is anything in them like the advocating of true national trades union principles. National unions should be built on the rock of truth, with stone honestly hewn, and cemented with industry and sobriety; then they will last as long as the nation. If Mr. Cowie will reply, I will show him how far I can throw a deep-sea lead, and report soundings if necessary.—Yours faithfully,

3 Mint Pavement, Tower Hill,
London, June 9, 1889.

ARTHUR R. ABBOTT,
London District Secretary.

ERRATUM.—In the second or third paragraph of my letter, "Looking Forward," you will find (it appeared May 31st) this sentence, "Albeit of noble sentiment and not a little mad." It should have been "not a little read."—JOHN ARMSDEN.

PEASANT PROPRIETORSHIP IN BRITANNY.—The British Consul at Brest, in his last report, refers to the condition of the Breton peasant proprietor, and says that although he has a great natural aptitude for tilling the soil he labours under considerable disadvantages. As a rule, he cannot furnish himself with the proper plant, cattle, and implements for agriculture, and, above all, bear the expense of draining. Nearly all the land cultivated by the peasant proprietor is worked with the spade, and the fear of losing, or even risking, the slender profit he is able to make by his severe labours effectually prevents any enterprise, and engenders a spirit of avarice difficult to describe. The peasantry apparently live in a condition of squalor—"happily unknown to the English agriculturist," says report! Thanks, however, to their extraordinary parsimony, it is perhaps doubtful if they are actually as poor as they seem; but their pale and troubled faces and bent forms, even in early life, show how badly they are fed, whether they can afford comfort or not. In Brittany, certainly, under the peasant proprietorship system, the land is not properly worked, and much goes out of cultivation. It is the custom to raise immense banks as hedges between their little plots, to grow scrub oak on. These banks, with their high crest of scrub, shade the land to a great extent on each side, and from the resulting damp little will grow under them. The object is to obtain the firewood, which is of very slow growth, and the peasant, in thus trying to get too much out of his plot, is half-starved, whilst half killing himself with labour. Many other instances could be presented of the same shortsightedness in squeezing the land. Men and women indiscriminately perform the work of the agricultural animals they cannot afford to buy, with the usual consequent evils to health. It is no common sight to see women working with the flail for hours, a labour so severe that it often breaks down the men.

THE SEAMEN'S STRIKE.

THE strike of sailors and firemen for increased pay, of which we spoke in last number, had fairly begun as we went to press, and shipowners were experiencing much difficulty in obtaining crews for their vessels. The Cunard steamship Bothnia sailed, however, from Liverpool with a full complement of rats. The Cunard Company's British Queen, bound for Havre, the White Star steamer Celtic, and the Inman International Company's City of Chicago, were filled with rats. The shipowners appeared determined to resist the demands of the union, and were prepared to take any course rather than grant the increases demanded. To prevent "intimidation" the police were "on duty" all over the place. At a meeting of unionists on Monday it was decided to, if necessary, forcibly fetch out rats. Telegrams were received announcing settlements at Cardiff, Swansea, and Newport. A meeting of the union in Glasgow resolved to give in their 24 hours' notice Wednesday, and come out on strike at the expiration of that time. There are about 6,000 members of the union in Glasgow.

On Thursday it was reported from Leith that owners were laying up vessels all round rather than give in. Glasgow owners were doing the same, except a few who succeeded in getting rats. From Dundee and Aberdeen came news of almost complete victory. The western ocean steamers which left Liverpool obtained their crews without paying advance. In the case of the steamer to the West Indies, the owners had to give the rate demanded. A sailing ship, the Sagona, which was the only one signing articles at the Sailors' Home, had also to pay the strike wages. To the casual observer nothing in the shape of a strike was apparent. The owners of the mail and passenger steamers to the west said they had plenty of competent rats. All the mail steamers sign articles on board in the various docks, to prevent the union men from intimidating others who are willing to sail on the masters' terms. No disturbance has been so far reported.

On Friday the officials in Sunderland stated that the union demands had been conceded in twenty ports. Nearly 600 men are now on strike at Leith, and as the shipowners still hold out, there are over twenty steamers laid up in the docks. The only line which is working is that of the North of Scotland Steam Navigation Company, the men on these vessels receiving the union rate of pay. A number of "men" were brought from London to form a crew for the London and Edinburgh steamer Iona. They were met by the secretary of the Seamen's Union, who induced some of them not to join. The Iona sailed with a crew made up of these men and officers of other steamers. The steamer Kinghorn yesterday sailed for Antwerp with a crew of Japanese and Dunkirk Frenchmen.

Saturday's telegrams said: At Liverpool matters were progressing quietly. The branch secretary having applied to the shipowners for an interview, with a view to ending the struggle was informed that no meeting was necessary, as the shipowners declined to pay any advance, and had made arrangements for bringing men from Scandinavia and Denmark, for whom they must find employment. During the week fifteen large western ocean steamers, sailing from Liverpool, each obtained a full rat crew. Seamen and employers maintain a determined attitude at Leith. A meeting of 700 seamen, firemen and dock labourers resolved to take combined action in demanding increased wages, and to pledge themselves to support each other until their demands were conceded. It was also agreed that seeing that some of the companies had begun to import foreigners into the port the Royal Naval Reserve men should in a body resign. The shipowners met and resolved to advertise for seamen and firemen at 30s. a week, with a six months' agreement.—The crews of the Dublin and Glasgow Steam Packet Company's steamers struck, and it was feared that the strike would extend itself at the Dublin port. This it had already done, the following notice having been extensively posted:—

AMALGAMATED SEAMEN'S AND FIREMEN'S UNION. DUBLIN BRANCH.

STRIKE IN DUBLIN.

The following rates of wages shall be demanded:—

WEEKLY STEAMERS—COLLIERS.
Sailors	...	£1 12 8
Firemen	...	1 12 8
Stewards and Cooks	...	1 16 0
Donkeymen	...	1 16 9
CHANNEL PASSENGER BOATS.
Sailors	...	£1 19 4
Firemen	...	1 10 4

TO THE SHIPOWNERS OF DUBLIN.

We trust you will see your way to adopt this scale of wages for the future, so as to prevent any inconvenience arising either to owners or men through the stoppage of work.

CAUTION.

To the Merchants, and Public, and Cattle Shippers, and Passengers.
Do not sail or send your goods in ships manned by incompetent crews.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

J. H. WILSON, General Secretary.

Some owners have given in, others have laid up their vessels, and the men are determined.

Monday's messages said:—Affairs on the Clyde on Saturday assumed a more serious aspect, 3,000 quay labourers having joined the strike. They ask for an advance of halfpenny per hour, and the stevedores want a penny increase. The seamen appear as determined as ever to hold out. Notwithstanding the vigilance of the Seamen's Union three steamers were got to sea from Leith on Saturday with rat crews. The Moscov left for Cronstadt, the Britannia for Newcastle, and the Meteor for London. The crew for the Meteor were collected at ports in the Firth of Forth, and were taken out to Leith Roads in a tug, whence they were transferred to the Meteor. The seamen held a demonstration on Saturday, and marched to Edinburgh, where they held a very large and enthusiastic meeting, with the president of the Edinburgh Trades Council in the chair. Of twenty steamers that came into port during the week, only five have got away again. One hundred and fifty seamen remained on strike at Londonderry. The steamer Voltaie, after being three days laid up, shipped a crew, mostly Germans forwarded from Belfast, and left on Saturday for Liverpool. In Belfast the trade of the port is pretty well tied up. A number of owners granted the advance, but the men declined to resume work until all yielded. As to ocean-going steamers, the employers have conceded all demands, but refuse to use their influence with owners of coasting vessels to act in a similar manner. They say their hands are engaged by the month, whereas those employed on coasting vessels are paid by the week. There is no sign of any settlement. On Saturday a number of vessels were being discharged by ordinary labourers, protected by harbour constables and Royal Irish Constabulary, while in a few cases the owners themselves and their sons were giving a hand to clear the vessels. Mr. King, who imports coal extensively, posted a notice offering half-a-sovereign for five hours' work to labourers, but there was no inclination to accept the offer.

On Tuesday we heard that the able-bodied seamen and firemen sailing from Maryport had the advance. The labourers employed in loading ships with coal also struck on Monday, but resumed on their wages being increased from 4d. to 6d. per ton. The strike only lasted an hour.

Wednesday's news spoke of no new move of any importance, but the look of affairs is rather promising for the men, whose victory we hope to report in our next.

The Annual Conference of the Socialist League on Sunday, June 9th, passed the following resolution unanimously:—

TO THE SEAMEN AND FIREMEN NOW ON STRIKE.

COMRADES.—We, the delegates of the Socialist League, in Conference assembled, tender you our heartiest congratulations upon the success with which you have welded a hitherto wholly unorganised multitude into a compact and powerful Union. The struggle in which you are at present engaged is part of the great fight for life which the working-class is compelled to unceasingly wage if it would not perish in the grasp of monopoly. That your efforts may result in a complete and crushing victory over your opponents is our ardent wish, and in achieving that end we pledge ourselves and the body we represent to afford you any and every assistance that lies within our power.

SUTTON HALL.

In the centre of an estate of some four thousand acres or more of fertile land, situated in Derbyshire, lies Sutton Hall, the seat of Mr. Arkwright. In some ways this is rather a model estate; any one walking across it will be struck by the prosperous look of the prettily situated farm-houses and cottages; all the gates are painted white, and the roads and paths seem well kept, and the whole estate has rather the air of being a continuation of the park. It consists of undulating country, beautifully wooded; handsome trees may be seen growing in all the hedges, and often away out in the fields, and there is one wood known as Sutton Springs of some considerable size, where, besides the usual English trees, the Spanish chestnut and rhododendron may be found in abundance. The labourers' cottages are often very prettily situated, and usually have a good bit of garden, and the rents are low comparatively. Mr. Arkwright's mother, who used to live on the estate, was very good in looking after the tenantry; if they were ill she would go to see them, and let them have almost anything they wanted from "The Hall," but—oh, that little word!—they must order themselves lowly and reverently to all their betters, i.e., the gentry of course, and be contented in that state of life in which it has pleased God to place them. If they do all this, and work hard and not grumble, then they will be well looked after if ill and helped a little if poor, and so on.

Such is the estate in the centre of which lies Sutton Hall, a fine square building, with a little ivy grown church hanging on to one corner, well lifted up and commanding a splendid view of wooded country, with a somewhat steep ridge in the distance, on which stands Bolsover Castle in full view, and further on Hardwicke Hall, the seat of the Unionist leader, the Marquis of Hartington. Around the Hall lies a lovely park, a fine avenue of trees runs down from the house towards the lake, and as we passed through last Sunday the deer could be seen grazing about, and a peacock and his wife were walking about the garden, adding the lovely blue of their necks to the already rich colouring of green, which was splendid with the freshness of a day's rain. But, alas! the great house looked all shut up and forsaken! I believe some servants live in the back parts out of the way, but Mr. Arkwright seldom lives there now; his rents and royalties supply him with an income of some ten or twenty thousand a-year I suppose, so he can go and live in some livelier though hardly more lovely place than Sutton Hall.

Small wonder that, as we stood looking at the house and the splendid view it commands, we should fall to talking of "the days that are going to be," when this Hall and others like it will be the centre of a happy communal life. Plenty of room in that large house for quite a small colony to live, each one having his own den upstairs where he could go to write, or sulk, or spend a quiet evening with his lady-love or his boon companion; and downstairs would be large common dining-halls, dancing-halls, smoking rooms—if indeed life shall still need the weed to make it perfect. And we chatted on, each one adding a bit to our picture; how some would till the land around and others tend the cattle, while others perhaps would start some industry, working in the outbuildings or building workshops about the park, and taking care not to spoil our view with a hideous building or blight our trees with smoke. Others, again, could work in the mines and bring up coal, of which there is a good supply just now being worked by a neighbouring company, who will have to pay, I suppose, about £6,000 a-year in royalties. And as we thought of what might be there, what health, what happiness, our indignation arose against what was,—the forsaken house, the wealth which should make comfort for all the people round, going to keep two or three people and their hanger's-on in idle enervating luxury. And as we turned to walk home through the beautiful Sutton Springs, carpeted with blue bells and young ferns, we all felt, I think, more than ever determined that what might be shall be.

RAYMOND UNWIN.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

THE Fifth Annual Conference of delegates from branches of Socialist League, was held at 13, Farringdon Road, on Sunday, June 9th. The following branches were represented at the Conference:—Hammersmith, North London, Clerkenwell, East London, St. George's-in-the-East, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Norwich, Leicester, Yarmouth, Oxford, and Manchester.

All the reports read were of the most satisfactory nature. Harmony permeated the meeting, and various important resolutions were unanimously adopted. At no previous Conference of the Socialist League were Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality so practically set forth.

The following members were elected to the new Council: J. Turner, Morris, Mowbray, Nicoll, Cantwell, H. Davis, Webb, Mrs. Schack, Sparling, Blundell, Bullock, Samuels, J. Davies, Tarleton, and S. Presburg.

Bullock and T. Davis were elected as auditors; Morris and Lane, as trustees; and Morris, Sparling, and Nicoll, as editors of 'Weal.

Defence Committee.—The Home Secretary, Mr. Matthews, seeing no reason to alter Jeffries' Edlin's sentence upon Diemshietz, a meeting of the Defence Committee will shortly be held to audit accounts and determine future action. Meanwhile, an appeal is made to enable the friends of Diemshietz to compensate him.

The Conference of the Socialist League, held on Sunday, June 9th, passed the following resolution unanimously:—"That this meeting of delegates of the Socialist League, in Conference assembled, do most emphatically protest against the brutal and unjust sentence passed on Lewis Diemshietz, steward of Berner Street Club, for the commission of no other crime than protecting the property of the Club, and the persons of his wife and friends, from the unbridled brutality and organised attack of the police. And this Conference further condemns the attitude taken up by the Home Secretary in refusing to interfere, and is of opinion that by so doing he is neglecting that 'public duty' which he makes his excuse for non-interference."

Notice.—All letters on League business, except those intended for Editors of Commonweal, to be addressed to me. No other person is authorised to sign any official communication.

FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

NOTES ON NEWS.

On this side of the Atlantic we have had an "accident" of the kind the responsibility for which it is impossible for us not to take on our own shoulders; nature or ill-luck or what not, must be accused after us and not before us. As a matter of course, we have nothing to say about the men who have been arrested: even if they should be proved guilty of carelessness, yet after all it is not they who would be the real criminals, but rather ourselves, who allow monopolist companies to work our railways for profit, with the necessary consequence of low wages and long hours and short-handedness amongst the underlings out of whose pay and leisure the monopolists have to scrape up a dividend. What can come of such a system but misery and disaster on all hands?

I see the Rev. Mr. Viner, in presiding over a meeting of the Plumstead tram-car men, said that the object of the movement was not to make war on the company, but to get for the men a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. Well, the words are pretty, but unmeaning; the men are at war with the company, and must be so as long as they don't get a fair day's wage for their work; that is, until they are employed by the public and get what the public pays for riding in the cars instead of their do-nothing, dividend-drawing masters. The masters are showing them pretty well what war means already, and it is much to be feared that if the men don't learn to understand their position, and fight as hard as they can, they will soon be taught by their masters the meaning of one of the maxims of war: "Woe to the vanquished."

In point of fact, they are at the lesson now: the companies are acting in a quite straightforward commercial manner, and see the necessity of crushing the movement at once: they know their enemies, and put them hors de combat by giving them the sack without quarter. The public, however, are beginning to be a little uneasy at such straight "application of economical principles," as the bourgeois slang goes, and it is not so certain that the dividend-drawers will win.

Here is what a non-Socialist friend told me last night. Asking why a certain tram was late, one of the men told him that the company had extended their dinner time ("hour," I was going to write) from eight minutes to fifteen; and that in consequence they had to put on the extra minutes' work at the end of the day. How is that for shabbiness in this world where nature is so superabundant? I call it the very sublime of shabbiness: the true antithesis to the Widow's Mite.

The respectable critics have been very much down on Ibsen's play of "A Doll's House," now being acted at the Novelty Theatre, and profess to be shocked: Mr. Buchanan, e.g., reiterating the phrase a "young woman of criminal proclivities" apropos of the heroine, whose crime one may say in passing is merely a technical one. How is this to be explained, linked as it is with the fact that the Socialists obviously look on the play as making for Socialism, and are enthusiastic about it? It is not difficult of explanation: whatever may be the demerits of "A Doll's House" as an acting play (by the way, if it is different from an ordinary modern play it must be better, just as any day different from last Whit-Monday must be better than it)—I say in any case it is a piece of the truth about modern society clearly and forcibly put. Therefore clearly it doesn't suit the critics, who are parasites of the band of robbers called modern society. Great is Diana of the Ephesians! But if my memory serves me, her rites were not distinguished for purity.

I note that the critics say that Ibsen's plays are pessimistic; so they are—to pessimists; and all intelligent persons who are not Socialists are pessimists. But the representation of the corruption of society carries with it in Ibsen's works aspirations for a better state of things, and that is not pessimism. Therefore Socialists recognise in them another token of the new dawn.

The Pall Mall Gazette in a recent issue says: "The proposal to administer the territory between Bechuanaland and Lake Tanganyika by means of a company armed with a Royal charter, has excited considerable uneasiness at Berlin, and it is understood, says the Standard's correspondent, that Germany and Portugal are both preparing to prevent any encroachment by the English company on their spheres of interest." Of course; this administering (beautiful word) of the territory mentioned may involve "poaching on the manors" of Germany and Portugal; the vultures don't want too large a company at their dinner-party.

On June 12th and 14th, we have two articles by Mr. John Mackenzie on "British Supremacy in South Africa," in which the writer impresses on us the quantity of healthy habitable land available in this region. He remarks: "Considering the landlessness of the people of these [British] isles, I have yet to find the man who will come forward and propose that her Majesty's Government should give away any part of Bechuanaland, up to the Zambesi, to any other administrative power whatever." It never occurs to Mr. Mackenzie, or any other advocate of "extended Imperial administration," that her Majesty's Government should leave any part of Bechuanaland in the hands of the natives. In fact, he expresses his feelings with ingenuous openness in the next quoted lines: "All would agree that the simplest and best method of overtaking our work in Bechuanaland would be to extend Imperial administration there, so that the whole country, from the border of the Cape Colony up to the great river at its northern boundary, may be in our hands." This is truly comprehensive and all-embracing; the writer should be congratulated on his large-minded views. He adds, "This also is what the natives desire." No doubt they do; we have it on the most trustworthy authority (of sportsmen) that the fox likes being hunted—rather enjoys the fun, in fact.

Mr. Mackenzie suggests an opening to British railway capitalists here, and even waves the glint of gold before our eyes, provided permission could be obtained from one of the native chiefs to begin gold-mining, "which would amply secure those dividends which shareholders in a commercial undertaking always look for." There is "room for all" in South Africa, he thinks; the white man will find scope for his energy, and will bring his chastening influence to bear upon the untutored native, who will "find that with the passing away of his old methods and beliefs, he has offered to him more ennobling teaching, and the possibility of living in peace, and enjoying the fruit of his industry." Mr. Mackenzie becomes pious towards the end of his second article, and says that he regards the recent concurrence of events in South Africa as "the call of Divine Providence to occupy and administer that great country till it is ready for self-government."

The Queen has sent a message of sympathy "kindly worded" to the scene of the railway disaster at Armagh; that done, she very likely troubles herself no further about the matter. Her Majesty's "messages of sympathy"—seldom or never accompanied by anything more substantial—are perhaps proverbial by this time. We English are so snobbish and apathetic we deserve what we get.

The Shah of Persia's journal, published in 1874 after his visit to England, contains some very amusing reading, and gives a fresh aspect of English life, which should be a godsend to some of us who find London life rather dry in its old day-to-day aspect. For example, the following tribute to the police, how vigorous and picturesque in its language, and yet how touchingly true in every particular:—"The police of this town is eight thousand strong, all handsome young men, in a particular dress. The citizens set great estimation on the police; whoever behaves disrespectfully to the police is adjudged worthy of death."

The increase of professional vagabonds in France causes uneasiness to the professional politicians, and the mayors of communes are asked to be more rigorous towards them. The increase has been greater of late years, owing to the vast number of unemployed. America also clamours for fresh legislation against tramps. Reynolds may include these notes in its next gush re glorious Republican institutions. F. K.

said that the signs of the spread of Socialism among young people are both abundant and striking. This is true; ten years ago the word Socialism was known in this country, even among the "educated" classes knew more about its meaning than Mr. Bradlaugh, Mr. Gladstone, or Admiral Maxse know now. Whereas at present it is fashionable for even the most frivolous and dinner-parties to affect an interest in and knowledge of it, it indicates a wide and deep public interest. This interest is so obvious in literature perhaps than in anything else, quite outside of the propagandist tracts issued by definitely Socialist societies. A certain tincture of Socialism, for instance (generally very watery), is almost a necessary ingredient nowadays in a novel which aims at being at once serious and life-like, while more serious treatment of the subject at the hands of non-Socialists is common enough. In short the golden haze of self-satisfaction and content with the best of all possible societies is rolling away before the sun-heat bred of misery and aspiration, and all people above the lowest level of intelligence (which I take to be low gambling and statesmanship) are looking towards the new development, some timorously, some anxiously, some hopefully.

It seems clear to me that the reception which Mr. Bellamy's 'Looking Backward' has received that there are a great many people who are hopeful in regard to Socialism. I am sure that ten years ago it would have been very little noticed, if at all; whereas now several editions have been sold in America, and it is attracting general attention in England, and to anyone not deeply interested in the social question it could not be at all an attractive book. It is true that it is cast into the form of a romance, but the author states very frankly in his preface that he has only given it this form as a sugar-coating to the pill, and the device of making a man wake up in a new world has now grown so common, and has been done with so much more care and art than Mr. Bellamy has used, that by itself this would have done little for it: it is the serious essay and not the slight envelope of romance which people have found interesting to them.

Since, therefore, both Socialists and non-Socialists have been so much impressed with the book, it seems to me necessary that the Commonweal should notice it. For it is a 'Utopia.' It purports to be written in the year 2000, and to describe the state of society at that period after a gradual and peaceable revolution has realised the Socialism which to us is but in the beginning of its militant period. It requires notice all the more because there is a certain danger in such books as this: a twofold danger; for there will be some temperaments to whom the answer given to the question "How shall we live then?" will be pleasing and satisfactory, others to whom it will be displeasing and unsatisfactory. The danger to the first is that they will accept it with all its necessary errors and fallacies (which such a book must abound in) as conclusive statements of facts and rules of action, which will warp their efforts into futile directions. The danger to the second, if they are but enquirers or very young Socialists, is that they also accepting its speculations as facts, will be inclined to say, "If that is Socialism, we won't help its advent, as it holds out no hope to us."

The only safe way of reading a utopia is to consider it as the expression of the temperament of its author. So looked at, Mr. Bellamy's utopia must be still called very interesting, as it is constructed with due economical knowledge, and with much adroitness; and of course his temperament is that of many thousands of people. This temperament may be called the unmixed modern one, unhistorical and unartistic; it makes its owner (if a Socialist) perfectly satisfied with modern civilisation, if only the injustice, misery, and waste of class society could be got rid of; which half-change seems possible to him. The only ideal of life which such a man can see is that of the industrious professional middle-class men of to-day purified from their crime of complicity with the monopolist class, and become independent instead of being, as they now are, parasitical. It is not to be denied that if such an ideal could be realised, it would be a great improvement on the present society. But can it be realised? It means in fact the alteration of the machinery of life in such a way that all men shall be allowed to share in the fulness of that life, for the production and upholding of which the machinery was instituted. There are clear signs to show us that that very group whose life is thus put forward as an ideal for the future are condemning it in the present, and that they also demand a revolution. The pessimistic revolt of the latter end of this century led by John Ruskin against the philistinism of the triumphant bourgeois, halting and stumbling as it necessarily was, shows that the change in the life of civilisation had begun, before any one seriously believed in the possibility of altering its machinery.

It follows naturally from the author's satisfaction with the best part of modern life that he conceives of the change to Socialism as taking place without any breakdown of that life, or indeed disturbance of it, by means of the final development of the great private monopolies which are such a noteworthy feature of the present day. He supposes that these must necessarily be absorbed into one great monopoly which will include the whole people and be worked for its benefit by the whole people. It may be noted in passing that by this use of the word monopoly he shows unconsciously that he has his mind fixed firmly on the mere machinery of life: for clearly the only part of their system which the people would or could take over from the monopolists would be the machinery of organisation, which monopoly is forced to use, but which is not an essential part of it. The essential of monopoly is, "I warm myself by the fire which you have made, and you (very much the plural) stay outside in the cold."

To go on. This hope of the development of the trusts and rings to which the competition for privilege has driven commerce, especially in America, is the distinctive part of Mr. Bellamy's book; and it seems to me to be a somewhat dangerous hope to rest upon, too uncertain to be made a sheet-anchor of. It may be indeed the logical outcome of the most modern side of commercialism—i.e., the outcome that ought to be; but then there is its historical outcome to be dealt with—i.e., what will be; which I cannot help thinking may be after all, as far as this commercial development is concerned, the recurrence of breaks-up and re-formations of this kind of monopoly, under the influence of competition for privilege, or war for the division of plunder, till the flood comes and destroys them all. A far better hope to trust to is that men having once got it into their heads that true life implies free and equal life, and that is now possible of attainment, they will consciously strive for its attainment at any cost. The economical semi-fatalism of some Socialists is a deadening and discouraging view, and may easily become more so, if events at present unforeseen bring back the full tide of "commercial prosperity"; which is by no means unlikely to happen.

The great change having thus peaceably and fatalistically taken place, the author has to put forward his scheme of the organisation of life; which is organised with a vengeance. His scheme may be described as State Communism, worked by the very extreme of national centralisation. The underlying vice in it is that the author cannot conceive, as aforesaid, of anything else than the machinery of society, and that, doubtless naturally, he reads in to the future of a society, which he tells us is unwastefully conducted, that terror of starvation which is the necessary accompaniment of a society in which two-thirds or more of its labour-power is wasted: the result is that though he tells us that every man is free to choose his occupation and that work is no burden to anyone, the impression which he produces is that of a huge standing army, tightly drilled, compelled by some mysterious fate to unceasing anxiety for the production of wares to satisfy every caprice, however wasteful and absurd, that may cast up amongst them.

As an illustration it may be mentioned that everybody is to begin the serious work of production at the age of twenty-one, work three years as a labourer, and then choose his skilled occupation and work till he is forty-five, when he is to knock off his work and amuse himself (improve his mind, if he has one left him). Heavens! think of a man of forty-five changing all his habits suddenly and by compulsion! It is a small matter after this that the said persons past work should form a kind of aristocracy (how curiously old ideas cling) for the performance of certain judicial and political functions.

Mr. Bellamy's ideas of life are curiously limited; he has no idea beyond existence in a great city; his dwelling of man in the future is Boston (U.S.A.) beautified. In one passage, indeed, he mentions villages, but with unconscious simplicity shows that they do not come into his scheme of economical equality, but are mere servants of the great centres of civilisation. This seems strange to some of us, who cannot help thinking that our experience ought to have taught us that such aggregations of population afford the worst possible form of dwelling-place, whatever the second-worst might be.

In short, a machine-life is the best which Mr. Bellamy can imagine for us on all sides; it is not to be wondered at then that his only idea of making labour tolerable is to decrease the amount of it by means of fresh and ever fresh developments of machinery. This view I know he will share with many Socialists with whom I might otherwise agree more than I can with him; but I think a word or two is due to this important side of the subject. Now surely this ideal of the great reduction of the hours of labour by the mere means of machinery is a futility. The human race has always put forth about as much energy as it could in given conditions of climate and the like, though that energy has had to struggle against the natural laziness of mankind: and the development of man's resources, which has given him greater power over nature, has driven him also into fresh desires and fresh demands on nature, and thus made his expenditure of energy much what it was before. I believe that this will be always so, and the multiplication of machinery will just—multiply machinery; I believe that the ideal of the future does not point to the lessening of men's energy by the reduction of labour to a minimum, but rather to the reduction of pain in labour to a minimum, so small that it will cease to be a pain; a gain to humanity which can only be dreamed of till men are even more completely equal than Mr. Bellamy's utopia would allow them to be, but which will most assuredly come about when men are really equal in condition; although it is probable that much of our so-called "refinement," our luxury—in short, our civilisation—will have to be sacrificed to it. In this part of his scheme, therefore, Mr. Bellamy worries himself unnecessarily in seeking (with obvious failure) some incentive to labour to replace the fear of starvation, which is at present our only one, whereas it cannot be too often repeated that the true incentive to useful and happy labour is and must be pleasure in the work itself.

I think it necessary to state these objections to Mr. Bellamy's utopia, not because there is any need to quarrel with a man's vision of the future of society, which, as above said, must always be more or less personal to himself; but because this book, having produced a great impression on people who are really enquiring into Socialism, will be sure to be quoted as an authority for what Socialists believe, and that, therefore, it is necessary to point out that there are some Socialists who do not think that the problem of the organisation of life and necessary labour can be dealt with by a huge national centralisation, working by a kind of magic for which no one feels himself responsible; that on the contrary it will be necessary for the unit of administration to be small enough for every citizen to feel himself responsible for its details, and be interested in them; that individual men cannot shuffle off the business of life on to the shoulders of an abstraction called the State, but must deal with it in conscious association with each other. That variety of life is as much an aim of true Communism as equality of condition, and that nothing but an union of these two will bring about real freedom. That modern nationalities are mere artificial devices for the commercial war that we seek to put an end to, and will disappear with it. And, finally, that art, using that word in its widest and due signification, is not a mere adjunct of life which free and happy men can do without, but the necessary expression and indispensable instrument of human happiness.

On the other hand, it must be said that Mr. Bellamy has faced the difficulty of economical reconstruction with courage, though he does not see any other sides to the problem, such, e.g., as the future of the family; that at any rate he sees the necessity for the equality of the reward of labour, which is such a stumbling-block for incomplete Socialists; and his criticism of the present monopolist system is forcible and fervid. Also up and down his pages there will be found satisfactory answers to many ordinary objections. The book is one to be read and considered seriously, but it should not be taken as the Socialist bible of reconstruction; a danger which perhaps it will not altogether escape, as incomplete systems impossible to be carried out but plausible on the surface are always attractive to people ripe for change, but not knowing clearly what their aim is.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

INTERNATIONAL SOCIALIST WORKING-MEN'S CONGRESS.

TO THE EDITOR OF Justice.

DEAR COMRADE,—In your issue of June 15—namely, in H. M. Hyndman's article entitled "The International Workers' Congress and the Marxist Clique"—I find it asserted that "both Stepniak and W. Parnell declare in writing that their names were appended to the Marxist circular without their consent." Allow me to say that no such declaration has been made by me and that my name has been appended to the said circular with my full consent.

I was in doubt at one time—and I made no secret of it—whether I have the right of signing such a document, having for obvious reasons no regular mandate from my country. But my scruples have been removed by the secretary of the Organising Commission, who informed me that the Commission will make allowance for the peculiar conditions of countries like Russia—a proceeding which has its precedents in former international congresses, and of which I was very happy to have the benefit. I think that we, the so-called Russian Nihilists, must take every opportunity of showing our solidarity with the great international Socialist movement; and I may be excused, I suppose, for refusing to admit that William Morris, Engels, Lafargue, and Bebel, with the body of German Social-Democratic deputies, have no claim to represent a huge part of this movement.—Yours very truly,

The following further adhesions have been received:—

RUSSIA—For the Russian Social-Democratic Union: Axelrod, Plechenoff, Véra Sazzoulitch.

SWEDEN—For the Social-Democratic Party: Brandtling, Danielson, Palm.

EAST-END CAPMAKERS.—These sweated workers have formed a union on advanced lines, comrade Rochman being elected honorary president. Meets at "Black Swan," Hanbury Street, Spitalfields, every Saturday night. Sixty-three joined at the first meeting, and it is fast growing.

POISONED AT WORK.—In a Nottingham paper is an account of how a workman, Arthur Meakin, died poisoned at his work with nitric acid gas. Arthur Meakin had the job of cleaning out condensing chambers at Old Barford Chemical Works, where the fumes of the gas were strong. He started for his work on Wednesday, June 12th, in his usual health and spirits. He went into the deadly chamber, and on returning home complained to his wife of a pain in his stomach. By 11 o'clock on Thursday morning he was dead. The doctor said he died of congestion of the lungs, which he believed was brought about by his breathing noxious fumes while at work. The coroner, in his charge, of course made it as light as possible for the owners of the chemical works. The man had not taken proper precautions, and so on; but he was forced to admit that the employment was not a "harmless" one, and the jury returned a verdict in accordance with the medical testimony. But what of the system that forces men to risk their lives in poisonous work for a scanty pittance? Murdered by competition should have been the verdict.

MURDEROUS SLAVE-DRIVING IN SHOPS.—At a recent meeting of the Protective Association of Warehouse, Stores, and Shop Assistants, the following tale was told by a speaker, for the accuracy of which he vouched:—"I was in the employ, some years ago, of a man who was a regular slave-driver. There was a young lady who was worn out with work. I have seen her drop down behind the counter, and have carried her out myself twice in one day. Well, one day I saw her looking very white, and I said to her: 'Sit down, you'll drop,' and I brought her a stool, and she sat down. And just then the employer came up and saw her sitting down; and he said, 'We can't have these lazy ways here,' and he kicked away the stool from under her, and she fell on the floor. I saw it myself, and she managed to keep about till the end of the week. She had a widowed mother depending on her; they had nothing but what she earned. And on the Monday morning she was ill, and he mother went up and told her it was time to go to the shop, and she said, 'Shop! Oh, mother, I can't go; I can't do it.' And her mother said: Well, you know what it means if you don't; you'll be turned off, and we shall have nothing.' But then she saw how ill she looked, and she said: 'There lie down a bit again, and I'll come up by and by; never mind if you are late.' And she went up half an hour after and found her lying dead. And that man goes on, and has a large business, and he goes to church on Sundays and hears read our: 'Thou shalt do no murder.' But if ever there was a murderer in the sight of heaven, that man is a murderer."

THE STRENGTH OF TYRAN.

(FROM THE Chartist Circular, 1841.)

The tyrant's chains are only strong
While slaves submit to wear them;
And who could bind them on the throng
Determined not to bear them?
Then clank your chain; e'en though the links
Were light as fashion's feather,
The heart which rightly thinks and feels
Would cast them altogether.

The lords of earth are only great
While others clothe and feed them!
But what were all their pride and state
Should labour cease to heed them?
The swain is higher than a king:
Before the laws of nature
The monarch were a useless thing,
The swain a useful creature.

We toil, we spin, we delve the mine,
Sustaining each his neighbour;
And who can show a right divine
To rob us of our labour?
We rush to battle, bear our lot
In every ill and danger;
And who shall make the peaceful cot
To homely joy a stranger?

erish all tyrants far and near,
Beneath the chains that bind us;
And perish, too, that servile fear
Which makes the slaves they find us.
One grand, one universal claim,
One peal of moral thunder,
One glorious burst in Freedom's name,
And rend our bonds asunder!

CHARLES COLE, A London Mechanic.

A SWAGSMAN'S FAREWELL.

[FROM THE BRISBANE (QUEENSLAND) 'BOOMERANG.']

GENERALLY speaking, when a man leaves a place, perhaps for ever, there is someone in particular to whom he would like to say "Good-bye." Such is not my case; but, not wishing to lack in courtesy, I make my bow, and to all whom it may concern I now say "Farewell."

Yes, after a weary sojourn of six years in this perspiring land of parti-coloured humanity and fervid politics, I feel tired and my soul yearns with a great yearning for that which has been denied me in my pilgrimage here—the boon of steady and fairly remunerative employment. Being only a swagsman, my departure might have passed unnoticed had I not called attention to it; even now that I have done so, nobody perhaps cares. "Only a swagsman," they say, "some idle worthless rascal; good riddance to him!"

I am a meek and lowly-minded man, accustomed to having the finger of scorn pointed at me by justly-incensed squatters and others when, after a day's hard tramp, I have hawked my labour up to their doors and dared to ask for a job. What was I to them but a thing whose grotesque shadow marred the beauty of the landscape and whose fossilised remains future generations might mistake for an extinct species of quadruped with a peculiar hump on its back? Being slow-witted and dull of perception, it took me a long while to tumble to the fact that the Government had imported me when they had no use for me. When the truth did first dawn upon me I gave way to impious anger; wicked words escaped me, and I longed—oh! how I did long—for a private interview with one Professor Bonwick, who had lied unto me. He had told me strange tales of a land of boundless wealth, o'erflowing with milk of human kindness, of trees perpetually laden with luscious fruits, and of honey abounding everywhere—a land where poverty existed not and all mankind were blessed with content and happiness. He spoke not of the Heathen Chinese, the guileless Kanaka, and the wily Cingalese. Neither spoke he of Maltese, Javanese, the amok-running Malay, and the perambulating vendor of miscellaneous articles in silks who hails from Afghanistan. Nay, he said unto me that all men in Queensland were as brothers. He was a facetious man, and dearly loved to have his little joke.

"Young man," he said, "when you arrive in that beautiful land to which you are going, so many people will be awaiting to employ you that you will be somewhat perplexed in deciding for whom you will work." Just so. They are still awaiting, and I was much perplexed. Perhaps they were not advised of my arrival; and though I advertised that I had come, still they came not. Ah, me! After weary waiting they may have given me up. It may be that with thoughtful hearts and careful hands they had cleared out a corner of the old barn for my reception and nailed kerosene tin over the holes where the shingles were shot away in the encounter with the carpet snake, or perhaps they had erected a new fowl-house that I might take possession of the old one and be comfortable therein. It is the terrible uncertainty of who they were that has made me what I am; but I try to console myself with the thought that one day I may find them in that land to which all sooner or later must emigrate, where the unemployed cease from troubling and the swagsman is at rest.

As I before remarked, I am meek and lowly-minded, but once I had a vain desire to possess the privilege of voting at a general election in the country which adopted me and in which I have been as an orphan. Such vanity has passed from me now, and I gaze with fearfulness at a Paternal Government when it says, "Behold, is not the land a big and a fruitful? Come, let us people the land; we will send to Europe where men are overworked and bring them here where there is nothing to do, and to them that desire it we will give an ant-hill and a dried-up waterhole for a homestead that they abide in the land. When the men whom they have brought out have dwelt awhile in the land and waxed lean on idleness, then they lift up the voice of ingratitude against their benefactors, and speak scornfully of them which sit in high places."

Why do they rage? Have they not, like other distinguished visitors, received free railway passes to the furthest extremity of a line which was not built with a sordid view to paying expenses, that their eyes might behold that Western Paradise whose joys are as a sealed book to them who have not been there? A wise and far-seeing Government heeds them not, but, regardless of personal expense and self-sacrifice, still carries on the noble work of populating this colony and her next neighbour; the penny daily advertisers jubilantly declare each new batch of immigrants finer than the last; the planter hums the glad refrain, "sugar's up and labour's down"; the squatter has sweet visions of a trip to Europe and cheap rouseabouts; the pawnbroker heaves the sigh of satisfaction as he trades a billy-can for the new chum's last garment of respectability and takes care of his watch for a consideration. The moon-faced heathen alone casts the oblique eye of alarm at the latest importation of mean whites, fearing lest they infringe on his prerogative of cabbage-growing; but his celestial countenance quickly assumes its wonted expression of blind serenity as he notes them slowly drifting away—he knows not where, nor cares either, so long as they do not jump his claim.

Amidst this universal joy I am sad, and meditatively I wend my way to the depôt, and, drawing near to a little group of chummies, I hear a suppressed growl of "I ain't agoing to work for ten bob a-week and cook my own grub." Another chips in, "You're lucky to get a chance at all; nobody's been to hire me yet!" While another exclaims, "I'll go to Sydney if I can, or else join the Salvation Army—they might get a fellow a job!" Like "reminiscences of the ruins of Pompeii" comes gently stealing o'er me the memory of a day when I was Bonwicked too, and choking back the sob of exceeding great sympathy, I turn to my mate and exclaim, with sorrowful emphasis, "Why, oh why, was I brought out here?"

"Ask me something hard an' I'll tell you," says he. "You was brought here, like these chaps is, so as where there is work for only one man there shall be twenty to apply for it, and the cheapest gets the job! You was brought here so as rich shareholders in big shipping companies should make a profit out of you! You was brought here to make rich men richer and poor men poorer, and so as big-bugs could get their friends fat billets in the immigration apartments! You was brought here to wear your soul-case out while the Pharisees [he meant parasites] of society gets fat on your hide! If you want to know, you was brought here to do another man out of his job or make him work cheaper! You fat-headed old duffer! you was brought out here like being put in pawn—so as they could borrow money on you and make their bloomin' piles the quicker; and the sooner you and me gets out of this the better, or we'll soon be working for nothing a-week and find our own tucker!"

I catch on. Legislation is a game limited to a few players, but pans out well to the holders of a hand. Honesty is a bad card to play, but the immigration trick is the "joker" of the pack—it scoops the pool every time. The players have a high old time, but God help their victims—the hundreds of poor wretches who this day are wandering throughout the length and breadth of the colony in aimless fashion like lost sheep. To them it means starvation, the desolation of despair. And so Queensland, thou happy exploiting ground of the syndicate and capitalist, to thee and all the halo of romance with which humbug and the fertile imagination of the well-paid lecturer have enriched thee, I bid farewell! I go to a land bigger in population though smaller in area than thou art, and whose wise Government never borrowed a single penny to misspend on Free or Assisted Immigration.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"SEAFARING."

SIR,—I notice a rather injudicious letter in your last from Mr. Reid, the local secretary of the National Seamen's Union at Hull. I term it injudicious because it is opposed to all good government of an organisation, that matters under the control of the central body should be taken up by local officials. I have every respect for Mr. Reid as an earnest and indefatigable worker in the cause, but he needs to temper his zeal with judgment. Had he done so on this occasion, I am persuaded that it would have appeared to him more orderly to have sent his complaint against Seafaring to the Executive Committee of the Union than to have rushed into print with it.

However, as Mr. Reid has delivered himself, he needs a reply. He asks "Has Mr. Cowie been deceiving us?" For my own part I cannot see how he has, for at the Conference of Seamen, held at Sunderland in March last, over which I had the honour of presiding, when the agreement was come to about Seafaring I asked Mr. Cowie whether the paper was printed at a union establishment, as I felt, and still feel, strongly on that point. His reply was in the negative, and he stated that his arrangements with the present firm were such that he could not make a change for awhile. I then impressed upon him the necessity for making the change as quickly as possible, which I understood he would do. What the arrangements were I felt to be no part of my business. It may, however, be the duty of the Executive of the Union to inquire, and for my part I hope they will; but as for Mr. Cowie deceiving the Union it is a grave charge, and knowing that he has done no such thing I feel it my duty to pen these few lines in his defence, though I hope he will not delay in having the desired change effected.—Yours truly,

W. FOREMAN.

ANARCHY AND COMMUNISM.

AN ANSWER TO W. MORRIS.

SIR,—I was very much interested in the perusal of comrade Morris's letter in Commonweal for May 18th, on the subject of Anarchism and Communism, and like him I am only desirous of noting down a few thoughts suggested by reading his letter. "I will begin by calling myself a Communist," says our comrade, "and have no wish to qualify that word by joining any other to it." I, on the other hand, call myself an Anarchist-Communist, and have no wish to separate the two words, as I think they fully convey the meaning I wish to give them; nor do I see how either word is modified by the other as Morris contends.

First, I am an Anarchist because I will admit of no compulsion of man over man—because I would be free; and freedom cannot obtain where there is compulsion arising from authority.

Secondly, I am a Communist because the communal system seems to me to be capable of affording the best opportunities of association and facilities for co-operation.

Large towns are necessarily unhealthy, and their replacement by small communes sufficiently far apart to admit of tracts of country between each commune, would not only bring us back to health, but would afford every opportunity to till the land lying, as it were, at our very doors. The coupling of the two words, then, do not modify each other, since the word anarchy has reference to the political status of the people, while the word commune has reference to their grouping and geographical arrangement.

It is possible, for instance, to introduce the communal system under capitalism, and if so it clearly has no modifying effect on the anarchistic state of society. Again, it is possible to introduce Anarchy without the intervention of the communal system.

"The aim of Communism," says our comrade, "seems to me to be the complete equality of condition for all people." And then he goes on to show that anything which falls short of this "complete equality" is a sham to be guarded against. There can be no mistaking his claim for real equality; even "its ethics have to be based on the recognition of natural cause and effect, and not on rules derived from a priori ideas of the relation of man to the universe or some imagined ruler of it; and from these two things, the equality of condition and the recognition of the cause and effect of material nature, will grow all Communistic life."

Now this explanation of the "new order" as he sees it, is as wide and as generous as the most ardent Anarchist could desire, and I entirely fail to see how it differs in any essential particulars from the declaration of principles agreed to by our Spanish comrades at Valencia. The only difference that I am able to discover between Morris and our Spanish comrades is that while the five clauses in their declaration bear out and explain each other, Morris's definition of Communism is contradicted in his attempts to explain it.

I now come to the kernel of the whole question. Anarchist-Communists assert that while there is authority there can be no freedom. Morris contends that "if freedom from authority means the assertion of the advisability or possibility of an individual man doing what he pleases always and under all circumstances, this is an absolute negation of Society, and makes Communism as the highest expression of Society impossible." As I have already said, I regard the communal system as the best means at present understood of dividing the people into groups, but the communal system is not itself necessarily Socialistic. The communal system is in existence in France, Switzerland, and Russia, and in these three countries capitalism reigns supreme.

The Anarchist seek freedom through individual liberty by affirming the sovereignty of the individual, whose liberty can only be restricted by the like claim for liberty on the part of others. But "when you begin to qualify this assertion of the right to do as you please by adding 'as long as you don't interfere with other people's rights to do the same,' the exercise of some kind of authority becomes necessary," says Morris. I became quite anxious to know what that authority was to be, and to my disappointment I read the following explanation: "If individuals are not to coerce others, there must somewhere be an authority which is prepared to coerce them not to coerce; and that authority must clearly be collective." I regret that our comrade did not more clearly define this "collective action." The only solution I can imagine to this "collective authority" is the rule of the majority, which is "the tyranny of the strongest," of which there is no more bitter opponent than comrade Morris himself.

It seems to me, however, assuming I have interpreted his meaning correctly, that this argument finds justification in the alleged imperfection of man—a proposition with which Socialists of every grade are quite familiar and I cannot refrain here from noticing the identity of the line of argument along which this argument runs, whether it is advanced by Morris or our most implacable opponent. Surely our comrade must have conceded that man is imperfect by nature, this imperfectly equally to those who are called on to govern as to those who are governed. To say that the majority are to direct the government no way out of the difficulty; and to give imperfect men the power to govern others for no other reason than that all men are imperfect, see, say the least, to be the height of illogic and unwisdom on the part of who reason from this point of view.

That we must submit to coercion in order to be free, as comrade Morris, reminds me of the proverbial square circle, of which there has never appeared a solution. I am also at a loss to discover how the "due opportunity free to everyone for the satisfaction of his needs" can obtain in a society where there is the exercise of coercion by the gentle and wise majority.

We are asked, too, not to forget "the necessary, and beneficent variety of temperament" which exists in men; and indeed we do not forget it; on the contrary, it is ever present in the mind of the Anarchist, simply because he is an Anarchist. He sees the variety of disposition in men, and knows that this variety cannot be destroyed or governed; hence his claim for the liberty of the individual, which can only exist in society wherein there is no rule of individuals over others—in short, where there is "due opportunity free to everyone for the satisfaction of his needs."

On the question of how differences of opinion are to be settled, comrade Morris assures us that we should have to submit to authority, because "in such matters there must be give and take." With this last sentence I am in entire agreement with him. But I am not in agreement with him when he calls a mutual agreement the exercise of authority. Indeed the illustration of twelve men who are not in agreement with each other, but in the interest of the project in hand agree to sink certain differences—"give and take"—without the pressure of any outside authority, seems to me to be fatal to the position taken up by our comrade in this connection. What he has succeeded in giving a clear illustration to, is not the intervention of the exercise of authority in the settlement of different opinions, but a clear case of voluntary organisation—i.e., the Anarchist ideal, wherein authority does not enter; "that is," to use the words of our comrade, "the conscience of association voluntary accepted in the first instance." (The italics are mine.)

I do not forget the complexity of men's natures, nor do I deny the variety of their moods, but I do deny the right of "Philip sober" to rule the actions of "Philip drunk," however obnoxious that individual may be.

Now I am in entire agreement with our comrade when he points out the existence of the moral conscience lying somewhere beneath the skin of every man (Philip drunk not excepted), and without which there can be no true society. It seems to me that in order to secure the widest operation of this inherent moral quality, society should be so constituted as to draw out and develop this aspiration, by affording each individual the means of satisfying his physical and mental needs, without the repression springing from any foreign agent restricting, by rule of force, the due development of men's desires and inclinations.

But it is vain for our comrade to tell us that he does not plead "for any form of arbitrary or unreasonable authority," while he justifies the rule of the majority. Besides, anything to which I cannot agree, to me at least is unreasonable; and if I am compelled to submit to the dictates of others, I become the victim of "arbitrary and unreasonable authority."

I notice that our comrade asks for the least possible exercise of authority, which betrays his dislike to it, and when he wrote this last demand his "moral conscience" beneath his skin was evidently pricking him; and it is quite evident, also, that when authority has for ever departed we shall not find comrade Morris among the mourners.

H. DAVIS.

William Morris, in continuing the discussion initiated by comrade Blackwell, says, "When you begin to qualify this assertion of the right to do as you please by adding 'as long as you don't interfere with other people's rights to do the same,' the exercise of some kind of authority becomes necessary." If by "authority" comrade Morris merely means, what also he thinks the Communist-Anarchists mean, a public conscience, I, individually, should have no objection to his statement. But in these discussions the word should, I think, be given a more restricted meaning. It should mean, in my opinion, the authority of compulsory representative institutions, such as parliaments, county and municipal councils, school boards, etc. With this meaning I should deny the necessity for the exercise of authority.

Very clearly there are two kinds of association, the voluntary and the compulsory; exemplified, the one by trade unions and the other by government, whether representative or otherwise; the one supported by voluntary contributions, the other by rates and taxes, neither more nor less than a compulsory service rendered to those who have the power to compel it. Of these two forms of association it is necessary, I think, to make a choice. The society of the future must be either of one or the other. If completely free, then it seems absurd to advocate parliamentary methods for its realisation. Our business should be to begin the destruction of the compulsory kind of association at once in all its forms; to withdraw from elections and to rely solely upon voluntary association for the realisation of a completely voluntary society. This free association is the only guarantee of the due observance of our equal liberty, now as in the future, and much might be done to hasten the advent of Anarchy, which is the final hope of even the State Socialists themselves, by a greater insistence on the rigid observance of this principle under existing conditions, and none the less because they are economically bad. Taking this course, we may reasonably hope that by the time all forms of compulsion, economic and political, which are at present the all-important ones, are ended, the William Morris of the future will not be called upon to endure the uglinesses of an excess of utilitarianism.

ANARCHIST.

NEWCASTLE RAILWAY MEN.—A large and enthusiastic demonstration was held at Newcastle Town Moor, on Sunday, by the railway men of the North Eastern Railway Company. The North-Eastern is a prosperous line; it pays six and a-quarter dividend, and its shares now stand at 173. The demonstration was held to advocate the following demands:—(1) That a ten hours per day system shall be the maximum for men in all departments. (2) That each day shall stand by itself. (3) That all overtime shall be paid at the rate of time and a-quarter, and Sunday duty at time and a-half. (4) That six days shall constitute a week's work. (5) That as far as practicable, promotion should be by seniority in all grades of the service. These are moderate enough in all conscience, and the men really ought to obtain them.

LABOUR STRUGGLE.

is distinguished from most strikes among English workers by its dramatic incidents. The telegrams speak of determined action on the part of the men, who show no signs of faltering. At Liverpool last Wednesday men paraded the streets and hooted vigorously the offices of the Anchor Line Co., which has always been one of the bitterest opponents of the seamen. The Seamen's Union has issued a notice threatening to expel any man from the society who may sign without permission of the union, even if the union wages are given, until all the masters concede the demand. This order has been made to compel all steamship owners to give the advance. The companies are forced to lay up their steamers, and one of them, the Cork Steamship Co., has invoked the power of the law in revenge for this action on the part of the union, by applying for summonses against eleven sailors and firemen, who had refused to proceed in their steamship Sheldrak. Of course the summonses were granted.

Good news comes the same day from Glasgow. Our readers know that the dockmen have joined the sailors and firemen in their strike. The Anchor Line engaged a hundred men in London to take the place of these labourers by the means of lying misrepresentation, so common with that ignoble beast of prey the capitalist. These poor men were told that the strike was practically over, and that during its continuance so many dockmen had left the harbour that there was not a sufficient number left to carry out the work. Directly they heard from the pickets the truth of the matter, all but two of them threw up their work, declining to aid the company in enslaving their fellows. A hundred men from Dundee also refused to work when they knew the circumstances of the case, and after eating a hearty meal at the union offices, returned home. Let none of us despair; this noble, this magnificent action on the part of those who have been the most ground down into the mire of poverty by the brutal system of to-day, shall inspire the most hopeless of us with renewed hope and courage. Remember these men, who prefer suffering the torture of hunger to aiding in trampling down their fellows, have given a proof of quiet heroism which should inspire all of us with renewed ardour in the great battle we are fighting.

At Dundee intense excitement prevails among the seamen, and the dock-labourers are also on strike. The men have assumed a most determined attitude. Several steamers are lying there without crews, but in some cases advanced wages have been given and the vessels have cleared the port.

On Thursday the men again paraded the streets at Liverpool, drawing with them a lorry, in the centre of which were two men dressed in white with red caps. Both were manacled, and represented white slaves. A little girl stood for Liberty, and sitting round the lorry were a number of men dressed in sailors' clothes and pretending to be in the throes of sea-sickness. These symbolised "dry-land sailors," the rats who had taken the place of the men on strike. The door of the Sailors' Home, which has been used as a crimping den by the capitalists, was placarded by an unknown hand with the words "The White-Slave Market."

Glasgow harbour was paraded on Thursday by 6,000 dock-labourers, to overawe men who wished to work on the ships. Whilst a van laden with beds and mattresses was going to the Anchor Line sheds, it was stopped, and its contents taken out and burned. The men threatened to throw the van into the water. The Seamen's Union has given £500 to the Labourers' Union. It is good to see that not only do the sailors and dockmen recognise the common brotherhood of labour, but they are also learning how "to put fear into the hearts of their enemies."

At Liverpool the next day the sailors and firemen stormed the Sailors' Home, where the masters were enlisting rats, and drove them from their holes. These animals made a hasty exit before the furious crowd of men. Despite the superintendent of the Mercantile Marine, who warned them against such "lawless proceedings," they refused to budge an inch, and declared their intention of not allowing a single rat to sign. They held the place till driven out by force by a strong body of police. They had to let the rats sneak by the back door. The shipowners of the ports between Hull and Berwick are forming a masters' association to fight the union. The Clyde shipowners have also formed another for the "legal" intimidation of their rebellious men. Five labourers have been arrested, charged with frightening rats. They have been liberated on bail.

The strike was continued at Liverpool on Saturday, and after the rebellious proceedings of the day before, the Mercantile Marine offices were guarded by extra police. Several of the leaders made speeches exhorting the strikers to hold out. From one end of the Mariners' Parade—a private passage alongside the Sailors' Home buildings—to the other a chalk line had been drawn, the words "Sailors this side" written on one side, and the word "Scabs" on the other. Of course in the presence of the strikers none dared to go on the scab side. A sailor has been fined 40s. for assaulting a scab, and the representative of law-'n'-order intimated that if a similar case came before him he should inflict a term of imprisonment without the option of a fine. The Clyde seamen, engineers, and firemen hold out bravely, despite the suffering caused by the length of the strike. The masters are importing large numbers of rats, though some of the men they have lured there under false pretences have thrown up their work. Several men have been arrested for "intimidation." So the battle goes on.

On Monday the news arrived that the strikers at Liverpool are daily becoming bolder. Despite the extra force of police, they have charged and routed a large number of rats. Matters are getting warm for these vermin, so warm that the shipowners are talking of placing a floating boarding-house for them in the river, to keep them safe and cool. In reply to some officials of the Board of Trade, the masters have stated that they were willing to grant the terms demanded by the men, but would submit to no "dictation" on the part of the union. How kind, how obliging! I wonder if they would have been so kind if the men had not got a union?

There was very little variation in the seamen's strike at Liverpool on Tuesday. The great steamship companies keep up their ring against the men, and have now been joined by the Inman Line, which has hitherto been favourable to the strikers. About 300 boiler-scalers have come out, in the hope of assisting the sailors. Three men have been sent to prison—two for a month and one for fourteen days—for assaulting scabs. Law-'n'-order has carried out its threat, and once more shown itself as the steady friend of capital.

Here is a little joke from Scotland: "The Clyde shipowners have addressed a memorial to the Home Secretary, drawing his attention to speeches made by Messrs. Cunninghame Graham and Keir Hardie, which they describe as inflammatory. The memorial states that matters are becoming serious.

Excited crowds patrol the streets, and violent and exciting speeches are made by the agitators. The Government are urged to take steps to protect the lives and property of those threatened." It appears that Keir Hardie and Cunninghame Graham have urged the strikers to take strong measures if necessary; and while the capitalists do not mind a wholesale massacre if by it they could drive the men back to their work, yet they have a strong objection to a brickbat if it comes too near their own precious persons. The battle is a desperate one, but the men may still conquer if they continue with the firm courage they have hitherto displayed.

The following is by an eye-witness of the seamen's strike: "If you want to find out the proper place for certain misplaced individuals, there is nothing like an emergency foreign to their experience for 'sizing' them. Last week, at the Broomielaw, Glasgow, a shipowner may have been seen working side by side with a returned convict. The puzzle there would be to find out the criminal. The struggle of the seamen and dock labourers against Moneybags still continues, the latter occasionally inducing men to come from a distance on false pretences, and the former waylaying and inducing their fellow-workmen to leave off work. Last week a dozen seamen who refused to work unless at the union rates were landed from Liverpool by a Clyde tug at Barremman Pier, on the Gareloch, and the men had not pennies enough on them to pay pier dues. The tug also went away without paying its dues. At a meeting of the labourers, on Saturday, Mr. McGhee criticised the remedy for low wages as laid down by Mrs. Elder (late of the firm which made the late Sir William Pearce a millionaire) in her Book of Cookery, and cited an instance where a penny bone with two gallons of water is given as a recipe for working men's wives to adopt in making a dinner where there is a large family. "Why," he asked "should the shipbuilders of Fairfield and the shipowners of Glasgow be allowed to scrape off the beef and throw the bone to the workers?" And echo answers why? yet still the same old game goes on with all classes of masters and men.

The Tram Slaves.

We are pleased to see that the Glasgow tram men have gained a victory which has been won like most victories by the courage and determination of the rank and file. Last Monday a large public meeting was held, which was addressed among others by Cunninghame Graham, who pointed out that "the tramway horses only worked four hours, and they were regarded as of a great more value than intelligent British workmen. The Glasgow Tramway Company paid 10 per cent., but that 10 per cent. was to shareholders like eating human flesh and drinking human blood." Throughout the meeting there were loud shouts of "Strike!" That little word, that very little but significant word, has had a good effect upon the directors, for a few days afterwards we hear that the masters have granted the reduction of hours demanded.

We wish the London men showed the same spirit. They must have learnt by this time that though they have shown, what milk-and-water politicians would call "a commendable moderation," yet it has profited them little. Even the gracious patronage of Conservative and Moderate Liberal M.P.'s, intent on vote-catching, doesn't prevent the men being sacked wholesale for the crime of "intimidating the directors" by presenting petitions and collecting union money. This fearful criminality is doubtless not sufficiently punished, in the opinion of these gentry, by the bitter starvation of these men and their families. These modern tyrants of capitalistic feudality would doubtless like to hang, draw, and quarter their wretched victims; but let me ask one question, "What becomes of your boasted freedom, Englishmen, when you can be turned into the streets to starve if you dare lift your voices complaining of the hardness of your lot?"

One tale is quite sufficient to illustrate the damnable tyranny of these modern slave-drivers. I clip this extract from the Star, which has done excellent service in fighting the cause of these men. Let Conductor Eke tell his own story:—"I was, he said, "a member of the deputation to the manager. This morning there was a number of men—eight—called to the office. A foreman was asked if he intended to stick to the Union, and he said he did. Then he was told that he must not intimidate the other men. When I went in, they said, 'Well, Eke, you have given us a lot of trouble lately!'—'I don't know in what way I have caused trouble.' Then Eke told how he had, for five days out of eight, worked 17 hours from the Deptford yard. Of that 14 hours was on the car, two relief, and one the time taken in going from and returning home. Col. Davidson told him, "You had better get your papers and go and work for some one else." There's another criminal offence for you, "going on a deputation to the manager," and yet there is no slavery in England! You are all free labourers, workmen!

The tram slaves should take courage. They have many to back them up, besides a host of M.P.'s at their back. They have now gained the valuable assistance of Mr. George Shipton, secretary of the London Trades' Council, with all his "blushing honours" gathered in the sugar bounty agitation "thick upon him." George holds forth in the following manner: "You may assure drivers and conductors employed on the London tramway systems of our earnest sympathy in their efforts to emancipate themselves from the hardships of their daily life. You have only to show a spirit of determination to organise in a solid trade union for the defence of your labour interests to ensure the practical as well as the material assistance of the 25,949 workmen who constitute our trades' council. It is imperative that the first step is to form and consolidate your union. The remedies for your just grievances will speedily follow, but unless you are well organised all your advantages, gained in a temporary enthusiasm, will soon be filched back by a remorseless system of capitalistic greed. Your cause is a just one, and if your men are faithful to themselves and their future they are ultimately sure to achieve an effectual and brilliant success."

That's good. "Capitalistic greed" is good. I suppose, however, that sugar capitalists were exceptions to the general rule, and that is why George lent them his ungrudging and unqualified support.

Meanwhile we earnestly recommend the advice of Mr. George Shipton to the tramway men. Organisation and determination will alone enable them to gain the victory, and not the gracious patronage of M.P.'s and noble lords who want to revive their waning popularity. Let them take courage. If they have that very Conservative body, the London Trades' Council, upon their side, they can surely depend upon the practical and material assistance of the other London workers. Let any more tyranny on the part of their slave-drivers be met by a strike—a general strike. The people will take good care that no cars manned by "scabs" shall pass through the popular districts, and their tyrants will quickly show, instead of their present bullying brutality, the most ignoble cowardice.

REPORTS.

LONDON OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.—Kilburn, Canterbury Road—Brookes and Charles spoke here to a small but attentive and sympathetic audience; 8 Weal sold. Wood Green, Jolly Butcher's Hill—Rather a long and interesting meeting; some little discussion and opposition; Brookes and Blundell spoke. Victoria Park—An exceptionally good meeting on Sunday, which was kept going until 7.30, and addressed by Davis, McCormack, Cores, and Hicks; some opposition offered by a converted Jew on behalf of Christianity; good sale of papers. Regents Park—Good meeting on Sunday, addressed by Hill and Nicoll; collected 4s. 2d., and sale of Weal and pamphlets good.

MITCHAM.—A large meeting held on the Fair Green; a Christian foreman was very much upset at disparaging remarks upon the sacred memories of Shaftesbury and S. Morley, peer and capitalist; good sale of Commonweal.—F. K.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting was held at Latimer Road at 11 a.m.; speakers were McCorde, Humphries (S.D.F.), Lynes, sen., and Dean; choir sang "Street Music" by Burrows. A good meeting held at William Street at 11.30; speakers were Tochatti, Mrs. Schack, Lynes, jun., Lynes, sen., and Crouch. At 7.30 p.m., we held a good meeting at Archer Street, Westbourne Grove; Lynes, sen., Maughan, Dean, Crouch, and Saint spoke; 86 Commonweal sold, and collected 5s. 3d.

STREATHAM.—An audience of 300 gathered at the Fountain, High Street, and listened attentively to an address by Kitz; Commonweal sold well. Next Sunday evening, at 7.30 prompt, we shall occupy our new station on the Common. The Streatham comrades will please turn up and help to start the meeting.—J. C.

ST. GEORGES' EAST.—The members turn up well at branch meetings, and it has been decided to open discussions after business is finished to bring out new speakers, as it is known we have latent talent among the members. A splendid meeting at Leman Street on Sunday morning, Davis and McCormack giving each an excellent address; 20 Commonweal sold, besides other literature.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 10th, a lecture by Patrick Geddes on "The Conditions of Progress" was read and discussed. At Woodside on Friday night, Cooper, Duncan, and Leatham addressed a meeting chiefly composed of outdoor workers.

LEEDS.—Our meetings last Sunday were a great success. Our ideas are permeating the workers to a large extent, as is proved by our large and interested audiences. Paylor, Maguire, and Hill spoke with great effect, urging upon the people the necessity of organisation, and deploring the fact that 200 "scab" workers have gone to Glasgow to take the places of the seamen on strike. We are making arrangements for a large demonstration in July.—A. M.

LEICESTER.—Proctor, of Nottingham, lectured here in the open air twice on Sunday last. Our Russell Square lecture was on "The Eight Hours' Movement." The attendance was moderate. In the evening, in Humberstone Gate, the lecture was on "Poverty: its Cause and Cure." The audience was much larger, and testified their satisfaction with the lecturer by their applause. No opposition was offered. 3s. 3d. worth of literature sold.—T. P. B.

MANCHESTER.—At Middleton, on Saturday night, Marshall and Baillie addressed the usual meeting. On Sunday afternoon a good meeting in Stevenson Square was addressed by Ritson, Barton, Marshall, and Parkinson. On Chester Road, at night, Barton, Marshall, and Baillie spoke to a fair audience. At Holt Town we held a meeting on Monday night.

NORWICH.—On Sunday last comrade Samuels (London) paid us a visit, and addressed a successful meeting in the afternoon; audience very attentive; Samuels delivered a capital address. In the evening another good meeting was held in the open air; Darley opened the meeting; Samuels spoke at some considerable length, followed by Poynts; a number of questions were put to Samuels by a respectable in the crowd, and they were satisfactorily answered. Good sale of Commonweal.

YARMOUTH.—We held three meetings here on Sunday. In the morning comrade Samuels gave a very interesting address on "The Evolution of Society." Comrade Moore, of Norwich, followed. In the afternoon and evening, Ruffeld, Moore, and Reynolds spoke. 3s. 10½d. was collected, and sixteen Commonweals sold.—C. R.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro Street, Saturday June 15th, J. A. Cree lectured on "Methods of Propaganda." A good discussion ensued, considerable discussion ensued, considerable difference with the opinions of the lecturer being expressed. King, Toomey, Smith, Frizelle, and Hamilton spoke.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—The club is progressing satisfactorily, both financially and numerically, and the work has necessitated an increase in the number of Commonweals taken. Open-air meeting in Market Square on Sunday, when Rooke, Peacock, and Hickling spoke to a large audience. Commonweals sold well.—R. F.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE right of asylum is threatened in Switzerland; nay it seems pretty much as if it had come to an end, since Switzerland is so completely between the pincers of the great absolutist tyrannies. "Grief in your neighbours' garth is grief at your own door," says an old proverb of the North; so we may well look at home to see what is likely to happen here in case any spy-supported absolutist government finds it convenient to pick a quarrel with Great Britain. Truth to say, it seems improbable that there will be a recurrence of the indignation which the Bonapartist colonels stirred up here which cost the popular Palmerston his place. There is no doubt as to what the Tories and Liberals would say and do, judging by the reactionary Standard and shabby-respectable Daily News. Let us hope the Star really represents the opinions of the Radicals in this matter, and that they will remember their old traditions.

To make the world not only a prison, but an utterly hopeless prison, is the great ambition of these tyrants. After all, they are not likely to advance their ends by attacking what even political Radicals must think the very elements of liberty. They will find that the sweep of their net is too wide, and that their miraculous draught of fishes will make a hole in it.

A citizen complained of a nuisance, in the form of a stink, in a police-court the other day, and the whole subject was thought to be very funny, the magistrate (Mr. Plowden) leading off the laughter. We cannot tell from the report what the merits of this particular case might be; but we do know that a neighbourhood may be stunk out without a legal nuisance being established, which is indeed ridiculous enough, though not more ridiculous than most of our law. Perhaps the magistrate and his audience were laughing at English law in general. Or perhaps they thought it a preposterous joke that a well-to-do citizen should make a fuss about commerce annoying him with a mere stink when it murders so many poor people day by day. No doubt this is a joke, but I can't laugh at it. There is another explanation, which is that these laughers were such dullards that they had no conception that people might possibly restrain commerce so as to allow people to live decent lives. That also is no laughing matter.

W. M.

We don't care for commercial advertisements as a rule, but here is one that really merits some attention from us. We give it in full:

"THE UNEMPLOYED IN EAST LONDON.—At a time when much thought is being given to this matter, a practical suggestion may be of service. Last year more than £300,000 worth of foreign matches were purchased by inconsiderate consumers in this country, to the great injury of our own working people, so true is it that 'evil is wrought by want of thought, as well as want of heart.' If all consumers would purchase Bryant and May's matches, that firm would be enabled to pay £1,000 a-week more in wages."

One would have thought it would be no great hardship to our working people not to be employed by Bryant and May; and for our part we prefer the "evil wrought by the want of thought" than by the want of heart displayed by certain pious dividend-grabbing firms and their shareholders. Let us look at the great benefit bestowed upon the workers. If you spend £300,000 a-year upon Bryant and May, they will give their workers £52,000, and reckoning £48,000 for manufacturing expenses, the rest, £200,000 will go into the pockets of the dividend grabbers. All working people anxious to benefit Bryant and May's shareholders please buy their matches of that excellent firm. We will charge them nothing for this advertisement.

Last week appeared a short note in the Commonweal concerning the death of Arthur Meakin, poisoned while at work for his master at Nottingham with nitric acid gas.

Now it appears, according to an article and some correspondence that appeared in the Daily News, that an invention has been patented by a well-known inventor, M. Fleuss, by which all risk of such deaths could be guarded against. This invention, though admirable in every way, and not too expensive, has not found the slightest patronage among the capitalist classes. There is no money to be made out of it. It would only save the insignificant lives of working-men, and that is not necessary. Should a workman be "carried off" by poisonous fumes, it is easy enough under the present beneficent system of commercial competition to find another to take his place. His death would only reduce the surplus population, and by lessening the number of the unemployed, who are likely in the near future to become dangerous, be a positive benefit to the "respectable classes."

These are your masters, workmen. These people with religion and humanity upon their lips, and the bitterest cruelty and hatred of their victims, the slaves of their splendour, in their hearts. They will not spend a single penny in an invention for saving human life, but let it be a machine for turning men in crowds upon the street, and desolating hundreds of homes by driving the wives of the workmen to prostitution and their children to beggary, while at the same time it fills the pockets of the employers with stolen wealth, then out come their guineas, and the capitalist rubs his hands gleefully at the prospect of riches which this invention will shower upon him.

Mr. John Morley surpassed himself in the House on Tuesday night. This "modern Radical," this philosophical prater of the worn-out cant of the Manchester school, did not alone trot out the dead doctrines of which he is truly a disciple, but took occasion to insult Cunninghame Graham in a phrase full of the sneering snobbery so common among the "educated" middle classes. Why, a plain rough workman from the forge or the mill could not be guilty of such a piece of sneaking insult as that conveyed in the phrase "professional philanthropist." Luckily the insult falls back upon the mean politician who used it. Who are "professional philanthropists" but Mr. Morley and the party of which he is a representative. The worst of it is, they never get beyond the "professional" part of the business, and the people are pretty sick of that, as Mr. Morley will soon find out.

They talk of the encouragement which the present society gives to the inventor. Here is an example, a notice issued by a railway company which has found its way into the pages of the Railway Review, from which I take it. I give it in full:

Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway,
Engineer's Office, Manchester, June 4th, 1889.

Circular.

INVENTIONS BY OFFICERS AND SERVANTS OF THE COMPANY.

The directors have ordered that, in the event of patents being taken out by officers or servants of the company, the company is at liberty to use the inventions free of charge, unless the directors should, in any special case, decide otherwise.

Please sign and return to me the attached form, stating that you agree to these terms. WILLIAM HUNT, Chief Engineer.

Isn't this charming. Those who read 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' will remember that one of the most flagrant abuses of the old slave system arose from the fact, that any invention created by the ingenuity and intelligence of the slave was not his own property but that of his master. The directors of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway seem to be of an opinion that the slave system is still in full force. Perhaps they are not far wrong, especially in respect to their own line.

Slave-driving has always been common with railway companies, but it strikes the present writer as a perfect marvel of avaricious greed that a Lancashire mill-owner, who in the good old days worked little children to death to fill his pockets, might envy; to be not content by sweating a man for 14 or 16 hours a-day, but even to claim any invention that he might make during his "leisure."

Those people who believe in the moralisation of capitalists, might find a field for their exertions among the directors of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway. They will have their work cut out for them.

THE PRIMROSE LEAGUE AND THE WORKING CLASSES.

WE hear a great deal just now of the energy, the progress, and the great services of the Primrose League. No one doubts the energy of the different Habitations, whether in urban or rural districts, and none can deny the wisdom they display in utilizing so largely the services of the female element in their work of propaganda. Like the Church of Rome, they know the value of female energy—of female devotion. When ladies of rank, as they are termed, are prepared to go from house to house and chat and shake hands with the wives and daughters of the working classes, such propaganda is not to be despised—it must be recognised. It is a danger not to be lost sight of. It is a force, a power, that must be combatted, and by similar means. We may laugh at it, but an organization that numbers its tens of thousands—over one hundred and thirty thousand enrolled members—cannot be ignored.

Let us, then, look at the kind of propaganda carried on by the dames of the Primrose League. In one of their magazines (June, 1888) we have a kind of programme, officially put forth, on page 1. There we are told that: "The principles and objects of the Primrose League are practically identical with those of the Tory Party." No thinking person ever doubted it; but there are many among the working classes who believe the principles and objects of the Primrose League to be something very different from those of the Tory Party—something far in advance of the old Tory rule.

But the very next sentence is a most remarkable one. It is, "The Tory party is the party of the people." What an astounding statement! What! The party of plunder; the party of blood, of rapine and murder, the wide world over? The party of oppression, of cold blooded massacres, through all the regions of the earth? The party of despotism in all its nakedness, of tyranny in every shape and form, the party of the people? What a monstrous perversion of historical fact; what a wilful misrepresentation of principle. Nevertheless, there are many men and women of the working classes who believe the statement, and who are amazed at the shortsightedness of those who do not accept it. We may laugh at the cool impudence of those who put forth the statement, but the statement is there, and the danger and our difficulty are in the fact of the mental darkness of so many of the workers who embrace it as true.

We are next told that the Primrose League is the largest political society in the world, and that it is "a society of men and women, each of whom undertakes to do all they can to defend and maintain: 1st, our religion; 2nd, the constitution of our country; 3rd, the safety and honour of Englishmen all over the world." To defend and maintain our holy religion. What a remarkable degree of simplicity or of mental blindness must characterise our Primrose dames, for them to go their rounds of house-to-house visitation, in defence of our holy religion! Of course it is only a cant phrase, by which is meant the archbishops and bishops, with the clerical army of twenty thousand white-throated black bats, who have a legal right to prey on the vitals of the people to the tune of ten millions a year. And then, the constitution of the country. Oh, happy thought. I will not say it came from "dreamland," oh, dear, no; but who can wonder at the audacity and occasional arrogance of our Primrose dames, when they look down from their lofty position as the defenders of our religion and the constitution of the country upon any poor mortal who even appears to doubt the veracity of their statements? As for the third part, it only means the safety and protection of our aristocrats while on their roving commissions or their plundering expeditions in foreign regions.

We are then told that "The objects of the Tory Party have been authoritatively declared to be: 1st, to maintain the institutions of the country; 2nd, the maintenance of the Empire; and 3rd, the elevation of the condition of the people." The first and third are a contradiction in terms, and the second an absurdity and impossibility. What are the institutions to be maintained? Royalty, with its million a-year out of the pockets of the workers, and its baneful influence on our relations with other countries; 2nd, the State Church, with its crowbar brigade, supported by batons, bullets, and bayonets, whenever its propensity to plunder meets with resistance; 3rd, the landed aristocracy, with its right to take at least two hundred millions a-year from the pockets of the people, supported if need be by all the forces of the Crown, the pulpit, and the press, with the help of bribery and corruption; and all the other resources of modern civilisation. Another is the sacredness of usury, which takes from the people at least three hundred millions per annum in the name and in virtue of the supremacy of brute force. Then we have another institution growing out of the present conditions of society, and the position of the mass of the population as mere wage-receivers, viz., the trading classes, who, according to Mulhall, have a stake in the country of the annual value of two hundred and forty-four millions. There are others to which I might refer.

In dealing with the programme of the Primrose League you can grasp the principle involved in all its fullness—despotism in all its nakedness; you cannot be misled, you cannot be deceived. It is not like the wishy-washy Socialism of some of our friends, who, like Sir W. Harcourt and many of the Moderates, are all Socialists now, although their so-called Socialism is nothing more than a species of contemptible Opportunism. Unlike our easy-chair-summer-pleasure-hunting-and-winter-campaigning Socialists, the Primrose dames know the need of organisation, and that to be consistent they must be devoted. Hence they go at once for the maintenance of present institutions, no mere steps in the "right" direction. With them there is no compromise; their task is to uphold the supremacy of our glorious constitution in Church and State, and they organise and prepare for the combat. Yes; to preserve existing institutions is their task of to-day.

Now all these are sacred, and form the glorious foundation of social order, without which society would fall to pieces and the poor workers doomed to perish. Whoever the writer of the statement of the principles and objects of the Primrose League may have been, nothing is more certain than that if existing institutions are maintained the condition of the people must remain what it is to day. Tory peers may promise, and Primrose dames may flatter and beguile, but so long as the reign of plunder lasts, the lot—the only possible lot—of the workers will be misery and poverty. It is logically impossible for it to be otherwise. If you take from the workers seventy or seventy-five per cent. of the wealth they produce by their labour, it is morally impossible for them to be otherwise than poor and degraded.

In all periods of agitation, especially in times of revolution, the political pedler is always with you. He is always present as a kind of marplot, as an apple of discord. By a little political tinkering he will get rid of political tyranny, and free us from departmental corruption and incapacity. By a grand display of social and economical patchwork, beautifully variegated, he will improve the condition of the workers and banish human misery. And those who cannot comprehend the sublime art of political tinkering, or the simple grandeur of social and economical patchwork, well, they are impracticable and therefore obstructionists. But all the Primrose dames in the world, assisted by all the pro-Tory penmen and orators of the age, will never make it possible to improve the condition of the mass of the people while the present institutions continue.

And then, what is royalty but an institution of barbarous origin, and whose great attraction lies in the barbaric splendour of its saturnalia. Why should it be retained? What is the church but an institution of the dark ages, a relic of the pride, the arrogance, the wild dreams and the still wilder notions of the priests of past ages. Why should it not be swept away, and the human soul freed from the idle hopes and childish fears engendered by a false, because a priest-directed system of education? And the aristocracy, why should it be retained? Emblem of all that is base and vicious, all that is villainous and revolting in human nature, a relic of the brutal tyranny of the middle ages; breathing, like royalty, an atmosphere of corruption, living on plunder, and representing only confiscation based on usurpation. Who dare defend it, who can wish for its continuance? As for usury, with its three hundred millions of yearly plunder, it is too monstrous to be defended and too villainous to be retained. All these and others arising from the ignorance and credulity of the past, the feudal tyranny of the middle ages, or resulting from our modern system of production and exchange, will be swept away by the coming Social Revolution.

Instead of political tinkering let us take our stand on principle, and let us never descend to compromise. Let us seek the abolition of tyranny in all its forms, and not its mere modification. And instead of wasting time in the impossible task of patching up our present rotten and degrading institutions, let us work consistently and devotedly for the triumph of Revolutionary Socialism, the only sure remedy for existing evils and the only hope of the down-trodden millions.

J. SKETCHLEY.

PROVINCIAL PROPAGANDA.

COMRADES,—It has long been a complaint among many Socialists that we have given but little attention to the Provinces. This has mainly been the result not of a want of inclination on our part, but want of money. Feeling this, our comrade Mowbray some weeks ago drew up a plan for the propagation of our principles throughout the manufacturing and rural districts of England. This plan, after undergoing some important modifications, has been approved of by the Conference, the Council, and the Propaganda Committee. Speakers are to be sent to centres like Manchester, Leicester, Leeds, Newcastle, Birmingham, and Oxford, from which the surrounding districts can be worked with the aid of our friends in these large towns. It now remains for us all to do our utmost to further this good work by sending in subscriptions, for if only part of the programme is carried out it must result in a great benefit to our common cause.

Subscriptions will be acknowledged under the head of Provincial Propaganda Fund, and should be sent to D. J. NICOLL, Secretary of the Propaganda Committee, 13, Farringdon Road, E.C.

CAP MAKER'S SOCIETY.—It was by no means too soon that a Society was formed in this trade. The workmen as a rule work from seven in the morning to nine in the evening for a paltry wage of from 18s. to 20s. a-week, besides other inconveniences. There is a firm in Commercial Street kept by one Konigsberg; he employs about 200 hands. Last week a workman, T. Sugerman, handed in some work, and his master being dissatisfied with it boxed his ears. The man, fearing starvation, had to submit to it (the said Konigsberg is a very religious man); I could say more. The Society is progressing very satisfactory, the number of members being doubled in one week; this has had a good effect on the employers. Our meeting-place being too small, a change of address was found necessary. The members will now meet at the "Lord Vincent," Philpot Street, E., on Saturdays, at 4 p.m.—R.

SCOTCH NOTES.

THE seamen's strike has been the chief matter of importance in the labour struggle here. The newspapers have daily given a full record of the progress of the strike throughout the country, but except at the docks and in the offices of the shipowners and shippers little or no interest is manifested in this great battle between capital and labour. Working-men as usual appear as ignorant and indifferent about the matter as though seamen and dock labourers were some obscure barbarous tribes, and the Clyde was a river in mid Africa. Indeed, I am certain that more working-men have read the recent account of Mr. Stanley's journey in the southern Soudan than have read the accounts of the strike of their fellow-workers in Britain. Scarcely a single newspaper expresses sympathy with the men—they mostly affect a neutral attitude. So powerful is the influence of the shipowners over the press, that even those newspapers which usually profess to be on the side of labour dare not avow sympathy with the demands of the strikers.

Shipowners advertise a great deal—and sometimes newspaper owners happen to be shipowners also.

Mr. Cunninghame Graham is the only member of Parliament who has ventured to champion the cause of the strikers. His speeches at Leith and Alva were very vigorous and very Socialistic. The newspapers are very angry with him, but they have to report him. Mr. Graham, since he has ventured to call himself a Socialist, has lost none of his popularity and none of his wit; and if he continues to speak as he has recently been doing, he will accomplish more for the salvation of the workers of Scotland than all the parliaments or members of parliaments have succeeded in doing during the last centuries!

The dock-labourers who have come out with the seamen and firemen here are not nearly so well provided for a strike as the seamen and firemen are. They are fighting, however, with extraordinary enthusiasm. Many of the poor fellows have been on picket duty for three days and nights at a stretch. A number of "scabs" imported from other towns have been obtained by the masters; but in many instances these have been induced to "come out," and have been sent home. This sending home of scabs has been a very serious drain upon the slender funds of the union.

The scabs have to be guarded as carefully as if every one of them was an Irish Chief Secretary. Few more wholesome sights could be seen than the terror of death that has been put upon these traitors.

A number of shipowners have conceded the advance demanded by the seamen and the labourers—notably the Messrs. McBrayne and Co. of the Highland steamers; but the great Channel and ocean companies have formed a shipowners' union, and have resolved not to yield.

Members of the Glasgow branches of the Socialist League and Social Democratic Federation have been very busy amongst the strikers, distributing literature and conversing with groups of men. Comrades Gilbert and Carr have been especially active in this way.

On Friday, June 14th, an incident occurred which illustrates the cowardice and stupidity, which seems to be characteristic of not a few of the paid organisers of trades' societies—men who appear to think that the chief object of trade organisations is the organisation of places of power and pay for themselves. A number of members of the League and myself were conversing with groups of men outside the Dock Labourer's Union office. A desire having been expressed by some of the dock labourers to hold a meeting with the view of hearing us speak, one of the officials—a Tory of old—seized a chair, and mounting it advised the crowd to have nothing whatever to do with the Socialists; the Socialists were not, he said, wanted there. At the same time he directed some ill-natured sneers at us. I insisted upon the right of being heard in reply, and in the course of a fifteen minutes address, maintained the principles of Socialism and the right of Socialists to speak to the workers on strike. During my speech there were frequent demonstrations of approval, and when I concluded it was manifest that the entire audience of some 2,000 men was in our favour, numbers of the men loudly complaining against the interference of the official. Afterwards the labourers fraternised with us more heartily than ever. It is highly improbable any one of the officials will again be so indiscreet as to assail Socialists before an audience of dock labourers.

In going amongst the Glasgow dock labourers one is impressed with the fact that the men are remarkably in earnest, and that if their funds would sustain them in existence at all they would compel their masters to surrender. They have come out on strike to a man. The "scabs" do not altogether number more than 200 or 300. Only a few ships have as yet been loaded or discharged since the strike began. But the funds of the men won't last.

The seamen's strike at Leith has already collapsed. There was dissension between the seamen and dock labourers there.

The tramway servants here have been advised not to strike in the meantime. Some concessions of advanced pay and reduced hours have been granted by the directors, and the leaders of the newly-formed Union think that it would be folly to strike until the society has funds to fall back upon.

A large number of riveters are still on strike in the Clyde shipyards for an advance of pay. J. BRUCE GLASIER.

LEGAL MURDER.—At the Brandon Petty Sessions on Thursday last week, George Gross, a gamekeeper to Colonel Mackenzie, was charged under section 2 of Poison to Flesh Prohibition Act, 1864, with unlawfully laying on a piece of land certain flesh or meat—namely, eggs—which had been impregnated with poison. The defendant placed a number of poisoned eggs in a plantation, and in the path of a gang of poachers, one of whom picked up an egg and sucked it, dying afterwards in great agony. The Bench dismissed the case, holding that the Act of Parliament "did not include eggs." Quite natural with a bench of game-preservers; but if a poacher had killed a gamekeeper even by accident, I wonder if he would have escaped without punishment?

SWITZERLAND.

The Iron Chancellor is again busily engaged in his devilish work of despotism, preparing a general invasion of the rights of those countries where a few liberties are still left to the peoples. At this very moment he is attempting to destroy the right of asylum for political refugees in the republic of Switzerland, and he is aided in this contemptible business by Austria, by Russia, and even by Italy. If Bismarck succeeds in Switzerland—and there cannot be any doubt about that—the independent existence of Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, etc., will also very soon be seriously imperilled, and despotism, under Bismarck's hegemony, will reign absolute and supreme. The crushing tyranny that has been set up at Berlin and, since 1878, prevails throughout Germany, is to spread all over the Continent and to rule every nation. The minor countries, if they are bullied by Bismarck, cannot possibly help themselves, as the actual case of Switzerland shows us well enough. France and England are the only European Powers that could interfere, but what have they done? The French press, of course, is sympathetic to Switzerland, but the bourgeois Government don't care very much whether Socialists should be expelled or not from Swiss territory. The English press, almost entirely got up for the interests of the capitalistic class, either openly approves of Bismarck's action or hypocritically weaves a few yards of disgusting prose in favour of those who are "rightly struggling to be free," which means in favour of shopkeepers, not of Socialists or of Anarchists, who are not rightly battling for freedom and equality. As for the Government, they know very well that a blow to Swiss liberty is at the same time a serious blow struck at the very heart of democracy all over Europe, and that is enough to fill Salisbury's soul with joy and delight. Switzerland, being isolated, and practically left alone to answer the threats of autocratic Germany, has not as yet gone so far as to refuse access to Swiss soil to any Socialist unprovided with credentials from his own Government, but at least she has already resolved to make a compromise of an extremely unfortunate character, namely, to appoint an "attorney-general of the confederated cantons, whose duty it will be to prosecute any Socialists or revolutionists, if by their actions they endanger international peace, or imperil the internal security of foreign countries." This first step in the way of concessions to the demands of the German Chancellor will unavoidably lead Switzerland to further acts of weakness and subserviency, for it is obviously certain that this Swiss attorney-general will receive his briefs from Berlin. But why should Switzerland be left alone? If the Governments that could successfully interfere and defy Bismarck's murderous plans are loth to do so, why should not all the revolutionary democracies of Europe unite in an immense and determined protest against the nefarious man who tries to trample under foot and crush out of the world all those who happen to think and act better than he ever did? A good opportunity will soon arise. In the middle of next month representatives of several millions of revolutionary Socialists of various nationalities will meet together at Paris in order to discuss the real and vital interests of society at large, interests which they alone truly represent if indeed society is one day or other to become a vast community of free and equal and happy men, and why should not those representatives of the world's toil and wealth enter a most emphatic protest against the crimes daily perpetrated by Bismarck and his tools? By far the largest part of those who will attend the next International Revolutionary Socialist Congress have suffered imprisonment and exile for liberty's sake; is it not indeed in their hands that the cause of liberty shall be best placed? In a memorable sitting of the National Convention, the deputy Isnard once exclaimed, "If despotic kings continue engaging their peoples in levying war against free nations, we will persuade all peoples to wage war, and war to death, against all kings!" Times are drawing near when the same warning might possibly be uttered once more, and to be followed by far more disastrous consequences both for the tyrants of society and those who help them in their abominable work of oppression.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

THE VITAL QUESTION.

IN the present phase of the labour movement, the philosophic or argumentative aspect is most prominent. At least it is so in America. I am reluctant to say that the old spirit of devotion—the determination, desperate courage, and whole-souled anxiety to work in the cause—that fearlessness of conventionalism, and utter disregard of the opinions of the "respectable" element, which characterised the agitators of twelve, seven, and four years ago—have utterly died out. But these qualities are not conspicuous. The worker "with a job" is apathetic and obedient, for he doesn't want to lose it; the man without one is discouraged, hopeless, enfeebled, his highest ambition to get a "steady position." The one-time agitator who gave his time, strength, and pennies, almost day and night, looks on this strange dead quiet, and thinks for the time being he may as well be looking out for himself a little until the people are ready for him.

In the meantime the polite discussion of economic questions is becoming quite a "fad." No first-class magazine is without its article on an industrial subject, by some high-sounding Prof., who knows nothing whatever of genuine work. No pulpit but devotes a Sunday now and then to the "labour question" and the "labouring classes." No rostrum but is open to a dainty handling of the working-man's cause, with kid gloves, and where now and then a bare-handed lover of truth walks in and shakes up their æsthetic nerves with a few wholesome criticisms. Debating societies, clubs, associations, where the air is redolent with "culture" and opulence, exist, whose members dive as deeply into the economic sea as though after a new idea in art or an old one in bric-a-brac. There are clubs which give weekly banquets, and where, over plates that are spread at a cost of five dollars a-head, they discuss "eight hours," "single tax," "free land," and "wages" as glibly as though these things did not mean the destruction of their privileges.

Not long since, one of our oldest and ablest agitators had the floor on a question of labour in a society where Julius S. Grinnell presided as chairman! Such a fact either shows up mighty well for Grinnell or very bad for the agitator. I think many of our truest men and women could not speak and address that atrocious perjurer and murderer with calmness or patience on any subject.

The old time Radicals are in the meantime too much inclined to discussing different "schools of Socialism," philosophic points of difference, definition of terms, and "hair-splitting." A few have established a society with a creed almost as close as a close-communion Baptist's, and all not subscribing to those principles have no right to call themselves Socialists, and "do so at their peril."

Of course this general discussion of economic questions must result in good; a greater number of people will arrive at some inkling of the truth; but there is danger, under this veil of respectability and mild arrangement of societary wrongs, that the great urgency of the question, the keen, living importance of its settlement to all humanity, will be forgotten—glossed over with cultured conventionalism—lost in a labyrinth of 'isms and abstractions. We may not all agree on the finely drawn differences as to what constitutes "personal liberty." We may differ as to the efficacy of "eight hours," "single tax," "mutual bank," or individual co-operative schemes. We may cherish lingering affections for the State, and hope it will yet steer us out of poverty and slavery; or we may be certain there is no hope as long as legalised Authority holds sway. But there are some things we can all agree on, and some we ought never for a moment to forget.

We all agree that the earth is for man; without it he must die. His birthright is as much of the natural elements as he needs; and when he is robbed of these and made to toil for his necessary share, he is robbed of so much of his life. We know that human labour applied to nature's resources alone creates wealth. We know that the labourer is wronged when in every land he is poor, helpless, dependent, duped and enslaved, instead of being in the enjoyment of his productions, walking upright and free before his fellow-creatures. We know that his deplorable condition is due to established and lawful systems in society, continuous methods, ever increasing in disproportionate results, recognised and accepted ways and means of production and distribution. We know that the present standard of right, which does not recognise every man's need and right to the land, nor to the full results of his labour, is working most terrible suffering among the human race, when there is literally no excuse for poverty on the face of the bountiful earth. We all know, but we do not realise it, that all the boasted advantages of civilisation are obtained at a fearful cost of human suffering.

And this is what we ought never to forget.

If we are comfortable—shut up in cosy rooms away from wan and hungry faces, we can easily discuss tweedledee and tweedledum. The bricks of houses do not show the drops of blood from little children's rasped arms that carried them. The coal that burns so cheerily in the grates bears no mark of the drudgery and agony of men and women's lives, the wasted youth of hopeless children; nor do the ghosts of the dead, sacrificed in its procuring, peer out from the blue dancing flames. The comfortable clothing we wear carries no stain of the tears dropped from weary eyes at midnight, the stitches tell no tales of the worn lives and faded youth sewn into the seams.

Our cosy tea-table bears no mark of the gambler's art; the crisp loaves tell no story of the farmer's unrequited toil, his mortgaged farm, nor of the bursting elevators and full bank vaults of "brokers," manipulators of the world's food. Sitting quietly at home, we realise nothing of the many men wandering homeless, hopeless, friendless; of the uncared youth, to whom no pathway is open but the road to crime and prison life; of the hungry children, whose wan pleading faces seem asking why they were born to suffer so.

But, bringing these dismal facts home to ourselves, I do not mean that we should be charitable—go out and feed a few hungry people, or save one or two boys from jail; if we did this we but make room for more. The causes beneath the surface of society continuously produce such results; the seething pool of injustice and corruption is constantly making wrecks of human beings, and casting them up as mere driftwood. The whole of societary arrangements must be changed, and soon, or civilisation will go backward. While we are philosophising, the most terrible suffering is going on; the degraded are becoming more degraded, the poor poorer, and the ruling classes wealthier and more greedy.

It is well enough to cry "Patience!" when you are not in the fire. One can wait for the slow growth of better conditions if one is never hungry; but how can we look out upon the gaunt, woeful, hardening faces that peer at us from the highways and byways, from dark cellars, from factory doors, and from frightful mining shafts, and still cry "Patience!"? How can we feel "patient," when knowing that this repressed, smothered, smoothed-over crater of wrong, suffering, and discontent, must burst forth into more terrible ebullitions than anything the world has ever seen if the present course is pursued?

The only hope there is, is that a general sense of "danger" may be infused among intelligent people; there is little time for waiting, for patience, or for philosophising. Not that I would stop the discussion of economic subjects, be they discussed ever so mildly and politely; but I would urge upon the already converted the necessity of more determination, more zeal for work, more of the spirit of self-sacrifice, less regard for respectable and conventional observances, and more for the truth, and a keener sense of the importance of the vital question.

LIZZIE M. S. HOLMES.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

THOMAS K. SNYDER, the policeman who, during the late strike of the tram-car employes in New York City, shot at and killed a striker, has been presented by some law-abiding people with a medal as a token of their admiration for his "heroic" deed. The medal was fastened to the lapel of his coat by Col. Elliott F. Shepard, the pious editor of the Mail and Express newspaper, son-in-law of the late W. H. Vanderbilt, and a lay preacher, who acted as chairman of the presentation committee. The medal is nearly a quarter of an inch thick and two inches in diameter, and is made of solid gold. On the bar from which it is suspended is inscribed, "Thomas K. Snyder," and on the medal itself, "N. Y. Municipal Police, February 5th, 1889. Fearless—Decisive—Successful." In the centre is set a two and a half carat diamond. It is said that Col. Shepard took for the subject of his next sermon the text, "Blessed be the poor, for they do get enabled to enjoy the blessings of heaven; and blessed be the police, for unto them the Almighty Dollar gives their due reward."

The police monument in Chicago in commemoration of the 4th of May, 1886, has at last been unveiled. It consists of a pedestal, to the right and left of which are attached gas candelabres. On the top stands a policeman over life-size, with drawn club and in an attitude clearly conveying to every onlooker every policeman's ideal: "It's a fine day, and I'm going to kill something." To the pedestal is fastened a marble slab, with the inscription, "In the name of the people of Illinois, I command peace." Rather a queer way to command peace, it must be confessed, if all the circumstances of the historic incident are recollected—200 law-and-order lambs advancing with swinging clubs and cocked revolvers on a peaceable meeting of working-men and ordering them to disperse. It looks more like premeditated murder, and that is what it was in truth. Young Degan, a son of policeman Degan who was killed by the bomb, performed the unveiling ceremony on the 29th of May. The monument is situated on the famous Haymarket. The whole affair fell exceedingly flat; no more than about five hundred persons could be got together for the occasion, most of whom were of a juvenile age. The "law-and-order" bullies have got their monument of stone; it took them a long time and much begging to get it. "Our Five" need no monument of stone nor of bronze nor of marble; their memory will be ever green as long as liberty-loving people are in existence. Would the police like to swap position?

Poor Captain Michael J. Schaack! He was not permitted to enjoy the sweets of office very long. On the 4th of June he was dismissed from the Chicago police force for neglect of duty and wilful disobedience of orders. He got himself mixed up in the Cronin mystery and tried to shield, of course against a heavy compensation in cash, his old friend and protector Alexander Sullivan, one of the dictators of the Parnellite movement over here. Sullivan is strongly suspected of having had a hand in the "removal" of the unfortunate Cronin. Schaack coolly admitted in his evidence before the coroner's jury that "he had suppressed testimony; that he had never entered into the case with any enthusiasm; that he had made many mistakes; and that he had been guilty of disobedience." It's somewhat strange that poor Mike was disciplined for such paltry reasons. He might well ask, Are the people losing faith in "law-and-order," that the authorities do not mind sacking so quickly a high police officer for what after all is committed every day by every official protector of "law-and-order"? But then perhaps Schaack wanted to go. He has found a new occupation since he joined the literary gents. This well-bred and highly refined ex-policeman, who is reported to be able, with plenty of time, plenty of ink, and plenty of paper at his disposal, to paint his signature, has written a book numbering seven hundred pages, entitled 'Anarchy and the Anarchists; a History of the Red Spectre and of the Social Revolution in America and in Europe.' The book is compiled in the style of the average penny horrible, and intended to make every bourgeois shiver in his shoes. As the Anarchists scare is about played out, Mike's literary botch may prove a drug in the market, and he had better return again to Wisconsin and re-start cultivating cabbages.

The miners on strike in Indiana are in a bad condition. Over 9,000 people are on the verge of starvation. The women are selling their wedding-rings and other little treasures, whilst the fathers are disposing of the trinkets of their children to get bread to keep them from starving. All of their furniture and more substantial belongings have been sold weeks ago. The miners have been out since May 1, and have been refused all offers to arbitrate and to settle their differences with the operators. For the past five years the maximum wages received by the men have been five dollars a-week. However, as Laurence Gronlund, writing in the capitalist press, puts it, "For after all the American nation remains a brotherhood of men." Reading this, who is not reminded of G. B. Shaw's description of brotherly love: "I believe that if Moses, instead of being a founding, brought up as the pet of a princess, had had practical experience of brothers, he would have said, 'Sirs, ye are brethren, therefore ye do wrong one to another.'"

It is a pitiful sight to see one who claims to be a Socialist lower himself so much, and to become the lickspittle of that coarse, repulsive imposture, the American Republic.

Incredible and exaggerated as it may appear at first impulse to some sentimental people, yet at the bottom of that horrible disaster at Johnstown can be discerned the social question. A gang of vulgar thieves, people who have grown wealthy on stealing the fruits of some other people's toil, founded in Pittsburgh the South Fork Hunting and Fishing Club. They leased from the Pennsylvania Railroad for sporting purposes the huge reservoir the breaking of whose dams caused all the loss of life. Never for one moment did these marauders consider that their means of pleasure formed a standing danger to thousands of human beings. Why should they? Were they not independent, respectable gentlemen? They showed the utmost criminal negligence in the construction of the dams, in their maintenance, their management, their repairs, and the keeping of the gates. The dams were built of clay, instead of stone. They contained a body of water far beyond the strength of the construction. The leaks were "stopped" with straw. The gates were completely clogged with stone. Time upon time the club members were memorialised upon the condition of the dams. They were asked to do something. But why should they? Happily they live in a Christian country, where everybody is for himself and the devil takes the hindmost. They had their pleasure, and what concern was the safety of other people to them? A dam broke. The artificial flood killed 8,000 people, destroyed 30 millions of property, and rendered about 20,000 more people homeless. Wasn't there an outcry of righteous and just wrath throughout all America against the conduct of these sportsmen? Oh, dear, no. Trust your Yankee! Every American found the behaviour of these rich people in all respects correct. Why should he not? No member of that club ever disturbed "law-and-order." They never questioned the correctness and the justice of the system which rules our actions and our fate. If they had, there would have been plenty of reasons for hanging them. But in their case—well, after all, if we come to think of it, they do deserve some consideration for their heavy loss. Let us get up a public subscription for their sole benefit, and let us buy for them some medals, golden medals, with a diamond in the centre, and with the inscription "Fearless," for they never feared for their reservoir, "Decisive," for they sternly rejected all memorials for the safety of the people, "Successful," for they killed something.

It is reported that some poor Hungarians, bearing the truly Hungarian names of Brown, Jones, and Smith, were caught robbing some of the dead. All America trembled with indignation at these vandalistic outrages. The black criminals were lynched on the spot. Serve them right. What right has a poor person to steal? It's vulgar to steal so that you can fill your belly; it's cultured and refined to "accumulate" millions. And robbing the dead, horrible—the dead who have so much use for silver dollars and golden rings and diamond bracelets! And right surely is the Rev. T. de Witt Talmage, the Spurgeon of America, in advising all honest folk that "those who have been guilty of robbing the dead should be hanged or shot without judge, jury, or trial." Truly a kind Christian spirit!

Some readers may think I am joking. I have never been more earnest in my life. Just read these newspaper cuttings:—

"There is no possibility of exacting an adequate penalty in the way of damages or retribution, even if it were practicable to clearly fix the responsibility for this calamity. Nothing would be gained by the sacrifice of a few more human lives, while few, if any, individuals would have the means necessary to make indemnification for the financial losses that have been sustained, to say nothing of those lives which no money payment can make good. But the disaster will be without its proper lesson if it does not lead to the examination of other dams."—Boston Morning Journal.

"If, therefore, it shall be shown that the Johnstown disaster was due to negligence and might have been averted by due care, both a civil and a criminal liability will fall upon those guilty of the negligence. That is the legal, the theoretical view of the case. But what will it amount to practically in view of the fact that ten thousand lives and seventy millions of property have been destroyed? What penalty can atone for this great loss? What civil remedy can repair the vast damage."—New York Herald.

"It is rather severe to lay the blame for the sad disaster at Johnstown on the members of the South Fork Fishing and Hunting Club, who owned the defective dam. They may have been culpable for allowing such a structure to exist, and the State authorities may be blamed for the same reason; but that they ever dreamed they were jeopardising the lives of the people in the valley of the Conemaugh isn't to be thought of for a moment."—Boston Herald.

"JOHNSTOWN, Pa., June 6, 1889. There will be no inquest held on the bodies of the thousands of residents of the Conemaugh valley who lost their lives. The law of the State does not require such an investigation, and the responsibility of the disaster, which can be directly charged to the insecure wall which held the water of the Conemaugh lake, will never be legally determined, unless the survivors should take independent action. All reports that arrangements for an inquest had been commenced are untrue."—A Telegram.

And how comforting is this philosophy of the New York World:

"There is no danger of an unsafe dam, or probably any dam at all, being again built at Conemaugh Lake. . . . However true it may be that a spiritual advancement of the race has been secured through the blood of martyrs, there is no question that much material wisdom has been gained only through the sacrifice of countless lives. Hundreds of victims were burned to death in railroad accidents before the abolition of the car stove was inaugurated. And more yet will, no doubt, be required to stop its use generally throughout the country. . ."

These are only a few examples. Through the whole capitalistic press runs but one desire: To shield the murderers.

My respect for the human character has been lowered considerably in consequence of this event. If some of the surviving relatives of the drowned had rushed on to Pittsburgh and shot or hanged or kicked some of these millionaire murderers, I should have considered such action reasonable and just, aye, even praiseworthy. Yes, if the criminals had been some poor people or rebels against "law-and-order," they would now be suspended from some cross-beam, indicate how the wind blows in this glorious Republic, you bet, dear reader; and yet, "For after all the American nation remains a brotherhood of men!"

The charitable spirit now stalks through the land. The power behind the throne of this charity may be ascertained when we ponder over the words this nation's chief executive magistrate spoke during a meeting over which he presided in Washington: "I think I am in duty bound to myself and to you to state right here that I myself have already subscribed five hundred dollars for the relief of the sufferers in Johnstown." If one gets a good advertisement for one's moral character, one may as well subscribe some money to a charity. And as a result plenty of money is coming in. To relieve the sufferers? Will they get the mammon? I guess not. All the solid business men in good standing from Pittsburgh, from Philadelphia, from New York, and so on, have departed for Johnstown to superintend the proper distribution of the money; and properly distributed it will be, any one can take his oath on that, and some people's banking accounts will swell considerably. It's perfectly sickening to live in America, the hell of creation.

There were 75 strikes, involving 26,186 employees, reported to Bradstreets during May, 1889.

Boston, Mass., June 12, 1889.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

The miners of Lancashire have obtained from their owners on Wednesday, June 19th, the same terms as those already obtained by the Yorkshire men, namely, an advance of 5 per cent. on July 1st, and another 5 per cent. on October 1st. This is a compromise on the original demand of 10 per cent.

WAGES IN THE LACE TRADE.—Two of the three branches—are on the verge of a desperate struggle with the masters. The latter, on the bogus plea that a 70 per cent. less is paid in the outlying districts, seek to reduce wages in the curtain branch by 40 per cent. and in the levers branch by from 15 to 25 per cent. A mass meeting of lace hands was held in the Mechanics Large Hall on Saturday afternoon, and it was unanimously resolved to approve of the action of the Trade Council in refusing to entertain the question of a reduction. The spirit of the meeting was excellent, and only deepened a regret that so few of them were alive to the necessity of constant warfare on the capitalist or to the knowledge that there is "no other name under heaven than Socialism whereby they may be saved."—R. P.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Seamen's Strike.

The battle still continues, though it has entered a phase which lacks the vivid interest of the incidents of last week. This is mainly owing to the precautions taken by the authorities to preserve "the freedom of labour"—that is, the freedom of the scabs to cut the throats of the strikers. It has now, however, become impossible for the men, thanks to strong force of police concentrated in the neighbourhood of the docks, to prevent the scabs from playing the game of the masters. The strikers, however, are still very hopeful of victory, although the Government declare that the Board of trade has no power to interfere in regard to the manning of vessels with incompetent crews. People who travel by such vessels must take their lives in their hands and be content to run the risk of drowning. A paternal government can do nothing in their behalf.

Some exciting incidents occurred at Glasgow on June 17, which have not yet been chronicled in our columns. On Monday evening, it appears that half a dozen scabs were got into a couple of cabs to be taken from Allan Line offices to the company's docks. While the cabs were standing at the door of the offices a labourer rushed from the crowd and tried to drag the scabs from the vehicles. He was immediately seized by the police, and handled in the usual brutal fashion. Mr. Smith Park, freight manager to Messrs. Allan, came out to encourage the police, and called out to keep hold of their victim. A number of the strikers immediately "went for" Mr. Smith Park, and in common parlance he "got it hot." The poor gentleman's head was cut open, and it is probable that he will not encourage the police to arrest strikers for some time to come. A man was arrested by the police who, according to them, had committed this assault. On their way to the station an attempt was made to rescue him, and in the struggle a constable had his face cut open and Mr. Park was again assaulted. However, the police being reinforced, were enabled to keep their prisoner and succeeded in making another arrest, afterwards reaching the station with both their prisoners. These incidents I have given to show how bitter is the feeling of the men against both the scabs and their tyrannical masters.

A number of men have been heavily fined for intimidation during the past week. How slight the intimidation is in most cases may be seen by the following case, taken from the Glasgow Evening Citizen.—James Muir was remitted to the Sheriff, from the Southern Police-court to-day, on a charge of intimidating a man named James Whally, who was being driven down King Street in a cab on the 15th. Whally was on his way to the harbour, and Muir, it is alleged, caught the horse by the head, looked into the cab, and asked Whally where he was going. If this is remitted to the sheriff as "a serious case," how slight must be the offences which the magistrates have dealt with.

Some of our readers must have been astonished at hearing from our Glasgow correspondent that the capitalists were engaged in useful work in company with convicts. This was made necessary by the strike of the dock labourers, which forced them to unload vessels laden with perishable goods. Here is an account from the North British Daily Mail of the honest work done under these circumstances by members of the idle classes: "One gang consisted of young men, most of whom wore trousers a la mode and suitable to the season of the year, while in some cases coats and vests were cast, displaying to the gaze of wondering crowds newly laundered white shirts. Managers, checkers, and foremen were, as on Monday, assisting in the discharging and loading work. A captain of a boat was observed battling with a cargo of pig-iron along with a few cattle-men. A section of the fair passengers on board of the 'Prussian' had also greatly amused the labourers when they unglved and began to shovel coal." This solves the problem of providing work for the capitalists after the revolution; we can give them a job as dock labourers. I confess I should have liked to see the middle-class damsels shovelling coal! It is marvellous what good qualities emergencies will produce among idle people.

Things were a little lively a few days back. A scab crew were working on the steamer Fintera, when a number of strikers swooped down upon it, scattered the scabs, and took possession of the steamer. The strikers held the steamer for some time, till the police arriving in strong force, the strikers abandoned the vessel. Both at Glasgow and Liverpool the strikers hold out firmly and have strong hopes of victory, despite the lying reports circulated by the capitalist press.

The Tram Slaves.

The slave-drivers have slightly changed their policy; they now treat their men like children, a sugar-plum in one hand and a cane in the other. While they have sacked men for joining the union that policy has not succeeded in breaking it up, so they are now trying the effect of some trifling concessions. On the Greenwich road the six journeys a day system has been abandoned for the five journeys asked by the men. This may indicate a coming surrender, and the men should take courage and not be content with this sop to Cerberus, but insist on their full demands. Among those dismissed have been five of those who were most prominent in forming the union. We are glad to hear that all those discharged have been engaged by Mr. Hansford, the secretary of the union, in the heavy work of organisation, and will be fairly paid for their work. We hope, however, that none of the men who have been discharged will be forgotten by their comrades. The tram men should remember the action of Bryant and May's girls, who all struck work sooner than let any of their comrades suffer starvation for the common cause, and their courage received its reward in a complete victory. The men should remember that a strike is their trump card, and it is only fear of it that has wrung from the directors even the present mild concessions.

Meanwhile, the union is spreading. The West Metropolitan Tramway men held a meeting at the Mission Hall, Chiswick, early on Thursday morning. There were a small number of officials present under the leadership of Mr. Gayner, the manager, who did their best to create a disturbance in the interests of law-'n'-order. They were also useful in finding out for the Company what men were present and who were the most active. Despite all this an amendment moved by the manager, to the effect that men were satisfied with their kind treatment by the Company, only got the support of the gang of officials, who came for the express purpose of voting for it, and a resolution declaring for the formation of a branch of the union was carried amid loud applause. The officials of the Company present at the meeting were Mr. Gayner, the manager, Inspectors Ling, McDonald, Shortland, and Berge; Fairman, clerk; and Ross and Mackay, foremen. What were these people there for, if it was not to intimidate the men who are struggling for some slight instalment of justice? But we don't hear of any of these clerks, managers, and foremen getting 40s. or a month. Who can doubt after this that our laws are passed in the interest of the class that made them, the aristocracy of capital?

The newspaper reports which led comrade Nicoll in his article last week to state that the Glasgow Tramway directors had conceded the demands of the men were, as usual, incorrect. As a matter of fact, while the secretary of the company, Mr. Duncan, has several times publicly stated that the hours have been reduced to an average of twelve hours a-day, the men themselves report that in many cases the men have still to work fifteen and sixteen hours, while the authorised advance of wages is simply a piece of barefaced public deception. The men were very anxious to strike; but Mr. Chisholm-Robertson, their chairman, strongly opposed that course, as he knew the company were prepared to replace the strikers at a moment's notice, while the funds of the union, which is just being formed, would be totally inadequate to maintain the men during a conflict. The Glasgow Trades Council have appointed a sub-committee to arrange a great demonstration on the Green, for the purpose of demanding that the Town Council should take over the tramways on the impending expiry of the company's lease. As this sub-committee is under the convenship of George Carson, a member of the Socialist League and late president of the Trades Council, we may expect that something "practical" will be done. Last Sunday a meeting of the tramway men was held in the Albion Halls, which was addressed by Mr. Conybeare, M.P. Mr. Conybeare's speech was a most disappointing one, his advice not rising above the average trades union level, in this respect contrasting very unfavourably with the vigorous Socialistic utterances of Mr. Cunninghame Graham. It was resolved that a petition should be sent by the men to the half-yearly meeting of the shareholders which will be held early next month, and that meanwhile the men endeavour to strengthen their union as much as possible. A number of the members of the Glasgow Branch of the Socialist League were present, and distributed the leaflet "Tram-car Slavery" amongst the men, which we hope will give them a higher purpose and hope that the mere reduction of their hours from sixteen to twelve and an increase of 2s. on their weekly pay.

The Northumberland and Durham Miners.

The ballot by Northumberland miners has resulted in the acceptance of the 5 per cent. advance recently offered as a compromise of the general demand for 10 per cent. The Durham miners are holding out for an advance of 25 per cent. The feeling is that the masters may offer 10 per cent., but the men continue to agitate for the full amount, and, the sliding scale terminating, the position is serious, 20,000 men being involved. Here is an instance of what we must call the lamentable disunion among trades' unionists. Here are two bodies of workers living practically in the same district, working under similar conditions, and yet they cannot make a uniform demand for an increase in wages. The Northumberland miners ask for 10 per cent. and take 5, and the Durham miners ask for 25 per cent. and hope to take 10. The result probably will be that the Durham miners will have to put up with the very moderate concession accepted by the Northumberland men. Why cannot all the miner's unions federate, and act in a solid body? They would then carry all before them. The position would be "serious" then, not for the men but for the masters.

GLASGOW CARTERS WILL STRIKE.—The labour troubles in Scotland are threatened with another serious augmentation. The carters of Glasgow have resolved to be allowed time to eat their meals—a carter must eat—and to be paid overtime after six o'clock. The masters refuse this, but instead offer an advance of 2s. per week. The men won't accept that offer, and will insist upon their meal hours and overtime; and if that be not granted the carters' strike is set down for July 2nd.

STRIKE AT KILSYTH.—The handloom weavers at Kilsyth are out on strike for an advance of wages. It is alleged they are at present paid at the rate of 20 per cent. less than those employed at Kirkinilloch in the same class of work. The operatives are mostly girls and women, with a few men. They are very industrious, but after working from early morn till late eve, the highest wage the strongest can make, after loom rent, coals, gas, tallow, etc., are deducted, is about 8s. per week. They are noted for being a well-behaved and intelligent people, and their employer is a "good Liberal," who takes an active part in politics, and yet they are not content. But even a worm will turn, and the Kilsyth weavers' strike is but a symptom of how deep the revolt is in canny Scotland against what Cunninghame Graham calls "political humbug." Why does the factory inspector not visit Kilsyth?

INTERNATIONAL SOCIALIST WORKING-MEN'S CONGRESS.

We have received a notice from our comrade Paul Lafargue, 60, Avenue de Champs Elysees, Le Perreux, Seine, France, inviting all delegates to send in their names to him at once, so that due arrangements may be made as to their lodging. The cost of living will be from 5s. to 6s. per diem not counting extras. It is hoped that delegates will be at Paris on the 13th. The first sitting of the Congress will be on the afternoon of the 14th, so as to enable the delegates to take part in the national fête.

Members wishing to go with a party of the Socialist League, leaving Saturday, July 13th, for Paris Congress, should communicate with secretary at once, so that sufficient accommodation may be provided. We hear that Auguste Coulon will represent the Dublin Socialist Club.

REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—Good meeting on Green, addressed by Hill and Blundell. In hall, J. McCormack gave an interesting account of "A Socialist's Tramp through the Provinces." Several persons present, who admitted that they were not Socialists, testified to the accuracy of lecturer's statement with regard to the condition of the poor and their bad dwellings.—B.

EAST LONDON.—At Gibraltar Walk on Sunday, a good meeting was addressed by Parker, McCormack, and Brookes; 10 Commonweal sold. At 5 o'clock in Victoria Park, a splendid meeting was started under exceptionally difficult circumstances, owing to a meeting of teetotallers taking place in our immediate vicinity; Brookes opened the meeting, but when McCormack began to speak some spirited opposition was offered by our temperance friends. An unknown friend and comrade also spoke on our behalf, and was loudly applauded; Davis then replied, and the meeting was brought to a close at 8 o'clock; 30 Commonweal sold. At our branch room at 9.30, Brookes lectured on "Order without Law" to a small but attentive audience; good discussion on marriage question, which arose out of the lecture; Davis promised to deal with this question in a few week's time.

HYDE PARK.—A good meeting was held here last Saturday evening at eight o'clock, when Samuels, Davis, Cores, Humphries, Hill, and Furlough (S.D.F.) addressed a very fair audience; we had some opposition from a Gladstonian, and a lively discussion followed which lasted over three hours; 2s. collected.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday, Mrs. Schack spoke to a fair and attentive audience. One good Conservative hardly believed his eyes, for he put his spectacles on when he saw Mrs. Schack speaking, and he was only kept quiet by our comrades. The speakers will please notice the importance of advertising the paper, as it improves the sale considerably.—G.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers, Tochatti, Lynes, sen., Lynes, jun., Saint, Dean, and Maughan; 9 new members made and 2s. 3d. collected; three ministers at the meeting. At 7.30, an excellent meeting was held at Archer Street, when Lyne, sen., Tochatti, Maughan, Dean, and Saint spoke; choir sang and 1s. 10d. collected; 73 Commonweal sold during day.

NORTH LONDON.—A good meeting was held in Regent's Park on Sunday, addressed by Hill, Cantwell, Crouch, and Nicoll; good sale of Weal. A fine meeting also held in Hyde Park by Cantwell, Bullock, Lynes, Tochatti, and Nicoll; some friendly opposition by Sinclair, M.P., who appeared to think that Socialism meant a dividing up of the land; he was well replied to by Bullock and Lynes; 3s. 6d. collected.

ST. GEORGE'S.—A fine meeting held on Mile End Waste on Tuesday, opened by Leech, Turner speaking about an hour to a very sympathetic audience. Good member's meeting on Wednesday; discussion opened by Turner on "Socialist Opposition," Hemmings, Leech, Wess, Smith, and Harris taking part. On Sunday morning, one of the largest meetings ever held at Leman Street was opened by Leech, Turner speaking especially of the seamen's strike, suggesting control of all shipping by the sailors; all Commonweal sold out, and good sale of our pamphlets.—T.

ABERDEEN.—The Liberal party having held a demonstration in favour of "free education," it was decided by our branch to hold one of our own to explain our views on the question. It took place last Saturday, and was attended by a large and enthusiastic audience. The Rev. Alexander Webster, Cooper, Leatham, and Duncan were the speakers. Two resolutions were carried amid loud cheering, one calling for "free, national, and secular" education, and the other demanding the ownership and control of the land and means of production by the whole community.

GLASGOW.—During the past fortnight our members have been busy speaking to and distributing literature amongst the seamen and dock labourers on strike, who everywhere welcomed our comrades amongst them. We collected for the dock labourers—At Govan, 2s. 4d.; Jail Square, 6s. 5d.; and Paisley Road Toll, 4s. 4d. Last week, comrades Gilbert, Carr, and Pollock continued their efforts. On Sunday at 2 o'clock, Joe Burgoyne, Tim Burgoyne, and Glasier addressed a large meeting on the Green, where 4s. was collected for the dock labourers. Many of our members turned up at Mr. Conybeare's lecture, held under the auspices of the Irish National League, and Glasier spoke from the platform. They afterwards attended a meeting of the tramway men, and distributed a large number of the leaflet on "Tram-car Slavery." At a business meeting of the branch held on the preceding Sunday, the council of the branch was re-organised, and Daniel McCulloch was appointed secretary in place of Bruce Glasier, who has resigned.

LEICESTER.—On Sunday last Raymond Unwin, of Chesterfield, lectured in the morning at Russell Square on "The Waste of Competition"; good audience. In evening, Unwin again lectured, on "What we Want" in Humberstone Gate. There was this time a much larger audience. An earnest and able address, which was listened to with the greatest attention, followed by an animated discussion, the crowd breaking up afterwards into discussion groups. On the previous Sunday we were prayed for at the principal Baptist Chapel, containing the largest dissenting congregation in Leicester; special reference was also made to us in the sermon! If this has had any result, it must have been favourable, for we have increased our audience, have much more discussion, and have about doubled our sale of literature.—T. P. B.

LEEDS.—Last Sunday afternoon Paylor spoke in support of the bricklayers' labourers of this town, who are forming a union. In the evening another meeting was held, when Corkwell, Maguire, and Paylor spoke. Reference was made to the strikes of the seamen and tramcar men. It has been stated in a local paper that tramcar slavery in Leeds is as bad, if not worse, than it is in London, but that body of nonentities the Leeds Trades Council has not a word to say on the subject.

NORWICH.—On Tuesday last comrade Netlow was elected delegate by the branch for the Paris Congress. On Sunday usual open-air meeting was held in the Market Place; a large audience present, addressed by comrade Mowbray. In the evening another good meeting was held; Darley opened, followed by Mowbray, who delivered a capital address. Good collections, and Commonweal sold out.

YARMOUTH.—Last Sunday morning we had a capital audience; comrade Mowbray gave a long and earnest address, which was listened to with great interest; collection 7s. In the evening we held a meeting near Colman's granary, on the South Quay, and considering this was new ground the meeting was most encouraging; Ruffold and Reynolds spoke. We sold all our Commonweal. Total collection for the day, 8s. 6d.—C. R.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro Street, June 22, H. Sutton Frizelle lectured on "Workers, Beggars, and Thieves," an excellent discussion resulting—King, Toomey, Wilson, Graham, and Cree taking part.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Usual meeting on Sunday in the Market Place, Rooke in the chair; Peacock, Proctor and Whalley (S.D.F.), who will run together as Socialist candidates at the School Board elections in November, explained their programme. Collection for election fund, 4s. 3d. Several new members joined.—R. P.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE police have been playing the usual game, and in all probability with the usual impunity to them and the usual punishment to the "rioters," so called. We shall not be suspected of agreement with the doctrines of the Salvation Army; but on this occasion the processionists must be looked on as citizens going about on their lawful errands and suddenly attacked by a band of organised and armed ruffians without any cause whatever.

Here is again an opportunity for testing the genuineness of the protestations of both parties in the State. Even the Tories might be expected to take up the matter on behalf of persons with no taint of revolutionism in them; and as for the Liberals!—Well, I must say that they are fast qualifying themselves for the name which they used to bestow on their Tory opponents—the Stupid Party. In fact their stupidity is a deep well—to fathom. They haven't even the wits to pick up a safe opportunity like this, but are determined to play into the hands of the "advanced" party, which is advancing in no doubtful way towards Socialism.

Our friend Mr. Cunninghame Graham was probably not particularly disappointed at the adverse vote against him about the instructions to the British delegate to the Berne Conference. To be invited to a Conference and to understand perfectly well what would be the only important subject discussed there, and then to say Yes, we will send delegates, but those delegates shall not take part in the discussion of the real subject which the Conference has been called together to discuss—this would undoubtedly seem to the dispassionate observer from another planet a piece of absurdity impossible to men claiming to hold a dignified and responsible position; but to us living on the Earth under a bureaucratic government, it is a quite familiar incident.

In short, it is the position of the Whig-Tory or Tory-Whig governments that we are such fools as to put up with. How could it be otherwise? What would happen if they were to allow the discussion of subjects affecting the welfare of the mass of the population? Clearly the preliminary to the useful discussion of these subjects would be that such governments should take themselves off; and, as it is the business of their lives not to go off, from his point of view Mr. Morley was right in declaring the question unpractical, although, as he knows well enough, all thinking workmen throughout civilisation are (rightly or wrongly) crying out for practical discussion of this subject of the limitation of the hours of labour.

Yet the position of Lord Salisbury's Government is more logical than Mr. Morley's, who blames them for refusing to discuss the question and then points out that it cannot be discussed; and his arguments against the limitation of labour are of the stale kind which would be quite as effective against the limitation of the working day of women and children as of adult males. In fact in this matter Mr. Morley is not really considering the position of the workers in their factories and workshops, but his own position as a politician in the House of Commons: that is why he is so anxious to ticket himself as a Whig. If the Whigs should be driven at any time to legislate about the working day, we shall find him naively assuming that all liberal-minded men were always in favour of the eight-hour day: just as he assumes that they were always in favour of Home Rule.

Mr. Cunninghame Graham must be thanked for giving the House of Commons and the Liberal party, including their organ the Daily News, another opportunity for showing the people how little they have to hope from them; and moreover the question is one that must be discussed, and I repeat will be, in spite of the attempt of the so-called leaders of the trades unions to burk the discussion. For my part I think that "unpractical" as the question is, legislation limiting the working hours of adult males will be forced on the Government, and that before very long.

If that legislation were effective, it would certainly give more leisure to the workers, which of itself would be a great gain whatever came with it, and lower wages for the mass of the workers, the unskilled, could not accompany it, because they are already working for mere subsistence wages. Also the struggle between the masters and the men would be embittered by it, because the masters would try to force down the wages of the skilled or half-skilled workmen, and to give less wages for the eight hours than they now give for the nine, ten, or twelve hours. Competition for profits would force them to do this, and the men of course would be obliged to resist this, so that there would be fresh strikes and fresh discontent throughout the world of labour, which would further our Cause.

On the other hand, the masters would be driven to meet the comparative scarcity of labour by carrying still further and faster the development of machinery and the organisation of labour, which is such a great feature of these days, of the last ten years especially; so that if less labour hours were available, less would be needed. And the improvement in machinery would increase the intensity of labour, so that the amount done in each hour and the consequent wear and tear to the workman would be greater than under the longer working-day. All these would disappoint the hope of those who think that the eight hours day would give more employment to the mass of workers. The system of wage-slavery and the profit-market necessitates "a reserve army of labour," i.e., of a starvation army waiting for the short crisis when it suits the capitalist slave-holders to take on all the hands whom they can sweep up from the workhouse and the street corners; and no shortening of the hours of labour will do away with this wretched state of things that does not bring with it obvious revolution, that is to say a change in the basis of society.

The workers must settle for themselves whether the gain of leisure, which it may be assumed would be the result of a limitation of the day's labour, would so far outweigh these drawbacks as to make it worth their while to carry on the agitation for it vigorously. But they must certainly settle it for themselves; if they allow the gentlemen of the House of Commons to settle it for them, they will find as usual that they will have something given them with the right hand to be taken back with the left.

In any case I beg them not to expect too much from the success of such an agitation, and above all not to think that it would relieve them of one scruple's-weight of their duty to struggle for the destruction of our present class-society. Mr. Graham, unconsciously perhaps, gave us a warning on this matter in his speech the other night. He reminded the House that for 24 years the eight hours' day had obtained in Victoria, and said that no harm had come of it. We know from the definite information of our comrades in the antipodes that a revolution is just as necessary there as here; and so it is, and will be all over the world as long as there are privileged classes living on the disinherited classes.

Tennyson's northern farmer heard his cantering horses' hoofs play the tune of "Proputty, Proputty, Proputty!" No wonder; it is the one thought in the mind of all respectable people. Some luckless persons the other day at St. Bees ate a poisoned joint of beef, and one (a lady) died of it, and the others were made very ill. Says the daily press anent this luckless business: "The occurrence is a most unfortunate one, as St. Bees is so popular and Mr. Scott is a new tenant of the hotel." The poor lady's epitaph then must be a moan over the lost "Proputty, proputty, proputty!" W. M.

We are surprised that the editor of Daylight, who has often done such good service to the cause of the people, should put on his front page that sentimental lie of some inventive and not too scrupulous journalist, concerning a Russian lady who shot herself in preference to shooting his most gracious Majesty the Czar of Russia. At any rate, if he had put it in, he might have edited it a little. It is funny surely to find the removal of a cruel, bloody, and merciless despot termed by a democratic paper "a foul deed," while in the next sentence the same paper affirms that she committed suicide to escape "her odious destiny." The notice then winds up by stating that she has been "interred at the cost of the Russian Government." Let the dead bury their dead, Mr. Editor, but let us preach the gospel of the Social Revolution, and not waste time and tears over the persons who never existed, save in the brains of an inventive journalist subsidised by the agents of Russian despotism.

A CHAT WITH A BURGLAR.

By PERPETUAL MOTION.

If I were a man like every other, it would be altogether useless to write these lines. I am a crank, a crotch-monger, an iconoclast—anything you like; but in my own estimation I am an inventor and a philosopher. I am so much of a philosopher that it needs great restraint to prevent my developing, in point blank discharge of accumulated philosophical deductions, a whole system of, not one, but several universes. To tell a story in a concise, business-like manner, stringing one little fact to another little fact, is with me one of the hardest of tasks. I see philosophy in every thing—as undoubtedly there is, and everything whatever existing has its causes, its relations to something else. If, for instance— But there I am again!

That I am an inventor is the natural sequel to my being a philosopher. A man who, like me, sees to the bottom of things, must of necessity be an inventor. As I know how Nature works, I can imitate her—that is, invent machines. I am in this respect tolerably well known to most firms who have anything to do with new inventions, and I have already spent a little fortune on models, patterns for the moulders, etc., while my library is well stocked with all those costly works of the natural philosophers which everybody reads nowadays and very few fully understand. It is a sign of the degeneracy of our days that philosophers of my stamp are getting rich, while it has been an axiom from the oldest days of ancient Greece to within a decade of our own time that a philosopher must have the appearance of a tramp and be as poor as Job in his days of adversity. Yes, things have mended in this respect, and as I am going to invent perpetual motion, I am as good as a millionaire already. The only thing that troubles me is, what shall I do with all that money? I am getting rich in spite of myself. I am a philosopher first and a rich man afterwards; and as I have found in the ancient philosophies of Hindostan the true truth—namely, the deception of matter—I am not going to be ruled by matter, but quite the reverse. But here I am again!

So far my inventions are not of great import, but they pay handsomely. That automatic jam-distributor of mine has taken hugely with those large working-men restaurateurs who sell their slices of buttered or "jam'd" bread by the thousands every day. Mr. Pearce sends me word that my automatic jam-distributor is doing wonders. By merely turning a crank 4,000 slices of bread are evenly "jam'd" in ten minutes, which almost equals in speed the capacity of our great printing presses. But somehow or other I am not proud of this invention. It is commonplace, and, I am sorry to say, not original enough.

The fact is, the main idea was suggested to me by the large inking rollers I have seen used in printing-presses. Even my second invention, the philosophical fly-catcher, smacks a little of the inking-roller and the automatic jam-distributor; and I might excuse these mere vagaries of a great mind by a reference to Mill's "association of ideas," but as I am cut out by nature for greater things, I can at least use the money gained for those profound investigations which will lead to perpetual motion. That the life of an inventor is not altogether an easy one, can be shown by a letter I have received this morning about my philosophical fly-catcher. Writes this ruffian:

"Sir,—Your philosophical fly-catcher is a sham and a — nuisance. I have made a calculation and have found out that it costs just three-ha'pence to kill one fly. At this rate it would be much cheaper to hire a boy to catch flies. Yesterday the hair of my mother-in-law got entangled in your — machine, and I could only release her by cutting off the few remaining locks which the vicissitudes of married life had left her. Take my advice, and turn your talents to shoeblacking or tract-distribution."

I may mention here that my philosophical fly-catcher is based upon the pernicious habit of the common house-fly to crawl over the sweet innocent faces of sleeping babies. Taking advantage of this habit, I constructed a machine representing on its upper side a sleeping baby. From this reason I called it a philosophical fly-catcher. The feet of the fly are caught in the filaments of the sham face, and are brushed off by a revolving apparatus inside the well-expanded cheek of this terrible infant. The fly then drops off, legless and helpless, and while it reflects over the question What the deuce shall I do without legs? is swept into a watery grave by an automatically-produced flow of water. I think that the mother-in-law of that ghoulish letter-writer must have kissed the sleeping baby—which is not so silly as might be supposed, as I have employed the best artistic talent in London for the production of a truly angelic baby face. Her hair must have encountered the same action of the revolving brushes which I designed to carry off the legs of the flies; but I intend to give warning to all purchasers of the sleeping baby and fly-catcher that it must not be kissed. But fancy this philistine utterly disregarding the beauty of killing off flies in such a scientific, truly philosophico-mechanical way, and preferring the humdrum style of a daub of jam and a wet dish-rag instead!

I am living alone with a lazy tom-cat, in a detached villa in the neighbourhood of Regent's Park. I keep no company, going to no places of amusement, and doing nothing but thinking and now and then a little amateur tinkering on experiments. In a spacious shed specially built against a high garden wall I arranged a workshop for the multifarious necessities of "first experiments." I employ a worn-out engineer to assist me in the construction of new apparatuses, and an old teacher of mathematics also belongs to my staff, whose duty it is to attend to the geometrical and arithmetical business of my inventions, having found out that without curves and parallelograms and square and cube roots, no inventor can hope to be listened to. It is true I know very little of these things, and old Jones knows it all, while at the same time he could not invent a nut-cracker. Being an old toper, he and the worn-out engineer—as thirsty a soul as ever pulled a throttle-valve—spend most of their time in the "Yellow Lion" not far off; and I allow this sort of thing only on the strength of the axiom that genius must be judged separately. I have noticed that old Jones is never more keenly alive to the mathematical relations of curves as when he can't walk straight; while the shaky engineer—Potts is his name—has more than once been visited by flashes of genius which would never have been attracted to these quarters if the fumes of alcohol had not penetrated to the inmost recesses of his being.

As I am total abstainer, disdaining to accept anything from the mysterious forces surrounding men by the attraction of deceptive spirit-matter (I may say here that I hold matter to be non-existent, spirit being the only true reality), it is really a sacrifice I am offering to the interests of science to have these two old toppers about me. They are as unimaginative as mathematics and applied geometry can well be, but they are faithful, and as their very existence depends on my liberality, they would be willing to risk their necks for me. Especially the old mathematician possesses a courage altogether out of the common, for which he has given me ample proofs during experiments in which unknown factors might have cut us both off without a moment's warning.

At nights and on Sundays I am quite alone. I cook my own meals, like a true philosopher, trying vegetarianism for a certain period, to observe the effects upon my brain and my capacity for hard study. Then I try flesh diet to see the alterations in mental and moral arrangement of the psychical forces. When I am labouring under a great idea I starve myself involuntarily. The invention of the philosophical fly-catcher was only possible by four weeks rigid fasting. In order to invent perpetual motion I know I shall have to reduce myself to a skeleton. But what are the sufferings of my flesh—at best only deceptions of fancy—compared to the gain for humanity! No more horse-torturing, no more man-torturing, no more snorting and puffing and exploding of the steam-engine, no more soot and black smoke, hellish noise, and colliery disaster. And the beauty of it is that it is so easy! Only the finishing off of those primeval inventions of the hammer, the axe, the lever, the screw! The reason that perpetual motion was left for me to invent is that men assumed its complexity, and laboured with self-created difficulties, instead of going to the cause of all mechanical action, which is simply—

There I am again! Hang philosophy, and come to business! I have already said that I am getting rich. But I do not hoard my money. What I do not need for myself I give away. Money, as matter, shall not get the best of me. I send my spare money to hospitals, special schools, or any other public institution working for the advancement of mankind. I do not like popularity. All I wish to do is to put before the world the example of a self-sufficient philosopher and to realise in my own conduct those great truths which I shall represent some of these days.

It was on a fine evening last autumn, when I was, as usual, sitting in my library and deeply meditating on the problem of producing circular motion by mere pressure, a pressure with hardly any velocity, when I was startled by the sound of stealthily approaching feet through the broad hall dividing the south and north set of rooms in the first story. I always left the front door of my villa unlocked while I was up, and anyone wishing to enter unawares could do so by a little precaution. Generally there was nothing left in the house which any thief or burglar would greatly care to take off, and I never troubled myself about such fears, but just that day I had received a heavy payment from a manufacturing firm for the use of one of my patents, and the money—about a thousand pounds in brand-new bank-notes—lay snugly between the books in my bookcase. It had been too late to dispose of it in the usual way. I intended to send £900 to the Home for Incurables in —, £50 to Professor L—, whose masterly exposition of physical laws had assisted me more than anything else, £25 to a poor working-man about whom I had read in a morning paper, reserving only £25 for my private uses. The presence of that money flashed at once through my mind on hearing those ominous footsteps. I am a very nervous man, but not a coward. I feared nothing for myself, not even for the money, but there is always in the unexpected an element of terror which the severest mental discipline cannot eliminate.

AGAINST VAIN PLEASURE.

THE world takes from us more than she can give ;
 In vain we trim our deeds to her command ;
 In vain, seduced by many a promise bland,
 We bow before her idols negative.
 Let the world go ; each his own life must live ;
 But the poor coward that has laid his hand
 On Custom's altar, spins a rope of sand,
 And bales the boundless ocean with a sieve.

A wayfarer's "Good night" when day is done,
 A mother with her babe, the merry noise
 Of rosy children playing in the sun,
 A walk across the fields with prattling boys,—
 These sights and sounds such wealth for me have won,
 I know that we are born for simple joys.

ANARCHY AND COMMUNISM.

COMRADES,—Whilst I am glad to see that my letter of April 13 has led to an interesting discussion, I regret that William Morris has been the only Socialist who has criticised the Anarchist position. It is so important to my mind that we should get a perfectly clear conception of the state of society we desire to bring about, and how we ought to act now and during the revolutionary period, that I very much desire to see more interest taken in the politics of Socialism. When the critical time comes, those who know what they want and how to act to get it will take the masses of the people with them. If State Socialism has the most numerous and most active adherents, State Socialism will be established ; if Anarchism is most popular, an Anarchist condition of society will result from the social revolution. But the Communists who are neither decidedly against nor decidedly in favour of government will have no real influence in the reorganisation of society. They will go with the crowd, and are just as likely to support the despotism of a revolutionary government as they are to oppose it.

We Socialists ought to make up our minds on two things. 1. What sort of society we are trying to realise. 2. How we should act in order to bring it about.

As regards the first point I think the members of the Socialist League and many of the Social Democrats are agreed with the Anarchist-Communists. In the words of William Morris, the society of the future is to be "a society which does not know the meaning of the words rich and poor or the rights of property, or law or legality or nationality : a society which has no consciousness of being governed ; in which equality of condition is a matter of course." Another definition is that of the Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost, of America, a State Socialist, who looks upon Anarchy, as many English Social Democrats do, as a future development. He describes the ideal as "co-operation without force or authority except that which inheres in natural law." This he says is "the highest possible conception of human society."

Now our position is that anything like compromise tends to prevent the realisation of this ideal society and does not even result in temporary good. Let us go for the whole thing, and let us rule our actions now, immediately, as far as we can in accordance with our ideals. We may not triumph in the universal revolution which is close upon us, but our chances of success will be increased exactly in proportion to the number of Socialists who declare themselves against all compromise with property and authority. Besides there is a vast amount of unconscious Anarchism here in England as elsewhere. People are rebels in spirit if not in act ; they grumble against and resist whenever possible the tyranny of the existing government ; and surely it is our business to encourage this spirit of revolt against dictation and coercion, to help develop individual initiative, and to persuade people to rely upon themselves and not to expect that the government which keeps them down will help to raise them up. To destroy the faith and respect which still exists in and for government and laws is in our view as important as to point out the evils of private property in land and capital.

Comrade Morris says Anarchist-Communists are "vague." In all good fellowship may I say that I think, not only that the vagueness rests with the Communists who are neither Anarchists nor Authoritarians, but that this vagueness has in the past caused many Socialists who wanted a political as well as an economic faith, to become Social Democrats instead of members of the Socialist League.

Comrade Morris brings forward the old question of majorities and minorities, and asks what is to be done in the case of a piece of business which must be either done or left undone, would the small minority have to give way or the large majority ? Now, no logical reason has ever been brought forward to show why the minority should give way to the majority, or the majority to the minority, for as has been proved over and over again counting noses doesn't prove the truth or falsehood of a thing. If on a committee, for instance, there are two opinions as to a certain matter, it is just as reasonable and rational to decide by a toss up as by a vote. A minority of one may be right, and so may a majority of ever so many. When a minority gives in to a majority on a committee, it is because the difference of opinion is not very great, and practically they are converted to the views of the majority. If the difference was sufficiently important neither party would give in. They would throw the business over. But let us take a concrete example as is suggested. A number of men and women agree to form a Socialist community or village, and they agree that there shall be equality, liberty, and fraternity in all their dealings with one another. A section of the community wishes to build a large common dwelling for the whole village, another section wishes that each family shall inhabit a separate cottage ; how do they settle it ? Either by the section who want the common dwelling having a common dwelling for themselves and letting the others have the separate cottages, or by one party voluntarily giving way to the other. It would be absurd to try coercion. And then in tilling the land of the village, there are perhaps two or more methods which could be employed ; why should not both be tried ? or, if that is not possible, why should not the advantages of each method be properly discussed until one party gave in ? If they were reasonable people living in good fellowship with each other, the weakest in argument would naturally give way. The pig-headedness which the opponents of Anarchism want to ascribe to so large a proportion of the human race does not, in reality, exist. In every-day life, even now when there is so much to irritate us and set our backs up, people are always giving way to one another in order to maintain friendly relations and their advantages. Comrade Morris may not think my concrete example a good one, and if so, I hope he will state a few cases in which he thinks coercion by majority-rule would have to be used to settle a difference.

In conclusion, let me quote the platform of the International Working People's Association, the organisation of the American Anarchists, as agreed to at the Pittsburg Congress in October, 1883 :—

1. Destruction of the existing class rule by all means, i.e., by energetic, relentless, revolutionary and international action.

2. Establishment of a free society based upon co-operative organisation of production.

3. Free exchange of equivalent products by and between the productive organisations without commerce and profit-mongery.

4. Organisation of education on a secular, scientific, and equal basis for both sexes.

5. Equal rights for all without distinction of sex or race.

6. Regulation of public affairs by free contracts between the autonomous (independent) communes and associations, resting on a federalistic basis.

Now I think most members of the Socialist League agree to every one of these planks ; and I hold with Adolph Fischer that "a Socialist who is not a State Socialist must necessarily be an Anarchist," and if the members of the Socialist League cannot falsify this opinion, it is for them to say which camp they belong to.—Yours fraternally,
 JAMES BLACKWELL.

EDUCATION IN INDIA.—The increase in the number of schools in the Bengal Presidency last year was 6,140, and in the number of pupils attending the schools 90,843. If the paternal British Government of India continues its beneficent administration on these lines, they may soon expect a grateful return.—A. B.

UNDER AN ELM-TREE;

OR,

THOUGHTS IN THE COUNTRY-SIDE.

MIDSUMMER in the country—here you may walk between the fields and hedges that are as it were one huge nosegay for you, redolent of bean-flowers and clover and sweet hay and elder-blossom. The cottage gardens are bright with flowers, the cottages themselves mostly models of architecture in their way. Above them towers here and there the architecture proper of days bygone, when every craftsman was an artist and brought definite intelligence to bear upon his work. Man in the past, nature in the present, seem to be bent on pleasing you and making all things delightful to your senses; even the burning dusty road has a look of luxury as you lie on the strip of roadside green, and listen to the blackbirds singing, surely for your benefit, and, I was going to say as if they were paid to do it, but I was wrong, for as it is they seem to be doing their best.

And all, or let us say most things, are brilliantly alive. The shadowy bleak in the river down yonder, which is—ignorant of the fate that Barking Reach is preparing for its waters—sapphire blue under this ruffling wind and cloudless sky, and barred across here and there with the pearly white-flowered water-weeds, every yard of its banks a treasure of delicate design, meadowsweet and dewberry and comfrey and bed-straw—from the bleak in the river, amongst the labyrinth of grasses, to the starlings busy in the new shorn fields, or about the grey ridges of the hay, all is eager, and I think all is happy that is not anxious.

What is that thought that has come into one's head as one turns round in the shadow of the roadside elm? A country-side worth fighting for if that were necessary, worth taking trouble to defend its peace. I raise my head, and betwixt the elm-boughs I see far off a grey buttressed down rising over the sea of green and blue-green meadows and fields, and dim on the flank of it over its buttresses can see a quaint figure made by cutting the short turf away from the chalk of the hill-side; a figure which represents a White Horse according to the heraldry of the period, eleven hundred years ago. Hard by that hill-side the country people of the day did verily fight for the peace and loveliness of this very country where I lie, and coming back from their victory scored the image of the White Horse as a token of their valour, and, who knows? perhaps as an example for their descendants to follow.

For a little time it makes the blood stir in me as I think of that, but as I watch the swallows flitting past me betwixt hedge and hedge, or mounting over the hedge in an easy sweep and hawking over the bean-field beyond, another thought comes over me. These live things I have been speaking of, bleak and swallows and starlings and black-birds, are all after their kind beautiful and graceful, not one of them is lacking in its due grace and beauty; but yesterday as I was passing by a hay-field there was an old red-roan cart-horse looking seriously but good-humouredly at me from a gap in the hedge, and I stopped to make his acquaintance; and I am sorry to say that in spite of his obvious merits he was ugly, Roman-nosed, shambling, ungainly: yet how useful had he been—for others. Also the same day (but not in the same field) I saw some other animals, male and female, with whom also I made acquaintance, for the male ones at least were thirsty. And these animals, both male and female, were ungraceful, unbeautiful, as ungainly as the roan cart-horse; yet they were obviously useful, for they were making hay before my eyes. Then I bethought me that as I had seen starlings in Hertfordshire that were of the same race as the Thames side starlings, so I had seen or heard of featherless two-legged animals of the same race as the thirsty creatures in the hay-field; they had been sculptured in the frieze of the Parthenon, painted on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, imagined in literature as the heroes and heroines of romance; nay, when people had created in their minds a god of the universe, creator of all that was, is, or shall be, they were driven to represent him as one of that same race to which the thirsty haymakers belonged; as though supreme intelligence and the greatest measure of gracefulness and beauty and majesty were at their highest in the race of those ungainly animals.

Under the elm-tree these things puzzle me, and again my thoughts return to the bold men of that very country-side, who, coming back from Ashdown field, scored that White Horse to look down for ever on the valley of the Thames; and I thought it likely that they had this much in common with the starlings and the bleak, that there was more equality amongst them than we are used to now, and that there would have been more models available amongst them for Woden than one would be like to find in the Thames-side meadows.

Under the elm-tree I don't ask myself whether that is owing to the greater average intelligence of men at the present day, and to the progress of humanity made since the time of the only decent official that England ever had, Alfred the Great, to wit; for indeed the place and time are not favourable to such questions, which seem sheer nonsense amidst of all that waste of superabundant beauty and pleasure held out to men who cannot take it or use it, unless some chance rich idler may happen to stray that way. My thoughts turn back to the haymakers and their hopes, and I remember that yesterday morning I said to a bystander, "Mr. So-and-so (the farmer) is late in sending his men into the hay-field."

Quoth he, "You see, sir, Mr. So-and-so is short-handed."

"How's that?" said I, pricking up my Socialist ears.

"Well, sir," said he, "these men are the old men and women bred in the village, and pretty much past work; and the young men with more work in them, they do think that they ought to have more wages than them, and Mr. So-and-so, he won't pay it. So you see, he be short-handed."

As I turned away, thinking over all the untold, untellable details of misery that lay within this shabby, sordid story, another one met my ears. A labourer of the village comes to a farmer and says to him that he really can't work for 9s. a week any more, but must have 10s. Says the farmer, "Get your 10s. somewhere else then." The man turns away to two month's lack of employment, and then comes back begging for his 9s. slavery.

Commonplace stories of unsupported strikes, you will say. Indeed they are, if not they would be easily remedied; the casual tragedy cut short; the casual wrongdoer branded as a person out of humanity. But since they are so commonplace—

What will happen, say my gloomy thoughts to me under the elm tree, with all this country beauty so tragically incongruous in its richness with the country misery which cannot feel its existence? Well, if we must still be slaves and slaveholders, it will not last long; the Battle of Ashdown will be forgotten for the last commercial crisis; Alfred's heraldry will yield to the lions on the half-crown. The architecture of the crafts-gildsmen will tumble down, or be "restored" for the benefit of the hunters of picturesque, who, hopeless themselves, are incapable of understanding the hopes of past days, or the expression of them. The beauty of the landscape will be exploited and artificialised for the sake of the villa-dweller's purses where it is striking enough to touch their jaded appetites; but in quiet places like this it will vanish year by year (as indeed it is now doing) under the attacks of the most grovelling commercialism.

Yet think I to myself under the elm-tree, whatever England, once so beautiful, may become, it will be good enough for us if we set no hope before us but the continuance of a population of slaves and slave-holders for the country which we pretend to love, while we use it and our sham love for it as a stalking-horse for robbery of the poor at home and abroad. The worst outward ugliness and vulgarity will be good enough for such sneaks and cowards.

Let me turn the leaf and find a new picture, or my holiday is spoilt; and don't let some of my Socialist friends with whom I have wrangled about the horrors of London, say, "This is all that can come of your country life." For as the round of the seasons under our system of landlord farmer and labourer produces in the country pinching parsimony and dulness, so does the "excitement of intellectual life" in the cities produce the slum under the capitalist system of turning out and selling market wares not for use but for waste. Turn the page I say. The hayfield is a pretty sight this month seen under the elm, as the work goes forward on the other side of the way opposite to the bean-field, till you look at the haymakers closely. Suppose the haymakers were friends working for friends on land which was theirs, as many as were needed, with leisure and hope ahead of them instead of hopeless toil and anxiety, need their useful labour for themselves and their neighbours cripple and disfigure them and knock them out of the shape of men fit to represent the Gods and Heroes? And if under such conditions a new Ashdown had to be fought (against capitalist robbers this time), the new White Horse would look down on the home of men as wise as the starlings in their equality, and so perhaps as happy.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

INTERNATIONAL SOCIALIST WORKING-MEN'S CONGRESS.

PARIS, 14TH TO 21ST JULY, 1889.

REPORT OF THE ORGANISING COMMISSION.

THE Socialists of France could not let the anniversary of the bourgeois revolution pass without affirming the imminence of a working-class revolution, that on the ruins of a capitalistic society shall proclaim, alike for men and women, equal conditions of labour and equal means of existence and enjoyment.

Wherefore the trades' unions and Socialist organisations of France resolved at the Bordeaux and Troyes congresses to convene an international congress during the Exhibition. The solidarity of the workers, which the bourgeois reactionaries had thought to drown in blood, would thus have a glorious opportunity of proving that it had not been affected by the crushing of the Commune and the proscription of the International Working-Men's Association, inasmuch as, born of capitalistic production and exchange, it defied persecution and outlived defeat.

To organise this Congress, the Bordeaux National Council of Trades' Unions and the Troyes Executive Committee of the Socialist Federation appointed a Commission constituted by the different workmen's and Socialist organisations. With a view to emphasizing the work of union with which it was charged, the Commission, at its first meeting, invited the Syndical Chambers and Socialist groups of Paris to nominate delegates to participate in its labours. Thus open to all, our Commission may be considered as truly representative of the Socialist proletariat of France, bound, in spite of difference of opinion, by one common purpose, the international union of the workers.

On the other hand, an international corporative congress, held in London shortly after the Bordeaux Congress, resolved to call an International Congress in 1889, and notwithstanding the presence of Farjat, delegated by upwards of 250 non-Possibilist trades' unions, the Possibilists alone were charged with the organisation of the Congress, in total disregard of the fact that this was wrongfully taking sides in the French differences and defrauding all non-Possibilists of an indisputable right.

Rightly concerned by the calling of two international congresses simultaneously and in the same city, the foreign Socialists were bound to do their utmost to avert such a scandal by an attempt to fuse the two congresses. On the initiative of the German Socialists, a private international conference was called for the Hague on the 28th February of this year. Were present: Bebel and Liebnicht, delegated by the Social-Democrats of Germany; Scherer and Reichel, delegated by the Socialist party of Switzerland; Ansele and Volders, delegated by the Socialist party of Belgium; Croll and Domela Nieuwenhuis, delegated by the Socialist party of Holland; Paul Lafargue, delegated by the National Council of the Syndical Chambers of France and the Executive Committee of the Socialist Federation of France. The delegates of the Socialist party of Denmark and William Morris excused themselves for not attending the conference, but intimated their adhesion to resolutions for the convening of a united International Socialist Congress. The Federation of Socialist Workmen, or the Possibilist party, invited on the same terms, and at the same time, as the workmen and Socialists of France, declined to send a delegate to the Hague conference, declaring that they would not allow the mandate given them by the London Congress, and which they intended appropriating to themselves, to be discussed. This was converting the duty to convene an International Congress into a right that should supersede the will of the Socialist parties of Europe. Now the London Congress was not qualified to pass resolutions binding on Socialist parties, because, though attended by Socialists, the Congress was not a Socialist but a corporative Congress, in the hands of the parliamentarians of the trades' unions, who went to the length of threatening the foreign delegates with eviction from the hall that they had hired: they had, indeed, taken measures to exclude from their congress the Socialist parties of Germany and Austria, as well as all other than manual labourers.

The Socialists would have been justified in disregarding a mandate conferred by such a congress; as to the Socialist organisations of France, they were resolved to abstain from sending representatives to an International Congress convened by the Possibilists. This resolution was motivated by the capital fact that the Possibilists, by openly acting as the bond-servants of the bourgeois parties and the electoral agents of successive ministries, had forfeited all claim to that independence which a Socialist party cannot renounce without abdicating.

Notwithstanding these considerations, the Hague conference, having international concord at heart, forbore to contest the validity of the mandate conferred on the Possibilists, and confined itself to specifying the conditions on which the Socialist parties represented at the Hague should participate in the International Congress. In a first circular, the Possibilists, treating the Congress as their property, had arrogated to themselves the right of fixing the date and order of the day of the Congress, and of imposing a mode of verification of credentials that made the admission of French delegates a matter of their good pleasure.

These impudent pretensions were unanimously set aside by the delegates to the conference, who passed the following resolution: "The undersigned invite the Federation of the Socialist Workmen of France, in virtue of the mandate conferred by the London Congress in 1888, to call the International Congress for Paris, in accord with the working-men's Socialist organisations of France and other countries."

This convocation, signed by the representatives of the working-men's and Socialist organisations, to be brought to the knowledge, with the least delay possible, of the working-classes and Socialists of Europe and America, read as follows:

The Conference of the Hague resolved:

- (1) That the Paris International Congress be held from the 14th to 21st of July, 1889.
- (2) That the Congress be open to the workmen and Socialists of all countries on conditions compatible with the political laws in force there.
- (3) That the Congress be sovereign with respect to the verification of credentials and the fixing of the order of the day.

The Conference resolved, provisionally, that the following questions be treated:

- (a) International labour legislation; Regulation, by law, of the working-day (day-work, night-work, holidays, work of adult males, women, and children).
- (b) Inspection of factories and workshops, as well as of domestic industries.
- (c) Ways and means to obtain these demands.

The Belgian delegates were charged with officially communicating to the Possibilist party the resolutions of the Hague Conference.

Citizen Volders, having accomplished his mission to the Possibilist Council, came to our committee. He informed us that the Possibilists refused to allow the French workers and Socialists to sign the international circular of convocation, as also to recognise the right of the Congress to directly verify the credentials.

The National Council of the trades' unions, the executive committee of the Socialist Federation, and the Congress organising commission unanimously resolved to conform to the Hague resolutions.

So great was the desire to effect a union that the foreign Socialists endeavoured to persuade the Possibilists to reconsider their refusal. They addressed themselves to the Social Democratic Federation of England, which is in friendly relationship with the Possibilists, and urged the same to use its influence in deciding the Possibilists to acquiesce in the reasonable demands of the Hague Conference.

The Social Democratic Federation was as unsuccessful as had been the delegate to the International Conference. The Possibilists, on the contrary, took advantage of the forced inaction to which these efforts at conciliation had condemned the executive committee; they intrigued right and left, communicated perfidious attacks on our Congress to the bourgeois press, calumniated our organising commission, and despatched delegates to Belgium, Spain, and Portugal with a commission to win over adherents to the Possibilist Congress at any price.

In presence of this insuperable determination of the Possibilists and their party to divide the French proletariat, the Socialist parties of Europe resolved to act; leaving to the Possibilists the responsibility of a counter-Congress, that we had done all in our power to prevent, they, jointly with us, issued the convocation already published in Commonweal.

Before the publication of our first circular, a Congress of the Belgian Workmen's Party had been held at Jolimont; the Possibilists lost no time in sending delegates to the same, in the hope of burking the Hague resolutions, but, despite their efforts, the Jolimont Congress resolved by 39 votes against 33 that a delegate be sent to the Possibilist Congress, and by 55 votes against 22 that it be represented at our International Congress.

The Democratic Socialist Party of Denmark, at a meeting held on the 23rd of May, passed the following resolution:—"This meeting profoundly deplores the calling of two Workmen's Congresses for Paris, and resolves that the Danish Democratic Socialist Party adhere to neither of the two so long as two Congresses are maintained, but urges the council of the party to bring its influence to bear on the parties in dispute, so as to amalgamate the two Congresses."

The Social Democratic Federation of England alone, setting itself against all existing Socialist organisations of Europe and America, has espoused the Possibilist cause, without, it may be presumed, pretending, by its solitary presence, to impress an international character on a Possibilist Congress so innocent of all international socialist elements.

The workers of both hemispheres thus find themselves in presence of a unique Congress having a claim to act as their representative and interpreter, for it alone has been convened by the Socialist parties at large, and it alone will count in its body delegates of that fraction of the world's proletariat which is conscious of its aim, and resolved to rear, on the ground of common property, the emancipation of labour and humanity.

It is with a view to obviating all misunderstanding, and frustrating all manoeuvres of the eleventh hour, that the organising commission has decided, for the benefit of International Socialists, to publish an account of the efforts at conciliation and union that have been made prior to the meeting of the Congress.

For the Organising Commission and by order,

DAUMAS, Chairman of the Sitting.
BESSET, JACLARD, VAILLANT, and LAFARGUE, Secretaries.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE IN LEEDS.—The labourers in the Leeds building trade are waking out of their Rip van Winkle sleep, and an organisation is in progress which bids fair to make a sensation among their masters. Last Sunday a meeting of about 3,000 men was held in Vicars Croft—Paylor, Hill, Sweeney, and Maguire encouraging the men to form a labourers' union, inclusive of bricklayers, plasterers, slate-layers, and joiners' labourers, with the result that at the end of the meeting 200 names were given in and 25s. collected. In the afternoon a crowded meeting was held at the club rooms, Clarendon Buildings, and a provisional committee was elected with a view to taking immediate steps to organise the labourers of the town. Meantime an aggressive front is being shown. The men are demanding an advance of a halfpenny per hour. They contend that during the past ten years wages have gone down 25 per cent. They will continue to meet at the branch rooms of the Socialist League until further developments.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Tram Slaves.

The agitation has now reached the North of London. The men employed by the North London Tramway Company and the London Street Tramway Company are bad off even for tram slaves, worse than they are even upon some poorer lines. This is especially the case with the men employed upon the steam-cars of the North London Tramway Company. According to the Star, the conductors work from 14 to 15 hours a-day, without any relief whatever, Sunday and week-days alike.

The men of the South London Tramway Company met at Sydney Hall, Battersea, in the early hours of the morning of 25th of June. Our comrade John Burns spoke at the meeting, and told the men that if they could not afford to pay 3d. a week, only the price of a pint of ale, to the Union, they deserved to work as many hours as could be crowded into a week. This blunt sentence is quite true. It is certain that if the men won't help themselves no one else can help them.

We are glad to hear that the Union now numbers over 1,000 strong. We are also glad to see that employees of some of the companies that do not treat their men so badly, are joining the Union in order to help their more unfortunate brethren. This is what all workers must do if they would free their class from its present slavery. The principle of the devil take the hindmost must perish before the feeling that the sufferings of the feeblest and most unhappy concern us all, and that in fighting their battle we are fighting our own.

The London Tramway Company have sacked two more men for joining the Union. One of them, Condon, has a wife and six children, and as one of the children was sick, he watched at its bedside till four in the morning. Through this he arrived four minutes late, and received his dismissal at once. Col. Davidson would not listen to his explanation, but said "Here's your license," and discharged him. He had served the Company for eleven years, and yet was sacked for being four minutes late. Can it be doubted that his membership of the Union explains it all? It is a great pity the gallant colonel cannot find courage to tell the man the real reason for his dismissal. The pretended reason for the dismissal of Driver W. H. Smith, who has been in the Company's employment for nine years, was that his horse looked "rather bad." What a pitiful excuse! Driver Smith had been very active in the formation of the Union; that was his real offence. The bullying cowardice of these slave drivers should teach the slaves how easy it would be to make them bite the dust, if the men were only united and determined.

On Saturday, the Cardiff tram slaves revolted, for the third time during the last six months, against their odious slavery of long hours and starvation wages. The slave-drivers endeavoured to start two cars manned by the scabs, but they got a warm reception, being surrounded by dense crowds and assailed with stones, rotten eggs, etc. One of the cars was thrown off the lines. The affair concluded by the chief of the police writing to one of the managing directors, and asking him to take the cars off the lines, as he feared their presence would lead to a riot! It is quite evident that the chief of police isn't suited for his position; he ought to have rejoiced at the opportunity for a wholesale bludgeoning of the strikers. Can't Mr. Matthews lend Munro for a few days to the Cardiff tram directors; we could spare him here.

It is good news to hear that on Monday, July 1st, the Cardiff men gained a victory by their indomitable courage and determination. It was time when grave-stones were laid across the lines, bricks and stones were flying through the air, and the heads of scabs and passengers were broken. The whole available police force of 150 men could do nothing against the popular storm, so the masters gave in. The following terms have been agreed upon: The men's wages will commence at 23s., and rise a shilling a week each year till the maximum of 28s. is reached. The men are allowed half a day off weekly, and no man is to suffer for his share in the recent proceedings. It is estimated that the damage done to the Company's "property" reaches £400. London tram-men, here is an example for you.

The Seamen's Strike.

At Liverpool, on Thursday, June 27th, another "violent" scene occurred. Some rats were signing on board the steamer 'Teneriffe,' when suddenly they were surrounded by a horde of furious men, who by force of desperate oaths and threats and the shaking of clenched fists, forced the rats to abandon the vessel. They then marched off with them in custody, the police being quite helpless. On the same day two processions of strikers with brass bands played the "Dead March" outside the offices of the Cunard Company, who have been among the bitterest opponents of the strikers. The steamer 'Atlas,' belonging to the same Company, is used as a floating boarding-house for scabs. The crew of the steamer 'Spray,' at Dundee, have refused to go to sea because the steward of the vessel belongs to the noble army of rats.

The seamen and firemen went in at Glasgow on Friday, June 28th. They agreed with the representatives of the masters that all scabs should be dismissed, but the masters now refuse to carry out their part of the agreement. Another example of the treachery of capital.

The Walsall Bit Makers.

These unfortunate men, who have been out on strike for a 15 per cent. advance for more than a month, have issued an appeal for help to their fellow-workmen, in which they state the reason why they have been forced into the struggle. They point out that some sixteen years ago the employers were so ashamed of the miserable wages they were paying that they granted them a 15 per cent. advance. For eight years they paid it, but suddenly the advanced price was knocked off. But now let the men tell their story in their own way:

"We had no option but to submit, for we were poor even at the advanced rate, and consequently weak; whilst our employers were few and rich, and therefore strong. For eight long years we have patiently submitted to this wrong; during which time we noticed that whilst we have worked harder and got poorer, we have earned more profit for our employers, and they have become richer and richer. Also that in our struggle to get on, we often fall victims to some form of chronic disease, and die a slow and miserable death long before our time. Even our most skilled workmen are unable to provide against our slackness of trade and old age. How then must it be for the ordinary and less fortunate workman? Yet on such miserable wages we are expected to be self-respecting, independent, honest, and to make due provision for old age and sickness: virtues which we would ask our employers could they accomplish if they were in our places? We do not pause for their reply. We know they could not. For eight long years we have tried and failed; and now we feel bound, as honourable men, to refuse to continue this miserable, pitiless struggle any longer. We refuse, as men, such grinding of our faces, such degradation and tyranny. Life for us and our wives and children must be morally, physically, and spiritually blighted. To submit any longer to such slavish conditions, without making a desperate effort to free ourselves, we feel would be unmanly."

These poor fellows seem to have some idea as to the root of the evil—the oppression which naturally follows when the few are rich and the many are poor. It will not take them long to recognise the fact that Socialism is the only remedy for their wretchedness. Those who desire to help them in their uphill battle against the power which wealth gives to a few merciless men cannot do better than send their subscriptions to C. Taylor, secretary, 159 High Street, Bloxwich.

The Durham Miners.

A large meeting of delegates, representing some fifteen thousand men, has been held at Houghton-le-Spring. They unanimously passed a resolution urging upon the Executive of the Union that if the owners refuse to accede to their demand for a 10 per cent. advance, to take a ballot at once, and that if this is carried, their notices will be sent in so as to expire on the 31st of July. Great enthusiasm and a dogged determination to strike if necessary was shown at the meeting. The 5 per cent. offer of the owners was looked upon as an insult, and there can be no doubt that if this most reasonable demand of the workers is not acceded to, some twenty thousand men will come out. As nearly all the miners in other districts have gained advances ranging from 5 to 10 per cent. upon threatening to strike, there is a great chance that the Durham men may win without a battle. We wish them good luck.

ROUMANIA.

The Conservative Government of Roumania having introduced a Bill for fifteen millions, to be devoted to military works, the Socialist deputy Nadedje, the "best friend of the workers," has voted for the Bill! That's one of the blessed things to which parliamentarism leads a Socialist deputy. But we may add to the credit of the Roumanian Socialists that they have refused to endorse the action of their deputy. Would it not be better, indeed, if he took somewhat more notice of the awful sufferings of the Roumanian peasantry? Roumania is chiefly an agricultural country, and those who produce all that she lives upon are in a much more dreadful condition than anywhere else, even than in Ireland or in Italy. Dr. Obédénaru writes about the miserable condition of the peasants in the Dictionnaire Encyclopédique des sciences médicales: "The food of the peasant consists almost entirely of vegetables, cabbages and mamaliga, a kind of maize worse even than the Italian polenta. This subsistence, insufficient by its quality, which fatigues beyond all measure the digestive organs without repairing the daily losses of the body, is absolutely incompatible with the body in a land where malaria never disappears and where the cold weather is as excessive as in the Crimea. The Roumanian peasant produces only one half of the production of a French or an English agriculturist. But these would certainly only produce half the quantity produced by the Roumanian, if they were to be kept on the régime of cabbages and mamaliga." And Dr. Félix, professor of medicine at the University of Bucharest, writes: "The Roumanian peasants have not the same dynamic force as the foreign workers. The cause of it resides in their frugality, or rather, in their exaggerated abstention!" Frugality here stands as an euphemism for starvation: professors are capable of anything and everything! Dr. Dima Georgesca, who is not a patented professor, puts it more plainly: "The food of the peasant is scarcely enough to benumb the colic that precedes death from starvation." That is the general condition of the people in Roumania, and it is not difficult to conceive how they have been visited by pellagra, that horrible curse of Italy. It is really to be hoped that the revolutionary party will soon be able to alter that state of things, for the agrarian reform of 1864 has made the peasant poorer and more unfortunate than he has ever been before.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Our contemporary die Gleichheit (Equality) of Vienna has been definitively suppressed by the Austrian police authorities, and without any judgment whatever. The police decree by which the paper is suppressed does not give any reason for it at all. But privately the chief commissioner of police has been good enough to tell Dr Adler, the editor of the paper, that the Socialist organ has been suppressed because it has provoked the troubles that have arisen in Steyr. Now, that is the second time that the police have tried to get rid of that incommensurable paper, the first attempt having been made at the time of the tramway-men's strike. Our Vienna colleague asserts that it has had nothing at all to do with the Steyr troubles, but the capitalist press has been continually denouncing Dr. Adler and the Gleichheit, especially so das Wiener Tageblatt, the Oesterreichische Volkszeitung, the Deutsche Volksblatt, and das Vaterland. These papers point at Dr. Adler as an Anarchist; though he has never been anything else than a Social Democrat, and whenever he has had the opportunity he has fought against Anarchists. Again, the whole affair in Steyr was not even a Socialist uprising, and the organised Socialists there did not even interfere with it. Notwithstanding all this, not only was die Gleichheit suppressed by the police authorities, but the editors, Dr. Victor Adler and Leo Bretschneider, were charged with the instigation of the working classes and with interference in the recent troubles, and tried under the Anarchist laws before an extraordinary tribunal. Although the defendants and their paper, as we stated before, were opposed to the Anarchist party, the tribunal declared themselves competent, and sentenced comrade Adler to four months' imprisonment and fined comrade Bretschneider thirty florins, and the suppression of the paper was held good.

We are very sorry for the disappearance of the Austrian paper, and although we did not always share its views, we must say that it was one of the best papers in Europe. We hope that our Austrian friends will soon get out of their difficulties and start afresh. In the meantime, the subscribers of Gleichheit will receive, instead of their suppressed organ, the Sozialdemokratische Monatschrift, a monthly review edited by comrade A. Grosse, in Vienna.

REPORTS.

LONDON OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.—Deptford Broadway—Brookes and Charles spoke here to a small meeting last Saturday; 12 Commonweal sold. Clerkenwell Green—Brookes and Blundell spoke to a large and attentive audience on Sunday. Hoxton—Charles and Blundell addressed good meeting; fair sale of literature.

CLERKENWELL.—On Sunday, A. Brookes lectured on "Order without Law"; a long and interesting discussion followed.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday, Kitz spoke to a fair audience on Mitcham Fair Green, giving a brief account of his visit to Manchester; 13 Commonweal sold.—S. G.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting was held at Latimer Road Station at 11 a.m.; speakers were Mrs. Lahr, Grierson (S.D.F.), Tochatti, Lyne, jun., and Maughan; choir also sang; 3s. 4d. collected, and 35 Commonweal sold. A poor meeting at William Street; speakers were Crouch, Lyne, jun., and Dean; 2 Commonweal sold. This is one of the poorest neighbourhoods in the Kensington district, and our comrades mean to make something of the people if it is possible to arouse them. At 7.30 a good meeting was held at Archer Street; speakers were Dean, Crouch, Tochatti, Maughan, and young Saint; a swell in the crowd thought to entrap the youngster by questions, but the lad was equal to the occasion and astonished the people by his answers; collected 6½d. and 24 Commonweal sold. During the afternoon our comrades at the demonstration in the Park managed to sell 64 Commonweal.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 17th ult., Leatham read a paper in answer to the question "Is a Science of History Possible?" On 24th, McCulloch's paper on "Education" was read and discussed. On 28th, Duncan, Cooper, and Leatham addressed meeting at Woodside, the singing attracting a good audience. On 29th, the usual Castle Street meeting was addressed by Duncan, Gilray (of Edinburgh), and Leatham—the latter being challenged by a vendor of doctor's prescriptions (who put a question and spoke from our platform) to debate Socialism with him in public on a date to be fixed hereafter. Same speakers held meeting on Sunday afternoon at Duthie Park.—L.

MANCHESTER.—No reports of our meetings were sent in last week, because we wished a fuller account of Kitz's visit to appear in Weal. This week we began with the Saturday night meeting at Middleton, where Bailie and Marshall addressed a good meeting; 18 Weal sold. The same speakers addressed a large meeting in Stevenson Square on Sunday afternoon, the audience being very enthusiastic; 28 Weal sold and 9½d. collected for propaganda. At Chester Road, Ritson and Marshall spoke. We began on Sunday night at a fresh station in Harpurhy; Stockton, Bailie, and Parkinson addressed the people, but it was not till we were over an hour started that a fair audience had assembled; 9 Weal sold and four new members joined. We intend working this station on Sunday mornings. We hold a meeting every Monday night at Holt Town, where we generally encounter considerable opposition.

LEICESTER.—Sunday, 30th ult., C. W. Mowbray addressed two meetings; morning, "The Need for Socialism"; evening, "Socialism, what is it?" The people seemed very interested, and the audience in the evening was the largest we have yet had; 15s. 10d. collection. This is the first collection that has been made in Leicester; 5s. worth of Commonweal and pamphlets were sold. H. Snell (Fabian), of Nottingham, gave a short address after Mowbray. Discussion was invited, but there was none forthcoming.—T. P. B.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning our speakers attended the bricklayers' labourers' meeting and spoke on their behalf. Again at night we had another meeting, when Sweeney, Hill, Paylor, and Maguire spoke to a large and appreciative audience, who manifested their approval of our ideas by loud cheering. We are endeavouring to organise the unskilled labourers in all branches of industry in the town, since the aristocrats of labour take no steps in organising them.

ROCHDALE.—On Sunday 30th we had L. Hall from London; he gave three lectures. A well-known spiritualist put a letter in the local paper which dealt with the strong language used by Socialists, which comrade Hall ably replied to.—H. BLOMLEY, Sec.

YARMOUTH.—On Monday a large meeting was held at Belton; comrade Reynolds addressed the meeting, which was very sympathetic. Our reception was so good that it is proposed to continue our meetings here. On Thursday evening a mass meeting was held in the Market Place, at which comrade McCormack of London and comrade Reynolds spoke. On Saturday a splendid meeting was held on the Priory Plain, addressed by Reynolds and McCormack. On Sunday morning on the Plain a meeting was held, which comrades Reynolds, McCormack, Ruffold, and Thomas of Ipswich addressed. In the afternoon another meeting was held, addressed by the same speakers. In the evening, on the Quay, we held a very large meeting, opened by Ruffold and followed by McCormack, who gave his experiences in the provinces; Reynolds came afterwards, and was well received. Six new members; total collection on Sunday, 11s.; Commonweal sold out. On Sunday morning, at Bradwell, a meeting was held by comrade Brightwell.—J. McC.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro Street, June 29, G. King lectured on the "Gospel of Plenty." Slight disturbance by two or three blatant Gaels. Shields, Hamilton, Graham, and Wilson took part in discussion.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Good meeting in the Market Place on Sunday night, Peacock and Rooke speaking. The former denounced the boycotting of the club by certain property owners, who refused to let their premises for meetings.—R. P.

NOTES ON NEWS.

Two announcements which were made last week are among the cheering "straws" that show which way the social "wind" is blowing. Ibsen's "Pillars of Society," literally translated by Mr. Wm. Archer, is to be performed at the Gaiety Theatre, on Tuesday, July 16, and the promoters of the undertaking are most anxious to make it known that there will be no tampering with the text. A new play by Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, called "The Middleman," will be put on the stage in the autumn by Mr. E. S. Willard at the Shaftesbury. It is said to be a study of contemporary life on similar lines to those of the same writer's striking production "Wealth," now running at the Haymarket. Not world-shaking events in themselves, but how much they mean!

In a recent issue of the Boston Herald, I noticed an advertisement for an "American man." Just what that means I don't know, outside of a Red Indian, but I was struck by the fact that almost in the next column was a long report of a "mass meeting" which wound up a three day's convention of the "National British-American Association of the United States," formed to antagonise and counteract wherever possible the work of the Irish-American organisations. The same mail brought a German paper with German-American politics and news; and one would have to run through all the nationalities of Europe before the minor organisations of a similar nature were exhausted. As at home, so abroad; the wretched workers all over the world allow themselves to be divided up and set fighting, and then by the time they have got through "antagonising" one another, there is neither time nor energy left for improving their position or deposing their oppressors.

According to a paragraph which went the round of the papers last week, there is actually a scheme on foot for a "land syndicate" to buy Lower California from Mexico in order to form an Irish-American Republic there. For the credit of the Irish race it is to be hoped that this stupid and pitiful plan will fall through before it approaches anything like realisation. It is an outcome of the terrible sectarianism and exclusiveness that has for so long laid Ireland helpless under the feet of her slave-drivers, aliens and natives, and made workmen everywhere the miserable slaves they are.

It is the habit of Englishmen to complain of the insularity of Irishmen, and their obstinate refusal to merge themselves in the mass of any folk they may dwell among, and it is further the delight of Unionist or Tory orators and scribes to dilate on the cruelty they discover ingrained in the Irish character. As for the failing first-named, are not Englishmen themselves a byword for it among all the nations of the earth? And for the cruelty, there is no crime of all that ever were, or could be, wrought by Irishmen, even the most desperate, which could equal for calculating cold-blooded malignity the massacre of the dervishes in the desert, which all English papers but one or two have been chronicling with joy as a great and glorious victory.

Heroically flinging their rude weapons and naked bodies in defence of their homes, their freedom, and their faith, against all the latest modern developments in the machinery of murder, they were beaten, broke, and fled. Then they were hunted down like wolves and vermin, and butchered in detail. Those of them who took refuge in the hills were cut off from water and penned up to die of thirst. Some, scores of them, did so die, and hundreds more of them were dying when the latest news was received, and every maddened wretch who, driven by unendurable, unutterable torment, crawled out into the open to allay the agony of his lingering death, was being coolly shot at sight. Calmly waiting for the despairing rush of each frenzied victim stood the representatives of English law 'n' order, upholding religion, civilisation, and all the rest of it, on behalf of their employers, who at home were cursing Patrick Ford and "Transatlantic," and thanking God they were not as these wild devils of dynamitards.

There is now a good chance for English workmen to help themselves in helping others. Danish joiners are locked-out to compel them to accept a reduction; their manifesto will be given in full next week. Let all those English workmen who talk of "foreign competition" go the best way to work to render it harmless by helping their foreign brethren to maintain wages at a decent level. Help should be addressed to P. J. Nielsen, Romersgade 22, Copenhagen. S.

The Northumberland miners at their annual gala had the valuable assistance of Mr. Burt, Mr. Bradlaugh, and Mr. Henry George. It appears that some of Mr. George's remarks did not meet with Mr. Bradlaugh's approval. First he fell foul of his worthy colleague because he said there was more freedom in America than England. Mr. Bradlaugh, as "an Englishman," thought "that we had almost as much liberty here as in America." Quite true, Mr. Bradlaugh. In England you can be bludgeoned to death for holding advanced opinions and endeavouring to express them. In America they will hang you for committing the same offence. Yes, it is probable that we have almost as much liberty as they have in America.

Then Mr. Bradlaugh went on to remark upon the marvellous progress achieved since the days of the old Roman empire.

"Mr. George rightly asked why it was that through the whole civilised world the labouring class was poor, but if he could have stood two thousand years ago in the greatest city of the civilised world, he would have had to ask the question—Why was it that the whole of the labouring class were slaves? There had been progress."

Wonderful progress! One would think to hear the unctious with which Mr. Bradlaugh speaks of it that it was all owing to the efforts of the pope of the National Secular Society. Still it may be doubted whether the workers have greatly improved their condition by being transformed from slaves into "free labourers." The Roman slave had enough to eat, he was often well housed and well cared for. Can the English "free labourer" say as much?

No, no. The great accomplishment of last century is not the abolition of slavery, but the evolution of Charles Bradlaugh!

Just consider how happy the Roman slave might have been if he could have had a Mr. Bradlaugh to tell him that he must not seek a total change in his condition. "Slavery was healthful, invigorating; it brought out, it developed the manly qualities of independence, honesty, and integrity." Just think how that would have soothed the poor creature down, and how he would have learnt to bless the kindly rule of his excellent master.

Please imagine the Roman Bradlaugh holding forth as follows: "My poor men, Mr. Catiline rightly asks 'Why are you slaves?' I admit there are disadvantages about slavery, great disadvantages; but if Mr. Catiline could have stood in the greatest city of the world a few thousand years ago, he would have had to ask the question 'Why did the workers eat one another?' There has been progress! Be patient, my friends, be patient; no violent language, no physical force, and perhaps in another two or three thousand years you may likewise improve your condition." Here our reporter came away.

Absurd! ridiculous! doubtless. We know slavery developed no manly qualities. But does the beneficent rule of the régime of individualism, which Mr. Bradlaugh praises so highly, bring them out? Are the ground-down slaves of our civilisation, the matchmakers, the unskilled labourers, the chainmakers, the tramwaymen, and the toilers upon the soil remarkable for their independence of character and their freedom from such vile qualities as marked the slaves of old?

No; the curse of the present system is that it degrades the mass of the workers far more than the slavery of the old world, or the serfdom of the feudal system. The serfs and slaves could and did revolt repeatedly against the tyranny of their masters. When will slaves of our commercial system have spirit enough to rise, and with one mighty effort break their chains? D. N.

A CHAT WITH A BURGLAR.

By PERPETUAL MOTION.

My turning round I beheld a middle-sized well-built man, about my own age, and the most determined-looking face I ever came across. On that face a trace of hesitation could not be detected; the eyes, of steel-grey colour, had all the sternness of an executioner and all the calmness of a practical man at his business. Even if I had been armed, it would have been useless to offer resistance, because a revolver glittered in the clutched, nervous fingers of the stranger, and every movement of mine was dominated by that death-dealing instrument. To do myself justice, my philosophical penchant did not leave me even a moment. I was cool enough to watch the various feelings and sensations in my own person, while the fellow's whole demeanour struck me more by the stamp of an interesting specimen of the genus homo than by the possible unpleasant consequences the unexpected visit might have for me.

"Don't raise an alarm, or I'll blow your brains out!" the fellow muttered, audibly enough for me.

"Don't trouble yourselves about that, my dear sir," I answered with all the sang froid I was capable of. "If you have not come for the special purpose of murdering me, I shall try to please you in any way you choose."

"I suppose you know what I am here for," the fellow remarked. "You have received some cash to-day, and I am in need of it. Where is it?"

"Would it not be better first to have a little friendly argument?"

"Damn your arguments! Where is the money?"

"There"; and I pointed to the bookcase.

The fellow advanced towards it, covering me with his revolver; opened the case, took the roll of banknotes, put them away in the inside pocket of his coat, and retreated towards the door.

I had kept my seat as unconcerned as if the visit of a burglar had been a daily incident in my life.

"Now look here, my man; I am not going to make any noise about that money. I don't care about it, and I should have given it away. If you had come to me and asked me for it I should have given it to you. And as for risking my own life or taking yours for that money, such an idea never entered my brain. I am a philosopher. I swear to you by the honour of a gentleman that I shall not molest you. But as a philosopher I wish to have a friendly chat with you. You are perfectly secure; you have got the money and that revolver. Sit down there on the chair near the door. I will remain where I am. If I make a move or call for help you can kill me, while the chances of escape are all in your favour. Sit down there and tell me what has forced you to become a burglar."

"Well, I never—" The fellow hesitated a moment and sat down in the chair. "So you want to know the reason why? I suppose you are a literary man, wishing to serve up something new. Why I am a burglar? I will tell you in a few words. Men are thieves; all men are thieves. The rich rob the poor, and now and then a fellow like me robs the rich. The one is legalised robbery, and mine is punishable robbery; that's the whole difference."

"I agree with you perhaps more than you might think," I answered. "There is such an amount of heartless cruelty in our social arrangements, that I am more struck with the moderation of the robbed victims than the amount of crime against property. But robbery in the one case as well as in the other is reprehensible and against the divine law."

"Divine law!" sneered the fellow, and a contemptuous expression overspread his face.

"You must not misjudge me. By divine law I do not mean the law given to man by some self-existing deity, but a law which is the very essence of our spiritual or true being. There is no lawgiver, but there is the fundamental or elemental essence which warns us constantly that things are not what they seem, and that we must not be ruled by them. Do you find any inward satisfaction by following your course?"

"I do. After every successful haul I feel that I have done something to set things right again. The rich man whom I rob has just as much right to his money as I have. He came to it by robbery, and lost it by robbery. I do not rob the poor, only the rich. There is no moral principle involved any more in the one case than in the other. If the Bank of England were broken into and £100,000 were carried away by burglars, I offer a bet that in the whole of England not one man's moral feelings would be outraged. Money, valuables, jewellery—all these things must be watched. They are the property of those who know how to get them."

"Even admitting all that, one thing is certain—that you are an outlaw, living in open or secret rebellion with mankind. Enmity is in your heart, and there can be no room for happiness."

"Perhaps so; but if you knew how I became thus you would judge less harshly of me."

"I do not judge at all, I assure you. You may have been especially unfortunate. To learn from you how this came about is the reason why I detained you."

"Listen, then. I was once an 'honest' working-man. I tried my best to earn a living by hard work. I am a compositor by trade."

"A compositor," I interrupted; "why, that's a very good trade."

"Oh, is it? That's all you know about it. There are at this day hundreds, perhaps thousands, of compositors in London whose weekly earnings range between eight and twenty shillings. Many of these men have families. I have worked in book-houses where the weekly earnings never reach a pound; sometimes I have earned not even ten shillings. Do you call that a trade?"

"This is almost incredible," I remarked. "How is this possible?"

"It is possible in the piece system, where two-thirds of a man's time is wasted by mismanagement and carelessness on the part of the employer. But this carelessness really means tiger-like cruelty for the poor comp., who is helpless. I know what I have gone through. The idea of being in work on a so-called trade, and bringing ten shillings home to missis on a Saturday was maddening to me. It turned me upside down. I was a young man, with a wife and a child. I should have willingly risked my life for both, and yet I could not earn enough to keep them fed and clothed. I swore the deadliest oath that they should have plenty to eat while I could move a finger, and I became a burglar. I have studied the business."

"And your wife, your children?"

"My wife had to be converted to my religion. It cost me a great deal of trouble. Women will listen to parsons. But my words and hunger made a practical communist out of her. My children know nothing about my doings. I bring them up respectably, like the legalised robbers."

"But suppose you are caught?"

"I shall never be caught alive."

"Then you would commit murder. Now, apart from all the commandments of so-called revealed religion, there is in murder all that is beastly in human nature. Tigers and wolves kill, but man, as an organism knowing the origin of all being, is almost unthinkable as a life-destroyer. Only the savage animalism in ourselves can delight in killing, and a terrible reaction, caused by our true being, makes us aware, when it is too late, that we have murdered our own peace, our sleep, and loosened all the hell-born crew of remorse, fear, terror, and despair."

"The likes of me do not kill for the pleasure of the thing. We only defend ourselves. If people risk their lives for their money, the fault is theirs, not ours. And yet I believe I could, if I had the chance, live as an honest man. I have tried again and again, but want drove me to despair, to hatred. I utterly despise your laws. They protect the rich, while for us they have starvation and the poorhouse."

"Could you not take that money and leave this country—try an honest life in Australia, the Cape, in Canada, or the United States? In your case I should not despair. Is your conscience free from murder?"

"It is."

"Thank goodness for that! Well, then, the mere fact of having robbed rich people of some of their unnecessary wealth should not force you to remain a criminal. There are worse things than burglary. There are deadlier wounds inflicted by countless acts other than the abstraction of banknotes and shining metal or glittering stones. I could commit a deadlier sin by my pen or a word of my mouth than you would be guilty of in house-breaking. But I draw the line at violence, let alone murder. It is questionable whether there exists anything in this world of deceptions worth the life of any human being, least of all a sum of money which may be thrown away for the smile of a painted harlot, or a gaudy picture, a sumptuous dinner for overfed gluttons, or a robe to cover the shrivelled skin of a worthless votary of fashion. If you alter your course and become an honest man, there is no honest man in England who would think much the worse of you because society has driven you to burglary."

"Now, I must say you are a real gentleman. Here, take these five hundred pounds, and I will content myself with half. With this money I shall leave England and try a new life abroad." And he handed me the five banknotes.

"I do not want the money. If I knew that you really meant to do what you say I should willingly give you more. Keep the money and carry out your resolve; and may the spirit of true humanity be henceforth your guide. Depart in peace, and without fear. Good evening, sir."

I could see the man's eyes swimming in tears he could not suppress. He walked out of the room never turning back, and I rewarded this confidence by whistling a popular tune to his retreating steps.

Am I not justified in maintaining that I am not like other people? Is such a man not worthy to invent perpetual motion?

'ZNAMIA.'—We are sorry to learn that the Russian Social-Democratic paper, Znamia, which has been published for some time in New York, has given up the ghost. Killed by that curse of labour-papers—lack of funds.

The following anecdote, which I clipped from the Omaha World, is a pretty good joke for a "law and order" paper: Penitentiary Visitor—My poor man, how did you come to be in here? Prisoner—For selling fraudulent goods and thereby getting money under false pretences. Visitor—I hope you'll become an honest man here and be a good citizen when you are released. What are you employed at by the State? Prisoner—Making warranted solid leather soles for boots and shoes out of pasteboard.—H. F. C.

From Paris we hear that paper is in the near future bound to supersede cotton and wool as the clothing material of people. For blankets, plain covering and similar purposes the paper fabrics are an established success. How will our cotton and woollen industries be effected by competition from this unexpected quarter? Shoddy paper hats at 3d. each will no doubt be good enough for the workers. Sixpenny glazed-paper overcoats will soon afford them shelter from the bleak winds and tempestuous showers of our inhospitable clime. Hurrah for civilisation! Its blessings are indeed great.—A. B.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The French Parti ouvrier has sustained a heavy loss by the death of comrade Simon Soëns, who died at Paris the 3rd inst., at the age of sixty-six, having been born on the 17th of August 1823. He has been very active, all his life through, in the Socialist cause, and as far back as June 1848 he did his duty as a revolutionist. In 1866 he founded a co-operative productive association, which came to an end during the Franco-German war. The same year he contributed towards the creation of a chambre syndicale (trade union) of the shoemakers, which ended in 1882. During the siege of Paris he organised an association for the providing of shoes to the National Guards, and continued the same up to 1880. Besides this merely administrative part of his work, he permeated all these creations with democratic and Socialist principles. He took a very active part in the working-men's movement of the last years of the Third Empire. In 1871 he was of course in the ranks of the Communards, where he bravely did his utmost for the cause of the people. In 1876 he was a delegate at the first general congress of the French Socialists, and in 1878 he aided very actively in the foundation of Le Proletaire. He was also up to the time of his death manager of Le Proletariat, the organ of the Parti ouvrier. In 1878 he was sentenced to imprisonment, with Jules Guesde and forty others, for having convened an international congress at Paris (Jules Favre law against the International). He was elected a member of the Municipal Council of Paris in 1887, and a member of the General Council of the Seine department. He was a noble-minded man, and all who once knew him liked him and soon became his friends. He was buried at the Père-Lachaise cemetery, where citizens Jacques, president of the General Council, Chantemps, chairman of the Municipal Council, and Chabert, in the name of those who have survived the struggles of 1848 and 1871, retraced the career of the deceased.

Never will any other Revolutionary Socialist Congress have been of such a fully international character as the forthcoming gathering of the 14th inst. To the conveners of various nationalities whose names and organisations have already appeared in the Commonweal are now to be added the following:—Greece—For the Greek Socialist party: Platon F. Drakulis, editor of Arden, the Socialist paper of the Hellenes. Norway—For the Norwegian Socialist party: Karl Jeppesen. Italy—For the Socialist organisation of Sicily: Aldissio Samnito; For the Socialist groups of Milano: O. Gnoch-Viani. Hungary—For the Hungarian Socialist party: A. Thrlinger, and Leo Frankel, ex-member of the Paris Commune. Germany—For the Shoemakers' Union of Barmstedt: T. Klüss (Elmshorn); For the Shoemakers' Union of Magdeburg and several other unions of the same trade throughout Germany: W. Bock (Gotha); For the carpenters' trade of Berlin: Karl Legien; For the workers of Königsberg: Karl Schulze; For the cabinetmakers of Germany comrade Karl Kloss (Stuttgart) is likely to be elected, his nomination having already been approved of in various important towns.

GERMANY.

The former Socialist deputy at the German Reichstag, Wilhelm Hasenclever, who for some time past has been located in a lunatic asylum, died there a few days ago. At the time when he first became ill we have in these notes recorded at some length the Socialistic career of the deceased, who was very much esteemed by the workers of his country.

The attorney Frehsee, who caused our comrade Lieske to be beheaded on account of the execution of the Police Councillor Rumpf, of which he was innocent, and who became mad a few weeks afterwards, has now died at Charlottenburg, near Berlin. No one pities that magistrate; the fate he met with served him right.

The members of the Westphalian strike committee have been tried and sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from one to five years. That is the revenge of the capitalist class; but if only the workers will rally together and combine they will soon be able to put an end to that kind of revenging.

SWITZERLAND.

The national council of the Swiss Social-Democrats have issued a manifesto to the members of the party and to the public generally, in regard to the scandalous attempt made by Iron Bismarck to destroy the right of asylum that has existed (more or less) for centuries past in the little Helvetic Republic. The document is a very important one, as it recapitulates all the shameful doings which for the last seven or eight years have been undertaken in Switzerland through the instrumentality of the German police authorities and their various agents. It has been issued in the columns of the Arbeiterstimme (Voice of the Workers) and has been reproduced by a number of revolutionary papers, among which we may mention der Sozialdemokrat of London (number 27, of 6th July), where our German-reading English comrades will find it. We regret that lack of space does not allow the Commonweal to translate the compendious document of our Swiss friends.

V. D.

If corruption seems rolling over us like a flood, mark, it is not the corruption of the humbler classes. It is millionaires who steal banks, mills, and railways; it is defaulters who live in palaces and make away with millions; it is money kings who buy up congress; it is demagogues and editors, in purple and fine linen, who give fifty thousand dollars for the presidency itself; it is greedy wealth which invests its thousand millions in rum, to coin money out of the weakness of its neighbour. These are the spots where corruption nestles and gangrenes the state. If humble men are corrupted, these furnish the overwhelming temptation. It is not the common people in the streets, but the money changers who have intruded into the temple that we most sorely need someone to scourge.—Wendell Phillips.

THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS.—The absolute rights of man, considered as a free agent, endowed with discernment to know good from evil, and with power of choosing those measures which appear to him most desirable, are usually summed up in one general appellation, and denominated the natural liberty of mankind. This natural liberty consists properly in a power of acting as one thinks fit, without restraint or control, unless by the law of nature; being a right inherent in us by birth. But every man when he enters society, gives up a part of his natural liberty, as the price of so valuable a purchase; and, in consideration of receiving the advantages of mutual commerce, obliges himself to conform to those rules which the community has thought proper to establish.—Blackstone's 'Commentaries.'

THE RED FLAG.

(Reprinted from the Democratic Review, edited by G. Julian Harney, April 1850.)

AIR—"Dark Loch na Garr."

'Tis in the Red Flag true Republicans glory;
Red is the emblem of Justice and Right—
By martyrs' blood dyed, whose names live in story—
The victors, though fallen, in Liberty's fight.
Fast flow our tears for the fettered and slaughtered,
And exiles who wander o'er valley and crag.
Too long has the earth by tyrants been tortured;
They shall crouch yet and cower before our Red Flag!

Away to the winds with the cant "moderation";
Mercy is not with king, tiger, or snake;
Crush them to the dust, as they've crushed each nation—
In the day of our triumph kings tremble and quake.
"Mercy!" yes, mercy such as they gave us—
Such we'll return, and throneless will drag
From their high places all those that enslave us,
To bow, mean and abject, before our Red Flag!

"Mercy!" while Haynau riots in murder,
And tiger-like gloats o'er the blood of mankind;
While the serfs of the Czar poor Poland engird,
The betrayers of France Rome's chains again bind!
Sicily crushed 'neath the Bourbon lies bleeding,
And Hungary curses the Austrian rag;
The nations oppressed pray the time may be speeding
When in triumph and glory shall fly our Red Flag!

That glad time shall come, kings, though patriots you slaughter;
Fresh legions shall rise for the martyrs who fall.
Through tempest and sunshine the nations have fought for Fair Freedom, benignant, who yet shall bless all;
We, the people, remember wrongs despots have wrought us;
Of their "divine right" not much more shall they brag;
"Moderation" is madness, experience hath taught us,
When at Freedom's next summons we hoist the Red Flag!

STORMING THE BASTILLE.

A HUNDRED years is a long time for the short memories bred of modern commercialism to look back upon. It seems longer still to the student of all that has happened since, all the changes in mechanism, all the advantages which science has given to a small luxurious class, and all the grinding misery that has fallen upon the people through the very inventions which have benefited the rich.

But a truce to these reflections called up by the fact that it is a hundred years ago since the Bastille fell, mid the roar of cannon and musketry, and the shouts of a revolted and victorious people. But now let me tell the story of how the people of France, ground down by taxation, the dues of the lords, the tithes of the church, and the tyranny and oppression of an arrogant ruling class, rose in revolt and with one mighty effort shivered the chains that bound them. Poor people, who had lain so long under crushing tyranny were unable to call their souls their own; so starved, so miserable, that they looked a nation of hungry scarecrows. Many of them were forced to live upon boiled grass, nettles, and garbage. A morsel of coarse black bread with a little, a very little meat, was a god-send, but they were forced to eat it with closed doors for fear the prowling tax-gatherer should swoop on them and insist that they must be rich or how could they have meat to eat. Meanwhile, the extravagance of the Court went on increasing by leaps and bounds, but the misery beneath spreads; the people below are taxed so much that they can be taxed no longer, already discontent is spreading, placards appear on every wall mysteriously denouncing the extravagance and corruption of the Royal Court, leaflets and pamphlets containing revolutionary ideas of the philosophers Rousseau, Voltaire, and Diderot circulate through the country. Public discontent breaks forth into riots and emeutes, and a scandalous deficit stares the Court in the face threatening national bankruptcy.

The king and his statesmen know not what to do; not even the most grinding tax-gatherer can get anything more out of the people; nay, already they are beginning to refuse the feudal dues and the Royal taxes. Meanwhile, the great middle-class are longing to become rulers in the place of the noblesse, and with many of the aristocracy who are not connected with the Court join in the outcry for a States-General. That is an Assembly composed of Lords, Clergy, and Commons. The Court struggles for a time, but agitation, riots, and emeutes go on unceasingly, and revolution looms in the distance. There is some hope, too, that the States-General may prove a convenient taxing machine for levying dues upon the privileged orders that have hitherto escaped taxation, the clergy and aristocracy. So the king gives way and the States-General is elected amidst bread riots, conflicts between the nobles and the people, and in Paris by open insurrection, resulting in the burning down of a paper manufactory of one Revellion, an employer who said the workmen ought to live on sevenpence-halfpenny a-day, and got his factory burnt down for his philanthropy.

The States-General meet on May 5th. Revolution is in the air, and even infects the timid bourgeois with courage. The middle-class deputies are very rebellious, they refuse to vote taxes meekly as required by the king. They demand, and succeed in obtaining their demand, that the Lords, Clergy, and Commons shall meet in one assembly, knowing that with the aid of the poorer clergy and liberal aristocrats they will easily be able to outvote the reactionary party. The king and his Court grow frightened; they determine on a coup d'état. Thirty thousand troops are massed round Paris, many of whom are foreign mercenaries, for the French troops already show signs of fraternising with the people. Cannon are pointed upon Paris, which is wild with fever and passion; the rebellious deputies of the States-General, now christened by them the National Assembly, shall be driven from their hall at the point of the bayonet, and as for the rabble "a whiff of grapeshot" will settle their business.

The king and Court begin their coup d'état by the dismissal of Necker, the popular Minister, and the appointment of a reactionary Ministry, of whom the Duc de Broglie, the whiff of grapeshot man, and Foulon, the old scoundrel who said the starving people might eat grass, were the chiefs.

When the news reached Paris, which was already in a wild fever of excitement, the excitement became a delirium of hatred, fury, and fear. It was said that the Royalist troops were advancing ready for massacre, red-hot balls were heated to burn the city, which that night would be given up to fire, sack, and pillage. In the Palais Royal, which had been for some days a kind of Parisian Hyde Park with its dozens of fiery orators, the excitement was maddening.

Suddenly a young man, Camille Desmoulin, with streaming hair and flaming eyes, leaps upon a cafe table. "Citizens," he shouts with frenzied passion, "Citizens, we have no time to lose; the dismissal of Necker means the massacre of the people. Shall we die tamely like sheep in the penfold bleating vainly for mercy, the knife of the butcher at our throats? No, there is but one thing left for us to do! To arms, citizens! To arms!"

"To arms! To arms!" comes thundering back from the crowd. A procession is formed, and two wax busts of Necker and the Duke of Orleans are draped in crape and borne in front of it. Through the streets they march, mid shouts and tumult. In the Place Louis Quinze, the German dragoons, commanded by Prince Lambesc, charge on the procession, sabring right and left. The bearer of one of the busts and a French guard fell dead on the ground. The sabred procession breaks and flies, bearing the news all over Paris. The dragoons mad with murderous fury pursue some of the processionists into the Tuilleries Gardens, and cut and slash without mercy not only the processionists but the usual Sunday promenaders. One poor old man falls, his white hair dabbled in blood from the cut of the sabre of Prince Lambesc. A fearful yell of indignation goes up from the people, who pile up barricades of benches, and literally drove away the dragoons with volleys of missiles of all kinds.

The cry "To arms!" rings through the city. It reaches the French Guards, who are already very mutinous, and who on hearing that one of their comrades has been murdered by Lambesc's dragoons, burst out of their barracks and greet the retreat of these butchers with a volley of sharp shot.

Meanwhile, the whole city breaks into revolt, alarm bells clang out from every steeple; arms shops are broken open and pillaged, and the streets are filled with a furious and desperate crowd; the troops, ordered to advance against the people, refuse, they seem more inclined to join the rebels than to attack; even the foreign mercenaries are disinclined for battle; the officers order a retreat, and the people are left in possession of Paris.

Thus amid clamour, turmoil, and furious excitement passed the night of the 12th of July. Monday, the 13th, was mainly occupied in forming a National Guard, and making pikes and searching for arms. It was a day of terror and uncertainty, for every moment there were groundless alarms that the troops were advancing against the city. Next day, the famous 14th, the people hear that there are 28,000 stand of arms at the Hotel de Invalides. They force their way into it, and carry off these precious weapons. Then arises a tremendous shout, "To the Bastille!" a gloomy fortress prison where languish the victims of royal and feudal tyranny. This place with its frowning walls, its gloomy dungeons, was to the people the symbol of the tyranny under which they had groaned so long. Let the Bastille fall and France was free.

Arrived outside the fortress gates the leaders of the crowd parley with the governor of the prison, an old officer, one De Launay, noted for his brutality. Suddenly by his orders the drawbridge is drawn up and a treacherous and murderous volley is poured upon the people. But it does not long remain so, as a brave old soldier, Louis Tournay, climbs up the wall of a guard-house, and though shot flies thick and fast around cuts the chains and the drawbridge falls; the crowd throng over and the outworks are in their hands.

But this means but little. The people are met by a terrible fire from the garrison that stands at bay. They retaliate by an infernal fire of musketry, which rains upon the fortress, rising like a grim grey rock amid the spray and foam of the tossing waves of tempest. Thus it rages, but despite the storm of lead the fortress holds out obstinately. The people have two small pieces of cannon, but these are useless against its mighty walls. Thus the fight rages for nearly four hours, but the appearance of the French Guards with some powerful artillery changes the aspect. The few hundred men in the garrison, though bemuddled with drink that had been plentifully served out to them by De Launay, fight with but little heart, for they feel that all Paris is against them, while help there is none. The appearance of the French Guards with their artillery decides the business. The Swiss and the Invalides offer to surrender, despite the resistance of their governor, who attempts to fire the powder magazine and blow the Bastille and insurgents high in the air, but is dragged back by his soldiers.

Suddenly a white flag is waved from the second drawbridge and a paper is held out; a leader crosses the moat on a plank, secures the paper, and shouts assent to the terms proposed—mercy for all. The drawbridge is lowered, and the people rush over by thousands and all is over. The cells in the Bastille are forced, the prisoners are released, and are borne along the streets to the number of seven; with them go more ghastly trophies, seven heads on pikes. Among them is that of De Launay, Governor of Bastille, slain on his way to the Hotel de Ville to be judged for murdering the people. The delicate humanitarians and rabid reactionists who shriek about the heads on pikes, should remember that that barbarous custom had been taught the people by the despotic monarchy, which was fond of cutting off the heads of rebels against its power, and sticking them on gateways as ornaments. This custom had not then been long out of fashion in our own happy land, the Jacobites of 1745 being the last to suffer this penalty.

My story concludes with the surrender of the king and his Court; the flight of the reactionary Ministry, all caused by the fall of the Bastille. A popular victory which overthrew the aristocracy, and put the middle classes in their places upon the backs of the people. When shall our bastilles, the factory, the prison, and the workhouse, fall, and the people be truly free? Is the day still distant? It is, perhaps, nearer than we imagine.

D. J. NICOLL.

THE HYNDMAN-GEORGE DEBATE.

I.

On Tuesday, the 2nd of July, St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, was fairly well filled with the partisans of H. M. Hyndman, the Social Democrat, and Henry George, the advocate of the Single Tax. Professor Beesly occupied the chair, and in opening the proceedings at eight sharp, confined himself to pointing out the terms of the debate. George was to commence by a ten minutes speech, in which he explained his proposal; Hyndman to follow with half-an-hour's speech; George to reply in twenty minutes to make up his half-hour; then Hyndman and George to have twenty minutes each, and then the two disputants to have again ten minutes each. By this arrangement George both commenced and ended the debate.

In his opening speech George said that of course they were both agreed as to the wrong in existing social conditions, and they both wanted to alter those conditions so that there should be opportunity for all, leisure for all, and a sufficiency of the necessaries and even the luxuries of life for all. But they differed as to means. Man was a land animal, and in the opinion of the single-tax men all the great social evils were to be traced to the monopoly of land by the few. They proposed that the land should be treated as the property of the whole community, and that individuals wishing to use a portion of it should pay the community rent for its use according to its superiority over other land. This rent was to be used for the public benefit. He preferred to call this payment taxes, because in an old country people were used to the payment of taxes. This proposal was called the single-tax, because it was proposed to abolish all other taxes which in any way hamper industry. But this name single-tax expressed their method rather than their ideal; what they really were was liberty men, what they wanted was perfect freedom. They wanted to give every man liberty to use his powers in any way he pleases bounded only by the liberty of others to do the same. They would abolish all monopolies, and they would begin with the worst of all monopolies—the monopoly of land. They did not believe that labour was a poor weak thing that must be coddled and protected by government, but that labour was the producer of all wealth, and that all that labour wanted was a fair field and no favour. Therefore, as against the doctrines of restriction advocated by his opponent they raised the banner of liberty and equal rights in the gospel of free fair play.

Hyndman commenced by pointing out where Social Democrats agreed with George as is set forth in "Progress and Poverty." 1. That wages are not drawn from capital but from the product of the labour for which they are paid, and that the profit which results to capital is unpaid labour. 2. That increase of population is not the cause of poverty. 3. That the proposed remedies for the present state of things (economy in government, limitation of families, better education for the working classes, greater industry by the workers, thrift and temperance, trade unionism, co-operation, and a more general distribution of land) would not even temporarily alter the conditions under which the people live. 4. That the tendency is to production, on a large scale. 5. That the tendency is for wages to fall in proportion to the wealth created. 6. The collective ownership and management of monopolies. They differed in this:—1. That rent in countries where the capitalist system prevails reduced the rate of wages. He denied that. 2. That rent absorbs all the difference between wages and the total wealth produced. That was not so. 3. They did not believe that a tax on land values up to their limit and the equivalent reduction of all other taxation would benefit the people. 4. They did not believe that competition could be other than harmful. They held that competition in itself was harmful. 5. Mr. George did not propose to nationalise the land; the Social Democrats did. 6. They did not think that monopoly of land was the chief cause of industrial depression at the present time. The rent of land and the increase of land values did not lower wages. In America and Australia wages had not fallen as the rent of land had advanced. Since the enactment of the eight-hour law in Australia wages had risen, and the purchasing power of wages in America was, he contended, higher to day than it was five-and-twenty years ago. Between 1878 and 1888 rent had fallen considerably in England, but wages had not advanced to the same extent. Between 1850 and 1878 rent rose and at the same time wages rose. Mr. George had not proposed that the results of his tax should be expended in building better dwellings for the people, making parks, or anything of that kind. He had proposed to apply it to the reduction of the general taxation, and this would only help the great capitalists. Mr. George did not propose to relieve the land of taxation or rent, he simply proposed to transfer the rent to the State. Therefore the man who went to the land would be in precisely the same state as he is to day. Land taxation was the sheet anchor of the taxation of India, and yet there was no such poverty in the world as there. The total amount of wages taken by the working-class of this country had been estimated at from 300 to 500 millions, and the total annual income was 1200 millions. But the economic rent of England was only 60 millions a-year, and if that amount was added to the amount of wages received by the workers there were still some hundreds of millions untouched, and unless these millions were taken the condition of the working population would remain precisely the same. Mr. George agreed with him that capital was rolling up into larger and larger masses. If he would look across at his own country he would find that that was the principal reason why so many people were out of work there. They would have to deal with these large masses of capital before they touched the land. Social Democrats built up the future society from the facts they saw around them to-day. To-day the capitalists found that they were eating one another up too fast, and rings and combinations were the result. The landlord was but the sleeping partner, and if the sleeping partner was killed and the active man was left at work how much better off were they? If Mr. George is going to tax income from land, why not tax all robbery of labour?

George had never said anything more than that the increase of rent produces a tendency to the decrease of wages as a proportion. What they aimed at was not so much the taking of rent for the good of the community, as the freeing of land for the use of labour. The tax on land would compel the dogs in the manger to let go their grasp, and everywhere open opportunities by which labour could employ itself. And then how many men would be knocking at the factory gates for work? The unemployed had been driven off the land. He himself had seen a family evicted in Ireland and met that same family in a factory town begging for work at any price. Land and labour were the only two absolutely necessary factors in the production of wealth. Capital was the child of labour exerted upon land. Give labour access to land and it will produce capital, and give labour access to land and the power of the capitalist to grind down the people must disappear. Mr. Hyndman quarrelled with competition; he wanted to abolish it. To abolish competition would be to abolish freedom. How could they abolish competition except by saying to men "Thou shalt not"? How could they abolish competition save by preventing men from doing what they wanted to do, and what it was to the interest of the community that they should do? Why, to-day what was it that the working classes had to complain of? The restriction of competition—monopoly. How was competition to be abolished? The Social-Democrats proposed to take everything—not merely that which belonged of natural right to all men equally, but that which belonged by natural right to the men who had produced it. It was a pretty big job. Competition could not be abolished without subjecting men to the worst form of tyranny, without stopping all progress. Where competition was not permitted there was stagnation. It was the competition of manufacturer with manufacturer that led to the adoption of inventions in manufacture, it was the competition of steamship-owner with steamship-owner that had given them the greyhounds of the sea. What was wanted was full competition. What they wanted to do was to abolish the monopolies that prevent competition. It was to these monopolies and not to the earnings of capital that great fortunes were due. The great owners of Irish estates were not the Irish landlords but the English banks and insurance societies. Jay Gould made his first start by getting hold of a piece of land and taking advantage of its rise in value, and he was to-day the owner of millions of acres. Capital was a real thing; something produced by labour from land, and used again in the production of wealth. If the English national debt were wiped out to-morrow there would not be a penny less capital in the country. Let there be competition all around, from the highest to the lowest, and then it became the highest, the widest, the finest the most delicate system of co-operation that could possibly be devised by the art of man. Labour's fight should not be against capital but against monopoly. Abolish monopoly everywhere, put all men on an equal footing, and then trust to freedom. To abolish competition they must have restriction, they must call upon the coercive powers of the State; how else were they going to do it?

JAMES BLACKWELL.

(To be concluded).

"THE SOLDIERS HATE THIS KIND OF THING."—A Dundee soldier, writing to his brother from the South of Ireland, gives some particulars of eviction scenes on the Ponsonby estates in County Cork, in which he, as one of the military body-guard of the emergency men, was called upon to take part. He says:—We rose at four, got our breakfast at half-past, and were on the road by five. We were joined by the emergency men, and a more villainous lot of human beings I never set eyes on. Priests and Irish newspaper men were not allowed inside the ring we had made. I was sickened by some of the sights I saw. Little did I think I would ever assist at an eviction, and I can tell you the soldiers hate this sort of thing, an officer remarking, with some feeling, during the proceedings, that he wondered why the landlords did not depart from the country and leave the land to the "poor devils." He would not put a dog into some of these houses. It was eight at night, before we got back to camp.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Seamen's Strike.

The shipowners at Liverpool merit sympathy. They are very hard up for rats, and two worthy gentlemen have been supplying the 'Adriatic,' one of the steamers of the White Star Line, with paupers from the workhouse dressed up in sailors' clothes, and then pocketed their advance notes, of £2 each, as a slight recompense for their trouble. Two of the paupers who were rejected were intercepted by the union, so the whole thing was exposed, and these practical philanthropists who desired to supply the paupers with useful work for a consideration were heavily fined by unsympathetic magistrates. It does not appear that the paupers knew anything about seamen-ship, and if the scab crews are generally made up with material of this kind, it is to be hoped that the passengers on big lines like the White Star and Cunard admire the care with which these companies select their scab crews.

The monotony of the strike at Liverpool was broken on Tuesday, July 2, by an attack on the house of a boarding-house keeper who has been supplying the ship-owners with scabs. His windows were broken, the doors forced, and his furniture smashed. The riot was thought so serious that the mounted police were called out. It is evident that the men at Liverpool, who are holding together so splendidly, will not be beaten without a bitter struggle.

The seamen are beaten at Sunderland, but they have resolved at Liverpool by 584 to 40 to continue the strike.

The Tram Slaves.

Another piece of shameful tyranny on the part of the London Tramway Company. They have dismissed one of their men, T. C. Roberts, a horse-keeper, because he would not sign an agreement binding him to give the company four days' notice if he wanted to leave, while the company could dismiss him at a moment's notice. Unfortunately, he found no backers in his plucky behaviour, for the rest of the men signed this in fear of dismissal. When will the men learn that a wrong inflicted upon one of their number is the concern of all? Several of the men who have been already discharged have obtained situations.

The spread of the union in the North of London has wrung the concession of a summer holiday from the North Metropolitan Tramway Company. The inspectors are to have ten days and their pay, and so on down to the horsekeepers, who will get two days and their pay. The hardest worked and the worst paid get the shortest holiday. This is the capitalistic notion of justice to their employees; they naturally treat their slave-drivers better than their slaves. These gentlemen will come back from their ten days at the seaside full of health and spirits for their pleasant task of harrying and harassing the unfortunate men.

Edward Cross, a conductor on the South London line, has issued a circular warning his fellow workmen against "agitators," and the danger and folly of coming out on strike. It is to be hoped that the directors have paid his printing expenses.

The West Metropolitan Company have sacked two men. One of them, conductor Dennington, received his dismissal, according to the company's manager, Mr. Gayner, "for endeavouring to get men to join the Union." Driver C. Witte has been evicted as well, for after he had joined the Union he was turned out of one of the company's houses, which the manager suddenly discovered he wanted for an office. The house was a new one, and it had cost him a sovereign for coals to dry. Where is his compensation for improving the property of the company? The West Metropolitan is the line of which the manager and officials were so prominent at one of the Union meetings. We can guess what they were there for now. Three cheers, my lads, for free England, where people are never evicted nor coerced!

National Conference of Miners.

At this conference, which was held at Manchester on July 2 and 3, there were fifty delegates present representing 240,000 miners. It was stated that Somerset was the only district in which the advance generally demanded by the miners had not been conceded. It was decided to give the men on strike in Somerset active support till they obtain the advance. It was agreed to support the resolution carried at Birmingham in favour of reducing the hours of labour for miners to eight a day, working five days a week. A resolution in sympathy with the relatives of the miners killed in the explosion at St. Etienne was adopted. This shows that our miners are getting international in their sympathies. Resolutions condemning the use of roburite in mines, and regretting the non-representation of workmen on the Rents and Royalties Commission were carried, and the conference then rose.

GENERAL STRIKE OF NAIL-MAKERS.—At a mass meeting of wrought nail-makers belonging to the East Worcestershire and Staffordshire districts, held at Halesowen last Monday, a general strike was declared. The operatives, who number about 15,000, claim an advance of wages ranging from 10 to 15 per cent.

STRIKE OF NEWSBOYS AT CARDIFF.—The spirit of revolt has spread from the tram men to the newsboys. The Cardiff newsboys on Monday refused to take out two evening papers, demanding to purchase the papers at 3d. a dozen instead of 4d., as hitherto paid. The boys surrounded two offices, broke the windows with sticks, threw the contents boards into the river, and expressed their determination not to give way. No papers are being sold in the streets. These young rebels put some of our men to shame.

TERMINATION OF THE GAS-WORKERS' DISPUTE.—The London gas-workers and labourers gained a partial victory last Saturday. The men, some 10,000 in number, originally worked twelve hours a day, and filled ninety-six retorts, and they demanded that their hours should be reduced to eight a day, with seventy-two retorts to draw and charge, and attendance to producers. The employers have decided to concede the men's demand for eight hours, but stipulated that eighty retorts should be drawn and charged, with attendance to ten producers. They are going to hold a demonstration on Sunday, to thank their employers for giving way. This is a mistake, for the employers certainly would not have given way unless they were obliged to, so there is nothing to thank them for.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Chicago and Alton Railroad has withdrawn from the Interstate Railroad Association. This considerably endangers the future existence of the embryo railroad trust, and the most likely upshot will be the formation of another association, with "cast-iron" rules, under the absolute dictatorship of Jay Gould. It will be remembered that the Interstate Railroad Association was the result of a compact entered into by the United States railroad magnates in New York last January. A railroad trust must and will come, for there is no other way imaginable to capitalistic minds in which to conform somewhat to economic laws. Railroad competition and its consequences—viz., passenger and goods rates "demoralisation"—is doomed, and must go to the wall. But what will the people do? Well, as Vanderbilt once remarked, the people be damned!

The present unsettled state of the railroads makes investors rather shy of this kind of property. Railroad stocks are practically ignored on the stock exchange, but everybody is hurrying to get hold of some trust shares. It is said that men have begun "to gamble blindly, heedless of the quantity and quality of their purchases." Sugar, lead, and oil take the lead, and the proverbial poor widow is withdrawing her money from savings banks to buy trust stock. The poor widow! She is always trotted out in any discussion on expropriation. However, she appears to have a taste for gambling, and a wish to participate in the spoils of the "unearned increment"; and perhaps it may not be so wicked after all to give her a chance to earn an honest living in a Socialistic society.

Edward Bellamy, of 'Looking Backward' fame, has written an open letter to the Nationalist Clubs advocating the extension of compulsory education to the seventeenth year. Reverend Solomon Schindler, also of the Nationalist Society, goes him one better, and closes an article in the Boston Globe with the following propositions:

"I for one stand ready to take the onus of absurdity on me by declaring that I believe (1) in manual training as the necessary supplement to mental training; (2) in the equal right of all, rich or poor, to share in the benefits of such an improved education; (3) in the extension of school life to the seventeenth year at least; and (4) in the duty of a community which pretends to offer education 'free' to all, to provide indigent scholars with the necessaries of life during their years of study."

If only these good people could see how urgent it is to concentrate all our energies on solving the economical question, after which all other questions will speedily solve themselves! It's no good switching on to side tracks.

Ex-inspector of Chicago police, John Bonfield, has been arrested for stealing diamonds. Of course nothing will happen to him; his services during the Anarchist trial were too valuable to allow of his being imprisoned for theft!

Things have evolved in Johnstown, Pa., much as I said they would. The members of the club who owned the reservoir have been declared not guilty by "experts." The money given by "charitable" people has not yet reached the deserving needy. The "honest, solid, self-made" business men, who, in conjunction with the State authorities, are in control, declare that in view of the chaotic condition in which everything happens to be in that unfortunate city, it is impossible to keep any accounts. The workers who were engaged in clearing away the debris struck because of the starvation wage paid them, and more than 1,500 of them have been compelled in consequence to leave the valley. Yet, after all, "America is a free country and a brotherhood of man."

The Washington, D. C., grand jury has indicted ten members of a hod-carriers' union for "conspiracy" in threatening to strike unless an offensive non-unionist were discharged by their employers.

The International Typographical Union in session at Denver, Col., adjourned on June 15th, having completed its labours. A resolution demanding that the Government return to the process of hand-work in printing Government bonds and banknotes was adopted. The convention indorsed Government control of telegraphs.

A trades council of delegates from all trade and labour unions has been organised in Salt Lake City.

A movement is on foot by the Knights of Labour and Farmers' Alliance to capture the Legislature of Alabama. They claim 40 out of 66 counties.

Brooklyn gravediggers will not dig for any but the body of a union man, and the Harse-drivers' Union in that city will not handle a non-union corpse.

The organisations of the railway firemen, switchmen, and brakemen have formed an alliance, to be known as the "United Order of Railway Employés."

Number of strikes from June 1 to 22, 33; number of strikers, 6,552.

Boston, Mass., June 26, 1889.

REPORTS.

LONDON OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.—Weltje Road, Hammersmith—Good meeting on Sunday evening, Morris and G. B. Shaw speakers; 5s. 8³d. collected. Kilburn—On Sunday morning, Mainwaring and Parker addressed a large audience outside the "Old Plough," Kilburn Lane, Harrow Road, at which place the meetings, formerly held at the Canterbury Road, will be carried on in future. Weal sold out. Finsbury Park—Brookes and Parker were here last Saturday, and had a little friendly chat with some workmen and distributed a large number of leaflets. By the way, whoever had the selection of the spot in the park for public meetings, chose the dreariest and least attractive that could be found. This is not to be wondered at, for it is quite in keeping with middle-class ideas of gratifying the tastes of the people. Streatham Fountain—Brookes addressed a very earnest audience on Sunday evening, and several questions were asked and answered. A plain-clothes policeman tried to find out where the speaker was employed. We know the benevolent intentions of these wretches when they make such enquiries.

CLERKENWELL.—Good meeting on the Green, J. Turner and Mrs. Lahr speaking. We afterwards adjourned from Green to hall, which we found crammed, and had to turn heaps of sympathisers and visitors away. Herbert Burrows (S. D. F.) lectured on "Social Democracy and Anarchism." After the lecture one of the Social Democrats present proposed that the Democrats abstain from discussion in order to allow the Anarchists a chance to reply. Warm discussion resulting in a challenge given by Burrows to Turner to debate "Anarchism and Social Democracy," Turner accepting the challenge the debate will be duly announced when arrangements are completed.—P.

HAMMERSMITH.—Sunday evening E. B. Bax lectured on "Law," full audience, many questions, and smart debate in which comrade Tucker (of Boston) took part.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday, July 7th, Kitz and Brooks spoke to a good audience; 13 Commonweal sold and 1s. 2d. collected. In the evening in our rooms we held a special meeting to elect a delegate to the Paris Congress; comrade Cooper was elected to represent the branch.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting was held at Latimer Road; speakers were Lyne, jun., Maughan, Tohatti, A. J. Smith, and Mrs. Lahr; 35 Commonweal sold, and 1s. 6d. collected; one new member. A fair meeting at William Street; speakers were Lyne, jun., Crouch, Davis, and Maughan; 6 Commonweal sold. At Archer Street 7.30 p.m., a good meeting was held; speakers were Tohatti, Dean, Crouch, and Maughan; a Christian spoke in opposition to parts of our programme; 15 Commonweal sold and 6d. collected.

NORTH LONDON.—Very good meeting addressed by Cantwell and Mowbray on Sunday morning at Regent's Park; 44 Commonweal sold and 7s. 4d. collected. Hyde Park on Sunday 3.30 p.m., good meeting addressed by Cantwell, Mainwaring, Mowbray, and Parker; Commonweal sold out and a number of pamphlets. A good meeting was held at Ossulton Street on Thursday evening, addressed by Hill, Cantwell, and Nicoll; fair sale of Weal. On Saturday evening at Hyde Park, Charles, Humphries, Cantwell, Hill, Cunningham, Nicoll, and Samuels addressed a very large meeting; some opposition on the foreign labour question; collection 2s. 2d., and 31 Weal sold.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.—Splendid meeting on Mile-end Waste on Tuesday, addressed by Foley and Turner on "Trades Unionism and Socialism." Fair members' meeting on Wednesday. Further collection for banner fund. Fair meeting at Leman Street on Sunday, addressed by Nicoll and Turner, Nicoll giving account of the taking of the Bastille.—J. T.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 1st inst., Frederic Harrison's lecture, "A Few Words about the Nineteenth Century," was read and discussed. The rain prevented open-air work on Saturday and Sunday.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday the usual meetings were held by Timothy, Joe Burgoyne, and Glasier. At the same stations good meetings were held the Sunday previous, when 2s. 8d. was collected for dock labourers. Owing to the Glasgow Fair Holidays no meetings will be held next Sunday.—D. McC.

LEICESTER.—Sunday morning last Peacock of Nottingham addressed a fairly good audience in Russell Square; 4s. 4d. collected, 3s. worth of literature sold. In the evening, in Humberstone Gate, Cunningshame Graham, M.P., addressed us on "The Eight Hours Movement." The audience was little short of 1,000. Several of the political and trades union leaders were present, and the press have given us ample reports. Barclay took the chair, and after a few words on Socialism, introduced the lecturer. Graham, who commenced with a very warm tribute to William Morris, went on to make out a good case for eight hours labour all round. The audience listened attentively, and were decidedly favourable to his sarcasms and denunciations. There was no opposition at the close, but several questions were put to the lecturer, which he dealt with. At this meeting 18s. 4d. was collected, which will go to other propagandist purposes, as Graham refused to have anything towards his expenses; 8s. worth of literature sold. Total collection, 22s. 8d.; total literature, 11s.—T. P. B.

LEEDS.—A large meeting was addressed on Sunday morning by Sweeney, Paylor, and Corkwell. In the afternoon a mass meeting of the builders' labourers took place in Vicars Croft, numbering 4,000. The Labourers' Union is now in thoroughgoing order; on Saturday last over 350 paid the shilling entrance fee and were enrolled as members. Meanwhile the strike is taking place; some forty masters have conceded the halfpenny per hour advance, and in the present flourishing state of the building trade the men are sure to win. The committee continue to meet at our rooms.

NORWICH.—On Sunday afternoon, owing to no speaker turning up, our usual stand was taken up by Mr. Burgess, editor of Daylight, who spoke upon various questions of interest to working-men, and was followed by comrade Swash. A meeting was held at North Walsham, addressed by comrades Adams and Moore; very attentive audience.

YARMOUTH.—On Monday a huge meeting was held at Belton by Ruffold, McCormack, and Brightwell. On Thursday comrade McCormack lectured at Nelson Hall on "How the Poor Live" to a good audience; brisk discussion, in which a Tory parson was "sat on." On Sunday morning, on Priory Plain, a large meeting was held; Cores sang a "Song for Socialists," then Fred Henderson spoke and completely pulverised an individualist who made some disparaging remarks; Reynolds also spoke. In the afternoon another meeting was held at the same place, the speakers being Ruffolds, McCormack, Cores, and Reynolds. On the Quay, in the evening, a most successful meeting was held, Cores, Henderson, McCormack, and Reynolds being the speakers. Splendid collections; 42 Commonweal sold, also a number of pamphlets.—J. McC.

BRADWELL.—On Sunday morning comrades McCormack and Ruffolds came over from Yarmouth and held a very successful meeting. 3 Commonweal and 16 pamphlets sold. We are going to start a branch here soon.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro Street, July 6th, Mr. J. Hamilton lectured on "Peasant Proprietary," advocating the system of occupying ownership. The reactionary nature of the scheme was forcibly pointed out by Frizelle, Toomey, King, and others.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Good meeting in the Market Place on Sunday. Rooke and Whalley spoke on School Board election. Next Sunday the Socialist excursion to Charnwood Forest, Leicestershire, takes place.—P.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE International Socialist Congress was opened on Sunday in the Salle Petrelle, as announced, but the delegates numbered nearly 400, and on Monday it was necessary to move into the larger hall known as the Fantaisies Parisiennes in the Rue Rochefoucault. Attracting less notice than any other event which took place on the centenary of the Bastille, the opening of this Congress was yet by far the most important happening of the day, to the workers of the world at least.

The present Congress is the largest and most representative that has ever been held, even in the palmiest days of the old International, and it is to be hoped that it will not separate without leaving as part of the result of its labours a reconstructed and stronger International.

The centenary shows everywhere have been very poor as celebrations in the true sense of the word. That in Paris even was only remarkable for its size and brilliance as a spectacle; the enthusiastic rejoicing that should have informed it, were the "celebration" real, was notable by its absence. The bourgeois were obviously unable to abandon themselves to merriment and amusement in face of so many reminders of the instability of wrongful privilege.

They thought upon existing Bastilles for the fall of which they are not anxious, and their efforts at gaiety were half-hearted and spasmodic. As for the workers—well! the Bastille fell a long while ago, and they are still poor and cruelly oppressed; they could not very well realise what good it had done them. However, the holiday was a boon, and the sunshine and the flags and the fireworks and the rest of the fun made it enjoyable, so the mass of them huzzaed, and didn't know why.

But the ever-increasing army of the discontented thought of the memories and associations of the day that had been, and looked forward to the days that are to come.

"A highly promising specimen of permissive legislation," as the Daily News calls it, in the shape of a Bill for enabling the London County Council to buy up the metropolitan water-works, is before Parliament, but with very small chance of becoming law this Session. As it only provides, however, that the water companies may sell, and that the Council may buy, there is very little need, one would think, for any great alarm on the part of the monopolists, or of enthusiasm on that of those who are adopting this method of attack upon their prerogatives. It is not very likely that the shareholders in the New River Company, for instance, will readily or soon relinquish the river of gold which their control over the river of water enables them to divert from the people's pockets to their own.

But there is, no doubt, looming large to their frightened eyes, behind this mild measure one couched in more imperative terms. Also they may remember the threat openly expressed on the Council itself some time ago, that if they asked exorbitant prices, or in any other way obstructed public control of public resources, it would always be possible to open new sources of supply and to compete them out of the field, which would be turning their own weapons upon them with a vengeance.

Another piece of legislation which has caused much weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth, is that clause of the Scotch Local Government Bill which provides for free education. "Free" education alone, and only for Scotland at that, is not calculated to stir a Socialist's blood to any great extent, but, as we have so often insisted in these columns, there is a meaning in these small things which makes them of much greater importance than many other events which to ordinary newspaper readers make the history of the time. S.

Mr. Lazarus has drawn attention at the St. Pancras Vestry to what is, ironically, called the "housing" of the poor in that locality. It appears that he has taken the trouble to visit some of the dens in which the poor live, and he declares that the houses are more like pigsties than habitations for human beings.

To quote his own forcible statement: "The staircases were rotten, the floor boards had great holes in them, the doors were broken off at the hinges, and some of these kennels were occupied by as many as fifteen or sixteen people, and an aggregate rent squeezed out of them amounting to some £68 and £70 per annum."

He afterwards gave some interesting details as to the amount of rent paid by these unhappy people. The details may be of interest, especially to our provincial friends, who can have very little idea as to that great curse of the helpless London worker, remorseless rack-renting by unscrupulous and greedy landlords. But let the figures speak for themselves.

These are the rents paid for some of the rooms in one of these houses. They range thus: Ground-floor front, two lodgers, 4s.; ground-floor back, six lodgers, 3s.; first floor, one family of four persons, 6s. 6d.; second floor front, three persons, 3s. 6d.; second floor back, no windows, one at 2s. 6d.; front kitchen, eight persons, 3s.; back kitchen, two at 2s. And yet this is rather a mild case of rack-renting for London. St. Pancras is some distance from the centre of London, and rents are cheaper there, but in the swarming dens of Soho, St. Luke's, and the East-end, it is not uncommon to find a family paying 5s. to 6s., or even 7s. for a single room.

Just let any thoughtful man think what this means. The most devoted believer in the respectable doctrine of individual responsibility must surely ask himself the question what he would be like if he had to live under these conditions, with an average wage of some 20s. a-week and a frowsy den to live in, in which bad smells, the voices of scolding women, and the shrieks of squalling children are painfully predominant. I wonder if, to escape this hell, he would not take to the milder one of the publichouse, and drink to drown his wretchedness.

I am not talking here to the self-righteous Pharisee, or to the smug temperance advocate with lungs of brass and a heart of iron. These people imagine that because under exceptionally favourable circumstances they can refrain from drink, therefore everyone else, no matter what their surroundings or environment may be, can do the same. No; I appeal to men with hearts to feel and brains to think, and not to the unconscious blockheads whose stolid stupidity and cruel hard-heartedness obtains for them a reputation for solid wisdom in respectable British society.

To the men of good-will I appeal. I ask them if they think it right that there should exist, beneath the smooth surface of modern society, this black pit, this yawning inferno, this hell on earth into which the wretched sink to rise no more.

Some of my readers may be trade unionists, workmen earning decent wages. And perhaps they imagine that this does not concern them. I think it does; for, my friends, despite your good wages and your little balance in the savings bank to-day, there may come a time when a commercial crisis, the failure of your master, a new machine, or sickness or death may precipitate you and your wife and children into one of these dens in the slums.

There, 'mid the stench, the shrieks, the yells, the curses, the hideous vices of many of the sufferers in these modern hells, you will find how easy it is to lead a decent life under such circumstances. It will need the sternest and noblest virtue on their part to keep your children pure and honest, to save the girls from the streets and the boys from vice and crime. Why, their surroundings, every sight they see, every word they hear, will urge them towards these courses with irresistible force; while at the same time their insanitary surroundings destroy their health and strength, and render them absolutely unfit for the grinding toil of the working people's existence.

Then let all unite, not to improve the house-farmer's property, as some Radicals seem inclined to do, but to make it harder and harder for him to exact the rents that grinds the people down into misery and vice. When we remember that people who live under these conditions may be reckoned by hundreds of thousands, it should urge the most indolent and careless of us to strike a heavy blow at the damnable system which makes these things possible. Talk of a Plan of Campaign in Ireland: do we not want one in London? D. N.

THE PHILANTHROPY OF SHIPOWNERS

ACCORDING to the published reports of the interviews between representatives of the daily press and shipowners, the latter have of late been very much grieved by the ungrateful spirit which their sailors and firemen have shown in agitating for higher wages. They expected better treatment from the men, seeing that they had in dull times kept their ships running at a loss solely to prevent their men suffering from want of employment. Several of the owners have repeated this story of their magnanimity so often that now they actually imagine that they are an unselfish and ill-used body. They will find some difficulty, however, in getting the men to believe that they ever run their ships at a loss from purely philanthropic motives, especially those men who have been often thrown out of work owing to want of remunerative employment on vessels belonging to the very fellows who are now blowing their own trumpet so loudly. The workers are beginning to learn that commercial men consider a business is being carried on at a loss, not merely when there is a balance on the wrong side of profit and loss account, but whenever the average profit is not realised. If the average profit is 10 per cent., and only 5 per cent. is being made, the capitalist is sure to raise a howl about his losses and his public spirit in keeping the business going. Indeed, it is more than suspected that often when he is making a very good thing of it he indulges in not a little whining and whimpering, for the purpose of keeping off competitors.

Sometimes, no doubt, ships are run at an actual loss, but that happens either through a slip on the part of the managers or through the desire of keeping hold of a certain trade which they know pays well on the average. What the profits made by shipping really are is not always easy to discover. All private companies, of course, keep their books and accounts under lock and key, safe from the vulgar eye. If, however, there is any truth in the following excerpt from the Glasgow Herald of 19th June, private concerns seem to be doing fairly well: "Some steamers have been doing uncommonly well for their owners of late. We have just heard of a firm that has distributed amongst the partners 30 per cent. of the drawings of the past year and have written off 10 per cent. besides. But this is moderate compared with the reported earnings of a Durham steamer—no less than 63 per cent. per annum." It is quite probable, of course, that the whole story is pure fiction, even though it did appear in the above-mentioned "respectable" paper. I give it for what it is worth.

In the case of public companies we have more reliable information, for most of them publish balance-sheets and working accounts, which are sometimes procurable. It seems that some are paying no dividend, because they are being crushed out by larger competitive lines. Others again are paying nothing because they have been paying too much in preceding years. They have been distributing dividends too high to leave them a sufficient sum to cover the depreciation in value of their vessels; and they have now to lay by abnormal sums from their net earnings in order to make their assets square with their subscribed capital and other liabilities. In other words, they have been taking from their net earnings, not only ordinary profits, but what was, strictly speaking, capital—namely, that which was to recompense them for the necessary and continuous fall in value of their vessels; they have been consuming their capital and have now to suffer for this extravagance by doing without dividends till they raise it to its original figure. For instance, the National Steamship Company paid no dividend for 1888, because in order to put itself into a good financial position it had during the previous three years been writing off the value of its ships enormous sums, which should have been spread over a great number of years. The value of its fleet as it stood in the books at the end of 1884 was £1,079,802, and it now appears as only £193,528, in these three years there having been written off £886,274, a large portion of which would have been paid in dividends if the shareholders had pocketed less in former years. This company gives, be it observed, 8 per cent. on its preference shares, and that must be paid before any dividend can be declared on ordinary stock.

On the other hand the General Steam Navigation Company, the oldest shipping company in the kingdom, is a good, steady-going concern. For 1888 it paid 3½ per cent. on ordinary stock and 5 per cent. on preference. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company paid 10 per cent. in dividend and bonus. The Union Steamship Company paid 7½ per cent. in dividend and bonus on ordinary shares, and 4 per cent. on its debenture stock.

It is difficult to tell the ratio of wages to profits, because some companies do not publish detailed working accounts, and others include with wages, in a single amount, such items as lights, tonnage-dues, port-charges, pilotages, provisions for troops and emigrants, and incidentals; which is certainly not explicit enough for a Socialist's purpose.

In the Royal Mail Company's accounts for 1888, however, we find £75,090 for wages, to which, since the company victuals the crews, has to be added a part of the sum shown in the item "provisions." Now as the sum paid in dividend and bonus amounted to £86,250, it is beyond doubt that wages might with perfect ease be raised by 75 per cent. at least. But the sum of £86,250 was not all that was earned by the workers in the employment of this company, and fished from them and their class. Out of the net earnings of the same year £87,007 was put by for repairing and renewing ships and machinery, £47,700 for insurance of the fleet, and £73,078 for depreciation—that is, for the replacement of capital lost by the natural fall in the market-value of the ships. The sums written off for depreciation are fabulously large, owing to the extremely rapid advance of the arts of shipbuilding and engineering, and to competition forcing shipowners to utilise without delay the very latest inventions and improvements. It is thus easily seen that the workers by their labour earn not only their wages but enough to repair all the wear and tear of the ships, replace such as are lost at sea, and keep adding to the fleet vessels with all the latest improvements, besides enough to pay the shareholders a handsome dividend. Thus, taking the Royal Mail Company's accounts we find the workers engaged in its service handing over to the shareholders for the purposes mentioned above £294,035 in all, or more than three times the sum they receive in wages.

These facts and figures are sufficient to enable us to form a pretty correct estimate of the financial position of shipping, and they show that in the vast majority of cases the shipowners could pay their men even far higher wages than the men themselves have at present the sense to think of claiming. Unfortunately, shipowners like other capitalists cannot be brought to see that there is no moral justification of the receipt of dividends. They believe they have a right to appropriate or confiscate the proceeds of the labour of other men when in the form of dividends, and cannot or will not see that, except in the case of gifts, whatever is taken from another without the return of an equivalent in value is robbery. Indeed it may be safely said that the capitalist class will never be moralised, but will cling to their privileges to the last. The workers must therefore depend upon themselves alone to realise Socialism and thus procure justice for all.

Under Socialism the shipping trade would, like other industries then, be managed for the good of the whole people instead of for the profit of a capitalist class. The safety, comfort, and wellbeing of the seamen and firemen would receive the first attention, no pecuniary sacrifice being considered too great to make their life as well worth living as that of the other workers. The payments made by the community for the work done by its mercantile navy would be large enough to cover as at present the expenses of maintaining the vessels in good order, supplying them with stores, building new ships to replace the old and those lost at sea. Further, they would be large enough to give the sailors and firemen the value of their labour, and not a mere fraction of it as at present. All this would not involve an extra drain on the resources of the community, for the sum paid in dividends at present would be used for this purpose, besides the enormous sums saved by the shipping being managed on co-operative lines instead of in the present private speculative way. To give an idea of the great saving that might be effected if shipping were nationalised, it may be mentioned that it was stated by the Hon. D. A. Wells, LL.D., in the Contemporary Review of August 1887, that good authorities had estimated that "the tonnage afloat in 1886 was about 25 per cent. in excess of all that was needed to do the carrying trade of the world." The meaning of that is obvious. It follows that if business were managed in an economical and rational manner, each sailor and fireman might, as the result of the saving effected by the reduction of tonnage alone, receive his present wages and into the bargain every year nearly three months' holidays ashore on full pay! For, as is easily seen, those thrown out of work by the reduction of tonnage would be available to relieve the general body of one-fifth of their work, and all would receive the same wages for nine months and a half as they now get for twelve, the same quantity of goods as now being carried for the same freights.

In view of all this, the paltry advance of two or three shillings which the firemen and sailors struck for is hardly worth troubling about. Let them go in for the full measure of justice to the whole of the working class with as much energy as they have displayed in their great strike, and if united with other trades, they will very soon rid the world of monopoly and privilege. They must put a high ideal before them, and make up their minds never to flinch till they have achieved the emancipation of labour from the yoke of capitalism.

R. ELLIOTT.

Ignorance is less distant from truth than prejudice.—Diderot.

G. C. Clemens of Topeka, Kans., has written a book entitled 'The History and Philosophy of the Labour Movement,' which I hope to review at length in the near future. For the present the following paragraph may suffice as the neatest and most concise illustration of the capitalistic system I have ever seen: "An enterprising man in a Missouri River town once during a freshet when the river was high advertised in a newspaper for five hundred hands to catch driftwood on shares. Scores of men responded to the advertisement, and for two or three days fished driftwood from the river, giving the advertiser half (which he very prudently hauled away at once), and piling up their own shares on the bank. It was amusing, of course, though sad enough, too, when philosophically thought of. When the men came to their senses at last and bethought them that the driftwood belonged to their 'employer' no more than to them, they were greatly incensed, but were so laughed at that they raised no disturbance."—H. FOULON TO THE LANTERNE!

It is nearly a week after the fall of the Bastille. The power of the aristocracy has vanished, and already the respectable middle class have taken the places of the nobles. Astronomer Bailly, who is now Mayor of Paris, and military Lafayette, commander of the National Guard, are endeavouring to maintain law and order in the interests of the monied classes. Maintaining law and order in a revolted capital, in the midst of an armed and starving people, is hard work; and so Lafayette and Bailly find it. The affair I am going to refer to especially upset them when it occurred on the 22nd of July.

It appears that old Foulon, knowing how great was the love the people bore him for his extortions, his tyranny, his schemes of taxation, and above all for his famous phrase, "The people may eat grass!" has a report spread that he is dead, and even goes to the expense of a sham funeral, concealing himself in the meantime in the country. Here he is unearthed by some country people, and dragged to Paris, with a bundle of grass on his back and a garland of nettles and thistles round his neck. Thus he is dragged along through the narrow streets to the Hôtel de Ville, a dense crowd, armed with every species of weapon, waiting outside, to see that justice is done; for the people have very grave doubts as to whether the new Municipals really desire to punish so great a man as Foulon. The people are right, for the Municipal Councillors, with the natural love of all respectable persons for scoundrels in high places, do their best to get him off. Seeing the temper of the people, who throng their council hall, which bristles with pikes and muskets, they waste the time in legal rhetoric. Morning has passed away; it is noon, but he is still unjudged. Lafayette, who has been sent for by Bailly and Co., arrives and suggests that Foulon may have accomplices, and that he had better be sent to the Abbaye prison in order to get the truth out of him. Some of the audience are foolish enough to applaud this treacherous suggestion, and old Foulon, knowing that he will be safe enough there in the kindly care of his friends upon the Municipal Council, claps his hands also. The people see the plot at once, and a well dressed man springing forward exclaimed, "Friends, what is the use of judging this man? Has he not been judged these thirty years?" In another moment he is seized by the people, dragged down stairs into the Place du Grève, and is swept across to the "lanterne" at the corner of the Rue de la Vannerie. The oil lamps of those days were hung from irons projecting from the walls of the houses, and these, with ropes by which the lamps were drawn up and lowered from them, formed convenient gibbets for popular executions. Well, Foulon, screeching for mercy, has a rope put round his neck and is dragged up to the iron. The rope breaks and down he falls; another also gives way; but the third finishes him. His head is then stuck on a pike and is borne through Paris with some grass in its mouth, amid shouts of triumphant rejoicing from a furious people.

Bailly and his friends feel anything but comfortable; but what is their dismay when they hear that Berthier, Foulon's son-in-law, has also been captured and is on his way to Paris. This man was the tyrant who had exacted taxes from the people of Paris; he had made a large fortune by his unjust exactions, and by starving the people by monopolising corn in times of scarcity. He is met by huge crowds at the gates of the city, who receive him with yells of fury and triumph. They brandish pikes, muskets, and huge placards bearing the particulars of the crimes of which he is accused, "He devoured the substance of the people," "He was the slave of the rich and the tyrant of the poor," "He drank the blood of the widow and orphan," "He betrayed his country." These are crimes that require a heavy retribution.

In the midst of the shouts and tumult he beholds the bloody head of Foulon coming towards him. He shrinks in horror from the ghastly object, and already feels the shadow of coming doom. Brought before the Municipals he refuses to answer their questions; he has only obeyed his orders, they have his papers and they can judge; as for himself he is worn out by want of rest, he only wants to sleep. A strong escort is prepared for him; he leaves the Council Hall to start for the Abbaye. But at the door of the hotel the people rush on his guards, the ranks are torn asunder, and he is whirled towards the Lanterne. He breaks loose from the encircling arms of those around him, snatches a musket and strikes desperately, for a moment driving back his assailants; but he is struck down, trampled under foot, and dragged to the lamp iron and hanged. His head is cut off, his heart torn out, and both are carried on steel points through the shouting streets. Thus die the foes of the people in the days of popular triumph and vengeance.

D. J. NICOLL.

It is difficult to free fools from the chains they revere.—Voltaire.

THE SEAMEN'S STRIKE.—The seamen's strike at Liverpool has collapsed; this was to be expected. For a long time it has been evident that the men were fighting a losing battle, though with invincible pluck and determination. They have been beaten, not so much by the organisation and wealth of the capitalist, as by the treachery of men belonging to their own class. The strike has been swamped by scabs, and it is to be feared that other strikes of the more downtrodden of the workers may be crushed in the same fashion. You see that in any labour strike, concerning those whose occupation can be learnt in a few days, may be always defeated by the aid of traitors who fight on the side of the capitalists against their fellows. It seems that nothing but the strongest measures will meet these emergencies. It is the scab and the capitalist that make terrorism necessary, and they cannot complain if their brutality and treachery brings fresh perils upon their shoulders.

A GILBERTIAN PERVERSION.

(SENTRY'S SONG, "IOLANTHE.")

WHEN all life long a chap remains
A workin' hard, the dull monotony
Must more or less obscure his brains,—
That is, supposin' that he's got any.
But though you cultured rich despise
The toiling herd, I must admonish you,
A few of us can use our eyes,
And think of things that would astonish you.
We doubt your doctrine's hardly true
That Nature ordered all things thus—
That there must needs be classes two,
One useful, one mere incubus;
And why should we break our backs for you,
If you do never a stroke for us?

You Ornamental Classes may Feel difficulty in believing it,
But speaking candidly, the way
You get your living is by thieving it.
Wherever Mammon makes his game,
From Tennessee to Trichinopoly,
The system's every whit the same—
The merry system of monopoly.

But now its days are growing few;
We see it's quite ridiculous
That there must needs be classes two—
One useful, one mere incubus;
And why should we break our backs for you,
If you do never a stroke for us?

Us workers, how the very name
Of Law and Order used to frighten us!
To-day, that text sounds rather tame—
Such power has hunger to enlighten us.
But, once we bid you all Good-day,
You money-bags and all your retinue,
We'll blink the pranks you used to play,
And say 'twas we were fools for lettin' you.

But though you may look somewhat blue,
We'll be no more bamboozled thus,
That there must needs be classes two,
One useful, one mere incubus;
For why should we toil and moil for you,
If you do never a stroke for us?

No remittances for League purposes should be sent to any other persons than those specially appointed to receive them, and whose names are duly advertised in the "Commonweal," or to any other address than this Office. Readers, especially in the Provinces, are asked to beware of appeals emanating from any person other than the Treasurer of the League, the Secretary of the Propaganda Committee, or myself,

FRANK KITZ, Secretary of the Socialist League.

TO ENGLISH WORKERS.

A DANISH ADDRESS.

BRETHREN,—In these days it is not necessary, as it would have been some years ago, to explain why we appeal to you. The cry, "Proletarians of the World, Unite!" long sounded in deaf ears; the millions were unconscious of their common misery. But now the workers everywhere are drawing closer their bonds of friendship, and are recognising that the wrong of one is the wrong of all.

Here in Denmark the Labour Movement began in 1871. Brave and energetic men took the lead and founded associations, which by their practical basis and great unanimity have extorted admiration even from our enemies. Through shortening hours, establishing regular prices for certain work, and enforcing these ameliorations by strikes and great sacrifices, we formed a defence against the encroachments of single employers; and our perfect solidarity alone has up to this time enabled us to maintain these advantages. But our enemies are also awake; they have never lost a moment in their attempts to regain their former absolute power. They have tried to form anti-Trade Union Associations, and in 1885 struck a fierce blow at one of our greatest Unions, that of the Smiths and Engineers, meaning to crush that first and the others in detail afterwards. That they failed can only be attributed to the resolute and universal aid in defence rendered by all workers.

Now the situation is much the same as then. Employers in the joinery trade have enforced a lock-out, which, if they can fulfil their intentions, will paralyse us for a very long time. Therefore we come to You, asking your help in the battle which is not alone ours but Yours also.

They have locked out 500 cabinet-makers as well as the joiners, and they threaten to carry it further and include in one monstrous lock-out all cabinet-makers, all builders, all iron-workers, and all plumbers and tinkers. To do all this, indeed, the will is not missing; and to nip the evil project in the bud, your support, moral and material, is urgently necessary. It will at least make them hesitate to carry it out, even if it do not hinder them altogether from making the attempt, when they are aware that we are not alone but have your great strength also on our side. Speedy help is here twofold help.

The cause of the conflict and its development into a lock-out is soon told. In May, 1888, a joint committee of workmen and employers completely revised the scale of pay which had been in force from 1875. The new scale made a reduction of about 20 per cent. for most of the hand-work, and an addition of 10 and 25 per cent. respectively for putting up hand and machine-work. Although the employers themselves had taken part in establishing the new prices, they speedily repudiated them and even the old scale as well. Last October we struck against two employers, and the strike ended in the compromise that the old prices should remain in force until further notice. On May 18th, these were abolished in favour of a reduction of 20 per cent. on all doors and windows worked by hand, and an addition of 15 per cent. for setting up of all joiner's work.

To many people these rates of wages may seem strange, but they are founded on the present circumstance of the trade in Copenhagen. Machine-production of joinery-work has greatly increased in the last few years, and the effects of the grande industrie are too well known to need recapitulation here.

During the negotiations the masters seemed to wish for a greater reduction for hand-work and a larger addition on setting up machine-work. Not finding these demands fulfilled in the new list they rejected it. We had not expected such a tempest as that with which our proposal was met, thinking to satisfy both parties by keeping up the reduction while reducing the addition and making it valid for both kinds of work.

As the Employer's Association did not accept our offer we struck on May 27th in seven workshops with about 120 hands. They now charged the Joiner's guild to negotiate with us, but as the guild largely consists of cabinet makers, who did not understand the subject of discussion, the negotiation came to nothing. At the last meeting it was even openly declared that the masters would acknowledge no scale; out of pure mercy they would accept the reduction, but the addition should be only 7½ per cent., and if we did not accept in fifteen minutes they would even withdraw this! Such a demand it was impossible to entertain. We claimed a delay in order to put the matter before a general assembly of our Union. We got the delay, and the answer of the Union was, as might be expected, a refusal.

We knew the truth now; it was not the mere percentage they would attack; it was the organisation they sought to destroy. On Tuesday, June 11th, Capital revealed itself in its true colours; flinging off the mask it refused to bargain any longer with its slaves, bringing against them its last resource, the Lock-Out.

In spite of all, we are of good cheer and resolved on fighting to the last. To-day it is we who must defend the rampart of Danish trades' unionism; to-morrow it may be another, many other trades. The smallness of our country and the troubles we have already endured, make it difficult to get the necessary support within our own ranks. But, knowing that for us, the oppressed and dispossessed, there are no frontiers, no difference of race or nation, we come to you for your powerful aid in our common battle, relying upon your knowledge that not we alone, but the workers everywhere are concerned. If we lose, you lose; our victory will be your gain. The international solidarity of Labour must confront and combat the international tyranny of Capital.

Therefore, brethren, help us, and help us speedily.—With fraternal greeting, for the Joiners' Trade Union, C. M. OLSEN, President.

Remittances should be sent to P. T. NIELSEN, Joiner, Joiners' Lock-Out Bureau, Romersgade, 22, Copenhagen, K., Denmark.

POWER OF CONSCIENCE.—Coal Magnate—My dear, I couldn't sleep last night. Wife—No wonder; the room was terribly warm. C. M.—Yes, the room was warm, but that wasn't what was the matter; my conscience troubled me. Wife—Eh? C. M.—Yes; I got thinking of all the poor people in the world, and what a hard time they had to get along, and I couldn't help thinking it was a pity they had to pay so much for things. Wife—Yes? C. M.—Yes; and I firmly resolved that with heaven's help I'd reduce the price of coal 25 cents. before the Fourth of July; but I guess maybe 15 cents. will be enough.—New York Weekly.

THE HYNDMAN-GEORGE DEBATE.

HYNDMAN pointed out that according to Arnold Toynbee the agricultural rent was annually 30 millions sterling, and the town ground rent also about 30 millions. And even if it were 150 millions, what did it matter? That was but a small amount compared with the total wealth which did not go to the producer. But Mr. George had said his object was to free the land. It would be just as impossible for the worker to get on the land after Mr. George had begun his operations as before, because he was going to exact the full economic rent every year. But supposing the worker went on to the land, who was going to supply his tools, and how was he to meet the competition of the big factory farms? If competition was such a glorious thing, would Mr. George tell him how the man who was working on ten acres with the spade was going to meet the competition of the great factory farmers of Dakota with their steam-ploughs, etc. The law of competition would crush out the small men who went on the land without tools. This law of competition meant degradation for the mass of the people. Socialists wanted instead that co-operation of man with man for the development of the faculties of each, and he believed that this national and international co-operation was the necessary future of mankind. What Mr. George was proposing was practically to substitute the monopoly of the capitalist by competition for the monopoly of the landlord by land. The system of competition was falling down at the present time by its own weight. Competition had been tried and found wanting. He was told that the Social Democratic system would mean the stunting of faculty—were not men's faculties stunted by competition and the mere desire to compete and crush down their fellows? He saw the finest faculties crushed down by overwork because of this competition. If it was immoral to socialise capital—the tools—then it was equally immoral to touch the rent which goes to the landlord. One was the result of historical causes just as much as the other, and one meant the expropriation of labour just as much as the other. He was told that co-operation would stop progress, but capitalism stopped progress to-day. The great forces of electricity were practically not utilised to-day because of this very capitalist system.

George said what he proposed was to take rent—always meaning by rent economic rent—for the community, because it belonged to the community. He would not abolish it; he would exact it from anyone who used land. The importance that he attributed to this taking of rent was not merely that it was taking that which would not restrict industry, oppress labour, or hamper production, but that in taking rent they made mere land ownership utterly valueless, that they made it unprofitable to hold land in expectation of a future increase in its values, that they made it impossible to extort from the worker a monopoly rent, and that they made it impossible for individuals to hold vast tracts of land in idleness or for purposes of pleasure. Tax land values to the full and what was the result? The land which had no value, the land lying on the outskirts, could be had without price. The selling value of land would be destroyed, and land which had a value from position or fertility could be had by paying the rent to the community. Mr. Hyndman had asked who was to supply tools. This was a striking illustration of how the Social Democrats simply took the old dicta of such political economists as Ricardo. Just as they used to say that labour cannot be employed unless there is capital to employ it, and capital must therefore restrict the employment of labour because labour could not support itself, save on the produce of past labour, which is capital, the Social Democrats now said that labour could not go on to land and utilise it without capital. But who was the capitalist who supplied the first man with capital? And, he was asked, how was labour to get to land. How had labour got to land when it was much farther off? How had the Irish labourer gone three thousand miles across the sea, and then in many cases a thousand miles west? By saving, by borrowing, some member of the family had gone across, and his earnings had constituted an emigration fund for the rest of the family. The whole development of the United States, the whole development of any new country, proved the fallacy of the assertion that labour could not employ itself without capital. Go into a new country where land is free, or at least the price of land is not yet high, and there they would find no such thing as an unemployed man. The monopoly of land and not the exploitation of capital had been the cause of the deterioration in the condition of the people of the United States. Wherever the farmer goes he finds the land speculator ahead of him, and he had to mortgage his labour for years. That was the cause of mortgages, and that was why times had been getting harder in the United States. As to the man with the spade competing with the great factory farmer, at least he could always make a good living for himself with the spade if he had access to the land, and when men could do that they would not work for another for anything less. Capital was not really the employer of labour, labour was the employer of capital—that was the natural order. Give labour access to land and the reward of its exertions upon it, and the dissensions between the capitalist and the labourer would pass away, and if there were then great organisations of capital they would necessarily be co-operative organisations, in which labour would have its full share. He proposed to go back to the old English system, to recognise that all men were equally entitled to the use of the land, and that each man was absolutely entitled to that which his labour produced. They had heard a great deal that night about nationalising all the instruments of production, making capital the property of the State, and organising labour by the State, but he had yet to hear of any practical step in this direction. How did the Social Democrats propose to begin? The instruments of production included the axe, the spade, and the tools of the individual workman; were they going to take all that? It was a good big job. Had it ever happened in the history of the world that the men who had nothing took everything from the possessing class? never! But if it was taken what did they propose to do? To use it under government direction. To have a government official or a Board at the head of every vocation, from lawyers, doctors, and civil engineers down to milkmen, costermongers, and bootblacks. Did not organisation always mean a concentration of power? Did not those present who belonged to trade and political organisations know that the tendency always was to their being managed by a few? When things were left to the vote of a large number of people it was a few designing men who had the advantage. The system of protection, or taxation on imports, which existed in his country was an example of government protection of production. It was the result of the wisdom of the people of the United States expressed by manhood suffrage, and it was a system of utter robbery and spoliation, a system which gave to such men as Andrew Carnegie incomes of millions of dollars a year and had driven American ships off the seas. Let them think of what would be the result if that system was applied to all industry. Think of the tyranny. The Social Democrats talked about organising industrial armies: an army always meant that a man must be put into the ranks as a machine and must obey arbitrary authority. Did they think there would be less tyranny because men claimed to act by the authority of the people? Not at all. They knew in the United States that there could be a tyranny of majorities just as bad as the tyranny of royalty.

Hyndman then enumerated the palliative measures propounded by the S. D. F. Mr. George had asked how Social Democrats were going to carry out their programme. By vote if possible, by force if necessary; and he would have to get his rent or tax in the same way.

George, in conclusion, claimed that the single tax would compel those who were now holding land unemployed to use it themselves or sell out to those who would. Mr. Hyndman had stated that industrial depression came from too much production; that because too many boots were made, men went shoeless, and so on. That was not it. There could not be too much production until the wants of all were satisfied. It was because the men were unable to apply their labour to produce something they could exchange for the boots. Industrial depression was caused by speculation in land values and shutting out labour and capital from employment on land, thus causing men to compete with each other for an employer. The Anglo-Saxon race had secured its predominance through trusting very little to government; more than any other people they had allowed free scope to the individual. He wanted them to follow their traditions to more and more liberty. The interest of the people was always in freedom. Their watchword should be—Freedom, Freedom, always Freedom.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, Professor Beesly, led him to reply that he agreed with neither party, and that in his opinion the best parts of the speeches were those in which the opponents destroyed one another's arguments.

JAMES BLACKWELL.

PROPOSED FEDERATION OF YORKSHIRE SOCIALISTS.

The following circular has been submitted to the Council of the Socialist League, and has received their warm approbation. They recommend it as an example to other provincial branches, and believe that a similar scheme would be a great help to all of them by strengthening them in the work of propaganda:—

Leeds Branch of the Socialist League, Clarendon Buildings, Victoria Road.

Your attendance is invited at the above address on Sunday, July 28th, at 7 p.m., to consider the advisability of forming a Federation of Yorkshire Socialists, for the purpose of strengthening existing branches and where possible establishing new ones.

In furtherance of this object it is suggested that an Annual Conference be held, time and place to be determined by sitting Conference. Members of branches and individuals taking part in the work of the Federation to be eligible to attend the Annual Conference.

In order that the work of Federation may be effectually carried on, it is further suggested:

That a Yorkshire secretary may be annually elected, whose duties shall be:—The organisation of the Socialist elements of Yorkshire, with a view to co-operative propaganda; by visiting branches and corresponding with individuals where branches do not exist; the preparation of a list of speakers for indoor and outdoor meetings, and collecting funds for defraying all expenses incidental to the agitation.

County secretary to pay a monthly visit to branches, and acquaint them of work done and to make arrangements for ensuing month. The secretary also to inform by correspondence, individuals situated in districts where branches do not exist, how the work of the Federation is going on, and to make such arrangements as may lead to the formation of branches.

All persons interested in the well-being of the Federation to consider it a duty to render every help to the county secretary, by promptly communicating facts as to trade disputes, places where meetings might be held, and names and addresses of such persons as could be counted upon to co-operate in the work.

N. B.—The above to be subject to any alterations or additions that the Conference may decide upon. F. CORKWELL, Organising Secretary of Leeds Branch of the Socialist League.

LANDLORD TYRANNY.

It appears that the people of Zetland have gained a great victory. The inhabitants of this primitive island in the far north living far from the rush and roar of the modern world, retain many habits and customs which we have long forgotten. Strange as it may appear, these men have no foe but the feudal landlord, who endeavours vainly to keep up the exactions of the past. The men of Zetland are largely engaged in the whale-fishery, and it has been the pleasant little custom of the landlords to claim a third of the value of any whales which had been driven upon the seashore and killed upon their property. Sometimes these exactions were extended to half the value of the fish caught. If the men refused, they had to take the consequences—eviction and loss of work. In order to avoid these feudal dues the men have sometimes not followed their usual custom of driving the whales into the shore, but have killed them at sea. This practice has been met by "fines" and "punishments." However, some rebellious people have taken the matter into court and have gained the day. Sheriff Mackenzie has decided that the landlord has no legal claim. In the judge's note to his decision occurs the following remarkable passages. In speaking of the landlord's claim, he points out that it has no written law at the back of it, and that according to Erskine, "Unwritten law is that which without any express enactment of the supreme power, derives its force from its tacit consent, which consent is presumed from the inveterate or immemorial usage of the community." That is, the landlord has only the consent of the community to rely upon for the legalisation of his exactions. He then points out that usage is not immemorial and inveterate, nor is it founded upon consent, "unless that consent is construed as the choice of two evils, the submission to a burden under the knowledge that a greater harm would come from resisting it. Every payment or claim, such as rent or taxes, is no doubt felt by many to be a hard thing, and one that they would be relieved from, but for which they from obvious reasons are compelled to pay." Indeed, Mr. Sheriff, and what are the "obvious reasons"? One fails to see them. What need is there for keeping a pack of idle landlords, government officials, and all the host of slave-driving classes? None whatever. Mr. Sheriff Mackenzie has discovered that it is illegal for men to pay a tax on the produce reaped by their labour from the sea; who knows that some day he may not find out that it is "illegal" for men to pay tax upon their labour, even if it be in the form of rent, taxes, profit, or interest.

D. N.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Tram Slaves.

I have already mentioned the hard case of the men employed upon the cars of the North London Tramway Company. It appears that the company pays its men a miserable pittance ranging from 3s. 3d. to 3s. 9d. for a day of 14 or 15 hours, while it manages to screw, for its shareholders 6½ per cent. dividend out of the slavery of its men. Yes, slavery! There is no other word for it, to work men seven days a-week and only give them a holiday once in every twenty-one days, while their life is made miserable by tyranny of the inspectors and the usual system of worrying fines.

Well, these men held a meeting at Edmonton in the small hours of Thursday morning, and were addressed, among others, by the Rev. D. Russel. The rev. gentleman acted up to his character of a minister of the gospel by recommending the men to combine and not to resort to "mob violence." Dear me! Suppose, now, the reverend gent was a tramway man and did some useful work for his living, instead of talking nonsense. Suppose, too, he came out on strike for higher wages, and saw that his place was being taken by traitors to his class, who by their cowardly action were taking the bread out of the mouth of himself his wife and children, and driving them to perish by quick starvation in the street or slow starvation in the workhouse, and there happened to be a brick handy. I wonder if the reverend gent would forget his Christian principles so far as to pick it up and chuck it at the head of that scab, as a gentle reminder that he was not wanted in his present position. If he did so he would be resorting to "mob violence"; but who could blame him for defending himself and his family against a man who was cutting their throats? The reverend gent should reserve his reprobation for the directors and their friends the scabs, who by their aggressive action force people into "mob violence."

The South London Tramway Co. have followed the example of the North Metropolitan by declaring that they have no objection to their men combining, and have also promised to do their best to remedy any grievances. Very kind of them. Such consideration from a tramway company is rare. Inspector Pain, the amateur spy, has gone to Honolulu,—a good journey to him! The West Metropolitan company are still dismissing their men for joining the union; while the Southwark and Deptford are short of conductors, and have to press horse-keepers for service in that capacity. All seems going well for the men; they are literally overwhelmed by the support of respectables. Rather different from the days when only the disreputable Socialist was found to plead their cause.

The Glasgow Dock-Labourers' Strike.

The dock-labourers' strike in Glasgow has collapsed. The surrender of the seamen and firemen made it futile for the labourers to hold out longer, and with the view of retaining some funds in hand the officials recommended the men to go back at the old terms for a time.

The labourers came out on strike on the understanding that the seamen and the labourers would stand or fall together. The action, therefore, of the seamen or their officials in "raising the siege" without the consent of the labourers provoked much ill-feeling amongst the latter, and will make the association of the two unions in a future struggle a very difficult task.

In many respects the dock-labourers fought well—better, indeed, than most working-men fight. They kept a watch upon the sheds day and night, and for a couple of weeks either coaxed or terrorised the most of the scabs to leave off work. They received very little ailment from their union—many of them none at all—and faithfully followed the advice of their official leaders. Their compulsory surrender is therefore much to be regretted, and it will probably dishearten the men for a long time to come.

Somersetshire Miners.

The Somerset miners still hold out for the 10 per cent. advance. There are upwards of 3,000 men out on strike. We take the following from our contemporary, the Labour Tribune, which tells a little story of how the Somersetshire women have made it hot for the scabs. After informing us that the miners are enjoying their holiday in a mild and tranquil manner, it goes on to observe: "So much as this cannot be said about the women, for the few people who went to work on the first day after the general cessation of work, seem to become the special charge of the fair sex, and they accompany some of these brave fellows to and from their work, and what with the beating of trays and bread tins and such like, produce a combination of sounds not in strict accordance with the rules of harmony, while occasionally above the din would be heard a shrill voice calling out 'blackleg.'" The end of it all, of course, was that twenty-three women and boys were summoned for "intimidation." The appearance of all who were summoned was more than ordinarily respectable, and most of the women carried babies! Fancy accusing a woman with a baby of "intimidation." I wonder they didn't summon the baby while they were about it. The magistrates happily saw the idiocy of the charges, and merely contented themselves by binding these dangerous people over to come up for judgment when called upon.

THE CLYDE RIVETERS.—The strike has been settled, and the threatened lock-out of 10,000 men averted by a compromise. The riveters are to work the next six months at a fixed rate.

THE GAS STOKERS after being victorious by their own action, have lost in the law courts. This must always be expected when workmen are foolish enough to go to law. Judge Bayley has decided that the men are only day labourers, and have no claim for a week's wages when dismissed without notice. What more could be expected from middle-class "justice?" Trust in your own strong arms, my friends, but don't waste time and money in your master's law courts. By doing so you only fill the capitalist classes with suppressed laughter; they know you will get more kicks than ha'pence at that game.

SHOE TRADE WAGES.—The boot and shoe riveters have gained an advance of 5 per cent. This increase has been the result of the deliberations of an arbitration board, composed equally of masters and men. This board was formed after the great lock-out of 1887, when 20,000 operatives were thrown out of work. The board appears to have worked well, but whether in the interest of masters or men the report does not say. Some 8,000 will be affected by the increase. The handstitch men have also received an advance they applied for a month ago. The increase to the hand-sewers or cordwainers is over 10 per cent.

SOCIALISM IN LANCASHIRE.

ONE thing the visit of our comrade Kitz to this epitome of civilisation has unmistakably made clear—i.e., the fact that Socialism is a name to conjure with among the workers of Lancashire; that, amid all the befogging and ugly surroundings, amid the horrors of this sordid régime of factory hells, the degradation and degeneracy of the human profit-grinding machines, the obliteration of all sense of natural beauty, and the total destruction of rural loveliness from the face of nature, which are the legacies left us by the glorious reign of commercial supremacy; amid the evil and benighting effects of these triumphs of modern civilisation, when one would have expected to find all hope abandoned by the working people who are its victims, it is yet true that the ideas of Socialism, the gospel of Revolution, has taken root and is now becoming a goodly tree, under whose spreading branches the thinking portion of the people are finding hope and discovering how they can work out the salvation of all humanity.

The first of the series of meetings addressed by comrade Kitz was held on Sunday afternoon the 23rd ult. in Stevenson Square, Manchester. It was called together to hear the question "Why the Workers Live in Slums" discussed from the revolutionary standpoint. The chair was taken by E. H. Parkinson, whose opening remarks were well received. The following resolution, proposed by Ritson, seconded by Marshall, each in an able speech on the question raised, was supported by F. Kitz:

"That this meeting of workers of Manchester, recognising the disparity between the death rate of the idlers living in luxury upon others' labour and that of the workers living in slums, declares that rent, interest, and profit, together with the monopoly of land and the means of production, are the main causes of the miseries of the producers, and can only be swept away by the workers combining for a total change in society."

The audience—nearly 2,000—filling the square listened most attentively to an address which lasted over an hour, and throughout received the uncompromising attack upon puritanical hypocrisy and social iniquity, which are the outcome of our class society, in a spirit of enthusiastic acquiescence which was most encouraging to the speaker. After Kitz's splendid address, which was much applauded, a notorious individual, who has fallen foul of every Socialist and labour movement which he became connected with, proposed an amendment which simply aimed at limiting the scope of the resolution. When it was put to the meeting, none but the mover and seconder could be found to support it. Leonard Hall stigmatised them as the half-loafers, which seemed to gauge the general feeling on the matter. The meeting, however, were for having none of the half-loaf business, so the resolution was carried unanimously. A good collection was made, and about 9s. worth of Commonweal and other literature sold.

Our usual meeting at Chester Road was also addressed by Kitz on Sunday night.

On Monday night a most sympathetic meeting of about 800 was addressed by Kitz and others on the Town Hall Square, Rochdale. Some opposition was given, which merely served to show how the people appreciated the gospel of Socialism. The S. D. F. is the only Socialist body here at present.

On Tuesday comrade Kitz paid Liverpool a visit, where no organisation of our party exists, but we have good reason to expect that some real work will soon be undertaken by the League in this fertile soil for the preaching of the Cause.

Bolton was selected for Wednesday night, where a large meeting was addressed by Kitz and Bailie, with the assistance of some members of the late branch of the S. D. F., which has been swamped by a premature effort at practical Socialism under the name of a Commonwealth, which has now become a society for the accumulation of capital and the spread of commercialism. When will our impatient sympathisers see the hopelessness of revolutionising society by isolated efforts at abolishing capitalism by means of commercial ventures whose capital is obtained by the pinching, mis-directed thrift of a few wage-slaves? Even if they were to succeed in their small way, what of the mass which could never hope to attain independence through saving, when they fail to obtain enough to keep away hunger under this system of monopoly? Less energy would be required to establish a free condition of society for all than would be necessary to steer one of these individualist co-operative efforts through a commercial crisis.

The visit of our comrade has infused fresh energy into the movement in these parts. He returned to London on Thursday, but we hope before long our success will enable us to bring him amongst us again. Two of the Manchester daily papers gave a short account of our Sunday demonstration and the resolution in full. Any energy which can be set in motion in this direction among the workers of industrial centres cannot fail to have satisfactory results and give the cause an impetus which cannot be stayed.

The visit of Kitz to Lancashire shows what good work can be done in stirring up the revolutionary spirit among the workers in the provinces. We could send other speakers who could do equally good work; but we need funds. Those desirous of helping this good work may send their subscriptions to D. J. Nicoll, Secretary of the Provincial Missionary Fund, 13 Farringdon Road.

In the death of our comrade George Robson, Socialism in Leicester has lost one of its best supporters and ablest exponents. From the first formation of our Branch he has been very active in the Cause. Wherever there was any lecture, discussion, newspaper controversy, or anti-Socialist cant, there was Robson in the midst of it, fighting fiercely for Socialism. None who knew him well could help but esteem him, both as a man and for his unselfish efforts in the Cause.

The opinions of mankind have been found wonderfully flexible, have always tended to consecrate existing facts, and to declare what did not yet exist either pernicious or impracticable.—John Stuart Mill.

In the North American Review for June, Andrew Carnegie has an article on "Wealth." Andrew, who for a long time received 5,000 dollars a-day on his protected steel (sometimes spelled steal), ought to know something about it.—Boston Sunday Globe.

READY FOR TRIAL.—Great Lawyer—The trial of our honourable client will begin to-morrow. Assistant (astounded)—Trial? couldn't you get the case postponed any longer? G. L.—No need to have it further postponed: all the important witnesses are dead.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

REPORTS.

LONDON OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.—Mile-end Waste—On Saturday evening, Mowbray and Hicks spoke. Kilburn—On Sunday morning, Parker, Samuels, Charles, and Mainwaring were in attendance, but the heavy rain prevented any meeting being held; one new member made. Hyde Park—An excellent meeting was held here on Sunday afternoon, the speakers being Parker and Crouch, and Hunter Watts and Emerson (S.D.F.); literature sold out. Mitcham Fair Green—Mrs. Lahr spoke here on Sunday morning. Streatham Fountain—Mrs. Lahr spoke to a large and enthusiastic audience; Weal sold out and 2s. 10d. collected for propaganda.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held a good meeting at Latimer Road on Sunday morning; speakers were Crouch, Saint, Bullock, and Maughan; 17 Commonweal sold and 7d. collected. At Archer Street we were told by the police we could not hold our meeting, who would give us no reason for the decision; our meetings have been most orderly. We moved away to the other end of the street, where Maughan and Bullock spoke for a little while, when the police came down and again broke our meeting up. We then took a stand which the religious party had vacated ten minutes before, but were again driven away.

NORTH LONDON.—A good meeting at Ossulton Street on Thursday, addressed by Humphries, Nicoll, and Cantwell; 15 Commonweal sold. A splendid meeting in Hyde Park on Saturday evening, when Davies, Nicoll, Humphries, Cantwell, Mrs. Lahr, and Miss Robertson (S.D.F.) spoke. Some disturbance caused by Tories and some of her Majesty's Foot Guards, who accused Mrs. Lahr of being "a foreigner." They were well replied to by Miss Robertson; good collection and 56 Commonweal sold.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 8th, Leatham read a paper in answer to the question, "Does the Universe show signs of being under Beneficent and Intelligent Government?" At Woodside on Friday night, Leatham addressed a meeting at the Fountain, and distributed a parcel of papers at the close.

GLASGOW.—Despite the fact that the Glasgow Fair holidays were on, Glasier and Joe Burgoyne had an unusually good audience last Sunday on Jail Square. An individual who assailed our speakers for defending the poor Soudanese, whom our "Christian soldiers" are butchering in the name of God and the Queen, was soon discomfited, and ridiculed "out of court" by the audience.

LEEDS.—Within the last week this branch has held three open-air meetings, all of which large audiences have attended. On Wednesday, July 10th, a mass meeting of the labourers in the building trade (now out on strike) was held. The speakers, comrades Maguire, Sweeney, Paylor, and A. Vickers (of Manchester) explained our position on strikes in general, and were loudly applauded. On Sunday morning at 11, another large meeting was held in Vicar's Croft; the speakers were comrades Corkwell, Sweeney, Maguire, Paylor, Hill, and Vickers; 27s. 4d. was collected for the labourers on strike. In the evening another meeting was held at same place, when Corkwell, Paylor, Sweeney, and Hill spoke; 6s. collected for Labourers' Strike Fund.—F. C.

LEICESTER.—Sunday morning last Barclay spoke in Russell Square on "Making a Profit"; we drew the audience into a very earnest and friendly discussion. In the evening Barclay again spoke in Humberstone Gate; the co-operators were to the fore to hear "A Criticism of Co-operation." Discussion having been called for, Thomas Slater, of Bury, got up and assailed the lecturer of being ignorant of the principles of Co-operation. Barclay replied vigorously; discussion was kept up till ten o'clock. Collection, 4s. 1d.; literature sale, 2s. 4d.

MANCHESTER.—Parkinson spoke for nearly two hours to a large and attentive audience at Middleton on Saturday night; 31 Commonweal sold. On Stevenson Square on Sunday afternoon a fair meeting was addressed by Marshall and Bailie. At 8 p.m. Marshall spoke at Chester Road. On Monday night at Holt Town we held a good meeting.—W. B.

YARMOUTH.—On Monday we held our usual meeting at Belton, in spite of an attempt of some hobbledoys to upset the meeting; McCormack, Ruffold, and Leggett addressed the audience. On Sunday morning a large meeting was held on Priory Plain, where we had a surprise in the person of comrade Rossiter, of the Battersea S.D.F., who gave an earnest address; Reynolds also spoke. On the Quay, in the evening, a most successful meeting was held; Darley opened the meeting with a song, followed by addresses from Adams and Darley (of Norwich), Rossiter, and Reynolds, to a large and sympathetic audience. Good collections, and Commonweal sold out. On Sunday morning comrades Ruffolds and Annis held a meeting at Brandwell, comrade Annis making a very good maiden speech; 5 Commonweal sold. On Monday evening comrades Reynolds and Rossiter will break fresh ground at Norton Stage. This will make the third village we have captured this summer.—J. H.

"THE THREE KINGS," Clerkenwell Close.—Brookes lectured on Sunday last; subject, "Order without Law." Rather animated opposition.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—We had our annual excursion on Sunday to Charnwood Forest, Leicestershire, proceeding thither in brakes, with much waving of red flags and singing of the "Marseillaise." Dinner and tea at a farm house, a visit to St. Bernard's Abbey, and a single innings match "Socialists v. Secularists" (in which the former scored 67 and the latter 46 runs), made up an enjoyable day.—P.

NOTES ON NEWS.

At its last meeting the London County Council passed by a large majority a demand for the control of Trafalgar Square. They are not likely to get it, nor can one be quite certain as to how they would exercise it if they did, but it would be a clear gain to have it in the hands of an elected body rather than in that of an irresponsible official. Of course Mr. Frederic Harrison voted against popular control of the Square, so following up his speech against popular control of the police. He was followed into the "No" lobby by these other alleged "Progressives," Messrs. Carr-Gomm, Johnson, Jno. Jones, and Lemon. It is well to remember the names; they may need recalling some day.

It seems that Mr. Shipton has, after all, now been really and definitely rejected by the House Decorator's trade union, of which he was secretary. That trade unionists should rebel against a "boss" of Mr. Shipton's kind is novel enough, but that it should be on the score of his neglecting labour interests in favour of sugar bounty, bimetalism, peace-society, and other boodle-bringing agitations, is little short of marvellous. The usual procedure in the past has been for trade union "leaders," like Mr. Shipton and other illustrious men, to receive higher rewards and more docile obedience from their servile following the more they disavowed their mandates, and the faster they fell into line as party hacks and wirepullers. Almost may we begin to hope for the clearing of the London Trades' Council from the unscrupulous ring-runners and forty-piece-of-silver politicians who have made of it a byword and a scorn, instead of the effective centre that it could and should be of the labour war in this country.

But while trade unionists are coming forward, there is no reason that Socialists should go backward, and all appearances go to prove that there is little danger of any great bulk of them doing so. Wherefore we may look with more amusement than alarm upon the spectacle of whilom revolutionists at the Possibilist Congress dramatically weeping upon the broad and throbbing bosom of Mr. Fenwick, M.P., and exchanging the kiss of peace with the Parliamentary Committee.

Comrade Burns, who did not join in this "spontaneous and impressive" stage-effect, stood out honourably also from among the English Possibilists when the question of amalgamating with the Socialist Congress was under discussion. His fraternal anxiety for union showed well against the background afforded by the bitter spite and sectional bigotry which masqueraded under the lofty guise of "fundamental principle."

The production of Ibsen's "Pillars of Society" last week gave the critics an ample opportunity of again displaying their puerile ignorance of humanity and modern life. They by no means lost the opportunity. Their pitiful little foot-rules and methods of measurement betrayed once more how ludicrously inadequate they were to the task of judging such a giant as Ibsen, or so strange a thing, to them, as the representation of truth. "Subdued to that they work in," they cannot see the corruption of bourgeois society and the sordid realities that lurk under its pretentious covering of culture and respectability. Accustomed to the polite and feeble play-wright who goes no further than some surface effect in his attacks, even when he attacks anything at all, and does not calmly assent to the current morality and base his drama on some beastliness that comes of it, they can only cavil and squeal in chorus at the strong man who, with a few well-directed blows, cuts his way through all hypocrisies and wrappings, and lays bare the problem in all its bitterness.

To solve the problem Ibsen does not pretend. Why should he? Is it not enough that he puts it clearly before people who in no other way could be roused to its consideration? And he does so put it; it would be difficult to imagine anyone, other than a critic or an otherwise hopeless person, who could witness any one of his plays without being disquieted and set thinking.

Our good friends the police have been very busy lately. What with knocking Salvationists about and keeping a wary eye upon the wicked Socialist, they have had their hands full, and in consequence have had no time to attend to such a trifling matter as the detection of crime.

Mr. Monro admits, in his annual report published a few days back, that crime has increased, but that is because the police have had so many onerous duties to perform. They have had to look after the mysterious murderer in Whitechapel, and to keep if anything a more vigilant eye lest some impious Socialist or Salvationist should desecrate the spot sacred to the memory of Warren—Trafalgar Square.

Who can be surprised if with this heavy work upon the shoulders of a harassed Chief Commissioner, that he should slightly neglect his ordinary duties, and that burglary should increase, and that another murder be committed in Whitechapel? These are trifling matters, and why should any respectable citizen of the bourgeois class fret about them? Trafalgar Square is safe, the unemployed dare not venture within the shadow of Nelson's column, and if murder and burglary go on increasing, it is only a sign that we want more police. Law'n'-order must be maintained; more spies, more police, more bludgeoning, more corpses! Long live the Law and the Constitution!

Horrible as are the deeds of the monster of Whitechapel, they yet throw a lurid light—perhaps more because of their horror than of anything else—upon the lives which so many are forced to lead amid the squalid gloom of the crowded courts of the East-end.

The case of Alice Mackenzie is particularly worthy of notice. Here is a woman who is, on the admission of all who know her, hard-working and industrious, toiling at one of the most miserable of all trades, that of charwoman in a poor neighbourhood, and despite all her industry, she is forced at times to drift on to the street to increase her scanty earnings by the wages of prostitution. In one of these excursions, to get money for her night's lodging, she falls before the murderous knife which has already slain so many of her class. And what is this woman, hard-working, industrious, and yet obliged to sell herself, but a type of thousands of her class?

Writers on respectable papers like the Daily News may talk about the great improvement in the condition of the poor at the East-end and elsewhere during the last forty years; but those who know the East-end will laugh at them. Walk through the streets of that stagnant marsh of misery, and see hopeless poverty reflected from the forms, the face, and the very garments of its inhabitants. It is not because there is a look of hungry hatred or the hope of coming vengeance upon their oppressors in their faces. These signs would be hopeful compared with the heavy look of habitual submission to unjust suffering, the total want of spirit, and the broken-down air which comes of continued semi-starvation and the grinding toil of a heavy existence.

Some times you ask yourself whether it is not hopeless to hope to stir these people into rebellion against their tyrants. But let history lend us a little comfort. The people of Paris were quite as down-trodden, if we are to believe one who wrote only a few years before the Revolution in France. "In Paris," says Mercier, "the people are weak, pallid, diminutive, and stunted." A countryman of our own, Arthur Young, bore witness as to how, with the meekness bred of long slavery, they let their nobles crush them and their children beneath their carriage wheels as they drove furiously through the streets. And yet a few years after these words were written the people rose and the Bastille fell beneath their cannon. So perhaps it would not be well for revolutionists even to despair of the East-end of London.

The Daily Telegraph has a long article on the "Weeds of Whitechapel." This title is an insult even to the poorest and most miserable of its inhabitants, for even the very criminals there are far more useful than those patrons of the D. T., the jobbers of the Stock Exchange.

D. N.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE PARIS CONGRESS.

We delegates of the League met as agreed at London Bridge Station, and found an enormous crowd of people going our way. We got stopped into the carriages somehow, and whiled away the time in singing songs and selling a few numbers of Commonweal to divers good folk who had only a glimmering about the events that the French were going to celebrate on the morrow. Getting to the boats at New-haven, we found that the clerk of the weather had provided us with a sell in the form of spring tides, so that the boats which were timed to start at 11 p.m. did not stir from the harbour till close on 3 a.m. And even then there was not enough water for us to get into Dieppe for an hour or two; so that, in short, instead of getting into Paris at 8 a.m. we did not start from Dieppe till 10, and got to Paris at 1.30, somewhat weary with the long journey.

We were met at the station by several old acquaintances, and made the best of our way to our headquarters, which is in the Montmartre district, the northern suburb of Paris. As a matter of course we thus missed the first sitting of the Congress at the Rue Petrelle, though I, having been put upon the committee, went down to the hall and saw our friend Lafargue and the members of the Organising Committee; after which there was nothing left for us but to take our pleasure as we best could in wandering about the city and seeing what I should irreverently call the "fun of the fair."

The next morning, Monday, we went down to the Salle Petrelle, and found the delegates assembling; I found myself also appointed to verify the mandates of the English-speaking delegates, and had plenty of work to do. It was obvious from the first that the Salle Petrelle was not large enough for the Congress, as it would not hold 300 persons, and besides the delegates the public was admitted. Hasty arrangements were made for another hall, and we were presently on the way to a kind of theatre, called the Fantasies Parisiennes, in the neighbouring Rue Rochechouart, where we soon got to business, with Vaillant and Liebknecht in the chair. The first business, was of course the roll-call of the delegates, which of itself was a somewhat imposing ceremony, considering the great number of them, and the trouble and even risk to which some of them had been put to come. The numbers of the delegates first taken were as follows: French, 180; Germans, 81; English, 21; Belgian, 14; Austrian, 8; Italian, 11; Russian, 6; Swiss, 6; Denmark, 3; Roumania, 4; Spain, 2; Poland, 4; Hungary, 3; America, 2; Portugal, 1; Greece, 1; Holland, 4; Sweden, 1; Norway, 1. In all, 353; but later comers made up the list to upwards of 400. The spirit of the Congress was good, the enthusiasm undoubted. As above said, the mere presence of so many Socialists come together from so many countries so earnest and eager was inspiring and encouraging.

Little was done at this morning meeting except what might be called formal business; but it was clear from the first that there were two parties in the Congress, one of which was anxious almost at any price for fusion with the Possibilist Congress, and the other quite contented to let them hold their deliberations by themselves. Accordingly a meeting of the English delegates met on the Monday afternoon to decide upon their course of action, at which the delegates of the League were unanimous for keeping quite apart from the Possibilist Congress, which has no pretensions to being a Socialist Congress, and considering that Germany is quite unrepresented there, and that there is a distinct smack of jingoism about it, no valid pretensions to being international.

We expected that this question of fusion would come on in the evening sitting of Monday, but the whole time was taken up in settling various details of the constitution of the Congress, some of which excited angry feeling among the French delegates; the cause of which it was difficult, or impossible rather, for a stranger to understand. Underlying it all, however, was this question of fusion: for it must be understood that the Belgian, Dutch, and Italian delegates had a definite mission to bring about a fusion of the two congresses, and that many of them were very hot about it. The chairman (a Swiss) at this evening meeting, though apparently a straightforward sincere man, had no hold on the meeting, so that it got rather out of hand; and no doubt there was some of the usual police element present. However, amongst the genuine Socialists no harm was meant and none was done.

The next morning we received at our headquarters comrades Charles and J. and R. Turner, and at the Congress the ground was cleared for the settlement of this question of fusion. There were practically three resolutions before the meeting. Domela Nieuwenhuis spoke for the fusion in a speech which his obvious earnestness and good-will made very impressive; though he ignored the fact that as to the French party neither the Guesdists nor the Possibilists really desired it, and rightly so, as the breach was too great between them to be healed by a mere formality. Tressaud, the Marseilles delegate, in a speech quite straightforward and to the point, spoke against the fusion, and I followed him, and supported him with the full assent of our comrades of the League.

Liebknecht brought forward another motion which threw the onus of making the fusion on the Possibilists; and this was clearly the popular view among the French and German delegates. The propositions made, a long time was spent in a somewhat wearisome and very involved discussion as to how we were to vote, and at last it was settled that the voting should be by nations. Then the voting took place, and it became clear that if we voted for Tressaud's proposal, as we should have preferred to do and thus took our votes away from Liebknecht, we should risk giving the majority to those who wished for fusion on almost any terms, and thus should find ourselves sitting in a Congress which, as above said, was not a Socialist one. We therefore voted for Liebknecht's proposal, appending to our votes a statement that if Tressaud's had been brought up we should have voted for it; and we found that the French delegates had voted in the same way. There was a large majority for Liebknecht's motion; and a committee was appointed to confer with the Possibilists and see if anything practical in the way of fusion could follow from this motion, which expressed a wish for fusion, but only on the terms that there should be no submission on our part; and thus a long sitting came to an end.

The next morning (Wednesday) we heard that the Possibilists had accepted the fusion; but on condition that we should submit to having our mandates examined by the united Congresses, which it was clearly impossible for us to agree to, as even those who had been most eager in pressing on the fusion admitted. We answered the Possibilists therefore that we could not agree to these terms, and in the evening received an answer from them in return breaking off the negotiations for good and all.

We had thus wasted two whole days in discussing a matter which in the opinion of the delegates of the Socialist League ought never to have been discussed at all, since our Congress was open even at the last moment to the delegates of any genuine working-men's association, so that there was nothing to prevent any one from joining us who felt friendly towards us. And furthermore, the plain truth is that real union between the two French sections was impossible, and an artificial union would have produced worse quarrels, and have prevented any profitable discussion to say the least of it.

On Wednesday morning, with this matter of the fusion hanging unsettled over us, began the reading of the reports, Bebel leading off for Germany. These have lasted all to-day; but as we shall go to press before an account of the end of the Congress could be given, I will leave these for the present.

Our comrades should understand that whatever is said in the Congress, whether French, German, or English, has to be translated doubly; and the translations seemed on the whole to be very well done. Mrs. Aveling acted as translator between German and French and English; Vollmar did the German part: the translators had their difficult task made more difficult by the buzz of conversation which arose as soon as the original speaker ended.

The earnestness and enthusiasm of the delegates was very impressive, and seems to have made some impression even on bourgeois observers; and whatever eagerness there was in debate, we all met out of debate with great friendliness and goodwill. A great many of the delegates have continually found themselves sitting at the same table for the meal after the session in the pleasantest and most fraternal manner in the cheaper restaurants round about the place of meeting.

I am sorry to say that I must finish this letter with mentioning a disagreeable affair, on which it is impossible to be wholly silent. In the discussion which took place in the Possibilist Congress as to the fusion, Mrs. Besant allowed herself to say that the English delegates at our Congress represented nothing but themselves. We have in consequence offered our comrades here to give them every opportunity for the fullest scrutiny of our mandates; but it is quite clear that we owe no account of ourselves to a Congress for which we have received no mandate.

"BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION."

In conversation the other day, a friend, who has a good deal of sympathy with Socialism, said, "One of the most difficult things you will have to deal with under Socialism will be the corruption of the officials." The remark arose out of a talk about different forms of corruption and bribery which flourish under the present system; and as this difficulty may be presenting itself to others, it will be worth while to compare the two, and see whether Socialism or the present competitive system would be the more likely to foster corruption, assuming for the present that anything like "officials" as we know them would exist under Socialism.

It will be well first to give some examples that have either come under my own observation or have come direct to me from those concerned. The first case is in the wood line. When a railway is fresh cut a large amount of wood fencing is required; this is let out by contract to the makers, and is put up by men employed by the contractors for the railway, and will have to be to the satisfaction of the inspecting engineer. My friend (a manufacturer of this fencing) described to me how he and another man, who had contracted to supply something else, went with the engineer to inspect a portion of the line. Now, inspecting rough wood fencing, as may easily be imagined, is not a difficult operation, but it is one the result of which will very largely depend upon the humour in which the engineer happens to be; if he was in a bad humour he could easily condemn every piece of wood that looked at all as if it had a flaw in it, while if he was in a good humour he would condemn nothing that was really fit for the work. So that, even with an inspector who is too honest to be bribed into passing really bad work, there is a large margin for him to be worked upon by the maker of fencing. In this case the two contractors whose work he was going to inspect made it as easy as possible for him, first by providing a carriage and pair to take him to the nearest point to start from, and then by providing him with a good lunch and plenty of good wine before commencing the serious business of inspecting!

I will not refer to cases of more flagrant bribery, where money, jewellery, pianos, etc., come into the hands of the engineer, as I wish more especially to deal with the milder forms which have almost become absolutely necessary, and so nearly universal, amongst even those who would be ranked as scrupulously honest men. But our fence-maker had not quite done all that was necessary yet; he saw that a great deal in the look of a fencing depended upon how it was put up, and he found that the foreman over the erectors of it also required a little sweetening to induce him to make the best of it. Evidently it would make all the difference whether the fence was made with all the best sides to the line (for even the best wood has two sides, you know!), or whether all the worst sides and pieces were put in the most conspicuous places. This, it soon turned out, depended very often upon whether the foreman had received his tip of a sovereign or half-sovereign. The contractor who was most liberal with such tips got his work shown to the best advantage.

Without going into any of the more flagrantly dishonest branches of this tipping, where, for instance, a bribe gets really bad work passed or hidden, it is very evident that this system is one which must grow, which gives great encouragement and temptation to all concerned to go further and further into it; and the more it grows the more impossible it becomes for an honest man to get on. My friend told me that unless he did that sort of thing he could not possibly get orders, or get the work passed without too much waste to allow it to pay. And when we add to this the fact that such contracts are competed for so keenly that the price is run down as low as it is possible to put the work in just good enough to pass, one realises still further how difficult it is for an honest man to live.

Let me give another instance, this time in the iron trade. For the sake of those who do not know much about iron, I may explain that the iron ore is first smelted in large blast-furnaces and then run out into bars for sale as pig-iron. When castings are wanted it is usual to melt up some of these bars of pig-iron in smaller furnaces called cupolas: in the re-melting the iron becomes purified from a certain amount of slag and other matter that is still mixed with it when first run from the furnaces, and so cupola-iron, as it is called, is generally considered superior to furnace-iron, and in large contracts for castings, columns, cylinders, pipes, and such-like, it is very often specified that cupola-iron shall be used. Of course, all foundries where they have no blast-furnaces are obliged to use cupola-iron, but most places with blast-furnaces have now foundries in connection with them and contract for making castings. Now these places can save about ten shillings per ton by using furnace-iron, and this, as may be imagined, they very frequently do. Hence it is quite evident that a firm with facility for using furnace-iron could quote so low a price as to cut out all who had no such facility and still make a decent profit. And it is also evident that one firm quoting on that basis could soon compel all other firms who could to adopt the same method, or else give up their trade in castings. This and other similar tricks of the trade make it necessary for those giving orders for castings to send inspectors to see that the work is carried out according to contract; and it is no unusual thing to see half-a-dozen inspectors hanging about a large foundry yard, to see that this that and the other set of castings is made according to specification. I know of one very large contract for castings where the inspecting costs at least £1,000 a-year to the purchasers, besides an elaborate system of testing which is paid for by the contractors. This system of inspection brings in the same temptations to bribery and corruption that we saw above. The inspectors are usually fed while on the works at the expense of the contractor, and not infrequently receive a brace of pheasants or some such small sweetener. Of course this is another of the cases where there are mitigating circumstances. Very often the inspectors are ignorant and make frivolous objections. And if furnace-iron will stand the test, the maker will argue, that is all that is required: moreover, he will be brought up if possible with the firm belief that furnace-iron—and his furnace-iron particularly—is as good as cupola-iron, if not a little better;—it is wonderful how easily we believe pleasant things, and he is a poor man who cannot find some plausible arguments for almost any proposition! But as I said before, it is these more moderate species of corruption and bribing that even the most honest of business men are forced into, which are of greatest interest to us in showing how the competitive system works. Here we see that a maker of castings must either contract with the intention of supplying an article different from that ordered, or he must be willing to see the contract go to someone else who will do this; which means in the end ruin to himself. Having got the contract, he then has to hoodwink the inspector, to sweeten and bribe him in varying degrees according to the honesty of them both!

CHRISTIAN CHARITY.—Our Yarmouth comrades send us the following: The Priory Plain, where we hold our meetings, adjoins the Old Man's Hospital, and one of the old men has attended and shown great interest, sitting as a rule on the stall from which we speak. Well, this poor old man received notice last week from the clerk by order of the trustees, that if he was seen at the meetings again he would be turned out of the Hospital, where he gets 5s. per week, into the workhouse.—These are the modern followers of a meek and lowly saviour—these brutal Mammon-worshippers, these bullying Bumbles, who make their creed stink in the nostrils of all honest and kindhearted people.

A SONG OF RESURRECTION.

FREEDOM has risen—
Freedom has risen—
Freedom has risen to-day!
The daughter of heaven
Her tomb has riven,
And burst from her gaolers away.

“When was she born?
How was she nursed?
Where was her cradle laid?”
In want and scorn,
Reviled and curst,
Mid the ranks of toil and trade.

“And hath she gone
On her holy-morn,
Nor staid for the long work-day?”
From heaven she came,
On earth to remain,
And bide with her sons away.

“Did she break the grave
Our souls to save
And leave our bodies in hell?”
To save us alive
If we will but strive,
Body and soul as well.

“Then what must we do
To prove us true,
And what is the law she gave?”
Never fulfil
A tyrant's will,
Nor willingly live a slave.

Then this we'll do
To prove us true,
And follow the law she gave;
Never fulfil
A tyrant's will,
Nor willingly live a slave.

THE SCOTCH MIDDLEMAN'S COVETED REWARDS.

THERE are two offices which serve in Scotland as suitable rewards to the successful sweater and the prosperous publican. To be a bailie or a kirk elder is the ambition of these two classes of men, and they are backed by the clear-sighted vision of their wives, who see therein the veneer of "respectability" which covereth a multitude of sins. The Scotch bailie is an honorary police magistrate, and the kirk elder is an honorary dispenser of religious soothing syrup, sometimes flavoured with sulphur. The paid religious dispensers, however, deal the largest in sulphur. Those who secure the dignities of bailie and kirk elder, are generally men deficient in heart and wisdom who have had the shrewdness to gather gear from the accumulated unpaid wages of girls or from the profits of the gill stoup. A bailie, who is also a kirk elder, has always the air about him of being somebody in particular. In my younger days I knew a publican who was a bailie, and remember him convicting some young men of being drunk and disorderly. They were no customers of his, and in his speech from the bench he said, "Young men, I am ashamed, and you ought to be ashamed to see yourselves standing where you now do; if you were to husband your savings you might some day occupy the high and dignified position I now hold." "How's that for high?" If they had been his customers the speech and sentence would have taken another turn, for it is clearly evident that if all the bailie's customers had followed his advice he would not have reached the "high and dignified position" of a non-paid Nupkins. It is not necessary that a Scotch bailie should be a judicious or cultured person, or that a kirk elder should be a gentle, kind-hearted, forgiving man.

In Scotland it not unfrequently happens that the bailie and elder go down the church aisle on Sundays raising "a joyful noise" in the same pair of chirping boots, after the bells have rung and all the other people are seated. The bailie and elder may or may not have a strong smell of whisky, but he certainly always appears, on Sundays at least, to be pious and important, notwithstanding what he may have been on the Saturday night previous. The privilege of his prerogative to order for any one of his neighbours seven day's imprisonment is a source of peculiar satisfaction to the bailie, it clothes him with importance, and the opportunities he has to favour some with lenient punishments are not the least of his assets as a church elder who needs to do something, at times, for the good of the kirk. To give a light sentence is a credit to the elder, and takes nothing from the pocket of the bailie. The Scotch kirk elder is generally the most tyrannical of masters, who would dismiss his clerk for the slightest offence and clap him in prison for the merest irregularity. The bailie who reaches the bench through the unpaid wages of girls, or the pious publican who reaches "respectability" through the gill stoup, are both typical of the pharisaical foundation on which society at present is built. In this Christian country it is unlawful to reduce the spirit of Christianity to practice; it is also unlawful not to profess a belief in it. The man who professes Christianity but does not practice it is the man who lives and succeeds according to law and order, but the man who practices its precepts and does not profess his belief in their plenary inspiration, is sure to break the law and disturb the order which prevails at present.

Psalm-singing Scotland holds the hundredth and the twenty-third psalms as first favorites. In the former all people on the earth are welcomed to praise the Lord with mirth because "We are his flock, He doth us feed," and in the latter each is assured "The Lord's my Shepherd, I'll not want." The heavy heart is permitted to rejoice with mirth but not to "feed," and if it be in earnest in saying "I'll not want" it is cast into prison. It is no part of present day Christianity to feed those who are "an hungred" with loaves and fishes, and if those who are "an hungred" attempt to feed themselves contrary to law and order they are put in prison by the bailie and are not visited therein by the elder.

A case in point was disposed of at Greenock Police-court the other day, when a bailie found Rebecca White guilty of being destitute and "an hungred," and as she put into practice the blessed twenty-third psalm, "I'll not want," by taking 6d. worth of bread from a shop-door, she was ordered to prison for three days. Now Rebecca was "an hungred" and they gave her no meat. There was no doubt in the court but that Rebecca was sorely in need of the bread she annexed, and would the bailie be quite certain, think you, that he had never eaten bread to which his claim was not so just, or good, in the sight of God, as Rebecca's was to that for which he imprisoned her? I am not aware of the peculiar traits of character or the nature of the basis of the social status through which the Greenock bailie reached the bench, but it is quite evident the verdict had more of cruelty than justice in it. The ends of justice would have been amply met by the court paying 6d. to the shopkeeper, and it would have been a saving to the town to have settled it that way. Rebecca's three days in prison would be more expensive than 6d., the price of the two loaves she took. Rebecca had to suffer not for her own crime, but for that others might commit.

Our clergy are never weary of proclaiming that the laws of the land are founded on a Christian basis. A greater lie than that was never proclaimed from pulpit, and that is saying much. In the face of the practices of the law, pulpit platitudes are becoming "too thin" to keep simple-minded people in subjection and contentment with the law and order that now prevails. Signs are not wanting that the sweater and publican as elder and bailie, are getting in the eyes of the multitude "rather steep" for the fitness of things. They, at last, are beginning to enquire into the nature of Justice's colour-blindness and the church's charity. When their knowledge consolidates into action, the earwigs of the law and the bats of the church will raise a cry of alarm that if the ivy, in which they nestle, be disturbed, the building of our social structure will fall in ruins. If the building cannot stand without the aid of two such hypocrisies, the quicker it falls the better, and the safer it will be for all concerned. A lie can never be a desirable or permanent safeguard. Let us be done with lies, and if in doing so the fabric of our constitution falls, the materials can be built on a better foundation in truth and purity, which will prove more healthy, humane, and harmonious. The present system brutalises and degrades all who come into immediate contact with the working of the machine, and the hypocrisies of the bailie and the elder permeate the whole structure, and enlarge themselves as they reach up to the highest offices in the law and the church. By a proper and exhaustive study of the minor offices, common unsophisticated minded people will be the better prepared to appreciate the enormities of the higher.

GEORGE McLEAN.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

How well organised our antagonists, the capitalists, are, is no secret to us, the revolutionists. Just look at this example. In England the seamen and firemen are on strike; scabs appear to be scarce, so other countries must be appealed to. The following advertisement I clipped from the Boston Globe:

Wanted—Seamen, ordinary seamen, deck hands, firemen and coal passers for Liverpool and London; a good chance for passage to England with wages. Apply to C. BALLEM, 232, Commercial St., Boston, Mass.

If the workers took but one hundredth part of the pains to protect their interests that the capitalists do to protect theirs, there would come a speedy end to the dispute between capital and labour.

Dakota's Farmer's Alliance favors government ownership of railroads.

A novel feature in the college commencements that have been in progress during the past fortnight, may be seen in the fact that the graduates in many cases took up the labour question in their essays.

At a meeting held in New York City by the Executive Board of the National Journeymen Baker's Union, a communication was read from the Baker's National Union of Germany asking American support for a new movement of the trade in Berlin. A National Convention of German bakers was held in Berlin on June 27th. It is proposed to hold an International Conference to form an International Union of the trade.

Immigration from all parts of Europe to this country is decidedly on the increase.

A Chinese laundryman is responsible for the following remarkable statement:—

"Few organised workers know that the strongest trades' unions in the world are in China. The great Tai-ping (or working-men's) rebellion was started by delegates from the trades' unions for the purpose of establishing a republic. Had not the notorious "Chinese" Gordon, backed by English and French influences, turned to and helped the empire, the rebellion would have been a success."

The tramping English capital has found a new and fine chance for investment. The Manufacturer's Record of Baltimore, Ind., says:—

"A distinctively new era in the South's iron and steel history is marked by the organisation of English companies, composed of the leading iron and steel makers of Great Britain, to build extensive steel and iron works, including four furnaces, steel rail mill, rolling mill, etc., at a new town at Cumberland Gap, on the dividing line between Tennessee and Kentucky. The name of the town is to be Middlesboro, Ky., and for over a year the work of buying mineral lands, preparing for railroad connections, etc., has been vigorously but quietly pushed by the American Association (Limited), which is the name of the parent company."

Three cheers and a "tiger," as the Americans have it, for the patriotic capital!

The famous agreement of the railroad presidents has gone to smithereens. The Baltimore and Ohio line has cut the rates, and all the other lines are following suit. Well, what next?—A railroad trust, of course.

The governmental labour statisticians have met in conference in Hartford, Ct., and some strange facts have been told to us. Colonel Carroll D. Wright, the national commissioner of labour statistics, for instance, tells us of the licence and prohibition figures which came under his observation in Massachusetts, that the results showed more arrests for drunkenness under prohibition than under licence. This, he says, was due to the prejudice of the police against prohibition, which caused them to arrest every drunken man under prohibition. Under licence they were lax, being favourable thereto. The figures, the colonel wound up, are not worth a "rap." Well, if these figures are not worth a "rap," what trust can we put in any figures collected by governmental employes? And is it not a fact that the New York legislature forgot about one year ago to vote the "supply" of the labour statistician of that State? Why? Because the man had published some correct figures. It may also be remarked right here that Col. Wright, the national labour statistician for the last two years, has been employed to collect the figures for divorce statistics! However, long live the State and—all the fools.

THE CHINESE IN AUSTRALIA.—The agitation connected with the presence of the Chinese in the Australian colonies has made so much noise all over the world that one is greatly surprised to find how few these Chinese really are and that they are actually decreasing in numbers. Yet this appears to be the case, according to the careful and elaborate statistical report just issued by Mr. Hayter, of Victoria. In 1854 there were 2,000 enumerated in the census. The following year the first restrictive Act was passed. It limited the number of Chinese males a vessel might bring to one for every ten tons, and put a poll-tax of £10 on each. This Act was evaded by landing Chinese in another colony, and leaving them to find their way overland. In 1857 the number of Chinese in Victoria had increased to 25,424, and in 1859 to 42,000. Soon afterwards an exodus took place to the New South Wales diggings, and in 1861 there were only 24,732, and although the Restriction Act was repealed this number continued to decline steadily up to 1871, when the number was 17,935, and again until 1881, when it stood at 12,120. At the end of 1887 it was 12,470. Since 1860 the records of the arrivals of Chinese by sea have been kept, and from these it appears that only 17,992 arrived in the twenty-seven years, or an average of 666 per year. Deducting the departures, it appears the Chinese population of Victoria increased by only 1,277, and in three of these years more departed than arrived. In 1887 the arrivals exceeded the departures by 1,147. After the Restriction Act of 1881 the tendency of the Chinese was to become naturalised. In eleven years ending 1881 only 91 Chinese took out letters of naturalisation. In 1882 the number reached 317; in 1883, 593; in 1884, 601, and in 1885, 1,178. Those naturalised were mainly gardeners, miners, labourers, shopkeepers, hawkers, carpenters, and cooks.

PLENTY.

(Translated by LAURA LAFARGUE.)

AN undulating sea of corn defies
Famine to do her work here; the hot air
Breathes aromatic odours everywhere;
The full corn in the ear awaits the scythes.

Field-mice and sparrows hold a feast; the cries
Of the shrill cricket like small trumpets blare;
The brute world in our joyance seems to share;
All nature with us plenty glorifies.

So from the nurse's breast, under the blue
Of the bright heavens, a flood of life outwells;
The full earth fruits and flowers and bursts and swells.

Yet walking homeward my foot staggereth
At a mother and child in tatters!—starved to death!
How say you, ripe corn, and who harvests you?

Paris, July 1883.

EUGENE POTTIER.

HEARD BY THE WAY.

SCENE.—Cross Roads in the country. Enter from one side an OLD MAN, very battered, leaning on stick; from the other a well-built YOUNG MAN, with a bundle over his shoulder.

YOUNG MAN. Morning, governor. Can you tell us how far it is to Portsmouth?

OLD MAN. Marnin'. A matter o' seven miles. Be you goin' there?

Y. M. Yes, worse luck. I have walked all the way from London.

O. M. From Lunnon; I was never there but once. Be ye lookin' for a job o' work?

Y. M. Yes, I've been out of a job for a long time.

O. M. Oi be main afraid you'n not find a job at Portsmouth.

Y. M. (dejectedly). Why, gov'nor?

O. M. They be sacking dockyard hands.

Y. M. And I have walked sixty miles on this chance. Ah, well!

O. M. Ha' ye any friends? Be ye married?

Y. M. Yes; but don't talk of it, I can't bear to think what they're doing now I'm away. Where are you going, old man?

O. M. Oi be goin' to the Union.

Y. M. To the Union?

O. M. Oi, to the work'us; we all go there in time.

Y. M. You all go to the Union?

O. M. Ay; my father went, I'm goin', and my lads 'll go' when they be old.

Y. M. It is terrible. But I suppose you don't mind it as it's so common?

O. M. Not mind it! Whoi it's been my dream to keep out of the Union. When oi were a lad oi began to have to keep me out; when Sal and oi were wed we warked and scraped, but it were no good. The times we were out o' wark took all we saved, and when Sal died oi 'ad to go the parish for a coffin.

Y. M. And yet you've worked hard?

O. M. Warked! Look 'ere, look about, every field you see oi've warked and tilled, sowed and reaped for nigh on fifty-five year, and now oi must go to the work'us.

Y. M. It is hard.

O. M. Hard, you call it! Oi've warked for the squire's father and grand-father; oi shall have been warking fifty-five year come Martimmas. Oi were alus obedient; some o' the others joined the Chartists, but oi wouldn't, oi stuck by the old squire, an' a lot oi've gained by it. Last 'lection oi voted as he telled me, but oi doubt it wuld have been all the same if oi had voted for the other chap. I could have kept out o' the Union if he would have 'lowed me half-a-crown a-week, but he wouldn't. Betsy, she's my grand-daughter, went up to the Hall for it, but he wouldn't give it. He said oi should be better in the work'us. Damn him! Look 'ere, young man, if you'll take the advice of an old 'un, strike 'em back. You'll get nothing by being humble; strike back 'ard. You be out o' work, 'ow did that come?

Y. M. The firm I worked for have closed the works.

O. M. That's some of their trickery, oi reckon; they've summat to gain by it.

Y. M. That's so; leastways the chaps say so.

O. M. Depend on't they're right.

Y. M. But where must we go? Who'll help us?

O. M. There be the Socialists. Our Sam picked up a paper the other day as some one 'ad put by the road, an' he read it to me every word. They be the folks as 'll help you, an' the only ones. They are poor men theirselves, and don't want voting into big places, they are the only men that can help you. By God, oi wish oi was young again, oi'd be a rousing big Socialist.

Y. M. Well, I'll think it over. Good-bye, old man, I must be off.

O. M. Good-bye; good luck to ye. Don't ye forget the Socialists.

The trouble with most people is, they bow to what is called authority; they have a certain reverence for the old because it is old. They think a man is better for being dead, especially if he has been dead a long time.—Ingersoll.

The busy bee still survives as the symbol of industry, but the ingenuity of man appears to be more than a match for it. Commercial cunning now makes honey from glucose, and puts it in a paraffin comb so deftly that it takes an expert to detect the difference. The busy bee must go.—Boston (Mass.) Herald.

THE HALF-YEAR'S BANK DIVIDENDS.—We often hear of the self-sacrificing bourgeois who employ their capital for other people's benefit. That they usually make it pay them for the trouble there are a thousand proofs, if they are needed. One of the latest is a list recently published, showing the dividends paid by joint-stock banks for the half-year just closed. For London banks the amounts range all the way from 5 per cent. (Merchant Banking Co.) to 18 per cent. (Capital and Counties). Provincial banks paid from 5 per cent. (London and Yorkshire) to 20 per cent. (Manchester and Liverpool Dis.). Indian and colonial also begin with 5 per cent. (Bank of Egypt), and run up to 14 per cent. (Union Bank of Australia).

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Tram Slaves.

The West Metropolitan Tramway Company is following the old policy pursued by most modern slave-drivers. On the one hand it has made some slight concessions to the men, the cars now having one journey taken off and the men getting a journey's relief on Sunday, and on the other hand the inspectors of the company are utilised as spies upon the Union collectors to see what men pay them subscriptions. Considering they have already sacked several Union men we can guess why this is done. One collector was too sharp to be caught this way, and noticing that an inspector was watching him he went away without collecting any money at all. The latest person of distinguished respectability to give his countenance to the Union is Lord Rosebery, who has sent £20 to the Union funds and promises them his help as far as his numerous engagements will allow.

The Eight Hours' Question.

Mr. Beaufoy, the Star member for Kennington, has tried the eight hours system in his own works, and has discovered that he is not one penny the worse for its introduction. He can get quite as much work out of his men at the new system as he could before, and save with the exception of the watchmen and the enginemen he hasn't had to increase his staff by a single man. This only proves what we have stated again and again, that the cry for the eight hours working-day is only another instance of "much ado about nothing." If it is possible for the employer to get as much work out of his men in the shorter as in the longer time, what becomes of the greatness of the reform, which to hear some people talk you would think it involved the creation of an earthly paradise in this sorry world of ours? What becomes of all this talk when, in the words of Mr. Beaufoy, "if a man works for eight hours you get out of him in one day all that is really in him"? Workmen, are you going to waste your time in agitating for a measure which, when you have obtained it, will still enable the capitalist to get out of you in one day all that is really in you? What a triumph when you gain it? Why an Eight Hours Labour Bill is enough of a sham to go in the programme of the Gladstonian Liberal Party.

Sweating the Herring-Curers.

At Fraserburgh in Scotland, writes a Scotch correspondent (whom we hope to hear from again), there are some herring-curing works said to belong to Monachie Bros., of London and Lowestoft. They employ about 400 hands, chiefly girls. They usually work from six in the morning to ten o'clock at night. Sometimes their hours are longer—till two or three in the early morning. Their hours of work ranging from fourteen to twenty a-day. There is no difference on Saturday. For these fearfully long hours the girls have sometimes been paid 5s. a-week. The slavery in the other branches of herring-curing is quite as bad. When the herrings are brought in from the sea they are carted direct to the curing yard. Here they are gutted and packed into barrels. It is generally at night when the boats arrive. This packing and gutting has to be done by women and girls at all sorts of hours and in all sorts of weather. They do not get home for any food as long as there are any herrings left. If they are lucky enough to get any food brought to them they have to snatch a moment to eat it, while they are at their work, not even getting time to clean their hands, which are bandaged up with rags. It is a pitiable sight to see them standing at the middle of the night in the pouring rain, devouring what little food will keep up their strength to finish their work. The men and women who flock here to fish and gutting from all parts of the country are so badly housed that epidemics are common. The shopkeepers also victimise them terribly. Is there no one in the district who could help these women to fight against the hideous tyranny of their sweaters? Trade unionists, is there not some work for you here?

The Railway Slaves.

There is a worse slavery than even that of tram men. This is apparent from a letter in the Star from one of the slaves employed on the railway. He points out that at the Nine Elms engine-shed of the London and North-Western Railway Company, there are many men working for from 2s. 6d. to 3s. a-day, and that it is of frequent occurrence for men and lads to work three shifts right off (36 hours) for the purpose of getting one extra day's pay to make their week's wage come to the grand total of 18s., 19s., or 20s. He says with truth that this is not done in the purer air of the streets but in an engine-shed, the atmosphere of which is frequently charged with smoke and carbonic acid gas from engines getting up steam. Here is a dismal state of slavery, calculated to raise the compassion of any man with a heart in his breast. But while the men are being slowly poisoned in an atmosphere laden with noxious vapours, the shareholders draw their dividends in peace and security. When shall their calm be disturbed by a general revolt on the part of these wretched slaves?

There was a debate on the long hours of railway servants in the House of Lords last week. The recent returns of the overtime worked by railway men show that in many cases they have been working from twelve to sixteen and seventeen hours a-day. It is not only the porters and unskilled workers who are slaving in this way, but the very men in whose hands lies the precious lives of the middle-classes—the signalmen and engine-drivers. The Armagh disaster—in which, of course, the higher officials have not even had a true bill brought in against them by a middle-class jury, who were ready enough to indict the overworked and underpaid servants of the Company—shows what results from this slavery, and proves once for all that the slavery of the most miserable and downtrodden of humanity may sometimes affect those who move in the "hupper stuckles." Well, the House of Lords after a little talk regretting this sad state of things, came to the conclusion that it could do nothing. Quite natural! I wonder what would get either the House of Lords or Commons to do anything. Perhaps if a few hundred peers or M.P.'s were mashed into indescribable pulp through being taken out in a train engineered by a driver who had worked eighteen hours, and signalled by signal men who had been on duty for the same period, they might be awakened into a temporary semblance of activity; but I am sure it would not last long. It would need the Social Revolution to awaken most of our legislators. D. N.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

A new Socialist organ has been started at Montluçon, in the Allier Department, under the title of Le Travailleur (the Worker). It has nothing to do with the Possibilist party, as the names of the contributors will at once show that it is to be a real Revolutionary Socialist paper. The editorial committee is composed of comrades Carrat, Dormoy, Raoul Fréjac, Létang, Souvarine, and Thivrier, and the principal contributors are comrades G. Deville, Jules Guesde, Paul Lafargue, and Edouard Vaillant. We hope that the new organ will prove a good success and make a good deal towards spreading the Revolutionary ideas among the working classes and peasantry of that part of France.

GERMANY.

Last week comrades Stendtemann, John, Richter, and Berck were sentenced by the tribunal of Dresden to thirty-five months of imprisonment because they intended to unfurl a red flag on some telephone stake, in remembrance of the revolutionary events of May 1848 at Dresden! That's what they call "justice" in Bismarck's accursed fatherland!

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Perquisitions having again been made at the houses of comrades Revalovicz, editor of the Kurjer Lvowsky, and Wyslouch, co-editor of the same organ, the latter has been arrested at Lemberg. A charge of "secret Socialist conspiracy" will be brought against him, which means several years of imprisonment, according to the brutal exceptional laws against revolutionaries in Austria. As usual in these cases, "conspiracy" only exists in the imagination of the so-called authorities.

SWITZERLAND.

The Federal Council has now definitively decided upon the publication of all the diplomatical notes despatched by it to the German Government in reference to the Wohlgenuth affair, and the dispute to which it gave rise.

MIDLAND COUNTIES FRAMEWORK KNITTERS' FEDERATION.

THE following pithy little address is prefixed to the book of rules of the above society, which certainly seems to know what it is driving at, and have some idea of how to get there. Good luck to it!

"FELLOW-MEMBERS,—Late in the day, but not too late, we hope, we have taken a step towards bringing closer together our fellow-workers in the Hosiery Trade. We are like others—it needs adversity to make us feel that our interests are the same. As long as one district felt itself independent of the other, it never sought closer union. Men generally, when they are doing well can be oppressed without notice, and it needs the cloud as well as sunshine to keep up the balance. Now competition and monopoly are hemming us in, and we feel the pressure, we are compelled to acknowledge the need for mutual help.

"This is not the end of trade and commerce; a system will yet be developed that will compel the workers of all trades, in all nations, to come together and form a solid square, in the claim to be made for labour's full reward.

"Labour to day is the great pay-master of all: interest on capital, profit on exchange, and rent for land, besides keeping the sources of all progress open to the world. Interest means that a class can always be kept without work at the direct expense of the workers. Profit creates a class of lookers-on, with nothing to do only what wages of superintendence covers. The reward of labour is therefore again lessened. Rent is a tax paid by labour for the privilege to work and live. This kind of social revolution, if ever effected, will require the combined efforts of all workers in every nation. The step we are taking is but a step in the early stage of a great movement, the end of which cannot be seen.

"In our trade, we seem to feel the effects of isolation first, from two or three causes. The march of invention in improved machinery, keeps the supply for goods up to the demand, limiting the number of hands required. With this great operating cause we have men thrown out of work in our villages, literally starving, rushing into our already over-crowded towns, seeking for work at any price—upon which they can barely live. The workers, therefore, are competing with one another for work, themselves bringing wages down.

"Where this is not felt, employers, eager to get rich, look out some poverty-stricken place, where they can take their machinery, and make use of the workers' poverty to increase their riches, and this is considered fair, honest competition.

"It is certain that necessity compels Federation and Union of all workers in all nations. We are following the lead of other great trades and organisations—Shoe-makers, Tailors, Miners, Carpenters, Engineers, Moulders, Cabinet-makers, Boiler-makers, Cotton operatives, etc.

"Fellow-workers, let us do our best at all times, to allow the good of all to control the action of each, so that with reason at the helm, justice at the scales, and courtesy and consideration in all our dealings with employers of labour, the wisest and the best may be done for the interest of all.

"We commend the rules to your careful consideration, and hope they will give us a solid basis of action for the good of Nottingham, Leicester, Ilkeston, and Loughborough. By our meetings we hope to assist in advising each other, and creating strong and lasting sympathy; and by creating a common fund from which we all can obtain support in our emergencies, we shall have greater power at our back, and encouragement before us to stand firm in our just demands.—We remain, yours very respectfully,

"THE COUNCIL OF FEDERATION.

JAMES HOLMES (Leicester), President.

SAMUEL BOWERS (Nottingham), Secretary.

LANCASHIRE MINERS.—The masters have agreed to a 5 per cent. advance so the strike in Lancashire has concluded.

LANARKSHIRE MINERS.—The masters, on the pretext that the sliding scale showed a decrease last month, have graciously consented to reduce their wages 2½ per cent.

THE STRIKE IN THE NAIL TRADE.—The nailmakers at Oldbury have gone in, their masters consenting to a 10 per cent. advance after the 27th inst., and agreeing to give fair consideration to the framing of a new list. At a general meeting held at Birmingham by the nailmakers, it was agreed to avoid a general strike and accept similar terms.

REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Sunday night, A. Brookes lectured upon "Competition." After the lecture an interesting discussion took place. The meeting finished with a few revolutionary songs; 11d. collected, and fair sale of Commonweal and literature.—J. P.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were Dean, J. Lyne, and R. J. Lyne; 6½d. collected and 40 Commonweal sold. No meeting at William Street owing to wet. At 7.30 p.m. we met at Archer Street, but the police were in force and stopped our meeting. We attempted to take our stand where the religious body held their meeting, but it was no good. We had a great crowd of people round us, and a man in the gathering fell down in a fit. Our comrade Lyne, sen., told the police the man was in a fit, and was told to get him out of it if he was of our party. The man was a complete stranger; so you see they were willing to let him die if he were a Socialist. We then walked a little further and held a good meeting in Cambridge Road, and sold 10 Commonweal; speakers were Maughan, Lyne, sen., Crouch, and Saint.

NORTH LONDON.—The meeting at Ossulton Street on Thursday evening was addressed by Cantwell, Nicoll, and Cores; 12 Commonweal sold. Splendid meeting at Hyde Park; Furlong (S.D.F.), Nicoll, Mrs. Lahr, and Miss Robertson (S.D.F.) spoke; 32 Commonweal sold and 1s. 7½d. collected for Provincial Missionary Fund.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 15th, "The Man with the Red Flag," being the first trial speech of John Burns, was read and discussed. No open-air work has been done during the week, this being holiday-time, the town largely deserted, and the weather very rainy.—L.

LEICESTER.—Pengeley, of Nottingham, spoke twice Sunday last; morning at Russell Square, on "The Gospel of Socialism;" evening at Humberstone Gate, "The Curse of Competition." Pengeley is a good and agreeable speaker; this was his maiden open-air address, and he certainly ought not to be discouraged from trying again. At the conclusion of his speech he was greeted with applause. Our old friend, Thos. Slater, again opposed, and discussion was kept up long after we had ceased speaking; audience good, 7s. 5d. collected, and 2s. 10d. worth of literature sold.—T. P. B.

MANCHESTER.—Despite the inclement weather we went to Middleton on Saturday night. Baillie spoke for about an hour to an attentive audience whilst rain fell heavily; Stockton followed, and was drawn into a long discussion with an intelligent opponent; 42 Commonweal sold. We had no meeting on Sunday afternoon owing to severity of weather. At night on Chester Road, Stockton and Baillie addressed a good meeting.

NORWICH.—The week before last eleven open-air meetings were held, addressed by comrades McCormack, Poynts, W. Moore, Swash, and Fred Henderson; the audiences very enthusiastic. Good meetings held this week at St. Pauls and Shirehall, addressed by Poynts and McCormack. On Saturday evening McCormack and Mowbray addressed a good meeting on the Haymarket. Mowbray had challenged Mr. Burgess to debate upon Free Love and Physical Force on Sunday afternoon; Mowbray did not put in an appearance, having stayed at Yarmouth; McCormack addressed the crowd for a time, expecting Mowbray would turn up. Mr. Burgess opened the debate at some length, and was ably replied to by McCormack. McCormack's reply was loudly applauded. Afterwards the meeting adjourned to the Fishmarket, owing to the rain. In the evening a very large meeting was held in the Market Place. At North Walsham in the morning a good meeting was held, addressed by McCormack; good impression made; 12 Commonweal sold. Collected for propaganda for last two weeks, 19s. 7d.; sale of literature, 1s. 3d.

YARMOUTH.—Some good work was done on Sunday. In the morning Mowbray gave an interesting address, devoting part of the time to the question why Socialists don't vote and part to the question "Is Socialism practical?" An opponent turned up in the person of a Scotch Radical. The joke of the opposition was that Scotty commenced by saying our comrade had nothing but abuse for everything, and ended by calling Mowbray "a bloody fool!" Our afternoon meeting was not so well attended. In the evening we had a good audience, who listened to our comrade whilst he showed how Socialism might be realised peaceably. 9s. 10½d. collected, and all the Commonweal sold. Sunday morning Ruffold, Annis, and Leggett went to Bradwell, where the people discuss with our comrades. They offered to pay any expenses if Reynolds would go and explain some of the points they stumble at. To-night several comrades go to Belton.—C. R.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Good meeting in Sneinton market on Sunday morning, addressed by Peacock. In the evening Peacock and Proctor addressed, in spite of rain, good audience in Great Market. Collection for School Board contest fund realised 2s. 6d. The Club has obtained convenient premises in Woodland Place, Upper Parliament Street, and meets there Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Sundays at 8.—P.

SHEFFIELD OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.—During the last nine or ten weeks J. Sketchley, assisted by two or three friends, has held good meetings every Sunday evening on West Bar Green. It would be well if all who are Socialists would attend and give a helping hand. On Sunday last the chair was taken by Bullas, after which Sketchley addressed the meeting, which was very earnest and enthusiastic. A fair amount of literature is sold every week. We are pleased with the initiative taken by the friends of Leeds.—T. L.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Royal Grants! We shall be expected to have a word or two to say about them. I hope what follows will not be considered too irreverent either towards the sovereignty of the sovereign or the sovereignty of the people; but it cannot be helped; it is impossible to treat the matter wholly seriously, though there is food for serious reflection in it. Let us put before our readers various views on the subject.

No. 1. The gracious Monarch of this land, the Empress of this beneficent Empire of Great Britain (on which the sun never sets), is pleased to inform her loyal and loving subjects that, owing to circumstances over which she has no control, she has grandchildren (who cannot work but are not ashamed to beg) who require pensioning, and that she is well aware how pleased all her l. and l. subjects will be to hear of this opportunity of showing their love and loyalty, and of expressing their sense of gratitude for the privilege which they enjoy of being so kindly allowed to live (if they can) under the shadow of the glory of the said empire. All this notwithstanding the fact that there are certain apes and demons in human form living amongst us, who have a dim idea that to pay a great deal for nothing at all is not their ideal of doing business in an ordinary way.

That is the official view of the matter, held as an article of faith by the greater part of the flunkey and ignorant middle-class population, and that part of the working classes who would be middle-class if they could. It is not meant to state facts: it is an article of faith, like the Athanasian Creed.

No. 2. England is practically a democratic republic, and as good a country as need be for an active and well-to-do middle-class man to live in: but there are anomalies in it which are troublesome to the logic of a commonsense man. Amongst these is a survival from the feudalism of the Middle Ages in the form of a sovereign who is usually of no great harm and never of much use. But even we commercial progressive people think it worth while to keep this sham going as a sort of symbol that we don't want to go too fast: still, having this gilt figure-head, as business men we don't want to pay too much for it, and of course we will take every opportunity of curbing its extravagancies.

That is the ordinary Radical view, and considers itself very superior and knowing. It is after all only a translation of No. 1 into a language understood of the people, and still leaves room for other views.

No. 3, for instance. "Well, what's the use of all this talk? Of course the old lady tries to get as much as she can from us and to do as little as possible for it; and since she is queen, she can easily best us: so we had better stump up, and say no more about it."

That is the ordinary commonsense working-man's view of it, looking at it from the outside. It is not very far from the fact as times go. But there is still room for the Socialist point of view: call it

No. 4. We are governed by a bureaucracy—i.e., a government of professional officials governing in their own interests as representatives of the proprietary classes. This Bureaucracy thinks it necessary to have a head ornamental official and to call it king or queen, though it has nothing whatever to do with the old feudal king, who had definite duties to perform. The present demand for more money is not made to the people in any form, but to the Bureaucracy, by its head official. That Bureaucracy, knowing well that its safety depends on its being as reactionary as possible, replies, "More money? certainly: only don't overdo it," and then proceeds to work the oracle by the usual parliamentary means; and the whole business of semi-opposition, and downright opposition, is all a solemn farce. The bureaucracy does not object. Let anyone else object if he pleases; he can't do anything.

After, all, working-men needn't lament the vote too much: if the Queen were not to have the money, they wouldn't. It will go just where it would have gone in any case—to the association for wasting the labour of the workers—i.e., the privileged classes. Cast your eyes over the list of the rubbish offered to our gilt gibbie-stick of royalty on this very occasion, and reflect on the toil and skill of ingenious and laborious men which has been cast away into the gutter in producing things that nobody wants, and how that toil and skill might have been employed in producing what everybody wants, and you will think that our head official with the sham mediæval cloak cast about it, is but a very natural expression of the great fraud and folly of our age.

Here is a sham Society, a real band of robbers, that steals and steals from all men who do anything, till it makes life hard and miserable for the great majority of men, and yet it can do no better for itself than waste its stolen resources in ugly and ridiculous toys, that those who are cumbered with them can do nothing with but bury or forget. For such a Society the crowned toy is good enough, and I can only wish it had to pay for it really instead of seemingly.

Yet, mind you, for the serious Radicals who voted against this natural and necessary insult to the community on principle and not for cheese-paring reasons, we cannot help feeling sympathy. But, poor souls, what are they to do if they have tacked themselves on to the skirts of such leaders as they are bound to put up with? All amateurs of oratory agree that Mr. Gladstone has at last made a speech worthy of his best period. What has he spent that rhetoric upon? Home Rule? Freedom of speech? Surely at least the independence and dignity of the House of Commons? Not at all, it was made in favour of the grant to save the Queen's pocket. What is to be said after that?

Also will any one explain why the Irish members voted for the Government on Mr. Labouchere's amendment? Is that part of the whitewashing into respectability of Mr. Parnell? or is it part of some Parliamentary tactics, a dodge that "almost no feller" can understand?

In any case the Irish members ought to consider whether the support of the "thoroughly respectable" is worth more to them than that of the democratic working men who have honestly taken up the cause of the poor of Ireland without any thought of their own self-interest.

As to Mr. Chamberlain, what need be said but that if one's enemy likes to roll himself in filth, it is not our business to warn him that he will stink afterwards?
W. M.

It seems that British capital is taking to itself wings, and is emigrating to the furthest corners of the earth. A telegram appeared in the Daily News last Saturday from New York, stating that "the agents of some English capitalists have been attempting several immense general retail shops in this city. . . These shops are somewhat like Whiteley's, they occupy immense buildings, and sell almost every kind of article.

We learn also from the same telegram that English capital now controls some of the largest breweries, has complete control of the salt industry, partial control of certain iron and steel mills, and is largely interested in tobacco factories, sugar refineries, flour mills, and cattle ranches. We are also informed that British capital has been endeavouring to buy Delmonico's celebrated restaurant. What is the meaning of this?

It is possible that some people may exclaim that it is the effect of the propaganda of the wicked Socialists which is driving all the capital out of the country. But this will hardly serve, we have not yet had a general strike on the eight hour's question, nor have there been pitched battles in the streets between workmen and the police. So, on the whole, I should imagine that capital is more secure in this country than in America. Well, what is the reason then of its emigration?

It probably springs from the fact that capital generally goes where it can get the most out of the people, where there are fresh fields for exploitation. In England at the present time, to use the language of the stock-jobbers, there is a great lack of remunerative investments.

It means, in plain English, that the capitalist has sweated the happy English worker till he can sweat very little more out of him, and he is now going to try his hand on the unfortunate American.

We Socialists should rejoice, for it only proves that the great commercial crisis, which will smash up the present system, is not far off, and that the far-seeing capitalist is getting out of a country which will soon be too hot for him. We shall soon have experience of the fact that by his system of wholesale robbery and greedy extortion, he has brought England to the verge of bankruptcy and national ruin. The birds are already beginning to fly before the coming storm.

Bryant and May have only been able to declare a dividend of 15 per cent. in place of the usual 20, and this in a time of improvement in trade! Surely you would think that this excellent firm, which is so generally noted for its "kindness" to its employees, ought to increase its dividends when trade is "improving." It seems, after all, that the Socialist advice to boycott certain firms is bearing good fruit, and that Bryant and May's advice (see advertisements) to the British consumer to patronise "British industry" in the persons of Bryant and May's shareholders, has not had the effect which doubtless the advertisers hoped.

Meanwhile, we can only advise our comrades to go on recommending people to boycott Bryant and May. If we can knock off 5 per cent. every year, in a very little time that firm of slave-driving Quakers will be in the bankruptcy court, which, at least, we trust will be "some consolation to mankind." D. N.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE PARIS CONGRESS.

Concluded from p. 234.)

ON the Wednesday, after the introduction of a delegate from the far-off country of Finland, who was received with much enthusiasm, Bebel began the reading of the reports with a history of the German movement in more recent days. This took two hours in the delivery, I should think, and of course could not be translated; a short resumé was all that could be given in French and English, but even from that it was plain that the original was able and exhaustive. I should mention that most, if not all, of the reports have been handed in in writing and will be printed; so that we shall have the benefit of noting the views of the delegates as to the position of the movement in the various countries.

A Spanish delegate (I think) followed Bebel, and spoke in his native tongue, which was translated by Lafargue. His address seemed emphatic and pithy.

In the evening the veteran Lavroff read a long and interesting report from Russia. After which came a threatening of the repetition of the fruitless noise of Monday evening, for what cause I, as a stranger, am utterly unable to say. The chairman (Anseele), however, disposed of this pretty easily, though I think in England we should have thought him a little too ready to adopt the last resort of "chucking out."

Then Jules Guesde got up and delivered what as a speech must be considered as the speech of the Congress, and was certainly splendid oratory. It was hardly a report, however, and to some of us there seemed too strong a flavour of electioneering in it; which, considering the position of the French Social-Democrats, was of course to be expected.

Next morning, after some preliminaries, I was called upon to report for England. I should mention here that we S. L. delegates were strongly of opinion that Keir Hardie, who represented the Parliamentary side of English Socialism, should have an opportunity of speaking to that side, and that we pressed this on the Committee. In the light of what occurred later, I think this ought to be noticed.

I was told that the time now pressed so much that the rest of the speakers of reports would be asked to keep within ten minutes, which I tried to do—and I think kept within twenty. I handed in my written report later on.

I was followed by Adler, for Austria, who by no means imitated my brevity (nor did any one else). Volders reported for Belgium; Italy, Holland, and Poland also reported. After these national reports came the special reports—i.e., for associations, etc. Keir Hardie spoke for the Scotch miners; I missed his speech, and chiefly remember a speech of the delegate for the Waiters' Association—very straightforward and to the point, complaining of the irrational contempt in which these luckless slaves of the well-to-do are held even by their working brethren: and also a speech of Madame Zetkin, who represented the working women of Berlin. This last was in fact a very clear and closely reasoned essay on the relation between the industrial position of women and Socialism. When printed it will be valuable as clearly establishing the difference in view between the Socialist and the "Woman's Rights" women. It was received with as much applause as any other speech; more than any, I think, except Guesde's.

The fag-end of this sitting (a very long one) was devoted to short speeches by various delegates. Here Kitz, as a result of a great deal of pressing on my part, was allowed to read the text of a resolution condemning the privileged thieves of society for their brutal treatment of the "criminals" who have been first manufactured and then punished by our robber sham-society. We understood that he would have an opportunity of moving this resolution; but the opportunity did not turn up.

Two or three Anarchists spoke in this sitting, and spoke well, though to my mind they did not put forward any distinctively Anarchist doctrines: they were well received by the mass of the delegates, who indeed throughout strongly applauded any revolutionary sentiments. The gibe of one Anarchist deserves to be noted. Apropos of palliation by legislation on labour, he said: "When I was a Collectivist I was taught the Iron Law so well by Marx and Liebnicht, that, I cannot forget it now I am an Anarchist."

That evening (Friday) the Paris Municipality threw open the splendid public rooms of the Hotel de Ville to the delegates of both Congresses and their friends, and entertained them very handsomely after the generous "custom of the country." Also there was a friendly meeting held at our friend Maxime Lisbonne's Taverne du Baigne, which is got up to simulate a prison, with (in all senses) fearful pictures on the walls: waiters dressed as convicts, and where for the consideration of 1½ francs you can be solemnly ironed in public (I don't know what charge is made for taking off the irons). Here Louise Michel spoke, and there was much enthusiasm shown. I was not able to attend either of these entertainments, as I had to spend the night in writing out my report from my notes.

On Saturday morning we found Cunninghame Graham in the chair, and we expected that Bebel's propositions would be formally put, debated on, and (certainly) carried by a large majority; but this was not duly done. I must explain here that for three days past I had handed in a resolution of a wide Socialist character, so that the Congress might pledge itself definitely to Socialism, which all our English comrades thought necessary to be done, if it were only to give our Congress a reason for existence in opposition to the Possibilist Congress. The organisers said that the preamble of Bebel's propositions practically carried with it the sense of my resolution. This was true; but I pleaded that a separate resolution ought to be put, as there were delegates present who would vote against Bebel's propositions who would assuredly vote for a Socialist resolution, and that moreover the resolution would not have the same force imbedded in a preamble which would not be noticed alongside of its "practical" deduction.

The organisers agreed therefore to the putting of a distinct resolution, and on this Saturday morning I spent some time in Conference with our French and German friends (including Bebel), and arranged for the modification of my resolution by the introduction of matter from the French and German preambles, which, however, did not alter the sense of the original resolution.

Coming back to the Congress Hall again nothing serious seemed doing, and knowing that the vast majority of the delegates were in favour of Bebel's propositions, believing also that nothing serious would be put forward in opposition, I left for Rouen after the morning session along with Kitz and Tarleton, and was therefore not a witness of the lamentable scene that followed; therefore, what I say of it is subject to correction by those of our comrades who were there.

It was clear that no discussion of the propositions was to be allowed, and the clôture was voted. Thereupon, our friend Merlino rose to protest against this proceeding, but was howled down; he was attacked in words by a delegate and accused of carrying on organised interruption, and his expulsion was ordered by the chairman. This was carried out with much brutal violence, against which the League delegates attempted to protect him. After his expulsion, Mrs. Schack and Tochatti rose also to protest, and then all our delegates present left and handed in a written protest against the violence and the smothering of the discussion.

Now surely, short as the time for discussion was, time could have been found for two speakers at least to put forward the contrary to the very propositions which from the first we had been called together to discuss; and since the Congress (though undoubtedly in the main composed of Social Democrats) had distinctly invited Socialists of all kinds, it must be said to have stultified itself in refusing to listen to opinions which everybody knew were held by some of the delegates; and the intolerance of the majority must remain a serious blot on what was otherwise a successful demonstration at least.

On the Sunday morning, the delegates went to Pere la Chaise to hang a wreath on the Mur des Federés, the death-place of so many of the murdered men of the Commune. Cunninghame Graham and Tochatti spoke there amongst others, and so came to an end this great gathering.

Looking back on it, it seems clear that if the Congress had gone on with its business instead of trying to stand well with the public by discussing the possibility of a fusion, which almost all of us knew was impossible, we should have gained at least one whole day for debating the pros and cons on Bebel's propositions; and if, in addition, the reports of the different nations had been taken as read (since they are all to be printed) we should have had time enough for a debate which would have satisfied everybody, and sent the delegates of all shades away contented. Because in the course of that debate everything could have been said that was necessary about the movement generally.

Finally, the impression made on me by attendance at this International Congress is that such gatherings are not favourable for the dispatch of business, and their real use is as demonstrations, and that it would be better to organise them as such. I mean that two or three great public meetings should be held (after the due formalities of verification, etc., have been gone through), that opportunities should be given for the delegates to meet each other in social and conversational meetings, and that there should be no voting, no "playing at Parliament." This is my wisdom after the event; but I think it is worth considering, as no doubt there will soon be another International Socialist Congress.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE National Greenback party, which everybody believed to be dead and buried some considerable time, all at once has come to life again. Probably the interest now taken again in so many crotchets has induced this corpse to resurrection. But the life of this latter-day Rip van Winkle, who looks on the present labour movement through the spectacles of twenty years ago, can only be a short one; however, let us hope it will be happy. Mr. G. O. Jones, the chairman of the party, has issued an invitation requesting all persons who desire to aid in reorganising the National Greenback party, to meet in their respective States and Congressional districts on or before Sept. 4th next, and appoint one delegate to attend the National Greenback Convention called to meet on Sept. 12th in Cincinnati, Ohio. The invitation is extended to “Those who favour a distinct American policy regarding its finances, who believe that full legal tender notes, greenbacks, issued by the government for value received, in promoting the general welfare, constitute the money which marks our advancing civilisation, make the best money the world ever saw, and should become the permanent circulating medium of the American people, the life of whose free government they saved, and that a party bearing their name should be perpetuated to keep these great truths constantly before the people. Those who believe, with the prophet of old, that ‘money answereth all things,’ and that no other reform can be wisely considered nor honestly determined until the great economic wrongs brought about by bad legislation have been corrected, and the money question for ever settled in the interest of the whole people, and who are willing to act in accordance with the spirit of the resolution passed by the Continental Congress in 1773, viz.: Not to eat, drink, wear, nor use anything manufactured in Great Britain; nor after one year trade with anyone who deals in goods brought here under the British flag.”

The call says “that the reorganised party will also advocate the payment of public debts according to the original contract under which they were issued; the encouragement of the American merchant marine and of home industries; the limitation of the debts of corporations to the amount of stock actually paid up; the restriction of dividends of corporations to a fair return on the investment, and the restriction of private ownership of land.” It is quite impossible to conceive of a more fossilian programme.

The Executive Board of the Knights of Labour organisation met on July 16th in Chicago city, General Master Workman T. V. Powderly presiding. The principal business was the selection of the time and place for the next general assembly. It was decided that the general assembly should be held at Atlanta, Ga., on the second Tuesday of next November. The board then examined complaints, petitions, and reports in relation to the Order in the North-west. The principal strength of the organisation is now concentrated in these regions. In the East the Knights have lost all their prestige, and the eastern assemblies are mostly defunct or count but few members. Talking to a reporter, Powderly stated:

“The charter of the first assembly of France was prepared this morning, and started on its way to the old country. It was given to Mrs. Barry, the general director and instructor in woman’s work. The first assembly has been organised for some time, but we have held back the charter, preferring to send it by special messenger.”

As a result of a meeting of the respective leaders of different labour organisations in February last at Philadelphia, Pa., an address to workmen has been published, signed by T. V. Powderly and J. W. Hayes, on behalf of the Knights of Labour; Samuel Gompers and P. J. McGuire, American Federation of Trades; Eugene V. Debbs and W. N. Sargent, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen; W. S. Sinnott, Brotherhood of Brakemen; and George S. Baily, Switchmen’s Union. With the exception of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, these are numerically the strongest labour organisations in the States. The principal argument of the address is that “If through zealous efforts in behalf of their separate organisations, the officers of the same have appeared to differ with each other, the fact stands that there has never been any real cause for any serious divergence of opinion.

“That the future may witness no repetition of past misunderstandings, we have assembled to counsel with each other, and to demonstrate by our presence at this gathering that between official heads of the organisations of labour there exists no difference of opinion or feeling which will stand in the way of the future welfare of labour generally.

“We therefore call—First, upon all organisations of labour to put forth renewed efforts to strengthen and solidify their ranks, and to leave nothing undone to make each society the power that it is intended to be; Second, upon all unorganised working-men to study the principles upon which organisation is based, to meet and consult with members of labour societies in their various localities, with the object in view of ultimately bringing within the folds of organised labour every worthy man and woman who toils in America.

“Thus far have we gone at our preliminary meeting. We hope that the example may be followed in every place where a labour society exists; that the advice we give may be acted upon, and when we meet again in the near future we may be prepared to report that the groundwork has been laid for a plan upon which all societies may become allies in defending the rights of each other.”

One thing these trades-unionists of all shades and degrees seem never to take into consideration, and that is, that the old object of unionism—to reduce the hours of labour and to raise the wages—is about played out by now. The principal duty, therefore, of real leaders should not so much consist in calling upon the workers to unite, but in evolving a programme scientifically correct and in agreement with the historical economic evolution. Unionism based upon antediluvian principles is worse than rat-ism.

The 4th of July has clearly demonstrated that the new eight-hour movement is a complete failure. Here, in the East, hardly anybody takes any interest in it. The workers know that it is absurd to believe that the capitalists will introduce the eight hours’ day for humanitarian reasons, and they also know that the present state of the labour market absolutely forbids even the idea of forcing the “bosses” to grant this principle. In consequence the movement is as dead as Queen Anne for all practical purposes. Chicago city had the biggest eight-hour demonstration. About 35,000 men attended the meeting. Mayor Creiger, Carter Harrison’s henchman, was among the speakers. Samuel Gompers, the President of the American Federation of Labour, delivered the principal address. Meetings were also held in Philadelphia, Pa., Lynn, Mass., Vicksburg, Miss. Here in Boston a meeting was to be held in Franklin Park, but the authorities declining to “grant” the use of the park, which is a waste, for such meetings, the idea of holding a demonstration was abandoned. As a protest against this arbitrary action of the city officials a meeting will be held in the historic Faneuil Hall.

The Social Democrats, recognised everywhere as indefatigable voters for a cause they believe in, have mostly withdrawn from the eight-hour movement. They have discovered that the whole movement is nothing but a farce. In New York city only about 800 persons attended the demonstration in favour of eight hours, but rain is given as the cause for this apparent lack of interest on the part of the workers in the movement. In Jersey city and Brooklyn the people interested did not show up stronger than in New York. In San Francisco the movement cannot get on, it is said, because the women will not join.

THE COMMON WEAL.

WE Socialists are often told we must get all people to be of the same mind, in fact, to think alike on whatever pertains to their sublunary existence in order to give practical effect to our doctrines. Granting that this is a sine qua non for the establishment of the Co-operative Commonwealth of the peoples of the world on a lasting basis, I do not see that the task is impossible. Every school of thought doing any propaganda, has for its main object the conversion of as many as possible to that phase of thought which it inculcates, and therefore of necessity the conversion of all mankind if possible. Such being the case, I fail to see wherein we differ in this respect from any other school of thought.

Let us consider the causes of the divergence of thought in different individuals, i.e., why people do not think alike. We know that unanimity of opinion prevails on all known facts; that when any hypothesis is advanced, by a consensus of opinion judgment is suspended until the hypothesis can be demonstrated to be a fact; and, therefore, that in the region of the known all people (who know) do think alike. Hence it follows that difference of opinion on all matters that pertain to actual knowledge can exist only in the unknown, i.e., the speculative. In the irrational system under which we live we find that divergence of opinion frequently arises in the consideration of a subject, not from the absolute good or evil to the community at large embodied in the subject, but to the relative effect produced upon certain individuals or classes of individuals, since the society of to-day is made up of conflicting interests. Therefore, conflicting interests produce a divergence of opinion. We contend that under Communism, people having an identity of interest, i.e., the common weal, a general consensus of opinion on anything which concerns the well-being of each and all will be no hard matter to obtain, and therefore in a rational society with identity of interests people will think alike.

DIEMSHIETZ’S RELEASE.—On Wednesday, at an early hour, members of the Patriotic and International Clubs waited outside Pentonville Gaol to welcome Louis Diemshietz upon his release, on the completion of his sentence. Some friends of the patriot’s were present as early as five o’clock. The prisoner was not released until nine, when a good muster of comrades were present, who gave our comrade a hearty welcome. In the evening, at the Patriotic Club, a public welcome was given to our comrade Diemshietz. Addresses were delivered by several comrades, and the evening passed pleasantly with songs, music, and readings. Our comrade in the course of a reply to the welcome given, declared his unshaken determination to work for the realisation of Socialism. His ill-treatment and imprisonment had only strengthened his hostility to the present system. The Defence Committee will meet shortly for the settlement of affairs. All friends having subscription sheets are requested to return them. Any further subscriptions towards the Compensation Fund should be sent in at once to F. Kitz, Secretary Defence Committee.

BUT it is in national and municipal contracts that corruption is always said to be most rampant, and there is no doubt than an immense amount of it does exist in connection with these. For one thing, it begins at an earlier stage—namely, with the letting of the work. In the majority of even the largest firms all important contracts come before the owners or directors for decision, and they are personally interested in getting the work done as well and as cheaply as possible. But in national and municipal affairs many large contracts are let by individuals, paid managers of departments, who have not the same personal interest as a board of directors or the owner. The class of contracts I now allude to are those for supplies to the army, navy, and police, and such-like. Here it is very common for the contractor to bribe more or less directly the official who has the letting of them. I know a corn-merchant who has given up trying for government contracts at all, the amount of bribery necessary to give him a chance of success being more than he could stand.

The corruption of government departments is frequently pointed to as a most potent argument against Socialism. “See what bribery exists in the departments of industry now managed by the Government and the municipalities! And yet you propose to put all industry under similar control! Preposterous!” So very often say our opponents. But there are a few considerations which make it less preposterous than our friend appears to think. If he will consider the instances given above, and many others, some of which probably have come under his own notice, I think he will be constrained to admit that the first cause of this corruption lies in the competition of many firms each eager to get the contracts, whose very existence, in fact, depends on their securing a number of these orders, and who are therefore driven to every means that will help them, either to quote a lower price than their opponents, or to induce the purchaser to give them a preference. Arising out of this is the second cause, namely, the opposition of interest between the various parties; as, for instance, it is the interest of the contractor to supply as poor an article as will pass the inspection, and it is the interest of the purchaser to get out of him as good a quality and as large a quantity as he possibly can. I am well aware that there are other considerations for the contractor; he must consider his reputation, and the chance of future orders; but such considerations as these, however much they may modify the result, do not alter the main direction in which the two interests are working. The sportsman is restrained by considerations for future sport from killing all the birds on his estate, but no one would maintain that this proved his interest and the birds’ to be the same! The sportsman’s interest is to kill as many as consideration for future sport will allow. So the contractor’s interest is to supply as poor a quality as considerations of reputation and future orders will allow!

Now in any state of Socialism that may be imagined these two causes of corruption will not exist. So that, although there may be more men in the position of managers of capital in which they have not a large personal stake, there will, on the other hand, be no men whose interest it will be to corrupt them. By far the most effectual way to stop corruption is to take away the temptation: something may be done, no doubt, towards securing men who will resist it, but if it can be taken away the thing is done at once. That is just what Socialism does. It may not, perhaps, place its managers in posts where it would be more difficult to corrupt them, but, by taking away competition amongst contractors, it leaves no one whose interest it would be to try and corrupt a manager. One often hears of a contractor for supplying corn, boots, or swords bribing an official to give him the order; but whoever heard of the manager of Woolwich Arsenal bribing the Admiralty officials to place orders for guns at his factory! Still less likely would the Postmaster-General be to bribe the chairman of the London School Board to buy their stamps and envelopes from his department! Well, the relations between the various productive and distributive departments under Socialism would be much the same as between any two of the present departments. The exceptional corruption said to exist in government departments at present arises from their contact with the competitive market around, and is due almost entirely to the conditions of that market; as soon as one national department comes to deal with another or with a municipal department, the corruption vanishes; and as soon as all industries are made national, municipal, or communal departments, as the case may be, all cause for bribing and corruption in their dealings with each other will have vanished too.

Another charge which is often brought against national and municipal establishments is that of extravagance, and while we are on the subject a word or two on this may not be out of place. To begin with, this charge is only partly true, and relates chiefly to the war departments, which are so different from any ordinary industry as hardly to count as an example. The Post Office is not usually charged with extravagance, and its dealings are much more comparable with ordinary industry; its officials, too, are more a class of trained men, many of whom, if not most, have worked their way up in the service. In the war departments, on the other hand, too many places are filled by untrained sons of powerful army and navy men, who are in want of an income without working much for it. In municipal affairs, too, the charge is by no means always true, as is proved by the successful way in which many towns work their gas and water supply, not only selling at a lower rate to the consumer, but making a handsome income for the municipality. But granting there may be a certain amount of extra waste and extravagance in many of these departments, the waste of competition, which would be done away with by the introduction of communal management of industries, would swallow it up many times over. Besides, part of the so-called extravagance of governments is due to a cause which we should be only too glad to see extended. As a rule, wages and salaries are higher in national and municipal industries, and very often a pension is allowed after so many years of service. Then as a rule the men can work more leisurely; they are not bullied quite so much. This of course applies with greater force to the higher branches, in which are employed the sons of swells, but still it runs through all grades more or less; and so far as the so-called extravagance is due to this it is good, and we need not fear to see a little more of such “waste.”

It must not be imagined that because I have been comparing competitive industries to our present government departments, that these departments are our ideal of what industries should be; far from it. But they are the only instances we have where competition is absent; and even these, based as they are to so large an extent on old caste distinctions, on party government, on old-fashioned notions about interfering with private enterprise, and similar absurdities, show very distinctly the advantages to be derived from the abolition of a competitive industry, not the least of which will be the sweeping away of the huge system of bribery and corruption which is distinctly due to the keen competition which Socialism will abolish.

ROYAL GRANTS, AND OTHER BURDENS.

THE question of royal grants is once more agitating the public mind. We hear a great deal of the duty of the democracy to oppose these grants, and we hear a great deal of the duty of the British democracy to remain loyal to the Crown. We also read of the sovereign right of her majesty to claim whatever she deems necessary to the comfort and dignity of every member of the royal family, even to the third or fourth generation. All this is very amusing at the close of the nineteenth century. But royalty is only a part of the present plundering system, though it is of course the centre around which all the plundering classes flutter. There are also many matters in connection with royalty to-day that require deep consideration. We have in the country a strong section whose aim is and has been for at least a generation to strengthen, as it is termed, the royal prerogative. We are told to-day that the Queen must maintain her sovereignty, her supremacy. Austin ('Province of Jurisprudence') lays it down as a principle "that a limited monarchy is an absurdity. Either the Crown or the Parliament must be supreme." During the debate (1876) on the Empress of India Bill, Disraeli claimed that supremacy for the Crown. He boldly declared: "The fact is that Parliament exists by the prerogative of the Crown. It is the royal prerogative that enables this house to be elected and assembled." In 1878 we got a step further. During the debate (May 21) on the Indian troops being brought to Malta, the Attorney-General said: "It is the prerogative of the Crown not only to command and control the military forces, but to raise them and maintain them, both regular and irregular. The Bill of Rights (?) forbids the keeping of a standing army in time of peace without the consent of Parliament. That was confined to the United Kingdom; the Mutiny Act extended it to Ireland. Beyond the United Kingdom the case was different." Again: It was the prerogative of the sovereign to move these forces from India, where they were, to Malta, or anywhere else, leaving it to the imperial Parliament, when they got there, subsequently to sanction the step which had been taken by voting the necessary supplies ('Hansard,' pp. 373 to 383).

In all this a great principle is involved, which may ere long prove most dangerous to the people of England. Parliament exists by the royal prerogative. By the royal prerogative Parliament may be prorogued or even dissolved. By the same prerogative the sovereign can raise and maintain an immense army in India; can move that army to Malta, or anywhere else, without the sanction of Parliament—Parliament having nothing to do with the matter but subsequently to vote the supplies. Fonblanque ('The Crown, the Senate, and the People,' p. 12) says: "The person of the sovereign is sacred. She is above the law. No Act of Parliament can bind her, unless it contain express words to that effect." So that all the thousands of Acts passed during the last half-century apply only to the people, not to her majesty; she is above the law. But Schomberg carries the doctrine of absolutism still further. At p. 227 he says: "The monarch is the depository of the wealth, and power, and wisdom of the country." And at p. 231: "The monarch is absolute and is the Minister of God." We are evidently progressing in more directions than one.

During the debate on the question of the Royal Grants, July 25th, Mr. W. H. Smith even spoke of our sacred institutions, royalty of course being one of them; and this in the year of grace, 1889. And even Gladstone thought the Crown ought to be supported in splendour. The splendour of barbarism in the midst of a starving population. The Grand Old Man!

But royalty ever has been, and, as long as it remains, ever will be, a curse and a scourge to the human race. In all the States of Europe it is the emblem of brute-force. Morally dead in all the nations, it depends for its supremacy on the mercenary legions at its command. In principle and in practice, and in its effects on the populations, it is one of the monster evils of the nineteenth century. It is not the mere cost of the Crown, though that is enormous; it is the principle involved, and where it may yet lead us. During the fifty-two years of this reign, the cost, in direct money payments, has been far over £34,000,000 sterling, while it would be difficult to estimate the indirect cost. But in dealing with the cost of the Crown we must remember that every kind of income comes, direct or indirect, from labour. That every kind of wealth comes from labour. And that the million or more which royalty costs the nation comes, directly or indirectly, from those who produce the nation's wealth. We have, then, to divide, not only the cost of the Crown, but all the other great burdens, whether national or local, among those from whose labour every kind of income is derived.

In 1882 Mulhall gave the number of working-class families in the United Kingdom at 4,629,100. If we divide the total cost of royalty by that number, it gives as the cost to every family 6s. 7d. per annum. Not much, it may be said; but why should it be paid at all, and for the support of a family of useless creatures? Then there is the royal church, which amounts to £2 3s. 3d. for each working family. There is also the royal army (not including the royal navy), the yearly cost to each family being £3 17s. 6d. And then there is the royal debt, the total annual burden of which is £6 7s. 6d. to each working-class family. These four items amount to £12 14s. 10d. a-year.

But let us take another view of the matter. The general revenue of the country (1882) was £87,743,465, which amounted to £18 19s. per family. Add the local expenditure (1884), £66,670,000, equal to £14 8s. per family, or the two items were a tax on each family of £33 7s. It is useless to talk about what the non-producing classes pay; labour being the only source of wealth, from whatever source income is directly derived—whether from the taxes or rates or tithes, or from rents or profits or dividends—all comes from labour, and from labour only, combined with the natural elements.

But we must go a step further. In 1882 the national income was stated to be £1,247,000,000, or rather over that—say £1,250,000,000. Now, taking the smaller sum, and dividing it between the 4,629,100 families comprised in the wealth-producing classes, and it amounts to £295 5s. to each family. Nearly £6 per week for each family. Place the wage of the skilled workman—his 30s. or 35s., or even his 40s. per week—by the side of this £6, and how small his wage looks! But how with those who get their 10s. or 12s. per week!

But who got this mass of wealth? where did it go? As those who produced it never received it, who got it, and how? Let us take four items only—

Landlordism (including ground-rents, which increase every year) takes at least £200,000,000, equal to each working-class family of	£42 19 0
Usury, not less than £300,000,000; cost per family	64 8 6
The trading classes, £244,000,000; cost to each family	53 3 0
Superintendence, £180,000,000; cost to each family	38 12 0

Here went £924,000,000; or from each family ...	£199 2 6
Leaving only £323,000,000; or for each family ...	96 2 6

We thus see that it takes from every working-class family, every year, close on £200, or nearly four pounds per week, to support the present system. And yet we are content to go on.

Taking the higher classes of the community, what were their number? 223,500 families; a mere handful as compared with the workers, who form the mass of the population. Yet, in 1878, when the wealth of the country was estimated at £7,960,000,000, those 223,500 families held of that wealth no less than £5,727,000,000, while the 4,629,100 families possessed only £398,000,000 among them. Again, from 1878 to 1882 the wealth of the nation rose to £8,720,000,000. And in 1885 to £9,410,000,000, equal to £261 per head of the population, and if divided among the 4,629,100 families of workers would have given to each such family £2,032. Taking the ten years ending 1875, the wealth of the nation increased £2,400,000,000, or showing a yearly saving of £240,000,000. From 1876 to 1885, the yearly increase averaged £180,000,000, and taking the seven years ending 1886 it was £207,100,000 per annum. Where does it all go? Who produced it? The workers. Who got it? The non-producing classes.

But it will be said that population has increased since 1882, and that therefore the workers are more numerous to-day than at that period. And so has our national income increased, to a much greater extent than the increase of population.

Now, much as I detest the institution of royalty, with its church, its army, and its debt, I cannot forget the greater burdens of landlordism, of usury, of our profit-mongering system. While I would sweep away royalty with all its ever-attendant evils, I would also free the workers from the curse of landlordism and the still greater curse of usury, and would organise society on the only rational basis—that of free association.

Let us, then, while condemning royal grants, also condemn the institution of royalty—condemn it as the centre of the semi-barbarous, brutal system that still obtains among us. Let us condemn it in the name of equal liberty, of universal justice, of eternal right.

And let us not forget, in combating the evils of royalty, or even as an institution, that the same monstrous principle exists throughout the whole of society. That it is the principle that must be swept away, not only on the throne of the nation, not only in the institutions of the country, but in the family circle itself. This the social revolution alone can accomplish. And by the social revolution I mean the triumph of revolutionary Socialism; not of mere Socialistic opportunism, but revolutionary Socialism, that would sweep away at once and for ever royalty in all its forms and in all the relations of life: the curse of landlordism, with all its traditions; of usury, with all its evils; of our profit-mongering system, with all its degradations; and that would raise the worker to Liberty, Dignity, and Independence.

J. SKETCHLEY.

AMERICAN IRONWORKERS.—The 3,000 employés of the Reading Ironworks recently received notice that no member of any labour organisation will be employed in those works when they resume operations. In case the men desire employment they must sign an "agreement" to these conditions to secure it. A year ago the 25,000 men employed on the Reading system all belonged to labour organisations, besides the 20,000 miners working for the company. To-day not one of these 45,000 men belong to a labour organisation.—C.

LABOUR-TROUBLES IN THE STATES.—Bradstreet's reports the number of bankruptcies from the 1st of January to the last of June, 1889, to be 5,918, against 5,254 for the same period in 1888, and 5,072 in 1887. The same paper says 53 strikes have occurred in June this year, involving 18,148 men; from the 13th of July 22 strikes have been declared, involving 8,500 men. The total number of strikes from January 1st to June 30th this year is reported to be 349, involving 93,258 men, against 436 strikes and 172,432 strikers for the same period in 1888, and 554 strikes and 222,023 strikers in 1887. This shows a considerable decrease in the strikes as well as regards the men involved, but of course it must not be concluded from these figures that capital and labour have become more harmonised in the States. Contrariwise, the relations of the two are worse than ever, but the toilers have clearly recognised by now that strikes cannot remedy their troubles, and that this mode of warfare under the present conditions is even unable to advance their interests one point. In fact, strikes are now-a-days only resorted to to prevent a reduction in wages.—C.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Strike of Nottingham Lace-makers.

For some time affairs have looked threatening, but they have now come to a crisis. As the masters have intimated their intention of reducing wages from 25 to 40 per cent. in certain branches of the trade, 2,500 men ceased work last Saturday, July 27th, and have announced their intention of not returning until the notices of a reduction in wages are withdrawn. As the men have the support of their fellows in the same trade, the struggle is likely to be both long and stubborn.

The Strike in Somerset and Lancashire.

The secretary of Lancashire Miners' Federation has issued an appeal to the miners in that district to pay a levy of sixpence weekly to support the miners who are on strike in Lancashire and Somerset. He states with truth that should the Somerset men be beaten, the men will lose the advance in Bristol and Forest of Dean districts, and that will probably be followed by a general reduction in the Midlands, Lancashire, and Yorkshire. He therefore urges the men to stand together, as the whole wages movement is one, and cannot be broken. That is true, Mr. Secretary; and let us also remember that the cause of the workers throughout the world is also one, and cannot be broken.

Managerial Tyranny in Derbyshire.

According to a correspondent of the Labour Tribune, Durham miners are not the only sufferers by the tyranny of a manager. At one colliery in Derbyshire the manager is doing his best to harrass the men who have been most prominent in getting the advance for their fellows. A number of men have been riddled out of their stalls. Others have had their earnings reduced to next to nothing by the ordinary facilities for output being denied them. It is said also that a list is to be taken of all those who gave notice, and any fineable offence in their case is to be met with a double penalty. The men at the colliery are rather disorganised, or we might depend upon it the manager would not have sufficient courage to practise his tyranny. It only shows what tyrants the capitalists would be if the men were fools enough to let them.

The Gas-Stokers.

A highly successful demonstration was held in Hyde Park by the London gas-stokers last Sunday, to celebrate their victory over their employers in reducing their hours from twelve to eight. John Burns, Mrs. Besant, H. H. Champion, and William Thorne, the Secretary of the Gas-stokers' Union, addressed the meeting. Resolutions were carried calling upon the Government and the County Councils to support the eight-hours system in all their departments, and expressing sympathy with the 52 Silesian workmen who have been condemned to shamefully long terms of imprisonment for "rioting" when on strike for shorter hours and higher wages. In its march to the Park the gas-stokers' procession came within a very few yards of Trafalgar Square. In fact, it passed the spot where processions are usually broken up by police; but the police did not fancy attacking this procession, it looked too formidable. Half-starved men and boys are more in their line. They do not give hard knocks when there is chance of getting them back.

The Durham Miners.

The Durham miners who work at the Hebburn Colliery are troubled with an unpopular and tyrannical manager. In consequence of his behaviour on 2nd of July in making a change in the manner of working, which was a breach of the terms under which the men were employed, a large number of them refused to work. And on the 8th of July there was another dispute. On the night of the 7th of July, as the shiftmen and stonemen were going to get the pit ready for stone-hewers, the door of a water-tub which was ascending got loose and was making a fearful noise. This naturally alarmed the men who were descending, and they shouted and stopped the cage. They hung in the mid air for some time, until someone went from the bank. The result was that the workmen refused to go to work till the shaft had been examined, so 313 of them were summoned at the South Shields Police Court for breach of contract. The miners made a picnic of the occasion, and marched to the court with a brass band and banners. In the end the court dismissed the charge for July 8th, and fined one of the culprits, J. Thompson, 5s. for the offence on the 2nd. The other charges were withdrawn for a month in order to allow an arrangement to be come to. That brass band and banner incident proves that the Durham miners have good stuff in them, and shows that the manager is exciting a dangerous feeling among the men.

ADVANCE IN HOB-NAIL MAKERS' WAGES.—The employers in the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire hob-nail trade decided on Wednesday the 24th to concede an advance in wages ranging from 10 to 15 per cent.

WALSALL BIT FILERS AND FORGERS' STRIKE.—This came to an end on Tuesday 23rd July, the men accepting the employers' offer of 10 per cent. advance and returning to work. The men are perfecting their organisation with a view of securing a further 10 per cent. in three months' time.

THE TRAM STRIKE AT MANCHESTER.—Our Manchester friends send us the following: On Friday morning the guards on the Harpurhey route of the Manchester Tramway Company turned out on strike in consequence of a notice which had been placed inside the cars, stating that fraud had been practised and that the company would pay £10 reward to anyone who would give information. Out of twenty-three men who ceased work only two returned, but the company had no difficulty in filling the places of the others with emergency-men. It was understood that the above notice, which the men considered an unnecessary aspersion on their honesty, would shortly be introduced throughout the company's service, only to disarm resistance it will be done piecemeal as it was begun. No society of any kind exists amongst the men, but they called a meeting of all servants of the company, which took place in the Lower Moseley Street Music Hall. About 600 guards, drivers, and other employes were present. A meek and submissive tone was taken by the few speakers amongst the men, who appeared to be more in fear of the "sack" than indignant at the informer-manufacturing notice. The Socialist League was represented by the secretary and another (Baillie and Strange), both of whom addressed the meeting advising the men to show a bold front and adopt a determined attitude, not only in the particular matter in question, but also the long hours and low pay—17 hours a-day and wages from 15s. a-week for guards. The immediate formation of a union was the means pointed out as the only way at present by which they could hope of gaining the slightest concession from the capitalists by whom they were employed. Over 300 names were at once given in, and a committee appointed to take the matter in hand. The Socialist League Rooms were offered as a meeting place for the committee, and gladly accepted. This took place on Sunday morning, the men having to go on duty at 1.30. The original strikers are still out, and a general strike is threatened if the objectionable notice is placed on the other routes. A collection was made at the above meeting for the benefit of the guards who are out, and a public subscription is about to be opened. None amongst the reptile press here take up the cause of these miserably paid slaves of capitalistic greed. D. N.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The German Nupkinses do their very best to drive into despair, and then naturally enough into revolutionary resistance, the oppressed workers of Bismarck's accursed fatherland. Last week the trial of thirty-three miners of the Waldenburg coal district on the charge of "riotous conduct" during the last strikes in Silesia was concluded. After the hearing of an unusual great number of police folk, who swore all sorts of falsehoods, the jury returned a verdict of "guilty" against all the accused but one, who was consequently released. The court sentenced our comrade Henkel, who had been a member of the strike committee ("the ringleader of the rioters," as the judges put it) to seven years' penal servitude, to be followed by seven years' deprivation of all civic rights. Nine of the accused were sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from eighteen months' hard labour to five years' penal servitude, and twenty-two others to periods of imprisonment ranging from twelve months to four years. These shameful sentences have been inflicted upon prisoners who for the most part are youths of sixteen to twenty years of age, only twelve of their number being above twenty-one. During the trial the Court of Schweidnitz, where the Nupkinses sat, was guarded by a considerable number of soldiers, as well as police and gendarmes, because the judges went in fear of being "judged" too.

In addition to the cases disposed of last week, the same court of Schweidnitz sentenced fourteen more miners, who were found "guilty" on the same police evidence of having committed what is termed "excesses" during the strikes at Waldenburg, to terms of imprisonment varying from one year to four years' penal servitude. Such shameful sentences are more likely to foster the revolutionary movement than the best speeches in Parliament would do, and in that sense at any rate these scandalous magistrates are working for us, and we earnestly hope that they soon will get the reward their "work" deserves.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Our readers remember that die Gleichheit, the Austrian organ of the Social-Democratic party, edited by comrades Dr. Adler and Bretschneider, was suppressed by the authorities. A new organ has now been created, under the title of Arbeiterzeitung (Workers' Gazette), and is provisionally to appear twice a-month. The publishers are comrades Julius Popp and Rudolph Pokorny, and the responsible editor comrade L. A. Bretschneider. It is an eight-page paper of large folio size, to be entirely devoted to fostering the interests of the working classes, from the same point of view as die Gleichheit. All communications to the editor are to be sent to the following address: Arbeiterzeitung, VI, Gumpendorferstrasse 79, Vienna.

The third volume of the Volksfreund-Bibliothek (Library of the People's Friend), containing a selection of Socialist poems from various authors, has been confiscated by the police. A new edition, "expurgated" of course, has now appeared at Brünn.

The Austrian Government is again busy spoiling matters among the coal-miners on strike at Trifail in Styria. Last Sunday sixty-two miners were arrested under the pretext that they were attempting to storm the police barracks, and twenty-six others have been taken into custody for attempting to attack the fire-brigade. As the prison was not large enough to receive so many prisoners, most of them were moved to the neighbouring towns. The police is said to have acted with the utmost brutality, in the interests of law and order.

SWITZERLAND.

"Free Helvetia" seems to be in a hurry to lay herself down at Bismarck's feet. The new "attorney-general" has not yet been chosen who is to receive German briefs for the prosecution of foreign Socialists, but the secretary of the justice department, M. Tachler, has already begun to do his work. He has been dispatched to Zürich in order to institute enquiries into the doings of the national committee of the Germans in Switzerland, and its relations to the London Sozialdemokrat, and to the propaganda in Germany. Comrades Courzett, editor of the Arbeiterstimme, and Manz have been heard in evidence, and at Basel comrade Willschlegel has also come forward as a witness, or rather as a possible "culprit." When comrade Courzett entered the inquisitorial room of the Federal Secretary he was not a little astonished to find there the notorious individual Attenhofer, the Swiss agent provocateur who for years past has been Bismarck's most useful tool in his campaign against Socialism in the "free republic." REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—Held good meeting on Green on Sunday evening; speakers, S. Presburg, D. J. Nicoll, and G. Cores. While the meeting was proceeding, our protectors in blue told some of the audience who were listening to the Gospel of Discontent to clear off the pavement, taking no heed of the Gospel grinders opposite us who were preaching the Gospel of Content and completely blocking up the thoroughfare. This is "law-'n'-order" that the workers pay for by the sweat of their brow.—S. P.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting held at Latimer Road; speakers were Lyne, sen., Lyne, jun., Saint, Dean, and Tochatti; 38 Commonweal sold and 2s. 7d. collected. A poor meeting at William Street; speakers were Dean and Lyne, jun. Our comrades reconnoitred the position at Archer Street. The Methodists, thinking it all right, brought out their harmonium, but to their dismay these terrible Socialists appeared on the scene. The detectives and police then hurried them off, musical instrument and all, with black looks from the Christians. Our comrades adjourned to Cambridge Gardens and held a good meeting, although the Christians who followed us gave all the opposition they could; they sent five women. Speakers were Maughan, Lyne, sen., and Saint; 16 Commonweal sold and 10d. collected.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday, July 14th, Mrs. Lahr spoke to a large audience, taking for her subject "The Overthrow of the Bastille," and concluding with an earnest appeal to the workers to study the principles of Socialism. On Sunday, July 21st, we attended a meeting of gas stokers, where Thomas Mann gave us some idea of trade unionism. A good meeting last Sunday, when Kitz gave a report of the Paris Socialist Congress; good sale of Commonweal. At Streatham Fountain, a comrade from Bolton and F. Kitz spoke to a good audience.—S. G.

NORTH LONDON.—Meeting at Ossulston Street on Thursday was held by Nicoll and Cantwell; fair sale of Commonweal. A good meeting at Regent's Park on Sunday, addressed by the same speakers; 18 Weal sold. On Sunday afternoon at Hyde Park, meeting opened by Cantwell, followed by Brookes; fair sale of Weal.

ST. GEORGE'S EAST.—No report the last two weeks on account of organising secretary's absence. On Saturday night, Brookes addressed a meeting on Mile End Waste; Weal sold well. On Sunday morning at Leman Street, the meeting was addressed by Leech and Turner; Turner gave an account of the Paris Congress.—J. T.

ABERDEEN.—No indoor meeting held last week, Monday being the second of the tradesmen's holidays. Capital meeting at Castle Street on Saturday night, Duncan, Aiken, and Leatham speaking. Large audience kept well together for near three hours; good-humoured questions at close. Literature sold out.—L.

GLASGOW.—Mid-day: Gilbert, T. Burgoyne and Joe Burgoyne spoke on Jail Square. In the evening, Gilbert and Joe Burgoyne spoke to large and attentive audience at Paisley Road. Owing to fair holidays no meeting held last Sunday.

LEEDS.—Last Sunday morning, at 11 a.m., a meeting was held in Vicars Croft to report progress of the Leeds labourers' strike. The speakers were Sweeney, Maguire, Paylor, and Hill. On Sunday afternoon a very large meeting was held in the same place. The Rev. J. J. Byner (Congregationalist), member of the Leeds School Board, was in the chair. The speakers were R. B. Cunningham Graham, M.P., Mitchell (Bradford), Chippendale (Leeds), and others. Although rain fell very heavily the whole of the afternoon a large audience of between 3,000 and 4,000 stayed through the whole of the meeting, and when the following resolution was submitted it was carried unanimously:—"Since the private and competitive handling of the land and capital of this country has resulted in a small minority owning and enjoying the wealth produced by the toiling masses, and since the condition of the producers of wealth is growing more intolerable and precarious, we, the working men here assembled, are of opinion that it is at once desirable and expedient to organise ourselves for the purpose of establishing a more equitable state of society." Graham had a most enthusiastic reception. Many people came miles to hear him. Literature sold well.—F. C.

LEICESTER.—Good meetings on Sunday last. H. Snell (Fabian) of Nottingham, spoke on "The Royal Grants and their Relation to Socialism," at 11 a.m., and "Quack Remedies for Poverty," at 8 p.m. Rain fell all through the evening, but the large audience never flinched, and even the middle-class men hoisted their umbrellas and held their ground firmly. Sullivan occupied the chair. Collection 10s.; literature sold, 1s. 9d.—A. G.

MANCHESTER.—A meeting at New Cross was held on Friday night to call public attention to the grievances of the lower classes. On Saturday night Stockton and Barton spoke to a large audience at Middleton; 22 Weal sold. In Stevenson Square on Sunday Stockton, Ritson, and Bailie addressed a good meeting in the rain; 21 Weal sold. At Chester Road, at 8 p.m., Stockton spoke to a large meeting despite the downpour of rain. Stockton has only lately begun speaking, but promises to develop into a good speaker.

NORWICH.—During the past week meetings have been held at Thorpe, St. Mary's Plain, and Haymarket; one or two meetings not held owing to it being wet. Sunday afternoon a large meeting was held in the Market, opened by comrade W. Moore, and followed by McCormack; in the evening another good meeting held in the Market Place. At the Gordon Hall McCormack spoke upon the unemployed, Darley in the chair. Discussion followed; Poynts took part; a good audience present.

YARMOUTH.—Three good meetings held here on Sunday. The speakers were Annis, P. Reynolds in the morning; Ruffold and Reynolds afternoon and night. Brightwell and Ruffold held meeting at Bradwell in the morning.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Good meeting in Sneinton Market on Sunday morning, Proctor and Peacock speaking on the lace maker's strike. In the evening in the Great Market, Rooke presided, while Peacock gathered a large audience by speaking on "The Royal Grants." Collections during the day for new premises realised 10s., and Commonweal sold well.—P.

SHEFFIELD.—Sunday evening, July 28th, we had a very good meeting at West Bar Green. Comrade Bullas opened the proceedings with a few suitable remarks, after which comrade Sketchley addressed the audience on Royal Grants and other current questions from a Socialist standpoint. Literature sold well.—S.

THE CHATEAUX IN FLAMES.

WE are now about to deal with a subject which middle-class historians generally skip over with a few sentences, and yet it is one which might form a profitable study to any one who really desires to understand the history of the revolution. This is the revolt of the peasants, which immediately followed the fall of the Bastille.

I have already described briefly the misery which the country people suffered, a state of wretchedness mainly caused by the taxes levied by the king's government, the rents exacted by the lords, and for the tithes of the church. Most of these taxes were farmed out, that is, a rich man would pay a certain sum to the king's government, the church, or the lords, and then, in order to make his own profit, extort by means of his underlings as much from the unfortunate people as they could be compelled to pay. To wring these taxes out of the people, an army of 200,000 tax-gatherers was needed. It was also necessary to have cruel laws with the galleys, the gibbet, and the rack to back them up. Beneath the devouring march of these locusts, the country became bare and desolate, the peasants deserted their villages, land went out of cultivation, and the amount of cultivated land was yearly decreasing when the revolution broke out. It must not be imagined that the peasant was in the same position as our farm labourers; he was more like the smaller Irish tenants of the present time, working on a small farm with the assistance of his family, but ground to earth by taxes, tithes, and feudal dues. Then, again, they were bound to serve their king, the church, or their lord in the most humiliating fashion. Under the system of the corvée (forced labour) they could be ordered out to work on the roads at certain periods. In those days the roads were in a frightful condition, a quagmire of ruts and holes, and they were often forced out to slave on them, in order that the carriage of the lord, the cortège of the king, or his majesty's troops might pass with ease. To accomplish these useful services they were often obliged to go miles away from their little farms in a wet season, just when there was a chance to save their crops, and so the crops were left to rot in the falling rain. Often, too, the peasant's beasts of burden were taken from him to drag the baggage of the army, or of the lord, or the king, and the animals were frequently kept for two or three days at this task and turned loose at night by these people, who never dreamt of feeding them. What were they but the property of the common dogs, the vermin, the canaille, whom the proud noble ground like dirt beneath his heel? The game of his lordship, his deer, his hares, his rabbits, and his pigeons feasted upon the crops of the peasant, and woe unto him if even in defence of his crops he shot one of them. He could be fined in 100 livres for the first offence, 200 for the second, and be whipped and banished for five years for the third.

At this moment I might relate a little anecdote illustrating how the peasant resented this. A peasant was once asked what he and his class specially wanted. He replied, "The suppression of pigeons, rabbits, and monks." His questioner was astonished at this strange medley, and asked him what he meant. "Oh, it is very simple," replied the peasant, "the first eat the grain, the second the herbs, and the third the sheaves."

It was among the feudal rights of the nobles to harness the peasant like a beast of burden to a cart; or keep him up all night beating the ponds or marshes amid the cold damp unwholesome mists, so that the croaking of the frogs should not disturb the lord's luxurious slumbers. The lord could and did take by force the fairest women of the peasants to feed his brutal lust; and what appeal was there against his tyranny when all administration of justice was in his hands, or that of some underling of his to whom he had let it out for a consideration? Such was the damnable tyranny under which the people groaned. To read of it must explain to the densest understanding why the people of the country and town hated the lords, and what caused the "atrocities" of the Terror and the revolt which I am about to relate.

It must not be supposed that the people always bore this tyranny with calm patience. No; it provoked, as tyranny always does provoke, repeated acts of revolt on the part of the boldest of them. Many thousands preferred a life in open defiance to law and authority, to labouring like dumb beasts of burden for their lords. Others finding it useless to try to get a living upon the soil, or thrown out of work in times of crisis, wandered all over France in the troops of starving wretches with which every highway was full, gaining their bread by threats or pillage from the rich. These were frequently so numerous that the rulers of provinces declared that it was useless to arrest them, as they had no place to put them in. Thousands of poachers in bands of fifty and sixty frequented the forests and game preserves, fighting desperately if attacked by the gamekeepers or troops, and sometimes putting them to flight. The smugglers of salt, upon which there was a heavy duty, marched in strong bands, and often fought their way through the forces of the Crown who opposed their passage. Even among the peasants who still remained upon the soil, secret societies were formed known as the "Jacques." They were rude bodies of the simplest form of organisation, having no central directing body; but aided by the other insurgents they made merciless war upon the lord, destroying his crops and his game, and sometimes killing their cruel tyrant. His corpse being perhaps some morning found cold and dead in his chateau, a knife through the heart, and a piece of paper round the hilt bearing the inscription, "This is from Jacques." Or perhaps the corpse of a lord was dragged from the shrubs at the bottom of a ravine, and still in his pocket was found the tell-tale scroll, "This is from Jacques." It was the hands of these men which scattered revolutionary leaflets, pamphlets, and caricatures among the peasants, representing the king, the queen, their favourites, the farmers of the taxes, lords and ladies, as vampires and ghouls sucking the blood and devouring the flesh of the people. It was largely owing to the work of these obscure propagandists, of whom we know little or nothing, for being unlearned they wrote no memoirs, that revolutionary ideas were spread far and wide, and that the people, when riots and insurrection broke out, knew whom to attack as the cause of their misery.

Still, the more determined men, who revolted either in secret societies, or as poachers, smugglers, or brigands, as the wanderers were called, were in a decided minority. The mass of the people, as the mass of the people has always done, bore their sufferings with a stolid indifference, caring only, as one of the writers of the time declared, to eat and sleep. "The inhabitants of the country," wrote d'Argenson, "are merely poverty-stricken slaves, draft cattle under a yoke, moving on as they are goaded, caring for nothing and embarrassed by nothing, provided they can eat and sleep at regular hours." The Parisians were particularly noted for their tameness under tyranny, and our own Arthur Young, not a revolutionist by any means, remarked upon this. "I saw," says he, speaking of the furious driving of the nobles, "a poor child run over and probably killed, and have been myself many times blackened by the mud of their wheels. . . . If young noblemen in London were to drive their chaises in streets without footways, as their brethren do at Paris, they would speedily and justly get very well thrashed or rolled in the gutter." Mercier declares that a squad of police of the time could easily scatter "platoons of five or six hundred men, at first greatly excited, but melting away in a twinkling of an eye after the soldiery have distributed a few shots and handcuffed two or three of the ringleaders." We have seen within recent years something very much like this in London; but let us hope that our people will redeem their character even as the French did in the first years of their revolution.

But the suffering grew at last too keen even for these men to bear with patience. From 1725 to 1789 there is at first in every ten or twelve years a year of absolute starvation. Then a crisis comes in every five years, and from 1785 to 1789 the years of starvation become almost continuous. The misery in these hunger years can scarcely be imagined. Taine states, on the authority of official reports, that one town, Rennes, two-thirds of the inhabitants were in a state of destitution. In two districts in the wine country 35,000 people were living upon alms. In a remote canton the peasants cut the grain still green and dry it in the oven, because they are too hungry to wait. It was impossible for the meekest of mankind to bear such misery with patience. In these years the peasants collect in the market towns, and, reinforced by those outcasts of society the tramps and the poachers, they storm the granaries and carry off the wheat. These revolts are at first local, but in 1788 and '89 they break out all over France. In every province in France the grain stores are sacked, the convoys of corn are stopped on the roads and pillaged. The forests and game preserves of the lords are invaded, the game shot, trees cut down and the wood sold in open day. At the same time, rich farmers and lords are obliged by threats of sword and fire to give involuntary contributions to the relief of the poor. In the small and large towns the barriers are burnt where they collect the tolls upon food, and the toll-collector, the tax gatherer, the corn monopolist flee for their lives before a crowd maddened with hunger and desperation, and armed with clubs, pitchforks, guns, and knives.

In the midst of the noise and tumult of these emeutes, which increase in fury when the news arrives of the fall of Necker, comes the joyful tidings of the fall of the Bastille and the overturning of the royal and feudal power. Up till now it has been the news of revolt in the provinces that has excited Paris; now the news from Paris adds fire to the fury of the provinces. In all the towns of France the news of the fall of Necker and the taking of the Bastille is accompanied by refusals on the part of the people to pay taxes. The young men sack the magazines of arms, and the troops, instead of defending law-'n'-order, join with the masses in the popular revolt. The same incidents accompany each insurrection. The burning of barriers, the driving away of monopolists and tax-gatherers, and other oppressors of the people; sometimes the fixing of the price of bread. At Chalellerault, in Poitou, the people fix the price of bread at 3 sols a-pound for themselves, but allow the bakers to charge the nobles 5 sols, as they can afford it better. Thus the revolution spreads throughout France.

D. J. NICOLL.

PARIS CONGRESS.

A DELEGATE'S REPORT.

THE first proceeding after the verification of credentials was the calling over the list of delegates, most of whom answered the roll in French, German, and English. The only incident worthy of mention during this tedious process was the applause with which the names of Peter Lavroff (Russia), Cipriani (Italy), and that of Dr. Adler the Austrian delegate (now sentenced to four months' imprisonment, to be undergone upon his return), and the Danish delegation, were greeted. These last had been sent at the last moment, the Danish Social-Democrats having altered their previous intention not to participate in the Congress. Several fresh adhesions during the sittings brought up the total of delegates to 407. The English representation, consisting of 21 at the outset of the business, was increased to 24 by the arrival of J. and R. Turner and F. Charles subsequently. The proportions of the English delegation from the Socialist League were: Council of two delegates; and branches nine in all. It is worthy of remark that Greece, Norway, Bulgaria, Roumania, Finland, Portugal, and the Czechs were represented. Scotland may properly be said to have been represented by Messrs. Keir Hardie, Ayrshire Miners; Ogilvy, Scottish Labour Association; Cunninghame Graham and Halliday. These, in conjunction with our comrade Wess of the Berner Street Club, were the other elements in the delegation from Britain.

The best part of two days was wasted in a useless discussion promoted by the Italian and Flemish delegates in favour of a fusion with the other Congress, which ended as described in my fellow-delegate's (Morris's) report. The reports of various nations and trades consumed the time until Saturday morning, when the proposals in favour of international legislation, eight hours per day, regulation and inspection of factories, and other "stepping stones" were brought forward. The League delegates held a special meeting to discuss their attitude towards these proposals, and as there was a diversity of opinion as to the course we should pursue, it was left to the discretion of each delegate to vote as he pleased.

The position occupied by myself, and some others of the delegates, in regard to the question of seeking the aid of Parliament for the reduction of the hours of labour, was that it should be achieved by strikes, combination, and by custom, for the reasons given in Merlino's amendment:—

"Considering that it is dangerous to foster amongst the masses the great superstition of the century, which consists in pretending to solve the great social problems by the ballot box and Acts of Parliament; that it is on the contrary necessary to undermine and destroy the fetishes of legislation and legislators; and that the offer of labour legislation officially made by the governments has only one aim, that of rehabilitating in the eyes of the masses Parliamentaryism, now becoming utterly discredited, and to prolong its agonising life."

The reading of the reports occupied several hours, during which it was necessary to sit in a cramped position and listen to them in French and German before the English translation was reached. This made it a wearisome task, the irksomeness of which was increased by the several presidents and prominent members of the bureau, who took little or no trouble to secure order for the English translations. Many valuable portions of the reports and names of the speakers in several cases were inaudible to me on this account. Mrs. Aveling laboured hard and conscientiously at a very hard task, but had to solicit the aid of your delegates' lungs to assist her in obtaining anything like silence for her explanations. I must say, as against the French character for courtesy, that the local Parisian delegates were as a group the most discourteous in this particular, and were several times rebuked from the platform for it.

The portions of reports which I think most noteworthy are those of the Parisian Waiters, French Seamen, German Westphalian Miners, Berlin Women Workers, Swedish, Danish, and Austrian delegates. Comrade Clara Zetkin, of the Berlin Women Workers, roused the Congress to enthusiasm when she said that the capitalist had destroyed women's place at home and forced her into the market as a producer, only to widen her ideas and create another enemy who would strive with energy for the overthrow of capitalist domination. She said that little thanks were due to the men for women's awakening, for they have held that women's place was at home as a domestic slave. The women would never return to that condition; but, in opposition to the middle-class agitation for so-called Women's Rights, which simply means to put women in antagonism to men and use them as competitors in the wage-market against them, they women Socialists, disregarding the question of sex in economics, would work with men on a basis of equality for the social revolution.

Dr. Adler, Austria, in giving his report, stated that in Austria labour legislation was theoretically perfect. Regulation of factories and of child and female labour existed on paper, yet men, women, and children are overworked and the laws disregarded. In a speech full of satire he ridiculed this state of things, and said that for his participation in the tram strike of Vienna his paper, the Gleichheit, was suppressed and himself condemned to prison; that in all Austria there are only fifteen inspectors to see to the enforcement of labour laws.

The delegate of the Parisian Waiters stated that they had to work from 7 a.m. to 2 p.m., and often longer; that they often had to pay the managers of the Bureau de Placement, or place farmers, 60 fr. to 100 fr. to secure a place, and then were frequently dismissed upon the smallest pretence, the employer and the bureau sharing in the plunder of the guarantee. They were obliged to be civil to all, and even when insulted to say "Thank you." Hitherto they had been counted as of no moment, but now that they are organised every other section of industry recognised them. They were heartily in sympathy with Socialism.

The delegate of the German Miners' recited how the miners had been treated by the authorities in their late revolt, and how many had been imprisoned for simply organising; of their interview with the German Emperor, whom, by the way, he designated "the devil"; and said, in conclusion, that the upheaval had been made without Socialist influence against intolerable conditions, but henceforward the miners would work with socialistic aims.

Sweden was obliged to seek a Swede resident in Paris as her representative, because just now there are four editors of Socialist papers in prison, and exceptional laws on the German and Austrian pattern are being passed against the Socialists.

Bohemian Socialists were also under the same difficulties; no combination was allowed, and just recently in one year 340 persons were arrested on suspicion, some condemned to one year of imprisonment for a paper that had ceased to exist, some to three or four months, and only 110 acquitted after being detained weeks without trial.

The delegate of the French Seamen detailed the hardships his constituents underwent, tied up by the hands to the rigging or placed in dark cells, and overworked and half starved. He appealed to the Congress for its sympathy and aid on their behalf.

Christensen, of Denmark, gave his report, and spoke of the rapid strides the movement was making in that country, and of the persecutions to which the Socialists were subjected.

Ferroul (Deputy) asked to be allowed to speak, and having obtained permission he delivered a powerful speech against Parliamentaryism.

The English report was given upon anti-Parliamentary lines by comrade Morris, and after a deal of pressure had been exercised upon the bureau.

Keir Hardie gave us a trades' union report, at the conclusion of which he went out of his way to declare that no person in England believed in other than peaceful methods to achieve amelioration of conditions, a statement that was protested against by myself and other delegates. Hardie's speech was carefully, very carefully, translated into German by Liebknecht, who in the course of it added comments of his own to demonstrate the difference between Morris and Keir Hardie.

The subsequent sittings of the Congress were devoted to the factory legislation before mentioned, and a resolution sent in on behalf of the League by Morris was added, I believe, to the preamble of the first resolution.

I then essayed my prentice hand in the belief that the wreckage caused by competition deserve as much attention as the organised workers, and therefore sent in the following resolution:—

"The Congress recognising that the monopoly of the means of life, viz., land and instruments of production, by landlords and capitalists is the cause of poverty and degradation amongst the masses, and seeing that the mass of unemployed caused by monopoly have only the choice of either starvation wages, brutal charity, theft, or rebellion, we view with disgust and horror the hypocrisy which establishes a code of morality and honesty, buttressed by religion, and yet condemns multitudes to pauperism, prostitution, and crime; the Congress having for its aim and object the extinction of poverty by the abolition of monopoly, declares that the monopolists who enforce judicially penal law are themselves the greatest criminals, and whilst extending our sympathy to prisoner, prostitute, and pauper, made so by injustice, we strengthen our resolve to overthrow at the earliest moment the fraud called Modern Society."

Considerable trouble had to be taken to get it read to the Congress, after which it was, I believe, consigned to limbo. No attempt was made to translate it for the convenience of the delegates, nor put it upon the order of the day.

In conclusion, I must say that the Congress was disappointing from a revolutionary standpoint, badly organised, and little more than a prelude to the Governmental one about to be held upon labour legislation. Discussion upon the anti-Parliamentary and Anarchical positions was barely tolerated, and ultimately, forcibly suppressed. Let me say that as a demonstration of Internationalism broadly, and not noticing details, the Congress was a success; but my advice to English Socialists is, in view of a convocation to another one to be held in the future, to insist upon organisation, such as the printing of the order of the day, proper translations, and above all, sound revolutionary doctrines in favour of ALL and not sections of the proletariat. F. KIRZ.

HOW SHALL WE EDUCATE THE RICH?

THE deplorable ignorance of the wealthy and well-to-do people on questions of social and political economy, and the condition of the masses surrounding them, calls for a remedy. How shall we educate the rich? is a question of quite as much importance as How shall we take care of the poor? It is suggested that the working classes shall organise missionary societies and publication societies for the purpose of working among the "better classes," and teaching them at least the rudiments of social science and attract their attention toward the condition of the masses. A series of tracts or publications on the labour problem that could be comprehended by undeveloped intellects, that would gradually prepare them to receive more comprehensive instruction; the preparation of lay preachers with a genius for imparting knowledge in the A B C of economics; the establishment of Sunday and evening schools, somewhat after the style of the "sun set" club or the economic conferences, where the ignorant rich might be gathered together to recite from a catechism of political economy and social science, or where the advanced students might give them instruction,—all of these methods could be adopted with more or less good effect, but it is exceedingly doubtful whether any of them would prove to be a remedy. It is difficult to inoculate individuals whose sole object for a quarter of a century has been money-getting, with no ideas except money-getting. A man whose brains is carried around in a pocket-book or deposited in a bank vault is not the right kind of material for a movement the foundation of which is intellectual development.

It is a fact that ought to be startling to the moneybags of the country that the working man is to-day better educated and much better qualified to discuss economic or political questions than the man who employs him, and that the only difficulty in the way of a peaceful solution of the labour question is the lamentable ignorance of the rich or capitalistic class.

Miserable fallacy, that high morality and refined sentiment can grow out of harsh social relations, ignorance, and want.—George Elliot.

An editorial in the Home Journal opens thus: "The text of the little sermon we intend preaching is taken from the news column of a metropolitan journal and reads as follows: 'It was an open secret that some members of the congregation were desirous of having the pastor removed on account of his democratic disposition and inclination to be friendly with all classes, which was considered undignified.'"

THE MARSEILLAISE.

Translated by J. A. ANDREWS.

CHILDREN of freedom, rouse to action!
The day of glory now is here!
Against us Tyranny's dark faction
Their bloody battle-flag uprear!
Mark, far and wide in every region,
The raging of their furious bands—
How loved ones, next your very hands,
Fall slaughtered by their murderous legion!
To arms against the wrong!
Array your vengeful throng!
March on! march on! till tyrants' blood
Shall soak the fields along!

What cunning scheme are they propounding,
These traitors, slaves, and kings forsworn!
For whom these snares our steps surrounding?
These fetters forged for many a morn?
Comrades, for us! Oh! cursed knavery!
What burning feelings it should bring!
'Tis us these wretches dare to sing
Of forcing back in bonds of slavery!
To arms, etc.

What! shall we have the law dictated
By strangers at our own fireside?
And us, rebellious, decimated
By hireling troops, for gold that ride?
Great God! are hands in chains that languish
Our necks beneath the yoke to bend?
Shall these vile despots longer blend
Our lives and destinies with anguish?
To arms, etc.

Quake, tyrants! quake! Ye treachery-brewing,
By friends and foes alike abhorred,
Tremble! your works of foul misdoing
At last shall have their due reward!
Against you all men's hands grow strengthened—
Ay! should our youngest heroes fall,
The earth her dead to life would call,
Your term of crimes should not be lengthened!
To arms, etc.

Comrades, as generous warriors, harden
Or spare, at need, your vengeful blows:
These sorry victims deign to pardon
Who dolefully our path oppose;
But bloody despots gorged with plunder,
And traitors who betray our force,
These tigers who without remorse
Would tear their mother's breasts in sunder.
To arms, etc.

When our first-born of Freedom perish,
We too shall be upon the plain!
Their dust beneath us we shall cherish,
And there their spirits will remain!
More proud within the self-same hollow
To sleep, than to escape their grave,
We the sublimest joy shall have—
To well avenge them, or to follow!
To arms, etc.

O sacred love of home, inspire us!
Guide and sustain our righteous zeal!
Liberty, Liberty shall fire us,
And fight among us for thy weal!
Beneath our flag, see Victory glowing Where'er thy pleading accents call,
And to thy foes, the while they fall,
Thy triumph and our glory showing!
To arms, etc.

THE EIGHT HOURS QUESTION.—The working classes—those at least who know what they do want—do not want a legal declaration of the time they are to be allowed to work for a master; they want absolute freedom to work for themselves independently of all masters. If with such freedom they can satisfy their needs by working three hours, they do not want to work five more hours for a master. Nothing short of this freedom will solve the labour problem, and all eight hour restrictions are political dodges and political tinkering. They are mostly appeals by designing politicians to the ignorant members of the working class, and those who can be blinded and pacified by such reforms as their masters in Parliament care to give them. Those who desire that wage-slavery shall follow chattel-slavery into oblivion will not be blinded by any such foolery, for they know that Factory Acts and Eight Hour Bills do not touch the real issue, that they leave the real cause of industrial slavery untouched.—Australian Radical.

FEDERATION OF YORKSHIRE SOCIALISTS.—A meeting of delegates of the Yorkshire Socialist societies was held at Leeds, after the demonstration at Vicars Croft on Sunday July 28, at which the following resolutions were carried: (1) That this meeting of Yorkshire Socialists considers that the time has arrived when a federation of Yorkshire Socialists is advisable." (2) "That a secretary be appointed to carry on the work of the Federation"; and that F. Corkwell be appointed secretary. (3) "That one penny per month per member be levied for the purpose of defraying expenses incidental to the work of the Federation." (4) "That a conference of Yorkshire Socialists be held half-yearly; and that the next conference be held at the Leeds Branch, date to be near Christmas." After the conference, a resolution was passed condemning the action of the German Government in regard to the Silesian miners; and also pledging those present to collect funds for the relief of the families of the miners. Cunninghame Graham accepted the position of treasurer, to whom funds may be addressed at 13 Paternoster Row, London.—F. C.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Grand Old Parties are preparing already for their next great fight. On the one side and the other the war-drum is being vigorously beaten and all available forces are being drawn out in array. Two of the war-leaders of the younger braves have been "making palaver" during the past week, and encouraging their men for the coming battle. Prof. Stuart laid before the National Liberal Club the other night his own particular views upon the situation, and the programme which he and those who act with him have drawn up for their future guidance. Not a wildly revolutionary programme, looked at with Socialist eyes, but a very striking exemplification, nevertheless, of the way in which things are progressing.

All serious Socialists take heed—or should if they do not—of all the more important events in the political world, and have therefore, one would fain hope, already examined this speech for themselves. Also the one in which Lord Randolph Churchill, having stolen a good deal of the Liberal thunder, managed to let it off before its more legitimate owners got a chance of doing so. They do not need, therefore, that all the items of both programmes should be re-stated here; or that they should be reminded that the thunder, such as it is, came originally from a Socialist arsenal—though in the hands of its present operators it cannot be said to sound like it!

One thing, however, they may be profitably warned of, for it never fails to come upon people as a fresh surprise. That is, that as the General Election comes nearer and nearer, as the bulk of the people give themselves up to the electoral delirium, and the confusion heightens, the revolutionary movement will seem to die down amid the clamour, and remain comparatively dormant until after the elections are completed. Wholly unreal and transient as is this dying down of the movement, it has on each occasion of its recurrence been responsible for the disheartening of many good workers, and the leading astray of many half-converted enquirers.

Yet it would not be difficult, one would think, for even a cursory examination to reveal that the movement is neither dead nor sleeping, but obscured, and partly hidden from sight and hearing, by the dust and noise of the parliamentary conflict. But there are some who are always laying themselves open to the rebuke: "O, ye of little faith!"

The worst among these weak ones are not those who are disquieted only when actual peril seems to be upon them, and their comrades appear to be dull and dilatory in the face of it. Far more mischievous are those who scent imaginary dangers afar off and who curse and wail in chorus over the probability of either Radical or Tory going in for "palliative measures" and so "retarding the Revolution." This ignorant and cowardly cry is now being raised over the "new Liberal" proposals, and the "new Tory" adaptation of them. One would think that the Revolution was a delicate mechanical construction on a special plan, which a profane hand might wreck or turn aside, instead of what it is, a mighty universal movement, undivided and resistless, taking a myriad shapes and working in a myriad ways, but all in one direction and to one end.

Last week the Deputy Coroner for Westminster held an enquiry into the death of a coach-painter, who had been found dead in bed:

"The doctor who made a post-mortem examination stated that the man died in a small back kitchen, amid the filthiest surroundings he had ever seen. The walls were wet, and in fact the place was utterly unfit for human habitation. Just outside the window, and within a space of about half the size of the table the jury were sitting round, were a water-closet, a dust-hole, and the water supply for drinking purposes. The room ought certainly never to have been occupied. The deceased's body and the apartment itself were in such a horribly neglected condition that witness's clothing was affected. The room, which measured 10 ft. or 12 ft., was so dark that when he entered he almost trod on the corpse."

That is one case out of—how many? There are thousands upon thousands of such cases which never come to light, not in London alone, but in every city in the civilised world. There is also the teeming misery that is only not quite so horrible in its degree, but is infinitely more terrible in its extent. The utmost effort of the good people who seek to palliate such a system as that which produces these things can achieve little of that which they aim at; but it can do much else of which some of them never dream.

Whatever is done or attempted to be done in any direction by any one on behalf of the proletariat is of good effect, though in a far other direction often times than that intended. It is for us to keep steadily on with our educational work, so that when anything shall be done by the proletariat on its own behalf it shall be done well and once for all. To fully carry out our work requires that we expose from time to time the futility of tinkering with a time-worn and outgrown system. It does not require that we regard those who disagree with us as deadly enemies, and waste our time and energy in opposition and abuse. Better work, our own work, has the first claim upon us, needs all our strength, and we can only neglect it at our peril.

That sinister organ of the bourgeoisie, the Daily Telegraph, in a recent article anent the closing of Millbank Prison, styled its inmates "felonious drones." Its columns have been filled for days with lists of the presents given and received by persons who have never done a day's useful work in their lives, the occasion being the marriage of a pair of drones from among what Lord John Russell once in a lucid moment termed the felonious classes.

The same journal has made the "Weeds of Whitechapel" the subject of an essay, wherein the poor are sternly censured for early marriages and the begetting of children they are unable to support. In its other portions it strongly supports the demand for additional royal grants, and thereby sustains the position taken up by Boycott Smith in the House—that the Prince of Wales is under no obligation to support his own family. So the semitic patriot of Fleet Street censures the "weeds" and applauds royalty for exactly the same thing, viz., casting their burdens upon the community. Levy should try, at least, to be consistent.

There is a movement on foot by Tory-Democrats to ameliorate, by shortening the hours of labour, housing of the poor, etc., the conditions of town workmen. Lord R. Churchill's speech is a straw in that direction. Like some people who wave the red flag, he would "house the people in great buildings suitable to the class who would inhabit them," somewhat on the principle that well-fed cattle provide the best meat. They would round off the acute corners of the present system and make it tolerable with a view to its preservation. Socialists who are not concerned about that may think that the people, instead of being herded in parish-built barracks, would be better settled as free Communists, say, for instance, upon the Marlborough or Salisbury estates. The quarrel between land-robbler and capitalist dates from the rise of the middle class into power at the expense of the feudal aristocracy. Working folk who desire complete emancipation, and not to be slaves, however well fed, will, whilst taking all that may be thrown to them by the contending parties, not forget the cause of the quarrel, nor neglect to prosecute their object, the overthrow of both landlord and capitalist. When will the Labour Elector vary the monotony of its attacks upon Liberal capitalists by some facts and figures relating to the Tory landed aristocracy?

CHARITY.

It is a saying of Carlyle's, that no institution or custom can pass away from mankind until they have sucked from it all the experience, however sweet or bitter, it can yield. Is it not time, then, that Christian Charity be overhauled, its nature analysed, and all the lessons learnt that it can teach? When Socialism shall be established the noise of the singing of jingling hymns will cease; the smooth pictures labelled "Charity" in our galleries will have lost the sentiment that makes beholders say "How pretty!"; and future annotators of Shakespeare's plays, reading the line "Give me a little earth for charity," will make learned notes on the then forgotten custom of "eating dirt" before rich and charitable patrons, so prevalent in this great era of flunkeys.

Never were there such opportunities as now for the study of this virtue since the time of the Apostle Paul, who discovered it and catalogued its merits. Had he but lived in our day, how many a seeming paradox he might have explained away by examples drawn from the rich and noble among us! What class before has understood so well, and so well acted up to, the dictum that "Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, it profiteth me nothing"? The wealthy, desiring above all things profit, seldom give, but prefer to lend their goods to the poor; thereby combining charity with five per cent., and winning the sweet consciousness of lending unto the Lord.

"Charity endureth all things," saith the apostle; and so in truth do the professors of Christian charity to-day. The poverty of the working classes, and all the misery and degradation that follow in its track in this world (not to mention the next),—this the wealthy know; yet, spite of their sorrow and lamentation, endure; doubtless because they find their acts of charity, like Epps's cocoa, "grateful and comforting" to their souls. For, "believing all things" (as St. Paul says charity does), they even believe that their state shall endure for ever, and that as there always have been, so there always will be, rich and poor, in order that the former may be charitable to the latter. And truly, were it otherwise, how could a rich man enter the kingdom of heaven? Happily, the presence of their poorer brethren enables the wealthy to solve that difficult problem; and not alone their occasional alms-giving, but much more their "kindness" (another attribute of charity) in allowing the poor to work for them, opens to them the gates of the golden city; and of the seed sown on the good ground of the proletariat, they reap an hundred-fold.

"Charity hopeth all things." "Charity covereth a multitude of sins." Yea, has it not, for the time, covered the sins of the greedy, grudging people, and led our gracious Queen herself to "hope" that her loyal Commons will bestow upon her royal grandchildren the wherewithal to practice this glorious virtue? Surely the loyal Commons will grant her request, knowing how much more blessed it is to give than to receive. And surely, too, will she "endure" with all long-suffering, if she but gain her desire, the attacks of those Radical journals, such as that halfpenny Star, who laugh and sneer, who call her children paupers, and print cartoons with scurrilous text, making her out to be herself an object of charity.

A few days ago I heard a pretty thing about a little bee, and as it may contain a valuable moral for such uncharitable persons, I will repeat it; the more gladly, since it does not for once introduce that unhappy simile about the working bees and the drones, wherein the discontented find so much delight. A good spinster lady was relating in my hearing a sermon she had heard, in which the preacher spoke of charity. In Rome, he said, there was a beautiful picture having the name of that virtue for its title. It represented a boy holding in his fingers a poor bee that had lost its wings, and this good child was trying to feed it with some honey. So touching an incident! For, of course, such a kind little boy could not be suspected of having first divested the poor insect of its wings. I grieve to say that I heard this possibility suggested, surely by some person who had forgotten that "charity believeth all things;" and a wicked Socialist who was present muttered (but under his breath) that, had the youth done so, the picture would have exactly represented the modern charity, which grips the worker tight, deprives him of the means of getting his own living, and then feeds him with the stolen produce of the labour of other workers. But he dared not say it aloud, and as the base suggestion of cruelty was repudiated the little tale retained its innocent charm; and I came to the conclusion that until the lesson of that beautiful picture is understood of the people, charity, even as St. Paul says, will indeed never fail, but will endure as a living custom to demonstrate the truth of Carlyle's philosophy. G. STURT.

PATRIOTISM.—The editor of the Chicago Knights of Labour comments as under on a matter referred in a recent note of ours:—

"We have received what purports to be a protest by the 'British American Association of Boston' against the appointment of Patrick Egan as Minister to Chili. We don't know anything about Mr. Egan, except that he is an enthusiastic Irishman. He may or may not be a fit person for the place, but we think if these British American, Irish American, German American, Scandinavian American, Canadian American, Hebrew American, and all other American Associations with a foreign prefix, were absorbed by a genuine United States American Association the country would be fully as well off. No man can serve two masters, and as long as the members of these various associations with foreign names acknowledge a fealty to foreign countries they have no right to ask for any of the privileges of American Citizenship."

We go further, and say that they have no right to be considered anything else than reactionary nincompoops. While they are quarrelling over who they are, the capitalist is settling what they are, and what they shall be, too, until they get a little more sense

IN A CATHEDRAL.

SUBLIME yet simple, delicate yet vast,
O flower of faith! what mastery had they
That wrought this miracle! what power to pray
Possessed the congregations of the past!
Yet now, more dread than armed iconoclast,
Or ever-gnawing tooth of slow decay,
Despair and doubt like spectres here display
A cold and empty sepulchre at last.

Will worshippers again be gathered here
In that new world wherewith time travaileth?
How will their hearts, grown strong and free from fear,
Confront the mysteries of life and death?
No man may prophesy; but this is clear—
There must be union, and there must be faith.

REGINALD A. BECKETT.

NOTES ON THE LEEDS LABOURERS' STRIKE.

THE builder's labourers in Leeds were getting 6d. an hour for their labour some few years ago. At that time they had a Union, which they foolishly allowed to collapse. No sooner had their Society ceased to exist than the masters struck a halfpenny per hour off the men's wages. This, however, failed to unite them together again, and in a little while another halfpenny deduction was effected.

About five weeks since some labourers, who met in Vicar's Croft, were discussing their grievances rather aimlessly when comrades Sweeney and Paylor, who happened to be present, took the matter up and urged the men to form a Union. It was then and there agreed to call a general meeting on the following Sunday. This was done, and our branch took the affair in hand. Our speakers exhorted the men to combine, and so favourably was the advice received that in the afternoon a meeting was held at our branch rooms, where a committee was elected, which had scarcely sat once when it decided to strike for a halfpenny per hour advance. A general meeting of the men was called, at which the committee's decision was unanimously and unhesitatingly agreed to.

The strike has now (Monday) reached the fifth week, and those still out are determined. Scarcely a day has passed since the commencement of the struggle without some employers sending in notes of surrender. A number of large contractors are holding out stubbornly, but no more stubbornly than are the men. Every day large numbers of the strikers meet at our rooms to arrange "pickets," and look to the general work of the Union. Occasionally a drove of black sheep (mostly strangers) are brought off a job to the great rejoicing of the faithful. The bearing of the men is excellent. Assiduous collecting and levies on those who have got the advance are working wonders. Last week £100 was paid to the strikers, and this week as much more will be needed. There are now about 150 men on strike, and we know that the few masters who have refused to give the advance must either give way soon or throw up their contracts.

Such is the present position of the strike. The resolute attitude of the men from the first, the comparative absence of "scabs," and the successful conducting of the struggle have won the admiration of skilled workmen, whose unions, though generations old, have never carried through so unanimous and uncompromising a strike.

Meantime, the builders of Leeds must be sitting on thorns and brambles. Leeds grows apace. Houses seem to shoot up like mushrooms, and one day (not a distant day) they will as suddenly tumble about the ears of their inhabitants if the big winds of the North are in anything like usual form. Labour is cheap, and materials too are cheap; cheap as dirt, for that is precisely what they are. The dredgings of the filthiest river in creation are used by these model builders for artisan's dwellings. Condemned hovels are reduced to a rubbish heap, and thrifty Jeremiah makes himself a profit by converting this unwholesome refuse into mortar for brick-sticking.

While these typhoid-traps have been elaborately and extensively laid out, rents have consistently maintained their high reputation. Property has sold well, and contracts for buildings are at present plentiful enough to keep the builders of Leeds busy for two years. The longer, therefore, these large contractors hold out against the men the worse it must be for them in the end. T. M.

CHICAGO FACTORY-HANDS.—A recent canvass by the factory inspectors of Chicago, Ills., showed that there are 28,077 concerns in that city employing 244,038 in industrial lines. Of these 199,100 are males, 44,938 females, 2,040 boys, and 762 girls.—C.

THAT NEVER LET UP.—While there are hundreds of passive labour reformers in each craft—men who give a tacit acquiescence to union principles, pay dues, and attend meetings—yet the active workers, those who keep the spirit of organisation alive, do the thinking and planning and hustling—these, as you know, can be counted with a very few figures. I suppose this is equally true of fraternal, benevolent, and other organisations; yet where a man's bread and butter is concerned one would naturally expect something different. Now, many of these active workers are less able to do what they are doing than many of their associates. Then, why do they give time and often money to a cause where they are reasonably certain to get more kicks than pennies, not only from the outside world, but from those they are trying to serve? To tell you frankly, I don't know, and I don't believe they know themselves. There are probably a hundred who contribute the motive power of the labour movement in Boston. I think I have heard five of them say, in effect, "I'm going to let up on this business. I can't afford it. Let somebody else do some work" But they never do let up. He has enlisted for life, and in spite of his grumbling you find him in harness year after year. His labour reform ideas have become, at least, a part of his religion, and he tugs away, caring less and less as time goes by what people say or think about it.—Boston Labour Leader.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Tram Slaves.

The Union appears to be running on the lines it has chalked out for itself, the gaining of some slight concessions from the managers and directors of the various companies. Mr. Gayner, the manager of the West Metropolitan, has dropped his old practices. The men are no longer to have the secret spy dogging their footsteps as a prelude to their dismissal if they should happen to belong to the Union. Nay, in an interview with the secretary of the Union the other day, this worthy manager professed himself quite shocked to hear that there were some men who had worked for 14 hours a day without any relief; he was in no way opposed to the Union, had no objection to engaging Union men; he would see whether the hours of the men could be improved, and would consider the question of reinstating discharged men. Public exposure in the pillory of the Star, which has fought the battle of these men with vigour and courage, has evidently brought Mr. Gayner to his senses.

The men employed upon the Woolwich and South-Eastern Tramway Company have been given something better than promises. The drivers and conductors have gained an increase of 1s. 6d. a week each, and the horse-keepers 1s. a week.

Reduced Dividends of Tramway Shareholders.

The shareholders of the London Street Tramway Co., noted for the usual bad treatment of its employes, are intensely dissatisfied at the lowness of their dividends. According to the Star, one gentleman wanted to know what they meant by the reduction of dividend from 9 and 10 per cent. to 5. Another hinted that the directors were providing their relations with comfortable little jobs in the company. We are glad to hear their dividends are going down; and if the public will only mark their sense of their treatment of their unfortunate men by leaving their cars severely alone, they may disappear altogether.

Poor Mr. Shipton!

Mr. Shipton has come another cropper. The Leather Workers' Society at its quarterly general meeting, has repudiated and condemned the action of the Committee of the London Trades' Council in their attempt to bolster up Shipton over the Sugar Bounties question. Though the terms of the resolution were only directed at the Committee of the London Trades' Council, yet, as the seconder of the resolution was careful to explain, "it was Shipton that was really aimed at." The resolution was carried unanimously amid enthusiastic applause. In the course of the proceedings, a delegate asked why Mr. Shipton did not take proceedings against those that had impugned his honesty? The reply was that Mr. Shipton had said that he would consider the matter. "He'd better stick to considering!" was the rough and unkind response of another delegate. It is clear that Shipton, like Broadhurst, is doomed. The sad fate of these poor people should serve as an awful example to others who in future may be inclined to follow their example in exploiting the workers for those colossal frauds, the Liberal and Tory parties.

The Eight Hours Question.

The writer of the notes which appeared in our political contemporary the Labour Elector should give himself pause, and reflect upon the old adage re glass houses. In a reference to the comments which appeared in the Commonweal of 27th July, he asks if the writer of the comments, D. J. Nicoll, ever worked as a factory hand for 9½ hours per day. It is quite true that I have not done so. Is it to be understood that no one who is not actually a factory worker is to be allowed to express opinions upon labour questions? If so, what position do Messrs. Champion and Maltman Barry occupy?

Cowards and Traitors.

The Labour Tribune says: "There has been a dispute in the cogging mill of the Parkgate Steel Works, the furnace men refusing to work at the price given. They all gave notice, which terminated on Saturday last. I understand that two of the men, who are now unionists, offered to do the work of four men at the same price." Traitors like these who sell their own class should be made an example of. They want kicking, and kicking hard.

Derbyshire Miners.

Although, as I said last week, the men are very disorganised in this district, yet the tyranny of the mine-owner is beginning to have the effect of driving the men into rebellion. They are finding out, that although they have to some extent shared in the advance gained by the Union miners, yet they are constantly being cheated out of their small advantages. The fine gentlemen managers refuse to treat with or recognise the Union. At the Swanwich (Monwood's) Collieries, the men received an advance of a ½d. a ton, owing to the Union secretary, Mr. Haslam, writing to the manager; but the manager never condescended to answer the letter. At the same collieries the men also assert that although the masters pretended to grant the advance demanded, yet it has never been put on anything but coal-getting. Another grievance is that the men are now compelled to make two refuge holes for the price paid for one previous to the New Mines Act, 1887. Similar complaints come from other collieries, and it is not surprising to hear that the spirit of revolt is spreading among these oppressed and downtrodden men.

Slave-driving on the Channel Steamers.

On the Channel steamer "Brittany," plying between Newhaven and Dieppe, which recently sustained an accident and drifted for hours in mid-Channel, the seamen worked forty-six hours at a stretch. On the "Normandie" in the same service, twenty-one hours has been quite common, no extra remuneration being given. Quite naturally, the men, having so little use for their bunks, make a little by letting them to the third-class passengers. It was a pitiful sight to see the seamen striving to get a few moments' sleep as they sat or leaned about. The Seamen's Union should bestow some little attention on this portion of the coast.—F. K.

Strike of Carters at Glasgow.

Three thousand Glasgow carters are out upon strike. Their wages have been at 24s. a-week, and they ask that they shall be raised to 26s., demanding also that they shall be paid for overtime after six o'clock at night. While a meeting was being held on the Infirmary Square, the drivers of a number of lorries down the High Street were hooted, and in one or two cases attempts were made to loosen the harness. The fight promises to be a hot one.

THE DURHAM MINERS have decided by a majority of one to accept the masters' offer of 10 per cent. advance. The threatened strike is thus averted.

WAGES IN THE BUILDING TRADE.—These are said to be the "fair" wages of the different workmen employed in the London building trade: Bricklayers, 9½d. and 9d. per hour; carpenters, 9d.; scaffolders, 6½d. and 6d.; navvies, 6d.; bricklayers' labourers, 5½d. What are the "unfair"?

THE STRIKE IN SOMERSET.—The Somersetshire men have been well supported throughout England and Wales. This has rather astonished the employers, who have made an offer of an advance of 5 per cent. on the 2nd of September and a further advance of 5 per cent. when the price of coal goes up again.

STRIKE IN THE FLAX-SPINNING TRADE.—The machine-boys in the employment of Messrs. Robert Stewart and Son, flax-spinners, have struck for an increase of wage. 40 men engaged in the drawing department have thrown in their lot with the boys and as the trade is now brisk, it is expected that the demand of the strikers will be conceded.

BOYCOTTED BUTCHERS.—At Murton, a northern mining village, the butchers have been boycotted by the miners' wives. The women held a meeting, at which the rapacity of these dealers in flesh was strongly denounced, and it was generally resolved to boycott any butcher who wanted more than eightpence a-pound for prime joints. The women have appointed pickets to wait upon the butchers' carts as they enter the place, and they have determined to boycott any woman who bought meat till prices were reduced. It is evident that butchers will have to cheapen their meat or lose popular custom. We recommend the example of the Murton women to their sisters in country or town. The poor could help themselves considerably in this way.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

La Révolte publishes a letter of Spanish Anarchist groups, dated Barcelona, July 19, in which an international Anarchist conference is proposed to be held at Paris, Salle Florel, on the first Sunday in September. The Anarchists of Paris have agreed to this proposal.

Comrade Tortelier was arrested in Paris just a day or two before the opening of both Congresses. He had been sentenced to a month's imprisonment, and the police chose this moment, of course, to hinder that Anarchist propaganda should be made at the Congresses. It need hardly be said that this was done, notwithstanding Tortelier's forced absence, by comrades Montant, Faure, Merlino, and others.

Le Socialiste of Montluçon is now replaced by a new paper, Le Travailleur (the Worker) published at Montluçon and Commentry since 14th July. This new "Republican Socialist" organ, as it is called, contains a curious mixture of opinions. Marxists and Blanquists are quoted as contributors. The leading article, signed by J. Guesde, concludes, "You are all . . . only a parliament of murderers," but the bulk of the rest of the paper is filled with a "Chronicle of Electioneering," "Our Candidates," etc.!

SWITZERLAND.

This "free" country is degrading more and more, and although we resent the impudence of the oppression exercised on her by Germany and other countries, it is not possible to be in sympathy with a country which wants to paralyse the most reactionary assaults by acting still more reactionary quite on her own behalf. Thus again the French Anarchists Niquet, Phillipot, Bordat, and several Russian refugees have been expelled from Geneva. The Government of Geneva is reported to have resolved to refuse the permission to reside at Geneva to all Russians who are not in possession of official passports, etc. Also the Federal Council of Berne is now considering a new extradition treaty with Austria, by which the extradition of political "criminals" would practically be handed over to the arbitrary of the Swiss authorities in every single case. We read of meetings of protest and of the intention to submit the question of the new Federal procuratorship to the direct vote of the people, but nobody expects any results from this.

SWEDEN.

On June 29 J. M. Engstrom, one of the founders of the Stockholm Social-Democratic Club, and one of the first pioneers of Social-Democracy in Sweden, died at Stockholm.

It has been resolved recently that Social-Demokraten of Stockholm (formerly bi-weekly, now a weekly paper) shall be published daily from Dec. 1. Also Arbetet of Malmo (now published thrice a-week) prepares a daily edition. The Swedish movement is hardly ten years old; it has, however, scarcely left the limits of a suffrage agitation and of trades-unionism, which, together with the economic conditions as shown by the recent strikes, the Government prosecutions (the editors of all the four papers are now in prison), and the weak character of Social-Democracy there (see the resolutions of the Stockholm Conference of 1889), explains the rapid numerical growth of the party there. Daily Social-Democratic papers, by the way, are now published in France, Belgium, Netherlands, Germany, Denmark, and the United States.

RUSSIA.

In Arbetet we read, without a reliable source being given, that Tchernyshevski has now been pardoned altogether and allowed to live at Saratow, where he chose to go to. If this is true at all, it opens a sad prospect as to the present state of this once so brilliant writer and Socialist; for nobody ever heard of any act of "grace" of the Czar, and thus we must assume that he has been so ruined during his twenty-five years' imprisonment and banishment that the Czar is no more afraid of him. Recently a report on a real butchery done to political prisoners in Takutsk, Siberia, was published in Svobodnaya Rossija of Geneva, and ought to be translated into English.

REPORTS.

LONDON OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.—Hoxton Church—Thursday night a large meeting held, Cores and Mowbray speaking; 7 Weal sold. Gibraltar Walk—Friday night a good meeting, Cores and Mowbray speaking; 13 Commonweal sold. Mile End Waste—On Saturday, Mowbray, Cores, and Hicks addressed large meeting; 21 Commonweal sold. Leman Street—Sunday morning, Mowbray spoke to good meeting; 13 Commonweal sold.

CLERKENWELL.—Sunday evening on the Green, Mrs. Lahr, Cores, and Mowbray addressed good meeting; fairly good sale of Commonweal, and 1s. 11d. collected for propaganda.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday morning, F. Kitz addressed a good audience, giving illustrations of Paris life; 4s. 2d. collected for one of our comrades, who is now undergoing one month's hard labour for refusing to obey the order of an Irish policeman; good sale of Commonweal.—S. G.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held a good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were Dean, Saint, Lyne, sen., and Lyne, jun.; 34 Commonweal sold. Our meeting was held at St. Ann's Road instead of William Street; speakers were Maughan and Dean; choir sang. A fine meeting was held at Cambridge Gardens; speakers were Dean, Maughan, Saint, Lyne, sen., and Crouch; 13 Commonweal sold, and 1s. 4d. collected. We sent a scouting party to Archer Street but the Methodists never turned out, and I may state that the answer given to Graham's question in the House of Commons by the Home Secretary was far from correct. It seems that any excuse is good enough for them.

NORTH LONDON.—Good meeting at Hyde Park on Saturday; speakers were Cantwell, Nicoll, Mrs. Lahr, and Miss Robertson (S.D.F.); warm discussion was initiated by some members of the Irish National League concerning the action of Irish members on the royal grants. A fair meeting on Sunday morning at Regent's Park; Nicoll and Cantwell spoke. Also good meeting in Hyde Park on Sunday afternoon, addressed by Nicoll, Cantwell, and Mrs. Lahr; Weal sold well.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 29th, Kropotkin's "Appeal to the Young" was read and discussed. At Castle Street on Saturday night, Duncan and Leatham addressed a fine meeting; questions at close and good sale of literature. On Sunday night same speakers addressed a meeting in same place.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at 2 o'clock, Joe Burgoyne and Glasier addressed a good audience on Green. At 5.30, Glasier and Gilbert spoke at Paisley Road Toll to a large crowd. At the conclusion Glasier was "heckled" by two persons, both of whom professed sympathy with "some of our principles"; one objected to our comrade denouncing Christians and clerics as mostly hypocrites and thieves, and advised Socialists that the first thing to be done is to burn down all the publichouses! His companion objected to become a Socialist because of some bloodthirsty Anarchist speeches, which he said had recently been delivered in London. Our comrade's replies met with the approval of the audience. We omitted to state in our report of last week that comrade Andreas Scheu—who was here on business—met a number of our members in the committee room and gave a stirring address.

LEEDS.—Two fine meetings last Sunday in Vicar's Croft. In the morning at 11 a.m. we had a meeting to jubilate over the complete victory of the labourers lately on strike, and to advise the men to stick to their Union for the purpose of still further ameliorating their condition. In the evening another meeting was held in the same place, when Maguire gave an excellent address on the "Principles of Socialism," assisted by Paylor, Corkwell, Sweeny, and Hill.—F. C.

LEICESTER.—On Sunday morning, Barclay spoke on "Socialism: what, why, how?" In the evening, "Definitions of Socialism, and comments on them," Hyndman, Joynes, Prof. Ely, Annie Besant, and J. S. Mill, etc., were cited. There was a lengthy discussion; literature sold, 2s. 1d.—A. G.

MANCHESTER.—The tram strike, in which we were taking an active part, has for the present come to an end by the directors of the company granting the men's request. We had called a meeting for Sunday to urge the boycotting of the tram company unless the men were better treated. But as the movement has practically collapsed, we held in Stevenson Square on Sunday a large Socialist demonstration, Prince, Baillie, and Parkinson speaking to an enthusiastic meeting. 40 Commonweal sold, and 2s. 1d. collected. On Sunday night Strange and Stockton addressed a meeting on Chester Road. At Middleton on Saturday night Baillie and Stockton spoke to a fair audience; 20 Commonweal sold. We have been assisting the cap-makers—men, women, and girls—to form a union, which is very much needed in this industry, where sweating is the order of the day. Baillie and Strange have spoken at two meetings, urging on them the necessity of organisation and showing how to do so; the work is now progressing favourably.

NORWICH.—On Wednesday a large meeting was held at St. Faiths, where Poynts, McCormack, and Darley spoke. Saturday evening a good meeting held on the Haymarket; slight opposition from a religious friend. Sunday morning McCormack spoke at North Walsham; in the afternoon a large meeting was held in the Market Place; McCormack opened, followed by J. Turner (London), who delivered a capital address. In the evening another good meeting held in the Market; audience very attentive; good sale of literature.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—In Sneinton Market on Sunday morning Peacock and Proctor spoke; collection for Club funds realised 2s. 6d. In the evening, in Great Market, Rooke presided; Peacock, Whalley, and Proctor spoke to large audience; 3s. 11d. collected for School Board fund.—P.

YARMOUTH AND CHELSEA.—Reports arrived too late through misdirection. Please send them to Editor in future.

Joseph Waddington writes and complains, as the mover of the amendment at the demonstration at Stevenson, reported in our issue of July 20, that the report is incorrect re his amendment, as the amendment was never put by the chairman to the meeting.

TRIAL BY JUDGE v. TRIAL BY JURY.

THE Maybrick case, of which we have been hearing so much, does not differ in essence from most other trials for murder. A man is killed; there is a certain amount of presumptive evidence against such and such a person; a coroner's jury find that this person is guilty of the murder. The presumptive evidence is after long delay brought before the Criminal Court; which delay, be it remarked, tends very much to increase the difficulty in getting at the truth, as lies and falsities have time to grow round the original kernel of fact, and make a regular problems for the solution of the professional dealers with other persons' misdoings—the lawyers and judge. In the Criminal Court the game begins. Each side has its theory for accounting for a series of events which are supposed to have taken place, and tries to establish that theory by the piecing together of details, the cross-examination of witnesses, and so on. It must be said that in this game the defence, which has to prove a negative, is necessarily very much weaker than the prosecution.

Next, the theory on either side being complete, it is in practice submitted to the judgment of one man, the judge, who is of course a thoroughly practised and skilful lawyer, drilled into a knowledge of what is called the "law of evidence"—i.e., a series of maxims, more or less arbitrary, as such theories must be, as to the credibility of statements of events more than half forgotten, misunderstood by the witnesses at the time they happened, confused by hearsay, corrupted by prejudice—in a word, mostly lies. This one man, the judge, may be a treasure of impartiality, though he is not likely to be, since he is a successful advocate, and therefore must have been in the habit of wresting appearances towards the side that he was conventionally interested in, however they might have showed to his real self. But, however impartial he may be, it is not in the nature of man for a person not to take sides in a dispute which he is obliged to listen to, and considering his official position, the side that this person is most likely to take is the official one—i.e., that of the prosecution.

In theory, however (as we all know), it is the jury and not the judge who have to make the final decision of the case,—but in theory only. For the jury are of necessity men of average intelligence, taken from the middle class; and they are in consequence deeply imbued with the middle-class prejudices of the day. Now the present-day middle-class theory of the jury has mistaken the function of the jury, and assumes that its business is, not to judge the case, as it was originally meant to do, but to correct any gross mistakes or partiality in the judge; to be, in short, a kind of censorship on the judge, and therein to represent the public generally. This being the case, as a matter of fact the jury almost always take their verdict from the judge's summing-up, and it is rare indeed that those who are watching a case need trouble themselves about the jury's decision when they have heard or read the judge's summing-up—unless, indeed, he is really puzzled over the matter, in which case, having no opinion, he kindly allows the jury to have one.

And now in the midst of this intricate game which is being played for the life or death of a fellow citizen, there is one person who is out of it all, and can only watch what is going on; and that person is the one who is principally interested. The mouth of the accused is shut until the decision is given. Whatever misunderstandings, falsifications, or wrong deductions take place must pass without challenge from his personality, although it is obvious that often a few words from the accused might explain the matter, and give a new course to the evidence either for or against.

In short, in an English Criminal Court sides are taken for and against the silent onlooking accused (who, in spite of all theories to the contrary, is always looked on as guilty from the first). The judge decides which of those two sides has the preponderating weight of evidence, and the jury formally ratifies his decision, unless it is so monstrously unfair that they are compelled to protest by expressing their own opinion. The "criminal" either "escapes" or is convicted and slaughtered; our "cultivated classes" bless their stars they are not living in days of violence, and those of the working classes who are not Socialists at heart echo their cant in various degrees of un-cultivation, however miserably they may be living.

For the rest, this is that "average" justice which is in complete harmony with the commercialism of the age, which declines to supply the public with anything choice; it is, like all machine-work, a make-shift. Such make-shifts people put up with without grumbling for a long time; but at last when some dramatic demonstration of their futility is given, when the shoe-sole comes off in the middle of a muddy road, or the hat melts in a heavy shower, they get angry, and express their anger—in a futile way indeed, because they are the slaves of the machine which they grumble at.

That we would fain hope, is the explanation of the popular ebullition of temper at Liverpool the other day; the people there were at last struck by the obvious unfairness of the whole proceeding, of the farce which thus trifles with the lives and liberties of the citizens. At all events they directed the expression of their anger rightly this time. The judge and his summing-up is the real centre of the whole iniquity. That is the head and front of the attack on Trial by Jury, which, as long as it was a reality, was a true defence of the liberties of the people.

That is the interest the Maybrick case has to us Socialists. The case itself was a wretched one, a mere exemplification of the unhappiness which springs from the corruption of a Society founded on robbery; an unhappiness which so often avenges the wrongs of the poor on those whose iniquitous position puts them beyond the reach of the special misery which they inflict on so many millions of people, as good as or better than themselves. Yet, indeed, it must be said once more that Mrs. Maybrick's "immorality" weighed heavily against her, helped the judge to get the conviction, and that if people are to be hanged for making mistakes in married life, there will be a large mortality amongst the upper and middle classes:

The remarks in the capitalistic papers on this case, a great part of which amount to a defence of the present system of dealing with circumstantial evidence in criminal cases, are curious, but are too numerous to go through. One, however, must be noticed, because it is the argument most often and most plausibly used. It is admitted, say these wisecracks, that this was a case of doubt; but in the teeth of the maxim that the jury should give the benefit of the doubt to the accused, if this were done, almost no criminal could be convicted, as all evidence is circumstantial, and in almost every case there is doubt

What does this amount to but this? That so beautifully constructed is the machine of criminal law, that it gives us two overwhelming risks, either of the escape of the guilty, or the condemnation of the innocent. Unhappily, it is not doubtful which risk our Society will take hardened as it is by the daily and hourly practice of wrong against so many people.

In effect, it is a ghastly thing to note so many respectable persons sitting safe at home in luxury so convinced of the necessity for hanging some one, either the right or the wrong person, if a "crime" is committed. How strange that persons not ill-natured, not specially stupid, should think it above all things necessary that a private murder should be remedied by a public one.

As to the Court of Appeal which is in every one's mouth at present, it would be a feeble protection against injustice; and if, as I suppose, it were to be a court of professional judges, it would tend to a further weakening of what is left of the jury system, and so do more harm than good.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

In the midst of a delirium of joyful excitement there is always a chance of sudden relapse into gloomy terror, all the heavier and more overwhelming on account of its lack of reason. Especially is this noticeable in times of great public excitement, such as a period of revolution must necessarily be. Men's imaginations are exalted. They have seen so many extraordinary things, that nothing which could happen will astonish them. We know during a disturbed period like that of the last few years how far rumour exceeds the reality. So it was in France in 1789. These riots, these revolts astonished the respectable middle-class person; he could not understand them at all. For the wild, starving people did not confine their attention to aristocrats, but attacked the houses and the stores of the rich in general. It was clear that these were not revolutionists of the middle-class pattern; these daring men—the poachers, the smugglers, and the vagrants who were foremost in the fray—were not likely to spare even middle-class property. So there is great fear in the hearts of the respectable. They dread the houseless wanderers who, with fierce faces, matted hair, and wild eyes, in which hope now gleams out, are marching along every highway in troops of twenty or twenty-five, and are gathering intent on pillage and destruction in every market place and every town. Rumour multiplies them from tens and twenties into thousands. Travellers gallop into every town, having caught a glimpse of them or heard of them, with intelligence that "the brigands are coming," and straightway the whole town flies to arms. A middle-class militia, afterwards known as a National Guard, is formed. From the towns the rumour spreads to the country. The peasants seize what weapons they have; they tear over the highways in search of the mysterious insurgents who are declared to be advancing. Filled as they are with wild excitement, they are often mistaken by other bands of peasants for brigands, and with difficulty a conflict between them is prevented. This rumour travels to the remotest regions, and in a few days the whole of France flashes with bayonets.

But brigands not turning up, or, if they do, arriving in small numbers and proving friends rather than foes, the peasant begins to turn his attention to his real enemy, his old oppressor, the lord of his village in which he dwells. He hears wonderful tidings, that a Bastille has fallen, that the rule of the lord is abolished—nay, in some cases he is informed by his brigand friends that a patriot king has abolished all feudal dues and taxes of every kind, and has ordered his loyal country people to drive away the lord, destroy his title-deeds, which enslave the poor, and burn his chateau to the ground.

In the midst of this growing excitement an awful story arrives; not a rumour this time, but true in all its ghastly details. Memmay de Quincey, a lord of Franche Comté, when the news arrived of the fall of the Bastille, invited the rustics of the neighbourhood to a banquet. In the midst of the jovial merrymaking, chateau and merrymakers together are blown in air. The ground around is strewn with the bodies of men, women, and children, while the scoundrel who has contrived this dastardly treachery quietly escapes. He returns years after, when the revolution is over, and the middle-class authorities are in power. These are inclined to trouble very little about the death of a few peasants; so he has no difficulty in persuading them that it was all by accident!

The news of this horror in this time of furious excitement flies over France with lightning speed. The cry goes forth, "Down with the accursed race who murder under the guise of friendship and hospitality!" So we see outcasts gather in the night with the boldest men of the village; the church bell clangs out; the inhabitants of the villages fill the village street, and, joined with the people of the country round, they pour forward in a stream of haggard hungry faces, fierce with want and frenzy, while blazing torches held aloft throw the glare of a smoky light on sharp glittering axes, pikes, scythe-blades, firelocks, and every weapon that revolt can fashion for itself.

Ye noble lords, ye proud ones of the earth, who have trod the poor in the dust for so many years, who have treated them like dogs, even worse than dogs, they have been your asses, your mules, their portion starvation, heavy loads, and blows. See, they are coming, starved, brutalised, maddened by you, with torches and weapons in their hands, and the bitterest hatred of you in their hearts. Fly, worthy seigneur, fly! there is no mercy there; there may be mercy in the flaming torches, in the glittering weapons, but not in the hearts of the people whom you have ground down and embruted out of all semblance to humanity!

The lord does fly; he, his wife, and his little ones, half naked, under cover of the night; and as he gazes back his chateau blazes behind him, a savage crowd dancing around the flaming mansion the funeral pyre of all his honours, dignities, and wealth, the flame of which makes the black night still more black and hideous than before.

This was the scene that occurred in most villages in France; but sometimes perchance the village was lazy or cowardly. Then in the dead of the night emissaries from other districts where the revolutionary feeling was stronger would creep through the place and silently fire the chateau, which would send up another beacon flame of revolt throughout rebellious France. Everywhere bands of peasants and vagrants move through the country, burning as they move. Flame after flame springs up. "Seventy-two chateaus have flamed aloft in Maconais and Beaujolois alone. This seems the centre of the conflagration; but it has spread over Dauphiné, Alsace, Lyonnaise; the whole south-east is in a blaze. All over the north, from Rouen to Metz, disorder is abroad: smugglers of salt go openly in armed bands; the barriers of towns are burnt; toll-gatherers, tax-gatherers, official persons are put to flight. "It was thought," says Young, "the people from hunger would revolt"; and we see they have done it." Every lord is not so fortunate as to escape even half-naked from the hands of the avengers. The lords who have ridden high upon their dignities, who have been merciless tyrants in the days of their triumph, are put to death by furious peasants. Among them is a gentleman who had distinguished himself by walking up the only fountain of the township, which he would only allow no peasant to use. Another man who seized on the common lands of a village meets a similar fate.

In many cases the outbreak is provoked by action of the lords. At several places these true representatives of property had fired upon the poor wretches who begged bread at their gates. At a chateau in Maconais a noble lord had hung several of his vassals who been driven by hunger to take the food they needed.

The fury excited by these stories which fly over France is terrible, and the vengeance that falls upon the lords, who have tortured, plundered, and oppressed the people, and now murder them, is what might be expected from a populace embruted and degraded by witnessing the cruel punishments which were common under the feudal system. Down to 1789 men had been broken on the wheel; and remember that the burnings, the quarterings, the hangings, whippings, and rackings had taught the peasants a sorry lesson, a lesson which they showed the lords they had learnt thoroughly. We know that feudal justice often forced from a culprit by means of torture the inmost secrets of his heart. What wonder, then, that the peasants also employed torture to gain their ends. Their great aim was to get hold of the title-deeds which gave their lords the right to plunder and oppress them. To force one lord to give up his deeds they hold a pistol to his throat for three hours, and he and his wife are then dragged from their carriage to be thrown in a pond. In Franche Comté, Madame de Bathilly is forced, an axe gleaming over her head, to give up her title-deeds. Another lady is also obliged to do the same by a pitchfork at her throat and her two daughters swooning at her feet. Another nobleman, Baron de Montjustin, is suspended for an hour in a well, listening to a discussion as to whether they shall drop him or not. The Chevalier d'Ambly is thrown on a dung-hill, while the wild men who have just torn out his hair and eyebrows dance like devils around him. In some cases the frenzy of hatred and fury brings death upon the oppressor. At Mans, M. de Montesson is shot after seeing his godfather's throat cut. In Languedoc M. de Barras is cut to pieces.

Such are the natural consequences of a long reign of wrong and tyranny, which reduces men and women to a state of slavish savagery. It is people like these that our present rulers are penning up by hundreds of thousands in the hideous slums of this most Christian city. If some day the barriers give way and the torrent of maddened men pour forth upon the mansions of the rich, it is not improbable that similar scenes might occur. Let the rich take warning, and stop their work of turning men and women into brutes by perpetuating a condition of society in which thousands cannot get enough bread to eat, even by the most wearisome and exhausting toil. Let them stop the cruel system by which rich men pile up their wealth out of the tears, the groans, the slavery and hunger of the poor. While this continues can we be surprised that crime increases, and that among the prostitutes, the thieves, and the ruffians—products of a vile debasing system—who fill the dens of Whitechapel, may be found the material for a new Jacquerie, which may fire the mansions of the tyrants and bloodsuckers of our own days? Only when that moment comes, gentlemen of the middle classes (to whose large fortunes, amassed by twenty per cent. dividends screwed out of slavery, misery, and prostitution of wretched men and women, may be traced most of the evils which afflict our present society), do not cry out, like the seigneurs of France, against the people whom you and yours have turned into devils, without ruth or pity, but reflect that these are the work of your hands, these are the beings that you have made.

Little more remains to be told. The fires of flaming chateaux lit up the whole of France, and with their destruction goes on a war against rent, tithes, and legal extortions of all kinds. The nobles and clergy in the National Assembly, finding that their feudal dues and tithes have vanished with their title-deeds in the glare of their burning chateaux, determine to renounce what they can no longer keep, and accordingly in a fit of forced enthusiasm they abolish all feudal and clerical dues on the famous night of the 4th of August. But however, they have an eye to themselves, and provide that some of these feudal rights shall be redeemed by a money payment on the part of the peasants. It is also decreed that tithes are abolished and the State in future must provide for the clergy, but in the meantime the tithe must still be levied. But the peasant refuses to pay. Revolt follows revolt during the four years of the revolution, and these insurrections do not cease till the National Convention, seeing that it is impossible to get any money out of the people, declare that the peasants shall no longer be forced to pay compensation for the abolished tithes and feudal dues.

Thus the peasant by his own action freed himself from the slavery which had ground him to earth for many centuries. It is a fact that for many years after the Revolution the French peasant was living in a state of comparative comfort and prosperity, which was mainly due to the work of the "brigands" and "incendiaries" of the stirring years of the first French Revolution.

A VISION OF FREEDOM.

I saw the sun reel down in sulphurous flame
And fume to death upon the cold sea's brink;
And every chain was loosened, link by link
That bound the people to a nameless shame.
Each man arose and called his fellow's name
And, eye to eye that was too free to shrink,
In the great name of Freedom bade him drink;
And lo! the sea grew still and pure and tame.

The Spirit of Freedom with white wings outspread
Shed benediction on them: all were free.
And on the wind came sounds of minstrelsy,
Proclaiming Freemen living and slaves dead;
While o'er a re-arisen people's head
Rang out the jubilation of the sea.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

HOLLAND.

F. Domela Nieuwenhuis, of the Netherlands, said at the Congress on July 20 (see the Sozialdemokrat of August 10) "that he expects nothing for the protection of the workers from parliamentarism. If the governments would only understand what their proper advantage is, they would immediately grant our demands (i.e., those of the Social Democrats on labour legislation), for thereby the Socialist movement would be killed at one blow. Fortunately for Socialism, the governments are not so clever. Labour legislation, like Malthusianism, etc., by which a few workers become individually a little better off, only contributes to reconcile the workers to a certain degree with their present position. The capitalists themselves will grant the eight hours working day at a given moment, for they will prefer to remain masters of the situation after some small sacrifices made. They will gild the chains of the workers to keep them the longer their slaves. The position of the workers can only be really bettered by abolishing private and introducing collective property." These perfectly sound remarks were of course at once contradicted by Liebknecht, who stuck to the orthodox dogmas of Social Democracy. We have to remember, it is true, that F. Domela Nieuwenhuis himself brought in a Bill, mostly relating to women's and children's labour, but also containing the eight hours day, in April last in the Dutch parliament, of which he is a member. On the other side, the report on the Paris Congress, published in Recht voor Allen of August 4, is the only fair report we have yet seen in a Social-Democratic paper, and denounces in much sharper terms than the English published reports the many blunders committed. The author failed to hear much of the "highly interesting debates" so much spoken of, considers the disunion of the congresses as the entire fault of the leaders of both parties, and urges upon the workers not to submit any longer to play the rôle of an army of either of the two coteries; blames the election of a permanent bureau from which workers were wellnigh excluded, considers the management to have been "bad and highly arbitrary," complains of the three days wasted in hearing reports which are to be printed and which were not at all subjects of the order of the day, reproves the arbitrary high-handed action of the bureau on Saturday afternoon, when those who wanted to speak were met by "the howlings and threatenings especially of Liebknecht's German guards," and, he goes on, "the Dutch delegates then refused (as did the Belgian delegates from the same reasons) by abstaining from voting, to take part in such a farce" (comedievertooning). "We call the manner shameful in which an Italian delegate was treated," etc., who was "simply thrown out by the help of the strongly disciplined Germans," who in his opinion bossed the Congress in an unbecoming manner. He then complains that the property-question is neglected in the resolutions, which contain nothing new, and he scoffs at the idea decided upon to enter into relations with the Swiss bourgeois conference. We give these extracts because this is a Social Democratic report, and to compare it with the reports in the other Social Democratic press. For instance, whilst it is reported from various parts of Germany that delegates on their return lost their employment, were subjected to various police molestations or even arrested, their chief paper, though of course grumbling over this, is endeavouring to show to the bourgeois the merits of the Congress by writing, "The practical character of the Congress, which, without veiling final aims, abstained from all utopian excursions into cloudland, and which cleared off quickly and energetically the Anarchist idiosyncrasy whose aim it is to discredit and to compromise the working class movement, has made an imposing impression in the widest circles" (of the bourgeois!). Also, as the Social Democratic papers record, Liebknecht has already had an interview with M. Clemenceau, the leader of the French Radicals who (the French elections being close at hand!) assured him of the utmost sympathy he always felt for the working classes in general and for labour legislation in particular, which indeed would save the State from revolution!

DENMARK.

From Denmark, during the last years, we continually heard about the growing strength of the Social Democratic vote, which returned several of their members to Parliament, and about the splendid state of their paper, Sozialdemokraten, which has nearly 30,000 subscribers, more than any other paper of Copenhagen and of Denmark too. This country was often held up as a model country for Social-Democratic agitation. Only this year the real state of the movement has become apparent, and is now a matter of public discussion and agitation in Denmark. It appears that in the years 1883-5, when the opposition against the Estrup conservative ministry was the greatest, an alliance between Social Democrats and Radicals and Liberals was made, and from that time dates the large circulation of the paper, which now discusses questions of political opposition in the first rank, and relegates economic or Socialist questions to a back place. All Social Democrats returned to parliament were so only by means of compromises with the bourgeois parties, for whom the Socialists voted in their turn in other places. This year an opposition sprang up against this way in which the party is managed by a few persons; and although we have no sympathy for this opposition, led by Nicolai Petersen (because they simply do like the others do, go on electioneering, with a little more ostentation of Social-Democratic principles), we are indebted to it for an intelligence of the true state of the official Danish party. We read in Sozialdemokraten, for instance, "The Danish Social-Democratic party represents Reform Socialism, and consequently fights against Revolutionary Socialism, a standpoint also taken by the vast majority of Social Democrats"; or, "The chief fault of the Revolutionary Socialists is to think that Socialism has in any way a greater connection with revolution than any other political standpoint. But just the contrary is the case. . . . Therefore we fight the real Revolutionary Socialists," etc. The keynote of the Danish elections is now militarism, and the Social-Democratic candidates simply say, "You have to choose between militarism and reforms," and on such grounds they are elected. All this shows plainly what is behind the big numbers of voters and subscribers—namely, the surrender of Socialism to bourgeois Liberalism. The opposition, as we see from Arbejderen, makes progress, but what can this result in? Not more than purifying the party for a short time, until a new bourgeois alliance offers itself.

GERMANY.

There are now 34 trades-unionist papers published (23 on Jan. 1, 1886), circulation 90,000. Also (at the end of 1888) 28 political Social-Democratic papers (8 in Prussia, 10 in Bavaria, 3 in Hessen, 3 in Wurtemberg, 1 in Baden, Braunschweig, Hamburg, Bremen); circulation about 140,000. These are big figures, but it must not be forgotten that if any of these papers only once were to make a really Socialist remark, it would instantly be suppressed, as some are here and there. So these papers simply deal with the ordinary political news, trade matters and election propaganda. A reader of them may lose his belief in the old parties, but at the same time he must receive quite a wrong impression of Socialism from them, so that in reality they are one more hindrance to the progress of Socialism (not of Social Democracy) in that country.

MERLINO'S RESOLUTION.

THE following is the full text of comrade Merlino's resolution, which he wished to put before the Paris Congress:—

"Considering that international or even national labour legislation would not only be, if accepted by the workers, the confirmation of their slavery and the negation of the great principles of revolutionary Socialism, but is also an economic impossibility, that it is therefore deplorable that such a false hope should be dangled before the eyes of the workers.

"That the workmen in different trades, the domestic servant and the workshop slave, the artisan and the peasant, the hands of the great manufacturers and the almost independent producers in the home industries, would never submit to one and the same regime, and even less so would the workmen of different countries, races, and continents.

"Seeing the differences which exist between manufacturing, agricultural, and commercial countries, and the different degrees of economical development at which they have arrived, it would be unjust to attempt to equalise their conditions otherwise than by the spontaneous evolution of economical relations; as this attempt would only result in the sacrifice of the weaker to the stronger; which is inevitable in a social organisation so essentially antagonistic to every principle of Justice and Reason as is the present form of society.

"Considering, in addition to these economical impossibilities, that there are also political impossibilities in the way of this gigantic illusion of international labour legislation; the governments being always armed to the teeth against each other, and continually engaged in fomenting national hatreds. When they fail even in reconciling the interests of the capitalistic classes, which they represent, how could they succeed in agreeing together for the benefit of the workman, whose natural and irreconcilable enemies they are? The State being an enormous engine of destruction and violence, how can it be an instrument of concord and peace, not only amongst workmen who fraternise without its interference, but between the workmen and their masters; the latter being at the same time the masters of politics, diplomacy, and finance, nay, of the State itself?

"Considering that even apart from all these economical and political impossibilities which render perfectly utopian the idea of international labour legislation, the great moral principle of Freedom is incompatible with any regulations and measures which interfere with the free development of society, and would instead mould it to a procrustean bed. Freedom has become for civilised man not only a want but one of the most important.

"Further considering that it is dangerous to foster amongst the masses the great superstition of the century, which consists in pretending to solve the great social problems by the ballot box and Acts of Parliament; that it is on the contrary necessary to undermine and destroy the fetishes of legislation and legislators; and that the offer of labour legislation officially made by the governments has only one aim, that of rehabilitating in the eyes of the masses the Parliamentarism which is now becoming utterly discredited, and to prolong its agonising life.

"Considering that at the present state of development of socialistic principles, and after the conquest and defeats of the International Workingmen's Association, we should not retrace our steps to old expedients, but march onwards and push forward the great claims of the proletariat and attack the last ramparts of the bourgeoisie, monarchical and republican parliamentarism.

"Considering that the bodies of thousands of victims, and the whole race of the oppressed stand between us and our enemies, and that this abyss must be deepened more and more, and not bridged over by compromises which amount in fact to treason to the Cause.

"That together with private property, government, this monstrous centralised engine of fraud, corruption, oppression, and social discord, must be suppressed, and in its place must be substituted a society composed of free associations of workers settling their own affairs and organising their own work.

"In accordance with these considerations the congress:

"Declares its intention to remain true to the great principles of Revolutionary Socialism;

"Rejects as anti-socialistic, reactionary, and fallacious any proposals for labour legislation;

"Inscribes in its programme the abolition of the parliamentary and governmental system as an essential condition for the real abolition of the capitalistic system;

"Lastly, denying to any one the right to compromise our principles (the sole and inalienable patrimony of the proletarians of the world and their only hope) and denying also the right to reduce Socialism to the meaner proportion of a class legislation, recommends that the union between the revolutionary Socialists of the world be made on the basis of the great and inprescriptible human claims; because on any other ground no union would be founded amongst the workers, but discord, rivalry, ambition, and the tyranny of one privileged minority over the suffering masses."

NOTES.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL is a smart young man; there is not the least doubt about it. His attempt to outbid the advanced Radicals is a masterpiece of genius, while his prophetic warning to ground landlords to set their houses in order for the day of retribution that is coming upon them, is the unkindest cut of all to these bulwarks of the Tory party. No wonder Randolph's leaders don't know what to do with this little puppy of Tory Democracy, whose teeth are growing and who knows how to bite.

But what are we to think of Randolph's speech, or of the rival performance of Professor Stuart at the Shoreditch Town Hall? They remind me very much of the orations of two rival Cheap Jacks at a country fair, who are both in possession of a number of articles equally cheap and worthless, and who are each endeavouring to howl the other down. The patter is the same in both cases. "Ladies and gentlemen, yer pays yer money and yer takes yer choice. A fine new political programme. What d'ye lack? What d'ye lack? A bill for the better housing of the working-classes; an excellent article; I can recommend it, gentlemen, I can recommend it. Yer you hab, yer you hab, all very fine and large. Some new workmen's dwellings, lighted by electricity, furnished with hydraulic lifts, and filled with every comfort and convenience. Who bids? Who bids? Your vote and interest at the next general election is all I require. To be had at the same moderate price—the taxation of ground rents, an eight hours bill, the suppression of the liquor traffic, or anything else you want. Any article not in stock procured at the shortest notice." And so they go on, though the Liberal Cheap Jack pauses in the midst of his harangue to warn his audience that the person over the way is an impudent fraud, and hasn't got the articles in stock that he brags so much about.

To this pass has the steady propaganda of Socialism during the past few years brought both political parties. Those who have purchased articles of the ordinary cheap jacks, may judge of the value of goods these political ones vend. For my part I do not believe that either the programme of Randolph Churchill or Professor Stuart will touch the sources of the present misery. They will but make discontent wider and deeper; but they will once more prove the truth of the proverb, "That those who make half revolutions dig their own graves."

But there is another person whom Randolph's eloquence annoys more even than any member of the Liberal party, and that is Joseph Chamberlain. Joseph appears to regard Randolph's most recent deliverance as a direct invitation to the Birmingham electors to desert the standard of the Chamberlain family and rally round the Churchill flag; and no doubt he isn't far wrong.

Mr. Chamberlain appears to be of an opinion that Churchill has got his advanced opinions from the extreme men of all parties, and he is unkind enough to put poor Professor Stuart among his list of extremists. Surely a milder Jacobin was never known than the author of the Metropolitan Liberal programme. Before long we shall have Howell and Cremer put on Chamberlain's list of dangerous persons.

Then, Randolph is accused of borrowing his Socialism from Burns and Hyndman! This is hardly complimentary to those two prophets of Social Democracy, for the only measure of theirs he has borrowed is the eight hour bill, and every one knows that that is advocated in America and in our colonies by many people who would be very much insulted if you called them Socialists—save in Sir Vernon's Harcourt's sense of the word.

But I think there is a far more probable explanation of Randolph's advanced opinions than by throwing the blame of them upon Professor Stuart, or Hyndman and Burns. In the good old days of "ransom" and "natural rights," Joseph and Randolph were fast friends. In those days Mr. Chamberlain formed himself upon the model of "the sea-green incorruptible" Maximilian Robespierre. Already in his own vivid imagination he pictured himself as a Jacobin dictator, passing heads of dangerous aristocrats like Salisbury and Hartington under the guillotine. But that dream is over for the friend of lords and the pet of duchesses. In the old days the haughty aristocrats would have nothing to do with the little Brummagem snob, and he burned for vengeance on them. Is it not, therefore, probable that Randolph got his advanced opinions from the "incorruptible" Joseph, and now he proceeds to hoist the "incorruptible" with his own petard! Once more has the pupil beat his master.

Montana, one of the four new States lately added to the Union, refuses to prescribe the reading and writing qualifications for her voters, customary in the older States. Delegate Maginnis, whose name bespeaks his paternity and probable creed, secured this result by pointing out that "the most dangerous classes in this country were not the illiterate, but the over-educated," and he instanced "several distinguished Anarchists who could read and write and talk several languages." Here, at last, is a congenial refuge for the atavistic reactionaries who are always denouncing education as a danger to the State. If only all the good orthodox, untroubled, and contented souls would migrate thither, and leave other people to wend their wicked way unhindered!

ERRATUM.—W. Wess was delegated by the Manchester International Club, and not Berner Street, as appeared last week in Paris Congress report.

Ida M. Van Etten, Frances Morris, Marian Macdaniel, Florence K. Wischnewetzky, and Jane T. Gillespie have incorporated the "Working Woman's Society of the City of New York," to promote organisation among women engaged in industrial pursuits, and to furnish indemnity to the members of said society by payments of money collected by way of dues, against loss occasioned by sickness or lack of employment, and also in general to labour for improvement in the condition of all working women.

CORRESPONDENCE.

COMMUNISM AND ANARCHISM.

I HAVE to excuse myself for being so long in answering our comrades. My journey to the Paris Congress, and business necessary to be done before and after that event, accounts for the greater part of the delay. I will now do what I can to answer our friends who have written to the Commonweal. I must premise, by the way, that I have let a typographical error of importance pass unnoticed: for "moral conscience" our friends should read "social conscience."

And now I find that one difficulty in dealing with the friends who are discussing the matter is that, in all probability, I differ very little in theory from what they think, but considerably from what they write—e.g., comrade Armsden appears to meet my commonplace "that you have a right to do as you like so long as you don't interfere with your neighbour's right to do as he likes" with a negative; which he cannot mean to do. Anyhow, I assert it again, and also assert that the social conscience, which being social is common to every man, will forbid such individual interference, and use coercion if other means fail: and also that without that there can be no society; and further, that man without society is not only impossible, but inconceivable. I may say that I perceive here that the unlucky misprint of moral for social has turned our friend's arguments beside the question.

Comrade H. Davis misunderstands my use of the word Communist in supposing me to use it as the Owenites did, as implying life in separate communities, whether those communities were mere scattered accidents amidst a capitalistic society or not; whereas I use it as a more accurate term for Socialism as implying equality of condition and consequently abolition of private property. In this sense, of course, you could not live Communistically until the present society of capitalism or contract is at an end. Equally of course, the living in small communities is not in theory an essential of this great change, though I have little doubt that it would bring about such a way of living and abolish big cities, which, equally with comrade Davis, I think much to be desired.

In his reference to Philip drunk and sober, comrade Davis does not of course really mean that any obnoxious person shall be allowed to tyrannize over the rest of the citizens without restraint from them; but that is what his words mean.

As to the matter of majority-rule, let us look at the matter again. All rule must be, as comrade Davis sees, majority-rule—i.e., of the effective majority. If at any time the minority rules, it is because they are better organised, better armed, less stupid, more energetic than the mere nose-counted majority: this effective majority therefore coerces the minority; and as long as it can coerce it, it will. The time may come, and I hope it will, when the social conscience will be so highly developed that coercion will be impossible, even on the part of the community: but then in those days the community will be composed of men who so thoroughly realise Communism that there will be no chance of any of them attacking his neighbour in any way. All reasonable men, whatever they may call themselves, would rejoice at such a change; and it is because I know that this cannot be brought about as long as private property exists, that I desire the abolition of private property, and am a Communist.

But I do not consider myself a pessimist because I am driven to admit that such a condition of things is a long way ahead. And what can we do in the meantime? I remember that the great traveller Dr. Wolff, travelling in the eastern wastes, inhabited a tent alone with a stalwart Greek servant of his, who habitually got drunk on the feast-days of his church, and when drunk, habitually beat poor Wolff. The latter objected, and said to his servant (I quote his own words), "You must either not get drunk, or when you get drunk you must not beat me." But the servant said to Wolff, "I shall get drunk, and when I am drunk I shall certainly beat you." Wolff being the weakest physically, had to submit; but if there had been two Wolffs, I will answer for it that they would have had recourse to coercion, and if they had allowed the drinking, they would certainly have put a stop to the beating. And really I think we should all of us have done in likewise, and considered it pedantic to allow one man to beat two of us: and surely it will always be so, as long as the individual acts unsocially: in that case he has no right against the society, which he himself has cast off.

I must repeat practically also what I said in my first article: however much the unit of association may be divided, people will have to associate in administration, and sometimes there will be differences of opinion as to what should be done. E.g., a community discuss the building of a bridge; some say Ay and some No, and persist in that opinion after all possible arguments have been exhausted: what is to be done? which party is to give way? Our Anarchist friends say it must not be carried by a majority; in that case, then, it must be carried by a minority. And Why? Is there any divine right in a minority? I fail to see it, although I admit that the opinion is held by the absolutists.

Or again, passing to matters of principle again. Supposing that a commune decides to re-introduce wage-slavery within its bounds. Is that to be allowed by the majority of communes? Are we not to deliver slaves from their masters? If not, why are we revolutionary Socialists to-day?

A friend under the signature of "Anarchist" stumbles, I think, over voluntary and involuntary association. Where all men are equal, I believe "the give and take" would have such influence over men's minds, that "the authority of compulsory representative institutions," or whatever took their place, would be so completely at one with the Social Conscience that there would be no dispute about it as to principle, and in detail, as above, the few would have to give way to the many; I should hope without any rancour. This correspondent does not seem to be able to think himself out of the present state of things, and yet at the same time imagines a possibility of free association as things now are; a quite illusory hope, since those of us who are unprivileged are at the beck and call of the privileged.

Comrade Blackwell suggests that since the majority is no more likely to be right than the minority (which I admit) they might as well toss a copper for it. I don't object; but then there might be a difference of opinion on that method also, and how are we to settle that? It is curious that comrade Blackwell in suggesting that the larger of the two differing parties in a matter of administration should throw the matter over, cannot see that this would mean victory for the noes; or, in other words, that in any question which must be answered aye or nay, any one obstructive could always prevent any business being done, and could in such matters thereby establish the most complete minority rule conceivable.

The other side of comrade Blackwell's remedy is a system of perpetual compromise, which would be disastrous if it were possible, for it would so hinder all reasonable work or progress that it could not be submitted to.

Comrade Blackwell objects to my calling the "Anarchist-Socialists" "vague," but he himself furnishes a specimen of their vagueness in the platform of the Pittsburg Congress in 1883. He adds, "Now I believe most members of the Socialist League agree to every one of these planks." Exactly, and every other Socialist also; there is nothing distinctively Anarchist in them. And this I find is often the case with "Communist-Anarchists"; they cannot differentiate themselves from the Communists. Their Anarchism consists in a somewhat exaggerated fear of a possible re-growth of some of the tyrannical methods of the destroyed Society, and a consequent distrust of the new Society having any definite form. On the other hand, I have met with Anarchists who were not at all vague, and who definitely opposed Communism. They had, indeed, this in common with militant Socialism, that they wished to abolish organised monopoly; but they supported unorganised monopoly, or the rule of the strongest individual, taking for their motto "To each one according to his deeds," which means the upholding of private property with no association to uphold it, a position impossible and inconceivable.

Our friends who have been discussing this subject do not, I know, agree with this view, but intend to be Communists though they find stumbling-blocks by the way. As for me, I can only say that whatever will give us equality, with whatever drawbacks, will content me, and I find that at bottom this is the ideal of all Socialists. So I think the fewer party-names and distinctions we can have the better, leaving plenty of scope for the inevitable differences between persons of different temperaments, so that various opinions may not make serious quarrels.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

PARIS CONGRESS—A DISCLAIMER.

SIR,—In your number of the 10th of this month, Mr. F. Kitz pays me the compliment of having "carefully, very carefully translated into German Keir Hardie's speech." Mr. Kitz is right. I did it "carefully, very carefully," as I am always wont to do my duty. Since Mr. Kitz has omitted to mention it, I may add that I have translated Mr. Morris's speech with exactly the same care and love; and if Mr. Kitz had made a speech as interesting and as instructive as those of his two countrymen, I should have rendered him the same service.—Truly yours,

W. LIEBKNECHT.

SOCIALISM AT YARMOUTH.

OUR comrades at Yarmouth have been employing their time so profitably recently, that as their report went wrong last week we think it only fair to put it in now. "We began our campaign on Monday evening, July 29th, when Reynolds gave an address at Norton to a good audience. On Wednesday, July 31st, Reynolds and Barber took advantage of the fair to hold a meeting on the Green at Martham. We were quite a feature of the fair. The boxing men wanted to know what the devil the Socialists wanted here spoiling their audiences; and another big show boss tried to spoil our meeting, but Barber knew his character too well as a sweater of the worst type, and he had to make a hasty retreat. Then we got wrong with the toll-collector, because we told the stall men that the lord of the manor was a fraud and advised them not to pay the 1s. toll. We sold 1s. 3d. worth of literature. In Yarmouth, on Friday evening (2nd inst.), Mrs. Tochatti and Reynolds held a meeting near Colman's Granary. We opened and finished with singing, and little Tochatti, not yet 8, gave a neat little socialistic speech. On Saturday evening, Reynolds, Mrs. Tochatti, and A. Barker held a meeting in the Market Place. We pitched close to where the Blue Ribbonites stand, but when we placed our platform they were not there; but just before we began the captain and one other made their appearance, read our placard but said nothing. But as soon as we began they started to sing. Well, we let them, but as soon as they left off singing we began, and those godly people sent for their drum (which the authorities had forbid), and for more than an hour they shouted and banged, but Reynolds stood his ground, and took advantage of any lull to tell the people that the teetotallers were advertising the Socialist demonstration for the next day. The captain fetched a constable in uniform, who told Reynolds to desist, but we told him we should do nothing of the kind and he could carry out any instructions he had received. Then a detective came and tried to get us out of it by saying he had told the others to drop it, but it was no use, we held on. At last, from sheer exhaustion, the drum and Gospel-grinding water-drinkers had to go. Reynolds moved a vote of thanks to the captain for the advertisement and the collection we had gained through their efforts, and our comrade wanted to shake hands, but the captain indignantly declined. By this time there were several hundred people collected; Mrs. Tochatti sang, and Reynolds kept the meeting up till nearly 10 p.m. Well, wonders never cease, we were so clated over our meeting, that we adjourned to Reynolds's house and sang till three in the morning, when we went to meet Tochatti and Turner, who did not arrive by the train we expected. So we adjourned to South Town station to meet the next train, and we sang the Marseillaise from station to station. When we got to the station up came a detective and says, 'Now, then, don't you know better making this row?' He asked comrade Thomas (of Ipswich) his address, and before our comrade could scarcely answer him he took him to the station; but our comrade soon made his appearance again, his name and address being taken. On Sunday we had three splendid meetings, Turner giving a capital address in the morning; Tochatti followed with an earnest and telling address. Tochatti spoke again in the afternoon and evening. The speeches of our comrades have made a good impression; sold 54 Commonweal and collected 10s." C. R.

Sailors' Strike.

The Coast Seamen's Journal (San Francisco) takes the Glasgow Socialists to task for interfering in the sailors' strike, and alleges that their action caused a split amongst the men. It appears that our Glasgow comrades went amongst the sailors distributing literature, and some of the union leaders abused them; that the men resented this and supported the Socialists, who held a successful meeting in consequence. To introduce, says the Coast Seamen's Journal, scientific theories, i.e., Socialism, "would defeat the object of the sailors, who are fighting for better wages and the principle of unionism." Socialism would abolish the system which breeds strikes and lock-outs, and replace it with free fraternal co-operation. Militant Socialists could not find a better field for operations than the scene of a strike; and whilst they neither desire to, or do, hinder trade union construction, they exercise both a right and a duty when they point to the object-lesson of strikes and lock-outs as showing the rottenness of wages-slavery. The same journal has also some pertinent comments upon the action of the Commonweal, re the printing of Seafaring (England) by non-unionists. Have not the leading officials of the Seamen's Union got over that yet? Is it sulks or press of business which prevents an answer being sent to a letter addressed to the General Secretary of the Seamen's Union anent the overworked men on the Channel steamers, and the opportunity for extending their union?—F. K.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Tram Slaves.

The London Tramways Company have added three more victims to their list of men discharged for joining the Union. Mr. Wylie, the manager of this Company, was the first manager to begin this tyranny, and he seems the last to leave off. Last week Robert Anderson, a driver, was dismissed upon the trivial excuse that he had been speaking to his conductor. Alexander Innes has also been sacked because, according to Col. Davidson, "his conduct had been very irregular," though what constituted the irregularity, except joining the Union, the gallant Colonel did not condescend to say. But the worst case of all is that of conductor Cane. This conductor, it appears, slipped on his car and hurt himself, and in consequence was absent from duty for a few days, sending word that he was ill. When he returned he was ordered up to the head office, and was told by the omnipotent Wylie that he had better take his papers and look for another job. Some time ago the night inspector (Daniels) asked if he belonged to the Union; Cane returned an evasive answer, and Daniels, in return, recommended him, if he respected the job he had got, "to leave the Union alone." Volumes could not say more; but what can the men expect, so long as they submit patiently to these tyrants?

Revolt of the Compositors.

The London Trades Council is receiving kicks in the rear from every side. The London Society of Compositors is the last to go for it; this revolt is, perhaps, the most important of all, as it means the rebellion of one of the largest and the most intelligent bodies of workmen in London. Well, they have decided at their quarterly delegate meeting to sever their connection altogether with the London Trades Council, which appears, upon the statement of Mr. Newstead, one of the Society's delegates to it, to be a bogus affair; he said that "only the adhesion of the compositors gave it any standing. The carpenters and joiners would have nothing to do with it, nor the other large and real trade unions of London. It was comprised of little tinpot societies. Societies were entitled to one delegate for every hundred, or fraction of a hundred, of their members, and the result of this was that the compositors' delegates were out-numbered by delegates who only represented little societies that numbered five-and-twenty." After passing their resolution, severing their connection with the Trades Council, it was almost unanimously passed that "the two representatives sent to the Dundee Trade Union Congress shall vote against the election of Messrs. C. Shipton and H. Broadhurst, M.P., on the Parliamentary Committee." How are the mighty fallen! But what will become of the Parliamentary Committee when its two chief pillars are withdrawn? That august body will not be able to hinder and obstruct the international union of workers. It will be taught for the future a useful lesson of humility.

Mr. Shipton Again.

The committee of the Hanover Square Branch of the Amalgamated Society of House Decorators and Painters, of which Mr. Shipton is a member, has summoned that worthy gentleman before it, to answer for violating the rules of the society by making false and libellous statements against the members of his branch. They have decided that if Mr. Shipton does not issue a correct statement about what occurred at the Hanover Square Branch on February 22, 1889, and apologise to all the branches for "the lying report he made at the Paddington Branch on March 9," he shall be expelled the society. Never mind, Shipton! no doubt Peters and Kelly will find you a job in the "sugar business."

The Somersetshire Miners.

The men have decided to refuse the miserable terms offered by the employers last week of a 5 per cent. advance at once and another 5 per cent. when trade shall improve. The men have decided to take nothing but the 10 per cent. they have demanded. Great enthusiasm is shown among the men, and at the meeting where the master's terms were refused original songs on the subject of the strike were sung by the miners. The conflict is a lively one, and several men, women, and boys have been summoned for intimidation. A certain animal of the rat species, Walter Bowns, who had received non-union pay (5s.) on Wednesday and meanly went to work on Thursday, met with "a slight accident," and summoned three men, one woman, and two boys for intimidating him. Penalty, £5 in each of five cases, or two months. The people are making an example of the scabs in another way; they have boycotted them. In several chapels last Sunday (says the correspondent of the Labour Tribune) the audience rose almost en masse when certain people went to preach, and in one instance not only the congregation stayed away, but the choir and the organist. The advice to let these people alone was given because the neighbours dared not speak to them, and it was dangerous even to look at them, for fear of being prosecuted for intimidation. The writer goes on to say that "even this does not please the owners." No, and if all other workmen showed the same pluck as the Somerset men it would please "the owners" still less.

The Strike in the Fur Trade.

A very interesting strike is now in progress in the East of London. For some time our good comrades of the International Club in Berner Street have been very busy in forming trade unions among the sweated workers, and the strike in question is one of the first battles of one of their newly-formed trades unions. H. Koenigsberg, fur-manufacturer and cap-maker, of 25 Commercial Street, is one of the employers who has a reputation in the East-end for making the most of those he employs. According to the appeal issued by the workers, who are now on strike, "One hundred and fifty-four workpeople employed by the above firm have been expected to work from eight in the morning till ten at night. The girls have had to remain at the place from eight to eight on some days, and on others from eight to ten. As invariably happens, these terrible long hours have had their corollary in reductions of wages. A couple of months ago the men combined in demanding shorter hours and got an hour knocked off their daily slavery. In the basement of the building, where a number of men worked, was a black hole. He refused to make it better, so Mr. Lakeman, the factory inspector, called on the proprietor to make some necessary alterations. They were not made as directed, and the consequence was that Mr. Lakeman had the alterations made and charged the firm with the costs. Mr. Koenigsberg then refused work to the men who had signed the document by which shorter hours were demanded. But in the meantime a union had been formed, and the men successfully resisted this piece of tyranny. They next resisted an unjust and altogether illegal deduction of a penny a-week from their wages. The master retaliated by refusing work to three of his men except at a further reduction in price. Then the whole shop went out on strike on Bank Holiday morning. The men demand fair distribution of the work; they decline to pay penny fines; they ask that the workmen who in the course of the dispute have left shall be taken back; and they demand a revision of the scale of prices." We are glad to hear that English girls employed by the firm have joined with the Jewish men in the struggle. Any subscriptions to aid the strikers may be sent to S. Levy, Secretary of the Strike Committee, 106 Sclater Street, Bethnal Green, E. N.

ARE LABOURERS FREE MEN?

THE editor of Belfast Brotherhood, visiting recently an Irish town where his paper has a pretty extensive circulation, found his way to the meeting-place of a newly-formed society, having for its object the strengthening of the position of all working people (unskilled as well as skilled) in relation to their employers. He introduced himself to the secretary, who was as courteous as could be, gave him full information about the principles of the society, and told him that it had already nearly 400 members. But the secretary and other members besought him that he would publish no particulars in his paper, nor communicate any to other papers, concerning the society. The editor naturally asked, Why not? would not some publicity help the society on? must not the mass of workers be informed of the existence of the society before they could be drawn into its membership? And this was the drift of the answer he got—"We should all get the sack." These men were afraid that if their employers came to hear of this infant organisation they would strangle it at once by dismissing all who joined it. They dreaded lest publicity should result in their being deprived of their means of subsistence—in their being brought with their wives and their children to utter destitution and starvation. And so the society must be kept secret until such time as it gains sufficient strength to resist an organised attack on the part of employers of labour.

Now, are working-men free?—especially working-men of the class to which the bulk of the members of this union belong; labourers, as distinguished from tradesmen? They are slaves, and they will be such until they combine in a mass—until they secure the strength that is in union. The whip that the landlords and capitalists—the rich classes—wield to bring the poor to submission is the power to starve them, to shut them out from all opportunities of earning their bread. They control the means of production. This whip must be wrested from their hands if the workers are to be free. Justice demands it. Combination can do it.

ABERDEEN.—On Sunday, August 4th, while Leatham was addressing a meeting in Castle Street, the superintendent of police, accompanied by a squad of his men, walked up and ordered him to stop. Our comrade gave way, but determined to fight the question on another occasion. A perfect storm was raised in the local newspapers against the police, and when we turned up at the place of meeting on the following Sunday an immense crowd was there. The Rev. Alexander Webster first addressed his usual weekly meeting for Unitarian propaganda, speaking on "The Socialism of Jesus." When he had finished, our platform was brought out, and Leatham addressed a crowd of some three or four thousand people; many more looked on from a distance. A hearty reception was accorded to our comrade, who spoke for some considerable time; questions were invited at the close, in order to give the police a more complete opportunity to "work their will." Comrade Duncan concluded the meeting with a short speech. The meeting passed off quietly, the police being thoroughly defeated.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at 2 o'clock Glasier and Joe Burgoyne spoke on Jail Square. At 5 o'clock Gilbert, Joe and Tim Burgoyne addressed a large audience at Paisley Road Toll. At the same hour Glasier addressed the Young Ireland Society, where his denunciation of the reactionary tactics of the Irish Parliamentary party, and his advocacy of an international union of the workers to achieve Socialism met with hearty approval.

LEICESTER.—Sunday last F. Charles arrived very opportunely, and gave a stirring address in Russell Square. In the evening Charles commenced an address on "The Labour Question" in Humberstone Gate; good audience. Charles addressed meetings again in Russell Square on Tuesday evening, and at Ansty, a village five miles from Leicester, on Thursday. 5s. 2½d. collected. Literature sold, 2s. 6d.—A. G.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning at 11 o'clock a meeting was held in Vicars Croft. Our speakers, Maguire, Sweeny, Corkwell, Paylor, Braithwaite and Hill had a very attentive hearing from a large audience. No meeting at night, owing to weather.—F. C.

MANCHESTER.—We visited Heywood on Sunday night. A meeting was held, and addressed by Stockton and Bailie. Twenty-four 'Weals' sold. In Stevenson Square on Sunday afternoon Leonard Hall, Prince and Barton spoke to a fair audience; twenty-four 'Weals' sold, and 1s. 8d. collected. In Chester Road, at night, a large meeting was addressed by Parkinson, Marshall and Barton. Some opposition was evoked by a "Christian," who said we should first find Jesus. Marshall ably replied to him. 'Weals' sold out.

NORWICH.—Saturday last a good meeting was held on the Haymarket, addressed by McCormack and Mowbray (London). Sunday morning a large meeting was held in Market Place, notwithstanding an opposition meeting by the temperance party. Sunday afternoon a very large meeting was held in the Market; speakers were McCormack and Mowbray, who made an able reply to the recent attack on us in the columns of Daylight, delivering a long and severe criticism upon the article, and was frequently applauded by the audience. In the evening another good meeting was held; Mowbray and McCormack both spoke; good collections and sale of literature.

YARMOUTH.—A good meeting was held on the beach on Monday afternoon, addressed by Turner and McCormack. On Tuesday evening Tochatti gave a good address. Several songs were sung by Mrs. Tochatti. Literature sold well. Tuesday evening Barker, of London, Mrs. Tochatti, Thomas, of Ipswich, and Reynolds held a good meeting at Belton; Mrs. Tochatti sang several songs. Friday evening meeting at Colman's Granary. Saturday night good meeting in Market Place; our Blue Ribbon friends were there with the harmonium, but we got their audience, the people joined heartily in our songs. Sunday morning Reynolds addressed the meeting, and in the evening Annis opened, followed by Tochatti, who spoke on Objections to Socialism. Literature sold well. Good collection.—C. R.

SALFORD.—On Sunday Leonard Hall addressed a splendid meeting in Oldfield Road at night. Subsequent organisation of Salford gasworks men.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Proctor presided in Sneinton Market on Sunday morning, Peacock and Snell speaking. In the evening good meeting, Rooke presiding; Peacock and Proctor spoke. Collections of the day realised 4s. 10d.—P.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87, Marlboro' Street, August 10, J. O'Gorman, who had attended the Possibilist Congress, in Paris, as the delegate of the Dublin Branch of the International Glass Bottle Blowers, lectured on the "International Congress," giving an account of its proceedings day by day. An interesting discussion took place, the speakers being Toomey, Cree, and Hamilton.

MIDLAND SOCIALISTS.—On August 5 the annual trip took place to Ambergate. Some fifty comrades turned up, chiefly from Sheffield, Chesterfield, Leeds and Leicester. The morning was very wet, obliging us to take shelter in a chapel schoolroom. An informal conference was held, at which it was decided to hold the next gathering in Nottingham, on the last Sunday in June next year, by which time it is hoped we may be in a position to form some federation for the Midlands. We were able to have an enjoyable walk in the afternoon, the sun having been coaxed out by our singing.—R. U.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Daily News, after a considerable amount of shilly-shally in the matter of the Maybrick case, has set itself to publishing a lot of meaningless politeness towards Mr. Matthews and the white-washing of Mr. Justice Stephen's "conscientiousness." This is all very well, and we don't want to go into people's "motives" like some judicial persons do; deeds that we do see must be taken as interpreting motives that we don't see; and the sentence on Harrison is the measure for us of Mr. Justice Stephen's "carefulness and conscientiousness." Nor can we forget that he was one of the first to set a-going the modern doctrine of the "superior pusson," and that in his published writings he has practically declared himself an enemy of the people. It is frightful to think of such a man wielding that abuse of our criminal procedure, the judge's summing-up.

The dock labourers' strike is one of the signs of the times, so fruitful of strikes of late, and at last of strikes among the unskilled. It must not be forgotten, however, that this kind of strike if successful (and, of course, every honest man must wish these poor fellows success) owes its success to the fact that public opinion is powerful in great centres of population, and that public opinion cannot help being on the side of these poor men, whose oppression touches even the sluggish imagination of the ordinary middle-class man. In places or under circumstances where overwhelming public opinion cannot be brought to bear, such strikes are doomed to certain failure; as, indeed, are most strikes.

Since then we are amidst such a period of strikes, and since whatever may be the effect of such strikes it is clear that they are inevitable, is it not the time to press on the workers general combination in this matter of the regulation of wages? Strikes, once more, are generally defeated now because the strikers are only acting in a scattered and skirmishing way, and can be crushed in detail. But suppose the inert and languishing body of trades' unionism revived by a "plan of campaign," which would mean the whole mass standing shoulder to shoulder in all strikes (and much increased in numbers as it certainly would be), surely that would be worth a heap of parliamentary legislation, and armies of paid and lukewarm inspectors! Every strike, I say, should have the whole weight of the organised workers at the back of it.

Again, if we have found strikes useful towards the revolutionary propaganda, it has been because in these days of widespread Socialist agitation they tend to enlighten the workers on their real relation to the masters, and to show them that the position of antagonism between the two taken up at a time of strike, is not an accident to the system of capital and labour, but an essential of it; that the masters as a body, and whatever may be the good will of any individual, are at enmity to the men; and that that enmity must take an obvious and practical form as soon as any group of the workers attempt to be anything more than mere passive tools in the hands of their employers.

Now surely, if the labour struggle were carried on by the workers organised in combination, this fact of the necessary opposition of the interests of master and men would no longer be hidden from the slowest capacity; and it would be understood that whatever gains the workers made could only be made at the expense of the masters, and when that was understood surely the step would not be long to the clear understanding that the masters are (at best) a mere useless clog on the workers, to be got rid of as soon as possible; and under these circumstances it would very soon be possible to get rid of them.

W. M.

Over the muzzling of dogs the first real conflict between the London County Council and the Government has arisen; so far it has gone entirely in favour of the Council. The Council was made responsible for superintending the execution of the dog-muzzling orders of the Government, and was requested to draw up regulations for the police to carry out. Not having any control over the police, they refused to do so; it was none of their business, they said, to "regulate" where they could not control. As representatives of the people of London they would assume no responsibility for expenses, the incurring of which they were not competent to check or over-see. Now the Government has appointed an officer to fulminate and enforce the necessary edict "by and at the expense of the London County Council." It remains to be seen what the latter will do, for the matter is by no means closed as yet, but if they have the hearts of hares or half the prowess of guinea-pigs, they will resist payment of the obnoxious impost until actual compulsion has wrung it out of them. Strength to their elbows and straightness to their backs!

A few nights ago, in the Pall Mall there appeared a column of extracts from the school-inspectors' reports for 1888, which was well worth reading for side-lights on modern "education." One examiner says of the pupil-teachers' examinations that "the papers seemed to be done more by the light of nature than of study"—a statement which in one sense of it is entirely borne out by a definition, quoted as bad, but which is assuredly a stroke of true inspiration—that of the candidate who described "stocks" as being "money borrowed by a Government which it never means to repay."

A shoemaker, last week, made of himself the thirtieth suicide from Clifton Suspension Bridge. Only twenty-four years old, he had found life a failure, and leaped into the unknown. The jury called it "temporary insanity." Plain people called it another name as they read of the wretched starveling desperately tramping on a miserable search for the work that was not for him, and how the sordid horror of it all closed in upon his path, until there was but one outlet. A vulgar tragedy, attracting no particular attention amid the rush and hurry of great affairs, but yet one of those things that need every now and again to be forced into people's notice as a sign of what goes on around them.

Where is the "platform" that will touch these things? Or the politician who will take them up? They are exploited by charity-mongers and professional philanthropists, and by others passed by in stony silence. Without remedy, and without remorse, the politician puts them aside as insoluble mysteries, dispensations of providence, or what not. And the people, with a patience that endures all things, endures this also, though to some of us it seems as though it could not be for much longer. S.

There is a long criticism in the shape of an article in the Daily News of last Saturday upon a recent novel, 'Captain Lobe,' which is supposed to deal with the work of the Salvation Army in the East-end, and has for its hero a captain in that valuable force. But as the writer of the article explains, it deals more with the condition of the inhabitants in the East-end slums than with the religious theories and practice put forth by the disciples of General Booth.

The writer appears to have, as far as an outsider can tell, some notion of the work of Salvationists, of which of course, as the book is written by a pious person and issued by a religious publishing firm, it gives a highly idealised picture; but it must be admitted that he is rather out of it when he proceeds to make an attempt to deal with the Socialist agitation in the East-end.

The book is among other things, according to the writer of the article, "a cry against the Socialists for their petty jealousies and the emptiness of their agitation." As to the emptiness of the agitation, we could agree with the author if it were true that Socialist speakers were in the habit of stunning their audiences with such words as "environment." I have spoken in the East-end for some years, and have heard others speak, and have never yet heard any Socialist orator make use of such a word. No, no, Mr. Author, with very few exceptions, Socialist speakers endeavour, like other popular orators, to render their words in as plain and simple fashion as they can to an audience that needs simplicity.

With regard to the emptiness of our agitation, I suppose by that the author means to bring up the old taunt of our want of practicality. But he agrees with other critics of East-end life in regard to the sluggishness and want of life in the East-end population. "The only things in which East-end people take much interest are murders and funerals. Their lives are so dull, nothing else sets their sluggish blood in motion. . . . The thing that strikes me most about East-end life is its soddenness; one is inclined to think that hunger and drink will in time produce a race of sensationless idiots." Is it not clear that the first thing to do with these people is to induce them to take an interest in something else than funerals and murders, and cannot the emptiness of our agitation spring from the fact that it has been mainly limited to making these people feel discontented with their lot? We are not sure, after all, that this agitation is so empty as talking to the people about a heaven and a god, which they cannot understand, or writing articles and novels which are simply a despairing cry for help to the middle and upper classes.

In spite, however, of our "petty jealousies" (which first fault I am not sure that Salvationists and other Christian bodies are so free from that their advocates can afford to cast stones at other people) and the "emptiness" of our agitation, Socialism is beginning to move even the East-end. The strike of the matchmakers a year ago, which was started by a Socialist, and which was supported by help from all sections of the Socialist party, has not been barren or empty in its results, for what does the fermentation, the revolts of the most downtrodden of the workers spring from but the plucky action of Bryant and May's girls? The gas-stokers, the tram men, the dock-labourers are following suit, and we do not find Salvationists or the writers of novels addressed to the middle classes, aiding in any way the workers even in these slight attempts to better their condition. Their work seems limited to crying Peace! peace! to the poor and soliciting charitable contributions from the rich. If the energy which is wasted in these futile attempts to stave off the rising storm were used to stir the people to revolt against their unjust misery, the East-end would not long cry for help in vain.

D. N.

FELIX PYAT.

THE veteran revolutionist, who has just been buried at the Pere la Chaise cemetery, has told us how he, the son of a Legitimist, became an ardent and devoted friend of the people. When, at the age of seventeen, he left college, before going to Paris for his degree, he spent his holiday with his family. On a certain Saturday, a market-day and a day of consultation for his father, who was an advocate, he found himself in his father's cabinet when an old man entered. He had white hair, a cotton cap, wooden shoes, a cotton blouse, although it was the end of October. He told his story as well as he could; the year had been a hard one, he said, and he had not been able to pay his rent, and his landlord, a new landlord, did not want to renew his lease. Pyat's father, who was honest, after having listened to him attentively, made him read and re-read his agreement, and then advised him not to go into court as the clauses were clear and plain against him. The old peasant, who had his own ideas concerning property, objected eloquently that it was unjust, that he had improved the farm, that he had made the land what it was, that he had grown old on that very soil, that one ought not, because he was in arrears for one year, to take his farm from him, much less to take it without any indemnity whatever. The advocate replied to him that indeed it was not right but it was the law. He repeated to him that it would simply be money thrown away to bring the case into court, and asked him at last his lowest fee, five francs for the consultation. "Five francs!" exclaimed the poor old man, with a cry never to be forgotten. "Five francs for four words, and only to tell him that he was ruined! Five francs to tell him that he was a dead man! Did they not know that he was forced to work and to pinch to get five francs?" And at every word his trembling voice pronounced, he complied, undoing the twisted string of his skin purse. And for every sou that he took from his purse a drop of sweat rolled down his forehead, as if he had taken that sou from his heart. It was pitiable to see and to listen. After having counted and re-counted it piece by piece, and given a long look for the last sight at the five piles of his poor money, Jacques Bonhomme went out staggering as if he had now been emptied and stunned in the process. The advocate had resumed his law-book. Pyat's mother, who was good, and who had come in for her market money, took up the coppers of the poor old man. Then she ran after him, making a sign for young Pyat to follow her. When all three were in the ante-chamber, she said to her son, "You see this poor man, it is his money that nourishes thee, it is his black bread that provides thee with white, his blouse pays for thy dress coat, his cap for thy hat, his wooden shoes for thy shoes! Here, give him ten francs back, and remember!"¹ Félix Pyat has well remembered! From that day he was upon the side of the people, and he has died a friend of the people. He has remained true to himself and to them to his last moment, and after all he has shown more revolutionary spirit than all those taken together who are so fond of merely peddling with petty economic questions, and who blame him now as they do—Pyat the Revolutionist!

Félix Pyat was born at Vierzon, in the Cher Department, October 4th, 1810, of parents who were influential in the Legitimist party.

His successes at the Bourges college were most brilliant. He then went to Paris to study jurisprudence, but did not feel inclined to go to the bar. Yet a student, he became mixed up in the republican and democratic movement, which, at that period, involved the élite of the French nation in a vigorous war against the execrated government of Charles X. After the revolution of 1830, which had only succeeded in replacing one king by another, Pyat entered upon a journalistic career and displayed a most strenuous literary activity. He contributed to the Charivari, the Revue de Paris, the Artiste, the Revue Démocratique, the National (1835, 1841), the Revue Britannique, of which he became the chief editor, the Europe Littéraire, and the Réforme. It was during this period that he wrote one of the most exquisite episodes in French literature, the "Daughters of Séjan," which is to be found in Barnave (by Jules Janin), the "Hangman" in Les Français peints par eux-mêmes (the French pictured by themselves), the "Revolutionary Telemachus," a very curious piece of criticism, the "Ring," the "Secret of Dominique," etc. Most of these writings attracted much attention, but his name became chiefly known and most popular as a dramatic author. After 1832, he wrote many plays mostly bearing upon social and political matters, some of which created very vivid impressions in the minds of the people. He was at all times a splendid master of language, using in turns the fierce invective, the bitter irony, and the burning denunciation of a prophet, or the corroding satire of a Juvenal; capable also of the profoundest pathos, when laying down the maxims of his clear, sober, and severe philosophy. Above all, he had, like the poets and the dramatists whose creations are revolutionary deeds and acts of propaganda, a serene faith that saw beyond the stormy clouds and the troubled darkness of the day into the events of a happier time to come. His début in the drama was "A Revolution of Yore: or, the Romans at Home," which was so full of political allusions that it provoked at once the wrath of the government and was suppressed. Then came "A Conjururation of Yore," "The Brigand and the Philosopher" (Feb. 22, 1834, Porte St. Martin Theatre); "Ango" (June 29, 1835, Ambigu); "Arabella" (1838), wherein he revealed the supposed authors of the murder of the Prince of Condé; "The Two Locksmiths" (May 25, 1841, Porte St. Martin); "Cedric the Norwegian" (1842, Odeon); "Mathilde" (1842); "Diogenes" (1846); and "The Ragpicker of Paris" (1847), which has often been reckoned amongst the symptoms preceding the great popular outbreak in the Revolution of 1848.

Here begins a new period in Pyat's life. The Provisional Government sent him as their general commissioner to the Cher Department. A month afterwards he was elected a member of the Constituent Assembly, where, as well as in the succeeding Legislative Chamber, he sided with the most advanced democrats, the Montagnards. On June 11, 1849, he is said by all the historians to have signed the appeal to arms drawn up by Ledru-Rollin, on the occasion of the infamous expedition of the French Republic (recte Napoleon) against the Roman Republic, and to have been, on the 13th, to the Academy of Arts and Crafts (Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers), where the conspiracy had its headquarters, and to have fled from there when the troops entered that establishment. For this plot he was tried and sentenced to transportation for life. Pyat chose to transport himself to Switzerland, and afterwards¹ explained that neither Ledru-Rollin, nor Considérant, nor himself had drawn up the famous appeal, and that he had not been at all at the Conservatoire, but that his colleague Pfiieger, whom he met at some distance of that spot in the Rue des Fossés-Montmartre, told him that all was over, the conspirators having been dispersed by the troops. Félix Pyat nevertheless went into exile, an exile that lasted twenty years.

VICTOR DAVE.

The Irish delegates, Dillon and Esmonde (Deasy being absent), spoke at Newcastle, N.S.W., on May 18th, 1889, to a very large audience; they briefly touched upon the position of the Irish peasants in Ireland, and illustrated some diabolical acts perpetrated by the authority of Landlord Balfour. - In the course of Esmonde's speech that gentleman came out very strongly. He said among the many things he had been charged with was that he had been called an Anarchist by way of reproach, but if it was to resist the tyranny and coercion of governments then he was an Anarchist and should remain so. The majority in attendance no doubt could not understand this, while some well-dressed land-sharks and boodlers in the Home Rule disguise sitting on the platform could not appreciate Esmonde's Anarchism, and gave some alarming looks at the speaker, and wondered what was coming next!—R. S., Australia.

We have received No. 1 of The Sower, "the organ of the New Fellowship," which is to be published quarterly at one penny, and is to be had from W. Reeves (Fleet Street). In its "Editorial Preface," it says: "The truth is that the basal fact underlying all the wretchedness around us is the absence of real freedom—of a freedom that is rooted in equality and manifested in brotherhood. Time was when not only the land and capital of the country, but also the labourers themselves were the possessions of a dominant class; and when the profoundest philosophers could conceive of no better condition as either possible or desirable for the masses of men. The heroic struggles of centuries have resulted in setting the slaves at liberty, and the ownership of man in man is abolished. But the freedom so hardly won turns out to be only a partial deliverance; and the majority of men find themselves but too often as truly thralls as ever. For the land and capital necessary to labour being retained by the few, he who has but his labour to depend on must pay toll to their owners or starve. Thus it comes about that the free man is forced to sell himself again for the right to live, not wholesale as of old, but by dribblets; by the day or the week. Formerly the absolute possession of his master, whom, as his live stock, it was his interest to keep in health and vigour, the worker has now become his tool, out of which he may get the most work, may use up, and fling away."

AUSTRALIAN NOTES.

THE Commonage, a tract of land situated close to Newcastle, and consisting of about 3,000 acres, has been the free abode of a large number of people for many years. In the early days of this colony (N.S.W.) it was used for cattle waiting shipment at Newcastle. After, when coal was found there, capitalistic companies opened out mines, and the people who were employed at the mines were allowed by the "authorities" to settle on the Commonage on account of it being convenient for their work; and the "gentlemen" in the "House" at that time, seeing also that the land was swampy and not at all valuable when in such a state, did a good thing for many hundreds of people by giving them the free use of it.

I maintain that they had a right to it—free; that, naturally, there should have been no authority about it. Anyhow, the people manufactured their own bricks, or else procured wood and built their humble abodes; they fenced in what land they needed—an amount which their individual labour could look after. Workers coming to the country found a natural benefit in settling on free land; there was no grasping as in most cases, or as our land monopolists do generally; the free land was not blest with beer or spirit houses. As time went on the Commonage began to have a different aspect! The inhabitants greatly improved the land by carefully draining it, and they heartily enjoyed this freedom. But a change came!

Later politicians had their eyes on this "Social System"; they found that working people did not bother about buying land surrounding the Commonage—mainly monopolised by themselves and other brother land-sharks—when they could freely settle down there; so the time has arrived when they are resolving to break down such a system and make the people pay cash for the land they hold, or else quit! The commoners have made the land rather valuable in the eyes of the grabbers by their improvements, and no doubt that will be used against them. The money, they say, that is derived from the sale of the land has to go into the coffers of the State; otherwise the pockets of the politicians, who seek to ruin these poor commoners. No doubt the monopolists in the "House" will see that the former do not purchase their little patches of land— $\frac{1}{4}$ of an acre—for "next-to-nothing"!

The valuers—tools of the exploiters—will no doubt put on a price which the people will be unable to pay, as the majority of them being miners have been working very little for a long time, and are still doing so; the recent long "strike" robbed a great many of what little money they had saved up, so no doubt they will be at the mercy of their foes. They have only one way in which to pay the government, and that is by obtaining a "loan" from the usurers with interest, but they must give them the deeds of the land, and perhaps their houses, as a security. Out of the frying-pan into the fire! No doubt the people will be unable to accomplish their ends, and thus will their natural property float from their grasp into the hands of the monied class; and they will be destitute of free homes!

But then, if the commoners had been of the same way of thinking as the people who print the Australian Radical (the latter are commoners, and the paper is printed on free land), they would naturally rebel and stand up for their rights, as the commoners number 3,000; but then few of them are Socialists, and they wish to be humbugged and robbed by political tricksters. They are evidently not advanced enough to perceive where injustice comes in; but it is to be hoped that our bright little paper, the Radical, will arouse them before long.

Propaganda work seems to be going ahead in Melbourne. J. A. Andrews, J. W. Fleming, L. D. Petrie, and a few others regularly speak on the wharves every Sunday, and influence large audiences. They persistently push the Radical, and their hearts are in the work; the authorities have given them much trouble by trying to suppress free speech, and the propagandists have had to put up with some very hard knocks—the government inciting "roughs" to belabour and drive them from the wharves at different times. J. W. Fleming has suffered imprisonment for advocating our principles, but he will not be stopped, and defies law-'n'-order!

The unemployed are numbering more and more every day. The streets of Melbourne and Sydney are thick with them; they are constantly going to the government for work at any price to buy food to keep life in, but Premiers Gillies and Parkes dismiss them with the answer, "See us some other time!" Great misery is prevalent among the poor people. One case is recorded in the Radical to this effect: "Only last week a poor human creature, haggard, worn, and emaciated, was found sleeping in the Melbourne Treasury Gardens, and for being found at night crouched in the public way he was dragged before the city magistrate. The man explained to Mr. Call, P.M., in a feeble voice, that being without work or money he had no choice but to be without shelter. 'Without shelter!' replied the magistrate with a cruel sneer, 'then we will give you a month's shelter in the gaol.'" Kind-hearted man!

A man, Ernest Buttner by name, was sentenced to death by the law for committing an alleged outrage on a young woman named Jessie Lennox some time back in Sydney. The story of the woman briefly was that she had just arrived from Brisbane and had put up at the prisoner's restaurant, that he had outraged her, and by her endeavours to make an alarm at the window she was able to bring some policemen to her help. The evidence of the latter was quite sufficient to prove the man guilty, so the above penalty was thought properly fit for him. But presto! A man living in Queensland happened to read about the affair, wrote to the New South Wales authorities and turned things as they were upside down. He conclusively proved that the said Jessie Lennox was a prostitute, and was well known as one among the important towns of Queensland. Upon this, further investigations were made, and it was found that no rape had been committed, and the woman finally confessed that she had been a consenting party and that Buttner was innocent and greatly wronged. The police evidence had been got up afterwards. He was released from prison the very day that he was to have been hanged! His little business is ruined, as it had to be sold to pay his Court expenses. The government have now offered him the sum of £50 to clear out of the country by way of "compensation"!

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The Révolte has just published a small pamphlet, "Les deux congrès impossibilistes: compte-rendu d'un délégué," a reprint from the Révolte, with Merlino's resolution appended.

The Père Peinard also contains a fair article on the Congress, reprinted in the Drapeau Noir of Brussels, the Belgian Anarchist paper, which from a fortnightly has now become a weekly paper.

The proposed International Anarchist meetings at Paris are announced to take place on the first two Sundays in September. A preparatory meeting of the Paris groups was held on August 10th. No order of the day will be fixed beforehand, each speaker bringing forward any subject he likes. Discussions on the following questions are already announced: What is Anarchy?—Can an Anarchist society last?—What are the best means of bringing about the revolution?—How shall expropriation be carried out?—What shall become of art and science in an Anarchist society?—What have Anarchists to do in wartime?—Revolutionary tactics in towns and agricultural districts—Theft in the interest of propaganda—Individual theft (for subsistence)—Theft through misery—Means of establishing communication between the Anarchists of various countries.

HOLLAND.

In 1887, as will be remembered, Socialist meeting-places in Leyden and other towns were attacked by drunken mobs amidst patriotic cries, the furniture of the halls was destroyed, several were wounded, etc. It has now been made public, through the revelations of a former police agent, that the police themselves distributed the money on which the mob got drunk. By bribing several persons, however, these exposures have been again hushed up and suppressed for the present.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The three editors of the new Arbeiter-Zeitung of Vienna have been fined £4 each for publishing their paper on Thursday night with the date of Friday printed on it, which is and long has been the custom with every weekly paper there. Pokorny, one of the editors, was sentenced to five days' imprisonment because he went disguised as a tramcar-driver to a tramcar-men's meeting and made a Socialist speech there.

The preamble of the Paris resolution on labour legislation has been confiscated at Brünn, although a fortnight ago it was published at Vienna without interference.

RUSSIA.

A large number of arrests are reported to have taken place lately in Odessa and its neighbourhood.

Dembski, who with the late Brinstein, took part some months ago in the chemical experiment near Zürich which formed the pretext for the imprisonment and expulsion of so many Russians in Zürich, and who was severely wounded then, has now recovered, and, being expelled, has been forced to leave Zürich for France.

AMERICA.

We have received the first number of Der Anarchist, an Anarchist-Communist organ, published in German at St. Louis, Mo. (August 1), and edited by Claus Timmermann. The new paper will follow upon the lines of the Anarchist, published monthly in 1886 at Chicago by Fischer, Engel, and others, and suppressed, like the Alarm, in May 1886. It proposes to abstain from all personal gossiping and quarrelling, which is by no means an unnecessary promise for a St. Louis paper, as the space of the Parole of that city was almost entirely wasted upon such purposes.

PORTUGAL.

A Revolução Social (Oporto) laments frankly, in the leading article of the current number, that Portugal lags behind in the revolutionary movement that stirs in Europe nowadays; that she is a land of indolence, a society putrid to the core, corrupt and corrupting. "No man is a hero to his valet," the proverb says; and it seems to me that we all make the same complaint of indolence and corruption of our respective countries, while the movement works, the idea goes on, almost unseen and in spite of ourselves. Some countries of necessity lag behind, by reason of slower development, occasioned by geographical position, temperament, and so forth; but their time will come with the rest, and what matters the day later or earlier? I read in the same number and in other papers of strikes in Lisbon and Oporto, and more or less successful attempts at association of the workers in self-defence against their exploiters. This is, after all, pretty much what other countries do, only on a smaller scale. The revolutionary movement lies beneath the industrial agitation.

ITALY.

The editors of Mazzini's works have published on the last anniversary of his birth (June 22) vol. 17 of the complete edition of his writings. The volume consists of a collection of articles written in 1871-72 in the Roma del Popolo on social questions and especially on the old International and on the Paris Commune. The following are some of the headings: "The Commune of France," "The Manifesto of the Commune of Paris," "Historical Sketch of the International," "Documents," etc., etc.

We have received a Patriotic March, "dedicated to the Italian Democracy" by the author Filippo Mercuri. Glancing at it with an unmusical and therefore modest eye, I gather that it is scored for a band of brass, that it is of a lively nature, and that the ubiquitous Garibaldi motiv comes in in the trio, first in the minor then in the major tone. It should be popular with democratic bands. I confess that my eye was so attracted by the cover that I could scarcely turn to the contents. It is a picture wonderfully full of incident and allegory. A double eagle is nailed to a massive gallows, whence swing along a rope the letters of the patriot Oberdan's name, also the name of the march. A liberally rayed star shines above, the red flag waves, laurels twine; and in short, I recommend this spirited drawing to the attention of Mr. Walter Crane, who in England is our only master of allegorical covers.

GONE BACK!—J. F. Busche, editor of the Workmen's Advocate, has returned to New York after attending the Paris Congress, and his paper has immediately resumed the habit of clipping from the Commonweal without acknowledgment, which it had dropped during his absence.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

THE reception accorded to the Duke and Duchess of Portland on their "home coming" to Fullarton House, Ayrshire, was, as the Duke himself admitted, "most cordial and gratifying" to him. A holiday was proclaimed in the district, triumphal arches were erected, flags were stuck on haystacks and chimney-pots, and the entire population, in full demonstration array, marched forth to greet the newly-wedded ducal pair. There were trade societies and athletic clubs, Freemasons and Good Templars, Sunday-schools and police; there were clergymen and lawyers, publicans and magistrates, merchants solvent and bankrupt, and working-men from 12s. per week upwards and downwards: and they all professed to be as delighted at having the actual body and soul of the newly-married duke in the midst of them as if he had been the heavenly bridegroom and Prince of Peace whom they profess to worship in their churches on Sundays.

We must not, however—as I remarked on a former occasion of this kind—take such exhibitions as serious manifestations of Scottish popular sentiment. Probably not one man or woman who "demonstrated" really cared one straw either for the Duke or his wife. People will applaud almost any show—especially when it brings them a holiday; and the show of a newly-married couple, although common enough, is always uncommonly interesting. In so far as the people welcomed and cheered the Duke and Duchess because of their rank and riches, they were paying more respect to themselves and their own interests than to the titled couple. It is a regard for their own wealth—which meanwhile is so largely dependent upon the patronage and favour of the Duke—that constrained them to make such an exhibition of themselves. They would cheer the "home coming" of the Mahdi or the King of the Cannibal Islands just as heartily if either of those individuals could do as much for or against them as the Duke of Portland; and when the Social Revolution comes, whether with "winds from heaven or blasts from hell," they will cheer it too. Some day they will see that the Duke of Portland is not a friend, but a foe—not a philanthropist, but a freebooter—and they won't cheer him then, I'll be bound. Some, probably most, of those who did cheer him think so now, but dare to avow their convictions. But the days are marching on: and the crowds who welcome and applaud the Duke of Portland to-day may yet hang him as thief and a robber in Fullarton Woods if he does not repent and be converted in time.

In July 1789 the populace of Paris welcomed their king with shouts of delirious joy and strewed roses on his path; and in January 1793—only three and a half years afterwards—they chopped his sacred head off and threw it in a basket, amid a storm of derision and curses.

The Glasgow carters who went on strike a fortnight ago did not show half the fight that was expected of them. The Caledonian Railway carters caved in on the third day: the sight of a number of scabs preparing to yoke their horses and take their places was more than their sordid souls could endure, and they rushed forward and begged back their jobs. By the end of the week all the railway hands had surrendered, the masters merely promising that individual claims for an advance would be considered each on its own merits. A number of general contractors acceded to the men's demand for 2s. extra per week—i.e., 26s. and payment for overtime. On Monday week all the strikers then out returned to work on the old terms, the president of the Carters' Society, who had the week before declared that "they would never surrender," etc., etc., himself leading a batch of carters back to his own employer and asking them to start work. The strike therefore only lasted a week.

But the tame "law and order" spirit of the men was sorrowful to behold. I witnessed a procession of some 1,200 men pass through the principal streets, and despite the fine physical appearance of the majority, their demeanour was most unimpressive. They had no "go" in them. The half-hearted cheers with which they greeted their friends were even more melancholy than the fitful attempts which they made to "boo" their enemies. They had more the appearance of a band of gravediggers going to the scene of some terrible railway disaster than a regiment of soldiers marching to fight for freedom.

Not a song was sung—not even "Scots wha hae": and I cannot help thinking that a procession of working men who don't sing, won't fight. It is true they do not know any labour songs; but when their souls are really stirred with enthusiasm for their own emancipation, they will find songs, and, if necessary, make them.

It is sixteen years since the carters were last out on strike, and since then they have been organising themselves—i.e., paying salaries to officials, etc.—and this is all the show of battle they could make! It is but fair, however, to state that, for some reason or other, the mass of the men had no confidence in the fight being really an earnest one; and this may in a measure account for their lack of pluck.

The carters' wives were far more enthusiastic in the struggle than their husbands, and far more hearty in their demonstrations of opinion. It is unsafe, however, to judge general sentiment from single instances. While the carters' procession was passing I heard a woman cry, "Stick tae yer colours, Jock, and though ye should eat naething but pease meal brose for a month, dinna gie in!" Immediately afterwards I overheard a woman counselling a carter who evidently had not joined the strike: "That's richt, Tam! Dinna leave yer job tae gang and mak' a fule o' yersel' wi' these puir misguided cratures; a bird in the hand's worth twa in the bush, ye ken!"

The base conception of duty which our money-mongering civilisation engenders is well exemplified by an appeal, which a correspondent in the Glasgow Daily Mail made last week, to reward the volunteer search party which found the body of the tourist Rose who was murdered on the Arran hills. The notion that men ought to be rewarded with money for performing so slight a service in the interests of humanity is as revolting as the murder itself.

Beware of the man who prefaces an argument by saying "I am as much a Socialist as you are, but—". You will generally find that there is much more of the "but" than the Socialist in him. I encountered an individual of this stamp in the form of a divinity student on a recent holiday. In the course of a conversation he expostulated,

"I am probably as much, if not more, a Socialist than you are, but—"; and the "but" included the following inventory of old rag-store Toryism: That it would be robbery to take the land without compensating landlords; that the Land League and Home Rule are utterly wicked things; that it is reasonable, humane, and Christian for our troops to butcher the Dervishes and Arabs in the interest of civilisation; and that there will always be rich and poor, and masters and servants!

And this interesting political prodigy carried two volumes of Swinburne in his satchel, and professed to be a great admirer of, and to have read all, William Morris's poetry! He actually crowded out several passages from the 'Earthly Paradise.' It may be that there was more of Swinburne than Morris in him; but anyhow it is evident that to some queer cases at least the 'Earthly Paradise' fails to be of more use as a moral agency than the Shorter Catechism or the Ten Commandments—(pace W. M.!).

[Lost yet again! Humanity will face
Another time, perhaps another place:
Yet soon the final triumph must appear,
And our reward is to have brought it near.]

HEAR how he kept the solemn vow he made
To live or die with those he loved and led—
And hope was gone, yet words of hope he said;
Then pressing friendly hands that would have stayed
His steadfast steps, he reached the barricade:
With loose white locks against the sunset red
He stood aloft a moment, and fell dead
Amid the thunder of the cannonade.

After long years heroically passed
In poverty, imprisonment, and pain,
After the die of fortune boldly cast
For visionary hopes the world calls vain,
He calmly welcomes his reward at last—
The swift sweet death, the bullet in the brain.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SAILORS AND SOCIALISTS.

Comrades,—In last week's number of Commonweal, notice was taken of a reference in the Coast Seamen's Journal to the action of the Glasgow Socialists in the recent strike of seamen and dock labourers. Let me say that the Glasgow Socialists did not ask to speak, and never were refused permission to speak to the Seamen's Union. The seamen's meetings were held in private, and being meetings confined so far as we knew exclusively to members of the union, we did not seek admission. Our action was confined to the dock labourers. Their meetings were held mostly in the open-air, and were addressed by several well-known disciples of Henry George, who were neither seamen nor dock labourers, and who advocated land reformation principles.

Despite this fact the Glasgow Socialists never made any request to speak upon the official platform of the union. What transpired was this:—A member of the dock labourers' committee, seeing a great mass of the men standing at the union office door, asked us if we would address the men, and we replied that we would. He then requested the men to go to the Queen's Dock, where they would hear addresses from Socialists. Upon this an official stood up and stated that he was authorised by the secretary and executive to say that they did not wish Socialists to speak to the men or have anything to do with the strike, and he requested the men to have nothing at all to do with the Socialists. I succeeded in gaining a hearing, and in a short speech explained our principles, and claimed the right to address any body of working-men whether their trades' officials wished it or not. The men received my address enthusiastically, and grumbled at the stupid prohibition of the union officials. We did distribute literature amongst the men, and what is more, collected money in public for them and spoke in their behalf at all our meetings—a thing no other political or trades' society did do. There was no split amongst the dock labourers owing to our action, for whatever our own opinions were concerning the officials and the management of the strike, we never expressed them during the strike. There was indeed a split between the dock labourers and the seamen, and that was owing to the fact that the seamen "went in" without the consent of the labourers, despite the fact (so the labourers alleged) that it had been stipulated that the two unions were to stand or fall together.

Let me say that we believe that the conduct of the officials of the Dock Labourers' Union in this matter was wretchedly partial and cowardly. The secretary was not a seaman or a dock labourer, but was known chiefly as an advocate of Henry Georgism. An individual who appeared to be chief boss of the strike was also neither a seaman nor dock labourer, and not even a member of the union; he was a public exponent of Henry George's theories, and advocated those theories in his speeches to the men. I fail to see that Henry George's unscientific theories have any more to do with a strike of dock labourers than the "scientific" theories of Socialists. Socialists can indeed speak very pertinently to workmen on strike, but Henry Georgites cannot; yet the Georgites were allowed to orate from the official platform, while the Socialists were forbidden to speak to the men on any platform at all!

It is comforting to us to know that if we had thought it our duty, we could have split the union on behalf of Socialism. Never in the presence of any mass of men have we felt such interest in or sympathy with our principles. Numbers of the men knew us personally as advocates of the rights of labour, and not a few of them were avowed Socialists. And I will only add this, that if we had been allowed to associate ourselves with the executive—small in number as we are—we could have suggested things to be done, and could have done much that was left undone, besides imbuing the men with such a recognition of their rights and such a resolution to achieve them, that might have made the issue of the strike both for seamen and labourers in Glasgow more successful than it unfortunately was.—Yours fraternally,

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

THE CASE OF SWEDEN.

A REPLY TO ANARCHIST CRITICISM.

Some of our Anarchistic friends like to speak worse of Socialistic leaders than of capitalists. "The working-men are good, but the leaders are bad" they say, and prove that even such a small morsel of authority as a Socialistic leader cannot avoid possessing and using must necessarily be corrupting, fatal to his finer, really Socialistic qualities. This is all true—so far as I can see. But it would be difficult to point out any occupation whatever which is not depraving under the present all-corrupting society. Even chewing over one's own Anarchist opinions for a length of time may be rather depraving. There is this much good which may be said about the leader, the propagandist—that he is active, that he is in contact with revolutionary life, with the Socialistic work as it is; that he is really spending his energy and sacrificing many of his minor inclinations for the cause. This is certainly educating and ennobling. Therefore I do not think it contradictory to what I admitted above to say that the leader and the propagandist generally are the best men among us.

Look for a moment at Sweden. A population by half a million smaller than that of London is in that country rather evenly spread over a surface more than a third part larger than that of Great Britain, Ireland, and the isles all put together. There are no big cities, but more than a hundred very small ones, with a distance between them of generally more than a hundred, often more than two hundred miles. There are no big centres of industry, but the whole vast country is dotted all over with small factories and mines employing a few dozen workmen each; and often these places are buried in virgin forests and sometimes fifty miles away from the nearest railway station. This is all very nice and picturesque to the tourist, whose nerves are ruined by the turmoil of London, Paris, or Berlin; but it means hard work to the preacher of the coming social order. He must travel far, and be content to speak to a dozen hearers at a time. He finds all industrial and economical matters in a much more primitive stage of evolution than his co-worker in the great industrial countries. He stands often before the necessity of making special analyses upon the circumstances around him, while it is clear that the ordinary phrases would not hit the mark, and would leave Socialism to his hearers a dead, unintelligible sound. He meets in petty local tyrants an immense reactionary force, which is a thing of the past in big industrial centres.

In a very poor, very thinly populated country, the worker is a slave indeed—especially in the country, where there are twenty or thirty miles to the next master. If you can show him that he might liberate himself from his master and be all the better for that, there is a new difficulty to show him—the possibility of freedom from want, from incessant drudgery for his bread. The glorious and encouraging achievements of our modern industry are nearly unknown to him. You have to teach him that too. Such are the difficulties with which our brave Swedish comrades, and more especially the leaders and propagandists ex professo, have to struggle. They have been at work only some three or four years, but have already succeeded in making Socialism known in all the towns and many of the villages of the vast country; they have made thousands of Swedish workers into friends of the Cause, and there is not a magistrate or police official in the country—from the minister of justice in Stockholm to the gendarme of the remotest village in the North—who does not feel uneasy and full of disagreeable emotions when he hears the word Socialism. The powers that be understand already, thanks to the agitation of a dozen devoted men, what an uncompromising enemy of the existing "order" Socialism is; and that is a great achievement in a country like Sweden. Because the government plunges itself at once with a ludicrous naivete into the work of—Socialistic propaganda. Even to the last peasant of the last village come the news of what government is doing. He hears that they fight Socialism with a brutality, a regardlessness of old civil rights, and a prostitution of "justice" hitherto unheard of in the country; and that sets him thinking what Socialism may be. The last great act of socialistic agitation by the Swedish government is the imprisonment of our four principal leaders. Of them and their fight with reaction I will tell next week under "International Notes."

STN.

The Nationalist (9, Hamilton Place, Boston, U.S., 10 cents. per number, 1 dol. per year) is a monthly magazine, well written, edited, and printed, but with a detestable sulphur-coloured cover. Its aims are sufficiently set forth in the following declaration of principles, which appears in each number:—

"The principle of the Brotherhood of Humanity is one of the eternal truths that govern the world's progress on lines which distinguish human nature from brute nature.

"The principle of competition is simply the application of the brutal law of the survival of the strongest and most cunning.

"Therefore, so long as competition continues to be the ruling factor in our industrial system, the highest development of the individual cannot be reached, the loftiest aims of humanity cannot be realised.

"No truth can avail unless practically applied. Therefore those who seek the welfare of man must endeavour to suppress the system founded on the brute principle of competition, and put in its place another based on the nobler principle of association.

"But in striving to apply this nobler and wiser principle to the complex conditions of modern life, we advocate no sudden or ill considered changes; we make no war upon individuals; we do not censure those who have accumulated immense fortunes simply by carrying to a logical end the false principle on which business is now based.

"The combinations, trusts, and syndicates of which the people at present complain, demonstrate the practicability of our basic principle of association. We merely seek to push this principle a little further, and have all industries operated in the interest of all by the nation—the people organised—the organic unity of the whole people.

"The present industrial system proves itself wrong by the immense wrongs it produces; it proves itself absurd by the immense waste of energy and material which is admitted to be its concomitant. Against this system we raise our protest; for the abolition of the slavery it has wrought and would perpetuate, we pledge our best efforts."

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Great Strike at the Docks.

There was great excitement at the East-end of London on Thursday August 15, for on that day a strike broke out affecting over 7,000 dock-labourers. The usual pay of these men has been 5d. an hour; but when the work has been unusually hard and hazardous they have received 6d. They complain that under the present system they only obtain one or two hours' work, and have to wait hours at the dock gate in order to get that. This system of course prevents them from obtaining any other work during the day. They now demand that they shall not be engaged for less than four hours at a time, and that their pay shall be at the rate of sixpence an hour. With a view of splitting the organisation, the Company have offered an advance of sixpence to men in the wood and export departments; but this has been refused unless all the strikers are included in it. The demands of the men are very moderate, for the Star states that at present with their ordinary wages the outside men do not earn more than 1s. 3d. a-day. Every 5,000 tons of unloading that comes into the docks represents between £900 and £1,000 to the companies, out of which sum not quite £300 is spent for labour. Intense sympathy is felt for the strikers in the neighbourhood, and the poor working people literally fill collecting-boxes of the men on strike with coppers. It is certain that those who make a plucky stand against capitalistic tyranny are always sure of the sympathy and help of their fellows.

On Friday, the men marched in procession through the city, John Burns at their head. As they passed by Millwall Docks, 1,000 men threw up their work and joined the procession, though the masters offered them as much as 8d., 9d., or 1s. an hour to stop. A great meeting was afterwards held outside the London Docks to hear the report of the deputation they had sent into the masters. The deputation reported that the masters had agreed that the men should not be employed for less than four hours, but had refused to give a decided answer as to paying the men 6d. instead of 5d. an hour for their ordinary work and 8d. instead of 6d. for overtime. On hearing this report the men decided to remain out. Burns recommended the men to persevere in their decision, and to fight shoulder to shoulder like the gas stokers and match girls.

On Saturday, a very dramatic incident occurred. While Burns was addressing a meeting the dock gates were suddenly opened, and a number of men who were lounging about made a rush forward to get a job; Burns sprang between them and the gates, and asked them in tones of thunder if they were mean enough to take the bread out of the mouths of their fellow men. The men fell back abashed, and joined the ranks of the strikers.

On Sunday morning, a large meeting was held at the East India Dock Gates. Mr. Tillet, the secretary of the Union, mentioned that the company was short of workmen, and that the clerks and officials of the company had been engaged in doing the work of the dock labourers. These gentlemen will be able to appreciate the "blessings of honest labour." It is a pity they could not be put upon the diet of labourers, so that they might enjoy these blessings all at once. Tom Mann, and other speakers, also addressed the meeting, among whom was McCarthy, secretary of the Amalgamated Stevedores. He had an important announcement to make, i.e., that the stevedores, numbering some 3,500, had agreed to throw in their lot with the strikers. The lightermen and watermen have also announced their intention of helping the men all they can.

On Monday the strike spread tremendously. Stevedores, Tilbury dockmen, the lightermen, Victoria and London dockmen, all pouring out to swell the ranks of the strikers. A huge procession of ten thousand marched through the City. The East-end is going simply frantic with excitement. On Tuesday I went into the district. On approaching Limehouse I saw a dense column of men crossing the Commercial Road, and pouring into the narrow streets that border on the river. These I found were the strikers going round to interview the men who still remained in at some of the smaller wharves. At the Free Trade Wharf the procession halted, as there were some men on the premises who had not come out. The crowd cheered and called to them to join them. On their not complying, groans and execrations burst from the crowd, the women being the loudest. The band strikes up the "Dead March"; a man attempts to scale the gates, which have been closed, but is dragged back by the police, who are guarding the wharf. Matters look dangerous, when it is reported that the men are coming out, and the crowd cheer loudly and march on. John Burns has been working very hard; besides continually speaking, he has much of the organisation upon his shoulders. He arranged a clever piece of strategy at the Victoria Dock, bringing the men out by sending twenty men in, who assumed the rôle of rats for that occasion only. Altogether, the strike is going splendidly.

The Stevedores have issued the following manifesto, which is so important that we print it in full:

"TO THE TRADE UNIONISTS AND PEOPLE OF LONDON.

"Friends and fellow-workmen,—The dock-labourers are on strike, and are asking for an advance of wages—the wages they now receive being 5d. per hour daytime and 6d. overtime. They now ask 6d. per hour daytime and 8d. per hour overtime. The work is of the most precarious nature, three hours being the average amount per day obtained by the 'docker.' We, the Union Stevedores of London, knowing the condition of the dock-labourers, have determined to support their movement by every lawful means in our power. We have, therefore, refused to work because of the Dock Company employing scabs and black-legs, who are taking the places of the dock-labourers on strike. We do this not to inconvenience the brokers, shipowners, or master stevedores, as our quarrel is not with them, but we feel our duty is to support our poorer brothers. We are promised the help of the Seamen's and Firemen's Union, and we now appeal with confidence to members of all trade unions for joint action with us, and especially those whose work is in connection with shipping, seagoing engineers and fitters, boilermakers, ship-carpenters, painters and decorators, shipwrights, iron-ship builders, caulkers, etc., etc.; and also the coal-heavers, ballast-men, lightermen and their watchmen. We also appeal to the public at large for contributions and support on behalf of the dock-labourers, which may be sent to Ben Tillet, Great Assembly Hall, Mile-end Road; and in doing this we feel sure that our efforts will be appreciated—not as disturbers nor peacebreakers, but as a demand from men determined to swerve not one inch from the attitude they have taken up, to succour the poor and lift up the down-trodden.—On behalf of the Amalgamated and United Stevedores, THOMAS MCCARTHY and T. M. WILLIAMS, Secs."

The Somersetshire Miners.

The men still hold out. In answer to their employers' offer, the following resolution was passed at a crowded meeting of the men on Thursday 15th, at Radstock: That we cannot accept as a settlement 5 per cent. on Sept. 2 and a conditional 5 per cent. on October 4th next, but are willing to resume work, on condition that we receive an advance of 5 per cent. on the first pay day after resuming work, and an unconditional 5 per cent. on October 1st; and we hereby pledge ourselves not to resume work till these terms are conceded. The executive of the Rhondda Miners' Association has granted them the sum of twenty guineas, and promised to make further efforts to get support from members of their association, and the men on strike are receiving steady support from other districts in England and Wales.

Fellows in Suffering.

The admirable way in which the Welsh miners are supporting their brethren in Somerset is the more remarkable from the fact that some of them have very great difficulty in making both ends meet. At the meeting of the South Wales and Monmouthshire Colliery Workmen's Federation, at which a resolution was passed to help the Somerset miners, it was stated by the Ebbw Vale delegate that at one of the collieries he represented some 30 or 40 men were under notice in consequence of their inability to obtain a livelihood at existing prices. This, we are told, is a period of commercial prosperity, and yet men cannot get a living by the hardest daily slavery. If this can happen during a period of "prosperity," what must it be like when trade is bad? Is it not shameful that the miner, who risks his life in the gloom of the treacherous mine, amid all the perils of fire-damp and the onrush of black subterranean waters, should yet not be able, in a time of "exceptional prosperity," to get a livelihood for himself and his family? This alone is enough to condemn the present system.

The Strike in the Fur Trade.

Mr. Koenigsberg is losing his temper through the long-continued strike, and last week he applied at the police-court for warrants against three of the leaders who had, according to his solicitor, threatened to break the necks of some rats on the premises. We should have thought the extermination of vermin was not an indictable offence. The magistrate refused to give warrants but granted summonses. It is a curious thing that the people who are guilty of treason to their brethren are not "foreigners," but belong to that section of the valiant British race whose main objection to the cheap foreigner appears to be that on some occasions he is before them in turning an "honest penny" as a scab. A large meeting was held in support of the strikers in Victoria Park last Sunday afternoon, which was addressed by Newman, Annie Besant, Herbert Burrows, Turner, and Hicks. Great enthusiasm shown, and a good collection made on behalf of the strikers.

THE GLASGOW CARTERS have had to go in on the master's terms. The latter have promised to consider the wages question shortly, and some of the goods stations now close half an hour earlier than they used to.

NO BANK HOLIDAY FOR MINERS.—Twenty-two miners were summoned at Oldbury Police-court for being absent from work on Bank Holiday. The decision was against the men—it always is—two of whom had to pay 8s. for costs and damages, and the others 4s. It seems a shameful piece of tyranny for miners to be denied the holiday which nearly all other workmen enjoy. They say there is no slavery in England, yet men can be forced to work on a public holiday under legal pains and penalties. N.

Events, like the pendulum of a clock, have swung forward and backward, but after all, man, like the hands, has gone steadily on. Man is growing grander.—Ingersoll.

Unity is a lovely paper, but, but—well, a short time ago it said something about preferring the condition of a cleanly washerwoman in a tenement house to that of Dr. Leete in Edward Bellamy's book. Why? Because amid the splendours of Bellamy's povertyless and crimeless world Dr. Leete and Julian West drank a glass of wine together! Fancy defending the present state of things, because it is possible to conceive of a washerwoman in a tenement house who doesn't drink beer, and warning persons against a change because the washerwoman's grandson, the heir of a splendid civilisation, might become addicted to an occasional glass of wine! How happily it that many persons who have such sharp eyes for the horrors of Calvinism cannot see anything wrong in the social laws that foreordain so many millions to a present hell!—Twentieth Century.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Labour Elector, since John Burns and Cunninghame Graham have associated their names with it, has been so far redeemed from its former repute that it is possible to take note of it without quite so much sacrifice of self-respect as would have been demanded hitherto. In his last issue its ostensible editor has conferred upon the Commonweal the honour of an attack for its "inconsistency," a vice (or virtue) his worst enemy would fail to fasten upon himself since he entered upon his present pursuit, and utilised the envenomed stiletto of his pen upon the backs of all those who refused to follow him. Taking an extract from a note by the present writer (page 230, No. 187, Aug. 10) and another from the resolution of comrade Merlino (page 259, No. 188, Aug. 17), he prints them side by side, thus prefacing them:—"Here are two cuttings from a recent issue, for the first of which"—i.e., Merlino's—"the present, and for the second, a past, Secretary of the Socialist League"—myself—"is responsible."

Passing by the calculated seeming carelessness with which the two cuttings are bracketed as alike editorial, and taken from one and the same number, it may be pointed out that comrade Merlino is not—nor ever has been—Secretary of the Socialist League, or, indeed, one of its members; is not, nor has been, connected in any way with the Commonweal. Whether we agree or disagree with his opinions, he alone is "responsible" for them. That this was known to the editor of the Labour Elector when he wrote as above, even he will scarce have the evil courage to deny; most certainly is it known to very nearly every one who is at all closely acquainted with the movement in England. Can it be that it was the consciousness of this which led him to depart from his usual practice of personal abuse, and to avoid all naming of names throughout the notes that are now under notice?

The Commonweal does not often care to deal with mere attacks upon its policy, or insults levelled at its conductors. It has always kept aloof from the pitiful quarrels which occur in and discredit our—as every other—movement. It has never turned spiteful under criticism, nor made party controversies a cover for personal malignity, let those do so who would. It has held the Cause too highly to serve it after such fashion. But it may be as well that all should know that this is done of set purpose, and not from insensibility or cowardice; that though the need of criticism is recognised, the limits of its fair exercise liberally construed, and a warm welcome accorded to all friendly discussion of differing opinions, no immunity is extended to studied and gratuitous misrepresentation.

Some woman, having more wealth, she confesses, than she knows what to do with, has sent ten thousand-pound bank notes to the Prince of Wales, whose late exercise upon the hereditary begging-dish had excited her pity. This woman is no doubt one of those who grind the faces of the poor, and exact their "due" to the uttermost farthing. She has not even the saving grace, small as that may be, of those who, as old Burton says, "when, by fraud and rapine, they have extorted all their lives, oppressed whole provinces, societies, etc., give something to pious uses, build a satisfactory almshouse, school, or bridge, etc., at their last end, or before perhaps, which is no otherwise than to steal a goose and stick down a feather, rob a thousand to relieve ten." But she is no doubt a good Christian of the common type, and holds with all her heart as a divine ordinance that "unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance, but from him that hath not shall be taken away, even that which he hath."

Alfonso XIII., King of Spain, and all the rest of it, took his first sea-bath one day last week. Another, and a slightly older sovereign, Ranavalo III., of Madagascar, had taken her annual dip a little while before. Both events were duly chronicled in all the dignity of the daily newspaper for the benefit of a wondering world. There was somewhat of interest in either event after all; for Alphonso, being by a long way the youngest king alive, is in so far the best, though "oft waxes wolf in youngling." And it might have been noted as a sign of progress that the water wherewith Ranavalo sprinkled the crowd in sign of blessing had been dipped from her bath before, instead of after, as hitherto, her royal body had been laved therein. How sad to see, even in simple, far-off Madagascar, how folk are losing faith in the inherent virtue of the uncleannesses of kings!

Tantia Bheel has been taken once more, and this time it looks as though English locks and bayonets would safely hold the celebrated brigand. The tales of his adventurous life, which are the delight of Indian story-tellers, will now have another added to their number, and it may be with a tragic ending; though it is to be hoped his unexhausted ingenuity and fertility of resource may get him out of trouble again, to be for years to come a friend of the poor and a terror to the rich. A biting satire upon modern morality, to see a band of robbers by the strong hand, the English in India, upholding law and order!—hunting to death a poor brigand, who does them no harm, because he has not learnt their civilised methods, and prefers the hill-side and the highway to the market-place and the law court. Of them can the Indian say, almost in Tyndale's words: "The money-lender sheareth, the judge shaveth, the soldier polleth, the lawyer scrapeth, and the policeman pareth; we lack but a butcher to pull off the skin." While Tantia Bheel took only from the rich, and that when they could specially well spare it, the civilised law-'n'-order machine goes on for ever, and presses hardest on the poor, on whom it does not even confer an occasional passing benefit, as Tantia Bheel is known to have often done.

The printing trade in Victoria is agitating for "a rectification of postal anomalies." In the adjoining colony of New South Wales, papers and periodicals are transmitted free through the post, and the consequence is that a large amount of printing has been taken away from Melbourne to Sydney. One firm actually saves £1,000 a year by printing and publishing in Sydney. It would seem to an outsider that the best thing for the Victorians to do would be to imitate the New South Welsh plan and adjust matters in that way, rather than get the plan put aside where it is already at work. As the affair stands now it affords the material for a good deal of reflection upon the misorganisation of industry, which is the special mark of the present system.

Who was the daring strategist to whom was due the Royal visit to Wales? A right skilful move in the political game, and one by no means easy to effectively return; while every day that elapses before some effort at retaliation is made only enhances the difficulty. For a long, long while past the Liberals have loudly boasted of their hold on "gallant little Wales"; none elsewhere was like the Welshman; sturdy disestablishers, neck-or-nothing Gladstonians, with every other Liberal virtue, and no vice, the people of "the Principality" were eulogised on every Liberal platform in the kingdom. If it were possible to find an even more pure and perfect civic hero than the ordinary Welshman (always providing that he voted Liberal), it was that Welshman's spiritual pastor and master of the Nonconformist pattern. "Mabon's" Jubilee delirium, and that of a thousand others to the contrary notwithstanding, the pleasing fiction has been kept alive; at the cost, it is true, of a disproportionate amount of trouble.

But lo! and look ye! Into the midst of the serried ranks of the rebels—in a polite and constitutional way—goes Victoria, like a late and vulgarised version of the ride of Richard II. at Smithfield, with very nearly the same result. The ranks break up. One manly remnant keeps fast hold upon its flag, closes up around it, and warns every one of the trick. But alas for the constancy of all but the sternest democrats! The large body of Welsh Liberalism is on its belly in the mud, only too happy to be hand-shaken, smiled on, spat upon—anything from Royal hands or Royal lips—while the units who compose it are shrieking curses upon their late comrades, who have retained some amount of insight as well as self-respect, for their discourtesy, their this, their that, and the other! And the loudest shriekers are Nonconformist parsons. Among them may perchance be found a worthy follower of Walworth, and the red dagger may yet be charged upon the coat of arms of a Cymric rival of the City.

Amid all the hubbub nobody seems to care a brass farthing for the working-class, or what their opinion of it all may be. Perhaps that is just as well for the peace of mind of the poor, perspiring Loyalists!

The dock labourers' strike is, in the opinion of many men who have witnessed some of the greatest labour struggles of the past, one of the grandest and most enthusiastic revolts of the workers against the domination of capital. Here I mean to consider it from a Socialist standpoint, for it certainly points out to the workers a new method of fighting their tyrants. It is evident that the workers are beginning to recognise the fact that their salvation lies in their own action.

One of the effects of our patient propaganda is seen in the notion of the men, that a general strike is the way to win a victory. The men in the immense processions which have traversed the East-end repeatedly called upon the clerks, the men, the women, and girls to come out and join them in the revolt of labour. This is a very encouraging sign.

We hear much now of obtaining palliative measures by Parliamentary and Governmental action. Why should not the workers gain all they want by a series of gigantic strikes, larger and more general than even the fight for a small instalment of justice by the dock labourers of the East-end? Would it not have far more effect than any amount of palaver inside Parliament or the County Council?

THE CO-OPERATIVE FESTIVAL.

CRYSTAL PALACE, AUGUST 17TH.

Just this time last year, in noticing the Co-operators' show at the Crystal Palace, I had an opportunity of punctuating a few of the little peculiarities of the Co-operators, and their captious treatment of Socialists and their methods. In the twelve months which have passed since then there have been in the pages of the chief Co-operative organ repeated proofs of the jealousy with which the spread of Socialist ideas is watched by the bigwigs of the Co-operative movement. The tu quoque may not be effective argument; and although to note schisms among Co-operators does not extenuate schisms among Socialists, yet when it becomes possible to draw a serious moral from certain events, it becomes a duty to do so which cannot be flinched from by any faithful reporter. If any Socialists who read the following have any earnest hope in Co-operation as an aid to, or part of, Socialism, now is their opportunity; and at the risk of being charged with egotism, I would ask them to turn back to the Commonweal for September 1st and 8th last year and weigh up some remarks there made in the light of another year's teaching. Dealing with the Co-operative Congress of 1888, the Pall Mall Gazette said, "Slowly but surely the Co-operative movement in this country has come to a final parting of the ways, and according to the path now chosen will depend whether its future is for good or evil, . . . profit-sharing or profit-mongering. . . . The profit-mongering plan is that which has been gradually growing in favour; and if the process is continued, then the last state of the working classes will be no whit better than the first." "The longest heads in the Co-operative camp are all of one way of thinking in the matter." In the Commonweal of September 1, 1888, I remark that "these same long heads are responsible for the Festival, which is the evidence of a revolt against the growing domination of the consumer, represented in the main by the Co-operative Wholesale Society, the hydra-monopolist of the movement. It is quite in accordance with the eternal spirit of 'compromise' which runs through the English mind, that while the official handbook and catalogue gives a list of 'forty-two' Co-operative productive societies, the whole show was a sort of strike of 'forty-one' societies against the forty-second, the biggest and greediest."

That these words were not one whit too strong has been abundantly proved during the past twelve months; and the promoters of the Co-operative Festival might almost be excused if they echoed the words suggested by the poet to be addressed to the tyrant Ten:

"Our very hearts, that were so high, sink down beneath your will:
Riches and land and pomp and state, ye have them, keep them still."

For, say the best that can be said for it, the Festival of 1889 must be reported as very small beer indeed; a result brought about by using all the methods usually adopted by a selfish, interested but rich and powerful section.

The organisers of the show would probably not care to admit that "failure" is the word to write against 1889, but judging by the ordinary rules applied to exhibitions, I cannot see what else to say of it. In 1888 there were represented forty-two societies; this year there are only thirty, and this in spite of the fact of there being three or four societies not in last year because not then in existence. Co-operators are fond of saying much to the progressiveness of their movement, but the claim seems somewhat discounted by this exhibition. Something has to be allowed for the fact that the executive this year have ruled out one or two societies as not accurately coming within the exact definition of a co-operative productive society, "that the workers participate in the produce and management of their own labour." But even making this allowance, the exhibition, as an attempt to impress the outside labourer with what Co-operation can do for him, can make but a very slight impression indeed.

In the Home Industries portion of the show, although perhaps the number of entries was larger, there seemed a decided falling off in the general standard of quality and interest, and the greater number was much made up by, the admission of exhibits which had the very remotest connection with the root idea of the Festival.

The Fruits, Flowers, and Vegetables portion occupied, as last year, almost the whole length of the nave of the Palace; but the Baron of Manchester, in his speech at the "great" Co-operative demonstration in the concert hall, protested against the amount of space taken up by the grapes of rich men. A very interesting feature of the first Co-operative Flower Show was the discussing of some short papers on cottage gardens, allotments, potit culture, etc., the idea being to foster love of outdoor work and enjoyment among workers. This feature seems to be now quite lost sight of, it forming no part of the last programme.

Last year the official handbook of the Festival contained an introduction giving roughly the position of the Productive section of the Co-operative movement. I should have much liked to have added to my last year's report a comparative statement of the position now, but the spirits of the compilers seem to have been quenched by twelve months' somewhat bitter opposition, and neither from handbook or speeches was a word to be learned as to what the last year has done towards putting labour on more level terms with capital.

If, failing to learn anything of twelve months' progress in bulk, the enquirer turns to the handbook, he has little reward for his labour in endeavouring to learn of progress by individual societies; for taking one, the Burnley Self-Help Society, founded 1887, we have offered to us precisely the figures and information of last year's book. The Coventry Watch-makers act in the same manner. Earls Barton Boot-makers gave a few figures last year, but none this. Hebden Bridge Fustian-cutters give fewer figures than last year; and the only thing that can be said, if the information given is to be accepted, is that from a labour point of view they simply mark time, for the number of sharing workpeople then and now is the same—200. This is the fashion of this handbook throughout; and keeping in mind that the Festival was intended as, and should be, a splendid bit of propaganda, it is not too much to say such compiling is simply idiotic, apart from being misleading.

Co-operators have for years been saying theirs is the message of hope for the toilers. As to distributionist Co-operation, most workers and all Socialists have given up any respect to that method of relief. Some have still a hope that in productive Co-operation there is yet a road to be found. If this be so it is imperative on the advanced Co-operators to prove it. Socialists who are Co-operators will be glad of any evidence that "true Co-operation" is progressing at something like the same rate as the need for it. There is much fear that this is not so.

A function such as that of August 17th should of all things show the progress and position year by year; it should encourage the hopeful to renewed effort and deter the many enemies of labour who, although Co-operators in name, are straining every nerve to keep labour subject.

Socialists who are at one with Co-operators have now an opportunity to prove the faith that is in them, for at the public meeting in the evening a step was taken to which, in view of its seriousness and possibilities, I now draw special attention. Last year the exhibition of Co-operative productions was made to bulk up largely by the admission of productions which in the true sense of the word were not Co-operative products. In the twelve months just past there has been an increased bitterness of feeling between the two schools of Co-operators, and it has been abundantly proved, as the Daily News says, noticing the show, "that often the worst enemies of Co-operation are those of its own household." The boycott, unwritten but effective, which has been put in force by the conservatives of the movement has now brought things to a head in the suggestion to legally found a new organisation for the active propaganda of Co-operation on the basis of "workers' rights" and no other. In view of the various organisations in the movement already, this is a serious step, but is fully warranted, because, in the words of E. V. Neale's presidential address, "in those parts of England where Co-operation has won her greatest triumphs, faith in the true Co-operative ideal has been choked by the enormous growth of the institutions that originally sprang out of itself," because of the engrossing worship of the great goddess "Divi."

There is a dry-rot at work in the Co-operative movement; brought about by stagnation of capital in the hands of a bastard plutocracy; a section who insist on the very extremity of their bond, as at Hebden Bridge, where recently a proposition to reduce interest to capital from 7½ to 5 was beaten by 137 votes against 73.

The Socialist Co-operative Federation and its sympathisers should now show some reason for existence by bringing "productive Co-operation" to the front as the true embodiment of the Co-operative idea—the idea that has inspired the great prophets of social evolution."

I have said so much on the side issues arising out of the show that little room is left to say much of the meeting, beyond expressing the hope that in future it will be much better arranged. E. V. Neale and George Jacob Holyoake have done splendid work in the past, but it is now absolute cruelty to put them up to address a meeting in such a villainously constructed room; not fifty people could have heard the president. Also it will be better in future to find speakers with something more of real interest in the movement than can be in such men as Burdett Coutts, M.P., and W. F. Lawrence, M.P.; it is farcical to put such men up as having working-class interests at heart.

The attendance was 32,500; not an insignificant number, but short of what should have been with the extra effort made and the prestige of last year to help.

ANACHARSIS.

HYMN FOR THE UNENFRANCHISED.

(FROM THE Chartist Circular, 1841.)

Who is the Patriot, who is he
When slaves are struggling to be free,
Freedom's best-beloved may claim
To be her holiest Oriflame?

He who joineth hands with Power,
When the anarchy would devour Trampled Right insurgent? He Is no friend of Liberty.

He who claimeth kin with Right
Perfumed or in ermine dight,
Knowing not the "rabble"? He Hateth Truth and Liberty.

Who "for Truth's sake" would embrace
A Lie, who seeks fit time and place
To traffic with his birthright? We Follow not expediency.

He who through distress and scorn
Freedom's Cross hath grandly borne,
The Uncompromising—he shall be
The banner-man of Liberty!

Though he wear no tittle-brand,
Though he own no stolen land,
Prouder as an upright man
Than to crawl in Fashion's van,
Though his bearing be uncouth,
Though his zeal be rude as truth,
Though he lieth never,—He Shall lead the Bond to victory!

MERLINO'S RESOLUTION.

Comrade Merlino should have an alias, Micawber. He appears to be severely determined to wait until something turns up. While such Socialists as he—they are known to the vulgar as sentimental Socialists—are turning the air sulphurous with big words behind which there is no shadow of meaning, common men are plodding along with the practical business of the Revolution, receiving as thanks the Merlinoistic sneers and libels. These "out and outers" are out of range altogether. They have taken wing to cloudland, and until they feel their feet again on this solid round earth they are as distinctly lost to the Revolution as, say, Morris's Anarchists. After removing from Merlino's resolution a certain dilution of platitude and heightened talkee-talkee, you have nothing left but reactionary utopianism. All that the party of action is doing is, to Merlino and Co., the wages of sin.

When he tells us that "labour legislation would be the confirmation of our slavery" (as though it required confirming!), and that "it would be unjust to attempt to equalise" the relations of the nations economically, however one may feel a sneaking doubt as to the economic soundness of some of the Parisian minutes, one nevertheless is not less inclined to scent in Merlino the Capitalist wolf under Socialist wool. Then we have an aggravatingly gaseous paragraph all about the glories of freedom, "a great moral principle," quotha, "incompatible with regulations and measures" such as those which the Socialist Labour Party sees to be inevitable—stepping-stones across the river. We all know as well as Merlino that we shall none the sooner get our whole loaf by begging and cringing for crusts and crumbs at a time. But is this swashbuckler so little familiar with the concrete facts of weekaday life as to imagine either that the obtaining of that whole in one lump is possible scientifically, or desirable as to expediency? It is awfully easy, and it sounds heroically "thorough," to scout as heresy the possibility of the ballot-box; but what sort of machinery would these light and airy impossibilists invent for us, untainted with the stamp of things modern? Is their Socialism still in the amateur fluidity of Catastrophe? As Shaw would say, do they intend to establish the Social Commonwealth by waving the red flag and howling the "Marseillaise"?

What does Merlino mean by "the offer of labour legislation officially made by the Governments"? Has not every "responsible" statesman of them all set a hard face and put his finger in his ear against "labour legislation"? Why does he so strenuously object to "bridging the abyss, instead of deepening it"? Is this not sacrificing sense to sawdust? We "must suppress government and private property together." Good! And will Merlino be our Aladdin, and will he reveal to us the secret of his lamp? It is simply an inconsequent inversion of historic commonplace to say the "abolition of the governmental system is an essential for the abolition of the capitalist system." Flesh-and-blood men and women can only "abolish" that system by hard detail work and carefully framed though far-reaching measures, practical working-class reforms. The policy of vague abstractions and fascinating mystery is played out. When a boy is getting too big for his clothes, he does not cast away everything—from undershirt to boots and hat—in one night, and don a brand-new rig-out next morning. It is done in pieces. So with the revolution. But this revolution is not some shadowy theoretic hobgoblin in the prospective vista. It is taking place—and has been for quite a time. We shall not put our head out of window some morning because of the din, and perceive it marching up the street in uniform. Evolution is continuous; and while your Merlino's are gassing and anticipating, their ideal future becomes ancient history, and their contentless shibboleths an anachronism. What are we to think of language like "reducing Socialism to the meaner proportion of class legislation"? Socialism in the 'eighties is a class movement, and its politics mean the absorption of the nation into a class. Take an example. Practical Socialists are denounced as "traitors" attempting "to gild the chains of the workers." Free education, higher and secular, is one of the tamest of the "palliatives." Yet the passage of such a Bill through your hated Parliament would have more effect in five years for the Revolution pure and undefiled than the siege of London and the shelling of the Tuileries by the mobilised proletariat of western Europe. The temporary absorption, again, of a percentage of the unemployed by an eight hour Bill, wretchedly mean and discouragingly possible though it be, would be worth ten-fold more as a tactical precedent than a league of cheap nothings ament "reconciling the workers to their present position." And if it proved "commercially impossible," so much the better for the Socialist tortoise, whose main chance in the struggle is the conversion of the Philistine difficulty into his own opportunity.

LEONARD HALL.

PUSHING "COMMONWEAL."

Dear Sir,—Every week I send half a dozen 'Weals' to different parts of "The Wide (not awake) World," and would wish each of your readers would do likewise. It would greatly aid the church militant—missionaries and all—save expense and redeem people's bodies and souls, and render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, etc., etc., and establish a new heaven on earth.—Yours truly,

G. E. HARRIS.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The decomposition of the old bourgeois and social democratic parties goes on rapidly. Of the former we need not speak here; as to the latter the Blanquists are now split over the election question, and the often revealed Boulangist sympathies of a part of them have been established a fact as to Granger and others, who left the Central Revolutionary Committee in which Vaillant and others remained. Félix Pyat is hardly buried before like vultures they rush upon his inheritance, the seat for Parliament in the Bouches-du-Rhône; Jules Guesde carried the palm. The late political events, Boulangism, etc., have cleared the ranks of the French Socialists of many who could not resist temptations of various kinds, and the elections next month will continue this work.

A new Marxist organ, Le Salarial, has been started at Rouen.

BELGIUM.

The Social Democratic papers record with satisfaction that at the Congress of the working-men's societies of the Borinage, held at Paturages on August 15th, the amalgamation of the Belgian Worker's Party (the official Social Democratic Party) and the Republican Socialist Party was resolved upon. A large demonstration to celebrate this event is to take place in September or October. Our readers will remember that after much previous quarrelling, a number of societies led by Conreur, Loor, Mignon, Minne, behind whom the family Defuissaux acted, seceded from the Congress of Mons (Aug. 14th and 15th, 1887) and formed the new party. The last Conference of this party, at Châtelet, in December, 1888, led to the process of Mons a few months ago, which showed it to be, by the intermediary of the spy Pourbaix, a tool in the hands of the reactionary ministry to frighten the bourgeois with. This trial ended, as is known, with the complete moral, but we cannot say intellectual, victory of the accused; and then negotiations with the old party began, and have, so far as can be seen, now succeeded. There was no great difference of principle between the parties, the dissensions arose out of the unsocialistic way in which the official party at Brussels and Ghent acted towards the miners in the famous strike of 1886. Thence those dissatisfied with the officialism and selfishness of their better-situated comrades, rejected their very patient palliative measures and co-operation policy, but unfortunately fell victims to a new fetish, the Belgian republic, universal suffrage, etc. Now they return under the ferule of Defnet and Anseele, the latter of whom, with his big stick, will henceforward rule over them! The Anarchist propaganda, meanwhile, goes on steadily, and the Drapeau Noir, its organ, is now a weekly paper.

AUSTRIA.

The large strikes are partly over, and have mostly ended in merely nominal concessions, which were virtual defeats to the workers. The police brutalities at Klado, Leoben, etc., are known; at Trifail about 200 persons were arrested, who after the dissolution of a meeting did not immediately leave the hall; 482 men, women, and children were cooped up in the cells, corridors, and gardens of the jail of Cilli. When under the pressure of those torturing conditions the police offered them to give in by accepting a little higher wages; they did so, and a part was then let free. This shows how law-'n'-order are mere tools in the hands of this and of every other ruling clique, by which, as a highwayman with his pistol, they extort whatever they like from the victims of the law-'n'-order superstition.

RUSSIA.

The Arbeiterstimme, of Zurich, publishes extracts from the reports of the Russian factory inspectors. In 1887, there were 789,322 workers employed in 21,247 establishments (105,498 respectively, 2,888 of them in Poland); 73.2 per cent. of them are men, 23.3 per cent. women, 2.4 per cent. boys, and 1.1 per cent. young girls. Although there are some laws on women's and children's labour in existence, it is stated that out of 578 factories visited in Poland in 1887, only in 33 establishments these regulations were followed. Children under the age of twelve are worked 15½ hours per day. The majority of Polish workers work 13, often 14 and 15 hours; in Northern Russia: 14 to 16 hours, average 13½; in Southern Russia: 14 hours as a rule. A great part of the Polish industry, which is developing faster than the Russian, is in the hands of German capitalists, and who would hinder the British capitalists in case of an eight hour's bill ever being passed to invest their capital in such countries. By this also the number of English workers required would decrease, and so the number of the unemployed become about the same as now. "International legislation" as at present proposed against this is a mere phrase, a new utopian illusion.

A new Radical paper called the Voix has just appeared in Paris. It is to be carried on chiefly by M. Millerand, who has worked under M. Clémenceau on the Justice, and other well-known deputies, some influential members of the town council. The Voix complains that but one law benefiting the working-class has passed both Chambers in 17 years, namely, that regulating trades' unions, and that every measure for the protection of miners, railway servants, and others from the great capitalists has been thrown out at the Luxembourg.

FELIX PYAT.

ONCE driven into exile, first in Switzerland and soon afterwards in Belgium, Pyat was far from remaining inactive. From Brussels he published his most virulent pamphlets, addressed to the Comte de Chambord, to Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, to the Prince de Joinville, to Barbès, to the French working-classes, and many others. After the coup d'état of Napoleon, he came over to London, where he lived until 1869, and was a member of the "Revolutionary Commune" just started at that time, and afterwards of the French Section of the International Working-men's Association, which section, however, was never recognised by the General Council of that Association. While here, again, he advocated in many pamphlets the cause of the Social Revolution, but it must be said that he generally put more stress upon political than on social matters, and in the years down to 1870 he spent the greater part of his talent and of his energies in waging war especially against the French Empire as such. His further ideas are broadly expounded in the Lettre aux Proscrits of 1855: a claim for the institution of a revolutionary Commune, more in accordance with the ideas of the French Revolution of 1793 than with modern Socialism. Born under the First Empire, in the full swing of the Caesarean era, Pyat's head was chiefly filled with the great dramatic events accomplished by the Convention; he was, as it were, permeated by the heroic grandeur of that period, and his enthusiastic admiration caused him sometimes to forget, or at least to lose sight of, the new conditions under which alone the emancipation of the proletariat can be accomplished. When, on the 14th of January, 1858, Orsini attempted to do away with the accursed misruler of France, Pyat hastily published an eloquent defence of the enterprise of the Italian revolutionist. For this defence he was prosecuted in England, at the instance of Napoleon, as were also Simon Bernard, and the publishers Truelove and Tchorzewski. They were all acquitted, however, and it will be remembered that the Palmerston administration, which instituted the proceedings, fell under the pressure of public opinion, at that time decidedly hostile to such prosecutions; an episode to be contrasted with what happened in 1881 to John Most, accused of the same "offence" by a Liberal government and sentenced to sixteen months' hard labour.

During the month of November, 1865, the students of the University of Liège convened an International Congress, and fifteen hundred scholars came together from all parts of Europe. It was, after the constitution of the International Working-men's Association at St. Martin's Hall, London, on the 28th of September, 1864, the first great real revolutionary demonstration since Europe at large had been reduced to an ignominious silence by the imperial adventurer of the Tuileries. To give a slight idea of the significance of this Congress, one need only go back to the wild utterances of the bourgeois press of the time:—The speeches were worthy of Marat, of the Père Duchesne of Hébert, they were far ahead of the programme of Babœuf, of the doctrines of the Levellers of England, the Anabaptists of Münster, the Jacques of the Middle Ages, and so on. Such were the appreciations of the press, and although very silly, they are sufficient to account for the importance of the Congress. Félix Pyat wrote, on this occasion, his Lettre aux Etudiants, especially addressed to the French members of the Liège Conference. His pamphlet was as eloquent as ever, but this time at least he failed to appreciate rightly the value of the international gathering of Liège. He contended that the French students ought not to have gone out of France, that the Emperor could best be beaten in their own country, that the course followed by the students was an anti-democratic one, since it would fatally result in a separation into two camps of the revolutionary elements—the brainworkers and the manual workers. Five years afterwards the greater part of the French students did at Paris what they had promised at Liège: Gustave Tridon, Longuet, Rey, Regnard, Eugène Protot, Fontaine, Sibrac, Jaclard, Vaillant, Dubois, Villeneuve, Lafargue, and scores of others were in the ranks of the Commune; those who died for the cause and those who escaped the wholesale slaughter by the Versailles, having equally been true and faithful to the solemn oath they swore in that memorable Congress.

At last, after twenty years of proscription, the amnesty of Aug. 15, 1869, brought him back to Paris, where he at once resumed his journalistic career. He first contributed to the Rappel, then one of the most important opposition papers, and in seventeen days work won four convictions amounting to seventeen months of imprisonment. At a banquet held at St. Mandé, a suburb of Paris, on January 21, 1870, after Victor Noir's assassination by Pierre Bonaparte, his secretary, Gromier, read the celebrated toast "To a Bullet" (for Napoleon, of course), for which he was prosecuted, along with other conspirators, before the High Court of Blois and sentenced in contumaciam (he had again reached London by that time), August 9, 1870, to five years imprisonment and a fine of six thousand francs. Altogether since the year 1849, Pyat was sentenced to fines amounting to two hundred and twelve thousand francs, to deportation for life, to twenty-nine years and five months imprisonment, five years of especial police survey, and ten years deprivation of all civic rights. And there were still some more convictions for him in store.

As soon as Napoleon, "his personal enemy," had played out at Sedan, Pyat once more crossed the Channel and started Le Combat, wherein he vigorously attacked the Gambetta régime. It was in this paper that the first news of the surrender of Metz by Bazaine was published on October 28, which led to many quarrels between Pyat, Flourens, and Rochefort. The official Gazette disavowed the truth of the information, and the offices of the paper were ransacked by the National Guard. Three days afterwards the government was compelled to confirm the terrible tidings, and Gambetta made his famous proclamation against the "traitor Bazaine." The result was the uprising of October 31, in which Pyat took a prominent part, but the movement failed, as hardly any one save Blanqui and Pyat did their proper duty. After a fortnight's imprisonment, Pyat continued his campaign in Le Combat until General Vinoy suppressed it altogether. On February 4, 1871, he started Le Vengeur, and four days after he was elected to the Bordeaux Assembly by 145,872 votes. On March 12, this last paper was also suppressed, but it reappeared under the Commune. Pyat became a member of the Paris Commune for the 10th Arrondissement, voted for the decree on the hostages, for the institution of the Committee of Public Safety, of which he was also a member. On May 22, when the Versailles entered Paris, he published the last issue of Le Vengeur, and made a vigorous appeal for resistance. On his proposition it was decided on that day that every member of the Commune should retire to his own arrondissement, there to lead the fedérés on the barricades. He was sentenced to death on March 27, 1873, by the third Court Martial, but by then he was in London again. We must say that his actions during the period of the Commune, are described most unfavourably to him in the works of Lissagaray and Arthur Arnould. He neither agreed with the Socialists nor, of course, with the Radicals, and went his own way, an advocate of the barren political revolution. After a new term of exile of eight years, during which he wrote many a pamphlet, now of a more decidedly Socialist character, he returned to Paris and edited La Commune, which became indeed an important paper. His articles on the glorification of regicide and the use of physical force in general are certainly the best that have ever been written on those especial lines, but they soon brought him to a new trial and a sentence of two years imprisonment, which put an end to the new venture. Never tired of working for his ideas, in spite of his old age, he edited afterwards La Commune Libre, followed by La Commune Affranchie, and contributed to La France, of Maujan, in which he gave "The Writings of the People," and to Le Cri du Peuple, which he left in 1888, when Séverine, its chief editor, severed her connection with the revolutionary organ, once famous under Jules Vallès's brilliant leadership. In March of the same year, Pyat had been elected member of the Chamber of Deputies for Marseilles (Bouches-du-Rhône).

A few days before his death, a law of amnesty was voted by the Chamber, excluding the convicted miners of Decazeville, the Algerians who took part in the insurrection of 1871, and all those sentenced for libel through the press. Old Pyat brought in a counter-bill, proclaiming a full and complete amnesty for all. "I am the oldest revolutionary deputy," he said, "so old, indeed, that I no longer live in hopes of re-entering a new-elected Chamber. As a child, I have seen the results effected by the first Boulanger, the Prussians at Orleans; later, I saw the results achieved by the second Boulanger, the Germans at Tours; I should not wish to witness the results to be brought about by the third, the Germans all over France. This is my political will. I have been amnestied six times, and I come forward to plead the cause of those who have been less fortunate than myself and are still in the bagnios, whilst I am a deputy. The present government is about to have the ashes of a regicide brought back to France amidst great honours, and yet they keep in the galleys the very man who has tried to save France . . . and Russia. I claim the deliverance of Bérézowsky!"

In conclusion, it may be said that the old veteran of the revolutionary cause was a fair, but somewhat antiquated, sample of the Socialists and Democrats of some forty years ago. He knew how to incite to fighting and understood it, to attack an existing government with the most pointed weapons, but he lacked a true appreciation of the place of economic questions in the Socialist movement. After all, he remained faithful to himself and to the cause of the people. His name will be recorded with honour in the revolutionary annals of the nineteenth century. Besides, as a man of letters, after having first revealed to France, Claude Tillier, a vigorous pamphleteer, and Hégésippe Moreau, a great poet, he has conquered for himself one of the highest and most prominent places in the literary history of his country.

LITERARY NOTES.

We are asked to state that copies of Les deux Congrès . . . Impossibilistes can be had free on application, from Freedom office, 28, Gray's Inn Road.

We have received for review two numbers of the Political World, a weekly newspaper on Liberal-Radical lines. It may be described as a little more advanced than the Daily News and a little less so than the Star. It goes in for a weekly cartoon. Of those in the two numbers which have reached us, the first, dealing with the housing of the poor, has a centre picture representing John Morley, as the coming minister, introducing Professor Stuart, as the dauntless reformer, to Lord Rosebery, in the neighbourhood of Trafalgar Square. The noble lord appears to be engaged in wondering as to whom that person may be, and the Professor looks, as is very natural, extremely nervous in such a lofty presence, and as if anxiously seeking a place where he can drop a bundle of bills under his arm, of which he seems to be heartily ashamed. The centre picture is supported by a London policeman in the well-known characters of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. For the present he is Hyde, but under the soothing influence of the County Council he will become as calm and as benignant as the doctor of Louis Stevenson's well-known romance. If the prophetic eye of the Political World may be trusted, he will also become fat as well as friendly. We remark that he still holds on to his truncheon. Is there no chance of a relapse into his former savage condition? The rest of the cartoon is occupied by representations of the way in which the workers are forced to live under the rule of the jerry-building capitalist, who is all the while luxuriating in bestial luxury. But will the London Programme alter that? The second cartoon is by Walter Crane, and is to be utilised in future as a cover to the Political World. It represents labour (typified in the inappropriate person of Mr. Gladstone) fighting a mail-clad feudal knight (Lord Salisbury). Mr. Gladstone, who—a capitalist by birth, a banker by marriage, and a landlord by choice—and withal an ordinary Liberal politician—impersonates the people. Liberty smiles from above upon the combat, but seems undecided as to the direction of her sympathy with the combatants. On the whole, considering that the paper is evidently written for the middle classes, the editor and publisher may be congratulated on their spirit and enterprise in helping the revolutionary propaganda by so plainly picturing the fight between labour and privilege. The design in itself is of high excellence, as might be expected from the name of the artist.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

THE REVOLT AT THE DOCKS.

I HAVE been an attentive spectator of the scenes that have occurred in East London during the last few days, and I purpose here, instead of giving a dry catalogue of the events that have occurred during the past week, to relate some of my own impressions of what is probably the greatest uprising of labour that has occurred during the present century in the East-end. But before describing the events and actors, let us look at the scene of this immense drama. It is the fashion now to be able, by personal experience, to talk about the East-end, but few of our benevolent slum visitors know anything at all of the region that lies between the Commercial Road and the river, and between the Tower and Limehouse. I will say still more, and that is that many of the dwellers even in the East-end know as little of this mysterious region as they do of Central Africa. No one but the inhabitants of Dock-land can guide you through that labyrinth of narrow lanes that seem cut through the towering walls of lofty warehouses, to be varied now and then by an iron bridge, thrown across the entrance to a dock, which now is like a placid lake, silence brooding around. You cross the bridge, and, passing by a wall, through which you catch a glimpse of some green grass, where some empty casks are piled on a bit of waste land near the river, you ascend a hill and enter a slummy street, gloomy houses, two or three stories high; shops which in most cases seemed to be occupied in vending some frowzy, fly-blown meat, dirty, yellow vegetables, fish not remarkable for its freshness, and bread of which bad potatoes and alum seem the principal ingredients. Here and there a wharf towers above the other houses on the southern side of the street; once busy with seething life, bales being trundled out from them into huge waggons, which afterwards rumbled along the streets with their heavy loads; possibly it is on account of the many perils that await the adventurous stranger that has rendered dock-land so seldom visited, and when the chances are of having your toes smashed by a heavy bale, or being crushed beneath a waggon or a loaded packing case dropping from a crane, added to the fearful perils incurred from the inhabitants of far-famed Ratcliff Highway, the adventurous stranger needs the courage of an explorer to plunge down the narrow lanes that lie East of Tower Hill, and thus penetrate the depths of the unknown. But now it is quiet enough. "It is just like Sunday," as a docker observed to a Star man, and the only risk you incur is the minor one of losing your way, and, travelling through a maze of lanes, you end by finding yourself very near the point from which you started.

But now we have described the scene; let us glance at those who live there. The population round the docks is essentially a strong race; the slums may be as hideous as the other parts of the East-end, but they are not so unhealthy, for the stormy winds rush from the sea through the wide estuaries of the Thames, and they scatter impure air and bring the breath of life to its inhabitants. Besides the dock men and coal whippers, the lightermen and carters are men who work in the open air, and depend for their livelihood upon the strength of their arms, therefore they are naturally more vigorous and fearless than the workers in unhealthy factories. There is a pleasant air of lawlessness about the neighbourhood, brought, I suppose, by the many seamen who frequent it; and though Ratcliff Highway is not what it was, there are still some of its former glories lingering about. Fights with fists and knives are not uncommon, and the police have a wholesome dread of many of its inhabitants. Hence their courtesy and good humour, of which we hear so much.

It is not surprising to find that the inhabitants have very sensible notions of treating the disease of Scabism. Unfortunate individuals afflicted with this detestable disease have, according to common report, been treated to a water cure by a ducking in the docks, their heads have been punched without mercy, and they are always certain of a good drubbing and kicking if their amateur doctors can lay hold of them. Strikers have been known to enter a dock or wharf and effect a cure by the announcement that "there was a jolly mob coming round the corner who would give 'em what for if they did not clear out." Even the roughest of strikers are very peaceful in their large processions; but woe to the scab upon whom an isolated party of them lay hands after working hours. A friend of mine saw one of them kicked into a state of insensibility. The police, arriving on the spot, after partially witnessing the performance, mildly inquired as to who had been knocking the man about. They were met with the polite retort of "How the hell do we know; you'd better take him away"—a piece of advice which they proceeded to obey, without the least attempt to interfere with the personal liberty of his attackers. The meekness of the police is, indeed, remarkable. It is said that the other day a file of them were standing in the Whitechapel Road, in the way of the procession. Some coal whippers bade them, in the rough but forcible dialect of the district, "to get out of the bloody way," which they proceeded at once to do. On the whole, the statement of a policeman to a reporter, that "if they chose to be riotous not all the police in London could stop them," seems very near the truth.

Before quitting the subject of scabs, I may mention that it is said that certain Christian missionaries at the East-end have been making themselves very busy by recruiting scabs for the Company. Poor fellows who are out of work have been sent by them to Dock Companies, with a letter of introduction to the managers. The women are heart and soul with the men. Unlike the usual working women, they do not appear to be under the influence of the church or the Primrose League. They are of opinion that "it is better to starve quickly without work than to starve slowly with work." You often see them among the crowds besetting a dock or wharf where scabs are concealed, and they are far fiercer in their exclamations than any of the men. "Oh, you miserable old wretch," shouted one of them at the Free Trade Wharf, to an official who incautiously showed himself, "I'd skin you if I had my way." "I'd tear the wharf down but what I'd have those blackguards out," said another. This is the spirit of the women, and you may judge whether it is revolutionary or not.

Talking of revolt reminds me of the exclamation of a city merchant, as a huge procession marched through the city on Thursday, with banners flying, the band playing the Marseillaise, punctuated by the thunder of thousands of marching feet. "Is this a strike or a revolution?" he cried, as he looked with wonder on the mighty host that seemed to have no end, and many Socialists in the ranks echoed it in their hearts. At least, if it is not a revolution, it is the beginning of one.

We have all read in our daily press concerning the huge meetings in Southwark Park and Hyde Park; I shall therefore only mention some matters not To doubt is to think, and to think is to improve.—Dr. Brewer.

Opinions which are equally honest on both sides should not affect personal esteem or social intercourse.—Jefferson.

generally noticed. The most striking business in Southwark Park was the large open-air meeting held by the lightermen, coalies, and other river-side trades, at which the conditions which they intended to enforce upon their masters were read out and assented to unanimously, with uproarious shouts of approval. There was great excitement on the road home. Among the procession were a large number of carmen, out on strike, and every man on the cars, still at work, was greeted with groans, yells, hisses, and shouts of "You will have to come out on Monday." As we reached Tooley Street the sky grew black with a coming storm. The shrill wind flapped the banners, and as they climbed the hill leading to the bridge it was a splendid sight to see the waving hats, the tossing banners, and black clouds, big with the approaching storm gathering over-head.

Sunday was festival day in the history of the strike. What need to describe the huge procession blazing with colour, for the strikers like their banners as bright and lively as possible, and that is, perhaps, the reason why so many of them carry the royal standard.

But look how Socialism intrudes, even among this loyal assemblage; side by side are carried two dolls, one decked out in gaudy finery, and the other clothed in filthy rags. One is labelled the docker's baby, the other, the contractor's infant. See yonder those banners of white calico. They bear the proud inscription, "We have got all we want, but we are out on principle." Yes, these coal porters, lightermen, rough carters, and wharfmen are ready to stand by their comrades till the last drop of their blood. Rough, coarse, as the dainty middle-class may consider them, they are ready to sacrifice themselves for the sake of their more unfortunate fellows. Are they not right who say that the people, marred and disfigured as they may be, have yet in them infinite nobleness and grandeur?

Those who set the noblest example among the processionists are the stevedores. These are skilled artisans who load the vessels, their pay ranges from 7s. to 9s. a-day, and they have a trade union. Yet these men did not hesitate, fine fellows as they are both mentally and physically, to turn out to the help of their poorer brethren. They have nothing so far to gain by this strike, only the loss of their daily wages, and yet they fight courageously, and with a lofty chivalry which might teach their masters a lesson, in the cause of their poorer brethren.

As a proof of the magnificent solidarity of labour, I quote the following. We at the League had heard the false report that Swedes had been engaged to act as scabs. As we thought they had been betrayed into this shameful position through ignorance, we wrote to some branches of the Seamen's Union suggesting that they might utilise the Swedish sailors belonging to their Union to draw their brethren out. We have received the following reply:—

(To D. J. Nicoll, Secretary of the Propaganda Committee.)

3, Mint Pavement, Tower Hill, London, August 24, 1889.

Dear Sir,—In answer to yours of the 22nd, I wish to inform you that all Scandinavians that are members of this branch have pledged themselves to assist the men on strike, and to use every effort to persuade any of their countrymen from working cargo, or doing anything that would be in any way detrimental to the dockers.—Yours in unity,

R. PLEASANCE,

Sec. Tower Branch N.A.S.F.U.

This shows how the men of all nationalities and trades are pulling together. The subscription sheets of the Star tell in even a better way than gigantic demonstrations in Hyde Park, how nobly the English workers are supporting their brethren.

The cry is still they come! The workers are pouring by thousands from their workshops—printers' labourers and brass finishers. The coal heavers leave their yards in response to the shouts of their comrades. Bands of these are marching round the Northern suburbs, turning out the men at every yard. The police are powerless before this movement, peaceful, yet overwhelming in its grand significance. It is not only in the East-end, but it is all over London. If this goes on, in a few days the sweaters dens will be deserted. It is the revolt of under-paid labour against the tyrants that have ground the poor wretches down so long; a revolt which carries all before it, which must end gloriously for the people. It seems, indeed, that the sacred torch of revolution has passed once again from France to England, and that our own people have once more to light the world along the path to a brighter and happier future.

The Strike in the Fur Trade.

Mark Hacht has received three months for "intimidation" from that Sokon of the magisterial bench, Mr. Saunders, of Dod Street celebrity, one of the worst of the blind old bats who sit there, and administer what is ironically called "justice." "It was the worst case he had ever heard of," said Mr. Saunders. For my part, I think the sentence is about the worst case of magisterial injustice and stupidity I ever heard of.

STRIKE IN WEXFORD.—The workmen, to the number of 130, have been locked out at the Mill Road Iron Works of Messrs. Pierce and Son, Wexford, for refusing to work overtime whilst some of their number were unemployed.

NEGRO LABOUR IN THE SOUTH.—An inquiry, says the Chattanooga (Tenn.) correspondent of the Chicago Knights of Labour, has been instituted with reference to the value of negro labour in industrial channels in the South. Three hundred southern manufacturers, representing all classes of labour, have responded, representing 9,000 negro employes, of whom 2,500 are skilled. The average wages for common labour are 1 dol. 10 c. a-day; skilled labour earns from 1 dol. 75 c. to 2 dols. 25 c., though some puddlers in the iron mills get 4 dols. and even 5 dols. a-day. Without exception the answers show the negro is fully as good if not better than the white men in the South. The prejudice, if there be any, is in his favour, as he is in labour and industrial circles to stay.

SOCIALISM AT LEICESTER.

THE ball is certainly rolling in Leicester; F. Charles being here all the week, has utilised his evenings in propagandism. Monday 12th last, we took up our position again in Humberstone Gate; Tuesday night we were in Russell Square; Wednesday night we opened up a new station in Sauvy Gate. Thursday evening we went on our first mission to the country, taking Ansty, a large village five miles out. Our audience was entirely favourable, and hoped we should come again; Charles made the best speech we have had from him. There were some very sensible and earnest questions at close. Saturday 17th, Gorrie, Charles, and Barclay met Kitz at station and went straight to Loughborough, a town of 20,000 inhabitants, just half-way between Leicester and Nottingham. A Loughborough friend had tried to get our bill posted up in the Liberal Club there; but no! the directors would not allow it. This friend has left the club in consequence. We pitched our tents for the first time, and Charles took the chair and opened; Barclay followed for a few minutes, but was interrupted by an offended Gladstonian who couldn't stomach the G.O.M. being called the "Prince's William." Kitz then made a powerful speech, at the end of which nearly all the prejudice against us was dried up. The curse of party is in full force in Loughborough. The Tories dare not attack us openly for fear of the Liberals, and the Liberals do not like to make themselves too obnoxious to the Tories, many of whom are employers. Where Labour is in the case, the Liberal employer will shake hands with the Tory one and let Liberalism go to the devil. Workmen are victimised for showing zeal in the cause of their party, and are then neglected and left to starve by that party. We had little opposition, save from a Primrose. Kitz, annoyed at his moral obliquity, turned the laugh against him beautifully. We did not try a collection, but we sold 6s. 5d. worth of pamphlets and Weal. Kitz spoke at our usual places in Leicester on Sunday morning and evening, speaking over an hour in the evening to an audience of about 500; good impression produced. Trade union leaders conspicuous by their absence; co-operators' guns silenced; Wordsworth-Donisthorpian individualists mute. The morning's discussion had been the sharpest and most prolonged we had had; in the evening, on the contrary, we could get none. We think we shall make a few more members now, and Charles, who has gone on to Nottingham, is to propose to them there that they pepper Loughborough from their side as we do from ours, until we have worked it up thoroughly. Finally, the Radical Club here, which boycotted the discussion of Socialism some eighteen months ago, has sent an invitation to our speakers whenever we can spare them, giving free use of their lecture-room for debates and discussion through the coming winter. The hall was crowded, and 10s. collected, 5s. of which, after paying expenses for hall, was taken to the Star for dock strikers' fund; 'Weal, Freedom, and literature sold pretty well; Morrison Davidson, in closing, stated, as an experienced lawyer, he believed Anarchism was not so new as some would think, and believed the same would be the outcome of the present system, as law, in 999 cases out of 1,000, was only necessary through private ownership in property, and as soon as property was made common, laws would not be needed.—S. P.

B.

MANCHESTER.—When we visited Middleton on Saturday night we found the "Wakes," or annual fair, in full swing, and our ground occupied; we held a short meeting close by, but with little success. On Sunday afternoon Ritson and Marshall addressed an attentive meeting in Stevenson Square; on Sunday night, at Heywood, a good meeting, addressed by Bailie; there is a desire by some sympathisers here to form a branch, which may hereafter be done.

NORWICH.—Saturday, usual open-air meeting held on the Haymarket; Sunday morning a meeting held in the Market Place; in the afternoon a good meeting held in the Market, McCormack spoke; in the evening another meeting held in the Market; McCormack and Poynts took part; Commonweal sold out.

YARMOUTH.—We had a splendid meeting in the morning (Sunday), on Priory Plain; we have beaten the guardians over widow Kersey's case; they have granted her relief again; while our morning meeting was going on, a comrade told Reynolds that men were being engaged to go to London Docks on Monday morning, to take the place of the dock strikers; well, to prove the truth of it, a comrade belonging to our branch went to Turrell's office, and was met at the door, and was asked if he wanted a job; "Yes," said our comrade; well, he was taken inside, and offered 30s. per week, and fare there and back, and was told there were plenty of police ready if necessary; of course, our comrade signed, and came out to tell us the little game; well, Reynolds and Mr. Halliday, of Lincoln, sent a telegram to Burns, Hyde Park demonstration, telling them of the scab work going on; and at night we marched from Colman's Granary to Turrell's office, and held an indignation meeting, giving three groans for the crimping Turrell, and telling the men to keep away from London; it was also agreed to meet at 5.30 next morning, to give the scabs and Turrell a salute, if they go by first train; we had a grand day, and the people are getting courage.—C. R.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87, Marlboro' Street, Saturday, August 24th, H. Sutton Frizelle lectured on "Why are the Workers Poor," giving a graphic description of the condition of the working classes in England, France, and the United States; a very good discussion, Hamilton, O'Gorman, Toomey, and others taking part.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Proctor and Rooke addressed a meeting in Sneinton Market on Sunday morning, and another in Great Market in the evening; at the Hall, afterwards, it was decided to take steps to organise a Midland Federation of Socialist bodies.—P.

ROCHDALE.—Yesterday we had comrades Sharples, of Blackburn, and L. Hall here; comrade Sharples had a debate in the afternoon with a tradesman in the town, who had enough of it, judging from the way in which he cleared out after it was over; in the evening comrade Hall dealt with some correspondence that had recently appeared in one of the local papers; the audience seemed well satisfied.

THE LESSON OF THE HOUR.

THE labour revolt in the East-end, whatever the result of the dock-labourers' strike may be, will leave a lasting impression behind it, at least on the working men. The wiseacre Norwood, in his speech of Tuesday last, made the very remarkable discovery that "the strike was aimed at capital and employers generally," and seemed to think that this discovery was a set-off against his other shortcomings.

As a matter of fact, it is just this element of conscious or semi-conscious attack on the slave-drivers generally which distinguishes this strike from the ordinary trades-union bickerings. These latter, as individual struggles, have been usually little more than business disputes between the two parties to a contract, recognised as such by both parties to it. But this is a revolt against oppression: a protest against the brute force which keeps a huge population down in the depths of the most dire degradation, for the benefit of a knot of profit-hunters; and there is no doubt that nothing except the physical force of the executive which is, as it were, keeping the ring in this fight between the public and the shareholders, prevents the revolt from achieving far more success than the attainment of its immediate and declared aims.

In short, other strikes have been, on the surface, strikes of the business-accessories of the factory against its financial managers; this is a strike of the poor against the rich.

Let us hope that those of the respectable classes who have so loudly expressed sympathy with the strikers understand this: because if they do, it gives us a dawning hope that they will be prepared to meet us half-way when the crisis comes, when the workmen have come to understand definitely their full claim. For indeed they may be sure that this will be the only way to prevent those terrors which haunt the dreams of the the useless rich; it will be worth more to the pleasure of their lives than all the array of brute force, which they will certainly not always be able to depend upon; since, after all, that force is necessarily made up of men who are workmen forced by ill-luck into the ranks of the soldiery and the police.

As Burns hinted when the guards passed the meeting on Tower Hill the other day, they who are now hapless tools of the rich will presently become their hapless slaves once more, as they were before they put on their livery-coats.

Meantime, do not let us deceive ourselves as to the amount and quality of this respectable sympathy. We will not be ungenerous; we are quite sure that with many of the well-to-do the sympathy is genuine; that the horrible poverty of the East-end workers (and how many thousands outside the East end) has touched their hearts; and these people will become Socialists of some kind before the end. But I fear that they are in the minority among the respectables (or rather I know it) and that the rest have been rather cowed into silence, or into venting their irritation against the strike, by falling foul of Norwood and his gang; who, after all, are only following the necessary custom of the whole gang.

If this were not so, why do not the subscriptions to the strike fund amount to £20,000 or £30,000 instead of what they amount to now? They are workmen's pennies, somewhat eked out by contributions from a few of the better off; mostly those who can least afford it.

One word about the withdrawn manifesto of the Strike Committee. It was to have been expected that it would be attacked furiously by the capitalist press, but it was not to be expected that any calling themselves Socialists should have attacked it; and it is most lamentable that they should have done so, as they may perhaps see by the avidity with which their opinions were recorded by the capitalist press. For us surely the mere fact that it was thought possible to bring about a general strike in London remains the central point in the history of the strike; let us hope that the aspiration toward the use of such an effective weapon against Capital may remain in the minds of the more considerate of the workers and bring forth fruit before long.

"A good man will be contented fast enough if he be fed and clothed sufficiently; but if a man be not well fed and clad, he is a base wretch to be contented." So says William Cobbett, and certainly the strikers might have one more banner with this inscription written on it. We have learned a good deal since William Cobbett's time, and some of us have become very "refined" indeed; but still on this foundation of victuals and shelter without anxiety must you build "refinement" and all.

Those who are "discontented" on the grounds given by Cobbett, know all about the meaning of that phrase so often used, "insufficiency of food and shelter"; and I am afraid it says little for the keenness of imagination at the present day, that those who have not suffered the insufficiency have so very little an idea of what it means. From that unimaginative content of the well-to-do comes all that covert hatred of the poor as inconvenient people, which is so common amongst us, and will one day (who can doubt it?) be so bitterly revenged.

This is the cause of the filling of the jails with manufactured criminals, a sort of criminal capital to be used for the production of more criminals; the preaching of thrift to people earning precarious starvation wages; the horrors of the workhouse, where poverty is punished for being poor; the horrors of the slum, which mocks the beauty of the earth outside the city, and the attempt to get rid of which is thrust aside as an insoluble problem; while all sorts of miracles, chemical, mechanical, and what not, are being invented for the benefit of capitalistic man, each one of them a million times more difficult than the due feeding and housing of all industrious persons.—IF we could but once have the wits to cease oppressing others for our own discomfort.

One thing is to me certain, that anyone of the well-to-do class whose imagination is sufficiently touched for him to have a vision of poverty and to gain an inkling of what it means, must either become a Socialist of some sort, or else join Mr. Justice Stephen's Religion of Inhumanity; and rather than that they had better, for their own sakes, have been knocked on the head while they were young enough to be innocent of cynicism at least. I say to all rich men, "Once feel what poverty is, and you must either be a Socialist or a cruel tyrant conscious of your tyranny." Are there such men? I should hope only a very few, and that the rest who sin against the people do so out of sheer stupidity.

The Great Strike does seem (as such things sometimes will) to have enlightened these last a little, to have touched their sluggish imaginations. If that could last, it would be something of a gain if there were no other. Yet I cannot help thinking that fear was an element of that enlightenment, at all events with many.

Meantime, surely a man of any imagination must have felt both puzzled and disgusted at the sentences on the men for intimidation. Here was the public sympathising with the efforts of the men to gain a better livelihood, and scolding at their immediate tyrants the Dock Companies; and yet through their magistrates and police-courts these very same sympathisers were punishing the strikers for doing what was necessary to carry on the strike. And this although the capitalist papers—e.g., the Daily News—admitted that the intimidation was probably merely formal, and that the men were quite willing to accept the intimidation as an excuse for coming out. Certainly hypocrisy is a very useful—virtue—and one cannot wonder that it is so sedulously cultivated in the first commercial country, the most practical people, in the world.

The recovery of trade, the cessation of depression, has been crowed over considerably of late; and some persons, both foes and friends, have seen in it the herald of the disappearance of Socialism; a most stupid assumption, and on the part of friends most cowardly, as has been pointed out in these columns a week or two back. But in any case a full recovery of trade to the period of Mr. Gladstone's "leaps and bounds" is a very unlikely event. Even now in the full flush of the "recovery" we find the cotton-trade in a disastrous condition; Blackburn, eg., which but less than a year ago, was, as I was told when there, doing as brisk a business as might be, now shutting up mills on all hands.

By all means no fatalistic folding of the hands for Socialists! Let us go on with our work as briskly as possible, whatever temporary discouragements we may meet with. But this we may be sure of: first, that modern capitalism is doomed to destroy itself; and secondly, that no new form of capitalism can arise from its ashes: that nothing but Socialism can arise from them.

W. M.

ABSTINENCE.

I AM not a total abstainer, nor a vegetarian. Although I believe in Malthusianism as a theory, I scorn the life of a cold-blooded bachelor. It goes without saying that I smoke a pipe. I have no great admiration for abstentions of any kind. There are thin people whose only virtues consist of abnegation, which, when you note the superior pleasure it seems to afford them, is no great mortification of the flesh after all. Surely a man is admirable more for the good he does than for the evil he abstains from doing. I can conceive of a person so anxious to avoid evil that he would miss all opportunity of doing good—his rule of life being a mere wary evasion of danger and difficulty. Indeed, one does not need to conceive such persons; we all know them.

I have known a glass work wonders in the way of thawing frosty reserve, which, but for its kindly influence, would never have dissolved. As for a pipe, to praise its offices would carry me beyond my depth. When I see a man who fidgets as he sits, who does not know what to do with his feet and hands, who never dreams or philosophises, I judge at once that his education has been neglected—that he does not smoke. Smoking is an employment which, providing amusement, while leaving the mind clear and free, reconciles men to physical passivity, and makes patience possible. By disposing men to follow things to their roots, it develops the bump of causation; and the person who smokes can afford to think twice before he speaks.

And yet I feel that I ought to be a teetotaler. The sociability that requires drink to call it forth is not worth much; and how many men have sworn eternal friendship at the street corner after a carouse, and ever after passed one another with a dry and distant nod. If drink sometimes performs the social function of forming and cementing friendships, it has ruined more friendships than ever it formed. To say nothing of the expenditure of money, time, and health over drink, it befogs the brains of those who have need of all the brains they possess to enable them to circumvent the enemy. The fellow who shouts his beery applause at whatever you say, and effusively shakes your hand at the close of a meeting, disgusts the by-standers and is a nuisance and a disgrace to every cause he favours.

There is an immense deal of truth in what the temperance people say as to the widely pervasive anti-social effects of intemperance. The large proportion of the people who live in slums are there, directly, or indirectly, through drink. There are, indeed, thousands of widows in the slums who, like Mrs. Nubbles, in "The Old Curiosity Shop," support a family by charring, sewing, and matchbox-making, and, by hard work, manage to preserve a measure of decency and self-respect. But was it hard work, or drink, that took away the husbands? Probably, a good deal of both, but especially drink, which, when it does not cut off the drinker precipitately, shortens his life by an insidious process of devitalisation. Drink helps to fill our prisons and asylums. It leads the giddy girl into harlotry. It carries distress and sorrow into millions of homes. It robs the masses of the education that might go on after the lad or lass has left school. It reconciles the miserable to their misery. I know scores of youths who look forward to their "pint" on Saturday night, and who, while that can be had, find the drudgery and abuse of the rest of the week tolerable. Your pothouse politician is no great social force.

The workers of Britain are said to spend about one hundred million pounds a year in liquor. That is not the entire national drink bill, which I have seen stated at one hundred-and-thirty-six millions; but the most enthusiastic temperance advocate will admit that the upper and middle classes contribute thirty-six millions of that amount. Well, if the masses spend one hundred million pounds in drink, I have no hesitation in saying, although I contribute my mite to this grand total, that it is one hundred millions too much; for I would not have liquor used even as a medicine. I know that doctors disagree; but intelligent people usually incline to one view or the other, whether they care to admit it or not; and I have adopted the view that alcohol, as a medicine, does more harm than good, and that any good it does could be better accomplished by other means.

Some of our comrades contend, according to the theory of the iron law of wages, that if the workers did not spend this money on drink they would not get it to spend at all. I myself have, I regret to say, blundered into this contention when, in the hurry of speaking, a better argument against the claim of teetotalism escaped my recollection. The iron law theory, as applied to total abstinence, will not bear examination. It is easy to see that if the workers did not spend their money on drink they could spend it on something else. Could not the standard of comfort be kept as high under a system of total abstinence as it is at present? Nay; could it not be raised higher? I am aware that saving, living beneath one's income, might, if generally practised, have the effect of lowering wages. (I say might, because the so-called iron law of wages has no great rigidity about it, but can be, and is, defeated by combination and legislation). But to save money by overcoming a bad habit does not involve that we should live on less. The money spent on drink could, and, if the drinking were stopped, would, be spent on useful articles, the manufacture of which would benefit the worker as producer, and the use and enjoyment of which would benefit the worker as consumer.

It is not worth much to say that the man who drinks his wages as he earns them has nothing to fall back upon in the event of a strike. He will be under strong temptation to turn rat, or scab, and he will be likely to put up with more oppression from his foreman, say, than the man who feels he can afford to be out of a job for a week, while he looks for work elsewhere. He must not suppose that prosperity makes for contentment. It is not the prosperous people, but the soakers, the people who are in debt and difficulties, who are our opponents. Political organisations and trade combinations are supported by the sober, rather than by the drinking, section of the working class. The periods of prosperity are the epochs of progress. Then the outlook takes the form of hope, and a steady hope is a better stimulus than despair.

If the hundred millions annually spent on drink were spent on clothing, food, furniture, and books, it would give employment to a million men at 30s. a week, after making full allowance for the displacement of labour caused by the abolition of the drink traffic. If the hundred millions spent on drink were spent on useful commodities, it would make up the difference between the most prosperous year and the most depressed year in trade. One hundred million pounds is about a thirteenth of the annual national income.

All this is very commonplace, and by association may seem even vulgar. But in following up new light, and in seeking to found a new gospel which will charm, as the old has failed to do, we are in danger of overlooking or underrating the value of the truth that lies in the commonplace.

Of course I do not for one moment pretend, as some temperance advocates do, that to shut the public house is to solve the social problem. I do not forget that, if the masses spend one hundred millions on drink, they are also fleeced every year of eight times as much by landlords, capitalists, and their hangers-on; that in interest alone they lose two hundred-and-fifty millions annually; that in rent 200 millions go past them. I do not barter, nor even abate, my ideal of the full-developed, well-rounded, communal life of the future for a teetotalist's mess of pottage, but I have jotted down these observations because I feel that some of us are not sound, not quite wise, on this matter.

I am of opinion, moreover, that the drink question is one with which we shall have to deal, either before, or soon after, we enter on the communal life. We all believe, with Bellamy, that to-day the position of humanity is as that of "a rosebush planted in a swamp, watered with black bog-water, breathing miasmatic fogs by day, and chilled with poison dews at night," and that when it is transplanted into the conditions of a better world, and has for the first time a chance of growing in goodness and beauty, it will be so transformed that we shall forget it was once the mean and vicious thing which it appears at present. We all believe this, I repeat, but one does not require to be a pessimist to see that the very virtues which the new order will call forth may, without due safeguards, lead us into the temptation of intemperance. To lift the yoke from the shoulders of toil-burdened, care-deadened men and women, and give them leisure, and the means of enjoying it, is a process not unattended with danger. It is not difficult to conceive of circumstances in which drink may exercise a fascination over generous and impulsive men; and I trust we shall always have impulsive men. Conduct is largely, if not wholly, determined by temptation, both good and bad, and it ought to be our aim to make it, as a great phrase-master has said, easy to do right and difficult to do wrong.

JAMES LEATHAM.

Live your own life in your own day. You are not your grandmother!

COLLECTIONS FOR DOCKER'S STRIKE.—Hammersmith and North Kensington branches of the S.L., £1; Aberdeen branch, £2 8s.; collected by Mr. Tochatti at Beadon Road, Hammersmith, on Monday, Aug. 26th, 16s. 3d.

Anyone who wants to see what a few workmen can do for themselves without injuring their fellows—even benefitting a good many of them—should send a stamp to the Hebden Bridge Fustian Manufacturing Society, Nutclough Works, Hebden Bridge, Yorks, for a pamphlet giving the story of the formation of the society and its subsequent history. It is a record of high resolve and strong endeavour, that we are glad to see is bearing fruit. If only the mass of the workers could see how easily masters are dispensed with, and how easy it is to combine!

SOCIALISM IN ABERDEEN.—A capital week's work has been done here. At indoor meeting on Monday, Leatham lectured to crowded audience on the question, "Why do we Punish Criminals?" re the Maybrick case; 5s. collected for dock labourers. The following meetings have been held at Castle Street during the week, the collections being for the strikers:—On Thursday night, speaker Duncan, collected 9s.; on Friday night, speakers, Duncan and Leatham, collected 6s.; on Saturday night, speakers, Duncan, Aiken, and Leatham, collected 19s. 4d.; large sale of literature; tall hat, which insinuated that we would "have a good booze off that," threatened by crowd with a ducking in the fountain. On Sunday afternoon, Duncan and Leatham addressed a meeting on the Inches, collecting 13s. 8d. Total for the five meetings, £2 13s. We are adding to our membership every week.—L.

THE BOURGEOIS: ANNO 1829.

(By HEINRICH HEINE. Translated by C. S. CALVERLEY.)

I CRAVE an ampler, worthier sphere :
 I'd liefer bleed at every vein
 Than stifle 'mid these hucksters here,
 These lying slaves of paltry gain.

They eat, they drink ; they're every whit
 As happy as their type, the mole ;
 Large are their bounties—as the slit
 Through which they drop the poor man's dole.

With pipe in mouth they go their way,
 With hands in pocket ; they are blest
 With grand digestions : only they
 Are such hard morsels to digest !

The hard that's red with some dark deed,
 Some giant crime, were white as wool
 Compared with these sleek saints, whose creed
 Is paying—all their debts in full.

Ye clouds that sail to far-off lands,
 O waft me to what clime ye will !
 To Lapland's snows, to Libya's sands,
 To the world's end—but onward still !

Take me, O clouds ! They ne'er look down ;
 But (proof of a discerning mind)
 One moment hang o'er Hamburg town,
 The next they leave it leagues behind.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE New Co-operative Publishing Co. has just issued its first list of books for the forthcoming season. It contains several noteworthy works, amongst others a novel by Miss Amye Reade (a relative of the late Charles Reade), entitled "Ruby." This is a realistic story of circus life, and is not unlikely to create a stir. Another realistic story of to-day is "A Manchester Shirt-maker," by John Law, the author of "Captain Lobe." The list further includes a book of stirring adventure, "After Shipwreck," by J. A. Owen; "A Book of Vagrom Men and Vagrant Thoughts," by a new writer; "The Education of Man," by John G. Speed; "The Laws of National Evolution," from the French of Ph. Delbert; "Fifine," a novel by A. T. Story, and "Only Half a Hero," by the same writer. Additions to this list are promised shortly—not a bad start for so young an enterprise.

A workingman to-day is not as well taken care of as were the slaves of the South in long time ago. As an illustration we give the following: A man in one of our shops was injured three weeks ago so as to disable him from working; he was hauled to his home in the carriage of the boss, who has not visited him since. In the days of slavery, the boss looked after his chattel and provided for him with food; to-day, as soon as a man is unable to work he is carted off to die.—Labour Herald.

THE EIGHT HOURS' QUESTION.—The following, says the Railway Review, is the result of the plebiscite taken among the members of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants on the Eight Hours' Question:—In favour of an eight hours' working-day, 3,344; not in favour, 350; in favour of eight hours being obtained by Act of Parliament, 2,190; against Act of Parliament, 1,504. Out of 13,000 voting papers issued, it will be seen that only 3,694—little over a fourth—have been returned, a number that cannot be of much service in gauging the views of the members on the question. If the figures mean anything at all it is that the bulk of the members feel no interest in the matter whatever, and declined to reply to the questions put.

SOCIALISM IN SWEDEN.

A FEW words about Swedish Socialist leaders will, I think, be interesting. Two of them are bourgeois—Hjalmar Branting, of Socialdemokraten (Stockholm), is bourgeois by birth and education; Axel Danielsson, of Arbetet (Malmö), is a proletarian by birth, but bourgeois by education. Economically, it, of course, means exactly the same to be a bourgeois in Scandinavia as in England, but not quite so intellectually. When a Scandinavian bourgeois leads anything else than a pure animal and economical life—I daresay it is not very often, but still—he is much better educated, much more truly refined in his taste, and much more modern in his thought than the English one. (I say so having studied both.) Chauvinism is not the worst vice of the better sort of an educated Swede. He is rather cosmopolitan, having a smattering of knowledge of everything modern, and being well trained in German, English, French, and Russian literature and science; and last, not least, he has a very excellent, very revolutionary, novelistic and dramatic literature of his own. Ibsen is his prophet, and he admires such in their ways revolutionary and uncompromising geniuses as Björnson, Lie, Kielland, Jacobsen, Strindberg, etc., who would be quite impossible in English literature. In this respect the evolution from Swedish (or Scandinavian) bourgeois to Socialist is the easiest possible. Hjalmar Branting is a fair, and not isolated, sample of such an evolution. He went to school with the present Swedish Crown Prince—and now he is in prison (Branting, not the Crown Prince) for publishing socialistic ideas. His paper is, on the whole, the best managed of the Swedish Socialist press. Branting is strongly Marxistic—perhaps, not to a slight extent, because the university youths of Sweden are impregnated with German science, and it therefore lies very near to a man like Branting to fall into a rather one-sided and exaggerated reliance upon German socialistic authority. Both theoretically and practically this seems to me noticeable by our Stockholm comrades. Evolution in everything—in Socialist theory and tactics before anything!

This slight reproach cannot be directed against Axel Danielsson. His strong, healthy mind is full of desire for movement onwards. He hates all authority, political and intellectual. He dislikes socialistic centralisation, and preaches autonomy. He has got his eyes open for the necessity of directing special agitation against political authority of all sorts—socialistic or bourgeois. Danielsson is a lively, charming writer, and his leaders in Arbetet are sometimes beautiful monuments of best modern revolutionary literature. He has been in prison one year now, and has got to stay eight long months more. Hitherto he has kept his freshness of mind most admirably. May he succeed to do so unto the end! He is a man that Swedish Socialism cannot afford to lose. His young wife promises to be a good co-worker in the interest of the cause.

The life of Pehr Eriksson, of Folkets Röst (Gothenberg), is typical of the Swedish proletarian. He is a native of Dalecarlia, and was first painter, afterwards compositor, by trade. His parents were the poorest kind of Swedish land-proletarians, who worked in the forests throughout the dreadful nine months' winter of North Sweden, and for all that excess of toil could not afford always to eat unmixed bread or porridge. Starving, freezing, and overwork was the essence of his childhood. When he as a youth was sent to the metropolis to learn a trade, he still had to lead a brutally hard life. A "peasant-boy" can, in such an event, always calculate on getting a little more ill-treatment than a "town-boy"—in Sweden there is namely still the ancient hostility between town and country. Certainly, Eriksson had to taste life from its very harshest side, and he ought to bring into the movement a sound experience of the sufferings of the poorest Swedish wage-slaves, and of the injustices they have to endure from their petty tyrants. His practical knowledge of this side of Swedish life makes him able for propagandist work among that socially and intellectually low, but—in Sweden, at least—bodily and morally healthy class, which it is often difficult for the highly educated man to reach. Eriksson seems to be a man of ability and great energy,—now he is in prison for a year, which gives him a, perhaps, not wholly unwelcome rest, after a life of incessant struggle for existence.

These are three types of Swedish Socialist leaders. Among the rest, with whom I cannot occupy myself now, is August Palm—perhaps the best known of them all, as far as foreign countries are concerned. He is the best popular agitator of the party, has the greatest merits in the spreading of Socialism in the country and the small towns. He was the first Social Democrat in Sweden, and has been in prison for the cause several times already. The Stockholm group is said to be more orthodox Marxistic, and the Malmö one of a more autonomistic character. But there is no split, and no quarrel—and in so far Swedish Socialism compares favourable with the English.

TAX-DODGERS.—The migration of the tax-dodgers took place on the last day of April; they will return on the second day of December, having spent just six months and one day in their country places, whereby they shifted the paying of a large proportion of their taxes to more economical regions. It is a very equitable arrangement, for it is only the rich man who can save money in this way, while his poorer neighbour, who has no country seat to which he can escape, must pay to the uttermost farthing. The system stimulates the impecunious to become wealthy, and helps the rich to become richer. It is, therefore, perfectly good and just.—Marion Crawford, in "An American Politician."

THE GOSPEL OF PLENTY.—Intelligent discontent is divine. By it everything worth having has been achieved. I wish I could kindle the flame of it in your breast. I am glad that it burns in mine. I am glad that I cannot see a palace or a hovel, a millionaire or a tramp, a pure mother or a street-walker, without being wrought into a fury by the needless contrasts presented. And I exhort you to join the church of the Holy Discontent. That is a church in which I believe. Its beatitude is this: Blessed is he who has neither too much nor too little. Its creed is this: I believe in the saving power of plenty. I believe that poverty as a social phenomenon is a crime. I believe that bad laws make bad men and a bad religion. I believe that no man should be allowed to appropriate wealth by law. I believe that each man and woman in the world should have and enjoy equal political and industrial opportunity with every other person. I believe that when vested rights are injurious to human welfare they become vested wrongs which we are not bound to respect. I believe that church and state were made for man and not man for them, and when they cease to be servants and become tyrants they must be changed or overthrown. I believe in the essential power of right and in the essential goodness of human nature, and I therefore hope for the time when there will be neither superfluity for a few nor poverty for the many, but enough for all.—Hugh O. Pentecost.

LIFE AND LABOUR IN EAST LONDON.¹

"Of the making of books there is no end," was the weary cry of an old time book reviewer, which is often re-echoed over the book-making which is still going. Book-making in excelsis is exhibited in the particular work in hand; it tells us nothing new, but re-relates a tale told ten thousand times before, and often in better fashion, for the tremendous length and detail will almost assuredly deter any but the most determined from attempting its pages. The only people at all likely to read this book are those who have gone through at least a dozen similar works. Mill's "Poverty and the State," Sims's "How the Poor Live," Kay's "Social Condition and Education of the People," Sargent's "Economy of the Labouring Classes," the "Essays" written in competition for the Rev. John Minter Morgan prize, Mayhew's "London Labour and London Poor," are only a few which can be recalled in a minute, all telling the same tale, all giving the same momentary feeling of despair, disgust, sympathy, and—in perhaps a few cases—of remorse, and all in a very short time completely forgotten and abortive.

The one feature peculiar to Mr. Booth's work is—as of course becomes a member of the Statistical Society—the elaboration of what I suppose our editor-in-chief would call "the method of the duck's egg." Tables of figures, and columns of figures, big masses and little, turn up everywhere; and would, but for Mr. Booth's excessive optimism, have suggested a much better title than the one which was, after some trouble, finally adopted.

The "Roll Call of the Army of the Damned," or, the "Field State of the Army of the Revolution," would have, either of them, been more appropriate as exact to fact and possibilities. For the terms "Life" and "Labour," according to any ideas of Ruskinian definition, could never be applied to such a record as is given in our six hundred pages of Inferno. This may seem strong, but is none too strong as a protest against what seems an optimism which the whole book is a denial of.

How a man can give page after page of such detail as is given on say pp. 7-10, the summing-up of which is "an awful place"; how an author can prove as ours does, that any real love of home, any circle of enduring friends is impossible, because of the continual breaking up of association—not to speak of the positive physical breaking up of the "home" as represented by constantly shifting furniture; how a man can epitomise so accurately modern commerce, as where he says, "people are selling things of hardly any value to people with hardly any money"; how, after showing that there are 314,000 sinking to want, he can bring himself to say, "there is a disgrace, not a danger," is only to be explained by his fatal optimism, or a mental obliquity of vision which defies facts no matter how or by whom stated.

One would much like to have an accurate knowledge of Mr. Booth's standard or standards of happiness, for without such it is hard to balance together statements such as "their life is an unending struggle," and that they are "more or less in want but not in distress."

It may be true that where there are "only" 43,000 or 24 per cent. in poverty, against 140,000 or 76 per cent. in comfort, there may be no "danger" only disgrace, but how about the "danger" when, as in St. George's, we have the numbers so evenly balanced as 23,000 in poverty against 24,000 in comfort (p. 62), especially when we come to know what this "comfort" really is; when we learn that "St. George's appears to stagnate with a squalor peculiar to itself," that "it shares in the poor characteristics of both her neighbours, and is more entirely poverty stricken than either" (p. 65).

For the purposes of this enquiry the whole population of 909,000 is divided into eight classes:—

- (A) The lowest class of occasional labourers, loafers, and semi-criminals.
- (B) Casual earnings—"Very Poor."
- (C) Intermittent earnings—"Poor."
- (D) Small regular earnings—"Poor."
- (E) Regular standard earnings—"Above the Line of Poverty."
- (F) Higher Class Labour.
- (G) Lower Middle Class.
- (H) Upper Middle Class.

Of A, roughly 11,000, our author says, "Their life is the life of savages, with vicissitudes of extreme hardship and occasional excess . . . the ready materials for disorder when occasion serves. They render no useful service, they create no wealth; more often they destroy it. They degrade whatever they touch, and as individuals are perhaps incapable of improvement" (p. 38). "A considerable number of discharged soldiers are to be found in Classes A and B."

Seeing that by "Poor," our "author" means a regular, though bare, income of 18s. to 21s. for a family, and that B, 100,000, is classed as "Very Poor," which means "those who fall below that standard," one is a bit puzzled to know what else their lives can be than the life of savages—extreme hardship, with occasional excess.

In the opinion of the author, Class C, 74,200, is the class which, above all others, is the most proper field for systematic charitable assistance; they are, "more than any others, the victims of competition, and on them falls with particular severity the weight of recurrent depressions of trade."

The possible standard of life of A, B and C may roughly be judged by the fact that Class D ("Small Regular Earnings") embraces 129,000, such as carmen, where men remain at a wage of 21s., or less, for fifteen or twenty years, "being in a comfortable position at the start, but getting poorer and poorer as their family increased, and improving again as their children became able to add their quota to the family income" (p. 49), to which statement much exception can be taken, for the improvement but very rarely takes place, two main reasons preventing. First, by the time the family has grown up, the father is fifteen or twenty years older, and is of less value to his employer, and has probably been reduced; secondly, the early marriage of the expected contributor.

E is taken as a class earning, a regular wage of from 22s. to 30s., in numbers 377,000, the largest of all.

F is rated from 30s. to 50s., and numbers about 121,000. G ("Lower Middle Class"), i.e., shopkeepers, small employers, clerks, and subordinate professional men, taken at about 34,000.

H ("Upper Middle Class") number about 45,000, and are those who generally manage to keep one servant, or, in a few cases, two, and who, in many cases, are almost as much deserving of pity as any of the first four classes.

Summing up, Mr. Booth, by grouping, has, in Classes A, B, C and D, 314,000, or 35 per cent. of population, in poverty, sinking to want, and E, F, G, and H, 577,000, or 65 per cent. in comfort, rising to affluence.

THE DOCK LABOURERS' STRIKE.

THE following song is being sung in the East-end to the tune of "God Save Ireland." Its lack of literary finish may be easily pardoned in a spontaneous popular effusion of the kind :—

At the Docks there is a strike the Companies don't like,
A tanner an hour a working man to pay ;
Like slaves they'd have them work far worse than any Turk,
And make them sweat their lives out every day.

Chorus—Strike boys, strike for better wages,
Stand out until they give you better pay,
You work hard at the Docks, stick out like fighting cocks,
Then the masters all to you they must give way.

Every morning there flocks for employment at the Docks
Hard-working men who scarce can get a meal,
With wives and children dear 'twill make you shed a tear,
If you only knew the hardship that they feel.

There's a lot of men they seek, for about a pound a week,
They'll take on any duffer that comes near,
It is sweating with a will, they try your place to fill,
But that won't wash with working-men it's clear.

If you stick up for your rights you'll put the Companies in a plight,
For meetings and processions there has been,
Speeches in galore, and the jolly Stevedore's,
The Seamen and the Firemen, too, were seen.

Starvation 'tis they bids to a man with seven kids,
When he brings home only fifteen pence a day,
What can they get to eat? a bloater's quite a treat,
It often takes his all his rent to pay.

Here's health to Mr. Burns, he's done us all a turn,
Mr. Tillet, Mann, and Mr. Toomey too.
Don't give in a bit, for you've got them in a fit,
You've put the Dock Companies in a stew.

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

ON Tuesday, Aug. 28th, the strike threatened to become general. Coal heavers, brass finishers, printer's labourers, rope makers, and tailors were all turning out. Revolt was contagious. On that afternoon I was passing through Commercial Road on the top of a tram, after attending the meeting at West India Docks. I saw a ring of factory girls performing a Carmagnole dance of triumph at the gates of a rope factory, occasionally bumping against the gates as if with the intention of forcing them in. Further down, they were bringing men, boys, and girls out of a biscuit factory, a good-humoured crowd standing at the door laughing and chaffing the strikers in a most fraternal manner. Descending from the tram I entered a quiet street, where there was already some appearance of fermentation. Gathered around a sweater's shop was a large crowd; the shop was guarded by a strong force of police, who were evidently apprehensive of having the windows broken.

When night falls upon the disturbed scene, gangs of ragged barefooted children parade the streets, carrying some rags elevated upon a pole and accompanying their parade with the rattle of tin-pots and pans; they are playing at "strikers." Soon after the streets are lighted up for the night; the sound of a drum and fife band is heard, and a procession from one of the side streets crosses the road. It is a number of carmen, who, exhilarated by the general situation, seem inclined to be noisy. They march rather confusedly down Christian Street in the direction of Cable Street, and returning to Commercial Road march off in the direction of Mile End Waste. Here every night since the beginning of the strike huge crowds have collected, and while the glaring gas falls upon their white upturned starved faces, they are addressed by numerous orators upon that all-absorbing subject, the Strike. Sometimes the meetings wind up with a Socialist procession, and the red flag, lurid in the glare of gas and oil, is borne through the streets followed by a tremendous crowd, while a chorus of many voices thunders out the "Marseillaise" or the "Carmagnole."

It is now getting late, nearly eleven o'clock. At ordinary times these narrow streets, save for the gleam of a more or less ineffectual gas-lamp, would be plunged into a darkness in which the hideous fiend whose murderous knife has made the East-end so notorious might stalk unseen. But now that is impossible. Many doors are open, throwing streams of light upon the pavement, and excited groups are everywhere discussing the latest news,—perhaps, though, we should rather say the latest rumour, which often transcends reality. "The tram men have revolted, the cars have been left on the road out Bow and Bromley way"; "Rioting has broken out, the docks are to be fired"; "The strikers are marching to attack the railway depots and turn the carmen out"; "Deptford Meat Market is in the hands of the insurgents, who won't allow London to be fed"; "There will be wild work at the docks to-morrow, as the strikers are going down to turn out the scabs." These are the subjects of discussion in these numerous groups, while light falls from windows and doors upon their excited faces. The East-end has become like Paris in the first revolution—"a naphtha-lighted city of the dead," and the ghosts stand at doors of their tombs discussing their resurrection. So great is the excitement, that the inhabitants have no need of sleep, and seem inclined to watch out the livelong night.

Now let us deal with one of the most interesting of the unorganised strikes. This was that of the coal-heavers. These men, in the midst of the excitement in the early part of last week, suddenly left their work, and marching round the northern suburbs stopped work at all the bays. The march of these grimy sons of toil, rough, sturdy, and furious, filled the middle-classes with terror. The police were few and far between, being all drafted into the East-end, and the houses of the wealthy were completely at their mercy. On Wednesday the business reached a climax. A number of coal-heavers had resumed work at King's Cross Station. The strikers mustered in Cambridge Street, and directly the wagons appeared they were furiously attacked. The police attempt to interfere, but the strikers jam them up against a wall and dragging the scabs off their perches, thrash them soundly before the very eyes of the police, who are helpless. Only one wagon gets away, the others are forced to put back in the yard. In Westbourne Grove some wagons of coal are upset and the coals distributed among the poor of the neighbourhood by these rebels. The effect of these vigorous measures was seen in the speedy surrender of the masters.

This is not the only unorganised strike that has been successful. The middle-classes are in a pitiable funk. Those who desire to test the question have only to read the columns of our daily press, whose articles eloquently express the perturbation of the superior person. Numerous cases are known where the mere threat of a strike has been sufficient to procure an advance of two or three shillings a-week in wages. The fountains of the great deep are breaking up, and the hearts of the rich are failing them for fear. Sweated workmen should universally take advantage of the terror of the rich to improve their condition.

In the middle of the week the strike flagged to a certain degree, the accessions to the ranks of the strikers not being so numerous as in the early part. This was mainly owing to the issue of a manifesto protesting against unorganised men joining the ranks of the strikers; but with the issue of the general strike manifesto on Friday public interest greatly revived.

On Saturday subscriptions poured in to a tremendous extent, £2,000 being received by the Strike Committee; and with the renewal of public interest the funk of the middle classes increased. That old Mother Gamp of journalism, the Standard, was very indignant, though it was evident to most of its readers that the indignation was mingled with fear. It shrieked aloud for the suppression of the strike and the arrest of the leaders. How you are to prevent men from leaving their work does not appear, unless you station soldiers with bayonets at every factory door; and as to the arrest of the leaders, it must be evident to most people that such a proceeding in the present state of public excitement would be more likely to extend the strike than act as a deterrent. The only way of protest against this act of illegal absolutism would be for every man to leave his work, and so the last state of the strike would be worse than the first. No, gentlemen of the middle classes, the time for suppressing strikes has gone by! Standard leader-writers should have lived in the good old times of George III.

The Standard finds an able backer-up in its strictures in Justice, which appears nearly as alarmed for the safety of the capital and the solidarity of our commercial system as the leader-writer of the Standard. Rather a funny position for "we Social-Democrats" to occupy! "We Social-Democrats, the only Socialist party in England," used to be always talking about a general strike, but now some impertinent person has a notion of putting our ideas into practice, we do not appear to like it. It is strange how moderate some revolutionists get in a time in which revolution seems not unlikely!

Well, despite the grave censures of that portion of the press in which old women delight, there is no doubt that public interest was greatly quickened by the famous manifesto. The procession into the City was larger and more enthusiastic than I have known it for some days. The narrow streets of the City looked bare and desolate before the host of marching men which swept through them. The "Marseillaise" rang out with what seemed redoubled force along the resounding streets. On comes the great procession, proudly, firmly, and defiantly. The windows of every business office is crowded with the middle classes, who gaze with parted lips and staring eyes upon the daring men below. As the procession advances, the hearts of the processionists swell within them as they listen to the glorious song of revolution that proclaims that the glorious day of victory and vengeance is at hand.

You all know how the directors refused the demands of the men, which was followed by a great demonstration in Hyde Park, and the withdrawal of the general strike manifesto, to be held back as the last desperate weapon to bring the middle classes to their knees. So now let me give a slight sketch of a scene on Tower Hill at one of the morning meetings. It is Monday morning; the sky is gloomy and overcast, but an immense crowd has gathered upon the hill. From that raised terrace in front of an old warehouse a man is speaking. We all know that figure—short, thick, strong and muscular, clad in blue, a straw hat on his head and a leather bag slung at his side. Yes, it is John Burns, the central figure—what one might almost call the soul of the strike. To the startled eyes of the few middle-class people who gaze upon the scene, there must be a terrible meaning about that black-bearded swarthy figure, that has risen like some gnome from the depths, and now towers aloft, a potent of coming storm and revolution.

You gaze through a screen of leafy trees upon the old grey Tower behind sleeping peacefully after a stirring life of centuries. There they stand face to face, the man and the prison fortress. The Tower one of the last relics of a worn-out feudalism; the man the impersonation of the coming storm, that will sweep capitalism and feudalism away. Here in this pleasant spot—for Tower Hill is one of the few places which are cheerful in the East-end of London, with its old houses, its gardens, the green trees, the huge fortress, and the river, which now sparkles in the sun, beyond—it is easy to fall into a pleasant dream; and even these wretched toilers must feel what little happiness their starved lives afford, while their hearts yearn for a life that shall be bright as the sun, fresh as the green leaves, free from care and joylessness.

But let us change the scene. Within a quarter of an hour's walk from Tower Hill there is a street where the League has held meetings for months past. By the side of a gloomy railway arch there is a coffee tavern, and an immense crowd of starving men has collected round to get their relief tickets. The place is besieged by them, and the doors threaten to give way. The terrified proprietor, fearing that they will yield and that this will be the signal for the sack of his shop, harangues them frantically from the window, and is met with shouts and groans. The police, however, arrive in strong force, and forming the men into a column three deep, they keep them in this position, and they gradually enter the shop. A little further on a mad crowd surrounds a strong man who has some relief tickets which are literally torn from his grasp. Little children with hardly rage enough to cover their nakedness run up to you to beg "a penny to get something to eat, they are so hungry."

We are now in a street inhabited by dockers—narrow, close, and unwholesome. The very houses look desolate, despairing, and hungry. Hag-gard women, with dishevelled hair and ragged dresses, talk excitedly together; and if you listened to their conversation you would probably hear the name of Norwood and the directors linked with the bitterest curses. But in spite of the hunger and the wretchedness, one sentiment prevails—the most enthusiastic belief in their leaders, and the certainty of ultimate victory. The misery of the present they are willing to suffer, if they can win by it a happier future for themselves and their children.

The battle is growing in bitterness. All processions have been stopped, and the docks are now invested by a vast silent army of pickets, through which it is almost impossible for a scab to pass. Meanwhile, funds are pouring in, and £3,000 was received by the Strike Committee on Tuesday. The epidemic of strikes spreads. At Liverpool the dock labourers are out, at Rochester the coal-whippers, and in the West and South-West of London the engineer's labourers have revolted. John Williams is at their head. The strike among the Jewish tailors and cabinet makers spreads in the East End, and before long they will be joined by the bootmakers. This will paralyse most of the sweating industries of the East End. Our own comrades have not been idle. Kitz, Mowbray, Cores, Nicoll, Brookes, and Parker have addressed large meetings, and tons of literature and leaflets have been distributed. More work could be done, but funds are lacking. Will our members and friends do their best to enable us to spread the light?

N.

Strike of Tailors.

A general strike of tailors was declared among the sweaters' victims of East London on Monday, September 2nd, 1889, when some 5,000 men and women turned out against the long hours of labour. Comrades Lewis Lyons, Mowbray, Turner, Wess, and others have assisted in bringing the Jews up to the scratch of unionism. Several employers of labour have already given their sanction to a reduction of the hours of labour. At present they work 16 to 18 hours per day; the strike is for a uniform day of 10½ hours. The men and women on strike show great enthusiasm in the matter, and the speeches bordering on Socialism are certainly the best received. The following is their manifesto:

TO TAILORS AND TAILORESSES!

GREAT STRIKE OF LONDON TAILORS AND SWEATER'S VICTIMS.

Fellow Workers,—You are all aware that a Commission of Lords have been appointed to enquire into the evils of the sweating system in the tailoring trade. The revelations made before the Commission by witnesses engaged in the tailoring trade, are a disgrace to a civilised country. The sweater's victims had hoped that this Commission would have come to some satisfactory conclusion as to an alteration in the condition of the sweated tailors. Finding they have just put off their deliberation until next Session, we have decided to take immediate action.

It is too long for us to wait until next Session, because the hardships inflicted upon us by the sweater are unbearable. We have, therefore, decided to join in the general demand for increased comfort and shorter hours of labour. Our hours at present being on an average from 14 to 18 per day, in unhealthy and dirty dens, we demand:

1. That the hours be reduced to 12, with an interval of one hour for dinner and half-hour for tea.
2. All meals to be had off the premises.
3. Government contractors to pay wages at trade union rates.
4. Government contractors and sweaters not to give work home at night after working hours.

We now appeal for the support of all tailors to join us and thus enable us to successfully enforce our demands, which are reasonable. Tailors and tailoresses support in joining this General Strike.

We appeal to all tailors, machinists, pressers, basters, etc., to meet, en masse, on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday mornings, at 10 o'clock (outside the Baths), Goulston Street, Whitechapel, E.

Piece workers finish up, week workers give notice at once. All work to cease on Saturday afternoon, when the strike will be declared.

(Signed) Strike Committee [here follow names].

The Printers' Labourers Strike.

A most remarkable movement among a class of workmen resembling in many respects the dock labourers, has during the past week been growing in a most encouraging manner. Like the dock labourers,—hopeless, disorganised, ignorant, and contemptible has been the verdict generally passed upon them by those who have had to do with them. Their case is even worse than that of the "dockers," as their pay is nearly as low and they toil in thoroughly unhealthy workshops. Let anyone who doubts this visit the places where they have to work, and look into the filthy cellars; the foul air coming out is enough to make one vomit, and the men themselves say that the employers hardly ever venture into the "machine-room"—perhaps not once in a twelvemonth.

Contrary to general belief, the "machine boy" is not by any means, generally speaking, a juvenile. On the contrary, two-thirds of these "boys" are from twenty to forty years of age, and the long spells of hard work, sometimes extending to fifty continuous hours, would be too much for a boy, in years, to do. Neither is it true, despite the title of "printers' labourers" being applied to them, that their work belongs to the "unskilled" order, for it requires very considerable practice and experience for one to become a "pointer" or "stroker-in." Both alertness of eye and precision of hand is needed in the work, especially as some machines run at the speed of 2,000 revolutions per hour, each revolution taking a sheet of paper and printing it, the work of the stroker-in or pointer being to "feed" the machine. The wages paid for this work is on the average only 12s. a-week, although varying from 9s. to 16s. a-week in different cases; and men, in order to keep their families in bare bread, have to work all night very often to add a couple of shillings to their miserable wages at the end of the week. They rejoice at the opportunity of being able to work "a week (of 59 hours) and two nights" to make up their wages to 16s., 17s., or 19s. per week! Could chattel-slavery be worse? But the burden has become too heavy to bear, and like the proverbial worm they have begun to "turn" on those who crush them.

A general strike is the first symptom of revolt among these despised and disorganised slaves. They begin to see clearly the position of the worker, and compare the profits of the employers with the scanty wages which they themselves receive. During the week isolated strikes took place, succeeded and failed, and finally ended in the employees of many firm's turning out on Monday morning last for a united demand for the not very exorbitant sum of 20s. a week of 54 hours, and 6d. an hour over-time.

Meetings have been held daily, at which not only Socialists such as comrades Cores, Power, Nielson, Nicoll, Annie Besant, etc., have spoken, but the men themselves have found out how to put their case most effectively before the public although never having addressed public audiences before.

Speaking thoroughly from the socialistic labour standpoint, they tell of their low wages and the employers' large profits, and of the foul holes in which they work. Their exhibition of lamed limbs, and hands with but one or two fingers remaining, or of shopmates lamed and beggared for life, too poor and weak even to obtain legal compensation, and turned off with a few shillings by the employers whose wealth is the result of the toil of these poor wretches.

They have formed the nucleus of a trade combination, who issued a manifesto on August 30th, which is printed below. They have good chances of success in their present demands, and it must also end in many cases in these unhappy wage-slaves resolving to get rid entirely of those men who take the profits, and who leave them, the workmen, toil, poverty, disease, and death.

TO PRINTERS' LABOURERS AND OTHER WORKERS IN THE PRINTING TRADE.

We, the Printers' Labourers, are on strike for a wage of 20s. per week and 6d. per hour overtime. We appeal to the Machine Minders and other workers to aid us in obtaining our just demands.

Our present wages vary from 12s. to 14s. per week, and many among us have wives and families to sustain. We work on an average fifty-four hours a week, and seventy-five hours to earn £1.

How, and under what conditions do we work? In heated cellars where gas-light replaces daylight; amidst perpetual din; breathing a stifling, filthy atmosphere. We have to keep eye and hand ever on the alert to keep stroke with the machines we tend.

Our kind, respectable Christian employers would not put their pet cats and dogs in the styes where they condemn us to pass our best working years. Above are the demands for the toil which destroys our health.

We appeal to all fellow labourers to join us. Do not listen to the specious talk of interested foremen and employers who "promise to favourably consider your demands." They want time to work off urgent orders. If you on strike are selfish enough to go in because a few employers grant concessions, you help to ruin the cause. Will you purchase your gain at the expense of our defeat? Show the same spirit as our comrades in other industries are displaying.

Strike! Strike all together! Stand together and win!

Printers' Strike Committee, Red Star
Coffee House, Clerkenwell Green.

GEORGE EVANS, Sec.
GEORGE WALDEN, Treas.

We hear a good many howls from the capitalists concerning "intimidation," but a more dastardly piece of the worst kind of intimidation would be hard to find than that contained in the following letter:

WATERLOW AND SONS, Limited,
Finsbury Factory, August 27th, 1889.

Dear Sir,—I have to inform you that your son was absent from his work this afternoon, and has presumably joined the boys on strike. I think it right to inform you that unless he presents himself at his work as usual to-morrow morning, he will render himself liable to lose his situation.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES E. LUKER,
Manager Machine Department.

We warn the capitalists that people may be inclined to follow their bad example if this sort of thing is to be carried on.

Passports among Cabinet Makers.

A crowded meeting was held on Thursday evening (Aug. 29th) in Princes Street Hall, Spitalfields, of the men who were called out on Tuesday and Wednesday. The chairman was Mr. Harris Goldberg. The position of the strikers was explained by Mr. C. Adams, the secretary of the East End branch of the Cabinet Makers Alliance, who said they had refused to work until the system of passports had been abolished. These passports are printed forms, which are given by the employers to the men when they leave one shop to go to another, and on which it is stated what work, wages, etc., the workman has been used to. But the real object is to coerce the men who are the most active in the trade union. The meeting was also addressed by J. E. Williams, W. B. Parker, and L. Diemshietz. Since then other firms have been brought out.

N.

CASTE FEELING AMONG WORKERS.—One of the most formidable obstacles to the success of the labour reform cause (says the Journal of United Labour) is the caste feeling among workers. The brainworker, editor, book-keeper, or teacher thinks himself above the mere mechanic. Although no class suffers more from the oppression of capitalism, yet, in nine cases out of ten, the intellectual worker ostentatiously sympathises with the exploiters of labour, or withholds his support from a movement which is as much in his interest as in that of the manual labourer. The skilled mechanic too often looks down on the unskilled toiler. The saleswoman considers herself the social superior of the factory girl, and the latter again affects to despise the domestic servant. While this feeling continues, and prevents the working class from acting harmoniously together in the interests of the whole, we cannot fairly or consistently blame others because they are dominated by the caste feeling. The skilled artisan who contemptuously refuses to cooperate with the labourer in the common cause has no right to feel aggrieved and indignant at any slight put upon him by the fashionably-dressed idler or the purse-proud capitalist. They are only showing the same hateful and contemptible spirit which he himself exhibits toward his less fortunate comrades in the army of toilers. The man who is always looking for somebody beneath him to insult and look down on by way of revenge for the contumely heaped on him and his class by those above him in the social scale has altogether failed to grasp the significance of the movement for labour's enfranchisement. All honest labour is dignified and honourable. Once admit that there are shades and distinctions—a skilled aristocracy and a plebian herd of inferiors—and you practically justify all the wrongs and insults heaped upon labour, irrespective of such distinctions by the "superior classes," who live by controlling the means of production.

MANHOOD SUFFRAGE LEAGUE (founded 1875), "Three Doves," Berwick St., Oxford Street, W.—Sunday September 8, at 8.45 p.m., Lothrop Withington, "False Lights of Revolutionary Wreckers: Was the Great Strike only a clever piece of stockjobbing after all?"

YARMOUTH.—On Wednesday evening William Morris gave a lecture in the Corn Hall on "Monopoly"; chairman, C. Reynolds. There was a very good attendance, mostly workers. After the lecture a few questions were asked of the usual sort, which our comrade answered satisfactorily. Our comrade Morris offered to come and spend a Sunday with us in about a month's time. On Sunday morning Brightwell held a meeting at Brackwell. We also held a large meeting on Priory Plain; Reynolds was assisted by a stranger.—C. R.

NOTES ON NEWS.

If the non-Socialist middle-class sympathisers with the strikers could grasp one side of the situation, I think it ought to stagger their complacency with the present arrangement of society. Let us take their own view of that situation, which is pretty much this: A body of workmen very much oppressed by the operation of the wages and capital system have demanded a slight increase of wages, and a revision of an iniquitous system of sweating; the public generally have admitted the justice and moderation of the men's claim; but their employers have simply buttoned up their pockets and said "We can't and shan't," and the public have absolutely no means of compelling them to yield.

Could anything condemn our present society more clearly and completely than this deadlock? Here is the whole of humanity and morality crying out loudly on the shabby employers to give way to the men's demands, and the shabby employers in fact replying to that cry: Humanity and morality may go to H (eaven) for us; we have to create a dividend; we stand on our legal right to starve as many people as may be convenient to us. And the public morality and humanity is helpless before them; for their legal right is undoubted: their legal right to put citizens to death by starvation.

Yes, in spite of its prisons and ropes and hangmen for those whom it calls specially "criminals," the law is the Great Murderer!

Here, then, at last is the reductio ad absurdum of laissez faire; which of course means, let the privileged alone to make the most of their privilege of driving the weakest to the wall. For clearly if you attack privilege you at once abjure laissez faire; you are not letting alone, you are becoming revolutionary.

Once more, we must not suppose, however, that this sympathy of the well-to-do for the strikers is universal; I believe that if you polled the well-to-do generally they would give you a handsome majority for Norwood. The Daily News the other day gave a specimen of a conversation with a man of business, who proposed to remedy the strike by locking up four of the ringleaders, and taking advantage of the rioting, which would be sure to follow, for putting down the whole agitation by means of a little murder in the streets.

I really believe that this conversation was genuine; for, happening to be in a Conservative club last week (I don't habitually frequent such places), I listened with much amusement to the "natives" (I must say, a rather gruesome-looking set of savages) putting the other view to that which has been generally put in the papers; and, as a matter of course, it was all on the lines of the Daily News' interlocutor; and Burns (I am happy to say) was by no means flattered by these worthies, a long term of imprisonment being the best wish for him. It is true that some pity was expressed for the "poor men" for their ill-luck in being led astray by such scoundrels, and their ruin (the deprivation of 6s. a-week) abundantly prophesied.

This may seem a kind of a joke to us: but do not let us forget that the theories of these ruffians would have been put into practice if they could have been. These strikes are not less dangerous to the supremacy of the landlords and their abettors than the Trafalgar Square incidents, but more dangerous. There is only one reason why Burns is not going to Pentonville this time, and why the streets are not cleared by the bludgeon, and if necessary by the bayonet, and that is because the rulers of this happy land are afraid to do it. The men are too many and too desperate, and their miserable condition has really impressed itself on a large part of the non-political middle classes; and lastly and above all, their brother-workers are really in active sympathy with the strikers.

The rejection by the men of the so-called compromise on Monday was a certain thing, for less than this they cannot get. The promise of the extra penny at some future date is seen by everybody to be a delusion; as who can say what may happen between now and then to serve the directors as an excuse for breaking their promise? they have shown themselves very fond of using the well-known formula of moneyed men, "We cannot," and will not be slow to do so in the future we may be sure.

It has seemed as though the provinces have not shown that enthusiasm for the strikes, or that understanding of them, that might have been expected; but, at least, the conduct of the 15 Dundee labourers who set out to tramp back when they found that they would interfere with the strike here, is a bright spot in the dullness. All honour to the brave men! As to the conduct of Mr. Christopher Peacock, it was what might have been expected from a Nupkins. We can only be glad that the men met in the end with a little better reward of loyalty than seven day's hard, though that is a type of such rewards too. Let us echo the cheers of the Lincoln folk who saw them off to Dundee again.

This last Trades-Union Congress has turned out thoroughly reactionary, and there has been plenty of bowing down to Gessler Broadhurst's hat, both by the men and in the press. It is to be feared that the explanation of this is simply that the influential men in the respectable trades-unions are fossil Whigs, and of course need a fossil Whig for a leader (and have got him). This at first seems discouraging to those who have had any hope of socialising the trades-unions, and I don't know that the hope was ever worth much.

It must not be forgotten, however, that not only has revolt begun amongst the older trades-unions, but that what is now going on is a threat of their final disappearance into a far wider and more generous association of the workers, which will be inspired with socialistic feeling. The unions of so-called unskilled labourers, which are part of the consequences of the present strikes, very much reduce the importance of Mr. Broadhurst and his brother officials who pretend to represent the workers of the country. There is a curious analogy, ominous of good, between the position of these two groups and that of the struggle of the Trade Guilds of the Middle Ages against the exclusive and aristocratic Merchant Guilds. That struggle ended in victory for the true workmen, and it is hardly indulging in prophesy to say that a similar victory may be looked forward to once more. Mr. Broadhurst's triumph and the solidifying of the Whig element in the official trades-unions does nothing but widen the gap (always a pretty wide one) between him and the workmen of the country. W. M.

The great strike has taught us one lesson, that battles of labour are best fought in the street and not in the Parliamentary arena. In future, if the workers want anything they will come out on strike for it, and not elect a man to Parliament to do for them what they can do far better for themselves. The big strike will be an infallible method to bring the capitalist to his knees.

Especially is this true with regard to the eight hour working-day. I have my opinion with regard to this reform, which I do not consider worth the fuss which is made about it, but still, if it is to be gained, why should it not be won by a general strike among the workers who desire it?

I say this not because I consider the reform of much consequence, but because the strike would be such a valuable instruction to the workers of the way in which to get some things of far more consequence than an eight hour working-day, namely, the wealth which is theirs by right. They created it and they should have it.

It may be said that the trades-unions are only a small minority of the working-classes of this country. But are not trade-union men a small minority among the waterside workers who have fought so gallantly? Suppose the trades-unions are won over to the eight hour notion, and they certainly have shown signs of becoming favourable to it, could not these men by the mere threat of a general strike extort even more than an eight hour's bill from their masters, and if the rich trade-unionists were determined to get this by their own action, how long would it take the men not belonging to trade-unions to follow the example set them by their more fortunate brethren?

This is the lesson that the docker's strike has taught us. Some people appear to imagine that they are to be converted by the vote of "free and independent electors" into the heaven of the House of Commons, whence they are to sit like Almighty Jove and shower blessings and curses upon meaner mortals. This is very good and very kind of them, but despite their sweet voices we persist in our belief that social diseases are not to be cured by homoeopathic doses of legislative medicine. In these the patient must minister to himself.

LIFE AND LABOUR IN EAST LONDON.

CHAPTER V., "Poverty,"—is probably the most detailed account ever printed, showing the sordid grind which is the lot of hundreds of thousands, and showing how low a standard of "Life" the free Briton has been reduced to without "danger" (!), and showing, too, how to estimate the value of the terms "Very Poor," "Poor," and "Comfort."

Thirty real families have been drawn upon for exact details of expenditure of every kind, in Classes B, C, D, E, and a few from F. Six families "Very Poor," ten "Poor," and fourteen above the line of poverty.

The table shows a range of expenditure for food per adult per week of 2s. 4½d. in Class B to 10s. 1½d. in Class F, but there is a somewhat droll qualification to be kept in view, "That in almost all the poorer cases the admitted expenditure exceeds the supposed income" (p. 134), and, in fact, the imagination must be drawn upon to complete the picture of Class B. Class A is not here dealt with, it is too low down probably to measure at all.

When we find by the detailed table (p. 136, 137) that Class E allows in the highest instance—a policeman earning 20s. per week, wife but no children—an expenditure of only 5s. 9½d. per adult for food, we may possibly be allowed to suggest that Mr. Booth's grouping by Classes is a trifle strained to make out his 577,000 rising to affluence, and to suggest that the large Class E, numbering 377,000, should rather be added to A, B, C, D, making in all 691,000 tending downwards against 200,000 of classes tending towards affluence.

This grouping makes a most startling change in the whole labour problem, and it is astounding, in face of the fact that the book itself backs up this grouping, that there should be such a general "disgrace but no danger" tone adopted by the people responsible for its production; the pronoun "its" refers to the "book" not the "social condition."

The book is divided into three Parts. For Part I., consisting of six chapters, Mr. Booth is wholly responsible. Part II., eight chapters, by different persons, deals with special trades as the docks, tailoring, bootmaking, furniture, tobacco, silk, etc. Part III., four chapters, two by Mr. Booth, influx of population and the Jewish community being dealt with by other writers. The eighteen chapters of the book are dealt with by eight different people from quite distinct points of view, and every chapter and almost every page will give proof that the whole tendency of the time is against labour and in favour of capital. "Unrestrained competition is the evil spirit of the age" (p. 238). "The average work per week throughout the year . . . four to four and a-half days in the shops of large contractors, and for the most competent and skilled hands throughout the trade (tailoring); three days for medium shops and average labour; and two and a-half days and under for the great majority of permanently unskilled or imperfectly trained workers" (p. 226).

In the boot trade we find by table (p. 267) the maximum is £1 18s., but, in spite of "very steady work," the average for the year is only £1 3s. 5½d.

It is interesting at this moment to learn, according to Beatrice Potter, who does the chapter on the docks, that "Go to the Docks!" might be taken as a modern equivalent for "Go to Hell!" and the statement is fully borne out.

The Hell of female labour is either the shirt trade or the fur trade. In the shirt trade a widow over sixty earned 5d. per day, from which 2d. for tram fare to get the work had to be deducted (p. 412). A woman young and strong can earn 2½d. per hour, but many can not earn more than 4s. per week (p. 410).

As a rule, the German and the Jew is at the bottom of all wages scales, but in the fur trade "Although nearly all the furriers are Jews, young Jewesses rarely enter the fur trade unless they are too poor and friendless to be supported while learning a trade. . . Girls must be very poor or incapable to take to fur sewing for a living, or they are girls who do not like regular work. It is difficult to say whether the immorality of many of these younger fur-sewers is the cause or the effect of their entering so irregular a trade" (p. 428).

In the trousers, vests, and juvenile-suits trade, we also find that as the work and pay decreases so does the number of Jewesses employed, the suggestion being that by the Christian woman the deficit is in many cases made up in the woman's final market of all, to which market Jewish women hardly ever go.

Many interesting details may be learnt by a study of the special articles, and attention may be drawn to a pretty little bubble argument greatly in favour among apologists for a luxurious class, who by their tastes require and by their riches can employ a large number of wage-slaves.

Chapter VII., Part 2, by Jesse Argyle, deals with silk, and from it we learn many interesting details, but particularly that silk-weaving seems to be dying out, for 70 per cent. of those engaged are past middle life, and hardly any one seems to be learning the craft. This perhaps is not much to be wondered at, for it is tedious, trying, and difficult to learn, and yet a "steady operative working not less than sixty hours per week might earn 20s. Taking a yearly average one-fourth must be deducted from this for lost time, there being often a good deal of waiting between the jobs, so that the weekly average for the year would be about 15s." (p. 400)!!

A very good workman, with fairly regular work at velvet-making, is put down for an average of 25s. to 27s. by working hard.

The most highly skilled and best paid class of work is the making of furniture silk. It is very heavy work, and requires a strong man to carry it on. The fabric is exceedingly rich and artistic, and is, of course, almost wholly manufactured for the wealthy—the plutocrats of America being large buyers of the best work, and in the making of this article "probably 35s. to £2 a week is the average of operatives' wages" (p. 403). They had better spin hemp.

Furs, again, may be taken as a product almost wholly for plutocratic consumption, and that trade, as has been already shown, is a working-class hell. How much of real benefit do these workers receive from their consumers, who, to use Ruskin's figure, consume their peach in such a selfish manner?

Leaving, of necessity, any further examination of the evil, and coming to the remedy or suggested solution of the problem, we have surely about the feeblest ever yet put forth.

In the eyes of Mr. Booth, Class B is the bête noir of modern civilisation. Class B consists of 100,000 "Very Poor." "Classes B and C are never employed more than half-time, and it may not be too much to say that if the whole of Class B were swept out of existence all the work they do could be done, together with their own work, by the men, women, and children of Classes C and D; that all they earn and all they spend might be earned and could be very easily spent by the classes above them; that these classes, and especially Class C, would be immensely better off, while no class nor any industry would suffer in the least. This view of the subject seems to show who it is that really bear the burden. To the rich the poor are a sentimental interest; (true, oh author!) to the poor they are a crushing load. The poverty of the poor is mainly the result of the competition of the very poor. The entire removal of this very poor class out of the daily struggle for existence I believe to be the only solution of the problem. Is this solution beyond our reach?" (p. 154).

This statement of the social problem of the day is something almost too utterly supremely lovely to be handled, and it is only because of the "?" with which the passage concludes that one feels compelled to answer.

THOMAS SHORE.

(To be concluded).

ROYAL PAUPERS AND POLITICAL TRICKSTERS.

A MAN and a woman were married the other day in England. Quite an ordinary event. But in this case columns of newspaper description of it were cabled over here, at twelve cents a word. We are even told, at 12 cents a word, that a young woman's father perspired freely as he led her to the altar. Why all this expensive information? Because the man who perspired was the Prince of Wales, and the young woman was his daughter. Somebody else will have to perspire to earn the additional 180,000 dols. a year that Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Parnell and others have voted shall henceforth be paid to the Prince, to help him support his dignity.

A woman in England, with a private fortune of 20,000,000 dols., an income from certain lands and other property of 2,000,000 dols., and a salary of almost 2,000,000 dols. more, has asked the people to give her granddaughter a yearly allowance. This granddaughter has just married a man with an income of 400,000 dols. a year. Cheek, do you say? Not at all. Royalty. The rich beggar is the Queen, and the pauper granddaughter is the Princess Louise, the daughter of the Prince of Wales. Royal paupers come high, but the English people like them.

Why did Mr. Parnell vote to increase the amount which the Prince of Wales is to be permitted to take from the people's hard-earned money? Because he is a politician. He believes he can succeed in doing something that he thinks is right by first doing something that he knows is wrong. The papers, generally, say that it was very clever in Mr. Parnell to thus vote for the further robbery of the people to provide for the unrighteous wants of a useless parasite. It's politics, you know. It's the sort of thing that many "reformers" believe in.—Twentieth Century.

SOCIALISM AT NORWICH.—On Saturday evening, comrades Poynts and Lyne (London) addressed a good meeting on Hay Hill. Sunday morning, W. Moore and Lyne spoke in the Market Place. For the afternoon an arrangement had been made between Fred Henderson and Mr. Burgess to hold a demonstration on behalf of the dockers. Mr. Burgess objected to speaking under the red flag, but it was decided that it should remain by an overwhelming majority of the audience. The chairman opened, followed by a representative of the carpenters moving a resolution of sympathy; W. Moore seconded, Fred Henderson supported; carried unanimously. Another resolution was proposed pledging to support the men; comrade Lynes followed. The meeting concluded with three cheers for the strikers, the collection being £6 15s. In the evening another meeting held in the Market Place, opened by Poynts, followed by Lyne, Fred Henderson, and Mr. Crotch; Freedom and Commonwealth sold well; collected for propaganda, 12s. 5d.—A. AUSTRALIAN NOTES.

THE Gympie miners intend to have a field-day on the 9th November. At their half-yearly meeting held in the first week of July, a satisfactory report and balance-sheet was adopted, and hopes were expressed that before the end of the year a further advance would be made. Although Gympie is now an old field, the miners in the district have done good service during the last few months by backing the Croydon agitation against total exemption and strengthening their members hands in bringing about an alteration in the law which practically prevents miners working on leased lands.

Australia seems to be progressing with rapid strides along the road which leads to civilisation and the poorhouse. Even in the little island of Tasmania they have just provided their "annual treat to the poor," which consists of a free tea. A correspondent on the spot says that "long before the time of opening the doors a large crowd of men, women, and children had assembled outside the building eager to gain admittance, but were kept back by a strong posse of police, who had been told off for the purpose. Fully 500 persons had assembled, although every precaution had been taken, it is affirmed, to prevent imposition." Truly this is a pleasant item for those who advocate the emigration of the London poor to Australia, and must be comforting to the political rulers who are bringing about a state of things which must at no distant future rival outcast London!

The Labour Federation which took the place of the Brisbane Trades Council is now fairly on its feet, and from enquiries now being made it is anticipated that many of the unions now standing out will shortly affiliate. At the last meeting a branch of bootmakers—the clickers and blockers—was admitted and steps taken to register the Federation under the Trades Union Act. The boilermakers are still out in the cold.

The navvies and draymen of Brisbane waited on a South Brisbane employer who had encroached on their hours of labour, but they got very little satisfaction from their interview. Unless they are prepared to form a strong organisation they must accept further encroachment on their hours as well as their wages.

The Brisbane wharf-labourers held their half-yearly meeting on Wednesday July 3. A satisfactory balance-sheet was presented, and a recommendation from the executive was read that the wharf-labourers join the Labour Federation, and that the small societies which are now established at every live coastal town shall amalgamate with Brisbane and form one large union. If these suggestions are carried out the Northern unions will benefit greatly.

The navvies and draymen are making another attempt to resuscitate their union, which has practically been allowed to lapse. Many bosses who were running their drays on fair pay and short hours have lately been compelled by the keen competition of unfair employers to lengthen hours and shorten pay. A good union would prevent this.

The Queensland Railway Employés Association has issued a circular to railway-men outside the organisation. In it is pointed out that lengthmen, gangers, inspectors, porters, clerks, station-masters, drivers, firemen, fitters, foremen, carriage-makers, and carriage-cleaners may now all be united in one association, which seeks to protect the interests and improve the condition of its members. There is no room or place for departmental jealousy in this organisation, for what affects the interests of one affects the interests of all, so that it is impossible for anyone to be overlooked or neglected. The sevenfold objects of the association are as follows:

1. To improve the condition and protect the interest of all classes of railway employés.
2. To obtain and maintain reasonable hours of duty and fair rates of wages.
3. To promote a good understanding between the various grades of the service and the settlement of all disputes by a board of arbitration or other effective means.
4. To provide legal assistance, when necessary, in cases of accident or injury through the negligence of others, in order to secure compensation.
5. To provide temporary assistance to members when under suspension through causes over which they have no just control or through unjust treatment.
6. To use every effort to provide for the safety of railway work and travelling.
7. To found a newspaper in the interests of the association, to be devoted to railway news and matters generally affecting railway work.

There are now seven branches of the association—at North Brisbane, Woolloona, Ipswich, Toowoomba, Warwick, Dalby, and Roma. Nearly 2,000 men on the Southern and Western are already enrolled. The terms of membership are 2s. 6d. entrance fee and 1s. per month.

The unemployed of this colony (Queensland) are beginning to make themselves heard, and if something is not done to relieve the congested labour-market there will be a big kick throughout the country. The deputation which waited on the Chief Secretary on Wednesday July 3 represented all branches of the ironworkers, and pointed out that about 75 per cent. of the men employed in the industry were idle. The Minister for Railways said "he did not see why, when all other persons suffered from depression of trade and bad seasons, the artizans should not bear their share of the burden." One of the deputation reminded him that they had already borne the heat and burden of the dull times, that they were getting tired of playing, and wanted work. The result of this interview must be waited for.

The Townsville unemployed, at an open-air meeting, have requested their representatives to bring under the notice of the Government the large number of the unemployed in the district, and to request that public works may be started to absorb the surplus labour. Resolutions were also adopted protesting against the "contravention of the Polynesian Act" and State-aided immigration. With regard to the latter it seems absurd for the Government to bring shipload after shipload of good, bad, and indifferent labourers to a country where all classes are crying out for work.

Brisbane, July 15, 1889.

BOOMERANG.

John Stuart Mill laconically stated that the only reason for the subjection of women that he could think of was that "men liked it." In the last Contemporary Review a woman corrects him by saying that the real reason is that women like it. And it is true of all grievous wrong that the ignorance or cowardice of the victims alone makes it possible for the knaves to successfully play the oppressor.—Liberty.

LYRIC OF LABOUR.

LET us raise up a tocsin of warning,
We that toil on the shore and the sea,
Our song is the song of the morning,
And our theme is the right to be free;
The light of the sky has been breaking,
We have seen what the clouds had in thrall,
The tyrants that held us are quaking,
For Upharsin is writ on the wall!

We toil but we do not inherit,
We build but we do not possess,
The flower of our skill and our merit
Only blossoms for others to bless;
It is time that Right cried a warning,
That Justice had thundered her call;
Our song is the song of the morning,
And Upharsin is writ on the wall!

Sweet freedom is ours if we dare it,
Demand it with resolute will,
And the gold that we coin we shall share it,
The fruit of the forge and the mill;
The creators of wealth cry a warning,
A new hope shines forth for us all:
Our song is the song of the morning,
And Upharsin is writ on the wall!

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

We have received the first part of the official edition of the proceedings of the International (Marxist) Congress (23 pp., Imprimerie de la Resse, 1889), containing the appeal of the organising committee, the list of delegates, and a number of resolutions passed. Very little care has been taken to make this publication a reliable historical document, for the lists of delegates swarm with misprints, omissions, and inconsequent arrangements. Two of the English delegates, F. Charles and J. Turner, are completely omitted; on the other side we find an Austrian delegate, Mr. Altrohan, who never existed, but the name of the town of Altrohan, where H. Dietel came from, was made the name of a delegate! William Morris's and F. Kitz's resolutions were not published as "no space was left," it is said, but will be published "later on."

A new pamphlet by Kropotkin, Le Salarial (The Wages System), a reprint of articles of the Révolte, August and September, 1888, has just been published (33 pp., 10 cents.). It deals not with the present system, the condemnation of which we all agree, but refutes the various schemes proposed by Social Democrats, culminating in the formula, "To each according to his deeds." The impracticability and evil consequences of such a system, even if considered as a transitory step only, are exposed, and Communism is advocated.

A French pamphlet on the Chicago Anarchists is now in course of preparation.

Le Coup de Feu ceased to appear with No. 72, of August 25th, and is to be replaced by the Revue Européenne, Socialiste, Littéraire, Artistique.

The French Republic acts like the worst monarchical government, and is emulating free Switzerland against Anarchists just now. An Italian, Joseph Rovigo, was imprisoned 25 days without any reason given, then sentenced to 2 days prison for carrying a weapon upon him, and now he is again locked up 25 days without even any pretext for this being given to him. L. Parmeggiani, who was arrested in London some time ago, has been liberated, none of the trumped up charges of the Italian government, wanting him extradited, having proved true.

SWITZERLAND.

Eighty Russians, Poles, Frenchmen, and Italians have been expelled from Geneva. A number of them had lived there for years. Even the editor of a moderate Liberal Russian paper, La Russie Libre, was forced to leave, as well as Plechanov, the Russian Marxist, who did more than anybody else to fight Anarchism in Russia.

A manifesto of the Swiss Anarchists, signed by many groups in all parts of the country, has been published, protesting against these and all the other acts of servility of the Swiss government towards Germany, Russia etc. It was confiscated, although even papers hostile towards it consider its language and style "quite moderate." The Social Democrats show the way in which they understand solidarity amongst the workers by denouncing this protest as made by police agents, and are busy with collecting signatures for the preliminary demand of a vote of the people to be taken on the question of the public procuratorship for Socialist persecutions now created by the Federal Council. Meanwhile, two arrests have been made in connection with the manifesto, and criminal proceedings will be begun against the authors of it.

The residue of delegates who adopted several resolutions at the Paris Congress on July 20th, left it over to the bureau to found a paper to be called The Eight Hour Working Day, to be published in French, English, and German. This matter passed through committees and commissions, and is now in the hands of a committee at Zurich, who intend to bring out the paper in October next if possible.

THE POWER OF THE PEOPLE.

THE COMING REVOLUTION.

THE great strike has proved to the world that even the unskilled labourers are beginning to learn their own strength; that to-day they are not the unthinking slaves they once were; that they are learning to think and learning to combine. Great have been the fears of the propertied classes; great the fears of the supporters of "vested" interests; great the anxiety and terrible the presentiments of the profit-mongering classes.

I was assured a day or two ago by a retired tradesman that the strike was the forerunner of greater troubles. That the great mass of the people, through their ignorance, are unfit for any good, are capable of only mischief; and that in a year or two we shall find history repeating itself in the shape of a reign of terror in this England of ours. Though a Conservative, he thought the Government were much to blame in not stopping all meetings and processions, and if need be, in even suspending the Habeas Corpus Act.

Well! these great upheavals, these social revolts, are among the best signs of the times. We know what the workers can do if they will, and we know what they will do when they learn their own strength and feel their own importance. It is our duty, then, to redouble our efforts in all directions to educate and to organise them, prepare them for the good time coming, and be ready to guide and control them when the crisis arrives. The unskilled labourers have hitherto been treated as almost beneath contempt; yet a cessation of labour on the part of a few thousands of those so-called unskilled workers paralyses the trade of the metropolis, and fills the bosoms of speculators with fear and trembling. What would a general cessation of labour do, even for one seven days? If a partial cessation, and for the removal of certain grievances only, can cause such consternation, what would a general cessation, and for the social revolution, accomplish? Not only would trade and commerce be paralysed, but the whole of the non-producing classes would be paralysed too.

We are often told that England is the richest country in the world. Nominally speaking it no doubt is, in proportion to its population. We were told in 1878 that, taking the ten years ending 1875, that the wealth increased £2,400,000,000, or a yearly average of £240,000,000. That ten years included the period of enormous profits—1870-74. But taking the period of low prices, the ten years ending 1885, and the increase was £1,800,000,000, or an annual average of £180,000,000; and if we take the seven years ending 1886, the yearly increase was over £207,000,000. But a great deal of this so-called wealth is a pure fiction, a mere increase in values.

Take the land of the United Kingdom. In 1840 the capital value was given at £1,680,000,000; in 1860, at £1,820,000,000; in 1878, at close on £3,000,000,000. But the land of the United Kingdom had not increased, while a large proportion was yearly going out of cultivation, and was thus becoming less valuable. The secret of the matter was the rise in rents. Taking as an example the rent of rural land. The rise of rents from 1857 to 1875 was £16,097,300, which, at 30 years' purchase, gave an increased capital-value of £482,919,000. And if we add the increase of ground-rents in towns, we shall have an increase in the capital value of far more than £1,000,000,000 during that short period. But the rent of rural land continued to rise up to 1880, and the ground-rents of our towns still go on increasing, thereby adding to the nominal wealth of the country. But notwithstanding the fact of the rise of rents, at the close of 1879 and the beginning of 1880, 25 years' purchase was generally held to be the true basis, and away went £500,000,000 in the capital-value of the land. But the land was there all the same. In 1882, it was £1,882,000,000.

Take house property. From 1841 to 1881 population increased about 45 per cent.; house property hardly so much. But rents rose over 165 per cent., and hence the capital-value of house property rose from 770,000,000 in 1840 to £2,280,000,000 in 1882.

Take the railways. In 1840 the capital-value was £33,000,000; in 1860, £334,000,000; in 1882, £770,000,000; and in 1886, £820,000,000. But take away the total results of what the Americans call the watering process, and what would the capital-value be? But that process adds nothing to the wealth of the country, but only increases the claims to dividends to those interested in the plunder of the workers.

If we take cattle, sheep, etc., one of the great necessities of life, the increase is very small. In 1840 their value was £380,000,000; in 1860, £460,000,000; but in 1882 it was down to £414,000,000. On the other hand, the value of shipping increased from £23,000,000 in 1840 to £120,000,000 in 1882. And the value of merchandise rose from £70,000,000 at the former period to £350,000,000 at the latter.

A few years ago it was customary in some parts of America to calculate a man's wealth by the extent of his indebtedness. Thus, say a man was worth ten thousand dollars, and he owed twenty thousand dollars, he was credited with being worth thirty thousand dollars. We don't do exactly in that way, but the increase in the indebtedness of our local bodies, etc., is added as an item in the increase of our national wealth. Thus loans rose from £230,000,000 in 1840 to £1,060,000,000 in 1882, forming £830,000,000 of the increase of our wealth from £4,030,000,000 in 1840 to £8,720,000,000 in 1882.

Take another test. In 1840 the total amount of our deposits were about £70,000,000; in 1876, about 700,000,000 (Mr. B. Baxter stated £800,000,000: Meeting of Stat. Soc., Jan. 1876). Now there was no corresponding increase in the gold and bullion of the country. That had only about doubled. And all the reserves at the disposal of the banks to meet a demand for the seven or eight hundred millions of deposits is rarely ever up to thirty millions. And of course one of the first results of a genuine crisis would be a run on the banks, or a scramble for the thirty millions. Of course the government would as usual protect the bank against its creditors.

Again, the increase of our investments at home and abroad is taken as evidence of our increasing riches. Taking 1882 and 1888, only six years, our investments at home increased from £2,433,000,000 to £2,753,373,000, being an increase of £320,373,000. But turning to our foreign investments we find an increase from £1,058,000,000 to £3,032,842,000, showing an increase of no less than £1,974,842,000. The amount of interest rose from £155,300,000 to £231,356,000.

Why do the non-producing classes fear the coming revolution? Why do they fear the very name of a crisis? Because this system of fictitious values would disappear in a moment. The fraud would be discovered. Their dividends would be swept away for ever, and the real wealth of the nation only would remain. On the first triumph of the revolution what would be the value of the £750,000,000 in the so-called Government Funds? What would be the value of the £4,000,000,000 of stocks and shares dealt with on the Stock Exchange? The villainies of the whole system would be exposed to the light of day; the rascalities of ages and the plunder of the toiling millions would disappear for ever. People! slaves of the United Kingdom! prepare for the social revolution! Therein lies your only hope, your only means of salvation! People, prepare!

NOTES.

THE terrible mining disaster in Mid-Lothian has come in due time to illustrate, in a fearful manner, the tribute Labour has to pay to meet the necessity of Capital having its profits, and it throws a strange light on the votes, speeches, and actions of Messrs. Weir and Chisholm Robertson, miners' agents, at the Dundee Congress. These men, who pose as advisers to the miners, and are paid accordingly, are anxious for it to be known that they are not Socialists, and that they think it right that labour should work for shareholders who render no equivalent in return but merely the granting of leave to toil. It is well to note enemies. Workers of all classes, take note!

There is not a day passes but the claims of the shareholders' profits must have their tribute of Labour's dead, but when this lesson comes to us in letters of fire in large text, it commands a passing notice from even the most thoughtless and unwilling learners. In the latter part of January twenty-three lives were taken at Cheshire in a mine explosion, two months later twenty lives were taken at North Wales, and now Scotland adds to the tribute with sixty-two lives at Maurice-wood Pit, Mid-Lothian.

These sixty-two lives were lost in a man-trap, fearful to contemplate. All for the sake of profit, and apparently against the Act of 1887, which not only enforced the prohibition of single shafts but provided that there must be two outlets separated by a distance of not less than 15 yards. These miners, who, it is noted, "as a whole were a superior set of men for their class," were entombed in the bowels of the earth in order to gain subsistence for themselves and profits to the shareholders of the Shotts Iron Company. The profits, it would seem, did not permit of the necessary outlay to provide a second shaft according to law, in order to give the legal security to the miner's only capital,—not speaking of the profit which should come to it,—and so they were permitted, notwithstanding mining agents, mine inspectors, legal Acts, and all, to labour in this man-trap in the full knowledge, from experience, of what was almost certain to happen.

A fire in the only shaft of escape, similar to the present disaster, occurred three years ago, but happily all the men at work escaped, and no notice was then taken of the fact that the mine was only provided with one shaft to the lower workings. Some time ago a project was spoken of to make another outlet, but the proposition then spoken of was never carried out for some reason or other, probably because "it would not pay," and so the poor men were sacrificed to the necessities of the shareholders. Oh, blessed Broadhurst! oh, sinless shareholding!

The present system of industry, we see, notwithstanding all that our present Parliament can do with laws and inspectors, must always subordinate the safety of the workers' lives to the shareholders' dividends. Our trades unionists, by their votes at Dundee, have practically endorsed this sort of thing, and it is for all workers now to consider whether such men can truly have their interests at heart, and whether they will content themselves with the prospect of ceaseless toil and a pauper's grave, the chances of a sudden and cruel death and Home Rule for Ireland—the only outcome possible to the aims of Broadhurst and his kind—or whether they will rise in their united strength against a social system which "finds them poor and always keeps them so," and thereby realise that no profits to shareholders can exist without the robbery and murder of the workers. He who is not against the principle of taking something for nothing—that is, shareholding—is against the workers, and with Broadhurst and his kind. G. McL.

CARNEGIE ON WEALTH.—With the perversity of a blind man, who insists in starting off in the wrong direction, Andrew Carnegie begins: "The problem of our age is the proper administration of wealth, so that the ties of brotherhood may still bind together the rich and the poor in harmonious relationship." This is the man with palaces in America and Scotland, whose vacation is a tour round the world, whose outing is a three months' coaching trip, and who also writes, "And here, oh my good friends! let me say, that until a man has stood at the door and seen his own four-in-hand drive up before him, the horses,—four noble bays,—champing the bits, their harness buckles glistening in the sun; the coach spick and span new and as glossy as a mirror, with the coachman on the box and the footman behind; and then, enchanted, has called to his friends, 'Come, look, there it is, just as I had pictured it!' and has then seen them mount to their places with beaming faces—until, as I say, he has had that experience, don't tell me that he has known the most exquisite sensation in life, for I know he hasn't." But mayhap there is another Carnegie, with two rooms on the fourth story of a tenement house in Pittsburgh, whose vacation is the holiday which the State rescues for him from his three hundred and sixty-five days of toil in the rolling-mills, whose outing is a jaunt from one end to the other of the paved city, whose coach is the horse-car which he shares with fifty others? This Carnegie, putting distribution for administration, might restate the question more truly, "The problem of our age is the proper distribution of wealth, so that the ties of brotherhood may bind all together in harmonious relationship, and so there shall be no longer the extravagantly rich and the beggarly poor."—Boston Nationalist.

OUR OLD MEN IN THE STREET.

THE cries of the burdened children,
The thanks of the world elect,
The curses of stunted manhood,
And sobs of souls just wrecked—
All go the same way to the gods above,
An incense of hate, despair, and love.

But the old men bent and weary
Have not a word to say;
They have passed the time of cursing,
They can neither sob nor pray;
And with aching backs and tired feet,
They work without moan in the city street.

Old and friendless and lonely,
With shovel and pick and rake,
Scraping the streets of Vanity Fair,
A pitiful alms to make
That will buy a bed or a bit of meat
For the grey-haired man in the city street.

Should he curse? Will it fill his stomach?
Should he sob? Will it ease his pain?
Are the years not growing apace, apace
When the earth will have him again?
And the world's elect will not sleep more sweet
Than the tired old man from the city street.

And so the silent old workers,
Trembling, patient, and grey,
Sobless, curseless, and silent,
File past us from day to day.
A gap in their ranks—the river has one,
Another is missing—his work is done.

Cry to the gods, ye children,
For the burdens that must be borne;
Curse them, oh stunted manhood,
For the deeds the ages have done;
But kneel, ye elect, and your thanks repeat:
Your father is not with the ranks in the street.

FANNIE S. ROPER in Twentieth Century.

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

I SAID at the conclusion of my last week's article that the strike had entered upon a new phase. It was found by the leaders that processions and meetings took up too much of their time, and that the unornamental but useful duties of picketing and distributing relief suffered accordingly. Processions were accordingly abandoned, the pickets were multiplied, and the relief fund was so managed that it no longer became a system of outdoor relief for some of the loafers and roughs of the East-end. The South side of the river, which had been rather neglected, had its needs attended to, and the few people who had taken advantage of the want of relief to stab Burns and the Strike Committee in the back, and had been well reported in the middle-class press for their pains, subsided into a dismal silence when Burns appeared upon the scene and wanted to know "What they had to say against him?" They had found out that "the lion was not dead but sleeping," and did not care about a personal interview with the noble beast. So they kept away somewhere round the corner; a very sensible policy on their part.

With the cessation of the processions, the Companies plucked up courage and began on their own account to spread the report that the lion was dead. The two evening newspapers, the Echo and the Evening News, which although professing friendship to strikers can always find ample space in their columns and upon their placards for any lies the masters may choose to circulate, reported that the strike was collapsing and that the men were going in. The other humbler emissaries of the dock companies, who get among the crowd on strike and spread false news, were also busy; but, despite these laudable efforts, the men would not listen to the sweet voices of these charmers, and they still held out gallantly despite the hunger and starvation which gnawed their vitals.

Then Mr. Norwood and his friends wrote to the papers to prove that the docker is not so badly off, and that if it had not been for those wicked agitators, and their attendant gangs of socialistic roughs, we should not have had any dock strike at all. However, all that the men have got to do is to return to their work, at the present exorbitantly high wage of 1s. 3d. a day, and all shall be forgiven. The benignant dock company will fold its repentant children in its arms. To this tempting and Christian invitation the men unfortunately, we hope it won't be remembered to them in the next world, made no response, but "put their thumb unto their nose and spread their fingers out." What very shocking behaviour; it is quite evident that they are not in the habit of attending church, and so have never received that religious instruction which inculcates obedience to their masters and pastors.

In case some people may be weak-minded enough to think that dockers have not much to complain of, I insert here a portion of a letter which appeared in the Star of Thursday, September 5th, and, from personal inquiries I have made, I know it only too truly pictures the infamous slavery against which this strike is an open revolt:

"Sir,—As a London dock foreman of some 40 years' experience, permit me to lay before your readers a few facts as to the sweating system practised. Contract work, so-called, means giving one man charge of a job (say the weighing off of 30,000 bags of sugar), and this man in his turn employs three or four bullies (I can term them nothing else), whose sole duty is to call out incessantly, 'Shove up,' 'On with you,' 'Run over him,' etc. Forty or fifty trucks are put on to a scale on this system, and are kept moving all day at the rate of 500 or 600 an hour. If the poor wretches, hungry, and wet through with perspiration, want to leave off at 4 p.m., they are told, often with an oath, to keep on or not come any more. And I must here inform you that the quay along which the men have to push their trucks is often an inch deep in a treacherous mess that has often, to my knowledge, pulled the soles bodily from the men's boots. The job finished, the contractor, often a man who cannot write his own name, gets £5 or £6 as his 'plush,' as it is called, and out of this he will give his bullies perhaps 5s. each, leaving him with £4 in his pocket, ground out of the half-starved bodies of the dockers. I can assure you, sir, that I am in daily contact with men who now own a row of houses (and it is curious the liking your contractor has for house property) and who a few years ago were cleaning boots in Ratcliff Highway! So much for the working of this most iniquitous contract system."

The various stories that I had heard concerning the strikers going in in their thousands, etc., made me anxious to discover, by personal observation, the truth of these reports. I therefore took a plunge into the undiscovered country, by going down one of the narrow streets leading out of the Commercial Road, and so into the St. Georges Street, more popularly known as the Ratcliff Highway, which is in the heart of the strike district. But what on earth has come to High Street, St. Georges? Why, it is as quiet, as dull and respectable, as a street in any country town. Where are the sailors of all nationalities—the Malays, with gleaming eyes and teeth? Where are the fights, the knives, the riot and drunkenness? A religious calm prevails; a hot sun beats down, blistering the paint. At the door of a public-house there is a man or two with slouched hats, adjusted coal-heaver fashion, and with that general air of lawlessness peculiar to sailors. They are busy conversing with "Nancy" and "Betsy." The slumberous sound of a banjo is heard from within another public-house; but that does not disturb the general tranquility. But at every lane leading to the docks and wharves, which the tapering masts shooting up into the sky proclaim to be near at hand, there are groups of stern-looking men, who look at you narrowly, with that jealous scrutinising glance which the active and intelligent police-officer usually gives to suspicious strangers. These are the pickets, the terrible pickets, whose motto is "No quarter to blacklegs." It is probable that if you plunged down one of those lanes with a train-catching air and made directly for yonder dock gate, you would find yourself seized not too gently by rough hands, while gruff voices would enquire your business in that locality. What would happen if you replied that you had got a job at dock-labouring and you were going to fulfil your engagement, I don't know. Policemen seem remarkably scarce down here, and the river is not far off. These men don't like scabs; indeed, I heard a burly stevedore express a fervent desire the other day for a barrel of gunpowder to send some gentlemen on a voyage skyward who were engaged in useful labour in a neighbouring dock. So probably it would be as well for you not to impersonate the scab, unless you have a desire to experience the sensations of a person in a situation of deadly peril.

But see, this lane leads to the docks and is yet a public thoroughfare; if you go straight ahead through these narrow lanes they will bring you out close to Limehouse Church. So down we go into the depths. But what a stern air the street is putting on! Shops and houses sternly and firmly closed; no women gossiping at the doors. Save for a few passers-by, there is no life in these narrow streets. It is the sullen desperation of starving poverty, which has determined to starve in silence sooner than yield. If Mr. Norwood and his friends could visit this district—they would require a strong police escort unless they were well disguised—they would learn how fruitless is their "game" of trying to starve the people into surrender. There is a spirit here that will take all the brutality and force inherent in capitalist monopoly to break down. "Death by hunger, bullet, or steel sooner than surrender"—that is the spirit which shows itself. Every closed house and every firm-set starving face, hard and obdurate as granite, which you meet in these deserted streets tells the same story of dogged determination and gloomy resolution.

Out from these narrow lanes we come upon an open space near the river. Yonder is an iron bridge thrown across the entrance to a dock, against the rails of which some twenty men are leaning; in their midst a solitary representative of law and authority, a policeman, stands. We lean on the rails of the bridge and look into the dock. Save for a few sailors unloading a ship close to the bridge, the quietude of the Sabbath reigns; the quays, the sheds, and ships are alike deserted; upon or within them is no sign of life. On through the narrow gloomy lanes, past deserted wharves, which all tell the same story, back to the broad expanse of the Commercial Road. We emerge from the depths close to Limehouse Church. The churchyard has been converted into a pretty garden, the seats of which are crowded by men, women, and children, trying to dull the edge of hunger by a doze amid the flowers and the sun. The figure of an old man strikes our attention; every feature of his face is sharpened by hunger and suffering; but he folds his withered old hands, and is content to suffer for the good time which is coming; coming soon, we hope, now.

In the middle of last week, the Strike Committee, having reorganised their fighting forces, decided to resume the processions. Having noticed a new and original feature, I hurried through the streets of the city and took my station among the well-fed city magnates who crowd the steps of the Dock House. The collectors with their boxes come and jingle them under the noses of these gentlemen, who look on stonily. One collector, an old man of excitable demeanour, takes up his station there, and announces that he means to stay there till the procession has passed. "Ah, sir," he ejaculates to a particularly comfortable-looking person, "I am very sorry for Mr. Norwood. Poor gentleman, he has come to a sad end. He is hanging on a gibbet at the end of the procession. People are getting angry, you know; and I tell you what he is doing, he'll bring about a revolution, if he is not very careful. Ah, here he comes, here he comes." Just then, amid the clangour of a brass band playing the "Marseillaise," a ghastly figure approaches. Swinging on a gallows high is an effigy attired in black coat and brown trowsers, a white handkerchief over its face, and its arms pinioned. The gibbet bears the following inscription: "To Norwood." The dock magnates turn green. Do any of them know that the hanging of unpopular people in effigy often preceded their hanging in reality during the stormy years of the French Revolution?

We all know how the Committee of Conciliation, under the able direction of Lord Mayor Whitehead, endeavoured to entrap the men into accepting the directors' terms. We know how the plot failed, and how the arch-plotter then endeavoured to discredit the movement by declaring that the leaders deserved no sympathy because they would not agree to Norwood's ultimatum. The men answered by a tremendous burst of enthusiasm over their leader on Monday. Tillet, who was sitting on a wagon in Eastcheap, was vociferously cheered; but this was nothing to the reception that awaited Burns. No sooner was the stalwart handsome figure of the leader of the strike seen standing erect on a wagon as the legions of revolted labour rolled by, than banners and flags were bent and bowed to the earth before him, while the air was rent by a storm of frenzied cheers from sailors, stevedores, lightermen, coaliers, and dockers. I have never witnessed such enthusiasm since the beginning of the strike.

At the present moment it is enough to say that the situation has undergone but little change. The men still hold out with the same dogged determination; but funds are pouring in by thousands daily, Australia alone having sent £14,000. Lord Mayor Whitehead and the Bishop of London have retired to recover their health in the country. Cardinal Manning is endeavouring to get the men to accept a compromise, but the men will have no compromise, they will have the "tanner" and nothing else; and so say all of us.

The Printers' Labourers' Strike.

Success so far has attended this movement. Conducted as it has been by a few workmen, and without any funds to speak of, yet no fewer than several dozen of the principal London-printing firms have been compelled to grant the advance, from 13s. and 14s. to 20s. per week, and many more employers have been forced to grant advances to 18s. and 19s. a week. A strong union, however, has been formed among the men, which will be able to compel other houses to grant the standard wage which the men demand. The strike, in spite of its success so far, has in reality only just begun, for the men express their determination to persevere until their union embraces the whole trade. The usual tactics of the employers have had a slight development during the week; not content with sending threatening letters to parents of the younger workers, "palming" the police to drive away pickets, and sending drunken men to discredit the movement (happily without success), they, or rather one of them, has invented a new dodge, which may be recommended to sweaters having disputes with their employees. It consists in calling in those of the workpeople who are to be found standing outside the factory, and in a fatherly manner promising them "a shilling and a belly full" on condition that they start work. The socialistic propaganda has, meanwhile, gone on steadily, more especially as the ordinary trade-unionist leaders are still "conspicuous by their absence"; 1,500 applications have been received by the Union Committee from men wishing to join, so that remarkable success seems pretty certain for this agitation. C.

The Trades Union Congress.

This assembly has often been termed the Parliament of Labour. It deserves the title, being nearly as useless and obsolete as the Parliament of Capital—the Houses of Lords and Commons. The Trades Union Congress has usually a fair amount of space devoted to its deliberations in the daily press. It meets at a period when news is scarce, and therefore even the twaddle talked among the respectable trades union delegates is of service, being perhaps of slightly more interest than the usual gush about big gooseberries, sea-serpents, marriage a failure, etc., etc. But, alas! this year a conflict is raging, a real battle between capital and labour, which engrosses public interest, and the Trades Union Congress has to take a back seat. It is quite true that this is no great loss, as the time of the Congress has been mainly occupied in passing votes of confidence and thanks to those two noble representatives of labour, Brothers Shipton and Broadhurst. This is not surprising; as most of its members are in the pay of one or both of the two gangs of swindlers, the Great Political Parties, it is only natural they should sympathise with their fellows in corruption. As to what the Congress did or what it did not do, that is not a matter which requires weighty consideration. We have not space for it. All we can say to honest trades unionists is, Come ye out from the Shipton and Broadhurst gang. Let them stink in their own corruption. Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting, Broadhurst, Shipton, and Co.; the sceptre has departed from you, and is given unto those who will send you to seek your paymaster the capitalist in the place that is fittest for him. That is the message of the people to the takers of corrupting gold and the sharers in the swollen profits of the sweater. D. N.

REPORTS.

LONDON OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.—Battersea—Good meeting at Princes Head, addressed by Kitz and Mowbray; collected for propaganda, 6s. 7d.; 37 Weals sold. Chelsea—A good meeting was held on Sunday morning on Chelsea Embankment by Samuel, Greenman (S.D.F.), and Tarleton; 27 Commonweal sold. Hoxton—A splendid meeting held here on Thursday evening, the speakers being Mrs. Lahr, Mowbray, Cores, and Parker. Several labour songs sung, and 2s. 5d. collected for Printers' Labourers Strike; Weal sold well. Mile End Waste—A monster meeting held on Wednesday night; speakers were Mowbray and Welsh (S.D.F.); Mowbray in the course of his speech pointed out that rent was robbery, and a landlord's agent who jeered and sneered but would not come on the platform and oppose, was "chucked out" by the dockers; Mowbray was enthusiastically cheered at the end of his speech. Prebend Street, Islington—An excellent meeting held here last Friday evening by Parker, Kitz, Davis, and Mowbray; 5s. 1d. was collected for the Docker's Strike Fund. Comrades in this locality are especially asked to turn up on Friday evening.

MITCHAM.—In response to handbills calling two meetings on the Fair Green, one in the morning and one in the evening in aid of the strike movement, about 600 working-men assembled in the morning; Mowbray and Kitz conducted the meeting. Owing to the misleading announcement in the Star that the strike was at an end we had a difficulty to collect for the dockers, but a collection for local propaganda realised 7s. In the evening, the laundry women turned up in strong force, and the Green was covered with a mass of people. The speaking fell to Kitz and Mowbray; Kitz leaving early to attend at Streatham, Mowbray gave the local sweaters a bad time of it. The wages of laundry women are 2s. 4d. per day of 11 hours; field workers, 1s. 2d. per day of 8 hours. Some pious face-grinders will have cause to remember the Mitcham Socialists.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held a good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were Maughan, Crouch, J. F. Lyne, Tochatti, Thomas (Ipswich), and Saint. Commonweal sold well, collected for strike fund, 2s. 8d. Fair meeting at St. Ann's Road, speakers were Crouch and J. F. Lyne. In the afternoon at 4, we assisted at a meeting on Acton Green to organise laundresses; we had a gathering of about 2,000 people, and Maughan took the chair. Also in the afternoon at 5.30 we held another meeting, which was so large, numbering about 4,000, we had to divide it and make two platforms; the meeting was a complete success. In the evening we held a meeting at Cambridge Gardens, but the closure was again applied and the meeting broke up. The police told us to go into Hyde Park if we wanted to hold meetings. Speakers were Maughan and Crouch; collected for strike fund, 1s. 5d.

STREATHAM.—Kitz and Dillier addressed the usual meeting. 56 Commonweal sold by Mitcham and Streatham comrades.

ST. GEORGE'S EAST.—Splendid meeting on Tuesday at Mile End Waste, addressed by Leech and Turner re the strike; fair sale of literature. Members turn up well at business meetings, and are very busy giving literature away among the strikers.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on Monday a paper on "Russia and Nihilism" was read. At Castle Street on Saturday night Aiken, Duncan, and Leatham addressed a large meeting, collecting 8s. for the dockers; collection spoiled by rumour that the strikers were returning to work. Three quires papers and other literature sold.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at 2 o'clock Glasier addressed a very good audience on the Green, where 4s. was collected for London dock-labourers' strike. Afterwards Glasier gave an address on "Home Rule and the Labour Problem" to the Kinning Park Branch of the Irish National League. At 5.30, Gilbert, Glasier, and Antony Smith (of Aberdeen) spoke at Paisley Road Toll, where 4s. was again collected for the dock-labourers. A number of leaflets were distributed during the day.

MANCHESTER.—Meeting held at Middleton on Saturday night. At our new station, Philips' Park gates, a good meeting was held on Sunday at 11 o'clock; Baillie and Stockton spoke; 27 Commonweal sold and 2s. 4d. collected for strike fund. In Stevenson Square two meetings, convened by Gasworkers and General Labourers' Union, were held in afternoon; W. Thorne, of London, General Sec., spoke at both. The object was the organisation of gasmen employed by Manchester Corporation. Collections made for dockers realised £1 11s. 6d. Commonweal sold out. A large meeting at Chester Road at 8 p.m., addressed by Stockton and Barton. Three comrades visited Oldham and held an enthusiastic meeting; some opposition by a local secularist. A branch is about to be formed here.

YARMOUTH.—Good meeting in Market Place on Thursday 5th, on behalf of the dock strikers; collected 10s. We held another meeting on the beach Sunday afternoon for the same purpose; collected 5s. In the morning a large meeting was held on Priory Plain, and another held in the evening at Colman's Granary; Reynolds and Ruffold were the speakers.—C. R.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, September 7th, J. Wilson delivered an address on "The Lessons of the Great London Strike." The cause of the strikers was upheld by Graham, Frizelle, Hamilton, and King, whilst the London Dock Companies found a congenial defender in Mr. C. McGowan, ex-Parliamentary candidate on the Nationalist ticket for Leitrim. At the conclusion of the meeting a collection was made.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday morning and evening Peacock and Whalley and Rooke spoke in Sneinton Market and Great Market Place. The conduct of Mr. Broadhurst and others of the official trades-union ring was criticised. This provoked some opposition, which was satisfactorily replied to.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE dockers have won their victory; for with all drawbacks it must be called a victory. They have shown qualities of unselfishness and power of combination which we may well hope will appear again before long. For one thing, they have knocked on the head the old slander against the lower ranks of labour, and shown that the mere "fringe of labour," the "roughs," the "vagabonds"—in short, the men named by the insults of the real criminal class, who have thrust them into their terrible position,—that these men can organise themselves at least as well, and be at least as true to their class, as the aristocracy of labour. No result of the strike is more important than the effect it will have as a blow against class jealousy amongst the workers themselves. Henceforth any working-man attempting to make distinctions between skilled and unskilled will be obvious to his fellows as a traitor and reactionary.

The Daily News, which, like several other definitely capitalist papers, espoused the cause of the strikers, was nevertheless very anxious to show that the strike had nothing to do with Socialism. Now if that means that it was no artificial agitation, but was caused by dire necessity, we can all agree with that. If it means anything else it is nonsense. For in the first place, although mere combination amongst the men, with no satisfactory ulterior aim, is not itself Socialism, yet it is both a necessary education for the workers, and it is an instrument which Socialism cannot dispense with. Furthermore, the attitude of the Daily News itself and of the well-to-do sympathisers with the strikers (including, doubtless, a large part of the lower middle class), remains, when all deductions have been made, a remarkable fact; and a fact, moreover, quite impossible to be explained except by admitting that the preaching of Socialism has frightened some and, at least partly, convinced others of the respectable classes. They are becoming at once terrified and shocked by the horrible poverty of London. Is that the result of the efforts of the Charity Organisation to make poverty respectable? of the efforts of the philanthropists to make it dumb? of the parsons of all sects to make it religious? No. It is the result of the efforts of the Socialists to make poverty actively discontented.

Let us go on with those efforts then, encouraged by the step that combination amongst the workers has taken, but remembering that the new epoch of combination is only just beginning. Let us make it clear to the middle-class sympathisers with labour, that very little has been done even to palliate the most obvious evils of the system which makes them a middle-class, i.e., a class of sweaters. The Dockers are to have their "tanner" (if the companies keep faith with them, which is very doubtful), but what will be their position when they reap the result of their hard won victory? Let us be plain on this matter. They will receive precarious mere-subsistence wages for the hardest of hard work. They will be lodged in hideous and foul slums; they will have no reasonable pleasure, no taste of the comforts and the luxuries which their labour helps to win for others. In a word, they will still be slaves as far as their material condition is concerned, though they have shown that they are not the stuff of which it is safe to make slaves.

For us, it is our business to make them understand that they never can be anything else than slaves till they have swept away class domination and privilege; that in spite of all the soft words of the capitalist press, they and the capitalists are and must be irreconcilable enemies; that whatever either gains must be at the expense of the other. When they have learned that, their combination will both be infinitely improved as an instrument, and they will also be compelled to use it for its one real use, the realization of Socialism, to which undoubtedly this strike has been a step, as part of the labour struggle, as part of the attack on our enemy—Capitalism. W. M.

I am very glad to see that "The Middleman," Mr. H. A. Jones's new play, has made a success at the Shaftesbury Theatre. Despite some extremely orthodox morality mixed up in the love-interest, and a great deal too much talk of "shame" and the "child of shame," and a woman who has been "dishonoured" being "better dead," and so on, it remains a really well-planned and well-wrought play, which is distinctly worth seeing. From the moment of the opening, which strikes the keynote at once, to the last dropping of the curtain, there is no fall from a very high level of economic and social thought. Not that there is any "preaching"; in so clearly reproducing, without obvious comment, a striking phase of the present system, the author has answered his evident purpose with tenfold effect. The man must be dull indeed who can rise from witnessing the performance of "The Middleman" without some measure of awakening to the crying injustice of the social arrangements which deliver one man bound hand and foot, body and brain, into the hand of another, because he is poor and the other rich.

Making all needful qualifications, "The Middleman" remains the healthiest production of an English dramatist in modern times, and the one which a Socialist may witness with least weariness, even in its worst places. For myself, I must confess that I have seen it twice and mean to see it again. Of course, the success of it is not altogether due to its high tone and progressive standpoint, though I hope and think that a great deal of it is. Something of it—much, indeed—is due to the magnificently careful and unaffected rendering of the old workman-inventor by Mr. Willard.

If anyone go and see it upon my recommendation, and, not liking it, blame me for beguiling him of his hard-earned entrance-money, I would ask him to think of the tawdry rubbish that has been hitherto, and still is, and will continue to be, served up to the British public in the place of a rational drama with some wholesome relation to ordinary life. Let him for a corrective go and see "A Man's Shadow" at the Haymarket, where he will see a powerful actor wasting his energies and those of a good company upon a melodrama, strong enough as melodramas go, but entirely designed and built upon the lines of the most debased and brutal of the superstitions which go to make up bourgeois "morality."

To say that Mr. Robert Buchanan, who assailed Ibsen for indecency, is its author or adapter, and that the Pall Mall is its most enthusiastic admirer, is to say that "social purity" is rampant throughout. Except in the "comic element," that is; for Mr. Buchanan's "morality" fails him when he tries to be funny, and his jokes are all turned upon the alternate condonation of adultery by two men who change places as the lover and husband of one woman. S.

The Liberty and Property Defence League has issued another list of Bills requiring "your opposition." There are 34 of them, all of which seem to have already come before Parliament, and, with two exceptions, to have been withdrawn or dropped. It is a striking testimony to the uselessness of Parliament for effecting any change worth the name, when 32 out of 34 bills, presumably for somebody's good, have to be dropped.

To be sure, it was of little consequence what became of these bills. Misbegotten things as most of them were, it cannot matter that nearly all were still-born. For no bill has the least chance of passing through Parliament, unless it is framed in such a way that it really makes no difference—except to place-hunters—whether it passes or not. So that one wonders what the Liberty and Property Defence League sees in them to object to.

But the fact is that the old watch-dog of Property is near going mad. These little puddles of watery bills have frightened him, and there are signs of imminent rabies. What else but madness can it be, in days like these, to waste hope or fear on Parliament—that huge gas-stroke and light of the world—which, in the middle of the docker's strike, goes out with a little sputter and stink of Queen's Speech, all unobserved as a dying candle when the day is come?

Yet here are these poor creatures of the Liberty and Property

Defence League busily patching their rotten roof at Westminster, not seeing that the sea is coming in at the door, in the East End, and undermining the foundations. For a tide is rising, with John Burns to the front, which may, if taken at the flood, lead straight to the better fortune of Socialism. Yet a little while, and the yelping, snapping, mad dog of Property may be washed away.

And John Burns? Will he keep his place on the advancing wave? He might help the working-classes, as perhaps no other man could, through the critical years to come. Or will he be persuaded by the politicians of Dundee or elsewhere, that the best thing he can do is to try to muzzle the dog in Parliament? If so, the tide will not wait, even for him. He will be left behind to help Cunninghame Graham give decent burial to further abortive bills—struggling over their remains with the Liberty and Property Defence League. All which would be a pity, for we don't see a man like John Burns every day.

Since I wrote the notes in last week's Weal, the manager of the Mauricewood Pit has explained through the press, that the lower workings of the pit had a downcast and upcast passage. Whether these passages met the requirements of the Act I cannot, of course, say; but one thing is certain, they did not help the men's escape, and it was possible by the outlay of more capital to have made these workings so that such a fate as overtook the men therein would have been impossible.

At the annual meeting of the owners, held last week, the report showed a nett profit of £4,969 2s. 9d., and the chairman mentioned the fact that the accident resulted in the death of 63 men. Some are in the pit yet, and the pit is sealed up. The men who risk and those who have lost their lives in the making of that £4,969 2s. 9d. have no claim upon it. That is the toll they have to pay for leave to toil.

The miners of the Lothians are apparently not satisfied with the manager's statement and "explanation" regarding the upcast and downcast shaft. At the usual meeting of their association they passed a resolution demanding a public enquiry to be made into the cause of the accident, and at the same time to call upon the inspector of mines to make a thorough inspection of all mines, especially where steam power is used underground, and that the seams worked have a proper outlet according to the Mines Regulation Act. The inspector has opened an enquiry—in the Company's office! At Carmyle the other day the shaft of a pit caved in, and it took the men twelve hours to get out by the second shaft. What is the use of this Act if the second shaft is not fit for instantaneous escape in emergencies?

LIFE AND LABOUR IN EAST LONDON.

BUT what a question to ask. The entire removal of a whole class. Is it impossible? Why, of course not! who that has read any history can doubt the possibility of removing a whole class? The real question to discuss is, Which is the class most likely to be removed?

"History," says Carlyle, "feels bound to consider that starvation is starvation; that starvation from age to age pre-supposes much; History ventures to assert that the French Sansculotte of Ninety-three, who, roused from a long death-sleep, could rush at once to the frontiers and die fighting for an immortal Hope and Faith of Deliverance for him and his was but the second-miserablest of men." It may be Carlyle would agree that the first most miserablest of men has been "conned and set down in a note" book by Charles Booth; and if so, the next passage from French Revolution, Book vii., is still more pertinent. "History confesses mournfully that there is no period to be met with, in which the general twenty-five millions of France suffered less than in this which they name Reign of Terror! But it was not the Dumb Millions that suffered here; it was the Speaking Thousands, and Hundreds, and Units; who shrieked and published, and made the world ring with their wail: that is the grand peculiarity."

The class which was removed was not the class which had starved and suffered from age to age; the millions who had borne the cross so long in silence now had bread, while they who had had all the bread and all the cake now ate grass, and made the world re-echo with their plaints; just as to-day, more fuss is made when some aristocrat breaks his one neck in the hunting-field, than over ten miners crushed by fall of pit roof.

Our author is getting on dangerous ground when he lays so much stress upon the fact that the poor are subject to a crushing load; a little further on he says the standard of life is rising, and again, further on, "Those who obtain better wages and more regular employment, receive only in proportion to what they give, and are more profitable servants." The standard of life is rising, but not so fast as is the knowledge among the poor that they have to bear a crushing load, and that the class responsible will have to be removed.

"The question of those who actually suffer from poverty should be considered separately from that of the true working classes, whose desire for a larger share of wealth is of a different character. It is the plan of agitators and the way of sensational writers to confound the two in one, to talk of 'starving millions,' and to tack on the thousands of the working classes to the tens or hundreds of distress. Against this method I protest. To confound these essentially distinct problems is to make the solution of both impossible; it is not by welding distress and aspirations that any good can be done" (p. 155). But methinks he doth protest too much and idly, for he is flying in the face of his own book and all history. "Agitators" have no need to draw upon "sensational writers" other than Charles Booth and his collaborateurs to make out a case for a big upheaval, and social upheavals do only come by the "welding" of "distress" and "aspirations."

Assuredly Classes G and H will not do much for a change; they have, as Elisée Reclus says, just dined, and toothpick in mouth are simply impatient at the cries of the suffering. Classes A and B have probably had every hope and aspiration trampled out, but C, D, and E have among them enough of sorrow and distress to spur them on, and enough of knowledge and hope to see the way to salvation, which will come not by way of Mr. Booth's peddling enlargement of the scope of our present Poor Law, so as to allow, for the benefit of Class B, the formation of Pauper or semi-Pauper Communes, much after the fashion suggested by H. V. Mills, or those of the Netherlands.

"To bring Class B under State regulation would be to control the springs of pauperism" (p. 166). Not while capitalism causes competition in production wholly for profit and not for consumption, and all Boothian suggestions will be waste and beside the mark, no matter how laboriously worked out, while "Life" and "Labour," "Poverty," "Poor," and "Comfort," are defined and measured as in this book. "Life and Labour" is a misnomer. Ruskin says "There is no Wealth but Life. Life, including all its powers of love, of joy, and of admiration. That country is the richest which nourishes the greatest number of noble and happy human beings" ('Unto this Last'), and few enough are there out of the whole of Mr. Booth's 909,000 who come within measurable distance of such Life and Wealth.

"Agitators" and "sentimental writers" owe thanks to Mr. Booth for the completeness and care with which an exceedingly complex piece of work has been done, often under very unpleasant and at times dangerous conditions. As every author sees his best thanks in a wide use of his work there can be little doubt that great use will be made of this book, although it is very probable that in some cases the arguments drawn out of it may be somewhat different to what Mr. Booth intended.

The solidarity just shown among the dockers and kindred labourers may possibly cause a reconsideration of the statement that there is no "danger" in having in our midst a quarter of a million with positively little more than bare existence to lose, come the very worst.

At the beginning of the century the total army of the kingdom was not more than the total of Classes A, B, and C. A hundred years ago the total strength of the French army was about 150,000, the total population of Paris was under half a million, and yet—well—they have an exhibition in Paris to-day by way of celebration.

It may be urged that in 1640 the population of our city and kingdom, and the whole of the conditions were very different from what obtains to-day; but then, as now, apparently the classes had all the advantages. What army there was, was in the hands of, and really in favour of, their rulers; and these rulers felt as assured in their position, aye, more assured, than does the same class to-day. Small as was the armed force at the disposal of tyranny in 1642, it was larger than to-day in comparison to population and extent of territory.

Cromwell's ever victorious army did never equal the population of the smallest London parish of to-day, leaving out the one or two exceptional parishes, such as where one building covers a whole parish, and where—as once remarked Colonel Perronet Thompson—in one building is stored up a £100 a-piece for 200,000 men, the finest prize-money offered since the Creation.

When smug optimists blind themselves to the readings of history, and insist there is only "disgrace but no danger," they overlook wholly the immensely increased value of the stakes of to-day as compared with any previous period in the world's history.

"Your idle people . . . are not merely waste coal beds. They are explosive coal beds" (Ruskin in 'Queen of the Air'). And every city of the kingdom has its explosive bed! What if a spark be applied?

A demand made by Ruskin in the work just quoted, "that sooner or later, we shall have to register our people; and to know how they live; and to make sure, if they are capable of work, that right work is given them to do," is to some extent answered by Mr. Booth's book; so far well; but much more must be done before it can be really and truly written, "There is no danger."

"You respect no hoary wrong,
More for having triumphed long;
Its past victims haggard through,
From the mould
You unbury. Swords and spears
Weaker are than poor men's tears,
Weaker than your silt years,
Hunger and Cold.

"Let them guard with hall and bower,
Through the window you will glower,
Patient till your reckoning hour
Shall be tolled.
Cheeks are pale, but hands are red,
Guiltless blood may chance be shed,
But ye must and will be fed,
Hunger and Cold.

"If the gods of this lower world will sit on their glittering thrones indolent as Epicurus' gods, with the living Chaos of Ignorance and Hunger weltering uncared for at their feet, and smooth Parasites preaching Peace, peace, when there is no peace, then the dark Chaos, it would seem, will rise;—has risen, and, O Heavens, has it not tanned their skins into breeches for itself? That there be no second Sansculottism on our Earth for a thousand years, let us understand well what the first was" ('French Revolution,' Book vii.)

MERLINO'S RESOLUTION.

Comrade Hall has thought fit to criticise Merlino's resolution in a way more gaudy than convincing, and in my opinion utterly beside the spirit and the obvious meaning of the words themselves. Space is too valuable and the subject too serious for one to use any of the "sulphurous big words," etc., etc., that even comrade Hall indulges in to a great extent. In plain English, Hall asks (of us who agree with the whole of Merlino's resolution), "Do we imagine that either the obtaining of the whole in one lump is possible scientifically or desirable as to expediency?" (strange words to follow one another—possible, scientific, desirable, and expedient!). To which the answer is, No! But when Hall pretends that Merlino's words mean that free education is bad, and that an eight hour day is reactionary, in themselves, then I for one feel that Hall himself is "gassing and anticipating," and won't understand that all these palliatives are absolutely scientifically inevitable, and we should therefore only preach our ideal, and not stop for one moment, and waste valuable time and material on "red herrings," but leaving the various political place-hunters to fight each other for place, power, and profit, with their ideals, knowing full well a result of this must be the introduction of "carefully [very carefully] framed though far-reaching measures, practical working-class reforms,"—which, in my opinion, will be greatly accelerated and brought "within the range of practical politics" (in spite of us) by really earnest uncompromising propaganda of our ideal, and by various signs of our determination and energy, which alone will teach the people how to use these possibly necessary stepping-stones towards that end for which all honest Socialists strive. One remark, in conclusion, anent the "boy getting too big for his clothes," which, as is often the case with "figures of speech," is rather misleading to the uninitiated. From what I have gathered from the "concrete facts of weekaday life," I have no hesitation in declaring that the little boy does "don a brand-new rig-out" next morning (if he's got 'em).

H. SAMUELS.

A "FRIENDLY" ATTACK.

IN the September number of Unity, "a monthly journal for Foresters, Oddfellows, and kindred societies" there is one of the stupid old attacks which ignorant men are fond of making; all about "professional agitators" with "delicate uplifted palms and oily tongues," "the commentary upon" our preaching "afforded by the Paris Congress" and its quarrelling, and so on. It winds up with the cheerful and Chadband-like reflection, "that while Socialists are trying to set the world at rest and peace by stirring up the dirty waters of discontent, true Friendly Society men are advancing the cause of humanity by thrift and thoughtfulness." The blinking screech-owl who cannot bear the light is a great personage in this country—there's a good many of him—and he never comes out of his hole without hooting at somebody who is throwing light on the dark places of the earth. So that we ought to be, and are, pretty well accustomed to him. But just now I am not in the humour to hear this particular belated specimen hoot without chucking a pebble in his direction.

We have just been passing through a trying time; are not out of it yet. The greatest labour battle ever fought in London has been going on around us; and, while we of the League have avoided intruding upon, or hampering in any way, the men's own elected leaders, we have been working with all our might to supply them with the sinews of war, and to bring public opinion to bear on their enemy. But where have been the "Foresters"? the "Oddfellows"? the "Hearts of Oak"? the "Druids"? the "Rechabites"? Where have been the powerful and wealthy bodies of which Unity is always boasting? Skulking in a safe, if cowardly, obscurity; displaying "thrift" and "thoughtfulness" in shapes that would bear other names a good deal better. What has Unity itself to say on the subject? Sympathy? Support? Notice, even? Not one word! It can write of the "choice little investment, yielding quite 7 per cent.," made by the London District of Foresters, or of similarly important matters, but the desperate struggle for life of a hundred thousand men is ignored, not even chronicled. Were it not for the "Sons of the Phoenix," a plebeian order that Unity does not often deign to notice, there would not have been one "friendly society" on the side of the men. The "Foresters," the "Oddfellows," the "Hearts of Oak," the "Druids," and the "Rechabites" gathered their unspotted skirts around them and passed by on the other side.

To such people it must, of course, seem unnatural that middle-class men, themselves not suffering in a factory-hell, should seek to lighten the burdens of their less fortunate brothers. "Thrift and thoughtful" men of the Unity type, organised for their own advantage, and "advancing the cause of humanity" by paying their own poor-rates and looking after number one, are not to be expected to trouble themselves to "stir up the dirty waters" even by dragging drowning men out of them. Not long ago Unity made a great fuss over some order—the "Hearts of Oak," I think—which was going to pay trade-union rates for some work that was to be done for it; so loudly did it proclaim the fact, that one instinctively felt how rare a thing it must be for these men to be "thoughtful" of others, and not "thrift" at their expense.

The glorification of the money-bag, the gospel of organised greed, has no attractiveness for Socialist ears, and if Unity would have them listen it must learn some other. While it and those it represents remain on the wrong side—or none, which is as bad—in the labour battle, it and they must expect to be looked upon with small favour by the growing multitude who are conscious of the wrong and mean to right it. It and they must put off hypocrisy, and declare themselves definitely. Are they organised for the gain of a few, or for the good of all?

John Swinton, although almost a confirmed invalid, still retains his interest in the labour movement.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The International Anarchist meetings which we announced some weeks ago took place on Sundays, September 1st and 8th, from 2 to 7 p.m., at the Salle du Commerce, Rue du Faubourg du Temple, Paris. The questions chiefly discussed were: Authoritarian Socialism and Anarchism, Collectivist and Communist Anarchism, Individualist and Communist Anarchism, and the position of both with regard to individual acts of expropriation, the propaganda amongst women and country people, organisation, the attitude of anarchists in wartime, etc. These and a number of minor questions were discussed at these meetings, consisting of Frenchmen, Italians, Spaniards, Englishmen, and Germans. The proceedings were most harmonious, and the best possible order was preserved, with neither chairman nor agenda, a strong contrast to the Marxist Congress, with its six days of useless preliminary business not connected with the order of the day, forcible repression of the very first one who wanted to speak on the supposed subjects of conference. The contrast struck all present, and comrade Merlino, in his last speech, expressed a justifiable gratification in the fact, saying that even he had not expected these wholly unorganised meetings to pass off in this way without the slightest incident. Our friends are justified in claiming that they were a practical demonstration of Proudhon's words, that "freedom is the mother, not the daughter of order."

A daily anarchist paper, La Sociale (22, Rue des Martyrs, Paris), has been published since Sept. 4th. From a copy which has reached us we see that it carries on a strong anti-electioneering agitation, to which is also devoted the last number of the Attaque. Abstentionist placards will also soon be published by the Père Peinard.

The bourgeois and Social Democratic parties are busy with electioneering. Yves Guyot, Member of the present Government, Minister of Public Works, known as one of the most blockheaded men who still exist of the Manchester school, figures on the placards in the 1st Arrondissement, the quarter of the Rue Rivoli and the Louvre, as the candidate of the Comité Républicain Radical Socialiste, as does likewise the former minister Floquet, in an eastern Faubourg. Thus far the confusion between Radicals and Social Democrats has gone. The Possibilists have started local socialistic papers in the 11th, 17th, 19th, and 20th Arrondissements (L'Electeur du XI^{me}, La Voix Electorale, Le Réveil du XX^e, etc.). Longuet's paper is the Banlieue Socialiste of St. Denis. All these papers will be dropped after the election, when the voting cattle have performed their duty.

GERMANY.

The Fraenkische Tagespost a while ago printed two lengthy articles under the title of "Anarchists—Swindlers?," which were reproduced by other Social Democratic papers in Germany and America. It is not worth while to deal with this tissue of misrepresentations and lies, which is of the notorious type that has been only too popular with German Social Democrats hitherto, but I note with pleasure that the Social Democrats of Stuttgart, Wurtemberg, have published a sharp protest against this "odious filthy article," as they call it. They say that these articles were written "with but one intention, i.e., to represent the Social Democratic party as being thoroughly harmless and innocently persecuted, while marking the Anarchists out as worthy of the strongest repression and of the fullest possible annihilation." Such an action, say they, taken by a party itself proscribed for ten years past by German law is "simply a shame; . . . everyone capable of thinking further on than the Social Democratic programme allows, and who is energetic enough to act according to his opinions is proscribed and excommunicated for this, and stigmatised as an Anarchist, which we are told is equal to being a swindler"! These remarks agree fully with some made by Bebel himself in 1885, but have been met with stern rebuke from the official paper, which tells the Stuttgart workers simply that they did not understand the benevolent intention of the articles at all.

A new monthly paper, Der Zeitgeist, is published at Hamburg, addressing itself to the "friends who exist in all classes of a labour movement, proceeding on lawful paths" and to "the mass of progressist elements." Of the 30 German papers which we know this seems to be about the dullest, containing on 40 pages of two columns each 25 articles on palliative questions of all kinds. A worker who manages to read all this will either be stupified for some weeks afterwards, or, perhaps more probably, be made conscious of the humbug of which he is the victim.

The Westfaelische Arbeiter Zeitung, of Dortmund (the mining district), has been suppressed. The Thueringer Tribune has been started.

ITALY.

TRIAL OF MEMBERS OF THE ITALIAN LABOUR PARTY.—We read with interest of this trial before the Assizes at Como, as the very fact of the paltriness of the accusations shows a determined vindictiveness on the part of the official prosecution, not unmixed with anxiety at the growth of agitation among the working-classes. The trial lasted three days, the various imputations being founded on speeches made by the defendants at public meetings held at Buguggiate and Malnate, without the interference of the police and officials present. They spoke ably in their own defence, and their speeches were received with general applause, which was of course repressed by the court. Altogether popular feeling was strong in their favour. The trial threatened to end unsatisfactorily for the Government, when the timely interference of the President put things straight again, for he addressed the jury with that beautiful disregard of the law, which orders that the twelve empanelled citizens shall give their unprejudiced verdict, to which we are so well accustomed here, saying: "You find yourselves confronted again with that terrible association called the International, which has for aim to take from you all your goods and property, and which carries on its banner the motto: 'The emancipation of the workers must be achieved by the workers themselves.' The Association is increasing everywhere, and it is our duty to protect ourselves from it, and in so doing protect likewise the State and the country." One of the defendants was sentenced, on several counts, to one year's imprisonment altogether and 700 francs fine; another to one month and 100 francs fine; the others seem to have been let off.

CROCE-MOSSO.—A very obstinate struggle has gone on here between the weavers and their employers for the last three months, we understand from the Fascio. Many of the workers are on strike, and at a demonstration held one day by them socialists were arrested for inciting the people to strike, etc., etc. I have not yet heard if either side has given way.

THE WHITEWASHING OF SHYLOCK.

THE Trades-Union Congress, held the other week at Dundee, white-washed Shylock by a vote of 177 against 11; and the editor of the Glasgow Herald rejoices that “the proceedings illustrate a strong reactionary feeling against the Socialists.” This vote, however, cannot honestly be taken as a criterion of the feeling of the labouring class towards the Socialists, for the total of 188 has, according to what transpired in the discussions of the Congress, a very questionable pretence of being representative of a million workers; but even that number cannot be said to be a representation of the workers in a population of thirty-five millions. All labour is not organised, and all organised labour was not represented at the Trades Congress. The bosses of the Trades Congress have always been opposed to Socialism, and that for cause—viz.:

“You take my life
 When you do take the means whereby I live”;

consequently it is not right to take their proceedings as “a strong reactionary feeling.”

Their vote is a guarantee that they are in favour of the principle which justifies the robbery of those who labour, to provide dividends to those who do not labour. They have justified Shylock’s claim to the pound of flesh, and have declared it to be no part of their business to protect the labourers from being robbed of more than the stipulated pound of flesh. The blood of the workers, according to them, is not so sacred as Broadhurst’s shares. Mr. Broadhurst said he never denied that he held shares in the firm of “Mr. Brunner, the notorious sweater”; and whether or not Mr. Hill “had reduced the cost of locks 50 per cent., and therefore those engaged in the lock-trades had been the losers to the extent of this 50 per cent., . . . Mr. Hill was a candidate who approved to the furthest extent of the great question then agitating the party of which he was a humble member and poor worker.”

That statement of Mr. Broadhurst’s simplifies the issue between the Socialists and the trades-unionists. The former aim at securing for the workers the full results of their labour; the latter such fractions of the products of their labour as will keep the workers from removing the institutions which provide the Broadhursts, Hills, Chisholm Robertsons, and Weirs with position, pay, and platforms. I sincerely hope the miners of Scotland will soon see through the petty palaver of the two last, and realise the hopelessness of any improvement in their lot so long as these worthies block the way towards the solidarity of labour, which apparently is the key that will unlock the chains that bind the workers to perpetual toil in the interests of the Shylocks. Mr. Broadhurst based his defence of shareholding—that is, the pocketing of wages the workers do not get—on the assertion that the workers in other places did not get so good wages as his firm paid. That has been and is always the argument of the enemies of labour, as Jeremy Bentham caricatured it—“What is the matter with you? What would you have? Look at the people there, and there; think how much better off you are than they are. Your prosperity and liberty are objects of their envy; your institutions models of their imitation”; and as Sydney Smith puts it, “When a particular suffering, produced by an assigned cause, has been pointed out, the object of the exploiters is to turn the eyes of their victims into any other quarter in preference. Why should the smallest evil be endured, which can be cured, because others suffer patiently under greater evils?” Mr. Broadhurst condoning, with the applause of the Congress, an injury done to labour interests, because a candidate “approved to the furthest extent of the great question then agitating the party of which he was a humble member and poor worker,” is good, very good, and demonstrates wherein the one-plank platform of the Gladstonians has been used as an unredeemed pawn-ticket to hide the poverty of Labour’s parliamentary representatives. The workers of Scotland and England have hitherto been persuaded, in the interest of the one-plank platform, to make the sacrifice of placing their fates in the hands of those with whom breach of trust was certain—due fulfilment of it morally and physically impossible. The Catholic endowment scheme will demonstrate whether the Parnellite party is prepared to sacrifice anything in return for the platform which concerns them most; and Mr. Broadhurst’s avowal is an assurance to the workers that trades-unionists such as he place their selfish ambitions before the greatest good of the greatest number of workers.

Trades-unionism, as represented by the Congress at Dundee, is played out, and only holds together by the interests of salaried officials, who shrink from any forward step in the labour movement. Their highest ideal is the regulation of wages, their own not the least important, and to leave a big enough margin for Shylock. Indeed, a Mr. Cowie of Normanton, whose hold of the labour problem appears to be as firm as to a one-year child, affirmed in a hey presto manner that “trades-unionism had done more in the last twelve months to advance the wages of working-men than the Socialists would do in five hundred years.” It is not possible to condense ignorance of Socialism into fewer words than Mr. Cowie can, and comrades near to where he blows off his bombast might do worse than use him as an instrument of propaganda.

It was amusing to note how often the “past service” argument was trotted out as a justification for doing nothing now, and for covering anything, perpetrated by old leaders of the past, calculated to injure the interests of labour to-day. The same argument would not hold with those labour “leaders” in giving Mr. J. Chamberlain his old position in the party of which Mr. Broadhurst “was a humble member and a poor worker.” The old-time argument was principally used by those “leaders” who felt that their only strength lay ‘neath the shadow of Mr. Broadhurst’s wings. Although they knew that it was impossible for all workers to rise by the aid of such wings, still they were led on their way by a like hope in individual chance as lures the gamester who stakes his all to his doom. They were ready to use any veil for trash—any pretext to repel the innovations of conscience and duty.

It was no use, according to those “leaders” of labour, to endeavour to do without the Shylocks. A Mr. Walsh said that, “although he came from London, he wished to dissociate himself from the Socialists.” It would appear from this genius’s remark that the workers of London are all Socialists, and that forbodes ill to the Trades Congress. Mr. Weir, the Fife Miners’ agent, who has in the past worked up his union and security for salary at the expense of the Lanarkshire miners, has given his word that he will not help on the “solidarity of labour.” His action which led to the defeat of the strike in Lanarkshire was a sufficient guarantee that he would not march forward with the development of labour troubles, in Scotland and England, but to his action he has now added his word. He said, “The Socialists were entering on the conflict with a broken reed. When trades-unionists departed from the lines on which they had been going they would be departing from the principles of rectitude. Let them fortify themselves as they had been doing in the past, and they would be prepared to meet both employers and Socialists.” That was said in support of Mr. Broadhurst’s shareholding—Shylock’s pound of flesh—and it is a fine illustration of running with the hare and hunting with the hounds. It is the key-note of the issue between these paid trades-unionists and Socialists.

The editor of the capitalist Glasgow Herald says: “The unions have been working for their own improvement, not for a social regeneration, and it must be frankly said that they have done less to grapple with the great problem of poverty than have the monied classes. Unionism has been in the past essentially selfish and radically opposed to Socialism." The class of men who have been better off by means of trades-unionism had better give their names. We will then see that their success has been at the expense of labour as a whole and not taken from Shylock at all. Trades-unionism has somehow got intermarried with the Shylock family, and its president, Mr. Ritchie, has to admit that "unionism has not touched the kernel of the problem." The opposition it gives to Socialism is the measure of its breach of trust, and its relationship to the spirit and methods of Shylock is the bottom cause of its opposition to Socialism.

BLANQUI.

(Translated by LAURA LAFARGUE.)

*He fought a pitiless race
For the people that have no bread;
Alive, four stone walls were his dwelling-place,
And four planks of wood when dead.*

THE crowd with heavy steps toiled up the stair
To the fourth-floor room where dead Blanqui lay:
Working-men's Paris, in working array,—
Men, women, children, with a sickly air.

Their mourning had prevailed o'er that day's care
Of bread-winning; three days and nights, away,
Friends crowded in, a last farewell to say:
Waiting my own turn, I stood dreaming there.

This heart that beats no more aye beat for thee,
Equality! . . . Deaf world, thou wrinkled slave,
That turnest in thy cage, or slow, or faster,

Now he is dead wilt thou attentive be?
This warrior, passing from the gaol to the grave,
From forth his silence cries: Nor god, nor master!

EUGENE POTTIER.

There are two subjects upon which men still consider it becoming and right to judge without evidence, and to condemn without examination. Those subjects are social science and theology.—John Stuart Mill.

SOCIALISM AT BRADFORD.—Though rather late in the day, and after waiting for the Trades' Council to move our branch along with the Labour Electoral Association, arranged a meeting in favour of the dockers and the machine makers who are on strike in Keighley (which is ten miles from here), so on Saturday last we got the collecting sheets from Park Band committees, and put them in the streets, and ten of the Keighley men and some local men looked after them; and at a meeting at night we collected £20, and sent the Keighley men home with £10 of it, the remainder to come to London.—P. B.

SOCIALISM AT LEICESTER.—For the last three weeks we have devoted ourselves to the strike, but have not neglected our usual meetings. Barclay and O'Sullivan have been the principal speakers; Taylor, Richards, and Carter have also given short addresses. We have been the principal organisers in forming a committee to collect for the dockers; over £60 has been sent off. A fortnight ago meetings were held every night in Humbers-ton Gate, and we utilised them to preach Socialism. We leave groups long after every address, hotly discussing our proposals; literature selling fairly well.—T. P. B.

"Facts for Londoners," Fabian Tract No. 8, price 6d., 4s. 6d. per dozen, or 32s. per 100, being a clear statement of the public questions arising out of every department of Metropolitan administration, with full figures, explanations, citations of authorities and references to official reports, for the use of Londoners who desire not only to understand their civic and political duties, but to argue upon them from exact statistical information, has been published by the Fabian Society, and may be obtained of the Secretary, Sydney Olivier, 180 Portsdown Road, W.; of the Freethought Publishing Co., 63 Fleet Street, E.C.; and of W. Reeves, 185, Fleet Street, E.C.

FOREIGN LABOUR IN FRANCE.—A certain M. Fondi, of Niort, who is a member of the Aude County Council, made a Protectionist speech before that body, in which he said that frequent renewal of "Battle of Fontenoy politeness" would land France in ruin. He ended by moving the following resolution, which was passed: "Whereas there are 1,100,000 foreigners in France, that is to say, one to every 34 inhabitants, and whereas it is unjust and dangerous to let these foreigners, who are nearly all agricultural labourers, enjoy the civil privileges of Frenchmen without being subject to the corresponding duties, and whereas it is intolerable that French farm labourers who go to serve in the army find their places taken by aliens, this Council-General demands of Government and Parliament (1) That aliens be excluded from employment in public works and railways; (2) That all employers be obliged to declare what foreigners they employ and to pay a tax of from 25f. to 100f. a head per year upon them; (3) That all who do not make such declaration incur a fine of from 1,000f. to 3,000f." The Councils-General of the Pas de Calais and of Calvados have passed similar resolutions. Our own reactionary Jingoese have been beaten at their own game. What a wail will go up from the Primrose League at not having originated these brilliant resolutions! Who speaks next?

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

THE last week was lacking in excitement down to Saturday. The smell of negotiations was in the air, and there was an evident belief that the strike would soon be over. Although the Lord Mayor and the Bishop of London had left town, disgusted because the men wouldn't knuckle down at once to the terms which had doubtless been drawn up in the dock offices before their submission to the men by the reverend and noble group of conciliation, yet Cardinal Manning still hoped to get the men to agree to a "reasonable compromise." Unfortunately, the leaders were too willing to listen to the right reverend conciliator. The boldest of them were worn out by the continual work which the strike had entailed upon them. Others, too, were doubtless awed by the rank and station of the right reverend conciliator, and perhaps, seeing that he was friendly to them, thought that he must be right in his well-meaning suggestions. They forgot that the Cardinal, being a man of the middle class, could not, however much he might sympathise, thoroughly understand the wants and the needs of the starving workers. He could not see that men who had been fighting desperately for a better life would hardly like to have their paradise put off for six weeks. The leaders, probably fearing that such a respectable person as the Cardinal should declare that they were "unreasonable," consented to the compromise. They feared to lose the support of the middle-class papers and the subscriptions of the middle classes,—precious few of the latter, by the by. They therefore agreed, and the Dock Company, delighted at the chance so kindly offered them of climbing down, and also of pocketing the increased profits consequent upon the resumption of work after its long cessation, with a well-feigned reluctance consented, only upon the condition that all the workers connected with docks and wharves should return to work. This the leaders agreed to do; and though they had a little trouble to get the lightermen and the South-side men to agree, yet rather than injure the dockers whose battle they had so gallantly fought, they agreed, and Burns and Tillett announced late on Saturday evening at West India Dock gates that the strike was ended. The men didn't like going back without their "tanner," but Burns by his "oratory and tact" gradually won them over, and they foolishly consented.

All London thought the strike was over; and the capitalist papers—Liberal, Radical, and Conservative, recovering from the pitiful funk in which they had been thrown, exhausted themselves in praise of the "moderation" of the men and their leaders.

It seems, however, that they won't praise the moderation of the men much longer, whatever they may say of the leaders. The men are intensely dissatisfied with the agreement; they say their leaders had no right to stipulate that they should work with "blacklegs." They will not see their comrades starve for the benefit of these wretches. They complain that when they get the advance they will no longer be paid for their dinner-time—half-an-hour—and that means a deduction of 3d. from the increased wage of 6d. an hour. Here is the new and old scale contrasted:

OLD SCALE.
8 a.m. to 4 p.m.—Eight hours at 5d. per hour	. . .	3 4
No deduction for meal time.
NEW SCALE.
8 a.m. to 4 p.m.—Eight hours at 6d. per hour	. . .	4 0
Less half an hour for dinner	. . .	0 3

This specially affects the regular hands, who are usually employed for the day, and will when they get the advance be much in the same position as they were before. The "tanner" has, therefore, not been obtained. An article in the Daily News of Tuesday, September 17th, will give the reader an idea of the intense dissatisfaction among the men. That dissatisfaction has found a vent in furious attacks upon the "blacklegs," several of whom have been sent to the hospital. The men accuse the leaders of climbing down, and very threatening cries were raised against Tillett on Tuesday when he recommended the men to go into work and treat the "blacklegs" as fellow workmen. At present, although work is partially resumed, matters look more threatening than they have done at any time since the beginning of the strike.

The conflict grows; "blacklegs" are chased; their legs are broken; they are thrown out of railway carriage windows; and they are having what the Yankees call a "high old time." Dissatisfaction with the leaders and the agreement is spreading, and the general idea is that Burns and Tillett were very foolish to agree to the strikers being forced to work with the mean sneaks who are depriving hundreds of honest men of their work, and starving their wives and families. The dockers are determined to get rid of the "blacklegs," and the "blacklegs" will have to go, and they are "going."

Wage-Slavery in Sheffield.

Discontent is everywhere on the increase, and strikes are the order of the day. We have them in Sheffield. But it is the strike of the fibre-drawers to which I am going to refer, and to call attention to the rules and regulations attempted to be enforced by the Messrs. Laycock and Sons, of Sheffield. About two years ago, when trade was much depressed, every worker was required to sign a set of rules, of the most stringent character. How any man or woman could sign such I cannot understand. The rules are fourteen in number. Rule 1 provides for seven days notice on leaving or for dismissal; but misconduct subjects to instant dismissal. Rule 2 also provides for instant dismissal for certain offences. Rule 3 is as follows: "All work must be twice drawn (unless otherwise instructed), thoroughly solid, and well finished. Work in any way imperfectly done will be paid less an amount proportionate to the imperfection. The amount to be fixed by a member of the firm or the manager." Rule 4: Any drawer whose work is found damp will be paid 3s. per cwt. less than the regular rate of wages on cocoas, and 2s. per cwt. less on Mexican fibres, etc." By rule 5, any drawer making his bunches too large is fined 2s. or 3s. for each such mistake. Rule 6: "Any drawer filling a card more than 12 inches deep will be fined 2s. on each occasion." Rule 7: "All hacklings must be worked up short, and all hacklings and clippings kept separate and free from twine and rubbish. Any drawer not doing this will be fined 2s. for each offence. Any drawer bringing down work to weigh in without tickets on will be fined 2s. for each offence." Rules 10 and 11 also provide for payment of fines, and always of 2s. each; and rule 12 provides: "Any drawer unnecessarily burning gas will be fined 2s. for each offence." Rule 14 provides for fines of 2s. for mere neglect of duty; and rule 13 for fines of 5s. each. Now of the fourteen rules, two provide for instant dismissal, one for unlimited fine, nine of them for fines of 2s. or 3s. for offence, and one for fines of 5s. each. Nothing less than 2s. fines will satisfy the Messrs. Laycock and Sons. What a monstrous system! And the workers having submitted to this heartless tyranny for two years, the Messrs. Laycock and Sons proposed another turn of the screw. Three weeks ago a notice was put up that from "on and after August 31," each drawer was to carry his work down to a lower room, there to be examined, etc., then carry it back, giving each a large amount of extra labour; and for what? To enable the firm to carry rule 3, as above. This, both men and women declare, means practically a reduction in their wages of from 20 to 30 per cent. What a state of things! Against this last act of tyranny both the men and the women turned out, and I hope will remain out till the above rules are swept away. Let every worker connected with the trade, directly or indirectly, note well the character of the rules, and any assistance that can be given will be most thankfully received by the workers. J. S.

It is curious that the cotton-spinners of the Lancashire towns, who used in the times of the old Radical and Chartist movements to be in the forefront of the battle, should now prove so reactionary. Of course, I am not speaking from a revolutionary standpoint, but merely from that of the ordinary trade-unionist; for we must remember that though we may consider the eight hour question as the essence of moderation, yet from a trade-unionist point of view it is almost a revolutionary measure. The only conclusion I can come to with regard to the Lancashire men is that they have been spoiled by too much prosperity. They are too comfortable, that is all about it, and they want a severe depression in the cotton trade to wake them up. Only this will enable them to shake off their Manchester radicalism, with which they have become inoculated by the great John Bright. This alone will arouse them from their comfortable creed of let them starve and die who will, as long as we are all right. It seems by no means improbable, through the beneficent operations of the cotton ring, that they may soon have a rude awakening from their creed of enlightened selfishness and unrestricted competition.

Fair Wages.

Advocates of parliamentary and municipal action for Socialists are very fond of pointing to the good work achieved by Mrs. Besant and John Burns in the direction of forcing all governing bodies to pay fair wages to men employed by their contractors. Our reply to this theory is that it may be good work, but it is work which the ordinary Radical or trade-unionist can do just as well. Socialists can surely employ their time far more profitably in spreading their own ideas. That even the most reactionary of trade-unionists are in favour of "corporate and other bodies" insisting upon their contractors paying fair wages is proved by the fact that the recent Trade-Union Congress—the most stupid and pig-headed of all trade congresses—passed unanimously a resolution in favour of this exceedingly mild reform. If Socialists cannot find better work to do upon the School Board, Municipal Council, or in Parliament, than merely insisting that these bodies should carry out unanimous resolutions of Trade-Union Congresses, they had better stay outside. They will find more useful employment in organising the sweated workers to secure "fair wages" by their own action and not by grandmotherly beneficence of the governing bodies of this "free and happy" country.

East-end Tailors.

The sweated tailors have gained a victory. In the early part of the week the number of the strikers greatly increased, and the masters, alarmed at the spread of the strike, have now granted most of the men's demands.

"The terms of the agreement were that ten and a half hours were in future to be the limit of a day's work, and that no overtime beyond the limit of four hours a-week could be demanded from the workers. As, allowing for half an hour for breakfast and an hour for dinner, this means work from seven in the morning until seven at night, with the possibility of four hours' overtime during the week, it cannot be said that the men's demands were otherwise than moderate, especially when it is recollected that the work is but too frequently carried on in close and ill-ventilated rooms." This is taken from a leader in the Evening Standard of Saturday Sept. 14. When a Conservative newspaper compliments workers upon being "moderate," they must make up their minds to be more "extreme" next time they come out. It is a great mistake to get praise from Conservative newspapers.

The strike is not over. On Saturday the masters shuffled out of the agreement; then on Sunday they agreed to everything but would not sign the agreement. Then they would not have anything to do with the Strike Committee because they objected to "agitators," and when the delegates of the London Society of Tailors, who have taken up the cause of their sweated brethren, wrote to them asking for an interview, they would only act with the Strike Committee. So up to the present the strike continues. The tailors, who are not patronised by Cardinals and Lord Mayors, have been boycotted by the Star and other papers, and have had to make a gallant fight for three weeks on very small subscriptions. D. N.

Tailors' Strike in Manchester.

Last Sunday a demonstration was held in Cheetham Hill, to support the claims of the tailors on strike. The meeting comprised between two and three thousand people, who were addressed by Diemshitz (London), Marshall (S. L.), Ritson (S. L.), Cannerick (S. L.), and others. The collection amounted to £4 4s. 10d., and over £10 has been collected for the strike fund. The resolution, which was carried unanimously, called upon all shades of workers to assist each other in the attempt to prevent capitalists from crippling them. The masters visited the committee last Saturday, and asked the men to return to work; the latter refused, except on condition that they were paid three days wages, which a few masters paid immediately, and the remainder are certain to follow their example. So strong has the union become, that those who refused to join when it was formed have found it to be to their advantage to remain no longer isolated from it. J. M.

The Printers' Labourers' Strike.

The strike among these workers is, for the present, at an end. About fifty of the largest printing firms have been compelled to grant an increase in wages, amounting to as much, in many cases, as eight and ten shillings per week. This has been done, too, by unorganised workmen, with but a small group of Socialist workmen directing and leading them. A strong Union has also been formed, cards and rules printed, and offices taken in the heart of the newspaper and printing metropolis, Fleet Street. Although strike relief has been granted to a large number of men, the agitation carried on and organisation has been successfully set on foot at the small cost of £25. If this agitation has done nothing more, it has at least taught these workers that they have the right and power to revolt against the oppression and exploitation of their masters. G. C.

STRIKE IN DROGHEDA.—On Friday a strike took place at the Greenhills spinning works of Mr. Thomas A. Dickson, M.P., 600 hands turning out in protest against the system of imposing fines of 6d. for every five minutes late in the morning. J. O'G.

SCOTCH STRIKES.—Strikes for increase of pay have been entered on by plasterer's labourers at Edinburgh, the Glasgow lathsplitters, the furnacemen at Coatbridge, and the joiners and plumbers at Falkirk. The lathsplitters, joiners, and plumbers have each demanded 7d. per hour. G. McL.

Also good meeting on Sunday morning (when a comrade presented us with a fine platform), Samuels and Beckett spoke; sold 29 Weal and collected 1s. 4d. for propaganda. Hoxton—Mowbray, Kitz, and Parker addressed a very large meeting outside Hoxton Church on Thursday evening; Weals sold well. Islington—A capital meeting was held at Prebend Street on Friday night by Reynolds (Yarmouth), Mowbray, and Parker. Mile End Waste—A large meeting held on Saturday night, addressed by Mowbray, Davis, and some members of S.D.F.; 27 Commonweal sold.

MITCHAM.—Good meeting, collected 2s. 2d.; speakers, Kitz and Reynolds; Commonweal sold 37; we are organising the labourers hereabouts to obtain shorter hours and better pay.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers, R. J. Lyne, Maughan, Charles Watson, S.D.F., J. F. Lyne; two quire of Weals sold; 2s. 8½d. collected; St. Anne Road, fine meeting; speakers, J. F. Lyne and Crouch; several of our members held a meeting in the Park in the afternoon; in the evening we held a good meeting at Cornwall Road; speakers, R. J. Lyne, Crouch, Maughan; we expected here that we would have had the order to move, but strange to say the police came and looked, but passed by on the other side.

STREATHAM.—Good meeting; speakers, Kitz and Reynolds; 27 Commonweal sold; Branch is increasing; 6 new members.

ST. GEORGE'S EAST.—A new station was opened at Union Street, Sunday morning; large audience addressed by Such, Turner, and Leggett, the last-named comrade having been discharged from his employment as carman, for daring to go on strike; good sale of literature; Weal and pamphlet on "Organised Labour" sold out, besides a good number of Freedom and League manifestoes. A concert has been arranged for the benefit of the Branch at the Berner Street Club on Saturday evening, the hall being kindly lent free by club comrades; for full particulars see elsewhere in Weal.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at 2 o'clock, Joe Burgoyne, Downie, and Antony Smith spoke on Jail Square. At the same hour Glasier lectured to the Legislative Independence Branch of the Irish National League on "Ireland and Socialism." At 5.30 Joe Burgoyne, Glasier, Downie, and Gilbert spoke at Paisley Road Toll to a large audience. Our ancient enemy the Orangemen, in the form of half-a-dozen by no means well favoured or well mannered specimens of humanity, turned up, obviously with the view of creating a disturbance; they expressed great anxiety to "debate" the question with us! As we have no ill-feeling towards the poor fellows, we could not of course think of being the means of displaying their ignorance and folly to the uncharitable crowd.

MANCHESTER.—Sunday morning at Philip's Park; meeting addressed by Mason and Stockton; afternoon, Stevenson Square; Speakers, Parkinson and Baillie; Chester Road, at 8 p.m., Baillie and Ritson spoke. At Oldham, in the morning, a meeting was held by Baillie and Oldham comrades; Heywood was visited in afternoon; good meetings addressed by Mason and Stockton; over 100 Weals sold altogether.

NORWICH.—On Saturday evening a large number of comrades went and heard Fred Henderson lecture in one of the local schoolrooms upon the Political Policy of Socialists. The meeting was well attended; chair taken by Mr. Burgess; the lecturer was opposed by comrades W. B. Parker (London) and W. Moore, Parker particularly pointing out the misstatements Henderson made in reference to the late strikes, and strongly condemned the use of politics. Henderson was subjected to much interruption from the audience; Sunday morning Parker addressed a good audience. At the Market Place, in the afternoon, a large meeting was held; Parker opened, followed by the Treasurer of the Local Trades Council, Mr. Crotch, and an Irish American, who spoke in favour of a resolution congratulating the dockers. In the evening another good open-air meeting held, comrades Parker, Hardy, and Poynts spoke; opposition was given by an individual who advocated thrift, etc., and advised the working-man to save up out of his weekly earnings. Parker replied at some length; meeting lasted over two hours; good sale of Commonweal.

YARMOUTH.—In the morning on Priory Plain the meeting was addressed by Ruffolds and Henderson. In the afternoon, at the same place, by Ruffold, followed by Adams; in the evening on Colman's Granary Quay. We opened by singing the "Starving Poor of Old England," followed by addresses from Ruffold, Moore, and Darley; we finished the day's propaganda with a song from Comrade Darley; 33 Weals sold, and fair collections for local propaganda. A meeting was held at Colman's Granary on Monday evening by Parker (London) and Poyntz; labour songs sung.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87, Marlboro' Street, September 14th.—T. Hamilton delivered an address on "Labour and its Remuneration," dealing with the various politico-economical theories. An interesting discussion followed; in which King, Graham, Wilson, O'Gorman, and others took part.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—In Sneinton Market on Sunday morning Peacock and Proctor addressed good meeting. In the evening in Great Market Road, Peacock presided, and Peacock and Proctor spoke on School Board affairs. A local trades unionist who defended Broadhurst was snuffed out by Proctor; collection for School Board Fund, 5s.—P.

FABIAN ESSAYS ON SOCIALISM.

The most complete exposition as yet produced of modern English Socialism in its latest and maturest phase. The book consists of eight monographs by Socialists who are known as practical speakers, writers, and political workers. The relation of Socialism to economic and moral science is dealt with by G. BERNARD SHAW and SYDNEY OLIVIER; its evolution, as traced in the history of politics and industry, by SIDNEY WEBB and WILLIAM LARKE; its effect on political parties in the immediate future, by HUBERT BLAND; its consequences upon property and industry, by GRAHAM WALLAS and ANNIE BESANT. The practical steps by which the transition to Social Democracy is likely to be completed are the subject of a separate essay. The book is being printed by Mr. Arthur Bonner, of 34 Bouverie Street, E.C., whose character as an employer may be ascertained on reference to the London Society of Compositors. The title-page will be designed by WALTER CRANE. The subscription, which will shortly be closed, is 3s. 6d. per volume; but it will not be possible for the Society to sell the work to non-subscribers at this price.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE events of the Great Strike, the pushing forward of the lower part of the "lower orders," coming as a sequel to the agitation of the last six years in England, have much impressed the minds of that part of the public which thinks at all. Socialism, once a mere word to them, then a foolish fad, then a bugbear, bearing with it confusion and violence and nothing else, is at last presenting itself to them as a possible change in society which their own eyes may see, and which will perhaps be bearable to them.

Good so far. But what do they mean by Socialism, these well-to-do people who are beginning to think that it is coming and that it will suit them pretty well (as indeed it will, but scarcely in the way they think)? Doubtless if questioned on the point as to what they expect from Socialism, they will answer with a phrase or two like this from the Pall Mall Gazette: "From the point of view of political economy, Socialism means the collective instead of the individual administration of capital, rent, and interest."

Yes, yes; but what does the "collective administration of capital, rent, and interest" mean? I suspect to the Pall Mall writer, nothing at all; and that when he comes to find out that it means the abolition of private property, he will cry off his Socialism—if he can.

In fact, his jubilant satisfaction, shared no doubt by many of the cultured classes, at the aspect of things at present, rather shows what a very limited idea he has of the coming new society. He echoes Sir William Harcourt's humbug, "We are all Socialists now!" Are we indeed? Well, I must say in that case we need not have taken the trouble to become Socialists; since the days are still so hard on the workers that it is considered a great victory for them when the hardest worked people in London can screw a very minute gain out of their masters, who are still living in luxury earned by the employment of doing nothing; while the slums in all our big cities are just as bad as they were ten years ago, and there is no prospect of their being bettered perceptibly by our present masters in the next ten years. We may be preparing the kingdom of heaven on earth, but I think I can bring many credible witnesses to prove to the most sanguine that it has not reached them yet.

Again, if we are all Socialists now, how does it come that we of the well-off are not holding mass meetings, and appointing committees to look into the best method of relinquishing our privilege in favour of the disinherited? Surely if we have acknowledged the tremendous truths which modern Socialism has laid open to us, we ought to be busy acting on them, unless we are prepared to brand ourselves as the feeblest curs yet told of in history.

Our Pall Mall friend quotes Sidney Webb to show that we are all Socialists in his well-known platitude about the individualist City Counsellor enjoying the advantages of Socialism without knowing it, and miscalling Socialism all the time. Of course our Fabian friend knew very well what a piece of claptrap he was putting forward, and that what the City Counsellor was really saying went rather in this way: "Ha, ha! So these damned fools think that all this municipal business is Socialism—what fun! And they wonder that I am pretty well satisfied with such Socialism, as I really think I ought to be, when they work to provide me with these fine things, and I enjoy them without working. Hurrah for Socialism of this kind, say I; so long as the word contents them!"

What is the real gate which will pull up these soft Socialists, who so long as they are allowed to steal the goose will not object to give the giblets to the poor? This is the barrier which they will not be able to pass, so long as they are in their present minds, the acknowledgment of the class war. The "Socialists" of this kind are blind as to the essence of modern society. They hope for a revolution, which is not the Revolution, but a revolution which is to ignore the facts that have led up to it and will bring it about.

It is strange that they are so blind! Granted, as they must grant, the existence of a class which consumes without producing, and which, instead of being treated as a criminal class that has forfeited its rights of citizenship, is the master of the producing class, and has arranged all its law, religion, and morality to fit in with the theory of the beneficent eternity of privilege,—granted all this, how far can the class which supports these criminals, these violent robbers, go, without knocking up against the laws, the religion, the morality of robbery? Surely not a step. "Let us rob you a little less," say these Constitutionalists, "and then be contented. Or, at least, you who are most discontented, let us shuffle off some of your burdens on to another group of the disinherited, and then at least you can be contented."

It won't do! When one man employs another, and as a consequence of the "employment" takes from him a large part of what he produces, what is the use of telling him to go to a third person to recover the wealth he has been diddled out of? His resource is obvious and at hand in the form of the robber's purse, and nothing else can compensate him.

It is most important that young Socialists should have this fact of the class-war always before them. It explains past history, and in the present gives us the only solid hope for the future. And it must be understood that it is only by the due working out of this class-war to its end, the abolition of classes, that Socialism can come about. Suppose the whole of the middle-classes agreed on the necessity of Socialism, how are they going to realise it unless it is demanded by the workers?

Give up their privilege, as above said, you may say. Yes, but they live on that privilege, and if they attempt to give it up without the world of labour being prepared to receive them as workers, they simply throw everything into confusion by competing with the workers for the employment of the world-market, which exists only as a machine for keeping capitalism going. It is the workers only, enlightened as to the class-war, and therefore no longer carrying it on blindly, as they have hitherto done, who must make the machinery of free labour and mutual exchange, which will supplant the machinery of capitalist commerce, and at one stroke both compel the resignation of privilege and make it possible.

Deduction: the worker cannot better himself at his own expense but only at the expense of his master, who for his part, driven by competition, cannot help striving against the attempts of the worker to better himself. These two, therefore, are necessarily enemies, and to blink that fact does not render them less so, but only gives a little longer day to the enemy of the workman. Therefore it is that the middle-class semi-Socialists, driven by class instinct, preach revolution without the class struggle; which is an absurdity and an impossibility.

AN ATTEMPT TO ESTABLISH THE CO-OPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH.

DEAR READERS,—We feel that you, in common with ourselves, have hoped to some day see evolved a truly natural, equitable and scientific educational, industrial and social system, wherein all public utilities should be free, and every article of personal consumption at cost; wherein there should be freedom from taxation, usury, and rent; wherein constant employment, and the enjoyment of the full product of his labour, should be secured to every member; wherein emulation should be encouraged, but competition should not be allowed; speculation and monopoly be impossible; ignorance and bigotry without a foothold; vice unpopular; strife and crime without incentive, and poverty unknown.

A few years ago a hope of this kind would have been received with derision, and stamped as Utopian; but the rapid march of events has already demonstrated that industrial and social reform will soon attract the notice of all truly progressive minds, yearning to extricate themselves from the toils of wage-slavery, and giant monopoly, or, if they have escaped those evils, to lend their moral and financial support to those of their fellow human beings who are still groaning under the lash of cut-throat competition. It is the iniquitous competitive system that demands our attention, and not the slave drivers whom fortune has placed in command.

A few true humanitarian co-operators, intelligent, unselfish, and harmonious, graduates in the practical school of co-operative endeavour, several being recent officers or members of the two great attempts at co-operative colonisation on the Pacific Coast, viz., Topolobampo, Mexico, and Puget Sound, Washington, have organised as a membership co-operation, in order to evolve a scientific and practical industrial and social system that shall be at the same time equitable.

We do not make any claims to originality, but rather have obtained our co-operative education in the school of experience, aided by the teachings of such grand forerunners of social reform as Fourier, Robert Owen, Cabet, Laurence Gronlund, and M. Godin, nor do we intend in any way to underrate the value of any of the many thousand co-operative undertakings throughout the world, many of which have greatly benefited their members, and all of which are daily adding to our common stock of co-operative knowledge. It is rather for the reason that all have alike failed to see the importance of organising a progressive integral system, with responsible, unselfish, intelligent, centralised leadership as its guarantee of success.

The name of our organisation is the Co-operative Commonwealth.

Our organisation will be composed of Phalanxes, each Phalanx being resident upon a Homestead. Our general officers will be a President-General, Secretary-General, and Treasurer-General, elected by the Board of Directors from their number.

The Board of Directors will consist of five, who will be elected by the members of the Electoral College from their own number.

The general officers and members of the Board of Directors will hold office until removed by a majority vote of the members of the Electoral College.

Our local officers for each Phalanx will be a Phalanx President, Phalanx Secretary, and a Phalanx Treasurer, who will be appointed by the President-General, from those members of the Electoral College resident in the Phalanx, when any such are competent, and who will be entrusted with the management of the affairs of the Co-operation at the Homesteads of the respective Phalanxes, as per instructions received from the President-General.

The Phalanx officers are the agents of the Co-operative Commonwealth, and retain their position until removed by the President-General, or suspended by a vote of dissatisfaction by a majority of the integral members of the Phalanx.

The Commissioned Captains of Industry of each organised group in each Phalanx, will be elected by the members of the group, subject to removal for incompetency by the Phalanx-President.

Our system aims to furnish facilities for Partial, Associate, and Integral Co-operation, according to the applicant's fitness of inclination.

The associate, trial, or integral membership fee will be 250 dols. for either sex.

Any member can withdraw at any time, or may be expelled by a two-thirds vote of his Phalanx; and, in case of rejection of an applicant after probation as a trial member, or voluntary withdrawal, or expulsion, the membership fee without interest and any undrawn quota of allowances from the divisible products or profits to the members, shall be paid to him within ninety (90) days, if desired.

Partial Members are those who, resident or not, upon the Homestead, co-operate only in some of our industries or in distribution, pay no fee, have no vote or voice in the management, limit their co-operation at will, and receive rebates from those branches only in which they co-operate, in proportion to the extent of their co-operation in labour or patronage.

Associate Members are those who have paid their fee, reside on the Homestead, are self-sustaining without labouring in any of the co-operative industries, limit their co-operation to the distributive, social and domestic, have no vote or voice in the management, except the privilege of balloting on Character Rank, are not eligible to any office, and receive their supplies on the same basis as partial members.

Trial Members are applicants for integral co-operation, who are resident on the Homestead on probation, have no vote or voice in the management excepting the privilege of balloting on Industrial and Character Rank, and are furnished employment and supplies on the same basis as integral members.

Integral Members are accepted applicants for integral co-operation, who are entitled to co-operate in all things, receiving their supplies at distributive cost.

Applicants for associate or trial membership, will be received as resident members on trial, only as fast as they can be provided for in some Phalanx with comfortable quarters, and employment profitable to the co-operation, unless otherwise self-sustaining.

Applicants for integral membership will be received after a twelve months probation as trial members, and, while the membership in the Phalanx is less than ten, with the unanimous consent of the prior integral members of the Phalanx, and, as the number increases, none shall be accepted whose admission would mar the harmony.

All occupations being considered of equal value, shall be rated alike; and the individual worker graded according to skill and industry. All compensation for labour shall be the divisible product or profits of the combined industries of the entire co-operation, based upon, and in proportion to, the Hour Labour Record and the Industrial Rank of the member.

An Hour Labour Record will be kept in each Phalanx, of all time devoted by each member, to the labour and interests of the co-operation.

The Industrial Rank of each member will be ascertained yearly, by all co-workers, resident, trial, or integral members, uniting in their respective Phalanxes, in determining by ballot the comparative grade, according to skill and industry, as evidenced by the quality or quantity of work performed.

The Character Rank of each member will be ascertained semi-annually, or at any other time within ten days after a demand by twenty five per cent. of the integral members, who can judge intelligently, from personal acquaintance, uniting in their respective Phalanxes, in determining by ballot the comparative grade, in all those traits of character, industrial, social, intellectual, and spiritual, which constitutes a true and lofty manhood and womanhood.

The numerical power of the vote of each member shall be determined by the Character Rank.

All members whose Industrial Rank ranges between 55 and 65, shall be termed Cadets of Industry; between 65 and 75, Corporals of Industry; between 75 and 85, Sergeants of Industry; between 85 and 95, Lieutenants of Industry; between 95 and 100, Captains of Industry.

All members whose Character Rank is between 90 and 100, shall comprise the Electoral College of the Co-operative Commonwealth.

Any one whose estimated Character Rank is less than 50, shall not be accepted by any Phalanx as an Associate or Trial Member; less than 75, shall not be eligible to election by any Phalanx as an Integral Member; less than 85, shall not be appointed as a Local Officer of a Phalanx; less than 90, shall not be eligible to the office of Director.

If any ballot lowers the Character Rank of any member five, it shall be considered a vote of censure, and if lowered ten, the right of voting shall be suspended until the censured member regains the confidence and esteem of his or her comrades; if lowered below 75, the comrade again becomes a Trial Member; if lowered below 50, it expells.

The Co-operative Commonwealth shall establish, manage, and maintain:—

All industries, controlling the character, amount, and disposition of their products.

A Commissariat and Co-operative Store, which shall furnish all needed supplies to the Phalanx Commissariats and Co-operative Stores, at distributed cost.

A Manual Training and Industrial Art University, in which all associate, trial or integral members, or their children, shall be entitled to receive instruction in any or all branches they desire, together with board at distributed cost, payable wholly or in part, by their labour, as they may prefer.

A Sanitarium, system of Insurance and Banking, and all Public Utilities for the benefit of the members.

A general fund for the purpose of establishing and maintaining the public utilities.

A general fund for the prompt payment of expelled or withdrawing members.

A general fund for developing the industries of newly organised Phalanxes.

Each Phalanx shall be independent in social and domestic matters; shall engage in such industries as may be established by the Co-operative Commonwealth; shall have a Unitary Home, Co-operative Dwelling or Social Palace, also a Cuisine Populaire, Nursery, Kindergarten, Manual Training School, Amusements, Public Hall and Library, also a local Commissariat and Co-operative Store.

All furniture in private use, and all personal effects, are the property of the individual member.

All purchases or sales must be for cash or its equivalent.

The necessary amount shall be annually taken from the divisible products of the entire co-operation, to make up to the worker any decrease in compensation, caused through any unavoidable lowering of the industrial rank, by sickness, accident, or old age.

Members may at any time, on giving a reasonable notice, leave the industries of the co-operation, and engage in work outside, without losing the privileges of membership, excepting of course, that during their absence, they can receive no credit for labour, unless by agreement between them and the co-operation they are to be credited with their labour outside, in which case the products of said labour shall be delivered to the co-operation; and, further excepting, in the event that the places they left have been filled during their absence, they will occupy the position of Associate Members until employment shall be found for them.

Every member must be self-sustaining, and during the pioneer stages, or until divisible products are earned, no member can be allowed by the co-operation, for maintenance, in excess of the sum that shall be ascertained by multiplying his or her hours of labour, by the cost of maintaining a member for each hour of labour, when all are working eight hours per day.

(To be concluded).

Some of our correspondents, discussing the political question, say that the workers should ask candidates to pledge themselves on the various planks in our platform. That would be better certainly than the old plan of blindly voting the party ticket. But has anyone invented a reliable plan of making a politician stick to his pledge after you elect him?—Journal of United Labour.

A SOUTH AFRICAN INFERNO.

The following passages occur in the report of the General Manager of the De Beer's Consolidated Mines, Ltd., to his directors, for the year ending March 31, 1889, printed in the Wynberg (South Africa) Times of July 27, a copy of which has reached us. The first should give pause to those pretended friends of labour who are so anxious for its expatriation.

"MINE LABOUR.—European as well as native labourers have been fairly plentiful throughout the year. For a short time the rush to the Gold Fields threatened to make European labourers scarce, but, before it had any serious effect on us, an influx of miners from England commenced, and at the present time the supply exceeds the demand."

These paragraphs do not seem somehow to read like the description of a free and happy place: rather do certain things in them look too near akin to items that used to appear in Southern papers during the old slavery days:

"NATIVE LABOUR.—The compound for free native labourers has been increased and new buildings erected so as to accommodate 600 men.

"CONVICT LABOUR.—Three hundred native convicts have been constantly employed during the year working on blue ground and at the pulsator. Arrangements are being made with the Government to supply us with a greater number of these men. Our convict station will bear favourable comparison with any like institution in the colony, if not with those in much older countries.

"NEW STABLES and a compound for native drivers are about to be constructed. All the native labourers working on "blue," with the exception of drivers, are now compounded.

"A substantial barbed wire fence, seven feet high, is being built around our floors."

So as not to be unfair and unduly heighten the horrible nature of the implications that underly the foregoing quotations, we also quote as to

"KENTWORTH VILLAGE.—A village has been started for the better accommodation of our employés. Substantial brick houses are being erected, and the grounds laid out and planted with trees. The houses are to be let to the employés at a reasonable rental."

What is a "reasonable rental"? Half the wages?

"In conclusion, I desire to say that the system of mining now being carried on in the De Beer's Mine can be continued to any reasonable depth without increasing the cost except that of hoisting and pumping, which will naturally increase with depth."

The mechanical cost will increase with depth; but though danger and discomfort do so also, the rate of wages will remain at the present "reasonable" figure.

From a table of statistics relating to the same mine published in the same paper, we see that £901,818 0s. 5d. was realised by the sale of 914,121 carats of diamonds dug out: the amount realised per load being 25s. 3½d., cost of production per load being 9s. 10½d. After this we are not surprised that £188,329 10s. was paid in dividends for the year.

Add to the foregoing a couple of cuttings from the Eastern Star, another South African paper. On August 10, under the heading "A Prince in Johannesburg," this paper reports:

"The peaceful citizens of Johannesburg who went a-marketing this morning must have been somewhat startled as a rather singular procession made its way across the Market Square. At the head of this small army rode three of the Mounted Police. Behind them, on a shaggy Basuto pony, rode a stout gentleman of dusky and dusty appearance. This was Mama, son of Letsie, Paramount Chief of Basutoland. Mama was immediately followed by four lesser native dignitaries, also mounted, and behind them marched some 150 Basutos in close order, with their polished kerries inclined at the same angle over their shoulders, with karosses or many-coloured blankets falling over their well-proportioned limbs, singing their marching song; while one finely-formed native executed the war-dance in front of them. The meaning of this cortège is speedily explained. Mama, the grandson of Moshesh, was bringing up 150 of his subjects to work in the mines. The procession made its way to Captain Von Brandis' office, where the leaders dismounted, and drew their men up in a semi-circle to have their contract confirmed, by which Mama engaged to see that his men did their duty for the next three months so far as the Jumpers Company was concerned. . . . Mama is an intelligent man, and has received a European education, and has rather a pleasant way of conversing. The formalities being concluded, the Landdrost shook hands with this potentate. . . . The band forthwith proceeded to the Jumpers Mine."

In its issue of August 12 the same paper says:

"A few days since, Mama, son of the Paramount Chief of Basutoland, arrived at Johannesburg with 150 of his fellow-countrymen, who were under contract to labour in the mine. Some difficulty, however, arose with regard to the terms of the agreement. The Basuto version is to the effect that the Kafir agent, who had been instrumental in bringing the Basutos up the Rand, had told them in Basutoland, by way of an additional inducement, that they would receive £1 5s. a-week from the companies. They came, and were grievously disappointed, as the Jumpers Company, on whose account they had been brought up, refused paying more than the current wages (about 15s.). Mama said he would take his men back rather than let them work for that, but through the Landdrost's representations that labour was really needed, and that it would be no difficult matter to obtain employment for his men, he decided to stay. The Landdrost gave him permission to seek labour for his men during the next two days; until then they could go about without passes, their Chief guaranteeing that the passes would be taken out in two days' time. This afternoon Mama was arrested for breach of contract."

LITERARY NOTES.

We have received the second edition of La Société au lendemain de la Révolution (Society on the Morrow of the Revolution), by Jehan le Vagre (Paris, 140 rue Mouffetard, 165 pp., 75 cents). The first edition, published five or six years ago, was a small pamphlet which has been translated into most languages in which a Socialist literature exists, including Danish and Roumanian. This edition is much enlarged by the addition of articles reprinted from the Revolte, and now forms one of the most comprehensive and handy books on the subject. The matters discussed in it are: Authority and organisation—the measure of value and statistical commissions—class dictatorship—the public service—the lazy people—the period of education—free selection of work—harmony, solidarity—Communism and Anarchy—the moral influence of the revolution—the child in the new society—the revolution and Darwinism—the struggle against nature—the individual in society—autonomy according to science—conclusion. From these contents the usefulness of an English translation of the book is, we think, clear; it might put a stop to much misunderstanding and useless quarreling arising from insufficient information on the subject.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

A general conference of the miners of Westphalia, in which delegates from other mining districts also took part, was held at Dortmund in August (200 delegates from 44 unions and 66 mines). It was resolved to form a general miners' union and to hold a congress of all miners in the country at Eisleben in 1890. The first number of the organ of the union, Allgemeine deutsche Bergarbeiterzeitung (General German Miners' Journal) has been published at Berlin.

SWITZERLAND.

Comrade Albert Nicolet, engraver at Chaux-de-Fonds, has been arrested as the author of the manifesto of the Swiss Anarchists which we mentioned two weeks ago. The poor Social Democrats, also, who have been so busy demonstrating to the bourgeois the abyss between their innocent doctrines and those of the Anarchists, have had one of their manifestoes (A Word to the Swiss People) confiscated too, upon a formal point of law which is ordinarily not put into force. They have published at Geneva two editions of a pamphlet protesting against the late revolting expulsions of Russians (Une honte pour notre pays: A Shame for Our Country, by L. Héritier).

RUSSIA.

Numerous arrests have been made of students at Charkov and Kiev; most of the arrested are Poles. Also two secret printing presses are said to have been discovered at Charkov. The latest figures to hand on political prosecutions in Russia are those: In 1886, 208 arrested for high treason, and 656 for "offences" against the Tsar (libels, etc.); in 1887, 186 and 833 respectively; 2,972 others were arrested in 1886 and 1887 for "political offences." Only a small number were acquitted; of the rest, 6 were hanged, 31 sent to the mines; the fate of the others is still pending, or they have been sent to Siberia or some other place of exile. The most atrocious details as to the treatment of political "offenders" on the island of Sakhalin have recently been published in a letter by one of them in a Polish paper. In Russia herself "reforms" are being made by which the whole management of the affairs of the peasants is put into the hands of officials who must be taken exclusively from the aristocracy. The office of justices of the peace is abolished with the exception of three towns, and all their functions are handed over to the aristocratic officials just mentioned. If the Russian Government so plainly marks out the class differences and antagonism, and singles the landlords out for the hatred and contempt of the people, they dig their own grave, and rightly so too.

A FELLOWSHIP SCHOOL.

SOME time ago, says The Sower, the New Fellowship issued a proposal for the establishment of a school on lines consistent with the principles which it advocates. Up to the present, circumstances have not admitted of the practical realisation of this scheme under the direct auspices of the Fellowship; but the members hail with great satisfaction a separate effort which some friends and associates are about to make, to establish just such a school as was contemplated in the circular which the Fellowship issued. An attempt will be made to develop harmoniously all the faculties of the boy—to train him how to live, in fact, and become a rational member of society. This harmonious development of all the faculties will be the foundation of the entire system of the school, and the training will therefore be (1) physical and manual; (2) artistic and imaginative; (3) literary and intellectual; and (4) moral and religious.

The physical training is to include not only games, but useful manual work, awakening a sounder conception of the conditions of labour and the processes of handicraft. The promoters rightly believe that "training in manual work produces a manipulative dexterity, a steadiness and concentration of mind and will, and a habit of exactness in practical matters, which mere scholarship seldom supplies," the experience so gained developing powers of resource and of self-reliance.

In the artistic and imaginative training the great aim will be to render the whole atmosphere of the school stimulating to the dormant aesthetic sensibilities. Believing "that the imaginative faculty is best developed by the education of the innate creative instinct, it is proposed to train the boys as far as possible in the creation of the objects of their daily lives, especially where these can be made more beautiful."

In literary and intellectual training, the progress of studies will be from the modern, concrete, and particular, to the older, more abstract and general; and this method will be adopted equally in the natural sciences, mathematics, history, geography, and language.

The moral training will be based on the principle that morality cannot be taught by sermons, but must rather be the outcome of the whole influence of the school, expressing itself in every act of school life. "It is necessary that ideas, example, and sympathy go together." The religious services will be made attractive and simple, and the instruction as unsectarian and undogmatic as possible. "The influences of music [the great importance of which is recognised] and art will be combined with practical instruction in the laws of right conduct."

It is intended that up to fifteen the education shall be practically the same for all; but that after that age the destined career of each boy should decide the nature of his studies.

Negotiations are almost completed for the lease of a commodious house called Abbotsholme, with adjoining land, on the banks of the Dove, near Rocester, in Staffordshire, a picturesque yet accessible region. There will be a lady matron who will take charge of the household life of the boys, and possibly also assist in the teaching. The school will be opened in October next. For further particulars we must refer enquirers to the prospectus already issued, and to the four friends named below, from whom all information can be obtained: Cecil Reddie (B.Sc.), University Hall, Edinburgh; R. F. Muirhead (M.A.), Lochwinnoch, Renfrewshire; Wm. Cassels, 18 Carrington Street, Glasgow; Edward Carpenter (M.A.), Millthorpe, Chesterfield.

MARRIAGE.—On the 16th, at the Registry, Gateshead, Edward R. Pease, of Newcastle-on-Tyne (Fabian), to Marjory Davidson, of Kinfauns, near Perth (Fabian).

THE VITAL QUESTION AGAIN.

SOME of your readers on this western side of the waters have misunderstood the drift of "A Vital Question," and think the writer advocates palliatives, reliefs, etc. How such a meaning came to be construed from the words I do not know; for certainly, to me, all ameliorative measures, charities, plasters of any kind, are only less mischievous than the exploiting schemes which make such things seem plausible. In urging on the attention of every thoughtful person the extreme misery which exists among the masses of the common people, there is no purpose of calling out temporary aid from the tender-hearted; it is impossible to take care of the drift-wood as fast as the whirlpool of greed and corruption casts it up, and I would not attempt it while the whirlpool is there. Even the "homes," "reliefs," and "institutions" which succour a few of the despoiled victims are mere conscience-salves, and serve, as well, to keep the wretched creatures from crowding too thickly around the luxurious palaces of the rich; and then, in the eyes of many, charity is a splendid substitute for justice.

I do not even urge political zeal. I do not believe the people can vote themselves bread and freedom, against a power which protects itself with prisons, scaffolds, soldiery, and guns, any more than they can brush back the sea with petty brooms. They are fooled, amused, kept quiet with something called the franchise; but if the time ever came when the majority-vote really endangered the privileges of the wealthy classes, the revolution would be precipitated. But the "right of suffrage," in America at least, is a farce from the primaries to the final count. The "State" is made up by a few men before ever a caucus is held; the platform settled, and a political catchword—which passes for principle—conjured up at the last moment, when everything else is done. Then the two parties "go in" to win, and the one which includes the shrewdest schemers, the most seared consciences, and has the biggest barrel, working through "voters" who have only a choice between a job and idleness, comes out ahead. "Men who are economically slaves cannot be politically free," Albert Parsons said, and it is in all countries and all times true.

It is the hope of many sincere State Socialists in this country that by taking up the wrongs and needs of the people one by one, urging them upon city councils, legislatures, and congresses without ceasing, by making political issues of the principal wants of the hour, and keeping up a constant agitation, that gradually and peaceably the government can be changed into a good, safe paternalism, warranted to secure justice to all. "The people" have secured about one little favourable law, to ten powerful edicts that strengthen the classes in their vested rights, in the last twenty years. Where one poor working-man has received a straw's benefit from a statute-law, a hundred men have secured fat spoils through the "bills" our law-makers are paid to manufacture and pass. A sop is thrown to working-men now and then in the way of a law "looking to their interests," while "syndicates," "trusts," monopolies and corruptions, grow and swallow them all at a stupendous rate. It must look discouraging to one who hopes for relief through political action alone.

No; the "dear people" might vote till doomsday and not change the current of events; but there is another element creeping into the situation. The low ominous mutterings of discontent and desperation, coming with thrilling power through the false quiet, have struck the ears of the higher middle classes; they tremble and look about them, fearful lest the deluge may not wait to come after them. What can be done to stay the awful flood, which may sweep everything before it? What more easy than to grant a few of the measures demanded by many of the foremost agitators?

Place railroads, telegraphs, transportation lines in the hands of the government, pass more laws limiting land-ownership, and forbidding all money except government money. A "dangerous element" in society would be quieted, government be strengthened, the "ins" would be more securely in, the privileges of the "higher" classes would not be materially interfered with—indeed, they might find their interests greatly enhanced by having the means they must use to a great extent in one place, so as to secure them easily—and everything would be so lovely that "all might go on smooth and even" for another fifty years perhaps.

It may become a question in the near future whether it is best to take a few concessions, get the burdens shifted a little, and stave off a thorough, world-wide, radical revolution, or to ignore offered compromises and agitate for full and complete freedom.

If we do the first, we simply leave for our children the work we should do to-day. We "pile up wrath against a day of wrath." In the condition in which the world is at the present time, we ought to accomplish the great change in one generation. The commercial system is almost toppling over; the human race, all civilisation, is ready for a new régime. Of course the present system can be propped up, the miseries of the poor relieved, or rather, varied, and with a few changes we can drag along a short age more. But is it best? Can true lovers of perfect liberty and justice consistently work for a few concessions, then die and leave the world, with the day of reckoning yet to come? It is a question we should all ponder.

Any relief in the shape of charity is still worse. It seems to me that people who once submit to the receiving of alms, without a blush of shame, are doomed; they are hopelessly apathetic and degraded. The giving of alms satisfies the conscience of the rich exploiter, strengthens his position, widens the gulf between the classes, and renders the recipients more subservient and obedient than before. I confess I never had so little hope for the American people as since the recent occurrences among the starving miners of Illinois. The facts are appalling enough to thrill the stoutest heart; for here in this boasted land of the free, a country growing so rich and prosperous that it takes an eloquent orator three hours to expatiate upon it, are thousands of men, women, and children actually starving to death and dying of the diseases want engenders. The men are eager and willing to work, the coal lies in the earth in abundance, and the world's inhabitants need it; yet because some men own "the hole in the ground," poor people must freeze this winter, and the miners must go hungry all the time.

And so these workers must be kept barely alive by the kind charities of philanthropic people! When the relief trains came in, those starving men marched behind the "committee" riding in carriages (hired, it is supposed, out of the relief funds), headed by a brass band whose members had not strength enough to blow out the tune they commenced! They had lived on the wind for some time, but had none to spare for their big brass horns. Think of it! Making a parade of their degradation! Able-bodied men holding a celebration over their deep humiliation! Not one indignation meeting had been held; not a resentful word murmured over such a state of affairs! Not with bowed heads and sorrow did they accept the bread they were forced to take or starve, but with a demonstration as if publishing their downfall to the world!¹

It has long been a fixed idea with many that the American working-man would never suffer starvation quietly; that when trodden upon too sorely he would turn and rend his destroyer; but the day has come, and he licks the hand that first withheld, then doled out in charity, while he capers and shouts to his master's honour with all the little remaining strength that he possesses!

More cruel, greedy monsters never existed than the coal corporations in this State. Human life is absolutely nothing to them in their rapacious grasping for wealth. Their victims suffer and die in the midst of their property, and not a stick or stone is touched. The company's stores, filled with all they need, stand undisturbed amidst the starving.

All but a few Anarchists and Socialists have persistently hushed any enquiries into causes. "These people want bread, not discussions and resolutions," they say; and so, as the citizens keep their "hands" fed and above the dangerous point, and do not question the justice of the situation, the soulless corporations rest calmly on their privileges and wait their own sweet will to set their drudges to work on a miserable pittance.

Charity is a curse when substituted for justice. It is of no use expending it on those already lost—the wrecks of society must be society's charge. To teach strong independent men to accept it with public rejoicing is to degrade them many degrees below anything they have yet known.

But for the element of new thought awakened in the serious minds of middle-class people, the case would be well-nigh hopeless. So, again I urge greater zeal and earnestness; less care for conventionalities, respectability or personal consequences; more of the feeling of personal responsibility for the injustice and suffering society tolerates. I do not point out your work, or ask you to take up any particular phase of economic action, because I know that with a thorough realising sense of the vital question deep in your soul, you must do good. Keep awake, and be in earnest!

LIZZIE M. HOLMES.

SOCIALISM IN SURREY.

ON Sunday 15th inst. Kitz and Reynolds held a very good meeting on Mitcham Fair Green in the morning at 11, and naturally the great strike of London dockers and the position of labour generally was largely discussed by both speakers. We sold a quire and a half of Commonweal and collected 2s. 7d. After the meeting, several carmen and labourers of the district complained of their low pay and long hours, and asked us when we were going to help them get better conditions. The appeal being so often made to us, and thinking that if we did not endeavour to do something for them we might to some extent lose touch with them, the question was brought before the Council, with the result that Reynolds was sent into the district on Tuesday the 17th inst. to ascertain as far as possible the views of the men upon the subject and the wages paid and hours worked. Well, speaking generally, I found that both men and women were dissatisfied with their lot, and anxious to alter it. I found that the wages of carmen ranged from 14s. to 23s. per week for hours ranging from 11 to 16 per day; and generally those who received the least wages worked the longest hours. The complaints among the laundry-women was very widespread. In one laundry especially the women have been compelled just recently to work half an hour longer per day, and have had their beer stopped, without any extra wages being paid them. Seeing that something ought to be done, a thousand handbills have been circulated in the district, announcing two mass meetings for Sunday September 29th on Mitcham Fair Green, in the morning at 11 and in the evening at 7, when a deputation from the Laundry-women's Association are expected to attend the evening meeting, and it is hoped that some definite plan will be adopted so as to enable the workers in this district to increase their wages and shorten their hours of toil.

Now so far as our movement is concerned, Mitcham and Streatham are very promising; there is plenty of enthusiasm amongst the members, contingents going from Streatham to Mitcham to attend the meetings, and the same of the Mitcham members. On Thursday evening, 19th, I gave an address at the Mitcham club-house, which was crowded, upon "The Necessity of Unity," at the end of which a good discussion took place. On Saturday evening the 21st, I attended, upon invitation, the Streatham Liberal Club, where an address was given upon the subject "Socialism Two Thousand Years Hence." The club-room was crowded. The opener dealt with Bellamy's "Looking Backward," and was altogether very favourable to Socialism. A splendid discussion followed, several of the speakers being dissatisfied with the essayist on the ground that he had not clearly defined what Socialism was. I therefore defined, as well as I was able, the principles of Socialism. I was kindly allowed extra time, and at the end of my speech was warmly applauded. Socialism was warmly defended by most of the speakers.

On Sunday morning, September 22nd, Kitz and myself addressed a large gathering in the morning on Mitcham Fair Green, when 42 Commonweal were sold and 8s. collected for propaganda. In the evening, a largely-attended meeting was held at Streatham Fountain; the speakers were Pillier, a Belgian comrade living at Croydon, Kitz and Reynolds; two quires of Commonweal were sold and 4s. collected.

Now I think this part of Surrey a splendid field for the spread of our movement. Certainly another determined attempt should be made to recapture Croydon, where I found several of the old comrades willing to make another start. In conclusion, I should not be doing my duty if I did not say that the growth of the movement in Mitcham and Streatham is in no small measure due to the efforts of our General Secretary, who lives in the district and is very popular among all classes of the workers.

C. REYNOLDS.

Labour is about the only commodity on which the seller does not fix the price when it is sold. Why? Is it not mainly because, the natural opportunities being monopolised, men who depend on their labour for a livelihood must sell it at the price capital offers or starve? The labourer of course does the first, if he be given an opportunity, which is not always.—Journal of United Labour.

A WARNING.

(Translated by JOHN ACKERLOS.)

DEAREST friend, thy fate I see,
If you write such books as these!
Would you gold and honour win,
Servile and humble you must be.

Surely you provoke the Fates,
Thus to speak unto the people,
Thus to speak of Priests and Parsons,
Thus of Kings and Potentates.

Friend, your lot excites my fears!
Kings and Princes have long arms,
Priests and Parsons have long tongues,
And the people have long ears!

HEINRICH HEINE.

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

THE dockers have gained another victory. Not a peaceful one this time, but one accompanied by a certain amount of bloodshed, especially from the nose. Black eyes and cracked crowns have not been uncommon, but black-legs are beginning to lessen in number in the locality; perhaps that has been because the two first commodities were so very plentiful. In their case the supply certainly exceeded the demand. Some of the blacklegs have been writing to the papers, especially to the Standard. What connection, by the bye, is there between the Standard and the blacklegs. Is it possible that some of the blacklegs are unfortunate country gentlemen reduced to abject poverty by the agricultural depression, or unhappy Irish landlords whose rents have not been paid with the old regularity, and who have therefore been compelled to seek a precarious existence at the dock gates? I know not; but this at least I know, the editor of the Standard might find it beneficial to engage one or two of these blacklegs—who doubtless are now in search of a job, the climate of the docks having proved too close for them—as reporters upon his widely circulated paper. For vivid description, sensational interest, and graphic minuteness of detail, their pens lick those of the ordinary penny-a-liner into fits. One gentleman, with much simple pathos, tells how he was forced to seek shelter in a coal shed from the violence of a howling mob of strikers. Another relates how that after being chased by strikers, from whose violence he was only saved by a strong force of metropolitan police, he was lured by treacherous dock officials (who assured him and some companion blacklegs that they had got a "special" train waiting for them) into a carriage filled with the savage dockers, the sort of person no respectable blackleg would lower himself to associate with. These "ruffians," I regret to say, fell upon the blacklegs and their friends with yells of "Give it to the bloody scabs, boys," and I fear the blacklegs got it. One of them was "chucked" out on the platform as the train was leaving the station, another was nearly shoved through the carriage window on to the line, and others only escaped with aching bones and faces covered with blood from their furious adversaries when the train stopped at the next station.

No wonder the blacklegs are departing, filled with the sad conviction that their lives are not secure in the neighbourhood of the docks. Thus the dockers have by their own action retrieved one of the blunders of their leaders. Perhaps the Lord Mayor and Cardinal Manning have now come to the conclusion that the strike has a separate existence from even Burns and Tillett; and even the dock directors may at last understand that this revolt of labour was, instead of being the result of a deep laid Socialist conspiracy, a spontaneous movement among a people wearied of the miserable lives they were forced to lead through the greedy avarice of sweating contractors and wealthy directors.

The grand movement among the dock labourers and its partial success has awakened many other workers to a revolt against their misery. On Sunday, a big meeting was held in Hyde Park of the London bakers, who were addressed by John Burns, Champion, and others. The bakers want to decrease their hours from a 100 a-week down to 57. No one can say they are not moderate. They threaten a general strike of bakers on the 9th of November if their demands are not complied with. It is to be hoped that the postmen, who are also tired of their long hours for the magnificent wage of 16s. a-week, and who want eight hours a-day at 6d. an hour and 8d. for overtime, will come out on strike at the same period together with the tramway and railway men. Then, indeed, as John Burns said, "all the fat will be in the fire." For there is nothing like a general strike to bring the capitalists to their senses, and it is possible that the men might realise more than their present modest demands by striking hard and striking altogether.

Intimidation.

We clip the following from the Star, which has behaved most pluckily in the recent great labour conflicts, and to whom the whole people of London owe an eternal debt of gratitude. We can say this without flattery, for we have never failed to criticise the Star unfavourably when we think it has done wrong.

We hope that a portion of the balance strike fund will be devoted to sustaining the wives and children of the men who are suffering shamefully long sentences for very trifling, and in some quite unreal, cases of intimidation. Here are some of them:

Bartholomew Harvey, 82, Lambeth Street, Whitechapel. No assault, but a month for being with men who intimidated.

James Clark, carman, intimidation, two months.

James Buck, assault and intimidation, three months hard labour.

James Stagg, carman, three months hard labour.

Cornelius Sullivan, two months hard labour.

We do not defend these men's conduct. But we do say that these sentences are vindictive and severe, and we think their wives and families deserve some consideration from the Strike Committee.

We agree with everything but the first line in the last paragraph. We say that these men's conduct needs no defence, and we know that but for the efforts of humble heroes like these men the dock strike would have been ended weeks ago. If a blackleg possessed any fine feelings of generosity er kindness to appeal to, we should say "intimidation" was a mistake; but as he is always a mean cur whom nothing will impress but a jolly good thrashing, we say "Bravo" to every man that gives him his just deserts; that is the only way to cure him. And the man who thrashes one of these scoundrels thoroughly, ought not alone to have his wife and children well cared for while he is in prison, but ought to be well rewarded when he comes out.

Wake up, Railwaymen!

The Railway Review has an interesting article upon the docker's strike, in which it gives some good advice to railwaymen, and which we take the liberty of quoting:

"There are numerous railwaymen who are in no better position than the poor dock labourer; indeed, the latter, when he receives his advance, will be, in many cases, the better off of the two. Yet we find those slaves of the iron road resting contented, or, at the most, grumbling at their hard lot, without making any effort to improve it. Had the dock labourers kept on grumbling instead of breaking out in revolt against the harsh conditions of their employment, they would have continued in their state of bondage. If railwaymen mean to improve their condition they will have to act differently in the future to what they have done in the past. The old form of suppliant memorials and begging petitions will have to be thrown to the winds, and a more manly course will need to be adopted; they will have to muster up courage, and be prepared to fight for their rights. So long as they feel horrified at the sound of the word 'strike,' so long will their oppressors keep them down. If they have a good cause it is worth fighting for; for if it be not worth a struggle to obtain, it cannot be estimated as of much value. Working men have had to fight for their rights in the past, and will have to do the same in the future, as capital will not yield till it is forced."

We hope these poor slaves will pluck up courage and take this excellent advice, but don't let them rely too much upon the patronage of the middle-class "philanthropists," as the tramway men have done. If they do depend upon it they will find that these people will be a dead weight upon the movement when the time for action arrives, and will do nothing but protest their great desire to prevent anything so ruinous to the trade and commerce of the country as a strike. Dog doesn't eat dog; and you will never find a respectable middle-class man recommending anything that may interfere with the regular payment of dividends.

Death Traps.

Keir Hardie has a strongly written article upon the shameful arrangements that exist for the safety of the men in most of the Scotch mines. He declares that they are "death traps," and the following description of a case that is typical of many fully bears this out:

"Knockterra Pit, near Cumnock, the property of the Eglinton Iron Company, employs over one hundred persons, young and old. It is ventilated by means of a cube or furnace, which is built into the bottom of the escape shaft. There is no machinery connected with it, nor any guides in the shaft for a cage. Suppose a fire to occur in the main shaft. Before the men could make their escape they would require first to put out the cube fire and wait till the place cooled, then crawl through the furnace to the bottom of the shaft to be drawn up in ones or twos by a windlass or some other piece of improvised machinery. Before all this could be done there would be a hundred blackened and discoloured bodies strewn about the pit bottom, and the morning papers would tell of the 'Dreadful Accident at Knockterra Pit.' Accident! I would have another name for it. Murder would come nearer the mark. I want to repeat that this is not an isolated case. I cannot say the number of pits in Ayrshire similarly situated, but certainly there are not less than 12, and may be as many as 20."

It is fearful to think that when we see on the placards "Fearful Colliery Explosion," it too often means "Wholesale Murder by Greedy Capitalists." Will anything but the Social Revolution stop these butcheries? I fear not.

London Potters' Labourers.

On Sunday an enthusiastic meeting was held on the Albert Embankment. John Stanley, the secretary, George Bateman and Mr. Newstead (London Society of Compositors), and W. Parnell (Alliance Cabinetmakers) addressed the meeting. 11s. 1½d. was collected for union expenses. The chairman closed the meeting, after announcing that W. A. Chambers would speak on the same spot next Sunday morning, and that W. Parnell would address the Fulham men outside Fulham Pottery on Sunday Sept. 29th, at 2 p.m. The men evidently mean business; many of them had come all the way from Bow to attend the meeting. Meetings of the Union are held every Tuesday at the "Windmill," High Street, Lambeth.

Trades Demonstration in Glasgow.

An enthusiastic trades demonstration took place on Saturday in Glasgow, when from 1,200 to 1,500 members of some 30 trades societies marched with hands and banners through the principal streets. The object of the demonstration was to express sympathy with the employes of the Tramway Company, and to insist that the Corporation, on the expiry of the company's lease, should take over the tramway system and work it for the benefit of the community. The demonstration was organised by the Trades Council—chiefly at the instance of our comrade George Carrow and other advanced members. Although the demonstration was a large and imposing one, only a fraction of the actual workers of Glasgow took part in it, the great majority preferring to attend football-matches or stand outside as mere spectators of the procession. The joiners, masons, and engineer societies refused to join in with their comrades. It was the poorly-paid trades—dock-labourers, united labourers, moulders, and seamen—that made up the great mass of the processionists. The processionists, after parading the streets, gathered round four platforms on the Green, where they were addressed by trades representatives, and resolutions in favour of the object of the demonstration were put and carried.

The Printers' Labourers'.

We are asked to announce that the Printers' Labourers' Union, the outcome of the recent strike in the printing trade, has secured offices at 4, Wine Office Court, Fleet Street. The entrance fee is 1s., and the subscription 2d. weekly. No sick, burial, or out of work benefits are to be given, as it is to be purely a labour combination. A conference of delegates from "fair" houses has been held, at which a union committee of twelve was elected to organise the union. This has certainly been the cheapest strike on record. Only about £30 has been received from all sources, out of which £25 has been expended in printing, relief, etc. The accounts have been audited by Mrs. A. Besant and Mr. G. Z. Chesterton (of the Star), and laid before the conference of delegates and received with approval.

The strike in the linen factory of Thomas Dickson, M.P., Drogheda, has ended in the resumption of work on the old system, the clergy and the local shopkeepers bringing such pressure on the strikers as to make them surrender.

SCOTCH MINERS.—The price of coal has considerably advanced, but the insignificant fraction of the increased value of their product, which generally falls to the miners on such occasions, is withheld by the great majority of masters. A sort of guerrilla struggle is consequently going on over the whole of Scotland for a "sixpence" advance per day. If the miners of Scotland had been properly led they would have, ere this, been discussing a more important and revolutionary point than that eternal "sixpence" per day. If a miner produces value for 10s. more per day this month than he did last month, the leaders think it a great thing to do after much cry and starvation, to agitate for, and sometimes get, "a sixpence per day"—the twentieth part of their increased gains—but oftener they have to content themselves with the half of that. The time has surely come when they should make a more staggering demand; the more they fight for, the greater proportion they will receive.

PROPAGANDA IN SHEFFIELD.—The open-air propaganda has been continued very successfully during the summer months, and will be as long as the weather permits. The sale of the Commonweal has very largely increased; other literature also sells fairly well. During the strike of the London dockers we held several meetings each week, and over £30 was collected. But we have now strikes in Sheffield, and during the last fortnight we have taken up the case of the fibre-drawers, about seventy men and women being on strike. We have held several meetings each week on their behalf, and organised assistance for them, with good results. We shall continue to help them as long as the strike lasts. At the same time, we do not neglect our propaganda. While doing our best to guide the workers in their struggles for temporary relief, we always explain to them that Socialism in all its fulness is the only possible permanent remedy. The fibre-drawers deserve all the help friends can give.—J. S.

FABIAN ESSAYS ON SOCIALISM.

The most complete exposition as yet produced of modern English Socialism in its latest and maturest phase. The book consists of eight monographs by Socialists who are known as practical speakers, writers, and political workers. The relation of Socialism to economic and moral science is dealt with by G. BERNARD SHAW and SYDNEY OLIVIER; its evolution, as traced in the history of politics and industry, by SIDNEY WEBB and WILLIAM CLARKE; its effect on political parties in the immediate future, by HUBERT BLAND; its consequences upon property and industry, by GRAHAM WALLAS and ANNIE BESANT. The practical steps by which the transition to Social Democracy is likely to be completed are the subject of a separate essay. The book is being printed by Mr. Arthur Bonner, of 34 Bouverie Street, E.C., whose character as an employer may be ascertained on reference to the London Society of Compositors. The title-page will be designed by WALTER CRANE. The subscription, which will shortly be closed, is 3s. 6d. per volume; but it will not be possible for the Society to sell the work to non-subscribers at this price.

FACTS FOR LONDONERS.¹

THE march of civilisation as expressed in such inventions as gunpowder, dynamite, roburite, melinite, and such kindly compounds, makes it quite impossible to utilise off-hand the name of the latest form of concentrated power as a simile for this pamphlet. Certainly, Andrew Carnegie's phrase, "paper bullets of the brain," is quite out of the running, as it is in no way full enough to express the blasting power of this fifty-page onslaught on monopoly of every kind.

Arranged under the following heads: London's Size and Growth; The Social Condition of Londoners; London's Annual Rental; London's Unearned Increment; Municipal Reform; Poor Law Reform; Hospitals; Public Schools; Housing of the People; London's Water Tribute, Gas Supply, and Tramways and Markets; The River and the Docks; Baths, Wash Houses, and Libraries; Church Rates and City Guilds; The Property of the Poor; Police and Police Courts; Public Houses, and Cabs and Omnibuses; and The Burial of the Dead, we are presented with details and statistics which cover practically the whole public concern of the capital.

The whole library of the Statistical Society seems to have been put into a Papin's "Digester" to present to the public in the form of a piece d'accusation, which, if studied by all concerned, would bring about a(n economic) revolution inside of twelve months.

It may be boldly stated that there has never been produced in such compass such a telling exposition of the power—and the weakness—of monopolism as is this last production of the Fabian Society.

Possessors of those giant minds who love to deal only with the broadest of generalisations, and the most abstract abstractions, will of course look down with contempt upon such a trifling detail as given in, say, the two pages dealing with the burial of the dead; but those unfortunate people who can only deal with the concrete and prefer to work upwards from particulars to generals, will be glad to find in those two pages, matter which it would be difficult to find in a pretty well-stocked library of the average class, and in which can be found one or two sentences that suggest some far-reaching speculations as to the ultimate economic changes which in a short time must come about.

Just as a square blow on the nose will make a foot-pad appreciate the force if not the beauty of your protest, which your previous lecture on morality had failed to do, so can at times a few figures expose a gigantic swindle and a rotten system of society and commerce.

Who can work out all connexions between the facts that there are close on 12,000 licensed drink shops in the administrative county of London—one to every 358 persons—that there are 14,028 licenses for the whole metropolitan police district, and only 3,346 bakers; with the fact that 2,797 prostitutes were arrested for annoying male passengers and other offences (representing a probable total of 20,000 to 25,000 living by prostitution), and connect these two facts with the fact that some parishes are populated at a rate of over 200 per acre; and that this overcrowding arises from that other fact that a Land Tribute of thirty-seven millions annually, and a Water Tribute of close on two millions, is being raked in by a handful of Benzons to squander and riot with. Thirty-nine millions per annum seems to be much too high a price to pay for the privilege of standing on one another's heads, emulating the men on the wall described in 2nd Book Kings, xviii., which, according to Local Government Report, 1887-8, c. 5,526, we have to do.

It should surely strike a nation of shopkeepers as a trifle wasteful, that after granting £2 16s. 8d. per head for education out of a gross of £3 4s. 1d., that a whole staff of teachers should have to expend ten hours a-week in book-keeping over the odd 7s. 5d., besides the labour of remitting committees and outdoor officers. It should surely strike a nation of missionary exporters as absolutely damnable that there should be at their own doors 25,000 school children with minds wandering because the body is starving.

The "Facts" being all connected with Londoners, must somehow or the other all have a connection, however remote any one "Fact" may seem from another; it is possible that if all the "Facts" were fully appreciated by even some of the Londoners concerned, the results might be rather striking.

There are roughly 400,000 paupers relieved every year. One person out of every five will die in workhouse, hospital, or asylum; one out of every three adults. The assumption is that they have little to lose, come what may.

Tram Companies control 122 miles of tram lines producing dividends in some cases of 9 to 10 per cent., earned by some 4,000 men, who themselves receive in many cases not more than 4s. for 16 hours labour, Sundays and holidays being extra—slavery, not pay. Probably they could not be much worse off if the 940 tram-cars—slave galleys—were one day found across the streets instead of longwise the streets.

There are probably 20,000 casual applicants at the dock gates daily who get hardly anything, besides some 4,000 or 5,000 who get a little—irregularly, and another 4,000 or 5,000 who get a little regularly, but who may some day think that the chance of an improvement is worth more than the possible loss of their little.

That "law-n'-order" is represented—civilly—by 14,261 men and officers, spread over a circle thirty miles across, an area of 688 square miles cut into sections by miles upon miles of roads, streets, and alleys; 1,853 miles of new streets formed by the building of about 520,000 houses since 1849. That the cost of this army was, for 1888-9, £1,597,832, for which sum of money they apprehended 75,807 persons, 207 for every day of the year. That 4,400 were "run in" for being beggars, and 481 for "having no visible means" of subsistence, for which crime 295 were punished—by being fed and housed.

Looking at the section dealing with the Docks, we learn that by a paltry outlay of £20,000,000 a handful of men have secured the power of practically dominating two-thirds of the food supply of the population and the whole of our commerce.

By the General View, with which the pamphlet closes, we learn that this £20,000,000 has just now an estimated value of only £15,000,000, which is worth taking notice of. That Water Companies represent a reported capital outlay of £14,140,434, with an estimated value of £30,000,000; Gas Companies, outlay, £13,654,237, estimated value, £30,000,000; Tramways, outlay, £3,316,459, estimated value, £4,000,000; a total outlay of £51,329,710, and estimated value of £79,000,000, with a present income of £3,385,023.

The suggestion is then made that even to buy up these concerns at the inflated value of £80,000,000, Londoners could save a million a-year; to pay the shareholders out at cost price would be to save a million and a-half sterling, but as this would deprive some 10,000 shareholders and bondholders of an invisible means of subsistence, it is a "Fact" which is not yet digested and appreciated at its full value.

In the words of Tchernychewsky, "What's to be Done?" Shall the kingdom called London, with a population of over five and a-half millions, continue at the mercy of an irresponsible band of muddlers and freebooters? Or, will the sufferers take up arms against their sea of troubles? Assuredly the present condition of unreason will not obtain for very many years longer, and there can be but little doubt that the Fabian Society's "Facts for Londoners" will, if only fairly well circulated, considerably help on the much-to-be-desired change, and when London shall no longer be such a hideous wen as now,² so exact a type and capital of

"A land whose children toil and rot like beasts,
Robbers and robb'd by turns,
Land of poor-grinding lords and faithless priests,
Where wisdom starves and folly thrones at ease
Mid lavishness and lusts and knaveries;
Times out of joint, a universe of lies."

THE INTEGRAL CO-OPERATORS:

AN ATTEMPT TO ESTABLISH THE CO-OPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH.

(Concluded from p. 306.)

Of the divisible products 50 per cent. shall be devoted, in such proportion as may be deemed best by the Co-operative Commonwealth, to the Increase of Industry, the Public Utilities, and the Insurance and Withdrawal Funds; and 50 per cent. shall be divided among the workers, in proportion to the hours of labour they have severally contributed to its production, modified by their Industrial Rank.

The compensation and prosperity of each member will be dependent upon the prosperity of the entire co-operation.

Members may, under proper regulations, transfer from one Phalanx to another, for change of climate, association, or occupation.

All differences between members shall be settled by arbitration.

Associate, trial, and integral members shall enjoy their separate apartments in the Unitary Home, Co-operative Dwelling, or Social Palace rent free during their membership.

Our work is to establish a progressive system, adapted to the varied developments of the members, as few are yet fitted for integral co-operation; hence the true system should provide for their evolution.

All past co-operative organisations have retained some of the vital errors of the competitive system, and also have served to overlook the importance of, or ignore entirely, the great fundamental principle of commercial, industrial, and social justice, impossible of application under competition, but on which all equitable co-operation must be based—to wit, "Cost the equitable limit of price."

Our plan bases membership, the franchise, all leadership, authority, and compensation upon merit alone, and will ever keep the worthy at the helm.

Our basic principles are industry, economy, liberty in unity, unselfishness, and justice; its one law is equity; and we believe the result will be harmony, prosperity, true progress and happiness.

The Homestead of the Central Phalanx of the Co-operative Commonwealth will consist of 800 acres.

Our first building, which we have termed our Co-operative Dwelling, was erected in the summer of 1888, and was simply intended for the pioneer stages, and we trust will, as the organisation prospers, be succeeded by the more commodious and handsome structure which we shall call our Social Palace.

The location of the Homestead of the Central Phalanx is in the foothills of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, four miles from the railroad and flourishing little city of Grass Valley (6,000 pop.) in Nevada Co., Cal., about 2,000 feet above the sea level; free from the fogs and raw winds of the coast; free from the malaria, and torrid heat of the great interior valleys of the Sacramento and San Joaquin; free from the storms and colds of the mountains. Our climate is ever mild, healthy, and delightful; our scenery varied and very beautiful; our large tract sufficient not only for present purposes, but for future needs as well; our soil is varied and retentive; our gentle slopes, sheltered valleys, and high plateaus adapted to the successful culture of every fruit grown in California, except, perhaps, the semi-tropical; favoured with a yearly average rainfall of from 40 to 50 inches, irrigation is not required for fruit, and crops of superior quality and ever commanding the best prices, are reliable.

The Central Phalanx will engage in the growing of California fruits—as figs, olives, English walnuts, pears, apples, quinces, apricots, nectarines, etc.—and will prepare for market by reducing bulk and increasing value through drying, preserving, glacing, making olive-oil, raisins, and wine; we shall also engage in poultry and stock raising; also in such manufacturing as may be deemed best for the interest of the organisation and may be established by the Co-operative Commonwealth.

All expenses must be paid, and resident members maintained, from the products of established industries, and all membership fees shall be used in building additions to accommodate the new members, and in establishing new, or increasing the productive capacity of present industries, sufficient to maintain them.

To this end, one acre of land to each person shall be prepared, set out in long-lived fruit, if in a fruit country, and properly tended, as a sure basis of maintenance, and, in case of withdrawal or expulsion, if the Treasurer General cannot promptly refund the membership-fee, and all divisible products earned, in lieu thereof the said acre shall be deeded to the retiring member, should he or she so desire, and also tended without charge, until in bearing.

As every acre of well-chosen California fruit, in full bearing and good condition, yields a yearly income greater than the membership-fee, their security for the investment is ample here, and for local Phalanxes, where fruit-growing is not sufficiently remunerative, other suitable guarantees shall be adopted.

We intend to secure immediate and profitable employment for some of our members in the Central Phalanx, by setting out and tending California fruit, and making other improvements according to the owner's fancy, for partial co-operators, who wish to own land near our Homestead, in order to avail themselves of some features of our Commonwealth, but the preference shall be given to such as possibly may eventually (by our progressive co-operative educational system) become integral members.

The Co-operative Commonwealth makes the following offer, for the benefit of any who are desirous of helping the cause, and securing a home with us, and future membership in our organisation, but who are barred at present by business or other causes—to wit: In consideration of seventy dollars down, and five dollars per month per acre for the term of three years, to give a bond for the deed on completion of payment, for not more than one acre for each member of any one family, and contract to set it out in fruit and properly tend for three years, and after that time as much longer as they may wish, for the crop or cash, at the option of the owner. If the owner applies for membership and is accepted, the Commonwealth will accept in lieu of the membership-fee the amount paid for the land, and its improvements by the applicant; or should the owner prior to receiving the deed and taking possession, become dissatisfied with the purchase for any cause whatsoever, the Co-operative Commonwealth will, on return and cancellation of the bond, after sixty days' notice, refund all payments made on the same.

Those of our co-operative friends who already possess homesteads and desire to organise Trial Phalanxes of the Co-operative Commonwealth, can do so as follows: They should elect from their number a Trial Phalanx President, Secretary, and Treasurer, selecting them with special reference to their fitness for their respective positions; their President should send to the President-General a full and careful statement of the natural capacities of the Homestead, together with his views of the best crops to be grown, or industries developed; their Secretary should send to the Secretary-General a list and description of the members, also a list with specific cash valuation of all the property, real and personal, comprising the Homestead and its equipments, excepting furniture in private apartments, and the personal effects of the members; their Treasurer should send to the Treasurer-General a statement of all monies in his hands.

The Co-operative Commonwealth, if satisfied that the elements of success are present in the Trial Phalanx, will then assume the responsibility of the industrial affairs of the Trial Phalanx, will furnish its supplies at distributed cost, receive all its products in its commissariat and co-operative store, and compensate its members from the divisible products of the Commonwealth in the same manner as are trial members in an organised Phalanx.

At the end of one year's trial, the members of a Trial Phalanx shall decide by ballot whether they desire to join the Commonwealth as an organised Local Phalanx, when, if the majority favour so joining, the Commonwealth assents thereto, the members of the former Trial Phalanx shall pay their membership-fee to the Treasurer-General and the Commonwealth shall purchase at its lowest cash value the homestead and all stock, machinery, and tools, and the former Trial Phalanx shall come into the General Co-operation as an organised Local Phalanx of the Co-operative Commonwealth.

Our co-operative friends will note that in the Co-operative Commonwealth taxes, usury, wage-slavery, rent, and the private ownership of land are eliminated; that office-holding is made a duty, and confined to those strictly qualified by character and ability, while no spoils-system makes it desirable from a selfish standpoint, the compensation of officers and members alike being dependent upon their hours of labour in the interest of the Commonwealth; that, as our system aims at absolute equity, there can never be any discrimination between individuals on account of age, sex, colour, nationality, or religion; that character and capacity determine occupation, compensation, privilege, and authority; that the functions of production, transportation, and distribution are managed by the Commonwealth; that all investments are equal; that memberships are non-transferable; that members are the same as equal partners, whose allowances from the business are proportioned to the time that each devotes to the common interests; that all criticisms of personal motives or private actions are prohibited, except as the latter may affect the public welfare; that the Co-operative Dwellings, and more particularly the Social Palace, will afford facilities for association, as well as the privileges of the isolated home; that by harmonising human interests through integral co-operation, the wastes of human energy through antagonism, injustice, poverty, and crime, that are the natural and inevitable result of the present competitive methods, will be avoided, and there can be built up prosperous, harmonious, and happy homes, in which the highest possible physical, intellectual, and spiritual developments of men and women may be attained.

We do not expect to be ready to receive many more resident co-operators before the fall of 1889, as we prefer to make haste slowly, carefully selecting our early membership, studying and testing every move, and laying the foundation broad, deep, and strong.

We are now pioneering, and our accommodations are limited to the needs of our present membership, hence any person who comes uninvited will find neither work nor shelter.

However, a few persons who can pay their membership-fee in full, and can bring an organised industry, can be accommodated on short notice. The following occupations, especially, should correspond with us: Shoemakers, potters, cutlers, laundresses, shirt-makers, cooks, over-all makers, machine hosiery knitters, fruit canners, dryers and crystal-lisers, sheet-metal-workers, cabinetmakers, blacksmiths, wagon-makers, horticulturists, gardeners, and harness-makers.

Those of our industrial readers who desire to make a thorough study of co-operation, whether or not they contemplate availing themselves of any opportunities that may be offered for engaging in co-operative enterprises, or think of applying for membership in the Central Phalanx, or of organising a Local Phalanx of the Co-operative Commonwealth, we would suggest that they subscribe for The Integral Co-operator, an exponent of the principles of Integral Co-operation, and a journal devoted to the interests of every phase of co-operative endeavour. Every subscriber to The Integral Co-operator will be enrolled, without additional fees, as a member of "The Co-operative Brotherhood," an organisation engaged in making a scientific study of Co-operation, with a view of thereby benefitting its members, as well as the rest of the human race.

The members of the Co-operative Commonwealth are also members of the Co-operative Brotherhood, and propose to aid their fellow members of the Brotherhood, to the limit of their desires, in comprehending and realising the grand possibilities of equitable co-operation. The General Officers of the Co-operative Commonwealth are ex officio the officers of the Co-operative Brotherhood.

As the membership of the Brotherhood increases, means will be co-operatively devised whereby valuable aid may be rendered to its members. If you desire to become identified with the purest, grandest move that has attracted the attention of thinking minds for centuries, enroll yourself without delay in the truly great cause, and prepare to march in the triumph of the Industrial Armies.

This is our life-work, and to it we have pledged all we have and are.

We will be pleased to receive any and all criticisms and suggestions prompted by a love for the cause, and will gladly correspond with all true co-operators who favour our plan.

As we are neither capitalists nor speculators, our propaganda must be self-sustaining. Persons desiring answers to their letters should enclose five cents for postage and stationery. Copies of this propaganda are five cents each, and will be mailed to any person on receipt of the price. For further information, address—The Co-operative Commonwealth, Central Phalanx, Grass Valley, Nevada Co., Cal., U.S.A.

[The above letter has been printed to provoke discussion, first of all on the advisability of such particulars as that it deals with, and secondly upon the merits and demerits of the particular plan which it sets forth. For the present we withhold editorial comment further than saying, that in our opinion any a priori plan of such complexity must necessarily result in a disastrous failure.—ED.]

TRAMWAY SERVANTS' GRIEVANCES.

In a letter to the editor of the Liverpool Daily Post, a "Checker" says that he "can say from experience that there is not a more downtrodden and crushed class of men than these." "I have been," he continues, "a servant of the company for some considerable time, and must say that I have felt disgusted at times with the orders I have received as to the treatment of my fellow working-man. When I first entered the service of the company as a 'checker' my instructions were to treat no man in the service, either guard or driver, as being honest, but to report everything that might be irregular, and to look upon nothing as a mistake. After I had been in the service a little while I found that it was very easy for a guard to make a mistake, particularly a new guard, which a checker could easily set right, and so put the guard out of a muddle, which I often do. For instance, a guard may in confusion use the reverse end of his tickets, after which a checker jumps on and finds that he has so many tickets in excess, which number he takes from the guard after they have been punched. He is then reported for having a quantity of tickets in his possession after having all his fares taken, besides losing the amount of money represented by those tickets. I am sorry to say that there are only too many checkers ready to avail themselves of cases of this kind, and follow up new guards for the purpose of tripping them up. I would ask if this is justice either to the company or servants? I for one would never stoop to this dirty work." In consequence, the number of his reports against the men have been lower than those of many other checkers, and for this he has been severely called to account.

Some time since he was summoned down to headquarters, and there told that: "I had not been sending in sufficient reports against the guards, and when I explained that I had sent in all reports of legitimate cases of neglect, etc., I was told that it was not for me to decide as to what was a mistake or not with a guard, and that I must in future send in more reports. A colleague of mine was taken down to the office not long since to explain the reason that he gave a familiar nod to one of the drivers as he passed along the road. In fact, if a checker is known to pass a friendly word to a guard or driver, it is immediately construed into conspiracy."

"I assure you," he goes on to say, "that a guard's berth is no sinecure, what with looking after his harness, his tickets, way bill, then, as in some cases, punching each ticket as many times as there are pence in the fares he receives, and watching for both passengers and the checker, he is kept busy, particularly when fresh at the work. . . . The men have formed themselves into a society of their own, and so soon as it began to operate the company suddenly thought that it would be a good thing for the men if they started another, which they have done, and their chief superintendent is daily amongst the men inducing them to join. The reason for this, I think, is obvious. I would conclude by urging every man to join the union they have formed amongst themselves, and I avail myself of every opportunity of urging them to do so, for I think that the Liverpool tramway men should now be on a par with those of Glasgow, Cardiff, Bristol, etc."

The September Statesman (Statesman Pub. Co., Chicago) opens with a readable article on Danton and Camille Desmoulins, by Brown Forester. Assessment Life Insurance is attacked by Miss M. Dawson. This is one of a series of articles to cover every phase of the insurance question, and will be answered in the October number by Gen. W. F. Singleton. Henry George comes in for adverse criticism at the hands of Judge Fontaine T. Fox, of Louisville. The editorials discuss the Enforced Sunday Labour question and the Farmers' Alliance.

THE PROPAGANDA IN EAST LONDON.—The report of last week was received too late for insertion. All comrades who assisted at the benefit concert accept thanks on behalf of the branch. It has added considerably to the funds. A good members' meeting on Wednesday; transacted important business re banner and platform. On Saturday a splendid meeting held on the Waste, comrades Reynolds, Davis, and Cores speaking to a most sympathetic meeting; 21 Commonweal sold. A short meeting held at Union Street Sunday morning, opened by Such and continued by Turner, till compelled to close on account of the rain. Fair sale of Commonweal. Most of our comrades assisted at the tailors' strike demonstration in Hyde Park in the afternoon.—J. T.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The French elections ended in a victory of the present ruling clique of Opportunist "Republicans" of the Ferry type. Those Social Democrats who took part in them played the worst possible rôle: partly they were hangers-on to the Governmental, and partly to the Boulangist parties. So on one side Boulangist "Blanquists" like Granger, and on the other side Governmental "Possibilists" like Joffrin were elected, the latter by the annulling of Boulangier's election, as the Government is, of course, less afraid of a "revolutionary Socialist" in Parliament than it is of a reactionary like Boulanger. This shows that the Government is at any rate right in one thing, namely, in considering the existence of a few Social Democrats in Parliament as perfectly harmless and of no danger to it. The Possibilists scored about 44,000 votes. The Marxists chose to stand by themselves, and had no more success in consequence of this than the few independent Blanquists had. In those electoral districts where second ballots take place, we see the Possibilists urge upon their electors to vote for the Republicans; here and there where a Possibilist heads the vote the Republicans will vote for them; in short, a perfect harmony between bourgeois and proletarians prevails, or is at any rate advocated by the official leaders of the parties. What a humbug then is the supposed creation of class-feeling and intelligence of Socialism during election time which we are so much told of!

A new paper, Le Proletaire du Nord, is published at Lille and Roubaix.

NETHERLANDS AND BELGIUM.

The early history of the Rotterdam dockers' strike, on which the daily papers report more fully, is as follows: On September 18, some hundreds of dock labourers held a meeting, and, after being addressed by the Socialist Helsdingen, elected a committee which drew up a list of demands. This was adopted at a large meeting on Friday, September 20, and the demands having been rejected by the employers, it was resolved on September 25 to begin the strike the next day, Thursday, September 26. At the meeting of September 25, it was stated that the strike movement originated with the workers themselves, and that they asked the Socialists to help them in their struggle. If the capitalist papers now publish reports to the effect that the strikers disavow any connection with Socialists, we know that these reports come from Holland, a country in which the police is used to hire people who are made drunk to attack and assault Socialists, which happened just two years ago in Rotterdam, in Leyden, and Amsterdam. They also like to fire on the people, and tried last week to repeat the butcheries of Amsterdam in 1886. It is already stated, even in the bourgeois papers, that on Friday, September 27, the police assaulted the people first.

We learn from the Werker that last week a union of the dock labourers of Antwerp was founded, but the local Socialists dissuade them from taking part in the present strike movement.

One of the editors of the Social Democratic daily paper of Ghent, Procureur, was sent by the Belgian party to the Argentine Republic to study the emigration fraud. He has just returned, and besides his many letters to the Belgian papers during his travels he is going to publish a pamphlet on the subject.

SWEDEN.

The not abundantly rich socialist literature of Sweden has just got a valuable addition. It is a scientific pamphlet, Socialismens Hörnsten (The Corner-stone of Socialism), by the imprisoned editor of Arbetet, Axel Danielsson. It is cleverly written, full of excellent remarks, rich in well chosen quotations, and to every ignorant reader, be he bourgeois or worker, it must be a revelation—as is necessarily the case with every truly historical and logical explanation of the existing productive system. But it strikes me that Danielsson—like most educated Swedish Socialists—greatly overrates Karl Marx's importance for the true science of political economy. I have heard orthodox admirers of Marx among our comrades in Berlin, who do not regard Marx's theory of value as so well proved and so important as our excellent Swedish comrade. Of course, the truth must lie on the side of Marx (and not on the side of his bourgeois antagonists, who are mostly mere idiots and sycophants)—but is Marx's theory the whole truth? Is there not for modern Socialists something suspicious in the close relationship of Marx's theory to the theories of so narrow bourgeois and in their whole line of thought, so non-evolutionistic (i.e., metaphysical) thinkers as Adam Smith and Ricardo?

DENMARK.

The quarrel between the Danish papers, Social Demokrat and Arbeideren, continues—and it is well. For the sake of a healthy evolution of Socialism in Denmark, an opposition in the spirit of Arbeideren is undoubtedly necessary. The last great event in the battle (in which Social Demokrat defends political tactics, that very closely resemble compromise with the liberal bourgeoisie) is that our German comrade Bebel has written a letter to Arbeideren, in which he repudiates every insinuation that German Socialists (an authority out of which Social Demokrat has made much capital!) compromise with bourgeois parties. German Socialists always act as an independent political party, Bebel says (and Arbeideren states that the Danish party does not). They have sometimes, when they in the second poll (Stichwahl) could only choose between a conservative and a liberal or radical candidate, given their votes to secure the election of the least objectionable of the two. But this tactic has been condemned by the Congress of St. Gallen.

A comrade who wants that the Socialists should carefully analyse the value of political action, and always make propaganda against its anti-Socialistic sides, will certainly with great interest follow the struggle in which comrade Trier (of Arbeideren) has so ably engaged. STN.

SOCIALISM IN LEEDS.—We are working hard. On Sunday morning, Sept. 22, we held a meeting and collected 9s. 3d. for the proposed agitation amongst the tailoresses. In the afternoon W. Thorne, of London, paid us a visit, to help us organise the gas-workers, and at a meeting at which Thorne, Paylor, Maguire, Sweeney, and Hill spoke, a collection of £1 5s. 4d. was made. In the evening another meeting of gas-workers was held in our club-room. On account of ill-health, Corkwell was been compelled to give up his post as secretary to the Yorkshire Socialist Federation, and T. Paylor, of 11 Sheldon Street, Holbeck, Leeds, has been appointed, to whom address all communications.—T. P.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN NEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors. Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them. Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s. six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. NOTES ON NEWS.

In the current number of Unity there is a reply to our “assault” of September 21 upon it and the societies which it represents, that requires more extended comment than can be made within the limits of a note, and I will try to deal with it in our next number. But I may say at once that what we Socialists object to in friendly societies, trade unions, and other combinations for mutual benefit, is not their carrying out the special—and for the most part laudable—objects for which they are organised, but the tendency to sit still in selfish isolation and twiddle complacent thumbs when those special and partial ends have been realised. They are too much content with all members; we think of all men.

This is taken from the Star of the 25th: “Mark Barnett, of Corsham, was charged before the Chippenham magistrates with cruelly illtreating his wife, who swore that he came home at one o'clock in the morning, threatened to cut her throat, tore the hair off her head in handfuls, knocked her down, knelt on her, and kicked her, the evidence of which she showed to the police inspector when she complained the following day. This treatment she swore she had been subjected to for the past five years. The magistrates declared themselves satisfied that an assault had been committed, which they did not consider an isolated one. They therefore considered it necessary to fine the prisoner 1s. 6d., with costs, and grant a judicial separation. One of these lights was a parson, Rev. J. J. Daniell.”

From the same paper the same day comes this also: “This morning John Russell, farmer, of Offchurch, was charged on remand before the magistrates at Leamington with having unlawfully killed Edward Brooks, whom he found with others poaching. The coroner's jury found a verdict of justifiable homicide. The solicitor who now appeared to prosecute on behalf of the Treasury said that department was unaware of the verdict of the jury, and he expected to receive instructions to withdraw from the case. Russell was again remanded, bail being allowed.”

Is there any comment needed on these two cuttings? Do they not speak, when put near together and so contrasted, more forcibly than any pen could do, of the hideous inversion of all that is human brought about by the present system?

An Indian journalist has written the following letter to the English press: “Sir Lepel Griffin in his recent lecture at the Royal Colonial Institute described the Maharaja of Kashmere, who has been deposed, as a ‘drunken debauchee’ and ‘a man of the vilest passions.’ I am a subject of the good Maharaja who is, I am greatly pained to find, so grossly libelled by a high Indian functionary like Sir Lepel. Far from the statement of Sir Lepel Griffin being true, the Maharaja is, as everybody in India knows, a rigid Hindu, very devout and pious, and he never touched a drop of wine in all his life. He abhors sensuality. He is kind, affectionate, generous, and forgiving, and not at all the monster he has been depicted by those who are trying to justify his violent deposition from the throne.”

Does this need any explanation or comment, any more than the items which go before it? When covetous eyes are being cast upon the land of “uncivilised” folk, whom the benevolent Englishman would like to bring beneath the mild and blessed sway of law'n' order, it is always easy to prove somebody in the wrong, and that England's intervention is imperatively needed in the interests of humanity and mercy and half the calendar of virtues. S.

Mr. G. R. Sims, in the Referee this week, remarks upon the fact that “We are to be treated this winter to a series of sensational strikes. When the postmen, the railwaymen, the tram-car men, the omnibus men, the cabmen, and the bakers are all “out,” the correspondence on the great question of ‘Is life worth living?’ will be doubly interesting.”

Then follows this very significant sentence: “It only wants perfect organisation to place the metropolis absolutely at the mercy of the working classes.” We ask the working classes to remember this important truth which Mr. Sims's brilliant intellect has so promptly grasped, and set about getting that perfect organisation which will place London at their mercy. They will not then need to go to Parliament to redress their grievances. D. N.

It is to be regretted that from time to time writers in the democratic newspaper, Reynolds, should descend from the high pedestal of international solidarity of the working-classes, which the paper is supposed to champion, in order to add to the inordinate anti-foreign-Jewish feeling so often displayed by the ignorant English workman.

In “Stories for the People,” on Sunday, September 22nd, we have an unworthy revival of this mania, a disease, it appears, which has overtaken many otherwise good men on the staff of Reynolds.

In this case the writer is just a wee bit inconsistent; a failing, I have noticed, most peculiar to gentlemen whose calibre is tainted and narrowed by national and creed hatred. Jewesses are here especially condemned for wearing “ribbons of all hues in and out of the rainbow,” while their “breadth of body” is equally offensive. The male Jews, on the other hand, we are told, “is not fond of bodily labour,” hence his liking “for the lazy life of tailoring, cigarette making, fur dressing, stick making, and so forth.” The “so forth” comprising such idle occupations as boot finishing, which is a good type of other equally idle occupations in which they engage. The inconsistency I have just noticed as peculiar to writers of this character comes out quite plainly.

In the letter to “the Social Democracy,” Professor Jevons is quoted to prove the originality of the “English blackguard,” the writer agreeing that this individual is alone in the wide, wide world in his depravity. “If a factory girl or housemaid dress tidily, Mrs. Grundy at once shakes her stupid head and talks of ‘love of finery,’” is another choice passage approvingly quoted from Jevons.

But then our writer may very logically contend that when he approves of the dress and ribbons of the factory girl, he was referring to an Englishwoman, not a foreigner. Of course this makes all the difference! However, wonders never cease. One can decide, it appears, in favour of international solidarity of the working classes without being an international Socialist. H. D.

IN THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

A FEW words with regard to this country may be of interest to the readers of the Commonweal.

On the 14th of July last the anniversary of the Bastille was celebrated in almost every town of importance in the Republic. The Socialists of Buenos Ayres sent round a circular on the occasion. I have not a copy of it by me, or I would send it to you, but the following extract from it, which I cull from a newspaper, is very appropriate to the condition of affairs actually existing in this new "El Dorado":

"The native race has almost entirely disappeared, and the white man has become the owner of the land. Thousands upon thousands of acres of land have been presented by Government to their favorites, or sold at a trifling price. What now remains of the enormous territory and that incalculable wealth for the hundreds of thousands of immigrants who come to us from the Old World? Nothing but the sale or letting of small patches at impossible or absurd prices, so that the working-man has no hope to raise himself above the position of a permanent wage-earner; and while the labourers are in this sad plight, Government stimulates immigration by artificial means and at the expense of the people. For what purpose? Simply to raise still higher the fictitious price of land, and to increase the fortunes of the rich, without any regard to the sad lot of the thousands of immigrants who come to be the victims of the most unbridled and inhuman speculation. The same thing occurs in the city as in the camp. The rents in the city are exorbitant in consequence of the artificial immigration. But this is not all, for then the Government comes to suck the proletariat by the imposition of innumerable taxes."

The Southern Cross, the clerical organ in this country, in commenting on the above, completely endorses it, but, as might be expected, warns its readers that "the evil is certainly not to be remedied by Socialism and Anarchy!"

The greatest evil in this country is the money. Gold is at a premium, and the money of the Republic (a paper currency) depreciated and at a discount. When I came to this country, in the latter end of May last, the premium on gold was 150 per cent.; it is now, at the date of writing, at 185! The paper dollar is now worth very little more than 50 cents. As the premium on gold rises, the prices of food and all the necessaries of existence rise also. This presses very severely on the workers, who are all paid in paper money. So much is this so, that it is almost impossible for any working-man with a family to exist. The people who alone make fortunes in this country are the great English and European capitalists, who have contracts with the Government and who get paid in gold, but pay the workers in paper, so that each time the premium on the precious metal rises the amount of the wages they have to pay their wage-slaves decreases. Any worker who comes out here with the object of bettering his position in life makes a huge mistake, as he actually receives less wages than at home and has to pay most exorbitant prices for everything he needs. The purchasing power of a dollar here is not as much as that of a shilling in England. The Argentine Republic is like Egypt, in the hands of usurers and bondholders who must have their pound of flesh. Here the two first necessities of life, bread and meat, are heavily taxed. One does not expect to find virtue in any Government, but that of this country is most shamefully corrupt, and has brought it to the verge of bankruptcy.

In consequence of this state of affairs numerous strikes are taking place. There are several thousand carpenters, stevedores, sailors, stokers, etc., on strike at the Boca, in Buenos Ayres, and some 2,000 labourers on the port works in the Riachuelo. "The stevedores, sailors, and stokers on strike at the Boca," says the Southern Cross of August 9th, "as yet show no sign of yielding. The employes of the Mihanovich Steam Tug Company have returned to work at increased wages, but 350 carpenters employed on the port works left their posts yesterday and joined the strike. An attempt made at arbitration came to nothing, the employers offering 30 dollars to 32 dollars, whilst the men are divided, some demanding to be paid in gold, others asking an increase to 35 dollars or 40 dollars. As yet there have been no disturbances, but the authorities have taken precautions in case of an outbreak." The Southern Cross also says: "Some 2,000 labourers on the port works in the Riachuelo went on strike last week for an increase of wages. Their salary was only 24 dollars per month, which in these times is certainly starvation wages." The Buenos Ayres Estandard has a leader on the strikes. After remarking that what with gold premium at 75 per cent. and the consequent increased cost of living, the strike for higher wages is not surprising, the writer adds that "the immigrant who comes to this country expects to better his condition, and, though that improvement may take place in the colonies of Santa Fe, in the rural districts of this province, and in the distant territories near the frontiers, it may fairly be doubted that the new-comer is any better off in the capital of this republic than in the slums of Naples."

Smouldering disaffection is the order of the day all over the Republic, and if only the workers could be organised there would be a crash. The stream of population still pours in. During the month of July, 16,569 immigrants arrived in Buenos Ayres, of whom 13,060 were brought in foreign steamers. Of these 6,483 were men, 3,135 women, and 3,432 children. Since January 1st, 157,681 immigrants have arrived.

The paper dollar of the neighbouring Republic of Chili is also depreciated considerably, but there are signs of improvement. In the Republic of Uruguay the money is at par. The language in almost every part of South America is as you are aware Spanish. I will write you again soon.—With greeting to all comrades, fraternally yours,

SAMUEL HAYES.

Mendoza, Argentine Republic, August 22, 1889.

ANOTHER NOTE FROM THE ARGENTINE.—Writing to comrade Kitz, comrade F. H. James, a member of the North London Branch, now in Buenos Ayres, says:—"If any of the members who are mechanics think of coming out here, tell them it is a great mistake to do so, they are far better off at home. I know several who have gone back just lately, thoroughly disgusted with the place. The fact is that Italians, French, and Spanish come here by the thousand every other day, and as they, by the mode of life to which they have been accustomed, can live at less than half the expense of the average Englishman, they are willing to work at a rate which he would starve at. Added to this there is an utter absence of the most simple comforts, a most disheartening lack of sympathy on the part of English people who have been here a little time, and a language entirely different to their own. The climate, however, is grand, quite equal I should imagine to some of the most favoured spots in the old world. Socialism is steadily making its way here, and indeed, for such a young country it is surprising the advances it has made and is still making. Only a day or two ago I read a terrible article in the leading English paper here, warning the government that unless they took speedy measures to repress it by instituting better laws, there would soon be a revolution; for the working-classes were groaning under the oppression of innumerable taxes on all sorts of food and necessaries to their existence. The police have found out that Socialists have been at the bottom of the recent successful strikes, and that the workers are quickly adopting Socialist views; so we may look forward to a system of police surveillance such as exists on the Continent of Europe. I feel confident, however, that nothing can stop the onward march of the Cause, and I believe that the workers of this country will take a very prominent part in bringing about that new order for which we all work and live."

THE MARCH OF THE STRIKERS.

Tune—"Drink Up, Boys!"

WORKMEN, down with your tools,
Throw them to the ground,
Workmen, ye are not fools,
In your ranks men may be found;
Take ye the rifle now,
And drop the saw and plane,
The rich man soon shall bow,
And Freedom be our gain.

Chorus—Shout hurrah! the Revolution comes,
Its thunder of the cannon, and the rumble of the drums;
Shout hurrah! the tyrants all shall flee,
And the people live together, all in love and liberty!

Storm through the streets in fury,
Low in the dust shall tyrants be,
We seek not gold or glory,
But yet we will be free;
Pile up the barricade,
Death to all tyranny,
See the red flag bold displayed,
Upon its crest shall be.

Chorus—Shout hurrah! etc.

Policemen! our own flesh and blood,
The people are one with you;
Soldiers! slaughter is not good
Of your kin and loved ones too;
Down, down with rifle and sabre,
And clasp our hands with glee!
Ye are one with the sons of labour—
The people shall yet be free!

Chorus—Shout hurrah! etc.

On! on! to the mansions high,
Ye people who live in slums!
We will have freedom or we'll die—
The revolution comes!
The rich man cowers in fear;
Let him loud for mercy pray,
The people answer, Freedom's near,
And you shall live and say—

Chorus—Shout hurrah! etc.

D. J. NICOLL.

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

THE demonstration of the tailors on Sunday was a great success. The poor wretches who slave in sweating fever dens of the East-end turned out in strong force, and the middle and upper classes of the West-end were startled at seeing a procession of the miserable men, with wan hunger-stricken faces, marching through the richest streets of the wealthiest city in the world. The police had taken especial precautions; not only was there an abundant supply of police on foot, but the procession was further honoured by a strong escort of mounted men. Probably a small red flag carried at the end of the procession, and the announcement that several "extreme" Socialists were to speak at the demonstration, had something to do with this. Some labour leaders seem very much afraid of Socialists and the red flag, and some workmen appear to share their fears. They dread that the presence of these wicked people, with their revolutionary standard may "compromise" them. It is not generally known that the most successful attempt of the London workers to improve their condition was headed entirely by avowed Socialists. I need scarcely say I allude to the strike of the printers' labourers. These men have gained advances of 5s., 6s., and 7s.; and although their leaders were avowed Socialists, yet the men do not appear so dissatisfied with the result of their agitation as many of the dockers do. This proves at least that Socialist speakers do not injure a labour agitation.

We are glad to see that the tailors are not afraid of Socialists, nor even of the red flag, which floated from their principal platform while the speeches were delivered. In Regent Street the procession was joined by West-end tailors. The contrast between the physique of these stalwart trade unionists, who marched in most admirable time, and the poor wretches from the East-end, was most striking. A comical incident occurred as we entered the Park. A body of burly policemen stood by the Park gates; a witty London gamin who was in the procession called out to them, "I say, you won't get no clothes now!"

There were at least ten thousand people round the three platforms in the Park. They were addressed by Hunter Watts, Lewis Lyons, and Hicks (S.D.F.), Macdonald, and O'Connor (Amalgamated Tailors), J. Turner, D. J. Nicoll, and S. Mainwaring (S.L.), A. Borgia (Patriotic Club), and Tom Mann (Labour Electoral Association). A resolution was carried unanimously pledging the meeting to support the tailors in their struggle.

The postmen held a large and most enthusiastic meeting on Clerkenwell

Green at 8 p.m. The spirit of the men is excellent. The speakers were Michael Henry, Tom Thorne, W. A. Chambers, A. K. Donald, Tom Dredge, and others. The Union increases in numbers daily, and the men are determined to "come out" if they do not get their demands.

1,500 indiarubber-workers at Messrs. Silver's works at Silverton are still out for increase of wage from 4½d. to 6d. an hour. The Gas-stokers' Union are supporting them, and have generously voted them a contribution of £250.

The Bakers' Union is also thriving, and there is no doubt that the men will strike on the 9th November if their demands are not conceded.

The Strike at Thornycrofts.

Thornycroft's men are still out, though the firm has offered a further compromise. On Sunday afternoon a large meeting was held on Acton Green, addressed by John Williams, and Tochatti and Lyne, S. L. Mrs. Tochatti opened the meeting with the revolutionary song, "When the Loafers are Somewhere Down Below." The men hold out firmly, but the masters show signs of yielding, and victory is certain in the near future.

The British Association and the Workers.

It is now very different to what it was a few years back, when only a few despised Socialists dared to discuss the great Condition of the People question. The fight for free speech, West-end riots, battles in Trafalgar Square, great strikes in the East-end, have awakened even the most callous of the middle-classes to the fact that we have immense suffering in our midst. Social questions are coming to the front; and the British Association, together with other scientists, clergymen, and all the other pretentious nobodies whose importance exists only in their own imaginations, are busy discussing the new phenomena which threaten their existence as privileged idlers. Several important social questions were discussed by the British Association, among them being the housing of the poor, the industrial relations, the difficulties of arbitration, the relations between wages and the economic product, and the social industries in their social and pathological aspect. According to the opinion of the workman contributor to the Labour Tribune, these good people's discourses upon these varied subjects were very useful in displaying their ignorance of the matters in question. There were at least some workmen in the audience who could have given them some very authentic information, gathered from bitter experience, and not culled from blue-books and other sources of "official" information, upon the housing of the poor, industrial relations, and the relation between wages and the remainder of the economic product, etc. The gentleman who spoke upon the housing of the poor gave some very startling figures, which we fear, however, are not likely to bring forth any startling action on the part of either spectacled savants or smooth-tongued politicians. Here are some of the figures relating to Glasgow and London: One-fourth of the inhabitants live in single apartments, nearly 70 per cent. in houses of one and two rooms, often with lodgers. The death-rate in such one and two roomed houses is 24.74 per thousand, in three and four roomed houses 19.45, in houses of five rooms and upwards 11.23. In dealing with this subject he stated a number of reasons why this poor accommodation existed, the cost of ground rendering it inevitable that many such houses should be erected in a limited space. Here is a delightful state of things in a Christian country in the enlightened nineteenth century! The poor wretches who live in single apartments are cheated out of more than half their lives as compared with even the respectable citizen and lower middle-class man. Is it not time something was done? High rents and low wages—these are the causes why the poor are thus foully and treacherously murdered beneath the poison-tree of middle-class greed and avarice. The people have struck and are striking against the low wages, is it not time that they had a turn at the high rents? Will the men of the district of St. George's—the St. Antoine of London—lead the way in this battle, as they have done in the past conflict?

English Waiters on the Wrong Track.

A meeting was held in Hyde Park last Sunday afternoon by a newly formed body calling itself the "English Hotel and Restaurant Servants' Association." Speeches were made by waiters and others exposing the scandalously low rates of wages paid to hotel and restaurant servants, and the fines for the breakage of glasses, etc., which they are forced to pay out of their already small wages, one speaker saying that after deductions had been made on various pretexts he had found himself possessed of as low as 5s. 6d. as a week's wage. But instead of recognising that the shareholders of Spiers and Pond (a firm in question), and of other companies and hotel proprietors generally were the gainers from their low wages and long hours of work, and speaking accordingly, they made a bitter and foolish tirade against their Continental fellow-workers, expressing their determination to deny them admittance to their organisation, and even refused a hearing to comrade J. Turner. Eventually, on the formal closing of their meeting, a Scotch friend got a hearing to plead for internationalism and fair play; Doughty (of the anti-Coercion Committee) and George Cores (of the S.L.) also spoke. The speakers pointed out to them the part Internationalism had played in the dockers strike, and the action of the East-end Jewish tailors who were demonstrating there that afternoon, contending that there were but two nations in the world, the rich idlers and the poor workers, and appealed to the waiters and waitresses to join hands with their fellow workers of all nationalities and fight the real foe—the capitalist sweater. The Italian waiters have had a strong organisation in London for a long time past, and are perfectly prepared to co-operate with their English fellow workers on terms of equality—a very fair proposal. Also these "English" waiters and waitresses should remember that there is a colony of English waiters in Paris who are received with open arms by the Parisian Waiters' Society. There is to be another meeting held in Hyde Park on Sunday next, at 3 p.m.

STRIKE OF SCHOOL CHILDREN.—Rebellion spreads; even the youngsters in the schools are turning out. A large number of the school children in the higher standards at Wilton and Trinity Board Schools, Hawick, have come out on strike, and marched in processional order between the two seminaries, denouncing the school discipline and calling names at the headmasters. The pupils state that they want shorter hours, fewer and easier lessons, and better teachers. Not a few were desirous of resuming their school work again in the course of the afternoon, but the spirit of revolt is strong; there are to be no blacklegs, and they were prevented from doing so.

SOCIALISM IN SURREY.

On Wednesday 25th Reynolds went to Croydon, and visited several of the members of the old branch. There is a chance of reviving the old propaganda here. Pilliers thinks that he can get his trade society club-room for our meetings.

Thursday evening, 26th, Reynolds gave an address at the Mitcham club-house on "The Fallacies of Politics"; there was a good attendance and good discussion; several new members made.

On Sunday 29th we held two large meetings on Mitcham Fair Green. In the morning 500 attended; Kitz and Reynolds were the speakers. In the evening there was a fine demonstration, which Reynolds, Kitz, Mrs. Schack, and Cantwell addressed. We sold 63 Commonweal, and collected 12s. for propaganda. Good meeting at Streatham; two quires of Commonweal sold, and 2s. 6d. collected. The large sale of Commonweal and big collections show that we gain by helping them to get better pay and shorter hours. Several men have already enrolled themselves members of the labour union we are forming. Reynolds is secretary and Sheppard is treasurer, pro tem.—C. R.

ERRATUM.—In note referring to Glasgow Trades' Demonstration in last week's Commonweal, I inadvertently wrote "1,200 to 1,500" instead of 12,000 to 15,000 as the number of processionists.—J. B. G.

SOMERSET MINERS.—These brave men have now gained a complete victory. The miners held together, but the forces of the masters began to split. One master after another yielded to the demands of the men, and now they have all surrendered, and the men return triumphantly to their work.

San Francisco may be said to come near London for civilisation. The latest news is that it has one criminal for every twenty-three citizens, one saloon for every sixteen voters, 4,000 grog shops, 10,000 courtesans, and, of course, about 40,000 men of equally bad character.

The European despots are bent on suppressing Socialism by imprisoning and exporting the leaders. It is a case of piling more weight on the safety-valve, and some day when the inevitable explosion comes and blows them into the middle of a second edition, enlarged and improved, of the French Revolution, the crowned fools and their fool ministers will blame it on providence, or fate, or the innate depravity of man, or anything but their own mulish stupidity.—Journal of United Labour.

Speaking of the Hungarians in the coke regions the Philadelphia Ledger says: "The companies that have employed them to break the wages of other labourers will probably regret before they are through with them that they ever had anything to do with such dangerous tools." Whereupon the Journal of United Labour retorts: "Yes, it is not unlikely that the companies will understand what chickens coming home to roost means. But what shall we say of the men who have through their unholty greed reduced the 'standard of living among American working-men'—how familiar the old worn-out cant is, to be sure!—so far below the 'standard of the pauper labour of Europe' that even half-civilised Huns rebel rather than submit to it?"

A good meeting at St. Ann's Road also; speakers were Maughan, Crouch, and Lyne, jun.; sale of Weals fair. We held a good meeting at one of the roads leading from Ladbroke Grove Road; speakers were Maughan, Crouch, and Dean. The members of the Colbourne Liberal Club who were present at the meeting, kindly asked us into their lecture room to open a discussion, and we accepted the invitation; we were re-inforced by comrade Davis and Tochatti. The subject chosen for discussion was "Strikes and the Events of the Week." The discussion, however, had more to do with the respective merits of Radicalism and Socialism; Davies, Maughan, and Lyne, jun. took part. At the close of the discussion we challenged them to debate "Radicalism v. Socialism."

SOUTHWARK.—On Sunday morning a good number of comrades, chiefly printers' labourers, gathered at Flat Iron Square; Cores and Holloway spoke (the latter making a very good maiden speech, being only a recent convert); fair sale of Weal, and several gave in their names towards forming a branch in this neighbourhood. We have not secured an indoor meeting-place yet, but expect to shortly.—G. E.

STREATHAM.—At the Fountain on Sunday C. Reynolds spoke on organisation of labour for Streatham, he being convinced in his own mind of the success of the movement by the ready response of the Mitcham labourers. Mr. Bootle also spoke. Good sale of Commonweal—54 for the meeting and Branch—and 2s. 6d. propaganda. Good Branch meeting last Wednesday, at which officers were elected. The labour question will be taken up in a practical manner during the week in Streatham.

GLASGOW.—The Branch is extending its propaganda. On Tuesday evening a meeting was held on Cathedral Square—Joe Burgoyne, Tim Burgoyne, and McKenzie (Edinburgh) being the speakers. On Sunday at 2 o'clock Glasier, Gilbert, and Downie spoke on Jail Square. At 5 o'clock Joe Burgoyne and Gilbert spoke at Paisley Road Toll. At 7 o'clock Gilbert lectured to the Secular Society, where his extreme views roused discussion. During the week comrade Leatham, of Aberdeen, visited Glasgow, and on Wednesday night met a number of members at a social gathering.

EDINBURGH.—On 29th, usual meetings held on Meadows.

MANCHESTER.—A meeting was held at Middleton on Saturday night, when Barton and Baillie spoke. At Philips Park on Sunday morning our meeting was addressed by Baillie. In the afternoon Stockton, Barton, and Baillie spoke to an attentive meeting on Stevenson Square.

NORWICH.—On Sunday afternoon a meeting was held in the Fishmarket, opened by comrade Swash, and followed by Mowbray (London), who delivered a stirring address, and gave an account of the recent strikes in London. Good audience, considering the weather; audience very attentive. In the evening Mowbray lectured in the Gordon Hall to a very fair audience, Lenneying in the chair. Mowbray spoke at some length, especially dealing with the Eight Hours Bill. At the conclusion several questions asked, and discussion followed; comrades W. Moore, Adams, Mills, and others took part. Mowbray replied at some length. 50 Commonweal sold, and 8s. 9d. collected for propaganda.

YARMOUTH.—On Wednesday night, at the Working Men's Club, Headley and Ruffold defended Socialism against capitalism, when one of our opponents gave Jay Gould credit for his excessive brain-power and cunning; but our comrades seemed to be too much for them. On Sunday we had comrade Thomas of Ipswich with us, but we could not hold any out-door meetings, owing to the inclemency of the weather, so we met at comrade Headley's in the afternoon, where we had an enjoyable hour or two in singing revolutionary songs, recitations, and discussing Socialism. 7 Commonweal sold.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, Sept. 28th, A. Shields lectured on "Socialistic Experiments," describing the formation and growth of the various Communistic societies in the Old and New worlds. Hamilton, Wilson, Kavanagh, O'Gorman, King, and others, took part in the discussion.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Meeting in Great Market on Sunday night, Rooke presiding. Proctor and Peacock spoke, the latter dealing with the cotton-corner and the bread ring.—P.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

AN immense noise is being made over an article in the Contemporary of this month, which is said to be by Mr. Gladstone. It is no very wonderful thing in itself, unless it be held as wonderful that a politician can speak the truth; it is merely a statement, by no means too strong or too clear, of the policy which has led Italy, or its bourgeois government, into the toils of the Central League, and a warning, none too outspoken, against the English people's tolerating on the part of Lord Salisbury a revival of the Pitt policy of a century ago. Among the many parallels that exist between the happenings of a hundred years since and those of to-day, there are few more striking than that between the coalition, then and now, of kings and scoundrels against France, the "danger-spot of Europe." Bismarck and Boulanger, Crispi and the Count of Paris, and all the rest of them, are of one mind when the French Republic is in question.

Salisbury, a true "sneaking Cecil," without courage and without ruth, has entered on the path which will lead him, as it led Pitt, into playing catspaw to the crowned apes of the Continent. Seeing this, as all thinking men must see it, Mr. Gladstone has been honest enough to write it and print it, though not bold enough to put his name to it when done. Whereupon all the tongues of Babel are let loose, and the chatters of half Europe have a new sensation. If it really meant anything, one would be pleased to hear and see attention given to the subject; but every one knows right well that if war broke out, the English Government, Whig or Tory, would be on the wrong side, inevitably, and that only the un-governmental and generally unrespectable and un-responsible people would protest against it. And the un-respectable people have very little voice in such matters, which are managed for them by Pecksniff, Podsnap, and the Tite Barnacle family.

Two men who have had much to do with the late strike have given their version of it to the public. Here in interesting contrast stands the Dock Committee:—

AS SEEN BY CARDINAL MANNING.

And I am bound to bear witness not only to the self-command of the men, but also to the measured language and calm courtesy of the employers. They have maintained an attitude of resistance to what they judged to be excessive, or, at least, inconsistent with the grave interest of those for whom they were trustees. Now, happily reconciled, the conduct on both sides gives the surest pledge of peace.

The articles in the current number of the Universal Review, from which the above are taken, should be read by all Socialists who can get hold of them. They tell the story of the strike from entirely dissimilar, even opposite, points of view; and when they are both read, leave upon one's mind an impression difficult to altogether analyse, but deepest in which is the feeling of how tremendously fast and far we have progressed of late years—while hardly knowing that we moved at all. And when it is possible, which it is not yet, to think over the late strike in cool blood and with calm deliberation, there will be many lessons to be drawn from it that have been missed in the heat of the fray.

Not least among these will be the lesson that it is not well to listen to the flying tales which the enemy, within or without our gates, may float on the chance of disuniting us; and the further lesson that however true these tales may seem to be at the moment, there should be a decent amount of delay in acting upon them; that amidst a heated battle is no time for quarrelling in the ranks; that we shouldn't "swap horses in mid-stream," as Lincoln said. A good deal was made while the strike was going on of certain alleged acts of tyranny, treachery to his convictions, etc., etc., on the part of John Burns; that he had denounced Socialists and the red flag, said that they should have no place in "his" processions, and so on. It has now become clear, as the Editors of the Commonweal have all along believed that it would, that these tales were simply—LIES!

Those who originated these reports for campaign purposes, or retailed them in the vain hope of revenge for private injuries, or those weak-headed and hot-tempered persons who too readily believed in and helped to spread them, do not need us to characterise their action. It is enough for us to feel that we were in the right to act as we have done; to wait for evidence, and to weigh it before we spoke, lest we should lightly and without thought condemn one whom we had long known as a good comrade and sincere co-worker in the Cause.

Those who like to buy things which are honestly made and the price of which reaches the worker in much higher proportion than is possible by any other plan while the present system lasts, can get by sending a stamp for it the catalogue of the recent Productive Exhibition at the Crystal Palace. H. E. Ivimey, Secretary of the Labour Association, 1 Norfolk Street, Strand, will send it them, and in it they will find details of the various co-operative societies which exhibited goods there. It is not all mere sentiment that makes it more comfortable to use a co-operative product than a capitalist one. Everything bought of a sweater helps the sweater and injures labour. And every time one avoids the sweater and seeks for some other quality than mere cheapness, a blow, if only a little one, is struck at capitalism.

Besides, the mere effort at getting honestly face to face with the actual producer is good moral medicine, and worth making for one's own soul's sake. The sentiment is a healthy one which makes a coat the more comfortable because you have spent some pains in seeing that the tears and blood of no man have gone to the making of it. It is impossible in so complex a society as that in which we live under the present system to wholly do without the sweater, but it is only the coward, the fool, or the cold-hearted who makes that an excuse for never attempting it. S.

Our politicians have been talking again. As in the whole course of their existence they have never done anything else, perhaps the fact is hardly worth recording. The gentleman engaged in that agreeable occupation on this occasion were Sir William Harcourt and Mr. Labouchere.

It was all the same old tune, the same refrain. Lord Hartington—Mr. Balfour—Mr. Chamberlain—The Wrongs of Ireland—The Wrongs of Ireland—and again, The Wrongs of Ireland. One would think that these honourable gentlemen were as sick of this dismal old ditty as the general public are. But they still grind it out, with the pertinacity with which a persevering organ-grinder pours out a dreary stream of the hackneyed melodies of bygone years. If Sir William Harcourt and Mr. Labouchere were only as weary of their eloquence as their audiences are, the poor gentlemen must be martyrs to the cause of the Great Liberal Party. Only fancy having to give the same worn-out old speech night after night to yawning audiences, who have read it again and again in the columns of the daily press.

Wrongs! Yes, we admit Ireland has wrongs; but, unfortunately for our palavering politicians, Ireland's wrongs are not so much in evidence at the present time as the wrongs of Englishmen. And yet Sir William Harcourt could only find a couple of lines in which to speak of the Labour Revolt at the East-end; and then he was good enough to say that the dockers had acted with "great moderation."

Even this was only dragged in as an illustration of the eternal Irish question, for he pointed out that "the victory was only accomplished by the force of combination, which it is the object of coercion to put down in Ireland." If Sir Vernon Harcourt wishes to ascertain whether you can be coerced in England, let him start a "Plan of Campaign" among the inhabitants of the rack-rented, fever-stricken dens of the East End. It strikes me very forcibly that he would then find that there is the same law in England as there is in Ireland. The experiment would be worth trying, if only to prove this interesting fact, Sir William Harcourt: It was capitalists, and not landlords, who suffered during the late strike, and that makes all the difference with a Tory Government.

It is curious to note that the mention of the London Strike was the last received passage of Sir William Harcourt's speech. In the midst of the two-line reference a stentorian voice called out for three cheers for "John Burns," which was liberally responded to. This at least should give Sir William Harcourt and people of his kidney a much-needed lesson. John Burns at least, whatever may be his faults, has done and suffered for the people; but how many moderate liberals of the William Harcourt type would even run the risk of a crack on the head from a policeman's bludgeon in Trafalgar Square or six weeks in Pentonville? Why, they won't even run such risks for their beloved Ireland, which they can never talk enough about in their involved and musty rhetoric, while a couple of lines suffices for the needs of the London poor. What chance, then, is there of their suffering for the people whom they can hardly mention?

But I forget. Sir William Harcourt did say a little more about the needs of labour. He pointed out what a shameful thing it was that sailors should be drowned at sea in considerable numbers through the avarice of shipowners, who persisted in overloading their vessels. To alter this state of things Sir William Harcourt is anxious that a compulsory load-line should be enforced by Act of Parliament.

I wonder if Sir William Harcourt is a shareholder in one of the dock companies, and is now anxious to pay the philanthropic ship-owner back in his own coin for taking the side of the dockers during the late strike? "When respectable middle-class gentlemen fall out"—you know the rest of the proverb.

Still, there is something about this compulsory load line which I should like to mention. They were discussing this question in Parliament when I was a little boy at school, and I have not the least doubt that, unless the Social Revolution intervenes—or, say the Seamen's Trade Union refuses to allow the men to go to sea in ships that are overloaded—that prominent politicians will still be discussing it when my hair is turning grey. So much for Parliamentary methods for saving the lives of the people.

SOCIALISM AND STRIKES.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE PROPAGANDA COMMITTEE OF THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

COMRADES,—It has been thought advisable at this period of agitation amongst the workers, to say a few words as to the attitude which we of the International Revolutionary Socialist Party should assume towards Strikes and the Labour Struggle generally. Some amongst us would seize every opportunity afforded by labour troubles to organise the hitherto unorganised portion of the workers, to wring even partial concessions in the hope of shorter hours and better pay from their masters, and justify this line of action on the ground that organisation in itself is good and raises the mass; also that it will tend to lead to higher results after the first demands have been won. On the other hand, a number of our comrades are opposed to joining in a demand for palliatives, and assert that such a line of agitation is liable to obscure the higher ideal, viz., the complete overthrow of the wage system, and to cause our speakers to temporise and form questionable alliances for the sake of gaining minor points. And if we review the situation as we find it to-day, after one of the most singular strikes of modern times, there is some ground for the fears of the last-mentioned section.

We have seen a replication of the proletariat and aristocrat even in the proletarian upheaval. The men who did the pioneer propagandist work amongst the masses at the East-end and other parts of the metropolis, did it at a time when the word Socialist meant to subject him to whom it was applied to hatred and execration, and not plaudits. They laid under the folds of the red flag the foundation for that change of ideas and conversion, the first fruits of which was the revolt of labour in East London.

Now we have seen a strange spectacle. A bishop, endowed with thousands per annum, as the exponent of the doctrines of the Nazarene who knew not where to lay his head, a prince of the church of another sect, a chief magistrate of at once the richest and poorest city on earth, suddenly develop an interest in the docker, and the conflict between him and his oppressors is brought to an end. The docker is said to have won, and perhaps he believes it. And still stranger spectacle, a commissioner of police, under whose orders numbers of workmen have been bludgeoned, suddenly withholds his aid to capital and stands on one side; the capitalist press, choking with suppressed rage, half curses the principal figures in the strike for the terrible shock the strike has given them, and the force with which the truth of the axiom, "that labour and not money is the source of all wealth," has been driven home. Their utter impotency in face of this stupendous movement on the part of an hitherto despised class has exasperated them, and yet they can find breath to praise the "moderation", tact, and generalship of the leaders, and singularly enough the police commissioner shares this praise with the "leaders." It is related of a traveller in a strange land, ignorant of both its language and currency, that he detected when he was being robbed by the smiles of those with whom he had to deal. Has there been any smiling in this case? and has it been concealed by a brown sleeve?

It has to be said that the revolutionary Socialists of London, when only a handful of men, and free from the presence of disappointed middle-class parliamentary candidates and would-be candidates, who are now rending the air,—that these men, gathering their inspiration from pure enthusiasm and honest conviction, went into the byways and highways of this huge city and spoke their gospel without fear, established their presses and scattered their literature broadcast; that subsequently, when from a handful they grew into a power, these men, obscure and without ostentation, still exercised a potent influence in the revolutionary movement. Time has wrought many changes in the movement, but a few of the pioneers remain; and I appeal to the young men of our party when I ask: Will they help to push forward by steady and persistent agitation the principles of international revolutionary Socialism, symbolised by the red flag, and by self-education and sacrifice spread them? If so, then I ask them not to allow the results of revolutionary agitation to be turned to account by designing men for the purpose of defeating the revolution. We have seen during the late labour agitation the red flag rigorously excluded from having a place in the processions, and speakers who were likely to draw a moral from the strike in favour of the overthrow of the whole cursed system which breeds the misery of the workers were bidden to stand aside. Why? What is the price of the compact which has caused this exclusion? when and where was it agreed upon, and what are its main purpose and results?

The price of the compact is that the capitalist may be attacked in the towns. Some concessions may be wrung from him, and urban life made tolerable to a larger number than at present. Even Lord R. Churchill is in favour of parish-built barracks, "suitable to the class who would inhabit them"; and why? Because the capitalist, by his overreaching greed, has jeopardised the whole position of privilege and power. He is the hasty clumsy thief who betrays the whole gang, and the landlord portion of the gang are willing that the capitalist shall lose a little that they may not lose all. A section of advanced Tories—for the "old order changeth"—more prescient than the fossils who would still pursue the methods of Castlereagh and Sidmouth, see in the condition of East London and similar districts of our large towns the glimmering light of a social revolution; and they would go the length of making a Jonah of the capitalist to save the ship of State with its aristocratic places and emoluments. And hence we see a group of men who once were under the red flag, hastening to avow their severance from it and its associations, and acting the part of saviours of society amid the plaudits of a corrupt press and class. "To what base uses may we not come, Horatio," when we cheer the bludgeoners of Trafalgar Square!

I wish it to be clearly understood that I am not joining in or echoing the pitiful complaints that have emanated from another quarter upon the same matter. For whilst I have no quarrel with the rank and file of the S.D.F., except for their subservieny and lack of independence, and the ready manner in which they lend themselves to spread the slander of their leader (having had some personal experience of the cowardly unctuous methods by which the machinery of the S.D.F. can be used to spread slanderous tales, headed "Dear comrade" and finished "Yours fraternally"), I do not wonder at the secession of robust men from a circle whose methods of propaganda closely resemble the efforts made by cheap-jacks or the vendors of the latest soap to draw attention to their wares. In their hands the red flag has been associated with schemes of the model dwelling and parish soup kitchen order.

Looking back over the past years, and knowing something of the origin of the "only Socialist organisation in Great Britain," and being fully aware how time and outside educational influences has mellowed and refined the undoubtedly strong Jingo-Tory flavour it once possessed, and knowing also the close connection which existed between one at its head now and another who is supposed to be behind the secessionists, one can only come to the conclusion that a game has been played in which the most astute has won.

Extremes meet, and after all there exists a close connection between the phalansterie and the model industrial dwellings which certain Tory-Democrats would see established, in order to bolster the present system and give it a renewed lease. But every lover of freedom must view with apprehension the remotest possibility of their realisation, and—saying to either "A plague upon both your houses!"—we will pass on to the consideration of the position which, in my opinion, Leaguers should take up in the future. I hold that by organising the disorganised workers, and by strikes and combinations leading them to revolt against their taskmasters, and still on to the Universal Strike that shall put an end to the wage system itself, we are doing distinctly revolutionary work.

Passing from the crowded cities and towns out into the broad fields, amidst the overworked and insufficiently fed agricultural labourers, lays our sphere of action. The peasantry have been made the stepping stones, upon which men like Arch have climbed to St. Stephens. The Liberal and Tory would give a few small patches of land as a sop, the one as an electioneering dodge, the other as a Conservative measure, and basing his calculations upon the known selfishness of a small-er-dowed class, would make them a barrier to the fulfilment of the wider aspirations of the landless, whether of town or country. Our provincial comrades should sally into the villages and fields with the cry of "Back to the Land! The Land for the People!" Our peasantry have sturdy revolutionary traditions, and can be stirred anew to action by earnest, hearty, and breezy watchwords; a vigorous unpromising agitation upon the Irish pattern but with higher aims, the enfranchisement of all, and not, as in Ireland, for a small farmer class, would bear speedy fruit. The urban workman would be freed from the fear of competition on the part of his agricultural comrade, and would be induced to assist him in his efforts towards freedom.

By education, agitation, and organisation, we should then complete the circle closing in upon both landlord and capitalist, and effectually defeat any attempt to avert the Revolution.

F. KITZ.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

During the present election period, the anti-electioneering agitation has been carried on upon a larger scale than ever before. Two placards, Le Père Peinard au Peuple (for September 22nd and October 6th), were spread all over the country; others like Des Anarchistes aux électeurs, A bas la Politique (Down with Politics!), Candidature anti-Anarchiste were published by Parisian groups; Saint Etienne, Bordeaux, Lyon, Marseille, and Carcassonne also had placards of their own. Numerous cases of police brutality against the comrades who pasted them up are recorded; here and there prosecutions will take place on one or another pretext, at Nantes the Père Peinard placard is prosecuted as an outrage on public morals! 130,000 copies of the leaflet, "The Strike of the Voters," were distributed. Revolutionary speakers went to the meetings of candidates, and gave in many cases satisfactory reports on the eagerness with which the people listened to their teachings, being disgusted with the common party politics. Thus the revolutionists are not idle at such times and let them pass by; on the contrary, they are the only party which brings new ideas, a fresh element which makes people think, in the worn-out struggle of bourgeois and pseudo-Socialist office-hunting politicians.

A new Anarchist paper, L'Associazione, is being published at Nice (12, Rue Halévy), beginning Oct. 6th.

SWITZERLAND.

The Social Democratic party, desiring that the creation of the new office of a public prosecutor for political offences should be put to the vote of the people, collected 24,845 signatures in favour of this, amongst them 6,750 in the canton of Zurich, 4,193 in Berne, and 2,036 in St. Gallen. As 30,000 signatures are required the proposition is lost, which was expected beforehand. The party will hold its annual Congress on October 27th, at Bern.

Comrade Janner was wanted by the Swiss authorities to give up the addresses of the Swiss subscribers of the Revolte, a paper not at all prohibited in Switzerland. Of course he refused to do this, and, also of course, the police did not find the addresses on a perquisition made at his house. New arrests have been made at Bâle, Luzern, and Zurich. The Anarchist trial is likely to take place at Neuchâtel.

AUSTRIA.

Twenty miners of Kladno, in Bohemia, were tried two weeks ago at Prague for having taken part in the riots during the strike of last June; fourteen were sentenced to penal servitude for terms varying from 8 to 18 months, and five to hard labour from 5 to 13 months. This is neither the first nor the last of the number of the Kladno trials, for hundreds of persons were arrested at that time.

AMERICA.

The Freiheit announces the impending publication by the committee of the I.W.P.A., of an eight page leaflet on the Chicago martyrs in the English, German, Bohemian, and Yiddish languages. They will be sold at cost price, and the first page being left empty, can be used for the announcements of meetings to celebrate the memory of the 11th of November.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A FEW WORDS BY AN OLD SOCIALIST.

I am pleased to notice the increasing number of attempts now being made at formulating socialistic ideas, and I hope speedily to see some of them at least put to a practical test. In the last speech I ever made on a platform devoted to the spread of Socialism, I complained of the plethora of theoretic ideas, and the entire absence of aught that could be considered to have a practical tendency. I neither am nor was then ignorant of the value of theoretitions, but I then saw and now see the necessity of convincing opponents that we are practical as well as theoretical. I know that I am open to the tu quoque argument, and that it might be asked what have I done to make Socialism practical. Still, it is possible for an ordinary mortal to see a fault, and desire to see it remedied without being able to contribute thereto. Robert Owen tried, and the result was failure, or at least partial failure. New Lanark simply proved that by employing machinery against manual labour, large profits might be made; Harmony Hall, that the men engaged in that experiment still longed for the flesh-pots of the individual system. What is written regarding the latter effort may be said with equal truth of the attempt at Christian Socialism and Co-operation generally. I did not enter into the latter movement from any religious motive, but what I saw convinced me that the Christians and non-Christians had not cut themselves adrift from old world selfishness. My friend, Mr. George Jacob Holyoake, has over and over again lamented the same fact with regard to the co-operative movement. The whole of the attempts to which I have referred were intended to show practically that socialistic theories could be reduced to practice. To that extent they are valuable to me. I must confess that their failure had the effect of impressing me with the belief that little could be done without State aid, and that State aid could only be got from a Parliament selected from widened constituencies, or rather constituencies in which the toilers were in a position to bring their influence to bear. I therefore determined to throw what power I had into the political scale, and for some thirty years at least I have done my best to carry out this resolve. I now hold that it rests with the working classes only to use the power they have obtained wisely, in order to make Socialism a reality. I do not mean to be understood to say that the political position they have attained is perfect, but that it gives them enough power to enable them to give Socialism a fair stage. If I could get a new lease of the health, strength, and ability to work that I once had, I would willingly join any organisation to bring this about; but I am not "a grand old man," and I feel the steel has been taken out of me, though I am hardly entitled to call myself old. Indeed, I know that many men much older than myself are foremost in the good work. While I cannot do as they are doing, may I be permitted to envy them, and, may I add, applaud, as I watch them in my humble garret in Drury Lane. I am not sorry for the decision I made. I feel, justly or unjustly, that the pathway has been cleared of many encumbrances, and that Socialistic progress will be easier; that much has become possible that would have remained impossible if this clearance had not been made. In a few years, if I mistake not, the political revolution will have been effected, and men's minds will be free to work out their social redemption. How it will be brought about I know not, nor whether the right mode has yet been hit upon.

In the many schemes I have recently consulted, or rather taken note of, I see much to admire and much to condemn, and my earnest hope is that their authors and advocates should consult together, and, without prejudice, endeavour to eliminate the most practical and sensible portions of the whole. That land should revert to the people is now very generally agreed upon by all advanced minds; that the private right to mineral stores is no longer tenable, and is in an equally advanced condition for settlement, is also true; ground rents must go, with the private right in land; it is plain also that market-dues will not much longer be tolerated, and the same may be said of house-rents.

I consider these questions to be as good as settled. I would I could see my way as clearly with regard to others. Still, I do not despair of seeing the rest of the unstated monopolies fall. Take away the support of these, the removal of which has been rendered easy, and they are bound to follow, many of them from their own innate rottenness, or from the undermining and underpinning they retain so long as the questions now ripe for settlement remain as they are.

With the franchise as it even now exists the working-classes have only to will. Their will must be an established fact, or they must be content to remain slaves, as most of them are. I came to London in '51, then the City, Finsbury, Westminster, Marylebone, Lambeth, and Southwark returned either Progressive members or advanced Liberals. At that period the franchise lay with the middle-class. Now, the chief power it gives is with the working-class, and what do I find? That the majority of members returned for the metropolis are Tories. If any inference is to be drawn from this, it must be that the working-class have used their enfranchisement to effect their own impoverishment. We who struggled to obtain their political freedom anticipated a far different result, but still hope they will eventually see their error and vote for candidates who see at least the necessity of great social changes.—Respectfully yours, JOHN B. LENO.

One of the most prosperous organisations of women wage-workers in New York City is the Shirtmakers' Assembly, Knights of Labour. It owns and operates a factory in the city which fills orders from all parts of the country. All union shops are carefully guarded so that no non-union workers may creep in.

SOCIALISM AT BRIGHTON.—F. Cooper writes from Brighton and informs us that they are carrying on a steady propaganda with good results. A few days since a debate took place between Comrade Barker and a middle-class politician, in which Barker was completely victorious. A Labour Emancipation League is being formed. A code of rules and manifesto has been drawn up, based on the first principles of Socialism.

CLERKENWELL BRANCH BANNER FUND.—A fund has been started for obtaining a banner for above branch. Members of the branch and sympathisers are kindly asked to send in their subscriptions so as to enable branch to have banner ready for "Chicago and Bloody Sunday Commemoration." The following subscriptions have been received:—R. Turner, 5s.; W. H. Henry, 5s.; C. Seglie, 5s.; S. Presburg, 2s. 6d.; C. Tilley, 2s. 6d.; and John Creaghe, 2s. 6d. All subscriptions should be sent to S. Presburg, Secretary, 13, Farringdon Road, E.C.

IN AUSTRALIA.

THE South Australian Government has promised one of the best sites in Adelaide whereon to build a trades' hall. This has raised the ire of the ultra conservatives, who point out that Church of England authorities were refused a site on which to build a cathedral. Evidently the objectors forget that there are many rival churches in that colony, all on an equal footing, but the S. A. Trades' Council represents the organised workers of the whole of the colony.

In addition to reorganising themselves, the Brisbane tailors have a committee of three hard at work organising the tailoresses, who, though skilled workwomen, only earn from 20s. to 25s., occasionally up to 30s., per week, for about ten hours work daily. It is hardly necessary to remark that no individual employer is responsible for this as competition is keen all round. There are some 140 tailoresses in the city, and most have expressed themselves in favour of a union, to consider which a meeting of them will be called in two or three weeks to be addressed by prominent labour men and some ladies interested in women's work. Tailoresses' organisation has been several times unsuccessfully attempted in Brisbane, but it now bids fair to go through, thanks to the tailors.

It is generally said that the boilermakers and wharf labourers will speedily join the new Labour Federation, which already numbers nearly 2,000 members. Each society affiliated pays 6d. per month per member, of which only 1d. can be used for working expenses, the remaining 5d. going into a reserve fund, which is already of respectable proportions.

The knights of the cleaver are sending round a circular for the purpose of obtaining signatures petitioning the master butchers to grant a weekly half-holiday. Petitions are useful, but if all the men were unionists petitions would be obsolete.

The Day Dawn (Charters Towers) mining strike arose so suddenly and was settled so quickly that there is little to be said about it. The facts are simply that a big syndicate wanted to treat honest miners like serfs and the miners wouldn't have it. The lesson is that the old pick and shovel days are passing and that gold-mining is drifting into the hands of soulless companies, to withstand whose aggression the diggers must close up the ranks and stand together in organisation just like other classes of labour. The Australian Miners' Association should get energetically to work, or the £2 a-week of Mount Morgan will soon be the rule and not the exception.

It is said that one of the causes which led up to the strike was the publication of a report from the Transvaal gold-fields, in which it was stated that the Kaffir miner worked naked and received 75 cents per day. This set one of the directors thinking, and after half a day's labour in figuring out the Australian equivalent for 75 cents he came to the conclusion that miners on the Towers were too independent, and that if they couldn't change the colour of their skins or live on 75 cents he would have them stripped or know the reason why. And it's very probable that his thirst for knowledge will very soon be gratified if the miners only hang together.

Says the Australian Christian World:—

"A WORKINGMAN'S PARADISE.—Queensland is the elysium of the working man. His hours of labour are short and his wages high, and he can generally dictate his own terms to his employer. He is the petted child of the community. Tradesmen cater for him, the Press counsels and backs him, politicians tickle his vanity, and statesmen legislate on his behalf. His interests are watched with keen eyes on all sides."

Now, although perhaps, as a body, men may be a trifle better off here than in Siberia, or Russia, or even England, yet there are hundreds out of work, and the number is steadily increasing. Eight hours work under a midsummer sky is like stoking for old Nick, yet the Australian Christian World calls it "an elysium." Down in a wet mine at 10s. a day is a "Paradise." On the wallaby with hard-headed and wooden-hearted squatters refusing tucker—Paradise. If these be Paradise, then what in the name of the Australian Christian World's burlesque humanity is Sheol? We pause for a reply.

The wharf labourers at Freemantle, W.A., recently formed a union. One firm, the Adelaide S.S. Co., conceded and at once recognised it; but three other firms not only decline to recognise the organisation but have announced that all union men in their employ will be discharged. In retaliation, one body of lumpers have taken the bull by the horns and declined to work with non-unionists. A strike has resulted, which is watched with interest by maritime men down South.

The master printers object to the Government Printing Office. Do the journeymen printers? In the Government office fair wages are paid to fair workmen, and there is no attempt at grinding. In private offices there is necessarily a continual pressure in the direction of cheap labour. This alone should induce workmen to throw their weight in favour of the former, and to insist that any reform should be in the direction of economic administration thereof, and not in restricting government work in order that cut-throat competition should have enlarged scope at the expense of workmen, their wives, and their families.

BOOMERANG.

Brisbane, Queensland, August 3, 1889.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To those who have obtained copies of the Commonwealth through the propagandist work of our comrades, by free distribution in the streets and public conveyances, or by purchase at our outdoor stations, we ask if in agreement with our principles to help the sale of the Commonwealth by ordering it of their newsagents, and sending on to us the names of newsagents willing to sell it; and still better, as our outdoor work must shortly be reduced, by joining the local branches and helping on the work.

THE PROPAGANDA IN SHEFFIELD.—Good meetings held on Sunday at Hill-foot Bridge in the morning, addressed by Bullas, Carnall, Charles, and Mr. Usher; also at Mars Hill, Attercliffe, by Bingham, Smith, and Green; some opposition from a trades-unionist ably met by Bingham. In the afternoon, a good meeting at Rotherham College-yard, addressed by Bullas, Sketchley, Carnall, and Charles. In the evening, another meeting at Rotherham, addressed by Fox, Charles, and Carnall; and we finished up with a fine meeting at the Westbar later on, addressed by Charles, Sketchley, and Bullas. Commonwealth and Freedom sold out, and other literature sold well. Collected during the day £2 0s. 7d. for local strike fund in aid of fibre-drawers at S. Laycock and Sons. We have further meetings at Dove and Partridge Assembly Rooms on Tuesday night; and at Temperance Hall, on "Housing of the Poor," at which Rev. C. Peach speaks for us, on Wednesday; also another meeting on behalf of strikers at Hallamshire Hall.

IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

DESPITE the cablegram of Mr. G. Kynoch, M.P., of January last, there is little in the way of inducement to tradesmen to emigrate to South Africa. Of gold-miners there is more than enough; this is admitted even by officials of gold mines, managers of companies, and others. As Mr. Kynoch happens to be a large shareholder in several companies, whose interest it is to have more labourers on the spot than there is labour for, perhaps that will explain his cablegram. There is just now no demand whatever for miners or engineers, and but a very slight demand for carpenters, masons, bricklayers, etc. In fairness, however, let me say that the curse of enforced idleness is not so much to be dreaded here as in Britain. All the same, unskilled labourers ought not to come to South Africa. Native labour is so cheap, that white labourers have no chance whatever. There is an ever-increasing number of white men appearing as prisoners before the "Landrost" daily. A few days ago (27th August) eight of these were charged with vagrancy, and were told "that if they did not procure work before morning the police would arrest them and they would be ousted out of the town." What chance a white labourer can have of procuring employment "before morning" can be better imagined than described, when one reads the following advertisement in the same paper, the Diggers' News: "KAFFIRS.—The undersigned begs to inform the public that he is prepared to supply Kaffirs. For particulars apply to J. C. Tomlin, Orange Free State"; or when, further on, one again reads that "Mama Letseia, Basuto chief, was charged with breaking a contract for the delivery of native employes, and has made tracks for his native land. The gentleman who entered into a contract with Mama for the delivery of a number of Kaffirs on the Rand has suffered severely financially." The particulars of this case are as follow: The gentleman referred to above, or his agent, had gone into Basutoland and made overtures to the chief to induce him to send 160 or 200 of his tribe to work in the gold mines, offering him by way of inducement a bribe of 25s. per week per man supplied. I suppose Mr. Bradlaugh would call this "free contract"! However, the bribe was more than the chief was proof against, and about 160 natives were ordered to Johannesburg, where they were to work for three months at 25s. per week. On arriving here, the Jumpers Company—an appropriate name!—refused to pay them more than 15s. per week. Result: Mama refused to allow his men to work for less money than what had been promised them in Basutoland. Result again, that Mama was arrested—I suppose for intimidation—and lodged in prison. On coming out—he had promised compliance—he at once made tracks for Basutoland, no doubt impressed with the "honour and integrity" of gold-company officials and British capitalists in general. That the companies get natives to labour for them after the knowledge has got abroad of the treatment to which they, the natives, are subjected, is a wonder, and can only be explained by the fact that the natives are for the time slaves to their masters, the shareholders and mincowners, who are pleased to condone this form of slavery, since it increases their dividends considerably.

Speaking of the treatment of the native slaves employed in the mines, I read in the same paper, Diggers' News, that the contractor for Boksburg Tramway admits that hundreds of natives die on their works and are buried without certificate of death." The opening-up of Matabeleland by the "Rhodes Matabele Syndicate" is giving rise to a deal of talk just now amongst diggers and Boers also, who make no secret that, despite the granting of the special charter by the British Government, they will refuse to admit the claim of the syndicate; and one speaker at a large meeting earned a round of applause by declaring—"Gentlemen, when the spoil falls to be divided, we will be there too!" As it is, the poor Matabeles are between the devil and the deep sea. Their country is likely to be torn from them by the Rudd-Rhodes Company on the one hand, and the individual gold-diggers on the other, who appear to be fully determined to "jump" the claims of the syndicate and "rush" the company as soon as ever the weather will admit of them "treking" that way. A Pretoria paper, the Press, edited by Baron Glückstein, in commenting on the Rhodes Matabele matter, says that colonisation of this kind and spoliation are synonymous terms—which is pretty true, as things go. Sir Gordon Sprigg and Sir Sydney Shippard are both freely blamed for having helped the Rhodes Syndicate to smuggle a thousand stand of rifles into the country, which are presumably for use in "opening up" Matabeleland. But what could poor Sir Gordon or Sir Sydney either do against a company whose chairman is the Prince of Wales's son-in-law, and of which the directorate is made up of earls and lords? No, no; these men know their work too well to refuse such a powerful and influential band of robbers anything they might require to "open-up" the country of the Matabeles. If the news just to hand from Matabeleland is correct, then more than the country will run a risk of "opening-up." It seems that Lobengulu's Impis—fighting regiments—are beyond the chief's control, and are now driving the white men, a number of whom they have "opened-up," out of the country, believing—and very naturally too—that when the Rudd Rhodes Company comes in they must go out, and they don't seem to relish the idea of an enforced "trek" across the Zambesi. However, a few months more will see a move being made into Matabeleland, and then—Another extract from the advertisement column and I have done. In a sale of building plots in one of the townships round Johannesburg, the auctioneer says: "It is admitted on all sides that Johannesburg is fast growing into a second London, and as a matter of course all those business men who have made or are making their fortunes will seek a picturesque spot where, after the toils of business, they may enjoy the quiet retirement of repose amongst their family." To men such as these "Heights Township offers every inducement; a water supply is arranged for; trees are being planted in the streets; and the company winds up by saying that they will at once proceed to build English and Baptist churches, and that plans for the erection of a splendid hotel are being drawn up. Nothing, however, about the poor devil of a Kaffir or white labourer being able to seek the "quiet retirement of repose amongst their family." No! a slum is good enough, in the "second London" as in the first, for the workman. Let him say nothing, but slink into it, and all will be well.

Cape Town, Sept. 4, 1889.

JAMES BAIN.

If we are set in earnest on escaping from delusions and sins, we cannot afford to wait for the multitude. If we would walk with clean steps we must gird ourselves for a solitary march. The world's mightiest tasks of reformation and regeneration have to be wrought out when lookers-on refuse their friendship, and the workers in them stand misunderstood, misinterpreted, reviled, persecuted, alone.—Huntington.

MARGUERITE.

TO MY DAUGHTER, M. P.

TURNED five, yet unbaptised is Marguerite—
The little Pagan! When she wakes she cries
With a glad bird-chirp, "Good-day, bright sunrise!"
And with fresh lips straight falls to kissing it.

That's all her prayer: what credo were more fit?
She loves the dew-filled flowers, red flames of skies,
A cloud for hours will fix her wondering eyes;
She loves thy flag, Commune, the fire-lit!

She keeps no Sabbath, but in the church-hour
Watches the young buds breaking into flower;
Nature that talks with her teaches her wit.

She sees a meaning in all things: we give Her a spring-cabbage crinkled: "It doth live
And laugh!" she cries; "Look, father! doesn't it?"

EUGENE POTTIER, translated by LAURA LAFARGUE.

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

READERS of our capitalist newspapers might imagine that the present time was a remarkably quiet one, and that the labour troubles were subsiding at last. A glance at the columns of the Star is, however, enough to disabuse anyone duped by the silence of such papers as the Daily News, which is evidently anxious to frighten its middle-class subscribers as little as possible. The air is electric; we feel that fresh storms are gathering and that struggles are impending to which even the revolt of the dockers will be a mere skirmish. One of the most eloquent signs of the coming storm is the fact that the gas-stokers, the coal-porters, the sailors and firemen, are going to federate their unions all over England. In this alliance they hope to get the miners and railway-men to join, so they will be able to control the whole coal supply, and thus put a rope round the neck of every sweating capitalist in this free and happy land. Michael Henry is the author of this scheme, which seems not only practical, but one admirably calculated, if carried out and carried into action, to realise Mr. Norwood's vision. We only hope the miners and the railway-men will join as heartily in the scheme as the other trades have done.

The tramway-men held a big meeting in the Memorial Hall on Saturday morning, October 5th. On this occasion they were enabled to rejoice in the presence of a noble lord in the chair. It must, however, in fairness be said that Lord Rosebery made a much better and more manly speech than what these unfortunate slaves usually hear from the middle and upper class politicians. He was right, too, in telling the men that an alteration of these evils can only come from their own action. It is quite certain that if they wait for that grandmotherly body the County Council, now so busy in "purifying" our public amusements and otherwise caring for our morality, to help them they will wait a long while. The County Council is too busy carrying out the dictates of Mrs. Grundy, and providing one of its most "honoured" friends with an easy and well-paid job at the public expense, to trouble about workmen who slave for sixteen and eighteen hours a-day at a starvation pittance.

The Silvertown strike still continues. The firm of Messrs. Silver and Co., which pays its men 3½d. and 4½d. an hour, can yet afford to pay 17 per cent. dividends to rich idlers like Lord Salisbury, Mr. Haldane, M.P., Lady Hobhouse, and pious clergymen like the Reverends Davis and Frost. Here we have Tories, Radicals, and the Church all equally concerned in sweating the people. This is all they have ever done for the masses, and all they ever will do. The only care of Tory peer, Radical M.P., and clergyman for the people is to rob them as much as possible; and it is time the people stopped their little game.

We are glad to see that our friends the tailors have realised most of their moderate demands. They have fought their strike gallantly, with few friends and but little money at their back, and we are only sorry that they have not reaped a greater reward.

Norwood is angry.

Mr. Norwood's recent speech to his unhappy shareholders upon the labour revolt is amusing. It is quite evident that the good gentleman has quite lost his temper, and his harmless ferocity is almost as funny as the agonising attempts of an old hound to bite who has lost his teeth, or the impotent malice of some paralysed old harridan, who can only vent her fury in frenzied curses, which supply little boys and other bystanders with innocent amusement.

I fear, however, that the leaders of the strikers must be very sorry that they let Norwood off so easily, for from his own statement it is evident that he was in a very tight place indeed. On one side there was Cardinal Manning, who poured into Norwood's unwilling ear fearful rumours of impending riot and insurrection; while on the other the Lord Mayor had a no less alarming announcement as to the sums of money that were pouring in from Australia, and intimating, moreover, that he might feel himself compelled to open a Mansion House fund, and that very strong pressure was being brought to bear upon him, which he could not long resist, to call a meeting at the Mansion House. This was very bad for Norwood, and very good for the Strike Committee; but what under these circumstances do these "friends" of the dockers, the Lord Mayor and Cardinal Manning, do? Why, they endeavour to get the leaders to agree to an impossible compromise, by which the men would have to wait for the tanner till January; and when this is rejected, they try to turn public sympathy from the men by denouncing them in a manifesto, and by making speeches in which they say they are "unreasonable." The wonder is that the leaders of the men accepted any further compromise from these players of Mr. Norwood's "game." Cardinal Manning and the Lord Mayor deliberately lent themselves to an attempt to turn away public sympathy from the strikers, and thus starve them into submission; and yet after these proofs of jesuitical treachery, the leaders of the strike accepted their proposal of a fresh "compromise." It is not easy to understand the "wisdom" of this action.

But even the partial victory of the dockers fills Mr. Norwood with alarm, not as to the future of the dock companies, for they intend to raise their rates, so that for every penny gained by the dockers they will put 2½d. into their own pockets; but Mr. Norwood as a shrewd business man and a typical capitalist dreads the effect which this strike may have upon the minds of the workers in other poorly paid occupations. But here are his own words:

"The successes, such as they are, of the recent strike will of necessity result, as they have already done, in further labour disturbances. If the lowest form of unskilled labour, such as the casual docker (of whom no questions are asked as to character or education, and of whom brute-force is the only qualification), is to be remunerated at the rate of 6d. per hour, is it likely that skilled men will long be content? Will the Post-Office employé, the railway servant, and the police constable be long satisfied with their position? . . . Mr. Burns has shown us how the maritime trade of the port can, in a few days, become paralysed. A little more picketing, with its attendant intimidation and violence, and every railway out of London would be stopped, the city plunged in darkness, the food supply arrested, and the metropolis compelled to submit, for the time at least, to any conditions that the strikers might impose upon it. This may be thought a fancy picture, but I venture to assert that it is well within the reach of possibility, unless steps are taken, and that promptly, to confront the extreme pretensions of labour."

Here is a pretty picture; and after Mr. Norwood has shown the people what they could do in London if they wanted an eight hour labour day, or the expropriation of capitalists, or Mr. Norwood's head—though that would not be much use to them—or any other little trifle of that sort, they have only to stop every railway, plunge London in darkness, and stop the food supply, and the thing is done. Thanks, Mr. Norwood, for teaching the people their own power.

Scottish Bakers.

The bakers in Scotland have determined not to begin work before 5 a.m., and to leave off at 4 p.m. They are likely to succeed. The masters in Kilsyth, Helensburgh, and a large number of other country towns, have already submitted to the men's demands. The society is strong all throughout Scotland. At a meeting held in the Albion Halls, Glasgow, Oct. 2, the secretary drew attention to the sudden interest that was being taken by the masters, and remarked it was a pity they had been so long in discovering the grievances the men had so long suffered from. He did not deny that they had made a wonderful offer, but he hoped the men understood why it was made. It was because of the Federal Union. Other speeches were delivered on the importance of standing by each other and rejecting all insidious offers, which, they were afraid, would not be kept. It was unanimously resolved to support the society, and that the men hand in their demand for a uniform morning hour, and if not granted they would strike on the 12th inst. A large number of men joined the society after the meeting was over.

Lanarkshire Miners.

Things are looking more hopeful in this district, and it is the key of the mining industry in Scotland. The cause of the men has been somewhat weakened ever since the last strike by some "snakes in the grass," who were anxious to wound the secretary, Mr. Small. The state of affairs has been a constant cause of grief to the real friends of the miners, who knew the spirit of the attack on Mr. Small and his thorough genuineness and fearless self-sacrifice, even to positive suffering, in the miners' interests. But it was ever thus. If he had looked to his own position, like our Weirs and Robertsons, and less to the miners', probably they would have dealt more kindly with him. Motherwell was the seat of the conspirators, but at a mass meeting held there on Oct. 2, after hearing Mr. Small, a vote of confidence was passed.

Clyde Steelworkers.

On the banks of the Clyde there is a steelworks noted for the lowness of its wages as compared with others in the district, which from its beginning has been a non-union sweating hell. Lately fifty of the workers joined the society, and when the boss heard of it thirteen of them were warned away as a terrifier. But the terror has struck the proper parties this time. Instead of thirteen men leaving off making money for sweaters, 120 went out on strike. The masters have been unsuccessful in getting other men to fill their places, and the middlemen or sweaters and clerks have tried their hands at making steel. The sweaters are more successful with steel than steel. This kid-glove competition with labour's claims is becoming frequent and comic. We, as Socialists, can appreciate the cruel competition that compels the poor clerk to that which neither his hand nor his heart is in with, and also the "principle" that in such emergencies compels the masher master to work side by side with the returned convict, as was the case at Glasgow Docks. We can sympathise with the clerks and rejoice at the fitness of things as exemplified in the masters' position. The workmen in this instance are determined to get rid of the middlemen or sweaters.

Clyde Riggers.

The Clyde riggers have agreed to form a union. Though a skilled trade, they have at present less wages than the dock labourers. By all means the workers in all trades should unite. "In union there is strength." But it should never be overlooked that this regulation of wages can never permanently benefit the workers. Their unions can never be so solid as the individual masters, and so long as the latter are permitted to hold the key of the position in their hands, in the name of capital, the workers will be forced to contribute their tribute, notwithstanding all their unions. The aim and goal of unions should be other than the regulation of wages; it should not only try to sweep away the middleman, it should sweep away every robber of labour, no matter what he may be called.

Wire Weavers' Strike at Norwich.

On Monday, Sept. 30, the wire weavers employed at Messrs. Barnard and Bishop's turned out on strike, to protest against a code of rules in force on the firm, and in consequence of one of the men being fined 2s. 6d., besides the loss of his wages, for being absent one night the previous week. The following rules the men complain of:—(1) That any wire weaver not being at work at 6.30 a.m. shall be fined 1s. for each offence; (2) Any weaver not being at work by 6.30 a.m. without letting his foreman know, will be fined 2s. 6d. for each offence; (3) Any weaver destroying these rules will be fined

10s. If the offender is not found the whole of the weavers will be subjected to the fine.

The men made the following request of the firm:—(1) The rules relating to fines be abolished; (2) That workmen be allowed to leave the premises day or night if their machines break down, or when from any cause they cannot work; (3) That a night watchman be employed, who shall have instructions to let men out who cannot work in consequence of the breakdown of the machinery, accident, or ill-health.

On Tuesday twenty-six of the boys employed turned out, making a total on strike of 72. The strikers declared at a meeting that their average wages the whole year did not exceed 12s. per week. Some of the men gave an account of being on night work, were locked in and could not get out. One stated his machine had broken down twice in one night, and enabled him to earn only a shilling that night; another earned 11½d. in two nights, working 24 hours. During the week several deputations waited on the heads of the firm, but it was of no avail. On Saturday a compromise was entered into with the workmen and the firm, the firm agreeing to accept the following terms, which were agreed to by the men:—(1) That the rules relating to fines for non-attendance be abolished, and that all workmen and boys return under the previous existing rules on Monday morning next; (2) That sufficient provision be made whereby men on night work may leave the works, in case they cannot work, either from breakdown in machinery, accident, or illness; (3) That any workman habitually absenting himself from work without giving proper notice to the foreman, without reasonable cause, shall be dismissed from the works; (4) That any workman habitually losing time without reasonable cause shall be dismissed from the works.

The men have announced a meeting for the purpose of forming a union.

SOCIALISM IN EDINBURGH.—The Edinburgh branches of the S. L. and S. D. F. have amalgamated and formed a strong local branch of the Scottish Socialist Federation. They announce a good series of lectures at the Moulders' Hall for the winter months, our comrade Bruce Glasier beginning the series last Sunday. The Scottish Socialist Federation have issued a statement of principles, the spirit of which may be seen in the concluding paragraph:

"The Scottish Socialist Federation, being convinced of the truth of the foregoing propositions, aims at the realisation of Socialism, and to that end expects its members to spread the principles of Socialism among the people, and to acknowledge Truth, Justice, and Morality as the basis of their behaviour among themselves and towards all their fellow-men, without regard to colour, creed, or nationality. The Federation regards it as the duty of a man to demand the rights of a man and citizen, not only for himself, but also for everyone who does his duty. No rights without duties, no duties without rights."

We wish our comrades every success in their work.

WORK AND WAGES IN WYOMING, U.S.A.—A correspondent writing from Rock Springs, Wyoming, in the Journal of United Labour of August 29, says: Work is rather brisk here at present, both in the building trade and the coal mines; but I would not advise anyone to come here, as there is no scarcity of men. The price paid for mining coal is 70 and 75 cents per ton, but it takes 2,988 pounds to make a ton. Take 2,988 and subtract a quarter off it for slack, which means 747 pounds, and you have just one pound over a ton, or 2,241 pounds. There is a mine here with an eleven-foot vein, and it is paid for at the rate of 70 cents per ton; another vein only four and a half feet, and it is dug at the same price, and it is under the same company. There was a little trouble here a few weeks ago. The company is engaged sinking a shaft and they struck water in it, and the men who were working in it asked for an advance of 25 cents a-day in addition to their wages, 2 dols. 75 cents. The superintendent discharged them and put Finlanders in their places. Wages are as follows: Carpenters, 3 dols. to 3 dols. 50 cents; plasterers, 5 dols.; labourers, 2 dols. to 2 dols. 50 cents; miners, 70 to 75 cents per ton; drivers, 2 dols. 50 cents; Chinese, 1 dol. 35 cents to 1 dol. 75 cents. Board costs from 22 dols. to as high as 40 dols. per month.

MR. GRANT ALLEN has made in the current number of the Fortnightly a bold attempt to grapple with what he frankly calls "The Woman Question" from a physiological standpoint. Here are the summarised heads of his argument:—(1) That for the perpetuation of the race, or nation, it is imperative that the great majority of women should become mothers; (2) that in "the ideal community" the duties of motherhood should be distributed among the greatest possible number of women, both for the sake of the mothers themselves and "in order that the average family may be kept small, that is to say, healthy and educable"; (3) that for the proper performance of the duties of motherhood, the mothers must be supported by the men; (4) that female education should, therefore, be primarily directed towards producing wise, healthy, and noble mothers, and not to producing self-supporting spinsters fit to compete with men in the battle of life. The conclusion is that "the highest women's movement" must have for its object the elevation, development, emancipation of—the wife. Mr. Grant Allen appeals to "advanced women" to meet advanced men on the platform which he has constructed, but at the same time he points out that—

"As a matter of fact, few women will go as far in their desire to emancipate woman as many men will go. It was Ibsen, not Mrs. Ibsen, who wrote the 'Doll's House.' It was women, not men, who ostracised George Eliot. The slavishness begotten in women by the régime of man is what we have most to fight against, not the slave-driving instinct of the men, now happily becoming obsolete, or even changing into a sincere desire to do equal justice."

In justice it should be added that he is tender enough towards the self-supporting spinster as we have her at present. She is to be recognised as a solemn fact—one of the unfortunate products of imperfect social conditions:—

"We ought for the moment to make things as easy and smooth as possible for her; we ought to remove all professional barriers, to break down the absurd jealousies and prejudices of men; to give her fair play, and if possible a little more than fair play, in the struggle for existence. . . . But we ought at the same time fully to recognise that she is an abnormality, not the woman of the future. We ought not to erect into an ideal what is in reality a painful necessity of the present transitional age."

ST. GEORGE'S, EAST.—A good meeting was held on Mile End Waste on Tuesday, addressed by Leech and Turner; good sale of literature. At a members' meeting on Wednesday we had a whip round for comrade Leggett, who has been out of work some weeks on account of striking; a benefit is mooted on his behalf. No meeting held on Mile End Waste on Saturday, as comrades did not turn up, although members were there with platform and 'Weal.' On Sunday two meetings were held instead of one, Leech, Turner, and Nicoll speaking at Union Street, Leggett and Nicoll at Philippot Street; good sale of 'Weal.' More help wanted on the Waste Tuesdays and Saturdays.

LEICESTER.—Saturday, Sept. 29, Maguire, of Leeds, addressed the Loughborough people; good audience; O'Sullivan took the chair. On the 30th Maguire addressed three meetings, the first being at the Radical Club, Vine Street, the lecture-room of which has been thrown open to the public, we taking the collection. On Sunday, Oct. 6, W. A. Chambers gave us three addresses. At the Radical Club they turned up in force, and cheered the sentiments and proposals of the speakers; at night, in Humberstone Gate, had an audience of 500. A resolution was carried unanimously condemning the Leicester Town Council's rejection of a resolution proposed by one of the Trade Union leaders on council, that no contracts should be given to men who were not willing to pay a "fair" wage. NORWICH.—On Sunday afternoon comrade W. Moore addressed a very fair audience in the Market Place; in the evening at the Gordon Hall. A general discussion upon Socialism; several comrades took part.

YARMOUTH.—Last Sunday morning, on Priory Plain, we had a very good muster to hear Mrs. Schack, when comrade Headley read two letters which he had received from her, stating that she was unable to attend owing to ill-health, but that she would come as soon as she was strong enough to do so. In the evening, at Colman's Grainery Quay, we had another good meeting, comrades Ruffold, Hadley, and Brightwell being the speakers; 18 Commonweals sold, 8d. collected for local propaganda.—J. H.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THERE seems to be a risk of the London County Council making a huge blunder, which it certainly will do if it approves the report of its Licensing Committee. That committee proposes in the first place that the Council shall act as a censor of morals as to the matter of what is said or sung in the Music Halls, and it is impossible for them to fulfil this function except on the old reactionary lines. Granted that the songs provided by the music halls are often coarse and often nasty, who is to gauge the degree of coarseness and nastiness which shall be enough to deprive a hall of its licence? Whose standard is to be applied? That of a Scotch goody-goody, a fanatical Salvationist editor of a commercial sensational journal, or that of a sensible man?

But no sensible man will have anything to do with such nonsense as trying to make people moral by Act, either of Parliament or of County Council. The standard, therefore, will be the standard of "purity" fanatics, who will be backed up by politicians anxious to catch the votes of the very powerful Nonconformist Liberals.

And all the time they will let alone the nastiness and double entendre of the respectable theatres, which are every bit as bad as the coarseness of the music halls.

It won't do. As a people is, so are its entertainments, and both the music halls and the theatres are but a reflex of the life of the slums. To that must you play down, gentlemen and ladies of the stage, or your managers will not be able to fill their houses, and your salaries will tumble down. Given a society corrupted by the existence of general misery, and founded on sheer robbery of the disinherited, and what are its theatrical entertainments likely to be? At the best, corruption whitewashed with respectability; at the worst?—but can there be anything worse than that?

As to the other side of this moral outburst of the over-righteous of the London County Council, the shutting up of a place of entertainment because it shelters prostitutes; that is worse still. You want to turn these poor women out into the streets, and when they are in the streets you want to run them in for being there. And all the while you know perfectly well that they are just as necessary an institution of modern Society as the banker who looks after the money that pays them, or the policeman who runs them in.

In short, this is an attack on the public by the Puritans, and it will be a thousand pities if the London County Council allows them to jump into the saddle and so injure its possible usefulness. And it is grievous to think how much power this Puritanism still has. Although it has sunk from a destructive fanaticism into a slimy superstition, it is still a dangerous ally of the gigantic robbery of capitalism, which first gave it birth. Such a body of voters as it can bring to the polling places!

The Bishop of London in the chair of the St. James's Hall meeting, gave a clear expression of its arbitrariness in refusing to allow our friend Headlam to move an amendment or to speak. His conception of a public meeting as a place where only one side is to be heard is refreshingly naïve, and really beats Bradlaugh.

Certainly it would be a preposterous blunder of the London County Council to jump at the office of a subsidiary Lord Chamberlain, and carry out his antiquated rules with extra zeal, even to the shutting up of the unprivileged small dramatic entertainments with (naturally) the full concurrence of Mr. Augustus Harris.

The "Turkish Atrocities" in Crete and Armenia are such an obviously good card for the Liberal party to play, that one cannot help feeling some suspicion on the subject. Such things, however, are the natural outcome of a dominant race with a population of workers under them, whether they be peasants or what not. We shall be less likely to question the substantial truth of these reports when we remember English "atrocities" in Ireland, India, Jamaica, Egypt, and other places where that blameless, religious, and practical race has been dominant.

Certainly two wrongs do not make a right, and we should be heartily glad to hear of the Cretans and Armenians rising against their tyrants, especially if that could be done without furnishing them with a fresh set of tyrants in the form of westernised, stock-jobbers subservient to the world-market, as I fear it could not. But we must not forget meanwhile that these "atrocities" are nothing more than the form which exploitation takes in rough societies; and that our own workers forced to live (?) in slums, to work in the factory hell, to have to enjoy bad beer and a low music hall as their share of the comforts and luxuries of civilisation, can show "atrocities" in competition with Crete, Armenia—or Hell, and that their case is a pretty considerable "disgrace to Europe," as the newspaper posters were phrasing it the other day.

For again let us remember that while the "atrocities" in Crete are spasmodic, the atrocities in England are chronic: they are always going on day after day, though we sometimes sprinkle a little rose-water on them in the hope (?) of a remedy. The very fact that the Cretan peasants can raise such a clamour over their sufferings shows that they have a well-grounded hope of their ceasing. What hope can our slum-dwellers have of curing their sufferings? Only those of them can have formed a hope who, dimly it may be, see the Social Revolution advancing.

To think that there are people in England by the hundred thousand who cannot hope for happiness because they have had no opportunity of forming an idea of what happiness is! Yet this is the foundation on which our modern society rests.

W. M.

By an unaccountable slip last week, I attributed the strike articles by Cardinal Manning and John Burns to the Universal instead of to the New Review, in which they really appear. The blunder is all the greater, as I might have remembered that I had bought the New Review (at 6d.), whereas I should have borrowed the Universal (at 2s. 6d.).

The Arts and Crafts Exhibition is open again, and might be used as a propagandist weapon with great effect. To take a doubting friend and show him what Socialists can do might induce him to hear with more attention what they have to say. And you will find plenty of Socialist work there; not alone of Morris and Crane and Emery Walker, and so on, but of men and women less heard of and comparatively unknown. An announcement of the forthcoming lectures will be found elsewhere.

Critics of all kinds have had a try at judging it, of course, and, equally of course, have for the most part failed miserably in rendering any coherent verdict upon either its merits or its meaning. But with one exception they have been studiously fair; the exception being Mr. — well! the "Artist Unknown" of the Star, who is neither an artist nor unknown, as I have had occasion to say before. And he, like the capitalist who listens to a Socialist, and knows that if the people hearken his occupation will be gone, and for just the same reason, indulged in a tirade of reactionary abuse. Against which may be placed the "plain man's" opinion expressed in its favour by Mr. Grant Allen in the Pall Mall. The fact of the matter being that on its own lines the Arts and Crafts Society is doing right good revolutionary work, to the great anger and disquietude of the quacks and exploiters of the present reign of sham.

Apropos of the schoolboy strikes which are taking place "all over the shop," we have received several very interesting letters, notably one from a Leith comrade, which we can only regret that space forbids our printing in full. The points they chiefly emphasise are the parallelism with the French Revolution times, the value of a real strike of school-children, backed by their parents, as a means of bringing about free education, free meals, etc., and the hopefulness of the fact that the "rising generation" are learning to regard themselves as citizens with rights and duties of their own.

None of our correspondents point out, however, the real point of the whole affair, that it is only another phase of the ever-recurring social problem. It is the children of the poor who feel the pressure of the present system so bitterly that they revolt; it is the children of the poor, because they are poor, who are overworked, underfed, ill-treated generally; a juvenile edition of the labour-struggle, a fit preparation indeed for the "battle of life" they will presently be compelled to wage.

Mr. Campbell White, a millionaire chemical manufacturer and an eminently practical Christian, by some recent utterances called forth the following from the Glasgow Bailie:

"When Mr. Campbell White is denouncing the railway companies for Sunday labour, it is to be hoped that he will give the chemical manufacturers 'a bite skite in the bye-gaun.' The poor wretches employed in chemical works are obliged to inhale poison on the day of rest that millionaires may be made. Their life is miserable, but by the blessed law of compensation it is short. Over the gates of such works, with a little addition, the terrible line of Dante should be inscribed—'Of health and all hope abandon ye who enter here.'"

At Dumbarton the other Sunday the Rev. Scott Matheson spoke at the High Street U.P. Church on Socialism, taking as his text the words (Isaiah lxii., 10), "Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highways; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people." Although it was on a Sunday and in a Scotch kirk, the congregation had much ado to keep from applauding. The lecture was well reported in the local papers. S.

Could the gospel of sham be better illustrated? The Regent Square pulpit has turned out to be made of stucco, and the disappointment of the London antiquarian Scot, who dreamed of preserving a bit of the "fine old carved oak" of Edward Irvine's pulpit, is all too deep for sneers! Oh! poor Scot, whose days are spent in the southern "big smoke," and who for years has looked upon that shoddy shrine in Regent Square as being made of the grand old oak but now find it to be made of stucco, may it not dawn upon your mental vision that even in that worship which went forth from the stucco pulpit things were not what they seemed? What would Carlyle have thought and said of his friend's pulpit? What does John McNeil say? Be it his so to speak and act that when his workmanship comes to be taken down and examined, it may be found what it professed to be, viz., a living message for here and now, a present gospel to the workers, and not something made of show and—stucco. PEASANT PROPRIETORSHIP.

THERE are many persons in England who advocate a system of peasant proprietorship in order to dispense with the evils which landlordism has created. This system, if adopted, would prove as injurious to the people as the present; for it would bring into existence a greater number of landowners than there are to-day. Were we to substitute peasant proprietorship in the place of landlordism, we should have the same difficulties to contend with in years to come as we are struggling against at present. It would be as well to allow the present monopolists to retain possession of the soil as to divide it between a greater number of small landowners. This is what peasant proprietorship means; and instead of destroying the evils created by landlordism, they would remain, but a greater number of owners held responsible for them. If those who cultivate the land are not entitled to the full value of the labour employed upon it, who are? Would the agricultural labourers under a system of peasant proprietorship enjoy to the fullest extent the product of their labour? Certainly not, for the proprietors would be in a position to take from them a certain proportion of the wealth produced by their combined labour. The proprietor would employ labourers to cultivate the soil on condition that he pays them a certain price for their labour, whilst at the same time the proprietor would be entitled to all the profits arising from between the articles sold and the salary he paid his employes. This course is almost similar to what the present landowners insist upon the agricultural labourers adopting under present social conditions. Look at peasant proprietorship in this light. Suppose a proprietor owns one hundred acres of land; he employs at the least ten men; each receive a weekly wage of twenty shillings all the year round. At the expiration of twelve months the proprietor discovers that he has saved sufficient money to purchase somewhere about an additional ten acres, which in addition to his first plot numbers one hundred and ten acres. Having this extra land, he finds it necessary to engage another man, paying him the same wages as the others. At the end of the next year, the proprietor finds out that he is in a position to purchase another plot of land; he does so, and employs another labourer. This goes on year after year, until the peasant proprietor can turn himself from a small landowner into a large one, through being allowed to purchase land out of the money extracted from those labourers whom the proprietor employs to cultivate his lands. Thus we see that instead of peasant proprietorship doing away with the evils of landlordism, it will only foster them; for the proprietor is at liberty to employ labourers and insist upon taking from them a portion of what they produce.

Were this system established in the United Kingdom it would prove as injurious to our rural population as the same system has proved detrimental to the rural inhabitants of France. When the proprietors have saved enormous wealth out of the agricultural labourers, they would introduce new machines; displace a great number of labourers; and put into their own pockets the money which ought to be used for purchasing food, clothes, and suchlike for the individuals discharged through the introduction of machinery. Machinery under this system does the same thing as machinery in the workshops and factories—throws people out of employment. Therefore, instead of peasant proprietorship being the means of creating comfort and happiness for our rural community, it would be the means of allowing a greater number of landowners to make themselves wealthy through the efforts of the agricultural labourers. If the labourers are to be robbed of their rights by peasant proprietors, they might as well submit to be robbed for ever by the present monopolists.

The transition would bring about no extra degree of pleasure; for the workers would under this system be compelled to produce wealth for proprietors who have as much right to do their share of the world's toil as any agricultural labourer. Landlordism plunders the people wholesale of what belongs to them; peasant proprietorship would intensify the evil and rob the soil-cultivators of their natural claims to share equally in the fruits of the earth. The rural population of France furnishes us with a splendid argument against peasant proprietorship; for being a great country for small owners of land, it affords us an opportunity for proving the dangers attached to such a system. The rural population decreased by 3,400,000 persons between the years 1851 and 1872. In 1851 the rural community was 21,922,000, or 62 per cent. of the whole population; in 1861 it diminished to 19,873,000, or 53 per cent. of the whole; and in 1872 it decreased to 18,513,000, or 52 per cent. of the population (see 'Progress of the World,' page 241). Mr. Mulhall states that "this decline is also in a measure due to the introduction of machinery, in which respect wonderful progress has been made in our own time" (ibid., p. 241). If machinery is to be constantly introduced in order to do away with human labour, we shall shortly witness in France a revolution similar to the one which took place in the last century, when feudalism was destroyed.

This is what peasant proprietorship has done for France. What, then, is the difference between the French and English systems, so far as the labouring community are concerned? French proprietors introduce machinery so as to make themselves rich, while the rural population become poor; in the United Kingdom the landowners dispense with the agricultural labourers, because agriculture is rapidly going out of existence in these islands, owing to the monopolists using the land for deer-forests and hunting grounds. In France the proprietors engage labour so as to make profits for their personal enjoyment; whilst in these islands the owners refuse to allow the soil to be cultivated unless they receive wealth under the name of rent. How, then, will peasant proprietorship be better for the common good than landlordism? In order to show how it is possible for a small proprietor to become the owner of a great number of acres, we have only to look at the following statistics, taken from Mr. Mulhall's 'Progress of the World,' p. 241:

Estates.	No.	Average extent.	Area.
1st class ...	154,000	320 acres	48 million acres
2nd class ...	636,000	50 "	32 "
3rd class ...	620,000	20 "	12½ "
4th class ...	1,816,000	6 "	10½ "
Total ...	3,226,000	32 acres	103 million acres

From the above it will appear that the French proprietors are nothing but great employers of labour; and the more land they acquire the more labourers they will have to engage, until such times as they can purchase machines in order to dispense with a number of their employes. It does certainly appear unnatural that a minority of men should be in a position to employ or discharge human beings whenever they think proper. Peasant proprietorship is against the interests of the labouring community, and ought not to be accepted by them, when at the same time the land could be communalised and cultivated on co-operative principles for the benefit of the whole population.

Communalisation of land is the only remedy for the evils the workers are suffering from to-day. Were the land under the control of the community the people collectively would share to the greatest extent in its produce. And the soil-cultivators would not be obliged to support either landowners or peasant proprietors; for these individuals would become extinct as monopolists, and they would be obliged to labour for their own maintenance. The great difference between the agricultural labourers of to-day and those of the future working under the latter system would be that they would be able in future to enjoy their own productions; whereas to-day the landowners live upon the labourers and refuse to assist in the production of wealth.

Which is the best course to adopt of the two following: A system whereby the peasant proprietor would be able to purchase as much land as possible, employ labour upon the same, and extract from the labourers sufficient wealth to enable him to live without doing any useful labour for the community; or a system which would abolish the landlord and proprietor, substitute in their stead the whole community, the labourers cultivating the soil to labour for their own and the community's happiness, and the landowners and proprietors to work for their own livelihood, instead of being in a position to make others procure a good living for them? The latter system is the most advantageous; for no community of persons ought to be forced to labour to produce luxuries for those who are able to work but decline to do so when they can compel the wealth-producers to labour for them.

There being no such thing naturally as private ownership in land, it is only natural for the labouring community to demand the land to be used for the community, and insist upon the present monopolists doing some useful labour before being allowed to consume what other labourers have produced. No man can claim naturally any portion of the earth, because it was not made by any individual and consequently belongs to no one in particular. If the land should be monopolised by the present owners, such monopoly means that they have got power to prevent it from being cultivated so as to yield agricultural produce for the community to consume. If they are the real owners they would be justified in preventing people from trespassing upon their lands. And to attempt to cultivate the land would be trespassing; therefore the owners can bring an action against any one attempting to interfere with their sacred private property. Such arguments are absurd, and need no further discussion.

JOHN MARSHALL.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

We have received La Revue Européenne Socialiste, Littéraire, et Artistique mensuelle (formerly the Coup de Feu), 64 rue de Turenne, Paris (24 pp., 8vo). It is edited by Eugène Chatelain, and is conducted on the same lines as the late Coup de Feu.

BELGIUM AND LUXEMBURG.

At a joint meeting of the Councils of the Socialist Working-men's and the Republican Socialist Parties, held at Brussels on Oct. 6th, the question of the amalgamation of the two parties was finally settled by the adoption of resolutions in this sense, and a general congress will be held at Easter-time, 1890. The details of the arrangements go to show that this amalgamation means surrender to the working-men's party, which goes in for universal suffrage and social reforms. Bertrand, of the Brussels daily Social Democratic organ, Le Peuple, is about to publish a new monthly paper, Les Co-opérateurs Belges (The Belgian Co-operators). Anseele, another of the leaders, at a meeting recently held at Frameries, brought forward the idea of a mass demonstration in favour of manhood suffrage, to take place in Brussels in June or July, 1890. Besides this, eight hour working day demonstrations are prepared for May, 1890. Thus the time and energy of the Belgian Social Democrats is pretty much occupied for a year to come—co-operation, manhood suffrage, eight hours question, and with these palliatives the Belgian workers will be lulled asleep for the next twelvemonth! Where the Socialist agitation will be left we can guess from such instances as the report of a celebration of the anniversary of the foundation of the International held at Brussels, where after two Anarchist comrades, Wysmans and Berger, had spoken, they were told by one of the chief leaders of the official party to deliver their speeches rather in Catholic anti-Socialist circles of workers, where there would be a better place for them.

The Social-Democratic weekly review, Toekomst, of Ghent, makes a new start, the management of the paper being reorganised, and it is now published at two centimes (one farthing), which is also the price of the daily Flemish Socialist paper of Ghent.

In Luxemburg a paper called Der Arbeiter (the Worker) is going to be published twice a-week in German. The Socialist movement in Luxemburg is very small; a paper bearing the same name was published there about ten years ago, but died long since.

AUSTRIA.

The great trial of Polish Socialists for alleged conspiracy at Lemberg ended with the complete breakdown of the prosecution and liberation of all the defendants except one, who got two weeks. The public prosecutor had constructed a large secret society with headquarters at Warsaw, but according to Austrian Socialist organs the defendants, who were kept for three months in preliminary imprisonment, were not even Socialists.

The trade societies of the blacksmiths and the ironworkers at Vienna were dissolved by the Government for having sent telegrams to the Paris International Congress. In such cases the property of the societies concerned is confiscated by the Government, and a large sum of money belonging to the ironworkers was stolen in this way.

ITALY.

MILAN.—At a meeting of the Italian labour party in Milan held last week, it was decided to take part in the forthcoming communal elections, and after some discussion six names were chosen to stand as candidates representing the labour party, among them being Turati, Gnocchi-Viani, G. Croce, etc. The respectability of Milan expresses through its journals a certain uneasiness or discontent at these proceedings, it apparently being rather a liberty for the labour party to aspire to have a finger in the administrative pie at all, and one of the leading papers goes to the length of blaming the municipality for allowing the use of a hall for the electoral meetings. I see the Roman working-classes are also engaged in the municipal electoral struggle.

Ca Ira, a new republican journal of Genoa, strenuously calls upon the workers to join forces with the bourgeoisie, and avoid the ignorant and despotic Socialist as inimical to their cause. "For," it says, "the working-class, with their ceaseless agitations and hatred of their employers, will end by tiring out the bourgeoisie and inducing them to ally themselves with the monarchy, getting the entire control of property, and thus the republican programme will never be effected, as it will be without the assistance of the most cultivated, intelligent, and influential part of the community formed by the bourgeoisie." A less futile prophecy for the future amalgamation of parties would be that the monarchists become merged into the bourgeois party, who have always, so soon as they awoke to consciousness, opposed the advancement of the labour party tooth and nail, and always will—with the exception of the "cultivated and intelligent" among them, who daily melt into the party of freedom, sometimes against their own will. The Italian labour party is busy elsewhere besides at Milan, in arranging to take part in the coming communal elections. At Pavia their committee have issued a programme or manifesto, at Bergamo they are agitating to form a list of representative candidates, at various other neighbouring towns also, and at Livorno a meeting was held to deliberate the question and to issue a manifesto addressed to the workers.

COMO.—The Labour Federation (of the labour party) here are also absorbed in the elections which take place in Como on the 10th of November, but it seems likely that they will join with the democratic party to form a single list of candidates together. The salient points of their programme offer no new departure from what we are familiar with in similar programmes, i.e., a fixed minimum of wage for those employed by the Commune, limitation of women's and children's labour, reform of taxes, etc.

VICENZA.—It is pretty hard slavery working under the small masters of the small Italian industries; they consider themselves, and are in fact, wholly masters of the situation, and bully and grind at will in ways so fatuous and unimportant, that would be beneath the notice of a bigger man. The director of a firm here has recently given an order to dock his employes of half an hour's rest, by which he gets out of them 250 extra hours work in one day (he has 500 employes). Many of the men are country folk, and have a long distance to come, which, with their 11½ hours work, brings the day up to 15½ or 16 hours—not hard for the hot climate of the "indolent Italian," is it?

A fatal accident occurred at Milan the other day in the building trade. A house in course of construction fell, and 11 men were killed and many others injured. At the public funeral ceremonies, one of their comrades blamed the egoism and carelessness of the masters for this and similar disasters, and was promptly arrested for so speaking. The cause of the house falling was bad materials and hasty building.

We have received the first number of a new weekly, L'Associazione (Nice), announcing itself "Socialist-Anarchist-Revolutionary." I find it impossible to render the name other than literally and clumsily, and think that a shorter description might have served the purpose. However, this number contains one or two thoughtful articles, one in particular in which the importance of large strikes as helping towards the emancipation of labour is strenuously insisted upon, and from the Anarchist point of view. PARTY POLITICS AND SOCIALISM.

If the angels have any fun in them, they must be frequently diverted by the simple tricks that are so successful in turning the eyes and energies of the workers from their vital concerns, to the ways and pursuits of the ignis-fatui of the professional politicians. If the workers would only try to think out what their parliamentary representative has done, or can do, for them, they would come to the same conclusion as Charles Lamb did respecting a friend of his, viz., "The more I think of him, the less I think of him." It matters not how parliament manipulates the incidence of taxation, it all must, and can only, be borne by the men and women who work. That is the central fact all politicians try to cover up, and so long as they are successful in doing it their object is accomplished, and the gain or defeat of their respective party platform concerns them but little in comparison.

It has been pointed out in these columns over and over again, that Home Rule and all the other political bubbles blown to divert the thoughtless toilers, were not the real objects over which our politicians were fighting, and that these were only used by them so that the robbery of the workers might be continued without protest. But our friends—the enemy—are beginning to fear that that game is up, and that they will ere long be forced into grips with the workers on labour questions. Free education, in Scotland, is beginning to cast its shadow before. Those persons who have hitherto benefited by the ignorance and gullibility of the workers are beginning to see the solidarity of their interests, and they are beginning to prepare for the coming conflict. They are already beginning to state the issues which marshal all sorts of silly superstitions and religious rancour on the side of undue privileges and those who think things are good enough as they are; while on the workers' side we have only their justice, insight, courage, and innate strength in union—but that is enough.

The bugle sound to arms of the privileged classes has been blown by Mr. Somervell, of Sorn, who generally speaks better than he knows. The Irish question did very well as a decoy-duck for a time, but underneath it our politicians are dismayed at seeing "a growth" which betokens for them something ominous. At a Conservative consolation conversation, given to Evelyn Ashley the other day "for the services you (E. A.) rendered to the constituency of the Western (Ayr) Burghs in the election of 1888," Mr. S., of Sorn, betrayed the fears of our political privileged classes. It will be remembered the services Mr. Ashley rendered resulted in the loss of the seat to his party; but what did that matter? the excitement which his contest enabled the politicians to raise, caused the workers to spend their enthusiasm and substance for that which was not bread, and so in their apparent defeat the upholders of undue privileges were victorious in their main object. Mr. S., of Sorn, who speaks the fears of his class, perceives that the time is drawing nigh when the Irish question will no longer suffice the laborious drudge to dupe. At this Baal-Hazor feast he said: "Far below the Irish question there lay the root of that question, viz., that Communism and Socialism had been openly preached in this country (Cheers). That placed them on a very broad platform, and if they believed that that was what they really were combating when combating the question of Home Rule, they were entitled to a very broad and universal support. (Cheers)." In order to combat that Socialism, Mr. S., of Sorn, approved of winning over the priests of Ireland by Balfour's bribe. To combat Socialism their platform must be so broad as to have room on it for the priests of all faiths, and for all who had undue privileges at the expense of the workers. "He knew that in a country like Scotland that was difficult and delicate ground to tread upon, but they must deal with affairs not as they wished them to exist, but as they did exist." They were to throw away all the religious prejudices which served them so well in the past, in warping that energy which otherwise would have spent itself on social and labour questions, for things as they existed required them to stake their all and play their best trump card, as Socialism was making it a desperate game—to the moneyed classes. This hitherto strong sympathiser with Orangeism now sees the necessity of "recognising the rights of our Roman Catholic fellow subjects, and enlisting in the cause of loyalty and support of loyal adherence to the throne all our Catholic fellow subjects, and the priesthood, who formed such an important element in the sister island (cheers). When he (Mr. S.) looked back to the cordial support he received from Roman Catholics in Tradeston (Glasgow) at the election of 1885, he felt grateful for their gallant (?) support, and when he came before another constituency he hoped the Catholic electors would again give him their votes. (Cheers)." After the admission that all the gabble and pretence of the past political performances of the Unionists was not a combat against Home Rule, but that it was Socialism they were combating, we have this hero of a defeat relying on success for his next contest in the hope that he will convince the workers that it is for their sacred religion he is fighting; Protestants and Roman Catholics alike.

It will be amusing to see our philosophic-agnostic Unionists posing as defenders of the Roman Catholic altar, and yet it will be no more of a palpable imposition than any of the other political pretensions. In Mr. Somervell's remarks we have a foreshadow of the political palaver it is intended to engage and dupe the workers with for the next seven years after the present Parliament is dissolved. We will have the professional political "patriots" mouthing on platforms and affirming their preparedness to drain their last drop of blood for those "glorious principles" they inwardly despise. They will descend to monkey antics, in the hope and belief that they will get all the gate-money.

The growth of Socialism, which is at last commanding the notice of the professional politician, can be seen in such unlikely places as among the fishermen of Moray and Nairn. The great Unionist lawyer, Mr. Finlay, M.P., who is working for a place in the next division of political spoils, felt it his duty to warn them that "the Socialist was no friend to the working-man or the fisherman, but he was their worst enemy. Nothing was more absolutely fatal to the property of the industrial wage-earning class than the acceptance of such teaching." "These be brave words, my masters," coming from a lawyer like Mr. Finlay. The people everywhere, who can read, now know enough about the objects and aims of Socialism to refuse such gratuitous assertions from interested parasites who feed on "the property of the industrial wage-earning class." There is a promise running through all this growth of Socialism which our enemies have discovered underneath the Irish question, that assures us the religious "fake" will be as unserviceable as Home Rule was, to stop or delay it. The reservoir of Labour's pent-up wrongs, it is evident to those who have eyes to see, will soon burst its banks, and our perjured politicians need not be surprised if they some morning awake to find that it approaches their Bastille through other channels than Parliament. Our Catholic fellow-subjects have not applauded the speeches of our comrades at their League meetings for nought, and the political prigs will discover that on social questions the Catholic workers can now distinguish between things that differ. There is no commandment in their creed which sanctifies the permitting of themselves to be robbed and murdered, and the present industrial system cannot continue without that being done.

The dock strike gave a hint whereby the capture of the capitalist's Bastille could be accomplished without going through Parliament. The fact is the capitalist's stronghold is built on an explosive substance, and the element which will make it work is daily reaching nearer it, and it is that growth our politicians so much dread. The circumstances evolving themselves are beyond the power of either Socialists or politicians to thwart. The Socialist can only point whereto things are tending. The workers are beginning to think less of their political privileges, and more of the relationship of their pay to the value of their productions. The worker looks now at his pay and at what he has done for it, and he says "Twont do." Not only the workers, but the circumstances of our industrial and commercial development are crying out in louder tones day by day, "Twont do!", and the time is at hand when we will be forced to "deal with things not as we wish them to exist, but as they do exist." "Things are in the saddle and ride mankind." GEORGE McLEAN.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE labour movement over here is exceedingly quiet just now—so quiet, that some superficial people might feel inclined to think that there is no such thing as a labour movement in the United States. And yet such people would be essentially in the wrong; for in spite of the breaking up and the failure of the orthodox labour organisations, we are making wonderful headway. The movement has left the sentimental stage—the time when the workers have to be awakened from their apathetic slumber and be made aware of the facts that they too may have rights and that they are most shamefully and cruelly robbed of three-quarters of their rightful earnings—and is entering the scientific stage, the period when it has to be determined, partly by experience, partly by scientific investigations and logical conclusions, which theory is most in accord with evolution and stands on correct sociological first principles. It cannot be contradicted that considering this statement we have made enormous progress. People everywhere begin to take interest in the social question, and the discussion of economic problems is now in most clubs, private circles, and institutions a matter of course. Nor can it under such circumstances be a matter of regret that the old organisations are breaking up, for they consisted of such heterogeneous elements that a sweeping reform such as the changed conditions would have necessitated would surely have been impossible.

The Nationalists and both wings of the Anarchists, the Communistic as well as the philosophic Individualists, are making good progress. But it must be confessed that the progress of the Communistic Anarchists is limited almost entirely to the German population of the United States.

The strikes in London, which we have watched with a great deal of interest, may temporarily infuse some of the old labour organisations with a little life, but the idea that the labour movement is restricted to the struggle of getting good wages for short hours is fast dying out. The workers are beginning to get a dim notion that the economic basis of such tactics is incorrect, and consequently will attach themselves more and more to parties whose economic theories are more correct.

The Socialistic Labour Party (the Social-Democrats) are in a dreadful muddle. For some time two parties have existed within this Party—one favouring political action exclusively, and sneering at the other party who looked for salvation to the eight hours movement. The fight grew bitter. Rosenberg, the old secretary of the S. L. P., headed the political-actionists, and Alexander Jonas and Sergius Schewitsch were the leaders of the opposition faction. Plebiscites were taken, the matter was dragged before a Social-Democratic tribunal, and dire things were threatened. As far as matters are standing just now—and a convention of the Party is deliberating in Chicago behind closed doors—the party of Schewitsch is victorious. They managed to get possession of the two organs of the Party—Der Socialist and the Workmen's Advocate. One thing may be said, that owing to the stupid leadership of Rosenberg and Bushe, the progress of the whole Socialist movement has been retarded over here. I spoke some days ago to the secretary of the branch of the Socialistic Labour Party in Boston, a good adherent of the Rosenberg-Bushe faction, and was told that they—the Party—consisting of some fifty members, mostly old stagers, would soon start lecturing again in a hall, but that no questions and no discussion would be permitted, because they did not intend to hire halls so that other people could make speeches. During their lectures last winter I noticed that whenever an inconvenient question turned up the unfortunate questioner was most arbitrarily sat upon. Now this spirit will unquestionably prejudice a good many people altogether against Socialism.

The 11,000 acres of the Sioux reservation, which the Government has just succeeded in purchasing from the Indians for the sum of 14,000,000 dollars—which money the Indians never will get—promises to invite almost as big a rush as the famous Oklahoma lands when the latter were thrown open to settlement.

It is said that a secret agreement has been made between the sugar trust and the outside refiners, whereby the latter are to be allowed to refine 30 per cent. of the total output. Hitherto, it is understood, the trust has tacitly consented to an output of 25 per cent. by the outsiders, but the recent increase in the demand for sugar has encouraged the independent refiners to demand more. Claus Spreckels is said to have negotiated the agreement.

The Congress of the Canadian labour organisations has met in Montreal, and passed resolutions to request the Dominion government to no longer subsidise railroad companies with gifts of lands and sums of money, as the interests of the country would be damaged by such proceedings.

The Labour Union says: "Prisoners in the penitentiary at Joliet, Ill., have sent 1,500 pounds of bread to the starving miners at Braidwood, Ill.," and Lucifer adds, "Here, indeed, is the climax of the wage-slave system! Think of it! Free American labourers in our great protected industries reduced to utter starvation and compelled to accept charity of the convict felons of the penitentiary. The convicts, who are the only order of chattel slaves yet remaining in America, are still able to give out of their abundance 'charity' to the starving free (?) labourers. Shame!"

Consider the foregoing item, and then just look at this clipped from a daily paper: "At Newport, Mrs. Fred Vanderbilt has been serving at her luncheon parties, ices frozen in the shape of strawberries. Each berry is perfect, and has a little green stem and calyx by which it is lifted in the fingers. They are heaped up on little shells of clear ice, and this in turn is set into a plate of crimson cameo glass."

The National Greenback Convention met on the 13th September under the leadership of George O. Jones in Cincinnati, and a platform was agreed upon by the twenty delegates present:—

"It reaffirms resolutions of the Democratic National Convention of 1868 pertaining to the payment of the national debt and to equal taxation of property, and also declares that all laws changing the time or manner of the payment of the public debt since 1865 should be repealed; that all legal tender notes now outstanding should be exchanged for others issued with the words 'promise to pay' stricken from their face, and an additional amount issued; that indications point to a greater financial panic in the near future than this country or the world ever before saw, unless wise and immediate provision be made to sustain tottering confidence; that all sectional prejudices between the people of the North and South should end. The convention appointed a national executive committee, which organised as follows: George O. Jones, chairman; Lee Crandall, vice-chairman; T. J. Sharp and William Richards, secretaries. The chairman and vice-chairman are authorised to formulate a plan of operations."

The following item I clipped from to-day's Herald. It speaks for itself:—

"New York, Sept. 30, 1889.—Three members of the executive board of the Knights of Labour arrived here to-day. They are J. M. Hayes of Philadelphia, J. J. Holland of Florida, and A. W. Wright of Toronto. Master Workman Powderly was expected this morning, but he did not arrive, and he failed to get in to-night. The executive board is surprised, but believe that Powderly has been unavoidably detained. No official business was transacted. There were rumours current to the effect that the real object of the meeting was to endeavour to compose some very serious dissensions that had arisen in the order here, accusations of extravagance and of unfaithfulness to the interests of the Knights of Labour being brought against Powderly. His friends declare that they amount to nothing. The executive board will probably remain in session several days."

William Martin, sealer of weights in New York, has complained of 300 tradesmen for using dishonest weights and measures. Within a week he expects to make complaints against 200 more butchers, grocers, and lucksters who have incorrect scales. Mr. Martin's investigations show that about 30,000,000 pounds of the necessaries of life are practically stolen every year from New Yorkers by means of false measures and weights. He has never found a correct pair of scales on a fish-dealer's counter.

Boston, Mass., Oct. 1, 1889.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

The Tramway Men.

Meetings are still being held, and the speakers are now threatening a strike if the men's demands are not complied with. That is the sort of talk, my boys; but do not be content with talking, act as well. Don't forget the 9th of November!

The Bakers.

The Baker's Union is now 3,000 strong, and is daily increasing. They mean to come out on the 9th if their demands are not agreed to. November promises to be a lively month.

The Postmen.

The Postmen's Union has been progressing steadily. We are sorry to see, however, that there has been a split among the organisers, Fred Henderson, Tom Dredge, and W. A. Chambers having left the committee. They accuse "the majority of the committee of using their position to further their personal and political aims." This is a very vague charge, which may mean something or nothing. It hardly seems worth while to split up a union because some of its members may not be perfectly disinterested. The seceding members will have to go a long way before they find an organisation of which every member has perfectly pure and disinterested motives.

The Strike at Silvertown.

The men are as yet unconquered, though the last few weeks have been terrible for them to struggle through. The fight began during the excitement of the Great Strike, and when that had concluded the struggle at Silvertown ran a great risk of collapsing through lack of public interest. The directors saw this, and replied to the recent demands of the workpeople, "They may go back at the old rate of pay; or they may stay out till starvation drives them back." Last Sunday a huge demonstration was held in Victoria Park to back up the Silvertown men in their struggle. All the water-side workers who took part in the dock strike were there, and good collections were made for the brave men and women who have fought so gallantly amid public coldness and neglect. A demonstration was also held on Clerkenwell Green on Sunday morning. It is to be hoped that not only the London workers, but the workers in every town in England, will do their utmost to prevent the directors and their "Norwood" of a manager, Mr. Gray, driving the people back to their work by hunger. Subscriptions may be sent to W. Thorne, Strike Committee, Railway Dining Rooms, Silvertown.

Women to the front!

John Burns and his friends are about to devote their attention to the redemption of the working women. It is a good work, and perhaps not so difficult as it appears at first. The women are poorly paid, it is true, disunited also, but they are more easily moved to action than men, and they are in the main far more idealistic and unselfish than the masses of mankind. At present time there seems a good chance of stirring them to vigorous action. But a word of warning: John Burns and his friends ought to have had enough of the interference of dignitaries of the church and big middle-class men in labour questions; and I frankly confess I was very sorry to see the Bishop of Bedford in the chair at the recent meeting at the Assembly Hall. It is not long since that that wealthy prelate was advocating "thrift" and "emigration" as a cure for the miseries under which the workers suffer. He has never even written a line that shows that he has the least understanding of the social problem, and we know very well that he was only there to get some cheap popularity for himself and his church, of which both are sorely in need. The presence of the Bishop of Bedford may add to the "respectability" of the movement, but will certainly not add to its efficiency. Why, the first thing the reverend prelate does directly he gets on the platform is to deprecate "strikes." They are "costly and barbarous." Doubtless; but the hard-hearted sweating that produces strikes, what is that, my lord bishop, but "costly and barbarous"? Some people may even find your existence as a luxurious idler "costly and barbarous" also; and costly and barbarous evils sometimes need costly and barbarous methods to get rid of them. In conclusion, I will say that it is a great mistake for the workpeople, not to speak of Socialists, to have anything to do with bishops and other rich sweaters of labour. What they gain in respectability they lose in zeal and fervour; and if the working women's movement goes wrong, the cause may be easily found in the middle-class patronage that has been lavished upon it.

"Storm and victory."

The gas-workers and people of Bristol are to be congratulated. They understand how to strike, and how to strike hard. The gas-workers came out on strike, and darkness hovered over the town. The Town Council called blacklegs to its aid, and introduced them in shoals. They were met at the station by vans to be conveyed to the gas-works. They were met also by an immense populace, armed with bricks and stones, and similar trifles, of which the blacklegs soon had enough. The vans reached the bridge over the Avon, but it was barricaded by overturned carts, while the volleys of missiles fell in furious hail. The vans laden with blacklegs turned back to the station. Here these "honest workmen" sought shelter from the fury of the multitude, bruised and battered as they were by showers of bricks and stones. Other blacklegs who arrived did not like the prospect, and went home. Next day the directors gave in, and the men gained the 5s. advance which they demanded. Capitalists don't like strikes; but they like riots less. Any workmen having a difference with their employers might profitably learn a lesson from the action of the men of Bristol.

Shop Assistants Unite.

We are glad to see that the shop assistants are taking advantage of the present time for the purpose of organisation. The provisional committee of the Shop Assistants Union have issued the following manifesto:—

Fellow Workers,—A Union of Shop Assistants has been formed, and we call upon you to cast aside false and ridiculous class prejudices and take your stand with the ever increasing army of organised labour. We call your attention to the concentration of all distributive establishments, such as Whiteley's, Shoolbred's, Barker's, etc., as well as the sham Co-operative Stores, viz., Army and Navy, Civil Service, and such like; also the establishment of Joint Stock Companies, with hundreds of branch shops. The effect of these developments upon our position is to prevent the hope of our ever becoming our own masters.

In starting this organisation, which, unlike all other assistants' societies, will strive not only to ameliorate our lot, but remove the cause itself under which we suffer, we earnestly call upon you to become members, so that by your aid we shall become a powerful organisation, which with public opinion on our side, will enable us to withstand the encroachments of capital. Our objects are:

1. The limitation of the hours of labour, which are usually in too many cases 16 to 18 hours a day. The result of work done under such high pressure is the very serious deterioration, physically, mentally, and morally, of thousands of our fellow-workers. This applies in many cases to establishments which profess to be the pioneers of early closing. The shutters may be down, but the assistants are still at work and receive no extra remuneration for it.

2. The abolition of all unjust and tyrannical fines, which in too many cases are often used as a means of reducing the already small wage, as well as the system of making contracts which practically outlaw us, thereby placing us absolutely at the mercy of our masters.

3. Longer and definitely fixed meal-times, which at present often consist of only a quarter of an hour, and even that not free from interruption. We also demand that food shall at least be wholesome and in sufficient quantity.

And Lastly, as soon as possible, we propose to submit a standard wage in each particular trade.

Signed by the General Secretary on behalf of the Provisional Committee, composed of the following trades:—Grocers, Drapers, Clerks, Chemists, Outfitters, Ironmongers, Provisions, Jewellers, and Stationers.

Until permanent offices are established all communications should be addressed, General Secretary, 177, Great Portland Street, which communications are strictly private.

Keir Hardie and the Penicuik Disaster.

Our friend Keir Hardie has another article in the Labour Tribune upon this disaster. He accuses the authorities in Scotland of endeavouring to hush up the causes of such fearful catastrophes. Keir Hardie appears to be of the opinion that the extension of the English "crown's quest" law to Scotland would be useful in bringing home the guilt to the capitalists, who in their selfish greed bring about these wholesale slaughters. The account he gives of the way the law enquires into the preventable murder of miners in Scotland would be amusing if the subject were not too deeply serious for laughter.

"The case is reported to the police and to the Inspector of Mines. The inspector pays a visit to the scene of the accident, as soon as his convenience or his opportunity will permit. I have known ten days elapse before the place has been visited by the inspector. Having seen the place, he next makes a report, if he thinks there is anything suspicious about it, to the Fiscal, the Fiscal being the representative of the Crown in our local courts of law. That official asks the local police to make enquiries and report. This the police do to the best of their ability, but the chances are ten to one that not one of the staff has ever been down a pit. On receiving the police report the Fiscal may, if he deems it necessary, cite a few witnesses to come to his office, where he takes their statements. Having thus fortified himself with 'evidence,' he has to decide whether there is a case against any one, and very naturally comes to the conclusion that, since the poor fellow has been killed, and as his knowledge of mining and mining laws is somewhat hazy, and, moreover, and most important of all, as all the reports made are privileged and therefore hidden from prying eyes, the best way will be to say no more about it, and the 'enquiry' is at an end. . . . Take the Mauricewood Pit disaster. Here there is strong prima facie evidence of neglect. Practical miners are saying that the accident could not have happened had the provisions of the Mines Act been complied with. Instead of inviting the most open investigation into all the facts of the case, every attempt is being made to hush the whole thing up. With a view to gulling the public, a report has appeared through the press that an enquiry into the cause of the disaster had been held. But the enquiry consisted of a meeting in the company's office between the manager, the overman, the mines inspector, and the Fiscal. An impartial tribunal, truly! The manager and the overman implicated in the guilt, if guilt there be; the Inspector of Mines the most culpable of all, if the Mines Act has been so flagrantly violated; the Fiscal not daring to have an opinion of his own in the face of the weighty evidence of such a body of experts."

But does Mr. Hardie think that the extension of the coroner's inquest to Scotland by law will prevent these mining massacres? I fear not. The families of the men who die through preventable causes on the mines and railways in England have now the consolation of knowing that the body has been "viewed" by a jury; but I never heard a verdict of "murder" yet brought against either mineowners or railway directors. No; the blame is usually shifted off upon some unfortunate subordinate; the jury, under direction of the coroner, returns a verdict censuring this scapegoat, but never touching the really guilty parties. While we have a privileged class, living in luxury upon the labour of others, these wholesale butcheries will continue.

P.S.—The editor of the Labour Tribune grumbles because we forgot to mention the source in our quotation of Keir Hardie's first article. We hope he will now be satisfied; we have put the name of his paper in this time. We hope the next time he "collars" our poetry he will also not forget to mention where it came from. We do not like to see it "Buried Alive" without the slightest acknowledgment. N.

Horsehair and Fibre-workers' Union.

The readers of this journal have already been made acquainted with the facts of the strike of the fibre-workers at Messrs. Laycock's, Sheffield, and also that the struggle is now in its seventh week, both the men and women standing out together in the fight against the fourteen tyrannical rules published in our issue of September 21st, and also for an increase of ten per cent. on their work, which they allege was taken from them two years ago. Since the commencement of the strike a union was started, and has been well supported by the workpeople in all branches of the trade in Sheffield, and has been successful in securing the financial assistance of the other trade organisations of the town. They are also endeavouring to form unions in London and Manchester, so as to secure the solidarity of the whole of the workers in this business—the work being principally done in the places above-mentioned; and there being less than a thousand of these operatives in the whole of England, the task is easy.

In order to start the union in London, the Sheffield men sent their secretary, who arrived at St. Pancras last Saturday morning, calling later in the day at Farringdon Road, to secure the assistance of the Socialist League. On Saturday afternoon a preliminary meeting was held at the "Joiners' Arms," Hackney Road, Mr. Hodges in the chair. The necessity for combination against their masters was insisted on by the Sheffield delegate and by H. Moore, W. B. Parker, and others. But on Monday night a crowded meeting was held in the large room at the "Swan," Bethnal Green Road, where, under the presidency of J. Blackburn, the new union was launched. The most pleasing feature about the meeting was the determination that all workers in this trade, whether skilled or not, should be included in the union. A provisional committee was elected to do the preliminary work and to call a further meeting.

On Sunday morning at Flat Iron Square, and in the afternoon at Hyde Park, the Sheffield delegate (whose name, for obvious reasons, is omitted here), addressed meetings, under the auspices of the Socialist League, at which places 2s. and 7s. 1d. were collected. Our comrade stated that the strikers had been well supported by our Sheffield comrades of the Socialist Society. The other speakers at these meetings included D. J. Nicoll, G. Cores, T. Cantwell, and W. B. Parker. A union will be at once formed in Manchester, where doubtless they will be assisted as far as possible by our Branch of the League in that city. The Sheffield delegate returned home on Tuesday morning. W. B. P.

Clyde Steel-workers' Strike.

This strike, which was referred to last week, still continues. One of the middlemen or sweaters, whom the men on strike are struggling to abolish, fired on the assembly that serenaded him and wounded a man and a boy. As he has not yet been tried for the discharging of firearms, I cannot at present comment on the affair. Comrade Cunninghame Graham was to address the men, along with comrade Keir Hardie, on Friday night, but was prevented doing so by an attack of rheumatism. There is great excitement in the vicinity of Rutherglen and Cambuslang, where the works are situated, and meetings of angry men and women are held daily.

Forfar Factories' Lock-out.

Except at the Messrs. Laird's factory, the lock-out in the factories of Forfar is now in full operation. The operatives at Victoria Works (Messrs. John Lowson, jun., and Co.) approached the firm and requested not to be locked-out, because, as their wages were higher than in the other factories, they had no intention of striking. The firm replied that they had decided to support the Messrs. Craik, whose workers were on strike, and that until the strike ended there the lock-out would continue. At a meeting of the operatives it was explained that the contest was not so much for an increase of 5 per cent. on the wages as to decide whether the employers' union could crush the workers' union. REPORTS.

LONDON OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.—Chelsea—On Sunday morning a good meeting was held on the Embankment, when Samuels spoke for over an hour to an attentive audience, and although he criticised and challenged the tactics and dogmas of the "only Socialist organisation in Great Britain," he could not get any opposition; Beckett sold 27 Commonweal. Hoxton—A good meeting was held here on Thursday evening, and was addressed by Davis, Kitz, Dr. Creaghe, and Parker. Hyde Park—Sunday afternoon, good meeting addressed by Cores, Cantwell, Parker, and the delegate of the Sheffield Hair and Fibre Worker's Union; 27 Weals sold and 7s. collected for the Fibre Workers' Strike Fund. Union Street—Good meeting here; Leggett spoke; 1s. collected. Clerkenwell Green—Good meeting addressed by Blundell and Brookes on Sunday evening.

MITCHAM.—Large meeting on the Fair Green, addressed by Kitz and Mowbray. In the evening at Duppas Hill, Croydon, a fair meeting was held, addressed by Kitz and Pillier. A number of Mitcham comrades turned up at the Croydon meeting; sale of Weals for day 52; collection for local propaganda, 1s. 5d.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers, Lync, sen., James, and Tochatti; 8d. collected and 40 Weals sold. Also a good meeting at St. Ann's Road; speakers were Crouch, Lync, sen., and Tochatti, and Wear-dale (S.D.F.); 16 Weals sold. The branch held a meeting at 8 p.m. of laundresses at the Clarendon Coffee Tavern, Crouch in the chair; Mrs. Barber, from Laundresses Union, attended and stated the objects of the Union.

SOUTHWARK.—At Flat Iron Square, a fairly good meeting was held here on Sunday morning; comrades Nicoll, Parker, and a Sheffield friend were the speakers. A collection was made for the Hair and Fibre Dressers Union, and a few Weals sold.

STREATHAM.—A good meeting held at the Fountain, addressed by Mowbray; 2s. 6d. worth of pamphlets sold, 2s. 7½d. collected, and sold 73 Commonweal; the branch is making rapid progress.

ST. GEORGES EAST.—A well attended members' meeting on Wednesday. On Saturday night, a good meeting on the Waste was addressed by Cores; fair sale of literature.

ABERDEEN.—Although no reports have appeared in last two issues, work has been carried on steadily. Reports not sent through misunderstanding. On Sunday, 29th ult., a great meeting was addressed by Duncan at Castle Street. On 5th inst., Duncan and Leatham (the latter is again in town and working meantime) addressed a large and enthusiastic meeting; questions and good sale of literature. At indoor meeting on 7th, Nicoll's lecture on "The Manchester Martyrs" read and discussed. On 12th, no meeting held owing to heavy rains.

GLASGOW.—On Tuesday evening Joe Burgoyne, Tim Burgoyne, Downie, Gilbert, and McKenzie (Edinburgh) spoke on Cathedral Square, where the crowd listened with great attention and evident sympathy to our comrades. This is becoming a very useful station. On the same evening Glasier "heckled" Mr. Provand, M.P., in the Wellington Halls—the M.P.'s stupid replies causing a deal of discussion in the local press. On Sunday, at two o'clock, Joe and Tim Burgoyne addressed a good meeting on Jail Square. At 5.30 Glasier and Gilbert spoke at Paisley Road Toll; we are considering the advisability of engaging a hall and forming a branch of the League in that district.

HALIFAX.—A large demonstration of gas-stokers was held on Sunday, at which our comrades here assisted. Commonweal sold well. The meeting was the largest ever held here; 9,000 people were present. In the evening we had a visit from some comrades at Leeds, after attending a lecture by Mr. Sutcliffe on the Municipal Elections. The discussion on Socialism and Individualism is adjourned till after these elections. Our comrades are working hard to sell paper.

LEICESTER.—John Turner addressed three meetings and produced marked impression. The Radical Club men are becoming enthusiastic, and the president is coming up to join us next Thursday. Our evening out-door meeting was held under difficulties, in the midst of the "fair." Eight new members joined—the biggest haul we have had. Collection, 16s. 9d.; literature, 4s. 11½d.—A. G.

MANCHESTER.—On Sunday morning we held a meeting at Phillips Park; Bailie and Stockton spoke; 14 Commonweal sold, and 1s. 1d. collected for local propaganda. In Stevenson Square, in the afternoon, a meeting was addressed by Barton, Ritson, and Parkinson; good sale of Commonweal; 1s. 2d. collected.

NORWICH.—On Thursday last W. Moore read a paper on "Revolutionary Socialism"; discussion followed; several comrades took part. Moore spoke at a meeting of wire-weavers held to form a union, and also took part in a discussion at one of the local temperance societies. Sunday morning good meeting held at St. Faiths; Emery and White spoke; opened with a song. In the afternoon, a good meeting held in the Market Place; Reynolds spoke at some considerable length, dealing with the recent strikes, and also upon working-men expecting anything to be done through political action. Comrade Swash followed; opposition to Reynolds's remarks was given by a local trades-unionist, and was well answered by Reynolds; audience very attentive. In the evening another capital meeting held in the open air, addressed by comrades Reynolds and W. Moore. Houghton and Morley went to Diss in the morning.

YARMOUTH.—On Saturday night we held a mass meeting on the Hall Quay, to protest against the cruelty of the police in doing to death a poor old and infirm man (through the "Frog's March"), and to obtain evidence against the police. The speakers were comrade Reynolds, Mr. Gibson, and Jacques. On Sunday morning, on Priory Plain, comrade Reynolds gave a long and earnest address on "Socialism in London," which was well received by the audience. In the evening, on Colman's Granary Quay, our usual meeting was held, the speakers being Mr. Jacques, local secretary of the Seamen and Firemen's Union, and comrade Ruffold. 16 Commonweal sold; 3s. 3d. collected towards paying comrade Reynolds's fare from London.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, Oct. 12th, A. Kavanagh lectured on "The Necessity for Labour Organisation." The principles of internationalism were well expounded by Graham, Thomson, Shields, and Wilson.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE last few elections, though they prove little in themselves, yet taken with other symptoms seem to show that, unless something very startlingly unexpected happens, the Gladstonites will have a majority in the next Parliament, and even make it probable that there will be a dissolution before long. The fact is that the swing of the pendulum is operating; the promise of performance of the old government has died out; they have pretty much exhausted their powers of pretentious do-nothing plus coercion, and people are beginning to think, “Now let us have a general election, and give the other fellows a turn.”

Well, so be it! We shall weep dry-eyed for the Tories; who, to speak shortly, are always and everywhere our declared and deadly enemies, and who include no section that can be of any use to us except as stimulating revolt by their stupid reactionism. Let us hope that no single Socialist and no group of workers will be taken in by the game of the Tory Democrats and their coquetting with one side of Social Democracy, or State Socialism, whichever you may please to call it. The Irish prisons show us pretty well what the meaning of Tory State Socialism really is. Let us remember that it can never go further than this—the bettering of one or more groups of workmen at the expense of other groups, the whole to be paid for by votes at the next election; which votes will, of course, be used for coercion in some form or other.

At the same time I don't see how we can throw up our hats very high for the advent of the Liberals to power. All we can hope of them is that they will be forced to clear away the Irish matter for awhile; though no doubt they, as well as the Tories, would be glad enough if they could keep on lugging it backwards and forwards as a convenient red herring across the trail of the welfare of the workers.

But when they have done that, what next? Will they even be near adopting the programme of the Socialist Radicals? which itself means nothing unless it is at once going to become real Socialism. It is pretty clear that they cannot turn themselves into incipient Socialists. It will be the old story: a few more Radicals more advanced than earlier Radicals were, but quite powerless in Parliament; a great accession to the strength of the Whigs, who as soon as the crisis is over will turn their minds to becoming more Tory than the Tories themselves.

This is the regular history of party government in England. A Tory government with a Whig opposition, backed by a Radical revolt according to the ideas of Radicalism current at the time. The Radicals (as notably now the Socialist Radicals) make a great stir, and begin to move popular public opinion. They get the Whigs in, and these, when in, kick the Radicals to the devil, where they may do what they can.

This is quite sure to happen once more. Let us hope that it will be a dangerous game for the Whigs this time, and that after the kick, since they won't do it before, the Socialist Radicals will drop the latter end of their name, which means nothing, and become real Socialists looking forward to revolution as the only possible true change, and relegating the phrase “Parliamentary reform” to Mr. Murray's new dictionary of the English language. W. M.

The fears we expressed last week as to the action of the County Council on the licensing of music-halls have not been realised. By a majority which was not far from a clear two-thirds they have rejected the proposals of the Licensing Committee and refused to embark on the system of puritanical tyranny which that committee had planned out for them. The minority made, of course, a great noise and angrily contested every inch of ground, but suffered all the same from the most galling reverse, the most crushing defeat they have ever met. Like all beaten reactionaries, as they lost ground they lost temper; and with their tempers lost everything. Were it not for the good it has wrought it would have been pitiable, this utter discomfiture of theirs.

It does not matter much to us as Socialists, perhaps, to any very great degree, whether this or that music-hall shall have a license or no. But it does matter very much to us indeed whether a puritanical tyranny, an entirely reactionary and oppressive censorship, shall be established among us. The men who shriek and rave now about a “blue” line in a music-hall song or a little too lofty kick on the part of a dancer, would be just as ready, if they got the power, to exercise it in suppressing free speech as in “putting down indecency.” And those who are now so ready to hunt the poor whores off the streets and drive them into the workhouse, the river, or the prison—or, deeper misery still, into their terrible “refuges” and “charitable homes”—would be just as willing to stone a Socialist or Atheist or any other rebel against their conventional respectability whenever they got the chance of doing so.

Sir Charles Russell rose above the advocate as he touched on this in a few masterly sentences. Mr. Nathan Robinson and the Rev. H. B. Chapman made stirring and impressive appeals to the Council on the side of the unfortunate women; Mr. Thornton declared that even prostitutes were citizens and had rights as such; and John Burns, speaking “as one of the class from which most of them were drawn,” made a plain and telling statement of the conditions which produce them, and demanded that the root causes be struck at and not the unhappy products be persecuted.

On the other side, Mr. Charrington spoke with such virulence, such blind and bigotted intolerance, that one could almost believe in the Whitechapel murder-fiend being such another as he. Like him, but not quite so bitter, was the Rev. Fleming (“Fog-horn”) Williams. Both of these, pretended followers of the man before whom was brought the woman taken in adultery, spoke with a fury that reminded one of the old-time zealots who burnt and racked and tortured men and women “for the glory of God and the good of their own souls.” A fury which was only less hateful than the smug hypocrisy and pretended moderation of the notorious Mr. McDougall.

There can be no question that these pseudo-Progressives, these shams and frauds of Nonconformist Radicalism, men of the type of the historic "dissenting deacon and little corner grocery-man," are among the worst enemies of any real progress of whom it is possible to conceive. There cannot be a departure from their crude reactionary ideals which they will not fight with all the malign force that popular ignorance and the survival of superstition may place in their hands. The sordid misery of modern life is the very breath of their being. Woe be to him who seeks to cure it if he fall into their hands! Democratic institutions, if they could but manage it, would be made the means of a more searching and cruel despotism than even the most docile German now cowers under at the behest of Bismark. There is no walk of life in which their crushing influence would not be felt. As Socialists, revolutionists, rebels against all convention and hypocrisy, we must watch these men, and if need be make them feel our enmity.

Despite the wild waving of "the flag of the free," etc., the United States do not seem such a home of liberty as their admirers would make out. At a reunion of Abolitionists held in Tremont Temple, Boston, a few weeks since, the Hon. George P. Downing of Newport, R. I., produced a sensation by announcing himself as "a coloured abolitionist," and saying, "For sixty years I have felt myself to be the victim of injustice. Although I have never committed any crime, I have never seemed to breathe the free air of my native country. I was with Wendell Phillips in this very hall when he faced a howling mob, led on by the gentlemen of Beacon Street, and when he declared to them 'I will live to hear you applaud me to the echo.'" Continuing, he pointed out how Wendell Phillips was now applauded, but his teachings unregarded still.

He concluded by saying: "A fire of dissatisfaction and grief burns in my breast. The conservative speech I am now making would endanger my life in some States. While my son is spurned from your counting-room, your art museum, and your church, and while my wife is forbidden to ride with you in the railway car, while my countrymen are murdered in the South, can you expect me to be mild?" Had not our contemporary, Reynolds, better ponder a little over this side of American life, as well as over the state of the labouring classes there, the next time it feels tempted to sing "Hail Columbia, happy land!"? Like every other country ruled by the bourgeois, and dominated by bourgeois ideas, any other class than that of the dominant moneybags is made to feel its "inferiority." S.

"HONEST TOIL."

THE virtue of "honest toil" is a precept which has been universally commended. We were taught it in our childhood, and have not been allowed to forget it in our after years. It was engraved as a headline in our copy-books, and was a favourite theme of our Sunday-school stories. It is always at hand as a peg whereon rich moralists may hang their speeches when addressing poor men's gatherings; and it is specially serviceable to newspaper editors when advising working-men not to strike or ask for an increase of wages.

By "honest toil" is meant physical toil for the physical needs of the community. The supposition is that by engaging in "honest toil," the toiler earns his own and his family's livelihood without having to beg, borrow, or steal any portion of it from his neighbours. The actuality is, that he not only earns his own and his family's livelihood, but the livelihood of a privileged class which is thus saved the necessity of doing any toil at all. The term "honest" has no doubt been tacked on to this species of toil from a perception of the fact that the toiler undoubtedly honestly earns by it whatever necessities or comforts of life he is permitted to retain to himself; and from a perception that there are other species of toil which men may engage in without honestly earning these things.

But although universally commended in precepts and speeches, "honest toil" is by no means universally practised. Indeed, none practise it who can avoid doing so; and instead of the practice of it conferring honour upon the individual, it invariably confers contempt. No "Noble" or "Honourable" or "Right Honourable" person ever performs it. No man who has to work for his livelihood is ever esteemed a "gentleman" and is never called such, except in courtesy or when he is being solicited for a vote or a subscription. A working-man is never made a knight or a peer, the chairman of a missionary society, or the president of a football club. The Queen will make "a belted knight, a marquis, duke and a' that" out of any kind of an effigy of a human being but a working-man. The fact that a man has to do "honest toil" utterly unfits him, apparently, from occupying any honourable position in church, State, or society. He may be physically as strong as a Hercules and as beautiful as an Apollo; he may have all the intellectual gifts of a Crichton and the moral resolution of a St. Anthony: but so long as he has of necessity to win his bread by the labour of his own hands and the sweat of his own brow, the door of refined society is shut in his face. If he were suddenly to enter a West-end drawing-room in his working garb the ladies would faint as though he were a Mid-African savage, and the gentlemen would kick him downstairs as though he were a bundle of hospital rags. A dog may sprawl upon the floor, a cat curl upon the hearthrug, and a parrot screech at the window, but he or his children may not even stand upon the doorstep. On the other hand, anything born of a woman, though it be physically fit only for a gynecological museum, though it has the intelligence of a hen and the morals of a zoological gardens gorilla, yet if it belongs to the class that does no useful work, but lives on the plunder of the labour of others, it will be welcomed into the best society, courted by beautiful girls, flattered by statesmen, and fawned upon by university professors.

"Honest toil," therefore, which is in precept a virtue, is in practice a crime. Instead of being regarded as noble and honourable, it is regarded as dishonourable and degrading; and it is just because it is "honest" that it is so regarded. The more "honest" it is, the more it is shunned and the more ignoble it is reckoned. Toil that is not in the current sense "honest"—toil per se—is not shunned or reckoned ignoble. A man may work till he is black in the face and white in the hair at any sort of physical occupation he chooses, providing he does not do so for the merely "honest" purpose of earning his own livelihood, and yet be esteemed an "honourable" man and a gentleman. He may, like Lord Lonsdale, tramp with bag and baggage over hundreds of miles in frost and snow; he may go into his garden and plant cabbages, lay dung, and hunt caterpillars; he may row a boat, sail a yacht, or drive a carriage; he may fish, fell trees, shoot birds, stalk deer, or engage in any manual labour he pleases, and still be a gentleman—so long as he does so for recreation or pleasure, and not with the "honest" motive of providing the food he eats, the clothes he wears, or the house he inhabits. But if he is compelled to do these things so as not to be dependent upon the toil of others for his livelihood, then he is outside the pale of rank, titles, office, and respectability. Just think of it! Lord Lonsdale boasts that during one of his journeys he made his servants carry only 40 lbs. of baggage, and that he himself carried 50 lbs: while at that very time thousands of poor men in England were toiling their lives away to provide him with the money he was spending on his useless escapade. He considers it a noble thing that he, during a freak of pleasure, should have burdened himself a little to lessen the burden of others, while he esteems it an honourable thing to compel millions of men and women to bear all their lives a fourfold burden that he and his class may live without bearing any burden at all. And this sentiment of what is honourable, is the prevailing one in civilised life to-day, and upon this sentiment rests the whole superstructure of modern religion, morals, and politics.

The precept, therefore, is a lie, and a most barefaced one, too. Nobody believes it, but everybody preaches it—especially those who would be horrified at the mere notion of their being expected to put it into practice. If a bishop—who would as soon think of preaching the Gospel as of staining his episcopal fingers with an hour's work at tent-making or carpentry—has occasion to address a meeting of working folk for the purpose of begging subscriptions, he rolls oily phrases about the dignity and holiness of "honest toil" in his mouth, with as much sanctimonious satisfaction as he afterwards rolls their shilling pieces in his breeches pocket. If a duke or an earl condescends to decorate the platform of a working-men's political meeting, held for the purpose of returning an aristocratic stripling to Parliament, he extols the nobility of honest toil with such apparent sincerity that one expects him to conclude with a declaration that he will get out of bed next morning at five o'clock and apply for a job as a navy or dock-labourer at twelve or fifteen shillings a-week.

Of course the bishop and the earl do not mean what they say, and nobody believes that they do; but everybody applauds their sentiments and affects to feel much encouraged and comforted by them. It is the same with reference to most matters nowadays. People preach what they do not believe, and conceal or deny what they do believe; and most people appear to be quite satisfied and delighted with this way of going on. If it were not so, peers would be paupers, priests lodged in lunatic asylums, and politicians in prison.

Why, then, is "honest toil" regarded as degrading? Why do the rich shun it and the poor try to escape from it? It is not, as I have shown, because toil—even hard toil—is of itself considered an ignoble or criminal thing. No; "honest toil" is regarded as degrading and ignoble because it is associated with slavery, with poverty, with social ugliness, and the lack of pleasure and recreation. Only those who are slaves, who are the tools of landlords and capitalists, earn their own livelihood by the labour of their own hands; and their toil is necessarily very hard and their livelihood very scanty. They have not the means nor the opportunity of making their bodies healthy, their minds happy, or their homes beautiful. Art, leisure, travel, and all that gives enchantment to life and love are denied them. No wonder, then, that associated with such hateful conditions and penalties, "honest" toil is shunned by all who can avoid it. After all, it is a truer and manlier instinct that regards toiling for one's bread, in the way the working class now toils, as a thing to be dreaded and despised, than the instinct that is content to perform it without prospect of rebellion. And however much we, as Socialists, must condemn the hypocrisy of the rich who preach and praise what they do not, and would not willingly perform, we must give tenfold condemnation to those who consent to their own degradation and serfdom, without strong and persistent effort to free themselves and abolish for ever the system under which they suffer. Nor need we wonder that the rich—who do not understand Socialism, but regard it as a system that would compel them to work as they see the workers working to-day—fear it and seek to prevent its coming.

But Socialism does not imply that either the present rich or the present poor will require to work as the poor work to-day. If to toil and live, as miners, dock-labourers, tramway-men, seamstresses, factory girls, or even skilled artisans have now to toil and live, were the ideal which Socialists propose to realise, when asserting that every one will require to work for his livelihood, then none but madmen indeed would be Socialists. Surely, however, rich and poor alike can perceive that so long as so many do no work, and so many do useless work, and so long as the reckless waste of wealth, which our present competitive system entails, goes on, those who by "honest toil" have to produce all the wealth which they and all the others consume must of necessity work very hard and get very little. But when Socialism is achieved—when all do useful work and there is no waste of wealth— toil will no longer be hard and degrading, but healthful and pleasurable, and consequently honourable; and "honest toil," as we now understand it, will be as unknown to all the people then as health, plenty, and pleasure are unknown to nine-tenths of the population to-day.

HEIRS OF TIME.

FROM street and square, from hill and glen
Of this vast world beyond my door,
I hear the tread of marching men,
The patient armies of the poor.

The halo of the city's lamps
Hangs, a vast torchlight, in the air;
I watch it through the evening damps;
The masters of the world are there.

Not ermine-clad or clothed in state,
Their title-deeds not yet made plain;
But waking early, toiling late,
The heirs of all the earth remain.

Some day, by laws as fixed and fair
As guide the planets in their sweep,
The children of each outcast heir
The harvest-fruits of time shall reap.

The peasant brain shall yet be wise,
The untamed pulse grow calm and still;
The blind shall see, the lowly rise,
And work in peace Time's wondrous will.

Some day, without a trumpet's call,
This news will o'er the world be blown:
"The heritage comes back to all!
The myriad monarchs take their own!"

CORRESPONDENCE.

"SOCIALISM AND STRIKES."

SIR,—After F. Kitz's able article on "Socialism and Strikes," I should like to say a few words on the same subject. It seems to me that the order of the day is Organise! organise! organise!—but what for? Up till now, it seems to me, we are all to organise for a paltry penny an hour, or something of that sort, but with no other object in view. Now this surprises me somewhat, when I consider who are the men taking the lead in this movement. How is this? Are these men watering down, or are they self-seeking? How is it they have left their old robust Socialism out in the cold to take on with labour unions without unity? For although we have now the South-side Council Protection League, the National Federation of Labour Union, the Dock, Wharf, Riverside and General Labourers' Union, Postmen's Union, and goodness knows how many more labour unions, yet no one seems trying to unite or affiliate them. They have leaders who each seem inclined to move only in their own small circle, instead of uniting the whole. Again, we find them in very doubtful company occasionally. What can dock-labourers expect from Lord Mayors or Mannings? The same may be said of the Women's Trades Association—hobnobbing with bishops and dowager ladies. Again, how will the poor tram and bus men get along in company with a Rosebery? These are questions I have asked myself several times lately, but they still remain unanswered.

SOCIALIST CO-OPERATIVE FEDERATION.

DEAR COMRADE,—It is now just over two years since you gave me the opportunity in the Commonweal of broaching the idea of Co-operation on Socialist lines. The articles you inserted led to the formation of the Socialist Co-operative Federation. During the past two years we have been enrolling members and getting in the funds necessary for carrying on business when we could open a store. We have also to acknowledge valuable assistance from Justice, The Link, and Star. At our General Meeting on 28th of last July we had 160 members, had paid all our formation expenses, and only wanted £30 more to make up the amount necessary to start the store. Some few weeks before our General Meeting I made the acquaintance of Mr. Isidore Phillips, the secretary of the Hygienic Co-operative Society, of 49 Southampton Row. That society by its rules was limited in the class of articles it could supply, and in consequence was not doing as good a trade as it could have done if not hampered by its fundamental rule. It was therefore in contemplation to reorganise the society on a wider basis. The idea occurred to me that it would be a good thing if the Hygienic Co-operative Society could be induced to amalgamate with the Socialist Co-operative Federation, and thus form one strong co-operative society working on Socialist lines and guaranteeing healthy products. I talked the matter over with Mr. Phillips, and he "took on" to the idea and agreed to bring it before his committee. I undertook to do the same with the committee of the Socialist Co-operative. Both Mr. Phillips and Mr. J. B. O'Callaghan, the president of the Hygienic Co-operative Society and a Socialist of old standing, warmly advocated the idea in their committee, and, with only one dissident, it was carried, that if possible the amalgamation should be effected. The committee of the S. C. F., when I brought it before them, unanimously approved. The result was that a joint sub-committee of the two societies met and arranged the terms of the amalgamation; and at a General Meeting of each society a resolution as follows, with names transposed, was carried—unanimously by the S. C. F., and with only one or two dissentients in the H. C. S. The resolution:

"That this meeting of the members of the Socialist Co-operative Federation, Limited, agrees to amalgamate with the Hygienic Co-operative Society, Limited. The rules of the Socialist Co-operative Federation, Limited, shall be the rules of the amalgamated societies, which shall be one society, called the Socialist Co-operative Federation, Limited; and the £1 shares of the Hygienic Co-operative Society, Limited, shall be converted into four 5s. shares of the Socialist Co-operative Federation, Limited."

To comply with the Act of Parliament, it was necessary to hold a special meeting of each society subsequently, to confirm the resolution. The special meeting of the two societies was held soon after, at the hall of the Social-Democratic Federation, 337 Strand. Mr. J. B. O'Callaghan was in the chair. On his right was a good gathering of the members of the S. C. F., and on his left an equally good muster of the H. C. S. The resolution having been duly moved and seconded by members of the S. C. F., was put and carried unanimously by the S. C. F., amid cheers from both societies. In like manner the resolution was carried by the H. C. S. for themselves. The event was unique in the history of co-operation and Socialism, and the feeling that prevailed was good augury for healthy progress in the future. It was a striking proof of the spread of sound Socialist principles. A few days after the special meeting, I had the pleasure of taking the necessary official documents to the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and in about a week later the amalgamation was duly registered and the two societies became legally one. I may mention that amalgamation has been very rare among co-operative societies. In fact, when I went to the office for the necessary documentary forms, they were taken from a small pile in a pigeon-hole, the top one being thickly covered with dust. "You see," said the obliging official, "we have not had much demand for these. I think there has been only one instance of amalgamation before."

Well, by this amalgamation the Socialist Co-operative Federation starts with a membership of upwards of 300, and a paid-up capital of over £300, part of which, however, has been sunk by both societies in the necessary formation expenses and the cost of starting a business as regards the H. C. S.

It now remains for Socialists and all who have the welfare of the workers at heart to rally to the Socialist Co-operative Federation, which a faithful few have nursed into being, but which will still need the most watchful care if it is to prove as we hope the herald of an evangel which will bring great joy to many a downtrodden worker. The duty of Socialists to their store is to give it in every case the first chance of supplying their wants before seeking to purchase elsewhere. Next, to take up one or more 5s. shares (entrance fee 1s.), and so increase the capital and membership, enabling the society to go into production of commodities, and thus give such of the members as wish, opportunity to become their own employers. The S. C. F. being now a member of the Co-operative Wholesale, is in a position to execute orders for food, drink, clothing, furniture, etc., etc. To those about to marry, if I say "Don't," it is not in the sense of Punch's immortal advice, but, "Don't go to Tottenham Court Road. Come to 49 Southampton Row for your furnishing. You can go with an order from the S. C. F. and make your selection at the great Co-operative Wholesale. And so with anything which may be wanted by our members. If the store has not got it in stock, it can get it—"from a needle to an anchor."

We hope to organise social gatherings and entertainments, and to make the Socialist Co-operative Federation a bond of union for all Socialists of every shade of opinion, and for all good and true men and women who, though not calling themselves Socialists, are "filled with the spirit" of brotherhood. The Socialist Co-operative Federation is catholic in the truest sense. Let it have generous support.

D. C. DALLAS.

28 Grays Inn Road, Oct. 12.

AN AGITATED BISHOP.

THE Bishop of London (Dr. Temple) has been asked to join the Anti-Sweating League, the objects of which are: (1) To reduce the hours of labour and lessen overwork wherever it interferes with the health and comfort of the worker; (2) to abolish the cruel and varied systems known as "sweating," by which the worker is oppressed and deprived of the legitimate fruits of his labour; and (3) to seek to accomplish these ends by persuasion, combination, arbitration, legislation, and any other legal and constitutional means, as well as by promoting obedience to industrial statutes.

The organisation is apparently of a very innocent one as times go; being "formed wholly apart from any socialistic agitation or agitators of the day," and being also under the patronage of "many well-known influential noblemen and gentlemen." So that one would have thought that even a bishop might have blessed its work in favour of the poor and oppressed, even if he did not open his own episcopal purse and roll up his own lawn sleeves, and throw himself into it heart and soul. But no! the meek servant of the Man of Sorrows arises in his wrath and pens the following letter, dated from a palace, and written presumably in the name of him who had not where to lay his head:—

"My Dear Sir,—I should prefer to wait for the report of the Committee of Lords (on sweating) before joining the Anti-Sweating League, and I could not approve of such expressions as I see in your 'objects,' viz., 'by which the worker is oppressed and deprived of the legitimate fruits of his labour.' I do not know what are 'the legitimate fruits' of any man's labour, and such language seems to me to be misleading and mischievous. The choice is constantly this: Shall a man get wages on which he cannot live, or no wages at all? I think he ought, in that alternative, to get no wages at all. Then he will be driven to transfer his labour to some place where he can get wages on which he can live. The principle for which I would contend is: If a man employs another man he must give him wages on which he can live. But there are businesses, I fear, which would cease to exist if this principle were universally adopted, and the workers in them would get nothing. I think it imperative always to bear this in mind."

Just read that letter over and fix the salient points of it in your mind. Try and put yourself in the position which a man must occupy who writes like that, and yet can talk as he is paid to talk every Sunday, and on week-days too when he gets the chance. Then try and fathom the filth which in the form of modern society engenders such reptiles, and there will rise in you a "holy wrath" which will not go to make you a very strong upholder of the present system.

THE CHICAGO MARTYRS.

COMRADE,—You are perhaps one of those that groan beneath the load which the present system piles upon the back of labour, you suffer, you are sweated, you are tired of the endless round of misery to which the poor are condemned. Perhaps you have borne your part in the battles which have recently raged between capital and labour. If you suffer, if you have fought to mitigate that suffering, to obtain a little more bread or a little more leisure, we ask you to listen while we tell the story of how brave men suffered and died for the good of the poor and the brotherhood and happiness of mankind.

America, as you all know, is the country of gigantic labour struggles. For some years previous to the period to which we are about to refer, there had been considerable agitation there, and especially in the city of Chicago, on the eight hour question. The result of this agitation was that legislative assemblies of various States and Congress had fixed an eight hour day for all government work. The workers, however, seeing how useless it was to hope to lessen the hours of slavery they endured under private masters by legislative action, determined to try what they could do for themselves. They determined at a General Conference of the National Labour Union at Chicago in 1885, to force this concession from the employers by means of a general strike beginning May 1st, 1886.

As the eventful day approached, our comrades Spies, Parsons, Fielden, Engel, and Schwab, who were working in Chicago, though as Socialists they knew that the agitation for eight hours would only lead to a slight palliation of the misery of the people, yet determined to help them to gain this small advantage, so that they might prove to them that they were sincere in their desire to bring better times for the workers. In this agitation our comrades spoke strongly; it was necessary. The capitalist press of America, the most brutal, cruel, and barbarous of the whole world, shrieked for the blood of the people. Poison, bullet, steel, and dynamite were called for to exterminate the "troublesome scoundrels" who would not slave and starve in Christian peace to oblige their lords and masters. Our comrades found it necessary to remind the capitalists that a wholesale slaughter of the people would not be submitted to quietly, and that murder would be met by the extermination of the murderers. The rich were not to have a monopoly of the "resources of civilisation."

The 1st of May arrived. The people abandoned the factories by thousands and poured into the streets. The capitalists were alarmed, and determined to strike terror into these rebels against their rule. The opportunity soon arrived. On May 3rd, some men who had been locked out from McCormick's works some months before the strike—because they had committed the offence of belonging to a trade union—threw a few stones at some blacklegs belonging to the factory. The police arriving on the spot fell upon the crowd with their accustomed brutality, and shot and bludgeoned men, women, and children without mercy. Six dead and many wounded were left upon the ground.

These cold-blooded murders were witnessed by our comrade Spies, who had been addressing a meeting close to the factory previous to the massacre, and he rushed back to the offices of the revolutionary paper of which he was editor, and drew up a burning appeal to the people to end, by force of arms if necessary, a system by which such wholesale murders were possible. It was also decided to call a meeting in the Haymarket on the evening of May 4th, to protest against the massacre committed by the police.

At this meeting, Parson, Spies, and Fielden were the speakers; the meeting was a quiet one, so quiet that the Mayor of Chicago, who had attended it for the purpose of dispersing it by main force in case of trouble, left the meeting at about ten o'clock, and went home after telling the officer in command of the police, Captain Bonfield, that there would be no trouble that night, and he had better dismiss his reserves. This was the opportunity the police wanted; the mayor was out of the way; it was late on a cold spring night, and most of the people had dispersed. What an opportunity of teaching these "agitators" a lesson! So 180 police marched out of the station and advanced on the meeting, armed to the teeth for massacre and slaughter. Their captain called on the meeting to disperse, and then the police rushed on to the attack, when suddenly something came flying through the air from the crowd and exploded in their midst, strewing the ground with the men who intended to butcher the people. The police rallied from their first shock, and poured a murderous volley into the peaceful bystanders, who, totally unarmed, fled in confusion. Many police were wounded, and one, Matthias Degan, was killed. It was a dynamite bomb, flung by no one knows who, that had struck terror into these legal murderers.

Then followed what always follows when the middle classes are struck with terror at what seems an impending revolt of their miserable slaves. Chicago was placed in a state of siege; the houses of all who had made themselves active in the labour agitation were entered, without warrants, without any legal formality; for what are legal formalities to frightened slaveholders? Not only were the most prominent men in the agitation thrown into prison, but even the humblest concerned in the revolutionary agitation were not safe from arrest.

Out of the crowd of prisoners, eight men, the boldest and the best, were selected for judicial murder. They were "tried" before a judge as bigoted and unjust as Edlin; the "evidence" was got up by police officers beside whom Endacott was an angel; the jury was packed by men certain to convict, and middle-class gold was unsparingly spent to secure a conviction. Result: a verdict of guilty, seven men—Lingg, Parsons, Spies, Engel, Fischer, Fielden, and Schwab—sentenced to death, and one, Oscar Neebe, to fifteen years penal servitude. The death sentence on Fielden and Schwab was afterwards "mercifully" commuted to a life-long captivity in the hell of the prisons in America. Young Lingg preferred to die by his own hand to that of the executioner. Parsons, Spies, Fischer, and Engel died on the scaffold on the 11th of November, 1887, with a courage that filled even their enemies with admiration. But retribution has followed close upon the heels of their murderers. The police officers who got up the case have been turned out of the force for the grossest perjury and corruption it is possible even for a policeman to perpetrate. The judge who pronounced the sentence is nearly mad with terror; innocent blood cries from the ground, and shall it not find an avenger? The furies of remorse and retribution stalk behind all that have lent their aid to this legal butchery.

And now, friends, a word with you. These men were not "executed" because they were proved to be guilty of the death of Deegan. No evidence was brought forward at the trial to even prove that it was a revolutionist who had thrown the bomb. Every attempt made by the prosecution to connect any one of the "executed" men with the bomb-throwing failed and broke down utterly. No, they were murdered because they loved the people, because they defied their oppressors, because, in a word, they were Socialists. Now, friend, great events are impending; there are signs that the last struggle between the oppressors and the oppressed is near at hand. In the day when the robbed and robbers come face to face, upon which side will you be? On that of the workers, or that of the rich sweaters, "those luxurious drones who eat your flesh and drink your blood." Choose now, and prepare for the battle that is near at hand!

IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

In no other place perhaps is industrial and social development so plainly seen and so easily traced as in the opening up of new gold or diamond fields. Here in Southern Africa, where a very short time is sufficient to change the entire appearance of different parts of the country, and where houses and townships spring up as only "Jerry builders" know how, one would think that the lesson all so plainly taught could not fail to be learnt by all observers. However, knowledge of this kind might be "dumped down" in cartloads on the gold-fields, and few be got to take even a shovelful of it. And yet men who show no desire to know, are by the force of events forced to learn; but as yet the way to their heads has been through their stomachs. The masters at Johannesburg, relying upon the influx of British emigrants (engineers, blacksmiths, and other tradesmen), caused in a measure by Mr. Kynoch's, M.P., lying cablegram, have recently notified their employees of their intention to increase the working-day by one hour with a decrease of pay. This much might have been anticipated by the men had they but been alive to what was going on around them in their work-a-day lives, and might have been much better prepared for. The "shovelful" would have served them had they but taken it. However, on the employers' intimation being made known, the men engaged in the engineering trades—fitters, blacksmiths, etc.—at once formed a Trades' Society, and met the master's notice with a demand for an eight-hour day and 25 per cent. increase of wages. A strike was the result, and the men at once cabled to the United States and to Britain warning fellow tradesmen against coming to the Gold Fields. Notices appeared in all the leading Colonial papers advising men to keep away from Johannesburg until the dispute was settled. It is said that the men are receiving financial support from capitalists, whose object in doing so is to "Bear the Share Market." This is a new feature in strikes which one, keeping in mind the tale of the Kilkenny cats, might almost wish might bring about the same termination.

If one could believe South African papers—but they are as great liars as British—one would say the capitalists at the Gold Fields are getting into hot water. Truly the ills they are heir to are many, and seem to be multiplying. One paper wonders how it is that native labour is growing so scarce; another upbraids the London dockers and the Johannesburg strikers in the same issue, whilst a third of like kidney goes off into a fit of indignation over the fact that "the natives are getting very impudent and lawless" I don't blame them either. I have an "idea" that if the "we's" who write these editorials had but to go down the mines as these poor devils, who are "getting so lawless," have for 14 or 16 hours at a stretch amongst slush and water, and on coming up at once marched off to the "compound," which they are not allowed to leave after nightfall, and get 15s. per week for their slavery, they, the editors, would no longer wonder at the scarcity of native labour, or the lawlessness or impudence either. There is very little demand just now for tradesmen of any kind, and men at home would do well to remember that the streets of Johannesburg are no more paved with gold than are the streets of "Modern Babylon."

Employment is getting more difficult to obtain every week, and in a short time, as things are going, "tramps and unemployed" will be common enough. The article in Blackwood's on "The Lepers on Robben Island," has shamed the government into a promise to do something for those suffering from that terrible disease. Both the Premier (Sir Gordon Sprigg) and the ex-Colonial Secretary (the Hon. J. Tudhope) join each other in saying that "the article was a gross exaggeration." Venturing an opinion I might say that to my mind the article is not one whit too severe. In truth it is not severe enough when one knows the living death those afflicted with leprosy on Robben Island endure.

A strike of natives in the Millwood district gold field has just been ended by the authorities sentencing the three ringleaders to three months' imprisonment each.

The men on strike at Johannesburg still hold out, and unanimously refuse the offer of the masters to refer the eight hours question to arbitration. It is confidently expected that the men will win.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The strike among the coal miners in the Lens district is now over. At Courrières and Lievin the pits have all along been guarded by strong bodies of soldiers, and the military have been told off to work the pumping engines. But at Lens itself the mayor took up the cause of the workers, and boldly announced that he would refuse to billet any troops which the Prefect of the Department might send. Last week the directors of all the mines where work had ceased, held a conference at Douai, and agreed to increase the wages of the coal-miners by 2½d. The strikers, having thus realised their wants, resolved to resume work. It is said that the moral effect of the worker's victory is very considerable indeed in the neighbouring coal basins, so we may soon expect to hear something more from these quarters.

GERMANY.

Once more the monster trial of Elberfeldt is announced to begin in that town on November 18th. The number of the accused has been considerably reduced, and yet ninety-one Socialists will have to appear before a special set of Nupkinses, who have been trained for that particular job. Convictions must of necessity come out of this judicial farce; it is willed so in high quarters. Among the accused are four German Socialist deputies, comrades Bebel, Harn, Grillenberger, and Schumacher. All the accused have been members of a secret society, and have conspired against the safety and welfare of their beloved Fatherland! The German Social-Democratic Party a secret society! Risum tenentis, amici! Let us burst for laughing, friends!

BELGIUM.

In the village of Court St. Etienne, Brabant, a Belgian has erected a monument to all religions; so we are told by the Freethinker. The Romans first put the idea of a Pantheon into form, although the fellowship of all faiths was recognised by the Greeks in many ways, and even by the Egyptians and Hindoos. This Belgian monument is forty feet high, of two stories and a cupola. The four facades, in French, Greek, Sanskrit, and Egyptian characters, give the famous old saying, "The one has many names." On the outside of the columns are carved the monogram of Jesus, the name Allah in Arabic, that of Odin in Scandinavian or Runic; the Greek invocation at Delphi, "Thou art"; the sacred monosyllables of Hebrews, Brahmins, Chaldeans, and Chinese; and as symbols are to be seen the hammer of Thor, the thunderbolt of Jove, the sacred flame of the Parsees, and the Buddhist wheel of the law. What are the Catholic peasants of that small village going to think about the amalgamation of all these creeds? For ages past they have thought that their religion is the only one to bring salvation, and now there comes a facetious individual who prepares for them a kind of holy mixture that they are not likely to be able to digest. Perhaps they will all soon have become freethinkers, and in Belgium freethought is generally the first stage towards Socialism. All is well that ends well!

A new fortnightly paper, Antikrist (the Antichrist) has appeared at Antwerp, especially devoted to questions of freethought. The address is, Kathelyne Vest, 33, and the price 1s. 6d. per year.

A pamphlet written by comrade Procureur, one of the editors of Vooruit, of Ghent, on the emigration question (Zes maanden in Argentina—Six Months in the Argentine Republic), has met with great success. Already ten thousand copies have been sold, and a new edition is now in preparation.

The central committee of the Socialist organisations of Ghent have decided to convene, on the 1st of November, a general conference of all the Flemish workers' societies of Belgium. The principal item on the agenda paper is, Ways and means for the wholesale distribution of Socialist literature (both newspapers and pamphlets).

SPAIN.

LINARES.—The labour movement is not asleep in Spain any more than elsewhere, but moves on steadily, though quietly and slowly. The Socialist Labour Party is making itself firm standing ground in Linares, amongst other places, and the members of the local branch are busy here with propagandist work. They hold constant meetings, which are well attended by the working-class, who listen with the greatest interest to the matters discussed. The bourgeoisie, and especially the republicans, are not well pleased to see the "masses" swiftly coming within the clutches of the Socialists.

JAEN.—A Socialist branch is in course of formation in this town; its committee accept the principles of the programme of the Labour Party.

In various other centres active propagandist work is being organised by the Anarchists for the winter months. Those of Gracia (Barcelona) are constituting two new groups, one for young people and one for women (perhaps the first in Spain), the latter calling itself "Equality with men." For this last, we can but wish it a speedy amalgamation with the groups composed of the women's brothers and fellow-workers; for the best way to do away with the distinctions derogatory to the dignity and well-being of women is, surely, to ignore such distinctions among themselves, and to work quietly side by side each in their own way. I say this only with regard to the Socialist movement, of course, for in the different trades and industries special unions are often necessary for special causes, according to the judgment of the workers at the time.

ALCOY.—A mill-owner of Antequera, going to Alcoy for more "hands" in consequence of a strike among his men, managed to secure twelve workmen, alleging that emigration was the cause of the scarcity of "hands" in his neighbourhood. However, when those newly engaged discovered the true state of the case, they had the courage and esprit de corps to return straight to Alcoy, declaring they had been engaged under false pretences, and were not going to step into their fellow-workers' shoes. The result was that the strikers were taken back on their own terms.

BARCELONA.—The 11th November will be celebrated by the Anarchists of this city.

SAN MARTIN DE PROVENÇAL.—The Anarchist Committee here have also announced the forthcoming commemoration of the Chicago tragedy.

ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

BUENOS AYRES.—The Socialists of this town announce the formation of a new Communist group, which, inspired by the approaching date, they call the "Eleventh of November."

ITALY.

VICENZA.—The other day, a workman named Giuseppe Gasparello tried to kill himself by taking a dose of laudanum. He was discovered in time and taken to the hospital, and is now recovering. I mention this poor fellow's case, not because of the fact itself, seeing that one can read of some such case every time one takes up a journal, but as illustrative of the difficulties the working-class experience in trying to fight their own battles in comparatively small towns or limited neighbourhoods. Here was a young man with a family to support, who had been out of employment for a year, owing to the fact that he had taken part in the strikes in the neighbourhood this time last year, and had been sentenced to 41 days' gaol in consequence. He becomes branded, none of the local masters will employ him, he loses hope finally, and in despair makes an attempt to get out of the whole business.

PIEVE DI SCHIO.—The employees of a wool-spinning factory here, make from 2 fr. 20 c. (1s. 10d.) to 1 fr. a-day, according to the different branches of the trade. The weavers, working eleven hours, make an average of 2 fr., only about 50 out of 200 averaging 3 fr. 50 c. a-day. The carders get 2 fr. 20 c. a-day, and the dyers and labourers about 1½d. an hour. M. M.

The Scottish Bakers.

The demand for a shorter day's work and a uniform starting hour—5 a.m.—is meeting with great success. The employers in Dunfermline and west Fife district bowed to it with a grudge, and the men began on Monday 14th with their well-earned concessions. The Arbroath masters are trying the new arrangement for a fortnight, to see how it works. It works well for the operatives in those places where it has already been tried; one small shop in Kilsyth, for instance, had to employ two extra men. This sort of thing, the men are confident, will take up a great part of that surplus labour which is a great danger to their movement, and with the increased strength it will give them they expect to force a minimum wage of 30s. per week. Among the places where the demands of the men have been conceded are Bathgate, Armadale, Whitburn, Broxburn, and Uphall, with the exception of two employers—Leisk at Uphall, and Kay at Whitburn. If the people only knew that in some sweating bakeries the men are so pushed and driven that their sweat flows continually down their arms and is wrought up in the bread, they would make a louder cry to free the bakers from that slavery which has hitherto murdered many of Scotland's most industrious men. Verily, the bakers have in the past given of their strength and life to prolong the present sham society!

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

The Silvertown Strike.

On Sunday, Oct. 20, the Silvertown strikers, in company with the riverside labourers and other East-end trade unions, held a large demonstration in Victoria Park. Their leaders complain bitterly of the heartless indifference shown by such middle-class papers as the Telegraph and Daily News. They should remember that it does not do to expose the merciless sweating by which respectable Liberals, Radicals, and Conservatives get their 15 per cent. dividends. This is the reason for the conspiracy of silence on the part of the big capitalist papers.

The Bakers.

While the Silvertown people were holding their meeting, the bakers also marched into the Park and held a big demonstration. The men seem very determined and enthusiastic, and there can be little doubt that they have the right sort of spirit which will conquer in the near future.

The Postmen.

These overworked and underpaid slaves of the State expounded their grievances in Hyde Park last Sunday. They are forced to slave in all sorts of weather for 16s. a week, gradually rising at the rate of 1s. a year to the munificent sum of 21s. and 23s. weekly. Meanwhile, they have the pleasure of seeing the Hon. Cecil Raikes and Co. take their £1,000 and £2,500 for doing little or no work at all. But a new spirit is abroad, the dry bones are stirring and heaving with life, and the slavery of the workers will not last much longer.

Miners in Conference.

An important resolution was agreed to at the recent conference of miners: "That this conference hereby agrees that on and after the 1st of January, 1890, all men and boys represented at this conference working underground, shall commence working not more than eight hours per day from bank to bank." This probably means a general strike in January, for a ballot is to be taken of the men as to whether they are prepared to hand in their notices on 1st of January next. Some of the mining delegates, however, who have evidently been bitten by certain cowardly forms of State Socialism, appeared to think that the men ought to go to Parliament to get what they were quite able to obtain by their own action, but they were in a very inconsiderable minority. There can be no doubt that the men will decide to strike if an eight hour day is not granted. The present time is too favourable for them to neglect such a splendid opportunity.

The Railway Men.

The railway men are also going for a general movement to improve their condition. A splendid demonstration was held at Manchester on Sunday, Oct. 13th, when the following resolution was carried with the utmost enthusiasm:—

"1st, That a week's pay be guaranteed to all grades of railway men who, by the terms of their agreement, have to devote the whole of their time to the service. 2nd, That the maximum hours of duty be 10 per day, excepting platelayers, whose duties should be 9 per day. For shunters in busy goods yards, signalmen at important signal boxes, and boxes always open, 8 hours shall be the maximum. In every case each day's duty to stand by itself, and not to be counted as a part of a week's labour. 3rd, That overtime be paid for at the rate of time and a quarter, and Sunday duty at time and a half."

These demands are to be presented to the directors, and it is to be hoped that the men will not be afraid to strike for them. Any appeal to the tender mercies of the railway directors would be a waste of time. These gentry must be frightened into humanity.

We must remember, however, that these railway servants who passed the above resolutions, are the aristocrats of the profession—enginemen, signalmen, and guards. They have a balance of £80,000 in the bank, and have hitherto been one of the most aristocratic and reactionary trade unions in the country. That they are making a stir is indeed a good sign; but they have not quite got rid of their old spirit. The other day they expressly excluded those common persons the platelayers from their highly respectable organisation, which, after all, is only a very minute section of the railway men, numbering as it does only 13,000 employees out of 360,000. Therefore, the other employees, who are as yet unorganised, are forming a union of their own. The subscriptions are too high, and the tone is too exclusive of the older organisation. John Burns addressed a large demonstration of these un-aristocratic railway workers at Battersea Park Gates last Sunday, together with W. S. de Mattos, Rogers, Ward, and several other Socialists. The new union is increasing rapidly, and promises to be a grand success. It will do immense good, if only by forcing the older union to "open its gates."

"Christian Charity."

"Alas for the rarity of Christian charity under the sun!" So sang Tom Hood many years ago; and in the present age, when Christianity takes the form of rabid puritanism, whose object seems to be to suppress everybody and everything that is not in accord with its pious crotchets, the remark applies still more strongly. The Daily Telegraph has recently devoted a considerable portion of its space to correspondence on the subject of Justice to Work-women. I wish I had space for many of the letters here, as they generally point out how many thousands of women are driven into prostitution by the low wages paid. But what I want to point out here is the kind consideration the Magdalenes of the present day receive from the people who profess to worship a man whose chosen companions were the outcasts of society. A contributor to the Telegraph, in the course of his wanderings through the East-end, found "in Wapping, in a reeking, fever-laden alley off Old Gravel Lane," a young woman with two children in a damp, stinking cellar—a dungeon in the Bastille of commercialism—earning 5s. or 6s. a-week at the "Christian" employment of sack-making. She had once been a rustic beauty, but had "fallen" and had been deserted, with her two children, by the scoundrel who had won her heart, and left her to the tender mercies of the sweater. The representative of the Telegraph asked if she got any help from pious philanthropists. This is her reply: "No, I don't get help from anyone. I don't care to ask for it, though I can't help noticing that the religious and charitable people mostly give to the 'carneying' ones and those that least need it. I have had a misfortune, and they fight shy of such as me." And these are the followers of a meek and lowly Saviour—these self-righteous Pharisees. Reader, have you read the story of Fantine in Hugo's 'Les Miserables'? To-day she still struggles on in a cellar making sacks at a starvation wage to get bread for her little ones, while the Scribe and Pharisee point the finger of scorn at her. Instead of helping her they try to hound her into the streets, to sell herself for bread.

No Rent!

The Daily Telegraph is advocating what seems very much like a No Rent campaign as a cure for the starvation of the poor. The same contributor, speaking of the rooms in which the wretched victims of our civilisation dwell, says:

"Yet something should be at once attempted. Were there 'judicial rents' for London as for Ireland, sixpence a-week would be too much for any of the rooms visited, including those of the persons named. Were there efficient sanitary legislation and inspection, human beings would not be permitted to be housed in such miserable and dirty structures, ill-ventilated, and without adequate provision for cleanliness. But the poor will not always be content to be robbed, either by foremen, moneylenders who have no pawnbroker's licence, or by the owners of ramshackle houses. They are already conscious of being wronged, and mutterings are being heard."

Well, if "something is to be at once attempted," and if these dens in which the poor live are not worth sixpence a-week, it is clear they are not worth any rent at all. So the workers of East London must take the advice of the Telegraph and nail the "No Rent" flag to the mast. When the landlord comes, tell him not to call again. Perhaps when there is "no rent" paid in East London our legislators may be graciously pleased to consider that the poor "are suffering considerably from hunger," and are determined to suffer no longer.

Good Advice.

Those labour leaders who cannot conduct an agitation without assistance from members of that "black police," the clerical profession, might take the following to heart. "Scottie" in the Labour Tribune says: "At Clydebridge the strike among the steel-workers still continues, but the men have offered to submit the question in dispute to arbitration. Unfortunately they have selected three clergymen as arbitrators. As a rule these men are the worst possible for a job of the kind. Their business capacity is frequently nil, while their sympathies, in a sneaking kind of way, are always with the rich." A word to the wise should be sufficient. N.

All the members were in thorough sympathy with the views of the League on the subject, and the Council would do well in giving all the aid in its power to this advanced body of men and women. Meetings will be held here every Sunday evening at 7.30.—M.

MITCHAM.—A short meeting held on Fair Green addressed by Kitz; weather unfavourable; 13 Weal sold, 8d. collected, and one member made.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers, Lyne, jun., Weardale, S.D.F. Also a good meeting at St. Ann's Road; speakers, Crouch, Maughan, and A. J. Smith; fair sale of Weal at both meetings. At our meeting at 8 p.m., Crouch lectured to good audience on "Socialism the only hope of the Workers"; good discussion after lecture.

STREATHAM.—At the Liberal Club on Saturday, a large number of comrades rallied to listen to a lecture on "Socialism a Delusion." The affair was a disillusion for the lecturer, who was, as one of the audience put it, "upset" at what he heard in reply. At the Fountain a good meeting held by Gregory; good sale of literature and Weal.

ST. GEORGE'S EAST.—Sunday morning, in spite of wet, a very fair meeting was held at Union Street, addressed by Leech, Turner, and Leggatt, the last named, who has again been discharged from his employment, making a vigorous appeal for more organisation on the part of the workers. A course of indoor lectures is being arranged for the winter months.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 14th, Hugh O. Pentecost's lecture on "The Timid Majority" was read and discussed. At Castle Street on 19th, Duncan and Leatham held a meeting, which was prolonged for two hours and a half amid boisterous enthusiasm, largely caused by the answers given to questions put by two angry swells. Whole stock of papers (including unsold stock of the previous week) sold off, besides tickets for a meeting to be addressed by Kropotkin in a few days.—L.

EDINBURGH (S. S. F.).—Excellent meeting in Moulders' Hall on Sunday 13th, when Bell lectured upon "What Socialism is Not"; animated discussion. The new society is progressing in all ways.—J. L.

GLASGOW.—On Tuesday night Downie and Joe Burgoyne spoke on Cathedral Square, where a well-known temperance fadist put forward some objections, which were disposed of by Burgoyne. On Sunday, owing to wet weather, no meeting was held on Jail Square; our comrades, however, turned up at Paisley Road in the evening, and Joe Burgoyne delivered a stirring address to a fine meeting.

LEICESTER.—Saturday and Sunday, 19th and 20th, H. H. Sparling gave four addresses. The first was at Loughborough, to a good audience; it is expected that Loughborough will now form a branch. The first address Sunday morning was at the Radical Club, subject "Thrift"; full house. The usual addresses were given in Russell Square and Humberstone Gate; both well attended. Collection 16s.; Commonweal sold, four quires.

MANCHESTER.—Some of our members attend a series of discussions on "Present Day Social Problems" which take place weekly in Ancoats. Whatever they may begin with, "Socialism" inevitably becomes the bone of contention, and a professor of political economy had a rather hot night of it on Wednesday from our speakers, who lose no opportunity of driving home their principles. On Sunday Ritson and Horrocks (organiser of the G.-W. and G. L. Union) addressed a large meeting of the gas-workers in Stevenson Square. 52 Commonweal sold by our branch.

NORWICH.—On Thursday last comrade A. Moore spoke in the Gordon Hall on "Temperance"; sharp discussion followed. Saturday evening a paper on "Strikes" was read at one of the local societies; three comrades took part, also comrade Blackwell, who had just arrived from London. Sunday morning, a short meeting was held in the Market Place, opened by W. Moore and followed by Blackwell. Owing to the wretched state of the weather, remaining open-air meetings could not be held. In the afternoon a meeting was held in the Gordon Hall, comrade Brock in the chair; Blackwell gave an address on "Anarchism," his remarks being cordially received; several questions asked, and answered satisfactorily. In the evening Blackwell lectured on the "Gospel of Freedom," Poynts in the chair; opposition was given by a late member of the branch, which was well replied to by Blackwell; audience very appreciative.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—In the Great Market place on Sunday evening Rooke and Proctor spoke; 1s. 9d. collected for club funds. Subsequently, at the club, the members discussed the programme for the winter session. Lectures, discussion class, a gymnasium, and weekly concerts are about to be initiated.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—Our usual meeting was held on Tuesday, and on Wednesday we attended a debate in connection with a local literary and debating society. The paper given was entitled "Socialism," but in reality simply dealt with compulsory education. Our comrades enlarged upon the subject and drew forth some amusing though not very intelligent criticism.—E. C. C.

THE PRINCIPLES OF SOCIALISM MADE PLAIN.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary
Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome.
Labour would be employed in co-operation,
and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners
for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries.
There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto—

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property
destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine
Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

As to the Falcarragh case, the Star says: "The verdict of manslaughter against William Coll is manifestly a technical verdict only." So was that against Parsons and the others, but the Star endorsed it. "Even the packed jury were struck by the flagrant discrepancies in the police evidence. No two depositions agreed with each other, and nearly every constable deposed one story to his superiors and told another in the witness-box. In such circumstances only a jury who were determined to override every consideration of decency could have found the prisoner guilty of murder." Just like Chicago: but this was in Ireland, which makes all the difference.

"They would have done better to acquit William Coll, but they have assumed that as he was in the crowd he was constructively guilty of the offence. . . . The moral effect of the trials so far is strongly against the Government, and when Father McFadden is put in the dock the criminal folly of the Government will stamp them even more strongly as the real authors of Martin's death." Still very like Chicago. May we hope that the Star will write like this about our men when commenting on the coming celebration? Or will it repeat and perpetuate the criminal blunder it made last year?

The German Federal Council has determined "to give a permanent character" to the legislation against the Socialist movement. A coercion code is to be framed and the authorities hope that this will enable them to cope with the Socialist agitation, which "aims at arousing the passions of the masses and inciting them to the commission of acts of violence." The Federal Council intend to pass what in America would be called an "ironclad law," which, it is hoped, will enable Bismarck to suppress the Socialist party. The administration of the new law is to be "tempered by a court of appeal"—appointed by the Government,—say the press telegrams. What kind of "tempering" that will be may be judged by those who have even in the most cursory manner watched the course of German events. The "permanent character" of the law may destroy that of the Government.

Well! the Brighton election has come and gone, and nobody seems a "penny the worse." Last week we said all that was needed as to its political bearing either way; and this week we need only comment on the manner in which the respective party organs have taken it. The Tories have been whooping over their "great victory," and say nothing of their largely lessened majority. The Liberals have talked altogether of the lessened majority, assuring us they never—no, never!—expected anything else. As usual, the Pall Mall has pushed its protestations to the point of absurdity. Heading its article "Bravo, Brighton!" it professed to have hoped for exactly that result, no more and no less. In fact, a victory would have sorely disappointed it! This was also what it said when its friends the pseudo-Radical puritans were thoroughly thrashed on the County Council the other week. That's the worst of being a party politician; you've got to shout for your own side whatever has happened. And then people wonder why we keep out of "politics."

A certain section of the Socialist party is trying to get the London County Council to found a new and improved slave market, with the latest appliances in the way of slave-pens and auction-blocks, tabulated scales of quotations for blood-money, and automatic machinery for brushing aside the worthless and outworn articles of merchandise. This is not what they call it, but what it is. It is on their lips a "Labour Exchange," furnishing "correct information as to the state of the labour market," and a "mart" for "skilled and unskilled labour." But in spite of the polite phrasing, it is easy to see what is underneath, and one can only wonder at the infatuation which can lead Socialists of howsoever mild a type into the folly of helping the capitalist in further developing his methods of man-trading and aiding in the recognition of his "right" of making profit upon the sale and purchase of his fellow-men.

That the County Council is likely to take up such a scheme I do not believe. Hitherto it has been pretty sound on the labour question. Only Tuesday week it negated a recommendation from one of the committees that a sweating firm of builders be entrusted with a job, and sent that part of the report back for re-consideration. At the same meeting it also sent back a recommendation that the sweating contractor at Crossness be let go free. All which does not look as though the projected deputation would be accorded the promise they will seek.

In the last number of Reynolds "Dodo" recommends, among other writings which "give a most pleasant, popular, and fascinating aspect of Socialistic ideas," two which we have not before heard of—"Grunland's 'Co-operative Commonwealth'" and "Prince Krapotkin's article on Socialism in the 'Encyclopedia Britannica.'" Those who search for these may find Grönlund's 'Co-operative Commonwealth,' but they will not find the article described. There is an article on Socialism in the 'Encyclopedia,' but, as you know, this is written by Mr. Kirkup, who, with all his merits, cannot equal Kropotkin as an exponent of the social problem. S.

MR. LABOUCHERE'S RADICAL PROGRAMME.

MR. LABOUCHERE appeared in Glasgow the other week as the acknowledged leader of the Radical section of the Liberal party. That his Radicalism was not regarded by the capitalist class with much alarm was made evident by the crowd of wealthy exploiters who accompanied him to the platform: and the detailed confession of political faith which he gave more than justified their assurance. It is true that several leading newspapers professed to regard it as quite a revolutionary utterance—but the notion entertained by "leading newspapers" of what is revolutionary, is not of much account.

Mr. Labouchere vigorously denounced the Tories and the Liberal Unionists, and spoke of the royal family just as he would of anybody else who wanted to beg or borrow money of him. He advocated triennial parliaments, payment of members, and the abolition of the House of Lords. He was also in favour of a great reduction in public expenditure, and the abolition of sinecure offices. With Mr. Labouchere's opinions upon such matters we Socialists are not in the least concerned. They do not bear, even remotely, upon the terrible Labour Struggle which rages around us. Were his full programme realised to-morrow we should still be a hundred years behind America and France politically. The wages of the workers would not be raised one halfpenny, or their hours reduced one minute. Mr. Labouchere knows this, and therefore speaks cheerily, for he is a rich man; and the money-mongers around him know it also and applaud him heartily, for they also are rich men. Mr. Labouchere's Radicalism will undoubtedly become popular with the bourgeois classes when they are a little better educated in politics; it exactly suits their commercial notions. Don't pay for anything you don't get, and for what you do get pay as little as you can; that is their golden rule, and Mr. Labouchere understands it both in precept and practice.

It is in Mr. Labouchere's remarks on land and labour legislation that we Socialists are interested, not because we regard his opinions of any value in themselves, but because we recognise that Mr. Labouchere has attained a position of influence in the political councils of the people, and his views are likely to be regarded by some sincere folk as authoritative and final.

Mr. Labouchere does not believe in land nationalisation, not presumably because he would venture to deny the justice of the proposal, for he carefully refrained from giving any opinion upon that, the chief point, but because he professes to think that the individual and local circumstances of the tenants could not be properly regarded under a system of national ownership. The crudeness of this plea was immediately made manifest by Mr. Labouchere himself, when he stated that one of the most necessary reforms required under the present system of private ownership was the establishment of land courts all over the country to fix the rents and adjust the conditions of occupancy between landlords and tenants. If land courts can be instituted capable of dealing with the individual and local circumstances of tenants in relation to landlords, surely they could deal just as well with the individual and local circumstances of tenants in relation to the State, municipalities, or communes? That tenancy, as we now understand it, would be tolerated under a Socialist system, is very doubtful; but whether or no, it is obvious that so far as Mr. Labouchere's objection is concerned, the circumstances of tenants could be regarded quite as fairly under national or common ownership as under the existing or any possible system of private ownership. Indeed, one is amazed that even Mr. Labouchere ventured to raise such an objection in the face of the universally recognised fact that whether in Ireland, Scotland, or England, landlords have flagrantly disregarded alike the personal and local circumstances of their tenants, and have fleeced and ground them down to the uttermost degree.

The most remarkable statement in Mr. Labouchere's speech was his declaration, that although opposed to land nationalisation he was in favour of the nationalisation of coals and minerals. On the death of existing proprietors he would have all coals and minerals revert to the State without compensation. Mr. Labouchere did not attempt to draw any distinction in principle between the proposition to nationalise the surface of the land and what is beneath the surface, he simply affirmed that the latter was a just proposal and necessary in the interests of the community, therefore it should be done. It is well to bear in mind—as giving a clue to Mr. Labouchere's notion of what constitutes justice in such matters—that minerals are the property of the State in most European countries; that the great mineral holders in Britain are a very few individuals; and that the rental involved is only £10,000,000 as against some £250,000,000 yielded by the use of the land. The fact that a Royal Commission is about to enquire into the exaction of mineral royalties, and that the question is likely to be forced by miners and others into the forefront of politics, has also no doubt quickened Mr. Labouchere's opinion on the expediency and justice of such a measure. On this as on other matters, Mr. Labouchere shows that in politics he is concerned solely, as in business affairs, with the state of the "market" and the immediate profit of the transaction—not as to its relation to any economic principle or scheme of social well-being. No doubt, as Bakounine has shown, authoritative theories and principles have been responsible for a deal of mischief in moral and social effort; but the rejection of all theory and principle save expediency, has only been less disastrous because of its inherent self-destruction. Mr. Labouchere, it is true, has none of the Presbyterian rigidly righteous notions in politics of his "great leader," Mr. Gladstone; but he has what is certainly no better, a deal of the unscrupulousness of the landlord's bailiff and the chicanery of the cheap goods salesman.

Mr. Labouchere spoke at some length on the eight hours' question. The fact that he felt constrained to do so shows how rapidly Socialist "sentiment" is entering upon the domain of "practical politics." It was evident from the whole tone of his remarks that Mr. Labouchere would have willingly avoided referring to the subject, if he could have done so with safety to his reputation as the champion of the democracy. He, however, told us frankly that he did not believe that a universal eight hours' working-day could be established. He was careful not to commit himself against the principle of such a measure, he was against its expediency merely. The arguments by which he laboured to justify his conclusion bore the old familiar Tory complexion—indeed, had he substituted "Home Rule" for "eight hours' legislation," one might have imagined himself listening to Lord Hartington or Joe Chamberlain. The workers, he said, do not want an eight hours' day, and even if they did it would not be possible for Parliament to grant it; if, however, the workers would carefully consider the question with a due regard to their own and their employer's interests, and fully make up their minds as to what they really wanted, he was sure that a Radical Parliament would be prepared to meet their demands as far as was consistent with our commercial and imperial interests; but this, Parliament could only be expected to do, after the workers had done their best to effect their wishes by trade combinations and had failed.

That, then, according to Mr. Labouchere, is the utmost the workers can expect from Radical legislation, even when Toryism is extinct in Parliament—when Liberalism is sent to penal servitude on the Opposition benches, and Radicalism sits triumphant on the Government benches with Henry Labouchere at its head! What a happy prospect for the twelve and fourteen hours a-day workers with their inalienable votes, their paid representatives, their no-House-of-Lords Parliament, and their £100,000 a-year monarchy! What a glorious hope to inspire them to march to and from the polling-booths for the next twenty years!

I must note one of the statements Mr. Labouchere made in justification of his contention that it would be impossible to concede an eight hours' working-day—a statement which has a distinct flavour of that "Pigottism" about it which he and his friends so virtuously denounce. Dangling the old tattered and torn bogey of foreign competition before the eyes of his audience, he said that the foreign workmen works twelve to fourteen hours a day, and does not want his twelve to fourteen hours reduced to eight hours, because he likes to work hard when young and strong so as to provide for old age! It is hard to believe that Mr. Labouchere does not know that at every recent International Congress of workers the foreign delegates have declared unanimously for an international eight hours' day—only the British delegates being dissentients. It is difficult to comprehend how he can have forgotten that an International Conference of Government representatives has been convened to meet at Berne, chiefly to discuss this proposal, and that he himself voted in a division censuring the British Government for refusing to allow its delegate to discuss that one question. As to the foreign worker desiring to work long hours with the view of providing for the future, the statement is simply ridiculous. The foreign worker works long hours because under existing conditions he must do so to compete against the British worker. So far from having a special forethought for his future well-being and comfort, he has generally been credited with having much less of this prudential and thrifty faculty than his English and Scottish brethren. Mr. Labouchere's statement, therefore, only shows how utterly Tory in idea and method he can be when conserving the interests of his own class.

The special remedy which Mr. Labouchere proposes for the want and misery of the industrial classes is the abolition of all indirect taxation and the imposition of a substantial graduated income tax. He does not in the least degree question the right of landlords to exact rent, or the capitalists to exact profit; he merely asserts that all—including, he pointedly observed, the poorest workers—ought to contribute to the support of the State according to their ability. He, therefore, leaves the great land and labour problem untouched. He is either utterly ignorant of its meaning, or else too selfish or too cowardly to honestly face it. It is well that he has spoken so plainly: and if he and his party continue to speak so plainly they will do much to hasten the Social Revolution. There is little fear now, thank "God!" of the workers being led astray with Radicalism of that kind. The only danger is that Mr. Labouchere and his political crew may discover this truth in time, and trim their sails nearer to the winds and currents of modern Socialist thought, so as to deceive the more ignorant and ensnare the more timid of the democracy.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

We call the attention of those of our readers who understand the German tongue to the pamphlets published by comrade Max Schippel, editor of the Berlin Volks-Tribune (People's Tribune), under the general title of "Berliner Arbeiter-Bibliothek" (Berlin Workers' Library). The address is: Berlin, S. O., Oranienstrasse, 23. Up to the present date seven pamphlets have been issued, and the matter dealt with therein is all of the greatest interest to Socialists. One pamphlet, containing from 32 to 48 pages, small 8vo size, with cover and special title-page, is published every month, at the very low price of from 1½d. to 2d. The following pamphlets are now on sale: 1. 'Ein socialistischer Roman' (a Socialistic Novel). This is a condensed résumé of Edward Bellamy's well-known American romance. 2. 'Die Gewerkschaften' (the Trades Unions), by Max Schippel. This is an essay on trades-unionism, the general utility of these unions, and their social significance in the workers' movement. Comrade Schippel deals at some length with the prosecutions of the unions, the struggle between capital and labour, the "iron" law of wages, the objections that have been raised against unionism, and the propagandist and educational influence of trades-unionism. At the same time we may recommend an English work on the same subject—Howell: 'The Conflicts of Capital and Labour' (London, 1878). 3. 'Die Arbeiterinnen und Frauenfrage der Gegenwart' (the Woman Question and the Working-women's Question of the Present Day), by Clara Zetkin. This pamphlet tends to show that the commercialistic system of to-day has brought about a complete revolution in the economical situation of women, and that in consequence thereof their work in the family is effaced more and more as compared with their social activity. Therefore comrade Zetkin claims for her sex a large part of influence in politics and in public life generally. The pamphlet is well written, and suggestive of many a thought which would make our friend Belfort Bax's blood boil. 4. 'Der Socialismus in Frankreich seit der Pariser Commune' (Socialism in France since the Fall of Commune), by Ossip Zedkin; and 5. 'Charakterköpfe aus der frauösischen Arbeiterbewegung' (Leading Men of the French Workers' Movement), by the same. 6. 'Die Hausindustrie in Deutschland' (Domestic Industry in Germany), by Paul Kampffmeyer. This pamphlet has several interesting chapters on production for domestic use, trades, and domestic industry, the origin of the older branches of German domestic industry, the transformation of old guild-trades and their development as a supplementary occupation and as the principal calling of workmen in the open country. It shows the influence of these facts on the increase of the proletariat and on the development of the commercial system. The origin of the more modern domestic industry—namely, in relation to the production of articles of luxury and fashion; the retransformation of the factory industry into works of domestic industry; the formation of new conditions of interdependency brought about by domestic industry, and the particular difficulties in the way of its improvement, are very ably expounded, as also are the evil effects of the truck and sweating systems. 7. 'Junker und Bauer' (Feudal Landlordism and Peasantry), by Paul Kampffmeyer. This pamphlet deals with the development of the agricultural conditions of Germany, and shows, by dint of considerable statistical material, how miserably large classes of independant peasants have been degraded to the condition of poor agricultural wage-slaves by an unscrupulous and thieving feudal gentry.

The Federal Council has resolved to make the anti-Socialist law a permanent one, instead of adhering to the former practice of renewing the law every third year. These good people were mainly influenced by the consideration that it is less important at present to stop the propagation of Social-Democratic doctrines than to cope with the more active agitation carried on by the Socialists, which, it is held, aims at arousing the passions of the masses and inciting them to the commission of acts of violence. Where these fools have seen acts of violence, we do not know, and they must have had some terrible dreams indeed, for we contend that the Socialists, respecting their numbers, are in Germany quieter and calmer and cooler than anywhere else. The Federal Council came to the conclusion that, for the attainment of the imaginary object they had in view, the provisions of the common law did not suffice, but that definite enactments dealing directly with the Social-Democratic movement were required. Furthermore, it was resolved that inasmuch as the effective enforcement of the law suffered through the periodical prolongations, which always afforded material for fresh agitation (that's it: no more Bebel speeches!), it was wise to resort to permanent measures, with the view, moreover, of applying a permanent remedy (remedy is good!) to an evil which showed signs of being a lasting one. They now begin to see that Socialism is going to last—aye, and to triumph too! On the other hand, these good souls thought that the permanent enactment of the existing law would so greatly sharpen its effects, that it was advisable to mitigate or dispense with some of its provisions, and to provide wide guarantees against any enforcement of those which remained. Consequently the Federal Council has struck out the penal clauses 22 to 25 of the old law, which enabled authorities to impose stringent restrictions on professional agitators in respect to their place of residence and business, and the spreading of Socialist literature. The new Bill also creates a new Court of Appeal—of course for the protection of the citizens!—composed of eleven Nupkinses of the Superior Courts of Justice, to be appointed by the Federal Council, which shall hear and sift all petitions against any proceedings taken by the executive authorities under the Socialist law. The president of this new set of Nupkinses will be chosen by the Emperor himself—who is exceedingly anxious that his good friends, the Socialists, should have fair play. But, at the same time, in order to replace these clauses 22 to 25 by something, at any rate (it is always well to replace, you know!), the Bill stipulates that agitators can be expelled under the minor state of siege for one year, and on the expiration of that period only return with the permission of the district police authorities. Periodical publications can only be suppressed under the new law provided that single numbers shall have already been repeatedly censored. Hitherto a single prohibition was sufficient; now the papers will have another chance, and at the second number only they will have to vanish. How merciful these Federal Humbugs are! But, to put it in short, we are satisfied that old laws and new laws will one and all have the same fate—die out—and the Revolution will, step by step, come in, bury councillors, laws, and judges, and make mankind happy, joyful, and free!

BELGIUM.

Our readers will remember that some months ago a monster trial came before the Court of Assize of Mons (province of Hainault), where more than twenty Socialists were accused of having been instrumental in the troubles which occurred in the coal-miner's districts (Mons, Charleroi, Frameries, La Louvière, etc.). They will also remember that all the accused were acquitted, owing to the fact that their counsel succeeded in detecting that the shameful plot was altogether got up by the government, and that even the Belgian Premier, the Catholic Minister Beernaert, had received in his cabinet, AT MIDNIGHT, two agents-provocateurs of the worst possible description, and had even given them directions in their despicable business. At the close of the great trial, an immense manifestation of protest was made all through Belgium against the miserable clerical government, with the first result that Paul Janson, the leading counsel in the Mons trial, was elected a member of Parliament by the combined efforts of the anti-clerical forces of the Belgian capital. The agents-provocateurs, but for that move of the electoral body, would almost certainly have escaped the doom they so rightly deserve. But now, at last, they are going to be tried by the Court of Assize of Mons, and we are promised some more revelations during the case that will begin on the 18th of November. The Attorney-General has just published his indictment, and it is certainly of interest to extract from that bulky document some facts which may serve as hints in all countries for all workers who are engaged, oftentimes amidst the greatest danger to themselves, in the noble work of bringing about the emancipation of mankind at large from the treble yoke of capitalism, priestcraft, and governmentalism.

During the trial against Defuisseaux and the other Socialists, the counsel for the defence found out that an individual named Leonard Pourbaix was at the same time a red-hot revolutionist and a secret agent of the Belgian administration of public safety! This scoundrel was to be found in all places where very violent speeches were delivered, and it was he who especially incited the workers to commit acts of violence by means of dynamite. Not only did he provoke such deeds, but he was also the very keeper of the explosive matter, and it goes without saying that he distributed it very generously amongst the workers. An explosion occurred at Mariemont, and it was Pourbaix who had advised one of his poor tools to lay the cartridges at the entrance door of the works. At Morlanwez another explosion took place, and again it was Pourbaix who had provided the man with the so-called "scientific means of warfare." At Chatelineau at a secret meeting, he proposed to entrust some one in the audience, by means of drawing lots, with the "revolutionary" mission of blowing to pieces one half of the locality. At Frameries he speaks thus at a secret meeting:—"Woe betide him who shall resume work! We shall blow up the houses of the workers who shall descend into the pits. Stores of dynamite are in readiness!" Besides, secret meetings were held at night in his own house, and at one of these meetings he announced that explosions were going to occur at Brussels, and preparations to that effect had really been made. A man named Rouhette, the lieutenant of Pourbaix, was sent to Brussels, and delivered dynamite, caps, and fulmi-cotton to three persons named in the indictment. All this and many other similar "moves" constituted the "revolutionary work" of that genuine "Socialist"; besides, however, he had his "police work" to do, and the more he had to report, the better he was paid for it. After having distributed broadcast his own dynamite, he wrote to the administration of public safety, "To-morrow I shall go to Frameries to find out a dépôt of explosives." Then again, "There is a store of dynamite at Morlanwez, I am going there to see if I can discover it." Of course, the miserable Pourbaix found it always, and very easily too! One day he asks his chief what he must do with all the explosives he has so "found out." "Keep it," answers the official, "we have no need of it at Brussels. We want only to know who has given it to you, and what are your ways and means of finding out the people who conceal it." After having given these and many other extracts of the correspondence exchanged between Pourbaix and the police authorities, the Attorney-General concludes his indictment by implicitly avowing that this man is a wretch, because, on the one side he induced the workers to deeds of violence they did not want to resort to, and, on the other side, he deceived his superiors apparently for the sake of increasing his blood-money.

The Belgian papers tell us that some more revelations are to come to light, which are likely to shake considerably, and probably to run down definitely, the despicable clerical government, who have made of Belgium a mere province of Bismark's Germany.

THE CHURCH AND USURY.—Two novelists, Charles Dudley Warner and Edward Garret (Mrs. Fyvie Mayo), are simultaneously assailing the class of speculators who make their tens of thousands, to use the latter's phrase, "by wide ramifications of usury, and by transactions too gigantic for any one man to control who cares to exercise his conscience as to their bearings on his fellow-creatures." The assault by Mr. Warner, very much the more elaborate of the two, will be found in "A Little Journey in the World" appearing in Harper's Magazine; that by Mrs. Mayo in a strong study of Scottish character, "Life's Long Battle Won," which forms not the least attractive feature just now of the Sunday Magazine. Both writers render help in what has become one of the most serious social problems of the age, a problem, by the way, which comes very near to some of the Christian churches, as Mr. Warner indicates in a suggestive conversation with respect to the endowment to a college by one of the ruthless millionaires who bestows the gift merely for the purpose of securing a character.—Christian Leader.

SWEATING IN THE STATES.—A committee from the Boston clothing trades union has been in New York investigating the condition of the clothing manufacturing trade. The wages of the clothing workers have been steadily decreasing in Boston, and work has become scarcer there. The Boston unions heard that New York had been taking away much of the business, and a committee was sent to investigate. The committee has visited the East-side districts where clothing is given out to workers, and they come to the conclusion that the "sweating" system, which was exposed some time ago, was the cause of the decline of wages and the withdrawal of much of the trade from Boston. They describe the condition of the working people who are engaged in the "sweating" work as miserable in the extreme—worse than that of plantation negroes during the time of slavery in the South. Men, women, and children are crowded into small hot rooms, where they live and cook, and work for starvation wages, fourteen hours and more out of the twenty-four. Among the places visited by the committee was a five-story house occupied by several "sweater" contractors. One man, Morris Kuster, employed eight men in a small room and worked them fourteen hours a-day. Some people in this building worked from four o'clock in the morning to nine o'clock in the evening. Other "sweaters" paid their hands 50 cents for making a coat, and others paid their hands from 5 to 8 dollars per week. Samuel Max, who employed fifteen men and made them work sixteen hours a-day, paid them not in money, but in clippings of the cloth.

CHURCH AND DEMOCRACY.

AMONGST the many interesting books for which readers with short purses some forty or fifty years ago had reason to thank Charles Knight—"Good Knight," as the punning epitaph put it—was a work which it seems might well be oftener used than it is. "Historical Parallels" are always worth the attention of the student in sociology, and it is rather pitiful to think that in this ultra-scientific age greater attention is not given to this detail of "parallels." Russel Lowell, in an address at the dedication of a free public library at Chelsea, Mass., U.S., in '84 or '85, said, "History is clarified experience, and yet how little do men profit by it." It is earnestly to be hoped that the democracy of to-day will be warned in time to take special note of the parallelism which is now showing in connection with the churches and the democratic movement.

At each successive annual pow-wow of religionists there is more and more attention given to the questions of Socialism and other forms of activity among the democracy. At the Carlisle Diocesan Conference held recently the Church and Socialism occupied much attention; and there can be no doubt that the feeling of the heads of the churches is exactly summed up in the words of the introducer of the resolution, the Rev. J. Llewelyn Davis, vicar of Kirkby Lonsdale, who in the course of his speech said "it was the obvious wisdom of the Church to make friends with the democracy now that the democracy was in the ascendant, and that those ardent clergymen who went further in that direction than sober persons could quite approve were probably doing the Church a political service." There is no need to deal with any other part of the discussion in question. That one sentence epitomises the whole Church record, which has been to use every legal and illegal earthly power and every superstitious terror to maintain supremacy in the fewest possible hands and to never concede a fraction by way of amelioration until it became "obvious wisdom to make friends" with a new growing power. Having made friends, to then forthwith proceed to betray them.

To take only one detail, capable of easy proof, let any examine the connection of the Church and the land system of the last four hundred years, or still more closely the last one hundred years, during the period of the great enclosures. Thousands upon thousands of acres of land, which for centuries had been the common property of the people, were taken away by means of Acts promoted by the squire or the lord of the manor, aided by the parson of the parish, in whom, as in many cases the only man of the district who could read or write, the parishioners trusted to defend their ancient rights against the swindling and jugglery of private bill legislation. In some cases the petitions promoted by the poor people in protest against the Act were so drafted as to be really used in favour, and of course, when the Act was completed, the ignorant mass was powerless, simply because they were ignorant, and for years remained ignorant of what was done.

The mention of the fact that the parish parson was in old times almost the only educated man in the district recalls another detail in which the Church has played the traitor. The education by which they were enabled to play the part of parish guide was almost wholly stolen property of the people. Nothing in history is much plainer than that almost all the educational endowments were originally given for the "poor of the parish." All over our country are colleges and grammar schools, wealthy to-day by reason of the growth of wealth made by the mass, but which are wholly devoted to the training of rich men's sons.

And how has the education so gained been used? Much of the most violent political writing in opposition to popular demands has been the work of fledgling bishops and high Church dignitaries. By fledgling bishops is meant tuft-hunting, place-seeking parsons, who by shameless literary work won preferment and place and then used their power in increased repression. Whig or Tory, no matter which, the pen of the theologian was always ready to earn a guinea or a cure by writing whatever was ordered. Philpott, Bishop of Exeter, who wrote a pamphlet in defence of the Peterloo massacre, and who at one time opposed and another supported Catholic emancipation, Herbert Marsh, Bishop of Peterborough, Rev. John Brand, and Dean Swift, are only a few of the many who could be named in this connection. It will of course be urged, however, that many names can be quoted in opposition to this view; but it is just exactly because of this fact that the special treachery of the Church comes out more strongly. Note the second part of the sentence quoted from Rev. J. Llewelyn Davies—"those ardent clergymen who went further in that direction than sober persons could quite approve were probably doing the Church a political service." No matter to what depth of degradation a church may sink, no matter the riot and debauchery, no matter the immorality and crime which has marked the decadence of every form of priestcraft, always have there been a few who have kept in view the ideals and teachings of their prophets; who have lived ascetic lives while their fellows wallowed in the mire of lust and every form of excess; who have been in some cases simply the faithful and believing disciples of the Christ of the time, in other cases the gulls of their superiors in the organisation, as for instance Jetzer of Bern. To whichever class the innocent happens to belong, he has to bear the whole of the punishment and scorn. If honestly believing the dogmas he preached, his own fellows and superiors were his bitterest enemies and scoffers, and every effort was made to break down his asceticism or drive him from the order. Making a long jump from Jetzer of 1500 to Malkin in 1836, if anyone wants a proof of what is now being urged let him note how Bishop Philpott treated two curates—Rev. J. Malkin of St. Ives, Cornwall, in 1836, and Rev. — Head of Feniton, Devonshire, in 1838. Bloomfield, Bishop of London, being in 1837 cast in £200 damages for libel on a curate, refused to renew the curate's license, knowing at the same time that without such license no other bishop would license him for any other parish. But when, after generations of such work, the dignitaries of each church find the march of events too strong for further repression, when they find that concessions must be made, then the men who have stood out from the corrupt mass and who have suffered at the hands of the Church for preaching the Church's doctrines in truth, these men are appealed to by the Church as being proof that the Church has always done justice and preached truth.

The churchmen martyrs of the past are appealed to to-day as warrant for continued domination. The names of Kingsley and Maurice are to-day being glibly used as proof that the Church has for years favoured some form of Socialism, although it is well known that the term Parson Lot was applied to Kingsley as a term of reproach and scorn.

Just as to-day preachers claim that chattel slavery was abolished by the aid of the Church—one of the biggest lies ever tried on—so in the future will it be claimed that the social reformation has been the work of the Church. If there is anything certain in this world, it is that Tyndale was correct when he said, "Woe to the realm where prelates are in the council! As profitable are the prelates to the realm with their council as wolves to the sheep, as foxes to the geese; for there is no mischief or disorder, whether it be in the temporal regiment or the spiritual, whereof they are not the chief causes, and even the very foundation and spring; so that it is impossible to preach against any mischief unless thou begin at them, or set up any reformation in the world except they are first reformed. They pretend they are for God and the Church, but their secret intent is to bring all under their power; and when they are once set up on high, then are they tyrants above all tyrants."

"It is a matter for serious thought that the brutal method of Philpott towards Robert Owen has to-day given place to the suavity of cardinal and bishop towards the strike leaders.

Between Tory Robert Southey and Nihilist Bakounine there would be found but few common thoughts, yet the poet makes Madoc declare

"No priest must dwell among us,—that hath been
The cause of all this misery"; and 'God and the State' teaches much the same lesson. Look to it, democracy!

THOMAS SHORE, jun.

A SONG OF THE FUTURE.

AIR—"The Same Old Game."

WHEN I was yet a slave
No money did I save,
Yet tried to live as cheaply as I could;
I drank no ale or gin,
Nor knew I was let in
When taking just a third the wage I should.

Chorus—The same old game, the same old game,
All carried on that damned old game.
It mattered not—oh no!—if one suffered ever so,
All carried on that damned old game!

Some workers came along,
Who said 'twas very wrong
To live upon the toil of other men;
They knew that all must work,
Their duty none must shirk,—
A mighty revolution started then.

Chorus—Another game, another game,
They carried on another game;
It mattered not a jot if they went to quod or not,
They carried on another game!

And now there is a change,
It seems so very strange,
No starving men and women do I see;
All wants are now supplied,
No pleasures are denied
To any in our free community.

Chorus—Another game, another game,
We carry on another game;
It matters to us all to see that nought befall
The players in this other game!

A. BROOKES.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

An important event in the labour movement took place in New York City on the 11th and 12th of October. Most of the editors of labour papers met and resolved to form an Associated Labour Press similar to the capitalistic Associated Press. The object of this new organisation is to devise ways and means to enable the editors to help one another; of trying to bring about an agreement on certain measures to be advocated, and also to give the different labour papers of the country accurate news in relation to labour matters. J. J. McDonnell of the Labour Standard of Paterson, N.J., was elected president of the new organisation, and Charles Guy Brown of the Union Printer of New York, secretary. A letter was read from John Swinton regretting his inability to be present. Samuel Gompers addressed the delegates on the eight hour movement. The majority of the editors present were in favour of the advocacy of the eight hour movement and the nationalisation of the railways and telegraphs. A resolution was adopted to the effect that it is the duty of labour editors to exchange papers with each other. Of the German-American labour papers, as far as I could learn, only the New York Volkszeitung was represented. The editors then adjourned to meet again next year.

The general executive board of the Knights of Labour organisation met in the first week of October in St. Louis. An onslaught on Powderly was predicted to take place on this occasion. But it appears now that the men who prophesied that they were going to down Powderly once for all are even bigger rascals than the arch-deceiver himself. They were Mortimer D. Shaw, William Blake, John McGarry, editor Detweiler, of the Chicago Knights of Labour, and in the background one Tom Furlong. To cut a long tale short, Tom Furlong has made some sort of fame by the vigorous manner in which he, as Jay Gould's chief of detectives, ran down Knights of Labour during the famous strike on the South-Western system. During the late presidential election Furlong did some great work for the Republicans in Indiana, for which he was promised the position as chief of the secret service. Powderly and the Knights opposed him. Powderly wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury opposing Furlong's appointment. Out of revenge, Furlong and his gang threatened to cut up the General Master Workman. At a mass meeting in St. Louis, Powderly mounted the platform and declared that Furlong's accusations against him were a pack of lies. Furlong and his friends did not dare to confront Powderly on the platform, and he won the day in consequence. This is much to be regretted, as affairs of this kind can only restore Powderly somewhat to popular favour, and the sooner he is forced to withdraw from the labour movement the better it will be for the workers. For in addition to his rascality, he is in economic matters a most ignorant ass. After the meetings in St. Louis Powderly went to Chicago, and addressing a large audience, delivered a teetotal speech. It is probable that an alliance between the Knights of Labour and the Farmers' Alliance will be formed. Talking to a reporter, J. F. Holland, member of the executive board of the Knights of Labour, said:

"There has been a great deal of talk in the federal trades unions of inaugurating a general strike on May 1, but I do not know whether or not it will be done. I have heard on very good authority that those in charge of affairs are opposed to any such action. What the Knights of Labour will do I cannot say, but that they will order a general strike seems now most improbable. We do not try to accomplish our ends in that way."

A conference between representatives of the American Federation of Labour and the Knights of Labour took place at Philadelphia. There were present General Master Workman Powderly, Secretary Hayes, and A. W. Wright, representing the latter body, and President Samuel Gompers, Wm. Martin of Pittsburg, Henry Ehman and John B. Lennon of New York, representing the Federation of Labour. The conference lasted about three hours. The first business discussed was the present condition of the eight hour movement. On behalf of the Knights of Labour it was stated that the executive board could do nothing as a board until the general assembly, which meets at Atlanta on November 12, has acted on the matter. On behalf of the Federation it was stated that letters had been sent to public men, clergymen, authors, editors, manufacturers, and business men generally, explaining what was wanted by the workers and asking opinions on the subject. The Knights of Labour representatives offered a written proposition which suggested a mutual exchange of working cards, a mutual recognition of trade labels, and the adoption of a rule which would prevent one body from organising the suspended or expelled members of another. The Federation proposed that the Knights of Labour discourage the formation of trade organisations within the order, the promise being made that the Federation would then urge the members of unions to connect themselves with mixed assemblies of Knights of Labour. It was agreed that the matters above referred to should form the subject of discussion at future conferences, it being also agreed that these conferences should be continued from time to time. This is the third conference that has so far been held. Another will be held between the meeting of the general assembly of the Knights, beginning at Atlanta, November 12, and the annual convention of the Federation at Boston, commencing December 10. I shall watch this new harmony with a great deal of interest, but I believe no good can come of it, as neither of these large organisations is based on sound economic or political principles.

Chief Arthur, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, talking of the Convention of this organisation to be held this week, said:—

"This Convention will be the most important ever held by the brotherhood. The question of federation with other labour organisations will be decided. I am opposed to the federation, and if the order is not maintained separate and distinct from all other organisations, the engineers must look for a new chief. The brotherhood is a peculiarly unique organisation, and cannot mingle with any other labour association with benefit to either—in my opinion."

Thomas A. Edison, the most Chimborazo-like figure of this century, has come back, and has ventilated his views on art. Of course he has made an ass of himself. He couldn't help himself however. Said he:—

"I saw all the old masters. Their work cannot be compared with the modern. They painted pictures of impossible men and women. No such human frames and proportions were ever born. I had a tape line, and I made measurements of them to satisfy myself on that point."

Measuring a Raphael with a tape line. Great Scott! What next? This beats the man who buys books by the pound. Well, we are a great people, we Americans; we are indeed!

The Missouri anti-trust law is having just the effect I always maintained such laws would have—the forcing of trusts and trade associations into one huge corporation and a more complete monopoly. The jute-bagging combine is now organising in this manner.

Nationalism is making progress in California. There are now organised in that State 20 Nationalist clubs, and one magazine has been started called Looking Forward.

The International Working People's Association is making great efforts to commemorate the worker's Good Friday on the 11th of November in a fit and becoming manner all over the country. A splendid propaganda pamphlet has already made its appearance. Let us hope that the meetings will be well attended. You over there can only hope, but we over here must also work hard to bring about such a result.

The trouble in the ranks of the Socialist Labour Party is not over yet, but so far the Schewitsch side of the party has won the day. This is the faction which has by some sort of legal and constitutional coup d'état forced the Rosenberg section out of power and office. The Rosenberg section met in Chicago, Ills., in convention, which lasted from Sept. 30th to Oct. 2nd. Rosenberg charged Schewitsch with being a political boddler, but being absolutely without proof for such an accusation he succeeded through such silly statements in damaging his own cause. The principal business of the convention was the denouncing of our five martyrs. F. Busche, the miserable late clown-editor of the Workmen's Advocate, went even so far as to say, "If the Anarchists flaunt the bones of their martyr-saints in our faces we must meet them with scientific Socialism." Chicago was made by this section the executive quarter of the party. Tommy Morgan, of Chicago, voted for Boston, as Boston according to his opinion is at present the intellectual centre of the labour movement in the States. The name of the organisation was changed to "The Socialistic Party of the United States." Conventions are to be held every four years, i.e., in the spring of the presidential years. The accepted platform contains the following planks:—

"(1) The nationalisation of capital and the title to labour-saving inventions and land in the order of their monopolisation. (2) The organisation and direction of the industries by the State in the same order. (3) The employment by the State of all able citizens in such callings as they may be fitted for. (4) General and equal public education and training by the State."

One thing is certain, and that is, that this new Socialistic Party of the United States will be very short-lived. Cranks and idiots cannot maintain for long a reform or revolutionary organisation even if they label themselves Socialistic, a term which I am certain Busche does not understand.

The larger part of the old Socialist Labour Party met under the leadership of Sergius Schewitsch, on October 12th, in Chicago. Disagreeing as I do in fundamental principles, as well as in economics and tactics, with this part of the party, I at least respect the people it is composed of, for they are neither cranks nor idiots nor rascals. In a mass meeting held on last Sunday in Chicago, Schewitsch spoke out well for our martyrs, and said that even if the bomb had been thrown by one of the five it would have been a disgrace to hang the thrower, as he would have been in the right. The police themselves had acted illegally first by attacking a peaceable meeting.

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

Great Revolt of Labour at Bristol.

Many of us were beginning to almost despair of the provinces, which have not, as a rule, shown that they have fully learnt the lesson taught to sweated labour by the dockers' strike. We know that in most large provincial towns sweating is carried on quite as cruelly as in London: sometimes, indeed, it is a great deal worse; yet, save for a few isolated instances, the storm of revolt which had swept through London had hardly affected the provinces, till Bristol surged up into enthusiastic rebellion on Tuesday October 22nd. That all has not been well at that important seaport in the west of England has indeed been evident for some time. The crowd who, when the gas-men struck, barricaded the bridges and drove back the blacklegs with volleys of stones, would hardly have acted with so much vigour and determination had they not also suffered from bitter wrongs. So when the deal-runners struck they found plenty of imitators—the dock-labourers, corn-porters, carters, cotton-hands, wharfingers, swayers, haulers, scavengers, and warehouse-porters, all abandoning their work and parading the streets by thousands. The strike spread like an epidemic, and it seemed at one time as if the whole town would be out. What has been the consequence? Why, alarmed at the spreading revolt, and dreading something more serious than a mere cessation of work, if the strikers became hungry, the masters have in many cases given in. The dock-labourers and deal-porters have gained their demands; and when the leaders of the London dock strike—Tillett, Mann, and Thorne—arrived there on Saturday they found that the greater part of the battle had been won without their aid—won by the people's own courage and determination. This is a bright example to other provincial towns.

The Bus and Tram Men.

The bus and tram men have found a leader at last. It has long been evident that the people at the head of their union have lacked courage and ability for their work. They have made up for their lack of either by getting plenty of middle class patronage for the union. The consequence of their timidity has been that the men, hearing repeatedly from the middle-class persons that they must not strike, because it was wicked, and so on, came to the conclusion that there was no backbone in the business, and it was not worth while to risk their places for a union that could only "petition." The consequence has been that out of 13,000 tram-men only 1,000 have joined the union. But now there is better hope for the men. John Burns has taken up their cause, and if his action comes up to the tone of his first speech the tram and bus men will soon have the rich companies at their mercy. For good or for evil, the name of John Burns is now a tower of strength. He is a terror to every sweating employer, and a hero to most workmen. The tramway companies had better agree with their enemy in the gate, or in a very short time not a single tram or bus will be running in London.

The Strike at Silvertown.

There is little to report this week. The manager objecting to interview the "agitators," some of the men who are on strike have seen the almighty Mr. Gray, but as the firm were not willing to concede anything worth mentioning the negotiations have not succeeded. The strike still goes on; it is now in its seventh week, and there are many women and little children suffering bitterly from hunger. Any one having a trifle to spare might send it to the Strike Committee, Railway Dining Rooms, Silvertown.

A Victory for the Sheffield Fibre Drawers.

We are glad to hear that this strike is now over. The men have gained a complete victory, Messrs. Laycock having withdrawn all the objectionable rules. The men have been well supported by the public during the strike, and the national union which their secretary, as our readers will remember, came to London to form a few weeks back, is progressing splendidly. Our readers will also remember that the men were helped throughout the whole of their struggle by the Sheffield Socialists, who have worked very hard on their behalf.

The Provinces Awakening.

The latest phase of the gas worker's agitation in Manchester seems likely to end in a strike. The gas committee of the Corporation, after considering the men's demand for an eight hour day and increased scale of wages, have refused to accede to their demands in full, but offered certain concessions which are not accepted because they would make distinctions among the different classes of workers; thus, eight hours was offered to one section and not to another, and 5 per cent. advance in some cases. Unless the full demands are complied with a strike will be declared on Wednesday night Oct. 30th, which will leave the great Cottonopolis in complete darkness. This is the first fruits of a 21 day's old branch of the Gas Workers and Gas Labourers Union.

Our comrades Maguire, Sweeney, and Paylor have been very busy in Leeds organising the tailoresses. The gas workers in Bradford have gained their demands. Their agitation has been mainly brought to a successful issue owing to the efforts of Mr. Bartley and our comrades Scott, Jonett, and Bland. We are sorry we have not more space to give details. N.

The Boot and Shoe Workers Waking Up.

The effect of the dock strike and the labour agitation which has been going on of late will be felt for a long time to come. The West-end cord-wainers, belonging to the Amalgamated Society of Shoemakers, have decided to demand an increase on their wages of 1s. per pair in the spring of the New Year. The East-end operatives too, who work on the modern system of sub-division of labour, have just decided through the local branch of the National Union of Boot and Shoe Operatives, to give the employers six months' notice that if workshops are not provided for them by the 1st of May, 1890, they will cease work until they are. At present, besides receiving sweating prices for their work, the men are forced to find their own workshops into the bargain, which is generally one of the two rooms they call "home." Besides the dirty character of the work, which makes their "homes" wretched and miserable, the system of "outdoor" workers gives great facility to the smaller sweaters, who are thereby enabled to get work from several firms and "sweat" men and lads in order to increase their own wages. By forcing the employers to find workshops of their own, it is hoped to considerably diminish the practice of "sweating" in the East-end boot and shoe trade. G. C.

AUSTRALIAN NOTES.

A FEW weeks back a horrible murder was perpetrated in one of the collieries owned by the A. A. Co., called the Glebe Pit, in which eleven men lost their lives, while seven narrowly escaped. In one part of the pit the masters forced the men to work the "pillars" out, which is very dangerous work. By all accounts it seems that many "pillars" had been worked out, which left the roof no support. It was, indeed, known among the miners that there would sooner or later be a great fall, and many of them refused to work; but the "bosses" warned them that if they did not they would be dismissed. This frightened some, so they went into the mine as usual one morning to be buried alive. Just before the fall the cracking of the roof alarmed some, who made for the mouth of the pit; but on their way they were met by an underground "boss," who, when he heard what was expected, bullied a few of them into returning to their work, stating that there was no danger. Those who yielded went to their fate. The fall came, blocking up the main entrance altogether, no doubt settling down where all the pillars had been worked out. A relief party was at once set to work to try and effect an entrance through the debris, at great risk to themselves. They worked for many days without coming upon any of the entombed men; at last they came to one, but dead and almost unrecognisable! At this point the "Company" refused to carry on the rescue work, on the ground that they could not bear the responsibility of any fatality which might occur to the relief party, as the work was so highly dangerous! So the government has stepped in and declared that it will carry on the relief work and pay the piper! A bit of cool cunning trickery on the part of the "bosses"—but here is a bit which must be related. Soon after the disaster, Lord Carrington (our "Governor") came to the mine, and even went down below to have a peep at the "fall." Now, it is widely rumoured that he is one of the directors of the Company which owns the mine, and that it is his influence that has got the government (at the expense of the taxpayers) to bear the cost which the mean "Company" should have borne. Two of the Company's horses have been found—one being alive; three men have also been come upon, but all dead—victims to the present system!

The Melbourne Age recently reported the doings of the "Melbourne Charity Association," and lauded the officials of that institution up to the skies for their "great endeavours" in collecting and distributing to somewhat relieve the poor starving wretches of Melbourne from hunger. But further on the report shows "that the society received £500 in subscriptions, absorbed over £400 in salaries and office expenses, and distributed but a paltry £30 in relief," and then goes on in a wriggling manner to make it appear that "it is not a charity but a medium between the giver and the taker, an agency which warns off the undeserving but seeks out the deserving." The officials, it would seem according to this, are the "undeserving" (?), while the worn-out human machines are the "undeserving"! The other day a boy in Sydney was sentenced to six month's hard labour for wandering about the streets "without visible means of support"! Poverty seems here as well as with you to be a terrible crime.

On Monday night Barclay gave the opening address in our new premises on "Principles." Sunday collection, 16s. 8½d.; 93 Commonweal sold.

MANCHESTER.—An agitation has been going on for some time amongst the men employed in the health department of the Manchester Corporation. The S. L. called a meeting of the men for Sunday the 27th, and in the meantime a branch of the Gas-workers and General Labourers' Union was formed by W. Horrocks, organiser for Lancashire, and a Socialist of Salford. Despite an exceptionally wet day, a number of the men turned up in Stevenson Square on Sunday and were addressed by Ritson, Bailie, and Barton of the S. L. The meeting was adjourned till next Sunday, when, if the elements be more favourable, a meeting of all workers in the department will take place. A strike has taken place at Berry's Blacking Works, Manchester, the largest firm of the sort in England. The men who lap up the packages are paid at the rate of 1d. per gross, and for all over 140 gross in one week, 1½d. Those who weigh the blacking get half this amount. No union existed amongst the men, but some members of the S. L. working there agitated them so that they demand 1½d. per gross for all work done. Mr. Berry, who is now very rich, though twenty years ago he was in much the same position as most of his men now are, did not see his way to grant this most meagre demand. The men turned out, and still remain out, though it is expected that what they now ask will speedily be conceded. On Monday morning a meeting of the strikers took place in a mission room, when Bailie of the S. L. addressed them and urged upon them the necessity of being organised. A branch of the G. W. and G. L. Union was therefore formed, all the men giving their names and paying their first contribution. The shirt-makers, men and women, in Manchester have formed a union, of which you shall hear more later on. This is one of the most sweated of the many sweating trades in this city.

NORWICH.—Thursday last Lenneying read a paper to a large number of comrades on "Organised Labour"; warm discussion followed, considerable opposition put forward. Saturday evening commenced a series of social gatherings of comrades; numerous revolutionary songs were rendered, and dancing kept up to a late hour. Sunday afternoon comrade W. Moore addressed a good meeting in the Market Place; audience very attentive. Other meetings could not be held, owing to weather. In the evening, at the Gordon Hall, a pleasant evening was passed. Good sale of Commonweal and fair collection.

YARMOUTH.—We held a meeting at the Coffee Tavern, Pier Walk, Goleston, on Monday last, when Reynolds gave an address on "Organisation"; 1s. 3d. collected towards paying expenses. On Thursday night, in the Market Place, Reynolds and Lee addressed a large audience on the same subject. On Sunday we held no meeting in the morning or afternoon. In the evening, at Colman's Granary Quay, we held a splendid meeting, addressed by Ruffold and Reynolds; 1s. 10d. collected, 17 Commonweal sold.—J. H.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

CHICAGO MURDERS & BLOODY SUNDAY.

“Let the voice of the people be heard.”—Parsons.

A MEETING to celebrate the Anniversary of above events will be held next Monday evening, November 11th, at 8 p.m., at SOUTH PLACE INSTITUTE.

The following comrades will speak:—James Blackwell, G. Brocher, F. Feigenbaum, R. B. Cunninghame Graham, Frank Kitz, Peter Kropotkin, Wm. Morris, C. W. Mowbray, D. J. Nicoll, John Turner, H. H. Sparling, and Lothrop Withington.

The following resolutions will be submitted to the meeting:—

CHICAGO MARTYRS.

“That this meeting, called together to commemorate the legal murder of four men in Chicago on November 11th, 1887 (Parsons, Spies, Fischer, and Engel), the driving to suicide of another (Lingg) in prison, and the cruel imprisonment of three more (Fielden, Schwab, and Neebe), by the government of the State of Illinois, for the crime of encouraging workmen on strike and helping them to carry on the struggle against their masters, and the further crime of trying to maintain the rights of free speech and public meeting, calls the attention of the workmen of the world to the gradual abrogation of these rights in all capitalistic countries, and while emphatically denouncing the tyrannical interference with these elementary rights, points out that it is a natural and necessary result of a so-called Society based upon the robbery of Labour.”

BLOODY SUNDAY.

“That this meeting also denounces the similar attack on free speech and the right of public meeting in London on Sunday, November 13, 1887, through which three men were killed (Linnell, Curwen, and Connell), one (Harrison) so injured that he died after a painful and lingering illness, and many sent to prison after a mere mockery of trial, and it again calls for the immediate and unconditional release of George Harrison, condemned to five years' penal servitude for being present at a political meeting which was ferociously attacked by the police.”

Revolutionary songs will be sung during the evening, including the Marseillaise, Carmagnole, Linnell's Death Song, When the People have their Own Again, and Annie Laurie.

A DREAM OF THE PAST AND PRESENT.

It was the close of an evening in May of the present year. The damp, uncomfortable crowd had melted away and left the slow rain to fall on the slippery pavements uninterrupted; the dreary square where creaky wagons, meek old horses, slow farmers, and enterprising buyers were wont to throng lay empty and silent as the night closed in, save for the tinkling of tram-car bells and the tread of a lone watchman's feet. In the centre, where the tracks curved apart, leaving an oblong space, a tall object gleamed clearly against the background of dark warehouses and sombre skies; a pile of rocks, and above them a form, a manly form, with uplifted hand and awe-inspiring presence. The sky arched over the uncovered figure for the first time. A vague white shape, like a ghost, had stood there many a night, frightening timid horses and belated wanderers; but now it towered revealed—a policeman rampant on a great block of stone. The night grew heavier and blacker; the rain turned to a thick mist, from which wavering forms seemed to gather; the cars crept into the light of the dim lamps and out again like ghosts of long departed vehicles; the one watchman, excusable under such dismal conditions, sought shelter in a hospitable “all night” retreat; nothing real or living looked upon the motionless form out in the wierd night.

Then, the gathering forms from out the mists seemed to take shape and being. They became more dense and frequent, and hovered about the huge figure, the pedestal and the stone steps. They were more than shadows: they were men—tall, strongly-formed, stern-visaged men, in quaint dress of a hundred years ago. A majestic figure with the familiar face of Washington stood gazing at the statue with wondering, frowning expression; a little lower, Jefferson leaned, staring in perplexed sternness; Benjamin Franklin peered through one rounded hand to read the inscriptions on the base, referring occasionally to a manuscript he held in the other. Patrick Henry stood upright at the foot with folded arms and stern demeanour. The “unknown orator” gazed upon it sadly, while Randolph, Adams, Hancock, Jonathan Parsons, and other patriotic heroes of that time were grouped about. Behind them hovered a shadowy form with a Liberty cap above her brow and a countenance sad and dejected.

The musical voice of Washington broke the silence. “So! this in America after one hundred years! A strange figure to represent a free, prosperous and moral people, and set up for a strange purpose, it seems to me.”

“Adams,” spoke up Jefferson, quite abruptly, “is this a specimen of that federal army you so determinedly organised against the wishes of the people?”

“It is not,” replied Adams, with stately courtesy. “That army was for the defense and dignity of the nation in its relations with other countries; it was not intended as a threat against our own people.”

“A State militia was instituted later on—perhaps this is a representative?”

“No, sir; for you will remember the militia consisted of every able-bodied man in the State. All citizens drilled and carried arms. With one comprehensive sweep of your spiritual gaze you can take in the sleeping thousands around us who lack everything that can make life enjoyable; they possess no arms—they dare not. Yet over here is an army and a well-filled arsenal, ready to meet—an invader? a foreign foe? Ready to spring to the aid of the poor and weak? Ready at the call of the useful portion of society to protect their rights? No, indeed! They go into action only at the command of wealth, when labouring men grow discontented with their poverty. There is no other enemy in the field—none but these disarmed and helpless people who toil. Look farther away, where restlessly sleep thousands of starving workers thrust out of the mines in which they would gladly toil while strength remained. They have laboured all their lives for barely enough to sustain existence, and now they are denied that privilege. They are pitifully hungry and pitifully humble. And yet they are threatened with an armed militia if you 'dare.' The one or two guns that some of them possessed have been 'confiscated'; property rights are sacred only when millions of unearned wealth are considered. Could we have foreseen that such scenes could be possible, either our struggle would have been more deadly and determined, or it would not have been made at all."

"Many believed we had secured the rights of man in that crisis that tried men's souls," said Paine. "But I knew that sooner or later the masses of the people would suffer, when human rights were made of less consideration than property rights. Through such a principle, a class like this became possible," pointing to the statue, which had strangely taken on an intense, a listening expression. "A class coming out from the people themselves, but endowed with extraordinary powers, surrounded by all the possibilities of despotism and every incentive to corruption, whose existence depends on the thriving of vice and crime; which grows on the misery it is supposed to suppress, breathes easily only in an atmosphere of corruption, is unlimited in power, answerable to nothing, responsible to no being on earth or out of it. Does such a class harmonise with a society organised on free and equal principles?"

A queer, hard little voice came from the bronze lips above them: "Now you fellows are having it all your own way, going for us down there. Maybe we've got a word or two to say for our side; and by your leave I'll rest my arm a bit, for it's mighty tired, I tell you."

"Tired commanding peace, when there is no peace," said Patrick Henry.

The statue assumed a more comfortable position, and continued: "Seems to me, you're pretty free in criticising my existence. Now, I know your names—I've heard of you frequently, and you're behind the times. You don't appear to understand I am a necessity of modern civilisation. In me you see represented the whole police force of the State of Illinois—and I'm proud of it. We're a great institution—one of the great institutions we're fond of saying you men founded, and which 'furriners' can't understand. To be sure, none of us were born here, but we know how to protect American liberties; we do it with a club and a dark cell. You fellows lived in a primitive age; we are prospering, enterprising, driving. Property interests are very important, and it is absolutely necessary to preserve law and order."

"Yes," said Paine, "your modern juggernaut drives desperately over the thousand devotees in its track, and you are created to keep the wrecks thus made from clogging the wheels. Of course you are necessary—you must pile the mangled victims out of the way, that the car may go on undisturbed."

"Is tyranny ever necessary?" queried Henry.

"Yes, to enforce a wrong. When good is to be accomplished, the freer the people the better," answered Jefferson.

"I'm afraid you don't appreciate me," said the policeman. "No one is louder in praising the forefathers than we; indeed, we carry on our work in the name of the law and order you established. We go in for 'patriotism' and 'free institutions' heavy. Didn't you see us marching for you, not long ago?"

"We repudiate you," said they all, with one voice. "We made no place for you when we founded a free and equal government. Liberty does not exist where classes are maintained by such as you."

The policeman looked astonished, and nearly toppled over. "Well! you'll admit I represent a worthy object in standing where I do?" he faintly said.

"H'm!" Jefferson began, when Franklin interposed: "I find this inscription in front of the pedestal—'Dedicated by the people of Chicago, May 4, 1889, to the memory of the brave defenders at the riot, May 4, 1886'; and at the back—did this personage address these words to some one behind him I wonder?—is this inscription: 'In the name of the State of Illinois, I command peace!'"

"Knowing the circumstances as we intuitively do," said Washington, with a delicate irony in his voice, "I would ask—was there a riot on the night specified?"

"Why, sir, there was an outdoor meeting—a large crowd of working people and common citizens, and some people were ranting about their 'wrongs,' as they called them—"

"Which looks like making use of the right to meet and state grievances," interrupted Jefferson.

"And there were some loud and bitter ejaculations from the audience when a speaker mentioned that a few workmen had been killed by the police."

"Was there any fighting?"

"No; but their temper—"

"Any attempt at violence?"

"No; but their passions were excited."

"Any direct threats made?"

"No; but they endangered—"

"The privileges of a few despoilers!" interjected Paine.

"The people were dispersing, were they not?" resumed Washington.

"Over one-half were gone; but the rest might have meant mischief."

"When your police marched on them, what were they doing?"

"Standing about and listening to the closing words of a speaker."

"What does the word 'riot' mean here, if this is the case? Never repeat the mockery of the 30th of April in my name while this remains. I refuse to father a country harbouring a lie like that. Erase it."

"By your own showing," said Thomas Paine, seizing the opportunity to speak, "you broke up a peaceable meeting of citizens, met according to constitutional rights to discuss grievances. Twice before in this city you have committed this same outrage and citizens have been clubbed to death. You have violated our most sacred principles. The people ought to resist such attacks; someone believed in the rights we sought to secure to the people when they forcibly repelled your invasion."

"We only did as we were ordered," rather meekly murmured the "representative"

"Willingly enough, I dare say."

"We thought we were putting down a dangerous element."

"You were creating one. Repressed thought will result in an explosion as surely as will confined steam. We used to be sure this country never would suffer from that evil, for freedom of speech was our dearest hope. But you commemorate its death, I fear, instead of keeping in memory the names of a few men who died while blindly obeying the commands of their superior officers. Were that your only object we would not be here. But your existence only perpetuates the memory of an act for which you should forever hang your heads in shame."

"And who are these," asked Washington, "whom you put to death in revenge?"

A thick mist rolled away like a curtain, and disclosed the white robed forms of Parsons, Spies, Fischer, Engel, with bright enraptured faces as they appeared on that last fatal morning; a little farther stood Lingg, beautiful and sad, driven to his death by persecution as surely as the others had been.

"Did these men kill the officers you commemorate?"

"Well, not directly, but their talk might have incited—"

"Their talk was what ours was a hundred years ago," said the old heroes with one voice. "King George would have put us to death if he could; you have killed the forefathers of the new century—the new régime of liberty. But their names will live, as ours have done!"

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The anti-Socialist law has been made to suit every purpose; so it seems at any rate by what has just happened at Weimar, the former city of poets. M. Manfred Wittich, a literary man of some repute, intended to lecture on "Goethe and His Times," and, forsooth, the lecture was prohibited under paragraph so-and-so of the muzzle-law. The next best "move" the police authorities could now make would be the suppression of Goethe's works themselves, for they contain numerous passages which do not suit Bismarck's way of thinking, and besides Germany of nowadays is not in the least worthy of reckoning Goethe among its illustrious men.

A rather interesting pamphlet has lately appeared at Berlin, dealing with the working women's question: "Die zwanzigjährige Arbeiterinnen-Bewegung Berlins und ihr Ergebnis" (Twenty Years of the Working-women's Movement at Berlin and its Result). The authoress of the pamphlet is one who has done very good work herself in that direction, and we feel sure that Miss Adeline Berger's observations will be of good help to those who work in that special field.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

As we approach towards the end of the year, the various Socialist organisations are preparing their calendars. Our Austrian comrades have just issued their Oesterreichische Arbeiter-Kalendar (Austrian Workers' Calendar) for the coming year. It is a nice little volume, full of interesting matter, among which we especially notice the following: 'Johann Philip Becker,' a biographical sketch; 'Social and Political Review of the year 1888-89'; the 'Laws Concerning Labour in Austria'; 'Socialism and Darwinism,' by K. Kautsky; 'Importance and Aims of Trades' Unions'; 'Woman in Ancient Ages,' by Minna Kautsky; 'Labour and Capital, and their respective value'; 'Honour and Crime,' a novelette; 'The Heritage of the Poor,' a novelette; poetry by Anton Weiser, Herwegh, Karl Knipf, Ille, W. Hasenclever, and H. Determann. It is to be had for 40 kreutzer, at 6, Gumpendorferstrasse, 79, Vienna, office of the Sozialdemok. Monatschrift.

At Brünn, the editors of the Volksfreund (the Friend of the People) have started a series of pamphlets, of which the three first have now appeared: 1. 'What exists and what we want' (has been confiscated); 'Capital and Labour' (being a translation of Domela Nieuwenhuys' Dutch résumé of Marx's 'Capital'); 3. 'Collection of Socialist Poems' (has been confiscated).

Comrades Dr. Adler and L. A. Bretschneider, formerly editors of the suppressed Gleichheit (Equality), have published a verbatim report of the trial, which brought to an untimely death that valuable and most interesting Socialist paper. It can be had for 15 kr., at the office of the Arbeiter-Zeitung at Vienna.

In the course of last week, not less than four new "Arbeiter-Bildungs Vereine" (Working-men's Educational Clubs) have been founded—at Graz, St. Veit, Seestadt, and Lieberwerda respectively.

We are very glad to hear that the Arbeiter-Zeitung (Workers' Paper), which hitherto was a fortnightly, has now become a weekly organ, as was formerly Gleichheit (Equality).

At Reichenberg (North Bohemia), a new Socialist paper has come to light, Der Freigeist (Free Spirit) published by comrade Josef Schiller, and edited by comrade Karl Schiller. It is to appear as a fortnightly to begin with. We wish good success to our new colleague. (The address is Wallensteinstrasse, 15, Reichenberg).

BELGIUM.

The coalminers' strike of the Mons basin (province of Hainault) is still growing, and the strikers appear to be as firm as ever in their demands. The coalowners' companies begin to be shaken in their confidence; several of them, in the Levant and in the Flénu coalfields, have issued a manifesto to their workers and to the public generally, showing that the rate of wages has in late years risen in the same proportion as the value of coal. But on the side of the workers it is asserted that the coalowners have made use of bogus figures, thus trying to deceive the population. The manifesto is not likely to produce any effect whatever on the situation. Last week a deputation of coalminers waited on the Minister of Public Works, asking him for his support. By whom the miners have been advised so to waste their time and their travelling expenses we do not know; perhaps the Parti ouvrier does. Anyhow, it is stated that the strikers are so determined to persevere to the utmost that great hopes of victory may be entertained. It is pretty well certain also that, unless ample concessions are made very soon, a general strike will ensue. At the present time, ten thousand men are out.

In their manifesto the coalowners have "forgotten" to state how the prices of the shares have risen in 1889 as compared with 1888. We give below the price of the shares, in francs, of the various collieries at the same day, 22nd of October, of each of these two years:

It is wellnigh certain that these figures entitle the workers to an increase of wages, and we hope that they will stand by their guns to the end.

HOLLAND.

The essays of S. E. W. Roorda van Eysinga, who died last year at Geneva, after having passed many years far from his native land, have now been collected and published at the Hague, in eight parts, where they can be had at the offices of Recht voor Allen, for 2 sh. They are well worth reading, and some of them might be usefully translated into English.

At last our Dutch comrades have succeeded in getting hold of the strongest fortress of reaction in Holland; they have formed a branch of the social-democratic party at Maastricht.

SWITZERLAND.

At last the Attorney-General, who has been desired by Bismark for that once glorious little republic, has been chosen. It is an individual going through life by the name of Scherb, and his first move, according to his German instructions, has been to order the trial of three Anarchists, supposed of having had something to do with the recent Anarchist manifesto placarded on the walls of various Swiss towns.

RUSSIA.

Nicolas Tchernischewsky is dead. Only a few weeks ago he was definitely set at liberty, after a life of heroism and martyrdom. We will try in our next issue to say what he has done for the cause of Socialism, to which he has been, amidst indescribable sufferings, "faithful unto death."

VICTOR DAVE.

SWEDEN.

Six large match factories—four in Kalmar, one in Ystad, and one in Wexjö—have suddenly been closed, and about 4,000 workers have been brought to starvation at a moment's notice. The factories all belong to an English company, and it is extremely probable that there is some foul financial speculation in the matter. Nobody in Sweden knows (or pretends to know) the financial situation of the company, but it has brought 4,000 hardworking Swedish citizens into horrible misery just at the moment when the long and hard Swedish winter is beginning. These are the blessings of international capitalism! There is not even the satisfaction that exploiters and exploited stand face to face—that the latter can (as a preliminary step to general revolutionary ideas) learn personally to hate his oppressor. It is worth mentioning that the wages in the factories of this company was 30 per cent. lower than in any other Swedish match factory. Also worth mentioning is the fact that the Swedish bourgeois press passes by the incident in silence—with fine feeling for the international interests of capital. Even in far-off Sweden journalists have learnt to limit their Chauvinism to instances when it is serviceable to their master, national and international capital. There is much to learn and to understand for poor, ignorant, overworked, and half-starved labourers in these gigantically and scientifically corrupt societies of ours.

An eminent Swedish actor and theatrical manager, Aug. Lindberg, has in Kristiania (Norway) made experiments with "working-men's nights" at his theatre, and with splendid success (financial and moral). His idea is to give the very best, most modern, and revolutionary plays in the excellent new dramatic literature of Scandinavia, to employ the best actors, and to lower the prices within reach of working-men. And the Norwegian workers have responded. They crammed the house when Ibsen's grand play "Gengangere" ("Ghosts") was performed, and they followed it with such deep feeling and applauded it with such an overwhelming enthusiasm as no bourgeois habitues could have done. Mr. Lindberg thanked his audience, because their warm interest and sincere desire to penetrate into the innermost meaning of the piece was a valuable contribution to the revival of true dramatic art. According to Mr. Lindberg, an audience of common bourgeois is quite incompetent of that sympathy and pure unartificial feeling, which alone make the actor develop his highest faculties. It is said that theatres in Stockholm and Copenhagen are going to follow the example.

CHICAGO AND LONDON.

I.

"Our silence will be stronger than our speech"—

Speech foully stifled by the felon's rope;
Speech ever sounding through its farthest scope
The watchword, "Each for all and all for each":
Silence, yea death's, electric, swift to reach
Through the wide world, telling how hearts could cope
With human wrath, for human love and hope;
Silence proclaiming more than words could teach.

Therefore we mourn not, rather we rejoice

For them and for the cause they made their care;
Since men now gather round us, and make choice
The hardships of the pilgrim's life to share,
And follow through the dawn their distant voice
Toward a future infinitely fair.

II.

That was a sight no watcher can forget—
Where in the waste of streets it well might be
That citizens should meet and speech be free,
Ensnared in strife police and people met;
There weapons gleamed above the parapet,
And dinked to time from marshalled cavalry,
While at high windows ladies laughed to see
Peaceful processions savagely beset.

Hereby, O men of London, ye may learn

The two clear courses left you by the rich:—
Either a life of hopeless toil, to earn
The right of burial in a pauper's ditch,
Or strife for freedom, definite and stern—
Choose one of them ye must. Consider which.

NOTES ON NEWS.

MR. GLADSTONE’S speech to the working-men of Saltney last week, though as long as need be, and doubtless as attractive to the platitude-lover in its oratory as his utterances usually are, scarcely needs much comment in detail; it plays the same wearisome tune which we have been used to hear played from the period of “leaps and bounds” onward. It is called optimistic, but really and truly is in the depths of pessimism; for this is the meaning of it.

“Friends, we are very comfortable, and we should be glad if you also could be so, always so long as your comfort takes away nothing from us. To say the truth we fear that you are not living in comfort, but since it is for our good that you should go on living as you do, pray endure your misery, and don’t try to alter matters. Meantime, we will do you this service, if no other; we will pretend that you are getting better and better as the days go on, and that really compared with what you were half a century ago (when you were all but in universal open revolt against us), you are quite happy, or at least ought to be. So be contented, thrifty, and hopeful—of our continued prosperity.”

This sort of poisonous and lying twaddle was what was always said by Liberal politicians when addressing the workers twenty, nay, ten years ago; it now needs a G.O.M. to say it in its completeness. Does the dim old man believe it, I wonder? Perhaps he does, as much as a hardened old politician can be said to believe anything. But just fancy this preacher of contentment, this old Conservative gentleman, being the dangerous revolutionary person who used to terrify the Tories so! He has undergone the usual fate of political heroes, and is now a stationary mile-stone on the road, marking the rate of progress which live men are making.

The Art Congress just over at Edinburgh was on the whole but a dull affair, and would have been very dull indeed but that to a Socialist its humours showed some signs of the times. It goes without saying, that though there were people present who were intent on playing the part of the art-philanthropists, all the paper-readers, except the declared Socialists, showed an absurd ignorance of the very elements of economics; and also, of course, that the general feeling was an ignoring of the existence of the working-class except as instruments to be played on.

Education was much talked of; but it was not understood that if you have condemned a man to be a slave, his education must be that of a slave. Art for the working-classes was talked of by men who chose to ignore the fact that men anxiously facing starvation, or wearily bearing it, are not free to receive pleasure from a work of art; although at the Congress meetings the clock-hands pointing to lunch-time at once emptied the room of the well-fed audience. Socialist artists and craftsmen (since there were none but Socialists capable of taking up the job) were set to lecture audiences of Edinburgh workmen on the due methods of work for producing popular art, though both lecturers and workmen audience knew but too well that such art was impossible for wage-slaves either to make or enjoy.

However, the said lecturers did not hide this fact under a bushel; and since a reactionist Edinburgh evening paper angrily declared that the Socialists had ruined the Congress, it is probable that their plain speaking had some effect. It must also be said that the working-men audiences received any allusions to Socialism, or any teaching founded on it, with more than assent, with enthusiasm rather. The definitely Socialist meetings, held under the auspices of our Edinburgh friends, were very successful, and the local Socialists are well satisfied with the result of the week.

W. M.

Last week saw another horrible proof of the reckless greed with which capitalists pursue profit as their sole aim. The Glasgow “accident,” “fatality,” or “disaster,” as the newspapers have been calling it, or the Glasgow massacre as we know it to have been, has shocked and startled everybody. Everybody, that is, but the people responsible for that and similar events. They regard it, as indeed it truly is, as only an unavoidable incident of commercial methods. To get profit you must work cheaply; to work cheaply you must run risks—or rather, make your slaves run risks; running the risk long enough means that sooner or later the crash comes off and your poor slaves suffer.

But if you have only been careful enough in arranging and distributing the risk, the “catastrophe” is put down to “Providence” or some other irresponsible cause, and you escape all punishment. Nay! if you only weep and wail a little, spend a fraction of the blood-money you have made out of the system which produced the “catastrophe” in burying one or two of its victims and healing the bruises of one or two more, there will be few but will do you reverence as a more than perfect man. Only the bad and wicked Socialist will call you murderer and so spoil by a discordant note the chorus of your praises.

But the people are listening more and more to the bad and wicked teachings of the rights of man as against the powers of property, and they will soon demand that whenever such a thing as this in Glasgow occurs there shall someone hang for it—even if they have to do the hanging themselves!

If the London Trades Council were anything other than a discreditable gang of ring-runners and place-makers, it would have long ago started a paper somewhat after the pattern of the Newark (N. J.) Mutual Aid. This is a small four-page journal co-operatively printed and published, and devoted to the positive side of boycotting as a weapon against sweaters and rat labour. It gives a list of fair houses and co-operative associations, as well as news of the trades union and co-operative movements, so that those who feel that way can deal exclusively with fair houses for all things. Failing the Trades Council, why does not the Labour Association take it up? By the way, can anyone tell us what the Labour Association is doing, if it does anything?

Another sign of the times is the public prayer in churches for the recovery of Mr. Bradlaugh. What would have been said a few years ago in reply to a prophecy that this would take place, will hardly bear imagining! I am glad to see that there is a chance of Mr. Bradlaugh’s recovery (by virtue of the prayers?) because he is an open and sturdy enemy of ours, and therefore to be prized in these days of sham friends and would-be patrons.

S.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

REPRESENTATIVES of State Socialism, Anarchism, and other phases of Radical thought met at Nassau Hall, in Boston, a few nights ago and decided to commemorate the Chicago murder by a public meeting on 11th November. A permanent memorial club was organised. The club voted to issue an address to the labour people of New England, in which the necessity for Socialist agitation shall be set forth. Committees were appointed to secure and decorate a hall, and in addition to several local speakers, the club voted to secure speakers from New York and Chicago.

Mr. Alexander Hogeland, president of the Boys and Girls' National Home Association, which has recently been in session in Washington, made the startling statement that there are 60,000 boy tramps in the United States. Now if this be true—and there is no reason why it should not be—then who can wonder that crime is constantly on the increase? But no matter. "This is a free country, and everybody can get there if he has the brains."

The Boston Globe publishes a letter of thanks from John Burns for £4 from citizens of Boston. "Although the strike is over, the money will be used for relief of dock-labourers." The sympathy of the Boston workers—I mean that part of them which believe in strikes, short hours, good pay, and all the rest of trades-unionism—does not seem to be able to take a very substantial shape. In spite of trade-union principles, they appear to cling, if the workers are concerned, to the motto, "Let everybody fight his own battles."

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers of the United States was convened in Denver on the 16th of October. Chief Engineer Arthur presided, and said, among other things:

"The present time represents the turning point in the history of the order, for it has become apparent that a feeling essentially radical has crept in and taken possession of a few of our members. This is dangerous, and must be suppressed; for, owing to this, statements seemingly contradictory have crept out and become public, which could never have happened with oneness of thought and honesty of purpose." He reiterated, with emphasis, his former statement that the organisation is law-abiding, and said, "To-day I clearly define our position toward railway corporations when I say that only as a last resort do we sanction a strike." Of the growth of the order, he said the membership was 26,000; during the year just ended it had paid out to widows and orphans of disabled members 206,000 dollars, making a total since its organisation of 2,608,169. He advised every man to endeavour, at whatever sacrifice, to save a little of his earnings every year, if no more than 25 dollars. "The possession of property brings respect, and always adds to the comfort and power of working-men, besides gaining the esteem of all good citizens."

What can be thought of a labour leader of this description? I do not know whether the men composing this organisation are to be pitied or to be cursed, but in any case they appear to be incurable idiots or they would have dismissed this humbug long ago.

The American Federation of Labour will hold its fourth annual convention in Boston, December 9. The circular hints at unification of the scattered forces of labour, and congratulates the Federation on withstanding the combined attacks of capitalists and politicians, and especially the secret machinations of conspirators within the very cordon of the camp of labour, meaning probably Socialists and Anarchists. On the eight hour movement the circular says: "It now becomes the mission of the Boston convention to transform the agitation which has become world wide into an organised movement for its realisation."

I am not aware of any "secret machinations" to oppose the eight hour movement. There has not even been opposition in the correct sense of the word, for a movement which does not exist can hardly be opposed.

In my last report I wrote something about the conference of the Schewitsch wing of the Socialistic Labour Party in Chicago. This wing is indeed the Socialistic labour party, as the Rosenberg side is absolutely without any significance. Next to the birth and rise of the Nationalist movement the split in the Socialistic Labour Party and the utter annihilation of the Rosenberg clique in this party are the most important events of this year in the State Socialistic camp. I am not in sympathy with the Social Democratic movement, as I cannot agree with my State-Socialistic friends either in tactics or in fundamental principles; but I am glad that Schewitsch and his friends have been able to freeze the Rosenberg-Busche faction out of their party. This faction is responsible for a good deal of the prejudice Socialism encounters among Americans. Now the State-Socialistic movement will be conducted on a more intelligent basis, and that is a considerable improvement. The convention got through the following business: A resolution endorsing the resolutions of the Paris Congress (Marxist) was adopted. Another defining the position of the S. L. P. towards trade unionism, saying that the party is in sympathy with the struggle of organised labour. As to political action, the convention resolved that under no circumstances should the party support a bourgeois party or its candidates. The eight hour agitation was also endorsed. In the platform of the organisation only few, and no important, changes were made. Brooklyn was chosen as seat for the executive; Boston for the board of appeal; and the party organs, Der Socialist and the Workmen's Advocate, will be edited and published in New York. The delegates to the convention visited in a body the graves of our martyrs in Chicago.

During the mass meeting at which Schewitsch spoke in Chicago, the reporters of the capitalistic press made out that the audience cheered the red and hissed the Union flag. Whether this was true or not, I know not. If so, it was to the credit of the feeling of the audience. In reference to this hissing-report, Schewitsch called on Mayor Cregier, and the following dialogue took place after the exchange of the usual conventionalities:—

"The Mayor. Mr. Schewitsch, much to my surprise you look like a respectable citizen; I had quite a different idea of your person.—Schewitsch. Are your words, Mr. Mayor, that you would like to drum me out of Chicago because of that flag incident, correctly reported?—M. No. I said those who insult our flag should be driven out of the city, nothing else; I made no reference to your speech. Although I do not agree with your views, I should never speak or act against freedom of speech.—S. Have you any objection that I called Chicago the Paris of America?—M. No, not in a certain sense; but I have it you meant it in the sense that Chicago is a revolutionary town.—S. Do you oppose all revolutions?—M. Most certainly.—S. Also that of 1776?—M. Oh, no; that's something different.—S. Why something different? Millions to-day live under a worse tyranny than that of the British ever has been.—M. I never studied social questions.—S. Then you don't know what Socialism means?—M. No.—S. You know what trusts are?—M. Oh, yes!—S. Have you ever heard that the natural development of trusts must lead to Socialism?—M. No. I am exclusively a business man, and have no time for these things.—S. Have you ever heard of "Looking Backward"?—M. No. What's that?—S. A book written by a man whose ancestors immigrated into Massachusetts about 200 years ago, and which contains everything that's called 'foreign Socialism.' Do you know something of the Nationalists, who have a large organisation in this city?—M. No; you mean the Irish?—S. No; I mean Americans who preach pure Socialism. Do you believe that public opinion has completely changed as regards the trial of the Anarchists?—M. I don't like to talk about that.—S. Don't you think that the Cronin trial is a disgrace for Chicago?—M. I got nothing to say about that.—S. So you don't want to drum me out of the city?—M. No, sir. On the contrary, I hope you remain a good while."

This ended the talk. Mayor Cregier, of Chicago City, most certainly is an ass either in pretence or in tact. Rosenberg has written a letter to the Mayor of Chicago, denouncing "the band of demagogues, which desired to show their hate of Americans by insulting their flag," which well illustrates the miserable nature of the man.

Boston, Mass., Oct. 22, 1889.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"SOCIALISM AND STRIKES."

Sir,—In the issue of Oct. 26th, "W. G. W." appeals on behalf of uniting the different Labour Unions, saying with truth that the leaders of these bodies "seem inclined to move only in their own small circle instead of uniting the whole." I think the Council of the S.L. ought to take serious steps in the matter, and to push forward by some means the teaching of Socialism to the unions that exist both in London and in the provinces; in fact, to follow the initiative of the Socialists in Belgium, who, I see in last Saturday's Weal, are convening a conference of all the worker's societies in Belgium for the 1st of November.

Socialist teaching will have small chance if something is not done soon among the different unions that have lately been formed in London and elsewhere, for a reaction is sure to follow unless the workers are taught to strike for something else besides a paltry penny per hour extra, or half an hour's less work per day. Cannot some of our best thinkers in the League formulate some scheme whereby the different associations may be welded together, so that their members might be inducted into the primary teachings of Socialism? That, I think, would be a great help in spreading propaganda, and it is I think the best means to induce working-men to see their own interests, and also to see that each one's interest is identical. By all means, I say, adopt W. G. W.'s proposal, and thus Socialism will be able to keep its own end in view, or how else are working-men to be prepared, systematically, for the time when they shall rise to take possession of their own?—Yours, etc.,

H. C. K.

MORALITY.

The "Scottish Socialist Federation," in the statement of its principles quoted in the Commonweal of Oct. 12th, uses a word which should not pass without protest when used by Socialists in connection with Socialism. It says it acknowledges "morality" with "truth and justice" as "the basis of behaviour." It speaks of "morality" as a definite thing, which, like the word "truth," conveys a definite idea to the mind. But the only "morality" which is known in Scotland is the conventional Christian "morality" of Scotland. Does the Scottish Socialist Federation mean that? If so, why is the "Scottish Socialist Federation" formed? and acknowledging "morality" why is it Socialist, seeing that Socialism is a protest against "the morals of the country." European morals are what we nickname "Mrs. Grundy." She has nothing in common with Socialism. The "Morals" of Europe, as taught and insisted on by all authorities—the only morals meant when one speaks briefly of "Morals" with a capital M—are, subordination to authority, marriage and the subjection of women, submission to exploitation, contentment in whatever slavery you are thrust, respect for "property" and a readiness to defend the wealth accumulated by one's owners, celibacy and prostitution for a vast proportion of both men and women; Faith, i.e., imbecility, the superstitious swallowing of some lie, any lie which it pleases "authority" to throw to you. These and such things as these are "morality," but my Socialism is a protest to the death against all of them and all such as they. If this is not the morality of the "Scottish Socialist Federation," what do they expect the Scottish people to understand as being their principles, and why do they use the word? Do they mean to be understood to approve of the Scottish Sabbath? Unless they do, they do not acknowledge "morality" in Scotland. This is but one item.

To repeat, there is no morality but the existing laws and customs which hold our present commercial and industrial society together. How can Socialists acknowledge it while using every endeavour to destroy those laws and customs? "Morality" is the merest shibboleth, like "glory" and "honour." Other than obedience to convention it has no existence whatever. Morals and Morality are absolute fictions. If they are to be regarded in the abstract, what are they? If in the concrete, where are they?

GEORGE PORTER.

LITERARY NOTES.

The National Reformer for Sept. 1 has a very neat if by no means exhaustive criticism, by John M. Robertson, on Bellamy's Looking Backward, which is well worth reading.

Into the merits of the quarrel with Mr. Powderly and the Knights of Labour we cannot enter on this side for lack of knowledge, but truth compels us to say that, excepting the Twentieth Century, there is not a better conducted or better written labour paper in the States than the official organ of the Knights of Labour, the Journal of United Labour, edited by A. W. Wright for the Board of Trustees.

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

The Bakers.

The men have refused the master's offer of a 12 hour's working-day, and will hand in their notices this Saturday for the 16th. A considerable minority of the masters have already granted the 10 hour's working-day, so it is not likely the strike will be general. All promises well for the agitation.

The Tramway Men.

The men have already benefited by finding a capable leader. The South London Tramway Company have reduced the hours of their employees to 12 and 12½ daily. This is the line where the men were talking of striking. The London Street Tramway Company have made a similar concession. The men are joining the union by hundreds.

The Silvertown Strike.

Things are much the same as last week. Money is coming in better, and the strikers show a fine front. The monotony of the strike was diversified last week by a little excitement. One of the strikers, a girl who had come out on principle, went back to work after receiving a pair of boots from the Strike Committee. The indignant populace broke the windows of the house in which she was living, and she is now under police protection. The people of Silvertown have a strong detestation of treason.

Trouble at the Docks.

The 4th of November, that has brought the docker's tanner, has brought fresh troubles with it. It is evident that the smouldering discontent which has been long prevalent seems likely to break into flame. The lightermen are striking; the men at one of the wharves are out, and a Daily News commissioner notes that the men have not received the tanner advance with many symptoms of joy. The lightermen's strike is a serious matter; there is still deep discontent concerning the blacklegs who still remain; and no one can tell how far the trouble may spread now it has once begun.

Later.—Matters are getting more serious. The South Side Strike Committee have issued a manifesto, in which they call the "glorious victory" a miserable sham, and call upon the men to come out for their dinner-money—the 3d. deducted from the 8d. gained. We hear that John Burns has thrown up all lecturing engagements in view of serious possibilities.

The Labour Revolt at Bristol.

Most of the strikers have gained their terms and gone to work again. The hatters and the cotton-factory hands are still out. The shop assistants are now agitating, and are threatening to strike if their demands are not granted. The directors of the tram companies have been forced to make concessions to prevent their men coming out. During the strike the bargemen, who were also out, blocked the Feeder Canal leading into the floating harbour by chaining their barges together under a bridge. The traffic was completely stopped, owing to this simple manœuvre, while the crowds that assembled refused to allow the barrier to be removed. An adventurous gentleman attempted to storm the barrier with a steam launch, but on being greeted with paving-stones gave up the attempt. The barges were at last removed by a hundred police, who got up very early in the morning and marched on the scene of action when there were no strikers about.

We have received an urgent appeal from our Bristol comrades for subscriptions for the women who are out at the cotton-factory. Subscriptions may be sent to Helena Born, secretary, British Workman Coffee House, New Street, St. Jude's, Bristol. These poor girls are subjected to the usual sweating and vexatious fines. It is a case which the Women's Trade Union Committee should surely take up.

The Railway Men.

The new union of the non-aristocratic railway men appears to be progressing favourably. Our readers will remember that this is composed of the poorer railway workers who are not allowed by the aristocratic or older society to join them in their union. The new union has already reached North London, and promises to spread into the provinces. The officials are very wroth, especially with John Burns, and in their rage have taken a very mean revenge. In the Railway Review of November 1st they publish an article taken from the "Times"!! defending "the Trade Unions' officials against the attacks" of John Burns, who is accused of attempting "to inflame the passions of uneducated men." It admits, however, that the action of the older society has been "automatic." That is good. "Automatic" is good. The arguments of the Times need little refutation, its character is too well known. The officials of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants must be very hard up for a defender, when they are obliged to fall back upon a paper known everywhere as the worst enemy of the working class, as well as one of the most cowardly, lying, forging sheets in existence. N.

The Strikes at Manchester.

The agitation of the gas-workers has been entirely successful. The Gas Committee of the Corporation, to avert a strike, have granted the eight hours day, in place of the twelve hours which has been the rule. The wages remain the same. Another easy victory has been won by the men employed at Berry's Blacking Works, who were on strike and formed a union. Mr. Berry made an unconditional surrender after a four days' struggle, which means that the greater part of the men get about 3s. a-week more in wages.

A second meeting of the Health Department employes, called together by the S. L., took place on Sunday in Stevenson Square. Barton and Bailie (S. L.), and W. Horrocks, organiser of the General Labourers' Union, addressed the men, who are determined to claim a considerable advance of wages and less work. They are now all organised. J. B.

Jewish Workers in Manchester.

A large meeting of machinists, tailors, and pressers was held on Saturday, October 26th, in the Wellington Hotel, Strangways, for the purpose of considering how to become united with the Amalgamated Society of Tailors. Mr. Quinn, President of the latter Association, spoke at some length on the necessity of union; he was followed by several English workers; and comrade Diemshietz received a hearty welcome on rising to speak in support of the resolution. J. Marshall read a letter he had received from the Secretary of the Manchester and Salford Trades Council, pointing out the advantages the society would gain by affiliating themselves with the above organisation. A resolution was passed to the effect that in future the English and Jewish workers will work in union with each other, so that when one society demands an increase in wages the other will assist them in that direction. J. M.

The "Shop Assistants' Union."

The union is progressing slowly but surely. At Hammersmith a branch has been formed which promises to be very strong; another is in course of formation at Whitechapel for the East End district. Most of the work has to be done on Sunday, and also secretly, as should the masters find out their assistants have joined they would often discharge them. No class of workers require to be organised more, for as their manifesto says, the modern conditions are such that it is getting less and less possible to become masters themselves, and yet too many of them remain as snobbish as ever. However, the competition machine is grinding it out of them somewhat. The places of meeting are, for Hammersmith, Lockhart's, 11, King Street; for East End, 147, Whitechapel Road (first floor). Wednesdays at 9.30.

The Carmen's Trade Union.

This union, the result of the late strike, is rapidly growing. At Nelson Street, Commercial Road, E., there is an exciting scene every Wednesday night, when the local branch business takes place at the "Crown and Anchor," the street being blocked with vans of all sorts while the men were paying their subscriptions; 134 new members were made the week before last, and last week members had to stand over as cards could not be made out fast enough. This branch is now over 400 strong. The police grumble and threaten the men for obstruction, but are really afraid to do anything as it would only advertise the organisation. The Wapping branch which meets at the "Prince Regent," St. George's Street, is also over 400 strong. At King's Cross the Midland Railway Carmen are joining secretly, and by their addition have sent the branch up to over 500. This shows what unskilled labour is capable of. During the dock strike numbers of them got the sack for going out to support the dockers (like our comrade Leggatt), but could get no assistance from the strike fund. Now they have got their own organisation, and are winning all along the line. J. T.

CAPITAL AND "LABOUR" AT LEICESTER.

THE mayor of Leicester is a bold man. It would not occur to most people that the present time was a happy one to induce representatives of capital and labour to meet at the same table for the purpose of having what may be called a friendly feed. Imagine, for instance, John Burns and Mr. Norwood eating and drinking together—or for the matter of that, any of the sweaters who have recently been exposed, enjoying their meals with the "pestilent agitators" who have caused all the bother. One fears that such feasting might end in a battle royal, when the wine was in and the wit was out, and the scene would hardly realise the common notion of a little heaven below, unless, indeed, it be the heaven of our remote ancestors, who, although Norse, yet were rather Irish in their notions, and required a combination of eating, drinking, and fighting to make up their paradise. But your admiration for the courage of the mayor vanishes when you find the name of Mr. Henry Broadhurst prominent upon the list, and himself occupying a place of honour as THE representative of labour at the mayor's left hand, while Mr. Picton, M.P., as Capital, occupied a seat on the mayor's right. Among the honoured guests we notice the name of George Snipton (London), and after that we cannot doubt that the mayor has got hold of as respectable a body of "labour representatives" (!) as can be procured at a short notice. People who live upon the bribes of the capitalist and by sweating their own class were well suited to "represent" labour at such a banquet.

The mayor did more than give a dinner; he made a speech, which was useful in proving one thing, and that is, how small a quantity of brains it requires to be mayor of an important manufacturing town. Among the numerous gems of oratory with which his speech was studded we select the following: "He [the mayor] had no hesitation in saying, and in taking the consequences of it, that those who were agitating in favour of an eight hours movement were the greatest enemies of the country." "Hear, hear!" from the "representatives" of labour present. We believe some honest men who had got in among the flunkies present protested, but their protests are not noticed in the report I have been reading. Now where did our friend get his logic from by which he justifies this extraordinary statement? If this is correct, the greatest foes Britain has are the editor of the Star, Mrs. Besant, John Burns, not to mention lesser lights. I wonder how many workmen outside the unique specimens assembled in the mayor's dining-room believe this statement. How people who advocate such a moderate proposal as an eight hour labour day can be the worst enemies of the country—or the capitalists, which I suppose was what the mayor meant—I will leave the reader to find out for himself; it is too mighty a problem for me to understand. I should like also to know how the mayor reconciles his statement that "every sensible Englishman sympathised with the dock-labourers strike"—among whom, I presume, the mayor doesn't reckon himself—with his other statement that the leader of that strike, as an advocate of the eight hours movement, is "the greatest enemy of the country." Is it not likely that that dreadful person was only pursuing his deep and deadly designs in getting up that strike in order to drive in like a wedge that fearful instrument of hellish destruction to the honour and glory of England, the eight hour movement? We pause for a reply.

Mr. Picton, M.P., was also much disturbed in his mind, because he had been listening to some more dreadful persons in Regent's Park who had proposing to nationalise his machinery. In the speeches of all present there was a prevailing tone of uneasiness; though Mr. Broadhurst might declare that labour was no enemy of capital, and the capitalists might reply they were quite willing to be friendly to labour as represented by Mr. Broadhurst, yet it seemed that the red spectre stood at the banquet board while the lights burnt blue in that ghastly presence. It was vain to cry "Hence, horrible shadow! unreal mockery, hence!" The goblin wouldn't go, and the cry of the millions who starve and slave around, while their smug "representatives" feasted with their tyrants, rose like a mournful wail. How long? how long? N.

REPORTS.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A fair meeting held at Latimer Road on Sunday morning; speakers were R. J. Lyne, J. F. Lyne, and Dean; good sale of Weal and 7½d. collected. No meeting at St. Ann's Road owing to weather. W. S. De Mattos lectured at our rooms to a good audience on "The Radical Policy and Practicable Socialism," after which a great number of questions were asked and good discussion followed; 1s. 1d. collected and a few Commonweal sold.

St. GEORGE'S EAST.—A fair meeting held at Mile End Waste on Tuesday, opened by comrade Foley and addressed by Turner; small sale of Commonweal. At the business meeting on Wednesday, two comrades attended from the Poplar group and reported work done; treasurer gave notice of resignation, as he leaves for New York on Thursday. He intends to try and form a Socialist League there, and be an agent for the Commonweal, also to correspond with the branch. No meetings held on Sunday on account of wet. The bad weather lately has spoiled the sale of literature. Comrade Leggett, of this branch, opened a discussion at the "Three Kings", Clerkenwell, Sunday night, on "Why I Became a Socialist"; good debate followed, in which several comrades took part.

STREATHAM.—Secretary of branch gave an address on "The Fallacy of Palliatives" at the "Leigham Arms." Two of our Streatham comrades took part in the debate on "Capital and Labour" at the Liberal Club. Short meeting at Fountain on Sunday; fair sale of Weal.

ABERDEEN.—At Castle Street on Sunday, 27th ult., and Saturday, 2nd inst., Duncan addressed good meetings. On Monday, 28th ult., Kropotkin lectured to about 1,000 people in the Albert Hall, Professor Ramsay in the chair. On the following night he spoke to an audience of 300 or 400 workers in the Friendly Society's Hall, the meeting being a free one; Bisset, a capitalist blacksmith and ex-president of Trades Council, in the chair. At both meetings questions were answered; the lectures were well reported in the local papers.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Tuesday evening Downie, Gilbert, Joe and Tim Burgoyne held a successful meeting on Cathedral Square. On Sunday, at 12.30, Joe Burgoyne and Glasier spoke on Jail Square. At 2.30, a conference of members and sympathisers took place in the Reception Room of the Waterloo Hall—comrades Morris, Crane, Cobden-Sanderson, and Walker being present. The conference, though not so well attended as it ought to have been, was a most interesting and useful one. In the evening Walter Crane lectured in the Waterloo Hall on "The Educational Value of Art," William Morris in the chair. Although the evening was wet and there was a charge for admission, over 700 persons were present. Crane's lecture, which was a very Socialistic one, was listened to with great attention and frequent manifestations of approval. He illustrated his lecture with sketches on the blackboard which we heartily applauded. Cobden-Sanderson then delivered an eloquent address, which made a marked impression on the audience. A resolution expressing sorrow at the deplorable accident by which some thirty women and girls lost their lives two days before in the Greehead Mills, Glasgow, and expressing sympathy with their relatives and friends, was moved by Glasier and seconded by George McLean and carried unanimously. In closing the meeting Morris made a strong appeal in behalf of Socialism and the branch. A collection in behalf of the relatives of the Greehead disaster was taken on going out, and £7 10s. was collected. Financially the meeting was a success, and it will no doubt do much to popularise Socialism in the city. The visit of our London comrades has imbued us with new spirit and will, we hope, help to increase greatly the efficacy of the branch.—G.

LEICESTER.—T. Barclay lectured in the Vine Street Radical Club on Sunday, November 3rd, in the morning, to a small audience, on "The Principles of Socialism." In the evening, to much larger numbers, on "Labour and Capital." Both addresses were followed by discussion. On Monday evening Kate Barclay read a paper on "Thrift" at our branch meeting; good discussion.—A. G.

MANCHESTER.—P. Kropotkin gave a lecture to a large audience, and was most enthusiastically received; our members sold about 9s. of literature.

NORWICH.—Sunday last, owing to the wretched weather, no open-air meeting could be held; a number of comrades and friends turned up at our Hall, where some of the speeches of the Chicago Anarchists were read; comrade Swash spoke in support. In the evening a discussion was opened by Lenneying, subject—"What is Socialism?" Comrades W. Moore, Houghton, Emery, and others took part; very poor sale of Commonweal, owing to the weather.

DUBLIN.—The debate at the Progressist Club on "Anarchism versus Democracy," opened by comrade W. Thompson, was kept up for three evenings, owing to the great number desirous of speaking. The advocates of Social Democracy were the more numerous; the Anarchists having if anything the best of the argument; King, Wilson, Hamilton, Locke, Dr. Creagh (Beunos Ayres), and several others spoke.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

A CURIOUS article in the Pall Mall Gazette is a good example of how far the force of conventional ignorance can go. It is in praise of advertisements, and its writer actually says, and I suppose really does think, that advertisements cheapen wares! Says he, "The morning cup of cocoa pays for the morning newspaper," thinking apparently that the said cocoa is cheapened by its having to bear its share of the advertising-rag, differentiated by this that or the other political humbug, which we are pleased to call a newspaper.

Did it ever occur to this very droll writer that the said advertising sheet cost labour, and that that labour might have been employed in producing things useful to the citizens, instead of puffing the private adventure of some capitalist which has for its object the robbing of anyone who will allow himself to be robbed?

An advertisement is, in short, an act of war, and cheapens wares just as much as a battery trampling down a wheatfield cheapens bread. If the Pall Mall Gazette in its enthusiasm for advertisement, and the rotten rags called newspapers, would give us the statistics of advertising of all kinds, say in the form of the "Puffer's Almanack," it would earn my eternal gratitude.

Another Pall Mall writer (or perhaps the same) has a rapturous article on the subject of the Eiffel Tower, and hopes we shall have several in London. Now as to its beauty (?) tastes differ, but I shall not allow myself to be bullied by Philistia into silence even on that point; so I say that it appeared to me a hellish piece of ugliness; but let that pass. But what is the meaning or use of it? Its use is simply to catch francs. All the labour of the thousands of workmen employed on it has been devoted to the erection of a franc-catching trap; a piece of brigandage on the public.

That teacher of the public, the Pall Mall Gazette, ought to be able to see that these Eiffel Towers, advertisements, and the rest of it, are on one side of them mere acts of war of the predatory classes, the capitalists; and on the other bonfires wherewith to burn up the energies of the working-men, to waste their labour as much as if it had never been; to have fed, clothed, and housed the men who built the Eiffel Tower without providing them with "employment" would have been comparatively an act of wisdom. This is the kind of folly, to pay for which the lives of the workers are worn away in shame without their ever having had a day's real pleasure. Do not let us tolerate for a single moment any act of the accursed thing—Capitalism.

To see how Socialism grows in favour it is only necessary to glance down any club lecture-list, or over the pages of any newspaper. I do not often see the Weekly Budget, nor I suppose do many readers of the Commonweal, but all the same it has an enormous circulation, mostly in country districts, so that it is interesting to note what a friendly attitude the editor assumes towards a mild (very mild!) kind of Socialism. The people must be more converted than some of us fancy when a firmly-established story paper such as this finds it necessary to progress in our direction.

A writer in the Twentieth Century has been "busting up" Henry George's reputation for originality by showing that 'Progress and Poverty' is only an old work by Patrick Edward Dove, worked over, re-written, and dressed in garments of more modern cut. To this Mr. George has replied in his own paper, but up to the present to no great effect. Of course, it does not affect the value of his book in the least that he took so much of it from another without acknowledgment, but it throws the same kind of light on his own character that his treatment of Socialists and others has done.

The Rev. T. W. Lewis, who describes himself as "a humble Methodist preacher, living and working to glorify God and do good to humanity," sends an article to the New York Independent, defending the action of the whites in killing twenty-seven Negroes in the State of Mississippi recently. He says, "The Anglo Saxon was born to rule in this Southern country." And again:

"I wish to say, in conclusion, that I am a true friend of the Negro. I preach to them. I believe they have immortal souls and are capable of advancement in morals as well as in mental culture. I preach a gospel of peace and love. . . . If we let the Negro alone, let him send his children to school, attend his church, see that he is paid for his work and not tampered with by designing white men, he is a peaceable citizen. But school him in politics, arouse his blood against the white people among whom he lives, and you make a fool of him. Yes; worse than a fool. You make him a dangerous element in society."

Whereupon comrade Pentecost in Twentieth Century comments in this fashion:

"This is the gospel of peace and love that is preached everywhere to working-men; for the Negro is the working-man of the South. Let him alone in his ignorance; let him send his children to school long enough to read and write a little; let him go to church, where he will be taught the virtues of economy and contentment in poverty; pay him for his work about one-fourth of what his work is worth; but do not train him in the art of getting his rights, do not arouse his mind, his blood, against his oppressors. If you do, you make him a dangerous element in society, which means, dangerous to the rich criminals, for whose benefit society is, at present, organised. This is the gospel that is preached by a large number of 'humble Methodist preachers, living and working to glorify' the God of the rich, and do good to the class that hires them to preach 'peace and love' to the poor; that is, that the poor should be peaceful and loving toward the rich."

Another "little war" is looming in the distance. There is one part of New Zealand known as the Uriwera country, where the Maories have remained isolated in their mountain fastnesses, refusing all contact with civilisation, adhering to their old customs and superstitions, and leading the life that their ancestors led before the arrival of Captain Cook. Gold is known to exist in the Uriwera country, and, if an attempt to "open it up" which is about to be made, is successful, the place will be soon rushed by crowds of intending diggers. Conflicts between the whites and Maories will then be inevitable; and the usual result inevitable also.

There has lately been going the round of the papers an amusing and true story at the expense of the Hamburg police. When the embassy from the Sultan of Zanzibar was in the city the African diplomatists lodged in the Hamburger Hof, whose landlord, in honour of his guests, hoisted the red flag of Zanzibar upon the roof of his hotel. To a German policeman the sight of a red flag is more enraging than it is supposed to be to a bull. The astonished chief of police marched into the hotel and asked the landlord what the — he meant by unfurling the revolutionary symbol in so conspicuous a place. The landlord explained that the official flag of the African monarch was unfortunately the exact double of the official flag of the European anti-monarchical party; and though he danced with rage, the professional defender of law'n'order could only glare helplessly at the offending flag which waved so tauntingly in front of him.

Competition is killing itself all round, and combination—not yet for the common benefit—is taking its place. The publishing house of "George Routledge and Sons" is to be turned at once into a Limited Liability Company. But a more important change is under discussion. This is an amalgamation of the future Routledge and Co. with Messrs. Warne and Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co. If this should really come about, it will be a very powerful combination. A second scheme is also talked of, in which three other well-known publishing houses are interested; Messrs. Kegan Paul and Co., Messrs. Trübner, and Mr. Redway. These rumours may be incorrect or premature, but they are certainly well founded, and show which way the current sets,
S.

A LONG-DELAYED REPLY.

Unity, the organ of the leading Friendly Societies, in its October number had some friendly notes upon our reply to its former attack upon Socialists, which should have been answered before, but one thing and another has kept us from dealing with them as they deserve. This we are all the more sorry for, as the Commonweal was spoken of in a very complimentary way.

First of all, Unity says that we have not "attempted to parry the attack" which it made upon us for quarrelling and the like. Well! as to that, we sometimes quarrel, of course, as all men do, and never pretend otherwise. It is deplorable, no doubt, but very natural under existing circumstances. Really, our friend should see that our anxiety to alter the system under which we live is not because we are perfect, but because we want a chance of becoming so.

Another part of the charge was, that we took part in labour troubles without all of us being workmen. That we fully admitted and do admit, but where is the harm of it when all is said? It is a pity, perhaps, that workmen cannot wholly rely on themselves for their own emancipation, but it is not a pity that members of the privileged class should cast aside their privileges and step down to fight for the common good.

Unity thinks it scored against us as we did not reply more fully. We have said what seems to us necessary, but if more is needed we shall be glad to be told so.

And now for the answer to our "assault." "Our Socialistic friend," says Unity, "finds fault with Friendly Societies because they have not publicly taken part and identified themselves with the great strike, and, further, with us, for not having expressed in these columns our sympathy with the poor dockers. But surely the writer ought to know that trade disputes have nothing directly to do with Friendly Societies as bodies." Nothing to do directly, at least as far as their primary objects are concerned, we know that well enough. But the article goes on to say that: "The affiliations are mainly composed of the working-classes," (who have presumably nothing directly to do with wage-disputes!) "and we have no reason to believe that they, as individuals, have gathered their unspotted skirts around them, and passed by on the other side." Our charge was against them as organisations. What did they do?

"As bodies, they have no power to vote their money to other than specified purposes; but we know that the members have subscribed, as we ourselves have done, though the names do not appear in bold print. So far from 'passing by on the other side,' we have used both money and influence on behalf of the starving poor." All this may be true; we hope for the credit of human nature that it is. But is money everything? Our friend confesses that it is not, by coupling it with "influence." But here we would ask again, What influence was exerted? and where? and when? A no doubt estimable but comparatively unknown private person probably exerted his personal influence on the right side—but as editor of Unity he said nothing—at a time when silence could bear but one construction. And the same behaviour on the part of Friendly Societies as a whole was what we complained of. They had no power, it is said, to vote their funds for other than specific purposes. Granted; but need that have prevented them from voting that a collection be taken up at each meeting? Need the inability to vote money from their funds have prevented their voting sympathy? To place their organised influence, the assurance of their support, behind the struggling dockers, to let the public know that they, the more fortunate of the workers, were on the side of their weaker brethren—was this impossible?

"We rejoice in the victory that the dockers have achieved." Glad to hear that, anyway. "The battle was well fought and nobly won; and we admire John Burns for his active and self-denying labours." Sorry you didn't make it easier for him! "But Burns preached simple justice, and that was the reason he received support." What is "justice," friend? "If, instead, he had preached Socialism pure and simple, as we understand it—and we must confess that, although we have been studying the subject for some time, we are still somewhat mystified—the influence he would have been able to exert would have been altogether different. People subscribed for fairer wages for the oppressed poor—not for social upheaval." But they didn't subscribe until the "social upheaval" was taking place. On our back page will be found a statement of our principles, which may help to clear Unity's ideas of what Socialism is. It may be seen from that statement that we are concerned not so much with "fairer" wages as with fair wages—otherwise, that the full product of labour should go to the labourer. If that is not "simple justice," what is?

Unity goes on to say: "Well, we guess we are on the right side of the labour battle, if it means paying a fair day's wage for a fair day's work" (see questions above), "and we wish all our brethren would endorse the sentiment." But they don't, and won't so long as they are allowed to think that the whole duty of man is to "benefit the community at large, by relieving the rates, and by making provision for disasters which would otherwise entail suffering on relatives and friends."

Next, complains Unity, "our contemporary objects to the Friendly Societies having lots of money. The seven millions sterling possessed by the Oddfellows, for instance, is apparently an eyesore to the Socialist. Why, we don't quite see." Here, again, our friend is confused. What we objected to was not the possession of so much money, but the use made of it—putting it out at interest, deriving revenue from unpaid labour. "Now, in conclusion, we should like to ask,

Does the Socialist really object to the principles upon which affiliations are founded; and the work which is carried on upon those principles? Are Socialists wanting to fight Friendly Societies, Trade Unions, and everybody? If so, what are their principles? and How do they want to apply them? We await with interest an authoritative answer, an answer of reason and argument, not of thinly-veneer'd abuse, which may be, and indeed is, amusing—very amusing—but not convincing. If Socialism be right, then we are not above being Socialists ourselves; but we must be shown that it is right."

We do not object, we say again, to men combining for mutual benefit. How could we, when what we preach and work for is universal combination for the common good? What we do object to, is the tendency of those who combine for some partial and personal benefit imagining that thereby they are helping to solve the social problem. And we are wanting to fight anybody and everybody who by so acting gets across our path. Along with this number of the Commonweal we are sending Unity our manifesto, with such of our pamphlets as happen to be in print; and in our turn also we shall "await with interest" and confidence the close and searching criticism, the detailed and studied reply which we know will be accorded us by Unity. More than that, we shall await with quite equal confidence the, perhaps later, but still sure, conversion of our friend, the editor of Unity, to Socialism, and his admission that he has come to see that neither Benefit Clubs, Trade Unions, nor Co-operative Societies, together or separately, can work out the salvation of the working folk, but that they must melt into something wider and deeper, something that shall embrace them all, and more, the ownership and administration by the community of all the means of life—Socialism. S.

IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

THE state of affairs in Johannesburg and in Kimberley just now is such that no tradesman, unless he is a fool, ought to even think of coming out from Britain. In Kimberley (diamond-fields) the De Beers Company has given notice that they intend to shut down two mines (Dutoitspan and Bielfontien). This will throw 200 white and over 1,800 native workers out of employment. This restriction is expected to raise the price of diamonds in the home markets and so increase the shareholders' dividends. In Johannesburg matters are indeed critical. Cape Town people are fond of proclaiming—aye, even from the housetops—that there is no such thing as a poorhouse in their midst. No; with the paupers as with the Robben Island lepers, a prison does instead. Woe to the poor wretch who is found wandering about "without any visible means of support." The following cutting is from the Cape Times, and may be taken for truth. Sometimes when reading the said paper I think that it must have been

"A page of the [Cape] Times the Devil read,
Then threw it down. Ahem!
I'm the father of lies, I know, he said,
But I'm damned if I father them!"

"A coloured woman named Sarah Daniels, who presented a pitiable sight on Saturday morning as she stood in the Police Court, was charged with being found wandering about without visible means of support. On Friday she was found in a state of starvation by a constable, who 'humanely' took her to the station. She had been for some time in the hospital, and since she left it she had nowhere to go to. Mr. Crosby passed a sentence of fourteen days' imprisonment." If the "visibility" of the stockbroking, shareholding, dividend-hunting gentry's means of support were demanded, the gaol would have a good many more insiders. And on the whole, it would be the best place for them, until they had learnt to earn their living honestly.

The Eastern Star (Johannesburg paper), commenting on the dilapidated state of the prison and the need of its repair, says that there are "176 scoundrels inside it." The population of Johannesburg is about 25,000. What a terrible large number of scoundrels there must be at large, to be sure. The difference in this case is that "the cute legal scoundrels are outside, the simple unauthorised ones in."

The scarcity of food tended to bring the strike of engineers, blacksmiths, etc., in Johannesburg to an end, but not before the demands of the men had in most cases been granted.

In Matabeleland the natives are beginning to scent danger and have driven most of the whites out. Colonel Carrington, who is near Matabeleland with a force of border police reports that he expects to be attacked every day by the Matabeles and that he is dissatisfied with the small force at his disposal. I expect to be in Matabeleland about March, and if there is fighting going on then shall be more likely to take sides with the Matabeles, who are a brave, manly tribe, than with the Rudd-Rhodes Syndicate. J. B.

LITERARY NOTES.

The National Economist, of Washington, D.C., is the organ of the Farmer's and Labourer's Union of America, and so far as we can see from the numbers which have as yet come to hand, is a "live" paper, solid and square for labour interests and progress generally.

Ten years is the average life of the London dock labourer who sticks to it, and the wages never reach above 30 cents an hour. The worst English prisons do not succeed in using up an average man in less than 15 years, a margin of five years thus standing in their favour. Why wonder at crime in London.—Boston Herald.

SOCIALISM AND POLITICS.—There seems to be a split in the Socialistic Labour party. With Socialistic aspiration after a better state of things we have great sympathy, but with Socialistic politics none at all. Politics is necessarily bad because it necessarily involves more or less of lying, humbug, and hypocrisy. Truth and politics cannot live in the same town. Neither ballots nor bullets are necessary to accomplish what most people want done. It is a fallacy to suppose that we must get things done either by ballots or bullets. All that is necessary is that a sufficient number of persons shall want the things done.—Twentieth Century.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The intended strike of the bookbinders at Stuttgart has been avoided, the masters of sixty-five firms having given way and accepted the new tariff claimed by the workers. Only a very few small employers have not as yet acceded to the toilers demands. Some time ago the bookbinders of Munich also succeeded in bettering their lot, and it is now hoped that their colleagues in every town throughout Germany will soon follow suit.

The German engineers are very busy just now in order to strengthen their organisation, and to induce all the men in that trade to join the existing union. The central committee of their union have sent out emissaries in all parts of the country, and their corporative organ, which is issued at Nürnberg, is rapidly increasing its circulation. At Nürnberg itself the progress of the union has been very rapid; three years ago only 80 members were on the books, and now there are over 1,200. At Stuttgart, the locksmith's union was only formed two or three months ago, and it has already 200 members. They have also in the last-named town founded a professional school, which is frequented by 60 pupils.

The male and female workers in the hosiery line at Chemnitz (Saxony), who have been on strike for seventeen days, have now resumed work after having won a complete victory. They have obtained in the various parts of their trade an increase of wages of from 5 to 15 per cent., the system of fines has been reduced, and an official scale of wages has to be placarded in all the workshops.

The 8th part of the "Berliner Arbeiter-Bibliothek" (Berlin Worker's Library) has just been issued. It is entitled, "Die wirtschaftlichen Umwälzungen unserer Zeit und die Entwicklung der Sozialdemokratie" (The economical Revolutions of our Time, and the Development of Social Democracy), by comrade Max Schippel, chief editor of the Berlin Volks Tribune, 32 pages, small 8vo, for 1½d.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Our Vienna comrades have started a new organ, which will defend in a satirical manner the interests of the working-classes. It is entitled, Glimlichter (Glow-lights), humoristic-satirical worker's paper. To begin with, it is to appear fortnightly, under the editorship of comrades Haas Czermak, administrator of Vorwaerts (Forward), the organ of the book-printers' unions of Austria, and Hans Bernauer, compositor. The editorial address is, H. Bernauer, VIII., Lenaugasse, No. 16, Vienna; and the address of the administration, Glimlichter, I., Am Bergel, No. 1, Vienna. We wish our humouristic comps over there good luck in their venture.

RUSSIA.

Last week we took from the telegraphic messages of the daily press the sad tidings of Tchernyschewsky's death, and announced at the same time that we intended in the present issue of this paper to deal at some length with the life and works of the founder of scientific revolutionary Socialism in Russia. We are now glad to say, in contradiction of this press news, that the illustrious sociologist is not dead at all, but on the contrary enjoys at the present time rather good health. Again, the news respecting his free pardon, which was here given some weeks ago, must be contradicted. We have the authority of Dr César De Paepe, the translator into French of Tchernyschewsky's economical works, for stating that he has only been transferred from Astrakan to Saratoff, where he is still under severe police supervision. But in this last place of confinement the Czar's heroic victim is at liberty to devote himself to scientific work. He has already written, under the nom de plume of Andreief, several essays in a Russian review. He has also translated into Russian language Weber's Universal History. It is announced that he is now engaged on a considerable critical work on Karl Marx's 'Capital.' We are exceedingly glad to be able to communicate these good tidings to our readers, and we earnestly hope that he may be preserved for a long time to come to the cause of Socialism, for which he has suffered twenty-five years of his life in the mines and in the prisons of Siberia.

HOLLAND.

On the 3rd November last the cigarmakers of Holland and Belgium met in a conference at the Hague and discussed the following agenda: 1. Situation of the two countries in relation to their trade; 2. Creation of branches both in Holland and Belgium, and of one general union for both countries; 3. Trades unions and their interference with politics; 4. Nomination of a committee for the organisation of an international cigarmakers' congress; 5. Ways and means by which to obtain a reduction of the work hours; 6. Ways and means by which to obtain equal wages for male and female workers; 7. Creation of a trade organ for both countries. We have not as yet received the minutes of the proceedings of the Hague conference, but we may say that the convening of an international congress of cigarmakers has been decided for the month of September 1890, and the trades organ De Sigarenmaker (Cigarmaker) of Amsterdam has been declared the official paper of the union.

VICTOR DAVE.

GREECE.

Here is one of those events which are of frequent occurrence in Greece, that ancient centre of civilisation, where all the royalties of Europe were gathered the other day to sanction, by the royal wedding at Athens, the sway of the capitalists and the exploiters. An Athenian (landowner, capitalist, and lawyer) was killed by a peasant lass of seventeen, Chariclea Verthi, whom he violated in a country house. The girl was working hard on his estate for a miserable wage, on which her family depended, her brother and father being out of employment. The rich lawyer, against whom the girl fought desperately but in vain, went to sleep after his brutal achievement, but the Greek heroine determined to lodge a bullet in his head. This she did by means of the sporting gun of her sleeping enemy, which was hung above his bed, and delivered herself afterwards to the police, saying that she had exterminated one of the enemies of the honour and happiness of her class. This little social drama shows that even in that young nation of modern Hellenes, who but for the politicians, might make rapid progress in civilisation, the rich class are the most immoral element of the community; and on the other hand it shows that the poor are full of the spirit of rebellion against bourgeois tyranny.

THE AGE.

(HENRICH HEINE. Translated by EMMA LAZARUS.)

My heart is heavy; from the present
 It yearns towards those old days again,
 When still the world seemed fair and pleasant,
 And men lived happy, free from pain.

Now all things seem at six and sevens;
 A scramble, and a constant dread;
 Dead is the Lord God in the heavens,
 Below us is the Devil dead.

And all folks sad and mournful moving,
 Wear such a cold, cross, anxious face;
 Were there not still a little loving,
 There would not be a resting-place.

SOCIALISM IN LEEDS.

WE have been so eaten up with work in this town of late that report-writing for the Commonweal had to be left over. The Builders' Labourers' Union which we had the pleasure of inaugurating, and which came out so victoriously from the strike it was engaged in, now numbers over 900 members and has about £300 in hand. No sooner was their business settled than an agitation arose amongst the gas-workers, and a great number of meetings have been held in connection with their grievances, at which the various speakers of our society have taken part. Our rooms have been thrown open to them during the agitation, and matters are rapidly coming to a crisis. Another week will see them out on strike, and Leeds in darkness, if their demands are not conceded. A meeting in connection with the gas-workers' question was held on Sunday last, at which about 5,000 were present.

In addition to our work amongst the gas-men, we have been agitating amongst the tailoresses with the object of forming them into a union. A meeting was held a couple of weeks ago at one of the Board schools, and a goodly number of names enrolled. Our work has been greatly accelerated by a strike at one of the shops, where 600 girls and women came out, and the union now numbers about 1,500 members. The strike still continues, and when I mention that about two public meetings are held each day, you will perceive that our hands are full. The girls have been out about ten days (as I now write), and about £250 has been collected for them. A local paper has opened a strike fund, and is giving prominence to the dispute, devoting a couple of pages daily. When I tell you that several columns "interviews" with various members of our body have appeared in the press, you will perceive that Socialism is going ahead and becoming more tolerable—mayhap perforce—to the "respectables."

With all this on our hands, we have had to find time to go around and give the municipal candidates fits; and only last week a deputation of workmen came to our club and asked for assistance, as they intend striking. As the delegates represented about 400 men, lively times are anticipated. We shall try to form them into a branch of the N. U. G. W. & G. L.

Mr. Broadhurst, M.P., once instanced Leeds as a town where Socialism could never take root. We hope within a very short period to make it such a hotbed of Socialism that Mr. Broadhurst will be unable to get a following. I will report again in a couple of weeks as things develop.

The Hartford (Conn.) Examiner, in a recent editorial, says: "What is the primal cause of all the poverty, suffering, and misery we behold in the world? Our answer would unhesitatingly be, the want of thought among the people. The majority of the people don't think, particularly the honest ones, therefore they are a prey to those who do."

THE ART CONGRESS.

LAST week was an eventful one with us in Edinburgh. Not that we can say the Art Congress has, from a general point of view, been a success. On the contrary, the members have been few and the papers seldom brilliant. It started badly. The Marquis of Lorne may be an excellent person, but he made a poor president. There was a select audience of about four hundred to hear his opening address, but to three-fourths of them it was mere pantomime of a rather awkward kind.

Needless to say there were also a few Philistines, who distinguished themselves by attacking Ruskin and his doctrine of morality in art. One might have sympathised with them if convinced their hostility had been directed to the morality of Pharaosism. We have too much of this miserable conventionality everywhere, but we felt somehow the critics had more than their own share of it; for after all, the morality of Ruskin is nothing more than fidelity of execution and sincerity of purpose.

The most successful meetings of all, however, were perhaps the lectures given to working men. These were led off by Morris and Crane and finished by Walker and Sanderson. We were not only much gratified by the reception given by the artizans to our comrades, but proud also to think they had been found most competent to address them on matters relative to their handicrafts.

Crane and Morris also lectured under the auspices of the Socialists to fashionable audiences in a West-end hall. The charges were high, and the attendance, considering the time and weather, was good. Crane's subject was "The Educational Value of Art," and it took well. He was in good form, and his illustrations of the Crag Baron, the Bag Baron, and the Capitalist elephant on the tortoise of Labour were most effective and instructive.

The proceedings terminated on Friday night by a regular Socialist meeting, with Crane in the chair and Morris as speaker. It was not only well attended in point of numbers, but the quality of the audience was also excellent.

The Branch held a Social in honour of our comrades at the close, and kept it up with speech and song to "the wee short hours ayont the twal." Altogether we have been refreshed and strengthened by the visit of our comrades from London.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To those who have obtained copies of the Commonwealth through the propagandist work of our comrades, by free distribution in the streets and public conveyances, or by purchase at our outdoor stations, we ask if in agreement with our principles to help the sale of the Commonwealth by ordering it of their newsagents, and sending on to us the names of newsagents willing to sell it; and still better, as our outdoor work must shortly be reduced, by joining the local branches and helping on the work.

ANNIVERSARY OF CHICAGO MARTYRS AND BLOODY SUNDAY.

THE South Place Institute was overcrowded last Monday with an enthusiastic audience, which vociferously cheered the songs and speeches, and unanimously voted the resolutions submitted to it.

The proceedings opened by the choir singing "When the People have their own again," after which the following resolution was moved by the chairman in a brief and simple speech:—

"That this meeting, having heard with deep regret of the death of Lulu, the youngest child of their murdered comrade, Albert R. Parsons, desires unanimously to express its unfeigned and fraternal sympathy with the widowed and bereaved mother, and to assure her of their participation in her great sorrow."

The choir then sang Parsons' favourite, "Annie Laurie," after which the first resolution was moved by C. W. Mowbray (S.L.) and seconded by James Blackwell (Freedom Group); F. Feigenbaum (Bernier Street Club), Lothrop Withington, and Peter Kropotkin supported, the latter making pathetic reference to an episode of Siberian life which had recently come to light, and asking the meeting to include the Russian comrades in their memory with the martyrs:—

"That this meeting, called together to commemorate the legal murder of four men in Chicago on November 11th, 1887 (Parsons, Spies, Fischer, and Engel), the driving to suicide of another (Lingg) in prison, and the cruel imprisonment of three more (Fielden, Schwab, and Neebe), by the government of the State of Illinois, for the crime of encouraging workmen on strike and helping them to carry on the struggle against their masters, and the further crime of trying to maintain the rights of free speech and public meeting, calls the attention of the workmen of the world to the gradual abrogation of these rights in all capitalistic countries, and while emphatically denouncing the tyrannical interference with these elementary rights, points out that it is a natural and necessary result of a so-called Society based upon the robbery of Labour."

A collection was then taken, and realised £5 19s.

After a few minutes recess, "Linnell's Death Song" was sung by the choir, and the second resolution was moved by Frank Kitz, seconded by William Morris, and supported by D. J. Nicoll:—

"That this meeting also denounces the similar attack on free speech and the right of public meeting in London on Sunday, November 13, 1887, through which three men were killed (Linnell, Curwen, and Connell), one (Harrison) so injured that he died after a painful and lingering illness, and many sent to prison after a mere mockery of trial, and it again calls for the immediate and unconditional release of George Harrison, condemned to five years' penal servitude for being present at a political meeting which was ferociously attacked by the police."

During the evening several telegrams (which will be printed in full next week) were received and read to the meeting, eliciting loud applause.

The meeting closed at a late hour by singing the "Marseillaise," and giving three cheers for the Social Revolution.

BURIAL OF LULU PARSONS.

ON Wednesday, 16th October, Lulu E. Parsons, the only and deeply-loved daughter of our dead comrade Parsons—the child of his hope and his most ardent love—was buried near the eastern boundary of Waldheim Cemetery, Chicago. Mrs. Kinsella, Mrs. Holmes, Mrs. Sund, and Mrs. Appel were the pall-bearers, and there were a large number of mourners and many tributes and signs of sympathy. The casket, a plain white one, was literally covered with flowers. The name "Lulu" appeared in immortelles on several wreaths. Bright red ribbons streamed from two or three. Mrs. Parsons stood with difficulty while the casket was borne past her to the grave, and sat down on the turf when the simple ceremonies began. Mr. Holmes stood beside the coffin, which was uncovered, and made a brief pathetic address, in the course of which he said: "The child who gave such bright promise of womanhood is gone from our midst; cut off in the early springtime of her life. For more than a year she bore her sufferings; bore them with sweet, uncomplaining patience that excited wonder and admiration in all who knew her; bore them even with cheerfulness, for her's was a disposition of gladness and sunshine. Time was when she was the pride of a fond father's heart; that father who paid the penalty of a crime the most heinous of which civilisation can conceive, the crime of loving oppressed humanity better than himself, the crime of loving justice and truth more than power and pelf. She was the light of her mother's eye; that mother who stands desolate and alone in her overpowering grief—twice stricken by the remorseless hand of Destiny. To those of you who knew our little Lulu I need speak no word of praise. To know was to admire and love her. To you who knew not, or scarcely knew this child, I will say she was one of the brightest, fairest flowers ever gathered into the bosom of our common mother. She was beautiful, and gave promise of a more beautiful womanhood. She was gentle, and good, and patient; loving and lovable. She was a beam of sunshine, reflecting the radiance of all that is good and glad in nature; and she gave abundant promise of superior intellectual force, of rare versatility and talent. And yet she was but a child—a child in years and in feeling; not precocious or self-conscious in the least, but happy, frolicsome, gay as a butterfly. Such was the little creature for whom we join this stricken mother in mourning." At the conclusion of the address Mrs. Kinsella sang "Annie Laurie" in a sweet, subdued voice, and the friends then slowly filed by to take a last look at the waxen face beneath the glass. This over, Mrs. Parsons quickly went away, the coffin was lowered into the grave, and very soon the little Anarchist maid was sleeping near her murdered father under a canopy of flowers.

The Montreal Witness alleges that at Woodstock, Ontario, a number of once useful, but now feeble and helpless poor men, are in prison just because they are poor. The climax is reached in the statement that a lady, a scholarly and accomplished Scotswoman, the cousin of a pioneer Presbyterian D.D. and the widow of a Baptist deacon, is now lying in jail because of her helpless poverty. It is hard to believe these statements.—Christian Leader.—They are not so much unlike what we have here. It requires little effort to believe and know them—even in Scotland.—G. MCL.

IN AUSTRALIA.

SINCE the last communication to the Commonweal an incident of a most striking and startling nature has come to light. In the last letter from here a short epitome of the A. A. Co. Glebe Pit disaster was given, and the verdict of the coroners' jury stated. Since then, however, the rescue party have discovered the whole of the buried men, and the philanthropic company which murdered them in its rush for gold has kindly condescended to pay the expenses of their second burial, on account, probably, of the profit their previous burial (alive) brought it. The rescue party left the crosscut to work in Murphy's heading, with the object of finding deputy-overman Hodson and Messrs. Meadows, Grant, and Beaumont. On Tuesday 3rd inst. the body of Hodson was found at the end of a forty-five yard passage which he and his fellow-sufferers had scraped out with their hands and a piece of tin. His body was well preserved, and the features were actually recognisable, after being buried alive for eight or nine weeks. His fellow-victims were found forty-five yards away, their bodies being dried and parched, besides being wasted away by the starvation they had endured. It was decided by the coroner that an inquest should be held on the body of Hodson. At the inquest evidence was advanced to substantiate the insinuation made by the vast majority, that they had actually died of starvation. At the last moment Dr. Harris gave it as his medical opinion that the men had not died of starvation, but had died of suffocation about forty-eight hours after the occurrence of the disaster. However, evidence is brought forward in the shape of a food-tin with the following inscription scratched upon it with a pin: "John Meadows 30 years 7 days starvation," which completely disproves that assertion. It is now rumoured that Dr. Harris was got at by the company, who endeavoured to save some of their ill-gotten gains from going back to the murdered men's relatives. However, proof is wanting. The inquest is adjourned, so we do not know what the verdict will be; but if we were on the jury it would be one of wilful murder against the A. A. Co. And right here let me give the reason for those four men being in the pit and entombed as they were to die slowly and horribly from want of food and air and water. The manager, fearing that a fall was going to occur, sent down the deputy-overman with the three others stated to extract a Tangye pump and save it from being buried and lost to the A. A. Co. Seeing that the company knew exactly where these men were, anyone would have expected them to make an effort to save their lives; but no! they left that for the State to do.

Seeing that the State had to come to the rescue, and seeing that the poor slaves of the company were sacrificed in an attempt at saving a paltry pump, the reader may not unnaturally be inclined to think that the A. A. Company is a poor company struggling along for a bare existence. Let the following report tell its own tale: "The A. A. Company in their report state that the accounts for 1888 show the following balances for the year: Unappropriated capital, £10,966; net revenue earned £113,887; amount available for dividend, £102,988. The dividend paid in February absorbed £80,100; and it is proposed to appropriate a further £50,000 to the payment of a second dividend at the same rate—viz., 50s. per share. The total sum distributed in dividend in 1888 will thus amount to £100,000, or 25 per cent. on the total capital." Figures and facts which, read in connection with the murderous details already given, show the character of this company. But the character of this company is that of the whole capitalist system, which produces such monstrosities.

Great sympathy is felt here for the London dock-labourers in their strike, and subscriptions are pouring in from all sides. The sum they are fighting for is just half what the dock-labourers get here. So many subscriptions are coming in from capitalists that some of us are beginning to suspect them of making a move to attract attention and cause a wholesale emigration to Australia, to reduce the wages of labour here when the time comes round. The labourers here receive twice as much in wages as in London, but pay away thrice as much in rent, which causes a considerable increase in the cost of living, and so brings their wages to about the same as in England. We still have, both in Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and New South Wales, our usual body of unemployed, numbering in all about 10,000 or 12,000, they being a necessary part of the capitalist system.

The Australian Radical, though it has severed its connection with the Australian Socialist League, is still hard at work preaching Socialism. Its circulation is gradually increasing, and there is good hope that it will soon be able to resume its old size. The Melbourne Socialists are working very hard, and with apparent success. The Sydney Socialists are considerably reduced in number by recent events; although the principles they advocate are fast taking root. Unflinching energy can alone make the movement a success, and here, as elsewhere, there is none too much of it. However, a right good work is being done with what we have, and you may confidently look for great developments on this continent before very long.

With fraternal greetings to all comrades, J. E. ANDERTON.

Radical Office, Hamilton, near Newcastle, N.S.W., Sept. 10.

SOCIALISM IN YARMOUTH.

At the Radical Club, Yarmouth, on Wednesday 6th, Mr. Dawson read his paper on Socialism, which was most abusive. He was well replied to by Reynolds, after which the discussion was adjourned until Wednesday next. On Sunday 10th we celebrated the anniversary of the Chicago murders and Bloody Sunday. In the morning, on Priory Plain, we began by Mrs. Tochatti singing "The Starving Poor," followed by a few remarks from Reynolds; after which Mrs. Schack gave an earnest address on the events we commemorated, explaining their meaning to an audience of over 1,000 people, who listened with great interest. We closed the meeting by singing the "March of the Workers," the audience taking up the chorus with great gusto. In the afternoon, at Colman's Granary, Mrs. Tochatti opened with "Trafalgar Square" and the "Marseillaise," followed by Ruffold, and by Mrs. Schack with a touching address on the Trafalgar Square murders. Mrs. Tochatti then sang the "Carmagnole," and Reynolds addressed the meeting, which closed by singing "The Starving Poor." Reynolds kept up a discussion with a Scotch fisherman who made a little opposition for a long time after the meeting, but Scottie seemed to get the worst of it. In the evening, at same place, Mrs. Tochatti opened with "Annie Laurie," followed by Mrs. Schack with another long and earnest address, in which she appealed to the Yarmouth people to accept Socialism. After Mrs. Tochatti had sung "Linnell's Death Song," Reynolds followed, again bringing the Scotchman to the front with his Christianity. We closed with the "Marseillaise," after which we adjourned to comrade Headley's, and spent the remainder of the night (up to 1 a.m.) in singing revolutionary songs, with the help of comrade H.'s fiddle. 36 Commonweal sold, 6s. 4½d. collected, and good sale of literature. THE LABOUR REVOLT.

The Railway Men.

The union is increasing rapidly. John Burns stated in his speech at the Priory Hall, Vauxhall, "that the General Railway Worker's Union had within a month enrolled in London alone 3,000 members. Of 6,000 men employed at the Broad Street Goods Depot of the London and North-Western Railway, 536 joined the union last Wednesday, and as a result of that union already many of the London and North-Western Company's guards, drivers, firemen, and platelayers had secured a rise of 2s., 3s., and in some cases 4s. a-week." The union is also getting a fair hold in the provinces. It now numbers over 6,000 members.

The Wharf Men.

Most of the men who came out on the Surrey side last week against the deduction for the meal-times, have gained their point. It is evident that the capitalists are routed all along the line. The workers seem victorious everywhere.

The Lightermen.

We are glad to hear that the men have won. The masters, doubtless, thought the Mansion House Committee and Lord Brassey (the arbitrator) would side with them, but they have found out their little mistake. The middle-class have had quite enough of strikes at the docks, and they don't want any more. There was great danger if the lightermen held out, that every one at the docks would soon be out also, so the Lord Mayor, the conciliation committee, and the arbitrator suddenly ranged themselves on the side of the men, to the great disgust of the masters, who complained pathetically that it was all through that John Burns, who had got such powers of speech that he could talk over our Lord Mayors. When we take into consideration the danger of the work of lightermen upon the river at night, and how many lives of these over-worked men are yearly drowned in the gloomy waters of the Thames, we can only be glad that such work will be largely diminished in the future.

The Silvertown Strike.

A number of the girls on strike at Silvertown were summoned before Mr. Bagallay charged with the serious crime of intimidating the blacklegs employed at Silver's works. The intimidation consisted of a free expression of opinion in the form of hooting and hissing. To the great dissatisfaction of the firm and their philanthropic manager Mr. Gray, none of these youthful criminals suffered severely for their "wicked" behaviour, Mr. Bagallay merely binding them over in their own recognisances of £5 to come up for judgment when called upon. The company have therefore not gained much by this attempt to legally intimidate the strikers. The directors are also trying another form of intimidation; they are removing their machinery to France, with the help of certain members of the Society of Engineers, who are thus disgracing themselves by fighting against their poorer and weaker brethren. What can be said of these people—who have been repeatedly asked to "come out," but have always declined—but that they are blacklegs of the worst type? There is some excuse for a poor starving wretch who does a mean action for the sake of a crust of bread, but there is none for members of the wealthiest trade union in England, who have deliberately lent themselves to such meanness. If they have not manhood enough to do their duty, their society ought to make them do it.

The strikers distributed numerous copies of a manifesto at their meeting in Hyde Park on Sunday, in which Lord Salisbury, Conservative Prime Minister, and Edmond Robertson, Radical M.P., are denounced as shareholders who gain their dividends from the slave-driving of English men and women. The Daily News objects to this sort of thing, and says that a man is not responsible because he holds shares in such a concern. No doubt the editor knows that many respectable Liberal philanthropists are partners in such iniquity, and fears that they also may be exposed.

Impending Strike of Bakers.

It is evident that the workmen and their masters are on the verge of a severe struggle. The masters held a meeting, at which they decided to stick to their proposal of twelve hours work instead of the ten hours a-day which the men demanded. The men wisely decided, in spite of the interested advice of the capitalist press, to insist upon the ten hours limit, and last Saturday, Oct. 9th, they sent in their notices. Already the wisdom of this course has been shown, for over a thousand masters have given way, among them the notorious Bread Union, the boss of which, Mr. Bouthorne, declared a little while ago that he would never give in to the union demands. Now, however, the serving of the notices has cooled his warlike ardour, and in the 250 shops of the Bread Union the ten hours limit will prevail. The bakers held a splendid demonstration in Hyde Park last Sunday. It was a fine afternoon, which reminded you more of the succession of bright Sundays which accompanied the demonstrations of dockers during their famous strike, than the usual dull and gloomy weather which you expect at this period of the year. Many of those who were present declared that there were if anything more people in the Park than during some of the dockers' demonstrations. One thing was quite certain, the enthusiasm ran quite as high as ever it did during any demonstration held during what we may call the great strike period. The bakers appeared in high spirits, and rejoiced greatly in the popular favour accorded to them. The central figure of the demonstration of course was John Burns, who seemed in good form, judging from the vigorous applause that rang out from the listening crowd. The enthusiasm was literally at boiling point at John's platform. On the whole, the demonstration was an immense success, and we imagine that any master present would feel forced at once, by its size and enthusiasm, to surrender as quickly as possible.

Bury Gas Stokers.

On Saturday, the gas stokers and about two-thirds of the yardmen at the Bury Corporation Gasworks struck. For some time the men have been employed at 4s. 8d. a day of twelve hours, and they have asked for 5s. a day of eight hours. Their demands were conceded, and it was thought everything had been arranged. The yardmen asked for 22s. per week in place of £1, and time and a half for Sunday. The price paid was 5s. per day for every two tons of coal carbonised, but as some of the men did not carbonise the full quantity a proportionate reduction in their wages was made. This the men resented, insisting that they should be paid the full 5s. and price and a quarter for all coal gas carbonised above that quantity. When the men asked for the interview they said they must have it in half an hour or the committee must wait their time. The committee offered to comply with the men's requests; the men then produced a document which they demanded that the committee should sign, saying they were the Manchester terms. The committee declined to sign, but promised if there were any differences in carrying out the arrangements to remedy them on explanation. The men refused these conditions, and would not return to work. A number of fire brigade labourers and others were got to work, but of course they were not equal to all the strikers. The committee are offering 5s. a day to labourers, but cannot get enough rats to go on with. A large staff of police are on duty at the gasworks. The streets last Sunday night were in darkness.

Bristol Cotton-workers.

These are still out. The first distribution of strike relief took place last week, and on Sunday the strikers demonstrated at the principal churches in the city. The directors still continue obdurate, and the struggle promises to be a long one. Funds are urgently needed.

The Leeds Gas Workers.

On Saturday, the Gas Committee put an end to the dispute between them and their employes at the different gas works in Leeds. The demands of the men, comprising a reduction of hours and an increase of wages, represented an advance of nearly 40 per cent., which the committee thought was unreasonable. They offered 20 per cent. advance, but the men held out, with the result that they have secured their full terms. The only alternative was a strike on their part, and this must have entailed very serious consequences. The men had taken care that, in the event of their demands being refused, there would not be gas in stock sufficient to last beyond Tuesday night or Wednesday morning. Three hundred retorts could not be made productive last week, because the men would not allow the rats to enter the works for that purpose. The pressure of gas had to be reduced both on Friday and Saturday. The committee were thus placed in great straits, and had to give in to the men, for they were not prepared to take the grave responsibility of allowing the town to be without gas.

Strike of Quay Labourers in Cork.

The labourers of Penrose's and other quays in Cork to the number of over a hundred, struck on Saturday for an increase of wages. The men put forward a demand for an advance of 1d. an hour (from 4d. to 5d.) in the day rate, and an advance from 4d. to 5d. in the night work. The ordinary employes of the Cork Steamship Companies have not joined the strike, and are not expected to do so.

STRAIGHT TALK TO A TIMID MAN.

A MAN in San Pasquale, California, is in a state of mind because he owns a farm, which he fears some of these desperate reformers will be for taking away from him. So he writes to the Twentieth Century that "confiscation of land is not right. I have a little farm of 320 acres, and it represents a life of toil to me, and I think no one else has any right to it." And the answer he receives is:

"This is a pretty good specimen of the way in which a good many people approach the consideration of questions of right and wrong. They don't begin by asking, Is this thing right? Does duty to my fellow-men require that I should act thus and so? What they want to know is, how it is going to affect them—what it is going to do for them—what it is going to take from them—what will be its cost or profit. 'I have a 320 acre farm,' says our San Pasquale friend. 'Your reform would take it away from me. Therefore your reform must be contrary to justice.' That was just the principle that lay at the bottom of all the pro-slavery arguments a generation ago.

"This San Pasquale farmer lives in a State in which only a small fraction of the earth's surface is being utilised for any purpose whatever. Let him stand upon the nearest unused tract of land—I guess he won't have to go far from his own house door to reach it—and ask himself this question: 'Is it conceivable that any man, or any body or assemblage of men—any individual, corporation, or community—can have a moral right to forbid me or any other man to go to work on this land and produce things by applying labour to it?' Never mind whether it injures men to be so forbidden or not—that is a secondary question. The real question is, Is it right to forbid them? If my San Pasquale friend will ask that question of his soul, and keep on asking until he gets an answer, he will find the gospel of emancipation illumined with a sudden light, that will reveal its beauty and its glory to him as he never dreamed of them.

"Only let San Pasquale be honest. If no man or body of men have a right to forbid any man to apply his labour to any piece of land that no one else is using, then the man who compels his fellow-man to pay, in money or in kind, for the privilege of using vacant land is a thief, no matter if a thousand statute laws are passed to make his stealing legal. And the duty that this San Pasquale farmer owes to himself and his fellow-men is to denounce the stealing. Whether the result will be the loss of his 320 acre farm or not is altogether beside the question. Men who stand by and see their neighbours' pockets picked, and say nothing about it for fear of something happening to themselves, are simply cowards.

"But San Pasquale need not be afraid. If he is really using 320 acres of land, he has a right to use it, and nobody has a right to forbid him, or to make him pay one penny for the privilege. And if he will think a little, he will see that the best thing that could happen for him would be that other men should be allowed to use land too, without being blackmailed for it. For the crops that San Pasquale raises on his 320 acres are of mighty little value to him, unless other people are utilising other tracts of land to produce things to give him in exchange for his crops; and the more other men produce, the better will be the market for what he himself produces. The corner-stone of civilisation is the Golden Rule—the simple law of justice. If our San Pasquale farmer wants prosperity and happiness for himself, he can secure those blessings only by seeing to it that others are not deprived of them by theft and rapine."

The nutrition of a commonwealth consisteth in the plenty and distribution of materials conducing to life. As for the plenty of matter, it is a thing limited by nature to those commodities which, from (the two breasts of our common mother) land and sea, God usually either freely giveth, or for labour selleth to mankind. For the matter of this nutriment, consisting in animals, vegetables, minerals, God hath freely laid them before us, in or near to the face of the earth, so as there needeth no more but the labour and industry of receiving them. Inasmuch that plenty (next to God's favour) dependeth on the labour and industry of man. Hobbes: 'Leviathan,' 1651.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—Splendid meeting on Triangle held in Commemoration of Chicago Martyrs, addressed by Davis and Cores; in hall, meeting addressed by Cantwell, Davis, and Cores; very good impression made.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting was held at Latimer Road; speakers were R. J. Lyne and J. F. Lyne; all Commonweal sold. J. Turner lectured to a good audience on the subject of "A Working Man as a Socialist"; a good muster in room.

SOUTHWARK.—At Bricklayer's Hall, on Monday, Nov. 4th, comrades Cores, Mowbray, and Samuels debated the question of "Foreign Competition and English Labour" with Messrs. Pettifer, Edgcombe (editor of Fair Trade), and W. F. Drew (Tory candidate for West Southwark). The hall was crammed, and the meeting afforded a good opportunity for preaching the principles of International Revolutionary Socialism to an audience of workmen not very well acquainted with our ideas.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 4th inst., a lecture entitled "Looking Forward," by Professor Orchardson, of New York, was read and discussed. On the 6th, comrade Glasier, of Edinburgh, lectured on "The Ethics of Socialism" to a good audience in the Unitarian Church, the meeting being held under the auspices of the Bon-Accord Inquirers' Society, which is mostly made up of Socialists; comrade Webster occupied the chair. The lecture was very well received, and questions were put at the close. This is the first of a series of lectures to be delivered in the same place, the speakers yet to come being Forrest (Kilmarnock), Webster (Aberdeen), and Walker (Glasgow).

GLASGOW.—On Tuesday evening, no meeting held on Cathedral Square, owing to bad weather. On Sunday, at 2 o'clock, Glasier, Joe Burgoyne, Tim Burgoyne, and Gilbert spoke to a good crowd. At 5.30, Joe Burgoyne, Tim Burgoyne, and Gilbert addressed an unusually large meeting at Paisley Road Toll. At 7 o'clock a meeting of members was held in Rooms. On Monday evening the members gathered in Rooms to commemorate the anniversary of the Chicago murders and Bloody Sunday. A resolution testifying the members' devotion to the cause for which our comrades died in Chicago and London was passed, and appropriate speeches, readings, and revolutionary songs were given.

LEICESTER.—Sunday 10th C. W. Mowbray lectured twice in the Radical Club, Vine Street, to good audiences—morning, "The Chicago Martyrs"; evening, "The Difference between Radicalism and Socialism." The last named was remarkably stirring. The lecturer hit straight from the shoulder, and brought down the house repeatedly, his revolutionary proposals being lustily cheered by Socialists and non-Socialists alike. Collection, 13s. 5d.; Commonweal sold, three quires.

MANCHESTER.—The branch entertained P. Kropotkin at the club on Nov. 7th, when a most enjoyable evening was passed, none being better satisfied than our comrade, who addressed us in an impressive oration on the progress of the movement. His other engagements did not permit of his giving a public lecture for the League.—We held a meeting at Philips Park on Sunday morning; Barton and Baile spoke; a large number of Commonweal and other literature was sold. In the afternoon, a meeting was held at our usual station to organise the carters and lorrymen of all the railway companies. In the evening, at the club, a public meeting commemorating the Chicago martyrs was held. Several comrades spoke in English and Yiddish, and revolutionary songs were sung.

NORWICH.—Owing to disappointment of London comrades, commemoration meetings were postponed until 17th inst. Sunday last, good meeting held in the Market, addressed by comrades W. Moore and Swash; both spoke upon the Chicago murders. A meeting was also held at Blofield; comrade Thompson spoke; large quantity of literature distributed. In the evening a meeting was held in the Gordon Hall; comrade Emery opened and Poynts followed; an interesting address upon the Chicago Anarchists was given; discussion followed, after which "Annie Laurie," "All for the Cause," etc., were sung by different comrades. Good sale of literature.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro Street, Nov. 9th, T. Hamilton lectured on "What is Malthusianism," opposing the doctrines of Malthus from the Christian standpoint. King, Wilson, O'Gorman, St. Rich, Kavanagh and others spoke.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—We had a busy day here on Sunday. In the morning, in Sneinton Market, Peacock and Proctor held a meeting in support of their candidature at the ensuing School Board elections; 6s. collected for election fund. In the afternoon the gas-stokers held a demonstration, at which Proctor and Peacock spoke. In the evening Proctor presided at a lecture on "Education" at the Secular Hall by Mrs. Annie Besant, and subsequently, with Peacock, Whalley, Knight, and Rooke, addressed a large meeting in Great Market; 6s. collected for election fund.

SHEFFIELD—COMMEMORATIVE MEETINGS.—Saturday 16th: Gower Street, at 12.30; Orchard Street, at 7. Sunday 17th: Orchard Street, at 11; Hall of Science Conference, at 3; Tea and Social Gathering, at 5; Lecture by Mowbray on "Revolution or Reform," at 7. Monday 18th, lecture by W. Morris, at St. Paul's Central Schools, at 8—"Socialism."

SYLLABUS of Lectures, in connection with the Arts and Crafts Exhibition now open, to be given in the New Gallery, Regent Street, on Thursday evenings, at 8.30 p.m.—Nov. 21st, T. J. Cobden-Sanderson, "The Decoration of Bound Books." 28th, Lewis F. Day, "Ornament." Dec. 5, Walter Crane, "Design and Expression." Admission 2s. 6d.; art students and employes, 1s.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE success of the bakers' strike is producing the usual crop of advice from the capitalistic press. They are told, for instance, that now would be the time to form a union between the masters and men, a kind of court of conciliation between the two bodies whose interests are opposed to each other by the very nature of the arrangement between masters and men. Fancy a court of conciliation between a Roman landowner, of the time of the great revolt of the slaves, and the unskilled labourers of his factory-farm! And then remember that the modern employee and the above-said landowner are essentially in the same position, except that the ancient slave-owner had to buy his slave while the modern one has his slave gratis.

Meanwhile, our baker friends no doubt think that they are lucky, and that ten hours is a short days work. I do not; neither will they in a year's time. Besides, of one thing they may be sure, that their masters are even now engaged in considering how and in what form they shall take back the advantages (real ones this time, I admit) which have been gained by the men. As for them, their attitude must be a fighting one, until their fighting has abolished masters and they set themselves to work like men, and are no longer set to work like machines.

Baron Huddleston's zeal for his employers, the governing classes, has probably not done them much good; he has a little overdone it, and made it somewhat clearer than it was before that the impartiality of the law, when it is a question of freedom versus respectability, is a transparent fiction. If that pretence were to be maintained, would not a judge, even as a matter of decency, be expected to give his charge on some such principles as these?—"I am a Tory, a reactionist, and as such I look on Mrs. Besant's views with the greatest horror; if the jury are to be left free in their verdict, and both sides have fair play, I must all the more not express my personal and party views; so I will just tell them what the law is and not say a word more."

That is what the baron might have been expected to say if the governing classes (largely manned by lawyers) cared to keep up even the pretence of fairness in the law courts. But, as it is, no one expected him to do anything but what he did do, that is act as an advocate for the defence. Clearly, therefore, no one expects the law courts to be fair in cases where any public interest is involved. And other cases—what business have they to be tried at all at the expense of the public? Our whole system of civil and criminal law is as regards the upper classes, whose instrument it is, a mere muddle of incongruities, and as regards the workers a mere instrument of oppression. And the fact is that the upper classes put up with those preposterous incongruities, because in spite of their absurdity they do not injure the system much as an instrument for the oppression of the poor, which is its primary purpose.

Imperial Federation is on its dunghill again, but not crowing very loud in the person of Lord Rosebery, who, though he began with some Jingo sentences of the usual type and ended with conventional rubbish about the Anglo-Saxon race and the Amphictyonic Council, employed the greater part of his time in pointing out with some skill that Imperial Federation is impossible, and that it is a mere party cry to catch votes.

In case any of our readers should be caught by the sound of the word "Federation," I must remind them that this "Imperial Federation" means in the first place, a Jingo competitive scheme for doing as much injury as possible to all peoples and countries outside the British Empire; and in the second place, a plot for setting schemes a-foot for bolstering up the tottering capitalist régime by finding new markets for it; that is to say, new commercial fields for the exercise of the "sword of cheapness." It is, in short, one of the dams which the middle-classes are building against the rising flood of Socialism. Happily, it is a dam built of paper and big words.

Mr. Goschen on the stump at Cardiff said some rather smart things about the Liberal party, and amongst others, in answer to cheers for Gladstone, wished that in the new Liberal Government the G. O. M. could have the real ordering of affairs, quoting (naturally with approbation) G. O. M.'s servility about the Royal Grants, and then going on to say that Gladstone would be controlled by Parnell, and his lieutenants by various politicians supposed to be progressive. This is amusing, but couldn't Goschen have carried it further and told us who were to control the controllers? I am afraid that the said controllers, Parnell, Tim Healy, Labouchere, and the rest, are at once too stupid and too political (i.e., false) to allow the people and common sense to control them. They will just stand with staring eyes and gasping mouth, not knowing what to do—but to stick to office.

For the rest, Mr. Goschen was somewhat too optimistic. "The system of limited liability and a wider diffusion of wealth had made working-men capitalists in a small way, and given them not only profits on their wages [what does that mean?] but on the capital they invested. Did not this result prove [?!] the fact that capital was not antagonistic to labour, but was really the accumulated earnings of labour? Capital was no longer regarded as a kind of vampire, for workmen had a large share in the increased prosperity of the country, and they were entitled to it."

Mr. Goschen must have a strong belief in the gullibility of working-men to deliver himself before them of such a mass of lies and twaddle. But he appears to have been justified by the ignorance of the Cardiff workmen, who hooted him for his political views and cheered him for his economics (?). But really, I repeat, he is too optimistic. Things have got a little further than that, thanks to the Socialist propaganda: working-men who are "capitalists" know that their "small way" is a very small way; that their wages are even in times of "prosperity" none too large to be eaten, worn, and paid to the rent-collector. They are at this moment showing all over the country that capital is antagonistic to labour by forcing capitalists to pay them more.

It is true that some of them know that "capital is the accumulated earnings of labour"; but more still know that they are robbed of their earnings, and the number of these is increasing every day, and more and more workmen are becoming alive to the fact that (individualist) capital is a kind of vampire—and the worst kind—and that in spite of the large share they have in the "prosperity" of the country, they have no share in its land, but must swelter in slums summer and winter, enjoying no beauty or pleasure of the "land they live in," with leave when they come out of their slums to "move on" on the highway and nothing else, under penalties of fine and imprisonment.

"At present," says this trickster, this battener on other men's labour, "things are prosperous, and prosperity does not give rise to violent political changes." Letting alone the baseness of the cowardice which thus hugs itself on the supposed sloth and apathy of the oppressed, we might ask this person how long this prosperity will last, and what kind of changes the next depression following on inflation will give rise to? Let us meanwhile go on steadily with our propaganda, in the hope that not all men are curs who will be "contented" with a little more dogs' wages than they have been having of late; that not all men are so stupid as to be humbugged by politicians of the Goschen type.

W. M.

Those who are fond of talking about the glorious benefits of English rule in India, and its absolute fairness and justice, may very usefully spend an hour or two in trying to reconcile their pet ideas with the facts that are set out with calmness and moderation in a pamphlet issued by Mr. Wm. Digby, and which may be got by writing to his address (Coromandel, Elm Road, Beckenham, Kent). Everybody has heard of the "Crawford scandal"; of the system of corruption, bribery, and blackmailing that had obtained in Indian high officialdom for many years past. But who that have heard of the case know that the evil would never have come to light had it not been for the Mamlatdars, or native magistrates, whom Crawford had been plundering, and from whom he had been wringing bribes by threats of stopping their promotion or procuring their dismissal?

These men came forward under a solemn and public pledge of immunity from the Government, and gave evidence which opened up all the secret dark places of a vast conspiracy to the light of day. But, as might be expected, when the question is between poor men, as are the Mamlatdars, and the powerful and highly-placed officials of one of the principal departments of a corrupt class government, the promise of immunity has proved to be worth less than the paper it was written on. The poor Mamlatdars are being dismissed, even as though no such promise had been given; ostensibly their punishment is for bribery—really it is for “splitting” on a superior. And of such is class-government everywhere!

The De Beers Consolidated Mines Company has undertaken a scheme of a model village for their white workmen, having found the advantages of the “compound” for their black labourers, on which we commented some weeks back. None who remembers about the “compound” will marvel that the “model village” fails to arouse overflowing enthusiasm in the breast of the workman. With Pullman and similar places in my mind's eye, and having had recently forced on my attention the immense additional power conferred on an employer by the ownership of all the available houses near his works, I am not disposed to follow the Cape Argus or the Diamond Fields Advertiser in singing the praises of Kenilworth, as the new suburb of Kimberley is to be called.

Speaking at the opening of the Rochdale Chamber of Commerce, Lord Derby drew loud cheers from his audience by declaring, “No one has a right to make a profit out of disease, or over-crowding carried so far as to produce disease.” But if they don't quite go the degree specified, neither Lord Derby nor his audience could see any harm in either making profit out of poverty or overcrowding. BUREAUS OF LABOUR.

“PROCEEDINGS at the Sixth Annual Session of the National Convention of Chiefs and Commissioners of the various Bureaus of Statistics of Labour in the United States, held at Indianapolis, Indiana, May 22 and 23, 1888.” There it is! put it all down, Mr. Printer: omit not a comma of that thirteen-line title-page of an eighty-seven page pamphlet. Let all the reading world see with what sort of straw an unhappy devil is expected to make Socialist bricks—and does it too! Let readers see and acknowledge the genius which can triumph over the malignant ingenuity of the Commonweal's Literary Organiser of Labour, whose sole function in life seems to be to draw a princely revenue and sit on his throne like some old mythological god, setting his bond-slaves tasks which innermost he deems impossible. But in the Greek fable the good young—or good old—person eventually accomplishes the seemingly impossible task—virtue is victorious and vice is vanquished; and so now, in spite of having a school of statisticians with no statistics, or hardly any; in spite of the fact that much time was taken up with what might be and should be done, rather than what had been done; in spite of two or three other facts which probably struck the before-mentioned pen-driving boil-it-down despot as helping to the impossibility of the task he was ordering,—this column shall prove that, like King Charles's head in Mr. Dick's memorial, Socialism will get in.

Taking the report page by page, the first item of promise is found in a letter from Carrol D. Wright, head of the Bureau of Statistics of U.S. and president of the Convention, but unfortunately absent. He desired to call attention to the need of statistics on mortgages and other debts of record. It appears that some work has been done by independent bureaus, but the results are not yet full enough to systematise or utilise. Whenever the record can be completed, it will be found to present a very droll state of affairs, and will prove once more how exact an economist the prophesying poet often is. Says Russell Lowell to the Landlord—

“What boots your houses and your lands?

In spite of close-drawn deed and fence,
Like water 'twixt your cheated hands
They slip into the graveyard's sands,
And mock your ownership's pretence.

How shall you speak to urge your right,
Choked with that soil for which you lust?
The bit of clay for whose delight
You grasp is mortgaged too; death might Foreclose this very day in dust.”

To one who has studied statistics of the wealthy (?) classes, it must stand as one of the hollowest shams of this age of shams, the claim for consideration on the score of wealth and social position. Some years ago it was estimated that the landed gentry of this country were indebted by way of mortgage in not less than £250,000,000. Revelations in the Bankruptcy Court and by Private Bill legislation, lead to the supposition that probably another £250,000,000 is owed by this same gentry and not secured so safely to the “shent per shent” mongers.

In addition to this tremendous rebate, there is another load which in the long-run will have to come on real property. According to the Local Government Board 14th Annual Report, 1885, the amount of Local Government loans outstanding had risen from £92,820,100 in 1875 to £159,142,926 for year ending 1883, an increase of over 71 per cent., being an annual average of £8,200,353 of new loan debt. In 1883 the gross estimated rental had increased by £37,263,436, rising from £132,571,829 in 1873 to £269,835,285 in 1883, an increase of only 28.1 per cent., the rentable value only rising 27.4 per cent. as compared with 1873. To present these figures in another fashion, it means, roughly, that while the gross rental increased 5s. per £, the mortgaging by the rating authorities increased by 15s. on the £ gross. Only at this rate it looks very much as if the rental value of the country was being mortgaged pretty quickly; but, as a matter of fact, the rate of increase increases; yet hardly any general notice is taken of it.

People often discuss the so-called National Debt; but at the above rate the Local will soon be more important than the National. This is the comparison for about the same periods:

YEAR.	NATIONAL.	LOCAL.
1875 ...	£768,945,757 ...	£92,820,100
1883 ...	£754,455,270 ...	£159,142,926

Just as the land is the source of all wealth—the bank to which ultimately all must apply for drafts—so it is the ultimate place of deposit and security, and ultimately either the land must bear and pay all debts, or they will be repudiated. In face of this, it is absolutely marvellous the way some talk of my land and my wealth, when in many cases, one way and another, it is mortgaged up to 30s. in the £; the final logic of the position being a form of national bankruptcy, and then, of necessity, nationalisation or municipalisation.

There is little doubt that in America a somewhat similar state of things would be revealed, if all facts could be got at.

The Convention finally resolved to call on the Census Department to include the enquiry in its scope.

Probably, seeing the amount of space occupied in dealing with the above item, the autocratic demon who rules the scissors and paste is now anathematising the convention of statistic-boilers; but there is plenty matter yet to prove how useful to Socialists are statistics and their manipulators, sometimes to the regret of the latter.

Probably few if any of the members of the Statistical Society or of the Convention of Statistical Bureau managers would care to lay claim to the gift of prophecy; but I am strongly in sympathy with the writer who says,

“The only reason why we cannot see the future as plainly as the past is because we know too little of the actual past and present; these things are too great for us, otherwise the future, in its minutest details, would lie spread out before our eyes, and we should lose half of our sense of time present by reason of the clearness with which we should perceive the past and future; perhaps we should not be able to distinguish time at all, but that is foreign. What we do know is, that the more the past and present are known the more the future can be predicted; and that no one dreams of doubting the fixity of the future in cases where he is fully cognisant of both past and present, and has had experience of the consequences that followed from such a past and such a present on previous occasions. . . . Those who are most firmly persuaded that the future is immutably bound up with the present in which their work is lying will best husband their present, and till it with the greatest care.” (‘Erewhon,’ by S. Butler, 1873.)

This may seem remote from the Convention report, but it is not. One of the commonest and wickedest of catch-cries for some years has been the one started by the Manchester school of manufacturer-politicians, who, to foster manufactures, decried agriculture, on the ground “that agriculture don't pay”; “better to buy food with our manufactured goods than to grow.” The result has been that we are now at the mercy of the foreign grower eight months out of every twelve for all the bread we eat, and for meat and fruit and much other food we are in the same position. The pages of the Commonweal have shown repeatedly that the demand for our manufactures is decreasing because our food-growers abroad are becoming manufacturers also, and not only supplying themselves but also cutting into our colonial markets, and so again reducing our chance of buying food with manufactures. But now mark the result, as shown by our Convention report. President James H. Smart, LL.D., of Perdue University, read a paper on “Industrial Education”—a paper which would please some whom readers of the Commonweal know.

“One of the greatest industrial problems of to-day is involved in this question, How to keep our sons and daughters out of the whirl and rush of city life and in the pure free air of our rural life; how shall we keep them in the ranks of the great producing classes and out of the ranks of the non-producing and of the destructive classes? . . . Science teaches us that nature will not be cheated. It teaches us that we cannot expect the soil to respond with a continued harvest if it is subjected to a constant robbery. It teaches that taking money out of the soil and putting it into a bank may make rich fathers, but that it will be likely to make poor sons, and that the safest bank of deposit for a farmer is his farm.”

But “close farming will never be done under the landlord and tenant system”; and in America as in England, boys seeing that to be a farmer too often means to work a lifetime on a farm means the enrichment of the landlord shark, get away to the city, where at least there is some excitement to bear off the wear of the slave-clain. A smattering of many sorts of theory—gained at some cost of farming capital—is all the equipment the boy has to start for the nearest city and “pick up” a living by “picking up” a trade.

The result of all this on farming and food supply is seen in the following from President Smart's paper:

“Those who have studied the progress of agriculture in Indiana will tell you that one of its most alarming features is the degeneracy of the soil. In many cases the shrinkage in its productive power has been fully 50 per cent. and in some it is going on at a very rapid rate. This is certainly alarming. But what is true of this State is true of many others. President Adams, of Cornell, says: In New York the crop of wheat went down in twenty years from 13 bushels per acre to 10.3 bushels per acre; of corn from 29.3 to 23. Going to the South we find that in N. Carolina during the last ten years—for there were no figures during the war—the crop of wheat has declined from 8 bushels to 5.9 per acre; corn from 16.4 to 11.5; oats from 12.9 to 8.7. In Georgia wheat fell from 7.3 to 5.1; corn from 11.1 to 8.7; oats from 10.2 to 9. In Mississippi wheat from 9.2 to 5; corn from 13.8 to 13.5; oats from 14.5 to 11.5. In Texas wheat fell from 12.5 to 8.5; corn from 19 to 13.5; oats from 27.2 to 22.8. Coming back to north and north-west, in Kentucky from 1864 to 1884 the product of wheat declined from 10.2 to 7.7 bushels per acre; corn from 28.5 to 24; oats from 24.2 to 16.3. In Indiana wheat from 14.3 to 10.4. In Illinois wheat went down from 14.3 to 10; corn from 33 to 25.”

And so on, and so on—a great and unmistakable reduction per acre; and it is the merest trifling with an important topic to try and dodge the proper conclusion by urging that the deficit can be made up by extra acres.

Then the paper takes a turn which should delight the supporters of the Arts and Crafts Society. The boys who, half-ballasted, enter factories and shops to get a living by “picking up” a trade “become restless, tired, and discouraged, and leave the business to possibly try another, and thus become the good-for-nothing jack-of-all-trades, or to join the ranks of the non-productives and possibly the ranks of the destructives.” “The picking-up process has a moral aspect which has wastage in it. Every handicraft carried to a high degree of excellence may become a fine art, and with no loss of time. There is no dignity in labour, but dignity may be put into labour.” This is a point on which some of our leaders have been most urgent, and it surely may be taken as good that Socialist teaching and doctrine is backed up by such a different school.

If President Smart can be relied upon, the state of affairs which is coming among craftsmen is as alarming in the direction of manufactures as are the other figures given in the matter of food. Returns were gathered from a number of persons able to give reliable information, and particulars procured as to carpenters and joiners, pattern-makers, moulders, blacksmiths, and machinists, and it was reported:

“That out of every ten who enter a carpenter’s shop with the intention of learning the trade, 4 abandon the business; of ten pattern-makers, 2; of ten blacksmiths, 6; of ten moulders, 5; of ten machinists, 6. Of those who pursue the business and become professed journeymen, but 3 become first-class workmen; of ten pattern-makers but 2; of ten blacksmiths but 2½; of ten machinists, 3½. And in form of a table the result is as follows, which shows the number of boys out of every hundred who enter each trade mentioned who become first-class workmen: Carpenters, 18; pattern-makers, 16; blacksmiths, 10; moulders, 17; machinists, 14. Being an average of fifteen to each hundred.”

We see by facts such as these the pretty pass to which our hundred-year-old competitive-factory-manufacture agriculture-don’t-pay system of society has brought us to the verge of; for the experience of America is also the experience of England.

The constantly increasing employment of automatic machinery, doing skilled work by the aid of unskilled labour, has also to be taken into consideration; but as the last paper printed in the report is an exceedingly interesting one on “Some Moral and Economic Consequences of Using Labour-Saving Machinery,” which is worth detailed treatment not now possible, it only remains to conclude with the charming view of future possibilities which is suggested by a passage from a paper by T. V. Powderly of Scranton, who urged the “Settlement of the Apprenticeship Question by Inaugurating Industrial Schools”:

“At the rate at which science is advancing, there will soon be no shoveling of earth, no levelling of hills by hand, no digging of trenches, no cutting of earth, or wood, or iron by hand; all of these things, and all else that enters into the industry of the world, will be done by the aid of science. There will be no trades or tradesmen of any special callings or crafts. In the world’s production nothing should be missing, nor should one man have an advantage over another which nature does not give him.”

As a final note of defiance I fling that one passage in the teeth of the abstraction to whom I referred at the opening of this notice, and claim that that one sentence is warrant and proof that good Socialistic doctrine can be found in most unpromising quarters when one knows how to dig for it.

THOMAS SHORE, JUL.

[NOTE.—If any readers of above can forward any other years’ reports of the Convention, or a copy of the 20th vol. U.S. Census, or of any special labour bureau report, the Editor will probably be able to make use of them to good effect.]

PROFIT AND LOSS OF THE LONDON STRIKE.—Up till now no clever figurer has demonstrated to the London dock labourers that really, after all, the result of the late strike was of no real advantage to them, for “don’t you see that it will be years before the slight advance in wages will aggregate as much as the time and money lost by the strike?” The clever figurer will appear in due time, however. In the meantime it may be worth noting that the Rotterdam dockers’ strike was won in a week. Perhaps the clever figurer will take this into his calculation when cyphering up the profit and loss of the London strike? Figures can’t lie, if you have all the figures and if you have seen carefully to their arrangement; but if you allow fools to mix figures with their foolish imaginings, none but fools will trust the story they will tell. That’s what makes so much of the statistical information on which the world’s economic legislation is based so valueless, and the legislation so mischievous. One of the good results of the late London strike which can never be put down in figures, is the discovery which the dockers have made that they have a capacity for organisation, self-control, and consequently self-help, which has been hitherto unsuspected. A movement which evidences considerable vitality for the organisation of London working-women is another outcome of the strike which cannot be reckoned in figures.—Journal of United Labour.

A DEATH SONG.

(Written to be sung at the funeral of Linnell, first victim of Bloody Sunday; reprinted by request.)

WHAT cometh here from west to east a-wending?
And who are these, the marchers stern and slow?
We bear the message that the rich are sending Aback to those who bade them wake and know.
Not one, not one, nor thousands must they slay,
But one and all if they would dusk the day.

We asked them for a life of toilsome earning,
They bade us bide their leisure for our bread,
We craved to speak to tell our woeful learning,
We come back speechless, bearing back our dead.
Not one, etc.

They will not learn; they have no ears to hearken,
They turn their faces from the eyes of fate;
Their gay-lit halls shut out the skies that darken,
But, lo! this dead man knocking at the gate.
Not one, etc.

Here lies the sign that we shall break our prison;
Amidst the storm he won a prisoner’s rest;
But in the cloudy dawn the sun arisen
Brings us our day of work to win the best.
Not one, not one, nor thousands must they slay,
But one and all if they would dusk the day.

LITERARY NOTES.

Great Thoughts (1d., 132, Fleet Street) is of the Tit-Bits order, but of a higher species than that most successful flat-catcher. In the current number is a portrait and criticism of comrade Morris; the portrait none too like and the criticism none too adequate. However, they are both passable of their kind, and are “better than nothing” as the saying goes.

The Bridgeton Single-Tax Review (3d. weekly) seems to be an enterprising attempt on the part of some Glasgow members of the Scottish Land Restoration League. It has 16 pp., mostly filled with advertisements, and so much reading matter as it gives is passably written and to the point.

The Political World (3d. Bouverie Street, 1d. weekly) came out last week in all the glory of its Walter Crane cover, and had a strong leader on the Indian scandal, spoken of in our front-page “Notes.” The week before it had a striking cartoon on the law-n-order juggle as worked by the Tories—with changed names it would have done for the Whigs.

The Illustrated Weekly News (1d., 297, Strand), of which we have just received the ninth number, is apparently an attempt at reconciling labour politics with ordinary newspaper methods. With the exception of Mr. Morrison Davidson, the labour expositors have not yet been of the most hopeful kind, but all the same we shall watch with much interest for the result of the experiment.

THE GREAT LABOUR MOVEMENT:

IS IT TO BE THOROUGH?

THE present labour movement is a most important one. The movement is general among the wealth-producing classes, and their bosoms swell with expectations of the future. Crushed to the earth by long ages of tyranny, victims of long centuries of oppression, they hope by organisation to secure a brighter future. Accustomed for generations to look upon the supremacy of the powers that be, the supremacy of the aristocratic and the commercial classes, and their own slavery and degradation as the normal conditions of society, no wonder at their apathy in the past. But to compare their apathy, their indifference of but as yesterday with their enthusiasm of to-day, and we may all hope that the days of political and social oppression are numbered.

But is the present movement of the workers to be thorough, thorough in its organisation, and thorough in its aims and objects? or is this grand uprising of the masses to be frittered away in seeking mere palliatives only? Are the mere effects of political tyranny and social oppression to be combated, while leaving untouched the principles from which they spring? Such has been the rule with all the trade movements of the past. Are the workers to seek only a small improvement of their miserable position, such improvement to depend on our imports and exports, on the constant extension of our foreign markets, such improvement to be swept away on the certain recurrence of commercial depression? Is such to be the fate of the present movement? Is it to begin and end with speeches, cheers, and resolutions only? Is the present great upheaval of the toiling millions, with their grand spontaneous organisations, to aim at nothing higher than a mere modification of the thousand oppressions under which they groan? Or is it to aim at the destruction of tyranny in every form in every department of modern industry, of oppression in all the relations of life, the supremacy of labour, the triumph of equal liberty, of universal justice?

For ages the aristocracy was supreme, and the result of that supremacy is the monopoly of the land. For generations the commercial classes have been supreme, and the result of that supremacy is the possession of the instruments of labour. The supremacy of these classes means the dependence and degradation of the workers. Is that supremacy to be recognised in the future? If yes, the continued slavery of the workers must be accepted. The one logically follows from the other. No mere modification of tyranny will destroy that supremacy; no mere temporary advantages, no mere advance of wages even, will result in the emancipation of labour.

The dominant class (or classes) for the time being is always revolutionary in relation to those who have previously governed. At the same time the dominant class (or classes) is always more or less reactionary in relation to further progress. This was the case with the aristocracy in relation to absolute monarchy. It was the same with the commercial classes in relation to feudalism, but both the aristocracy and the commercial classes are reactionary in relation to the wealth-producing classes; and the workers must of necessity become revolutionary in relation to the non-producing classes—to all who live on taxes, rents, and profits. Such is their logical, their historical position. If, then, the present great movement is to be anything more than a mere temporary one; if it is to sweep away the political tyranny and the social oppression which now prevail; if it is to end in the emancipation of labour by destroying not only the supremacy, but the existence of the non-producing classes, then the workers must recognise and accept their true position, with all its rights, its duties, and its obligations, that of the one great revolutionary element in modern society, whose success and future welfare is bound up with, and dependent on, the triumph of the Social Revolution.

Do the leaders of the present movement, those who are organising it, and to whom the workers now look for guidance, thoroughly understand this? Is such their aim, is such their intention, to raise the aspirations of the workers upward, and to lead ever onward to the social redemption, to the regeneration of society? We all know that in every town and in every country there are men who have advanced to a certain point, but who cannot advance further. They are to be found not only in connection with the political organisations, but very largely in connection with trade societies. Accustomed to nothing higher than political peddling and contemptible compromise, they cannot comprehend the simple truth that the workers are, and of necessity must be, revolutionary in relation to all the other classes of society. These blind leaders of the hitherto blind masses know perfectly well that as the workers learn their true position and become revolutionary, that their position as leaders will be gone for ever. Hence they will, as far as possible, prevent the movement becoming anything more than a grand display of empty speeches, enthusiastic cheers, resolutions based on generalities, and comparatively useless organisations. It is then the duty of the true leaders of the workers to-day to prevent this great movement, with its grand organisations, from being tricked away for party purposes, or its organised strength wasted on petty and degrading compromises.

The time has come for the workers to take their stand on principle, to assume their true position in society, to struggle for their social redemption, the emancipation and supremacy of labour, which means and can only mean the triumph, in all its fulness, of the Social Revolution.

WAGES AND PRICES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

THE labour market is "fairly well supplied," says the Johannesburg Star of Oct. 11, "indeed, in some trades there are more hands than there is work for." We know what that mild way of putting it really means! In the wagon and cart building trades, and also in the farriery trades, fifty-one per week are the present hours, but the carpenters and builders work but forty-eight hours—eight and a-half per day, and a half-day on Saturdays. The following were the current rates of wages per day:—Carpenters, 20s. to 25s.; masons, 25s. to 27s. 6d.; ornamental plasterers, 27s. 6d. to 30s.; painters, 20s. to 22s.; blacksmiths and farriers, 20s.; wagonmakers, 20s.; cart trimmers, 20s.; cart painters, 20s. In the wagon and cart-building trades these rates were paid to good hands; but in some cases, where greater excellence is shown, 10s. per week extra was paid. Ordinary workmen in all branches were abundant, and could be got at much lower rates. Meanwhile, prices were proportionate. For such timber as was obtainable, 2s. 3d. per foot was the current rate. Ruling rates for iron were 1s. 4d. to 1s. 5d. per foot. Of breadstuffs the market was almost bare; 50s. per 100-lb. bag was the wholesale price of flour, for a fraction less for large parcels, retailers asking as high as 55s. Boer meal and mealie meal were also in very short supply, 50s. being the current rate for the former, and a trifle higher for the latter. The master bakers, in view of the high price of flour, had in some cases, where the price for a 1-lb. loaf has been 4d., raised it to 6d., and in others the 16-oz. 6d. loaf has been reduced to 14 ozs. Sugars (white) are quoted at 57s. 6d., and for the lower qualities (brown) 50s. White crystals are retailed at 9d. per lb. Milk of brands is very scarce, and readily commands 17s. to 18s. per dozen wholesale. Later advices give the prices at nearly double those just quoted. On the 22nd of October the 1-lb. loaf had risen to 1s., and was expected to go higher. But the workman's benevolent friends over here tell him only of the wages he will get, and nothing of the prices he must pay.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To those who have obtained copies of the Commonweal through the propagandist work of our comrades, by free distribution in the streets and public conveyances, or by purchase at our outdoor stations, we ask if in agreement with our principles to help the sale of the Commonweal by ordering it of their newsagents, and sending on to us the names of newsagents willing to sell it; and still better, as our outdoor work must shortly be reduced, by joining the local branches and helping on the work.

CHRISTIANISING THE NATIVES.—The Cape Argus in a recent number had the following cutting from an up-country paper:—"Those engaged in the Colesberg extension have adopted a rascally dodge for getting more work out of the natives. A distance is marked off which is estimated to be within the ability of the natives to finish in a day if they work extra hard, and at the end of the piece allotted, a 'vaatje' of brandy is placed. When the end of the line thus marked off is reached the natives have the liquor divided amongst them. So great is the desire to obtain the converted 'soepje,' that natives work doubly hard to obtain the price of a pennyworth of drink, and a full shillingworth of extra labour is obtained by the employers. It is a most corrupt system, and should not be permitted. The Kafirs are sufficiently demoralised with brandy, without any immoral inducements of this sort."

"MORALITY."

DEAR COMRADES,—Being a member of the Scottish Socialist Federation, I should like to say a word with reference to George Porter's letter. The hysterical excitement under which it must have been written is really quite inexplicable, the only apparent cause of it being so absurdly inadequate. There cannot be the slightest doubt that we have here a clear case of much ado about nothing. But for all that, it may be well to assure George Porter that he need not be at all afraid that the morality acknowledged by the S.S.F. is not true Socialist morality, or that it is identical with the conventional Christian morality of Scotland, which he painfully and unsuccessfully labours to prove to be the logical inference from the use of the word "morality" in our statement of principles. Moreover, he may rest satisfied that the S.S.F. are using every means in their power to let people understand the great difference between the old morality and the new. I suppose I must also point out to George Porter that he is wrong in saying that the paragraph he saw in the Commonweal of October 12 is our declaration of principles; it is merely the "concluding remarks," an exhortation to those holding our principles to stick by them; and the word "morality" being used in this context cannot possibly be interpreted as "obedience to convention" by any but the most stupid. For our principles are of course an emphatic enough protest against the present "morals of society."

But George Porter's limitation of the use of the word is arbitrary and narrow in the extreme, and few besides himself would attempt to justify it. The word, as everybody knows, means sometimes the practice, sometimes the doctrine of moral duties, the context of course determining the sense in which it is to be taken. And the doctrine of moral duties is the doctrine of those rules of conduct which must be followed if the social welfare of mankind is to be realised. Surely, then, the S.S.F. make quite a legitimate use of the word in asking members to acknowledge morality as the basis of their behaviour—in other words, to obey the rules of conduct necessary for social well-being. It is true there are always differences of opinion as to what the proper rules of conduct are. Therefore the exact meaning to be attached to the word "morality" doubtless depends on the principles of the persons using it. But if these are made clear, its indefinite character disappears. And the S.S.F. certainly cannot be charged with not stating boldly and clearly what their principles are.

The fact is, the word, like "glory," "honour," and other similar words despised by George Porter, has a real value for Socialists; and its value lies in its association in men's minds with ideas of social welfare (rightly conceived or wrongly), and in its expressing the idea of something obligatory in matters of conduct, the idea of the necessity or duty of following a particular course of action (whatever it may be) which has for its avowed end the good of the community. It is for this reason that, if we Socialists maintain that certain laws and customs are condemned by Morality, thoughtful and earnest people, having at heart the welfare of society, will certainly feel it their duty to consider whether we are right or not; and even though they should be unable to agree with us, they will nevertheless be inclined to give us credit for doing what we believe to be our duty.

Hoping you will excuse this long letter, which perhaps treats too seriously what is really a most puerile objection, I am yours fraternally,

J. HALDANE SMITH.

SIR,—As a member of the Scottish Socialist Federation, though not writing officially on its behalf, I may be allowed a word or two in reply to comrade Porter's letter in Commonweal of 9th inst. When, with jaded energies and in a stifling atmosphere—things all Socialists are accustomed to—I was present at the drawing up of our principles, I had a sure presentiment that though we passed the word "morality" it would not be passed elsewhere. Its inevitable fate was to be "jumped upon."

So far, then, I have anticipated and am in sympathy with comrade Porter. But my sympathy ends here. No one will deny he has done the jumping vigorously; and he can readily be trusted, despite protest, on occasion to serve the terms "truth" and "justice" in like manner. He has consciously framed for us two conceptions of the term morality. It is either a mere shibboleth, and consequently has a meaning which is really nothing, or it is the ethics of Mrs. Grundy, and to be moral is to keep the Sabbath, and generally to have the manners of a Scotchman, which is bad. But I venture to say he has unconsciously set before us another conception. He has passed under review existing economical and social arrangements, and, in the light of a higher morality—Bax's "New Ethic" presumably—has condemned them. While, then, this new ethic is higher than that of the market-place—if it can be said to have one at all—is there anything in existing conditions with which we can compare it? In a word, can any good thing come out of this Nazareth of competitive society? There obviously must be something which is akin to it, else how other could we form the conception? Well, then, friendships have been formed, miserable types, pale shadows, they may be of the comradeship of the future, but having in them something of truth and reality. It will not be permissible to say that in those friendships there is an unwritten code of honour—that is to make use of a shibboleth—but one may be allowed to say that they carry with them a sense of responsibility of what is due to one another. (I live in constant terror of Porter's analytical ability, and fear to use almost any term in the English language.) This, then, is something like the sense in which we use the term morality. It is not sufficient to give an intellectual assent to the doctrines of Socialism; one must not be just quite a stranger to its spirit. A magnificent peroration about the degradation of women would, for instance, have its oratorical effect considerably weakened, not to say anything worse, if it came from the lips of one whose relations with them were notorious for all that was selfish and unfeeling. Again, to give a merely individualistic direction to what has been collected for a common purpose, to break faith, and so on, do not tend, to say the least, to strengthen the sentiment of comradeship. To sum up, then, as I have little time to spare and post-time is near, it may be said that he who would do such things is no Socialist. Very possibly. We preach a higher ethic than does the average man; if our conduct can be no improvement on his, let it not at least sink below it; if we fail of any special fidelity or devotion to commend our doctrine, let us at least not give the enemy any unnecessary occasion to blaspheme. JOHN GILRAY.

BORO' OF HACKNEY W. M.'S CLUB, 27 Haggerston Road, E.—Sunday Nov. 24, at 12 noon, George Bernard Shaw, "A Socialist Programme for London."

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

The Bakers' Strike.

Last week the masters surrendered by hundreds. Nearly all large firms have given in, and the struggle is now principally with the small sweating masters in the poorer neighbourhoods. There are now about 250 men out. Whitechapel seems the centre of resistance by the masters. The men are in the habit of parading daily and playing the "Dead March" outside the unfair shops. Fifty thousand handbills have also been printed, two with the words "Don't buy at this shop," which will be distributed to the sweaters' customers. Possibly these measures may have a persuasive effect upon the hard hearts of the slave-drivers.

At some of the shops which have yielded blacklegs are still employed, and the men very properly refuse to work with them. Some employers have put the price of bread up a halfpenny a loaf, which covers the whole cost of labour involved in making it. The men threaten that if the employers put the bread up more than enough to cover what the men ask for, the men will ask for still more money.

Our comrade Mrs. Lahr has done good work in speaking at bakers' meetings, and pointing out to them that there was something more for the workers to gain than a ten hours' working day. This has offended some of the conservative members of the Strike Committee, one of whom was rude enough to push her off the platform at the Hyde Park demonstration, but was obliged himself to retreat before the angry crowd.

Threatened Strike of Busmen.

Last week the agitation of the tram and bus men promised to result in a strike in West London, through the London Road Car Company working their men 17 hours a-day. This extraordinary slave-driving, the company stated, was rendered necessary to accommodate the visitors to Barnum's Show; but the men didn't see why they should slave their hearts out to get the company their big profits. Matters came to a crisis at last, at a meeting of the men in the small hours of Friday morning, Nov. 15, when it was decided to send in an ultimatum to the company, giving them three days to agree to the demand of the men for twelve hours' work, or trouble would follow. Frightened by this vigorous resolution, the company has offered to grant the twelve hours if the other bus companies will do the same. The strike has been postponed by the men till they have made the same demand to the General Omnibus and other companies, which, if refused, will be followed by a general strike. We think it would have been better for the men to have carried out their resolution. There is so much discontent among the tram and bus employes that we are pretty sure that a strike on one line would be quickly followed by a strike upon all. If the men in South Dock, when the late dock strike began, had waited till they had got all their comrades in the other docks to promise to come out, they might have waited till the present time. But they did not wait, they acted, and the result was that within a week after they had given the signal of revolt all Dockland was seething in open rebellion. If the slaves of the bus and tram wait too long, the auspicious moment may pass; the tide may recede and leave them stranded hopeless and helpless.

The Silvertown Strike.

Last week Sydney Buxton and several other well-meaning middle-class people endeavoured to get the great Mr. Gray to consent to arbitration, but the great man steadfastly refused. You see there will probably be some nice cold weather in a few weeks, and starving people will find it hard to stand against it. So this Napoleon of Capitalism will have no arbitration, as he calculates with fiendish barbarity that they won't be able to stand long against cold and hunger combined. How Mr. Norwood must envy Mr. Gray his splendid opportunities! If he could only have fought the dockers with the advantages of an unsympathetic public, trade-unionist blacklegs, and cold as well as hunger to back him up, what a victory he might have gained! The women and children are suffering bitterly, for this is not a sensational strike, and public sympathy has not been strongly aroused. Any contributions to help these brave men and women, who are fighting a desperate battle against the cold cruel calculations of the capitalist, might be sent to the Strike Committee, Railway Dining-Rooms, Silvertown.

Keir Hardie and Eight Hours.

Keir Hardie has written an article in the Labour Tribune upon this question. The miners are greatly excited about it at the present time, as in a few days they will meet in conference to decide as to whether they will come out for it on the 1st of January. Keir Hardie appears to think that it will be impossible to enforce an eight-hour day in mines without an Act of Parliament. He says, "Experience has shown that in some of the largest and most important of the mining centres, there is a section of the men who have neither the stamina nor the desire to enforce an eight-hour day for any length of time. Under the influence of a sudden burst of enthusiasm these men will for a time uphold the principle, but when temptation from without and pressure from within overtakes them, they give way and drag others down with them." Therefore, he argues, we must have an Act of Parliament. Now it is quite clear the shaky individuals must be either a majority or a very strong minority among the workers, because a trade union can always enforce its rules upon a weak section. But then, on the other hand, if a large number of the miners prefer long hours and extra pay to short hours and small pay, we fail to see how you are not only to enforce it when it is carried into law, but even carry it in the face of the formidable opposition it would sure to meet with from the capitalist classes. The men must be educated as to advantages of leisure and the advantages also of sticking firmly together, a quality which the Scotch miner seems to lack. They must remember also that if they cannot do anything for themselves, there is very little chance of getting any one to do it for them. Let them bear these things in mind, and they will soon gain a great deal more than an eight-hour day from their masters.

The "Homes" of the Poor.

At last a move is being made against that pillar of modern society, the house farmer. Through the efforts of Bennet Burleigh, the well-known war correspondent and author of the recent series of articles upon the slums in the Daily Telegraph, some shocking dens in Ann's Place, Boundary Street, Shoreditch, have been closed. These places in which the poor were housed, were rather worse than the dungeons in which a feudal baron confined his captives. Stinking drains, rooms in which it was impossible to stand upright, rain coming through the roof, rats running all over the place—such are the joys that await the honest worker in an age of Christian civilisation. Well, thanks to Bennet Burleigh and Montagu Williams, these dens will soon vanish from the face of the earth, although it was stated "it was not a bad case," and even the tenants admitted that "this was not one of the many outrageous cases which undoubtedly do exist in London." What the other cases must be like imagination fails to picture. But still, there is another side to the question. These dens are "condemned"; well and good. But what is to become of the tenants? Has the law got some decent dwellings for them to inhabit, or are they to take refuge in other dens, the condition of which may be considered "bad" or even "outrageous"? It is rather funny that the law can provide no remedy for such ills, except that of prompt and speedy eviction for the unfortunate tenants. It is possible that they might even prefer the shelter of the rat-haunted dens in Ann's Place, to being turned into the street to search for another place where to lay their heads. Mr. Bennet Burleigh means well, but pulling down the worst slums in London will only increase the overcrowding in those that are not bad enough to be "condemned" by magistrates and sanitary inspectors. Moreover, it will rather tend, by diminishing the number of dwellings, to raise the rack-rents which every worker suffers from in the crowded districts of central London. What we want is a movement against these rents, and not legal action which will only result in increasing them.

A Question for the Furriers.

Our Leeds comrades are trying to form a branch of the N.U.G. and G.L. among the furriers there, and want to know the London prices for "pulling" and "opening" rabbit skins. Will any one employed in that industry who reads this send us a list of London prices?

The Strikes of 1888.

In a report on the strikes and lock-outs of 1888, issued by the Board of Trade, the following, among other statistics, are interesting. The total number of strikes during the year was 509, affecting 118,288 persons, but the number of actual strikers was 87,764. The number of successful strikes was 249, and the partially successful, 94. Under these two heads 83,200 persons were affected. The amount expended by trades unions on strikes was £32,729, being at the rate of 2s. 4½d. per head on membership. There were only eight lock-outs, affecting 985 persons.

The Sweated Tailors.

Another strike seems imminent. It was stated at a large meeting last Saturday at the Assembly Hall, Mile-end, that the masters have broken faith with the men and are endeavouring to introduce the old slavish system of unlimited working hours. They are discharging their workpeople right and left for refusing to submit to their tyranny. It will take a sharp lesson to persuade these people to abandon their slave-driving; the sweating system seems to be part and parcel of their nature.

Strike of Maltsters at Burton.

The labour revolt reached Burton on Friday the 15th, when the maltsters turned out for an advance of eightpence a-day. Large meetings were held, and they marched round to the various breweries and brought out their comrades by force or persuasion. At Coope and Co.'s, during these proceedings, the manager's son was rather roughly handled. The strike was quite successful, for in a very few hours most of the firms gave in, and the others have now followed their example. N.

REPORTS.

KILBURN.—On Sunday morning, good meeting held back of the "Plough"; speakers were Mainwaring and Samuels. A quire of Freedom sold, Commonweal not being on the spot.

MITCHAM AND CROYDON.—For several weeks we have been pegging away at the work of agitation in this neighbourhood, with the result of establishing branches of the Surrey Labourers' Union in Streatham, Merton, Mitcham, and Croydon. In the last place we have re-established the branch of the Socialist League. Two successful meetings have been held upon Duppas Hill, addressed by comrades Pillier, Thorrington, and Kitz. The new branch works well, and Commonweal is pushed and good collections made. We want help to carry the campaign into Sutton, Carshalton, and other towns and villages around.—F. K.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting was held at Latimer Road; speakers were R. J. Lyne, and J. F. Lyne; all Commonweal sold. No meeting at St. Ann's Road, owing to the absence of some of our comrades who had other engagements. A lecture was given by R. E. Dell (Fabian) on "Why I am a Socialist" to a good audience.

NORTH LONDON.—Good meeting in Regent's Park Sunday morning, addressed by Cantwell, Nicoll, and Mrs. Lahr; fair sale of Weal and 8d. collected. At Hyde Park in the afternoon, meeting opened by Cantwell and Furlong, and then Mrs. Tochatti sang "Are you willing to work and to wait" amid considerable enthusiasm; Cores and Mrs. Lahr followed; good sale of Commonweal and other literature, and collected 1s. 10d.

ST. GEORGE'S EAST.—No meetings have been held outdoors on account of lack of speakers; comrade Turner has now left this neighbourhood, and so some other help is required if the branch is to continue its work successfully. At the business meeting on Wednesday, it was decided to hold branch meetings on a Thursday, after next week. Members please note.—J. T.

STREATHAM.—Good branch meeting, at which a vote of condolence to Mrs. Parsons for her loss of Lulu, and also for the relatives of our other murdered comrades, was passed. Good meetings at Fountain on Nov. 10 and last Sunday, Weir (of Acton) speaking for us; collected 2s. on Nov. 10. Last Sunday we collected 3s., which was sent to the Silvertown strikers; 70 Weal sold. The Surrey Labourers' Union is doing well. The carmen in Streatham are working 17 hours a day for £1 1s. a week. The time is not ripe for a strike yet, so they thought the Silvertown people had the first claim for assistance.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 11th, comrade Unwin's lecture, "Broken Cisterns," was read; discussion held over. At Castle Street on 16th, Duncan, Smith, and Leatham addressed good meeting.—L.

GLASGOW.—Lively meeting on Cathedral Square on Tuesday evening; speakers, Joe Burgoyne and Gilbert, who had evidently the sympathy of the audience. On Thursday evening Glasier lectured on "Socialism, what it means," to the Govan Liberal and Radical association. There was a good deal of opposition, mostly from the Henry George standpoint. The chairman, who is a large employer of labour, confessed after our comrade's reply, that Socialism had been presented to him in a new light and that he would seriously reconsider the subject. On Sunday a meeting was held at 5.30 on Jail Square by Joe Burgoyne. At Paisley Road Toll, Glasier and Downie spoke to a good audience; a well attended meeting of members was afterwards held in our rooms, when Glasier was reappointed secretary of the branch.

LEICESTER.—Monday 11th, comrade Taylor read a paper, "The Condition of the People." Excited discussion followed on the question Is property robbery? Sunday 17th, R. S. Pengeley, of Nottingham, lectured twice at Radical Club—morning, "The Question of Cain"; evening, "Drifting to Socialism." Lectures well liked. Sunday morning, Barclay occupied Russell Sq. again, on "Should we, and can we, Compensate Landlords?" In evening, he opposed Dr. Drysdale on the Population fallacy at Secular Hall. Monday evening, comrade Chambers gave a well-written paper on "Parliamentarianism v. Anarchism"; long discussion. Collection, 8s.; Commonweal sold, 3 quires.

MANCHESTER.—On Sunday afternoon a meeting of pipe-makers now on strike was held in Stevenson Square; 2 quires of Commonweal sold. Our season for indoor meetings began on Sunday night, when, at the club, a lecture on "Socialism of To-day" was given by W. Bailie; discussion followed, in which some members and others took part. 5s. collected.

NORWICH.—On Thursday last comrade A. Moore read a paper on "What's to be Done during a Revolutionary Period"; good number of comrades present. Sunday afternoon, a large number of people assembled in the Market Place for the commemoration of the Chicago martyrs; comrade Emery took the chair, followed by W. Moore. A slight disturbance was occasioned by an individual a little the worse for drink, but he was very quickly shifted by the crowd. Sunday evening a meeting held in the Gordon Hall; W. Moore opened—subject, "Four Schools of Socialist Thought"; warm discussion followed upon the principles of the League and Anarchism; comrades Houghton, Poynts, Swash, and others took part. After the meeting, G. Ashley sung very effectively "Annie Laurie," Tenneying "Chicago Martyrs," "All for the Cause," sung by Mrs. Sutton and G. Ashley, and other revolutionary songs were rendered.

SHEFFIELD.—Comrade Mowbray addressed large meetings on Saturday and Sunday at Peenstone Street, West Bar, Gower Street, the Monolith, assisted by Bulas, Bingham, Carpenter, and Sketchley. Mowbray also addressed a meeting at the Hall of Science. At the Monolith a police-inspector wanted his name and address. On Sunday evening we had a tea and social meeting, after which Mowbray lectured on "Revolution and Reform." On Monday a meeting was held at Gower Street of the workmen at Cammel's ironworks, and also at the Monolith, Fargate. No police interruption. At 8 p.m. William Morris lectured to a good audience at the Cambridge Hall. Commonweal sold out; 7s. worth of literature; good collections.

YARMOUTH.—At the Radical Club, on Wednesday 13th, the adjourned discussion on Mr. Dawson's paper on Socialism was resumed, Messrs. King, Lee, and Lang (R.C.) supporting it, and Headley (S.L.) opposed it; Mr. Dawson closed with a brief reply. On Sunday we held no meetings, owing to the bad weather. The principles of Socialism are fast taking root. Unflinching energy can alone make the movement a success, and here, as elsewhere, there is none too much of it. 6 Commonweal sold. C. Reynolds wishes it to be announced in the Commonweal that he has resigned from the Socialist League.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At St. George's Y.M.C.A., Tuesday, November 12th, R. F. Wilson read a paper on "Modern Social Anomalies," a very outline of the principles of Socialism; he was ably assisted by Hamilton. The opposition was of the poorest possible description, one speaker hoping that the Society would take steps to prevent itself becoming a platform for the dissemination of such foul doctrines.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—We have been very busy here with the School Board election campaign. Three meetings were held each night last week, and on Sunday two, at which 17s. was collected for election expenses. Besides the candidates (J. Peacock and T. Proctor) good work has been done by S. Whalley, Winterton, Rooke, Hickling, Tomkinson, Snell, Knight, and Jones. Election on November 21st.

COMMEMORATION MEETINGS.

BRIGHTON.—On Sunday evening Nov. 10th, we held a meeting at the Free thought Hall, to commemorate the death of the "Chicago Martyrs and Bloody Sunday." Barker gave an excellent address on the lives and trial of the men, and I moved the resolutions printed in the Commonweal; they were carried without a dissentient voice. This I think is encouraging.—F. C.

DUBLIN.—The Dublin Socialist Club held a Commemoration Meeting in honour of the Chicago Anarchists on Monday, Nov. 11th, at 87, Marlborough Street; there was a large attendance—Frizelle in the chair. Comrade Fitzpatrik, who has recently returned from Chicago, was the orator of the evening; he dealt exhaustively with the Haymarket meeting, the so-called trials, and the execution. Hamilton, King, and Toomey also spoke.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THERE is an exhibition on show, it seems, for "Garments for the Poor." It is a difficult thing to see how such an exhibition can be made a novelty, considering the many exhibitions in which the triumphs of cheap labour and shoddy are set forth, and which are open to all and several (who have any money in their pockets) under various glowing titles, which, however, do not conceal the fact that they are the markets of the miserable; shops where wares are sold which no one would buy if he had not been forced to labour for nothing by a robber. Really, I don't see how this new exhibition can compete with Petticoat Lane, as a remarkable object—as a sign of our civilisation.

But if I might give a hint to the promoters of this exhibition, here it is. I suppose that those to whom they give the new garments adapted to their condition of life, when they take the new will strip off the old. Well, suppose these were collected and an exhibition made of them, the garments of the poor, instead of for them. If the gift of garments were done on a large enough scale, the cast-off clothes might make an exhibition of some interest for us of the well-to-do class, and might prepare us for that Exhibition of the Poor themselves, which will take place one day, and will be an imposing ceremony for those of the rich who may chance to survive it.

In fact, if I had dropped down from the moon into a London reading-room and had got hold of a newspaper, I should have said to myself, "The Poor, who are they? They seem to be a very lucky set of people; here are folk always doing something for them, which they wouldn't do for anybody else! Why, amongst other things, here's a man given them £250,000, whatever that means!"

However, not having come into England by way of the moon, I am rather puzzled about this "magnificent gift to the London Poor," and am principally sure of one thing, that if I were a member of that much-cared-for body, I would willingly speculate on my share of the said £250,000, and take, say, a pound of sausages in exchange for my chance; and meantime, I should like to ask a question or two.

1. How is the donor going to get at the poor so that they may receive the "gift"?
2. He will build houses with it, will he? Well, when built, who is to inhabit them? and on what terms?
 - (a) Are the "poor" to live rent free in them?
 - (b) Or to pay rent below the market value of them?
 - (c) If so, who amongst the poor are to be thus favoured?
 - (d) And where are the rest going to live?
3. Or is this, after all, another building company to whom the Guinness is going to lend his money?

When all these questions are answered quite satisfactorily, and I am so far assured that a gift has been given, I have still another question to ask, namely, Where did the money come from?

The Brazilian revolution would appear to be, as Mr. Cunninghame Graham hints, a revolution of the ordinary political type which does not touch the workers at all, but it may turn out otherwise. If so we shall soon see. It will not be a matter of "freeing" the slaves in the bourgeois sense of the word; that may be done, as we in England know too well, without making one stroke at the slavery of poverty. If the Brazilian revolution is to be a real one, Capitalism, the root of all evil, must be attacked definitely; then we shall believe in it. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

We have lost by death an energetic worker in the Cause, William Sharman, who, although he was addressed by the title of "reverend," had long shaken off any priestly assumption of dogmatism or special holiness. William Sharman was one of those Unitarian preachers who have become entirely convinced of the truth of Socialism, and see no reason for keeping their light under a bushel; he was a centre of Socialism in a very unsocialistic neighbourhood, and quietly and steadily did much good; a genial, unselfish man, his personal friends will miss him sorely. W. M.

Lord Melbourne's journals and papers, recently published, include some valuable contributions to the history of an interesting period (1790-1848) and many characteristic sketches of the men who made that history. One of his caustic touches is: "Dr. ——— is one of those men whom the Whigs call a Tory; whom the Tories call a fair man inclined to Whig opinions; and who calls himself a man of no politics. Such men are for the most part, if not always, really Tories."

Then, as now, Whigs were no better than Tories when the people were concerned. Here is one of the reasons urged by Melbourne himself against removing the Houses of Parliament from Westminster (italics ours):

"If a total removal takes place, and that to a situation where space is unlimited, it will be very difficult to avoid providing much larger accommodation for spectators as well as for members; and Viscount Melbourne need not recall to your Majesty's mind the fatal effects which large galleries filled with the multitude have had upon the deliberation of public assemblies, and consequently upon the laws and institutions of nations."

May not the "munificent gifts" of Messrs. Guinness and Waterlow, over which the papers have been gushing so, be merely "ransom" such as Mr. Chamberlain used to talk about when he was playing to the gallery and had not turned his face downwards to the stalls? Anyway, it is only giving back a feather from a stolen goose.

The Bishop of Manchester feels that he must move with the times. This is how he does it:

"Dr. Moorhouse, speaking at a meeting of the governors of the Manchester Hospital for Incurables, said one suggestion in the report was that they had lost a considerable number of subscribers during the year, and he must tell them that they were destined to lose more and more, not only by death, but in virtue of the great social movement which most of them regarded with the utmost satisfaction, that social movement whereby the wealth of this country was being very much more extensively distributed among the people. Only the other day a very eminent statesman, who had just received a number of returns making it perfectly plain, told him that whereas the number of smaller fortunes was largely increasing in Great Britain, the number of larger fortunes was steadily diminishing. He (the Bishop) was glad of that, because no community was in a healthy state which had nothing but a small knot of millionaires on one hand, and mostly all paupers on the other. Call this social movement what they might, there was no disguising from themselves the fact that it would make the collection of funds for institutions like that more and more difficult."

The Omaha Daily Democrat of the 8th prints a report on the Paris Congress—the progressive one—by the Hon. John E. Ahles, delegate of the Brotherhood of United Labour. In the course of it he complains that the Commonweal did not correctly describe the American contingent at the Congress. Well! the Commonweal deeply regrets the mistake, though from his own statement it seems to have been a natural as well as a very slight one. But he forgets to say that although the Editor and Secretary of the Commonweal were both there, as well as many other representatives of European labour papers, he neglected to explain to any of them the position he took up, which seems to have been generally misunderstood by the Congress.

What led to his withdrawal from the Congress was that he had been selected to report for the United States, but that through what he claims to have been "ignorance or dishonesty" on the part of Liebknecht, Mr. Busche, then of the Workmen's Advocate, supplanted him, and proceeded to misrepresent American labour. He need not now be sore, however, for the revenge of time has overtaken Mr. Busche, who has since then been cast out and discredited by the Socialist Labour Party of the U. S., by which he was sent to Paris, and in consequence is no longer in the editorial chair of the Workmen's Advocate, to that paper's manifest improvement. Among other things, we notice that it now acknowledges in a proper manner the source of its clippings. S.

THE MEN OF THE REVOLUTION.

II

MIRABEAU AND ROBESPIERRE.

We have seen revolutionary Paris in its first outburst of fury against the tyranny of the king and the nobles. We have seen the storm as it spread from Paris over the whole of France, its course marked by the blazing chateaux of the aristocrats. It now remains to take a glimpse at the man who, up to the fall of the Bastille, was the head of the revolt; but who now, like many revolutionary leaders of the "moderate" type, sees that the people are getting in advance of him, and is beginning to fall back into the rear.

Foremost among the men who sit upon the benches of the Assembly, which is now looked upon with superstitious awe by the French people as the sole means of bringing "Peace and the Constitution" to distracted France, is Gabriel Honoré Riquette de Mirabeau, born of a wild Southern race, noted for their contempt of law and authority. A race gallant in battle, but usually too rough and blunt for the scented atmosphere of Courts, where a rough word to a king's favourite would often outweigh the memory of services rendered in the field of battle. Mirabeau was not an unworthy representative of his family. He had the good or bad fortune to be the son of "a friend of man," the Marquis de Mirabeau, a deep student of political economy, who displayed his love of mankind by locking his family up, all but one, in prison, because they were impudent enough not to regulate their conduct by rules he had laid down for their guidance. In those good old days, when "parents were what parents ought to be," and "law-'n'-order" supported them to the fullest in exercising their authority, an irascible father could not only cut off a rebellious son with a shilling, but put him in the Bastille as well by means of a lettre de cachet. The Marquis de Mirabeau made the fullest use of his privileges as a noble, and only required three score lettres de cachet for his own use.

It was only to be expected that young Mirabeau would reap the full benefit of his father's paternal care. At both school and college he showed remarkable abilities, and with these abilities a strong individuality which would brook no control. In consequence, as he grew up, he was repeatedly consigned to jail by his philanthropic parent. While at Pontarlier he met Madame de Monier, the young wife of an old husband. The two fell in love, and escaping from the prison fled together to Holland. Here they lived by literary work, but were shamefully betrayed and handed over to the French Government, when Madame de Monier was sent to a convent and Mirabeau to the prison of Vincennes. Here he passed forty-two months in a dark dungeon, with hardly any clothing to his back. Released he wandered through Europe, writing on every subject of topical interest, and continually attacking the system under which he had suffered. The sound of the gathering storm of the revolution brought him to France. He was elected to the National Assembly as deputy for Aix, and from his election the time of his public history begins. He attended with other deputies the opening of the States-General, and marched in the procession with other deputies from the Church de Notre Dame to the Church of St. Louis. Here all eyes were fixed upon him, attracted by the fame of his intellect and also of his vices. "His immense mane of hair, his leonine head, stamped with a mighty ugliness, were astounding; no one could take their eyes from him. He was a man, and the others were but shadows."¹ Thus 'mid the throng, the giant, vicious it is true, but great and courageous, strides along, frowned on by the mediocre respectabilities that surround him. He marches on contemptuous and undaunted, "shaking his lion's mane as if prophetic of great deeds."

For a time Mirabeau spoke but little in the Assembly, but his opportunity came at last. In the early days of the struggle between the King and the Commons, being egged on by the Court, his majesty determined to put an end to this sort of thing, and backed up by a strong display of military force, he read out a list of concessions he had resolved to make to popular demands, and wound up by informing his faithful Commons "that if they would not carry them out he would do it without them." Already the Commons, dumb with apprehension, saw before them the gleaming bayonets of an impending coup d'état, when Mirabeau, springing to the tribune, said to the king's messenger, who bade the Assembly obey the king's orders and disperse, "We have heard the intentions suggested by the king; and you, sir, who can never be his organ to the National Assembly, you, who have neither place, right, nor voice to speak, you are not the man to remind us of it. Go and tell them who sent you, that we are here by the will of the people, and nothing but the force of bayonets shall drive us hence." These stirring words put new courage into the hearts of the Assembly; they stood to their guns amid roars of popular approval. The Court was defeated, and Mirabeau became from that day the most popular man in France.

But now mark what followed. Mirabeau was an aristocrat; and though persecuted in his younger days by his own class, it was impossible for him to forget his birth and his blood. He was alarmed by the spread of the revolution. The fall of the Bastille, the burning of the chateaux, the sweeping away of feudal rights and privileges frightened him; the revolution was going too far. Besides, his vices, his love of wine and women, luxurious feasting, splendid establishments, needed a full purse to support his extravagance; but riches are not found in the ranks of the revolutionary party, while the reaction had gold and to spare. Soon after the fall of the Bastille, Mirabeau received gold from the Court, and made use of his immense popularity to delay and obstruct the progress of the revolution. After a time he did worse, he plotted with the Court for the overthrow of the revolution and butchery of the people. His death on April 2nd, 1791, brought on by his wild life, only saved him from the inevitable doom, which in those days overtook treason. For it is absurd to suppose that even Mirabeau, great as his abilities were, could have stayed the progress of the torrent of revolt; he would only have been swept away in the desperate endeavour. It was not until the revolution had exhausted itself by years of storm and stress, that a mightier than Mirabeau—Napoleon Bonaparte—could overthrow the stockjobbers and usurers who usurped the post once occupied by men, who, whatever were their faults, were sincere in their desire to make life happier and better for the masses of the people. In such an attempt Mirabeau would have died like Danton, upon the scaffold. There are times when events are stronger than men, no matter how strong those men may be.

But in the same Assembly, within whose walls as Farmer Gerard remarked "there were a good many scoundrels," was another man, whom middle-class historians have not hard words enough to shower upon—his name is Maximilian Robespierre. In every way a complete contrast to Mirabeau, the "anxious, slight, ineffectual looking man under thirty in spectacles," would have looked poor and mean beside the huge revolutionary giant that towered above him, yet he had a quality which Mirabeau lacked, and without which all Mirabeau's great qualities were as dust in the balance. Robespierre was honest; even his bitterest foes are forced to admit it; and it was that one quality that enabled him to triumph over foes who were his superiors in both courage and ability. Mirabeau even saw this, and in one of the earlier Sessions of the Assembly remarked to some friends, "This man will do somewhat, he believes every word he says." Not only was Robespierre sincere, but he was entirely disinterested. The son of an advocate, he was sent to the college of Louise Grandat Paris by the influence of Cardinal Rohan, noted for his share in the scandalous affair of the diamond necklace. There he had Camille Desmoulins as schoolmate; but Robespierre did not stay there long, for he begged his patron to let him resign in favour of a younger brother. He returned home to his own province of Arras, and there practised in his profession of advocate so successfully that his abilities attracted the attention of the bishop, who used his influence to appoint him judge of his diocese. Robespierre's decisions, unlike those of most judges in those days, were never swayed by bribery of self-interest. One day a culprit is brought before him, for whose offence the law prescribes the penalty of death, and Robespierre resigns his post with all its emoluments rather than pronounce that sentence upon this unfortunate wretch. These simple facts hardly bear out the epithets that are usually levied at Robespierre by middle-class historians; certainly you could hardly expect these deeds from a man that was either "self-seeking," "bloodthirsty," or "cruel." If Robespierre sent intriguing royalists to the guillotine it could only have been in obedience to what he imagined was a cruel necessity, and the respectable persons who exclaim against him and the people of Paris for the abrupt methods of disposing of their enemies, should remember that these traitors to their country and the people were in league with foreign despots to bring arson, massacre, and slaughter upon the French people, who had been brave enough to rebel against the tyranny of centuries. Mercy with people of this kind would have been a mistake; only it would have been better to have stripped them of the wealth which made them dangerous, and thus rendered them powerless to injure the people, reserving the guillotine only for very extreme cases. Still, it is easy to criticise from an arm-chair standpoint, and yet probably under the same circumstances the critic would have done the same. As we advance further into the history of these exciting years, we may often have cause to wonder at the self-restraint exercised by the people under circumstances of extreme provocation on the part of their enemies.

My purpose in writing this article was to draw a contrast between two men who are in their way revolutionary types. On one side the man of gigantic genius, of startling talent, yet depraved by a vicious life, selling himself and the cause of the people for gold—Mirabeau; this "splendid leper," a giant whom cold steel could not frighten, but yet gold could buy. On the other hand, Robespierre, the man whose abilities are scarcely above the average, but whose honesty, sincerity, and disinterestedness are so apparent that he wins the confidence of the people, who are wearied of tricksters of every kind, and stand even to-day a figure at which all their foeman shudder.

I am quite aware that Robespierre's principles are not ours, that his care for the people took the form of the benevolent despotism of modern State Socialism; but still no one can doubt his love for the poor, and what is more he met his fate at the hands of a pitiless reaction, whose leaders were the men who could boast of all of Mirabeau's vices but none of his virtues. Cold-blooded scoundrels who restored once again the rule of the money-bag, and the slavery of the masses to the tyranny of the rich. It is because Robespierre died for the people and by their foes that his name should be remembered among the other martyrs of the popular cause. D. J. NICOLL.

There are about 80,000 able-bodied convicts in our jails and penitentiaries. The crime and vice represented by this immense prison population is the outgrowth of a vicious social system which enforces poverty on the many to enable the few to revel in luxury. The best antidote for crime is occupation and comfort.—Washington (D. C.) National Economist.

CAPITAL AND LABOUR.

THE ordinary conception among the so-called educated classes of the relations between labour and capitalism is a striking instance of the power of a phrase. Nothing has done more to confuse the public mind as to the rights and wrongs of the social question, and so lead to the perpetuation of the worst evils of wage-slavery, than the systematic misuse of the term "capital." The true and original meaning of the word is, of course, wealth, either in the form of money or materials, employed for the production of more wealth; and were it always used in this sense a great deal of misconception would have been avoided and the utter shallowness and absurdity of much of the teaching of the hired apologist for plutocracy would have been apparent at the first glance. But because the growth of language has not kept pace with new conditions arising from social evolution it has become customary to use the word "capital" in a double sense. In addition to its primary and correct meaning of wealth employed in production, it has come by general usage to signify also the interests and powers of those who own or control capital. In speaking of "the rights of capital," "the conflict between capital and labour," and similar every-day phrases, reference is made not to material capital, the product and at the same time the instrument of industry, but to the position of the capitalist as a social factor. Using the word sometimes in one sense and sometimes in the other, it is no wonder that those whose interest it is to befog the popular understanding on the subject should have found in this confusion, under the one term of two ideas of such widely different import, a splendid opportunity for the exercise of controversial disingenuousness. How easy, for instance, is it to argue that as capital—i.e., the product of labour used to create more wealth—is a necessary instrument and auxiliary of labour, that therefore the interests of labour and capital are identical, and all who would attempt to stir up strife between them are either fools or knaves.

"Capital," says the hireling journalist, or the sleek and well-paid popular lecturer, "what is it but the tools with which industry works—machinery and raw material, axes and hammers, spades and wheelbarrows, corn and cotton? Capital is but stored labour, increasing and multiplying infinitely the productiveness of the labour of the future. Why, without capital we could do nothing. We should all be naked, half-starved savages. So you see that there can be no possible antagonism between capital and labour. They are mutually necessary and ought to be the best friends." And there are any number of otherwise intelligent, fairly-educated people who have been convinced by this kind of intellectual jugglery that labour reformers are a set of mischievous destructives and that the complaints of the toilers of the oppression of capitalism are unfounded. They have not the wit to see that the "capital" whose advantages are universally acknowledged is an entirely different thing from the "capital" whose rule is complained of as arbitrary and tyrannous, although comprised under the same term—that the inert material, the use of which renders labour profitable—has been confounded with the individuals, whose possession or control of it puts them in a position to tax industry.

No labour reformer has any quarrel with "capital." We all recognise its utility—nay, its absolute necessity—to effective production. But "capitalism" is another affair altogether. It is the assumption of the few who possess capital to control labour by virtue of such possession. When once the distinction is clearly understood, the whole superstructure of false logic and politico-economical platitudes, reared upon the puerile play upon words, in which writers who pass for cultured and profound have not been ashamed to indulge, falls to the ground. And to this end all labour-reform writers and speakers ought to be careful to make the distinction, and never say "capital" when they mean "capitalism." It may seem a small matter in the eyes of some, but we cannot ignore the extent to which the convictions of mankind are shaped by words and phrases. Men will fight to the death for a catchword or a party shibboleth, which by the change of conditions has lost any real meaning it may at one time have possessed.

In admitting the usefulness of "capital" we do not admit the necessity for the capitalist or the system of capitalism which implies the absolute control of the forces of labour by the money power. On the contrary, as all wealth is the creation of labour, it should be the servant, not the master—the instrument, and not the directing power. The interests of capitalism and labour are diametrically and eternally opposed to each other in the very nature of things. They never can be harmonised, and they never ought to be. Labour has not and cannot have any quarrel with "capital" any more than with land or air or water. But with those who seek to monopolise all or any of these essentials to life and industry we have an unceasing struggle to wage to regain possession of our natural rights, and establish a just system of distribution under which capitalism will cease to exist, while capital will be owned by those whose labour alone gives it value.—Journal of United Labour.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HENRY GEORGE AND P. E. DOVE.

I desire to state that to my knowledge Henry George had never seen or heard of Patrick Edward Dove as late as the autumn of 1882—that is to say, three years after the publication of 'Progress and Poverty,' and eleven years after Henry George's 'Our Land and Land Policy,' which I have now before me, and from which 'Progress and Poverty' obviously evolved. But independently of this, any unbiassed literary man who takes the trouble to read Dove's two works, 'The Theory of Human Progression' (London, 1850) and 'The Elements of Political Science' (Edinburgh, 1854), will see that the idea of plagiarism is supremely untenable. Further, in the New York Standard of October 16th, Henry George meets the original suggestion with a straightforward openness which probably no English editor would have exhibited, seeing that he publishes in his own journal the full text of the accusatory article in the Twentieth Century, at the same time distinctly stating, what I knew seven years ago—i.e., that he had not heard of P. E. Dove's works when he published 'Progress and Poverty.'

With this information before you I feel sure that you will take the necessary steps to stamp out the misstatement alluded to.

HOLY THURSDAY.

Is this a holy thing to see
In a rich and fertile land,
Babes reduced to misery,
Fed with cold and usurous haud?

Is that trembling cry a song?
Can it be a song of joy?
And so many children poor?
It is a land of poverty!

And their sun does never shine,
And their fields are bleak and bare,
And their ways are filled with thorns:
It is eternal winter there.

For where'er the sun does shine,
And where'er the rain does fall,
Babe can never hunger there,
Nor poverty the mind appal.

The nation which can show the most enormous massing of wealth can also show the most abject poverty. The one is the usual accompaniment of the other. Great wealth cannot be massed except it be taken from the thousands who created it to be centred in the hands of the few who hold it. Every unusual luxury enjoyed by one represents its equivalent in destitution and suffering by many.—Washington (D. C.) National Economist.

INTEREST.—These pleasant illustrations to show the poetic justice of interest, like that of the poor fellow digging potatoes with his fingers till the benevolent capitalist kindly loans him a spade to be returned with a goodly share of potatoes, only serve to show that men could never have been cheated or driven into the adoption of any such practice, if its advocates had not given it the outward semblance of justice. Anybody who has read "Ivanhoe," if not history, knows that the Jews of the dark times of Catholic supremacy were hated by professed Christians less for having crucified Jesus than for the usury which their somewhat unique position as the only really successful financiers of the time enabled them to extort. It was not until Christians learned from their Jewish taskmasters that to let men live to produce for them and to absorb their products in the shape of usury was really easier than killing them outright, that they concluded to tame the monster usury—convert and Christianise him for their own special accommodation. He was duly baptized "Interest," fettered a little by something known as "legal enactment," and put to work in Christian harness. The petty examples brought forward by the advocates of this infamy give no more idea of its real dimensions than one gets of an elephant by merely seeing the eye. The truth is, the heaviest interests under which the masses struggle to-day, are those for which the "for value received" is a rascally pretext on the part of the interest takers; the indebtedness is purely fiat in the large majority of cases, created by the scratch of a pen. Let anyone who doubts this, examine the real character of our town, city, state, and national debts to be convinced. The smaller interests which are taken or paid among private individuals, although wrong in principle, are a drop in the bucket as compared with these monster absorbers of the people's wealth, which do their work so stealthily and so evenly as to escape the notice of their victims. There is no end to the things that can truthfully be said on this line.—Eleanor F. Baldwin, in Twentieth Century.

JOHN MORLEY.

THE political career of John Morley is an "awful example" of the demoralising influence of politics. It is a warning to us all. Could his old intellectual wet nurse, Philosophic Radicalism, behold him now, what would she think? Rest her good soul, it is well that she is dead! Maybe her spirit still haunts for a season the shelves whereon Mill's "Representative Government" and his own "On Compromise" lie dust covered. If so, how it must anguish her to read the reports of his speeches in the daily newspapers which are laid on the library table! The once promising apostle of high and mighty political ethics and intellectual integrity, become a hack politician! The student who walked the solemn portals of uncompromising principles, wallowing in the filth and mire of electioneering and party chicanery!

Probably some Socialists will say, that Mr. Morley's decline and fall into Parliamentary pusillanimity was just what one would have anticipated from the vague preceptorial attitude of his earlier writings; and some may even affirm that he has not declined or fallen at all; that his philosophical platform was always a shabby one, and that he never was more than a backboneless poser in political criticism. Such opinions are, I think, not quite fair. It appears to me that there was much in his earlier writings to justify the hope that Mr. Morley would have acted a useful and not ignoble part in the conflict of modern social speculations, and that instead of descending into the wretched arena of party disputation and office hunting, he would at least have borne steadily, if not very brilliantly, the little light of social idealism which Mr. Mill committed from his dying grasp to his disciples.

As it is, instead of entering practical politics (which he never should have entered) as a fearless and uncompromising champion of sheer political and social principles, prepared to struggle with the minority through good and ill report, Mr. Morley has at once amalgamated himself with the ignorant, brutish, and selfish majority, and has endeavoured to beat the record as a place-seeker and manoeuvrer of party marionettes. No politician of recent times has more explicitly disavowed principle in favour of expediency and party and personal success. Men must be judged "according to their lights," and while Mr. Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, and Lord Randolph Churchill may be excused as never having known any better, Mr. Morley must be condemned as having abjured his faith for a mess of pottage, and having "wilfully sought his own salvation."

Could the career of John Morley of to-day be written by the John Morley of ten or fifteen years ago, what a poor spectacle he would make of him! What fine dissertations on pure morals he would give us, when relating how the author of "On Compromise" and the apologist of Robespierre and the French Revolution declared at Newcastle a few days ago to the labour delegates, "If you ask me if I am in favour of abolishing the Monarchy, I answer emphatically, 'No!'" With what solemn antithesis he would set Mr. Morley's political critiques in the Fortnightly Review of ten years ago against the political harangues of Mr. Morley of the last two years! In the Fortnightly Review days, Mr. Morley criticised the doings of Liberals and Tories with some measure of impartiality. He frequently blamed the Liberals for speaking and acting wrongly, and not infrequently commended the attitude and utterances of the Tories. Mr. Morley was not a politician then, and probably had no thought of becoming one, or of tasting the "sweets" of office. Now Mr. Morley is a politician, and has tasted, and wants to taste more, of official privilege and power. So you never find him saying one good word of the Tories, or one bad word of the Liberals. Has the Liberal party become so much wiser and better since then, and the Tory party so much more foolish and wicked? Or has not rather Mr. Morley become a changed man, changed from an impartial and thoughtful observer to a bribed and prejudiced partisan?

Yes! according to Mr. Morley, everything the Liberals and Home Rulers do or want to do is right; everything the Tories and wicked Liberal Unionists do or want to do is wrong. Some politicians who are in favour of a more extreme measure of Home Rule than the Liberals are ever likely to give Ireland, and who never pretended to be very philosophical or exacting in their critical estimates, do not just approve of everything said and done by the Irish party; but philosophical Mr. Morley has no reservation in his approval of their tactics. He is prepared to back up and justify with a thousand historical and ethical references, every syllable uttered and every act done in the name of the Home Rule agitation. Even the most insensitive of the Irish members must blush sometimes, when they behold the halo of wisdom and absolute justice which Mr. Morley radiates round their most inconsequent sayings and doings—from Mr. O'Brien's fight for his breeches to Mr. Redmond's epistolary remonstrances to the editor of the Times.

In his recent utterances on social and labour questions, Mr. Morley shows that he is not one whit more governed by principle in his "opinions" than Lord Randolph Churchill or the worst political time-servers of the day. Nor can we say that he is any degree more advanced or democratic. Some of our friends are apt to look upon his declaration in favour of what is termed the "London programme" as an evidence of his progressiveness. Of course he is progressive—so also is Churchill. Politicians must be progressive. But let us not credit Churchill, Morley or any other politicians with what we, not they, have done. Undoubtedly, Socialists and Land Nationalisers have brought a number of measures within the region of practical politics, which politicians previously rejected as unpractical. And now that we have made them practical, why praise men like John Morley because they cannot fail to see what is evident to the veriest political nincompoop? Let us judge John Morley's opinions, not by what he cannot avoid approving if he intends to exist as a politician, but by the measures or principles he advocates because he thinks them right, whether immediately expedient or not. Judged in this way, Mr. Morley will, I think, be found not on the side of progress really, but on the side of reaction. In his speech at the Eighty Club he declared himself against Socialism if it meant the abolition of private property. That is a definite declaration of principle. The abolition of private property is not within the region of practical politics, and in Mr. Morley's estimation is not likely to be for a long time. He was safe, therefore, in making that declaration as a politician. But free education, free meals to school children, the taxation of ground values, etc., these are measures which are distinctly within the range of practical politics, and although they are definitely Socialistic measures (for they sap the very foundations of the principle of individualism and private property) yet Mr. Morley supports them. Mr. Morley might as well tell us that he is a strict teetotaler, but that he is prepared to take a little wine—or even whiskey if much pressed—just for his stomach's sake, as it were!

It would serve little purpose to enter into a detailed criticism of Mr. Morley's objections to the eight hours movement and other of the more extreme labour proposals. One gets quite sick of replying to the statements of men, who by their position and professions dare not, even if they had any honest convictions, speak them out. Of course, if it were necessary it would be the duty of Socialists at all times to dispute point by point even the most barefaced misstatements of politicians. Luckily for us, however, it is not so. Everywhere around us we see the true principles of Socialism spreading amongst the people with extraordinary swiftness; and by the time we could succeed in dispersing half the crudities and calumnies which men like Mr. Morley thrust in our pathway, the social revolution would be upon us.

Mr. Morley says that he is sometimes regarded as a sluggard Whig and sometimes as a Nihilist—sometimes as a Marlborough House man and sometimes as a St. Just. This he appeared to regard as rather complimentary to the breadth and variety of his sympathies. Perhaps it is. Blowing hot and cold and mixing bitter with sweet has long been a favourite and successful accomplishment of politicians. There has always been a close resemblance between the professions of the conjurer and the political adventurer. It is scarcely necessary, however, to remark that no honest and earnest advocate of truth is ever likely to be so misapprehended. St. Just could never be mistaken for a Marlborough House man, or a Marlborough House man for a St. Just; and if Mr. Morley were burning with a desire to serve suffering humanity and prepared to fight all principalities and powers in behalf of truth and justice, he would not be regarded as a Whig or anything but what he really was—and never would have had the opportunity of delivering his shallow and specious address at the Eighty Club.

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

THE WAGE SYSTEM AND CHATTEL SLAVERY.

AN attempt was made on the life of Dom Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, since deposed, and it is said the would-be regicide was actuated by a desire to be revenged for the emancipation of the slaves. If this be true, says the Journal of United Labour, it will be interesting to discover to what class of society the man belongs, and how the emancipation of the slaves affected him. He is said to have been crazy: if so he may belong to the ex-slave-holding class; a sane member of this class would hardly feel resentful for the emancipation, they have benefited too greatly, in the way of cheaper labour and lessened anxiety, from it. It was the wealthy land-holders and slave-owners who led the movement for the emancipation of the slaves in Brazil, a fact that may seem strange to those who remember how desperately Southern slave-owners fought against abolition. Yet with the experience of the Southern planters before them it was the most natural thing in the world that the Brazilian land-owners should favour emancipation. It was because they believed that slave labour was cheap that the planters of the South favoured slavery, but their experience since the war has shown them that the wage system gives them cheaper labour than slavery did. It costs less to hire black men now than it did to support them and pay interest on their purchase money before the war; and, instead of the injury they dreaded, abolition has absolutely benefited them financially. The fear of want and anxiety for his children is a sharper goad to force the negro wage slave to work than ever was the driver's lash; and if he is no longer the "property" of his employer, his master is relieved of all anxiety regarding his "property's" health and welfare. In slavery, the condition of the slaves varied; some worked on cotton lands, some in sugar plantations, and some in rice swamps, some slave-owners were more just and humane than were others. Not every one was a Legree. So under the wage system there is difference of condition: the lot of the bricklayer and carpenter is better than that of the Pennsylvanian miner and cokeworker; the employes in one factory have advantages over those in another. Some employers are more just and humane than others. The essence of slavery is that men are compelled to work for the benefit of others, and that the result of their labour does not inure to themselves. They may be forced into slavery by the guns of the Arab slave-hunters, or by monopoly of natural opportunities; they may become the property of a master by virtue of a sale in the slave-market, or the employe of one through the operation of competitive commercialism; but whether kidnapped into chattel slaves or monopolised into the wage system, it is a mockery to call them free when the fruit of their labour is not theirs to enjoy. The modern wage-worker does not wear a collar like the Saxon serf; he need not fear the driver's lash like the chattel slave; but the law of supply and demand binds him as firmly to his task as the one, and the sharp sting of competition goads him to his work as effectively as the other; while the iron law of wages fixes the amount he is to receive for his support as near the minimum where he can exist and continue to produce as ever did the pinching economy of the most careful feeder of slaves. At best the wage system is but an improved system of slavery—this is the most that can be said of it—and all the improvements have not been in the interest of workers.

A SOCIALIST HYMN.

By the bodies and minds and souls that rot in a common sty
In the city's offal-holes, where the dregs of its horrors lie—
By the prayers that bubble out, and never ascend to God,
We swear the tyrants of earth to rout, with tongue and with pen and sword!

By the child that sees the light, where the pestilent air stagnates,
By the woman, worn and white, who under the street-lamp waits,
By the horror of vice that thrives in the dens of the wretched poor,
We swear to strike when the time arrives, for all that is good and pure!

By the rights that were always ours—the rights that we ne'er enjoyed,
By the gloomy cloud that lowers on the brow of the unemployed,
By the struggling mothers and wives—by the girls in the streets of sin—
We swear to strike when the time arrives, for our kind, and our kith and kin!

By our burning hate for men who rob us of ours by might,
And drive to the slum and den, the poor from the sun and light,
By the hell-born greed that drives our sons o'er the world to roam,
We swear to strike when the time arrives, and strike for our friends and home!

By the little of manhood left in a world of want and sin,
By the rift in the dark cloud's brow where the light still struggles in,
By the love that scarce survives in a stream that is sluggish and thin,
We swear to work till the time arrives for ourselves and our kind and kin!

The little of love may dry in its stream that scarcely flows,
The little of manhood die and the rift in the dark clouds close,
And hope may vanish from earth and all that is pure and bright,
But we swear to strike e'er that time has birth with the whole of our gathered might!

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

DENMARK.

The controversy between the Danish Socialistic papers, Social Demokrat and Arbejderen, has now degenerated into a scandal and a shame, which must be felt as an humiliation by all Socialists. On November 8th, the leaders of the Danish Social-democratic party and editors of the Social Demokrat (that is the "party government") dismissed Miss Signe Andersen from her membership of the said "party government," because she had censured it in Arbejderen for partly concealing the true kernel of Socialism, and compromising with Liberals and Radicals in order to get a big political party (of a very mixed quality though), and in order to make safe their own comfortable position as leaders or "government." On November 10th, this same socialistic government sent out a circular to all the Socialists of Denmark, requesting them to vote for or against the expulsion from the party of the seven editors of Arbejderen, namely, comrades Gerson Trier, P. Petersen, Nicolai L. Petersen, F. Möller, Nielsen-Kolding, P. Christensen, and Chr. Bildsøe. Their "crime" consisted simply of "violating party discipline"! They have dared to speak out in earnest their opinion upon the party government, and to criticise the quality of the Socialistic party itself; and that is reason enough for the Danish party government to make themselves into Bismarcks, dictating expulsion!

Such is the liberty of the press and of free thought and speech in the Danish Social-Democratic party, which identifies itself with Socialism in Denmark! But this, bad as it is, is hardly the worst of the affair. Arbejderen has always exercised its, as it seems to me, very necessary criticism in a fair and moderate way; but Social-Demokrat uses against its adversaries the dirtiest and vilest denunciations, mostly of a quite private character. It simply declares our seven comrades of Arbejderen to be "spies," "masked Conservatives," etc., etc. Since the publication of the expulsion resolution in Social-Demokrat, this paper has every day been full of foul personal attacks upon the seven "miscreants." It is very seldom that I have observed more corrupt practices on the side of the bourgeois press against Socialists than the tactics of this "Social-Democratic" paper against its Socialistic adversaries. And the shame is the greater, as fellow-Socialists ought to stand nigher than our enemies the bourgeois.

The result of the vote upon the expulsion of the seven comrades of Arbejderen was going to be published on the 20th of November. It will probably be affirmative to the proposal of the "government" by a large majority. If so, we have from this month to date a thorough split in the so-called Socialistic party of Denmark; and it will be the lasting honour of comrade Trier to have provoked this split, because, under such circumstances as this a split means nothing less than the unveiling of a miserable humbug. We who mean by our Socialism something broader, and keener, and purer than the detestable political juggle of the "party government" in Denmark will hail this split as a new birth of Socialism in that country.

Sens moral: Dear friend, consider once more the "value" of a Socialistic party, of Socialistic political action. CAN there come anything good out of it?

STN.

COMMUNISM AND QUARRELLING.—Writing in 1592 of the true state of Iceland in reply to the "lying slanders" of Krantz and Munster, German cosmographers, "Arngrimus Jonas of Holen Hialtadale" is very much exercised by the statement as to the Icelanders that "all things are common among them except their wives." Commenting upon this he says (Hakluyt, 1599 ed., p. 581): "But whether the aforesaid things be true or no, we call the laws of our country to witness, which the Icelanders from the beginning have used all one with the Norways; . . . of inheritances, . . . theft, extortions, lending, bargains, and the rest: all which, to what purpose should they be enjoined unto them with whom all things are common? We call to witness so many broils and contentions in our courts and places of judgment . . . concerning goods moveable and immoveable. We call to witness our kings, . . . who by so many bills of supplication . . . hath been often interrupted, for the setting through of controversies concerning possessions." And he thus quite triumphantly refutes the reproach, as he takes it, cast upon his countrymen of taking away distinctions of properties, like the Anabaptists. For indeed how should laws and quarrellings pertain "unto those with whom all things are common"?

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

John Morley and Eight Hours.

The jubilation of the workmen Radicals when the Liberal and Radical Union accepted their proposal for an eight hours day in all Government establishments has been considerably checked by the stern non possumus of Mr. John Morley. The Star, which has advocated an eight hours law for some time, and at no time so strongly at the present, when it seems to fear that the spread of the labour revolt may lead to some breach of the peace, professes itself quite delighted with the stern honesty of Mr. Morley. It is a great pity that the Star has such a weakness for humbug, but then I suppose a mild infusion of that inestimable quality is one of the means by which the Star has attained its present great popularity. At the same time, as it falls down and worships the Roman virtue of Mr. Morley, it is good enough to hint to a working-class public that that rigid honesty might be softened on a future occasion, and, like the solid rock, wear away beneath the rushing torrent of modern democracy. Now, despite the Star's cant about Mr. Morley's "honesty"—a thing the editor knows very well that a successful politician has no business with, for he would find it a terrible obstacle to future greatness—I maintain that "honesty" does not enter into the business at all. To put the matter in the brutal language of the market, Mr. Morley's refusal simply means that for the Liberal party to pledge itself to such an "advanced" measure would not pay. Already the Daily News, the organ of the moderate Liberals—who are not only "moderate," but rich as well—had expressed alarm at the rate the Liberal and Radical Union were going. Therefore for the chiefs of the party to pledge themselves to anything of the kind would mean the driving of these gentlemen into the ranks of Tories, and what is of more consequence, the loss of their money and influence—very valuable in a general election. The situation is as follows: The Liberals aren't go in for even mild measures of social reform, although, of course, it may suit very well to get their Radical organs to talk a mild kind of Socialism, which means nothing in particular. The Tories will not, whatever Tory Democrats of the Randolph Churchill school may think or say. We have only to read the utterances of their leaders to see that they are as blind and bigoted as ever. Their only remedies for popular discontent are handcuffs, bludgeons, bullets, and bayonets. Therefore the people must trust in themselves. Let them take Mr. Morley's advice, and go in for combination. Only combination of a kind that Mr. Morley would scarcely relish. If those who advocate the eight hour labour day were resolved, they could bring with their great influence and popularity every workman in London out on strike for it in a year or so; and it strikes me that Mr. Morley and his friends might even prefer passing laws to that kind of combination. One thing is quite certain—the workmen can have eight hours when they like, as they can have anything, if they have courage to take it; but if they wait for one of the great political parties to give it to them they may wait till all eternity.

The Bakers' Strike.

The men have practically won all along the line, though a few sweaters still hold out in the neighbourhood of Whitechapel. The union officials are now endeavouring to check the undue extension of overtime. In some cases 20 hours of overtime have been made in a week, and the union officials feel that this is not what the agitation was meant to bring about, as it is not diminishing the amount of unemployed labour. The British workman certainly doesn't deserve the taunt of being lazy which is so frequently thrown at him by middle-class critics. He seems to be too fond of work. Still it is to be feared that however desirable the abolition of overtime may be, it will be impossible to do away with it while ordinary wages are barely sufficient for the most elementary needs of life.

Later.—The Jewish bakers have now granted the men's demands, pressure having been brought to bear upon them by the Chief Rabbi, Dr. Adler. Several have been heavily fined at Clerkenwell Police-court for intimidation. The "intimidation" mainly consisted in distributing bills advising people not to buy their bread at a sweating shop.

The Silvertown Strike.

Last Tuesday, the police diversified the monotony of the strike by a savage assault upon the strikers; these gallant heroes suddenly drawing the bludgeons and falling upon a helpless and unoffending crowd, breaking the heads of old men and young women with all that heroism which distinguishes our noble civic force. Several men were afterwards arrested, convicted, and imprisoned for "assaulting" the police.

The Railwaymen.

The new Railway Worker's Union is going on swimmingly, to the intense disgust of the officials in the older society. Though only formed a few weeks the new society now numbers over 24,000 members. The officials of the old society have now given up relying upon articles from the Times, and are depending now upon their own unaided efforts. In an article in the Railway Review, there are some bitter complaints concerning "a great deal of loose talk about the new and old trade unionism," which the Railway Review sorrowfully admits "is generally to the detriment of the latter." It then goes on to say "that if it was necessary it would be easy to defend the greater portion of those who are at the head of our old societies," but the Railway Review appears to be of an opinion that it is not necessary, for it does not do it, perhaps because the task is not so easy as it at first appears. It then complains that "unless care is exercised that the new trade unions, the new labour organisations, will not be trade unions at all, but mere fighting bodies dependent upon the public for the sinews of war." The description of them as "fighting bodies" is perfectly accurate, and it is quite true they are not "trade unions" in the sense that A.S.R.S. is a trade union, that is they are not "benefit societies." That they are "fighting bodies" is perhaps owing to the fact that they are young, and not decrepid and helpless with old age, overfeeding, and that general debility produced by a superabundance of riches. It is not fair, however, to state that new trade unions are "dependent on the public for sinews of war." It is quite true that the dockers were dependent upon the public for assistance during the great dock strike, when the mass of them had no trade union, but now the dockers have their own trade union and will not need it in the future, and therefore it is not fair to make such a statement merely because the new unions do not demand large contributions from the members in order to turn "fighting bodies" into dead and alive benefit societies. The old reactionary trade unionism may wail as much as it pleases, its hour has come! "The old order changeth," and the Rip Van Winkle of old-fashioned trade unionism has awoke from his twenty year's sleep, and has found the world very much changed indeed, to his intense disgust and astonishment. Poor fellow, he will soon go to sleep again, but it will be a sleep that will have no awakening.

Waterproof Garment Makers.

A meeting was held on Saturday, Nov. 23rd, of workers in this trade for the purpose of forming a trade union; H. Davis occupied the chair. Speeches were delivered in English and German, urging those present to combine to destroy the two capital grievances, viz., the "improver" system and sub-contract work. The following resolution was unanimously adopted: "That in the opinion of this meeting of men and women employed in the waterproof garment trade, the time has arrived to take the necessary steps to protect ourselves from the ever-growing sweating which is being rapidly introduced into this trade; we, therefore, pledge ourselves to form a union for our mutual benefit and protection." M. J. Silverstone was elected secretary pro. tem., and a committee of seven appointed and instructed to call the next meeting in some large hall in the district. W. Wess, of the Berner Street Club, who had rendered useful assistance in organising the meeting, was present, and took a large number of names as members of the new organisation. All communications to be addressed to the organising secretary, M. J. Silverstone, "Waterproofs," 2, Fort Street, Spitalfields, E.

A Benevolent Gas Company.

The South Metropolitan Gas Company has become suddenly anxious about the welfare of its men. Quite recently it issued a scheme of profit-sharing by which a certain portion of profits would accumulate yearly to each man's credit in the hands of the company, and which would be forfeited in case of a strike. This is simply an attempt on the part of the company to lull the men over to keep the peace. And we are glad to see that the men look upon it in this light, and at a large meeting of South Metropolitan gas-workers held on Deptford Broadway on Sunday a resolution was carried declaring that this "benevolent" scheme was only a plan to break up the union, and calling upon the men not to sign the agreement. It must, moreover, be quite evident that if the company can afford to be so generous with its profits it can also afford to pay better wages, and the gas-workers must take care that they must get a better share of the profits without signing an agreement that will in any way limit their freedom of action.

Sheffield Labourers.

Our comrades at Sheffield are busy forming a labourers' union. The masters are greatly alarmed, and comrade Sketchley stated at a recent meeting that the federated employers of Sheffield had passed a resolution that any man taking an active part in that union should be dismissed, and that no other member of the federated employers should employ him. I wonder if this kind of boycotting is illegal? The labourers, however, are not frightened, for according to Sheffield newspapers the room was crowded with men anxious to join the union. Employers may pass what resolutions they like, they cannot stop the great movement which is now sweeping over the country.

Dublin Bakers.

The Dublin bakers, encouraged by the success of the Londoners, are threatening to come out on strike for an advance of 6s. a-week for foremen and ordinary hands. They might also demand a reduction of hours, for 84 hours a-week is decidedly too long to work.

The Dockers' Balance-Sheet.

The audit of accounts promised by John Burns and the "Wade Arms" Strike Committee has been completed. The audit shows that from the beginning to the end of the struggle the total amount of money received from all sources was, in round numbers, £48,000, of which £30,800, or nearly two-thirds, was received from Australia. The various English trades unions subscribed £4,000. There is a surplus of about £5,000, in the disposal of which the committee will be guided by the general opinion of the subscribers. The only assistance given to strikers other than the dock and river men were several subscriptions to the Silvertown men, who struck at the same time as the dockers, and who might almost be considered as riverside workers, and a donation of £100 to the tailors' strike fund.

It is evident that if it had not been for the help of the workmen of Australia—who doubtless in many instances had known what poverty was in London—the strike would have fallen through. Their generous behaviour and the chivalry of the gallant stevedores, who fought so well in a quarrel in which they personally had nothing to gain, is a bright contrast beside the help given by the leaders of the older school of trade unionism, who evidently saw in this great labour revolt the beginning of the end as far as they were concerned. N.

DEATH'S HEAD AND CROSSBONES.—My journeyings have brought me into close proximity with a broad field of distress. Here in the richest and fattest land on earth, the great fertile State of Illinois, are ten thousand people appealing to the world for food to keep them from starvation! Yes, the almighty truth is rising up before the rich land-grabbers and money-grabbers that "something is rotten in Denmark." Death's head and crossbones are abroad in the land, teaching the bitter lesson of the past over again. Here in the midst of a "land that flows with milk and honey," a land that groans under its load of luxuries, here in the midst of a vast population of wealthy, civilised, Christianised, and educated land lords and money lords, are ten thousand hard-working, honest, sober men, women, and children actually starving to death. Within fifty miles of these unfortunate sons and daughters of our universal Creator, there are fifty thousand acres of idle land, which that same Creator intended for the equal use and benefit of these or any other ten thousand food-wanting creatures he should see fit to send here. But have those hungry sons and daughters of a common God the right to use these idle acres of our common God's good land, and in the sweat of their brows produce their food? Not a bit of it! God made those broad acres for speculative merchandise, to be gobbled up by the rich and held, as by divine right, to make themselves richer. No matter if ten or fifteen thousand do perish. That's all right. Cæsar says it is.—C. W. AYERS, in Twentieth Century.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—On Sunday, D. J. Nicoll lectured to a good audience on "The French Revolution"; some very interesting points were raised in the discussion which followed the lecture.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held a good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were Maughan, R. J. Lyne, J. F. Lyne, and Crouch; 2s. 1½d. collected and 50 Commonweal sold. No meeting at St. Ann's Road. Rev. F. L. Donaldson lectured at the Clarendon Coffee Tavern to a splendid audience on "Christian Socialism"; a great many questions were asked and good discussion; several Weals and pamphlets sold and 3s. 9d. collected.

NORTH LONDON.—At Hyde Park on Sunday afternoon, good meeting addressed by Cantwell and Mowbray; good sale of Weals and collected 1s. 3d.

STREATHAM.—Interesting discussion at branch meeting on "Land and Machinery." Good meeting at Fountain on Sunday, in spite of bad weather, addressed by Weir, Howard, and Smith. Good discussion on "Socialism and Trade Unions" at the Manor Arms after the meeting.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 18th we had a "hat night," the topics discussed being all Socialist; speakers were Slater, Duncan, A. Smith, Stewart, and Leatham. In the Unitarian Church on the 20th, Rev. W. L. Walker (Glasgow) delivered a very honest lecture on "Practicable Steps towards the Social Ideal," which, though the lecturer didn't mean it, was quite Socialistic. Leatham put a number of "leading" questions, the audience seeming to find these rather more satisfactory than some of the answers to them. At Castle Street on 23rd, Aiken and Leatham addressed the last regular open-air meeting of the season. Health necessitates that Duncan and Leatham should give up open-air work during the winter and spring months.

GLASGOW.—No meeting held on Cathedral Square on Tuesday evening. On Thursday evening, J. P. Gilmour, a local Secularist, gave a lecture to the Govan Liberal and Radical Association on "Socialism, a Vision of Sin." Comrades Gilbert, McCulloch, and Joe Burgoyne who were present, ably defended Socialism, and quite neutralised the effect of the lecturer's extravagant diatribes. No meetings were held on Sunday owing to the very stormy weather. A number of our comrades were present in the evening in Maxwell parish church, where comrade Rev. John Glasse (of Edinburgh) delivered a thoroughly outspoken and effective Socialist discourse. The church was crammed although the evening was wet, and so deeply were the hearers affected by the eloquence and earnestness of the preacher that they several times applauded.

LEICESTER.—Friday, the 22nd, Barclay addressed about 250 workmen at the Barrow-on-Soar Liberal Club, on "The Meaning of Socialism." The address was repeated at the Irish National Club, Silver Street, on Sunday night. Sunday morning we occupied the Square again; and Mrs. Schack (of London) gave two earnest addresses at the Radical Club. In the morning she addressed a good meeting on "Radicalism and Socialism"; in the evening the club was full, and a great many women present to hear Mrs. Schack on "Why Should not Women Join the Workman's Movement?" The women were very attentive, and evidently much interested. Monday 25th, at our society, Miss C. Warner read a paper on "The Position of Women"; discussion followed; collected 14s. 8d., and 2½ quires of Commonweal sold.

MANCHESTER.—In Stevenson Square on Sunday afternoon we held a meeting—the audience very large and enthusiastic; Raymond Unwin (from Chesterfield), Barton, and Bailie were the speakers; 40 Commonweal sold. Cur hall was well filled at night to hear a lecture on "The Wane of Civilisation" by Raymond Unwin; some discussion followed; 5s. 9d. collected for local propaganda.

NORWICH.—On Tuesday last the Branch passed a vote of condolence with Mrs. Parsons on the loss of her daughter, and also with the relatives of our other murdered comrades. On Sunday afternoon open-air meeting held in the Market Place, comrades Swash and Moore addressing the audience. In the evening, at the Gordon Hall, a meeting was held; a general discussion took place, one of the questions raised being, Is force necessary? Comrades A. Moore, Poynts, and others took part.

YARMOUTH.—On Tuesday, after our business meeting, comrade Brightwell opened a discussion on the "Principles of Socialism," supported by Edwards, Headley, and Harvey. On Sunday we were unable to hold out-door meetings, owing to bad weather. In the afternoon, at comrade Headley's, a well-attended meeting was held to consider the resignation of our late secretary, C. Reynolds. 11 Commonweal sold.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, November 23, J. O'Donovan lectured on "Land Nationalisation." An interesting discussion followed—the Single-Tax theory receiving rather rough handling—King, Shields, Wilson, Fitzpatrick, and others speaking.

EDINBURGH (SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION)—At a meeting held in the Moulders' Hall, comrade Howie delivered a rattling lecture on "Socialism and Evolution" to a large and appreciative audience. Several new members added to the roll.—W. D. T.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—At the School Board election on Thursday Peacock (Socialist) received 14,176 votes and Proctor (Socialist) 10,276. Neither was elected, but while we lose a seat, we have increased the Socialist vote by 2,000 since 1886. On Sunday, good open-air meetings were held morning and evening; Peacock, Proctor, and Rooke spoke; 9s. collected for election fund.

NOTICE.—Subscribers, Branches, and Members whose orders are not promptly executed, or who have not received receipts for sums paid, are asked to excuse delays, which are unavoidable while transference of business is taking place.

NOTES ON NEWS.

CLOTHES again! This time it is an advertisement in a pushing draper's catalogue of "Charity clothes, as supplied to her Majesty." At first sight this appears to emanate from a "boiling-over" Radical Republican, annoyed by the fact that he and his like are paying rather heavily for the pension of royalty which has ceased to earn its money but not ceased to draw it: for surely all "her Majesty's" outfit is "charity." The other interpretation is that the advertiser supposes that the Queen follows the fashion of which an example was mentioned last week of kindly considering the position of the "poor" by taking care not to give them clothes which would compromise them and cause them to be mistaken for persons above them. Is not this over-anxiety? The poor wear a livery of their own not easy to mistake.

Well, well, the poor go on with the strain of luck mentioned in our issue of last week! Here are people again who want to teach them how to cook. If once they learn that, they will so far be ahead of their fellow-countrymen or women. Perhaps the next thing after teaching them how to cook will be to allow them to get hold of something which can be cooked—and eaten.

Lord Salisbury's Nottingham manifesto will be a disappointment to those opportunist semi (or demi-semi) Socialists who look upon the Tories as possible allies in the enterprise for the total abolition of Toryism. His admissions came to no more than this, that the Irish Question had been played out in its function of football to the two "great" parties who are playing the game of political jobbery, and that some other football must be found. For the rest, his speech on "Social Questions" was the usual string of platitudes, contradictions, and falsities which make up the big lie political.

So remarkably stupid it was, that one is tempted at first sight to think that the Marquis was restraining his wisdom and knowledge for the sake of talking down to the comprehension of his Tory audience; but a moment's reflection shows one that whatever intelligence the man once possessed has long ago been drowned in the muddy sea of political dishonesty: he was no whit better than his audience.

For after all, what was the real meaning of his stale sham-economics? It is very simple, and should read thus: "My friends, we are living in ticklish times, in which Socialism (about which we know nothing) is advancing on us rapidly. Some of our party are in favour of recognising the fact and tossing some considerable tub to the whale; I don't see my way to that, for we have no tub to toss that we don't want ourselves; so I am in favour of ignoring the advance of Socialism altogether. So you had better go about and say that the working-man will be no better off for having less work and more pay, and that since the land of England is only half cultivated he had better emigrate at once to countries which produce less wealth at the expense of more labour. And look here! you had better say, also, that the question as to whether the workman is to have more than a bare subsistence (i.e., starvation) wage is a matter of "philanthropy."

Thus much Lord Salisbury, who, it must be said, makes a very halting advance towards the progressive side. But the other party, will they come any further? That seems more than doubtful. The Whig Rag, for instance, in commenting on the marquis's speech, while attacking his political views, is highly satisfied with his social and (save the mark!) economical utterances. The workers had better not trouble themselves in the least as to what such worn-out nullities as Salisbury and Gladstone may say, but look to it not to wait to have things given them, but take them for themselves. The gifts will mean nothing; they will be like the fairy gold in the old tale which turns into dry leaves in the morning light.

W. M.

The Daily News, not to be outdone by the advertising draper, of whom comrade Morris speaks, had on Saturday an article dealing with working-class cookery, and scolding workman's wives for their wastefulness. Now, it is not only true that English working-women are wasteful cooks, but that all English women are so—those of the lower middle-class more especially so. Also it is true that a large part of the food not literally thrown away, is virtually so by not being utilised to its full extent, either in the quantity or quality of the sustenance and pleasure got out of it. In either instance this is the result of ignorance, which in the case of the working-woman is complicated by lack of means and leisure.

But, supposing that she could cook like a French woman, or even pinch and scrape like a Chinese, other things remaining as they are, is it conceivable that she could thereby materially improve the position of herself and her family? Not at all. To bare subsistence tends wages always while wage-slavery lasts. Every advantage conferred on the working-classes by education is wrung from them again by the pressure of the labour-market. Teach everybody (not women only!) how to cook, by all means; teach everybody everything that will add to their comfort and happiness. But to teach "cheap cookery" to the "working-classes" is, like the giving them charity-blankets that no one else would use, a sham and a fraud so miserable, so degrading, that only the case-hardened conscience of the ordinary "benevolent" humbug could possibly endure it.

If the Chronicle-Telegraph of Pittsburgh may be believed, Herr Krupp is going to move his factory of murder-machines from Essen to some place in Western Pennsylvania. His agent, who has been over to view the ground, gave several reasons for the proposed change. "The first is the fact that Europe may at any moment become the scene of a great war. Of course, in such case, Krupp would have to stand by his fatherland, and from patriotic considerations he would manufacture guns for Germany alone. Now, as all the world knows, Krupp makes more guns than any other firm in the world. If, therefore, our plant were established in a neutral country, we could furnish our guns to any Power." The italics are ours. Modern commercial patriotism is a great thing!

My protest will reach very few Knights of Labour, and would have little effect if it did; but I make it all the same. It is against the alteration proposed to be made in the title of the official organ of the Knights of Labour. If any change is needed, which seems doubtful, The Journal of United Labour need only drop the first three words, and keep on as United Labour, which has been its familiar name these years past.

THE MEN OF THE REVOLUTION.

II.

DANTON AND MARAT.

WE have glanced at the rebels of the Assembly, now let us see the rebels of the street. Both in their way are better men than either of the heroes of Parliament House. Danton, it is true, is another Mirabeau, curiously like him in feature, power, and eloquence, yet without those vices which perhaps after all belonged to Mirabeau's class rather than the man. Still he has been accused of one vice, which also belonged to Mirabeau, and that is corruption. An accusation generally believed in in the time of the revolution, and which really brought Danton's head beneath the guillotine, but the truth of which modern research has rendered doubtful. A revolutionist should not only be honest, but his honesty, like that of Cæsar's wife, should be above suspicion. Danton was born at Arcis-sur-Aube, a small country town a hundred miles from Paris. Very little indeed is known of his earlier life; his parents were comfortable middle-class people. He passed through the usual round of school and college, where he studied for the law. In 1780 he started for Paris, and entered the office of a notary as a pupil. Nothing very remarkable occurred in his career up till 1787. He became an advocate, and on March 29, 1787, two years before the revolution, he buys—as was customary at the time when all profitable posts at the disposal of the government were bought and sold—the post of advocate to the Paris Parliament and the Council of State, two of the chief law courts of the time. In June of the same year he married Mademoiselle Charpentin, the daughter of a superintendent of taxes, a rather funny family for a revolutionist to marry into; but probably at that time Danton was unconscious of the coming storm, then gathering thick and fast, as most people in France. The storm burst, as we know, and a very few weeks after the fall of the Bastille we find Danton president of the Cordeliers district, one of the most revolutionary parts of Paris. In the time of the revolution the people were accustomed to assemble in a hall in this district to discuss their own affairs and current politics generally, and Danton became the chief of one of these assemblages. The Cordeliers afterwards became a club of the most advanced revolutionists, and were always foremost in their battles against the tyranny of the middle-class rulers who succeeded the feudal despots of the past.

Whether Danton took the money of the Court or not matters little. One thing is quite certain, if he did take the money he did not do the work. The truth or untruth of the accusation is one which certain historians will fight over to the end of time. But it is impossible not to like Danton; his good nature, his kindness, the grandeur of his heroism, when with foreign hosts pouring upon Paris with hardly an obstacle in their path, he yet faced them with heroic words that rang through France. Words that were deeds, that struck down domestic treason and hurled torrents of heroism upon the advancing foe. "Citizens, it is not an alarm gun that you hear, it is the pas de charge against your enemies. To conquer them what do we need? To dare, and again to dare, and without end to dare!" And again, when France was in peril and the Convention was distracted by miserable personalities, it was Danton's lion voice that uttered the words, "Shall we not in such a crisis of fate lay aside personal quarrels? Reputation! Oh, what is the reputation of this man or that? Let my name be blighted but let France be free!" It was this, the power of sinking himself and his personal likes and dislikes for the common good, together with his wonderful power of raising storms of enthusiasm, that overwhelmed the advancing hosts of tyranny, that gives Danton the claim to a place as a great leader in a Revolution that still shakes the world.

Jean Paul Marat is more unfortunate than either Robespierre or Danton at the hands of middle-class historians. They are kind enough to allow both these revolutionists some virtues, but Marat, according to them, had none. A murky demon, born of the slime and the mud of Paris cellars, a being so horrible that he only walked by night and dared not show himself by day, a ghoul that shrieked continually for human blood, his favourite meat and drink. This is the sort of impression of Marat the ordinary reader obtains from most people who endeavour to write French revolutionary history; but as these persons generally get their information from Royalist historians, who insist that the whole revolution was a plot got up by the gold of the Duke of Orleans to place him on the throne, these impressions as to the characters of those who were foremost in the revolution are not very valuable. But when it comes to historians like Carlyle, who talks of his "dingy squalor" and calls him an "obscure spectrum," etc., the matter is more serious. But then Carlyle was a mere hero-worshipper; given a large amount of intellectual ability, and a man might be an enormous scoundrel and receive every laudation from Carlyle; but let a man not have more than average power of mind, and yet play a prominent part in the world's history by sheer force of his honesty, unselfishness, and courage, and Thomas Carlyle was down upon him at once. Marat, it is true, had some hand in sending a few thousand traitorous aristocrats to eternal night. Infamous! Carlyle's two favourite heroes, Cromwell and Frederick the Great, slaughtered myriads of the common people. Glorious! But these were great men, and that makes a great difference. It is true Marat approved of the slaughter of these aristocrats, because he, perhaps erroneously, thought he was preserving the liberty of the people from its worst foes. Cromwell and Frederick the Great slaughtered immense multitudes for their own honour and glory. Marat is a criminal; the others are glorious heroes. Such is the logic of the greatest historian that the century has yet produced.

Let us, unlike the great denouncer of "slams," clear our minds of cant, and be as fair to Marat as Carlyle was to Cromwell or the great Fritz. One thing is quite certain, if Cromwell's slaughter of the disarmed Irish at Drogheda was necessary, right, and just, as Carlyle argues it was, then also the slaughter of the "ferocious conspirators" in the prisons of Paris at a time of intense national peril was even more justifiable. If the September Massacres were crimes, then the Drogheda Massacre of a people struggling to be free was ten times more infamous. Unlike Carlyle, we do not consider that genius justifies a man in committing every crime in the calendar without a word of disapprobation. Terrorism is a favourite weapon with the ruling classes, and for one tyrant slain by the people the men of order have slain thousands of the poor to perpetuate their tyranny. This is a mistake. Let the motto of revolutionists in future be "The villainy they teach us we will execute," and it shall go hard if we do not better the instruction.

But now let us tell the plain story of the life of Marat down to the time of which I am now writing, and we shall then see that the "monster" that is held up to public execration was gentle and humane in all his habits, with a heart keen to feel the insults, the sufferings and injustice heaped daily upon the multitude by their enemies and false friends, while he possessed at the same time a hatred as strong as his love of those for whom he died for all forms of tyranny, injustice, and oppression, that made life bitter to the suffering poor.

Jean Paul Marat was born at Bowdry, then in the Prussian principality, now the Swiss Canton of Neuchâtel. His father was a medical man, a Sardinian; his mother a Swiss. From her he derived his keen hatred of injustice. She was a good, kind-hearted woman, and though but poor herself, she visited those who were sick and in trouble and helped them with her scanty means. Her boy went with her; and doubtless often mused as he went upon the scenes of suffering he witnessed, and wondered why this misery should exist in a world so full of wealth and beauty. He had plenty of time for thought, for throughout his childhood he was of a studious and quiet disposition, holding aloof from the noisy sports and the games of his schoolmates. His quiet disposition even in those days of brutal school discipline saved him from the punishment that often fell upon others. Once, however, being chastised unjustly, he brooded over the injustice, and cast himself in desperation from the window of his home, and received in his fall a cut on the forehead, the scar of which he bore to his dying day.

He left home at an early age, as his parents' means were scanty, and wandered through half Europe. Ten years of his life were spent in England. During this period he lived mainly by practising his profession—for he was, like his father, a doctor—teaching languages, and writing upon scientific and other subjects. Even then he was a very advanced revolutionist, as may be judged from a work published by him in London in 1774, entitled 'The Chains of Slavery.' While in London he gained considerable repute in his profession for his skill in treating diseases of the eye. Returning to Paris, he became physician to the bodyguard of the Comte d'Artois, the brother of the king, whose employment he left in 1787, as the revolutionary storm was gathering. Soon after this he plunged as pamphleteer into the political troubles of the time. His first brochure, 'Offrande à la Patrie'—'An Offering to the Fatherland'—attacking the ministers of the time, attracted considerable public attention. Great events often lift men from semi-obscurity into the full glare of publicity. This was the case with Marat on the occasion of the fall of the Bastille. A troop of cavalry endeavoured to creep into Paris, but were stopped by people headed by Marat. The captain protested that they had come to join the people. "Alight, and give up your arms, then," answered Marat; and the captain complies, for the crowd surges round in overwhelming waves. But the people were to hear more of Marat, whose promptitude and decision in acting were thus proved for the first time. On the 8th September, 1789, his famous paper came into being, and soon L'Ami du Peuple (The Friend of the People) was known throughout Europe as the dreaded foe of tyrants and the friend of the oppressed. Probably it was the first journal in which every one suffering wrong and oppression, no matter how humble, poor and despised, could make their voices heard. Let those who dub Marat "a bloodthirsty monster" remember that. Perhaps we should never have had a Star or a T. P. O'Connor if the man who is now anathematised by every friend of tyranny had not lived and written. But scant payment awaited the journalist in those days who dared to speak of those who were in trouble and distress, because the rich were cruel and merciless. Marat had no enormous circulation. It was often hard for him in his poverty to pay for the printing of his paper. Besides, the well-fed patriots Lafayette and Bailly, who lorded it at the Hotel de Ville, did not like the plain speaking of the People's Friend. Within the first month of its appearance the editor was twice summoned before the Municipal Council to explain the "violence" of his articles. On one of these occasions the secretary of the Council was good enough to say that he believed Marat wielded the pen of a good patriot; the people's friend roughly responded that he could not return the compliment, for these reasons. "For, while I for nine months have been living on bread and water to pay the expenses of printing and serve my country with my pen, you have the skill, like Mr. Mayor and several of your colleagues, to show yourselves good patriots and keep at the same time your places and your pensions. I know who you will be able to deceive, but it is certain it will not be those wise men who know the world. . . . All those men you call friends of the people were their worst enemies before the 14th of July. I cannot believe that a moment is enough to change them." Such rough truths were not appreciated by these sham patriots, whose patriotism consisted alone of love of place and power, and he was persecuted, hunted like a wild beast, and forced to seek shelter from his foes in the cellars and dens of Paris. But he never faltered; despite every persecution, his paper grew bolder in its denunciation, and every persecution only redoubled the love the people bore him, and the obscure journalist became a tenfold power.

To show how great was his popularity, it is only necessary to cite the testimony of a royalist writer, who states that on one occasion, when Lafayette wanted to arrest Marat, he required for the expedition some six thousand National Guards, with cavalry and artillery, and even then his intended victim escaped him.

The best testimony to Marat's integrity is the fact that when he fell beneath the dagger of the assassin he had only a few pence in his possession; and yet this man had had power that might have made him rich. But Marat, savage, ferocious, squalid, as reactionary writers may call him, was at least too honest to sell himself for gold. Both he and Robespierre, though they might have become wealthy if they had chosen, died in poverty. This is a testimony to their sincerity that not even their worst foes can deny them.

D. J. NICOLL.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

ABOUT District Attorney Fellows, the public prosecutor of the City of New York, the pettifogger who has constantly persecuted and prosecuted comrade John Most, even the capitalist Herald is now compelled to write:

"There seems to be no doubt that almost every person in the District Attorney's office follows the course of his chief, and gives up to vote-gathering and political blatherskiting the time which belongs to the people. Meanwhile, prisoners languish in their cells, and the orderly progress of justice is obstructed. . . . Colonel Fellows is shameless. He has been censured to a degree that would make any self-respecting man reform or give up his office. But he cares nothing for public opinion nor for his own reputation. He will neither do his duty nor resign. His . . . office is to-day a standing incentive to crime, provided the criminal has political friends. It is a reproach to the city."

From January 1st to November 1st, 1889, 277,538 persons have immigrated into the United States against 350,613 of the same period in the year previous.

Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labour, was asked to run as State Senator in the interest of the democratic party of New York, but on advice of the Central Labour Federation of that city he declined that nomination.

The farmers of the Mississippi and Missouri valleys met some days ago and formed an organisation. In his opening speech the chairman of the convention outlined the objects of the meeting:

"We are not here for the purpose of denouncing trusts and 'combines,' but to meet the issue of new systems and conditions in trade. Realising our individual feebleness, and the great importance of unity of action as a class, we have been called together to consider the proposition to delegate to a power of our own creation the exclusive right to market the products of our farms, and to take such measures as will afford present relief and future protection to the agricultural interests of the Mississippi valley. It is proposed to substitute a new system by which the price of farm products shall be fixed at the cost of production 'on lands that produce only thirty-fold,' whatever that may be, and the power to do this is to be found in the centralised agency of the federated farmers of the Mississippi valley, a company legally chartered with a capital stock of 20,000,000 dols."

The City of Boston has resolved officially to recognise the American Federation of Labour, which will hold a convention in that city on the 10th of December by tendering a public banquet to the delegates.

In Pittsburgh recently, six master horse-shoers applied for a charter for a union, but Judge Ewing of that city refused the grant, giving the following reasons:

"The object of the proposed corporation, as set forth in the application, is for the purpose, first, of encouraging and protecting the trade of horse-shoers in the cities of Pittsburgh and Allegheny; second, for preserving and disseminating valuable business information; and third, adjusting as far as practicable, controversies and misunderstandings arising among the members as to methods and prices of work. The first two purposes are laudable and certainly not illegal, though how a charter of incorporation will aid the association in carrying out its purposes is difficult to see. The third purpose avowed is that of interfering with the natural laws of trade and usurping the functions of government. It is contrary to a sound public policy, and, if not so intended, may readily be used to shield the members, behind the form of a corporation, from the consequences of illegal acts and combinations. For this we refuse to approve the proposed charter."

This argument logically applied all round would destroy the basis of all the labour combinations. So according to this sage of the bench, voluntary combination is wrong, whereas enforced co-operation of some kind as represented by the State he holds to be correct. Queer people in this world, to be sure!

The Sailor's and Firemen's Union of New York met a few days ago to perfect their organisation, which is an offshoot of the English one, and has adopted its statement of principles and objects practically in a lump. It was stated that the parent organisation would give 10,000 dols. for the establishment of a home in this city if necessary. The dues of the new union will be 1 dol. per month. The sailors are very enthusiastic over the new organisation. Organisations will soon be formed in Brooklyn, Jersey City, and Hoboken, and in time the whole coast will be organised, and then an immense international organisation will be formed.

There is trouble brewing for the Standard Oil Trust. The Oil Producers' Association resolved that they would lay a pipe-line themselves to the seaboard, and become a direct competitor of the Standard. They made arrangements for the engagement 6,000,000 dollars for this purpose, and for an additional 6,000,000 dollars to build new refineries on the Atlantic seaboard. This money has all been guaranteed by prominent capitalists of New York, Pittsburgh, and Philadelphia. The Standard Oil Trust has three pipe-lines to the seaboard, reaching New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. Where the terminus of the opposition line will be has not yet been determined. On the whole, the Producers' Association holds the key of the situation. If they can complete their proposed pipe-lines and refineries, the Standard Trust will have to take a back seat. The Producers have raised the money, but the Standard Trust have yet to be heard from on the subject. It is said that the directors of the gigantic Pennsylvania Railroad system are engineering this new move.

The Supreme Court of New York confirmed the decision of Judge Barrett rendered by him about a year ago, that the Sugar Trust is an illegal combination. In consequence of this decision, Sugar Trust shares rose the next day on the Exchange about 4 per cent. Three cheers for the power of the law against monopoly!

The managers of the Cottonseed Oil Trust have speculated with the funds of the trust and lost about half a million. Some silly persons now say that this experience points to a speedy downfall of trusts in general. Bad management of some co-operative organisation does not prove that the principle of combination is incorrect. The principle of trusts—viz., combination—apart from the idea of combining for the purpose of exploitation and fleecing, is correct, but the legal privileges which they have are damnably wrong.

The convention of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers has met. Chief Arthur has been re-elected as president of the organisation by 313 votes against 101 votes given to George Vroman. The Convention disapproved of the idea of amalgamate with other labour organisations.

The Convention of the Knights of Labour organisation has met to-day at Atlanta, Ga.

In most of the leading cities in the northern States meetings have been held to commemorate the workers' Good Friday, the 11th of November. Herein Boston we tried to get up a big demonstration, to be addressed by

Most, Shevitsch, and Pentecost, but we could not get one of the 'big halls,' as the proprietors refused to us the use of them, saying "they drew the line at murder." In consequence we had to content ourselves with a smaller hall, the Paine Memorial Hall. However, twice as many people as last year attended the meeting this year. The hall was nicely decorated, and good speeches were delivered by A. H. Simpson, Victor Yarros, and others. In New York, Shevitsch and John Most made eloquent addresses. In that city the big hall in Cooper Union was engaged, holding about 5,000 people; but as the policemen on duty said, 2,000 people had to be turned away. "Our silence will be more eloquent than our speech." Waldheim Cemetery was visited by a large mass of people. Speeches were made by G. C. Clemens of Topeka and others. Mrs. Parsons had the following experience, as described by one of the sneaks of the press:

"Mrs. Parsons, in defiance of the police prohibition of red flags, hung one from the window of her residence on Milwaukee Avenue early in the day. A policeman was sent to her house to notify her to take down the Anarchical emblem. 'This is a free country,' said Mrs. Parsons; 'why can't I wave the flag of my doctrine?' 'Because my orders are to pull it down,' said the policeman; and without further parley he tore down the flag and took it to the station. Mrs. Parsons fumed for awhile, and then left for Waldheim."

It will be a cold day when we settle accounts with the authorities, the press, and the pulpit cannibals.

America is the land of the free and the home of the brave. To get a fine illustration of this boast it is only necessary to read the following telegram to the N. Y. Herald:

"PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 11, 1889.—The Anarchists outwitted the police to-night, and their celebration of the anniversary of the Chicago Haymarket tragedy came off with great éclat. The police were in total ignorance of their place of meeting, and therefore the shouters and their audience were not molested. Not since the memorable riots of 1877 had the police made such extensive preparations to preserve the peace. . . . 'The Anarchists must not meet,' said the director. . . . It was decided to place six hundred policemen at the disposal of the superintendent. Of this number five hundred were to be held in readiness to be called at two minutes' notice. The rest were assigned to preserve order. The greatest precaution was taken to prevent any attempt to force an entrance into Odd Fellows' Hall. . . . The news that the police were to prevent the meeting had spread, and at eight o'clock fully five thousand people had gathered about Odd Fellows' Hall, expecting to see a fight. A great procession of Anarchists and others arrived a little before eight o'clock, and being informed by the police that the meeting was prohibited, they quietly dispersed, but only to gather quickly at No. 868 Marshall Street, where a crowded meeting in glorification of the Chicago 'martyrs' was held."

For two years the authorities believed indeed they had crushed radical thought, and in consequence the press treated us rather fairly. They now find how mistaken they were, and that radical thought has developed, in spite of misrepresentation and calumny, wonderfully, and has gained tremendous support all over the country. People everywhere begin to understand the crime committed on Chicago's Golgotha. And in consequence the raving and abuse of the press has begun again. Well, I guess we can also weather this change of tactics.

Boston, Mass., Nov 12, 1889.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

AMERICAN CATHOLICS ON THE LABOUR QUESTION.

A CONVENTION of the laymen of the Catholic Church in the United States has just come off in Baltimore, Ind. This Convention was an illustration of the article in a recent Weal on "Democracy and the Church." The Church may be able to dish sentimental State Socialism, but real Socialism need fear nothing, being based as it is on reason, science, and materialism. A paper on "Capital and Labour" was read to the delegates by William Richards, of Washington. Here is a condensed report of what he said:

"He announced its purpose as being, to contrast the social condition of the time when the mission of charity was acknowledged and accepted by all, and the present, when free competition has been substituted for charity. The speaker unhesitatingly asserted that notwithstanding sophistical collocation of facts and figures that the comparatively few rich are getting richer, the multitudinous poor are getting more numerous and poorer, and that pauperism is more general, more wretched, and more rapidly increasing than in any prior age of the world. Thank God, however, there is to-day hope for a betterment of our condition. It is in the tendency to recombine the isolated particles into a consolidated union, co-operating harmoniously once more on the primordial principle of the brotherhood of man, as for example in the powerful organisation of the Knights of Labour. But such voluntary associations are only partially remedies. Only the Catholic Church, the speaker declared, can solve the problems that are perplexing the souls of men. He asked: 'Have you forgotten the vast crowds of enthusiastic men and women who not long ago imagined that the hoped for messenger had appeared in Henry George or Dr. McGlynn? But there are leaders. Thank God the judicious, earnest, and sympathetic efforts of Cardinal Gibbons at Rome in behalf of the Knights of Labour and the cause of freedom in our glorious country, and the magnificent triumph of Cardinal Manning in his recent grand work of reconciling the rich and haughty employers and the poor labourers in London, have lifted up the hearts and the hopes of the waiting and despairing millions.'"

The lecture was much applauded by the delegates. The following resolution was adopted almost unanimously:

"Another danger which menaces our Republic is the constant conflict between capital and labour. We, therefore, at all times must view with feelings of regret and alarm any antagonism existing between them, because thereby society itself is imperilled. With the Church we condemn Nihilism, Socialism, and Communism, and we equally condemn the heartless greed of capital. The remedy must be sought in the mediation of the Church through her action on the individual conscience, and thereby on society, teaching each its respective duty, as well as rights, and in such civil enactments as have been rendered necessary by these altered conditions. We disapprove of the employment of very young minors, whether male or female, in factories, as tending to dwarf and retard the true development of the wage-earners of the future. We respectfully protest against any change in the policy of the government in the matter of the education of the Indians by which they will be deprived of Christian teaching. The amelioration and promotion of the physical and moral culture of the negro race is a subject of the utmost concern, and we pledge ourselves to assist our clergy in all ways tending to effect any improvement in their condition."

The resolution was prepared by Cardinal Gibbons.

MONOPOLY.

I WANT you to consider the position of the working-classes generally at the present day: not to dwell on the progress that they may (or may not) have made within the last five hundred or the last fifty years, but to consider what their position is relatively to the other classes of which our society is composed: and in doing so I wish to guard against any exaggeration as to the advantages of the position of the upper and middle-classes on one side and the disadvantages of the working-classes on the other side; for in truth there is no need for exaggeration; the contrast between the two positions is sufficiently startling when all admissions have been made that can be made. After all, one ought not to go further than the simple statement of these few words: The workers are in an inferior position to that of the non-workers.

When we come to consider that everyone nowadays admits that labour is the source of wealth—or, to put it in another way, that it is a law of nature for man generally that he must labour in order to live—we must all of us come to the conclusion that this fact, that the workers' standard of livelihood is lower than that of the non-workers, is a startling fact. But startling as it is, it may perhaps help out the imaginations of some of us—at all events of the well-to-do, if I dwell a little on the details of this disgrace, and say plainly what it means.

To begin, then, with the foundation; the workers eat inferior food and are clad in inferior clothes to those of the non-workers. This is true of the whole class: but a great portion of it are so ill-fed that they not only live on coarser or nastier victuals than the non-producers, but have not enough even of these to keep up their vitality duly; so that they suffer from the diseases and the early death which come of semi-starvation: or why say semi-starvation? let us say plainly most of the workers are starved to death. As to their clothes, they are so ill clad that the dirt and foulness of their clothes forms an integral part of their substance, and is useful in making them a defence against the weather; according to the ancient proverb, "Dirt and grease are the poor man's apparel."

Again, the housing of the workers is proportionately far worse, as far as the better-off of them go, than their food or clothing. The best of their houses or apartments are not fit for human beings to live in, so crowded as they are: they would not be, even if one could step out of their doors into gardens or pleasant country or handsome squares; but when one thinks of the wretched sordidness and closeness of the streets and alleys that they actually do form, one is almost forced to try to blunt one's sense of fitness and propriety, so miserable they are. As to the lodgings of the worse-off of our town workers, I must confess that I only know of them by rumour, and that I dare not face them personally; though I think my imagination will carry me a good way in picturing them to me. One thing, again, has always struck me much in passing through poor quarters of the town, and that is the noise and unrest of them, so confusing to all one's ideas and thoughts, and such a contrast to the dignified calm of the quarters of those who can afford such blessings.

Well! food, clothes, and housing—those are the three important items in the material condition of men, and I say flatly that the contrast between those of the non-producers and those of the producers is horrible, and that the word is no exaggeration. But is there a contrast in nothing else—education, now? Some of us are in the habit of boasting about our elementary education: perhaps it is good as far as it goes (and perhaps it isn't), but why doesn't it go further? In ordinary parlance, elementary is contrasted with liberal education. You know in the class to which I belong, the professional or parasitical class, if a man cannot make some pretence to read a Latin book, and doesn't know a little French or German, he is very apt to keep it dark as something to be ashamed of, unless he has some real turn towards mathematics or the physical sciences to cover his historical or classical ignorance; whereas if a working-man were to know a little Latin and a little French, he would be looked on as a very superior person, a kind of genius—which, considering the difficulties which surround him, he would be: inferiority again, you see, clear and plain.

But after all, it is not such scraps of ill-digested knowledge as this that give us the real test of the contrast; this lies rather in the taste for reading and the habit of it, and the capacity for the enjoyment of refined thought and the expression of it, which the more expensive class really has (in spite of the disgraceful sloppiness of its education), and which unhappily the working or unexpensive class lacks. The immediate reason for that lack I know well enough, and that forms another item of contrast: it is the combined leisure and elbow-room which the expensive class considers its birthright, and without which, education, as I have often had to say, is a mere mockery; and which leisure and elbow-room the working class lacks, and even "social reformers" expect him to be contented with that lack. Of course you understand that in speaking of this item I am thinking of the well-to-do artizan, and not the squalid, hustled-about, misery-blinded and hopeless wretch of the fringe of labour—i.e., the greater part of labour.

Just consider the contrast in the mere matter of holidays, for instance. If a professional man (like myself, for instance) does a little more than his due daily grind—dear me, the fuss his friends make of him! how they are always urging him not to overdo it, and to consider his precious health, and the necessity of rest and so forth! and you know the very same persons, if they found some artizan in their employment looking towards a holiday, how sourly they would treat his longings for rest, how they would call him (perhaps not to his face) sot and sluggard and the like; and if he has it, he has got to take it against both his purse and his conscience; whereas in the professional class the yearly holiday is part of the payment for services. Once more, look at the different standard for the worker and the non-worker!

What can I say about popular amusements that would not so offend you that you would refuse to listen to me? Well, I must say something at any cost—viz., that few things sadden me so much as the amusements which are thought good enough for the workers; such a miserable killing—yea, murder—of the little scraps of their scanty leisure time as they are. Though, indeed, if you say that there is not so much contrast here between the workers' public amusements and those provided for the middle classes, I must admit it, with this explanation, that owing to the nature of the case, the necessarily social or co-operative method of the getting up and acceptance of such amusements, the lower standard has pulled down the whole of our public amusements; has made, for instance, our theatrical entertainments the very lowest expression of the art of acting which the world has yet seen.

Or again, a cognate subject, the condition of the English language at present. How often I have it said to me, You must not write in a literary style if you wish the working classes to understand you.

Now at first sight that seems as if the worker were in rather the better position in this matter; because the English of our drawing-rooms and leading articles is a wretched mongrel jargon that can scarcely be called English, or indeed language; and one would have expected, a priori, that what the workers needed from a man speaking to them was plain English: but alas! 'tis just the contrary; I am told on all hands that my language is too simple to be understood by working-men, that if I wish them to understand me I must use an inferior quality of the newspaper jargon, the language (so called) of critics and "superior persons"; and I am almost driven to believe this when I notice the kind of English used by candidates at election time, and by political men generally—though of course this is complicated by the fact that these gentlemen by no means want to make the meaning of their words too clear.

Well, I want to keep as sternly as possible to the point that I started from—viz., that there is a contrast between the position of the working classes and that of the easily-living classes, and that the former were in an inferior position in all ways. And here at least we find the so-called friends of the working classes telling us that the producers are in such a miserable condition that if they are to understand our agitation we must talk down to their slavish condition, not straightforwardly to them as friends and neighbours—as men, in short. Such advice I neither can nor will take; but that this should be thought necessary shows that, in spite of all hypocrisy, the master-class know well enough that those whom they "employ" are their slaves.

To be short, then, the working-classes are, relatively to the upper and middle-classes, in a degraded condition, and if their condition could be much raised from what it is now, even if their wages were doubled and their work-time halved, they would still be in a degraded condition, as long as they were in a position of inferiority to another class—as long as they were dependent on them—unless it turned out to be a law of nature that the making of useful things necessarily brought with it such inferiority!

Now, once again, I ask you very seriously to consider what that means, and you will, after consideration, see clearly that it must have to do with the way in which industry is organised amongst us, and the brute force which supports that organisation. It is clearly no matter of race; the highest noble in the land is of the same blood for all he can tell as the clerk in his estate office, or his gardener's boy. The grandson or even the son of the self-made man may be just as refined, and also quite as unenergetic and stupid as the man with twenty generations of titled fools at his back. Neither will it do to say, as some do, that it is a matter of individual talent or energy. He who says this, practically asserts that the whole of the working-classes are composed of men who individually do not rise above a lowish average, and that all of the middle-class men rise above it; and I don't think any one will be found who will support such a proposition, who is himself not manifestly below even that lowish average. No! you will, when you think of this contrast between the position of the producing and the non-producing classes, be forced to admit first that it is an evil, and secondly that it is caused by artificial regulations; by customs that can be turned into more reasonable paths; by laws of man that can be abolished, leaving us free to work and live as the laws of nature would have us. And when you have come to those two conclusions, you will then have either to accept Socialism as the basis for a new order of things, or to find some better basis than that; but you will not be able to accept the present basis of society unless you are prepared to say that you will not seek a remedy for an evil which you know can be remedied.

Let me put the position once more as clearly as I can, and then let us see what the remedy is.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

J. BRONTERRE O'BRIEN OR HENRY GEORGE.

Sir,—Many years ago a Mr. John Days left London for America (Kansas or California), and took out with him a quantity of the late Mr. Bronterre O'Brien's writings. Now I have been told upon very good authority that George having fell in company with Days, and having read O'Brien's papers, etc., etc., got his initial ideas from this source. Seeing Mr. T. F. Walker's letter in last week's issue of the Commonweal, it might be interesting to some of your readers to know if it were possible to ascertain how far the statement is true, as it might appear there existed a desire in some quarters to blot the memory of a man and a scholar, who suffered much and died poor "for conscience sake." Any light thrown on the above would oblige.—Yours faithfully,
GEORGE E. HARRIS.

The Detroit Evening News said in a recent editorial: "The logic of Democracy is Anarchism, and the logic of Republicanism is State Socialism or Communism."

The Patrick Henry is the title of a new weekly paper published at Springfield, Mo. It is the organ of the Order of Anti-Monopolists, "and of all who strive for justice."

The first number of the Eight Hour Herald was issued November 3, at 824 Howard Street, San Francisco. It is to appear monthly, and will be edited by Myles L. Fasland.

The veteran labour advocate, John Swinton, is still very ill, and has been ordered by the doctor to the Mediterranean for a year. He has probably reached Nice by this-time, as he was to leave New York on the 2nd. Wherever he goes, the good wishes of all Socialists will be with him.

OUT OF THE HOUSE OF BONDAGE.

How say ye, friends, are they in fun
Who boast that slavery's day is done?
Think of the lives ye lead, and say
If slavery yet abides, or nay.

Or think ye then the fates decree
The few to lives of luxury,
The mass to poverty and pain?
Slaves ye are, and shall remain.

Or in another world than this
Hope ye for homes of hazy bliss,
Where earthly loss is heavenly gain?
Slaves ye are, and shall remain.

Or bide ye till your masters yield
Of their free grace the powers they wield?
Shall they bow down to loose your chain?
Slaves ye are, and shall remain.

Or strive ye each for self alone?
Not thus can Mammon be o'erthrown.
Who fights but singly, fights in vain.
Slaves ye are, and shall remain.

Then cast off sloth and slavish fear,
Make heaven a thing of now and here,
Nor wait upon your lords' good-will,
Or, sooth, ye may be waiting still.

But marshal you in order fair,
Wait for the word, then forward bear
The flag that, fluttering in the van,
Claims equal rights for every man.

Lo, at the shout of Liberty,
Yon braggart hirelings break and flee!
Your day doth dawn, their star doth wane;
Free shall ye be, and shall remain.

We are not disputing the theory that emigration from "countries where population is congested" is a cure. Indeed, given a wise selection of the emigrants, we readily admit that the remedy is not only a remedy but a good one. Let the idle rich, the wasteful aristocrats and plutocrats, and the devourers of industry generally be induced to emigrate, and the useful classes—the industrious wealth producers—will be at once relieved. Will great statesmen never learn that it is not the number of competent seamen that endanger the safety of the Ship of State? If there are leaks in the hold the wreck will not be averted by compelling the workers among the crew to walk the plank, but by stopping the leaks and compelling the idlers to man the pumps.—Journal of United Labour.

A correspondent closes his letter thus: "I admire your work and appreciate the work of all others in the same direction, although I am too cowardly at the present time to openly avow myself before the community. But I am gradually growing bolder." How do you manage to look yourself in the face? What do you suppose will become of you if you know the right and do it not? "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" These questions are not asked to rebuke you, because I know that it does require iron courage to do right. But did you ever think how much better it is to thoroughly respect yourself than to have gold or place or power that you would not have if you did not exchange your self-respect for it?—Twentieth Century.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Silvertown Strike.

Better late than never! After the fight has been going on for ten weary weeks, and men, women, and children have suffered the severest privations, the London Trades Council has at last come to their aid. The Council has now issued a circular to the trade-unionists of the metropolis, in which it states that the dispute "has been fully investigated and found to be fully worthy of your prompt and generous pecuniary and moral support. It is of the utmost importance, not only to the workers engaged in this struggle, but also to the whole industrial population of the metropolis, that the contest should be honourably terminated on a basis of mutual justice to all interests involved." Well, we are glad to hear this from the Trades Council, and we can only wish that they had come to this decision a few weeks ago, and not have waited till the unfortunate people are nearly starved and frozen into surrender. The Council has offered to negotiate with Mr. Gray, but the gentleman has haughtily refused. That body is going to give him another chance, and if he refuses, to call out the men at all rubber factories throughout London and provinces. There is now too some hope of bringing the engineers and other trade-unionists out who have been working in the factory since the beginning of the strike. The Silvertown workers have now a good chance of victory.

The strikers are also getting assistance from the middle-class clergy. Last Sunday the Rev. Stopford Brooke preached and made a collection on their behalf. I select from the sermon a description of the shameful slave-driving and sweating which was common at the firm before the strike:

"Mr. Brooke told his hearers that if lads working naked in the hot rooms, at a temperature of 120 degrees, took advantage of the rule allowing them half an hour's wait before they went into the cold rooms, they were discharged at the end of the week without cause assigned. Girls, too, were liable to be kept idle all day when work was not ready for them. They were not paid for the idle day, but if they went home, or even asked to go home, they were turned off. Their time was seized on, but not paid for. A poor widow woman with a large family earned 14s. a-week. One week she put on a desperate spurt and earned 14s. 6d. The manager then docked her 3d. an hour, because he believed she had been under-working. 'They want my life's blood,' said the poor creature piteously. Old hands were threatened with dismissal, and when they begged leave to stay, were told, 'Yes, they could stay, at 3d. less an hour.' The men were used as if they had no bodies, no flesh, no souls—nay, body and soul were burnt up like candles in a flaring wick."

It is to be hoped that this striking picture of the hideous tyranny exercised over their wretched slaves will touch the hearts of the middle-class shareholders, and that they will join their efforts to those of the London Trades Council to bring Mr. Gray to reason.

The Sweated Tailors.

There is still much discontent among the men concerning the way in which the masters are breaking the agreement by which the strike was concluded; a renewal of the conflict seems by no means improbable. The men have another weapon at hand which may exterminate the sweater altogether. A London Tailors' Co-operative Society has been started, which is to commence business at once near Oxford Street. It has been arranged to provide a workshop for five hundred hands, to furnish all necessary machinery and plant, to pay the current wages, and to give the workmen a share in the profits. This is an interesting experiment in productive co-operation which we may hope will put an end to wages disputes by enabling the men to become their own masters, and thus rid themselves of the miserable grinding slavery which has been up till now the curse of their lives.

The Railwaymen at the Docks.

A deputation of railwaymen, consisting of signalmen, shunters, and men of other grades, have been to see the manager, Mr. H. W. Williams, and the superintendent, Mr. Tucker, at the Dock House, for the purpose of demanding the reduction of the hours from twelve to ten a-day. The answer was what might have been expected from these worthy gentlemen. It was practically this, "You can work ten hours if you like, but you will have to do with less wages." This kind of proposition was not acceptable to the men, and the deputation declined to agree to the terms offered.

The "Homes" of the Poor.

Mr. Burleigh's crusade has already had unfortunate consequences. A week or two ago I pointed out that closing insanitary dwellings would only benefit the unhappy tenants by turning them into the street. It has done more, it has lodged one of them in prison. It appears that William Jones, one of Mr. Burleigh's witnesses in the recent police-court cases, did not relish being turned with other tenants into the cold freezing streets last Saturday. He resisted the officers of the law, barricaded the door of his house, and on being evicted endeavoured to resume possession. For this offence he has been sent to prison for twenty-one days. It is to be hoped that William Jones, who might have done good service in a real anti-racket movement, appreciates the improvement of his condition by the help of the policeman's bludgeon and the prison cell. He will be properly housed now at the public expense; but probably he will not consider the change a great improvement. Probably this ignorant and ungrateful person would prefer to have been left in his hovel and not to have been thus provided with "decent" lodgings. It is just as well to warn Mr. Burleigh and his friends that reforms of this kind are rarely popular.

The Miners and Eight Hours.

The miners postponed action upon the eight hours question at their recent conference. It is a pity they show signs of indecision in face of the firm determination of the masters not to grant what they demand. Their present indecision arises from two causes—one section, though a small one, of the miners have been bitten by the legislative mania, and appear to think that Parliament will give them what they have not the courage to take for themselves; while another, the South Wales men, are engaged in negotiating with their masters for an eight hour day under a sliding-scale. But they stated at conference that if these negotiations fall through they will join in a general strike; as for the matter of that, the people who believe in legislation will probably do the same. The decision is therefore put off till the South Wales people are in a position to act. It must be quite evident to every sensible person that as the immense majority of the miners are in favour of obtaining the eight hours day by their own action, that therefore they stand a good chance of winning. Coal is one of the things which keep the present commercial system cannot do without; it is the fuel which keeps the huge machine going. Let the miners cease work for a fortnight and nearly every factory in the country would be stopped, and modern commercialism would totter on the brink of ruin. The miners are not only the backbone of the working class in strength, courage, and intelligence, but they have in their grip the very sources of the life of our corrupted, worn-out society. We are therefore surprised that when these men propose to strike a blow that will bring their masters to their feet, some of them, with a caution worthy of the legal profession of law and order, should recommend that the men prefer the dirty work of rascally politicians to trusting in their own sturdy strength and honest manhood. To me it seems folly to advise men to take a road to an object which will take them years to traverse, instead of going at once straight to the mark. Surely it is far better that the miners should get what they want by taking it at once, than wait years until it shall please knavish politicians to give it to them. It is to be hoped that people who are so fond of legislation will not introduce the same element of indecision when the question comes up again for discussion.

Dublin Bakers.

The Dublin Bakers have settled their dispute with the masters by arbitration. The arbitrators have awarded them an increase of 4s. They demanded 6s.

Dockers' Strike at Bristol.

The Bristol dockers last week revolted again. The men demanded that foreign crews should not unload the timber ships, and that the outdoor foremen and sub-foremen of the timber merchants should join the dockers' union. The usual spectacle is presented of merchants, clerks, and foremen doing some honest work for once in their lives by unloading perishable cargoes. The Mayor offered his services as a mediator, and the strike has now been settled by a compromise.

Threatened Strike of Scotch Railwaymen.

On Saturday, Nov. 30th, mass meetings of railway servants were held throughout Scotland for the purpose of hearing the replies given by the railway companies to the demands of the men for a ten hour day. Some of the companies sent no replies at all, others merely acknowledged the receipt of the circular, while the Highland Company haughtily inquired by what authority the memorialists spoke on behalf of the men in their employment. The men at all the meetings unanimously decided that another circular should be sent to the whole of the companies, informing them that if an answer was not received before the 14th inst., the whole of the employees on the Scottish railways should take an idle day at an early date to consider the situation.

Impending Strike of Manchester and Salford Gas-workers.

Some events in the struggle of the gas-workers with the Corporations was given in these columns a few weeks ago. In their demands for shorter hours, less work, and more pay they were completely successful, but not until a strike was about to take place. Notwithstanding the evident advantages of the union, some few of the workers held entirely aloof, and all the efforts of their fellow workers have failed to induce them to join. The union men now state that these "scabs" are favoured by the officials, and that many of the union men have not received the increased pay agreed upon. The Gas Committee deny that they have broken the agreement in any way which was made with the leaders of the men, and refuse to discharge the blacklegs. Their action has been endorsed by the City Council. Both parties have addressed the public by wall posters setting forth the different positions. In Manchester and Salford at all the gas-works the men have given in their notices, which expire on 5th and 6th. Unless the Corporations of both places concede the present demands of the men a strike, therefore, will follow. Both sides appear determined. A monster meeting of the gas-workers took place in Stevenson Square on Sunday afternoon, at which Wm. Thorne, of London, and others, spoke. A resolution pledging the public to support the men was carried unanimously, about 5,000 being present. N.

It is very easy to pick holes in other people's work, but it is far more profitable to do better yourself. Is there a fool in the world that cannot criticise? Those who can themselves do good service are but as one to a thousand compared with those who can see faults in the labour of others.

... The improvement of labour makes the far greater part of the value. I think it will be but a very modest computation to say, that of the products of the earth useful to the life of man, nine-tenths are the efforts of labour. Nay, if we will rightly consider things as they come to our use, and cast up the several expenses about them, what in them is purely owing to nature, and what to labour, we shall find that in most of them ninety-nine hundredths are wholly to be put on the account of labour.—Locke: 'On Civil Government,' 1689.

When one looks out over our history, through the long catalogue of bloody and iniquitous centuries, when one looks among the present nations, with standing armies of professional killers, their protective tariffs, their monopolistic laws and laissez-faires, their crime-breeding and lunacy-nursing devilties, one almost feels like the pessimist who wishes he could go to the moon in order to be able to spit on the whole human race at one time. Take a couple of instances: The example of crime and mental diseases producing agencies of portentous power, and both wholly remedial. Do you know that hundreds of thousands of English men and women are dying from starvation, disease, and slavery at from ten to twenty-five cents a-day for twelve to sixteen hours of ceaseless toil? Unless they do this the choice for women is between death and harlotry; for men, between death and crime; for both, it is death or disobedience to moral and mental laws. Do you know that while this is so there are many ignorant little monkeys annually making more money as horse jockeys than we pay the President of these United States? We may curse Nihilism, scorn Socialism, sneer at Co-operation, ignore Georgeism, pooh-pooh profit-sharing, eat our good dinner and be indifferent to the whole economic pother of the "idealists;" but only one who combines the qualities of an ass with those of a hyena can forget or deny that a civilisation is unjust and doomed wherein thousand of roues and rake-hells can live lives of debauchery, idleness, and luxury, whilst the millions who feed them drag out their sad days in want, wretchedness, and ceaseless toil.—George M. Gould in Open Court.

REPORTS.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were R. J. Lyne, Crouch, and Dean; 50 Commonweal sold. In the evening, comrade Bullock lectured to a good audience on "Evolution and Revolution;" many questions and good debate; collected 2s. 0½d., and Commonweal sold out.

NORTH LONDON.—At Hyde Park on Sunday afternoon, good meeting addressed by Lyne, sen. and Cantwell; 30 Commonweal sold, and 3s. 2½d. collected.

STREATHAM.—Comrade Kitz gave an excellent address to an attentive audience here. We have decided to close open-air propaganda for the winter.

ST. GEORGES' EAST.—At the last branch meeting it was decided to begin the winter season of indoor lectures on Wednesdays. It was also agreed that the branch meetings shall be held on Tuesday nights henceforth, so as to give an opportunity on Thursdays for members to attend the discussion and do some propaganda at the Toynbee Hall. Members are requested to turn up at nine sharp next Tuesday.

ABERDEEN.—At branch meeting on 25th, "A King's Lesson" and E. Kay Robinson's article on "The Man of the Future" were read and discussed. On 26th, comrade Forrest, of Kilmarnock, lectured in the Unitarian Church on "Socialism and Christianity," this being the last of a series of four lectures on social questions, which one of the audience proposed should be printed in collected form. Open-air work discontinued for the winter. Preparations going on for social meeting and dance.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at mid-day Glasier and Joe Burgoyne spoke on Jail Sq. At 2 o'clock a good number of members and friends gathered in our Rooms to meet comrade Stepniak, author of 'Underground Russia,' etc. Stepniak gave us some most interesting observations upon the revolutionary movement in Russia, and answered many questions. In the evening Stepniak lectured on "Socialism amongst the Russian Peasantry" in the Waterloo Hall—comrade Mavor in the chair. Some 700 people were present (there was a charge of 3d., 6d., and 1s. for admission) and listened attentively to the lecture. Stepniak gave a most interesting account of the communal life of the Russian peasantry—showing how their social habits fitted them for the immediate realisation of complete Socialism. At the conclusion, a resolution wishing good speed to the Russian revolutionary movement, and expressing sympathy with the prisoners and exiles, was moved by Shaw-Maxwell, seconded by Jas. Thomson, and carried unanimously. A resolution in favour of Socialism, moved by Glasier and seconded by Fisher McLaren, was also carried without dissent. Eight quires of Commonweal and a good quantity of literature sold.

EDINBURGH.—Comrade R. B. Kerr lectured to a full house on Sunday. His subject, "The Fundamental Principles of Socialism," was thoroughly well handled. A host of questions were well answered, and a good discussion followed. On Monday the 2nd, Stepniak was well received by a large and appreciative audience in the Waverley Hall.

LEICESTER.—Sunday Dec. 1, Chambers, Taylor, and Barclay spoke in Russell Square, and Councillor Sanders (of Walsall) gave three addresses. Morning, Radical Club, Vine Street, on "Municipal Politics; a Programme for Town Councils." Afternoon, 3 p.m., in Humberstone Gate, "The Organisation of Labour." Evening, Radical Club again, "Labour Federation; a Programme for Trade Unions." All three stirring addresses, and well attended, especially the evening one. Collections 17s. 3d.; 2½ quires Commonweal sold. Monday 2nd, comrade Timson read a paper on "Proposed Remedies for the Present State of Society." Tuesday Nov. 26, Graham Wallas lectured on "A Socialist View of the Political Outlook," in the Co-operative Hall—the concluding lecture of four on "Socialism and Practical Politics."—T. B.

MANCHESTER.—Wm. Morris lectured for the branch on "The Class Struggle" at the Secular Hall on Saturday night. The lecture was well received; brisk discussion followed; lecturer replied amid enthusiastic applause. About 10s. worth of literature sold. Our comrade also lectured on Sunday at Islington Hall, Ancoats, on "The Revolt of Ghent," at which the branch sold a quantity of literature. The members met Morris in the evening. At a meeting of gas-workers in Stevenson Square, 57 Commonweal, being all we had, were speedily disposed of.

NORWICH.—Saturday night, social meeting; large attendance. Sunday, at 3, in the Market Place some 3,000 people turned out to hear comrade Mowbray, who also addressed a meeting again at 7, when, notwithstanding the fog, some 600 persons turned up. At 8, Mowbray lectured on the "Fallacies of Political Action." Collection for day, 10s. Literature sold well; Commonweal all sold out.—M.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday morning comrade C. W. Mowbray, of London, delivered an earnest address to an attentive audience on the Priory Plain. In the evening, on Colman's Granary Quay, we held our usual meeting, comrade Ruffold being the speaker. All Commonweal sold, and 1s. 1½d. collected.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87, Marlboro' Street, Nov. 30th, R. F. Wilson lectured to a large audience on "The Goal of Modern Civilisation," in the course of which he plainly demonstrated that all the tendencies were towards Socialism. An interesting discussion took place, King, Kavanagh, Toomey, Hamilton, and others taking part.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—We have closed our outdoor campaign, and are now making arrangements for a series of lectures in our hall, Woodland Place, Parliament Street.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

At first sight the programme put forward by the Gladstonians at Manchester seems like an advance towards the Socialist-Radical position, and as if they were determined to avoid being dished by the Tories. However, the Radicals had better not halloo till they are out of the wood; for they must remember that there is a very wide distance between what a caucus meeting of the Outs will put forward as a promise, and what a party in office will attempt to carry.

Let the Radicals who think that they have a chance of being something more than the tail of the Liberal party, note the significant difference between the reception of such startling revolutionary novelties (?) as the giving of some real powers to the County Councils, the taxing of ground-rents, etc., and a bit of the regular old caucus programme, the Disestablishment of the Scotch and Welsh Churches. The assembled delegates had received the announcement of the former with decent signs of approbation, but they roared with delight at the announcement of the latter.

Now, certainly, we must all admit that it is a good thing that all churches should be disestablished; but to express such unbounded enthusiasm for a subject so stale, such a foregone conclusion, is ominous of the Gladstonian future, and shows that the Liberal party might almost as well be called the Nonconformist party, and that we may look forward after the tremendous birth-pangs of the political mountain to see a small Whig mouse (or rat rather) creep forth on to the surface of things, and the Radicals with their mongrel and impossible demi-semi-Socialist programme as hopelessly excluded from any Parliamentary political power as ever.

Whatever power the Radicals may have now, they have in virtue of their making some approach toward Socialism amongst a population which is beginning to have an inkling of Socialism; but that very power with the people makes them weak in Parliament, which is a mere drag on popular aspirations. And in any case they (the Radicals) only have any reason for existence as a party because the mass of the people is only beginning to turn towards Socialism. When the people understand the matter better, those Radicals of to-day, who are anything better than political tricksters, will have become Socialists, and the rest of them will be declared reactionists.

There never will nor can be again a Radical party in Parliament; that belongs to the days when Radicalism saw nothing ahead of itself in progress. It has now become quite conscious of some form of Socialism being its necessary development. It is accepting its transitional position, and is waiting for the transformation to take place. Such a body must necessarily be too nebulous to form a political party, for it is of the essence of a political party to consider its position as a final one; that is to say, that a political party is the outcome of opinions which have been superseded in the minds of all thoughtful persons by new developments of thought. It is no longer the growing fruit-tree, but the dead log; useful—for burning.

The Radicals, therefore, are to be congratulated for their powerlessness as a political party; it is a sign of life and growth in them. As for Mr. Gladstone's Manchester audiences, it is clear that they were, as aforesaid, Nonconformist Whigs; and they were engaged in devising the best form of giving the people stones for bread.

The strikes which are now taking place have a tendency which is noteworthy, and surely, amidst all shortcomings, encouraging. They are not merely strikes for a rise of wages, but show a desire for independence on the part of the men; strikes against blacklegs, or against the imposition of conditions under the guise of a gift. This, we may well hope, shows that the workers are gradually becoming conscious that their existence as workers means that they are engaged in a class war. That whatever gains they make, whatever improvements in their condition they conquer, must be at the expense of the master-class.

They will be aided in this new acquirement of knowledge by the attitude of the middle class, which a month or two ago was so "sympathetic." For in the struggle against blackleg treachery and the dictation of conditions by the masters they need look for no "sympathy" from the master-class. Expressions of sorrow at their having made such a mistake as to take the step absolutely necessary to true combination they will get in plenty, if that is any good to them; but, for the rest, it will be the kind masters who are so generously offering to share profits with their men who will receive the "sympathy of the public."

A word about this profit-sharing. What is it but a feeding of the dog with his own tail? It means on the one hand a writing down in the account-books of wages as profits shared by the men; while on the other hand it gets more work out of the men than the obvious wage-paying for the same money paid, and is, of course, praised by its advocates for that very reason. For the rest, the men are quite right in seeing in it a dodge to break up their organisation; an instrument for detaching some of the men from furthering the interests of their class by deluding them into thinking that their interests are one with those of their masters, who, if only they had eyes to see, are visibly living on their labour. Whether the gas-stokers' strike fails or not, the mere fact that the men have gained this much of insight into the capitalist trickery is very encouraging.

A curmudgeon (name of no importance) is determined to put the pretty river Mole, or certain reaches of it, into his own pocket, and the public is naturally angry at the proceeding, to the extent of forming a society for the protection of the said river; but as their only means of "protection" seems to be going to law with its owner, it is certain that the Mole will remain pocketed till "when the revolution comes."

For my part, I sympathise heartily with the sorrow of those who have been locked out of the Mole; for I should like to live on a river three quarters of the year; and the Mole is an exceedingly pretty little meadow-stream. But on the other hand it is no bad thing that the middle class—even the lower at that—should have a reminder of their position in relation to the landowners. I must say to them, "You would have it so, my friends! Now perhaps you begin to understand the meaning of the 'sacred rights of property,' the right of using and abusing wealth, which is so dear to the souls of the Liberty and Property Defence League. Turn Socialists my friends, and one day you shall have the Mole again." W. M.

The New York Herald (the real one), writing the other day about a shooting case, says that we live in "a world in which hard cash wins the victory over poverty every time. Wealth can whistle all fear of being caught down the wind, for the law's delays are a purchasable commodity." But if it had been a Socialist or Anarchist who had said that in his paper, the Herald would have been calling for his head before now.

"When slaveholders and land monopolists in Brazil seek a nominal republic, the better to accomplish the ends of injustice, the old query is recalled—What's in a name?" This is the question which the Boston Globe asks; and those who have been abusing Cunninghame-Graham for his letter had better ponder awhile before they try to answer it.

An aristocratic mixture of matrimonial relations has brought out the fact that in England, while a man is strictly prohibited from marrying his deceased wife's sister, there is nothing to prevent his marrying his divorced wife's sister, even while the divorced wife is alive. The ways of law are wonderful, and its paths past finding out!
S.

Society to-day is divided into classes, those who render services to the public and those who do not. Those who render services to the community are in an inferior position to those who do not, though there are various degrees of inferiority amongst them, from a position worse than that of a savage in a good climate to one not much below that of the lower degree of the unserviceable class; but the general rule is, that the more undeniably useful a man's services are, the worse his position is; as, for example, the agricultural labourers who raise our most absolute necessities are the most poverty-stricken of all our slaves.

The individuals of this inferior or serviceable class, however, are not deprived of a hope. That hope is, that if they are successful they may become unserviceable; in which case they will be rewarded by a position of ease, comfort, and respect, and may leave this position as an inheritance to their children. The preachers of the unserviceable class (which rules all society) are very eloquent in urging the realisation of this hope, as a pious duty, on the members of the serviceable class. They say, amidst various degrees of rigmarole: "My friends, thrift and industry are the greatest of the virtues; exercise them to the uttermost, and you will be rewarded by a position which will enable you to throw thrift and industry to the winds."

However, it is clear that this doctrine would not be preached by the unserviceable if it could be widely practised, because the result would then be that the serviceable class would tend to grow less and less and the world be undone; there would be nobody to make things. In short, I must say of this hope, "What is that among so many?" Still it is a phantom which has its uses—to the unserviceable.

Now this arrangement of society appears to me to be a mistake (since I don't want to use strong language)—so much a mistake, that even if it could be shown to be irremediable, I should still say that every honest man must needs be a rebel against it; that those only could be contented with it who were, on the one hand, dishonest tyrants interested in its continuance; or, on the other hand, the cowardly and helpless slaves of tyrants—and both contemptible. Such a world, if it cannot be mended, needs no hell to supplement it.

But, you see, all people really admit that it can be remedied, only some don't want it to be, because they live easily and thoughtlessly in it and by means of it; and others are so hard-worked and miserable that they have no time to think and no heart to hope, and yet I tell you that if there were nothing between these two sets of people it would be remedied, even then should we have a new world. But judge you with what wreck and ruin, what fire and blood, its birth would be accompanied!

Argument, and appeals to think about these matters, and consciously help to bring a better world to birth, must be addressed to those who lie between these two dreadful products of our system, the blind tyrant and his blind slave. I appeal, therefore, to those of the unserviceable class who are ashamed of their position, who are learning to understand the crime of living without producing, and would be serviceable if they could; and on the other hand to those of the serviceable class who by luck maybe, or rather maybe by determination, by sacrifice of what small leisure or pleasure our system has left them, are able to think about their position and are intelligently discontented with it.

To all these I say, you well know that there must be a remedy to the present state of things. For nature bids all men to work in order to live, and that command can only be evaded by a man or a class forcing others to work for its stead; and, as a matter of fact, it is the few that compel and the many that are compelled, as indeed the most must work or the work of the world couldn't go on. Here, then, is your remedy within sight surely; for why should the many allow the few to compel them to do what nature does compel them to do? It is only by means of superstition and ignorance that they can do so; for observe that the existence of a superior class living on an inferior implies that there is a constant struggle going on between them; whatever the inferior class can do to better itself at the expense of the superior it both can and must do, just as a plant must needs grow towards the light; but its aim must be proportionate to its freedom from prejudice and its knowledge. If it is ignorant and prejudiced it will aim at some mere amelioration of its slavery; when it ceases to be ignorant it will strive to throw off its slavery once for all.

Now, I may assume that the divine appointment of misery and degradation as accompaniments of labour is an exploded superstition among the workers, and, furthermore, that the recognition of the duty of the working-man to raise his class, apart from his own individual advancement, is spreading wider and wider amongst the workers. I assume that most workmen are conscious of the inferior position of their class, although they are not and cannot be fully conscious of the extent of the loss which they and the whole world suffer as a consequence, since they cannot see and feel the better life they have not lived; but before they set out to seek a remedy they must add to this knowledge of their position and discontent with it, a knowledge of the means whereby they are kept in that position in their own despite; and that knowledge it is for us Socialists to give them, and when they have learned it then the change will come.

One can surely imagine the workman saying to himself, "Here am I, a useful person in the community, a carpenter, a smith, a compositor, a weaver, a miner, a ploughman, or what not, and yet, as long as I work thus and am useful, I belong to the lower class, and am not respected like yonder squire or lord's son who does nothing, yonder gentleman who receives his quarterly dividends, yonder lawyer or soldier who does worse than nothing, or yonder manufacturer, as he calls himself, who pays his managers and foremen to do the work he pretends to do; and in all ways I live worse than he does, and yet I do and he lives on my doings. And furthermore, I know that not only do I know my share of my work, but I know that if I were to combine with my fellow-workmen, we between us could carry on our business and earn a good livelihood by it without the help of the squire's partridge-shooting, the gentleman's dividend-drawing, the lawyer's chicanery, the soldier's stupidity, or the manufacturer's quarrel with his brother manufacturer. Why, then, am I in an inferior position to the man who does nothing useful, and whom, therefore, it is clear that I keep? He says he is useful to me, but I know I am useful to him or he would not 'employ' me, and I don't perceive his utility. How would it be if I were to leave him severely alone to try the experiment of living on his usefulness while I lived on mine, and worked with those that are useful for those that are useful? Why can't I do this?"

My friend, because since you live by your labour, you are not free. And if you ask me, Who is my master? who owns me? I answer Monopoly. Get rid of Monopoly, and you will have overthrown your present tyrant, and will be able to live as you please within the limits which nature prescribed to you while she was your master, but which limits you as man have enlarged so enormously by almost making her your servant.

And now what are we to understand by the word Monopoly? I have seen it defined as the selling of wares at an enhanced price without the seller having added any additional value to them, which may be put again in this way, the habit of receiving reward for services never performed or intended to be performed; for imaginary services, in short.

This definition would come to this, that Monopolist is cheat writ large; but there is an element lacking in this definition which we must presently supply. We can defend ourselves against this cheat by using our wits to find out that his services are imaginary, and then refusing to deal with him; his instrument is fraud only. I should extend the definition of the Monopolist by saying that he was one who was privileged to compel us to pay for imaginary services. He is, therefore, a more injurious person than a mere cheat, against whom we can take precautions, because his instrument for depriving us of what we have earned is no longer mere fraud, but fraud with violence to fall back on. As long as his privilege lasts we have no defence against him; if we want to do business in his line of things we must pay him the toll which his privilege allows him to claim of us, or else abstain from the article we want to buy. If, for example, there were a Monopoly of champagne, silk velvet, kid gloves, or doll's eyes, when you wanted any of those articles you would have to pay the toll of the Monopolist, which would certainly be as much as he could get, besides their cost of production and distribution; and I imagine that if any such Monopoly were to come to light in these days, there would be a tremendous to-do about it both in and out of Parliament. Nevertheless, there is little to-do about the fact that all society to-day is in the grasp of Monopoly. Monopoly is our master, and we do not know it.

For the privilege of our Monopolists does not enable them merely to lay a toll on a few matters of luxury or curiosity which people can do without. I have stated, and you must admit, that everyone must labour who would live, unless he is able to get somebody to do his share of labour for him—to be somebody's pensioner in fact. But most people cannot be the pensioners of others; therefore, they have to labour to supply their wants, but in order to labour usefully two matters are required: 1st, The bodily and mental powers of a human being developed by training, habit, and tradition; and 2nd, Raw material on which to exercise those powers, and tools wherewith to aid them. The second matters are absolutely necessary to the first; unless the two come together no commodity can be produced. Those, therefore, that must labour in order to live, and who have to ask leave of others for the use of the instruments of labour, are not free men but their dependents, i.e., their slaves, for the commodity which they have to buy of the monopolists is no less than life itself.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To those who have obtained copies of the Commonweal through the propagandist work of our comrades, by free distribution in the streets and public conveyances, or by purchase at our outdoor stations, we ask if in agreement with our principles to help the sale of the Commonweal by ordering it of their newsagents, and sending on to us the names of newsagents willing to sell it; and still better, as our outdoor work must shortly be reduced, by joining the local branches and helping on the work.

In the newly-drafted constitution for the State of Wyoming it is provided that "eight hours shall constitute a lawful day's work in all mines and on all State and municipal works."

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen, Knights of Labour, Switchmen's Mutual Aid Association, and Brotherhood of Railway Brakemen, all in the employ of the Union Pacific system, have signed articles of federation. The agreement was submitted for approval to the general session of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

SONG OF THE BRAVE.

Oh, what is the Life of the brave?
 A gift which his Maker hath given,
 Least nothing but tyrant and slave
 Remain of mankind under heaven.
 And what is the life of the brave
 When staked in the cause of his right?
 'Tis but as a drop to the wave—
 A trifle he values as light.

And what is the Death of the brave?
 A loss which the good shall deplore:
 Who freedom hath striven to save,
 Mankind shall revere evermore!
 'Tis the close of a glorious day,
 'Tis the setting of yonder bright sun;
 A summons that welcomes away,
 To a heaven already begun!

And what is the Fame of the brave?
 'Tis the halo which follows his day;
 The noble example he gave,
 Still shining in splendid array!
 The blood of the coward runs cold;
 The wise and the good do admire;
 But in the warm heart of the bold,
 Oh, it kindles a nobler fire!

Then who would not live with the brave?
 The wretch without virtue or worth.
 And who would not die with the brave?
 The coward that clings to the earth.
 And who shall partake with the brave
 The fame which his valour hath won?
 'Tis he that will fight with the brave,
 Till the battle of freedom is done!

SAMUEL BAMFORD.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

HERE are two items clipped from the capitalistic press of November 13th. This one is from the Boston Globe:

"The word 'Anarchist' is used very loosely in the press reports. Schevitch, the so-called Anarchist, who made the incendiary speech in Cooper Union the other night, is anything but an Anarchist in the strict definition of that term. He is a State Socialist. Instead of favouring the abolition of all law, as the Anarchists do, he believes in piling law mountains high, and giving to it the control of every kind of business. Of the two extremes, that of Schevitch is probably the worse."

And the following is from the Transcript, the organ of "culture":

"The meeting announced to be held in Philadelphia last Sunday night 'in memory of the working people murdered at Chicago on Nov. 11, 1887,' was forcibly prevented by the police. One thousand persons, a considerable proportion of whom were ladies, had been provided with tickets for the meeting, and seven hundred policemen were massed around the building to prevent these people from entering. At the next meeting announced in Philadelphia in sympathy with the Anarchists, two thousand people will want to attend. The thing always works in that way."

We are getting nearer and nearer Cæsaristic methods of government. About 40,000 people are out of employment in Chicago. They are regarded by the fathers of that rotten city as a dangerous class. And well they may! In order to calm this unruly element somewhat, a new system of water supply and drainage is to be undertaken, which will employ 10,000 labourers, a host of politicians, and will cost the city 60 million dollars.

The meeting in honour of our martyrs in New York was a most gigantic success. The Morning Journal estimated the people who surged about the doors of Cooper Institute as over ten thousand, and says "the streets for blocks around the entrance were black with men and women, struggling to attend the great demonstration in 'memorial of the martyrs of the working people, murdered at Chicago.'" There is talk in the newspapers about the prosecution of John Most and Sergius E. Shevitch for the speeches they delivered, but I don't believe anything will come of it.

The most important event during the last week in the labour movement was the convention of the Knights of Labour at Atlanta, Ga. Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labour, addressed a letter to the assembled Knights on the proposed eight hour movement, in which he proposed the cordial co-operation of both bodies. He reviewed at length the work of the American Federation in endeavouring to promote the movement, and said:

"At present it is impossible to say definitely what action will be necessary to be taken by the working people to secure the eight-hour work-day. Some have stated that it will be conceded upon the demand of organised labour; that the employers will recognise the necessity of so doing, if not from a spirit of humanity, at least from a wise discretion. Such, permit me to say, I hope may be the case. Others again believe that our employers will not manifest such good judgment, and that organised labour will be compelled to resort to a cessation of work to enforce the demand. It is the policy of the American Federation of Labour to inaugurate good labour organisations, to avoid the harsh measure of strikes whenever possible; but if we cannot obtain justice, if in the light of the immense improvements in machinery as applied to the modern methods of production; if with all the civilising influence of this latter part of the nineteenth century, we cannot secure a substantial reduction of the hours of labour, so that all may find an opportunity of remunerative employment, without a strike, then probably that must be resorted to. We appeal to you for your co-operation in this movement, because we believe that the interest of the toiling masses are identical. We recognise the necessity for unity of action and purposes in the whole body of organised labour, and spurn with contempt the policy of isolation. Nor do we attach any more importance to the fact that the American Federation of Labour inaugurated this present movement and asked your co-operation, than if you had initiated it and asked our organisation to aid you."

Before the convention, Mr. Powderly stated in an interview:

"The eight-hour system will be discussed very fully. The American Federation of Labour has decided that the eight-hour system shall go into effect all over the county on the 31st of May, 1890, but, as I stated in my recommendations to the General Assembly, I do not think we can adopt any such measure according to the preamble of our constitution, but I think we should adopt the eight-hour system gradually. If it should go into effect all over the country at the same time it would disarrange business too much."

Before I go much further, I may say that considerable secrecy surrounds the deliberations of the General Assembly of the Knights this year. For the purpose probably of concealing the weak condition of the Order and the bad state of the finances, very scant information is given. Wright, the editor of the Journal of United Labour, a good, honest, able man, but weak in his make, doles out all the information—but of course he must obey general instructions.

The convention opened on the 13th inst. This year is the 20th anniversary of the birth of the order. General Master Workman Powderly said this in his report, and after saying that the order has passed through a trying period, but that it had passed through it better than he expected, he continued:

"I now wish to speak very plainly. Your officers have done all they could do, and unless they receive more encouragement from the order the struggle will be in vain. It must be understood that we make the fight, not for ourselves, but for all, and the battle must have the support of all or fail. I have had to stand on the public platform and deny charges, explain actions, and face accusers in defence of this order, when, if called on to do it in my own behalf I would have refused to stir hand or foot; and yet it is supposed that I do these things for self. Our members unfortunately do not realise that they are the ones for whom this struggle is made, and not for your General Master Workman. To say that he is tired and weary of such doings is to tell but part of the truth, and if the struggle is to continue for the future as it has during the past three years, some other man must take the place now occupied by your General Master Workman, for he is convinced that it is a waste of time and energy on his part to keep on fighting the same old battles with men who should be promptly silenced by the order itself, while the majority of our members regard the general officers as something apart from themselves, and look upon attacks on these officers as personal and in which they are not concerned. Upon this convention devolves the solemn duty of making the effort to again arouse the zeal of our members throughout the land. You have the opportunity to make or mar the order forever, and I sincerely hope that we will not leave here with our duty undone. . . . At the session of 1887, I notified that I would not again accept the position of General Master Workman, I could not therefore consistently advocate a reduction of the salary of that officer. . . . I now recommend that the salary of the Master Workman be reduced one-half—not that I consider 2,500 dollars, or even 5,000, enough for the duties and responsibilities of the office, but the order cannot well afford to pay any more. . . . Last year I called for contributions to enable me to send out lecturers, and it is a question with me whether that act has not done more harm than good to the order. . . . In future the Journal of United Labour should be our educator, and it should be in every member's hands if possible. I again recommend that the name of the journal be changed, to conform to existing circumstances. When the name was selected the order was working in extreme secrecy. Hence the adoption of the present title. I recommend that the name be changed to the "Journal of the Knights of Labour," or something more suitable than that now in use. . . ."

"Our declaration of principles calls for a gradual reduction of the hours of labour, and I urge upon the convention to give serious attention to that question before adjournment. I do not regard a reduction of the hours to be a cure-all and the end of the struggle, but merely as a means to an end. . . . I am not hostile to the eight-hour question. It is because I am deeply concerned in it that I will not sanction any foolhardy or unwise methods of hastening it. Had we acted on the proposition presented by Mr. Edwin Norton in Cleveland in 1886, this year would see the end of the long-hour work day. His recommendation was that 9½ hours constitute the work day for 1887, 9 hours for 1888, 8½ for 1889, and 8 hours for 1890. That was and is a practical plan. It was feasible, and so gradual as not to estrange business, or in any way work hardship to either side in the controversy. Men who will deliberately enter into such a plan to carry forward the short-hour movement may be depended upon to retain the benefits of a reduction in hours, but those who wait until the last minute and then attempt to inaugurate the new system with a hurrah will abandon organisation and live in the memory of the glory of the achievement, while the employers are taking from them what they so suddenly gained. I submit for your consideration the plan above alluded to, and ask you to make an effort to put it into practical operation."

The per capita tax amounted to 52,945 dols. 69 c. On July 1 the balances were: General Fund, 4,036 d. 31 c.; Educational Fund, 4,138 d. 47 c.; Insurance Fund, 882 d. 83 c. No wonder that Powderly volunteered to give up half of his salary!

On the 15th L. F. Livingston, president of the State Farmers' Alliance of Georgia, addressed the Knights, speaking for 100,000 men, describing the pitiable condition of the farmers of the State and the South, and stating what was being attempted to aid the farmers in their fight against monopoly. He was convinced that in many things the Alliance and the Knights are working side by side, and he saw no reason why they may not join, at least as far along the road as they went together. He hoped the Knights would in some way be represented at the coming national convention of various farmers' organisations, to be held at St. Louis, December 3. His address was heartily applauded, the general assembly at the close rising to its feet and giving three hearty cheers for the Farmers' Alliance.

The substance of the report of the K. of L. Legislative Committee upon its action at Washington during the last session of Congress, was that nothing was accomplished, as all the Bills in which working people were interested that originated in the Senate were buried in the House, and vice versa, so that honours were easy between them in their ingenuity in smothering such legislation.

The capitalistic papers say to-day that an amalgamation of the Knights and the Farmers would be next to invincible.

Boston, Mass., Nov 18, 1889.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

Of all the great minds that have made the labour problem a study, there is not one to-day that will not admit that woman has become a factor in all the affairs of the world, and that she is in as great a degree as man a wealth-producer, and should, therefore, be entitled to her full share of the gains and honours of advancing civilisation. We say greater because, according to the definition given by one that "wealth is all money over and above the necessaries of life," she, by working for smaller wages, certainly increases the wealth of her employer faster than a man, who is paid a more equitable share for his labour. The reasoning and thinking minds of the age have also come to see clearly the truth that with equal privileges woman will be man's equal in any and all vocations of life. Therefore it is very apparent to those who have labour's cause at heart that we cannot longer afford to allow our women to toil without recompense or be driven to lives of shame. We ask only that woman may be given an equal chance with man in every way, and not be obliged, as now, to rob him of his honestly earned loaf that she may have a crust.—Living Issue.

THE WORKMAN'S COMPASS.

SHALL the "docker's tanner" be the end of the "greatest labour movement of the century," or shall the strike whereby the "tanner" was won be only the beginning of a far greater movement—the first step along the road that shall lead the working people from poverty and misery to plenty and happiness?

The road is sure. There need be no mistaking it. For the strike should teach lessons that will prove like signposts all along the way, giving certain directions to those who will learn to read them.

The main lessons to be learnt are five. I. The absolute dependence of all life upon labour. II. The inter-dependence of labour. III. The necessity of union. IV. The value of organisation. V. The uselessness of government.

Let us take these lessons in their order.

I. The dependence of life upon labour. This is the key to the whole position. The strike closed only one of the sources of supply of London; yet it paralysed trade, hindered production, and interfered with distribution. If the other great source of supply—the railways—had been closed by a similar strike, what would have happened? In one week London would have been starving; because the rich man's money would not buy him food if the working people refused to bring it in for him to buy. So that it is plain that all people, rich and poor alike, depend for their very living on those who work. And instead of the companies—the capitalists—starving the strikers into submission, the strikers might have starved their masters into submission, and made what terms they liked with them.

Therefore it is plain that capital is useless without labour. But labour is not useless without capital, for it can produce capital. When the docks and the railways were made, and the machinery you work with and the houses you live in, labour was producing capital. And the labourers were not kept by the capitalists' money, but by the food brought into London by other labourers.

All who live depend upon labour; if not on their own, then on some one else's.

II. The inter-dependence of labour. The skilled workman is therefore not more useful to society than the unskilled labourer. He gets higher wages, because his class of work is more scarce than the labourer's; not because it is more useful. If all men had learnt a trade, competition would have lowered the wages of skilled labour.

But the skilled workman is not only no more useful than the unskilled. He cannot get on without the latter. During the strike there were many artisans obliged to stand idle for want of the materials kept back in the docks by the dockers. This would have been much worse had the railways also been closed. Then it would have been seen at once that all classes of labour depend on one another, and especially on those who supply the daily food.

Therefore all labour is inter-dependent, and the interests of all working men and women are common.

III. The value of union is plainer since the strike; but if the working men and women of London had all been united, the duration of the strike might have been reckoned by days instead of by weeks.

We have seen how a general strike would enable the working classes to make what terms they like with their masters. But the proclamation of a general strike was withdrawn, and wisely withdrawn under the circumstances. Why? What were the circumstances which made it wise not to take a step that should have ensured immediate victory for the men? They were three: (a) There was not enough unity to ensure its success. (b) The men could not depend entirely on the help of the other working-men of London. (c) They were therefore afraid of losing the help of those who were not working-men, but who live on the labour of the workers.

Now, if there had been more complete unity amongst the working people, (b) the dockers would have had the help of all other labourers, (c) they could have done without the help of the rich, and (a) they would have ended the strike and got all they wanted.

Therefore, for the future, unity of labour is a necessity (and it should include eventually all clerks, Post-office employes, domestic servants, shop-assistants, and the police).

IV. The value of organisation is especially notable in connection with the distribution of relief to the dockers. It was stated that the Strike Committee practically knew every genuine docker personally, and so could regulate the distribution of relief-tickets. (Whether or not this was taken advantage of does not matter.) It could be managed in this way. The dockers, when employed, work in gangs. Each gang is under the direction of a well-known man, who is more or less acquainted with the men who work with him. By putting these "gangers" in connection with the leaders of the strike and with the general distributors the relief could be afforded with a regularity otherwise impossible. Every man might be sure of his fair share, and no man could obtain more. Happily the men seem to have behaved so splendidly (it is a glorious thing to think of!) that there was little need of such precautions. Heroes do not cheat one another. Yet it is well to have some check against sneaks and traitors.

These four facts are the north, south, east, and west of the untried future. The fifth is the Compass, whereby the working class may steer a direct course across it.

V. Neither Parliament nor the County Council did, or could do, anything to help the strikers. All that was done, was done by the men themselves, under trusty leaders. But further, the Government was equally powerless to help the dock companies against the strikers. For Parliament could not compel one single man to work; neither could the police prevent picketing. Therefore the workers need not expect either help or hindrance from any but themselves. They must take their own cause in their own hands.

Government is useless. The people must help themselves.

And now, steering by this Compass, which points away from government, straight towards self-help, what is the course for the working classes to pursue?

They depend upon each other for their life. Let them unite in order to make that life happier. At present their life is rendered hard and miserable by competition amongst themselves. The large profits of their employers are made at the expense of the welfare and happiness of the workers, who keep all men. If the toilers wish to be better off they must persuade their masters to be content with smaller profits. If they cannot persuade them, then they must force them. They will be able to force them when they can threaten to starve them out by a general strike.

Therefore all the workers in London should combine. Perhaps in separate unions, but if so, these unions should amalgamate and form a general combination of working people—a labour syndicate.

As soon as this is sufficiently accomplished they will be able (1) to fix a minimum wage; (2) to fix a maximum working day—say eight hours; (3) to protect every man and woman in London from ill-treatment by a master; (4) to make short work of the slums, and insist upon every worker having a decent home at a reasonable rent; because if the landlords are obstinate they will be able to persuade them by the force of a general strike!

But much more than this may be achieved by such a combination of all the workers. For out of their higher wages a large fund of money would be contributed to the central union. Strikes would hardly be necessary, for the masters would not dare resist. Therefore this money might be used for other purposes. The sick and the old would have to be well provided for. Then with the remainder of the money co-operative stores might be started, to supply the workers with food and clothes at cost price. Bakeries, shoemakers' shops, tailors' shops, etc, might also be conducted on the same principle.

And now observe what this leads to. These stores and shops would have to be built. Many men would be employed in them. Vans and machinery would be required, which would give work to still other men. The Relief Committees have shown how these men may be paid. Their work will be equally valuable; their wages too must be equal.

Thus the workers of London would begin to be their own employers. They would not only be dependent on one another; they would be working for one another. And they would then keep for themselves all that extra labour which now makes their masters rich. Then they might still further reduce the hours of labour: and so there need no longer be any starving unemployed.

Other towns will follow suit, and other countries too. There will be no fear of foreigners being brought in to help the capitalists starve Englishmen. The Australians are even now with you. The Americans will follow suit. (You saw them come out and join you, rather than work against you for 3s. 6d. an hour. They treated you as brothers; do not treat yourselves worse, but be worthy to call such men brothers!) The Germans and Jews in London will labour side by side with you in perfect friendship, taking their part in keeping themselves and you.

When other towns and countries have followed suit, you may buy your goods of them at cost price, extending your union to your brothers all over the world. You may acquire your own farms all over the country: they will belong to you in common, and those working on them will not be slaves of landlord and farmer, but will be your comrades, working happily with you for the good of all.

You and your children will be on the road to a happiness hitherto only dreamt of, but now shown to be possible, if you will only take the first step, and combine.

Your enemies will tell you that this is unpractical. Try it. It will be a good deal too practical for them. For nothing can stand against you when your watchword is—COMBINE. G. S.

CORRESPONDENCE.

J. BRONTERRE O'BRIEN OR HENRY GEORGE.

Last week I answered the charge that Henry George plagiarised from P. E. Dove. This week I am pained to see that another correspondent suggests that J. Bronterre O'Brien was the originator of 'Progress and Poverty.' Such an innuendo is not deserving of notice except for the purpose of appealing to Socialists generally to raise themselves above the temptation to carp and cavil at the success of any man who, while striving to reach the same goal as they, does not travel along the same road. Any man who realises the solemnity and grandeur of the cause for which it is our privilege to work should beware of allowing his personality to drag him down below the level of his own ideal.

As to the specific charge that Henry George borrowed his ideas from this man or that, anyone who reads his 'Land Policy' of 1871 will have no need to search further for the source of his inspiration. The book dealt with the results of the United States policy of alienating the national inheritance; and by the collation and study of facts, and the patient tracing out of the various forms of "land-grants" and their influence on the national life, the iniquity and deadly effect of private property in land became so glaring that the mere fact of such an investigation having been undertaken by a man of Henry George's qualifications irresistibly led to the writing of the mere elaborate work, 'Progress and Poverty,' which, whatever we may think of some minor points of opinion and method, has had a widespread influence in awakening thought among the present generation, for which all sincere Socialists owe him a debt of enduring gratitude.

As to the question of abstract originality, is it not the fact that the greatest genius of any age merely gathers the threads spun in the past by others, and, in the increased light of his own day, weaves them into a harmonious whole? Allow me, therefore, to entreat the numerous possible Donnellys among your readers to hold their hands, and to utilise their energies in some nobler and more helpful endeavour than in thoughtlessly attacking a co-worker in social reform; the more especially as any such attack only tends to lower the standard of the cause which they desire to advance.

Collapse of the Silvertown Strike.

We are sorry to say that the Silvertown strike has collapsed. After a gallant fight of 12 weeks these brave workers have been forced to yield by hunger. Their defeat must be laid upon the shoulders of the executive of the richest trade union in England—the Engineers. They refused to call their men out, who were acting as blacklegs, and thus lent their aid to one of the worst sweating firms in London. It is to be hoped the members of their trade union who are not blacklegs will remember this.

South Wales Miners.

It will be remembered that action on the eight hours question was postponed at the recent miners' conference till the negotiations of the South Wales men with their masters for an eight hour day under the sliding-scale were settled. It now appears that these negotiations have practically fallen through; there is a complete deadlock between the delegates of the men and the masters upon the eight hour and other questions. The whole business has now been referred to the men, of whom 50,000 are affected. Altogether, the situation in South Wales is very serious, and masters and men are probably on the verge of a bitter struggle. N.

SOCIALIST SING-SONG.

I.
A SINGLE bud in bursting shows,
A million ready to unclose.

II.
The earliest song-bird falleth chilled,
Yet soon with song the world is filled.

III.
Dead leaves that rot in rain and cold,
Shall feed fresh shoots with fruitful mould.

IV.
The hard frost breaks the iron earth,
That rain and grain may bring to birth.

V.
Of life relinquished joyously,
Who shall measure the force set free?

VI.
Ere one through hope may find death fair,
How many perish in despair?

VII.
Like many a fool of poison fain,
The rich man's passion proves his bane.

VIII.
A false step on a darkened stair,
And lo! the highest step is there.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Threatened Strike of London Gas-stokers.

When I noticed a week or two ago the "benevolent" scheme of which Mr. Livesey, the chairman of the South London board of directors, was the author, I had no idea that it would have such serious consequences; but now, thanks to this gentleman's "goodness," South London will be plunged in darkness in a very little time. It was quite evident from the beginning that the scheme was only a cunning plan to break up the union and place the men completely at the mercy of the directors. At first, according to the terms of the agreement, the workers were to forfeit their share of the profits if they went on strike. This has now been withdrawn, but the men must still agree to serve for a year, and will forfeit their bonus if they give notice and the engineer of the works does not choose to accept their notice. If the scheme were accepted by the men, not only would the present union be broken up—for what use would a union be if the workers were bound over to keep the peace by the beautiful bonus scheme?—but it would be impossible to form another one, and the men would sink back into the old state of degrading slavery. The bonus, too, would prove a very uncertain gift, depending as it does upon the present low price of gas, which, as coal is going up in price, is not likely to remain as cheap as at present, and directly it rises away goes the bonus. Now, when the men saw that the "blacklegs" who had signed the agreement were becoming the special pets of the company—Mr. Livesey having declared that they and all others who sold themselves into slavery by signing the agreement should be kept on in the slack summer season, when the majority of the men were discharged—they informed the directors through their union that the company must give up the bonus scheme or dismiss the blacklegs who had signed, the men backing up their demands by sending in their notices to the number of 2,000 on Friday Dec. 6th. The directors are doing their best to obtain blacklegs. They managed to get a number of the men from the country by false pretences on Friday, but when informed by the pickets of the true state of things, they refused to do the company's dirty work. They afterwards applied to Mr. Livesey for their fares home, which request was indignantly refused. That worthy gentleman is now busily superintending the erection of iron huts for his blacklegs inside the works. A plentiful supply of provisions has been collected with a rapidity that shows that this capitalist Pecksniff, who conceals his greed and cunning under an outward appearance of unctuous benevolence, has been preparing for the strike which he has deliberately forced on for a long time. This virtuous and worthy gentleman is one of the shining lights of the temperance platform, yet among the provisions he has collected are numerous barrels of beer, enough to make his blackleg crew roaring drunk for weeks. Mr. Pecksniff Livesey doubtless knows that his pets are some of the most sneaking contemptible cowards that ever crawled on the earth's surface; and though he always recommends temperance and thrift to the working class as the foundation of all virtue, yet he finds strong drink the only means of infusing into the breasts of his protégés a bad imitation of the virtue they most conspicuously lack. Meanwhile the regular hands are not working too hard, owing to "excitement," and the consequence is that the supply of gas is getting very limited. The gas-holders at the Old Kent Road are very low indeed, Jumbo, the largest, being nearly down to the ground. The good folks of South London had better lay in a good stock of candles and lamps, for it is to be feared that gas will be very scarce when the men come out. Meanwhile a new peril threatens the middle class, for the coal-porters are not only coming out in South London, but are also going to abandon their work all over the metropolis. The middle classes without coal or gas will be in a very awkward plight indeed; no wonder their papers do not like the prospect.

Strike of Gasmen at Woolwich.

The Woolwich gas men are already out; they came out on Sunday, December 9th. They find that they are expected to do heavier work under the eight hour system than under the former twelve hour arrangement. Formerly, they had sixty retorts and six fires to do in gangs of three men; now with only two-thirds the time to do it in they have fifty-four retorts and eight fires, and have to do all their own coal wheeling and all the work connected with the retorts; they get 5s. a-day. What they ask is that each gang of three shall have a coal wheeler, that they have 5s. 4d. a-day, the usual 1s. 6d. a week good time money, and double time for Sunday work when carbonising. At a large meeting of friends and sympathisers on Sunday night, it was decided to go on with the strike. N.

Manchester Gas Workers and the City Council.

The struggle, which last week in these columns was anticipated, has begun with apparent determination on the part both of the workers and their freely elected masters, the citizen's representatives. The latter had been making extensive preparations to carry on the fight for some time previous to the expiration of the notices of the gas workers. It is worthy of note that the workmen who are employed to erect sheds and construct rooms and habitations inside the various gas works of the Co-operation, to accommodate the poor cattle (I mean the scabs) who have been induced to take the places of the men on strike, are members of the different trade unions in the building trade, the contractor who got the job from the Corporation having none but unionists in his employ. But this shows the powerlessness of mere trade unionism to effect the solidarity of labour. The first cause of the dispute was the presence of a number of non-unionists among the gas workers, and who, it appeared, were especially favoured by the officials of the works. The Gas Committee, refusing to discharge these obnoxious persons, or to remove them to work away from the union men, a strike was resolved upon. A deputation of the men met the Mayor (a successful grocer) and the deputy Chairman of the Committee (a master painter who never had a union man in his employment) and an ex-Mayor a few days before coming out, when these people refused to recognise their union, or unionists as such in any way, and declined to undertake not to discharge or punish any of those taking a prominent part in the agitation. After this the Gas Committee posted the city denying any knowledge of what the men were coming out for, and offering four month's work to all who would apply and permanent places to well-conducted men. Consequently, an assortment of all ages and conditions of human beings were got together, most of them being either over 60 or under 20 years of age. They are provided, at the public expense, with provisions of all kinds, beer without limit, medical and cooking attendance, sleeping accommodation in the shape of boards sloping down on either side from a centre, upon which the poor "scabs" are meant to lie head to head with a blanket to each. Certainly, loafers of all kinds are likely to have a good time of it through the kindly considerations of our municipal rulers. Little progress, however, is being made in the supplying of gas; indeed, it is questionable whether plentiful potatoes of beer and general pampering will tend to produce efficient carbonisers. The streets of Manchester are in almost complete darkness, through Salford entirely so, the shops and warehouses eking out the miserable light supplied them by the Corporation with oil and candles; two shops have already been burnt out by paraffin explosions. How long the traders of this commercial centre will submit to the consequence of a few stupid and incompetent civic auto-crats' mismanagement is not much a matter of speculation. The gas men are determined to stick together till the bitter end; all the gas works are well picketed, and some of the pickets have already been arrested and fined for obstruction, a most excellent way of demonstrating on which side "law-n'-order" always throws its weight when the workers are concerned. Meetings and processions are held every day. John Burns arrived on Saturday, primarily to organise branches of the new Railwaymen's Union, but he has thrown himself fully into the cause of the gas workers. On Sunday, in Stevenson Square, over 30,000 people attended their meeting at which Burns spoke. Resolutions supporting the strikers were passed unanimously, and over £21 collected at the meetings on Sunday. The calumnies upon the men, and the confusion as to the objects of the strike which the Corporation have been spreading, are getting cleared away. The issues are becoming plainer, and let us hope success will speedily attend the efforts of the Manchester and Salford gas workers to maintain their splendid organisation. W. B.

Railway Men Moving.

Thirty-six delegates from the leading centres of the North-Eastern Railway between Berwick and Leeds held a conference at Darlington on Sunday. Many delegates urged immediate action, consequent on their programme of hours, and Sunday and overtime pay being refused. A majority, however, decided to make a last appeal to the directors at an interview which was asked for on Wednesday last. If such interview be refused, the men would at once enter the battle to obtain their demands. A resolution supporting the goods men at Newcastle, and urging railway men to refuse to take their places, was adopted.

Railway Strike at Cork.

The men employed in the goods shed department of the Great Southern Railway at Cork are now on strike. The strikers include sixty porters, and also about sixty yardmen and shunters. On leaving the goods yard they were loudly cheered, much sympathy being felt in Cork with the strikers. The men complained that they are overworked and underpaid, their wages only being 16s. to 18s. weekly, and they have often to work 16 hours a-day, besides Sunday. They demand a work-day of 12 hours, pay for overtime, and pay for Sundays.

Sheffield Labourers.

A strike of labourers has taken place at John Brown's, one of the largest ironworks in Sheffield. These workers two years ago were working six days in the week and receiving 36s. for making three flues for steam boilers, etc. They now make from six to seven flues in four days and receive as their share 24s. weekly. The smiths who contract for the job from the firm, and whose chief work seems to be looking on, took about £6 weekly two years ago, and about £12 weekly now as their share of the plunder. Our Sheffield comrades have taken an active part in the agitation, and have held several meetings in support of the strikers. The blacklegs have had a rather warm time, and twenty-five summonses are out against the men for intimidation. The whole district is in a state of considerable excitement. All the working people are up in arms against the blacklegs, and there have been some very lively times.

Leicester Hosiery Union.

We have received the reports for October and November, 1889, of the Leicester Hosiery Union. We are glad to see that the members of this trade union have grasped the fact that the wealth of the rich is merely the creation of the plunder of the poor. The report says, "Where does all the interest, profit, and rent come from if not from labour?" and then, after pointing out the source of rent and profit, it thus deals with interest: "Then take interest on capital invested, where does the £5 come from? Suppose the £100 has been lent, and the person lending it goes abroad, what can he do towards creating a penny by labour? So it is clear that labour only earns or increases the wealth. No man can get rich by his own labour alone; and if none received only what they earned by their own labour, none would be rich and very very few need be poor." Further on, the report criticises the speech of the Mayor at the famous dinner where capital and labour met in loving companionship, and the lion laid down with the lamb, the lamb being inside the lion. The writer says, "The Mayor's motive, no doubt, was good. The way he asked working-men to try and work at a reduction to compete with the Swiss, was very suspicious; also when he said that those who were advocating the eight hour day were the worst enemies the working-men had." So the writer and the workmen of Leicester are quite up to the benevolent little dodge of the worthy Mayor in trying to feast and flatter them into working cheap and for long hours. The hosiery trade seems in a flourishing condition, and all, on the whole, is going well, but still the old workman stands very little chance of employment. One sentence of the report tells his story with short and simple pathos, "In the struggle for work now, when a man begins to wear spectacles he is passed on one side." Do any of the younger workmen who are now earning good wages think of this? that all our competitive system does for them if they live till they become old and greyheaded, is to throw them aside to die in a ditch by the roadside, or to linger, longing for death, in that cheerless prison, the workhouse. If they think of this, they will find the report of this trade union a battle call urging them forward to end the wrong and oppression which makes these things possible. N.

REPORTS.

MITCHAM AND MERTON.—Outdoor meetings discontinued for the present, but perfecting of the organisation of both League and Labourers' Union going on steadily. Last Sunday, a meeting of delegates was held at the Merton Club to revise rules of Labourers' Union. Reports from Streatham, Mitcham, South Norwood, and Croydon show great progress of the Union and League.—F. K.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held a meeting at Latimer Road on Sunday morning; speakers were Dean, Crouch, and Maughan; a few Weals sold. Comrade Webster lectured at our rooms in the evening to a fairly good audience; many questions and good debate; 1s. 9d. collected and fair sale of Weal.

ABERDEEN.—On Saturday night, in the Tea Room, Café Buildings, Shiprow, the Aberdeen Branch of the League celebrated the second anniversary of its formation. As the branch was formed in October, 1887, this fraction should have come off two months ago, but it was delayed by pressure of work on certain active members. It was a thoroughly enjoyable meeting, and there was so large a turnout of members and friends that an overflow company had to take their tea in an ante-room. However, we all got together before the choir-singing, solos, readings, speeches, and pianoforte music began. Comrade Webster occupied the chair; Mr. James (organist in the Unitarian Church) played the accompaniments; Duncan, Gray, and Leatham sang songs, Socialistic and other; whilst Webster, Leatham, and Rennie (an old comrade just returned from America) gave speeches. Dancing was engaged in for two hours to music supplied by a capital string-band of six, of whom it may be said that God and comrade Aiken alone know where they came from. A desire was expressed that a similar meeting should be held on Hogmanay night.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, Joe Bargoyne addressed a good crowd on Jail Square, and replied to some objections. Meeting at Paisley Road Toll not held owing to rain. In the afternoon, Glasier lectured on "Ireland and Socialism" to the Sexton Branch of the Irish National League; and in the evening, lectured upon the same subject to the Glasgow Branch of the Irish National League. On both occasions his address was well received, all the subsequent speakers being quite favourable to Socialism, a few of them insisting that the Home Rule question should be settled first.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning Rogers and Disch held a meeting at Vicars Croft. In the afternoon a big meeting was held at the Vicars Croft of gas-workers and general labourers, when J. L. Mahon, Maguire, Paylor, and Sweeney addressed the meeting. Commonweal sold out, and 6s. worth of League pamphlets sold. On Sunday evening at 8, a meeting was held at the Jewish Workers' Club of Jewish tailors, etc., who had met to discuss the objects of their union. Rogers attended and spoke in favour of union and combination, and was well received; many questions asked afterwards.

LEICESTER.—Sunday 8th the usual meeting in Russell Square. In the evening Barclay occupied the Radical Club platform on "The Origin and Claims of Private Property"; a warm discussion followed. The same evening, a discussion on Socialism was carried on at the Irish National Club, in which several of our comrades took part. At our weekly branch meeting the adjourned debate on comrade Timson's paper was concluded.—T. B.

MANCHESTER.—At the gas-workers' meeting on Sunday in Stevenson Square the branch sold 135 Commonweals, 40 Freedom, and a quantity of other literature, besides distributing a large number of leaflets. At the Club, in the evening, comrade Barton gave a lecture on "Socialism and Politics."

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday, comrade Poynts, of Norwich, came and lent us a hand. No meeting in morning, owing to bad weather. In the evening, at Colman's Granary Quay, comrade Poynts delivered an earnest address. Fair sale of Commonweal.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87, Marlboro' Street, Dec. 7th, A. Kavanagh delivered a lecture on "Chattel Slavery v. Wages Slavery." Brisk discussion, in which King, Toomey, Hamilton, Fitzpatrick, and others took part.

EDINBURGH (S.S.F.).—On Tuesday Dec. 3, we held a social meeting in honour of Stepniak, who met with an enthusiastic reception. After partaking of tea and cake, short and earnest speeches were made by Stepniak, Glasie, Melliet, Lacroix, and McKenzie, and songs were rendered by several comrades, and a recitation by Miss Nicol. A very enjoyable evening was wound up by the singing of "Auld Lang Syne" and a hand-shaking all round. On Sunday Mr. Ritchie delivered an able lecture on "International Co-operation." After the usual "heckling," a good discussion took place, in which comrades Smith, Davidson, Hamilton, and others took part.

MONOPOLY.

Now I ask you to conceive of a society in which all sound and sane persons can produce by their labour on raw materials, aided by due tools, a due and comfortable livelihood, and which possesses a sufficiency of raw material and tools. Would you think it unreasonable or unjust that such community should insist on every sane and sound person working to produce wealth in order that he might not burden the community; or, on the other hand, that it should insure a comfortable livelihood to every person who worked honestly for that livelihood, a livelihood in which nothing was lacking that was necessary to his development as a healthy human animal, with all its strange complexity of intellectual and moral habits and aspirations?

Now, further, as to the raw material and tools of the community, which, mind you, are necessary to its existence: would you think it unreasonable if the community should insist that these precious necessities, things without which it could not live, should be used and not abused? Now, raw material and tools can only be used for the production of useful things; a piece of tillage, for instance, is not used by sowing it with thistles and dock and dodder, nor a bale of wool by burning it under your neighbours' window to annoy him; this is abuse, not use, of all these things, and I say that our community will be right in forbidding such abuse.

Again, would it be unreasonable for the community to say that these means of production, if they are to be used and not abused, must be used by those who can use them, that is, by all the sane and sound persons engaged in earning their livelihood in concert; that they are to be so used according to fair and natural regulations agreed upon by the whole community in its sane mind; and that, furthermore, since they are to be used by all, they must not be exclusively possessed, i.e., owned by any; because, if any private persons, or groups of such, held the exclusive possession or ownership of them, they could withhold the use of them from those who could use them except on terms which would place the useful persons in a position of inferiority to the useless; in other words they would be their masters, and would impose such a life on them as they chose. Therefore, I say those raw materials and tools would be the property of the whole community, and would be used by every one in it, on the terms that they should repair the waste in them and not engross undue shares of them.

Here, then, is our reasonable community, in which all can produce, all do produce, no one has to pay poll-tax to be allowed to work, that is to live; in which no man need be badly off unless by his own will; a society whose aim it is to make the most of their natural conditions and surroundings for the benefit of each and all of its members. These people I call reasonable men; but they have been called by other names, as breakers of the eighth commandment (or of all the commandments in the lump), brigands, assassins, greedy pillagers, enemies of society,—in a word, Socialists.

Look at another society, and see if we like it better. In it, as in our first one, all sane and sound persons can produce wealth by their labour on raw material aided by tools; nor is there any lack of raw materials and tools in this society; yet there the resemblance ceases, for one part of those who could do useful work will not, and consequently another part cannot; some of this second part can get no work to do, and are starved outright; others can get nothing but useless work to do, and thereby help to starve their brethren; and all those who produce anything, as we have seen before, are in an inferior position to those who do not.

The law of nature, that livelihood follows labour, is thus reversed, since those who work hardest get least, and those who work least fare best. Is this reasonable? Yet it is the direct and necessary result of those rights of property which the whole of our army, navy, police, judges, lawyers, parsons, etc., are banded together to sustain by whatever amount of fraud and violence may be necessary for its safeguarding. It is the result of monopoly; for now the field is no longer used only for its primary use, the growing of corn, the feeding of beasts, the building of a house upon it; it is also abused by being employed as a rent-squeezing machine for the supposed benefit of an individual, and the like is the case with the tools of labour; the stored up labour of past generations, the machinery, the means of transit, all these things are no longer used merely as means of production, that has now become their secondary use, which the law does not trouble itself with at all, since it has all its attention turned to its enforcing their abuse (now become their primary use) for the benefit of the owners; their abuse as instruments for squeezing rent, interest, and profit out of the producers.

Those that thus according to the (middle-class) ten commandments are so anxious to prevent what they call theft, are thus the masters—nay, the owners—of all society under our present system; outside them there is nothing whatever but machinery, metal, brutal, and human, for enabling them to produce, not the greatest amount of wealth, but the greatest amount of profit; and when the masters fall short in getting what they consider the due amount of profit produced by this said machinery, they say times are bad, even though the warehouses and granaries are full, and the power of producing wealth with decreasing labour is every day growing. High prices to them and also, unluckily, to their human machines, mean prosperity, because these latter are not in the least in the world rewarded for producing wealth for themselves, but for producing profits for their masters; the destruction of wealth by war and other calamities is good for their profit-grinding, therefore we have war; the waste of labour in all kinds of stupidities and fatuities is good for trade, therefore we have sham literature, sham art, sham enjoyment, newspapers, advertisements, jubilees, and all kinds of disgraces, to help our failing system to totter on a little longer, so that our sons instead of ourselves may have to face the inevitable ruin which, on these terms, must bring about the peace to come.

What help is there out of it all? I have spoken of the workers as the helpless machinery of commerce; and helpless they are as long as they are apathetically accepting their position as mere machinery in the hands of the masters of society; and yet it is they who have to bring about the change, and sweep away monopoly. The capitalists for any radical change are far more helpless than they are, because as capitalists, as a class, they cannot even conceive of any other means of living except as pensioners on others, and it is their accepted duty, nay, their religion, to resist all change in this direction; nor as individuals have they any means of earning their livelihood, if you take away their pensions before you have begun to reconstruct a new world in which they would find a place like other people; it is, therefore, impossible that the change can be made from above to below. No, it is the classes which are necessary to what of real society still hangs together behind the monstrous machinery of monopoly, it is the workers themselves that must bring about the change. And it is at least an incidental purpose of Socialist propaganda that the change should be, if possible, brought about or at least guided by the conscious intelligence of the workers, that it may not be left altogether to the blind forces of hunger, misery, and despair, which the capitalist system is so steadily piling up for its own overthrow. Apart from all the conscious politics, all the pushing this way and that, of semi-extinct Toryism and vague crude democracy, which is undoubtedly paving the way for revolution, the time is coming when the monopoly of the means of production will lose its value, when the employers will begin to cease to employ. Cut-throat competition ever cheapening means of production and exhausting markets on one hand; on the other, the unceasing struggle of the workers to improve their condition at the expense of the capitalists, will make employment for profit more difficult both to get and to give; will, in fact, bring about deadlock and ruin in spite of occasional improvements in trade. But if the workers have learned to understand their position, which means if they have become determined to make the best of the nature which they have so far conquered, in despite of artificial restrictions on labour for the benefit of a class, they need not fear the coming crisis. That very increase in the productivity of labour, which will ruin capitalism, will make Socialism possible, and it cannot be doubted that the progress of the cheapening of production will be quickened prodigiously in the very first days of the new social order, and we shall all find it easy enough to live a very few years after the time when we found it so difficult to make profits.

Nevertheless, it would be disingenuous if I seemed to try to create the impression that the abolition of monopoly—of the artificial restrictions on production—would be plain sailing, that it would come quite peacefully and without strenuous effort of various kinds. Things now going on do not encourage one to think that; hypocrisy where the movement seems weak in power or limited in aim, unscrupulous and relentless repression where it seems threatening and well instructed; no real signs of privilege yielding a jot without compulsion. And you must remember that all our law and government, from Parliament to a County Court, has now got to be just an elaborate defence of that very monopoly which it is our business to clear away, though they by no means began with that. True it is that if the whole class of workers could be convinced on one day or in one year of the necessity of abolishing monopoly, it would pass away like the clouds of night. But the necessities of the miserable, and the aspirations of the intelligent will outrun the slower process of gradual conversion, and the anti-monopolists will find themselves in a position in which they will be forced to try to get hold of the executive in order to destroy it, and thus metamorphose society not in order to govern by it and as they are now governed; in other words, they will have to sweep away all the artificial restrictions that stand in the way of free labour, and they will have to compel this step by some means or other. Those who set before them this necessity will doubtless differ at present as to the means whereby this will be done; but they should at least agree, and will agree when the time comes for action, that any means that are means, and are not unhuman, are good to use.

I have then tried to point out to you that the producing or useful class are in an inferior position to the non-producing or useless class; that this is a reversal of the law of nature that bids all to labour in order to live. That this monstrosity is the necessary result of private persons being allowed to treat the matters that are necessary to the fructification of labour as their property, and to abuse them by employing them as mere means of compulsion on the worker to pay tribute for leave to live. I have asked you to learn to agree with us Socialists in thinking it necessary to abolish this monopoly, and to combine together for its abolition and the reconstruction of society on the basis of the freedom of labour and the abolition of all privilege. I must add further that no programme is worthy the acceptance of the working-classes that stops short of the abolition of private property in the means of production. Any other programme is misleading and dishonest; it has two faces to it, one of which says to the working-man, "This is Socialism or the beginning of it" (which it is not), and the other says to the capitalist, "This is sham Socialism; if you can get the workers, or part of them, to accept this, it will create a new lower middle class, a buffer, to push in between Privilege and Socialism, and save you, if only for a while.

But this true programme, which means the abolition of privilege, is enough, for it must and will lead directly to full Socialism. It will draw the teeth of the dragon of capitalism, and make a society of equality possible; a society in which, instead of living among enemies in a state of things where there is nothing but a kind of armed truce between all men, we shall live among friends and neighbours, with whom indeed our passions or folly may sometimes make us quarrel, but whose interests cannot really be dissociated from our own. W. M.

THE RUSKIN READING GUILD.

It is no criticism on Socialism to say that Socialists show some resemblance to schoolboys, in their tendency to despise what is not of their own set. We are apt to be intolerant of independent opinion; and this the more if amongst ourselves, where we most look for uniformity, than in a stranger who followeth not with us. Like the new boy in a school, the latter is kicked and passed by; but a pitched battle ensues upon any division in our own ranks. Some apprehension may be felt for the Cause when at these times difference of opinion, like a sharp knife, slices important sections from the main body of Socialists. Yet is such division not fatal. The cuttings take root and grow. As in vivisection of the hydra of our duck-ponds, the dissevered parts assume the parent form and become new organisations. Perhaps in the end apprehension may prove groundless, since it is with ideas as in organic life—the more crowded the struggle the more rapid is the evolution, and the development more adapted to survive. Only, if Socialism is to result from the struggle, superiority should be shown in those characteristics that make for Socialism. In generosity we must excel, and by wisdom vanquish. From sarcasm comes no help; and to those who deal in personalities or scandal, to hear it eagerly, and harshly to howl it, what can result but long ears and a bray? Bitterness and rancour can develop only meanness and distrust, to prolong the era of individualism. Out of these, no Socialism can arise to shed its summer glory on the world. We must be tolerantly calm; then with the spread of wisdom brotherhood will increase. Isolated facts will seem contradictory for a time; but let all be admitted. When the general law is deduced, it will explain them all, and peace will be more secure than before. So long as our contest be friendly, what matters the number of competitors? The more hands digging in the field of truth the better. Presently the trenches shall run together; the traversed space will increase, and the buried treasure unearthed will be the common property of all.

Socialists have no monopoly of wisdom, and their sympathy should go out to all honest enquirers; not omitting such as are going over the old ground once more. Something overlooked may turn up; gold may yet be found in the ore we washed and left; our pyramid may be strengthened by another brick added somewhere at its base. At any rate it will be better for the searchers, as well as for us, to prove the admitted truth again. "Every mind must know the whole lesson for itself," says Emerson; and we who believe in brotherhood must acknowledge the kinship of every learner.

Amongst the claimants for our sympathy is the Ruskin Reading Guild. Many have tasted the rich fruit that Ruskin offers; others, in their haste, have passed him by. Here, accordingly, is this society making a fresh search of the tree. What they find will be to the former a serviceable reminder; to the latter it may be a revelation. Let not our theories be too narrow to include what treasure they bring. And they, for their part, must assay their metal with the touchstone of free-thought, and cast out the dross from their gold. In their monthly publication, the Ruskin Reading Guild Journal, the results of their labour are displayed; and having read a recent number, I am of opinion that they deserve some recognition from us.

In so far as they accept Ruskin's authority for their conclusions, these may be considered worthless—at least to them. Their opinions may be correct; but the coin is borrowed, and they must make it their own. "Re-examine," says Walt Whitman, "everything that you have been told"; and this good advice is good applied to Ruskin as to any other. So only shall the truth be sifted out. But an imitation of Ruskin's literary style—the double-barrelled adjectives, the slippery argument from epithets, the headlong sentiment unseasoned with any salt of humour—are not re-examination. Without the fire of Ruskin's native strength, the writers' enthusiasm sometimes borders on the comic. Yet their earnestness will save them; as a swift horse, it will carry them on to overtake the important truths they are following, which Socialists too will do well to keep in view. For face to face, as so many of our comrades are, with the facts of actual starvation, the elementary needs of the body push into the background all further aspirations; whereby it happens that some, listening to these and not understanding our aims, fear lest Socialism should bury culture in a dismal barrack-like existence. Nay, are there not some Socialists who have no higher ideal? But the Ruskin Reading Guild looks beyond. Its claims for a cultured life are intense, if narrow. Perhaps we must admit them to be narrow. One writer, describing a picture, ignores the æsthetic side of art—the mere delight in lovely form and colour—so enthusiastic is he for the meaning conveyed by the artist. Indeed, throughout the book pleasure is rather frowned upon, except as a means of educating "the soul." Education is divided into two sorts, and this on the "Master's" own authority: the false, namely, which delights us, and the true, which makes us unhappy. A rash statement, or over-statement rather; but typical of the energy of its authors, which sometimes carries them beyond the goal of their own meaning. Nevertheless, it is fair criticism to say that in their desire to exalt the "spiritual" they deny the "material." Their culture is to be didactic, and their art symbolical, rather than sensuous and in itself sufficient. One feels disposed to kick at this asceticism, and to claim the widest possible enjoyment for this present life.

Yet is width of happiness not all. The quality of it is to be reckoned as well as the quantity; perhaps even before it. I heard one child ask another, "Would you sooner have little and good, or much and not so good?" and the same question is ever before us to be answered. The Ruskinians say, Good, if only little; and can we find fault with their decision? Narrowness may be compensated for by depth. If our cup be deep enough, who knows but, like Thor's drinking-horn, its bottom may communicate with the infinite ocean? Very intense is the joy aimed at by Ruskin and his followers. In Carlyle's words, they seek "a higher than happiness in blessedness." So did the Chicago Anarchists, and none dare call them mistaken.

Much is to be learnt from a study of Ruskin; and for this the Reading Guild is making systematic preparations. Mazzini, too, and Tolstoi and Carlyle are in their programme, as throwing light on the "Master." Pity that the light should be so much of one colour. Why should the faithful doubt? Only the play-actor needs footlights: the hero shows best in the blazing sunshine. Is he truly greater than his worshippers? Then should they call in others to discourse with him—his equals, to whom alone he can fully disclose himself. Whitman, Darwin, Ibsen—what will he say to these, and these to him? The seeds of wisdom are sown in the mind where men like these compare notes.

The Idea is the first cause of progress. Duly the effects follow, clothing the cause in fact, until the ideal becomes actual. To-day's dream is of to-morrow's doing; but the dream is first and the other follows it, as the day follows the sun. The future society will be our creation rather than our manufacture. The thing we really want is mightier than all our conscious efforts to attain it, and it will grow in its own way. The Ruskinians have their ideal, the Collectivists another, and the Anarchists a third. Be very sure that none of these would flourish without some root in fact; and of these, that one which is to survive must never be partial, it must cover the whole ground, and possess that fact.

I say not partial, for I have little belief in parties. They savour too much of trade, with its advertisements. Let us rather have societies. Your party man has his pill to puff, and public analysis may ruin his profits. Not so the farmer, feeder of men. He knows no advertisements, and loves the light of the sun to enrich his harvest; and like him let us gather in truth, rejoicing in the plenty of our neighbours' fields. It is the true economy, whether applied to corn or to wisdom, to labour together as comrades in useful work; for neither can advertisements feed us, nor wrangling make us wise. Not amongst the advertisers do we class the Ruskin Reading Guild. Though not in the Socialist ranks, they are walking the same road with us, and it is good to give them greeting as we draw near together. G. S.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

HURRAH! We are nearing the land which shall be peopled by the faithful only! What's the reason of all this joy? Well, a big clothing house doing business has given 20,000 copies of Bellamy's book 'Looking Backward.' And to-day I read the following advertisement in the papers:

"WE SHALL GIVE AWAY
25,000 BOOKS

containing
EDWARD BELLAMY'S LATEST EFFORT,
LOOKING FORWARD,

Which will appear in the December number of the Nationalist Magazine,
Together with an excellent PORTRAIT OF MR. BELLAMY.

These books are for the working men and women entirely, and will be ready for distribution Dec. 2. To avoid the enormous rush that will occur on and after Dec. 2, you can apply at once in person for the book, and it will be mailed to your address in the order in which the applications occur."

But what does this prove? It proves that people over here begin to take so much interest in the social question that books dealing with the subject are supposed by commercial people to serve as a good means of advertising their wares. A pity, however, these gentry do not hit upon better works than those for which Bellamy is responsible. But I suppose we must be thankful even for small mercies.

The police of the city of New York appear to be permeated by Socialism. An "inferior" member of that body died lately, true up to the last moment to his belief in the correctness of the theory of Henry George and as an Atheist. He desired that some expression to his creed should be given in the orations over his grave. Sergeant Tims undertook this task, and delivered a good radical speech. In consequence the New York Volkzeitung sent a reporter to interview Tims. He said that he had always taken great interest in the writings of Marx, George, and Lassalle, and he added that according to his opinion every fifth man in the police force of New York believed in radical doctrines upon the social question. This gave the capitalistic press an opportunity for a series of most sensational articles. Flaming headlines like "Is the New York police force an Anarchistic body?" "Sergeant Tims, the friend of Herr Most and of the Anarchist Shevitsch," and so on, appeared in the dailies. The capitalists didn't know what to think of this. They believed the New York police the "finest" in the world, always ready to bludgeon into a jelly all enemies of property and all those opposed to law'n'order. Now all at once they have to learn that every fifth man of the force intended to protect property is himself a Socialist, an enemy of property and of the ruling classes. What is the world coming to! Action has not as yet been taken in the matter, but some people may take a friend's advice and look out for a "job" in some more congenial quarter.

The next annual convention of the Farmers and Labourers' Union will be held at St. Louis, December 3. The committee expect that there will be fully 500 delegates present. One of the features of the convention will be a proposition from the Northern Farmers' Alliance for a union of the two bodies, and several delegates will be present to effect that object if possible.

Trust certificates are in a bad way just now. A few days ago lead fell to below 20 dols. again and sugar to 68 dols., against 35 and 126 respectively attained by the certificates in June. There is too much "water" in this kind of business.

On the 18th of November the General Assembly of the Knights of Labour devoted the morning session to a full discussion in committee of the land question. By a nearly unanimous vote the following resolution was embodied in the constitution of the order:

"That the land, including all the natural sources of wealth, is the heritage of all the people and should not be subject to speculative traffic. Occupancy and use should be the only title to the possession of land, and the taxes upon land should be levied upon its value for use, exclusive of improvements, and should be sufficient to take for the community all unearned increment."

This is not quite Georgeism. George wants a single tax, whereas the above resolution leaves a loophole open for an additional income-tax. Later General Master Workman Powderly and A. W. Wright of the General Executive Board were appointed a committee on behalf of the General Assembly to attend the convention of the farmers' organisations to be held at St. Louis, December 3rd, 1889.

In regard to taking independent political action, it was concluded to leave each member free, as heretofore, to act as he saw fit, but that the agitation for independence be kept up in the columns of the organ of the order. It was voted that the ritual of the order shall be printed in the Hebrew language.

The following resolution was also adopted:

"Whereas, the accumulation of vast fortunes in the hands of a few, and the growth of a plutocracy, threatening the stability and existence of free institutions, render important a knowledge of economic conditions to successfully resist aggression from these dangers; therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the General Assembly of the Knights of Labour, that it is our judgment that the next census of the United States should show what proportion of the people of this country occupy their homes and farms, what proportion have their property free from debt, and, of the homes and farms under mortgage, what percentage of the value is so mortgaged.

"Resolved, that the secretary of the General Assembly be and he is hereby instructed to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, and to Hon. John W. Noble, secretary of the interior, Washington, D.C.

"Resolved, further, that all local assemblies be urged to at once adopt resolutions requesting congressmen from their respective districts to use their influence to have those facts collected and published."

The 19th of November was devoted to the discussion of the eight hour question. A letter was read from Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labour, of which I gave a summary in my last. Some surprise was expressed that the letter detailed no fixed plan of action. The eight hour committee submitted the following resolutions, which have been adopted:

"Resolved, that we coincide with the last expressed views of the President of the American Federation of Labour, expressing as they do the sentiments of that organisation that no general strike should be inaugurated upon May 1, 1890, and that the movement should be confined to such trades as are in condition to put the plan in operation on May 1, 1890.

"Resolved, that we call upon the President of the American Federation of Labour to indicate the trade or trades organised within the folds of that society which is or are prepared to successfully inaugurate the eight hour movement on May 1, 1890, confident that the Knights of Labour will lend their moral support to the movement in favour of such trade or trades."

It was also resolved that the Assembly recommend that, wherever practicable, the members should arrange for a reduction of the hours of labour to nine and a-half hours per day, or 57 hours per week, for the year beginning March 30, 1890, and a reduction of one half-hour daily each succeeding year, until the eight hour point is attained.

In the debate preceding the adoption of the report, all who spoke expressed themselves in favour of a reduction of hours, but that to set any special day when a big strike should be made for a reduction of hours from ten to eight without being amply prepared for it, would be worse than foolish—it would be criminal.

The action of the Knights has given the coup de grace to the so-called eight hour movement. When will labour organisations cease to engage in such Sisyphus-like work? I suppose when doomsday is near at hand.

The Assembly came to a close on the 20th of November. In future all local assemblies attached to the General Assembly will pay a per capita tax of 10 cents per quarter instead of 6 cents as heretofore. The general executive board were empowered at their discretion to put on an assessment tax of not more than 20 cents for the next year.

The most interesting vote was that over the place of holding the next General Assembly. There were a number of applicants, the most prominent being Toledo, Ohio, Albany, Denver, and Birmingham, Eng. Under the rules of the Knights, the final selection is made by the executive board, which takes one from the three cities receiving the highest votes. Toledo will, in all probability, be the scene of the next General Assembly. The large vote received by Birmingham is taken as an indication of a strong tendency to extend the order across the water. Birmingham showed such strength that it will undoubtedly be chosen for some future General Assembly.

Grand Master Workman Powderley's request to cut down his salary from 5,000 dols. to 2,500 dols. was refused by the Assembly. Everybody from the beginning regarded this request as only meant in a "Pickwickian sense." Powderley closed the convention. He impressed upon members the necessity for pursuing the present conservative policy.

November 30 will be the twentieth anniversary of the Knights of Labour.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CO-OPERATIVE TYRANNY AND COMPETITION.

Dear Sir,—A meeting of the Co-operative Wholesale was held at Manchester on Saturday, December 7th, and one of the most important recommendations was to purchase land outside Leicester with the object of obtaining cheap labour to successfully compete with another co-operative shoe works and smash it. Here is proof that in this case co-operators are profit mongers, and care for very little else. A number of delegates were sent from Leicester to get the matter postponed for three months, so that the members might have time to consider it; but when one of the delegates arose for the third time to put the matter fully before the meeting, he was voted down and not allowed to speak. I simply state the facts. The evils of unchecked competition were felt to be a mighty leech sucking the very vitals from the masses, when co-operation arose to check it, stamp it out, or put it on a rational basis.

But what does the action at Manchester prove? It proves that co-operators generally are moving on the very lines they feared and condemned, so much so that they used their might to crush the right of a fellow delegate to speak on the subject that he was specially appointed to deal with by an influential society in the Midlands. He claimed the right to vindicate the action of those who took a different view of the matter to the board. Improper motives were attributed to the delegates from Leicester, and dishonourable innuendoes were levelled at them, yet he was denied the right to explain and repudiate. Such an action is one of the meanest and most contemptible of its kind; and no men but profit-seekers and bigots would be guilty of such a tyrannical act. This will put the workers on their guard, and teach them what to expect from men, who though co-operators, when interest and profit are concerned can act like this. Does not such action prove that Socialists are not far wrong when they say that co-operation is only joint-stockism? And that the statements made in the Trades Union Congresses that co-operations are worse and more tyrannical than private firms as employers of labour, are true. To estrange these two sections of the community from the movement will be its death knell.

Can co-operation be a remedy for the evils of competition while the fundamental factors of rent, interest, and profit are the same in both cases? In both co-operation and competition this is a very serious question for all to consider. The masses have looked for social salvation from co-operation, and it is to be feared that they have been deceived. Let us look at a few facts:—The Co-operative Wholesale have become boot and shoe makers, but fail in the first essential of true co-operation—bonus to labour—this they do not give, besides the unfair or unsatisfactory way the work is given out. The men in the trade refuse to go to work there in busy times, because they are treated so shabbily. A new society of working-men is formed; they succeed, and give bonus to labour, and the conditions are first-class. But they are independent of the wholesale, and have succeeded well in getting work for about 250 men and women. To smash this society seems to be the object of the official gang, and no doubt it is so; else how is it they passed the resolution so hurriedly through—denying the right of full discussion. So, to effect that object, they leave one of the best and most healthy factories in the town to go outside with about £17,000 invested, and no prospect of letting it, in order to destroy this new co-operative society; and at the factory they are going to leave there is room for enlarging it to last about 10 years.

Thus to get profit, and crush out a new society that has dared to start, succeed, and give bonus to labour, the co-operators are imitating the worst employers by going into the county for cheap labour. What can be said to this?

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Home Secretary "does not feel justified in departing from the decision" to keep George Harrison in prison up to the full period of his sentence—five years. In the hurried rush of great events, which seems to have become chronic, there is always danger that he will be forgotten; but all those interested in him, and they are many, should make a point of periodically bringing up his case and refreshing the public memory.

The citizens of this great metropolis have been gratified by the news of an addition of a thousand more lambs to the law-'n'-order flock. That is to say, those of the citizens have been gratified for whose benefit the addition will be made. But those who work and suffer among the citizens, are not so very grateful as they reflect upon the thousand more batons ready for their benighted heads if they are ever raised an inch above the mud of their ordinary lives. A thousand more protectors for scabs and sweaters; a thousand more repressors of any effort at improvement on the part of under-paid workmen, this is what it means.

"There is one moral to be learned from Silvertown, and that is that the whole labour movement is not to be carried by strikes. The impetuous rush on the position has been stayed; the workers have been taught by sad experience that a fight with unorganised forces and scanty funds may be beaten back by a determined resistance on the part of a cool, hard, unrelenting employer. The lesson must be taken to heart. It should teach the workers to perfect their organisations." So says the Star, which then proceeds to spoil a good note by feebly adding, "and also to keep a weather-eye open for legislative remedies."

There would be small need of fooling with any "legislative remedies" if only the workers would "perfect their organisations."

To follow the docker's victory with the Silvertown defeat; the wonderful solidarity of labour which had gladdened all hearts, with the eager scramble after the gasmen's places by a degraded mob of blacklegs; this is one of the salutary lessons of experience, one of the reverses which mean renewed victory. Anyone who had watched the fighting of labour battles for any length of time, knew well that the successes, such as they were, in recent conflicts would mean a crushing defeat in the near future.

There is nothing more fatal in war than to under-estimate your enemy, or to over-estimate your friends. The winning of so many battles in so short a time has for the moment demoralised the labour army, and has made it less careful and far-seeing than it should be in meeting its powerful enemy. Seeing how large the floating army of unorganised, and for the present unorganisable, "blacklegs" still is, will serve to force home the fact that there will have to be wider and much more cautious preparations before another fight is begun.

It is not possible to believe that the Executive of the Amalgamated Engineers is anything else than a collection of hide-bound self-seekers, a mere clique which has fastened itself upon a powerful organisation and paralyses all the centres of its activity. Were it anything else it would not have behaved as it has done over the Silvertown strike; nor would its members have remained so calmly under the rain of scorn that has covered them.

And if the engineers as a body were much better than their "leaders," they would long since have leaped into rage under the sting of the contempt which is expressed for them by the bulk of awakened working-men, since "engineer" has become synonymous with "rat." Could they even confess their membership in the Amalgamated Society without a blush?

At this time also it would be well if the London Trades' Council were brought to book. What this detestable gang of hypocritical reactionaries really are and mean to be we know right well. Also we have some idea of what a true trades council might be made. What we are anxious to know is, how long the London trades are going to allow their name to be taken in vain and their efforts neutralised by this worse than nullity?

But it may be that the bulk of the London trades are like the Amalgamated Engineers, rats at heart, and only anxious for themselves. Even in that case, though, one would have thought they had sense enough to see that the best way of helping themselves was by combination with their fellows. "Two heads are better than one any day, even if one be a sheep's!"

Papers to hand by last mail from the Argentine speak of renewed strikes and labour troubles. Among others, the men in the Southern Railway workshops had to come out because some of the older hands among them were being dismissed for their part in the former strike. The works were guarded by police, and everything was done upon the "civilised" plan obtaining in the effete and corrupt European monarchies. Republics in the new world, as in the old, don't seem to be the happy hunting-grounds for workmen that some people would make them out to be.

The fatuities of the Pall Mall are beyond measure. In one column of one issue it advocated the knighting of Stanley for his plunder-raid in Africa, and the more complete police-censorship of literature in London. A good record for one evening! In the same column it warmly endorsed a "Commons Preservation Society" and other means of enforcing public rights. As I came upon that after reading the gush about Stanley, an eager regret came over me that some of the poor natives of Mid-Africa had not preserved their commons a little better from the enterprising pioneer of exploitation and monopoly! Also that one of these days a "Readers' Protection Society" should take up the defence of freedom of speech, even for pornography, making it hot in the meantime for the McDougall-Stead-policeman who is the guardian of Mrs. Grundy.

In the same column there is an attack on "the detestable French custom of giving Government monopolies to certain favoured individuals." But why, then, ask for a Government monopoly of morality on behalf of the pharasaical combination of prudens and prurient ascetics?

A lady who works among the poor in the South of London told me the other day with much unction and feeling that in Price's candle-factory none but girls of "good moral character" are employed; that the moment a girl "loses her character" she is dismissed. The wages are fairly good and the employés well treated. Virtuous and pious citizens and citizenesses, please note, and buy of Price's! (This "par" is not an advertisement.)

Seriously, is it not time that even the pious and virtuous made a mental effort, and tried at last to understand what they drive men and women to by their false sentiment and false notions of social purity? Price sheds his shining light amid a crowd of less virtuous factories "of extremely bad character," as my friend said with bated breath, "where prostitutes are content to take a low wage to eke out their shameful trade." Is it not just possible that the houses of fair fame send them thither on casting them out of doors? The religious mind turns a deaf ear to all argument, however; I receive a pious smile, and—"The Lord's will be done!"

The stout-hearted women who step among the dead and wounded on a battle-field, accepting the waste and destruction of life as heaven-sent, and those, no less courageous, who spend their lives in succouring the poor and administering comfort and advice after their own fashion—there is something ghastly about their resignation and inability to grasp the true meaning of the ills and vices they live amongst, and something pitiable and exasperating in the enthusiasm, self-satisfaction, and self-completion they feel in their minute and isolated corner of the world. Given a woman addicted to good works who lives near a slum and works hard in it, sees and talks to some scores of working-folk in the week, and must necessarily accumulate a good deal of interesting facts about work and wages, and learn something about the lives and troubles of the workers, and you have usually a complete example of how not to assimilate useful information and deduct inferences from it!

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The Elberfeldt monster-trial is still going on, and nearly every day a new police spy comes to the front. It seems that the Social Democratic party in Germany is as much infested with this abominable vermin as the Anarchist party. It is said that the trial got up by all these Kamhoffs and other beasts has already cost the State 60,000 mk.; and the accused will be at a loss of 25,000 mk. (loss of wages, travelling, and other expenses). Further, 31 workers have already been dismissed by their employers on account of their being connected with the trial. In spite of all these trumped-up conspiracies, the cause of Socialism "marches on" in Germany as everywhere else, and this trial will have the same result as all the former ones, namely: for one man lost by imprisonment, one or two dozen won to Socialism!

A new issue of our Hamburg contemporary Der Zeitgeist has just been published, and contains the following articles:—Conception, contents, object and meaning of popular hygiene; Saving; Contributions to the solution of the question of industrial arbitration; Chambers of Trade; Truth pierces every obstacle; Decay of small trade; What is to become of me in future; German fundamental rights of 1848; The origin of the wage system; The revision of the laws relating to relief societies; On the causes of the increasing consumption of spirits; The poverty and degradation of the working women of Berlin: The destitution of the miners and the riches of the mine-owners in Westphalia, etc., etc.

At Brünswig the Vereinsblatt für Maurer (The Mason's Trade Paper) has been suppressed by the muzzle-laws of the Iron Chancellor.

Comrade Oscar Wieske, for having laid down a wreath with the following inscription, "All honour to the deceased and may his example be followed," got three months imprisonment, because the silly Nupkinses of Kottbus considered that dreadful inscription to be a Socialist demonstration!

BELGIUM.

All the weavers of La Linière, at Liège, are on strike, and it is now a good long time since they first left off working. The masters have tried to get "blacklegs" from other towns, especially Mechelen, but they have tried in vain, and the workers are bound to win. They are well supported by the Liège section of the Belgian Socialistic Party, and the co-operative society "La Populaire" distribute daily bread and vegetables to the strikers and their families. Numerous meetings are held also, and the propaganda of Socialist ideas is carried on with great success. The workers used to go to their meeting-places in processions, but the very liberal burgomaster of Liège, M. d'Andrimont, has put a stop to it, and street demonstrations are no longer allowed. We hope that the workers will see that the Liberal party, and even the so-called Radical section of it, is exactly as bad for them as the Clerical party, and that they will no longer go in for these electioneering business politics, by which they can only waste their energies and compromise even the cause they intend to serve—the revolutionary Socialist cause.

In order to show what these Liberals and Clericals over there really are, one more example. Pourbaix, the scoundrel who has acted as agent provocateur in the miners' strikes of 1887 and 1888, has finally got two years' imprisonment—which, by the by, he is not even likely to undergo, because he is the Premier's good friend. Bara, a former Minister of Justice in a Liberal Cabinet, fulminated during a five hours' speech against De Volder, the present and Clerical Minister of the Interior, because this De Volder, along with the Premier Beernaert, had allowed a number of innocent men to be prosecuted, knowing, as he did, that Pourbaix, who caused the prosecution to be instituted, was a paid agent of the secret service. "You are unworthy to be a Councillor of the Crown, your true place is in the dock, you ought to be sent to prison yourself; you have no longer any claim to the respect of honest men." And so on for five hours. In the evening of that very same day, M. Anspach-Puissant, an influential moneybag at Brussels, gave a banquet, at which the Liberal Bara and the Clerical De Volder occupied the places of honour on the right and left of the financial magnate! What do you think, then, Belgian workers, of the "unworthy" De Volder and of the "worthy" Bara? Are they not exactly the same sort of mountebanks?

Comrade L. Bertrand, of Brussels, has started a new paper for the special propagation of the Socialist co-operative ideas. It is called Les Co-opérateurs Belges, and appears monthly.

On the 1st of January next another paper will be issued by the "Young Socialist Vanguard" of Brussels. It is to be called Le Conscrit, and will mostly deal with the military question: abolition of conscription, permanent armies, and kindred subjects.

In order to incite our English comrades to make somewhat more vigorous efforts in their propaganda by way of spreading our Socialist literature, papers, pamphlets, leaflets, etc., we may as well give here the amount of printed matter sent out in one year (October 1888-89) by one town—Ghent:

AUSTRIA.

A new Socialist paper has been started last week at Vienna, and will appear on the 2nd and 4th Monday in each month, under the editorship of comrade R. Hauser. It is entitled Die Volkspresse (The Press of the People), and intends to bring the Socialist ideas to the indifferent masses of the people. The first issue of the paper contains an official communication, stating that the new organ will be edited in accordance with the views and principles laid down at the last Congress at Hainfeldt, where the Austrian Socialists, as our readers will remember, have come to a mutual understanding, and dropped all their former differences of opinion. We hope that the new venture will do considerable good among those workers who have not as yet grasped the principles of Socialism. The administration of the paper, published by comrade A. Heimann, is situated in Vienna, Neulercheufeld, Herbstrasse, 3, 3rd floor 28.

ITALY.

The tribunal of Forli has granted Amilcare Cipriani one year jail and a goodish fine of 1,000 lire, for provocation to civil war. But as Cipriani has thought it better to live outside the sacred frontiers of his "generous" Italy, he is allright for all that. He has just answered his judges, as it were, by an article which appeared in La Revue Europeenne of Paris, under the heading of "Force against Force."

L'Associazione says that in the recent communal elections in Italy abstention from voting has been very marked. "To select a few of the most important figures, we note that in Rome out of 45,000 electors only 16,000 have voted; in Naples, 12,000 out of 35,000; in Florence, 8,000 out of 18,000; Leghorn, 8,400 out of 17,000; Turin, 13,620 out of 261,30; Milan, 21,000 out of 41,000; Ferli, 2,300 out of 4,300." The Associazione puts a great deal of this down to the abstentionist propaganda work of the Anarchist party; this may have had some influence, but the probabilities are that it is principally due to laissez faire, the apathy of some, the hopelessness of others among the disinherited, and the cynicism of modern well-to-do society.

SPAIN.

MADRID.—There is a strike among the paper factory employés, and as it bids fair to remain firm the mill-owners have published in the journals a notice asking for hands from the provinces and abroad.

ALCOY.—A strike is declared in a paper-mills here also, and the employés in the other establishments are manifesting their solidarity and intend to support them.

"Seafaring."

We are glad to see that the printing of our bright little contemporary Seafaring, organ of the Sailors' and Firemen's Union, has been transferred to a fair house, Messrs. Perkins, Bacon, and Co., of Whitefriars. Our readers will remember that the Commonweal was the first to call attention to the fact that the paper was printed at an unfair house.

The End of the Manchester Gas Strike.

We are sorry to say the Manchester gas stokers have been beaten in their plucky attempt to get rid of blacklegs. The treason of those who are a disgrace to the workers, and the money power at the back of a rich Corporation, has proved too strong for them. Such a defeat, though it involves intense suffering, does not dishonour the men. It is rather the victors who should be ashamed of their victory.

Impending Strike of Scottish Railway Men.

The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants met on Sunday in Glasgow to consider the replies received to their demand for ten hours daily. Mr. Tait (secretary) said the replies left the members practically the same as when they met on the 1st December, but the Glasgow and South-Western Company had advanced the wages in several departments. The meeting approved the recommendation of the executive that the men give notice to cease work on a given day and remain out till the demand was conceded, but that the men all over the country should be first asked whether they approved of this step.

N.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Gas-stokers Strike.

The gas-stokers' strike marks a crisis in the revolt against the sweater. The attack by Mr. Livesey upon the gas stokers, taking as it has done the insidious form of a profit-sharing scheme, is a blow aimed not only at that union alone but at the whole labour movement, the rapid spread of which has struck terror into the hearts of every slave-driving capitalist in England. It may be doubted very much if Mr. Livesey is the only person responsible for the scheme. It is quite certain that his company would not be the only one to profit by it, if it were successful. The various gas companies all agreed to accept the men's terms last summer, when they were forced upon them by a threatened strike. Is it to be too suspicious to say that they have also agreed in common to attack the men in their weakest position, and at the time of the year when there are plenty of unemployed men in town and country to act as blacklegs? One thing is quite certain, i.e., not only the gas companies but every sweater would rejoice at Mr. Livesey's success. The market would be flooded at once with profit-sharing schemes, to which the conditions prefixed would be that the money would be held in hand by the sweaters, and would be forfeited at once if the work-people went on strike or joined a union. It behoves, therefore, not only the gas-stokers, but every workman in London to fight to the death on the side of the gas-stokers. If these men are defeated not only will they sink into hopeless slavery, but every union that has sprung up within the last few months throughout the country will be in danger. These unions will not only have to fight for the advantages they have gained but for very life itself; the gas-stokers must not be defeated. If it is necessary to gain the victory, London must not only be plunged in darkness and the supply of coal stopped, but every new union must be prepared to bring out its men, and tramways, railways, and docks alike be idle. A good lesson might be learnt from the events of last week; the coal-porters threatened to stop the supply of the coal of London; the middle-class press wailed, raved, and cursed, but the men have got their demands. The gas-stokers were moderate, they only proposed to stop the supply of gas in what is essentially a working class quarter, where the wealthy do not reside; they are out in the cold at the present moment, and they are likely to remain so for all the middle-class care. What does it matter to them if South London is without light, so long as the West End and other "respectable" parts are well illuminated? Now, I do not advise that these extreme means be taken at once, but it strikes me that if the middle and upper classes knew that the organised workmen of London were prepared to paralyse trade throughout the whole metropolis rather than allow the gas-stokers to be beaten, very strong influence would soon be brought to bear upon Mr. Livesey to make him give way.

Of course, we shall be told that such action will alienate "public sympathy;" that means, of course, the sympathy of the very people whom every worker, who wishes to gain his own, will have to fight. A labour agitation conducted in accordance with the opinion of the middle and upper classes would be a very tame and spiritless thing indeed. We know very well what it is. We have had plenty of it under the leadership of Broadhurst, Shipton, and Co., for the last twenty years, but the people haven't got much "forrarder" in consequence. The New Trade Unionism is surely going to do better than that.

The strike has not been devoid of interesting and amusing incidents. The funniest story is that told by the manager of the West Greenwich Gas Works, who stated that he was glad the union men had gone, because they had got into the inconvenient habit of suddenly leaving off work to search the place for blacklegs. Sometimes they found them, and then the manager had to turn the wretched blacklegs out.

The shameful way in which the whole forces of the Government have been placed at the disposal of Mr. Livesey is worthy of remark. This is most apparent even in the reports of the reactionary press. We have always thought that picketting was legal, but the horde of police and mounted men would not allow the pickets even to approach the blacklegs, the footmen driving them away, and the mounted men charging upon them and completely scattering them. Not only was this terrorism carried on by the police in the interest of our modern shareholders, but there cannot be the least doubt that after the blacklegs left the railway stations in the custody of the police they were virtually prisoners. Those who have lived in the country know that that wretched serf, the agricultural labourer, of whom there were many among the blacklegs, always stands in the utmost dread of those who are set in authority over him, and it is hardly likely if any of the "new hands" had felt repentant that they would have dared to have broken through the strong cordon of police who surrounded them to join the strikers. The police, too, appeared, quite willing to use force upon occasion, as at the Old Kent Road, where one unfortunate man, who was inclining his ear to what the pickets had to say, was dragged by the active and intelligent officers into the gas-works to be a blackleg whether he liked it or not. It is even now certain that the large force of police that garrisons every one of the companies' works are there less to protect the blackleg from the strike than to keep them to their work. It is a known fact that many of the "new hands" would have bolted long ago from the dismal hells in which they are confined were it not for the police. Mr. Livesey has been endeavouring to enliven the monotony of their confinement by a "religious" service on Sunday, in which we presume the god was invoked who presides over dirty actions. We mean the god who took Jacob into favour because he had done his brother Esau out of his birthright. We hear that the blacklegs smoked during the service; if Mr. Livesey could only have had a few pots of beer handed round, it would have made the thing complete. That philanthropic gentleman directly he got his blacklegs forced them to slave for 12 hours daily; the union time, eight hours, has been abolished. Can we doubt now why the profit-sharing scheme was introduced?

At Rotherhithe on Friday, December 13th, a large number of blacklegs were brought from Birmingham. Many of these, directly they found there was a strike on, scaled the wall of the gas-works to get out, thus proving that the police would not let them out by the gates. One of these men in the ardour of his conversion began trying the strength of a policeman's helmet with a piece of granite. Unfortunately his experiments in the public interest have been checked by a sentence from a police magistrate of 21 days. A worthy constable, Marchant 511 B, struck a striker, cutting his lip; the magistrate bound the striker (not the constable) over to keep the peace for three months.

The police have been having quite a good old time of the Trafalgar Square pattern. W. Thorne, the secretary of the Gas Stokers' Union, has had enough of their kindness. First, he was hustled off the platform of the Old Kent Road station when endeavouring to speak to some blacklegs. Again, he sought an interview with Major Gilbert at Vauxhall to know if picketting was permitted. The worthy gentleman answered by setting his police bullies on to him, who literally threw him out of the place. We were told a little while ago that both the Tory Government and the police were friendly to striking workmen. Their friendship does not last long, and seems to depend upon the number and strength of the strikers. I cannot help quoting the remark of a stoker, when he saw the huge force of police collected to maintain blacklegism as part of the law and constitution. "What need is there for 400 police to watch a few poor, half-starved stokers?" It will take a great deal to persuade workmen that the Tories are their friends after this shameful police tyranny. Why the very blacklegs and police are recruited from places where Toryism is rampant. The events of last week should shake the faith of workmen in both political parties, for while the strikers have been hounded down by police acting under the orders of a Tory Government, the middle-class Liberals and their organs, like the Daily News, stood by and applauded. But despite the efforts of both political parties, the men stand a fair chance of winning. The fog we had last week has nearly used up Livesey's supply of gas. The coal boycott of the sailors and coal porters promises to be effective; and it is to be hoped that Mr. Livesey and his company will get a good thrashing.

German Capitalists and English Trades Unions.

According to the Berlin correspondent of the Sheffield Independent, it appears that some German capitalists have recently visited England in order to see for themselves the working of our trades unions, and to obtain information upon the labour question generally. They were of course informed by the orthodox officials of old-fashioned trade-unionism that the English workers did not favour Socialism, and were generally "reasonable." The German capitalists have come to a different conclusion. They say they have found that Socialism is spreading in England, and that the trade unions encouraged it. They were quite right in their opinion that Socialism is spreading; but if they think that Messrs. Shipton, Broadhurst, and Co. encourage Socialism they labour under one of those curious delusions as to English affairs peculiar to the "intelligent foreigner." The German Government would be only too happy to have such "reasonable" people to deal with as the present chiefs of English trade-unionism. N.

BRANCH SECRETARIES PLEASE NOTE.

As we are going to press a day earlier next week, on account of Christmas Holidays, comrades are asked to send in their reports and lecture notices by first post on Monday morning.

REPORTS.

STREATHAM.—Good number of comrades turned up at the Liberal Club debate, "England a Republic," a Socialist in the chair. A collection after the meeting for the gas strikers was not allowed by the committee, and was returned to each one in the room who had contributed; 4s. 8d. was, however, collected by the secretary of Streatham Labourer's Union on the pavement outside the club. The general feeling was one of heartfelt sympathy with the strikers, and indignation at the mean cowardice of the Streatham "Liberals." A carman of the Labourers' Union has been sacked at a minutes notice on Saturday night by a master noted for working his men 17 hours a-day.

ABERDEEN.—At meeting on 9th, Mrs. Lynn Linton's article "About Ireland," in the New Review, was read and discussed.

GLASGOW.—On Monday evening Joe and Tim Burgoyne spoke on Cathedral Square to a good audience; on Wednesday Dan McCulloch gave a lecture on "Education under Socialism" to the Springburn Literary Society, the criticism which followed being entirely favourable; on Sunday, at 1 o'clock, Joe Burgoyne spoke on Jail Square, and at 5.30 at Paisley Road Toll.

LEICESTER.—Chambers and Barclay spoke in Russell Square on Sunday morning; an adjourned discussion of a lively character in the Radical Club in the evening. Chambers also gave an address in the Irish National Club.—A. G.

YARMOUTH.—No meeting in the morning; in the afternoon at the discussion class there was a good attendance; comrade Brightwell opened a discussion on "Socialism and Anarchy," followed by Headley, Edwards, and Willmott. In the evening, at Colman's Granary Quay, we opened by singing "The Starving Poor," followed by comrade Ruffold, closing with "Leisure and Pleasure;" we then marched along the quay, under the red flag, singing "Trafalgar Square;" three new members, and all the Weals sold out.

WALSALL.—At the Socialist Club, 18, Goodall Street, December 8th, J. Rowson delivered a lecture on "The Present System." On Sunday last H. Sanders lectured on "A Socialist Programme for Town Councils." Both well received, and several new members joined.

DUBLIN.—At the Progressist Club, 87, Marlborough Street, on December 14th, in the absence of the appointed lecturer, T. Fitzpatrick delivered an address on "The Coming Slavery"—an exhaustive attack on the theories of collectivism; very good discussion; Hamilton, Wilson, Kavanagh, and Wiedesleder, a German comrade, spoke.

EDINBURGH (S.S.F.).—We had a good meeting on Sunday night in the Moulders' Hall, when comrade McCulloch (Glasgow) delivered a very interesting lecture on "Wealth and its Producers," which gave rise to an animated discussion on the blessings and otherwise of trades-unionism, and the wisdom of directing our energies more in the way of unionism. The "soon" comrades feared that thereby the central idea might be lost sight of, and stoutly championed pure and unadulterated Socialism.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday evening, in our hall, we had a capital paper from comrade Doleman, "Is Socialism Practicable?" Discussion followed, in which several members took part. We are just starting our winter campaign and hope to follow up with larger meetings.

SHEFFIELD.—On Saturday a good meeting was held at Gower Street at 12. Large attendance of men employed in ironworks at Pinstone Street at 8 p.m. On Sunday good meetings were held at Gower Street; Monolith, Fargate; Steam Clock, Brightside; and Pump, Westbar—addressed by comrades Charles, Bingham, Palfryman, McBride, and Mowbray (of London). Our ideas were received with great enthusiasm. Good collections for the strikers at Brown's Flue Department made at all meetings. Sale of literature very good; we sold out our Commonweal—three quires—on the Saturday, and had to telegraph for three quires more for Sunday, all of which were sold. Some 18s. was taken for Commonweal and pamphlets.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To those who have obtained copies of the Commonweal through the propagandist work of our comrades, by free distribution in the streets and public conveyances, or by purchase at our outdoor stations, we ask if in agreement with our principles to help the sale of the Commonweal by ordering it of their newsagents, and sending on to us the names of newsagents willing to sell it; and still better, as our outdoor work must shortly be reduced, by joining the local branches and helping on the work.

A SOCIAL EVENING to members of the Socialist League will be given by the Propaganda Committee, at the Hall of the Socialist League, 24 Great Queen St., on New Year's Eve, at 8 p.m. Secretary of Propaganda Committee will read report of work done during last half year, to be followed by discussion and Concert; Recitations by comrade Darwood. Meeting and Concert free to all members.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International
Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary
Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers
instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome.
Labour would be employed in co-operation,
and the struggle of man with man for bare
subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would
no longer be dependent on idle property-owners
for subsistence; thus they would be brothers,
for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal,
for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries.
There would be no great centres breeding race
hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities
not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property
destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other
one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine
Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE "intelligent and sympathetic" middle-classes do not seem to have had the strike-fever in a very severe form. After having contributed to the victory of the dockers (whatever that amounted to), they seem to have thought that they had exhausted all the claims that could be made on their "intelligent sympathy," and allowed the poor folk at Silvertown to be slowly crushed down by capitalist tyranny, without showing any signs that they were conscious of that terrible struggle against starvation with or without employment.

Of course, I except Stopford Brooke's eloquent appeal for justice to these poor people; but it fell upon the ears of a class who were not going to accept two such bothers in one year as two strikes that shocked their sensibility.

As to the gas-stokers' strike, that is quite another matter. For are they not in the receipt of quite splendid wages? Don't they get as much in a week as a very small gentleman of the proprietary class, or the parasitical class, gets in a day? What on earth can they want more? They want to be free to strike, forsooth, in case their employer thinks fit to put on the screw! What next? They will get ideas of independence into their heads, and what becomes of us, then, the pensioners, of us the parasites? No, no, this is no case for sympathy; these men are our enemies, and, what is more, are beginning to know it. Instead of subscribing for them, let us use brute force against them, and show them that they shall not be allowed to argue with their fellow-workmen.

Well, gentlemen! there is much truth in this view of your period of convalescence from the strike fever. These men are indeed your enemies, for their interests are opposed to yours; and as a class, gentlemen, whatever you may think in your more maudlin moments, when your hypocrisy gets so much the better of your tyrannical greed that it even deceives yourselves, you will not and cannot give up anything to the workers beyond the mere subsistence wage according to the standard of the day, unless you are compelled to do so by force; i.e., by the fear of material injury to your purse or persons.

And that standard of the day, gentlemen, do you really trouble yourselves as to the lowness of it? the horror and disgrace of such a mass of semi-starvation? Silvertown did not move you. And indeed why should it have done so, when such a livelihood is so common? When you know, or could know by asking a very few questions, what the standard of livelihood is for our field-labourers! When you know, and cannot help knowing, that you have made the beautiful garden-like country-side of England into a mere hell of barrenness for the people who feed you! A hell from which the country people flee to that other hell of the city slums, to make for you fresh entanglements of that "social problem" that you gabble about continuously—with no real intention of trying to solve it.

Who can wonder, so sweet as life is for rich people in our civilisation? Nothing short of the fear of imminent break-up, of a break-up of the "status and lives" of those now living at least, can really fix their attention on the fate of the "nation of the poor" amongst whom they dwell; and, for the rest, the strikes do not seem to them threatening enough for them to trouble much about them. As for the field-labourers, they know how weak they are; perhaps they think them weaker than they really are; and the cry of "the land for the people" frightens them so little, that some of them will even coquette with it in the game of politics, which is the top amusement of the proprietary classes. Let us hope that we may live to see the day when they will learn what it really means—to wit, the abolition of the class of compulsory pensioners.

I wonder whether these strike-cured gentlemen noted, as I did, a little incident of civilisation which took place the other day about the Solomon Islands, where one of our war-ships was used for the safe amusement of "punishing" the islanders for cannibalism? Did it in that case occur to them, as it did to me, that while the poor devils of Solomon Islanders were engaged in eating their enemies, the "superior persons" of British Islanders were eating the people whom they call their friends and fellow-countrymen; their equals before the law, and before God, as the cant phrase goes?

Cannibalism for cannibalism, it seems to me, that that of the poor ignorant poverty-stricken Solomon Islanders is less deserving of punishment than that of the British Islanders; and that the word "punishment" ought to make the latter shake in their shoes, if ever they think, as I fear few of them do, of the natural results of artificial compulsory poverty in a land which nature and the traditions of labour would make so wealthy for all people if the non-producers did not eat up the lives of the producers after the manner of civilised cannibalism.

W. M.

Now is the chosen time of the charity-fiend, the busiest season for the professional philanthropist. At Christmas-tide, the most hide-bound bourgeois will allow himself to be moved, either by compassion or prudence, into rendering back to the poor some infinitesimal part of what he has been busily stealing from them all the year. But, having for so long devoted all his energies to getting, he is unskilled and awkward at giving. Not only that; he would be made uncomfortable if himself brought face to face with the misery he has been making. Even if he took himself and his charity quite seriously, he would still be made uncomfortable; and if, as would probably happen, a dim perception of the humbug and blasphemy of it all forced itself upon his hardened conscience, he would be unable to face his victim without a blush. So that, all things considered, he would very decidedly prefer not to come into close relations with the recipient of his "bounty."

The workman or his wife, on their side, are ridden with a fearful dread of the master and of the landlord; there is so strongly associated with them the fear of dismissal in the one case, of eviction or a rise of rent in the other, that a personal interview is, to put it mildly, rather too suggestive of unpleasantness. It would bring to mind so many scenes of the past, that the pleasantness which would attend the friendly meeting of free men, and the pleasure of accepting a gift from one whom one liked and respected, would be very far removed indeed from the actual realities. So far, indeed, that those realities would more resemble to the workman, either a contemptuous flinging of degrading alms or a shamefaced half-measure of would-be atonement for the wrongs he had suffered.

Here, then, is a field for the philanthropist; here is a gap into which he can fling himself; a function he can justify his existence by fulfilling. On the one hand he can relieve the benevolent landlord or employer of all trouble or responsibility beyond writing out a cheque; and on the other, he can save the workman at his charity-dinner or under his charity-blanket (special quality: see Messrs. Vampire and Co.'s Christmas price-list) from having his appetite spoiled, or his angry passions roused, by the strong contrast between his well-fed benefactor and his unfortunate self. So, into a charitable conduit, with a leak in it here and there, the self-sacrificing philanthropist turns himself, and waxes fat on the consciousness of well-doing. A cheque placed in his right hand becomes coal or soup or blankets in his left. He is a close follower of scriptural commands, and his right hand very rarely knows what his left hand doeth: in other words, so absorbed is he in heavenly work that so base and material a thing as a balance-sheet does not occur to him.

Nor does he ever lose sight of the heavenly side of his mission; the bodily comforts (?) he sparingly administers are made the baits wherewith he fishes for the souls of men. The bread is seasoned and the blankets embroidered with scriptural admonitions to contentment and obedience, with explanations of the worthlessness of perishable bodies as compared with immortal "souls." All of which leads up to the moral, that this is the best of all possible worlds; that his hearers ought to be happy, and would be if they only looked at things in the proper light; and that the misery and discomfort of their bodies is most healthful for their "spiritual parts," which will one day receive a thousand-fold reward; and all the rest of the pestilent rubbish that is ladled out to keep the slaves subservient.

The giving of gifts among equals and friends is a pleasant thing, and good for both giver and receiver; but the doling out of charity is degrading in every way, even when given and received in all honesty and goodwill. When the charity is vicarious, without personal contact and good fellowship; when it is made the vehicle of condescension and class-feeling, a pretence for the preaching of humility, a means of buttressing robbery and preserving the supremacy of property,—it becomes so horrible a blasphemy, so terrible an outrage upon humanity, as to rank, in Socialist eyes at least, along with the most blistering wrongs under which men suffer nowadays. S.

DISCORD, MONOTONY, AND HARMONY.

It occurred to me that, at the present time,—when a growing feeling is finding utterance amongst all the peoples of the world that the institutions of our age are not the most conducive to the happiness of the largest number, despite the sancity which centuries of usage has given many of them—a glance at social life as it is and as it might be, life which the environment of society with its usages, man-made laws and traditions necessitates, and life admitting of no bonds but natural laws and the free will of the individual as a factor of society, would induce people, i.e., those who have not already done so, to think more seriously and earnestly upon the social degradation of this so-called age of enlightenment. And I am confident that when once people begin thinking about these things, that their thoughts will soon be moulded into deeds. They will then enrol themselves in the ranks of the discontented, the rebels against ignorance, superstition, and injustice.

The unsocial discord of society grates more painfully on the ears of the Socialist than the most inharmonic sounds do on the ear of the musician. It is this discord that the Socialist is striving to displace. This cannot be done by putting one's fingers to their ears to shut out the unwelcome strains. Perhaps many who do so now in the endeavour to shut out the piercing cries of the victims murdered for greed on the battle field, in the mine, the factory, or the slum, will find that they have turned a deaf ear too long when the sounds of discord roar like the thunder in the heavens, and the victimised class becomes a weapon of destruction more terrible than the lightning. The homœpaths say that like cures like; if so, our unsocial discord is awaiting its destruction by the consummation of its own elements.

So far I have only been generalising. Now, let us go into a closer analysis of our unsocial system, or system of discord. First, we have our unsocial system divided into a possessing class and a non-possessing class, familiarly called the haves and have-nots. These two have nothing in common, consequently there is perpetual discord between them; to wit, the incessant strikes and lock-outs, restraints and ejections. The goddess of Liberty prostitutes herself, and at her shrine bow both these classes. Amongst the possessors each man's hand is against the other, for have they not the liberty to compete! Free competition sets everyone against the other to try by chicanery, artifice, or fraud to appropriate to himself as much as he can from Nature's gifts to all. The have-nots, likewise free to compete, fight each other to under-sell their labour to the haves. Thus our unsocial system revels in perpetual discord.

Again, Nature has divided mankind into two, two not varying in nature, but in functions. Unsosocial society says the sanctity of the house and family can only be maintained by yoking people in pairs during their mortal tenure, subject to the economic conditions of the system. This means that the possessing classes are all in a position to be yoked. Of the have-nots, those only who get more than enough from the haves to keep themselves can be yoked, so the haves can even prevent the have-nots from discharging their natural functions as human beings. Again, inasmuch as the people are not yoked in accordance to natural law, i.e., by natural selection, many couples of both classes find they have made a mistake in getting yoked; but as the traditions of the elders have taught them it is very naughty to get unyoked, they find themselves compelled to endure a cat-and-dog existence till death does them part, which not infrequently happens by the man or the woman severing the gordian knot by knocking out the brains of his or her lawfully wedded partner. Sometimes, too, one or other of the partners rebels against the time honoured institutions of society, and tries a change of life with one of more congenial tastes. And thus the sanctity of the house and family is maintained, and sounds of discord wail forth from many a domestic hearth. It would be useless here to dilate upon the want of harmony with natural law in the lives of old-maids, bachelors, and prostitutes. That must be patent to all. Such then is the discord in the relation between the sexes in our present unsocial system.

When one comes, however, to the region of speculative thought, which the traditions of nearly 2,000 years have handed down in varied fantastic forms as truth, the outsider finds chaos supreme. But it is this discord, this warring of hypocrites and impostors and deluded fanatics, that leaves a ray of hope for the truth, that out of the infinity of discord harmony may yet evolve.

I think I have demonstrated that at whatever phase of modern society we take a glance, we find nothing but discord. Surely to any reasoning being such a system must stand condemned on its own demerits, for merits it has none.

We often find people expressing their abhorrence of a society based upon the principles of natural equality, and they say that the frightful monotony of such an existence would be simply intolerable. Such arguments are on a par with that of the philanthropic old lady who denounced Socialists as wicked, because they were endeavouring to prevent her, and other good, kind, charitable people like her, from enjoying one of the greatest pleasures of life—that is, from helping the poor and destitute: or the policeman, who asked to be removed from his division because his duties were so monotonous. The monotony he complained of was that in all the beats he had taken, by day or by night, he never had the chance of clumping anyone on the head. If we want to find monotony in life, we must look for it in our present system. Take the lives of those victims of society, who, after spending their youth and manhood or womanhood in almost perpetual toil, find the reward of a useful life meted out to them in a workhouse under the degrading name of pauper. If you want monotonous lives, take those of the slaves of the needle, the match girls, the tram men, the railway men, and thousands of other workers whose monotony of hard toil is only varied by an occasional change to starvation. No! monotonous lives cannot be where there is social equality. When the worry, confusion, and discord of modern society ceases, harmony arising from equality of condition, brotherly feeling and peace must prevail.

Some may say, we care not for a sameness, for a monotony. My answer to them is, no more do I; but do not confuse the absence of discord with monotony. An infinite number of varied and pleasing changes can be rung out in harmony; and if an individual be so socially degraded that an infinity of change because harmonious is to him monotonous, then I say he is unfit for the future society in which we aspire to a melody of life unbroken by discord. A. BROOKES.

SOCIALISM AMONG THE INDIANS.

THE Rev. Mr. Batty, for fifteen years a Quaker missionary among the Indians, and recently labouring among the Sacs and Foxes of Iowa, says, according to the Boston Dawn, what is well known, that they do not take kindly to our civilisation, and gives as a reason the following significant account:—

They are on a small reservation, closely environed by a thrifty farming population, but "make no progress" and show no desire to copy the white man's ways. They are all honest; there is not a thief among them. Occasionally one steals under the influence of liquor, but as soon as he becomes sober he returns the goods and begs forgiveness, a touch of paganism which wouldn't be a bad thing for a considerable element of our white population, so that their aversion to the white man's ways may not be altogether due to native depravity. It is chiefly due, according to Mr. Batty, to aversion to the very things in our civilisation on which we are most apt to pride ourselves—our individualism; our utter disregard in business transactions of the interests of our neighbours. The Indian cannot understand this. To him it is monstrous, abhorrent. With him the tribal bond makes individualism of the selfish sort impossible. Every member of the tribe is his brother. All things are held in common, so that none can be in want while others have plenty. If one is successful in the chase, that success, by custom, gives him the right to take the first or choice cut from the game. But this taken, the remainder is the property of the others—not theirs to take simply by his leave or courtesy, but theirs by right unquestioned.

The same law holds in the cultivation of the land. No one has any exclusive right to the product of the soil. The fact that he has tilled the land does not make the crop his in any exclusive sense. So long as any have plenty, none can be left in want.

And this rule of action, Mr. Batty says, has its root in their religion. To the Indian, the earth is literally his mother and the sun his father. This is not poetry with them, as it is with us, for in their thought the sun and earth are living beings. The rays of the sun fructify the earth and make her fruitful. To her products all her children have equal rights, and to her bosom all must have equal access. It is for this reason that land in severalty is so generally opposed. It is cutting up and parcelling out their mother, and shutting out some of her children from access to her breast. The thought is repugnant to the fundamentals of their religion.

Mr. Batty tells a very interesting story of personal experience, which sets forth their property ideas in very clear light. A sick Indian had a pony he desired to sell. Mr. B., at his request, consented to take it to the agency and dispose of it for him, and purchase certain goods. After the sale, and while still at the agency, another Indian of the same tribe came to him and asked him what he got for the pony. Mr. Batty told him. Very soon he inquired what he paid for the goods, and then, after a short pause, how much he had left. All his questions being answered satisfactorily, and finding that Mr. Batty had a balance of twelve dollars, he said, "I need some things for my family, I have no money. I would like what you have left." Mr. Batty objected that the money was not his to give; that it belonged to the man whose pony he sold. "I must return it to him," said Mr. Batty. "You no understand Indians' ways," was the response; "you give me money; it all right. All the same as if you take it to the other Indian. But Mr. Batty was not to be persuaded, and the Indian had to go away without the money. Very soon, however, he returned, with instructions from the agent authorising Mr. Batty to give him the money. He did so, though not without misgiving as to the propriety of his course. On returning home, he reported to the Indian whose pony he had sold, what had occurred, with no little anxiety as to the result. But, to his utter astonishment, when he had finished his story, the Indian replied, "That all right. He my brother."

How THEY DO IT.—Municipal Dignitary (to police official): Order the force to have everything in readiness for a descent on the gambling houses to-night. Police Official (to subordinate officer): Tell the men to get ready for a raid on the gambling places to-night. Subordinate Officer (to squad of police): Boys, be around here about 11 o'clock; we are ordered to make a haul of the gambling houses. Policeman (to gambler): Jerry, we're goin' to raid ye about midnight: tell the boys.—Chicago Tribune.

LABOUR'S LATEST WEAPON.

THE "Union Label," says the Boston Globe, is Labour's latest and most effective weapon. The changed system of production, owing to the introduction of steam as a motive power and the consequent growth of the so-called "factory system," has led to many such new ideas. With the concentration of large bodies of men working on machinery and the concentration of capital, have naturally arisen the great organisations of labourers and of capitalists. These great organisations stand facing each other, each desirous of securing as much as possible out of the joint product of labour and capital. With the control of machinery, and consequently of the means of employment, it has been possible for the capitalist to say to a great degree how much it should take. The labourers had only one weapon by which to enforce a demand for a larger share of the product. This weapon was the strike. It proved to be costly to the labourer as well as to the capitalist, and was not always effective.

Within the past five years another weapon has been discovered, which has proved very effective. It came into existence as the result of the discovery that not only were the labourers producers, but they were also the great bulk of the consumers. This weapon is the so-called "union label." The idea of using a label to distinguish the product of certain kinds of labour dates back about 15 years. The germ of it was contained in a label first issued by the White League of San Francisco, and which was put upon goods made by white labour to distinguish them from those made by the Chinese. It was used on cigars principally, but it was also placed on boots and shoes and other articles. It was very effective for a time.

The idea was adopted and enlarged upon by the Cigarmakers' International Union at its convention in Chicago in September, 1880. They then originated the famous "blue label" of the cigarmakers, which was placed on every box of cigars and was broken like the revenue stamp when the box was opened. This label, which is in use to-day, certifies that the cigars contained in the box are made by a first-class workman, a member of the union which is opposed to inferior rat shop, coolie prison, or filthy tenement workmanship. It was thus used directly to prevent the sale of cigars made by coolie, prison, or tenement-house labour, by distinguishing goods that were not so made. It indirectly assisted to a marked degree to increase the wages and reduce the hours of labour of its members, because no unfair employer could retain the use of the label. Its success was marked, as stated above.

When the Knights of Labour had grown into large proportions, it also was obliged by the force of events to issue a label. The boycott had been used to such a degree as to impair its efficiency. Besides, the boycott was only negative. It simply said to the members of the organisation, "Don't patronise such a firm." There the matter ended. This was construed in some States to be a criminal conspiracy to injure a man's business, and several persons went to prison on that account, while a large number of indictments were kept hanging over the heads of different agents of labour organisations, terrorising them into inactivity.

The advantages of the "union label" were quickly brought into prominence. Directly, it harmed no particular man's business. It had the effect of inducing the members of the various labour organisations to call for goods bearing the union or Knights of Labour label. If a man had trouble with the labour organisations, and consequently was not entitled to the use of the label, that was his own look-out. He was the only one that was injuring his business. In the Journal of United Labour there are engravings given of not less than ten different kinds of labels, which are placed on trunks, shirts, barrels, tin cans, hats, gloves, cigars, files, and collars and cuffs. The shoemakers have also a label, which is soon to be brought into greater prominence than it has had in the past.

When the operative tailors of Boston were suffering from the effects of their accustomed work being taken from them, and sent to New York to be made in filthy tenement houses, and under conditions deleterious to the health of the customer who might wear the clothing so made, they at first knew not what step to take. Out of 7,000 persons employed in Boston, it was alleged that fully 3,000 were idle from this cause. There was then practically no organisation. It was considered by some in the trade, that the first thing to be done was to form an organisation, so that an organised effort might be made against this tenement-house work. Several unions of the different branches were formed by the assistance of members of the Central Labour Union. They existed, with more or less vigour, for some time, and at one time seemed about to follow the fate of their predecessors by collapsing. At this juncture it was suggested by several of the prominent labour men of the city that the unions should adopt a union label to distinguish clothing made by them in Boston from that made in the sweaters' tenement houses. This idea was accepted, and after much deliberation a label was adopted. A strong and determined effort was made to impress on the public the necessity for calling for clothing bearing this label, if they desired to escape buying garments made by the sweaters. The attention of the firms making clothing was also called to the label. One well-known firm, noted for its enterprise and originality in advertising methods, took up the label, and adopted it for use on their garments. Another did the same. The effect was magical. The unions began to pick up in membership immediately, and new unions were formed.

There are to-day six unions of the various branches of the clothing trade, exclusive of the Clothing Cutters' Union. These are the Tailors and Trimmers' Union, Machine Operators' union, Pressmen's Union, Female Coat-makers' Union, Female Pantaloon-makers' Union, and Male Pantaloon-makers' unions, with a possibility of two other unions being formed in the near future. Contractor after contractor who did work for the different large clothing firms was obliged to allow his employés to join the union of their branch in order to be allowed the use of the label. A label committee was appointed, whose duty was to increase the demand for the label. One man was selected to go around to the different organisations of working-men every night, and urge upon them to call for clothing bearing the union label. It has had considerable effect already. The different unions of tramway employés were visited. They were many of them about to purchase overcoats for the winter. Their attention being called to the label and the facts about the tenement houses, a large number of them promised to ask for the union label. This agitation is not being confined to Boston. As fast as possible it is intended to reach out into all the cities and towns of Massachusetts and then into other parts of New England.

Wherever a labour organisation exists, there the story of the tenement houses will be repeated and a demand created for the union label clothing. When the American Federation of Labour meets, a demand will be made that the convention indorse this label, and it will then become a national affair, and the same demand will be created all over the United States.

THE ANTHROPOPHAGITE.

HAST thou a heart cased in steel?
Hast nought of human save the brow?
Art turned to marble and canst not feel?
Then to my Hell follow me now.

The antique anthropophagite
Am I, masked as society;
Look on my hands, a bloody sight!
Look on my lustful, cruel eye!
There's many a corner in my lair
With mangled carcasses bestrewn;
Thither with me do thou repair;
I ate thy father! I'll eat thy son!

First look upon this battlefield here,
They mowed it down three whole days long;
Grapeshot and guns the mowers were,
The gleaners are this vulture-throng.
The corn upon this glorious plain
A yellow carpet hath outspread.
Ye poor, that bind the sheaves amain,
Pick out the ears from 'mid the dead.

Look yonder where a brothel stands,
A lazar-house of infamy;
Here, severing all familiar bands,
Lust triumphs over misery.
See, how this slave of foul desire
Allures man with her wanton eye,
Wallowing body and soul in the mire,
And spat on by each passer-by!

Prisons to look on art thou fain?
Lo, the men that knives and poisons use!
That count each crime for a campaign,
And with the very hangman ruse.
To the galleys I condemn young thieves,
Or ever they have learnt to spell,
But ere the criminal that school leaves
He's deep, and read in murder well!

Follow me to the factory,
A more appalling prison still!
Here human beings caught up, see,
And ground down by the rolling mill.
Soul, body, heart, brain consumed, and then
The residue a damned thing means;
Here the machines behave like men,
And men are turned into machines.

Oh, I can show thee other hells,
Shall I break open a human brain?
The life-corroding ennui dwells
Where phantasy and thought should reign.
Shall I lay open a human heart
Writhing in anguish infinite?
Galled love of hate hath played the part,
And molten lead hath poured on it.

The antique anthropophagite
Am I, masked as Society;
The masks wherewith I am bedight
Are Family and Property.
Proud man, once pent in my domain,
His conquering destiny hath forgone;
I hold and loose him not again;
Thy father I ate and I'll eat thy son!

EUGENE POTTIER.

A POET-CHAMPION OF WORKING WOMEN. — A correspondent in Copenhagen writes to the Neue Wiener Tageblatt, giving an account of the strike of the workwomen at the large match factory at Christiania. The occupation of these women is extremely unhealthy and badly paid. In order to gain a bare subsistence they must pack no fewer than 16,000 match-boxes in a week, and the women live amid poisonous sulphur and phosphorus fumes for twelve hours every day. The consequence is that most of them fall into a decline, and as their strength goes their earnings diminish. The conditions under which they work render the only means of safety—nourishing food, healthy dwellings, and medical aid—unattainable. More than a thousand workwomen went on strike, and the movement, as soon as it became important, received the powerful aid of the celebrated poet Björnson, who enthusiastically took up the women's cause, declaring that never had strike so much justice on its side, for the helpless women were obliged to act against manufacturers who were without conscience, and who took no pains to arrange sanitary measures against the consumption which played such havoc among the women and girls. Björnson wrote a letter to the Norwegian Bishop Essendrop, calling upon him to fulfil his Christian duties by publicly championing the women's cause, but the Bishop declined, saying that his official position prevented him from siding with any party. Björnson then appeared at a great strike meeting, and made an enthusiastic speech, which was received with great applause. The meeting was opened by Dr. Nissen, who led in three young girls who had once been extremely healthy, but were now living examples of the evil effects of work done without sanitary precautions. Their appearance excited the greatest pity, and moved the spectators even to tears, for the three girls had lost almost all their teeth, and even portions of the jaw, their ashy grey faces being frightfully disfigured. Björnson, in his speech, said "that this time the voice of right should be heard, and that the struggle of these women and girls should not be fruitless. He was no agitator, but he would call a hundred strikes into being in the country until the workpeople had got their human rights, and were no longer forced to eat poison with every bit of bread."

SOMETHING IN A NAME.

I BELIEVE that the working people of England are far in advance of the same class in the United States in comprehension of economic questions and of the social and industrial situation. They are braver, more daring; but this naturally ensues from their better understanding of their own rights and powers. They march, carry red banners, sing revolutionary songs, and "state grievances" in no mild terms. They hold many meetings, and keep numerous speakers in the field. This, at least, we gather from our reading of the Commonweal and an occasional London daily.

Why should it be so? Here where the boast is that every man is a sovereign and all are free and equal before the law? Have we not the "freest and most prosperous people in the world"? You hear it often enough and as soon as you strike the coast line of America. But alas for our boasts! In Chicago on the 11th of November every suitable hall was closed against memorial meetings; the exercises in memory of our brave martyrs were held outside the city, and even then the Waldheim Cemetery authorities did all in their power to prevent the meeting by denying a place for speakers or even room for a carriage or wagon from which they could address the throng. In Philadelphia, thousands of people were prevented from gathering in a mass meeting to hear Hugh Pentecost on "The Crime of the 11th of November" by the authorities closing the hall already rented and paid for. In many other cities no attempts at demonstration were made because it was known to be useless. And yet, scarcely a word is said about such legal invasion of personal liberty. It is treated as a matter of course. No one dares be so "lawless and disorderly" as to rebel against such despotism—no one thinks of such a thing as defying a policeman's command. The chief of police in the United States has more power than England's queen. His monarchy is unlimited; he is not bound by constitutions, or the will of the people. He is as complete an autocrat as the Czar of Russia—in reality, not in name. He is called here "a servant of the people." And herein lies the principal difference between the two countries. Everything is misnamed over here, and the people are so misled by fine-sounding titles that they do not know tyranny, robbery, and oppression when they see and feel them. From the president down to a petty constable everything is under a misnomer, and when the people feel inclined to rebel against conditions, they look around and see nothing definite to fight. They only see, apparently, "freedom and equality for all," a "government by and for the people," universal suffrage, equal opportunities, no aristocracy, no classes, no monarch. There is no visible despotism to struggle against, though they know that the hardest workers are poor, the most willing often rewarded with starving idleness, and that humanity suffers as much through poverty, famine, and sickness as elsewhere.

In England the common people easily learn that they are saddled with a large family of paupers for whom parliament must make fresh provision every year, called queen, princes, princesses, dukes, etc. The whole system by which they are robbed has become so methodical, so old, so customary, that each person is born into a certain groove, with no illusory hope of getting out of it by his own exertions; he is not told he is a sovereign, not taunted with the assertion that he has equal opportunity with the richest to gain wealth and power. He is given plainly to understand that there are classes, and it is the right of one class to live in idleness and rack-rent him. He has something tangible to protest against, and the dullest rebel, or feel ready to do so, at the first opportunity. In America our billionaires, railroad kings, coal-barons, landlords, and bankers, who hold the fate of the common people in the hollow of their hands, comprise an aristocracy as powerful as that in any monarchy; but our legislature votes them privileges instead of direct incomes, and our good labouring masses do not recognise them as what they are.

We are supposed to have no classes; yet the working girl or working man stands less chance of meeting his or her employer on an equal social plane than in England or Germany. Several years ago, the junior partner of a large clothing firm was married and had a grand wedding. His employes clubbed together and bought a handsome solid silver service. The forewoman collected the money, bought the silver, and had it sent direct to the house. Some of the girls who had contributed generously, said regretfully, "I wish we could have seen it at least. I wonder if we could not get a glimpse of it if we peeped in at the windows after dark." From the little their employer allowed them after his profits were made, the girls deducted more than they could spare to buy a present they could never hope to see—and not a foot among them dare tread where it had gone. Is there a tighter drawn line anywhere?

The boasted right of universal suffrage is but the privilege of handling a bit of paper as the boss directs, and has no bearing whatever on the voter's real wants, needs, or desires. He simply knows he may lose a chance to toil if he does not "use" it.

Our officers are all "servants of the people," supposed to have no will of their own, but desirous of doing whatever is best for the welfare of society. But woe be to the poor man or the woman driven to despair by poverty, if they come in contact with one of these "servants"! Servants they are, but the badly-bribed servants of a few greedy capitalists, engaged to do the dirty work of government, rather than the people's servants. If they were known as the king's own or a czar's instruments of terror, we would know better how to deal with them.

"Law and order" is but another name for the tyranny that pins a man to earth and makes him lie there quietly while another robber takes all he has. It is more respectable to have the fleecing done in an orderly and peaceful manner; and if we name the process something awe-inspiring—so much the better, for the people know no better.

We have the letter but not the spirit. It is obligatory on citizens to reverence certain names, such as equality, liberty, the franchise, citizenship, law and order, etc. They do not recognise the most palpable wrong if bearing these titles. It would be a step in advance if the United States should resolve itself into a dictatorship, as some men still dream of having done, so that the people would see something tangible to attack.

We must teach the people to know oppression when they see it, no matter in what guise it comes. Slavery is slavery, though the chains be ever so gilded. Liberty, true liberty, will be so bright, will bring such comfort, such happiness, such plenty in her train, that we cannot by any possibility mistake her.

LIZZIE M. HOLMES.

NOTES.

EVERY now and then there is much talk of the mighty power of the press, and particular stress is laid on the decided progress which is evidenced by the improvements, both literary and technical, shown when comparing the papers of to-day with those of years past. As a rule, this may be taken for just what it is worth, which is not much; but when such a positive comparison is made, and such a challenge thrown out as that made by the preliminary number of the Daily Graphic, it is time to kick.

The address to the public states, that the Graphic has undergone constant development and enlargement; that in 1869 the annual cost was £54,000 (24 pp.), while now the annual cost is £74,000 (36 pp.). "Prodigious!" This cordial appreciation and sympathy of an "indulgent public" is now taken as warrant to embark in an entirely new enterprise, a daily newspaper, illustrated. Well, if the preliminary number is to be taken as only a fair sample, by thunder the public will indeed be indulgent!

What a sign of "progress" this preliminary number really is, may be judged by the following paragraph of the address: "The day has not yet arrived when our special artist at the seat of war can make a sketch that will be reproduced fac-simile by telegraph in our London offices in the twinkling of an eye, but we may be within measurable distance of such a feat of electricity." This precious paragraph of hope is illustrated with a man sitting on the side of a cart, which carries a reel of telegraph cable attached to the end of the artist's pencil, the battle going on in the distance.

In order that there shall be no possibility of missing the old moral that "a war, bloody war," is the almost constant desire of newspaper proprietors, four whole pages are taken up with a re-dishing of the report of the Battle of Waterloo, illustrated of course. Progress, high civilisation, culture, all are emphasized in this latest emanation.

Of the sixteen pages, four are devoted to advertisements, four to jingoism, four to an illustrated rehash of the Times of a century ago, and the rest to gas and twaddle, with a special par for Mrs. Grundy and Mr. Horsley, A.R.A., as for example this: "It shall contain nothing from pen or pencil which a parent would wish to conceal from his family;" the concluding line of the battle report is: "The whole surface of the battle-field is one great shambles"; so, evidently, to familiarise war is quite a family duty. "This we believe can be effected without the paper being considered prudish or namby-pamby."

The address concludes: "Believe me to be, Ladies and Gentlemen, your most obedient servant," and is signed by one who, according to the illustration at the side, has the grace to hide his face, he is boozing so very low. Of course, in any report of the Battle of Waterloo, there must be considerable about the almost supernatural powers of the "Great Duke"; and it really is droll, just after looking such a report over, to read the correspondence between the Iron Duke and Miss J., just published by Fisher Unwin.

What a splendid text for a democratic satirist of the time, with his pencil dipped in a vivid recollection of the despotic modes used by Wellington, when dealing with any agitation, would have been the interview of November 12th, 1834. Never having seen one another previously, this is the sort of thing which takes place:—Miss J. opens by reading the first chapter of St. John down to "Ye must be born again;" whereupon the Duke seizes her hand, exclaiming, "Oh, how I love you! how I love you!" Miss J. (in the tone of a Church Catechist): "Who causes you to feel thus towards me?" Duke: "God Almighty!"

Almighty gosh! what rot; what a thing to make a despot and ruler of. Even with the fact that he was 65 years old, it must considerably discount the immense claims made by some that the Duke was one of the very few always level-headed men equal to every emergency.

T. S.

The United States to-day is the most monopoly-cursed nation on the face of the earth. They have made more millionaires in 20 years than Europe and England have made in 500 years. Everything in this country is controlled by a syndicate, pool, combination, trust, patent or corner. If a boy, now grown to manhood, wishes to go into business he must buy a seat on the board of trade; if he wishes to go into manufacturing, he must buy himself into a combination which represents and has monopolised that business.—New Orleans Times Democrat.

Old-fashioned, non-progressive people the English are. They still call them "corners" over there, an uncouth, harsh-sounding name, suggestive of nefarious business methods. Why can't they progress a little? Why can't they call their aggregations of business rascality "trusts?" That sounds less harsh and it don't prevent the good work of plunder going on as effectually as ever. To be sure, the member of an English "corner," like the member of an American "trust," abates no jot of his respectability, can hold his head just as high as ever in society and in church, and is entitled to count on the law as an accomplice. And all the time his stealing is more certain to succeed and to be a thousand times more profitable than ever were the operations of footpad, burglar, or pirate.—Journal of United Labour.

OUR LADY OF LABOUR.

In the faint twilight of half-dawn she stands,
Scarce knowing light from darkness, life from death;
In the far east the red sun quickeneth
To reawakened life the silent lands.
Her eyes are weary and the clinging bands
Of pain and sorrow gird her, and the breath
Scarce lives upon her lips: "Behold," one saith,
"She bears the curse of ages in her hands."

Nay, for the light grows stronger; nay, the day
Is yearning towards her, and the morning wind
Sings as a singer, whose eyes once were blind
And now have sight and knowledge. Who shall say
Here stands not one whose woes have passed away,
The nursing mother of a new mankind?

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

Those who believe that all is for the best under "the best possible of republics," will do well to look at the following facts. A few days ago the police made a raid on about 500 wretched homeless people about the Halles centrales; two days afterwards a new raid on over 200! As no accommodation could be procured for such a large number in one night, they left them the whole night to tramp about in the yards of the different police-stations, to be removed early in the morning to the various depots or prisons of this beautiful city. There they will get board and lodging at the expense of the ratepayers for a term varying from eight days to three months "for being too poor." One of them had been picked up thirty-nine times already! Surely that fellow must have a queer opinion of our democratic republic! Had he been a robber or a murderer he might have a chance of a better life; he might be rich and free. Poor and "honest" as he is, he spends his whole life in gaol! O great Paris Exhibition! what boon have you brought to the toiler?
A. C., Paris.

GERMANY.

The anti-Socialist laws of Germany, so it was said lately in the Reichstag, are now more moderately resorted to than in the first years of their existence. However, the truth is as follows: In the year 1882, 69 persons were sentenced by direct application of the muzzle-laws; in 1883, 83 persons; in 1884, 113 persons; in 1885, 98 persons; in 1886, 92 persons; in 1887, 116 persons; in 1888, 258 persons. For having been members of illegal associations, the convictions have been as follows: In 1882, 22 persons; in 1883, 12 persons; in 1884, 5 persons; in 1885, 6 persons; in 1886, 47 persons; in 1887, 82 persons; in 1888, 108 persons. These are only two especial categories of offences committed by Socialists, but they do not by a long way exhaust the series of offences which Socialists have committed, as these series are really innumerable. Besides the convictions of persons, 1,400 prints have been suppressed, 120 daily or periodical papers or magazines, 200 pamphlets or books. Twelve Socialist publishing houses have been forcibly closed, thus bringing about the total ruin of a considerable number of workers interested in these ventures. Over 600 expulsions have been made. An extraordinary number of meetings have been forbidden or forcibly dispersed, and hundreds of well-constituted associations or trade-unions have been suppressed. More than ten thousand men have had their homes searched by the police.

The imperial crank who is supposed to rule Germany has made his political programme publicly known at the late banquet of Francfort. Drinking to the health and prosperity of the town (the fellow is always toasting) he said: "There are no longer parties. I only know those who are for me, and those who are against me. All the rest is old rubbish (alter Troedel)." I am afraid that this old rubbish is erelong going to trouble considerably the happiness of that impudent young would-be Charlemagne or Napoleon. If his "left ear" does not kill him, it is pretty certain that the "old rubbish" will do away with him.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To those who have obtained copies of the Commonweal through the propagandist work of our comrades, by free distribution in the streets and public conveyances, or by purchase at our outdoor stations, we ask if in agreement with our principles to help the sale of the Commonweal by ordering it of their newsagents, and sending on to us the names of newsagents willing to sell it; and still better, as our outdoor work must shortly be reduced, by joining the local branches and helping on the work.

The red flag itself is an emblem of trade-unions, and was carried by the mechanics' union (the "Eranoi" of the Greek) 1,000 years before Christ, when working men were followers of Zoroaster, fire worshippers, "Children of the Sun," the colour of which was emblemized in their scarlet banner.

QUESTION AND ANSWER.—Question: Is it wise to put into the Dawn, under the heading of "The Tocsin," contrasted statements of the conditions of the poor and the rich? Is it not calculated to be inflammatory? Answer: We answer by asking some other questions. Are the statements not true statements? Yes. Do they not fairly illustrate the relative conditions of rich and poor in this land? Yes. They picture truth, then? Yes. Should not the truth, then, be known? Indeed, we hope that these contrasts are inflammatory; we would not inflame the poor against the rich, or the rich against the poor, but we would inflame all men, rich and poor, against the horror, the unchristianity of the present state of things.—From the Boston Dawn.

A SOCIAL EVENING to members of the Socialist League will be given by the Propaganda Committee, at the Hall of the Socialist League, 24 Great Queen St., on New Year's Eve, at 8 p.m. Secretary of Propaganda Committee will read report of work done during last half year, to be followed by discussion and Concert; Recitations by comrade Darwood. Meeting and Concert free to all members.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Gas-stokers' Strike.

The strike continues, though there are few events of interest to mark its course. Mr. Livesey has issued an address to his blacklegs, in which he declares that not one of them will be discharged to make room for the old stokers who have gone on strike, and that they may consider themselves engaged for three months. They are also promised a gratuity of £2 for the first week of the strike, and £1 for each succeeding week, in addition to their wages. But despite these fine promises the condition of the blacklegs is not to be envied. The Ambulance Corps stationed at the Old Kent Road, has treated 130 cases of unfortunate blacklegs who have burned or otherwise injured themselves while at work. They are literally wallowing in filth inside the iron sheds of the works; their condition being so bad at Vauxhall that the medical officer of the Lambeth Vestry had his attention called to it, but took no action, because of a promise from Mr. Livesey to mend matters. It is probable, however, that blacklegs, like other vermin, flourish best in dirty and overcrowded dens, so Mr. Livesey may probably know better than the medical officer what is good for them. The directors and a deputation from the strikers have had another interview, but it has led to no result. The men, in a manifesto they have issued, state that they will return to work if the clauses of the bonus agreement that bind them to work for a year and to serve the company in any capacity, are withdrawn, and on their side they are willing in future to bind themselves to give a month instead of a week's notice before striking. No one can deny that the men are most moderate in their demands, in fact, too moderate, experience having shown that Mr. Livesey can get all the blacklegs he wants in a week, and there is no reason for strengthening his hands by giving him a month for the same purpose. Still there is some excuse for the men, when sham friends of the working-classes, who even call themselves Socialists, have recommended the men to bind themselves for a year. Universal sympathy is felt for the strikers among all sections of the workers, whatever may be the opinions of well-fed middle-class people who read the Daily News. Even the old aristocratic trade unionists are full of sympathy for these brave men, who are so gallantly fighting the battle of labour. A good expression of this feeling is found in the leading article of the Railway Review, a paper with which we have had on some occasions to differ, but which now speaks upon the right side. It says: "It requires but little experience of the tactics of capitalists to discover the cloven foot of the enemy of combination in the agreement proposal of the directors of the South Metropolitan Gas Company. Imagine for a moment what would be the result of an individual agreement being signed by every man in all our large centres of industry throughout the country. The dates of termination would be different, and the workers would lose that cohesion which is so essential to the men whose only strength lay in the force of organised numbers. Where, we ask, would the strength of a trades' union be under such conditions? . . . It is just because we take this view of the situation that we think the battle now being fought by the gas stokers is one which should be shared by all organised workmen. If the directors succeed, there is no reason why other companies should not also use the same effective weapon to destroy our unions. That such is the desire is no mere stretch of imagination, but is palpable to the dullest of observers. . . . The fate of the gas workers to-day may be that of any other trades union to-morrow. If the army of labour is attacked at one point the safety of the whole is endangered." The article concludes by declaring that "the hewers of wood and drawers of water have caught a glimpse—a far away vision it may be—of the promised land of their hopes, and nothing will induce them to sacrifice that which has brought them thus far on the road, and to return once again to the desert of despair." We think this article, and especially the last sentence, shows that the preaching of Socialism during the last few years has had some effect. We are glad to see in the same paper that a good collection was made for the strikers by the railway men at their big meeting in Hyde Park. This is an example which other trade unionists might well copy. "Sympathy" is not worth much unless it is put into a practical form.

Great Lock-out at Bristol.

10,000 men in the boot and shoe trade have been locked-out at Bristol. After the one day's strike a few weeks ago, a uniform wages statement was adopted, but a classification committee proved abortive, and the whole dispute has occurred on the classification of wages, as the workers found under the existing classification they received lower pay for certain goods that were largely in demand. All attempts to bring about a settlement having failed, the manufacturers determined to give out no more work, and to suspend clickers, machinists, and rough stuff cutters, and the rounders and finishers. The workmen have offered the following alternative as a basis of settlement: The men will accept either the London statement and wages, or the Northampton statement and classification, or the Leicester statement and Leicester classification.

The Eight Hours Bill.

The replies of Mr. Gladstone and Randolph Churchill to Keir Hardie on the Eight Hours Bill for miners are models of parliamentary diplomacy. Mr. Gladstone would give the Bill "a dispassionate consideration," while Randolph will vote for it if Broadhurst and Co. will. It must be confessed that the latter young gentleman has given some study to the subject. He has read Mr. Sidney Webb's article in the Contemporary, and he has come to the conclusion that the Bill would diminish the unemployed and also the capitalists' profits. Those who believe in improving the condition of the people by wresting election pledges from reluctant politicians may make up their minds for plenty of answers of this kind. The only question would be, in case of two rival candidates giving answers similar to the above, which would be the right person to vote for? "Dispassionate consideration" and a promise of support, conditional on the worst enemies of your pet measure agreeing to it, are both equally worthless. Still, the rival politicians understand their business, and candidates at the next election will do well to copy their diplomacy. They will then be able to juggle a good many poor people out of a vote, while really promising them nothing. This is the highest art of politics. N.

The Sheffield and District General Labourers' Union.

The above organisation is making rapid progress. Tctally unlike other organisations, while aiming at the removal of existing evils, to obtain a general rise in wages and a reduction of the hours of labour to each as the normal day, the movement has been, is, and will be of a thoroughly Socialistic character. Although only six weeks old, it numbers over 900 members, and is entering at the rate of 200 per week. Comrade Sketchley as secretary, with the help of comrade Bulas as president, hold at least five meetings each week in different parts of the town, at all of which thorough revolutionary Socialism is taught, and is everywhere well received. The system of organisation, too, is very simple, yet most effective in case of a great crisis, which is kept steadily in view. The committee has just taken the Hallamshire Hall, at a rental of £50 a-year. They have entire control of the hall (as sale tenants) for the year 1890. There the secretary (or some other one) will lecture twice each Sunday; in the morning at 11 on the events of the week, and in the evening at 7 on one of the great social or economical questions of the day. The hall will seat about 800. On the Tuesday evenings the society will hold its regular weekly meetings for the transaction of business, etc. The Commonweal begins to be looked upon among the more advanced of the members as their organ. B. S.

REAL AND FICTITIOUS CAPITAL.

THE miscalled "national" banking system of this country, by which every money shark who can buy a 100,000 dols. United States bond, obtains the privilege to issue 90,000 dols. in notes which he can put out at interest, while also drawing interest on the bond, is a wrong and injustice to labour. It makes the indebtedness of the people the basis upon which the Shylocks bark and levy double usury. But it is not so great and deep-seated a wrong as the system under which fictitious credit-capital is created, bearing no necessary relation to the amount of money in the country or the real values of property, on every cent. of which credit-capital draws usury. Every operation in bonds or stocks, in produce or in real estate, in railroads or factories, which leaves a profit, adds just so much to the enormous volume of credit-capital. Every time a bondholder clips his coupons or a shareholder in a corporation receives his dividends, there is an addition to the paper-capital and the power of the moneyed class to levy tribute on industry. Capital used to be defined as stored-up labour, but like many other of the definitions of the so-called science of political economy it is an absurdity in relation to what we call capital to-day. There is a sense in which it is true. Real capital—such as machinery, buildings, coal, wheat, or furniture—the tangible material capital—is stored-up labour, though it is usually stored up by and for the use of someone other than the actual wealth creator. Real capital, moreover, is perishable; it is liable to be consumed, worn-out, or destroyed in many different ways. But credit-capital, the capital created not by labour but by buying and selling and putting out money to usury, is not stored-up labour—it is not actual wealth—it represents nothing now actually in existence, but is simply a charge or mortgage upon the labour of the future. And it does not, like real capital, perish in the using; it is not worn out or consumed, but goes on accumulating, piling up and "making money" for its possessor, twenty, fifty, or a hundred years after it was called into existence, by a stroke of the pen on a deed or a banker's book.

We have called this "credit-capital" because the existing phraseology of political economy is lacking and deceptive. It has no term to distinguish these imaginary values created by the speculator, the banker, and the usurer from the genuine labour-created capital. It lumps them both together under the one term "capital," and then, when exception is taken to the insidious process under which labour is taxed to pay the holder of imaginary values, its professors cry out: "Oh, but capital is necessary—capital is stored labour and industry must pay for its use." And so it is no wonder that many intelligent people are unable to see the argument against the injustice of taxing labour to pay usury on a thing that has no existence apart from figures on paper, because their minds have been so befogged by the teaching of learned professors of political economy, who wilfully or ignorantly, confused two entirely different things.

Credit-capital means the eternal enslavement of labour. It lies at the foundation of the enormous fortunes which are accumulating so rapidly throughout America, and of the corresponding impoverishment of the masses. If the process of creating by the juggling operations of a currency system, framed in the interest of bankers and usurers, and by the inflation of land values, railroad shares, etc., a capital which is real only in its power of taxing the workers to maintain idlers in luxury, is allowed to continue, freedom will soon exist only in name, and the United States will be a plutocracy with a population of serfs.—Journal of United Labour.

Very often, indeed, what seems to be noisy or senseless joy in frivolous amusements is nothing but a result of immoderate, galling, and brutalising labour, since the mind, by perpetual hurrying and scurrying in the service of money-making, loses the capacity for a purer, nobler, and calmly-devised enjoyment. Men then involuntarily pursue their recreation also with the feverish haste of acquisition, and pleasure is measured by its cost, and is hurried through as if it were a kind of duty in the days and the hours set apart for it. That such a state of things is not healthy, and can hardly exist permanently, seems obvious; but it is not less clear that in the present industrial epoch enormous achievements are accomplished which at a future time may well serve to make the fruits of a higher culture accessible to the widest circles.—F. A. Lange, 'History of Materialism,' Vol. iii.—'Political Economy and Egoism.'

DIVIDENDS.—What is it to the dwellers on Fifth Avenue as they roll in their elegant, expensive carriages to the theatre or the club-room, or when they give one night's entertainment that costs them ten, twenty, thirty thousand dollars, that thousands of honest poor are struggling to keep life in their bodies on less per annum than they spend on a favourite dog! Here is a horse railroad that it cost only two million dollars to build and equip; stock is sold to the amount of four millions; to pay dividends on that stock the wages must be cut down to starvation limit. The men see that they are being robbed, to increase the ill-gotten pelf of the rich; they combine and strike; there is an ever-increasing army of starving wretches to take their place. Feeling that it is a war for life or death, the strikers meet wrong with wrong, violence and fraud with violence and fraud. Then come the police with club and revolver, next the soldiers with bayonet and Gatling guns. In the meantime the stock-waterer and gambler watches the shooting from his club window, and is only concerned that the soldier will not leave men (slaves) enough to operate his road and increase his millions.—Rev. Chas. E. Stowe.

REPORTS.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting held at Latimer Road; speakers Crouch, Dean, R. J. Lyne; fair sale of Commonweal. Comrade Bonham lectured in our Rooms to a good audience on "Money"; a good debate followed.

ABERDEEN.—At weekly meeting of Branch on 16th a paper on "Christian Socialism," by E. D. Girdlestone, was read and discussed.—L.

GLASGOW.—Our Tuesday night and Sunday afternoon meetings had to be abandoned, owing to the wet weather and indisposition of our speakers—most Socialists, like all other members of the community here, being afflicted with the cold, influenza, bronchitis, or some other "seasonable" illness. On Sunday evening, however, we held our usual meeting at Paisley Road Toll, where Glasier spoke to a good audience.

LEICESTER.—Barclay lectured at the Gladstone Working Men's Club on Tuesday. Sunday night, in the Irish National Club, the discussion with Chambers was resumed.—A. G.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning at Vicar's Croft, Rogers debated with Deveril (a local Irish leader) on the "Statement of Principles"; good attendance and great interest shown; Weal sold out.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday morning on the Priory Plain, Ruffold addressed a large meeting. In the afternoon, Ruffold spoke at the same place to a good audience, and in the evening at Colman's Granary; 7d. collected and all Commonweal sold out.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At the Progressist Club, 87 Marlborough Street, on December 21st, J. O'Gorman lectured to a small audience on "The Demands of Organised Labour." King, Wilson, Hamilton, and Fitzpatrick took part in the discussion.

SHEFFIELD.—Things are moving splendidly in this district. In addition to several meetings held during the week, we have had good meetings on Sunday—at the Monolith in the morning, Gower Street in the afternoon, and the Pump, Westbar, at night. This morning a reporter was specially sent down to report our speech to the Watch Committee of the Corporation, and several rumours are about of various impending prosecutions by the police authorities, who have been rather hardly hit by our comrades during the past month. They seem to have been buzzing about lately for witnesses on their behalf, and there is every likelihood that efforts will shortly be made here to stop our open-air meetings. Commonweal and other literature sold well. We all feel encouraged by the attitude of the police, and accept it as the best praise of our work.—F. C.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday, comrade Proctor gave a paper on "The Unskilled Labour Movement." It was a masterly review of the situation, and provoked a good discussion.

"WHITE SLAVERY."—To talk about white slavery in this country, and to liken the condition of the working-men to the negro slaves before emancipation, is to speak falsely, to bear false witness, and to insult, slander, and degrade the vast majority of American citizens.—New York Sun. And yet we seem to remember, says the Boston Herald, that only a few months ago the Sun published a series of articles which bore the heading of "The White Slaves of New York," and described the condition of poor sewing-women of the metropolis in a way that made their condition seem worse, in many respects, than that of the slave-women before the war. Negro slavery was a bad and brutal thing; but at least the slaves ordinarily had a plentiful supply of the bare necessities of life, such as food, clothing, and shelter. Self-interest and the law, if no higher motives, compelled the master to see to that. But, according to the Sun's own accounts, some of the poor sewing-women of New York, and hard-working ones too, do not have these bare necessities. They are at the mercy of "sweaters" and landlords as much as the slaves were at the mercy of their masters. Is there not, then, some truth in the talk about "white slavery"?

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.
