ADVERTISEMENT.

ON the publication of a work of this nature, something may be expected by way of prelude. If the plaudit of the public is not to be purchased, their indulgence may possibly be secured. But neither of these motives has influenced the author to trespass upon their time. He would deprecate their censure, not for having given birth to this production, but for having introduced it immaturely to the observation of the public. What little polish would the close application of two years throw upon a body of this magnitude! And yet, amid a variety of other avocations, two years only has the author been allowed to transcribe, correct, and finish it. He says, allowed, as necessity prescribes the term, and his duty calls him to a distant part of the globe, to perform other engagements, to pay other debts, than what the desire of pleasing prompts, or the love of fame exacts from him.

Under this conviction, therefore, he waits silently the probe of criticism. But the candid critic, like the skilful surgeon, is sparing of the knife, and, but in desperate cases, is inclined to proceed to extremities. Into such hands it may be the lot of the author to fall. Where the eye takes more delight in beauty than in deformity, where the disposition is more apt to praise than to censure, no doubts could deter an author from appearing at the bar of criticism. In a description of countries little travelled, and of men little known, there may possibly be mistakes that have arisen from misinformation, or even misconception of things. In a detail of adventures committed often to paper in moments of peril and distress, there may, indeed, be a repetition of sentiment, and sometimes a contradiction of opinions before advanced, which the greatest attention; during a two years revision, has not been able to correct. But if impartiality has uniformly directed his pencil, and his pictures are not even so highly coloured as nature would have permitted; if he has rather consulted the public amusement, than the gratification of his own vanity, this early publication, with all its imperfections, will not want an advocate among the literati.

And here he was about to congratulate himself on having gained so essential a point. To the private approbation of Mr. Reed of Staples-Inn, was the author confirmed in the hope of success, and to his open recommendation of this work to some who knew the value of Mr. Reed's judgment, the reader, probably, owes that it is now submitted to his view. To the friendship of Mr. Braithwaite of the Post-Office, he may place this, and other material helps he has experienced in the course of publication. But he should ask these gentlemen's forgiveness, for involving them in a question, where their names are used less to their advantage than to that of the author.

It behoves him to say a word or two on the head of the plates. His knowledge of drawing is so confined, that more than a sketch of the places through which he passed, exceeded the author's art. The antiquities of Egypt have given employment to the pencils of a Norden and a Pococke, and were not to be expected from the title of these travels. But drawings of particular scenes, in which he was engaged, and representations of the singular customs of the country, would have brought them forward to the reader's eye. He must ever lament the deficiency of his work in this respect: but he is happy at the same time to observe, that there is a remedy at hand, for those who delight in novel pictures. The reputation of Mr. Dalton, his Majesty's antiquarian, was established by the work which he produced in 1752, consisting of plates of various antiquities in Greece and Egypt. The connoisseurs, therefore, are not likely to be disappointed in the Supplement to that work, which Mr. Dalton is about to publish. The designs which relate to Egypt, obtained as they must have been with great difficulty, and executed as they are with great spirit, will prove such an elucidation to his labors, that the author must beg Mr. Dalton's pardon, if he presumes to recommend those designs to the reader, which are so peculiarly adapted to this work, that nothing but its unworthiness should divide them from each other.

He has but one thing more to add, which concerns the companions of his travels. To the two gentlemen who accompanied him to Europe, he trusts an apology is needless, as they will readily acquit him of a design to pay any but a proper tribute to their characters. By the other person, whom the hand of mischance separated from their company, he would wish to be understood. The circumstances which produced that separation should have been buried in oblivion, had not a regard for his own honor obliged the author to place the intentions of his companions and himself in their true light. The narrative of that affair—as it appears in this work—was signed by Major Henry Alexander, Mr. Anthony Hammond, and the author, and transmitted to India at the time. The paper may have miscarried, but the parties are alive to testify the fact. All that delicacy and humanity could suggest, has been observed on the occasion. The name of the unhappy person is suppressed, and self-vindication alone could have induced him to revive a subject, which more nearly affected the author and his companions, than all their subsequent misfortunes!

To conclude. Were books, any more than men, to be judged only by their good intentions—were no regard to be paid to the figure which they make in the world—this work would have a better chance to maintain its ground. But as there are other points to be considered; as truth can only be rendered efficacious in an amiable dress, and as the justest descriptions must be disgraced by inelegant language, the author cannot divest himself of certain sensations, which must disturb the firmest mind, on the eve of committing its thoughts to the discussion of the public.

ADVENTURES, &c.

IN THE YEARS 1777, AND 1781;
IN LETTERS TO A LADY.

MADAM,

WERE ability subservient to inclination, were the efforts of the heart to be seconded by the efforts of the imagination, I should with less scruple begin upon the task which you have allotted me. But the seas which I have passed, and the sands which I have wandered over, appear now to have been fraught with less danger than the adventure I am about to engage in. Once launched into the literary world, what has not a poor author to fear from the blasts of ridicule, and the rocks of envy! But as the want of an ostentatious tious display has secured my footsteps from the assault of the wild Arab, so may I hope, that the modesty of my pretensions may prove my passport through the waste of criticism. Happy at all events, in the prospect of your influence, to protect the strain that is guided by truth, and owes its existence to the commands of friendship.

The occurrences of our voyage from Madras to Mocha, are like the generality of sea-affairs, too trivial to become interesting, and too unvaried to afford amusement. Since the fables of the ancients have been banished our creed, a modern voyager finds it difficult to diversify or embellish his journal. Neptune ceases to assert his empire over the waves, and Amphitrité no longer skims the surface of the deep, seated in a coral chariot drawn by Mermaids, and surrounded by a choir of musical Nereids. A storm therefore loses the majesty which a Divinity would give it; and our calms are really dull, for want of the company of such a beautiful Goddess. I question whether the voyage of Æneas, if deprived of these fictitious ornaments, would not become equally insipid with those published by recent discoverers, whose heroes visited people more strange, and seas more remote than Æneas, and encountered gulphs far more dangerous than Scylla or Charybdis!

- There was nothing remarkable in our passage to Mocha, but the length of it. We were above eight weeks in effecting a passage, which frequently requires but three. The lateness of the season made us apprehensive of delays, but not the continual ones we met with. At several periods we thought of nothing less than of getting to Suez by water. My fellow-travellers and myself were, however, resolved to prosecute our journey by land, should the snow Adventure reach any port in the Red Sea. But the sight of land presented us with better prospects.

We had been two-and-forty days in crossing the wide ocean which divides India from Africa, when on the 31st of March we saw indistinctly the island of Socotra, which lies about 35 leagues from the main. On the 2d of April we made Cape Guardafoy, which is a prodigious mountainous and craggy shore. From hence we stood over to the coast of Arabia, and by an easterly current, were driven so far towards the ocean, that it was the 6th before we past Cape Aden. Here the remains of a Portuguese fort are still visible, which is an humiliating monument of their former superiority in these parts. On the 9th we ran through the straits of Babelmandel*, with a fine gale, which, joined to a strong current, set us through in a quarter of an hour. There is a very ugly sea in these straits, and they being the usual entrance into the Red-Sea, I have annexed a plate of them, which was drawn upon the spot. Vessels may pass to the westward of the island, but this is attended with danger. The gale increased to such a degree, that we were fain to run under the land at noon, in a bay about half-way between the straits and Mocha. Here we rode out a very violent storm, and thought ourselves lucky in being so well sheltered from the fury of it. The wind abated a little at day-break on the 10th, when we weighed and stood for Mocha. Though still boisterous, the wind was fortunately fair, and we were not many hours in running the distance. At twelve o'clock we dropped our anchor in Mocha road, but were obliged to wait until the weather moderated, before we ventured to debark. The month of April was advanced, but we went ashore at Mocha the same evening, in full confidence of being agreeably accommodated to Suez, on board the Adventure. We looked only upon the brighter side of the perspective; as the difficulties and dangers annexed to a journey of 11 or 1200 miles by land, along a barren and barbarous coast, could afford us no very pleasing reflections.

* In Ramusia's copy it is called Babel: which are the two first words of Bab al Man dub (corruptly called the gate of weeping) that is the gate of weeping, the name given to the mouth of the Red Sea, or Arabian Gulph; which was reckoned so dangerous by the antient Arabs, that whenever any of their relations passed it, they put on mourning for them, as persons they gave over for lost.

Mocha, the antient capital of Arabia Felix, is situated upon a sandy soil, about 12 leagues from the straits of Babelmandel, and in the latitude of  $13^{\circ} 15'$  north. This city is of great antiquity, and displays a very handsome appearance towards the sea. But its beauty will not bear a close inspection. Like the deformities which are so frequently discovered beneath a fair exterior, the inside of its buildings is by no means answerable to the expectations which they raise. To survey the desert on which it stands, a stranger must be surprized at the plenty which reigns in the markets. There is not a tree within ken, that produces any fruit, but the date, or herbage of any kind, to support the cattle which are daily exposed for sale. But to the simplicity of the Arabian manners this circumstance is to be attributed. Where the natives are content with the coarsest food that a country produces, it is no wonder that the more delicate viands are readily procured, by the few Europeans who visit their shores. And indeed, when we are informed that the sheep which are sold here, are all brought from the opposite coast of Abyssinia, and the simplest vegetable, at no less a distance than fifteen miles from Mocha, conjecture would lose itself in accounting for such plenty, were a clue not given to unravel the mystery.

Mocha is under the authority of a governor, as the Imaun, who unites the offices of high-priest and king of Arabia Felix, always resides at Senna, a city about ten days journey from hence, delightfully situated in a valley, with which this mountainous country abounds. The Turks have lost the influence which they formerly possessed in this kingdom. They seem content, at present, to receive their proportion of the duties of the other provinces of Arabia, without pretending to exert the arbitrary sway, which marks their government in the districts that are more immediately within the reach of their arms. There is one privilege that the Imaun claims here, which custom has rendered familiar to the subjects of a despotic state, however oppressive it may appear to the ideas of an European. He has an indisputable property in all horse-flesh. So that if a stranger takes a liking to an horse, it is of no consequence to whom it belongs, provided he be content to pay the price, which the governor may fix on it in the name of his master. But the owner is seldom exposed to the mortification of being obliged to part with his property: the value of the beast, however beautiful it may be, seldom proving in the least adequate to the price which is demanded for it.

In their horses the chief pleasure and pride of the Arabs consist. Pampered to an excess that renders them fitter for show than use, they stand in the stable, or are picketed at the doors of their masters, from one sabbath-day to another. But on this festival, they are adorned with a load of rich and unwieldy furniture, with which they parade the streets from morning to night: and they now receive the only exercise which they are permitted to take. The governor's stud, which consists of a number of choice horses, are particularly drawn up in the square before his house. They are opposed to each other in squadrons, and at the word of command, the riders set off at full gallop, and as they pass each other, dart the pike or spear with great dexterity.

We paid a customary visit to the governor on our landing, and found him to be a grave and elderly man, meager in his body, and slovenly in his apparel. But with this unpromising appearance, he has the character of being a very good and intelligent man; and much more inquisitive after the manners and discoveries of European nations, than the generality of his countrymen. This peculiarity in his disposition plainly evinces itself in the furniture of his audience chamber, which is ornamented with a broken figured clock, a French thermometer, and an English quadrant. He received us very politely, and is a professed friend of the English nation, whose genius and spirit he affects to admire. This piece of intelligence we obtained from our resident here, who at the same time communicated to us an anecdote of his life, which is not unworthy of mention. It not only carries with it an evidence of the intriguing temper of the Arabs, but sets off to advantage the character of a man, to whom the English are materially obliged.

In the reign of the father of the present king of Sennaa, this man was the vizier and favourite. So universally was his administration approved of, and so necessary did the old king think him to the welfare of the state, that he recommended him on his death-bed to the protection of his son, in the most earnest terms. The prince was deeply impressed with a charge delivered to him at so solemn a moment, and promised his father, to make the knowledge and advice of the vizier the sole guides of his future life. And to this promise he very faithfully adhered, for some years after his accession to the throne.

In the course of this time, the young monarch had formed inconsiderate attachments for courtiers of his own age and disposition. Though this did not immediately interfere with the minister's influence in matters of government, it nevertheless suggested, to a discerning mind, the approaches of neglect and disgrace. To prevent the execution, therefore, of what he considered as inevitable, should he continue in his present office, he very wisely formed the resolution of retiring from court. A resolution inspired by the soundest philosophy, wavered not until an opportunity offered to put it into practice.

One day when he was alone with the king, he took the liberty to speak of the length of his services, and of the decline of his life. He touched modestly upon his known affection, and zeal for the honor of his sovereign; and bespoke his majesty's indulgence for the petition which he was about to prefer. He concluded with an humble desire, that he might be permitted to resign his trust to one, whose faculties and health were more vigorous, and able to transact the important affairs, in which he had been so long employed. The better to cover his design, he affected an inclination clination to visit Mocha, where he purposed to remain until his name was forgotten, and that time should weaken the malice of a faction, which is the inseparable attendant of the best administration. It was not without reluctance, that the king complied with this unexpected request. He had a particular value and respect for the minister, and was not prepared to forego his services, although the latter had been artful enough to recommend for his successor, one of the chief favorites of his master. The struggle, however, was of no long continuance. The king's pride was touched at the idea of being at a loss for a servant, and he hastened to invest the very favorite who had been pointed out to him, with the dignity of the abdicated minister.

But little did the minister dream of the consequences of this resignation. Little did he foresee, that his successor would lay hold of the wish which he had expressed to visit Mocha, to load him again with the cares of government; where his influence would be considerably lessened, though his dignity would appear greater than before. No sooner had the new vizier possessed himself of his office, than he was determined to remove for ever, so virtuous an observer of his administration. Poison or the sword, was too dangerous an implement, against such a character. He had recourse to a remedy which wholly answered his intentions; and, by blinding the eyes of his sovereign, and advancing the opinion of his principles among the vulgar, vulgar, must be held as a masterpiece of courtly artifice.

With the greatest appearance of warmth, therefore, he represented to the king the outcry which would be raised against him, should he suffer an old servant of his father's, and the guardian of his own youth, to visit Mocha, without being distinguished by some public character. He then insinuated the lucky occasion which presented itself, to reward his services with the government of that city. It was impossible to suspect the treachery of this advice; and it is not wonderful, that the monarch greedily took the bait. He that very day forwarded a commission to Mocha, which the old man had the mortification to find, on his arrival here. To him, however, the trick was obvious. He readily dived into the scheme of his successor, who, judging of others from himself, had taken an unnecessary step to detach him from the vanity of court-favour. The vexation of the governor is not to be described. But rather than disturb the peace of his master with complaints, he has the virtue to encounter the fatigues of business, though repugnant to his inclinations; and is content to live a voluntary exile from his native place, secure of the affection of the people, and conscious of the esteem of the king. A king! who still continues under the delusion of having preferred a faithful subject, agreeably to his own choice. What a lesson should this be to the sovereigns of more enlightened nations! who may justly apprehend hend the intrigues of designing men, when the refinements of party prevail within the narrow scope of Arabian politics!

The women in Arabia are kept in much stricter confinement, than those of their religion in India. The females of rank are shut up in their apartments, and never stir abroad, except now and then, to accompany their husbands on an excursion to the vallies. They are veiled at these times from head to foot, and sent off upon horseback under cover of the night. But this simple recreation does not fall often to their lot. The civilized Arabs are, of all nations, the least inclined to action; and it is to be supposed, that women born here, live and die, without stirring out of the walls of Mocha: such is the tax that is laid on birth and greatness, even in the remote country of Arabia. How then can we be surprized at the vexations, which cloud the lives of the followers of a powerful court? if female beauty be doomed to solitude in these rude parts, is not the liberty which is allowed it in more polished countries, too often the source of calamities more grievous than confinement, of persecutions more intolerable than the commands of an imperious master? I doubt not, but there is many a toast that blazes in the circles of St. James's, that sighs for the privilege of obscurity, and would willingly hide the remains of a shattered reputation in an Arabian seraglio!

To those of a lower degree, there is some deviation permitted from the severity of this custom.

Though

Though there are no public Hummums for the women to resort to as in Turkey, they are indulged with the freedom of visiting their neighbors, when the dusk of the evening can skreen their persons from observation: for the thick veils in which their faces are buried, utterly preclude the possibility of distinguishing their features. We have met them ourselves in the streets, and have conceived a favorable idea of their faces, from the symmetry of their figures.

Incontinence is held much more criminal among the single than married females. Though adultery is punished with a heavy fine, the seduction of a virgin is attended by a more serious correction. In this they differ from the laws of more enlightened kingdoms, where an injury of this nature, is not only unpunishable by any course of law, but the matter itself is treated in a very light manner. And here the character of the Arabian legislator rises far beyond the boasted policy of European states. To his justice it is owing, that the destruction of innocence is held in such abhorrence; and to his rectitude of thinking, that the mere accomplice of a lewd woman should encounter less rigorous treatment, than the mean betrayer of unexperienced simplicity. How just this observation may be, I submit with pleasure to the decision of a lady, who can so charitably distinguish between the follies and vices of her sex; and who can separate the errors of inexperience from the impulses of a depraved inclination!

We were surprized at the number of Christian renegadoes that reside at Mocha. Not, that the apostacy of men, who perhaps had no sense of religion until they professed Mahometanism, could provoke our wonder; but how their worldly interests could be advanced by the change. Reduced to a pitiful subsistence, and held in deserved contempt by the natives, we should have surmised their defection to be merely the effects of despair; and that the fugitives from justice alone, sought their safety at this price, had not the example of a Greek priest somewhat shaken our opinion. This priest, by name Ananias, I remember to have heard mentioned in Bengal, as a miracle of piety. And yet in the seventieth year of his age, did he publicly abjure the Christian religion, in the course of a pilgrimage to Mount Sinai. He was circumcised, and received into the Mahometan church; and, to crown the whole of this strange proceeding, was led about the city for three days, according to custom, mounted on an ass, to receive the alms of the faithful, which every convert is entitled to on his admission to their mysteries. This happened during our short stay at Mocha; and is one of the greatest instances of the infirmity of human nature, which has come within the sphere of my observation.

The English are the only nation who have a resident here; and this is but a late regulation. The East India Company were accustomed to send a ship here every season; but now the coffee is transported ported on country bottoms to Bombay, from whence our Indiamen convey it to Europe. By this plan they are eased of a considerable expence; as the appointments of supercargoes to this station, and the heavy duties of this port, must have lessened the advantages which result from this trade. No better means could have been devised to ingratiate ourselves with the natives, than the appointment of a resident among them. It is a pleasure to me to add, that nothing could have better ensured the end in view, than the choice of the present gentleman who fills that post. His mild demeanor cannot fail to engage the esteem of the people; as his acknowledged abilities will lead him to improve every occasion, to restore this drooping branch of commerce to its original value. Neither is the presence of Mr. Horfeley at Mocha, of less moment to the interests of travellers, who prefer this short cut to Europe, to the old track by the Cape of Good Hope. Hospitality and politeness are acceptable in all places, but doubly so to the way-worn traveller, who the least expects to meet with them in a remote and uncivilized region.

I have annexed a view of the town and suburbs of Mocha, which I took from our vessel on the day of our arrival here. There is a wall runs round the town, but there are no cannon mounted on it, except a few on a battery towards the sea. The northern and southern extremities of the town are flanked by two castles of a circular form, which are likewise ornamented with guns, and were meant as a defence to the place. How much these Arabian engineers were mistaken in their ideas of fortification, will clearly appear from a circumstance, which occurred here about six or seven years ago, and will set their pretensions to power in a proper light.

The captain of a trading vessel from India, was ashore at the English factory, and correcting a slave for some fault or other, the boy ran away, and took refuge in an Arabian house, where he was prevailed upon to become a Mahometan. In this country no Christian is permitted to keep a slave of this persuasion. The boy availed himself of this privilege, and went abroad again, without any fear of his master's resentment. One day, however, as he ventured to pass the factory, he was observed by the captain, whose English blood boiled with indignation at this seeming insult. Unheeding of his situation, he gave way to a sudden impulse of passion, and ordered his servants to seize the boy, and flog him severely within the yard of the factory. This rash action could not escape notice, and was attended by consequences which he little expected. The factory was at that time uninhabited, except by the supercargoes and captains during their short stay here. It was not in the best repair, and but little calculated to make a defence. The mob, which now gathered about it, easily forced the gates; and not finding the object of their research, whom they meant to have sacrificed on the spot, contented contented themselves with plundering his effects. On the first alarm, the captain wisely retreated to the terrace of the factory; and it was with no little difficulty, that he escaped along the roofs of the houses to the sea-side, where he immediately took a boat for his vessel.

This disturbance was too sudden to have been checked under the best-regulated government; but it might have been remedied: satisfaction might have been made to the sufferer, had the governor been inclined to do him justice. A deaf ear was turned to his remonstrances, and the captain was obliged to carry his complaint to Bombay: here, to the honour of the British name, it was properly attended to. The councils were vigorous; and two sloops of war were directly fitted out for Mocha, to enforce redress. They accordingly appeared before the town, with all the implements for a bombardment; and a message was sent ashore, to advertise the governor of their errand. It is impossible to conceive the terror of the inhabitants at these tidings. They deserted the castles, which they had once considered as impregnable, and were about to quit the city itself; but this the governor prevented. He thought proper to comply with the demands, which were made in the name of the sufferer, and sent off 4,000 dollars to the commodore of the expedition; happy, to preserve the city from destruction, and to appease the resentment of the English, at so cheap a rate. And even the money to make good this payment, was raised unjustly.

unjustly, though it was to satisfy a just demand. The Banian, or Gentoo merchants, who are settled here, and transact all the business of the port, fell within the gripe of government on this occasion. They have assured us more than once, that they were obliged to advance the sum in question, for which they have not yet been satisfied. It is necessary to add, that this occurrence, so disgraceful in its nature, was antecedent to the administration of the present governor; of whose character I have had occasion to speak in the most favorable terms.

To these Banians we were obliged for a part of our amusements at this place. There is a wood of date-trees, which extends from the southern suburbs of Mocha, for some miles towards the inland mountains. There is no mark of cultivation in this neighborhood besides; and in this wood, one of the principal Banians has a country seat. We have no conveyance here, except asses, on which we ride about for our diversion. In one of our excursions we called at this seat, which is above three miles from the town, and on our way home, had an opportunity of observing a curious process in the vegetable world. It has already been taken notice of by naturalists, but is too uncommon to be known to readers of every class. The date-trees were now in blossom; and we remarked the Arabs to be busied about the branches. It is necessary to ingraft all fruit-trees, to obtain good fruit; but the propagation of the date is in another manner, and intimately resembles that of the animal creation. There is a male as well as female date-tree, which are distinguished from each other by the color and shape of the blossoms. The male tree yields no fruit; but the gardener must be careful, every spring, to cull as many blossoms from the male, as will serve his purpose. One of these at least he must inwrap and bind up in a blossom of the female tree; without which she will prove as barren as the male. The singularity of this operation is heightened by its being discovered by a people, who are at present grossly ignorant of every branch of natural philosophy*.

It is to our resident that I am indebted for an ingenious conjecture, relative to the barren coasts of Arabia Felix, with which I shall close my remarks on this celebrated territory. For the space of fifteen or sixteen miles from the beach, the land rises on a gradual ascent towards the foot of the mountains. Here the scene suddenly changes from a sandy waste, to a verdant and fertile soil; from a scarcity of palatable water, to a profusion of chrystal springs and running streams. In this desert barrier there are found quantities of shells, and other productions of the ocean, which seem to have lain there for many ages: this, joined to the shelving appearance of the ground, renders the idea very probable, that this tract of land has been won from the sea, by the secret operations of nature. There is, indeed, no information to be gathered of this event, among a people whose annals carry no perspicuity with them, beyond the days of their prophet. But the perpendicular shores of the opposite coast of Africa, upon which the waters may have proportionably encroached, are an additional evidence in favor of this opinion. No stranger, in traversing this shore, could possibly conceive her right to the title of Happy. But place him in her middle regions, beneath her balm-dropping woods, and amidst her delightful vales, where the fruits of every climate court his taste, and the breezes of cassia refresh his senses, and he will pronounce, that she justly retains the flattering appellation with which she was honoured by the antients.

* There is little force in this compliment, when it is known that the Egyptians have so far improved on this mode, as to plant only a male date-tree in the middle of many females. The wind scatters the male seed, which impregnates the female tree, without the trouble of the Arabian culture.

On the 16th of April we had completed our wood and water, and taken on board a sufficient stock of provision to serve us on our passage. We cheerfully embarked, therefore, on the Adventure, captain Bacon, and with an additional passenger from India, spread our sails for the long-wish'd-for port of Suez. For some days we were favored with a fair breeze, and moderate weather: but the wind changed suddenly to the northward, and began to blow with great violence against us. The moon was now at the full, and we were to look for a continuance of the gale. In narrow seas the waters are soon agitated; and we experienced such a disagreeable motion, from the incessant working of the vessel, that some of my fellow-passengers were again confined to their cabbins. As for my own part, I have had the good fortune to be free from sickness during our tedious voyage, if I except an head-ach of four days standing, which I consider, indeed, as a natural infirmity. Our hopes were once more revived, from the wind's abating. We were by this time in the latitude of Judda; and though the wind was still contrary, we made a shift to creep on daily towards our desired port. Our greatest progress was from ten to twenty miles in our way. We could not, with propriety, run more than thirty miles upon one tack; and it was our custom to make one shore about sun-set, then to tack, and stand for the opposite side, until day-break.

We had beaten up in this manner, to the 24th degree of north latitude, and were within 150 leagues of Suez, when, in the afternoon of the 6th of May, we discovered breakers ahead. The vessel's head was to the north-east, and the captain judged himself, from his journal, to be in mid-channel. It may be supposed, therefore, that this circumstance much alarmed us, as nothing but a strong easterly current, could have thrown us among the rocks and shoals, with which this part of the Arabian coast abounds. Nor were our fears without foundation. The weather had been so hazy all day, that we could scarcely see two leagues distance.

distance. The vessel had been put about at the alarm before recited, and we were sailing with great security towards the open sea, when the departing sun warned us of the destruction on which we were running. The sky cleared up for a moment as the sun set, and presented to our view, a line of rocks and shoals immediately before us, and on which, in a quarter of an hour, we must have struck, had not Providence, in this unexpected manner, delivered us from the ravenous deep. The most experienced among us were appalled at this sight. We had breakers to the northward and westward of us, and an unknown coast to the east. The wind fortunately favoring the only safe course which was now left us, the vessel wore and stood to the southward; her two boats being sent a mile ahead to lead the way. In this manner we proceeded until midnight, when one of the boats fired a gun, as a signal of distress. Our sails were backed on this alarm; and the boat presently bore down to inform us, that she heard the surf break close to her, and that there was no ground with fifty fathom of line. Our danger now became pressing. We were exposed to impending destruction while the vessel was in motion, and there was no probability of finding anchorage for her on this coast.

In this dilemma the vessel's head was put towards the land. The weather happily continued moderate, and we made a shift to steer clear of the perils that encircled us, though not without frequent alarms. So desperate did our situation appear, so few were the chances of safety, that about two in the morning I retired to my cabin, and secured what little money and valuables I could conveniently carry about me. I loaded my pistols, and took out a packet of consequence from my chest, which I kept by me, in expectation of the vessel's striking on the rocks. In case of such an accident, we were only to trust to our boats for our deliverance. This we had learnt from the captain and officers of the snow Aurora, which was wrecked on this part of the coast, not six months preceding our arrival. We met them at Mocha on their return to India; and were advised of the particulars of their disaster, which doubled our apprehensions at the present crisis. The Aurora had been standing, like us, for the Arabian coast, and just before day-break, she struck, without the least warning, on a sunken rock. By the violence of the wind, she was driven so far upon the rock, as to bulge her bows, while at her stern no ground was to be found with ninety fathom of line. It was impossible that the vessel could hold long together in this position; and the captain and crew had scarcely time to take to their boats, when she separated and went down. There was an island in view, to which they made, and which would have preserved them from shipwreck, had the day broke but half an hour sooner. But we were at length relieved from our perplexity. With constant founding we hit upon a narrow bank in fifty fathom, and joyfully dropped an anchor at four in the morning. There was no ground, however, ever, to be found by the boats that sounded round the vessel. The bottom was rocky; and should the wind freshen, there was little dependance to be placed upon our anchor. Our satisfaction consequently was imperfect and precarious.

The light, which had been so long expected, now dawned, and enabled us at least, to discover the dangers that lurked around us. As the sun rose over the coast, we plainly discerned the mountains of Arabia; and to the splendor of that glorious luminary, we were once more indebted for a gleam of hope, to revive our drooping spirits. We hastened therefore to take advantage of this intelligence. We weighed our anchor, with as much expedition as the depth of water would admit of, and were rejoiced to get it safe on board again. Our course was still directed towards the land, which was often obscured by the mists which hung over it. About noon we were close enough to distinguish a large town, which, from our charts, we concluded to be Yambo. To this town we attempted to get. After various intricate traverses, as the channel between the sands and rocks occasioned, we arrived at the mouth of the harbor, without which there is no ground, though the boats sounded at the edge of the shoals.

And now did we heartily congratulate ourselves on the conclusion of our troubles. We had heard at Mocha of the hospitality of this port, from the very persons who had owed to the inhabitants, their life and freedom. Captain Adams, and the survivors of the snow Aurora before mentioned, had been released by the governor of Yambo from the hands of the wild Arabs. These banditti had seized them, on their reaching the continent in their boat, stripped them of their cloaths, and brought them here with a view of selling them. Not content with this act of humanity, he had furnished them with camels, and generously supplied them with money and necessaries to carry them to Judda, where they were certain of finding English vessels. Nay, the very commerce that is carried on between the English and the inhabitants of Judda, which, as well as Yambo, is subject to the Xerif of Mecca, dispelled any doubt which might arise concerning the good faith of these people. We knew that there were several English vessels at Judda at the very time. We had landed a considerable sum of money at Mocha, which was a present from the nabob of the Carnatic to the temple of Mecca; and we doubted not of meeting with the most favorable treatment at a place, which is in the neighbourhood of Medina. How dim is the perception of mortals! What avails their boasted sagacity! Their funds of lettered knowledge! Their idle dreams of security! What appears the most reconcileable to their judgment, turns out in the experiment, to have been trusted without cause, and embraced without the evidence of conviction!

I have been the more particular in recapitulating the circumstances, on which we built a confidence confidence in these people, as there are not wanting persons, idle and malicious enough, to condemn even the steps, by which their fellow-creatures have entailed misery and destruction upon themselves. The captain would have been censured for bringing his vessel into an uncivilized port, and the credulity of the passengers held up in a ridiculous light, for trusting themselves among a savage tribe, unversed in the tender offices of humanity, and unrestrained by the laws of social life. And to such this recital will be of use. While the generous breast shall plead our cause, and make allowances for the frailty of our natures, those worse than Arab spirits shall be robbed of the enjoyment of their spleen, and of liberty to pass sentence upon us, unheard. Entangled in a chain of sands and rocks, without a correct chart to direct us, or a seaman on board acquainted with the path of safety, there remained no alternative but to enter a port, that seemed to open her friendly arms for our relief. We were certain there were pilots here who could conduct us to Suez; and to escape shipwreck at sea, necessity would have obliged us to hazard slaughter ashore, even had we not been taught to look for the most hospitable reception. It will appear in the course of this narrative, that had we not considered the vessel's safety prior to our own, our lives had probably never been endangered, and we had escaped a fund of trouble and disquietude. But to our ignorance of the Arabian policy must our conduct be attributed, and

and that opposition, which brought us to the brink of destruction.

As the adventures which befel us in this place, were either immediately committed to paper, or as soon as I could regain a communication with the pen, I will beg leave to deviate from the mode which I have hitherto observed, and keep a diary of our future transactions. A tale of distress is not only more interesting when thus divided, but more capable of spirit and accuracy. I ask not the colors of fiction to heighten a picture, which cannot fail to affect, when represented by the simplest touches of nature!

WEDNESDAY, 7th MAY 1777.

On the afternoon of this day we anchored at the entrance of Yambo harbor. We had scarcely taken a view of the town through our glasses, when we perceived a boat rowing towards us, which brought on board an Arab of a venerable and pleasing aspect. His appearance bespoke him of no common rank, and we presently found that he was a Shaik, and one of the members of government. This personage was charged with the compliments of the governor, or as he is here styled, the Vizier of Yambo, and his congratulations on our arrival in a port, where we should want for nothing that was in his power to afford. Refreshments we were in little need of. But our spirits were elated with the proffer of a pilot, which the vizier justly divined to be the motive of our errand.

In a few minutes a second boat reached our vessel, from which ascended an Abyssinian slave, handsomely clothed and armed after the fashion of the country. He proved to be one of the vizier's guard, and came with an invitation from his master, to favor him with our company on shore. We were much taken with the freedom of these people's behavior; and though they acknowledged to us, that no European vessel had put into their port before, we entertained no distrust of their sincerity, and readily promised to take advantage of the vizier's politeness. There were several of us in the ship who talked the Moor language, and were equally deceived by the old shaik, who was a Patan, and understood it perfectly. He conversed with such ease and gravity of face, that the eye of suspicion might have been lulled asleep, and age itself relaxed of its severity of opinion.

After regaling them with coffee and tea, of which they willingly partook, we dismissed them with advice of our intentions to go on shore in the morning. The preliminaries were adjusted; and we agreed to salute the fort at sun-rise, when these messengers promised to come on board for us.

THURSDAY,

THURSDAY, 8th MAY.

I was awakened this morning by the vessel's salute, which was irregularly returned by the fort. As soon as breakfast was over, I went into the long-boat with the captain, two supercargoes, our interpreter, and three passengers, who are bound for England as well as myself. We were accompanied by our servants in a fisher-boat, and about the middle of the harbor, were met by the old shaik, the Abyssinian, and others of the vizier's train, who had been sent to conduct us ashore. As we passed a decayed castle on an angle of the fort, a very laughable incident occurred. A gun was fired from thence to welcome us to Yambo; but such a quantity of rubbish fell down from the shock, and such a dust obscured the place, as immediately interrupted the salute, and induced the garrison to consult their own safety, by an omission of the compliment intended us. Indeed, so ruinous an appearance did the walls and buildings of this town exhibit, which had not probably been repaired since the days of Mahomet, that our contempt of it increased to a degree, that would have ridiculed the idea of danger. At our landing we were met by some officers of the vizier's household, and ushered in great state to an apartment by the sea-side. Here were assembled sundry of the principal inhabitants, who were seated on carpets, agreeably to the oriental custom. There were chairs provided for our reception, and we were served with coffee and perfumes.
were

After an hour's delay, at which we were somewhat surprized, but have since been able to account for, the vizier sent to acquaint us of his being ready to see us. We were accordingly attended in the same manner as before, to a building within the fort, and introduced to this minister. He received us sitting; it being unusual with the Arabs to rise up, to salute those of an inferior rank. We advanced however, towards him, by the direction of our interpreter; on which he put his right hand to his breast with a slight inclination of his head, and gave it to each of us, as a token of his amity. Of all the Mussulmen whom I have yet seen, the vizier of Yambo is the fairest. Without the mixture of red and white, that distinguishes Europeans from Asiatics, his complexion did not yield to any of our company. His eyes black and sparkling; his nose aquiline, and his countenance expressive of great sweetness and sensibility. He seemed to be between thirty and forty years of age, and was not the least embarrassed by the presence of strangers, whom he only knew by report. We had been surprized at the deportment of the vizier's servants yesterday. But that was a scene of little admiration, when compared with the audience we now obtained. The impression will never be effaced from my mind. The powers of Garrick would, if possible, fall short, to support the countenance and address of the vizier during an interview of two hours, hours, in which such complicated deceit and villainy were used, as throw the crooked politics of Machiavel far behind !

After the first ceremonies were over, and the coffee and perfumes brought in, the vizier repeated his offers of assistance. He professed a great respect for the English nation, and a regard for the nabob of Arcot—in whose service the captain had declared himself—for his generous attention to the poor of Mecca. He flattered us with the prospect of getting easily to Suez; and as we were in want of a pilot, he sent for the captain of the port, to examine him in our presence, touching our future passage. Nothing could be more plausible than this behavior. We were profuse in our acknowledgments of the minister's goodness, and little imagined that the man who was summoned before us, had been tutored for the purpose, during our stay at the shaik's house.

In a short time this officer appeared, and was questioned by the vizier himself on the certainty and length of our voyage to Suez. The particulars of this conversation were conveyed to us by our interpreter, who stood between them. It had long been our fear, that the southerly winds were exhausted, and that the northerly monsoon was about to set in; which would inevitably prevent our further progress. And it was on these points that the pilot insisted. He expressed his doubts of making the passage, and his apprehensions of endangering an English vessel; the consequence of which

which he could not answer. At length he positively declined the undertaking, as hazardous and impracticable. Much argument did the vizier use to render him compliant. He threw out the lure of the reward, which his success would entitle him to; and even affected to be shocked at his presumption and pusillanimity. He submitted the matter to ourselves, and offered, if we pleased, to send the pilot in irons on board our vessel. To this violence it may be supposed, we universally dissented; at the same time that we declared our sense of this mark of the minister's friendship. The head pilot was therefore dismissed, and another sent for, whom the vizier pretended to judge would be more tractable. But with him we had no better success. He was equally backward with the former, to take charge of the vessel; and after much futile persuasion, the minister turned round to us in seeming trouble, and expressed his regret at our bad fortune.

The captain now totally abandoned all thoughts of proceeding further; and was content with the promise of a pilot to carry him to Judda; the port to which the ship was ordered, in case of the loss of her passage to Suez. The travellers destined for Europe, now preferred their petition. We requested a boat, to transport us to Suez with our baggage; and informed the vizier of our being severally charged with packets for the East India Company, both from the nabob of Arcot and the governor of Madras. To this he gave a gracious assent; assent ; and the pilot engaged to fit out a boat for us in five days. Nay, the price of his trouble was fixed at 50 dollars, which apparently exceeded his expectations. Our conference had been spun out to a great length, and as our business was dispatched we made a motion to retire. It was our intention to have repaired immediately to the vessel, where dinner was provided : but the vizier acquainted us at our departure, that he had directed refreshments to be prepared for us at the shaik's house, of which he hoped we would partake. As the day was pretty far advanced, and we travellers were anxious to adjust the particulars of our voyage with the pilot, we unwittingly swallowed the bait which was thrown out for us, and returned with the old shaik to his house, little dreaming that it would become the theatre of our troubles !

On a candid review of the foregoing scene, even on the very day it occurred, I cannot charge my memory with a single circumstance, by which the sincerity of the vizier was liable to suspicion. So well was the plot laid, with such address did the principal characters conduct themselves, that never fiction so happily assumed the air of truth. The slightest alarm would probably have prevented the consequences which ensued, as none of us imagine the shaik or his attendants were authorized to oppose our departure, had we made an effort to regain our boat, instead of returning to the house of our conductor. But we were lulled into a security, that was particularly strengthened on the part of us travellers, travellers, from an information which the vizier gave us. Two English gentlemen had been recommended to his good offices by the Xerif his master; and he had dispatched them with a packet to Suez, but a few days before our arrival. This circumstance encouraged our hopes. We conceived the packet to be the same, which a captain Dibdin was charged with from the usurped administration at Madras; and we were emulous of not being outstripped in a race, where we contended without reproach.

We had not been half an hour at the shaik's house, when a messenger came to summon our interpreter to the vizier's presence. This man was an Arab by birth, and had performed a pilgrimage to Mecca; an act of devotion which every true Mussulman undertakes, either in person or by proxy, before he dies. From this he had obtained the title of Hadgy. He was a shrewd sensible fellow, and proved of infinite service to us in the sequel, by letting us into the designs of his countrymen. He returned after a short absence, with evident marks of surprize in his countenance, which soon communicated itself to our breasts, by the message he brought. It imported, that the vizier could render us no assistance, until he received an order from the Xerif of Mecca concerning us; and that it would be adviseable for the captain to direct the officer on board, to bring the vessel into the harbor. Such a contradiction in his conduct immediately opened our eyes to the wrong that was intended us; and we began to think of the best method to extricate ourselves from the snare we had fallen into. A retreat to our boat naturally suggested itself: but our deliberations were soon interrupted, by one of the company observing from a window, that there was a guard upon the house. To be certified of this, I walked through an area that led to the gateway, which I found beset by a troop of soldiers. There was now nothing left us, but to put the best face on the matter. We sent the interpreter back to the vizier, with expostulations on the duplicity of his behavior. We reminded him of our having come ashore at his own invitation; and that he could not detain us, without a violation of the law of nations, and of hospitality: for a regard to which the Arabs were universally celebrated. We demanded, what business he or his master could have with a vessel which had not entered their port, and was in want of nothing but a pilot, which it was at their option to afford her. We observed the odium that would attend such proceedings towards the property of a prince, to whom the Xerif was so much indebted, both in respect to the commerce which he carried on with the port of Judda, and the very valuable present that our vessel had brought for the temple of Mecca. Finally, we warned him, not to offer any insult to the British flag, which the most barbarous nations had been taught to respect. The interpreter was likewise charged to demand an audience for the captain, that he might argue the matter with the vizier. But this effort was unsuccessful. The poor fellow came back with a long face, and brought a strict injunction to the captain, to order the vessel into the harbor, and a desire that we would make ourselves easy, until the orders respecting us arrived, which would be in six days at furthest. The captain's suit was declined, on pretence of the vizier's being engaged with company.

We now consulted upon the steps to be taken in this exigency. Our junction with the ship was infallibly cut off. The mariners who had been left to take care of the boat, had by this time, been sent to the place of our confinement. From them we learnt, that our boat was carried to an unknown part, at the moment of their seizure. Our own detention was consequently confirmed, and the escape of the vessel from the hands of these robbers—for such we regarded them—was the point to which we turned our views. Indeed, we considered her as the anchor by which our lives were held. It was impossible to answer for the forbearance or humanity of people, who had broken through the most sacred precept of their religion, in their treatment of us, should they once get the vessel into their possession, by whose means alone the circumstances of our detention could be brought to light. With our concurrence therefore, the captain wrote a positive order to his chief mate, to weigh or slip his anchor with the first favorable wind, make the best of his way to Judda, and there communicate our story to the captains of the English vessels. And even this scheme appeared to us by no means as safe or feasible. The vessel lay in a narrow channel, with shoals and breakers on each side of her; and the northerly winds prevailed the greatest part of the day, which obstructed her departure. Add to this, that her passage to Judda was dangerous without a pilot; to the chance of procuring which, the officer must have trusted to the coasting boats. But all obstacles sunk under the pressure of necessity. The captain and supercargoes were more particularly interested in the preservation of the vessel and cargo; and among the valuables that the passengers had on board, I chiefly considered a packet, which a noble friend* had entrusted to a fellow-traveller and myself. We were, perhaps, singular in our concern for some moveable or other. But we were unanimous in our desire, that the vessel which contained it, should get beyond the reach of these spoilers.

While our interpreter was dispatched with this letter to the vizier, to give a very opposite explanation of the contents, which their utter ignorance of our language enabled him to do with security, we sat down upon a carpet, to partake of a frugal meal which the old shaik had set before us. It consisted of stewed mutton, garnished with raw onions. Flat cakes of flour were our plates, and our fingers stood us in lieu of knives and forks.

Notwithstanding the agitation of our minds, and this unusual method of eating, we made a shift to clear the dish in a few minutes, to the no small admiration of the shaik and his attendants. The natives of Arabia are very temperate in their diet; and though we found that the lower class would drink spirituous liquors to excess, we have reason to believe, that the better sort generally adhere to the precept of the Alcoran, which forbids the use of them. Pure water is their common draught, and with this we were obliged to crown our meal.

Our watches had advised us of its being past five o'clock, when the interpreter returned with an order to the shaik, to send a boat off with the letter. It now occurred to us, that the captain had better proffer himself to execute the vizier's pleasure. His escape would have proved an additional security to the vessel; and though we almost despaired of success, we omitted not our endeavours to carry this point. The captain and the two supercargoes were separately proposed to be the bearer of the orders; but all that we could obtain, in the course of two hours sollicitation, was leave for a servant to go off with the letter. It was now near eight o'clock, and we had the further mortification to be kept in suspense an hour longer, before the boat was ready. We felt for the situation of the officers on board, who had expected our return to dinner, and had received no intelligence from us since we had been ashore. We knew not what designs might be concerting against the vessel which lay within half a mile of the coast; and until the officers aboard were cautioned of the danger, our general fate was undetermined. Night had thrown her sable curtains around us, and treachery and stratagem, which shun the light, might now be busy for our destruction. We were entangled in those toils, with which the dauntless lion struggles in vain. The pale glimmering of a lamp served just to afford us a sight of each other, and the posture of a part of our guard, who had civilly intruded themselves into the room, where gentlemen, servants, and mariners, to the number of twenty, were crowded together. The sea surrounded three sides of our prison, and the other was secured by a strong body, armed with matchlocks, pistols, and sabres. Though it afterwards appeared, that our situation could be more alarming than at this period, I should think such another hour dearly purchased with the wealth of the east. I can truly affirm, that when death seemed unavoidable, when the ministers of vengeance stood ready to perform its mandate, my thoughts were more collected, and my resolution more confirmed. So preferable is the knowledge of the worst which can befall us, to a state of uncertainty!

But our minds were at length relieved by the arrival of the boat, which took our servant from the window of our apartment. A desperate scheme now suggested itself for our escape, but was rejected, on a conviction of its folly. There was a guard in the boat as well as in our room; and we had observed soldiers planted on the walls, as spies upon our motions. To have regained our swords, the only weapons we had brought ashore, we must have betrayed our design. To make the attempt unarmed, would have been worse than madness. We therefore contented ourselves with adding verbal instructions to the servant, for the officer's positive departure, and prepared to take that repose, which the circumstances we were under, might allow of. But here, we reckoned without our host. Sleep and we were not so near, as we expected. The boat had not long left us, when we observed some of the domestics remove the carpets, which had been spread for our beds. We had not time to indulge our conjectures on this incident, when the old shaik appeared, and with much apparent concern acquainted us, that it was the vizier's order, we should be confined in an upper apartment of the house during the night. The place to which he pointed, was a tower, against which our very natures revolted. The order itself had a black appearance; and though it turned out to be only meant for the better securing our persons, it is no wonder that some among us should attribute it to be a project, for the readier perpetration of their villainous purposes. In short, it was agreed upon to oppose the execution of this order to the utmost; and though actual resistance was equally vain and hopeless, we found the good effects of not tamely submitting to this indignity. The shaik was charged to tell the vizier, that we would not go to the dungeon allotted us, unless compelled by force of arms; and again to warn him of treating us harshly. And this commission was so faithfully executed, that in about an hour, our carpets were returned to us, and we were delivered from further persecution for the present.

Our spirits were much raised by the success of this measure; and we began to entertain hopes that no violence was intended us. Our late distress became the subject of mirth; and we affected to regret, that our story would not be enriched with the adventure of the round tower. We betook ourselves, without repining, to our humble lodging on the ground; and I enjoyed a very comfortable nap until day-break, although my nostrils were plentifully regaled with the fumes of tobacco, from the pipe of one of our guard, who had taken post in the seat of a window above me.

F R I D A Y, 9th M A Y.

When I awoke this morning, I found our servant had returned, with an answer from the chief mate; which expressed his concern for our situation, and his intention to get away with the first favorable wind, agreeably to the captain's directions. This was very pleasing intelligence; and we drank the coffee which was now brought us, without complaining of its being unpalatable. The Arabs never ver adulterate their coffee with sugar or milk. These are quite an European addition; as is the case likewise with respect to tea, which is drank pure in China. I must acknowledge, that I prefer our method of preparing these articles of luxury; but were we to use tea and coffee in such quantities as the natives of those countries, we should neither find them pleasant nor salutary, when mixed with other ingredients. There is scarce an hour passes in the day, that coffee is not served up here; and their coloons, or pipes, are never from their mouths, but when they are at meals or asleep.

Our attention was engaged the whole morning towards our vessel, which we could see very plainly from the windows of our apartment. The wind began to blow from the northward according to custom, and before noon encreased with such violence, as not only to cut off the possibility of her departure, but even to alarm us for her safety; as she rode without the harbor, and lay exposed to all the fury of the sea and weather. We now plotted for the recovery of our boat; the absence of which, with the prime part of her crew, might occasion the loss of the vessel, in case of her parting her cable. For this purpose we dispatched our interpreter to the vizier, who was entrusted to express to him our doubts of the officer's obedience. We remarked that the wind blew into the harbor, and the vessel had made no motion to weigh her anchor and stand in; and we attributed the officer's backwardness to his entertaining a notion, that the orders which he had received, had been extorted from from us. As a means, therefore, of satisfying him, we proposed that the vizier would permit our boat and mariners to go on board, with a second order from the captain, and a declaration of our having done nothing by compulsion. At the same time we insinuated, that the sight of our boat and people would overcome any scruples, which the officer might have harboured in his breast.

The whole day was spent in this negotiation, and we began to think it would prove fruitless, when this crafty minister was foiled at his own weapons, and allowed himself to be egregiously duped. An Arab boat with a guard, however, was ordered to accompany ours; and the captain wrote a second letter to the officer, conjuring him to depart by the first opportunity, and to detain the ship's boat, and return our servant on the other. He also directed him to appear enraged at the contents of the letter, and to declare to the Arabs that he would sail at day-break. We took this opportunity to send on board for a shift or two of linen; a convenience which we had been two days debarred of, and which, in other circumstances, would have been sufficiently distressing in a warm climate. I had several valuables about me; but I had not a thought of preserving any thing from pillage, except the picture of a dear sister, which I had worn for many years about my neck. From this bosom-friend did I now resolve to part; and the most sensible pang which I endured in our captivity, was at the moment of my delivering this picture into the hands of the servant, who was going ing off to the vessel. I was ashamed of my weakness, and retired to a window in order to conceal a tear, which rose in my own despite, from the fountain of affection!

We were entertained by our hospitable shaik with a dinner, similar to that of yesterday; with the addition however of water-melons, which are much larger and finer here than in India. It is but doing him justice to say, that he has behaved to us with the greatest civility and attention; in-somuch, that our food is frequently served up with his own hands. We were inquisitive about the viziér's intentions, but could get nothing out of the old man, except exhortations to patience, and hopes of a speedy answer from Mecca. The suspense we live in, is the greatest hardship which we labor under. In other respects, our situation is as comfortable as prisoners could expect. Our very guard are as civil as their manners will admit of; and though their presence is troublesome enough, we have hitherto met with none of those insults, which the petty tyrants of our own country are so apt to exercise over the poor wretches in their custody. Though we have fallen into the hands of an arbitrary government, we have not become the prey of its servile and unfeeling instruments.

About nine o'clock at night we were advertized of the return of the Arab boat, but without our servant or linen; the Arabs having been so intimidated at the officer's affectation of anger, as to leave leave the vessel with precipitation. This news was communicated to us by our host, who seemed much surprized at the presumption of the officer towards his captain, which he could by no means reconcile to his own ideas of subordination to his superiors. Our only concern was the want of the linen, and some liquors that we had sent for. But we consoled ourselves with the thoughts of procuring them in the morning by some accident or other; and in the mean time composed ourselves to rest.

S A T U R D A Y, 10th M A Y.

The last night was passed in the same manner as the first, except that we were less crowded, by the departure of our boat's crew; a circumstance not immaterial in an hot climate, where our apartment did not measure more than sixteen feet by ten. I rose before day-break, and going out on a small terrace bounded by the sea, for the benefit of the morning air, was surprized at the sound of female voices, which seemed at no great distance. I looked up, and found it to proceed from the windows above me; the lattices of which were now open, and filled with women. These were members of the old shaik's family, and I little imagined that we could meet with such treatment in the neighborhood of a seraglio. We had access to but one room in this mansion; the upper part of which was consecrated to beauty, under equal restraint with with ourselves. Had we been possessed of the true spirit of chivalry, we should have gloried in our fate, that enabled us to wear the same chains that enslaved the fair; and, regardless of our own destiny, we should only have resolved how to deliver these captive damsels from their enchanted castle. But alas! there was no Quixote among us; and we shall remain as a signal instance of the degeneracy of these latter times.

I listened attentively to these females, who were very earnestly engaged; and though I am a stranger to the Arabic language, I judged from the motions which they made use of, that we were the subjects of their discourse. I even flattered myself, that they were touched with pity at our situation, from the tones of their voices at certain intervals; and, though the romantic notions I entertain of the general tenderness and benevolence of woman-kind, may have rendered me too sanguine in this particular, I have not the least doubt but they interested themselves in our safety, and would have contributed towards our escape. As the light dawned they found themselves observed, and retired from the windows, but not without many respectful obeisances, and looks of commiseration.

About seven o'clock the vessel fired a gun and loosed her foretop-sail, the customary signals for sailing: and we received a letter from the officer to this effect. This he had sent by our small boat with two sailors, whom he could well spare to provide for our necessities, which were become pressing.

We now got a message from the vizier, demanding the result of the officer's determination. To this we replied, that he still denied the captain's authority over him, and was on the point of sailing for Judda, with the account of our detention. Had this design been fortunately executed, the end which we had in view, would probably have been answered: for seeing his prey escape him, which was the ship, the vizier would, it is to be presumed, have sent us after her in our boat, as lumber too unworthy to be withheld.

By this time the vessel was in motion. The rocks had cut her cable as her crew were weighing her anchor, and she swung bodily towards a reef of breakers, before they could bring her up with another anchor. At this moment we tasted the bitterness of anguish. We plainly saw the vessel driving on destruction, and stood idle spectators of a misfortune beyond our power to avert. Our captain himself, a man of skill and experience, gave her up as lost; and we vented the ebullitions of our rage, in impotent threats, and idle imprecations on the author of our distress. The horrors of our situation rushed at once upon our minds. All hopes of relief would perish with the vessel, and we be left at the mercy of a race, the professed enemies of our religion. The fears of detection might inspire them with the worst designs; and though our lives might be remitted us, the more grievous alternative of pining away our days in slavery, cut off from a communication with our friends friends and country, might be our portion. Nor were these the weak suggestions of despair. Every thing conspired to darken the prospect before us. Our host and guard had caught the alarm, and painted the danger of the vessel in such strong colors to the vizier, as induced him to permit us to send our boat to her assistance. We gladly availed ourselves of this circumstance, though the immediate danger was over before the boat reached the vessel, which now rode at anchor within a fathom of the rocks. Had the wind encreased as usual, her respite would have been but short. But Providence decreed otherwise. The weather proved so moderate the whole day, as to allow the officer to warp her into her old birth again.

While he was employed in a task that calmed the perturbation we were under, we observed a strange boat pass near him, and make towards the town. At the same time we heard the report of muskets, but could not distinguish, whether it came from the vessel or the boat. We cannot say positively, whether it was a scheme to entrap us, or that the vizier really supposed our people had commenced hostilities against the Arabs; but so it was: the boat had scarcely reached the shore, when the vizier sent for our interpreter, to complain of the outrage, and to let us know that we had no right to expect good treatment from him hereafter. It was in vain, that we appealed to the testimony of the master of the boat, who came to us of his own accord, and deposed, that our people

ple had not fired at him. That they had only brought him to, with a musket, and offered him money for a pilot, which he had refused them. A formal demand was now made of our swords; and we suspected there was something uncommon in agitation, from the whispers of our guard, and the frequent messengers that came to and fro. One of our company observed a body of soldiers marching towards the place, where our vessel lay; and not a stone's throw from us, we saw them unloading a boat of ammunition, which they had transported across an arm of the sea, that runs into the town at high water. These preparations plainly indicated their designs on the vessel, against which we had previously cautioned the officer to prepare himself. The Adventure carried eight 3-pounders, besides swivels; and we had not the least doubt of her repelling the whole of their force. But we were unacquainted with the policy of the Arabs, who trust to craft for the accomplishment of their wishes; and only affect resolution when they can do it with impunity.

The hills now re-echoed with the sound of cannon; which we learnt was a summons to the neighbouring tribes to join the holy standard, which is set up in times of danger. And this was a prelude to a scene, that threatened to end very tragically. We were ruminating on the issue of this extraordinary adventure, when the Arabian musketry began to play briskly on the vessel. As a part of the fort screened the action from our view, we retired to the front windows of our apartment, where we could better observe the vessel's motions, I had Thomson's Seasons in my hand, and had, inadvertently, cast my eyes on the sublime hymn which crowns that delightful work, when a band of ruffians rushed into the room, and ranged themselves directly before us. Their appearance was rude, and their countenances very different from the people we had hitherto conversed with. They were of the roving race, and promised to prove worthy of the dark purpose in which they were engaged. The matches of their pieces were lighted, and we tottered on the brink of futurity!—

The villainy of the Arabs was now apparent. They were endeavoring to provoke our mariners to return their fire; and we well knew, that the death of one Mussulman is only to be atoned for, by the lives of ten Christians. This is a precept of their religion. But the officer on board, had reflexion enough to consider his countrymen ashore. He felt for our distress, and was so cool as to bear with their repeated insults for the space of two hours; although the musket-balls flew into the vessel, and he was continually urged by the crew, to pour a broadside among the troops, some of whom were daring enough to wade into the sea, within pistol-shot of the vessel. Nay, we afterwards learnt our situation had been so critical, that nothing but threats of instant death, could prevent the sailors from taking to their arms; and the officer was obliged to parade the deck with a loaded musket, to intimidate them. But it is not strange, that we should apprehend other measures. We knew not what steps they had taken, to facilitate the seizure of the vessel; or how long the forbearance of our people would last: and we expected an engagement every moment, to commence between her and the shore. At this crisis we held a consultation together, and it was unanimously resolved, to demand a parley with the vizier, touching the delivery of the vessel into his hands. Our interpreter was dispatched to him, with this mortifying concession. The matter was become too serious to be trifled with. We had the evidence of our own eyes, to despair of the possibility of the vessel's escape, without a pilot; nor could we answer for the blood, which might be spilled through a fruitless obstinacy. In this awful interval I endeavored to collect myself so, as to meet death with a becoming resignation. I breathed a prayer for the welfare of my friends, and can truly say, that I should have died in peace with all mankind. But the greatest consolation which I found in this exigency, was derived from the sublime hymn that I before mentioned. I read it over with pleasure, and felt my bosom filled with a prophetic confidence from the energy of the latter part; which is so analogous to the situation we were in, that I cannot resist transcribing it, though it is so well known to persons of taste.

*“ Should Fate command me to the farthest verge
 Of the green earth, to distant barbarous climes, Rivers unknown to song; where first the sun
 Gilds Indian mountains, or his setting beam
 Flames on th’ Atlantic isles; ’tis nought to me:
 Since God is ever present, ever felt,
 In the void waste as in the city full;
 And where He vital breathes there must be joy.
 When ev’n at last the solemn hour shall come,
 And wing my mystic flight to future worlds,
 I cheerful will obey; there, with new powers,
 Will rising wonders sing: I cannot go
 Where universal love not smiles around,
 Sustaining all yon orbs and all their sons;
 From seeming evil still educing good, &c.”*

A full hour and more, did we remain under the alarming circumstances I have described, before we obtained the shadow of a reprieve. The fire of the musketry was still continued against the vessel; and the ministers of death stood over us, each seeming to have singled out his prey, in a fixed posture and a mute reserve. At length our interpreter returned from his embassy to the vizier. He was accompanied by three Arabians of distinction, who were come to pledge their words for the safety of ourselves and vessel. The first of these, was the general of the troops at Yambo; and the other two, were the chiefs of the Arab tribes, who had been summoned to the vizier’s assistance. A writing was drawn up, and signed by them; to the observance of which they swore by their beards, the most solemn oath that a Mussulman can take. The captain was now cited to the presence of the vizier, to obtain a similar obligation from him. He staid only to drink a cup of coffee; and brought back an handkerchief, which he had received, as a token of the minister's sincerity. Pledges of this nature among the Orientals, amount to the most serious engagements. Whatever doubts we might entertain of their value, this was no season to express them; and we readily concurred in the captain's orders to the chief mate, to bring the vessel into the harbor. We stated the matter to him, and furnished him with the assurances which had been given us, for our general security. The captain himself, harbored no suspicions of their intention to plunder us; and I must own that I was of the same opinion. There was nothing very improbable in the vizier's story, now that we came to a right knowledge of it. This was the first European vessel that had appeared on this part of the coast; and he had written to the Xerif, to know whether he should treat us as friends or not. It is not impossible but he considered us as spies, who meant to pry into the poverty and weakness of the country. Given to deceit himself, he might have held our tale of a pilot, as fictitious; and our anchoring at the mouth of the harbor, as a shallow artifice, through which he could discern. I would be

be as charitable in my conclusions, as a Christian ought to be, but must leave to the event, an explanation of his conduct.

The good effects of our late compliance were soon visible. The troops were recalled from the beach, and our tremendous guests withdrawn from our apartment. Hope once more dawned in our bosoms; and the disappointed looks of the ruffians, who retired without having earned the wages of iniquity, left us no room to doubt of their inhuman commission.

The day was too far advanced to think of moving the vessel, as the channel into the harbor is very narrow. It was therefore stipulated, that a pilot should go on board at day-break, to fetch her in; and that on her coming to anchor, her great and small guns, pistols and cutlasses, should be delivered over to the custody of an officer, whom the vizier should appoint for that purpose. This article was insisted upon by him, as the only means to quiet the minds of the inhabitants; who trembled for the safety of the town, while the cannon were on board; and could not conquer their fears of Europeans, who had arms of any kind in their possession. This shew of terror was, to be sure, a tacit compliment to the European name; and we were at any rate content to subscribe to terms, by which alone we were permitted to return to the vessel. The boundary was passed; and we had no other resource, than to confide in people who held us in subjection. We were heartily tired of being cooped up in a prison, and wished to return to the vessel; where we should at least be rid of observation, and live agreeably to our own customs, although saddled with the loss of liberty. We spent the evening far more cheerfully than usual, and found the guard less watchful of our motions, since the conclusion of the treaty. Our host was particularly attentive to us; and regaled us, for the first time, with a supper. This is a meal almost unknown in Arabia; and was considered by us in the light of a friendly banquet. We resigned ourselves, at our customary hour, to our carpets; where our imaginations were again disturbed, by a review of the unpleasing scenes of the foregoing day.

SUNDAY, 11th MAY.

This proved by far the most tedious day that we had passed in our confinement. We expected to have got on board to dinner, but were prevented by that indolent and perverse disposition, which prevails among the Eastern nations. At eight o'clock the pilot weighed the vessel's anchor, and before nine she brought up, within half a mile abreast of the town. We now received a visit from Mr. Walters, the chief officer, and were advertised by him of the particulars which I have before recited, respecting the attack on the vessel. Our thanks were justly due to this gentleman, on whose firmness firmness and discretion our lives had depended; and I embrace with pleasure, this public opportunity to declare our sense of his conduct. The captain gave him an order, for the delivery of the arms to the vizier's officer, who now accompanied him in a boat to receive them. They were landed in great form. The small arms were lodged in the fort, and the cannon were mounted on a battery opposite our vessel. This was meant to intimidate us; though it was easy to perceive, that a single discharge would reduce the wall to ruins. Our swords were returned to us, with a compliment from the vizier; and we were in momentary expectation of permission to depart. But the little philosophy we possessed, was yet to be exercised; and happy was he, who could the best make a virtue of necessity.

Frequent were the visits of our interpreter to the minister in the course of this day: but no audience could he obtain. At noon he was retired to his haram, where it was treason to disturb him. Now, he was engaged at dinner; and now he had company with him. As we saw every thing here through the medium of discontent, we considered these excuses as mere evasions of his word; and should he fail in that part of the treaty, where our living on board the vessel was specified, we had little reason to expect his fulfilling the rest of it. Nay, the worst of their former fears recurred to some of our party; and though I was by this time pretty well reconciled to the malice of fortune, and did not torment myself by anticipating evils, I must confess, that appearances were not much in our favor. Our property, freedom, and lives, were in the hands of an imperious tyrant, who had secured us by treachery, and might only be restrained by fear, from falsifying his engagements. And to this principle, by which his tribe are generally actuated in political concerns, I trusted for our deliverance. The sails of commerce are ever busy in this sea, and numbers of small vessels had arrived at, and departed from this port, during our short stay. Should the vizier be inclined to keep the transaction a secret, his own reflexion must suggest to him, that it must needs transpire by a sea-conveyance, should he have influence enough to bar the communication by land: and, whatever might be the tale he trumped up to deceive his master, the fact would at length reach him in its native colors. Such did I conceive to be the point, which was discussed during this delay. I imaged to myself the minister, shut up with his creatures in dark cabal, and flattered myself that his interest would teach him for once, to be honest. Nor was I disappointed. The captain was summoned to the presence of the vizier, and returned with very gracious assurances of protection, and a licence to repair to the vessel. In the whole course of my life, I do not recollect to have received more acceptable tidings. We could not have wished for a stronger confirmation of the minister's sincerity; and for my own part, I felt a certain confidence in the

the thoughts of being on board, although we were destitute of arms, to protect us against violence, and there was a guard of soldiers to be stationed in the vessel. But so preferable is the notion of what we term our home, to that of a foreign place, that even in the midst of danger and distress, we derive comfort from the partiality, and find something therein, to flatter and to console us.

The sun was just sinking in the bosom of the deep, when we put off from the shore. We had taken a very cordial leave of our hospitable shaik, and invited him to visit us frequently on board, when we observed the ladies of his family were assembled to grace our departure. The old man's house was one of the largest in the town, and surrounded on three sides by the sea: and the windows were now crowded with females, who waved to us with their handkerchiefs, unperceived by those below. The generosity of the fair sex might have atoned for the inhumanity of the men of Yambo, had we been able to benefit by their good-will. But what arms could they assail our persecutors with, whose bosoms were proof to the irresistible violence of female tears? and what hope could we derive from their gentle interposition in a Mahometan region, where the interests of the heart are at the lowest ebb? Still be the tenets of this absurd faith confined to desert climes, and an ignorant race! Let them expand themselves through the Numidian waste, and let the unlettered Arab cherish them in his mind! Never will they get footing in more enlightened lands; never will they usurp the polished breast, which acknowledges the soft empire of womankind, and rejects all attempts to depreciate her worth, as the dictates of malice, folly, and pride!

The evening was spent in a more agreeable manner, than we had of late experienced. We enjoyed our own customs with double satisfaction, since we had known the want of them; and our minds were relieved from a load of suspense, with which they had been oppressed. We had obtained the vizier's leave to write to our friends at Judda; and we retired to our beds, with the pleasing expectations of being soon redeemed from captivity, by the good offices of our countrymen with the Xerif.

M O N D A Y, 12th M A Y.

The captain this morning wrote a state of our case to captain Anderson; who he knew was at Judda, with a ship in his charge, belonging to the nabob of Arcot. He entreated him to represent our wrongs to the Xerif of Mecca, and to demand our immediate release, under pain of the resentment of the English. This letter was sent to the vizier by his desire, that he might inclose it in his packet. To guard against the double-dealing of a man so well known to us, we had the precaution to write a duplicate of this letter. This was folded up, and directed directed after the Arabic fashion, by our interpreter; who secretly delivered it to a passenger in the boat, that waited to carry the vizier's dispatches to Judda.

I have said, that there was a ship at Judda in the service of the nabob of Arcot, and that our captain had thought proper to declare the Adventure to be his property. It is not to be inferred from this, that the nabob is a maritime power, or is aiming to extend the commerce of his subjects by an attention to naval affairs. The fact is quite the reverse. The trade of India wholly exists in the spirit and industry of the English. While their vessels are exploring the islands that border on the Pacific ocean, and return with a freight that renders our settlements the mart of Oriental productions, a ship or two is sent yearly to Judda by the nabob of Arcot. These vessels, indeed, carry a cargo, and import in exchange, the products of Arabia. But this is the captain's care. The only benefit which the nabob looks for, is the prayers of two or three hundred pilgrims, who are transported at his expence, to perform their vows at the mosque of Mecca! his ships were so crowded this season with these idle mendicants, that through the nabob's interest with the owners, we had the company of above twenty of them in our vessel. This was an honour we were by no means ambitious of; and from which we readily disengaged ourselves at Mocha, where they were landed to prosecute their journey in the best manner they could.

The abuse of reason in these useless undertakings, is the least evil to be complained of. They are such an encouragement to idleness, and so destructive to the welfare of a country, where thousands of the inhabitants are seduced from their families and habitations by a fanatic call, that we may consider their toleration as one of the ruinous principles of a Mahometan government. We have had an opportunity of observing the effect, which these pilgrimages have upon the manners and dispositions of those who engaged in them. A froward spirit and a brutal behavior, mark the herd of these pilgrims. And we have been assured from good authority, that their mutinous deportment rises sometimes to such a pitch, that the captains of the ships are obliged to put them in irons, for the preservation of themselves and crew.

The occurrences aboard the Adventure being as unvaried, as may be imagined in a vessel at anchor, I will omit the recital but of such days, as produced any particular events; which may be useful in curtailing a journal already, I fear, too prolix to escape censure. If we were uneasy at the restraint we were under, we had no reason to complain of sensual entertainment during the term of our detention. We were plentifully supplied with provisions and vegetables, at an easy rate; and Apicius himself, might have taken a voyage to the Red-Sea, to have feasted on the delicious fish with which the harbor of Yambo abounds, without the least least derogation to the merits of the lamprey of Baia.

M O N D A Y, 19th M A Y.

Our patience was pretty nearly exhausted by this time. But on the evening of this day, we were permitted to wait on the vizier, after many vain solicitations, to learn how soon we might expect our release: the time appointed by him to obtain answers from Mecca, being expired.

We went ashore about five o'clock, and were received by him in greater state, than at our first audience. The room was full of armed men; and we could not but impute this useless precaution, to the terrors of a bad conscience, which views every thing with a suspicious eye. The evident alteration in the vizier's countenance and behavior, which were now marked with inquietude and reserve, in spite of his efforts to conceal them, convinced us of his having repented the step he had taken. He made several enquiries concerning the power and commerce of the English in the East. Nor was there occasion for our magnifying their influence, to awaken his fears. He seemed very attentive to the description of our ships of force; and could not help expressing his surprize, when our interpreter told him, that there were three men of war at Suez. As he was in an inquisitive mood, we would not miss the opportunity to impress him with sentiments, that might serve to regulate his future conduct. But his pride at length, got the better of his timidity. For in the course of our conversation, when the actions of the Portugueze in this sea, and their settlements on this coast, were brought on the carpet, he informed us, that the Arabian historians took notice of them; and added, with an air of triumph, that the Portugueze were expelled Arabia by the great Sultan Selim.

We were civilly dismissed by the minister, with hopes of hourly intelligence from Mecca, and an invitation to take a view of the town, if agreeable to us. As there was a full hour to sun-set, we readily embraced the occasion to satisfy our curiosity, and to use a little exercise, of which we had been so long deprived. We had an officer to attend us, besides two soldiers who had accompanied us from the vessel. And we found this guard necessary, to keep off the rabble that pursued us in our walk. The first arrival of a Cherokee Indian in Europe, could not have begotten half the wonder that our appearance did here. If the commonalty of Europe are not more mannerly, they are at least better informed than the rude Arab. Bred up in utter ignorance of other countries, and bigotted to the prejudices of illiberal doctrines, he is at a loss to account for the production of a Christian, whom his religion teaches him to hold in abhorrence and contempt. But if the rough minds of the men are hurried away into these absurdities, I must once more bear witness to the moderation of the the Mahometan females, who plainly evinced to us, that their bosoms were made of "penetrable stuff." As we passed through the streets, the windows and terraces of the houses were filled with women, who were inspired with no illaudable curiosity to behold the strangers. They neither treated us with scorn, nor followed us with curses, like the savage throng below; but by their eagerness of observation, and attempts to engage our attention, betrayed the secret symptoms of approbation. Nay, the sacred thirst of admiration, so predominant in the sex, was not quenched in their breasts. We observed many veils drop, as if by accident, as we passed beneath their owners faces, which were overspread with a visible confusion, and verified the poet's idea of Musidora's consolation in her distress, at being surprized in a naked situation by her lover:

*" Ev'n a sense
Of self-approving beauty stole across Her busy thought."*

Yambo is situated in the latitude of  $24^{\circ} 10'$  north, and is the port, from which the communication is more immediately carried on with Egypt. It is the general resort of all the Arabian vessels that ply on this sea; and has a very safe and convenient haven for their protection, in bad weather. Its situation, behind an almost uninterrupted chain of shoals and breakers, may have hitherto secluded it from the knowledge of European navigators,

But the charm is now broken; and as fortune has thrown it in our way, I have annexed a view of Yambo, with the foundings of the harbor, taken from an actual survey, which Mr. Walters, chief officer of the Adventure, permitted me to copy from his draught. This will not only explain the critical situation that our vessel was in during the attack, but may be a guide to future mariners, whose evil stars may throw them on this inhospitable shore.

The coast here is infinitely more barren than the environs of Mocha, the soil being too ungrateful to produce even the date-tree or furze-bush, and is throughout a shining expanse of sand. The eye meets with no interruption, until it reaches the distant mountains, which bound the joyless prospect. But if the beautiful be wanting here, the sublime exists in no small degree. The mountains in the more remote parts of the world, seem particularly appointed by Providence, to be the residence of rude and straggling nations, unconnected by the laws of civil polity, and unambitious of rambling beyond the limits which nature has prescribed them. The coast of Arabia is an evidence in favor of this remark. The interior parts, from one end to the other, exhibit what Shakespear emphatically calls, "Heaven-kissing hills," and the mountains behind the town of Yambo, rival, in height, the American Andees, or the Caucasus of Asia. This restraint, perhaps, has been the cause of as extraordinary a revolution in the face of things, things, as the world has seen. Mahomet kindled the flame, that under the Caliphs, stirred up the Arabs to break from their dark recesses. Like the fearful eruptions of Etna or Vesuvius, they burst upon the astonished nations, and spread desolation far and near. But the calamity is past, though its effects still remain: effects, perhaps, not salutary to the posterity of the vanquished countries. This victorious race are retired within their barriers again; there to prey upon each other, until time shall ripen them for another grand event.

F R I D A Y, 23d M A Y.

Four days are now elapsed since our visit to the vizier, and no intelligence is come from Mecca. The year is nearly half expended, and we have not performed the half of our journey to Europe. Besides, we have the uncomfortable prospect before us, of being obliged to travel in the heats of summer through Egypt. This idea was particularly aggravated by the scorching wind, that blew to-day from the land. It was well for us, that we had been seasoned for this attack, by the land-winds so remarkable on the coast of Coromandel, or else the air would have been intolerable, and our blood been inflamed by the violence of the heat. Fevers would have been no eligible companions to constitutions, that had been exposed to the effects of a long voyage, and in want of a surgeon, to administer relief to them. But it pleased God, that we should maintain our healths in the midst of our distresses, and experience a signal mark of his protection, in the hands of our enemies.

To add to the disagreeableness of our situation, our guard was this day doubled upon the vessel. The sails had been taken down to be mended, on her coming into the harbor; and though the top-masts were struck, and her yards lowered down, the vizier excepted at our offering to replace the sails on the yards. He pretended to be apprehensive of our departure, and sent formally to demand our sails. The captain was justly nettled at this message, which he could not but consider as a wanton insult. He pointed out to the vizier's officer, the impossibility of the vessel's escape. For, not to mention the unprepared state she was in, the wind constantly blew into the harbor, and there was a necessity for a pilot to carry her out. In truth, we were as much in their hands, as if the vessel had been drawn ashore. The captain, therefore, desired him to inform his master, that if he wanted the sails, he must send people to fetch them, as he would not voluntarily give them up. This shew of resolution proved a check on the presumption of this haughty bashaw, who withdrew his demand; but at the same time, contrived to torment us with the company of the additional guard I have mentioned.

The wind did not lose its rage when the sun went down, but was so parching the whole night, as to oblige me to quit the deck, where I had taken up my lodging for the sake of coolness, ever since our return to the vessel. But this, to our great joy, is the only land-wind we felt here; which, from its direction and burning heat, probably traversed the great desert, which extends from the Red-Sea to the coast of Palestine, ere it spent its fury upon us.

Many camels have come in from the country within these two days, but bring no news for us. These creatures are loaded with fruit and vegetables for the town; and with skins of water, which they fetch from the vallies, for the use of the inhabitants, who can procure no water here, but what the heavens supply them with. It generally rains about once in two years in Arabia Petrea; and then not a drop is lost, which can be caught by the natives who live on the sea-coast. They preserve it very carefully in large reservoirs, and make an article of trade of it, which, however, is sold at a moderate rate. We have drank nothing but rain-water since our arrival, and find it very wholesome and palatable; although some was brought us, which the old shaik declared to be ten years old. Whether he may have exaggerated the age of it or not, it is certain, that they have little or no rain in this country. But the want of it is amply supplied by the heavy dews that fall at night, and make the ground appear as if moistened by a shower. Thus is the vegetable brought to perfection, thus are the trees supplied with never-failing fruit, and the vallies covered with eternal green.

A caravan arrived this forenoon from Medina, which is but two days journey from hence. This was the first I had seen, and though it consisted but of 4 or 500 camels, I must confess myself to have been much struck with the grandeur and novelty of the sight. We discerned it from afar, moving onwards with a quick though solemn pace, and as it passed near the beach, we could distinguish with our glasses the economy of the whole. The major part of the camels were loaded with merchandize, and the rest carried the travellers and the principal camel-drivers. The sun was in his meridian, and not a cloud obscured the heavens, nor a breath disturbed the surface of the deep. The natives were retired to the inmost recesses of their habitations, and not a beast was seen abroad, save the patient camel, that now braved the fiery ray, and marched with steady steps, beneath the united pressure of hunger, thirst, and heat! While the wooden bark ploughs the deep, and wafts from shore to shore the produce of each clime, this living vessel traverses the pathless waste, fraught with the precious treasures of the East. A caravan of camels exploring the wilds of Arabia, with nothing in view but sand and sky, and conducted by the planets to its desired haven, may well be likened to a fleet of vessels, which are not more useful in their way, or wonderful in their structure. As the ship alone can outlive the seas, in which the weaker boat must perish, so is the camel peculiarly adapted to a region, in which no other class of beasts could bear fatigue. He too experiences the chance of sublunary things. What avail his mighty strength, his dauntless heart, when the whirlwind rages, and overwhelms him with the violence, that is fatal to the towering and thick-ribbed bark?

Our expectations were wound up to the highest pitch this evening, by the return of the boat which carried our packet to Judda. But these were soon let down by the information of our interpreter, whom we had sent to the vizier to learn the news. The boat he found had not waited for answers; but we had reason to expect them before now by and. The return of the boat in so short a time, was however a matter of consolation, as it evinced the possibility of our getting to Suez, though the wind is contrary for the greatest part of the day.

T U E S D A Y, 27th MAY.

We observed two camels travelling with uncommon expedition towards the town, yesterday evening, and flattered ourselves with the thoughts of their bringing our dispatches. Nor were we deceived. The vizier sent for our interpreter, to acquaint us, of his having just received orders concerning us, which he would communicate in the morning. This short delay was mortifying enough, but we had long learnt to have recourse to patience, as the only remedy in our present situation.

The craft and deceit of these people are equally great and inexplicable. To lye for the sake of falsehood, and to overreach in matters of no moment, are paradoxes peculiar to the Arabians. Were the enthusiasts in vice to think, that, like virtue, it is its own reward, the conduct of the vizier would not need a comment. But, why he should conceal orders which he must submissively obey, or trifle with our anxiety when we are at his mercy, is beyond the reach of thought to fathom. We waited this whole morning in expectation of a summons, according to his voluntary promise. Disappointed in this, we sent our interpreter to besiege his gate in the afternoon, who at dusk, returned with an appointment for an audience the next morning, but with no manner of apology from the minister, for his extraordinary behavior. We bore the flight with a good grace; and in the height of our charitable suggestions, framed excuses for his neglect, and were sanguine enough to believe, that the morrow would put an end to our suspense. But we knew not the race we had stumbled upon. Our dealings had been hitherto confined to people, who have settled principles of action: and, whether spurred on by interest, or guided by fear, we were

sensible of what we had to expect from the natives of India. But here judgment is at a stand. No penetration can unravel the mazes of inconsistency, no reflexion account for the sudden starts of barbarous pride!

W E D N E S D A Y, 28th M A Y.

This day was passed, like the foregoing, in vain applications and idle repinings. Nay, the insult was aggravated, by the vizier's refusing even to see our interpreter. — He endeavored, it is true, to sweeten the bitter potion, by pleading business as the reason. But we were by this time, too well convinced of his insincerity, to swallow the excuse with our usual facility. Our state was now more deplorable than ever. The arrival of a dispatch from Mecca, had produced nothing in our favor; and we beheld the period which we had assigned to our detention, escape, without disclosing the faintest gleam of hope.

If such were the clouds which obscured our immediate prospect, how were our imaginations fitted to encounter the scene which approached; worked up as they had been by a series of complicated villainy, to apprehend the utmost malice of mankind! We had supped as usual, and some of our company were retired to their cabbins, when a report was made to the officer upon watch, that there was a boat along-side of the vessel. I happened to be on the quarter-deck, and was ruminating on the strangeness of the circumstance at so late an hour, when several armed men approached us without ceremony, and immediately joined their comrades, who commonly mounted guard on the aftermost part of the deck. Their appearance was as much a matter of surprize to our stated guard, as to ourselves. And all we could gather from them, by dint of repeated inquiry, was, that they had orders to remain on board the vessel until day-break.

It is generally allowed, that an air of mystery renders the most trivial incident of consequence, as every object looks larger, that is seen through a mist. At this moment the alarm was given, that there was a guard-boat on each bow; whereas, we had heretofore had the company but of one. Wearied out with a succession of disappointments, and impressed with the most unfavorable ideas of the people we were among, it is no wonder that we gave way to conjectures, by no means to the honor of the vizier's principles. We had too great confidence in the commercial connections between the English and the Xerif, to suspect that any harm would befall us by his directions. But on the other hand, the minister might be endeavoring to foment the present difference. This was the deepest stroke we had experienced in the desperate game which he had been playing, and was not to be solved by any maxims of policy. His intents were evidently deep and unfriendly; but the hue of them was not clearly to be discerned. Had they been murderous, there was no occasion for the farce which he had been playing. For, what rational creature is so abandoned to humanity, as wantonly to destroy those who have never offended him, or lengthen misery, which it is his interest to shorten? our lives and property had been long at his disposal; and it was not reasonable to imagine, that he would delay the sentence which would secure the prize, had he authority or inclination to execute it. We had been witnesses to so many instances of his folly and caprice, that it was not improbable, but this adventure would terminate without prejudice to us. But it must be confessed, that no little share of resolution is necessary for the support of such argument, where reason is too weak to oppose the evidence of our senses, and reflexion is lost in the tumult of the scene before us. Our minds by degrees resumed their wonted calm, and we retired to rest, with no other safeguard but the eye of a beneficent God, without whose regard there is no protection for the sleeping monarch, surrounded by his guards.

T H U R S D A Y, 29th M A Y.

The dawn of day delivered us from these unwelcome guests, conformably to their report; and the vizier, ashamed, as we suppose, of the transaction, had the grace to pretend an utter ignorance of it. On our remonstrating against the violation of the compact compact between us, he laid the blame on the general of the troops, who had committed some mistake in issuing orders relative to the vessel. This proof of his being yet sensible of shame, gave us hopes of an amendment in his behavior, and encouraged the captain to press the vizier for another interview for himself only, which he now condescended to grant. Though productive of no real advantage, we derived great consolation from it, as the captain fairly extorted from him the reason of his late reserve. He acknowledged, that his instructions concerning us were come; but that nothing could be done in the affair, until the arrival of the Shawbunder, or captain of the port of Judda, whom the Xerif had ordered to Yambo, to adjust the terms of our departure. We had long suspected, that the vizier's designs were to extort heavy duties from the vessel; and were pleased to hear, that those duties were to be regulated by the port of Judda; which, though unreasonable enough, will certainly come more within the bounds of equity and justice, than the conscience of this Arab might have demanded.

As the name of the Xerif of Mecca so often occurs in this narrative, and as his power and influence ought properly to be ascertained, for the elucidation of the part he bore in our detention, I will endeavor to throw such light upon them, as opportunity and inquiry have afforded me.

The Xerif of Mecca is, in most respects, on the footing of the Pope in the earlier days of Christianity.

anity. He is sovereign Pontiff of the Mahometan church, and a temporal as well as spiritual prince. Since the extinction of the Caliphs, whose apparent ſucceſſor he is, he holds his dominions as fiefs to the Turk; and is more indebted to the zeal of ſuperſtition than to the terror of his arms, for the ſupport of his dignity. A prodigious decline indeed, from the importance of thoſe Caliphs, who reigned the maſters of the Eaſtern world, and ſhook the neighboring kingdoms of the north with dire diſmay! But ſhrunk as he is within the limits of a province, where the Mahometan greatneſs firſt originated, the Xerif, in two inſtances, exceeds the Popes in the fullreſt plenitude of their power. His honors are hereditary; to poſſeſs which, he muſt prove his deſcent from the Prophet: and the extent of his influence reaches as far beyond that of the Popes, as the perſuaſion of Mahomet beyond the Papal tenets. The remoteſt corners of the Eaſt pay homage to his title. Numerous are the pilgrims that come from Teſſis or Meſopotamia, to add their mite to the treaſures of Medina's temple; while the ſubahs of Ind, and the ſultans of the Spicy Iſles, fail not to ſend their annual offerings to the Prophet's ſhrine. The large ſum of money which our veſſel brought for the ſervice of the Moſque, as a peace-offering from the nabob of Arcot, on the deceaſe of his daughter, is a corroborating evidence of the enthuſiaſm of Muſſulmen. It amounted to one lack and an half of rupees, which is near £. 20,000 ſterling, and was the gift of a prince, whom the world need not be told is so involved in debt, as not to require this drain to exhaust his mortgaged revenues.

The territories of the Xerif lie in the heart of Arabia, and are about three hundred miles long and one hundred broad. Besides the cities of Mecca and Medina, to which the caravans annually bring the produce of distant countries, his revenues are considerably augmented by the commerce, that is carried on with his ports of Yambo and Judda, by the vessels of Africa and India. Whatever sanctity he may pretend to, or indifference to the concerns of this world, like other hypocrites in religion, he prefers his own interest to that of his Maker; and uses his name as an instrument, to advance his own dignity and riches. The caravans, which professedly set out on a pious journey to Mecca, are more encouraged by this Pontiff for the sake of his own glory, than that of the Prophet; as the valuable goods they convey, and the high duties imposed upon the deluded merchants, sufficiently attest. But what persuasion is there among the frail race of mankind, which is not open to perversion, and liable to be disgraced by absurd rites, and idle ceremonies? the divine purity of the Christian religion could not preserve its stream from being tainted, by the machinations of priestcraft, and the intemperance of zeal. Nor is there much difference in the folly of the belief, that founds salvation on a pilgrimage to the temple of Mecca, or to the house of my lady of Loretto!

But

But in the vortex of this zeal and superstition, the private interests of mankind, every where equally active and powerful, have not been wanting to resist the impulse, and to turn it to their own advantage. If the city of Rome has more than once exhibited the spectacle of a degraded Pontiff, and an election of the successor of St. Peter, carried by fire and sword; if two vicars of God, as they are stiled by the Papal church, have existed, and been obeyed at the same time; will it excite our surprize to learn, that a revolution took place but a few years ago in the principality of Mecca? The famous Ali Bey planned the conquest of Arabia, in order to ensure to the government of Egypt, of which he was the chief, the free commerce of the Red Sea, and the coasts of India. This plan, as well conducted as bold in its idea, was terminated in 1770 with the reduction of Mecca, and the expulsion of the reigning Xerif. A creature of Ali Bey was invested in his place with the sacred dignity; and the event promised to the conqueror the quiet possession of the advantages he had in view. But his foresight and greatness of mind, served only to embitter the reverses of fortune, which so strongly marked the life of Ali Bey. Betrayed, and overcome at length, by the very dependant (Aben Dahab) who had carried his victorious arms into Arabia, he lived to see his new Xerif driven from his usurped dignity, and implore his relief, when he was unable to maintain his own footing in the ungrateful and undeserving kingdom of Egypt.

The

The present Xerif is a youth under twenty years of age, and, what is remarkable on account of his family, he is as black as a negro. He has been seen by some of our countrymen, but this is not a common thing, as he seldom stirs from Mecca, to the neighborhood of which place, and Medina, no approach is allowed to Christians. Nay, to such a degree has their contempt of us arisen, that neither at Mocha, Judda, nor Yambo, will they suffer a Christian to go out at the gate, which looks towards Mecca. One of his Majesty's frigates was at Judda last year, to settle some articles of trade between the different nations; when the Xerif himself made an excursion to Judda, on purpose to pay a compliment to the British flag. He went on board the frigate; and, to testify his satisfaction at the activity of the sailors, and the discipline of the marines, he left a very princely gratuity to be distributed among them. On this appearance of good-will in the Xerif towards the English, we rely for redress in the injury we have received; though the course of justice may be delayed, by the misrepresentations of the knave, into whose clutches we have unfortunately fallen.

SATURDAY, 31st MAY.

This morning we were delighted with the sight of two boats to the southward. As they came into the harbor, we learnt from our guard, that the shawbunder

shawbunder of Judda was in the foremost. But this sunshine was soon clouded by a message from the shore, which advised us that the person we expected, was in a boat behind. We, who were bound for Europe, thought this a good opportunity to solicit the vizier for our departure to Suez, which he might, on certain conditions, wish to grant us, before the arrival of another officer to share in the profit, which he evidently meant to make of us. With his permission, therefore, my three fellow-travellers and myself paid him a visit in the afternoon, when we were received with his wonted politeness. We pressed him for the immediate provision of a boat, but he pretended that nothing could be done until the shawbunder's arrival, except the order for a boat to be ready at a minute's warning. He concluded this assurance with a caution against the impositions of his people, and a request not to give any presents, but to such as came expressly by his order. This was too plain to be misunderstood; and after our return to the vessel, we judged it expedient to tender this minister a bribe. We found from long experience, that he was not to be moved by the force of words, and accordingly prepared a present, wherewith to melt his unrelenting breast. It consisted of a diamond-ring, a fine shawl, and a piece of gold stuff for a dress; and was an offering, rather extorted by necessity, than suitable to the characters which we assumed. This we sent him by our interpreter, and had the pleasure to learn that it was graciously received.

ceived. We met in return, with a repetition of those assurances of his protection, which he had before lavished upon us.

I cannot help relating here a curious circumstance of the divers of Arabia, whose skill exceeds that of any others which I have read of. The master of a boat, which was just returned from Tor, offered to recover the anchor, which I mentioned to have been lost by our vessel, while she was at the entrance of the harbor. As it lay in sixteen fathom water, the captain gave little credit to the fellow's pretensions, but was willing to try the experiment, as much from a motive of curiosity as any other. The diver was to earn but a third of the fixed reward, should his attempts miscarry. He brought his boat to the vessel to-day, and accompanied our long-boat, with an officer on board, to the mouth of the harbor. And from this officer I had the following particulars.

When they came to the supposed place, the diver went down in sixteen fathoms, with no other preparation than a weight to his feet, and a piece of wood on his nostrils, to prevent his fetching his breath in the water. There was a rope fastened to his arm, by which he gave notice when he wanted to be drawn up. At the signal made, he was run up by his comrades with amazing celerity. He informed the officer that he had seen the anchor at some distance; and taking a rope of sufficient strength to hold it, he dived again to an equal depth, and tied it to the ring of the anchor. Upon weighing weighing it, however, it turned out not to be ours, but a large grapnel belonging to the annual Judda vessel, which failed from hence some months ago. After this disappointment, to make good what he had asserted of his skill, the fellow went down in two-and-twenty fathoms, though the wind began to freshen, and the sea to be ruffled. He staid between two and three minutes under water, according to the watch of the gentleman present. Nay, after he came into the boat, this amphibious creature did not take the pressure from his nostrils for near a minute longer; and appeared not in the least fatigued or discomposed. He affirmed, that upon occasion, he can dive some fathoms deeper; and in a calm day, can see ten fathoms around him. That he can walk about with great ease at the bottom of the sea, and separate branches of coral from the rocks, with an ax or a saw. As a proof of which, he produced a large branch of coral, which he had taken out of a bay to the northward. I have a piece of this coral in my possession. Anxious as he appeared to be for the recovery of our anchor, we have reason to believe that the poor man had been forbidden by the vizier to get it; as he means to turn it to his own account, after our departure. I am sensible that the divers go to a great depth, in the pearl-fisheries in the Gulph of Persia, where they are assisted by machines of various constructions: but such a marvellous instance as I have related, of natural powers unaided by the efforts of art, should have died in silence for me, had it not fallen, in a manner, under our immediate observation.

The only recreation we enjoy, is sailing about the harbor in one of the ship's boats. And this is rather connived at by our guard, than allowed of by the vizier, whose orders concerning us are very rigid. In the course of these cruizes, we have had opportunities to make ourselves well acquainted with the harbor, and to produce the plate which has been exhibited of it. But all our observations tended nothing towards our own enlargement. There is but one channel into the harbor, and the wind constantly blows into it at this season. It is not, therefore, the loss of our guns, or the presence of a guard, that detains us. Despair would furnish us with arms to rid us of this obstacle, were the door of escape open to our vessel.

M O N D A Y, 2d JUNE.

This morning the long-expected boat brought in the shawbunder of Judda. At nine o'clock he came aboard the Adventure, and delivered our captain a letter from the Xerif himself, and another from Captain Anderson. The first letter contained permission for the captain to go where he pleased, on paying the duties of the port of Yambo; an imposition which is levied on all vessels that enter the Xerif's ports, whether they dispose of their cargoes or not. If he preferred going to Judda, no duties were to be paid at Yambo; but in that case, the vessel was to be given as a security into the charge of the Xerif's servants; and the captain and his officers were to proceed to Judda, on a boat which should be provided for them. The vizier was likewise directed to dispatch the packets, and the gentlemen who had the care of them, in a proper boat to Suez. Such was the substance of the Xerif's orders. They were in some respects, unreasonable enough, and betrayed a greater regard to his own benefit, than a readiness to do us justice. But our situation considered, it will be easily believed, that we were more satisfied than otherwise, at the receipt of these tidings.

The contents of captain Anderson's letter were not less agreeable. After condoling with us on our misfortune, he tells us, that the Swallow sloop of war, which had been on a voyage to Suez, was just arrived at Judda. That on learning our situation, her commander, Captain Panton, had demanded satisfaction of the government, for the insult that had been offered to the British flag. It was plain from this letter, that the Xerif was unacquainted with this demand, when his instructions relative to us, were forwarded to Yambo. But we doubted not that our wrongs would be redressed, by the presence of a naval officer, of the known spirit and humanity of Captain Panton. Captain Bacon and the supercargoes of the Adventure, would soon have an opportunity of making a personal application to him at Judda, on this head. But the gentlemen tlemen bound for Europe, thought it expedient to join with me, in a representation of the damages we had incurred, by the treachery of the Xerif's government. This letter we forwarded to Captain Panton by the hands of Captain Bacon; and though no benefit may accrue to us from the result, we shall be satisfied to hear that the insult is revenged, by the interposition of the British arms.

Our prospect of getting to England now recurred with tenfold pleasure; and we were not willing to lose a moment in taking advantage of the Xerif's permission. The interpreter was immediately dispatched to the vizier, to remind him of his promise. He returned with a Nokidah, or master of a boat, whom this crafty minister pretended to have sent us, that we might make our own terms with him. This modest fellow had the confidence to ask us 700 dollars and a dress, for the freight of his boat to Suez. I say freight, as we were to find provisions, and even water, ourselves. When the direct distance be considered, which scarcely exceeds 150 leagues, and the boat itself be examined, which is without a deck, and not so well found as a Cornish fishing-smack, no one will pronounce the demand to be within the bounds of moderation, though preferred by an Arab. But we were in absolute want of the boat, and were fain to see ourselves cheated, with our eyes open. We found this convenient agent inflexible in his purpose, and were glad to strike the bargain at 650 dollars, the major part of which, we shrewdly suspected, would go into the vizier's coffers. And this was the return which his gratitude suggested, for the present which we made him! but we were obliged to keep our suspicions and our complaints, equally a secret. It was in the vizier's power to frame a thousand delays in our undertaking, and consequently, our interest to wink at an imposition, by which we secured his protection. On these principles, therefore, we agreed to give more for the hire of a boat, than she was intrinsically worth. And, happy to escape from the snare which beset us, we did not think our liberty dearly purchased, at the price of being handsomely fleeced. When this weighty matter was settled, the Arab retired, to give his employer the agreeable intelligence of his success, while we seriously prepared ourselves to turn a bad bargain to the best account.

S U N D A Y, 8th JUNE.

The last week was employed in regulating the affairs of the vessel. There was not the best appearance of harmony between the vizier and the shawbunder; which operated to retard her dispatch. By some blunder of the former, the cargo was ordered ashore; and though this procedure seemed to contradict the Xerif's commands, the captain could not dispute the pleasure of the vizier. By the shawbunder's representation, however, the cargo was forthwith returned to the vessel; but a bale of callicoes was missing. This was undoubtedly embezzled by the vizier and his people, who stoutly denied having received it, though opposed by the testimonies of the supercargoes, and the officers of the Adventure. Two days were spent in fruitless disputes on this subject; and there is no pronouncing to what a length they would have been spun out, had not a seasonable hint which the vizier dropped, finally decided them. He affected to declare, that as his honor was doubted, he must insist upon things resting as they were, until justice had been done to him at Mecca. There needed no more to convince us of the absurdity of perseverance against such a character. We were ascertained of his being capable of the blackest actions; and the captain wisely resolved to forego his right, and give a receipt for the whole cargo.

These vexatious transactions detained my fellow-travellers and myself at Yambo, as the vessel's departure and ours was to take place together. But every thing being now prepared for the prosecution of our coasting voyage, our debts at this place discharged, and the boat we had agreed for, having been exchanged for another, which the vizier, for reasons best known to himself, pitched upon for us, we this afternoon obtained our audience of leave of this extraordinary personage. We were received with that politeness and affability, which in ministers of state, cover a multitude of imperfections. These are the bright sides of political characters, where an agreeable light is blended with the shades that overcast them. Had our knowledge of this man been confined to externals, we should have quitted Yambo, with the most favorable ideas of his disposition. But the brutality of his conduct could not be softened by the polish of his manners, and the conviction of his treachery flashed through the veil of a smooth tongue and a winning address. We were resolved, nevertheless, to appear satisfied of his sincerity; which, in truth, we now gave him more credit for, than since our acquaintance commenced. He had no longer any probable motive to amuse us; and the Xerif's commands are reputed to be held too sacred, to be sported with by his servants. We accepted in good part, the wishes he expressed for our safe arrival at Suez; and received the passport which he gave us for the security of our persons, with entire confidence in the virtue of its contents. We took our leave of the vizier, amid a profusion of high-flown compliments, which we had neither the capacity nor inclination to return. The natives of the East are so habituated to this mode of speech, that well-turned compliments fall from their lips with inexpressible readiness. And the Arabian language is so superior in elegance to the rest, that this people, in other respects so remarkable for their simplicity, exceed all other nations in the delicacy of their expression, and the agreeable wildness of their images.

M O N D A Y, 9th JUNE.

This has been a busy, as well as a joyful day for us. On the eve of recovering our liberty, after a tedious and painful detention, like the birds who escape the cage which with-held them, and flutter abroad without a thought of the consequences, we only rejoiced over the present moment, unheedful of the toils we might fall into, or the dangers that might await us in coasting a wild and unknown shore, and, as the poet finely says, “with no other “ stay save innocence and Heaven.” We could only provide against obvious calamities. We were well furnished with fire-arms and ammunition, to guard against open attacks, and with rice and water, to obviate the calls of hunger and thirst. But the friendship of Captain Bacon set us above answering the mere necessities of nature. He supplied us with many articles, which might have been dispensed with in the voyage which we had undertaken, had we meant to have kept a table suitable to our accommodations in an open boat. But he was willing that we should be as well provided as his ship would afford; and we could not in justice, refuse him the pleasure of crowning his genteel behavior during a four-months voyage, by this more material instance of his attention. It will appear a mystery to people in Europe, who are obliged to pay extravagantly for a passage from one kingdom to another, to learn that the commanders, manders, in general, in the country service in India, think your entertainment sufficiently repaid by the pleasure of your company; and are only studious to render a passage agreeable to you, which can no otherwise redound to their benefit, than what a liberal mind feels on the exertion of an hospitable action. This remark is due to the gentlemen of a service, which has been too much disparaged by the ill conduct of some unworthy members. The character of Captain Bacon, and others that I could mention from experience, will more than atone for the defection of the rest. I should not omit, among the rest of his favors, that he furnished us with a lascar, or mariner, who had some knowledge of the Arabic tongue. It would be painful to conceive the difficulties, to which we might be reduced in the course of our journey, were not this man to be with us, to interpret our wants, and to give the people we dealt with, a more favorable idea of Christians. He is a Mussulman, and is likely to gain some credit with those of his persuasion. And yet we were on the point of setting out, without any interpreter; neither reflecting on possible events, nor providing against human accidents.

We supped for the last time, on board the Adventure; and after taking a parting glass, and a cordial leave of Captain Bacon and the rest of our friends, Major Alexander, Lieutenant * * *, Mr. Hammond, and myself, attended by my European servant, two slave-boys of the major's, one of
Lieutenant

Lieutenant * * *'s, and Ibrahim our interpreter, stepped into the vessel's pinnace, and were presently conveyed to the boat, which we reached about ten o'clock at night. I would attempt to give the reader some idea of the place we got into, but the description demands an higher coloring than my pencil can convey. If he can imagine, however, the situation of four gentlemen, crowded together in a square of about five feet diameter, with no defence from the noontide suns and midnight dews of the Arabian coast, deprived of the smallest exercise of their limbs, and condemned to the constant society of the boat's crew, wholly at the discretion of a perfidious race, and with the prospect of a long and tedious cruize in an unknown sea—he may gather some faint traits of the undertaking we were engaged in. As we fought the danger, there can be no vanity in speaking of it: as something more than an idle temerity, enforced the prosecution of a voyage, the difficulties of which we were sufficiently apprized of.

JOURNAL OF THE BOAT IMPOSITION

FROM YAMBO TOWARDS SUEZ*.

---

T U E S D A Y, 10th JUNE.

We were disturbed at day-break by the arrival of the nokidah, and pilot who is to navigate the boat, which, from the price we have paid for her, we have named the Imposition. They brought another * Yambo affords provision, fish, and dates. Their water is kept in cisterns, and is brought on camels from a place a day's journey distant, also a day's journey inland stands a large town called Medinah al Nabi, where is Mahomet's sepulchre, although it is commonly said to be at Mecca. Here we staid six days.

The 1st May we set sail at 9 o'clock; after we had gone 10 miles, the wind turning contrary, we cast anchor among some shoals, and staid there two days.

From the 3d to the 9th, the fleet kept traversing off and on the coast among certain sand-banks, with a contrary wind, and so continued 6 days, without advancing more than 8 miles.

The 10th and 11th, kept coasting with a contrary wind 10 miles, and cast anchor in another place.

The 13th, proceeded along the shore, and came up with a galley of Alexandria.

The 14th, sailed along the coast, N. W. 10 miles, and cast anchor in 7 fathom water, in a place called Sikhabo.

The

another Arab and three Abyssinian slaves with them, who made up her crew. And these are full sufficient to manage her. Could we consult our ease before our safety, we would willingly dispense with this addition to our numbers, which greatly exceed the size and convenience of our bark. We

The 15th, sailing N. W. 70 miles, cast anchor in the open sea.

The 16th, proceeding along the coast 30 miles, cast anchor at Budukton.

The 17th, sailing along the coast 30 miles, cast anchor in the open sea, in 20 fathoms, near an island called Yanamini.

The 18th, went on by the shore 20 miles, and cast anchor at Khifafes.

The 19th, sailed by the shore 50 miles, and came to Molin.

The 20th, cast anchor at sea 25 miles further.

The 21st, proceeding along the shore 43 miles, dropped anchor at sea.

The 22d, the fleet failed, and cast anchor in the same manner, after advancing 10 miles.

The 24th, being in a bad station, we departed with a pretty good wind, the half galley having left behind one anchor and three cables, and one galley run a-ground, but was not lost. After sailing 10 miles, cast anchor in 8 fathom water, and stayed here one day, because there was good riding for the ships.

The 26th, proceeding 35 miles along the coast, cast anchor in a road.

The 27th, sailing W. N. W. at noon came up with Tor (a town to the northward of Cape Mahomet).

found no little difficulty, laſt night, in providing for our reſoſe. Our cheſts form a ſquare in the center of the boat, and my companions and I, each take up his lodging on his own cheſt. Our ſervants diſpoſed themſelves in ſuch places, as they could obtain a footing upon; but this increaſe to our ſociety, will reduce them to the neceſſity of ſecuring a poſt for themſelves.

We weighed our anchor at 6 A. M. and ſtood to the weſtward, with the wind at N. by W. But we had not got a league out, when the wind hauled round to N. W. This obliged us to run back again and anchor at the mouth of the harbor.

We had not been here long, when a boat paſſed us, with Captain Bacon and his chief mate on board. They are bound for Judda, and we had but juſt time to hail each other, and renew our wiſhes for our reciprocal welfare. The wind will be fair for their boat, when they get clear of the harbor; and their paſſage promiſes to be a ſpeedy one, in proportion as the wind is unfavorable to us.

The wind was ſtrong all day from the N. W. In the evening we ſaw the Adventure, ſtanding towards us. There were but a few of her fails ſet; and the Arabian pilots, to whoſe charge ſhe is committed by the Xerif's order, not being able to make any hand of it, brought her to an anchor again in the harbor. This outſet proves the little knowledge of theſe pilots; and it will be well if they

they carry her safely to Judda, considering the great difference between working her, and vessels rigged for coasting voyages.

I have annexed a chart of the Red-sea, from Yambo to Suez, that the reader may pursue the track of the boat as he reads the journal.

W E D N E S D A Y, 11th JUNE.

The nokidah and pilot slept upon the poop last night. Our arrangement, therefore, is as follows. They have possessed themselves of the stern; my companions and myself occupy the mid-space, and our servants and the crew keep in the fore-part of the boat. We have mounted a musketoen upon the gunnel, and have our fuses and pistols loaded. But as we are as yet, under the protection of the fort, we have not began to keep watch during the night.

At 6 A. M. we weighed with the wind at S. W. and stood N. W. and ran about three leagues; but the wind suddenly veering round to the west and W. N. W. the pilot found he could not reach his intended anchoring-place, and, to our great mortification, ran back before the wind, to an opening between the rocks. These rocks are a part of a reef, that extends from Judda to Cape Mahomet, and in which our vessel was unfortunately entangled, when we were driven to the necessity of putting into Yambo. We understand there are particular places upon this coast, which vessels are obliged to reach during the day, or else they must, at times, run back to the birth which they left, for want of anchoring-ground. At one of these stages, our boat brought to, at twelve o'clock, which is the properest term that can be used on the occasion. As the boat approaches the reef, one of the crew jumps from the fore-castle, with a hook in each hand, and diving under the reef, fastens the hooks to the rocks, which are rendered porous by the water. The boat rides here in smooth water, with her sides almost touching the rocks. And here a vessel of considerable burden, might ride; as the water is so deep, that we cannot find a bottom with several fathoms of rope.

We took an observation at noon, and found ourselves in the latitude of  $24^{\circ} 10'$  north. We have hitherto made little or no progress in our voyage; but are not to despair, because the winds have been contrary for two days. In the afternoon we saw the Adventure, standing to the southward. This denotes that she is clear of the harbor, but she seems to be going under a very easy sail.

T H U R S D A Y, 12th JUNE.

The nokidah waded ashore during the night, in order to go to Yambo for a spar, to replace one which was carried away yesterday. He had not left us long, when a brisk breeze sprung up from the land, with which we might have made a stretch to the northward, had our master been aboard. But this is only on a supposition, that these people work their boats in the night, which we have, indeed, but too much reason to doubt. At day-break the wind shifted to the N. W. so that when the nokidah returned, he found that it was impossible for us to stir. He brought some intelligence respecting the Adventure. It seems that the Arabian pilots are so unskilful in the management of a vessel of her construction, that the supercargoes and the officer who remain on board, are afraid of being cast away in the passage to Judda. They have already lost all her own anchors by their ignorance; and it is a great chance if they succeed better with the grapnels, which they have taken in, to supply the loss. The situation of this vessel is very peculiar. She was reduced to her present distress by the treachery of these barbarians; and is in danger of being wrecked by their obstinacy, in not permitting Captain Bacon to take charge of her, when they carry her clear of the rocks. But vengeance, no doubt, awaits the injured. This is not the first time that the English flag has redressed her subjects, even in this remote sea: and the hour perhaps will come, when the Xerif of Mecca will be forced to do justice to the sufferers on the snow Adventure.

About nine o'clock the wind changed to the southward; but we could not take advantage of it, on account of the absence of some of our company.

Lieutenant

Lieutenant * * * went ashore at six o'clock, on pretence of gathering samphire, and took Ibrahim, our interpreter with him. We were a little surprized at their stay; but when the wind became favourable, we dispatched a mariner into the country, to recal them to the boat. But how was our surprize increased, when the messenger returned, and informed us, that they were not to be found! Various were our conjectures on this occasion. We at one time, fancied that they had wandered beyond their knowledge, and were gone towards the beach, by tracing which they must at length find the boat. At another, we apprehended they had been surprized by the wild Arabs, and carried into slavery. The true cause was the furthest from our thoughts. But something possessed our nokidah to believe, that the absentees were gone to Yambo. Whether he had observed Lieutenant * * * 's discontent at his situation, and suspected that he was engaged in a business unfavorable to him, so it was, the nokidah's penetration exceeded ours, and he determined to seek them at Yambo. It was about noon when he set out for the town, which is about two leagues from hence; and, that nothing might be wanting on our parts, to recover our friends, we directed two mariners to take different routes in search of them, while we hoisted a signal on our mainmast, and discharged our musketoon repeatedly, in hopes of attracting their notice. At 3 P. M. the wind came about to the

N. W. and blew from that point the rest of the day.

Our mariners returned with as little success, as before. Our opinions now began to waver, and we suspected that Lieutenant * * * had taken some extraordinary step. Ever since our imprisonment at Yambo, his conduct had been the reverse to what we had known it. His prejudice against the Arabs exceeded all bounds, and his apprehensions of them seemed to have disordered his intellects. He often expressed such an abhorrence of the voyage we were about to engage in, that we more than once pressed him to forbear accompanying us. We had observed with concern, that he had betrayed fears for his life ever since he entered the boat; and was always on the watch, while we slept in the security which our situation required. We were too near to Yambo, to expect danger from the country; and all resistance would be vain, were harm intended us by the government. But the night before, he had declared, that our Arabs meant to murder us at supper. Then, that they had deferred it until midnight. These, and many other extravagancies which he committed, we attributed to the effects of distrust, and contented ourselves with laughing at them; although he frequently protested that he had overheard the Arabs debating on the manner of our deaths.

The day thus passed over our heads, while we labored under a weight of vexation and anxiety.

We

We had missed of as fair a wind as could blow for us; and were uncertain of the fate, which had befallen Lieutenant * * * and Ibrahim. At five o'clock we discovered camels and a guard of soldiers at a distance, which actually turned out to be their escort. Our looks mutually exhibited astonishment and confusion at this meeting. But we pitied the situation of our companion, and forbore to reproach him in the presence of the guard. He seemed much agitated and fatigued, and spoke but little on his arrival. From our interpreter and the guard, we learnt the particulars of his expedition. It appears, that his distrust of our Arabs had so worked upon the mind of Lieutenant * * *, as to induce him to return, in a clandestine manner, to the vizier of Yambo, and communicate his suspicions. On their reaching the shore, he artfully drew Ibrahim towards the town, and, on their getting about a mile, by threats and entreaties, he persuaded the simple fellow to accompany him. On their reaching the town, they were laid hold of by some Arabs; and carried, as they desired, before the vizier. They were received very politely by that minister, and the complaint of Lieutenant * * * was so far attended to, that a guard was ordered to take the boat-people into custody. At this moment the nokidah arrived, and gave evidence of his innocence, by the relation of our behavior on the absence of the accuser. The tables were now turned, and Lieutenant * * * was sent back to us, in the manner before recited. The vizier dispatched an Hindoo with him, to assure us, in the Moor tongue, that we had nothing to fear from the boat-people, whose lives should answer for our safety. We were obliged, in our own defence, to disown any knowledge of Lieutenant ***'s intentions; and to thank the vizier for his candid behavior on this occasion. The guard then departed, with a gratification which we made them for their trouble.

As accusations and repinings were equally vain, we determined among ourselves, to be silent on this mysterious conduct of Lieutenant ***. We, however, reprimanded Ibrahim very severely in his presence, for the folly which he had been guilty of; and came to a general resolution, not to go on shore on the continent, nor detain the boat for any one, who ventured to do so in future. After we went to bed, we observed Lieutenant *** go to the poop, and by means of gestures, and the few words of Arabic of which he is master, hold a kind of discourse with the nokidah and pilot. He came to his scrutoire once or twice, and we suspect took out money. What he did with it, or what will be the issue of his unhappy turn of mind, we cannot determine. It was late when he laid down, and we have reason to believe his rest is broken and unfound.

FRIDAY, 13th JUNE.

Our boat got under fail at four o'clock this morning, with a light breeze from the land. Though she is too large to row against an head sea, we found the advantage of having oars on board. The weather was so moderate, we made use of them the greatest part of the morning. At nine A. M. the wind shifted to the S. W. but proved very faint. We felt the rage of the sun to-day pretty severely. While we are under fail, it is not possible for us to put up a canvas awning, with which we are furnished. But to advance quicker in our progress, we must be content to be exposed in this manner. About 3 P. M. the wind came round to the favorite point, the N. W. which obliged us to run into smooth water, and bring to, as before, between the breakers and the shore; from the latter of which we are about a mile distant. The coast here is rather low, but the mountains rise a few miles behind it. The sky was too hazy for us to take an observation at noon; but by our reckoning, we have gained about three leagues to the northward in the last run.

Just as the boat came to anchor, Lieutenant * * * 's infirmity plainly discovered itself. We had been confirmed since yesterday, in our suspicions of his brain being touched. His appetite was gone, his looks were wild and disordered, and his conversation continually bordered upon madness. He told us, when the boat stood out to sea this morning, that the Arabs were carrying us there to murder us; and, when she stood into land, he changed his tone, and pronounced our deaths to be prepared for us here. We little regarded such strange fancies; but were alarmed much at his seizing his sword when we came to anchor, and bidding us to stand upon our defence. The Arabs were now justly frightened at his extravagance, and we had much ado to persuade him to lay by his sword. This circumstance had been overlooked, and we had determined only to keep a strict eye on his conduct; when the arrival of two boats, from the northward, in the cove we are in, opened a strange and unexpected scene.

As they approached us, Lieutenant *** betrayed the strongest symptoms of uneasiness. He gravely bade us prepare for death; and, unaccountably, made these new-comers privy to our fate. It was in vain that we assured him, they could have no intimation of any ill which was meant us; strangers as they were, and accidental as our meeting had been. Such an unhappy prepossession had he taken against the Arabians in general, that no opinion, no reasoning of ours, could avail. We knew that he had but little knowledge of the Arabic language; but every word that had an affinity to those of wicked purport, was converted, by his dis-tempered imagination, into the very mischief itself; as his infected sight, in like manner, turned sticks into spears, and knives into daggers. The ears of Ibrahim were open as well as his, and his ready apprehension of the language would have advertised us of danger, if any were at hand.

It had been whispered to us, that some money had been given to our nokidah last night; and we were now not a little astonished to find from Lieutenant * * * himself, that the sum was no less than 75 venetians, which he had divided between the nokidah and pilot, to save his life. He lamented, however, that it was in vain; for our deaths were fixed upon, and we should soon follow Captain Bacon and the gentlemen in the Adventure, who, he vehemently affirmed, had been massacred some days before. To divert these strange thoughts as much as possible, a slave-boy of Major Alexander's played on the fiddle, while the Arabs in the other boats, joined us with their kinds of music. We had supped, and were looking at some fish, which were playing about the boat, when Lieutenant * * * suddenly sprang from his seat, with two swords in his hand, and running to the major, gave him one sword to defend himself, and attempted to draw the other, as he said his life was in danger, from a man near the mainmast of the boat, who had a poniard in his hand. The boat was immediately filled with confusion; the crew crowded together in the stern, and called out to the other boat, which pushed away from us in haste. The matter was too critical to be trifled with; and the frenzy of our companion had become too conspicuous, to be palliated. He was accordingly seized, and disarmed by us; and, in the struggle, the major received a slight wound in the foot, from the other's sword.

We now began to be alarmed for ourselves. The strange boats might judge from appearances, that we had hostile intentions, and perhaps attempt to secure themselves, in a manner not very agreeable to us. The nokidah of ours came to us, and positively declared, that he would not get under sail again, while Lieutenant * * * remained on board. It was to no purpose that we offered to pledge our lives for the safety of himself and crew; and to keep a constant watch on our unhappy friend. The man was startled at the mad freaks which had been committed; and owned to us, that he thought our lives in equal danger with his own: as in his frantic fits, Lieutenant * * * would not be able to distinguish his friends from his imaginary foes. The reader may suppose that this insinuation made no impression upon us. Our repugnance in parting with our companion in so melancholy a situation, awakened all our eloquence, and redoubled our efforts to keep him with us. For some hours did we argue the matter with our nokidah and pilot, who had now joined him. But they remained deaf to our remonstrances. We found ourselves reduced to the necessity of either foregoing our voyage, or complying with these fellows' demand, of desiring Lieutenant * * * to return to Yambo upon one of the boats near us. This boat is afterwards to proceed to Judda; where he will find
Captain

Captain Bacon, and be certain of being accommodated in his vessel.

When we saw there was no alternative, but what had been proposed to us, we were fain to acquiesce, however strong our reluctance to such a measure. But on a serious review of it, Lieutenant ***'s interest may have demanded it, as much as our own. The business we are engaged in, is of too great consequence to be forgone; and by his going to Judda, we are ascertained that he is likely to meet with the assistance which his unfortunate case requires, from the surgeon of the Swallow sloop of war. Whereas, by proceeding with us, his malady would daily encrease, by the force of the terrors which he entertains of our Arabs. And some months would perhaps elapse before he could receive the advice of an European surgeon. The opportunity of removing him might never occur again; and the idea of beholding him sunk in the last stage of madness, bound hand and foot, and out of the reach of medicine, presents a picture too distressing to encounter, even in fancy. A letter was therefore written to Captain Bacon, with a summary of the untoward affair. We requested him to supply Lieutenant *** with the money which he had paid for his share of the boat; for which Captain Bacon was to call on our attorneys in India.

Our nokidah now hailed one of the boats, and induced it to draw near us again. He related the cause of the late disturbance, and agreed with the master of it, to land Lieutenant * * * and his slave-boy at Yambo, and afterwards carry him to Judda. He was now asked the amount of the sum, which he had received the last night from Lieutenant * * *. The nokidah and pilot produced 25 venetians, which they declared were all he had given them. It was impossible to discover the truth. Lieutenant * * * might perchance be mistaken, and they be apt to deceive us in such a point. It appears, however, of little moment to our poor friend; who is in a mood to give away all his money to the first man he is distrustful of.

It was now midnight, and Lieutenant * * * seemed desirous of passing the night with us; which he once more solemnly averred, was the last which he or we should ever know. As we were not to part until day-break, we readily assented to this desire. We prevailed on him to lie down on one of our beds, as he was afraid to remain in his own. At his own request, and for the satisfaction of our Arabs, Mr. Hammond and myself kept watch over him until morning. I do not remember to have ever been engaged in a more disagreeable office. Our humanity was wounded by the object before us; and our consciences were touched at a resolution, which we had been obliged to adopt in our own despite. The reader of sensibility will feel for our perplexity. Not a wink of sleep did our charge get during the night. He started up every moment in his bed, or called out to us to know, what villain stood behind him with a drawn sword!

He

He seemed not to apprehend danger from the other boats; or to dream of assassins, but among our own people.

SATURDAY, 14th JUNE.

At day-break the signal was made for sailing, Lieutenant * * * arose, rather more composed than usual, and permitted his baggage to be put into the other boat, without complaining. He had reflection enough at this moment, to see the necessity of our separation; and assured us, that he held himself in no more danger in one place than another. It was his firm opinion that our destiny was certain, whether in this vessel or that, at Yambo or at Judda. We paid for his passage, and gave the master of the boat a verbal message for the vizier, to advertise him of our companion's situation, and to request his good offices, in getting him conveyed safely to Judda. Our letter for Captain Bacon, we committed to the slave-boy, together with his master's swords and keys. This is a shrewd honest boy, who we make no doubt will be as careful as he can be, of his master, on this short passage. We had the satisfaction to perceive, that Lieutenant * * * left us much more readily, than we could have expected. Though his antipathy to the Arabs is rooted in his present disorder, he distinguishes ours more particularly, in his distrust; and perhaps, the quitting their company is a temporary relief to his mind. Fortunate did we hold it, that not an angry word was requisite, to hasten his departure; affected as we were at the situation of a person, whom we had some regard for, and averse to embittering the potion which was prepared for him. Our principal consolation arose from the wind being fair for his return. It ensured his reaching Yambo in a few hours; and might throw him even in the way of the Adventure, which we had seen at the mouth of the harbor but two days before. At all events, we depended on the vizier's treating him with the same humanity as before; and complying with the request, which we had made in his behalf.

The boats had not long left us with Lieutenant ***, when a breeze of wind came off the land. We presently got under sail, and had made a good stretch along shore, when the wind suddenly came ahead, and blew so strong, as to oblige us to tack about, and look for a shelter from its fury. We ran back a good way on this design, and at 11 A. M. entered a large bay encircled by a reef of rocks, to which we fastened our boat, in the manner before described. This bay is called Jeraboop, by the Arabians. In the middle of it there is an island, on which stands a priest's house. His name is Beridi, and we understand that he is visited by all the faithful who pass by, on account of his extreme piety and old age. We were too much taken up with the late misfortune which had befallen our society, ciety, to indulge curiosity; and left our Arabs to pay their devotions on the island alone.

We could get no observation at noon. The wind blew very violent the whole day from the N. W. but there is no sea in this bay, though it is two miles across from the rocks to the shore, which is here as mountainous as usual. We caught some beautiful rock-fish in the evening, with our hooks. They were well tasted, and encouraged us to hope for such refreshments, at other places on the coast. The wind increased during the night, and threatens a storm.

SUNDAY, 15th JUNE.

We cannot move this morning, as the wind still remains contrary: the weather is very boisterous without, but we may laugh at the storm, which idly spends its rage on the reef of rocks, that rises up, like the sevenfold shield of Ajax, between us and danger. Never was a coast so provided by nature, with a barrier against the hostilities of the sea or of mankind. The very surge is not permitted to lash it. And all the navy of Europe would be deterred by this formidable outwork from approaching any fortification which might be erected on the shore. What a pity is it, that the country is not worthy of the disposition, which has been made in its favor! There is no occasion for armies to protect the coast; and it is certain, that Arabia Petree is not indebted to this line of rocks, for her security. She poured forth myriads of enthusiasts, under her warlike son Mahomet, in search of more fertile lands. Nor does it appear, that her desarts, in that interval, attracted the avarice of foreign invaders.

We amused ourselves during the morning in catching fish, which readily take the bait here. Some of them have a mouth like a parrot's beak, which our Arabs advise us not to eat. But whether from their unseemly form, or their being really unwholesome, Ibrahim could not discover. At 10 A. M. we saw a boat standing towards us, which we suppose to be bound to Yambo. The people on board descried us, and at eleven o'clock she run so near the reef we were upon, as to be within hearing. We find she comes from Suez, and learn that most of the English vessels have left that port. This was all the conversation that we had with the boat, which put before the wind, and was soon out of sight. We gather this consolation, however, from the intelligence, that it is likely the winds are about to shift in this quarter. We can no otherwise account for the departure of our ships from Suez, so much earlier than we expected. Our voyage may therefore, be more prosperous than it promised to be.

We had no observation at noon, and the wind remained in the N. W. quarter while we lay here. A poor woman waded, and swam through the water to our boat in the evening, and was very thankful

thankful for some measures of rice which she took away.

M O N D A Y, 16th JUNE.

We were awakened at one o'clock this morning, by the boat getting under way. It is impossible for the Arabs to perform this manœuvre, without our knowledge; and though we lost our rest by the noise on board, we were agreeably surprized at their taking advantage of the light breeze, which came from the land. With sail and oar, we made a shift to go at the rate of a knot and a knot and an half an hour, the whole night. At day-break we saw a vessel to the N. W. standing as we did. Our people say, that she is also bound for Suez, and has been out no less than twenty days from Yambo. At 9 A. M. we discovered two more sail ahead. At ten we perceived a shoal, which they call Morfa, some leagues distant; and at noon, two of the boats appeared at anchor, within a point of land in the N. E. quarter. We stood for them; but the wind had now shifted to the N. W. and it was the work of some hours, to carry ourselves within the reef where the largest vessel was lying. We hooked our boat close by her about 3 P. M. and understand the bay we are in is called Banas. By our observation to-day it lies in the latitude of  $24^{\circ} 30'$  north. Cape Mahar within view to the northward. We are much disappointed appointed at finding what little progress we have made since we left Yambo; and particularly, after having been at sea to-day no less than fourteen hours. But our voyage bears an intimate resemblance to what the Greeks embarked in of old; and by our mode of coasting alone, we can easily conceive Ulysses to have been ten years rounding the shores of Greece; without the intervention of any enmity, but what the mariner may expect from the winds and waves.

In the evening we went on board the vessel by us. Her burden and accommodations place her far above the stile of our boat; and we could not but repine at our lot, which had thrown us into an open boat, when it is plain that some of them are provided with cabbins. We were received very civilly by her nokidah, who tells us that he is going to Suez. He is sickly, and was very thankful for some medicines we spared him, which we brought with us for the complaint he is afflicted with. These, the Arabians never fail to solicit of Europeans, when they have occasion for them, as they have a notion that we have one and all of us, a smattering in physic. The wind freshened, and blew all night from the N. W. as usual.

T U E S D A Y, 17th JUNE.

The wind is still contrary, and we cannot move this morning. It blew so strong at day-break, that our

our Arabs made our boat fast with another rope, by a turn round a pointed rock. Where we lie, a man of war might ride in great security. There are several fathoms of water close by the rocks, which break the force of the swell that tumbles down from the N. W. the reef at low water is every where dry, and we then pick up plenty of fish among the crevices of the rocks. While we have this supply, we shall not be at a loss for provisions. We have still a sheep left, and shall reserve a few fowls which we got from the Adventure, for more necessitous times.

At 8 A. M. the nokidah of the large vessel paid us a visit. It was partly to return our compliment, but his principal business was to look at our chart of the Red Sea. Our Arabs tell us that he is one of the best pilots of their nation. On a review of this chart we find it tolerably exact, as to the names of the islands and headlands on this coast. It is our intention, in the course of our voyage, to correct it where it is faulty, and to point out all the reefs and shoals between Yambo and Cape Mahomet. We have the advantage of being with pilots, who are acquainted with every creek and corner of the coast; and may gather such information of the track, as will prove of service to vessels thrown by currents on this dangerous shore. The fellow's surprize was very great, to hear places named by strangers, which only those of his own profession among his countrymen were acquainted with. They have no such thing as a chart; but his natural sagacity quickly made him comprehend the plan of ours. But as we are the first Europeans whom he has heard of in this navigation, he cannot reconcile to himself, how the situation of these islands could have been taken by vessels that dare not approach them. He has not the least idea of the use of the quadrant; and he conceived that we were rather making discoveries in the heavens, than ascertaining our latitude below.

We began to keep a regular watch to-night. Each gentleman and his servant to take two hours in rotation. We shall run no risk, it seems, until we get among the islands, but it is prudent to inure ourselves in time to a necessary habit. There were hard gales from the N. W. all day and part of the night.

W E D N E S D A Y, 18th JUNE.

We were under way at 6 A. M. with the wind at N. by W. and stood out to sea. But the wind was too moderate to be of much service to us, against the heavy swell which the late blowing weather has occasioned. We tacked therefore at 10 o'clock, and the wind coming round more to the W. we were enabled, contrary to our expectations, to fetch a reef to the northward of Cape Mahar about 2 P. M. There is another boat at anchor about a mile to the northward of us, supposed also to be bound to Suez. Our boat beats better to windward than the two which were in company with us yesterday. The largest of which has run into shore near a league to the southward, and the other within a mile of us.

We were disappointed of an observation to-day by the high lands to the southward, which obstructed our view. Our progress however has been very little. Were not the full moon at hand, we should look for little success in beating up such a coast as this. A few days of a southerly wind would give us a good shove in the short distance we are going; and all our hopes rest on the influence of this useful planet. The gentle light which she now affords us during the night-season, proves a great relief to us after the sunshine of the day, in this sultry month. But difficult as we find it to keep ourselves cool in the day-time, it is no easier matter to defend our bodies from the damps of the night, when the wind is loaded with the heaviest dews that ever fell. To be in readiness for every change of wind in our favor, we are obliged to forego the benefit of the awning I mentioned. We lie exposed to the whole weight of the dews, and the cloaks in which we wrap ourselves, are as wet in the morning, as if they had been immersed in the sea. It is plain, however, that they are not impregnated with the bad qualities, which render people so fearful of the dew in most parts of the world, or our constitutions would have evinced the fact.

The weather was very moderate during the night, and the wind remained in the usual quarter. We relieved our watch regularly, as the night before, and find that a little practice will make it easy to us.

THURSDAY, 19th JUNE.

We got under sail at day-break with the wind at N. and stood out to sea until 10 o'clock. The wind now heading us, we tacked and lay up along shore. Our course was but slow, but we continued gaining ground until 2 P. M. when we ran into a fine bay, and brought to, on a reef within an hundred yards of the beach. We are not at all displeased with the working of our boat. She has run her two comforts out of sight, and beat the boat which was a-head of us yesterday. There was a contest between them the whole morning, and the victory declared in favor of our boat, which has fetched a mile to windward of the other. However contemptible the prize, there is a secret satisfaction in being superior to our neighbors on every occasion. And I doubt, whether the winner at an horse-race could have exulted more, than we did at our dexterity, in beating a vessel, much worse found than ours.

The bay we are in, is in the latitude of  $24^{\circ} 36'$  N. by an observation which we took to-day. To the W. it is defended by a reef of rocks, and the high land to the northward and eastward, would secure it from a storm in those points. There is water

water enough within for the largest ships; but it is very uncertain, whether they could gain admittance within the reef that guards this coast. It is not always that we discern that reef to the westward of us; but there is every reason to imagine, that we are still sailing within it; and that the rocks are only more sunken in those places, where the sea is not seen to break upon them. It was accident alone, that brought the Adventure through this reef before our arrival at Yambo; and it would be the same chance, that would steer a vessel of her burthen into this bay, clear of the dangers which impede the passage*.

To

* The Author is sorry to observe, that there is a chasm in this part of the journal, which all his labor and assiduity has not been able to supply. Some remarks on the curious economy of the rocks on the coast of Arabia Petrea, were mislaid before the first publication, and to memory alone, must he trust for the matter of them in this edition. As that coast, perhaps, throughout the known world is solely studded thus with sunken rocks, so is the peculiarity heightened by their general substance and formation. Bare and desolate as the shore appears to the eye, on a calm day the shallows betray the most beautiful bodies of coral and stone, which branch horizontally, or rise perpendicularly, like extensive forests beneath the waves. In proportion to her parsimony ashore, Nature seems to have been lavish of her charms in the clear bosom of this sea, which gave, perchance, to the antients the idea of groves and palaces beneath the deep, the haunts of Neptune and his court, and were the origin of fables, which are said to have sprung from this quarter. No one can doubt that the ocean teems with vegetable productions; but only on this uncommon coast

To atone, in some measure, for the want of exercise in our present situation, we make a practice of going into the water regularly before sun-set. The coves we lie in, are very convenient for this purpose; and we find great benefit, as well as refreshment, from the salt water.

FRIDAY, 20th JUNE.

We weighed at day-break, and stood out to sea, with the wind at N. N. W. At 7 A. M.

coast have they been pervious to mortal eye. Much more than we perceived was communicated to us by the diver aforementioned, at Yambo, who described such caverns and places that he had met with under water, as would justify the most extravagant accounts of the poets on this head. It may not be amiss to observe here, that the conjecture already started in this work, relative to the barren aspect of the coast of Arabia, is almost confirmed by the circumstance of her dangerous and almost unnavigable shores. As the waters retired from the strand, these rocks, which were before covered, began also to appear, and to interrupt a navigation, which in the days of Solomon was probably more secure than at present. At least, if we can judge from the success of the voyages performed by his order in the Red Sea, it is not likely, that the same shoals and breakers could have been avoided by the ignorant navigators of that age, which are so fatal to the experienced of our own! Nor can it be supposed that the vessels he employed, were of the light structure and burthen with the present craft of Arabia; as it is now generally understood, that they brought their cargoes of gold, precious stones, and spices from the Eastern islands—a voyage that would require bottoms of no inconsiderable bulk.

we saw the island of Hafana, bearing about N. N. W. at the distance of eight leagues. At eight, we ran by a funken rock, above three leagues from the land; and at the same time we discerned breakers upon our lee-quarter, a league further in the sea. At ten we tacked with the wind at W. and stood along the coast. At eleven we came among a number of breakers, that extend three or four leagues into the sea. Our pilot appears to be well experienced in this navigation. He displayed his dexterity to-day, by running us through narrow channels; and almost brushing the rocks to the windward of the boat. This is as dangerous a part as we have seen of this coast; nor would it be possible for a ship, without an Arabian pilot on board, to steer through this net of rocks and shoals, except by a miracle.

We proceeded under an easy sail for some hours. The weather was remarkably hot, and we were exposed, as usual, to all the rage of a vertical sun. But we had the satisfaction to reflect, that we were gaining somewhat on our way. And this served to alleviate the inconveniences to which we are subjected by our situation. The satisfaction, however, was transient. The wind headed us at two o'clock, and we were obliged to run into shore by another boat, which is said to be bound for Suez. We had the mortification still not to keep the ground which we had so happily attained. The pilot did not like the birth, and ran back again to the southward, in search of another. It is impossible to portray the countenances which we exhibited during this manœuvre. We could not contain our vexation, and remonstrated pretty warmly with the pilot, on his sporting with our good fortune, and throwing away the advantages which we so seldom obtained. He lent a deaf ear to our complaints; and went near a league, before we arrived at the bay where he intended to pass the night. Here we came to on a reef, at 4 P. M. and found the water not deep enough to admit vessels of any burthen. Our observation at noon brought us into the latitude of  $24^{\circ} 46'$  N. The wind was moderate all night from the N. W.

SATURDAY, 21st JUNE.

We were roused at three this morning by the boat getting under way. Our beds take up the breadth of the boat, and were we ever so much overpowered with sleep, the trampling of the mariners' feet upon our bodies, would soon chase away all inclinations of that nature. There was a light breeze from the land, and the moon being at her full just before it sprang up, flatters our hopes of more favorable winds for some days to come. We went easily along until day-break, when the high land of Hafana appeared, bearing N. W. at the distance of six leagues. This island is in the form of a sugar-loaf, and rises like an exhalation from the sea. At 9 A. M. a fine breeze sprung up from the S. E.

and at noon we anchored in a small bay, off the northernmost point of Hafana. We were much out of humor at this delay, but found it impossible to prevent the Arabs stopping, for purposes unknown to us. It is an hardship on us, to lose the benefit of a fair wind, with a month's provision and water on board. But we are obliged to consider the resolutions of these people as law, in every thing that respects the management of the boat.

The island of Hafana is a barren rock, inhabited only at particular seasons, when the natives from the continent bring off wood, water, and provisions, for the conveniency of vessels that pass to and fro. They erect temporary habitations for their families, and live chiefly upon the fish with which this coast abounds. This island is not more than two leagues long, and about half as broad. It lies about three leagues from the main, and in the latitude of  $25^{\circ} 3'$  N. by this day's observation. Here we found three boats, bound likewise for Suez. They mean to join us to-morrow, in order to pass the cluster of islands that lies to the northward of this. This we learn from our nokidah; who assures us that the Buddoos, or wild Arabs, infest those parts, and make no scruple to attack a single boat. It was one reason for his calling here, if we are to take his word; and though we hold ourselves strong enough to venture singly through this sea, all argument and displeasure on our side, are equally vain.

The wind blew briskly from the S. E. the remainder mainder of the day, and continued in the same quarter until we retired to rest. The loss of time did not add more to our discontent, than did the indolence and phlegm of our Arabs.

S U N D A Y, 22d JUNE.

Our nokidah and pilot both lay ashore last night, so that it was not practicable for us to have sailed, had our inclinations only been consulted. A land breeze came off from the N. E. about an hour before day-break, and at 6 A. M. we sent Ibrahim ashore to hasten our people. He returned with an answer, that the other boats were not ready, and that it was fruitless to urge the necessity of our affairs, or to expect their departure a moment before their own time.

It is more than probable, that the snow Aurora was wrecked on the back of this island in the month of December; a circumstance which has been already noticed in this work. The captain's journal places the island in this latitude; and we have sufficient proofs of a wreck being in this neighborhood. The beach is covered with a number of * teak-timbers, knees, and bolts of a vessel; and a fine English-built cutter lies upon the strand, which is new, and in good repair.

* The teak-tree is a native of India, and its timber resembles oak so much, that it is used throughout the East for ship-building. It is thought to surpass oak in point of duration.

At nine we weighed, in company with five boats, and stood to the eastward, with little or no wind. At ten a fine breeze sprung up from the S. W. and we ran by a number of shoals and breakers to the windward of us, that are four or five leagues from the main. At eleven we passed a sandy island, from which there appears to stretch a connected line of breakers to the island of Hafana. Within this line we have made our run to-day. At 2 P. M. we anchored to the eastward of the island of Harama, which lies about six leagues to the northward of Hafana. We had no observation at noon, but we conclude it from our reckoning to be in the latitude of  $25^{\circ} 20' N$ . This is a low sandy island, extending about two miles in length, and half a mile in breadth, and situated about a league from the main. There are a few huts near the place we are anchored at, which serve to shew the poverty of the inhabitants, and that we have little to fear from them, though we perceive that there are boats belonging to the island.

From this day's navigation we are convinced, that no ship can approach this part of the coast of Arabia, with any degree of security; as the sea is all along foul with shoals and rocks, and we frequently saw breakers to windward of us, which could not be less than six or seven leagues from the land. The wind was variable during the night, but blew chiefly from the westward.

M O N D A Y,

M O N D A Y, 23d JUNE.

We weighed at day-break, after taking on board a couple of sheep, which we purchased here for three dollars each. There was a brisk breeze from the E. N. E. with which we stood along the coast. At seven o'clock we passed the small island of Abumellie, which is surrounded by breakers. Here we discovered an Arab family ashore, and a boat put off with some of the men, to visit our people. This island is bare of every thing but a few bushes, and does not lie half a league from the main. At eight the wind came round to N. which obliged us to stand out more to sea. Our bark is, indeed, a prime sailer, and no vessel which we have met with, can keep pace with her. But this is rather a disadvantage to us, as our pilot daily foregoes the superiority he has gained, to keep company with the other boats. He now inclined more to the westward than was necessary. His intention was evidently to loiter for our comforts. We cannot prevent the delay which this plan must occasion, during our disagreeable voyage. Our Arabs seem resolved to grant their countrymen the protection which our company may afford them; and at the same time, they are not wanting to persuade us, that our security consists in going together.

The run to-day has been very clear, and the coast appears more fertile, than we have seen it on this

this side of Mocha. At 2 P. M. we tacked and ran into shore. To our great disappointment, we could not weather a bluff point a-head; and the pilot ran back near a league, before he could find a secure birth. At length he came to, on a reef close to the shore before four o'clock, where we were presently joined by two of our fleet. We could get no observation at noon, on account of the high land to the southward; but, by our reckoning, we take the place which we now lie in, to be in the latitude of  $25^{\circ} 38' N.$

We had more exercise for our physical skill this evening. There is a boy lying sick of a fever, on board one of the boats near us; and on application for relief, we sent him some cooling draughts, to be repeated according to the directions which we received. But some bowls of weak tea, which the boy more readily took, produced an immediate perspiration, and seem more likely to promote his recovery. Our success will not fail to recommend us to the Arabs. The wind blew from the S. W. a great part of the night.

T U E S D A Y, 24th JUNE.

We got under sail at day-break, with a fine breeze from the land, in company with the two boats. The other three appearing above a league astern. We kept about half a league from the shore, but found the water so shallow, that we hold
it

it impossible the annual Judda ship should go to Suez in this track. There were breakers the whole way, some leagues without us. Several sandy islands are scattered about this part of the coast, which are laid down in the chart. The shore is now covered with underwood, and interspersed with date-trees; but no inhabitants have come into view.

At 8 A.M. the wind died away, and our crew took to their oars and rowed out to sea, in hopes of meeting with the sea-wind. The channels here, in many places, will scarcely admit our boats between them; and the rocks around us stand out of the water, and are covered with the largest birds which were ever seen. The Arabs call them Meriah. They have a prodigious long bill and long legs, which enable them to catch fish in near a fathom water. The current seems to be for us, but we have no opportunity to try it. At nine we came up with the southernmost point of the island of Naaman, which is laid down in the chart in  $26^{\circ} 6'$  north; with sands about it. But this we find to be an error. The island begins in the latitude of  $25^{\circ} 50'$  and extends to  $26^{\circ} 6'$  north; and although at a distance, it might be taken for a number of different islands, on a nearer view, it proves to be one continued land, overflowed in several quarters at high water. We run between this island and the main, through very clear and deep water, with a strong breeze at W. S. W. Latitude per observation  $25^{\circ} 50'$ .

At

At 3 P. M. we opened a cove within a reef of rocks, and anchored close on the Arabian coast, where one of our fleet had already arrived. The rest we fairly ran out of sight to-day, except a boat of our own size, commanded by our pilot's brother; which stopped at Naaman to procure a supply of wood. By our reckoning, we take our anchoring-place to be in the latitude of  $26^{\circ}$  north. At sun-set our nokidah weighed his anchor, and ran out into deeper water, to prevent a surprize from the wild Arabs, who frequent this neighborhood. The other boat followed our example. There were calms and light airs the whole night.

WEDNESDAY, 25th JUNE.

We weighed our anchor at day-break, with a light breeze from the land. The two boats were in company, and we went under an easy sail for some hours. At 8 A. M. a fine gale sprung up from the southward, and agreeably quickened our course. We ran by several sandy islands, within a league and an half of the main, and in spite of the hot weather, entertained our imaginations with the fairness of the wind, and the novelty of the navigation. We had been a fortnight on board yesterday, and though we were advanced not a third of the distance to Suez, we had the satisfaction to reflect, that we had gained all our ground in the last four or five days. For the first week our progress had been delayed by the misfortune of our companion, and the strength of contrary winds. The winds are now variable, and promise to be so until the change of the moon. It only depends upon our Arabs, to improve the occasion which fortune presents to us.

On some of the islands which we passed, were several birds, larger even than those we saw yesterday. We positively mistook them for men at a distance, wading in the sea; and one of them was so bold, as not to be scared at a shot, which was fired at it from our boat. At 11 A.M. the wind veered round to the westward, and our pilot thought fit to run under the lee of a sandy island, where the other boats soon came to, likewise. With this wind we might have gone a great way further to the northward, were we not in a manner shut up among shoals and rocks, by keeping so close to the shore. By our observation this island is in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 7'$  north.

Here our people gathered a quantity of eggs, which the birds lay upon the sandy reefs. They tell us these eggs are well-tasted and wholesome; but we are not driven to such streights, as to be obliged to put up with all kinds of food. The boy is much mended in his fever, and entertains a great opinion of the virtues of tea. There were light airs from the southward, and calms, during the night.

THURSDAY,

THURSDAY, 26th JUNE.

We got under fail at day-break, in company with the two boats. The wind was at S. E. and we ran easily for some hours, through very foul water, with sandy islands on each side of us. At 9 A. M. we came to, under a small island; where our nokidah tells us we must wait for the rest of the fleet, in order to pass some islands ahead, which are haunted by piratical Arabs. The caution of this man begins to communicate itself to our minds. Were there not some danger lurking near us, he could not be so uniform in his behavior, or so solicitous for the junction of the boats behind us. As the wind freshens from the southward, we have hopes that the rest of the fleet will join us in a few hours. But this is little consolation to persons in our situation, who are anxious to conclude our voyage, and are obliged to forego a fair wind in a contrary monsoon. This island is about four leagues from the main, and by our observation, is in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 8' N$ . There is a priest dwells upon it, called Morbeck, to whose cell our Arabs are gone, to pray for a fair wind, at a time that they are trifling one away! To the south of this island there is a remarkable rock, which appears at a distance, like a lion couchant. One of the boats is anchored by us, the other is gone to the continent to cut wood.

At noon we discovered two boats to the fourthward, and before 2 P. M. we were joined by all the fleet; except one boat which is a bad failor, and lags behind. We immediately got under fail, and stood to the N. W. with a fine sea breeze. We ran briskly through deep and clear water, until past four o'clock, when the wind coming round to the northward of west, the whole fleet steered into shore, and anchored close on the Arabian coast. The hindermost boat came up within a mile of us, so that we are now six sail in company. This place, by our account, lies in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 16' N.$

We had scarcely come to an anchor, when we discovered camels and a number of women moving towards us. They proved to belong to a wandering tribe of Arabs, who are wont to come down in a friendly manner, to sell sheep and water to vessels that touch on the coast. Their appearance was truly miserable; and we could perceive but little difference between the human and brute creation, whom nature had bred in this desert region. Their wants, their appetites, and their insensibility, bore an intimate resemblance together. And they were as much below our envy, as above our compassion. Light airs from the west all night.

F R I D A Y, 27th JUNE.

We were disturbed in our first sleep, by the fleet of boats getting under way at one this morning.
There

There was a light breeze from the land, and with the help of our oars, we made a shift to go between two and three knots an hour. Our run was through very foul and shallow water. At 11 A. M. we passed a sandy island, which is lofty, and makes like the ruins of a castle standing in the water: the sides perpendicular and appearing like walls, and at one end, the face resembling a decayed tower. The rocks in this sea are often thrown into fantastic shapes. Some we have seen like boats under sail, and some like animals and men.

A fine breeze now sprung up from the S. W. and at noon we ran by another island, sandy like the former, and lying within four leagues of the main. By our observation, this island is in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 26'$  N. from hence we continued our course through clear and deep water, until 3 P. M. when the wind heading us, we stood into shore, to fetch our pilot's brother, whose boat got the start of us to-day, and had come to an anchor under the land. This was the boat that went for wood yesterday, and we were astonished to see a fine timber on board, which she had picked up ashore. It is of teak, and being about 30 feet long, we conjecture it to be one of the beams of the unfortunate Aurora, which the sea has cast up again. The Arab thinks to get a good price for it, at some of the ports in this sea.

This place, by our reckoning, is in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 36'$  N. Here we found an opening in the land, which disclosed a very deep and romantic valley, where the sea, at times, appears to flow in to a considerable depth. The same chain of mountains still continues within land, that we have traced from Yambo. They only vary in the line, which in some places, approaches nearer to the coast than in others. Four of our fleet not being able to reach us, bore away for anchoring-ground, which is not in sight. This is no small mortification to us, who will be under the necessity of waiting for them. The wind blew from the westward during the night.

S A T U R D A Y, 28th JUNE.

There was a fine breeze sprang up from the land before day-break, but we did not weigh, in expectation of being joined by the other boats. At 5 P. M. they came in view, but the force of the wind was spent, and we sailed with little or no wind. At 8 the wind came round to the N. W. and began to blow so fresh, that our pilot was fain to run under a reef of breakers, which lies more than three leagues from the main. Here our pilot's brother was already arrived, but none of the rest of the fleet could come up. Our situation is very eligible. We are here defended from the violence of the weather, and are ready to slip out, should the wind veer again to the east or south quarters. As we advance on our voyage, we have daily fresh matter of surprize, and behold the intricacies of a navigation, which we had no idea could exist in any corner of the globe. By our observation, this reef is in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 40'$  N. Cape Sellah bears due north, at the distance of six leagues.

This sea abounds with the large mother-of-pearl oysters; and our nokidah to-day gave us a proof of his agility, by jumping out of the boat when under sail, and bringing up one of these oysters in two fathom water, in time to catch a rope from the boat's quarter. These fellows' dexterity in fishing cannot be sufficiently admired; and wherever we are, we may depend upon our master for a dish of excellent fish. At low water the reef appears some feet above the level of the sea, and our table was not unprovided with its usual service. This circumstance is very favorable to this coasting voyage; as, whatever other hardships they may endure, the want of provision is not felt by the mariners.

There were hard gales all day from the N. W. so that we could not quit our station. As the moon enters into her last quarter to-day, this contrary wind betides us no good, and we apprehend there will be no change until the new moon. We are become very skilful in the influences of this planet; but how are they to be pitied, whose success depends upon so inconstant a power! The weather was more moderate during the night. The wind in the same point.

S U N D A Y, 29th JUNE.

At half past six this morning a light breeze came off the land, and flattered us to leave our station. We weighed in company with the other boat, and stood to the N. N. W. but the wind shifting suddenly to the W. N. W. and an ugly swell being against us, before we had got a league, both the boats were obliged to tack, and run back to their former birth under the reef. Here we were joined by three more of our fleet at 9 A. M. They had luckily made such a stretch to sea, as to be able to reach this reef, when the wind changed to the westward. There was now but one missing boat, and at 10, we discovered her at anchor upon the reef, about a league to the southward. Our fears of the weather are now confirmed. We must look for delays for some days to come; which, joined to some circumstances of our situation, call forth all our fortitude to combat with cheerfully.

The weather was very tempestuous, and there were frequent gales from the N. W. during the day. The night was more moderate; but we had a disturbance of another nature on board our boat, which alarmed us at first, but turned out to be a ludicrous, rather than a serious adventure.

Besides our nokidah and pilot, there is another Arab on board, as I have said before. The rest of the crew are Abyffinians. During the first watch at night,

night, which it was my turn to keep, this Arab, who was talking with his companions, suddenly fell upon the deck in the stern of the boat, and to all appearance, was seized with a convulsive fit. We were immediately in motion, and offered to administer such relief to him, as we had seen practised in the same cases. But our astonishment was great, when we found the Arabs would not permit any assistance to be given him. They declared, that he was only disordered in mind, and that an evil spirit possessed him, who could only be expelled by the force of prayer. Accordingly the nokidah began to pray over him aloud, while two men held the unhappy creature down, to prevent, as they said, the ill effects of the temporary influence which over-ruled him. They told us stories of men in this situation, who committed murder, and every other act of desperation. This idea appeared so extravagant to us, that we treated it with ridicule; and could not but pity the ignorance of a people, who were such slaves to superstition. The notion was certainly imbibed from the demoniacs of Palestine, who are mentioned in the New Testament. We have scriptural authority to believe their existence at a certain period. But to suppose they have still liberty to enter into human bodies, and that man has the same power as our Saviour possessed over supernatural beings, are tenets worthy of a weak and unenlightened mind. We were much surprized, however, at the length of the fit, which continued between two and three hours ; and, from the strong agitations of his body, left the Arab in a state of imbecillity for the rest of the night. But the devil was at length exorcised, and the nokidah remarked to us with triumph, the great efficacy of prayer !

M O N D A Y, 30th JUNE.

We weighed at six this morning, in company with the four boats, with a light breeze from the N. N. E. The other boat stood after us at a distance. Our run to-day was through very deep and clear water, and, by the long and ugly swell which tumbled in upon us from the N. W. we conjecture there is no reef of rocks without this part of the coast, and that a large vessel might stand in without danger. Latitude, per observation,  $26^{\circ} 44'$  north. At twelve o'clock the wind hauled round to the N. W. and the whole fleet tacked and stood into shore. At 1 P. M. we ran into a small inlet, defended from the sea by a reef, and hooked ourselves to a rock, within two fathoms of the beach. Here we were joined by the rest of the fleet, except one boat which cannot keep up.

As we came in here, our nokidah told us to prime our fire-arms, and prepare ourselves for the reception of the wild Arabs. He had scarcely spoken, when our old pilot leaped into the water and swam ashore, and with all the agility of youth, ascended an eminence that juts into the sea, to learn learn if there was any immediate danger. This inlet opens into a valley, on each side of which we have planted a sentinel. The country has resumed its barren appearance, and yields only a brushwood, with which our fleet have supplied themselves. This place is called Jebul, or Mount Lebel, and by our reckoning, lies in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 46'$  north.

About half an hour after our arrival, a man and woman came down to us in a friendly manner, and assured us we had nothing to fear, as there were no Buddoos in that neighborhood at present. But our Arabs pay little attention to this information; and are so suspicious of this station, that we doubled our watch during the night, and perhaps, would have made an enemy repent of an intrusion at such a season. The weather was moderate during the night, but the wind still remained in the N. W. quarter.

T U E S D A Y, 1st JULY.

We got under way at half past one this morning, with a light breeze from the land, in company with the four boats. We stood along shore with sails and oars, until 7 A. M. when the wind heading us, we made a stretch out to sea. At eight we tacked with the wind at west, and stood to the northward. At nine we passed a little sandy island, about two leagues from the main. At ten we ran close

close by a reef of rocks, about half a league further in the sea. There was no swell to-day, which we attribute to our being within shoals and reefs, and we saw a rock some leagues without us. But this may be owing to the nature of narrow seas, where a swell soon rises, and as soon subsides, as the wind freshens or moderates.

We fetched as high as we could on the Arabian shore, and at noon anchored in smooth water, where three of the boats soon joined us. The pilot's brother is a better sailor than we, and is anchored at least a league a-head. By our observation we are in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 56'$  north. The coast is not so hilly here, and our people are less apprehensive of a surprize. The wind remained at N. W. during the rest of the day, but so moderate, that we have great hopes of variable winds, if not a total change, at the new moon, which now approaches. We have only run half the distance between Yambo and Suez; but a few days of a southerly wind would do our business. There were light airs from the land in the night.

W E D N E S D A Y, 2d JULY.

We weighed at day-break with a breeze from the land, in company with the three boats. We stood close in with the shore, and went through smooth and shallow water until 9 A.M. when the wind coming round to the N. W. we made a stretch stretch out to sea, tacked, and weathered a sandy island ahead, where our pilot's brother lay to his vessel for us. This island, by our reckoning, lies in the latitude of  $27^{\circ} 1'$  north, and has a reef of breakers, extending some leagues beyond it to the N. W. It is only inhabited by birds, of which we saw an amazing number on the shore. At eleven the wind heading us, we ran into the Arabian shore, and at noon anchored in a cove, surrounded by high mountains, which rise perpendicular from the sea. Here we found the pilot's brother, and were soon joined by the three other boats. Our fleet now consists but of five boats, the other having been totally separated from us.

This cove is called Maraut by the Arabians, and by our observation, lies in the latitude of  $27^{\circ} 3'$  north. We have reason to think that Ras, or Cape Sellah, which is laid down in the charts in  $27^{\circ}$  north, is twenty miles to the southward, and the land in  $27^{\circ}$  does not form a cape. We have our pilot's authority, as well as our own observation, for this remark.

Towards the evening some natives came down, with about a dozen camels loaded with water. We were at too great a distance to be in danger of a surprize, and sent our people ashore to replenish our casks, which, with all our care, began to be low. Here we likewise provided ourselves with firewood; and are told there is a spring of water near the beach, which is the first we have met with on this coast. It is, however, so very brackish, that nothing but necessity could induce any one to drink it. Our nokidah returned, with a branch of a very fragrant shrub. It grows wild among the rocks, and differs in appearance and smell, from any species that we know of. The vicinity of the natives made us double our watch during the night, which was calmer than usual.

THURSDAY, 3d JULY.

We got under way at day-break, with little or no wind; but with our oars, we made a shift to creep on at the rate of a knot an hour. The four boats in company. At 9 A. M. the wind came from the N. N. W. with which we made a stretch out to sea. We soon found that we could make nothing of it, and at ten we tacked and stood into the land. We saw an island ahead about four leagues to the northward, which we take to be the island of Sufcha, as our chart names it, though our pilot calls it Shaur. By our observation at noon, we were in the latitude of  $27^{\circ} 9'$  north. Our run to-day has been through deep and clear water, and as we have not observed any reefs or shoals without us, we have reason to think a ship might stand close into the Arabian coast in this latitude. This is, in fact, but a matter of opinion, founded upon such evidence, as the reader has before him. We are neither masters of our time, nor the motions of our vessel, vessel, and our remarks can only arise from a superficial view of things.

At 1 P. M. we anchored under a point of land on the main, which we take, by our reckoning, to be in the latitude of  $27^{\circ} 12'$  north. From hence we saw another island, bearing to the westward of Shaur. We are now approaching to the scenes of danger, with which we have been so long amused by our Arabs; and have some hopes that we shall not be awaked to the reality of our apprehensions. We were soon joined by the rest of our little fleet. The wind blew from the N. W. during the day, but very moderately.

Towards the close of the evening, we discovered a couple of women and some camels in the country, with the help of our glasses. This was sufficient to put us more upon our guard, to prevent our being surprized by these roving tribes. There were calms and light airs from the northward, for the first part of the night.

FRIDAY, 4th JULY.

We weighed at one A. M. with a light breeze from the land, in company with the other boats. At six a fine breeze sprung up from the S. E. with which we stood along the Arabian coast. At eight we ran by the island of Shaur or Suscha, whose shores are very steep, and resemble decayed walls at a distance. This island is about two leagues in length, length, lies about two leagues from the main, and by our reckoning, is in the latitude of  $27^{\circ} 20'$  N. A reef of breakers extend from the island to the N. W. on which we saw the wreck of the annual Judda ship, said to have been lost here in a gale of wind in the year 1774, on her way to Suez. Her stem and stern, and many of her ribs, still appear above the water, and pronounce her to have been of prodigious magnitude. Indeed, the accounts of this Arabian galleon's burden, are so extravagant, that it might seem to offend credibility to repeat them. I shall only observe, that she sails from Judda in the month of March, and by following the track which we have gone, as near as possible, she is generally fifty days, or two months, on her voyage to Suez: and, as it has happened this year, from some accident or other, she sometimes gets no further than Tor. To fail in the performance of so short a voyage, in the most favorable season of the year, would be an inexplicable circumstance to a mariner, unacquainted with the navigation of this extraordinary coast. To us, who are no strangers to the course, the wonder is, how a vessel of her great burden and unwieldy structure, can accomplish the passage at all.

At 10 A. M. the wind hauled round to the westward, and we stood N. N. W. until eleven, when all the fleet bore away for the land. After we had passed the island of Shaur, an ugly swell came tumbling upon us from the N. W. Our run to-day was through shallow water, until we reached Shaur; but we found very deep water between the island and the main. At noon we anchored under a reef of rocks, above two miles from the Arabian coast. Latitude, per observation,  $27^{\circ} 28'$  N. There is a prodigious high mountain inland, some leagues to the northward of us, on the top of which are two remarkable spires, that resemble a bull's horns. We saw a fire ashore, but no people. The wind was W. all day, and part of the night.
to-day

S A T U R D A Y, 5th JULY.

We weighed before one this morning, with a light breeze from the land. The other boats were in company. At day-break the wind came round to the S. E. with which we stood along the shore. There was an heavy swell from the N. W. which considerably impeded our progress. Our run to-day was through clear and deep water. We looked out ahead for Mount Sinai, and stood on until noon, when the wind shifting to the westward, we tacked, and the whole fleet stood into the land. Our latitude, per observation, was  $27^{\circ} 49'$  N. We now discovered a large town ahead, which our Arabs call Moilah. There is little doubt but it is the same place, which our chart erroneously lays down in  $27^{\circ}$  N. about 50 miles to the southward. We saw an island to the N. W. which our pilot tells us is Sanafir. At 1 P. M. we plainly discerned cerned the high land, which we take to be adjacent to Cape Mahomet, bearing W. N. W. At three the wind veering round to the W. the whole fleet anchored within a reef of rocks to the northward of Moilah, and about one league and an half from the shore.

The mountain mentioned yesterday with the remarkable top, lies behind this town, which appears through our glaffes to be a regular fortification, of a square figure. Our nokidah gives the inhabitants a very bad character, and tells us a story of their recently seizing, and plundering a Judda boat, which put into the road through stress of weather. At sun-set, the shore to the N. of the gulf of Akaba bore W. by N. Cape Mahomet we take to bear due west, as we have entered the gulf. By our reckoning this reef is in the latitude of  $27^{\circ} 58'$  N. The wind continued at W. the remainder of the day.

When the evening closed in, all the boats run out into six fathom water, on account of the vicinity of Moilah, of which place our Arabs have a very unfavorable opinion. After it was dark, we saw many fires on the Arabian shore, but every thing remained quiet during the night. The wind inclined towards the southward.

SUNDAY,

SUNDAY, 6th JULY.

We got under way at two this morning, in company with the other boats, with the wind from the S. S. W. At day-break we saw the island of Sanafir, bearing W. by N. at the distance of four leagues and upwards. There are breakers without us, which probably extend, with little interruption, from the island of Shaur to Sanafir. At 10 A. M. we came up with the latter island, and came to, under it, to wait for some boats which sail worse than ours. This island is nothing but a high barren rock, and lies in the latitude of  $28^{\circ} 3' N.$  We saw a turtle-shell on the beach, but could not procure a turtle here, or in any of the islands we have passed. At half past ten we stood to the northward, in company with the whole fleet, and on opening a strait that divides this island into two parts, we discovered two boats at anchor under the land. On their perceiving us; they immediately got under sail, stood towards us for a time, then slackened their sail, and after having amused us for an hour and more, ran back into their former station. By these manœuvres we concluded them to be pirates, which was confirmed by their not answering the signals, which were made them by the rear of our fleet. Our numbers only prevented their engaging us, and our Arabs bade us expect to fall in with more vessels of this kind.

The shore of Sanafir is very bold, and would admit of a large ship running close to it.

At noon we saw the island of Tiran bearing due west, and the island of Barkan N. W. The wind was still at S. S. W. when we bore away for the island of Barkan. These islands are both laid down too far to the southward in the charts, as is the coast adjacent to Cape Mahomet. Latitude, per observation,  $28^{\circ} 7' N$ . At 2 P. M. the whole fleet anchored in a cove at Barkan. By running so deep into this gulf, we could not stand with this wind for Cape Mahomet, which must bear S. W. of this island. We have here obtained a convincing proof of the necessity, which boats are under to sail in fleets on this coast. Not more than five months ago, four boats from Suez to Judda, were plundered at this very island of Barkan by pirates, and some Greek and Turkish passengers cut off by these barbarians. This story was confirmed by the testimony of some of our servants, who were ashore, and saw quantities of wheat and coffee scattered about the beach. The wind hauled round to the S. E. at sun-set, but we did not move, the passage to the Cape being too hazardous, we find, to risk in the dark. We were induced, from concurrent circumstances, to double our watch during the night; the best part of which the wind was from the southward.

MONDAY, 7th JULY.

We weighed at four this morning, in company with the other boats, with a light breeze from the S. E. At day-break saw a vessel some leagues to the southward, standing as we did. At ten o'clock passed an island within three leagues of the main, which our pilot tells us, is Tiran. This information much surprized us, as in our chart, Tiran lies some leagues to the southward of Cape Mahomet, whereas, by our reckoning, this island lies in  $28^{\circ} 15'$ , which is considerably to the northward of the given latitude of the Cape. There is indeed an head-land to the northward of this island, which we took for Cape Mahomet; but our pilot tells us, that the Cape bears S. W. of us, at the distance of seven or eight leagues. By our run yesterday and to-day, the coast from the Cape to the top of the gulf of Akaba, runs nearly N. and S. though our chart lays it down two points more westerly. This is not the only mistake. This gulf is twice as broad as the chart makes it, or we have been sailing on dry ground the whole day. Latitude, per observation,  $28^{\circ} 14' N$ .

At 1 P. M. the wind hauled round to the S. W. and all the fleet bore away to a reef of rocks that we had before past, and anchored under them, within 3 or 4 leagues of the main. It is a mortification to us indeed, to be baffled in doubling the Cape with a wind, which we have so anxiously wished for, and which is become foul instead of being fair, by our having run up so high into this gulf, when we might have stood over direct from Moilah to Cape Mahomet.

At sun-set the wind, to our great joy, came round to the E. S. E. as it induced the whole fleet to get under sail, which we had never before done at night. In weighing her anchor, the largest boat among us was near driving upon the rocks. The wind blew fresh upon them, and it is probable she would have been stranded in a few minutes, had not one of our people swam off to her in time with a rope, with which we towed her out of the danger that threatened her. By the advice of our nokidah, we primed our fire-arms anew, and sat up the whole night, to be the better prepared for the reception of the pirates, who, he assures us, are accustomed to lurk in great numbers about Cape Mahomet. This was doubtless a troublesome circumstance, but our minds were so taken up with our approach to the gulf of Suez, that there was not room left for disagreeable reflections. With the present wind we were in hopes of making the harbor of Tor some time to-morrow, and if a chance then appeared of our having a tedious passage by water, we resolved to proceed by land to Suez, as captain Dibdin's officers had purposed to do, which the removing of the cargo of the Judda ship would, in all likelihood, afford us a good opportunity of effecting. The night was serene, and we stood on with the coast under an easy sail.

T U E S D A Y, 8th JULY.

About two this morning the wind shifted to the N. N. W. and we stood to the westward, at the rate of three knots an hour. We have left the reef of rocks behind us, or our Arabs would not go on so boldly on a foul coast. Just before day-break we laid down to take a short nap after our watching. By 7 A. M. we were awake, and upon enquiring for Cape Mahomet, were much surprized when the pilot pointed it out to us, bearing to the southward of us at the distance of twelve or fourteen leagues. Our disappointment was great at this information. We expected to have rounded the Cape before this, and had recourse to our chart, which only plunged us into fresh perplexity. We could only solve the difficulty by supposing, that we had gone much higher up the gulf of Akaba than we imagined; and were now obliged to stand to the southward, in order to double the Cape. At eight we opened a gulf, which they tell us, is the gulf of Akaba, and the head-land which we have come round, and took yesterday to be Cape Mahomet, must be the true island of Tiran. This coast has been bolder than any other we have passed; and what is remarkable,

we did not see a shoal or breaker, the whole morning.

Our latitude, per observation, was  $27^{\circ} 42' N.$  We were above half a degree to the southward of yesterday, and this tended to convince us, that we had been much deeper in the gulf of Akaba than we suspected. We stood W. and sometimes W. by S. as the wind permitted. At 1 P. M. we saw two sail to the southward, one of which our pilot supposes to have been the large boat, which parted company with us long since. At two the wind shifted again to the southward, and all the fleet bore away for the land to the westward of us. At five we anchored under a rocky island, within a league of the main, where we found a strange boat at anchor. None of the fleet, but the pilot's brother, fetched this island besides; but we are told they will easily join us when the wind changes. Our vexation is infinite, that our situation will not admit of our taking advantage of a southerly wind. When we have doubled the Cape, we may look for this wind in vain. The pilot points it out to us, at the distance of three or four leagues, and talks of getting to Tor in the morning.

Just as the sun set behind the coast we were upon, the mariners of the strange boat observed a couple of turtles, swimming from the reef we lie on, and immediately rowed out to sea after them. It is common to turn these animals upon their backs, when they are asleep on the surface of the water; but it was a new thing to us, to see them

taken when awake, in their own element. We could not but laugh at the attempt, but we had soon reason to condemn our own incredulity. The dexterity of the Arabs was equal to it. One of them jumped out of the boat with a rope in his hand, pursued, overtook, and after a struggle under water, fastened a hook to the head of the largest turtle in four fathom. It was, with equal facility, run up into the boat, and brought in triumph on board our vessel. This creature weighs about two hundred weight, and will furnish a plentiful meal for the whole fleet. The wind kept to the south most of the night.

WEDNESDAY, 9th JULY.

The other boats came up to us at two this morning, when we weighed with a fine breeze from the N. W. At three the gale encreased so much, as to send us at the rate of six knots an hour. This made us uneasy, as we doubted the possibility of doubling the Cape. When the day broke, we saw high land to our right, which we still took to be the Arabian coast; as we had not, to our knowledge, parted with it. But as the sun rose, we were not a little astonished at his situation, which was quite the reverse of what it used to be. We lost no time in calling upon the pilot, to explain this phenomenon. He replied without emotion, that we had passed the Cape during the night, and that

Tor itself was a considerable way behind us. We had no compass on board, but from the sun's position, we were certain that we were going to the southward. We could not divine the reason of this, except that the bay in which Tor lies, was deeper than the chart describes it. This idea satisfied us for awhile; and under this delusion we stood on at the same rate, sometimes doubting the fidelity of our Arabs, and sometimes hoping that we were in the right course.

But we were at length awakened to a conviction of our suspicions. By our observation at noon, we found ourselves to be in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 35' N.$  which is above a degree to the southward of what we were yesterday. The deceit was too glaring, to be further concealed from us. We had been looking out the whole morning for the Egyptian shore, as the gulf of Suez is not reckoned to be ten leagues in breadth. We were instantly ascertained that we were upon the Egyptian shore. It now struck us, that our boat was originally bound for Cosire, and that the vizier of Yambo had put us on board of her, for the sake of reserving the major part of the freight to himself, which he actually did reserve, by the confession of the nokidah during the passage. So that we got to Cairo, he did not care by what route. He had performed the Xerif's orders, in dispatching us from Yambo, and as there is a frequented track from Cosire to Cairo by the river Nile, it is a sufficient reserve for the conscience of an Arab. The vizier had often pressed us to go by the way of Cosire, which we had as often rejected, from the idea of its being a more uncommon and dangerous road, than that by Suez; and as we were not compliant, he had thus tricked us into what we had determined to avoid.

In this persuasion, we charged our nokidah and pilot with perfidy, and informed them, to their utter astonishment, that the shore before us, was the Egyptian, and that we were not many miles distant from Cosire. Their ideas of navigation are entirely confined to the headlands and shoals, which lie upon the coast; and to obtain a knowledge of our situation from the quadrant, was as new, as it was unintelligible to them. Their fear, however, of our resentment, made these fellows at first persist, that we were bound for Suez; to which falsehood they attested by swearing by their beards; an oath the most sacred to Mussulmen. But what perjuries will not fear lead mankind into? Their notions of Europeans taught them to dread a detection of their behavior. Their ignorance gave them hopes of imposing this place upon us for Suez; and they apprehended that their lives would be the forfeit of a premature discovery. It was now plain, that they had taken the advantage of the night before last, to run over to the Egyptian coast. They had never before sailed in the dark, and they artfully contrived to deceive us, under cover of the night. All our difficulties were now solved. We had been led to mistake the gulf of
Suez

Suez yesterday, for that of Akaba. It was directly astern of us when we awoke; and we did not discover that we had made a new shore. We had not at that time, the most distant imagination of the treachery which was intended us. We were puzzled, indeed, to account for the course we kept; but the situation of the coast might oblige us to change our direction; and the assurances of the Arabs of our being near the Cape, perfectly lulled us into a fatal security.

The pen would convey but a lifeless picture of our feelings in this important crisis. A thousand circumstances crowded upon our minds, to evince the cheat which had been put upon us. Several boats had left Yambo for Cofire, preceding our departure; and we had been informed, that all boats bound for Cofire, were obliged to make Cape Mahomet at this season, before they stretched over to the Egyptian shore. The boats that we had joined, were actually those bound for Cofire; and we had sailed with them for above three weeks, under the belief of their being destined for Suez. It is not so wonderful, that incidents of this nature should have escaped our notice. We mixed but little with the Arabs, and were such strangers to their language, that there was no occasion for their being upon their guard when they conversed before us. But Ibrahim, our interpreter, had no such excuse for his want of discernment. Moments there doubtless were, when he might have suspected their design, if they had address enough to conceal it partly from him. We have no doubts of his honesty; but from the simplicity he has betrayed in this matter, draw but a bad omen of his services in the enterprize before us. It is too late to hesitate upon the step we are to take. Resistance is equally absurd and vain. Necessity, with all the force of a vortex, impels us forward. We cannot pretend to carry the boat to Suez, contrary to the inclinations of our mariners, and against the northerly monsoon. We know Cosire to be under the Turkish government, and immediately dependent on Cairo; and we have the vizier's pass, to afford us a safe-conduct to that place. We have no doubt of the virtue of this pass, however we have been deceived by the person who gave it. He had the Xerif's order to forward us to Suez; and after he has so materially benefited by our purses, we give him credit for an inclination to serve us, by the means of his master's signet, which we know to be respected in all Mahometan regions.

Our minds were somewhat relieved by these reflexions. We partook of the turtle at dinner with apparent cheerfulness; and even went so far, as to adopt their own measures, and express to the Arabs our indifference, in regard to the port we were going to. In this disposition we made the mosque of Cosire, without any other emotions, than what disappointment naturally excites in the human breast. The toils and dangers which we had undergone, envenomed the stings of that disappointment; and after a month's endeavors, we found ourselves ourselves nearly in the same situation, as when we set out from Yambo: not, indeed, so far removed from Suez, but infinitely in more uncertainty and distress.

At 7 in the evening we anchored in the harbor of Cosire; and find by the distance which we have run, that the island we remained at last night, was that of Shadwan, well known to the English vessels which trade from India to Suez. As soon as it was dark, the nokidah went ashore, to advise the commandant of our arrival; and to interest him, as he assured us, in our behalf. To confess the truth, we had not the prospect of passing the most agreeable night. Our fortune was wrapped up in doubt, dark as the shades which enveloped the creation; and we anxiously looked for the returning light, to dispel the obscurity of the scene!

Thus, Madam, have I at length conducted you to Cosire, instead of the promised port of Suez. In pursuing the course of this narrative, you have been subjected, like the principal characters, to the inconstancy of fortune; who, in imitation of the light ones of the sex, finds a pleasure in deceiving those the most who aspire to the favor of her smiles. I have frequently had occasion to dissent against the well-known proverb of the Romans, "Fortune favors favors the brave," though I am far from pretending, that the undertakers of this voyage, are an instance of its fallacy. The fatigues that we have endured in a month's cruize in an open boat, during the hottest season of the Eastern year, and the dangers that we have ran in exploring a wild and piratical coast, were well encountered for the end we had in view. True fortitude is exalted by opposition, and, like the fabled Antæus, rises with fresh vigor from successive overthrows. The present moments, when our reception at this place, nay, our very safety, is precarious, are critical indeed, and teem with events, that may awaken curiosity, and excite the susceptible breast to regret the unseasonable interruption of this narrative.

If the foregoing sheets have the good fortune to meet with your approbation—if they are adjudged to contain the unstudied touches of nature, and interest the public in the fate of three unlucky travellers—I shall be tempted to renew the thread of our adventures, and recount the most remarkable occurrences of our journey from Cosire to Alexandria. The novelty of the track will engage the reader, where business is deficient; nor can he wholly be at a loss for amusement, in a region so untrodden, on a river so celebrated as the Nile!

It is a received maxim, that there is no incident in a man's life, but from which he may derive some instruction. If I have reaped any advantage from the late scenes I have been engaged in, it is a stock of philosophy, which has cost me no little pains in the acquisition; and will, I trust, prove sufficient to support me in any trial, to which the lot of humanity may hereafter subject me. But to my own sufferings may my indifference be confined! When I separate my concerns from those of my fellow-creatures; when I become deaf to the call of distress; or behold, unmoved, the tear of contrition, may I be rejected by the more enlightened class of society, and chiefly by her, who is one of its first and brightest ornaments!

I have the honor to be,

M A D A M,

TO prove as good as one's word is the province of every honest man, but more particularly will it be expected where inclination and duty go hand-in-hand. Whatever may be the fate of my former letter, the specious name of honor will insure the performance of my promise, and lead me into error under a mistaken notion of things. The man of honor submits his better judgment to the opinion of the multitude, and sacrifices his friend's life, or his own, to extend his reputation. In like manner the author is betrayed by the secret impulses of vanity, and is so tenacious of the empty applauses of the croud, as to be still risking what little fame he may have acquired, in the pursuit of more. But you, Madam, have to answer for this transgression, and, though innocent of the intention, are unhappily the cause of a poor author adding to the number of his sins. There is doubtless matter enough in the pages which he has the honor to submit to your perusal; but in respect to the manner, he only wishes he was possessed of your talent to excuse it to the world.

There

There is a regret mingled with the pleasure I feel in retracing my progress through a land, which has been renowned from the earliest times, and is replete with the noblest ruins of antiquity. Which gave birth to Cleopatra, and contains the ashes of Alexander! From whence music boasts its divine origin, and on whose mythology Homer formed the grounds of his immortal work! The parent of science! the nurse of heroes! and the monument, alas! of decayed greatness! Too severe, O Egypt! has been thy lot; too severe an example dost thou afford of the instability of human glory. It is in thy school that the proud should learn humility, the atheist religion; more instruction will he gain in the review of thy fortune, than from the dreams of philosophers or the lessons of divines. Here will he see the invincible Sesostris vanquished in his posterity; the public works through which he meant to hand down his name to latest ages, yielded to the conqueror, Time; and his once potent empire divided by the sword of infidels!—The sublime imagery of Shakespear rushes to my mind on the contemplation of this awful scene,

“ The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces,

“ The solemn temples, the great globe itself,

“ Yea, all which it inherits, shall dissolve,”

The productions of art every where bear humiliating marks of the rage of barbarians; and learning

ing has been banished by the votaries of ignorance and superstition. Where freedom smiled; where the Loves and Muses sported in peace, the Nile either rolls his stream through solitary plains, or washes a bank, stained with native blood, and cloathed with the verdant but obvious badge of slavery.

For the sake of a more familiar stile, I have preserved the form of a diary in the following narrative. I detest formality, and would sacrifice a well-turned period for the appearance of ease. The reader who looks for connected accounts, Ciceroian epithets, and polished expressions, in these rambling pages, will be greatly mistaken in the intention of the author; whose highest aim is to amuse the curious, and to touch the humane. Loose hints, concise descriptions, and unstudied details, sum up the chief parts of a work, which is merely published to promote the interests of humanity, and to afford a caution to the unwary traveller. There is one thing which he has most reason to fear will be objected to it, and that is, the want of the marvellous and surprizing, in a region so involved among the fables of antiquity.

T H U R S D A Y, 10th JULY.

Cosire\* is situated in  $26^{\circ} 20'$  north latitude, and is the southernmost port on the coast of Egypt. It has \* " Al Koffir lies from Saraken 136 leagues, and in the latitude of  $26^{\circ} 15'$ , as Don John found by two observations. It has been a place of great note, and is still considerable for the exportation of grain to Arabia, which was seated formerly two leagues higher on the coast, but for want of a port capable of the great resort of shipping, it was removed higher. There are still some remains of the antient town, which is called Old Al Kossir (supposed to be the antient Berenicè). The new town is very small: the houses like the yards cattle are kept in, although there is no kind of cattle in the place. They are built of stone and clay, or sometimes only fods, covered at top with mats or the like; more, as they said, to keep off the sun than the rain, which seldom falls.

“ The port is the worst on all the coasts, and the only place that wanted fish, which every where else abound. ’Tis very large, and exceeding subject to easterly winds. The ships anchor between the land and some small shoals, whereon the sea breaks. Near the town are three wells of water, whereof the people drink, tho’ scarce to be distinguished from salt water. The place is quite encompassed with barren, piked mountains scorched black with the sun, which, together with the barrenness of the soil, makes a most uncomfortable prospect. For there grows no manner of herb, grass, bush, or tree, on either the coast, the plains, or mountains; and whatever ground may lie between the hills and the town, is a barren sand, intermixed with gravel.

“ The extraordinary barrenness of the place made Don John curious to enquire of the most understanding Moors, how they came to pitch on such a miserable situation to inhabit. The reason, they said, was because it happened to be the nearest port to the river Nile, 15 or 16 (rather 3 or 4) day’s journey distant, and so most convenient for lodging the provisions, with which all the towns on this coast are supplied by their respective ships. Egypt, they said, was one continued plain, and the most fruitful in the world in cattle, horses, cameis, and grain, and that the last was carried up the Nile to a place nearest Al Kossir, and thence carried by land to this port. That the caravans which is brought in the caravan from the Nile. There is a prodigious high range of mountains behind it, which are an exact counterpart to those on the Arabian side; through these mountains is the road to the Nile. The harbor is defended to the northward by a reef of rocks, which stretch about a mile into the sea; and to the southward and westward, the land forms it into the shape of a crescent. Here is water for ships of burden; but without a pilot, they could not venture into the basin. The fort of Cosire stands upon a rising ground; and is a square building of about four hundred yards in circumference. It was formerly strong enough, to have withstood a regular attack; the walls being of stone, and raised to a considerable height. But at present, it is in a defenceless state; the breaches vans were often attacked in the way by the Bulwis (Buddoos) who sometimes assaulted Al Kossir itself, which obliged them, for their security, to build their houses with stone and earth. They also told the author, that the name of Egypt was unknown to them, but that all the country from Al Kossir and a great way behind to Alexandria, was called Riffa."

Extract of a Journal from Goa to Suez, ann. 1540.

Written by Don Juan de Castro (afterwards viceroy of India) captain in the fleet under Don Stefana de Gama. Coll. Voy. vol. iii. p. 107.

The author has quoted the foregoing passage to shew the similar state of this port and coast near two centuries and an half ago, to that of the present day. The navigator knew not the real distance between the river and coast; nor that Ul Riff signifies a great bank, which occasions Upper Egypt to be called Riff Ul Nile, because inhabited only on the banks of that river.

which time has made in it, being repaired with mud-work, and not more than three dismantled pieces of cannon left to protect it. The town itself is in a more miserable condition. Of all the numerous houses which once reared their heads here, nothing but their walls are standing; and of the mosques, which good Mussulmen esteem beyond all other edifices, but the remains of two now can be discerned, and one of these bowed almost to the ground. The reader is here presented with a view of a place, so new to observation. It is a matter of conjecture whether, in fifty years hence, there will be any traces of habitations on a spot, which at this moment exhibits only the outlines of them. But if the town displays so unfavorable an appearance, it falls infinitely short of the dreary aspect of the country around it. So far from a tree being in sight, the eye cannot catch a verdant spot, whether it surveys the mountains within, or the plain that stretches along the sea-shore. And this desert is the barrier to the celebrated and fertile land of Upper Egypt!

At 7 o'clock the principal Turk and two Arabs came on board the boat, to invite us ashore, and to acquaint us that there was a house provided for our reception. We had passed but an uncomfortable night, and were overjoyed to be relieved from our suspense, by so polite an invitation. We readily accepted of it, and ourselves and our baggage were conveyed to the house appointed for us; which, though the best in the town, was little better than an English barn. Here we were received by an Arab of distinction, whom we found to be the son of the Arabian shaik or prince of the district, who was absent on an excursion to the Nile. Though the garrison of the fort of Cosire is under the command of a Turkish officer, appointed by the bey of Cairo, the government of the city and the commerce of the port, are entirely in the hands of the Arabs; to the chief of whom we are recommended by the vizier of Yambo. This is a piece of intelligence which we have learnt from the nokidah of our boat, and indeed, the vizier could do no less, to atone for his treachery towards us. The young man very politely supplied his father's place, and informed us, it was his intention to accompany us to the Nile, as soon as the caravan, which was daily expected, should arrive from thence. This he considered as the least dangerous and expensive mode of travelling; as a few camels would require a guard, and run more risk of an attack from the banditti which infest the mountains of Upper Egypt. With these plausible reasons we are obliged to acquiesce, though the delays we undergo are not the smallest mortifications we meet with. Our room was crowded the whole day with visitors, whose curiosity led them to view us. Europeans they might have seen here in disguise, but the habit which we wore was evidently new and surprizing to them. Among these people there were two Christians, who appeared much rejoiced to see us, and presented us with a dish of rusks, which were very light and palatable. They are clothed in the Arabian dress, which we likewise intend to assume when we set out on our journey, not only to avoid the inquisitive and illiberal temper of the natives, but for the sake of coolness. The loose and light vestments of the oriental nations are admirably adapted to the nature of their climate; and the numerous folds of the muslin turban, are the best invented defence against the burning rays of a vertical sun.

F R I D A Y, 11th JULY.

We had company, as yesterday, to pay us their compliments this morning, for which we are as much indebted to the indolence of temper, as to the politeness of the Arabs. If we except their hours of devotion, they have no other way of passing their time than in visits of ceremony. Books are entirely neglected by them, except those of a religious turn; and which are more calculated to infuse the gloom of superstition into the mind of a Mussulman, than to afford amusement. Poetry itself, which seems to have sprung from the pastoral regions of Arabia, is no longer courted nor acknowledged by this degenerate race; and the names of their poets are more honored and known in Europe than in Asia. Strange as this assertion may appear, there is nothing more certain than the truth of it; and it cannot be disputed, that the propagation pagation of a novel and bigotted faith, has been always attended with the same melancholy effects in every part of the globe. The blindness of zeal destroys every thing that is not intimately connected with the object of its pursuit; and the high-priests of a new-fangled doctrine, are the Goths and Vandals of the age, who overturn the altars dedicated to the arts and sciences.

Another Christian accompanied those who paid us a visit yesterday, and we learn, to our great satisfaction, that they are waiting for the caravan which is to convey us to the Nile. There is an inexpressible pleasure in meeting with those of our own religion in a foreign land, and especially where the difference of opinion is sufficient to occasion the worst of treatment to a traveller. But it is universally acknowledged, that Christians have greater privileges, and experience better usage in Egypt, than in any other part of Turkey. Governed by her own beys, and but nominally dependant on the Porte, she deviates wholly from the false system which subsists in the Ottoman politics; and studies her own interest in the favor she shews to Christianity. Too supine for study, and too proud for labor, the Mahometan resigns the pen and plough to the industrious Christian. But for this despised tribe, the wheels of government would stand still, and the Nile would yearly fatten his banks in vain. The mechanics, as well as husbandmen, are of this persuasion; and the secretaries, as well as most of the confidential officers of the great and petty princes of Egypt, profess the Christian tenets.

The Turkish commandant has just sent to acquaint us, by our nokidah, that it is customary to search the baggage of travellers, that the duties of the port may be levied on any merchandize they possess. Though we assured them that we were fitted out, not as merchants, but as travellers, we could have no objection to a practice so usual in all places. In the evening, therefore, we were visited by some of the principal people, to whom we opened our trunks; and can say, that the scrutiny was less rigid, and conducted with more decency, than in many of the custom-houses of Europe. While these gentry were drinking coffee with us, at sun-set intelligence was brought us of the caravan's approach, which afforded us no inconsiderable pleasure. The young shaik was informed of his father's arrival, and hastened to receive him. We soon learnt that only a part of the caravan was come with the Arabian shaik; who sent us his compliments, and excuses for not waiting on us, being fatigued with the journey. He promised to visit us early in the morning, to provide us with camels, and to adjust the œconomy of our expedition by the return of the caravan, which would certainly be here in a few days. If we encounter no further delays, we shall not repine at being betrayed into this route, which is new, and may afford us matter of curious speculation. As the wind also continues

nues to blow from the N. W. quarter, we can the more easily give credit to our nokidah, who assures us, that our boat would not have gotten to Suez this month to come, and that the season alone prevented our being carried to Suez agreeably to our desire. As this fellow seems very earnest to serve us, and has promised to remain here until we depart for the Nile, we the more readily forget the trick he played us, which the apprehensions of the vizier's resentment might induce him to commit. That titled villain has principally benefited by our misfortunes; and, were this last evil necessary to fill up the measure of them, instead of paying the enormous sum of 650 dollars for our passage to Cosire, we might have been transported here at a trifling expence, on any of the numerous boats that trade between Yambo and this place.

SATURDAY, 12th JULY.

We were surprized this morning with an early visit from the Arabian shaik, attended by the chief people of the town. He is an elderly man, of a good countenance and a polite address, and in every respect answers to the idea which an European would form of one of these leaders. He confirmed the tenders of service, and promises of protection, made us by his son; and seemed willing to dispatch us immediately to the Nile with the few camels he had here, provided we were content to leave leave our baggage behind, to be sent after us by the great caravan. Though our living on the Nile until our baggage came up, would be more agreeable in respect to the situation, and the cheapness of provision, when compared with this place, we determined to wait for the caravan, which we now found was not expected these eight days. And this not only on account of security, but as it appeared to be the wish of the shaik, who declared his intention of accompanying us himself, or putting us under the protection of his son during the journey. When this point was settled, we requested the shaik to furnish us with a camel to carry a letter to the Nile, from thence to be forwarded to the India Company's agent at Cairo, that he might be advised of our arrival in these parts. To this the shaik cheerfully consented, and we addressed the following letter to Mr. Baldwin, and delivered it to the Arab.

To GEORGE BALDWIN, Esq.

“ SIR,

“ We take the liberty to acquaint you of our arrival at this place on the 10th instant. A concurrence of accidents has obliged us to undertake this uncommon route, although it was our intention to have proceeded to Cairo by the way of Suez. As we are charged with dispatches of the utmost consequence from the president of Madras

to the Court of Directors, we flatter ourselves, that this circumstance will be a further inducement to your humanity, to interest yourself with the bey of Cairo * in our behalf, that he may immediately issue passes to Ghinnah and Jirje, for our better security in going down the Nile. We have a protection from the vizier of Yambo to the Arab shaik of this district, who has treated us with great civility, and promises to send us to the Nile, under charge of his son, by the return of the caravan, which is expected here in a few days. It is with his assistance that we are enabled to forward you this intelligence of our situation. When we have the pleasure, Sir, of seeing you at Cairo, we shall do ourselves the honor to deliver the letters we are charged with to your address, which we consider of too much importance to you to be trusted to this conveyance.

“ In the hopes of meeting with you in a short time, and of expressing our sense of the services which your influence in this country may afford us, we remain,

S I R,

Your very obedient, &c.”

“ Cosire, on the coast of Upper Egypt,
12th July, 1777.”

* This bey is emphatically called Sbaik Elbalad, or chief of the beys of Egypt.

When the shaik and his courtiers had taken their leave, we had a continual levee the whole morning, and the durbar of an eastern prince could not be more crowded than our apartments. We treated our visitors with coffee only, as it is the custom of the country for every one to carry his principal entertainment about with him, which is the pipe. It supplies the place of meat and drink, and even thought itself; though they tell you here, that the pipe is the best friend imaginable to meditation. Be this as it may, the Arabs do not seem to benefit by it in this respect; though never did I see a passion carried to such excess as this.

At noon the young shaik accompanied us in a walk about the town, and as we passed the fort, we were saluted with one gun: a compliment for which we made a small donation to the gunner. In this excursion we gathered nothing, but a nearer view of the poverty of the people, and the dreary face of the country. At our return home we had another visit from the shaik, to acquaint us, that the carriage of a letter to Cairo would be very heavy, and that we might as well omit sending it. When he named 60 dollars for the trouble, we were not a little startled at the sum, and should have been well inclined to drop the matter, had we not held it of great moment to our concerns. We declined, however, giving such an extravagant price, for what we told the shaik was of little consequence in itself. He was called away by some business in the midst of this conference, and our

nokidah offered to follow him, and to bring him to reason in his demand. The fellow accordingly went on this embassy to the shaik, who consented at length to take 20 dollars for the dispatch of the letter. The money was immediately advanced, and the camel was that night sent off to the Nile, if any reliance could be placed on the word of an Arab. The attempt to impose on us in a charge of this kind, was only considered by us as an essay on the strength of our purses; and we are in hopes, from our having lowered them so considerably in their prices, that we shall be less liable to imposition, in our future dealings with the natives of Egypt.

Our evening, as usual, was passed in receiving company, among whom we saw several people who were to be our fellow-travellers. There was a merchant, in particular, who was very intelligent, and offered to accommodate us with his house, on our arrival at Ghinnah, a large city on the Nile, to which the caravan is to carry us. He tells us, to our great satisfaction, that we shall find no difficulty in procuring boats for our passage down the Nile; and that at the easy expence of 25 dollars. So that our money holds out to Cairo, we must be content to pay for every inch of the road, through this strange and remote country. We have been obliged to make several little presents to the great people already; but these have been confined to pieces of Indian handkerchiefs, and bottles of European liquors. These the Turkish commandant carried away under his garment, with all the gravity peculiar to his nation; and, to heighten the joke, he was pleased to let the spirits pass under the denomination of physic.

The weather here is remarkably pleasant for this time of the year. This must be owing to the prevalence of the northerly winds, that blow across the Red-Sea to this coast. Neither are the dews so heavy and troublesome, as we found them on the shores of Arabia. A lucky circumstance to travellers, who have been so long accustomed to the magnificent and spacious canopy of the sky, that they cannot sleep within doors, or be confined beneath the low and contracted roof of a chamber. We have a good yard belonging to the house, where we pass the nights.

SUNDAY, 13th JULY.

Our charges are considerably augmented by the price of water, which is become so scarce, that we are at times at a loss for a draught of it. The people here drink of a bad sort, which they bring from a spring at above a league's distance, it not being in their power to pay a quarter of a dollar per skin, for so considerable a necessary of life.

The northerly wind continues to blow so strongly, that we have great reason to think we should have been much longer beating our passage to Suez, than we shall be in getting to Cairo by the route

route we have stumbled upon. The character of our nokidah begins to be again doubtful. After all his promises to stay by us until our departure, and to see us provided with good camels, he came to us this evening with the shaik, and, after a parade of his attachment towards us, pretended to regret the necessity which called him away. He even persuaded the old man to declaim in his behalf; to acquaint us that the letter which the vizier of Yambo had sent by the nokidah, was of the utmost moment to our interest; that we were thereby entitled to the shaik's protection, as far as his life would afford it; and that he hoped we would remember him, now he was about to leave us. Notwithstanding our indignation was roused at the prevarication of this fellow, we did not hold him worth our attention, nor did we chuse to let the shaik into the reason of our desiring his stay. It was our business to appear to place an unlimited confidence in the man, whom chance had made the master of our fates. And indeed he acted very impartially on the occasion, and concluded his harangue, with intreating us to consult our inclinations only, when we fixed on a recompence for the nokidah's services. We thanked him for his goodness, and carelessly added, that we would think on this subject in the morning. There is no doubt but the nokidah's waiting our motions, might be prejudicial to his affairs which summon him to Yambo; but it was our declared intention to have made him a very handsome consideration on this account. To have sent advices to our friends in India of our safety, and of our departure for the Nile, was a matter which we had much at heart. This very fellow had promised to accomplish it. He has undoubtedly forfeited all further pretensions to our favor, so that the present which we give him will be very trifling.

M O N D A Y, 14th JULY.

The greatest part of the morning was spent in a conversation with the nokidah, and in writing a letter to the vizier, in testimony of this fellow's good treatment of us. His conducting us to this place appears to have been more the vizier's crime than his; and, in spite of his recent abuse of our confidence, our distresses had not deprived us of the principle of forgiveness, so far as to permit us to deny him a request of this nature. The safety of his family, who were in the vizier's power, depended, as he assured us, upon our word. The address was extraordinary enough, to a man who had been the primary cause of our misfortunes; and it may be expected that we did not miss the opportunity to give a vent to our indignation. But, irritated as we were against the minister, we disdained even to expostulate with him on his unfair proceedings. We were determined not to afford him matter of triumph, and concealed the effects which his detested policy had been attended with. The letter was expressed in general terms; and we bore witness to the conduct of the nokidah, as far as regarded his attention and respect towards us. With this he seemed better satisfied than with the present we made him. We assigned but ten dollars for himself and the pilot, of whom I have made such frequent mention in the journal of the boat. This was a sufficient mortification to people, whose expectations had been raised by the rewards we promised them on our safe arrival at Suez, and whose ideas of our wealth were so extravagant. The several trifles we had left in the boat amounted to no inconsiderable sum; but the value of these were already forgotten. We were more liberal to the boat's crew, who came at the same time to take leave of us; as they had been the innocent instruments in the execution of the plot, which was devised against us in the town of Yambo.

We perceive a jealousy subsists between the Turk and Arab on our account, which we have no reason to be concerned at. As the presence of the former will prove an infallible check on the motions of the shaik, we shall rather be desirous of fomenting the difference, by paying an equal attention to these chiefs, than, by attaching ourselves to one, run the chance of incurring the resentment of the other. The government of the district is undoubtedly in the hands of the shaik, who holds it from the mandate of the bey of Cairo; and to his influence we must commit ourselves in our journey to the Nile. But the ostensible dignity lies with the Turkish officer, who commands the fort of Cosire in the name of the bey, and is placed here as a spy on the conduct of the shaik. They never meet at our house but by accident; and then nothing but common civility passes between them. The Arab, in particular, is uneasy at the frequent visits of the other, and it is no longer ago than this morning, that he cautioned us to trust to him alone for the supply of our wants. While the Turk, on the other hand, let us this afternoon into the knowledge of every thing we wanted to be informed of. The customary price of camels to the Nile will be but trifling, and we hope, by his means, to escape the impositions which we should otherwise incur from the poverty of the Arabs, who, in many respects, are of no unamiable character. We have found them to be decent in their manners, and temperate in their diet; addicted to no warmth or levity of temper, respectful in the last degree to their parents, charitable in their dispositions, and humane to their dependents: strictly attentive to all the forms of their religion, and wholly unacquainted with the unnatural vices which originated in the East, and have long disgraced the Christian empire. But this assemblage of good qualities is thoroughly tainted by the lust of lucre, which no bounds are forcible enough to restrain. Their command of mind is applied to facilitate the basest purposes of gain, and their pretended sanctity often serves to cover some scheme of fraud. It must be owned, the necessities necessities of people, who almost live in a state of nature, must bear hard on the innate principles of goodness which they may possess; and when the prejudices of their religion, which inculcate the practice of deceit towards Christians, are thrown into the balance, it will not be so much wondered at, that the scale of injustice prevailed against us: that we were so maltreated in Arabia, or that we shall be obliged to win our way through the deserts of Thebaïs to the Nile, by dint of gold.

The young shaik, after his father had left us, took a liking to a very good spying-glass which we had brought with us. As he is likely to be our fellow-traveller, we begged his acceptance of it. At the same time our nokidah came to take his leave; and we parted on good terms, notwithstanding what had passed between us.

T U E S D A Y, 15th J U L Y.

This morning a jar of water was brought to us from the shaik, which had just arrived from the mountains. He had heard us complain yesterday of the want of sweet water, and very politely sent this jar to our house, which had come for his own drinking. We were content to pay three dollars for the carriage, as we set an higher value upon water, in our present circumstances, than if it were wine. We had an early visit from the old man, to whom we presented a piece of Indian chintz for his women. Had we been apprized of our going this road, we might have brought numberless trifles from our vessel, which would have appeared of some estimation in the eyes of a people, to whom all foreign articles have the charms of novelty. This man however has seen more of the world than the generality of his countrymen. He has been twice at Constantinople; and at Alexandria, he tells us, he went on board an English man of war of sixty guns, from which he seems to have derived an high idea of the power and dignity of the British nation. He has been comforting us with the hopes of the caravan's not exceeding the time appointed for its appearance; which now approaches, to our great satisfaction. There is nothing to be seen here but sea, mountain, and sky; and we long to be coasting the banks of the Nile, and to become eye-witnesses of the fertility and beauty of a country, so celebrated by historians, and confirmed in our admiration by the testimony of the people here, who are never tired of repeating its praises. We learn that our boat, and four others, sailed this morning for Yambo; and that three larger ones remain here to receive their lading from the caravan. The passage to Yambo can be made with ease in four or five days. What a contrast to the long and tedious voyage that we experienced to this place!

Nothing is a greater proof of the warlike dispositions of the Arabs, than the pleasure they take in the inspection of arms of all kinds. Our swords, guns, and pistols, have undergone a thousand examinations; and been honored with a profusion of applauses, not, we suspect, without hopes, on their side, of profiting by our politeness. Were a sword or spear to be put into the hand of an Arab, whatever disguise he might be in, his bent of mind would as quickly betray itself, as did Achilles', when he handled the arms which Ulysses placed before him. He is always armed as if going to battle; and we never see any one, whose profession allows of it, unprovided with a pair of loaded pistols in his girdle, a sabre and a dagger by his side, and a spear of about six feet in length in his right hand. In his left he always carries a pipe, which, moderately speaking, is not five minutes together from his lips in the course of the day. Though this general practice of carrying fire-arms on peaceable occasions, is totally repugnant to the ideas of civilized minds, there is nothing but what may be reconciled to us by the force of habit; and we now view this threatening apparatus of war without the smallest emotion. In the evening the shaik brought us a plate of unripened limes, which, indifferent as they were, we understand have come from the neighborhood of the Nile.

W E D N E S D A Y, 16th JULY.

We are very fortunate in respect to the owner of the house we live in. He is an old Arab, of a civil demeanor and a quiet temper; and if ever a mortal passed away an inoffensive life, it is this host of ours. His worldly cares extend not beyond the little œconomy of an humble roof, and the sale of a few articles, with which he makes shift to provide for the calls of nature. The only luxury he tastes of, is his pipe of tobacco and his cup of coffee; and his sole enjoyment, is the tendance of a milch goat, that follows him about with the docility of a dog. The milk of this animal he kindly reserves for our use; and, indeed, it is serviceable to us, in a miserable place, where milk is not to be procured. In the course of such a simple life, it is not likely that he should imbibe the errors which higher stations are apt to betray their possessors into: and there is no doubt but the prayers of this poor Arab are acceptable to the Almighty disposer of all things. Content carries along with it the aspect of every virtue; and not to repine at the destiny which Heaven has allotted us, is certainly of more solid importance to mankind, than the attainment of a thousand dazzling talents, which, by fitting us to the admiration of this world, too often render us indifferent to the acquisition of a more glorious recompence.

The shaik and the commandant are become very regular in their visits to us. By this particular attention we conceive hopes of the caravan's approach, as we do not think they would thus court us through mere form. The Turk is by much the more modest of the two, which must be attributed to a more general ral knowledge of the world. He has asked for nothing but the liquor before mentioned; and has received nothing from us, but a piece of muslin handkerchiefs, which we presented him with last night. The Arab does not maintain this decency in his conduct, though he is by no means open in his demands. He is continually asking us, through the channel of our interpreter, of the things we possess; and this morning desired to look at a curious pair of pistols of mine, which I had carefully concealed from his knowledge. Though I could not learn in what manner he had discovered them, I was obliged to promise them to him on our arrival at the Nile; when we fondly flattered ourselves to be delivered from the necessity of standing upon our guard. These pistols have a stop upon the cocks, which must render them safer to an Arab, who is accustomed, on a march, to sleep with them in his girdle.

The weather was hotter to-day than we have before experienced it, which we attribute to an alteration in the wind, that has blown from the land, though very faintly. Were it not for the constant gales which prevail in these seas, the coasts would be intolerably hot, as the soil is nothing but rock and sand.

T H U R S D A Y, 17th JULY.

The shaik brought us this morning a bottle of cinnamon-water under his cloak. We were prevailed on to taste it, out of compliment to him, who shewed us the example, but we heartily repented of it. Whether owing to the still, or whatever cause it might be, there was a copperas taste in the liquor, that did not agree with our stomachs. This will be a caution how we make free with foreign liquors, among a people, whose ignorance may be imposed on by the venders of these articles.

We have discovered an amiable trait in the character of the old man, which has considerably heightened our opinion of him. He has a paternal regard for his subjects, and seems to share in any innocent recreation they can take. It was no longer ago than last night, that a slave-boy, belonging to our company, was playing on the fiddle for the entertainment of the shaik. The novelty of the sound brought a crowd about the gate of the yard, where we were sitting on carpets to enjoy the cool of the evening. The old man perceived them to be pleased with the music, and asked our permission to let them come in. This was no sooner granted, than the yard was filled with people of all ranks, who expressed great satisfaction and surprize at the skill of a boy, who might be put put on a footing with the blind fiddlers that set a country wake in motion. The ideas of the better sort of a simple people, cannot be expected to be more refined than those of the lower class of a polished nation. Nature is the same in every climate, and betrays its want of cultivation, by an undistinguishing taste in the several degrees of perfection to which the arts and sciences may be carried. The notes of a violin or flute may touch a rude ear with sensations of delight, although not regulated by the pauses of time; or how can we pretend to receive pleasure from the wild notes of the wood-lark or nightingale? The truth is, we look not for any excellence in the bird, but what nature has afforded. The sweetness of his pipe makes ample amends for the irregularity of the measure; and we drink the melody, without feeling the want of correctness.

We had a visit as usual from the Turk, who watches his time, and comes always after the departure of the shaik. He informs us, that he has just had a messenger, who brings advice of the immediate departure of the caravan from the Nile. If this account be true, it must arrive within two days at furthest. The Turk shewed us a chop or signet, that he received from Ibrahim Beg, the bey of Cairo, nominating him to the command of the fort of Cosire. He is a very obliging and good-humored man; and it will be our inclination, as well as interest, to cultivate his friendship.

It is not often that we venture out of the doors
of

of our gateway, except by moon-light, when we stray down to the sea-side, which is the only prospect from this place that can bear observation. There was doubtless some appearance of cultivation, when the country was better inhabited, as the most stubborn soil cannot resist the efforts of industry. But as the power of the Turks began to decline in these parts, commerce failed apace; the inhabitants of this populous city removed by degrees to the more fertile banks of the Nile, and have left it a prey to poverty and desolation!

FRIDAY, 18th JULY.

We received very disagreeable tidings this morning relative to the caravan. The road is so infested with Buddoos, or wild Arabs, that its progress is delayed, until a reinforcement arrives from the Nile. It seems that a shaik of the mountains, through which the caravan passes, has lately disappeared; so that the security which the country was in from his influence, no longer subsists. It is customary for the caravan to pay a tribute to these chiefs, for a passage through their districts. They are only robbers of a larger growth, and openly set their protection to sale, to defend the traveller from the rapine of their tribes.

Distressing as this circumstance is, we are habituated to disappointment, and are arrived at that happy temper of mind, which rejects complaint in things things unavoidable. As soon as a sufficient number of camels arrive, to transport ourselves and baggage to the river, we are determined to set out, in company with the shaik or his son; our number and fire-arms being sufficient, in our opinion, to put any band of robbers to flight. We shall, at least, make up fifteen camels; not to mention the Christians and others, who might be glad to join us on such an expedition. But it is likely we shall not be reduced to take this step, which, at any rate, must be attended with risk. The caravan may come before any further intelligence, as it only waited for the dispersion of the Buddoos, who are between it and this place; and the practice of giving notice of its approach, by lighting fires on the hills, has been discontinued, since the arrival of these troublesome neighbors.

The boats that waited for grain by the caravan, are now resolved upon sailing, as its appearance is so uncertain. The master of a boat belonging to Judda, came to us this morning to know our commands. As he seems to be a good sort of man, and this is the only opportunity we may have of advising our friends in India of our situation, we are determined to write by him, to the care of Mr. Horfeley at Mocha, who has his letters very punctually forwarded to Suez per viam Judda.

The Arabs are beggars from the highest to the lowest. Indeed, so sacred is the state of poverty among them, that they hold its votaries as under the peculiar direction of Providence. And this humane humane notion is the source of that charity, which is the most general virtue they possess. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at, that an Arab feels not the shame which overspreads the cheek of an European petitioner. He asks, without scruple, for what he thinks his poverty entitles him to; and intrudes himself in his rags into the presence of his superiors, from which he seldom or never experiences a repulse. A son of a shaik of Yambo is about to return thither on one of the boats, and came today to demand a present of us. As we were at a loss what to offer him, the old shaik stood our friend on this occasion, and gave him two gold pieces in our name, called mauheboops, of the value of one dollar and an half each. These we are to give him credit for when we settle accounts with the shaik. In the evening the man came for our letters, which we delivered to him.

SATURDAY, 19th JULY.

The air was so bleak during the night, that we were glad to retire into the house, though the place we sleep in is defended from the wind, by the height of the walls. This is one of the finest climates under the sun, the air serene and wholesome, and the sky always unclouded. The rays of the sun are tempered by the refreshing breezes from the sea, which constantly blow during the hotter months of the year. The southerly winds prevail
only

only in December, January, and February; and at the changes of the moon, they are sometimes felt for a day or two in the other months. From our experience of this sea, we do not think it practicable for a vessel to get up to Suez later than March. But then she may always reach Cosire, whence her packets, and even her goods, may be conveyed at an easy expence to the Nile. Ghinnah, a city of Upper Egypt, is situated about 130 miles W. N. W. of Cosire; thither the caravan goes, and there boats may be had in great plenty for Cairo, which is 500 computed miles from thence. This route can only be recommended to a packet-boat with dispatches from India, or to a vessel that loses her passage to Suez; as the expence of boat-hire down the river, and the customs of this port, would prove a considerable draw-back on the profits of the voyage. But in such a situation, we doubt not that vessels would find their account in coming here, instead of repairing to Judda, as the snow Adventure had orders to do, to the great loss of her owners. A treaty of commerce might as readily be effected with the princes of Upper Egypt, as with the bey of Cairo; if the India Company do not consider this trade as prejudicial to their interests. It is not my intention, at present, to enter into a discussion of this matter, as I acknowledge myself but an incompetent judge of it. But if the species of goods which are carried to the Cairo market, and the channels into which they are afterwards thrown, be considered, it does not appear, that the establishment of this commerce would operate materially to the Company's loss. The cargoes for this track are chiefly of the finest assortment, and their circulation confined to the ports of the Mediterranean; so that it is not to be feared they will interfere with the sale of the Company's merchandise*.

The Arabs here are much less reserved in conversation than in Arabia. The shaik himself has mentioned his wives to us more than once, though it is a subject on which his countrymen at home preserve the strictest silence. But in proportion as they are removed from the land of their Prophet, it would seem that they throw off the austerity which is inseparable from bigotry. Their features are considerably relaxed here, of the solemnity that they affect at Yambo; and the old man relishes a joke with as much glee as ourselves. He has just now gained much upon our confidence by an instance of forbearance, which bespeaks him somewhat divested of the rapacious spirit of his tribe. My European servant was imprudent enough to venture out in the dusk, into the quarter of the town where the filles de joie reside. He was discovered by the patrole, and after having suffered some indignities, was hurried away to the guard-

* It is not unlikely that this question will be decided by the Turks themselves, whose fickleness and rapacity may lead them to overset an infant commerce, by means more forcible to those engaged in it, than the authority of the legislature itself, house, whence he was released by the shaik's order, as soon as the report was made to him. This happened two nights ago, and was kept from our knowledge. The old man was very backward to mention the subject to us, which he did at length, on account, we believe, of the mischief that might ensue to the foolish fellow, were he ever caught by the natives in such a place again. Had this incident occurred at Yambo, or even at Mocha, where strangers are less liable to impositions, there is no doubt but the servant would have been detained in prison, until his liberty was purchased at the price of three or four hundred dollars.

The shaik brought us word this evening, that he had just received certain intelligence of the caravan having left the Nile. While he was sitting with us, an express arrived, intimating that a party of Buddoos were in the neighborhood, and had seized a camel and four asses belonging to the town, which had gone out this morning to fetch charcoal. The old man immediately signified his resolution to sally forth with a few attendants, and observe their motions. For this end he borrowed the pair of pistols belonging to me, which he had long fixed his eye upon, and which I had promised to present him with on our arrival at Ghinah. Fires were now lighted on the different eminences which overlook the town, and the drum beat to arms. Nor were these precautions useless, in such a defenceless place as this, which might be plundered with great ease by a resolute and well-

accoutered band. But these robbers are reported not only to be indifferently armed, but to be void of all spirit when they meet with resistance. The third part may be furnished with match-locks, and the rest with spears and swords. A miserable race, wandering from hill to hill, and subsisting on the pilfer of straggling passengers. We prepared our fire-arms for their reception, should they venture to assault our castle; and there was little occasion for our keeping a regular watch, as it was not possible to obtain a sound nap during the night, whose "dull ear" (as Shakespear denotes it) was deafened by the rattling of the drum, and the chorus of a war-song. These the Arabs continued until the morning dawned, and, delivering them from their fears, permitted us to take an hour's repose.

S U N D A Y, 20th JULY.

We find that the Turkish commandant had every thing in readiness in the fort, to have done execution among the Buddoos. The gunner this morning was spunging the few pieces that are mounted on the walls, having drawn, we suppose, the charges of powder, which may serve on a future occasion. The Turk breakfasted with us, and magnified, with the rhodomontade of his nation, the strength of his citadel, and the valor of his troops; both of which, however, we must confess, might withstand withstand the attack of an army of such vagrants, as these have been represented to us!

Even in this remote corner of the globe, the character of the Turks strongly displays itself. Suspicious of strangers, and jealous of observation, they endeavor to conceal their weakness under an ostentatious language. Though he has never invited us into his fort, the commandant frequently talks of the importance of his charge; and though the contempt which the shaik entertains for him is too visible to escape our notice, he is willing to inspire us with an idea of his own superiority. Conscious that his power is daily mouldering away in these parts, the Turk grows more and more distrustful of the Arab; while the latter can no longer suppress the rancor which he has conceived against his tyrannical masters. To what lengths this mutual aversion will carry them, time alone can discover. But this appears probable: should a favorable conjuncture present itself to the Arabs, to recover the territories of Egypt, it will not pass by unheeded. This conquest of their Prophet's family may return into their hands, and then, by a natural course of things, revert to the dominion of the original possessor. Thus, by a retrograde motion, the chains of bondage may be unloosed, and the rights of the native be restored to him.

One of the present subjects of our apprehension is, that the house we live in will not last our time, should the caravan meet with further delays. The rafters are of the date-tree, and instead of plank or tiles, the floor is composed of rushes laid close together. On this loose sand is placed, and over all the coarse mats of the country. Materials of this sort must have a wonderful elasticity in them; and every step we take, is attended by an universal tremor of the house. Neither would a stranger imagine that we were better provided in regard to the roof. This is formed of nothing stronger than rushes, on which stones are heaped, to prevent their being scattered by the winds. But in this settled climate the native requires no defence, but against the rays of the sun; thunder and lightning being almost unknown to him; and even rain a very uncommon visitor. By the accounts of the inhabitants, no rain has fallen at Cosire for these three years past; nor does it ever exceed a shower or two, when it comes. Of this the structure of their remaining houses is an unquestionable proof; for being rebuilt with mud, and half thatched with rushes, one day of rain would mix them with their mother earth.

MONDAY, 21st JULY.

Old and desolate as this town is, cats are the chief and almost only nuisance which we have found here. But we are infested with these vermin to such a degree, that no provision can be secured from their talons during the night. It is to no purpose to lock the door, when the roof is so unable to withstand their assaults. A droll adventure happened last night, in consequence of the voraciousness of these animals, which may not be unworthy of remark. We had been presented with a dish of nice cakes by one of our Christian acquaintance, which a servant, out of his great wisdom, hung up in the room where one of our companions slept. Though the doors and windows were flung open on account of the heat, he thought the cakes would be safer here than in any other place; and for the greater security, suspended them over the gentleman's bed. But the very reverse fell out. When all was quiet, the cats, which had been attracted in great numbers by the savory smell of the cakes, rushed in at once from all quarters, and, without the least respect to the intended guardian of them, and directed by instinct to their booty, flew in a tumultuous manner towards it. Our companion was awakened by the growling of two of these ferocious creatures, who were disputing for a prize on his pillow; and, finding by the noise which assailed his ears, that the combat raged with equal fury on all sides, he ran to a stick that stood near him, and with an activity equally new and surprizing, lay about him with such success, that his persecutors made off at length with the remains of the plunder. We, who took up our lodging in the yard, were disturbed by this uncommon tumult, which did not continue less than a quarter of an hour. It immediately recalled to our minds an adventure of Don Quixote's, with this difference only, that the present was not a preconcerted one. It was perhaps happy for our friend, that the cats had something forcible enough to draw their attention from him, or his face and body might have suffered equally with the knight's of facetious memory. Our mirth was increased however according to the innocence of the distress, which deprived him of his sleep during the whole night. This was every moment broken by the mewling of these animals, that hovered around the scene of action until the day broke, and disclosed to the unfortunate hero the cause of his perplexity.
to

Should we remain here much longer, we shall not have wherewith to supply the cravings of these people, who are continually importuning us for powder, ball, flints, and every article that they fix their eyes upon. Empty bottles are particularly acceptable to them; and the shaik himself did not disdain to request a dozen for his own use. Even such trifles as these have given rise to jealousies in this simple place: nay, one of the shaik's guards has gone so far, as to throw out threats of vengeance against our servant Ibrahim, because the preference of a few bottles was given to another. To punish his insolence, we took upon us this morning to forbid this fellow the house. Since our first arrival he has been remarkably officious, and profuse of his tenders of service; but as we have always considered him in the light of a spy, we did not regret the opportunity which permitted us to rid ourselves of so troublesome a visitor.

T U E S D A Y, 22d JULY.

A boat arrived last night from Tor, in the gulf of Suez, which brings intelligence that there are four English vessels still at Suez. We may therefore flatter ourselves with the hopes of relieving our friends in India from their apprehensions for our safety: the accounts we have hitherto sent being unsatisfactory, and their conveyance uncertain. Our shaik likewise informed us, in the course of his visit this morning, that two Europeans had arrived in a boat at Tor, and had set out on camels for Suez without any escort, about a month ago. These we know to be the gentlemen already mentioned to have touched at Yambo, and who had the charge of the packet which Captain Dibdin brought from Madras. We could not but congratulate ourselves on being carried by this road instead of that by Tor, which would infallibly have been the furthest port that our boat could have reached in the Red-Sea, at this season. Our situation appears to us in every respect more eligible than theirs. The country between Tor and Suez is esteemed the most uncivilized in all Arabia. There is no regular caravan, and we cannot but tremble for the security of these adventurers. Their appearance indeed is a powerful circumstance in their favor ; and it might be better for us, if we were as bare of baggage and money as they are reported to be.

The shaik informs us, that another camel and some asses have been taken by the Buddoos, which occasioned his sending an express last night to meet the caravan, and warn it of the danger. The alarm which these robbers have spread through the country, has certainly been the cause of its extraordinary delay, which is so grievous to the inhabitants of Cosire, that the Turkish commandant just now told us, he has dispatched a camel to Ghinnah, to request that an additional guard may be sent after the caravan, to conduct it hither. A scarcity of every article of life has been felt here for some time, and famine itself can only be warded off for a few days longer.

There is a trait in the character of the Arabs, which is very disgusting ; but no more peculiar to them than to Mussulmen in general. They are so dirty in their linen, that though they take great pains to adorn themselves in gay apparel, this habitual uncleanness cannot be concealed. Their shirt is of the coarsest linen, and much resembles the English shift. Their drawers are loose, and usually of silk, and their under garment of dyed linen, except on particular occasions, when it is exchanged for a more costly one of silk. Over this they throw a cloak of broad-cloth, which is edged with fatten or fur. They wear slippers on their feet, and turbans on their heads, of much less magnitude than than the other followers of Mahomet. The dress of the women varies little from that of the men. Their shirt and drawers are the same, but their whole habit consists of a loose gown, which is gathered up and fastened at the breast. They take the greatest pride in their hair, which falls down their necks in numerous plaits. But this is concealed when they go abroad by a part of their veils, with as much care as their faces. The veil is divided into two pieces, and joins by a clasp on the forehead, which is either of gold or of precious stones: so that the forehead and eyes are entirely exposed to public view. The complexions of the females are much fairer than those of the men, which must be attributed to the care which is taken to preserve them from the sun. In this particular they seem to be a distinct species from their swarthy mates; and are really so in respect to the neatness of their dress, and the liberality of their principles. This encomium is but due to their merit, and falls short of the assistance which we experienced from them in the hour of our greatest distress.

W E D N E S D A Y, 23d J U L Y.

We were agreeably struck this morning with the appearance of three camels, which were hastening to the town. They brought the news of the caravan's approach. It left the river in three divisions, and travels by easy stages towards Cosire. The first division fell in with the wild Arabs who were lately in this quarter, and was attacked by them, and plundered of forty camels loaded with merchandize. It happened to be the smallest, and unprovided with a proper guard. The two larger divisions will not be here before to-morrow, and are said to consist of one thousand or twelve hundred camels. But the danger we learn is now over, as these banditti are gone towards Suez, which is the road to their own country. This is the intelligence which we received from the Turk at breakfast, and it was confirmed by the shaik, when he came to wish us joy of our speedy departure.

By these camels there is little come besides wheat, and we are still distressed for good water. We have been obliged to drink the water of this place for these two days past: it is very brackish and unpalatable: but we take the precaution to boil it for our use; and this has probably prevented its disagreeing with us.

One of the plagues of Egypt seems to be renewed to-day, to our extreme annoyance and regret. We had been quite free from the insects which are continually engendered in hot climates, when a warm southerly wind has brought such a swarm of flies along with it, as to prevent the possibility of obtaining our customary nap after dinner. The whole house is filled with them, and not a moment's satisfaction is to be found within doors. This is the first time that the wind has been in the southerly quarter since our arrival at Cosire; and consequently consequently is the first fair wind that we should have met with, had our boat pursued her voyage to Suez. The gulph of Suez is so narrow, that the wind must be very favorable to carry up a boat so badly fitted out as ours; and all attempts on our part to beat up the channel, must have proved fruitless. Though the charge of duplicity against the vizier and the nokidah of Yambo, remains unrefuted, this prevalence of contrary winds is no impeachment of their experience of this sea. The weather is considerably changed by the alteration of the wind; and had we a thermometer to announce it, I am convinced that it is hotter by many degrees than it was yesterday. We are the more incommoded by the heat, as our house has not a window towards the sea.

T H U R S D A Y, 24th JULY.

The shaik this morning proposed to us a scheme of getting expeditiously to the Nile, though he could not but take notice of the heavy charges that would attend it. We had been repeating our complaints of the delay of the main body of the caravan, and of the detriment which our stay here, would be of to our affairs. This was a fine opening for him to benefit by our necessity, which he judged was too pressing, to admit of hesitation in point of expence. He offered to procure us as many camels, as would transport us and our baggage, gage, from those which arrived yesterday. For these, however, we were to pay double the price of camel-hire to Ghinnah, on account of the scarcity of these animals at present. To this measure we would readily have subscribed, had not the price he demanded, exceeded trebly what it ought to have done from his own calculation. When he even reduced it, at our remonstrance, to eight dollars per camel, we were still at a loss how to act. We found that we could not manage without eighteen camels, for the accommodation of ourselves, the shaik, and an escort of ten soldiers, which he thinks is the smallest we can have, and for whose attendance we must pay sixty dollars. As it is impossible for us to ascertain the charges that we shall incur on the way to Cairo; as the impositions that we may meet with on the Nile may equal, if not exceed those which we have already experienced, it was but prudent to have an eye to our purses, which may be exhausted before we find a friend to replenish them. But our deliberations on this head, were put an end to by the advice of the other principal people of the town, who came upon us at this critical moment. They represented to us the danger that we should run, in travelling with so small a body; that the caravan's delay was certainly occasioned by alarms on the road; and that, at all events, it was better for us to wait for intelligence from the caravan, before we attempted to proceed. Nay, they even went so far as to reprobate the conduct of the shaik, which in this respect, favoured of temerity, and an inattention to our interests. Though we gave not an entire credit to the insinuations of these people, whose jealousy of the shaik's good fortune was palpable enough, we had heard too much not to be guided by reason, which pointed out to us the safest path to pursue. Rejoiced as they would have been, to have enjoyed the opportunities which the old man had to pillage us daily, their malice confirmed our resolution, which began to waver, of waiting for the caravan.

To our great relief, some asses which we sent to the mountains, are returned this morning, with six skins of water. This we may drink without fear, as its quality is good; but it is rather more unpalatable than that we have been using of late. The taste is oily, from the skins having been newly soaked in that disgusting liquid, to prevent their leaking. We have the agreeable prospect before us, of being furnished with this beverage during our journey through the desert; as the Arabs, whose business it is to keep the skins in order, are too lazy to attend to the cleanliness of the inside of them.

FRIDAY, 25th JULY.

This morning the shaik brought the master of the Tor vessel to pay us a visit. It seems, that he went in company with the European gentlemen from
Tor

Tor to Cairo, where he carried his own coffee for sale. We have the pleasure to be eased of our fears on their account, by this intelligence of their safe arrival at that capital. It is rather extraordinary, that we should have remained so long ignorant of these circumstances, and that the adventures of our countrymen should have been related to us by halves. But this has been more the effect of accident than design. The Arabs give us credit for the sang-froid which is the principal ingredient in the composition of their own minds; and were careless of the communication of an incident of such little importance to us, as the safety of these strangers. Great events are sometimes exhibited to mark the character of an individual; while a trait like this will suffice to fix that of a nation!

From the master of the vessel we enquired several particulars of a journey, so new to our experience, and so similar, in our idea, to the one which we were about to undertake. But little could be gathered from a man, whose imagination was wholly engrossed by self-interest, that could contribute to our instruction or amusement. The road, he tells us, lies through a continued desert, on which they travelled for fifteen days; and, to their agreeable surprize, they met not with any interruption or alarm. In the course of the conversation we learnt, that this man's vessel is the property of the shaik's brother, who is a merchant of Cairo. This connection of his may be a bond for the old man's good usage of us; as, over and above his dependence on the bey, his brother might dearly answer any complaint which we might prefer on our arrival at Cairo.

At noon a camel arrived, with intelligence of the caravan's long-expected approach. It had halted during the heat of the day in a valley about two leagues distant, and will be here in the evening. The shaik confirmed this news in a visit in the afternoon, and gave us assurances, that we should set out the day after to-morrow at furthest. At sunset about 200 camels came in, and the rest are expected during the night. We sent a message to the shaik, to desire he would provide us with camels, and give the necessary orders concerning our departure. This brought him to our house again. But the prologue to the scene was the demand of a loan of twenty dollars, which he was in want of to purchase coffee. As he was to accompany us to the Nile, an adventure of this kind would make it the better worth his while, and give him some employment during his absence. These were arguments not to be contested; at least, we should have been willing to keep the old fellow in humor, had it been at the expence of double the sum in question. For as to any discharge of the debt, it was the last thing we looked for. We had been too long acquainted with the genius of the Arabs, to consider such a demand in any other light, than a new species of begging. The crafty veteran received the money with many professions of gratitude;

tude; and while he promised to expedite our journey, we observed a smile of exultation on his countenance, which seemed to portend us no good.

SATURDAY, 26th JULY.

The morning was ushered in by a visit from the shaik, who was attended by the principal Arabs of the town. We soon discovered the errand they came upon, which was, agreeably to the national maxim, to see what they could strip us of before our departure. Every eye appeared enlivened with expectation, and devoured in idea the contents of our baggage, which was piled up in one corner of the room. Whatever might be their dissensions in other matters, they were evidently unanimous on the present occasion. We were determined to bring them to the point at once, and demanded of the shaik the sum total we were to pay for getting to Ghinnah. This, after some hesitation and wrangling among themselves, they fixed at 205 dollars. The paper which they delivered to us to explain matters, will evince the knavery and extortion of this race: especially when it is known, that the usual hire of a camel is but two dollars, and that money bears ten times its original value, in a country where specie is so scarce. The translation is literally as follows :

To the government of Cofire for its protec- tion	-	-	-	Dollars	100
To twelve camels from hence to Ghinnah	-				80
To pay for two askaries or foldiers, to guard you	-	-	-	-	10
To a present to the fhaik for his company	-				15
				Dollars	205

This fum, added to our other expences, will occafion our being sufferers to the amount of 500 dollars fince our arrival here; which may alfo be placed to the account of the vizier of Yambo. We paid it down, however, on the fpot, and difmiffed our vifitors, who appeared to be well pleafed with the fuccefs of their negotiation*.

While we were employed in packing up our baggage, and preparing for our expedition, a man of a good mien, and a creditable appearance, entered the room without ceremony, and requested a private audience on business of moment to ourselves. He was of the race of the Seids, who pretend to be the descendants of Mahomet, and, as such, are universally respected among the followers of that successful impostor. The generality of these Seids tread in the footsteps of their founder, and have as slender a title as himself to the homage which they demand from the deluded multitude. But so prevalent is the blindness of man, that the shadow shall outweigh the substance in his sight; and these hypocrites, under the garb of a specious name, shall obtain pensions from Mahometan princes, who were never guilty of rewarding merit or virtue during their reigns. I have myself known more than one instance of this kind, while I resided in India; and was once told by a Seid, who came to solicit charity of me, that he had rejected with scorn a purse of 300 rupees, or 40*l.* which was offered him by the nabob of Arcot, who was fain to purchase his prayers at a larger price! With such a confidence, which would lead him into every secret, and such a protection, which would secure him from any chastisement, it is no wonder that the man who now visited us, should have become acquainted with the intrigues of the Arabs, or that he should have had resolution enough to warn us of them. After asking pardon for my digression, to this man we will now return.

When the servants were dismissed, and the door was shut, the Seid professed to us his concern at finding

finding us in that inhospitable region. That he had heard of our former adventures with surprize, and was filled with admiration to conceive, how we should surmount the dangers which now encompassed us. That as our foes were numerous, our conduct could not be too circumspect; and that, above all things, we should decline, to the utmost of our power, any proposal to travel in a body distinct from the main caravan: for, as he was convinced there were designs formed against us, the only chance to frustrate them, was to keep our persons and baggage with the croud. However bitter and alarming this communication was, we could not but pay our hearty acknowledgments to the author of it. We considered him as a good spirit, who had assumed this form to assist in our preservation, and we promised to hold his friendly caution in faithful remembrance. The yard was full of people, who were sewing up our trunks in bags, and the shaik himself was sometimes among them to give directions. This circumstance obliged the Seid to shorten our conference, who took his leave for fear of observation; but not before he had recommended us to the protection of his Prophet, whose votaries, at the very moment, were plotting our destruction.

Scarce had our humane monitor left the room, when the shaik came in to excuse himself from accompanying us. He lamented that some affairs of importance required his presence at Cosire, because he should be deprived so soon of our company.

But as to our convenience and safety, they would equally be consulted by his son, who would attend us on the road. He found no difficulty in persuading us of the truth of this conclusion. Our present views were to get, in the best manner we could, to some civilized place, whose extent would screen us from notice, or whose government would secure us from further depredations. In the immediate temper we were in, the services of the son seemed to promise us full as much sincerity as those of the father.

SUNDAY, 27th JULY.

We were employed the whole morning in preparing for our departure, which is fixed for four o'clock this afternoon. After all the money we have paid, the principal article of our journey is yet to be provided at our expence: and this is water. Ten new skins, that hold from three to four gallons each, were accordingly purchased for the use of ourselves and servants. And this stock stood us in no contemptible sum, in a country where good water is dearer than any other necessary of life. We furnished ourselves with a kind of bisket to satisfy the calls of hunger, and added to the store a mutton-pye of our own making: for cookery was a knowledge to which we had been indebted more than once, for a comfortable meal, since we left the snow Adventure.

Our old host is almost the only reasonable being we have met with here. While the rest of his countrymen are racking us to the utmost, he is very well contented with a gratification of fifteen dollars, for the time that we have resided in his house, which is upwards of a fortnight. We take a pleasure in bestowing on this good man the little trifles we leave behind us, such as chests, beds, and old linen, in gratitude for his services, which were not the slightest to people in our situation; imposed upon as we should have been in every necessary of life, but for his timely interposition. We were obliged, however, to observe great secrecy in this donation; which, mean as its intrinsic value may appear, might have excited the attention of his superiors, and induced the shaik himself to dispute it with him after our departure.

At four o'clock we put on our Arabian dresses, which we had provided for the journey. As we have suffered the hair to grow upon our upper lips for some months past, we are each provided with a tolerable pair of whiskers; and as our complexions are by this time pretty well tanned by the sun, we hope the more easily to escape observation. But there is a peculiar characteristic in the individuals of every nation, that will distinguish them through the disguise of dress and language. This is exemplified daily amid the neighboring states of Europe, whose habits and manners are nearly the same; and cannot so much excite wonder in our case, where the whole temperature of our minds and bodies was so contrary to that of the people, whom we endeavored to personate. Our landing on this coast, it is true, was known, and our progress was every where preceded by the herald of rumor. But neither of these causes conspired towards the discovery of our origin, however they might have operated in the seizure of our effects, and the detention of our persons. Every eye immediately pronounced us to be aliens to the land, and did not require any further support of this opinion, than its own penetration.

The Turkish commandant had been very sparing of his visits of late, which we had imputed to his shame of seeing us, after the scene of extortion he had been concerned in. Though we gave him credit for a principle which the Arabs are wholly devoid of, it appears, that we did him great injustice in our conclusion. In the division of the sum demanded of us for the use of the government, the Arabs had not only excluded him from a share, but had kept the whole transaction from his knowledge. This we learnt from his own mouth, in a farewell visit that we now received from him. Whether he really was our friend, or was overreached by the shaik and his adherents, we cannot pretend to determine; and if we thought favorably of this Turk, it arose from his personal civilities towards us, and could not be justified by the general deportment of his nation towards Christians. This Turk, and an Arab merchant, were the only people in whose professions we trusted; though it happened, happened, that their good wishes were all they could bestow on us. The merchant was a resident of Judda, and was here on a commercial scheme. He had contracted an affection for the English in his native place, and cautioned us frequently against the knavery of his countrymen, though he was afraid to disclose his good-will towards us openly. To him we entrusted letters directed to the care of Mr. Horseley at Mocha, advising our friends in India of our departure to Ghinnah.

The shaik's avaricious disposition seems to be equal to that of his countrymen in general. He has thrown off at last the mask of dissimulation, and acts in his native character. While it answered his purposes, he affected the humane patron; and now he plays the unfeeling tyrant with as good a grace. Our departure is deferred until the morning, on account of the caravan's not being in readiness; and the shaik has taken this opportunity to insinuate to us, that the camel-drivers are not satisfied with the price we have paid them! Gracious Heaven! of what latitude is the conscience of an Arab, which is not content with three times the value of his beasts' labor! for three times are we already charged, to what the native pays for the hire of a camel. We are bent upon not complying with this further imposition, unless this man should be base enough to obstruct our departure. The old fellow and we parted for the night on bad terms; and he was particularly irritated at our declining to accept of a centry to guard our baggage, which was piled up in the yard. This was done by the advice of our venerable host, who told the shaik, that his walls were a sufficient defence for our property. This diverted the shaik's attention from us, and he let drop some words significant of our reliance on a foolish dotard, who might not be able to protect our effects from the attempts of the town's people. We paid no other regard to this speech, than by spreading our carpets around the baggage, and taking our posts on the ground, ready to defend it against the designs of secret or avowed enemies.

M O N D A Y, 28th JULY.

“ All's well that ends well,” says the old proverb ; and this, if ever, was verified with us. The shaik came early in the morning, and looked gloomy. His ordinary salutation was even omitted, and convinced us, that his discontent was great, and not to be removed, but by a compliance with his humor. When a Mussulman fails in the modes of politeness, the worst is to be apprehended from his power, which will carry by force the point which his address was unable to accomplish. All ceremony was now laid aside, and he told us in plain terms, that he must have more money. He condescended, indeed, to place this requisition to the account of the people of the town and country, who had been pestering him for buxies, or presents, from us. That it was our misfortune to be considered dered by these people as men of vast wealth, whose trunks were filled with gold, precious stones, and rich merchandize, on which it was their custom to levy a tax. It was in vain that we remonstrated against this demand, which was as wanton as unjust. It was in vain that we referred to the shaik's own knowledge of our effects and profession, neither of which subjected us to the taxation imposed upon merchants and their goods. It was in vain that we appealed to the government of Cosire for its interposition in this matter, as we had paid so largely for its protection. The dependants of the shaik were yet to receive their mite, and he declared in a determined tone, that he could not pretend to send us in safety to the Nile, until he had received orders from the bey of Cairo, unless we satisfied the hill-people with a donation of twenty-five dollars. Hard as the extortion was, we panted too much for a return to our friends and country to hesitate long about it; and the shaik was content with the sum of twenty-three dollars, which we had kept about our persons for the extra expences of the road. And lucky it was for us that this money was reserved from our baggage, which, in its present situation, could not have been opened for a supply, without exposing our real treasure, which was not inconsiderable, to the eyes of the shaik. Suspicion of our concealed money was the only ground on which he proceeded in his demands; but a conviction of it might have operated more materially to our detriment. The cloud which had loomed in the countenance of the shaik, was in a moment dispelled, and, with a tone of infinite good-humor, he ordered the camels to the door to take up our luggage. The hopes of our departure were now for the first time certain, and while we gave orders to the servants in what manner to dispose of the things, our spirits insensibly returned to us, and chased all ideas of animosity and complaint. It appeared that during our altercation the caravan had left the town, but was to halt in a valley at a small distance, to be joined by all stragglers. To avoid the impertinence of the mob that surrounded the house, the shaik advised us to quit the town, and wait for our camels at the west angle of the fort. After a very cordial and moving separation with our good host, we resorted to the house of the Judda merchant, and partook of a breakfast which he had prepared for us. Having embraced him, as a friend who had been raised up to us from the tribe of our enemies, we hastened to the appointed spot. Here, as we sat beneath the wall, our other friend, the Turk, appeared on the ramparts, and bade us adieu! At this instant the camels came up, and we found that they had only provided us with ten instead of twelve, for the eighty dollars. Nor was the shaik present to rectify this wilful mistake. To increase my own hardship, my companions happened, as luck would have it, to be beforehand with me, and to possess themselves of the two only riding camels that were in our train. I was, therefore, tain to put up with one of the beasts which carried the baggage; and not finding my seat so easy as I could have wished, I consoled myself with bestowing an hearty malediction on the shaik, for this parting proof of his kindness. Soon after we had moved onwards, we were overtaken by the young shaik and the two guards, who were to be our escort on the road. They brought us the compliments of the shaik, who had grace enough left to shun an interview, after this last scene of his political farce*. The young man endeavored to palliate the offence, by assuring me it was a mistake, which

* Since the publication of this work advices were received from Cosire, via Constantinople, of an event that tends to justify the opinion, that guilt sooner or later meets with its reward. In the Autumn of 1780 it seems that the Coventry frigate put into Cosire by contrary winds, and landed four English gentleman, who proceeded by Ghinnah and the Nile to Cairo, not without having contributions levied on them. Their destiny in the sequel was not a little alarming and vexatious. On their arrival at Cairo, three of the travellers were seized and sent back to their vessel, while the fourth (Mr. Woolley) was suffered to proceed to Constantinople under a guard, where, it is said, the interposition of the British ambassador was necessary for the preservation of his life and his release from confinement. In the interim a quarrel arose at Cosire between the Arabs and some of the Coventry's crew, in which five of the latter lost their lives. This naturally awakened the resentment of the captain, who immediately fired into the town, and took ample revenge on the treachery of its inhabitants. Just as this retaliation must appear, the consequences may be fatal to those Europeans whose ill fortune may throw them into the hands of the shaik of Cosire.

should be rectified when we joined the caravan. Besides the aforesaid Arabs, our company consisted of Major Alexander, Mr. Hammond, and myself, my European servant, two slaves belonging to the major, our interpreter Ibrahim, an Arab servant named Abdul Ruffar, whom we had hired at Cosire, and an Indian fakeer, whom we permitted to ride on a baggage-camel, to assist him on his route to Cairo, where he was bound on a religious penance. We had a couple of muskets, as many blunderbusses, and two pair of pistols among ourselves, with plenty of cartridges which we had prepared. The shaik's son and his attendants were much more completely armed, as were the camel-drivers, who followed us on foot. At two o'clock in the afternoon we joined the caravan, which we found in a valley two hours journey from Cosire. The distance I computed to be five miles, as, by the best observation I could make now and during our journey, a camel goes at the rate of two miles and an half an hour. Here a scanty stream waters the thirsty soil, and about an acre around is covered with date-trees. Under these we made a delicious repast, upon the mutton-pye which we had brought with us. The water is brackish in this spring, and is what the inhabitants of Cosire generally use.

In this valley we had a glimpse of the friendly Seid, and it was the last we got of him. Some of the camels were in motion long before ours, and he passed us on one of them. At three o'clock, we

we moved off the ground, and were not a little startled to find that our whole collective force did not exceed forty camels. The caravan had departed, it seems, when the Seid went by, and the conviction of this brought his vain precautions to our minds. We could not help expostulating pretty severely with the young shaik on this neglect of his, which might subject us to risk. But as he laughed at any idea of danger to such a body as we were, and talked of overtaking the caravan before it reached the next stage, we were under the necessity of becoming quiet, to avoid the appearance of fear, which would have sunk us in their estimation. It was our interest to conceal, as much as possible, the real motives of our apprehension, and to appear to place a confidence in the man, who was become our conductor. Our party was the fourth of this little company, and we kept in as compact a body as the road would allow of, to secure us the better against the effects of treachery or surprize. We continued our way through the valley, which soon became desert and stony like the hills above it. At six o'clock we halted to drink coffee, and to feed our cattle. This stage was three hours, or seven miles and an half. At eight o'clock the signal was given for marching, but just as we had mounted our camels, an alarm was spread of the approach of the wild Arabs. In the confusion which this naturally occasioned, we immediately dismounted, and assembling our servants, marched directly to the quarter

where our Arabs had set up a war-cry, and whence the discharge of several matchlocks had reached our ears. On the road we met with the young shaik and his attendants, who were seeking us out, and seemed not a little surprized at our alertness, and the good countenance we assumed in this ugly affair. This we understood from an expression which he dropped in the hearing of our Ibrahim; which, joined to the sudden cessation of the tumult, convinced us that he was at the bottom of it. But whatever he and his associates intended, the trick failed of any other purpose, than that of letting them see we were ready to repel any insult. They gave some trifling reason for the bustle, which they told us was owing to the unexpected appearance of one of the hill-people, who had threatened to pillage us while at Cosire. As we neither saw this man, nor received any satisfactory account of the matter, we attributed it to a design to try our mettle, and to make what advantage they could of our fears. But we lent a deaf ear to their demands of buxies or presents, which we mortified them in saying, were not due to the timidity that they had betrayed. When all was calm we mounted again, and moved on; our only light the stars, which shone very bright. We continued to traverse the same valley as before, until two o'clock in the morning, when we halted beneath the hills, and spread our carpets to take such repose, as our time, and the peculiarity of our circumstances, would admit of. The last stage was six hours, or fifteen miles, and by our reckoning, we are twenty-seven miles from Cofire.

T U E S D A Y, 29th JULY.

At five o'clock the Arabs roused us to get ourselves ready. We were soon mounted, and began our march; fasting, and not recovered from yesterday's fatigues. We were very solicitous for a junction with the caravan, but from the last evening's manœuvres, and our disappointment at night, we are by this time ascertained that our separation had been intended, and consequently, that a meeting would be unlikely before our arrival at Ghinnah. In this uncomfortable situation, our only hope rested upon the knowledge which the caravan had of our being in the desert, which we flattered ourselves would deter our conductors from any open outrage. Besides, we numbered the camels and merchandize of a merchant of Ghinnah among our body, which we considered as a kind of protection; though whether we owed this union to accident or design, we could not determine. This merchant, by name Mahomet, travels with us; and we understand, that we are to be lodged in his house during our short stay at Ghinnah. He is the brother of one Ally, who professed a great regard for us at Cofire; and who is the cause, we suppose, of the invitation which the merchant has given us.

The country as we advance, still wears the same barren

barren face. Here and there a dwarf date-tree appears, and the truffle-bush is frequent on the road, to the great delight and benefit of the poor camel, who devours it very greedily. Among these bushes we found several deer, who must necessarily live many days without water in the depth of this desert; except that, like the rein-deer, who digs with certainty for provender beneath the snow, they supply themselves with water from a similar practice. The Arabs find springs in particular spots, and I doubt not but nature has implanted in these poor animals the instinct to satisfy one of her loudest calls. We likewise saw numbers of quail, and several earths of an unknown animal; probably of the hare and gerbua, which are common in the deserts of Arabia, but did not come within our view. This country would be truly romantic, were it covered with verdure. The variety of slopes and declivities with which it is interspersed, the frequent vistas which the openings between the hills afford, would present the beautiful scenes of nature, were the soil fertilized, as they do the sublime, in their rude and sterile state. The mountains contain both alabaster and marble, of which many pieces lie scattered upon the road. We made a long and fatiguing march, and at eleven o'clock halted in a pass between the mountains, where the Arabs dig for fresh water, and find it very good. They have nothing indeed to do, but to remove the dirt with which the spring is choaked up; and as the water is drawn before its transparency returns, we strained it through a cloth to take off the foulness. The mountains here are so perpendicular, and approach so close together, that at noon there is a shade on the south side for travellers to repose under. We had centinels on the heights during our slight repast, as this place has the character of being very dangerous. The last stage was six hours, or fifteen miles. At one o'clock we moved onwards with a plentiful supply of water, and went near a mile through this pass, which winds about like the entrance of an Indian fortress; and where an handful of men might check the progress of a large army, were the country worth disputing for. The wind was very hot from the vicinity of the rocky mountains, and this day's journey proved very laborious to us, who had led a sedentary life for so many months past. Our minds indeed had been sufficiently exercised, but our limbs were enfeebled from ease and inactivity. We had no refreshment, but some biscuit and water, during the day, though our conductor, who was well mounted, pushed on frequently before us, and had his cup of coffee with his friends, beneath the shade of some projecting hill, that afforded fuel for a fire. This our camels would by no means admit of our doing; and though coffee would have been the best recruit which our spirits could have received, we could only repine in silence at the young man's neglect. At five o'clock we halted on a plain to refresh ourselves. This stage was four hours, or ten miles.

At seven o'clock in the evening we mounted again, and for the first time ascended an eminence by a very easy approach. We quickly regained the level country, and advanced at a faster rate than by day, through the vallies in which we are constantly buried. The night was as bright as the last, and we should think it a lucky incident were we to lay by in the day, and to travel only by night. At two o'clock in the morning the moon rose, which was the signal for us to halt. And much indeed did we stand in need of repose, after a journey of such a continuance. Besides, we suffered greatly from the uneasy motion of the camels, which nothing but habit could reconcile to a man. For my own part, I am so particularly aggrieved by the saddle of the camel on which I ride, that the small of my back is stripped of its skin. This arises from my still being furnished with a baggage-beast, notwithstanding the fine promises of the young shaik. Authors are much mistaken in their particular ideas of this animal. His being able to go from 100 to 150 miles in the twenty-four hours, is a very fable. Perseverance and hardiness are the qualities which distinguish him above all other quadrupeds, and peculiarly adapt him to the barren countries, where he is found in the most vigorous state. His common pace does not exceed three miles an hour, at which rate he will go sixteen hours out of the twenty-four, for a journey of a month and upwards. But put him beyond his usual speed, and he soon tires. For a day indeed deed it may be quickened to five, and even six miles an hour; but he shortly grows obstinate, and refuses to proceed at a rate so disproportioned to his abilities. He is however very docile, and when trained to a caravan, requires neither a rein to guide, nor a whip to forward his motions. To a stranger nothing can be so ineligible as this mode of travelling; tedious and fatiguing to the last degree, and especially in these parts, where we could not provide ourselves with litters, to defend us from the scorching rays of the sun. Our course yesterday and to-day was generally to the northward of west, and sometimes west and by south, and due west. The last stage was seven hours, or eighteen miles, and by our reckoning we are now seventy miles distant from Cosire.

WEDNESDAY, 30th JULY.

At five o'clock this morning we were wakened from our sleep, which had been very sound, notwithstanding the suspicious company we are in. We got up more assured of the good faith of our conductor, seeing that no attempts had been made to surprize us, at a season when exhausted nature had left us at his mercy. At a moment of such alarm, there was something particularly aggravating in our situation. Worn out with the labors we had undergone, sleep insensibly stole upon the most determined eye; and the common satisfaction of keeping a watch at least upon the motions of an enemy, was denied us. Short as our nap was, it gave us spirits to pursue our journey. But this might not long have proved the case, if we were to obtain but two hours repose out of the twenty-four, in travelling to any considerable distance.

Before we had gone far, my European companions and myself began to find our bowels greatly affected by the water which we got yesterday. This, at all times, is an alarming complaint; and nothing but our supposed vicinity to Ghinnah, could have administered consolation to our distress. We entered, after an hour's march, upon a large plain, sterile and stony like the mountains which we now left behind us. It is a circumstance worthy of remark, that we never crossed any considerable acclivity in our passage through this desert; though at every point of view, the traveller supposes he has a laborious height to ascend, and that he must make his way good, by conquering the stupendous precipices which continually present themselves before him. But indulgent nature has accommodated the country to the necessities of the native. Throughout the hilly region, which extends itself from the Red-Sea to the Nile, she has scooped out a line of vallies for the passage of the caravan. The soil is a mixture of stone and sand, which, beaten down by the constant tread of the splay-footed camel for many centuries past, affords an even and firm pavement to the beasts that travel over it. The road is wide enough in some places places for an army to pass in a line; and in others, will not admit above two or three camels abreast.

This country must have experienced a sad reverse, were it ever so fruitful as the antients have represented it. For the last fifty miles we have not met with any tree but the hawthorn, or any verdure but what the sweet-scented shrubs faintly afford the sight; and now that we are within a few leagues of the Nile, the prospect is not mended for the better. At eleven o'clock we halted under a spreading hawthorn to breakfast; but had not as yet a glimpse of the Nile, or any token of our being in the neighborhood of so fine a river. The last stage was six hours, or fifteen miles. Here, to our great astonishment, we found that our water was expended. This must have been owing, as much to theft in the night, as to the impudence of the camel-drivers, who, as we go along, draw water from our skins in despite of us, though depending from the beasts on which we ride. The insolence of this tribe is surprizing. Though their camels are hired by us, they pretend to a right of mounting them themselves, when they are weary of walking. Thus, do the poor baggage-beasts groan, at times, under the additional burden of a man's weight. It was as much as I could do to keep my camel-driver from getting up behind me; and my friend, the major, was not so fortunate, whose driver once effected a seat on his camel, in defiance of his remonstrances, and threats, to deter him from such a piece of assurance.

At one o'clock, the young shaik moved forward, to procure us a supply of water from some springs which lie out of the road; and we proposed to remain here during the heat of the day. But we presently discovered something that made us hasten our departure. There was a certain Arab, whom I have already mentioned to have rendered himself very disagreeable to us, during our abode at Cosfire. This fellow had been appointed by the shaik as one of our guard; and was at this very time under the shade with us. By his assiduity on the road, he had tried to efface the unfavorable idea we had of him; and as our friend, he now insinuated to us, that it was better for us not to trust ourselves at Ghinnah, where the inhabitants were professed rogues, and would plunder our effects. Nay, he went so far as to propose to conduct us to Banute; a town a few hours higher up the river, where he could ensure us the best reception, and a choice of boats to transport us to Cairo. This circumstance was too barefaced not to alarm us, and we determined to push on, through an almost insupportable heat. But our conductor was absent, and we were left in the hands of our guard and the camel-drivers; a force which indeed we did not fear, but would have been glad to be quit of in a solitary and inimical place. This resolution was confirmed by Abdul Ruffar, our Arabian servant, who was entitled to credit from his past behavior. He advised us by no means to listen to, or remain with these rascals; but to follow

low the young shaik, whom they had the confidence to tell us was a foolish youth, who did not know our interests. Accordingly, at two o'clock, we mounted our camels, in spite of their importunities to wait until the evening, and moved on, in the most sultry day I had ever felt in the East. We soon rejoined the merchant's camels, which had taken shelter under a thorn-tree at some distance, and were ready to attend us. While united with this body, we did not fear going astray; and pursued our course, under a full security of being on the road to Ghinnah. We had no water, but what our earthen gurglets contained; and this was soon expended. It is impossible to describe what we suffered from heat and thirst during this stage. A mouthful or two of dirty water, which one of our guards gave me, made me forget for the moment his recent insolence; and all our former apprehensions were insensibly swallowed up in the more painful idea of falling victims to thirst. Our tongues actually became parched to our palates; and we were obliged to wet them every now and then, with spirituous liquors, to prevent suffocation from the clouds of dust which continual whirlwinds threw around us. This expedient was but transitory, and served indeed to encrease the rage of thirst. It was our common misfortune also to labor under a violent complaint in our bowels; and to the want of the bad water that occasioned it—a want which we had lamented in the most earnest manner—our preservation was probably owing. I was so afflicted myself with this disorder, that I could scarcely sit my camel through excess of pain. The wind and dust had equally affected our sight, so that we wandered on in agony and darkness. There is no doubt that our Arabian companions partook in some measure of our sufferings; but they were too much accustomed to the sun, to feel all the effects of his fury; and we had some reason to suspect, that their stock of water lasted long after ours had failed us. To crown this scene of distress, we at length overtook the shaik, who, we learnt, had been disappointed in replenishing his skins, by the appearance of wild Arabs about the springs. This news sounded like the knell of death in our ears; not from the neighborhood of these robbers, who were once so formidable to our fears, but from the absence of a fluid, on which we supposed our lives to depend. Faint and spiritless, therefore, we toiled on until eight o'clock at night, when we halted, without having encountered any foe in the way. But far different was this halting-place from any other we had come to. Without a draught of water to moisten our throats, it was impracticable to force down a morsel of bread; and the pain and weariness under which our bodies labored, were too extreme to admit of a momentary repose. Overwhelmed with hunger, thirst, and fatigue, we sat ourselves upon the ground, and revolved our melancholy situation in silence. Every skin was alternately ransacked by us for water, and not an article ticle left untried that was likely to produce the least moisture. My companions and I had unluckily recourse to raw onions, which were among the baggage. But no sooner had we tasted of this potent root, than we repented of our rashness. The effect was quite contrary to our hopes; and our drought was irritated to the highest degree. This stage was six hours, or fifteen miles.

At nine o'clock the word was given to resume our march. The doubtful light of the stars, and the evils we endured, prevented our seeing clearly what was going forward. But our Arab servant soon alarmed us with the intelligence of our having left the merchant's camels upon the ground; and by some words which the drivers had let drop in his hearing, that they had but a bad opinion of the shaik's intentions respecting us. The scene was now become very critical, and a catastrophe not very happy, appeared likely to ensue. We rode up immediately in a body to our fraudulent conductor, and charged him with treachery towards us. We instanced his first having parted company with the caravan, and then with the merchant's camels, which being both bound for Ghinnah, plainly indicated his unfriendly design of carrying us to another place. To our great surprize, he acknowledged the charge of deceit towards us in this particular, but endeavored to divest it of any sinister motives. That it was his father's opinion, as well as his own, that our departure might be retarded at such a city as Ghinnah, from the rumor of our riches, which would induce the officers of government to visit our baggage. That he had it in command from him to leave the caravan at the first stage, and to carry us by another route, without awakening our suspicions, which he must confess his countrymen had given too much cause to be directed against them. That the merchant's camels, from which we had just parted, would reach Ghinnah in a few hours; and that we should arrive about the same time at Banute, a village somewhat higher up the Nile, where we might embark secretly, and without molestation for Cairo. There was something as plausible in the substance of this defence, as engaging in the delivery of it. That coolness of temper, and ready eloquence, for which the Orientals are so conspicuous, were fully exerted on this occasion. From the former declarations of our guard, and the present confession of the shaik, we were assured there was a combination against us; but whether it had any ill tendency, we could not so easily determine. In truth, we were now in the power of our guides, and our deliberations could only terminate in a resolution, to sell our lives as dearly as possible, should they attempt to play us false.

There was but little variety in the scene during the remainder of this stage. The night was too dark to favor our observation of the objects around us, if our misfortunes had not extinguished every spark of curiosity within our breasts. Hour succeeded hour, without a vestige of fertility appearing;

ing, to announce a speedy period to our troubles ; and we were almost sunk into a fit of despair, when the sight of a camel, bearing two skins of water, raised us in a moment to the pinnacle of joy ! Colors would be faint to express the transports of wretches half-dead like us of thirst, at such a change ! We owed this supply to the good-nature of the shaik, who pushed on before us to the river, to relieve our distress ; and I must do him the justice to own, that no service could have been more material than what he rendered us on this occasion. Nor did it pass unrewarded. It restored him to our good graces, and we renewed our promise of an handsome donation on his putting us into a boat. Before I ventured to drink, I had the precaution to wash my mouth, and to gargle my throat several times. I recommended the same method to my companions, and I do not believe it was unserviceable, as the extreme dryness of our palates would otherwise have obliged us to swallow a quantity that might have proved fatal to us. But still we drank with great eagerness and pleasure. And it is not to be wondered at, considering the goodness of the water, and our long abstinence. We were now within a mile of the Nile, and at three o'clock arrived at a village composed of tents and huts. We made no disturbance in unlading our baggage, and having stretched our carpets upon the ground, betook ourselves to a short, though sound, repose. The last stage was six hours, or fifteen miles ; so that we travelled yesterday no less than

than

than eighteen hours, or forty-five miles; an amazing stretch, if our calamitous situation be considered. This part of the Nile, by our reckoning, lies 115 miles to the west of Cosire.

THURSDAY, 31st JULY.

We awoke this morning long after the sun had risen, and, upon looking around us, had the pleasure of seeing the Nile, which now began to be gilded with his early beams. We were near a quarter of a mile from the river, and could only obtain a view of the water through different openings in the bank. Here the borders are adorned in several places with the date and other fruit-trees; though the country around wears the same dreary aspect as before. In one of these verdant spots lies the village of Banute; the place we are in, being lonely and uncultivated, and consisting of a cluster of cottages, the property of some camel-drivers. Nothing can more evince the magnificence of this celebrated river, than its breadth at this distance from the sea. It appears to our eye not much less than a mile wide; though, with its windings, it cannot run a course of less than 700 miles, from its leaving Banute, until it discharges itself into the Mediterranean.

The young shaik was absent some hours, and brought us the disagreeable tidings, that no boat could be procured in this neighborhood. We were now reduced to the indispensable necessity of seeking one at Ghinnah; and the shaik left us, to get fresh camels to carry us to that city. We are again inclined to doubt the errand on which we came here; but whatever may have been the view of our conductor and his associates, a solution of their odd conduct cannot be very remote. While our patience is thus exercised in respect to our minds, it is not less so in a case of equal importance to our bodies. Though we have fasted, in a manner, for three days past, we are afraid to send to Banute for a supply of meat and fruit: the inhabitants, we learn, are impudent beggars, who would not wait our bestowing alms upon them, should they happen to be apprised of our small number. A pretty specimen, indeed, of a place which has been recommended to us by our guard! But the humble distance which the shaik keeps, shews plainly his opinion of it. A pair of pigeons which this place afforded, served just to allay the appetites of our company; and as we had no money at hand, the shaik lent us a couple of dollars to pay for them and some dried dates, which we took with us to eat upon the road.

At three o'clock in the afternoon we quitted this miserable village, and set out for Ghinnah, in tolerable health and spirits. Whether we owe our recovery to the sulubrious water of the Nile, or to a cessation of fatigue for the last twelve hours, we arose this morning with a perfect freedom from our late complaint. Our faces were now turned to the north, and we went for the most part of this stage in the same direction. This was no unpleasing circumstance, as we thereby presented our backs to the sun, which had so dreadfully annoyed us yesterday. At four we entered a sandy valley, where we saw an herd of deer. When we mounted the hills beyond it, we had a glance, for the first time, of a cultivated country. The Nile appeared about two miles to the westward, washing the foot of the mountains by which it is skirted on that side. To the eastward, the whole space between us was laid out in plantations of grain, which were watered by inlets from the river. There was an extraordinary contrast in the prospect before us, as could possibly occur in the wantonness of nature. The scene to our left, verdant, and crowded with clumps of stately trees, which were bounded by a fine river; while that to the right was barren as before, and offered nothing but sands and stony mountains to the eye.
north,

Our company was reduced by the absence of our guard, who had got the start of us on the road by the shaik's orders, so that we could not muster above ten camels, had we been in the way of danger. At five o'clock we passed by the ruins of a large village, which our guides tell us has long been abandoned on account of robbers, who were continually plundering the property of the inhabitants. Here we were also deserted by the shaik, who gave us notice of his intention to push on to the city to prepare an house for our reception. He assured us, that he could answer for our safety on the road, and at Ghinnah, where he would introduce us under cover of the night, and previously provide for our embarkation. Whatever reluctance we might have towards this step, it was impossible to frustrate it, and he put his camel on at such a trot, as made us lose sight of him presently. We were even worse provided with cattle than before, and on our endeavoring to mend their pace to keep up with the shaik, we received remonstrances from the owner against hurrying his camels. This fellow attended us, and was as surly a dog as I ever met with in my life. When he found that my companions and I paid little regard to his words, he had the impudence to make Abdul Ruffar, our Arab servant, and the poor Hindoo, alight, and trudge along on foot, under pretence that the beasts they rode, were overladen. When we were apprized of this circumstance, we rated the owner soundly for his insolence. But he remained inflexible, and I know not to what a pitch our difference would have arisen, if Abdul Ruffar had not wisely urged us to acquiesce in a thing, which he now pretended was a matter of choice. He had great merit for his prudent interference, at a time when we were about to forget the restraint we were under in this Mahometan region. And happy would it have been for the Fakeer, if he could have yielded to circumstances with equal temper. But his spirit was so wounded at the indignity which had been offered him, that he took the first opportunity tunity of remounting his camel, unobserved by the owner. We were at this juncture some hundreds of yards ahead, and were not a little surprized to hear the most lamentable outcries in our rear. These proceeded from the unfortunate Fakeer, whom we beheld under the discipline of the Arab's stick, but urging his beast forwards, without betraying the least design towards quitting his seat. As he approached us, his confidence seemed to redouble, and he began to pour forth the vilest abuse on his antagonist in the Moor language. It was perhaps conducive to his safety, that the Arab did not understand him, who, at our instance, not only desisted from the assault, but left him in quiet possession of the camel. This so elevated the spirits of the Hindoo, that giving more credit to his own vociferation than to our support, he descanted largely on his own courage and rank in life, which he averred was formerly a Subedar, or commander of Sepoys in the English service. As this man had hitherto kept a centinel on his lips, we did not regret the rude manner in which they had been put off their guard; as the many stories which now fell from them, served, in some measure, to banish painful reflexions. But, indeed, the scene which now disclosed itself, quickly absorbed our attention. After a six months confinement in a ship, and in barren countries, it was not without an exquisite satisfaction that I beheld the earth cloathed again in green, and adorned with her fairest ornaments of wood and water. The captive, who has long pined in a gloomy

gloomy dungeon, could not experience more joyful emotions at the sight of day, than animated me on this occasion. I looked about me with sensations unknown before. I called to my camel-driver to gather every blossom that the bushes afforded, which my imagination supplied with fragrance; and this part of the Nile, which would appear contemptible when opposed to the rudest banks of the Thames, was to me fraught with numberless beauties. We now, for the first time on our journey, beheld the marks of agriculture. The people were in some places tending their cattle, and in others following the plough. The river discovered itself at various breaches in the banks, about two miles to our left; and we saw wells that were worked by * pacotahs, as in India. Water-channels now intersected the road, to supply the country to the right of us, which here began to be cultivated. At these channels our poor camels halted, and drank with the eagerness and perseverance of creatures unaccustomed to quench the heaviest call of nature, which I may safely pronounce to be thirst. I can truly say, that, during the last three days, I have not eaten an ounce. Meat we had not, and I could never get down above a mouthful or two of bread. My companions were nearly in the same situation; which can only be attributed to our stomachs having been overcharged with the quantities of water, which the heat and dust obliged us to swallow.

* A pacotah is a machine of a very simple construction. By the means of a long bamboo, fixed across a well, a single man will raise water from the depth of ten or twelve feet, by walking up and down the bamboo. During this leisure movement, the man above encourages himself with a song, in which he is accompanied by his fellow, who stays below, to distribute the water as it comes up in the bucket.

Between the time of our seeing the ruined village and sun-set, we counted not less than a dozen desolated towns, which we were given to understand had been unpeopled on the same account; some large, and the houses still standing; and others defended by walls and towers, whose remains are still respectable. Were a traveller allowed to indulge a conjecture on a cursory view of things, I should rather suspect that these ruins were of far greater antiquity than the modern inhabitants of Egypt imagine; and that time, the grand destroyer of all human systems, had depopulated these parts, and not the dread of the roving Arabs. When the Saracens over-ran Egypt, whole cities must have yielded to the destructive tide; and while the bloody contest subsisted between them and the Turks, the rest were involved in the general wreck of this country's grandeur. I particularly remarked the ruins of one town, situated on two hills to the right of the road, and joined together by a wall which runs across the valley. The front of this town still extends itself a mile, and its towers and hummums, which are of stone, are many of them in tolerable repair. Our guides had, indeed, names for this, as well as some of the rest of these places; but being of Arab derivation, vation, they could throw no light on the subject of our enquiry.

The night was very bright, from the countless host of stars which are wont to shine with unclouded lustre in this serene hemisphere. A full hour before we reached Ghinnah, we left our northern direction, and travelled due west. The many gardens and plantations that we passed, announced our vicinity to the city, where we arrived at nine o'clock. At our entrance we went by a large mosque, which was illuminated, and full of people, who were attending divine service. We saw many good houses and streets, before we reached the lodgings that had been provided for us. Here we were housed at half past nine, without having met with any adventure that could tend to a discovery of our persons. The mansion seems large and commodious, and belongs to the merchant whose camels accompanied us the greatest part of the way. He welcomed us with great cordiality, and, having seen our baggage carried up stairs, lighted us himself to our apartment, where some new bread and fresh dates were served up to us. During our repast the merchant Mahomet, his brother Ally, and the shaik, attended us, and on their wishing us a good night, we reminded them of our anxiety to be gone. The last stage was six hours, or fifteen miles, so that we have come 130 miles since we left Cosire, though the direct distance must fall somewhat short of that number. While we were going to bed, we were thrown into some confusion by Major Alexander missing his Indian sabre. The baggage was rummaged for it in vain; so that we were obliged to call up our host to lay the complaint before him. The major now remembered having left it below stairs, and, as it could not be found, the suspicions of our host immediately fell upon the soldier, who had been so long the object of our aversion. This soldier he now sallied forth at this late hour to seek; and bidding the major be of good cheer, assured him that the sword should be recovered, if still within the precincts of the city.

F R I D A Y, 1st AUGUST.

I awoke at day-break to-day after a very sound repose. One night's rest had perfectly restored me to myself, if I may except a languor upon my limbs, which so laborious a journey might occasion to a constitution that is none of the strongest. When I had got on my Arabian habit, I perceived a pair of stairs that led to the top of the house. As I conceived myself to be sufficiently disguised, I made no scruple to ascend them, in order to take a view of the city. Ghinnah, or Cana, as the ancients called it, is pleasantly situated on the eastern banks of the Nile, in that district which is known by the name of Upper Egypt. By our nicest observation of its bearing from Cosire, it lies in the latitude  $26^{\circ} 35'$  N. which brings it considerably lower down the river than we find it, either in the old or modern maps. Its length extends from east to west, and its principal streets run in a parallel line, and ascend by a gentle acclivity from the river to the center of the city. This situation seems adapted to the neighborhood of the Nile, which, in the time of the floods, must lay the adjacent parts under water. Its appearance is truly romantic, as every house is surrounded with an inclosure, and partly concealed from view by the lofty date-trees, that every here and there mingle their tufted heads with the spiral mosques and swelling domes, as if ambitious to rival their proudest heights. I was proceeding in my observations, when our host came up to bid us good-morrow, and hearing that I was above, he called to me in haste to descend. I was rather surprized at this abrupt command; but when he pointed out the offence which his neighbors might take at having their women overlooked, I bore with the reproof, though my curiosity had not been awakened from that quarter. I was well acquainted with the jealousy of the Mahometans in this particular; and therefore did not consider the conduct of our host as any way unreasonable. To the great satisfaction of the major, he produced the sword, which he declared had been taken on the thief he mentioned. He demanded, however, eight dollars for the hire of two men, who had assisted him in the pursuit of the soldier some miles from the town. The money was paid to him without hesitation, as the weapon was of value to the owner; but our ideas of the justice which prevails here, became very unfavorable, when we understood that the loss of his plunder was the only punishment which the knave was likely to experience.

We feasted this morning at breakfast on cow's milk, to which we have been long strangers, and on the first good bread we have tasted in Egypt. Indeed, we learn, that this place is plentifully supplied with every necessary of life, situated in a serene climate, and far removed from the turbulence and intrigues of the capital we are hastening to. A picture, pretty in speculation, and what we flatter ourselves we shall find just in the practice. The shaik and our host joined us at our coffee, and we expected to have heard something of the boat; but their errand was to get such presents for the camel-drivers and guard, as are usual for travellers to give. We were content to be quit of them for a dollar each; though it went not a little against our inclination to include the roguish soldier among the number. Scarce had they left us, when we had a visit from the guard themselves. The offender came without a blush into our presence, and had the effrontery to make a jest of taking the sword, which he pretended he only meant to have kept as a pledge, for the present that was due to his comrade and himself. He added, that they were now come for that present, which they had so justly deserved at our hands, by the protection they had afforded us on the road. We were inclined enough to have disputed their merits in this case, had it not been in the power of these fellows to publish our arrival at Ghinnah, and expose us to the rapacity of the government. Their demand, therefore, met with a civiler reception than they expected, and we assured them that it had been already gratified. We were now witnesses to one of the most striking instances of the unlicensed tempers of the Arabs that ever occurred in history. For no sooner was the spokesman certified of the shaik's having received his quota, than he caught up his sabre which lay by him on the carpet, and half-drawing it, told us with a resolute air, that if we would disclose but the sum which the shaik had presumed to take without their knowledge, he would force it from his throat with the point of his sword. This language from a soldier, of his superior, did not suit our notions of military discipline; and we dispatched Abdul Ruffar to seek for the shaik, and acquaint him therewith. He soon came, and such a scene passed between the prince and subject, as baffles all description. An hundred times did they catch up their sabres, and challenge each other to instant conflict, and as often did they revile each other in the bitterest terms. But our friend had the greatest justice in his reproaches, as he stigmatized the soldier with having betrayed his trust, in respect to the major's sword. This breach of trust seemed to both of these warriors the principal crime in the robbery; and the quarrel waxed to such a pitch, that finding it impossible to soften their fury, we looked to our arms, in order to intimidate the soldier. His comrade had sneaked off in the beginning of this dispute, and wisely informed the people of the house of what was passing above. This intelligence, together with the noise, brought up the host with his family, just at the nick of time, that our apartment was about to become the scene of bloodshed, in a populous and civilized city, on the trifling subject of a few dollars! This company soon accommodated the matter, and the foldier was dismissed, with a promise of obtaining his dividend of the sum in question.
in

Our distaste for the people we are among, was so heightened by this late transaction, that we now pressed the shaik, very seriously, to discharge the obligation he was under to embark us in a boat for Cairo. We found ourselves at greater liberty, and under less apprehension, when committed to the wide waves in an Arab boat, than now when we are upon Arab ground; and I doubt if there was one among us, who would not have undertaken the pilotage of a boat to Cairo, though the current was the only guide he could depend upon, in preference to staying at Ghinnah a day longer. The shaik saw our anxiety, and assured us solemnly of his intention to keep his word, as soon as a boat could be got ready. Our host, and his brother Ally, offered to pledge themselves for the shaik's sincerity, and the latter proposed himself to accompany us to Cairo. They left us to sit down to a meal of wheat, boiled in mutton-broth, which had been delayed by the strange business of the day.

S, A T U R D A Y,

S A T U R D A Y, 2d AUGUST.

We are doomed to be the sport of fortune, to achieve adventures which we never aspired to, and to find our situation more dangerous than ever, at the moment that we are foolishly expecting the period of our troubles. Though the night was close, and I had not rested well, from the dust which incommoded the terrace we sleep upon, I was up, according to custom, at day-break, and in going down stairs to the back-yard, in order to wash me, was met by a servant of the house, who took me by the arm, and, with a significant gesture, hurried me up again in apparent agitation. When he could make a shift to explain himself, by the means of Ibrahim, we understood, to our great concern, that the vizier of the city was in the house, and locked up in close conference with our host. This early visit had a very unpromising appearance, and as we had remained within doors since our arrival, we attributed this discovery of us, to some treachery in those who were in the secret. My companions posted themselves on the stair-head, to learn, if possible, what was going forward, and I was ruminating in an inner apartment on the consequences of Arab duplicity, when they came running to me, with an account of the street-door being besieged by a body of horse. Our host himself followed them into the room, and, with the utmost shew of terror, desired us to load our fire-arms quickly, and assist him to defend the house, which he expected would be assaulted every moment. It was some time before we could get him to interpret the meaning of this alarm. We were not a little surprized at last to learn, that the horse at the door belonged to the shaik of Banute, and were sent with injunctions to carry us before their master, who had been apprized of our having passed his residence, without paying him the usual compliment. As improbable as this story appeared, what imposition was there which could not have been practised with success on people, who were utter strangers to the customs and language of the country? We were well informed of the independence of the Arab shaiks, and their propensity to extort money from travellers; and though the sending an armed force into a commercial town was incomprehensible to us, yet we did not know but it might enter into the system of their politics, where one party was superior to another. In order, we suppose, to terrify us into their measures, our host told us, that there was no regular government at present in Ghinnah; that every man was the protector of his own house, which he would defend, on our account, against all invaders. From one of our windows, which in this country more resembles a pigeon-hole than any thing else, we beheld a number of horsemen, who paraded the street, but did not betray any intentions to proceed to violence. On our observing this matter to our host, he pretended that it discovered an inclination to treat with us; and immediately went down to the gate, to make, as he said, the best terms for us in his power. Thus were we, on a sudden, shut up in a beleaguered place, and either on the point of being put to the sword, or being obliged to deliver ourselves up prisoners of war. The castle was besieged in form, and the treacherous governor about to forego his trust. We remained, during this interval, under arms in our apartment, and had centinels posted on the stairs, to apprize us of any danger. After this farce — for a farce it was, though of a very serious nature to us — had been kept up for two hours and upwards, our host at length came up. He told us, that he had so far succeeded, as to get us excused from our visit to Banute, for a pecuniary consideration, and that the sum of 150 dollars would free us from these troublesome guests. From the vizier's visit, and the strange conduct of the host, we suspected there was a collusion between them and the cavalry at the door, and that we had already fallen within the gripe of the government of Ghinnah. Under this persuasion we submitted with a good grace, to what we judged was unavoidable. We paid down fifty dollars in advance, though we loudly protested against the imposition, which we declared would leave us almost destitute of money. To moderate our vexation, and to revive the pleasing ideas of our departure, our host very artfully shifted the subject, and reminded us of putting him in cash for the boat, boat, which the shaik and his brother was gone in pursuit of. His demand was forty dollars, which we readily deposited in his hands, on his solemn declaration, that he received them for the hire of a boat, which should be ready for our reception at night.

In a short time after our host had left us, he returned to advise us of the vizier's approach, who followed him into our apartment, attended by a number of officers of state. They came, as they informed us, to enquire into our business, and our reasons for travelling through their country. Tho' they had taken us rather unawares, we put the best face we could upon the matter, and declared ourselves travellers, whom ill-fortune, and not our own inclinations, had led among them. On their demanding our pass, we produced the one from the vizier of Yambo; and we thought it fortunate that we could shew them letters from Captain Bacon, and the supercargoes of the snow Adventure, to Ibrahim Beg, the bey of Cairo, to convince them that our journey was not a secret to the bey. The vizier put the pass into his pocket, and we remarked, that he eyed the letter to the bey with great attention, and whispered with apparent earnestness to some of his followers before he returned it to us. We gathered the most flattering presages from this incident; and as he had preserved the utmost politeness and moderation in this interview, we saw the vizier and his train depart, in the fullest confidence of having found protection in our letters, against the government, which were so well inclined to have persecuted us.

When these people were gone, we partook of a repast which the family had provided for us. It was simple, but well dressed, and consisted of meat and vegetables, both stewed and roasted. We had not seen the young shaik all day, and were uneasy at his absence. When he made his appearance, he assured us that he had been employed in our service since we saw him last, and that he only wanted the money, to secure the boat which he had engaged for us. But this information seemed chiefly to be a prelude to his own demands, and we discovered that he was come, like the rest of his countrymen, for a present. Though we had promised him a gratuity conditionally, yet as we placed too much reliance on the oath of an Arab, we hoped to bind him more strongly to us, by an act that favored of confidence, as well as of bounty. We therefore presented him with twenty dollars; and Mr. Hammond gave him a shawl to which he had taken a liking. He appeared so much struck with this generosity, that he swore by his Prophet, he would not leave the house until a boat was provided for us. We then sent for our host, with whom we had entrusted the boat-hire; but understood from him, that he had just paid it away with the rest of the money to the Banute cavalry, who, on this prompt payment, had relinquished their first demand. Tho' this story was rather strange, it carried not a suspicious fuspicious air on the face of it. We saved sixty dollars by the manœuvre, and readily proffered to advance the boat-hire anew. A reys, or nokidah, accompanied the host, who, after some altercation, agreed to let us have a large, commodious boat, to carry us to Cairo, for fifty-five dollars. As the price was considerably increased, we affected to run short of cash, in hopes to impress them with a notion of our being too poor to be worth detaining. Accordingly we produced several Indian coins, both of gold and silver, which we desired might be weighed, to make up the sum. Though we let them understand that these were pocket-pieces, which we had preserved through curiosity, I fear this expedient was the means of awakening the avarice of these robbers, and teaching them to expect a hoard of this treasure. On receiving the amount, with five dollars besides, to provide bread and two or three sheep for the voyage, the shaik, our host, and the nokidah, swore in conjunction to the immediate performance of the treaty. But they think, as the poet says of lovers, that "Jove laughs at Arab perjuries," and they can swallow the most sacred oaths, without the smallest intention to keep them. And this we found more strongly verified than ever.

On the faith of their promises we had packed up our baggage, and disposed ourselves for our removal. Nine o'clock was the appointed hour, and we waited for it with all the impatience of a bridegroom, who looks forward to the moment which is to crown his fondest wishes. But our watches announced the hour, and no Arabs appeared. We, however, accounted easily for the delay; especially as the natives must find it difficult to ascertain time, in a country where clocks and watches are unknown. Ten o'clock came, and brought no intelligence of them. Our suspense now began to be cruel; and we sent Abdul Ruffar down stairs, to enquire what was become of the host and his companions. He returned without having obtained any other tidings, than their being still abroad. It is impossible to give the reader an idea of our situation during this interval. We were assembled on a terrace that was open to the air, and had no other light than what the stars afforded us. The worst interpretation was put upon their absence, by some of our company. Ibrahim began to despair; and Abdul Ruffar himself could not account for the conduct of his countrymen. Tired out with fruitless expectation, we stretched ourselves upon our carpets, and endeavored to compose ourselves to rest. In the midst of our disordered slumbers, we were suddenly alarmed, about midnight, by a noise at the outward gate of the house. We heard the door open, and the sound of a man's feet hastily ascend the stairs. Hope hung upon his steps; and when we beheld our host enter with a light in his hand, we called out, as if with one voice, that we were ready to attend him. Judge ye, who have ever experienced the fallacy of appearances in matters nearest to the heart—judge of our emotions, when

when we found, that, instead of a boat being in readiness to carry us away, the vizier and his train were below ! The late hour, our recent disappointment, and the surprize which this news threw us into, operated together to render us very unfit to receive these unwelcome visitants. But we had not even time to enquire into the meaning of this intrusion, when the vizier entered. He was accompanied by all the officers who were with him in the morning ; but his retinue was now enlarged by a number of soldiers, each of whom bore a torch in his hand. They seated themselves, without waiting to be asked, on the carpets which we had risen from ; and calling for our interpreter, the vizier desired him to tell us, that he was come to levy a duty on the goods and jewels that we had with us : that he and the council of state had formed a resolution to demand no more than 4,000 dollars ; and if we refused to pay so moderate a sum, they must send us to their master, the Shaik-Ul-Arab, who was then on the frontiers of his dominions, to answer for our refusal. The exorbitancy of the demand made us treat it in a light manner ; and as to our taking another journey upon camels, we declared it was better to die here, than to fall a sacrifice to the fatigues of the Arabian method of travelling. We told them our baggage lay ready for their inspection, and they might soon satisfy themselves of our poverty. Whether this confident behavior impressed them with an idea of our sincerity, or that their designs were not ripe for execution, cution, we cannot pronounce; but the vizier declined the search. He however politely insinuated, that a shawl or two would be very acceptable to him. I had two fine ones belonging to my Turkish dress, which had stood me in 100 dollars. These I produced without hesitation, tho' I declared truly they were all I had, when I presented them to the vizier. On receiving them, the minister begged us to be easy, as he now considered us to be under his protection, and would give us a pass in the morning for our safety down the river. When he had taken his leave, we reproached our host for the failure of his word. But he shifted the blame from himself to the vizier, who, he assured us, had put a stop to our voyage for this night. He repeated his former assertions, that the boat was ready for our reception. In short, he drew so flattering a picture of the vizier's good intentions towards us, and expressed such a zeal for our service, that he obtained his ends of getting a shawl himself from Major Alexander, and of lulling us once more into a transient security.

S U N D A Y, 3d AUGUST.

The morning came, only to furnish us with fresh instances of the perfidy of these people. Instead of the vizier's pass, or any signs of our departure, we were left to our own reflexions, and we saw nothing of the young shaik, of our host, or of his brother.

Nay,

Nay, to such a pitch was their neglect carried, that at noon we found there was no dinner provided for us in the house. In this embarrassment we sent out Abdul Ruffar to purchase us some provision; and as we understood the city abounded with Christian merchants, we directed him to apply to them for their opinion of our detention, and for their advice and assistance on this alarming occasion. Too strict a watch was kept upon the motions of Ibrahim, to admit of his negotiating such a matter for us. It was rarely that he was suffered to stir out of doors, under pretence that the people of Banute were once more in search of us, to tax us in another present; and when this liberty was allowed him, he was attended by the host, or some of the family. We were yet in the dark, therefore, in respect to the form and nature of the government under whose extortions we groaned. But we gave the absent prince, whoever he might be, full credit for a principal share in our sufferings.

In about an hour's time our faithful domestic returned, with a couple of fowls and some greens, which he immediately set about to dress for us. But, to our great concern, he had met with no success in the more material part of his errand. No admittance had been given him at the Christian houses, because it was the hour of dinner; an hour sacred to privacy among the Oriental nations. While we were waiting for our humble repast, we were not a little surprized at the sight of the vizier, who came to pay us a visit, attended only by his servants, who remained below. It was about two o'clock, and long past his time of dining. Nevertheless, on our victuals appearing, he sat down to a single dish with us, and partook with much seeming satisfaction of the fare which was put before him. He called for spirits, which he jocosely said the Christians were the most choice in, and drank several coffee-cups of rum, both during and after our meal. The vizier's name is Mahmoud. He is a young man of about thirty years of age, tall and well made, of a pleasing aspect and insinuating address, lively and entertaining in his discourse, and void of the reserve which marks the generality of his nation. It appeared to us that he was come incog, with an intent to unbend himself with the novelty of European company, and with the charms of a liquor which is forbidden by his law. But strong as these motives might be, we had quickly cause to be convinced, that there was another more prevalent in his bosom, which induced him to honor us with this visit. He began his attack in complimenting the knowledge and sagacity of our countrymen, and in passing the highest encomiums on the manufactures of our country. He dwelt in particular on the beauty of the fire-arms, and, by an easy transition, expressed a desire to possess a pair of English pistols. I had one pair left, very handsomely mounted with silver, which I immediately presented him with. These had been seen by our treacherous host the preceding morning, when we had taken up arms to de-send the house, and as I perceived that the vizier had got an item of them, I parted with them in the best manner I could. Not satisfied with this compliance, he now cast his eye on the major's sword. But its master had too great a value for an old and trusty servant, to give it up so easily. He had already redeemed it from the hands of a robber, and, perhaps, on that account, prized it more than ever. But the vizier's inclination for the sword seemed to increase, in proportion to the reluctance of the owner to resign it. In such a situation as ours, I could not see the use of with-holding any article from a man, who, by his rank and authority, might apparently dispose of us as he pleased. In my experience of these people, I had never found the good of resistance, in cases of this nature; and cannot take any shame upon myself for advising conciliating and pacific measures, in a country where a successful opposition would prove fatal to us. We had arms to defend ourselves, and I believe skill to have repelled superior numbers; but it must be allowed, that we should dearly have abided a recourse to them. Under this conviction, I endeavored to soften the vizier's disappointment, by tendering him a creese, or dagger, in lieu of the sword he wanted. Its handle was agate, studded with small rubies and emeralds; and as it belonged to my Turkish dress, was a very proper present to an Arab. This creese, with the pistols, cost me seventy dollars at least; but the sooner we are divested of our valuables, the nearer will be the hour of our departure. The meaning of this interview was too obvious to escape our notice; and we should have been content to have purchased this minister's friendship at the price of our baggage. Though every request he made could only be construed into a demand, he never exceeded the bounds of good-breeding in this piratical visit; and it must be acknowledged, that there never existed a more polite robber than the vizier of Ghinnah. He had the art to shift the discourse to something flattering or amusing to us, whenever we attempted to touch on the subject of our departure; and notwithstanding we perceived his drift, he had the address to evade the question, and to lead us from the point we had always in view. In short, he laughed with us, rallied with us, and drank with us; and, as a particular compliment, obliged us in our turns to smoke of his pipe. He lengthened his visit until eight o'clock in the evening, and, during the whole time, displayed all the skill and education of a professed courtier. We were absolutely foiled in our attempts to sound this politician's mind; and, at the end of the interview, had not obtained the least insight into the extent of his designs upon us. When we lamented our confinement in a private house, and complained of the deceitful conduct of our host, he affected to take a part in our troubles. But his language was ambiguous, and left us to conceive something more than it conveyed. At his departure, however, he assured us with a smile, that he intended to renew his visit on the morrow; but that he should insist on standing our caterer, and sending us a dinner more suitable to our condition. To this he added, that he hoped it would be the last meal we should eat in Ghinnah. Inconclusive as these words were, we were somewhat assured by them, and thanked the minister very cordially for his good intentions.

M O N D A Y, 4th AUGUST.

What with the anxiety of our minds, and the closeness of our apartment, we pass our nights in a very uncomfortable manner. The weather is very sultry, and the high walls which surround us on all sides, seem calculated to prevent a free circulation of air. But we had more important cares to engage our attention. From the wreck of our fortunes, we were intent to save a sufficiency to carry us to Europe, should it please God to deliver us from this rapacious tribe. I had about 100 l. left in venetians and guineas, which, with a gold watch, and a ruby ring of some value, I concealed in an handkerchief about my waist. My European servant contrived also to carry about him some pictures and trinkets set with jewels, of mine, in his sash and turban. Mr. Hammond and the major made use of similar contrivances, to preserve their treasure. But the abundant riches of the latter became a grievous burden to him. He had lent the supercargo of the Adventure 1000 pagodas, or

400l. respondentia, to be paid at Suez. At our departure from Yambo he had received this sum, and what with pagodas and rupees that he had besides, he could not at that time be in possession of less than 1000 l. in specie. A large capital, and though somewhat lessened by our former travels, still considerable enough to put him to great difficulties in the disposal of it. An heavy bag of 500 venetians was suspended about Ibrahim's waist, and afforded us no little trial of the honesty and attachment of this Indian. The major's slave-boys were likewise encumbered with gold and silver; and a prodigious handsome sword, which he had hitherto secreted in his bed, was now, for greater security, hidden in a hole under the staircase. The handle and scabbard were of silver, highly wrought, and doubly gilt. This sword was valued at 100 l. sterling, and was once the property of an eastern prince. These measures were adopted, from a suspicion that our trunks would undergo a scrutiny to-day, and that nothing but this ceremony having hitherto been omitted, obstructed our departure. It was our original misfortune to be lumbered with too much baggage, and it had been better that we had committed every thing to the waves at Cosire, than to have brought any packages but papers with the caravan. Its appearance almost warranted the exaggeration of the vulgar; and the approach of the English travellers, loaded with gold, precious stones, and merchandize, was every where published. As they had no idea of people being led by curiosity or accident to visit their country, it was very natural for them to place our journey to the desire of gain, and to consider us in the light of merchants. Instead of coming here with privacy — as we had foolishly believed on the word of our conductor—it now appears, that we were expected with impatience by the principal inhabitants; and that our persons and our goods had only been transferred from one hand to another. To the blessing of God only can we now attribute the moderation of the shaik of Cosire, and our preservation on the road hither. Our lives and property had been at the disposal of him and his dependants, and we could not but shudder to reflect on the company we had travelled with. But to be exposed to pillage in a large and populous town, to which merchants of different countries resort, is only to be explained by the strange ideas they entertain of our baggage, which they will not search, though we press them to do it, and will not seize, though inclined to possess it. Thus kept in a struggle between avarice and fear, our journey is delayed, our apprehensions awakened, and our lives possibly endangered, until the conflict shall be decided in the breasts of these spoilers!

We have seen nothing of the young shaik since he received his present, nor of our host Mahomet, since he made us the fine promises of a speedy departure. Ibrahim watched an opportunity this morning to slip out unobserved, and to accompany pany Abdul Ruffar to some Christian houses. They were directed to sound these people, respecting the protection they were inclined to afford us. To know whether they could harbor us in their houses, in case we effected an escape from our prison; or at least would assist in procuring us a boat, to accomplish our flight under cover of the night. This negotiation was as fruitless as all the others we had undertaken. Neither their desires to serve us, nor the hopes of a good reward, were forcible enough to command the interposition of these Christians, confident as they were that we labored under the persecution of the government. To fill up the measure of our distress, the very boatmen, whom Ibrahim spoke to distantly on the subject, positively declined to receive us on board without a passport. Once more then must we give up the flattering prospect of liberty, and attend with patience the issue of our misfortunes.

It has been remarked by some philosopher, that in every trial to which humanity is put, how numerous soever the illusions of hope, there is still a succession of causes to revive this active principle, and to preserve the mind from the influence of despair. It is a pleasure to me to subscribe to a sentiment, which holds out so comfortable a truth to mankind, and which ascribes so benevolent a property to the divine ordination of events. Various had been the turns of our fortune, but never had we lost sight of an happy sequel. Even now, when all immediate succour is denied us, we look forward to a distant promise. The Indian Fakeer, whom we had not seen since our arrival here, and whose absence we could only attribute to his having pursued his journey, followed Ibrahim into the house, and offered to carry a letter to Cairo. He informed us of his having been frequently denied admittance to us, and urged us to dispatch him with all possible speed, that he might depart unnoticed. The gratitude of this poor Indian excited our admiration, and we delayed not a moment to take advantage of his unexpected offer. We penned a short but pathetic letter to Mr. Baldwin at Cairo, acquainting him of our alarming situation, and begging his interest with the bey to demand our release of this government. We had every reason to believe that our letter from Cosire had not reached Mr. Baldwin, but we had a better foundation for the success of this, as the bearer had evinced himself our friend, and was in a character that would render him unsuspected. But to ensure the delivery of it, as much as lay in our power, we presented the Fakeer with five dollars, and on the back of the letter desired Mr. Baldwin would pay him as much more, as a reward for his fidelity. The Indian was very thankful for this kindness, and after concealing the letter in his turban, took leave of us with no little emotion. He luckily went out of the house unquestioned by the porter; and we prepared ourselves to receive the vizier, in a better temper of mind than we had been in for some time past.

At two o'clock the minister came, accompanied
only

only by the traitor Ally. We were glad to find that he was not unmindful of his promise; and indeed he exceeded our expectations in the sumptuous dinner he had provided for us. It consisted of thirty covers, wherein various kinds of fish, flesh, and fowl, were served up to our table. We had not seen so plentiful a meal for many a day, and were not backward in doing honor to it. The vizier was particularly attentive in recommending the best dishes to us, and seemed much pleased at the appetite with which we ate. He relaxed entirely of his state, and when the victuals were removed, he and Ally set in for serious drinking. It was impossible for us to escape a dram or two, which he forced upon us. But he would take no excuse from Ally, who being a Mussulman like himself, was called upon to keep him in countenance. The rum was old, and consequently potent, and did not require a great quantity to intoxicate these boon companions. The vizier's head however was much the strongest; and while the liquor only rendered him more talkative, its effects upon Ally were mischievous and alarming. He acted a thousand extravagancies, and at length pulled one of the vizier's pistols out of his girdle, and fired it in the air. In this state of frenzy the pistol might as well have been directed at one of our breasts, and we were very glad, in a few minutes after, to see him sink upon the floor in a fit of stupefaction. This afforded matter of great triumph to the minister, who began to conceive an infinite affection for us, talked of carrying us home to an house more eligible for our reception, and in the fulness of his heart, offered us horses and guards to conduct us through the city. He was very desirous to play a game of chess with me, when he understood I was conversant with it, and we were entertaining hopes of being benefited in some shape or other by this paroxysm of kindness, when he was suddenly overcome by sleep. He stretched himself upon the carpet on which he had been sitting, and all our airy notions of relief vanished with his waking thoughts.

He had been upwards of an hour in this situation, when a messenger brought a letter, the delivery of which was too important to be dispensed with. We therefore ventured to wake the minister, who I believe was ashamed to be found in such a manner. On perusing it, he said the contents concerned us. That the shaik of Banute had sent two boats to pursue us down the Nile, under a supposition of our having pushed on for Cairo, and that they were now returned to seek us here. He bade us however to rely on his protection, and to keep ourselves quiet until these people had left the city, when he would dispatch us with safety. He then took his leave, not empty-handed, as during the visit he had wheedled the major out of a shawl, which appears to be the chief object of his desires. We had gained no ground in this interview; and held the revival of the Banute story, as a mere feint to renew renew our apprehensions, and to conceal the real motives of our detention.

T U E S D A Y, 5th AUGUST.

The prospect begins to grow darker and darker, and our departure seems to be more distant than ever. We are utterly neglected by the family, and, in a manner, forsaken by the world. We had sent Abdul Ruffar to search for them in vain, when about eleven o'clock he returned with Ally. He was just risen from his bed, and the fumes of the liquor were scarcely evaporated from his brain. We were not sorry to see him in a situation, from which we had a chance of procuring some material intelligence. But he was a traitor in his cups, and gave the lie to the notion that good liquor will make a rogue honest. For my own part, I had been so mortified at the depravity of human nature, which, in the shape of our landlord and his associates, had not only violated the rights of hospitality, but repeatedly broken the most tremendous oaths which could be taken in the sight of a just God, that I was tempted at times to disown my alliance to such a race. Oppressed by one part of it, and unassisted by another, whose religion should have enforced their compassion towards us, it is not surprizing that we beheld them with an eye of abhorrence and distrust. We had experienced that there was no safety among them, and to the inter-

position of the divine Power alone, could we look for our deliverance. But the simplicity of Ibrahim led him to renew a confidence, so often misplaced. He gave more credit to the word of a Mussulman, and was the last to see into their falsehood. He took great pains to worm out of Ally the secret intentions of his brother. Repeatedly did he demand what they sought for from us, and as often did he proffer in our name to leave our baggage to them, provided they would convey us and our papers to a boat. Shame frequently appeared in Ally's face during this interrogation; and it was not without the hesitation attached to a guilty conscience, that he acknowledged they wanted more valuables. On this the major produced a silver mug, which he promised to deliver to the brothers at the river-side. But Ally would not be satisfied without a diamond-ring, which he had seen on the major's finger at Cosire. This was a ring of no inconsiderable value, and had been imprudently exposed by the major, at a moment, indeed, when he did not suspect the mischief which was hatching against us. It would have been impossible, perhaps, to have waved this demand, if the major had not luckily been in possession of a paste ring of nearly the same size, which he imposed upon Ally for the diamond one. This ring and the silver mug were to be his, when he performed his engagement of putting us into a boat. The sight of them seemed to rouse the fellow, and to animate his zeal in our behalf. He left us on the instant, with a design to seek his brother, brother, and to see what could be done for us. As an earnest of his good intentions, he left word with Abdul Ruffar below, that he would provide a dinner for us, which we were likely to have gone without before. We saw nothing of him however until two o'clock, when he brought us a very scanty and indifferent dish of fish stewed in oil. We could not help murmuring at our condition, and the rascal apologized, as well as he could, for the badness of the victuals. We were now left to ourselves for the rest of the day, to solve if possible the intentions of our enemies, and to deliberate in vain on the best measures to guard against their malignity.

In the evening, Ally brought his brother to us, whom we had not obtained a sight of for the three last days, though supposed to be under the same roof with us. Nature had been very just to this man, as the villainy of his disposition was written in legible characters in his countenance. He was in a manner dragged up to our apartment, and his present appearance would not have discredited a king's evidence at the Old-Bailey. He hung his head, though possessed of an infinite stock of assurance, and the frivolous reasons which he assigned for his absence, were the plainest proofs of his guilt. He now joined with Ally in seeming earnest for our departure, and which he assured us nothing delayed but the search of our baggage. This ceremony he understood, was to be performed in the morning, and he fully discovered his principles, by desiring us to suffer him and Ally to inspect our baggage before the vizier came to do it. There was a time when this proposal would have been treated with the contempt it deserved; but our immediate dependence on these fellows, obliged us to listen to it with complacency. We were aware of their knavish designs, but we considered our effects as the clog which impeded our course; and a livelier picture cannot be exhibited of our situation, than the readiness with which we accelerated the hour, which might leave us destitute of the common necessaries of life. Our operations were now confined to the obtaining of our enlargement. We thought only of resuming our journey. The means of accomplishing so arduous an undertaking, were entirely left to the direction of chance.

W E D N E S D A Y, 6th AUGUST.

This is the sixth day of our arrival at Ghinnah, and we are as perfect strangers to the place as the hour we came here. Our view is limited to the street in which we live, and which we peep into from our windows, that are very small and very high. Here our faces engage the attention of passengers, many of whom are brought by curiosity to view us: the detention and ill usage of European travellers having made no little noise about the city. But compassion is the only medicine they can afford us. Although our case is known, we have little chance of relief under so precarious a government, where the ruling maxim seems to be, that the weaker side must go to the wall.

It is our fortune once more to excite the pity of the fairer part of the creation, and to find tenderness and humanity among the members of an Arab tribe. Exactly opposite to our prison is the haram of a man of some consequence, if we can judge of him from the number of his women. It was but two days ago that we discovered we were the objects of these females' regard; who, when the sun goes down, come tripping by pairs to the front of their terrace, and, by signs and salutations, enquire into our welfare, and lament their inability to relieve our distresses. Some of these women are beautiful, and all well made; and they make no scruple to appear before us unvailed, at no greater distance than the breadth of a narrow street. It would be an easy matter for us to discourse together, with the help of our interpreter, were we not afraid, in our critical situation, of incurring suspicion and danger. We find satisfaction, however, in this dumb intercourse. Unavailing as their sympathy must prove, our vanity is not the less flattered by it. We have retorted upon our oppressors without design, and triumph over them in the tenderest point!

Before we had breakfasted, our host and his brother visited us, to make the proposed search. We readily opened our trunks to them, and they were not not a little surpris'd to find nothing but linen and cloaths, where they expected at least to light upon piece-goods, jewels, and money. They took, however, two handsome china bowls, a box of cut Trichinopoly stones, half a dozen sheets, and a Turkish habit from the major; and from me a Turkish coat only. Mr. Hammond's trunks escap'd their hands. We were much astonish'd at this moderation, but suppose an apprehension of the vizier's catching them in the fact, occasioned their hasty retreat. As they were going away, Ally staid until his brother was out of hearing, and then ask'd the major in a whisper, to let him secrete the silver mug which was promis'd him when we enter'd the boat. It unluckily stood on the window-seat with the remains of the major's breakfast, and without waiting for an answer, Ally took it up, and march'd with it down stairs.

We had scarcely got rid of these plunderers, when the vizier and his train made their appearance. They were very rigid in their scrutiny, until they came to a box belonging to me, which contain'd a packet and letters of consequence. The manner in which this box was secured, with nails and wax-cloth, gave them hopes of being well rewarded for their trouble. But when the lid was taken off, and the contents were display'd, never was such surprize seen, as was betray'd in the countenances of the vizier and his adherents. They seem'd to awaken as from a dream, and after conferring together with evident marks of disappointment, they precipitately retired, retired, notwithstanding our remonstrances, that they would finish the examination, and permit us to depart, though at the expence of our baggage.

We had sent Abdul Ruffar abroad to procure intelligence, and he returned with the news, that a boat was on the point of setting out for Cairo. He had founded the nokidah, to know what he would do in our behalf; who, in defiance of bribery, would only venture to convey a letter for us to that city. As nothing could be effected towards our escape, we were content to address another letter to Mr. Baldwin, relating the new troubles we had met with, and the necessity of his immediate assistance, to deliver us from the perils which environed us. This letter Abdul Ruffar carried with great secrecy to the nokidah, who, in consideration of a present, undertook to deliver it to Mr. Baldwin.

In the afternoon the vizier repeated his visit, under pretence of taking down our names, and making out the pass for our departure. The conduct of this man towards us had been truly singular. He had courted us for his own views, and he had deceived us without any apparent motive. He had taken indeed many things from us in a polite way, but when he had an opportunity of satisfying his avarice with the choice of our moveables, he shrunk back, as if ashamed or afraid to persevere in his intentions. This palpably shews that there is a ruling authority to which he is accountable, and to which we are indebted for our security to this hour. He positively told us that we should go at night, and our host as positively promised us his camels, to transport us and our baggage to the river-side. At six o'clock our host came, but it was only to inform us, that the young shaik had ran away to Coſſre with the boat-money. We could not at first think ſo ill of our conductor, but our host assured us, that we had ſeen our laſt of him. More money was now demanded for the hire of a boat, but we had ſo long perſiſted in the ſtory of our money being all expended, that we could not have produced any, without confirming their opinion of our wealth. This fellow, however, had the addreſs to obtain the ſword from the major, which had been reſuſed to the vizier, and had been redeemed, with ſuch trouble, from the clutches of the ſoldier. This ſword he now demanded upon the footing of a former promiſe; and the major thought proper to gratify his wiſhes. He has been a material ſufferer during the tranſactions of this day.

T H U R S D A Y, 7th AUGUST.

We were at breakfast upon ripe figs and bread, for which we were indebted to the attention of Abdul Ruſſar, who is our caterer at ſuch times as our host neglects us, when two of the vizier's people entered the room, accompanied by our host and his father. The laſt is an old man, and not only privy to the iniquitous conduct of his ſons, but a tormenting ſolicitor himſelf for any thing that comes within his view.

view. The trite tale of the Banute cavalry being returned for money, was once more attempted to be imposed upon us; but we had learned to parry the attack, by desiring them to convey our baggage to the horsemen, who were welcome to dispose of it as they thought fit. This liberal offer did not suit their designs. It was the specie which they looked for, and it seemed as if they began to suspect that we did not keep it among our baggage. From 1000 dollars, which these mock agents at first demanded, they fell at once to 100, then to 80, 60, 40, and at length to 20 dollars! The vizier's adherents soon retired, when they found themselves treated in so cavalier a manner, and left us to discuss the matter with Mahomet. This is the Cerberus whom we are to gain over, if the door to our escape is to be opened to us. We have tempted him with many a sop, but his price is yet to be reached, if it be in his power to permit of our departure. We condescended to assure him, that we had not the money to satisfy this demand; but that, to oblige him, we would give up our silver spoons, which we used at our table, and which were equal to the value of twenty dollars. He appeared to listen with great attention to this proposal, but suddenly recollecting himself, he paused for a moment, and told us, that without a letter, specifying that he had received no money from us, he could concern himself no further about our affairs. The effrontery of this Arab exceeded, if possible, his depravity. He talked as if his endeavors had been exerted for our good ; and held the language of friendship amid the daily practice of injustice. We were, therefore, not a little rejoiced to find, that our host did not quietly enjoy the fruits of his villainy. On inquiring into the necessity of giving him such a letter, we learned that the town's people threatened to pillage his house, and to share with him the 1000 venetians which he was reported to have obtained from us. A declaration under our hands of its falsity, would stifle the report, and preserve his property from being left to the mercy of an enraged populace. We had been so little accustomed to truth in this country, that we were become sceptics in every thing, which did not immediately fall under our own observation. This fellow, however, had evidently some reason for his fears, and, in order to discover their origin, we dismissed him with a promise of furnishing him with the paper he wanted.

Ibrahim informed us, that he had been frequently pressed by Ally, to go abroad with him at unseasonable hours. This behavior awakened our suspicions, that some foul play was intended to this faithful domestic ; and we accordingly cautioned him not to trust himself in Ally's company. But by a strange infatuation, he neglected this admonition ; and by venturing out of doors, when we had laid down to take our afternoon-nap, fell into the net which was spread for him, and very nearly involved us in the danger we were mostly to apprehend. He returned about five o'clock in a state of intoxication, and could hardly find words to explain the cause of it,

when he became quite beside himself. We gathered, nevertheless, from him, that Ally had met and inveigled him into a coffee-house, under pretence of treating him with a dish of coffee. That he had tasted something particular in the coffee, and would not be prevailed upon to stay, when he found his head begin to grow giddy. That villain Ally had doubtless introduced an opiate into the cup; and whatever his view was, it was baffled by the resolution of Ibrahim, who forced his way home in that condition, and displayed a conduct we did not give him credit for before to-day. The major's bag of venetians was still about him; but it was impossible for us to know what intelligence might not have been drawn from him in such a situation. He was by no means addicted to liquor; and though he would not refuse his dram when on board the Adventure, he had so long abstained from spirits, that we were convinced he had not been assisting to his own intoxication. We had the greatest confidence in his honesty and attachment, but we dreaded the discoveries which he unknowingly might have made. We were anxious to suppose that no harm had yet been done, and hurried him to bed in an inner apartment, where we watched him like a child, that he might not get down stairs, or hold any conversation with Mahomet or Ally, until he was sobered again. These blood-hounds followed the scent which the latter had hit off, and came up repeatedly, under pretence of talking to Ibrahim about our departure. But we were aware of their intentions, and hindered their waking or getting any access to him. It would not have been so easy for us to have prevented the intrusion of the vizier, and we trembled for his appearance at this moment. I can declare for myself, that I have not experienced the poignancy of distress until this accident; by which we find ourselves brought to the brink of destruction, through the simplicity of one of our own attendants. The morning, we hope, will restore him to a sense of his folly, and dispel the cloud which thickens around us.

FRIDAY, 8th AUGUST.

The occurrences of this day have been so crowded, so strange, and so affecting to humanity, that the reader will doubtless offer a plea to himself for the irregularity of a narrative, which was taken down late at night, and while our fates were still in all the horrors of uncertainty. The desire of being held in the memory of mankind, even awaits us to the mouth of the grave; and however hideous the danger, a liberal mind cannot bear the idea of going out of the world by an obscure and unknown track, while there is a chance of transmitting its sufferings, its fortitude, and its resignation, to the regard of posterity. And should it please God to permit this journal of our distresses, to survive the general wreck which threatens our lives and property, it may have the merit of disclosing to others, the perils which attend the traveller through this savage clime; and to warn him by our examples, of the little credit he should repose in the sanctity, the hospitality of the Arabs; for which virtues they have been falsely celebrated by uninformed historians!

The morning had passed as usual, in suspense and distrust of these people's intentions, nor did any thing occur to sweeten our daily potion, but the repentance of Ibrahim, and the behavior of the poor women whom I before mentioned to have taken notice of us. Immured in a similar confinement, they felt for our situation, and partook of our troubles. The tale of our disasters had certainly reached their ears, as they enquired by signs whether we had cloaths left, or victuals to eat. Actuated by our melancholy gestures to suggest the worst, these tender-hearted creatures brought fruit and sugar-canes, all they could probably lay their hands upon, and threw them by stealth across the street to our terrace. This humane task they were employed in for half an hour and more, when they disappeared, on our advertising them of the arrival of visitors.

The alarm was false, for it was only Abdul Rufar, who was returned from reconnoitring the motions of the enemy. In his walk he had been encountered by some Christian merchants, who now recommended to us, to get a letter privately written to the Shaik Ul Arab, complaining of the usage

we had met with, and imploring his protection. They not only advised this expedient, but promised to forward the letter for us, in the success of which they implicitly confided. We could not do better, we thought, than follow the opinion of those of our own persuasion; and we had actually dispatched our agents to them upon this errand, when the scheme was unknowingly overfet by the major. We had all along considered ourselves as close prisoners; and the major resolved to make an effort to get into the street, to be certified of the worst of our situation. He found the door locked, and knocking to get it opened by the porter who constantly attended without, the family were alarmed, and came in numbers to prevent his forcing this passage. A struggle ensued, which the major thought prudent to desist from, and returned up stairs with our servants, who were detained at home by this untoward accident.

While we were consulting on some remedy for this disappointment, a body of people came up to our apartment, ushered by our host. The principals were an old fat man, and one dressed in a scarlet robe, who told us that he was the hakeem or governor of the town, and had been commanded by the Shaik Ul Arab, his master, to take us under his protection; to enquire into the particulars of the injuries which we had sustained; and to transmit a faithful account of us to the shaik, who would see justice done to us, let whosoever be the aggressor. Our spirits had long been in want of a cordial to revive them, and this speech operated very powerfully upon them. The appearance of these officers, and the authority which they took upon them, gave credit to their words. We considered ourselves as distinguished by the compassion of the shaik, though we could not discover by what providential accident the tale of our disasters had come to his knowledge. But elated as we were by this sudden change in our affairs, and consonant as the hakeem's offer was to our hopes of revenge, we were too well aware of the unstable state of an Arabian government, to be led astray by a false emblem of power. The event proved that we did not judge much amiss; and that it is dangerous to make enemies in a body, where we are not assured of friends.

Before the assembly had well seated themselves, the vizier arrived, and took his place among them. He betrayed a downcast and irresolute countenance, and I observed him to look often at us, to guess I suppose at our intentions. I endeavored to clear his doubts with a smile. In reply to the hakeem, we declared our scruples to prefer complaints, strangers as we were to the country, and unassured of protection. On this we were urged by most present to a plain recital of facts, which they said was but due to the honor of their master, whose character would suffer by the mal-treatment of strangers, who were suffered to leave his dominions without redress. Ibrahim on this advised us to give a general statement of our losses, without specifying the names of our oppressors; which would irritate no one, and still obtain us the protection of the government. Had this counsel been followed, it might have turned out better; though it is impossible for human judgment to determine it. The examination began under this restriction, and Ibrahim expressed sundry sums of money and articles of value we had been deprived of, by the arts and menaces of persons unknown. The vizier sat in the circle like a private man, and listened in silence to the account of the robberies; in which he seemed satisfied not to be declared an accomplice. But the zeal of Abdul Ruffar quickly altered this peaceable scene. I had observed him sitting in a corner, with indignant looks and restless postures, when, unable to bear with the villainy of his countrymen any longer, he started up, and pointing to his own neck as a pledge for our safety, he went up to the hakeem, and pronounced aloud, that our doubts of protection prevented the truth from appearing in its proper colors. That, to his knowledge, our host Mahomet had forced money and effects from us; and that the vizier himself had defrauded us of shauls and other things to a considerable amount. But the integrity and courage of this poor fellow met with a very unworthy recompence. He had built more than ourselves upon the regal authority, which could not, in the persons of the shaik's officers, shield him from danger and disgrace. The vizier rose abruptly from his seat, and half drawing his sabre, would have stopped his countryman in his tale, had he not been luckily prevented by those near him. The assembly broke up in confusion, and we could not but be alarmed for our own safety at such a moment. No sooner was Abdul Ruffar delivered from one enemy, than he encountered others more bitter in the host and his family, who fell furiously on him in the presence of the hakeem, and it was with much difficulty that we rescued him from their hands, at the expence of some heavy blows. But the scene did not conclude here. To make good our host's assertion, that every one is absolute in his own house, he turned the vizier, hakeem, and all the shaik's officers out of doors, and told them deridingly, to go and consult elsewhere. Our faithful domestic would fain have followed them, but he was prevented; which so intimidated him, that dreading the resentment of the family, he came unobserved to our terrace, and dropped himself thirty feet at least, from a perpendicular height, into the street. He escaped; but not, we apprehend, without some sprain or contusion, from so desperate a leap.

This tumult had scarcely subsided, when one of a more serious and insulting nature ensued. Apprehensive of a discovery, and perhaps weary of carrying about such a load, Ibrahim had deposited the bag of venetians which he was charged with, in the corner of a dark room which held fire-wood. The major was apprized of this step, and might very well be satisfied of the security of his treasure. But the prying disposition of the family surmounted our precaution. Ibrahim had been met coming out of this room by Ally, before the arrival of the hakeem and his company. Suspicion is ever on the watch, and gives a motive to every action that falls under its observation. The late dispute, in which he had borne so active a part, had not driven it from this fellow's mind; who, when all was quiet again, stole up softly to the room which had excited his curiosity. Ibrahim by good fortune saw him enter it, and crying loudly for assistance, ran towards the place which concealed the money. He was heard and followed by the major and my European servant, who found him at the room-door struggling for the bag which Ally had secured, and would have retreated with. Numbers however prevailed, and the bag was presently redeemed from the rascal's gripe, who retired, muttering vengeance against us.

We had soon reason to lament this unfortunate discovery. It awakened a new spirit of avarice in our host, and confirmed him in his exaggerated ideas of our wealth. He came up stairs, attended by the informer Ally and his servants, armed with swords and spears, to demand the contested treasure. We had expected this, and in the interval, the major had time to change the bag of venetians for one of rupees, which was not a twentieth part its value. The gold was again committed to Ibrahim's waist, and the silver was carelessly thrown into one of the trunks. The deception succeeded; and, after some altercation, the bag was produced from the trunk, and imposed upon Ally for the one that he had seized upon. The bulk was nearly the same, though nothing but the confusion he was in, can account for his not distinguishing the difference between the weight of the gold and silver. Though this action was nothing less than a robbery, these Arabs were willing to give it a more favorable term, and said, that they took it on condition of providing us with a boat, and accelerating our departure. There was something too gross in this behavior to amuse us with expectation; but we were as ready as themselves to save appearances, and to conceal our mortification at being subjected to such violence. Some of our company had proposed manual resistance; and a musket was actually taken up on the occasion, which was laid down upon a conviction of the folly of opposition, where our lives were not concerned, in a country so inimical to Christians, and so severe in its decrees against those, who, however justly, have dipped their hands in the blood of a Mahometan. We adopted a middle course, and so far maintained our dignity, as to insist upon the host's dismissing his servants before we would treat with him. This he easily complied with, and received the bag containing eighty-seven rupees, with many assurances of fidelity, and promises to effect our deliverance from this city.

Our host justified the opinion we entertained of him. So far from keeping his word, and endeavoring to serve us, in return for the money he had extorted, he only left us, to contrive some method to make sure of our remaining treasure.

In

In less than half an hour he returned, accompanied by two villains, who called themselves the servants of the Shaik Ul Arab, and who produced a paper, which they termed his order to search our baggage. Though we could not but doubt the authenticity of this paper, we were far from opposing a measure which we had so often solicited; and which we hoped would deliver us from further persecution on this head. It is too cutting to my reflection to recount the particulars of this scrutiny, which was conducted rather with the violence and indecency of a robbery, than with the forms of a search. Not a single thing escaped the hands of these fellows, that was of the least value. Mr. Hammond, among other articles, lost a pair of silver-mounted pistols, which he had hitherto preserved, and they plundered the major of his silver spoons, a silver urn handsomely chased, and weighing above fifty ounces, which he had in vain concealed within some kitchen utensils, besides a quantity of linen to a considerable amount. From me they took a silver hookah, a set of gold buckles, two pieces of Indian handkerchiefs, a gold brocade waistcoat, and a Turkish gown, which, at the lowest calculation, were worth 200 dollars. I left the room while this scene was transacting, as it was to the last degree grating to my nature, to behold, unrevenged, so daring an outrage against all divine and human laws. They retired about eight o'clock in the evening, loaded with their spoils, and we threw ourselves upon the floor, to endeavor to get some repose, after a day spent in uproar, altercation, and fatigue: infomuch that we had not leisure to take a proper refreshment. It is no wonder if our rest was disturbed, and our imagination haunted with gloomy ideas, under such peculiar circumstances. We could observe from our windows a strong guard to be posted about the house, with camels ready saddled at the door, but for what purpose we knew not; whether to take us to the boat, or to any place more suitable to their black designs. We were deprived of our servant, who used to provide us with the necessaries of life, and were to trust to chance for the morrow, should it ever dawn upon our eyes, after the unparalleled treatment we had suffered. Guilt might possibly be touched by the stings of distrust and fear; and to quiet these monitors, it was uncertain how much further our persecutors would plunge themselves into the abyss of wickedness. In the variety of this distress, life was still dear; and, divested as it was of ease and enjoyment, we slept with arms in our hands, to preserve it from violence!

SATURDAY, 9th AUGUST.

The dawn relieved us from our apprehensions, but found us in all the agitations of suspense. We were chiefly distressed at the absence of Abdul Ruffar. We knew not what mischance might have befallen him, in his attempt to escape the death
which

which was intended him; and we were at a loss to furnish ourselves with provision for the day. There was a risk attended the going abroad of Ibrahim, after the adventure of yesterday; and we had not much dependence on the charity of the family, who had already forfeited every pretension to humanity in our estimation. We had luckily a little coffee left, which we boiled, and made out a breakfast with the stale bread of yesterday. About an hour after this, a servant of the house unexpectedly brought us up some milk mixed with water, with a scanty allowance of bread. We understood that we were indebted to our host for this meagre repast, but we neither saw him, his brother, nor any living creatures but at a distance, during the whole morning. Among these were our kind friends in the opposite house, to whom only we now appear to be of the least consequence. These compassionate females had been alarmed at the tumult in our apartment on the preceding evening. I had observed them, at the time, frequently peep over their wall, to see what was going on, and seemingly anxious about the consequences. Nor had they exhausted their attention towards us. At the still hour of noon, when the streets are deserted by the people, they came to their terrace, and with sympathizing looks would have consoled our sufferings. Often did they wipe their eyes which were suffused with tears, and as often did they inquire, by the most significant signs, whether our lives had been endangered during the transactions of the past day. Notwithstanding our forlorn condition, we should have little deserved the name of men, if this behavior had failed to make a suitable impression upon our minds. Like the cordial which is administered to the dying patient, it served to revive our spirits, though we were sensible its effects were temporary and insufficient. Their generosity was equally extended to our wants. Naturally supposing that we were stinted in our nourishment in such an inhospitable house, these affectionate souls threw over loaves of bread and boiled eggs, tied up carefully in their vails, which came safely to us, and would have proved a plentiful supply, if something extraordinary had not disturbed them while taken up with this charitable act. We are apprehensive that they were discovered assisting us by their keeper; and, as they did not appear to us again, that they are doomed to stricter confinement, for exerting an impulse of benevolence to their fellow-creatures in distress! No breast but a Mussulman's could harbor a jealous thought on such an occasion, or confound a principle of compassion with an amorous inclination towards persons in our situation.

About two o'clock the same servant whom we had seen before, brought us a wretched composition of eggs and oil, which, for my part, I found it was impossible to touch. I was content, therefore, to adapt my meal to our prison, and dined upon bread and water. At this moment we had notice given us, that the hakeem and his train were below stairs, and that he purposed to remove us in the evening from this hateful habitation. He presently came up to us, to confirm this agreeable intelligence, and received our cordial acknowledgments for his humane intentions. We had experienced many reverses of fortune since our arrival in this country, but none so sudden, so unlooked-for, as the present. From the circumstances which attended the hakeem's expulsion yesterday, we little expected to see him re-enter the house in triumph, and rescue us from the force which had so successfully opposed him before. But it seems that he comes armed with new powers from the shaik, to take us immediately under his own protection. It is not easy to unravel the politics of this state; but the decisive behavior of our host last night, is a presumptive evidence of his authority being about to draw to a conclusion. He has plundered us of all he could lay his hands upon, and he wisely absents himself at a period when he either cannot, or does not think it worth his while to detain us. We found from the hakeem, that Abdul Ruffar is securely lodged in his house, tho' his legs and feet are violently contused by the fall. We are happy in his safety; but the damage which this faithful adherent has sustained in our cause, cannot but strongly affect us. The hakeem now bade us farewell until sun-set, when he promised to return with a camel and an escort, to convey us and our baggage to a dwelling of his own. To prevent the family from giving us any further disturbance, he left

There was no danger, however, of our being molested in the smallest degree. The house appeared to be abandoned by its inhabitants; and this solitude luckily afforded the major an opportunity of recovering his costly sword, from the hole in which it had been deposited. This he once more sewed up in his bed; and we had packed up the remains of our baggage, long before the appointed hour of our removal. We waited with great patience until the day closed, and it was quite dark before any of us betrayed the least uneasiness at the hakeem's stay. But as the night waxed old, we relapsed into the dreadful state of uncertainty which we had so repeatedly known. We had not a doubt of the veracity of the hakeem; but we began to suspect that our enemies had prevailed against him, either by secret intrigues or open violence. We were apprized of their animosity, and we had every thing to dread from their success. It was ten o'clock before this gloomy prospect was dissipated, by the arrival of the hakeem. He came attended by a party of soldiers, and a camel to transport our baggage. The villain Ally had now the assurance to shew himself, and to superintend the removal of our things. Before we went out, the hakeem obliged us to prime our fire-arms anew, and dropped certain expressions which seemed to Ibrahim to imply danger on the road. Had we been convinced of an ambuscade being laid for us, we should rather have preferred to encounter it, now we were patronized by the government, than to have remained in an house, which had been a scene of mortification and deceit to us. The die was cast, and we were to abide by its decision; which we did, by marching after our camel and servants, who helped to carry the baggage, accompanied by the hakeem and his guard. Each of the servants took a lighted taper in his hand, and, to heighten the scene, we were enjoined profound silence. In this manner did we traverse a number of streets, each of which we found secured by a gate; and after going above half a mile, arrived at the place of our destination about eleven o'clock, without having met with any interruption. We were introduced by the hakeem to our lodging, and after passing through a large court, were carried up stairs to a small, but airy, bed-room. Our baggage was also brought up, and deposited in a back-room, where the servants are to sleep. The friendly hakeem now took his leave of us, and fixing a centry at our door to protect us, left us to enjoy almost the only sound rest we had known since our departure from Cosire.

S U N D A Y, 10th AUGUST.

Here are we, after all our difficulties and dangers, safely pounded within the precincts of an haram. Such, on our awaking this morning, did we find the

the house we were got into. It is an antique structure, much injured by time, and stands upon a spacious foundation, though the apartments are small, and huddled together after the mode of these eastern piles of lasciviousness. Around our chamber the floor is raised about two feet from the ground, which serves us to eat upon by day, and to sleep luxuriously upon by night. Hence we have a fine view of the river, from which we are but two or three streets distant. It is here seemingly less than a mile in breadth, and discovers itself through different openings in the gardens, with which this city is adorned. The wind from the north-west now prevails, and meets the current, which runs with the utmost rapidity towards the sea. This produces a fine effect. The town lines this side of the Nile, and the opposite bank is bordered by a mountain, which at one place breaks off abruptly, and discloses a large plain, covered with enclosures of grain, and here and there embellished with groves of date and orange trees. While we were indulging ourselves with this prospect, we had a visit from the friendly hakeem, who seemed alarmed at our exposing ourselves to public view, and hastily shut our windows. He excused this check to our curiosity, from the necessity there was for us to remain in privacy until the arrival of his master, or of further orders from him respecting our concerns. We could not but acquiesce in this measure; and after bidding us to rely on the justice of the Shaik Ul Arab, he left us to partake of a meal of good bread and milk, which his domestics had provided for us. Our breakfast was scarcely over, when the hakeem sent for Ibrahim, to attend him at his own house. We expect this interview will determine something positive about our fate.

When we left Cosire, we laid our account that our troubles would end with our journey to the Nile. Who could have dreamt that after escaping the perils of the desert, we should be reduced to despair in a populous city! It were better that our baggage had been sunk to the bottom of the Red-Sea, than that it should have afforded us a trifling part of the uneasiness we have suffered. Prisoners for ten days in a private house, where each moment was impoisoned by the uncertainty of our destiny, we were now, perhaps, in a more honorable confinement in the hands of government, which we shrewdly suspect asserts our cause, rather from a desire of recovering the plunder for itself, than of doing justice to us. But we are content if our departure can be purchased at so low a price.

We were anxious to see Abdul Ruffar, whose ankles we find are much more strained by his fall, than were at first reported. But he is not to be moved here until the evening, when we shall be able to administer such relief to him, as is in our power to do. At one o'clock Ibrahim returned to us, and we understand that the hakeem has got out of him all our losses, not excepting the other night's pillage, which he had at first determined to conceal. And with some reason, as the villains threatened our lives if we divulged it to any one. But Ibrahim says, there was no one present at the examination, but a Christian secretary, who took it down, and the hakeem privately assured him, that his master would give orders to seize the robbers, and make them restore their booty. God only knows the termination of this matter; but, for our parts, we would compromise to escape with our present damages. We now ate heartily of a plentiful meal, which Ibrahim had provided for us. Mutton, fish, and vegetables, are very cheap here, and no European could complain of their manner of dressing their food.

We saw nobody during the evening, but the servants belonging to the house. But we received a complimentary message from the hakeem, with notice of his master's approach, who is expected here immediately. These are welcome tidings to us, who have no idea of getting away, until the arrival of this great man. It is our plan to be rid of this place as soon as possible; and we propose to make a tender to the shaik of all he may recover on our accounts. Happy, if we have the luck to escape without further pillage.

In order that we might enjoy the benefit of a cool wind, and a moon-light evening, we went to bed very early, as we had been desired not to open our windows until the lights were extinguished. And now an adventure occurred, which was romantic to the last degree, and bore a resemblance to those feigned ones, portrayed by the inimitable pencil of Cervantes. I was awakened out of a sound nap about ten o'clock, by a loud knocking at the gate, which secures the upper end of the street we live in. I found my companions had been disturbed by the same noise, and were equally surprized with myself at the strangeness of it. Presently after the gate was opened, and a number of people assembled before our house, whom we could discern by the light of the moon, disposing themselves in different situations on the ground, and conversing with great earnestness and vociferation. While we were pondering on the issue of this business, which had an alarming appearance at such an hour of the night, when we knew our residence was meant to be kept secret, and that our lives might be sought by the villains whom we had informed against, I went out on the back terrace, to awake the guard, which was stationed to protect us, when suddenly a band of music struck up without, and recalled me to the scene of action. This band was composed of string, wind, and parchment instruments, and though the harmony was none of the best, it could not fail to have a singular effect upon our imaginations, haunted as they were with doubts and apprehensions. A single voice sometimes accompanied the music, which was in general of a melancholy strain. This serenade lasted until midnight, and when the moon went down, it was continued by torch-light. But the intent of it we are are utterly at a loss to discover. Whether to celebrate a marriage, or a funeral, or whether it was performed by the hakeem's guard, to divert their master or ourselves. It was one o'clock before the night was restored to its usual quiet; at which time I fell asleep, but had my repose disturbed by the extravagance of fancy, which brought a motley jumble to my mind, of music, harems, arms, captivity, and impassable wastes!

M O N D A Y, 11th AUGUST.

This day was the most barren of incidents of any that we have long experienced. Not a message, nor the least intelligence from the hakeem, in regard to our affairs. This has at least a good appearance. He means, perhaps, to wait the arrival of his master, instead of deceiving us with the hopes of his own interposition, and obtaining presents from us on that score, like the vizier and the people into whose hands we at first fell. We learn from Ibrahim, that the rude concert last night was intended for the hakeem's entertainment, who is our neighbor, and who sat smoking and drinking coffee with his women the greatest part of the night. This is a favorite diversion with the Arabs and Turks, who keep themselves still during the heat of the day, and enjoy the cool hours of the night, and the serene light of the moon, with a relish unknown to the inhabitants of the inclement north. Those only who have partaken of this enchanting scene, under a sky still unclouded, can form an idea of its luxury; where the very dews are genial, and the night-breeze carries a temperate coolness on its wing. And this season favors more the bringing of their women into view; when silence and solitude prevail without, and afford them the selfish satisfaction of beholding beauty, without the intrusion of a rival, and tasting of its charms with the avarice of misers.

At four o'clock we had a visit from the hakeem, who only staid to enquire after our healths, and to reassure us of his protection. We had determined on making this man a present, to secure his further good offices, and finding that he was averse to taking any thing but money, we sent him twenty-one venetians by Ibrahim, with an apology for the smallness of the donation, which had been bounded by our poverty. To our great joy, our domestic, Abdul Ruffar, returned with Ibrahim from the hakeem's house. He was obliged to be moved in the arms of the servants, though we are pleased to find that his hurts do not portend any ill effects. One of his ankles is quite reduced, and the other promises fair to admit of his getting abroad in a few days.

TUESDAY,

T U E S D A Y, 12th AUGUST.

The indisposition of Abdul Ruffar has already proved very inconvenient to us. Our silver is expended, and we are at a loss to exchange our gold for dollars, or to gain any intelligence of what is passing without doors, during this poor creature's confinement. He often cautions us against trusting any of his countrymen in matters of such importance; sensible as he is of their want of charity for Christians. As for Ibrahim, he is as much a prisoner as ourselves. The hakeem tells him, that he cannot answer for his safety, until the shaik returns, should he fall in the way of our old host and his gang. We are too well ascertained, from ocular proof, of the little order which subsists here in the absence of the chief, to doubt it. We learn that his return is anxiously expected by the whole city, and cannot be very distant, if we may trust to the information of Abdul Ruffar, who says, such is the temper of this people, and such the instability of this government, should the shaik remain for any length of time in another place, the inhabitants of Ghinnah would throw off all submission to his officers, and fall to cutting each other's throats. What a blessed land have we dropped into! What a race are we amongst! who are only to be ruled by the sword, and to be taught humanity at the expence of their blood!

We

We had scarcely breakfasted when the hakeem entered our apartment, accompanied by a man whom we had frequently seen at Cofire. He had been assiduous in his visits to us there, and had proffered us the use of his house during our stay at Ghinnah. This the shaik of Cofire prevented by his intrigues, and the man arrived here yesterday in the caravan. We find he is a merchant of this city, and though, agreeably to the mode of Arabian travellers, he was wont to assume a poor habit at Cofire, we now saw him in a creditable dress, and seemingly on an intimate footing with the hakeem. He lamented our misfortunes, which were the common topic of conversation, and reproached us for not having accepted of his offers of assistance. Though he must have been sensible that we did not merit this reproach, while our conduct was directed by another, and though we have cause to be on our guard against the professions of an Arabian, there is little doubt but we should have fared better under this man's protection, than in the vile hands we fell into. Our present situation is far from being disagreeable. The hakeem is civil and attentive to us, and at the same time does not pester us with his company, or solicit us for presents. From this conduct we draw more favorable omens, than from any incident since the change of our situation; and as he confirms the report of the shaik's approach, we endeavor to resign ourselves with patience, for the accomplishment of that desirable event. It may be, that our release will be at last owing to the interposition of Mr. Baldwin at Cairo. We have great expectations that our letters are both safely delivered to him. The reward of five dollars, which is to attend the receipt of each, is the strongest incentive that could be devised to secure the fidelity of the messengers. But fortune has been so much out of humor with us of late, that we cannot promise ourselves a return of her smiles, until they beam upon us.

Just as we had laid down to rest, there was a knocking at the outward gate, which we found to be made by the hakeem, who came to borrow one of our fuses. He was mounted on a fine horse, which I observed from the window, and was accompanied by a party of armed men on foot. He sent us word, that he was going about the town to preserve peace and good order; which is a necessary practice in cities better regulated than Ghinnah.

WEDNESDAY, 13th AUGUST.

We are obliged to be early risers, in order to receive the company that wait upon us during the cool of the morning. We have generally finished our breakfast by seven o'clock, and at that hour to-day we were summoned by our servants to the back terrace, which commands a noble view of the river, to see a number of boats under sail. These we learnt were the Banute fleet, which arrived here two days after us; with the foldiers of which our hoft, the vizier, and others, had alarmed us, and forced us to pay down a fum of money, which was falſely charged to their account. They are going down to Jirje, and being chiefly gallies, painted, and gilt, and adorned with ſtreamers, they cut no contemptible appearance in falling down with the ſtream, to the amount of twenty boats. We deſcried armed troops on the poop of each galley, and heard the drums beating to arms on board. There is a myſtery in the accounts of theſe Banute people, which we cannot unravel. Immediately after their departure, we had a viſit from the hakeem, who threw open the windows of our apartments, and told us with a chearful air, that we had now nothing to fear, as the Banute people, who are a ſet of thieves, and apt to plunder defenceleſs veſſels on the river, were failed for Jirje. This deſcription neither answers the ſtay which theſe people made here, nor the good condition of their boats, which is far from beſpeaking them to be a needy race. We therefore enquired of the hakeem of the origin and government of Banute; and were told, that it formerly belonged to his maſter, the Shaik Ul Arab, but had lately been taken poſſeſſion of by the Turks. This confirmed us in a vague report we had heard, of Banute being really in the hands of Ibrahim Beg. It might conſequently be, that the hakeem wiſhed for his maſter's return, that juſtice might be done us ere we proceeded to Cairo; and was willing to conceal us from the Turks,

Turks, whom he artfully represented as robbers, to prevent our applying to them for a passage. So strongly had this prepossession taken hold of our minds, that some among us were not wanting to lament our ignorance of this circumstance, and to consider the departure of the Banute fleet, as a preclusion to the escape which we had so long meditated.

At five o'clock the hakeem paid us a second visit, in which he was accompanied by two considerable merchants of the town. They all produced letters from the shaik, which they told us respected our losses, and his coming to redress our wrongs. When the merchants took their leave, the hakeem asked us, whether we were inclined to take a walk with him to the river-side. This agreeable invitation my companions were obliged to decline, as the rascals who plundered our trunks, had not left them a Turkish gown: but I readily accepted of it, as I had a gown that luckily escaped their search. It is easy to conceive the joy I felt at being restored to the freedom of the air, after our perilous confinement; not to mention the good face which our affairs assumed by this step, as the people's intentions must appear to be honest, who exposed us to the eyes of the town. I accordingly arrayed myself in the best manner, and followed the hakeem, attended by my European servant and Ibrahim. As we walked towards the river, we were accompanied by a crowd of people, who behaved themselves very respectfully; awed, perhaps, by the presence of the hakeem and his guard. We soon left the town, and ascended a dyke which is thrown round it, to prevent it suffering by the inundations of the Nile. I had the good fortune to be witness to the commencement of this periodical phenomenon, by mere chance. From the dyke we descended to the river, by a pier that extends itself to the natural strand, and measures some hundreds of yards in length. At the extremity of this pier we seated ourselves on carpets, which were spread for us on the ground, and I had full leisure to survey the objects around me, the novelty and beauty of which equally engaged my admiration. The Nile is originally of a tolerable breadth here, and at other seasons would not disappoint the traveller in his expectations of so celebrated a stream. But two days ago it began to assume a grander aspect. The kitchen-gardens which supply the town, and stand in the low grounds, are already overflown; and several channels are opened in the bank, through which the waters rush with great rapidity, and promise by to-morrow night to spread themselves to the dyke, which is at least a quarter of a mile distant. The same effects seem to have been produced on the opposite side; where I observed the country to be overflown even to the mountain's edge, and the rising lands to appear like islands in the waters. In mid-channel the stream runs with amazing force; carrying down rushes, bushes, and fragments of trees, which the floods have swept away with them from the heights, and will in a few days discharge into the Mediterranean. The sun was fallen behind the hills on the western banks, from whose burnished tops a dazzling radiance played upon the ruffled waters. The boats glided along their curling surface: the date-groves rung with the amorous cooings of a thousand doves, and the cattle lowed in the distant dale. The charms of this lovely evening are beyond my art to depicture, but they will be ever faithfully imprinted on my imagination. At dusk we returned homeward, and I could obtain but a very imperfect sight of Ghinnah from this point of view; as it stretches towards the river like the end of a Turkish slipper, and is screened by the dyke from the eye. We passed by a bridge on our way back, turned on a single arch over a creek where the boats lie, and which appears to be a modern work of no elegant design*.
by

into

* It may not prove unpleasing to the reader, to compare the observations of other travellers on this place and its neighborhood. As we passed over the desert between Cosire and Ghinnah, we can confirm the assertion of Captain Norden, that there are no remains of the antient canal mentioned by Herodotus and others, to have been dug for conveying goods from the Nile to the Red-sea. Ghinnah and its environs are still noted for manufacturing the best earthen-ware in Egypt; in the bottoms of which, the same peculiarity subsists as related by Dr. Pococke.

“ At two o'clock in the afternoon there came on a calm, which obliged us to land on the same side, a little below Gienc, or Kiene, a town, which is not at present very considerable, but which has, however, a mosque. There was formerly in this place a great commerce; for they had made a road which

I found myself rather fatigued from my walk, and was glad of the approach of our hour of re-led to Cefire, a port of the Red-sea; and in three days they crossed the desarts of Thebais. But at present this route is not secure, on account of the robbers.

“ I had been told much of the antiquities of this place, which engaged me to go thither; but I found nothing there.
 The inhabitants themselves of the place could give me no account of them. In vain did I seek for the antient canal that was dug for conveying merchandizes to the Red-sea, and for bringing others from thence by this means. I did not perceive the least mark of it, neither in the town, nor in the adjacent places. It is in this town they celebrate every year the great festival, at which the Bey of Girge is commonly present; but not without having first obtained permission from the Arab princes or Schechs.

“ I perceived that all the neighboring places of Giene were covered with all sorts of plants, such as pompions, colocoquintida, and others, which were, for the most part, unknown to me.
 As I did not see any corn there, I imagined that they had cut it; and that the plants which I perceived, were the second product of the ground.

“ There were in the neighborhood of the town divers ponds, in which water was preserved after the inundation; but it was not good for drinking. It had a brackish taste, which it takes from the soil itself; and indeed the inhabitants do not use it for any other purpose than watering their grounds, and giving drink to their cattle.”

Norden's Travels in Egypt, &c. vol. ii.

“ We now pursued our voyage with a fine wind, and passed by the canal that goes to the city of Coptos, which is at present remarkable for making the best earthen-ware in Egypt, it being very light and much esteemed; but they could never be prevailed on to make the vases with broad bottoms, that they might stand without danger of falling; so that the people are obliged to set them in wooden frames.”

Pococke's Travels, chap. vi.

pose,

pose, which, for want of candle-light, we are obliged to anticipate as soon as the day is closed. But we were awakened from our first sleep by the sounds of tinkling instruments, accompanied by a chorus of female voices. I looked out of the window, and saw a band of thirty damsels at least, come tripping towards us, with measured paces, and animated gestures. The moon shone very bright, and we had a full view of them, from their entering the gate of our street, until they reached our house. Here they stopped, and spreading themselves in a circle before the door, renewed the dance and song with infinite spirit, and recalled to our minds the picture which is so fully given of these dancing females in holy writ. After they had favored us a few minutes with their lively performance, they moved on to the hakeem's house, and serenading him with an air or two, this joyous band quitted our quarter, and went, as the dying sounds informed us, to awaken the other slumberers of the town, to melody and joy! These are certainly the descendants of the women of Israel, whose beauty and skill gladdened the heart of the sapient king: The dancing girls of India are not to be spoken of at the same time: they are but an illegitimate race, were their excellencies to be compared with those of the nymphs of the Nile. Had these figures presented themselves to me in a vision, I should have concluded that they were the fair inhabitants of our mansion, who were come to demand the restitution of their late possessions!

THURSDAY, 14th AUGUST.

We were impatient to know the cause of the agreeable disturbance we met with last night, and learnt from one of our guard, that the dancing girls observe the ceremony we were witnesses to, on the first visible rise of the Nile. It seems that they took our house in their way to the river, where they went down to bathe at that late hour, and to sing the praises of the benevolent Power, who yearly distributes his waters to supply the necessities of the native.

It is designed, to all appearance, that we shall meet with no friends in this inhospitable region, or immediately lose the protection of those who have displayed a ray of humanity for us. We were but this morning congratulating ourselves, on having fallen into the hands of a good man, who has not only rescued us from the house of a villain, but has even sheltered us under his own roof. He had yesterday admired a couple of carpets belonging to Mr. Hammond and me. We had sent them to him after breakfast, when he paid us a visit to thank us for our attention. He came escorted by a large train, little dreaming how shortly his glories would set, which now shone forth in meridian lustre. The change in his fortune was announced to us about five o'clock in the afternoon, when several strange servants came to our house. Their errand errand was to advise us of the approach of a new hakeem, who was sent by the shaik to displace our friend, and meant to take up his quarters for the night, in the back part of our habitation. While we were forming conjectures on this sudden event, several of the principal merchants of the town visited us, to confirm the news. They assured us, that the shaik had particularly charged this new officer with our affairs, and had dismissed the old hakeem from his employment, for having suffered European travellers to be plundered, and detained within his jurisdiction. In our own minds, we would readily have dispensed with this severity, to a man who had rendered us the most material services. Moreover, we could not but suspect, that the interest of the vizier, and others who had benefited by our arrival, had prevailed against the more honest character that had exerted itself in our behalf. This reflection wounded us deeply, as the truth of it might reduce us to our former desperate situation. Considering the bad treatment we had met with, it is not strange that we should be jealous of any innovation in the protection which had been lately extended to us; and, in our experience of this tribe, that we should doubt of finding a second man of moderation among the officers of government.

About sun-set the new hakeem arrived, and sent us word that he was ready to receive us. This is the first visit we had paid to another. We found him seated upon a carpet on the back terrace, with a crowd of people about him. He is an elderly man, tall, thin, and of a mean appearance; distant in his behavior, and seemingly full of his own consequence. This may possibly arise from the lowness of his origin, which is that of an Abyssinian slave. His deportment was so different from that which distinguished his predecessor in office, that we could not but look upon him as an arrogant upstart, who promised to abuse the favor of his lord. He condescended, however, to tell us, with a smile, that his master had recommended us to his good offices, and had directed that the strictest justice should be rendered to us. While we staid, a number of persons came to pay their compliments to him, among which was Sauker, one of the rascals who had assisted the two brothers to pillage our baggage. By this effrontery he perhaps expects to escape suspicion; and to intimidate us by his presence, from bringing a charge against him. We soon retired to our apartment, and found that the vizier, among others, made his court to this new magistrate. Nothing can be a more direct implication of the arbitrary government we are under, than the promotion of this Abyssinian to one of its first dignities. When Charles of Sweden, the most despotic monarch of his age, wrote to the senate of Stockholm, that he would send his jack-boot to preside over them; ungrateful as the idea was, it surely was less humiliating, than if he had threatened to dispatch a Turkish slave from Bender for that purpose. And yet we were now witnesses to the universal homage that may be paid to such a character. The suddenness of his arrival, and the respect which he commands, no doubt bespeak, that he is charged with some important business; but we should be pleased to depart, without waiting the issue of his errand, though it prove to be the restitution of our losses. The shaik, it seems, is but a day's journey hence: but we fear we shall be necessitated to wait his arrival, which the critical situation of his affairs still renders uncertain.

We have not seen our old friend since his disgrace, but we sent Ibrahim to make him our acknowledgments and good wishes. He seemed much flattered with a mark of attention, so new to a person in his condition; and returned us assurances, that he will represent our story in its true colors to the shaik, for whose court he is to set off to-morrow or next day. This kind interposition may serve to advance our suit; and we understand that we shall then get rid of the company of our new guest, who goes into the house of his predecessor, on the latter's departure. His servants let off some paltry fire-works at night behind the house, for which they demanded a gratification. They were cunning enough to call that a compliment to us, which was more likely intended for their master; and we were glad to be released from their impertinence, at the expence of a few silver pieces, of the value of a penny apiece.

FRIDAY, 15th AUGUST.

We do not find that we are likely to be as soon quit of our guest, as we at first expected. There is no talk of his moving this morning, and as it appears to depend upon the departure of his predecessor, we may have the pleasure of his company for some days longer. This is a sad restraint upon us, who are confined to the front of the house, which consists of two small apartments for ourselves, and one, more roomy, for our servants. Nor are we free from apprehensions, lest some discovery should be made to our disadvantage. The hakeem's servants are continually mingling with ours, and may draw inferences of our abounding with money from our manner of living, if not from the imprudence of our people, whose simplicity may betray us, notwithstanding the cautions we have given them on this head.

Just as we had dined, an order came from the hakeem to clear the room which our servants were in, for the reception of some travellers. This, at the time, was a very disagreeable command to us, though it may turn out as much to our benefit, as any thing which has occurred since our arrival here. The travellers prove to be a company of Turks, on their return to Cairo, from an excursion into this country. There is a man of consequence among them, who, on notice of our being here, here, immediately sent some of his attendants to enquire into our business in this quarter. It may be supposed that we were very particular in the narration of our troubles, and the ill usage we had met with. The politeness and humanity of these Turks were very striking to us, who had so long experienced nothing but rudeness and barbarity from the human race. They regretted the impossibility of having our company on the road, without the permission of the Shaik Ul Arab; and were hurt at the thoughts of leaving us among a people, whom they seemed to have no opinion of. But they promised to represent our case to the bey of Cairo, and to exert all their interest with him to demand our release from the shaik. They acknowledged, however, that the reasons for detaining us until the shaik's arrival, may be very good, as the river is at present so infested with pirates, that they are obliged themselves to go by land to Cairo. There is a Christian among them, who has charged himself with a third letter, which we have addressed to Mr. Baldwin from this city. He is a confidential domestic, and, by his influence, has prevailed upon the Turk his master, to write to the shaik in our behalf, to state our uncomfortable condition, and to advise him to dispatch us forthwith to Cairo, as we are content to leave the punishment of our oppressors to his discretion. Heaven knows what effect this kind mediation may have with the shaik; but we have long suspected that our release can only be accomplished from Cairo; and are

are stocking ourselves with a fund of patience to support us in the tedious interval. The journey by land, we are told, is from ten to twelve days, and the Turks propose to set off at day-break. Allowing, therefore, three days for obtaining an order from the bey in our favor, three weeks at least must elapse, before the return of the answer which is to set us at liberty. But Hope, the deceiver Hope! sometimes whispers better things in our ears; and as we are importunate in our desires to be sent away, we are inclined to expect the shaik will not detain us after his arrival at Ghinnah.

SATURDAY, 16th AUGUST.

The Turks have deferred their departure until night, which, on account of our reliance on their good offices at Cairo, and their delivery of our letter, has given us more vexation than the matter may deserve. The itch of avarice appears to have infected the mass of the people we are among, from the highest to the lowest. The new hakeem, though an Abaffee, and a slave to the shaik, cannot resist the disease, and is already fingering, in idea, the gold and valuables which he conceives us to possess. He sent for Ibrahim at midnight, and questioned him closely touching our circumstances, and the presents we made to his predecessor: and, lastly, if we had any offering left for himself. Ibrahim, in conformity to his instructions, represented represented the poverty we were reduced to, and which utterly disabled us from tendering any thing worthy the hakeem's acceptance. He disclaimed all knowledge of our having given either money or goods to the quondam hakeem, though he found that this man had got an item of the removal of our carpets. It is a bitter comfort to us to observe, that the man who was sent down by the shaik to protect us, should be the first to attempt our property. The substance of this mercenary interview we received from Ibrahim, while we were at breakfast.

We had visits to-day from several of the Turkish gentlemen, who are in the suite of the grandee. They repeated their tenders of service on their arrival at Cairo. A very fine Georgian boy is in the train, whose beautiful features and fair complexion easily distinguish him from the Turks. He is a slave, and, we understand, is in high favor with his master.

As the hakeem had offered us the liberty of going abroad, whenever we pleased to apply to him for a servant to protect us, at five o'clock Mr. Hammond, who was now equipped with a cloak, accompanied by myself, Ibrahim, and the hakeem's servant, sallied forth. We directed our steps to the bazar, or market-place, and entered a caravan-fera, which attracted our curiosity. These buildings are receptacles for travellers, and are either erected at the public expence, or by the donations of private people. The one we saw was a very large structure. Its entrance was through a stone gateway, which led into a square court, surrounded by apartments of two stories. The ground-floor was open in front, and thrown upon arches, and divided into different rooms, by a balustrade of stone. The back part was closed, and appropriated for warehouses for the merchant. Beneath one of these arches we found a Turk sitting, whom we had left at Yambo, and who had once put it into our heads to come by this inauspicious route to Cairo. We immediately recognized one another, and were very hearty in our congratulations on this unexpected meeting. He took us into his apartment, and placing coffee before us, very kindly condoled with us on our misfortunes, which had reached his ears. We find that he remains here, on account of the dangers on the river. After pressing this Turk to visit us frequently, we took our leave, and walked without any interruption to the river. Here we went on board a boat, which waits for a lading of coffee for the Cairo market. This boat is one of the most convenient I ever saw. She has two cabbins, besides an awning of matts, that extends to her main-mast. The roof is high, and, with the sides, handsomely carved and painted. We were politely received by the nokidah, who said he hoped for our company to Cairo. We should rejoice much to be accommodated in this manner in our voyage down the Nile. It was from this boat that the view of Ghinnah, which is annexed, was taken. At sun-set we returned home, and found our good friends the Turks were preparing to decamp. At nine o'clock they mounted their camels to the number of twenty, well armed, and went off with the benefit of a fine moon, which renders travelling at night very delightful in these serene climates. The chief of the Turks rode on a fine dun camel, and was followed on another by the sprightly Georgian, well accoutred with a scimitar and a matchlock.

SUNDAY, 17th AUGUST.

The hakeem has actually fixed his residence at our house, and means, we suppose, to take good care of us and our baggage. When the Turks went away, he possessed himself of their apartment, which was before occupied by our servants. We are now reduced to an uncomfortable situation, and cannot enjoy a moment's privacy, but during the hours of meals and repose. But we are determined to suffer no further inconvenience from the vicinity of the hakeem. We have accordingly directed our servants to take up their lodgings at night on the terrace which extends itself over our apartments, and which we often ascend in the evening, to obtain a view of the country.

We were surprized with an early visit from the Turk, whom we had encountered at the caravansera yesterday, and were much pleased with this mark of his attention. He now gave us the particulars of some transactions at Yambo, which nearly concerned us, and which proved very satisfactory, in respect to the measures which we had taken with Lt. * * *. The reader will remember our separation in the Red-Sea, and the melancholy circumstances which reduced us to the necessity of returning him to Yambo, on a boat bound to that port. On his arrival at Yambo, it appears, that his madness broke out with more violence than ever. Instead of waiting for the boat's coming to an anchor, he jumped overboard at the entrance of the harbor, and swam to the beach below the town; and would have made his way into the country, had he not been pursued by some of the mariners, who overtook him, and carried him before the vizier of Yambo. This was the second time he had been brought to this minister in this extraordinary manner, and within the compass of a few days. His misfortune had been more than suspected on the former occasion; but it was now communicated to the minister by the nokidah of the boat, who was charged with our message, to request that Lt. * * * might be sent on the first vessel to Judda. On his coming into the vizier's presence, he gravely demanded to be made a Mussulman, and to be entertained in the service of the xerif. This request luckily could not be complied with by the Mahometan law, which does not admit of converts, who are deprived of the faculty to judge between right and wrong. Neither does it now establish its faith by the means of the sword. So different different are the principles of the same sect, when the flame of blind zeal has abated of its ardor. It happens, however, that the unhappy victims of madness meet with an attention in this country, that is not paid to rational beings. They are considered as inspired, because hurried beyond the precincts of reason; and though they still serve as a butt of ridicule to the shafts of the vulgar, they are secured by their situation from the shadow of an injury. On this principle the vizier acted. From his own wardrobe he gave the turban and Arabian dress to our unfortunate companion, to humor his frenzy, and sent him safely to Judda, full of the idea of having become a follower of Mahomet. Poor youth! to what joy and satisfaction wilt thou hereafter awake, should it please God to restore thee to thy senses! What will thy sensations be, to consider the past as no more than a dream; to reflect on the dangerous abyss that thou hast escaped, by the interposition of the Divine hand! It must occur to every humane mind, that the news of his safety was the most pleasing music to our ears. Driven by stern necessity to a separation with him, when his condition was truly deplorable, we could not but admire at the happy turn which matters had taken. We had acted for the best in sending Lt. *** back to Judda; and could not but rejoice at the intelligence which now reached us, of his being gone thither under proper protection. Had he less fortunately remained with us; had he been exposed to a month's
of

a month's fun in an open boat; had he visited the coasts of Egypt; toiled with the caravan over the desert, and experienced the oppression we have met with at Ghinnah, it is impossible that his intellects could have withstood the complicated shock, and a confirmed madness, or perhaps death, would have ensued! Whereas every good consequence is to be expected from the step we took; every assistance will be given him by the surgeon of the Swallow sloop, which was luckily at Judda; and we can promise ourselves that he was hospitably received by our friend Captain Bacon, and even accommodated with a passage to Bombay, should the Adventure be bound to that port*. We also learn from this Turk, that the nokidah of our boat was more to blame than the vizier of Yambo, that we did not attempt to get to Suez. He went to the vizier while we were at anchor at the mouth of the harbor, and told him that he could reach no port but Cofire!

In the evening the major sallied out in an Arabian dress, which he made here, accompanied by Ibrahim and our usual guard. He returned with two Christian merchants, whom he had got acquainted with. They are persons of credit here, and very civilly invited us to repay their visit.

* The humane reader will rejoice with us, to know, that our designs respecting our unfortunate companion were fully answered. That he found Captain Bacon at Judda, and returned in the Adventure to Bombay, recovered of his frenzy.

M O N D A Y, 18th AUGUST.

We were disturbed at midnight by a knocking at the door, which proved to be the hakeem and Ibrahim, whom he had called up to attend him. This was the first visit he had paid us, and was as disagreeable as unexpected. We at once guessed the purport of it. He is a plain man, and did not use much ceremony in introducing what he had so much at heart. But we were at a loss what to offer him, that could be acceptable. Money he pretended to decline taking, and we, with equal artifice, pretended that we had none. There were two sets of silver buttons, and two silver chains, which belonged to the regimentals and swords of the major, and which had escaped pillage. These we produced, as the only remains of our goods which were of value; though we promised to acknowledge his services in a better manner from Cairo, should he procure an order from the shaik for our immediate departure. The weight of these toys attracted his notice, though he did not seem to admire their workmanship, which was none of the best. He however put them into his bosom, and desired to look at some of our cloaths. But so particular was this fellow, that he could not be prevailed upon to peep into our trunks; and so scrupulous, that he would not receive a single thing, until we put it into his hands. A pretty salvo truly, for his conscience, which grasped at all in our possession! Besides the silver articles, he carried away three broadcloth coats of different colors, and two silk tambour waistcoats—for the purpose, we imagine, of covering his pipes, and the scabbards of his swords—and half a dozen cambric handkerchiefs for his own use. In consideration of this present, he has undertaken to write to his master, for permission to send us away by land, which is the only safe track at present. It is not without extreme compunction that we forego the ease and pleasure of a voyage down the Nile, to encounter the hardships and dangers of the desert. But we foresee no end to our detention here, while we depend upon the river for a conveyance; and readily acquiesced in the hakeem's proposal, who about one o'clock left us to finish our repose.

Before we were up we had a visit from the friendly Christians, who brought us a present of fine milk, and made us an hearty tender of their services during our stay here. There is an honest simplicity in these men, that affords us infinite satisfaction; and we suppose it was the apprehension of immediate danger to themselves, which withheld their good offices, when we stood so much more in need of them.

Behold the justice of divine Providence! which often punishes the iniquities of mankind, by their very accomplices in guilt. A retribution the more dreadful, as the villain who breaks through every tie himself which links man to man, is not yet so hardened hardened as to be proof to a breach of confidence in another. The blow which is given by the public executioner, is weak, when compared to that which comes from the hand of a friend. There is intelligence just arrived from Cosire, that the merchant Mahomet, who invited us to his house to plunder us, and who had returned in the last caravan to that place, is so desperately wounded, that his life is despaired of. The quarrel arose between him and some of his confederates, touching the division of our spoils. His brother Ally and his father were this day examined before the hakeem, on the subject of their ill usage of us. The result we have not learnt; but it cannot be very dangerous to them, as we find Ally has obtained leave to attend his dying brother.

In the afternoon the hakeem, and two merchants of the town in the confidence of the shaik, came to our apartment to take a list of the things we have lost. This they advise one of us to carry to the shaik, and to make him a formal tender of the whole. This errand would be readily adopted by us, had we any thing fit to present to him, agreeably to the Eastern custom. These people looked into our trunks for this purpose; but finding us bare of valuables, they gave us hopes of being dispatched without paying this great visit.

T U E S D A Y, 19th AUGUST.

Some further particulars relative to the misfortune of Mahomet, were communicated to us this morning. We learn, to our surprize, that the young shaik of Cofire, and the soldier who stole the major's sword, were the principals in the assault. They went in company with Mahomet to Cofire, and were constantly soliciting of him a proportion of the money which he had obtained from us. This he had the imprudence to decline; and on their finding he was deaf to their arguments, they one day took an opportunity to seduce him from the caravan, and attacking him jointly, they cut him desperately with their swords. There is no doubt but he defended himself manfully; but his strength and resolution could not avail him against this cowardly proceeding. The assassins have escaped to Cofire, but the soldier's relations, who live here, have been seized by the order of the government. In case of Mahomet's death, however, we find a pecuniary mulct will preserve the murderers from the punishment due to their crimes.

This story affords a truer picture of the dispositions and manners of the Arabs, than volumes could portray on such a subject. We reflect with horror, on the connection which subsisted between us and the delinquents in question; and consider our escape from them, as altogether unexampled and miraculous.

raculous. It is now plain that they could meditate the plunder of our baggage; and we might have fallen a sacrifice in the desert, with much less danger to them, than the deceased Mahomet, whose family will exact revenge.

We had another visit from our Turkish acquaintance at the caravanera. From him we have obtained a very extraordinary and alarming piece of intelligence. Since our arrival here, we had received confused accounts of Ibrahim Beg's absence from Cairo; but we could never get to the bottom of the story. It now appears, that for this month past, Egypt has been the seat of a bloody and obstinate civil war. Ismaul Beg took on him to assume the reins of government, by the connivance of the Porte; but the Shaik Elbalad Ibrahim disputed the usurpation, and appeared in arms to maintain his own title. The matter was contested in a desperate battle without the walls of Cairo, and ended in the defeat of Ibrahim Beg, who retired up the Nile, and is now in a province not three days march from this place. Instead of pirates infesting the river, we understand, that the danger arises from the soldiers of Ibrahim Beg, who are raising contributions upon it. The Turk tells us, that the galleys which fell down hence some days ago, were commanded by Mustapha Beg, who is in the interest of the deposed Ibrahim, and is gone to join him. But it is not possible, that the fugitive chiefs can long withstand their successful opponent; whose army is already strengthened by a large detachment of the Grand Signior's forces. We understand too, that the Shaik Ul Arab has acknowledged Ismaul Beg, which accounts for the bad character that was given us here of the Banute people, who are of the other party. It also strikes us forcibly, that the letters which we produced for Ibrahim Beg, were one cause of the ill treatment we experienced from the vizier and his associates. The shaik was out of reach of our complaints, and Ibrahim Beg, our only friend beside, not in a situation to redress them. We had a contrary idea when we boasted of these letters; and must acknowledge the uncertainty of human conjecture, which errs in matters apparently the most obvious.

This sudden revolution creates no surprize in a country unsettled in its government, and divided by the jarring interests of a number of petty princes. But to us it is a matter of serious reflection. We hear, indeed, that the European factories are undisturbed at Cairo. But how far the influence of Mr. Baldwin will prevail with the new bey, or how we shall reach the capital, through the disorders of a country, agitated by opposing factions, and laid waste by the sword of rebellion, we are at a loss to determine. Danger besets us on every side. Public commotions are united to private persecutions, to compleat our distress; and the most alarming circumstance of our affairs seems to be, that we are at the mercy of two simple though honest Mussulmen, our domestics. They have hitherto preserved their fidelity to us; but such is the frailty of human nature, nature, that a long residence here may have a bad effect on their morals; exposed as they are to the artifices, and obliged as they are to mingle in the society of this fraudulent tribe.

W E D N E S D A Y, 20th AUGUST.

We had an early visit from the hakeem this morning, who brought us a plate of raisins of the sun, which are produced in Lower Egypt. He came, seemingly full of the scheme of one of us going to the shaik, and proposed sending a boat up to-day on this service. We readily fell into this measure, which, notwithstanding the objections that were made to it yesterday, I have long considered as absolutely necessary to our immediate release. Little can be done with the ministers of Eastern princes, whose hands are tied by the awe which they stand in of their masters, or whose minds are so habituated to the receipt of presents, that nothing short of the whole substance of the petitioner, can satisfy their avarice. I made a tender of my services on this occasion; not more from a principle of curiosity, than a desire of hastening our departure; and was happy to find that they were accepted of by my companions.

In the afternoon we had a visit from the quondam hakeem, whose advice we have constantly solicited since his disgrace. As he can now have no selfish interest in our concerns, we are inclined to place more confidence in him, than when we were at his discretion. He has business with the shaik, and has kindly promised to accompany me on this embassy. He is well acquainted with our story, and if he is as much our friend as we take him to be, he may quicken the dispatch of our business, by a candid representation of facts. He tells us, that the place of the shaik's present residence, called Ghose, is but seven or eight hours journey by water, and that we shall be absent but two days from hence.

The day passed away without another message from the hakeem, or any preparation for my journey.

THURSDAY, 21st AUGUST.

There is no end to the prevarication of these people. The more earnest we are to go in person to the shaik, the less willing they are to admit of it; and it is likely, after all, that we shall be just where we were before the new hakeem arrived. He told Ibrahim this morning, that he was looking out for a boat to convey me to the shaik, but it was uncertain when he should procure one. This excuse, from a man who can certainly command every boat belonging to Ghinnah, is next to waving the visit altogether.

A funeral procession passed our house about noon, which was very solemn and numerous. The corpse was preceded by troops of women, who went veiled, and and at certain intervals, uttered a choral cry, which was accompanied by expressive action. The coffin was borne by some of the friends of the deceased, and several little flags of different colors were carried around it. A body of priests closed the procession, who recited aloud passages from the Alcoran, as they walked along. Mussulmen never neglect to shew their sense of these sights; and perhaps it would prove of no detriment to Christians, to imbibe some of their customs on these occasions. There was an Arabian merchant on a visit to us, when the funeral went by; and though in company with strangers, he was not ashamed to run to the window, and to join audibly in the devotions of the train. It is true, that the observance of these forms, makes not the Arabs better members of society; that it neither checks their propensity to fraud, nor instils one benevolent idea into their breasts, towards the votaries of a different persuasion. But still it throws a decency into their discourse, a sobriety into their manners, which is very persuasive. They possess, what may be called, the graces of religion, which would better adorn a good Christian, whose temper is charitable, and whose heart unknowing of deceit!

Just as we sat down to dinner, the hakeem sent for Ibrahim, and told him, that he expected an answer from the shaik to-day or to-morrow, which, perhaps, would save me the trouble of waiting on him. This is what we dreaded; but I fear, there is no rebelling against this man's will; and we must endeavor some way or other to fix him in our interest. In the evening Mr. Hammond and I went to the caravan-sera, to pay our compliments to our Turkish acquaintance. He received us with his usual civility. The chance of proceeding to Cairo by the Nile, seems to be much against us, on account of the disturbances. We should, therefore, be very happy in the Turk's company in our journey by land, as his knowledge of the language and customs of the country, would be a great defence to us against the inconveniences of the road. His circumstances, however, will by no means afford the expence of five camels, which the coffee he has would require; and he is content to wait the issue of the disputes upon the river. We could not converse on so delicate a subject in a public place, and have therefore desired the favor of his company in the morning, when we shall propose to pay for his camel-hire, should he consent to make one of our party. This is to be kept a profound secret. Though fifty dollars can be no object to us, when compared to the services we are likely to reap from his presence, we must, at all events, conceal a circumstance from the hakeem, which would sufficiently denote the strength of our resources.

As we were going to bed, we had a visit from the hakeem, who is very mysterious in his hours of communicating with us. To our great joy, he did not touch on the usual string of presents; but came, as he said, to satisfy our minds of his intentions to send us under a safe conduct to Cairo, when he received the shaik's sanction for such a step.

F R I D A Y, 22d AUGUST.

The hakeem sent for Ibrahim at day-break, and founded him respecting the valuables in our possession, which might be worth his acceptance. We have already promised to send him a remnant of broad-cloth, and some India goods, on our arrival at Cairo, by the return of the guard which he is to give us for our protection. But the native disposition of these people renders them suspicious of the professions of others. He, who does not hold himself bound by a promise, will not give another credit for the performance of one, which may be broken with impunity. The hakeem, therefore, wants to absolve us of this distant obligation, provided we come down immediately with something of equal value. Generous man! how he consults the interests of men immediately under his protection! What humane endeavors he daily exerts to render justice to distressed strangers, whom he came here professedly to console and to relieve! Two of the gang who were leagued against us, have been twice brought before him. The vizier has been as often summoned to his tribunal. Examinations have been taken of the facts; but as the accusers and the culprits have never been brought together, nothing

nothing is likely to ensue from this extraordinary mode of trial, that can tend to the recovery of our property, or the punishment of the offenders. Smaller crimes, however, are corrected with severity, when they are offered to Mussulmen; an instance of which occurred to-day before our door. A Christian and an Arabian were convicted before the hakeem, of stealing a small quantity of silver plate from a caravanera. This act of delinquency was punished by a severe bastinado on the soles of the feet, which we understand is the general method of correction.

This being the Mahometan sabbath, the hakeem went in great state to the mosque. But the furniture of his horse was not of a piece with the display he meant to make. It was very antique, and considerably the worse for wear. Neither did his beast do much credit to his keeping. The horses in Upper Egypt seem to labor in common under this neglect. They are very sprightly animals, though of a small size; and yet they cut no figure, where corn and sugar-canes are in great plenty; which must be attributed either to the unskilfulness of the groom, or the penury of the owner. Indeed, provisions of all kinds are so cheap in this country, that the natives live well, for little or nothing. We, who necessarily pay for things at double rates, provide for a family of ten or twelve people, at the moderate expence of one dollar and a half, or seven shillings per diem. In this are included fruits of various kinds, of which we eat so heartily, that they often constitute a quarter part of the cost. Bread is at least thrice as cheap as in England, and fine mutton sells usually at two pence per pound. But what avails the plenty that reigns here, when freedom has fled the land, and taken up her abode in northern climes? Insecure in the enjoyment of their property, which is the sport of every intestine commotion, the natives rather draw out a life of uncertain tenure, than exist with the spirit of human creatures.

A servant belonging to our house brought me a piece of copper money, which I immediately knew to be Roman. On my giving him a silver dewanny for it, value a halfpenny, he produced three others, all Roman coins, and found, as he tells me, among some ruins here. To spur his activity in procuring me more, I gave him two dewannies a-piece for the rest, with which he seemed much delighted. I can only regret the critical situation we are in, which prevents our beating up an ample field, that undoubtedly abounds in every species of antique rarities.

S A T U R D A Y, 23d AUGUST.

The quondam hakeem sent for Ibrahim early this morning, and proposed my accompanying him to the shaik this evening. We very readily closed with this scheme, and sent our compliments to the hakeem, desiring his permission to go. This was a request which he could not flatly refuse; but Ibrahim says he appeared much chagrined that we would not trust to the letter he had sent, and to which he daily expected a favorable answer. We are so tired out with evasions, that any state seems preferable to that we are in; and I have accordingly prepared myself to embark with the quondam hakeem and Ibrahim for the shaik's court at sunset.

While we were at breakfast, we had a visit from the Turk, who was accompanied by a friend that is likewise going to Cairo. He opened to us a design which we much approved of, and doubt not to bring it to bear, in case of the shaik's permission. He tells us there is a boat ready to sail for Cairo, on which we may embark at my return, provided we are willing to give their passage to some camel-drivers, who are waiting for a conveyance to Cairo. He is acquainted with a company of these people, who want to transport their coffee thither. They will save us the expence of a guard, as every man carries a matchlock, and, in defence of his property, will form the best protection we can desire for our boat. We esteem ourselves very lucky in having found an adviser, whose interest will prompt him to be sincere, and whose journey depends upon our success.

I had a message about eleven o'clock, to prepare for my voyage immediately after dinner. This meal is served up at noon in this country, and we were in the height of it, when Ibrahim was sent for by the hakeem. We did not like this summons, and were the less surprized, when we learnt that the hakeem dissuaded us from going to the shaik. This he did, under the pretence of the trouble it would give me, and the little consequence a visit would be of, unfurnished as we were with a present to smooth the introduction of our suit. To this we replied, that nothing could be accounted a trouble which would effect our departure; and in respect to the want of a present, the gentleman who went, proposed to lay the paper, which contained our losses here, at the shaik's feet; and to request him to recover the whole for his own use. And that this could not be considered as a trifling gift, which amounted at least to 1,200 dollars. But he was deaf to these arguments; and at length told us he would write again by his predecessor in office, urging an order for our safe conduct to Cairo. But that he could not admit of my visiting the shaik, and falling into a thousand difficulties, from an inability to satisfy the demands of the shaik's secretaries and domestics. There was some shew of reason in this remonstrance. We were well acquainted with their craving disposition; and though we had money enough to have scattered among them, our situation is so precarious, that we dare not pretend to it. The fact is, we are in his power, and cannot act contrary to his inclination. We therefore submitted with a good grace, and sent Ibrahim to the quondam hakeem, to remind him of our story, and to bespeak his influence with the shaik shaik in our behalf. Ibrahim attended him to the boat, and brought us back assurances of his utmost services, which the poor man delivered with tears in his eyes. This is too uncommon an expression of sincerity among the Arabs, to make us suspicious of its not coming from the heart*.

We walked to the caravanera in the evening, to acquaint the Turk of our disappointment, and to tender him camels for the conveyance of his coffee, should the shaik think it safer for us to go by land. He received the offer with gratitude; but still gives us hopes of hearing better news concerning the troubles on the river.

S U N D A Y, 24th AUGUST.

The Turk came to us this morning, with a face full of something important. After the first cup of coffee, he delivered himself of his burthen, which was at all events to dissuade us from going by land. He told us, that he proposed setting off in a few days for Jirje, to wait till the river was clear, and pressed us much to accompany him. We were rather startled at this proposition, after what had passed between us the night before; and, willing to know his sentiments fully on the matter, we re-

* Thus were all my hopes of viewing the antiquities of Luxor and Thebes, dashed in a moment, by the caprice of a slave, who is become our master, and detains me from accompanying this Arab to the shaik, who is in that neighborhood.

peated our intention to proceed by land, in case the passage by the Nile should remain still perilous. Now it was that we learnt the desperate situation we were reduced to. The dangers which encompassed us appeared in their proper colors, and required not the touches of art to give them a formidable appearance. Armies of contending parties obstructed our progress by water; and a band of robbers threatened to pursue our footsteps by land. In short, we discovered that this Turk was tender of the characters of Mussulmen, until he began to suspect we should suffer by their treachery. He therefore informed us in confidence, that we should be madmen to trust ourselves over the desarts of Thebais, when our departure could not be kept a secret. That, allowing the hakeem to be sincere, and that he dispatched us agreeably to the shaik's order, there would not be wanting rogues in this town, who, confident of our carrying away money and jewels with us, would secretly collect thirty or forty light camels, and although we had got two days start of them, might easily overtake, plunder, and murder our whole body. To illustrate this observation, he related to us a story of a Turkish gentleman of his acquaintance, who was treated in this manner about two years ago, in a journey from Cosire to Ghinnah. A report universally prevailed, as in our case, that he was possessed of great wealth, and he was followed by a select band into the desert, and surprized while he was taking some refreshment beneath a thorn-tree. His party was too weak to resist the robbers; and the Turk was shot through the head at the first onset. This anecdote naturally led him to reflect on our late situation, which had been so similar to the unfortunate traveller's, and to congratulate us on the issue, which had been so different. He was ascertained that the same fate had been intended us, from which we had escaped by a single intervention of Providence. On the other hand, our friend pointed out the probability of our shunning the dangers of the river, by the taking refuge in any town we might be near, on an alarm of enemies; not to add the chance of steering clear of them by night, and our ability, in a stout boat, to make a manful resistance against an hostile attack. We were quickly convinced of the propriety of this advice; and it is resolved that we wait for the shaik's answer respecting our departure. Should it so happen that he direct our being sent by land, we are to inform the hakeem that we are content to run all risks by water, rather than encounter the fatigues of another camel-journey: And, moreover, that our purses will not afford the expence of it. In the mean time, the Turk is to secure a boat, and to hold it in readiness for us. This is a plan that has been reared on the most plausible foundation, but, like the rest of our airy schemes, may be demolished by the changes of the morrow.

I know not whether I should lament or rejoice at my not being possessed of the true spirit of virtù, which, overlooking all obstacles and perils, leads the possessor, to hazard every thing for the acquisition of an antique medal or seal. Were I one of the number whom Pope says, "sighs for an Otho, and neglects his bride," I might indeed add to the list of the curiosities which I have picked up, but at the same time endanger our very liberties, by a shew of enquiry into the smallest matters. To procure these reliques, money must be produced, the mere rumor of which might awaken the avarice of the people, at whose disposal we lie. These reflections were suggested by a present, which I received this evening from one of the Christians, of seals taken up both here and at antient Thebes. The impressions, it must be confessed, discover no great elegance in the engraving. But their antiquity is not to be doubted, from the remoteness of the quarter in which they were found.

M O N D A Y, 25th AUGUST.

News is at length arrived of the death of the merchant Mahomet at Cosire. The persons who communicated it to us, had the confidence to warn us of going abroad immediately, lest the relations of the deceased should revenge themselves upon us, whose money they consider to have been the cause of his murder. A pretty inference, truly! worthy of the subtle intellects of this diabolical tribe! But whether the danger exists or not, we intend to make a plea of it to the hakeem, to hasten our departure, as we do of the murder itself, to excuse our going by land. Indeed, when we are ascertained of the villainy of the Arabs, who are lawless enough to take away a Mussulman's life in the middle of a caravan, what security can be given to Christians, for their safety with a small body? Our Turk paid us a morning visit amid these determinations, and again confirmed us in them. He proposes our getting away to Jirje as soon as possible, and remaining there, until an opportunity offers to convey ourselves to Cairo. He describes Jirje to be a large and well-regulated city; where we may keep ourselves private in a caravansera, and be two days nearer the capital, to obtain intelligence. We are too tired of the oppression and deceit of the people of Ghinnah, not to wish earnestly for a change of the scene; which, at any rate, cannot prove less agreeable and eligible to us.

The fall of villainy occasions as great lamentations in this town, as would the demise of integrity in an honest land. The tragedy which was lately acted near Cosire, gave birth to a mournful procession of females, which passed through the different streets of Ghinnah this morning, and uttered dismal cries for the death of Mahomet. In the center was a female of his family, who carried a naked sword in her hand, to intimate the weapon by which the deceased fell. At sundry places the procession stopped, and danced around the sword, to the music of timbrels and tabors. They paused a long time before our house, and some of the women made threatening signs to one of our servants; which agree with the caution we received to keep within doors. It would be dangerous enough to face this frantic company; whose constant clamor and extravagant gestures give them all the appearance of the female Bacchanals of Thrace, recorded of old.

As our Turk came up stairs this evening, he was stopped by some of the hakeem's servants, and we were obliged to send Ibrahim to obtain him admittance. The little man was much nettled at this usage, nor could we account for it. The bustle below stairs had occasioned an enquiry into the cause, and Ibrahim was summoned by the great man, to explain it. The Turk insisted upon accompanying him, and returned to us very well satisfied. He told the hakeem that he was an acquaintance of long standing; was known to our consul at Cairo, and purposed to attend us to that city. We are very well pleased that this matter is broken to the hakeem; who politely apologized for the affront, which had been offered to a friend of ours, through the ignorance of his servants.

The meanness of this Abassée is shocking to a liberal mind, which must be reduced indeed to accept of the trifles which he greedily solicits. He suspects us to be bare of money, and is willing to ease us of our remaining cloaths. He even takes apparel which can be turned to no use; and the very sheets from our beds have not escaped his rapacious hands. Daily are the inroads which he makes into our baggage; and we are content to have it reduced to a small compass. Among all the bad qualities this fellow possesses, pride cannot be included in the number.

T U E S D A Y, 26th AUGUST.

The times of Yambo seem to be once more revived, and our patience fated to be put to the severest proof. Three days are elapsed since the last letter went to the shaik, and no answer is yet arrived. It is a mystery to all, that no notice has been taken of the various accounts, which have been transmitted to the shaik relative to us. He doubtless knows of our detention; but we greatly apprehend, that he is still a stranger to the principal circumstances of our story. Were it not for the confidence we repose in the former hakeem, we should not expect any orders in our favor, until the shaik's return, which every one says is near at hand. This morning we saw his nephew pass towards the river, where he embarks in a boat to meet the shaik. Four or five hours of a fair wind, will carry him to the place to which his uncle has lately moved.

We had a long visit from the hakeem this forenoon. He tells us that advices came yesterday from Cairo, which afford hopes that a strong force will soon be sent up the river, to clear it of Ibrahim Beg's parties. A large detachment of Ismaul Beg's army has secured an important post about fifty miles below Jirje; so that the communication is open from thence to Cairo; and Mustapha Beg's

gallics are thereby detained at Jirje. A very short interval may occasion a revolution in matters; and the rebels who obstruct our progress, may be driven back to the upper parts of the Nile. We also find that Ismaul Beg, by these advices, has invested the Shaik Ul Arab with the sovereignty of four more provinces of Upper Egypt. A refined stroke of policy in the Bey, to confirm him in the interest of the government; and to oblige him to defend these very provinces against the fugitive chiefs, who might acquire a supply of men and money from the conquest of them.

In the course of our conversation with the ha-keem, we discovered his predilection to our going by land. On our pointing out the obstacles which might deter us from such an undertaking, he endeavored to obviate them, by the strongest assurances of his care and protection. He went so far as to declare, that on our setting out for Cairo, he would seize upon Ally and the fellows who had robbed us, and detain them in custody until our safety was known. That he would also affix chops or seals, upon the warehouse-doors of the camel-drivers, until they returned with the intelligence of our arrival at Cairo. These promises are encouraging enough, and might induce us to venture at last upon camels, if an example were made of the rogues who plundered us, to deter others from attempting the like. The camel-drivers who went with the company of Turks to Cairo, are expected back in four or five days. They will, perhaps, bring us an answer from Mr. Baldwin, and we have the good fortune to be furnished, by his means, with a recommendation to the shaik from Ismaul Beg. But there is little chance of our being obliged to determine on this point, during the absence of the shaik. The government is likely to reap no little advantage from our coming here. The murder of Mahomet has given it a pretence, to secure the property of the camel-drivers belonging to that caravan. We saw a secretary pass by with a party of soldiers this afternoon, and were told, that he had been affixing chops to the different warehouses of their caravansera, which contained coffee to a considerable amount. This would partly go towards satisfying the family of the deceased, but the most considerable portion be confiscated to government.

I went up to the top of our house in the evening, to observe the progress of the inundations of the Nile. The freshes now are at the greatest height; and there appeared a prodigious alteration in the scene since my last view of it. The waters are spread to the very extremities of the town. The stream is greatly agitated and discolored, and runs down with the force of an headlong torrent.

WEDNESDAY, 27th AUGUST,

I was awakened before day-break by the same troop of women, which passed our house the other day day in honor to the memory of Mahomet. Their dismal cries suited well with the lonely hour of the night: and I understand that this relic of the Grecian custom lasts for the space of seven days; during which interval the female relations of the deceased make a tour through the town, morning and night, beating their breasts, throwing ashes on their heads, and displaying every artificial token of sorrow.

The general rumor of the town is, that the shaik will be here to-morrow. Some of his domestics are arrived, which in a manner confirms it. It is time for us to be relieved from the restraint we are under, as every hour teems with the danger of discoveries. From the frequent inspection of our baggage, we still hold it expedient to carry our money and valuables about us. Besides the irksomeness of such a charge, accidental occurrences have often brought us to the brink of betraying it: and more than once, to my great confusion, has the hakeem himself fate down so close to the place where my watch has been concealed, that he must infallibly have heard it going, had we not strained all our invention to engage his attention. God grant that the shaik was once come among us! when the worst which can happen will be, that we shall know the utmost malice of our fate.

We took a walk this evening along the banks of the Nile, to see the revolution of things in that quarter. The deluge extends itself daily on every side; and we remarked many places where the river

river has formerly made inroads into the town itself. A face of business diffuses itself around the country. The husbandmen have prepared their grounds for the reception of the manure, which the floods will leave upon them. Nature assists them in a point, the most laborious and expensive to the farmer in other * countries; and to this account the cheapness of grain may be imputed in Upper Egypt, more than to the quantity which the land produces, which is only cultivated on the banks of the Nile. When the waters retire, the seed is immediately sown, and a crop is reaped within the short space of four months. The most astonishing instance of the quickness of vegetation that the world can afford. As we had encountered some intelligent fellows on the road, I enquired into some of the natural curiosities, which have so long distinguished this region. I learn that the ostrich is too common, to be much regarded by the natives. That the crocodile is a most formidable tenant of the Nile, and held in great dread by the fishermen; one of whom told us, that he was present at the death of a crocodile a short time ago, in whose belly were found the gold rings and ornaments of a dancing-girl, who was devoured by the monster, as she was bathing in the river. The hippopotamus, or river-horse, is * The author must except the kingdom of Bengal, which is watered by that noble river the Ganges; whose operations and effects bear an intimate resemblance to those of the Nile.

likewise yet, though rarely, met with, between this place and Jirje. I have an exact resemblance of him in an antique seal which came from the ruins of Thebes; but I must add, that he is often found to be twelve feet and upwards in length. His skin is so hard as to resist a musket-ball; and he is so cunning, as seldom or never to be seen ashore, by day-light. Among the various reasons that induce my preferring to travel by water, the desire of beholding this rare production of nature, is not the least cogent: and I cannot but anticipate the gratifications which are in store for us, whenever I meditate on a voyage down the Nile, disturbed as it is by the commotions of war.

THURSDAY, 28th AUGUST.

The morning was ushered in by the arrival of a great man, who came immediately to our house, accompanied by the hakeem, who went to the river-side to receive him. He is a Turk, and was lately governor of Ghose, a town some hours distant up the Nile, from whence he was removed on the revolution at Cairo. He is going by land to that city, and on hearing of our situation, very politely sent a message to request the favor of our company. A better opportunity could not have offered itself for our proceeding by this route; and we must undoubtedly avail ourselves of it, if no good intelligence reach us touching the passage by water, before fore the shaik's return, which this Turk assures us will be to-morrow evening, or the next morning at furthest. It will be with the utmost regret, that we forego the verdant prospects, the romantic scenes, which the banks of the Nile abound with, to traverse stony vallies and a dreary waste. We cannot, with any degree of patience, compare the ease and convenience of a boat, to the labor, fatigue, and heat we shall experience, in journeying upon camels. But so hearty is our aversion to the people we are among, so wearied out are we with the delays we have met with, that we are ready to encounter the horrors of the desert, provided we encounter them under a safe conduct, rather than remain here a week longer, to wait the issue of the disputes upon the river.—But our resolutions are the sport of fortune, and catch their hue from the aspect of the day. It is with some concern, that we shall separate ourselves from our little Turkish acquaintance, whose good-humor and attention have greatly preferred him in our esteem. But it would be folly to reject the protection of this great man, who travels with a strong guard, for the uncertain and dangerous prospect of getting down by water.

We were warmly solicited by the hakeem to-day, for various articles, which he had overlooked before. This is a strong intimation that his master is at hand, to deliver us at least from his importunities.

FRIDAY,

F R I D A Y, 29th AUGUST.

A woman came to our door to-day, who used to ask charity of us at Cofire. She is just arrived with the caravan, and brings some shocking accounts touching the death of Mahomet. It appears, that he was left in the desert by the villains who assaulted him, and remained there three days without any assistance whatever, when he was accidentally taken up by a party of a few camels, and carried to Cofire. There he lingered three days more, ere death relieved him from the pains he endured. The tortures which were reserved for this poor wretch, from the rankling of his many wounds, are really affecting to humanity; but the horrors which must have haunted his conscience in this dreadful interval, are too formidable to conceive. The deceit which he had practised towards strangers, the breach of hospitality beneath his own roof, and the perjuries that he had committed in the presence of a just God, must in those moments have recurred with double force to his imagination, and struck him with a full conviction of his guilt. Even the Arabs themselves, who are seldom restrained from evil from the contemplation of a future state, acknowledge the interposition of the divine hand in the fate of this man. Unhappy victim of prejudice and passion! may thy sins have been expiated by the anguish of thy exit! And may the eternal pardon

pardon which is promised to repentance, meet thee as fully, as what I bestow upon thy offence!

Our hopes of going in company with the Turkish officer, are cut off as soon as formed. He purposes setting out this night, and we are immovably fixed here, until the presence of the shaik breaks the spell. We cannot but secretly reproach the hakeem for this disappointment. Had he permitted of my embassy to the shaik, there is little doubt but we should have obtained permission to accompany this Turk to Cairo. But we have not been wanting to effect the utmost. We have written a fourth letter to Mr. Baldwin, stating our uncomfortable situation; which we have committed to the care of one of the Turk's domestics, through the means of Ibrahim.

The Turk and his party departed at midnight, which we observed from our windows, that almost face his lodgings. He had given out that he should not go until the morning. These precautions were taken by the former travellers who went by land; to deceive, we presume, the thieves who lurk in this neighborhood.

S A T U R D A Y, 30th AUGUST.

We had scarcely breakfasted this morning, when advice came of the long-expected approach of the Shaik Ul Arab. We immediately went to the top of our house, to see the ceremony of his landing.

We

We had hitherto restrained our joy at an event, which was too desirable to be credited, without the evidence of our senses. The reader may judge therefore of our emotions, when we beheld a large fleet of boats, falling down with the stream. We found the shaik to be in the headmost, from the pendant and ensign which were displayed on board; and he soon entered the creek, which is a shelter for boats from the violence of the freshes, both sides of which were lined with people to receive him. But by the strength of the current his boat was forced upon a bank, mid-way in the creek, and not without great difficulty, disengaged. The watermen on the Nile do not seem to understand their business, like their fraternity on the Thames; or they would not have left their monarch so long in perplexity. Several ropes gave way in drawing the boat from the bank; and two hours elapsed before she was brought to the landing-place, though assisted by some hundreds of people.

It was pleasant enough to behold the terraces crowned with women on this occasion. Their keepers were probably abroad, to pay their compliments to the shaik, while the birds flew to the tops of their cages, to taste of the momentary sweets of liberty. I never saw so numerous a shew of females, some of whom, in our neighborhood, proclaimed themselves proficient in the arts of coquetry, by withdrawing their veils to attract our notice, and dropping them again, when our eyes were fixed upon their faces. Many were the salutations we received from these good-natured creatures; whose freedom of behavior to us, I attribute to the rigid confinement in which they are kept. Restraint is the bane of modesty in female bosoms; and I will venture to say, that there are more women of loose inclinations in the Turkish dominions, than in all Europe beside. So just is the advice of our countryman Prior, in regard to our treatment of a fair companion:

Be to her virtues very kind;
Let all her ways be unconfin’d,
And clap your padlock on her mind!”*

At four o’clock we were summoned to the presence of the shaik, whom we found alone in a lower apartment of his palace. We were much elevated by his arrival, and perhaps, could not have appeared to better advantage before our protector; whose cordial reception of us bespeaks him to be such, in the truest sense of the word. He seated us on the same carpet with himself, and after a few compliments, which were interpreted to us by Ibrahim, he directed coffee and fruit to be placed before us. Here for the first time we saw grapes, which were very fine, and a peculiar date, which surpasses every thing of the kind I ever met with. While we were partaking of this repast, I had leisure to take a full view of the shaik, and cannot resist the inclination of introducing a character to the reader, reader, of which I flatter myself he will have reason to be enamored hereafter.

Isman Abu Ally, the great shaik of the Arabs— for such we would render the Shaik Ul Arab—is a short fat man, of about five feet two inches high, and turned, as we learn, of seventy-five. His eyes are grey, and his complexion very fair; but what at once gives him a singular and more youthful look, his beard, which is very bushy, is colored of a bright yellow. This exterior may not seem the most promising, and might create distaste, if the benevolence that beams from his countenance, were not foremost to secure the heart of the beholder. Neither can the shrillness of his voice, which is harsh and dissonant, destroy the beauty of the sentiments, which it is insufficiently made use of to convey; as the elegance of the words may sometimes atone for the demerits of a tune. He is still active, for a man of his size and age; and his spirits are so good, that were it not for the ravage which time has made among his teeth, he might pass for a younger man by twenty years at least. Except the viziers of Yambo and Ghinnah, whom we had found to be villains by sad experience, we had hitherto dealt with the dross of the nation. It was reserved for this moment, for us to meet with the polite gentleman and the honest man, comprized in the person where they ought to be found, in the representative of his people. Happy the subject of a virtuous land, who at once possesses and imitates so rare an example! But how sunk in the abyss of infamy are the race, who wholly deviate from the standard of rectitude; and though daily reproached by the life of their monarch, are not to be reclaimed by the tone of authority, or the elocution of active virtue!

We had quickly cause to find, that we had not given the shaik too much credit for his integrity. His impatience to acquit himself in our opinion, of any connivance at the conduct of his servants, could scarcely be restrained by the forms of civility, which precluded business during our repast. But no sooner was it ended, than he shifted the conversation, and came directly to the point which we were so much concerned in. He lamented the treatment which we had undergone, and which could only have happened in his absence; and he vehemently reprobated the behavior of his officers, which he was determined to punish in the most exemplary manner. After a few leading questions, which tended to confirm the report that had been made to him touching our story, he professed, that his return to Ghinnah had been hastened on our account. That he had come purposely to do us strict justice on our persecutors, and to dispatch us under a safe conduct to Cairo. As a proof of his sincerity, he ordered Ally, the brother of the deceased Mahomet, to be brought before him. He had been previously taken into custody, and was waiting without, to be examined. With this fellow, came Sauker, one of the rogues who had assisted to plunder us, and who of his own accord, produced the things things which had fallen to his share, in the division of the spoils. He laid them at the shaik's feet; and with the greatest effrontery declared, that he had taken them, only to secure them from the thieves of the house: and that his truth might be deduced from his care of our property. Though his offence was palpable, this step was sufficient to skreen him from punishment in a country, where retribution is all that is required by the prosecutor, and where justice is generally to be appeased by pecuniary fines. But the ill-advised Ally did not escape in this manner. He boldly denied having robbed us of money or valuables, and was loudly exclaiming at the injustice of the accusation, when the shaik raised his voice, and a dozen Abyssinian slaves suddenly seized on the culprit, and hurried him out of the room. We were in pain for the fellow, and were meditating on the consequences of his arrest, when he was brought into our presence again, bound hand and foot, with a chain about his neck, by which he was held. He was on the point of receiving the bastinado on his knees, when he confessed the charge, and promised to return all that he had taken from us. The shaik was inclined to inflict the punishment on him; but by the interposition of those about him, in which we joined, he remitted it for the present; and directed Ally to be led home, that he might produce the goods. Our triumph was complete. One of our antient enemies had atoned for his crime, in a manner that outwent the most sanguine idea of revenge. The other was humbled at our feet. He survived indeed: but it was only to abase himself before us, and to depend upon our moderation for his security!

In about half an hour Ally returned, and produced a few of the least valuable articles. He earnestly requested until the morning to deliver up the rest, and to repay us the money that he had cheated us out of. This was granted him at our desire, and the prisoner committed to his own house, under the custody of a strong guard.

Several of the shaik's courtiers had come in during this examination, among whom were his nephew and the quondam hakeem. We found the latter was in disgrace, and endeavored to make his peace, by expressing to his master, the many obligations we lay under to his care of our persons. The good old man only shook his head in reply, and waved the subject, by desiring us to attend again at seven o'clock the next morning, when he had summoned a full court of justice to punish our aggressors. He dismissed us, with fresh assurances of his protection; and, as an earnest of what we might expect, he directed our servants to carry home the recovered goods in triumph before us.

SUNDAY,

SUNDAY, 31st AUGUST.

We breakfasted betimes, and at seven o'clock went to the shaik's house. The court were already assembled in an open spot before the house, which was shaded by an high wall from the morning sun. Here we found the shaik encompassed by his great men, with a number of soldiers and attendants at some distance in their front. Carpets were spread in the intermediate space for our reception. Here we seated ourselves, after making our obeisance to the shaik, and waited in silence the issue of the trial. Next to the shaik's right hand was placed his nephew, and, as we understand, his declared successor in the government. He is a comely and good-humored looking man, seemingly between thirty and forty years of age; and by his behavior, appeared to be less our enemy than any other of his uncle's counsellors. So unhappy is this upright and humane prince in the lot of his servants.

Just before we came in, the culprit Ally had undergone a severe bastinado, on again proving refractory; and the hakeem was sent to search his house for the stolen goods. This occasioned a pause in the proceedings, which was interrupted by the sudden appearance of the vizier, who, to our great astonishment, took a seat which was vacant next to the shaik's nephew. This confidence was unexpected, and filled us with unfavorable prognostics of the event of our suit. But our doubts were of short continuance. He had entered unregarded by his master, and was talking with great ease to those about him, when the shaik turned about, and in a solemn tone, asked him for the shauls and things, which he had received from the English gentlemen. The whole frame of this gay courtier was evidently discomposed by this question. He had probably laid his account with our suppressing the part he had taken against us, after the high hand with which he had once stopped the accusation of Abdul Ruffar, and was unprepared with an evasion. His countenance instantly was disrobed of its pleasantry; his limbs trembled, and his tongue faltered in framing a reply, the substance of which was, that he was a stranger to the matter with which he was charged. We were ashamed of the meanness of a man of his rank, but the wrath of the shaik was wound up to the highest pitch at the hearing of this falsehood. He was confirmed of the guilt from the symptoms which the offender displayed; and without calling any fresh evidence to corroborate it, he proceeded to decide. But he could hardly find utterance for his orders, which were to arrest and flog the vizier immediately. A number of slaves started from the croud, to execute the pleasure of their lord. The astonished minister could not believe his ears, and would fain have persuaded himself that the affair was a jest. He was presently convinced of his mistake. The officers ficers of justice laid violent hands upon his person, tumbled him from his proud seat, and in a rude manner hurried him away, in spite of his outcries and fruitless resistance. This behavior served only to exasperate the shaik. His eyes flashed with the honest indignation which lighted his bosom; his strength could scarcely support the agitations of his mind; and after some effort, he raised himself from his carpet, and repeated his commands in a voice, that struck terror into the breasts of all present. He was immediately surrounded by a croud of his courtiers, who kissed his hands, embraced his knees, and interceded with him for the pardon of the vizier. These nobles took no share in the passions of their monarch, and were only attentive to exculpate one of their body, though at the expence of honor and justice.

I must own that I was concerned at the fearful situation of a man, who had never been guilty of any actual violence towards us, and whose greatest trespass was the receipt of presents, on his assurances of protection, when he permitted of our being plundered by our inhospitable host and his adherents. These, however, were crimes of the deepest dye, in the eyes of the good old shaik. When we directed Ibrahim to plead for the inoffensive conduct of the vizier towards us, he would not hear of any apology for a villain, who had so little the honor of his country at heart, as to injure its character by winking at the maltreatment of strangers. He could the less overlook it in a servant of his own, and added, that it was at our instance only, he would remit the punishment due to his enormity. The mortification nevertheless was reserved for the vizier, that he should be brought before us, disarrayed of his gay apparel, his hands bound behind him, and a chain fastened about his neck. In this miserable plight, he was told of the obligation he was under to our generous application; and led home by a guard, to produce his ill-gotten acquisition, as his only hope of safety. We observed a general murmur among the grandees, at the compliment which was paid us on this occasion. The disgrace of one of their body excited no friendly sentiments towards us; and not a few menacing looks were thrown upon us from the circle. On the other hand, the shaik harangued them in a sensible and pathetic speech, on the honor of their nation. He cast the most just and severe reproaches on the character of the absent minister, and warned them in future, against such inhuman practices towards Christians and strangers. He then turned to us with the kindest aspect, and reassured us of his protection. He thanked us for the confidence which we had reposed in him, in venturing through a country, so remote and unknown; and lamented anew, that his absence from his capital had given room for our repenting the experiment. He supposed that no society, however enlightened, was free from the class of reptiles by which we had suffered; and the law provided a just retaliation for the offence. But he attributed the commission of the offence to the neglect of the

hakeem of Ghinnah, who had slumbered like an unwary centinel on his duty. For this he had been discharged from his office, and a slave of his own been sent to take care of us until his arrival. All that was now wanting to complete our satisfaction, was the recovery of our losses, which he would see effected; and our journey to Cairo, which he swore should be accomplished without an injury being offered to an hair of our heads.

As virtue as well as vice is magnified by comparison, it will not appear extraordinary, that our encreasing regard for this great man began to border upon enthusiasm. Reader! if thou art of the yielding kind, if thy mould be susceptible of tender impressions—say, when surrounded by a croud of homely females, did thy heart never beat high at the approach of transcendant beauty? So, from the cloud of miscreants that encompassed his throne, shot forth the glories of the Egyptian king! So bright, so peerless did he rise from the contrast. So unworthily stationed, and yet so worthy of the station in which his birth had placed him! Nursed in the lap of ignorance and barbarism, like another Peter, he had triumphed over nature. Nor opinion could warp, nor habit could bind him. He nobly spurned the prejudices of education, and, without any guide, save the impulse of innate goodness, he soared to the superior heights of virtue. She seemed the mistress of his inclinations, rather than of his election or interest; and, beside him, the world may afford but few subjects of such an an influence. It is true, that his endeavors were not crowned with the success that distinguished those of Peter the Great. But Peter attended more to the aggrandizement than the morals of his people; and, with all the great qualities of the hero, sunk infinitely below the Egyptian, in the feelings of the man. The latter was fit to have ruled over an enlightened empire. While the former, after all his victories, was, in many respects, an example unworthy of imitation!

Our ignorance of the Arabian language obliged us to have recourse to our interpreter, for an acknowledgement of these favors. But at the same time, it saved us the confusion of appearing at a loss for a suitable reply. We sheltered ourselves under this fortunate circumstance, which, in a great measure, left our patron to conceive a gratitude, which words would have but poorly expressed.

A messenger now arrived with two shauls and my creese, from the vizier. The other shaul, he said, he had parted with; and the pistols he had given to Ally. Once more, therefore, was the wretched Ally produced before the court; and on denying the receipt of them, the bastinado was again inflicted on him*. Besides the articles which had been restored, there were still a silver urn, a pair of gold knee-buckles, and a quantity of valuable linen to be accounted for. Not to speak of the money which they had obtained from us, under various pretences. But these were said to have fallen to Mahomet's share in the division; and his robbery and death were made a plea of by the family, to satisfy us for our loss. The shaik would not hear of this apology, which he termed false and evasive. And sooner than we should suffer by that family, he declared, that he would first order their substance to be disposed of, and if that would not repay us for our losses, Ally and the rest of them should be sold as slaves, to make up the sum. It was now time for us to interfere. The matter was exceeding the bounds to which we meant to push it; and policy, as well as humanity, prompted us to drop it. Our principal aim was to get from Ghinnah, under a proper protection. Our persecutors had been chastised, and it was preferable for us to put up with some inconvenience, rather than run the risk of being detained here, in the pursuit of full redress. On this account we listened to the mediation of the hakeem, and some of the courtiers, who beseeched us to withdraw our claim to all but eighty dollars of the remaining debt, which Ally might raise from the camels he possessed. Our acquiescence in this proposal gained us credit with all present, and drew a particular compliment from the worthy shaik; who protested, that he could not but admire our generosity, though it was exercised at the expence of their national character. The reader, perhaps, may agree with us, that we ought not to have subscribed to this insinuation, as such a man as was then before us, was enough to redeem his nation from obloquy.

* This is a very novel as well as fearful punishment. The prisoner is placed upright on the ground, with his hands and feet bound together, while the executioner stands before him, and, with a short illick, strikes him with a smart motion on the outside of his knees. The pain which arises from these strokes, is exquisitely severe, and what no constitution could support for any continuance.

The court now broke up, and we were dismissed, not a little pleased with this mode of administering justice. The punishment inflicted upon robbers in other countries, suppresses the growth of them in the general opinion. But when we reflect on the frequent robberies that are committed in our own, it seems doubtful, whether the severity of the sentence answers the expected end. For a traveller, at least, who has his own interest most at heart, the satisfaction which we received was infinitely more eligible, than any that could have been made us of a sanguinary nature. We had recovered what we had lost all expectation of seeing again; and to our haste and good-will only, is to be attributed our not obtaining the unconditional benefit of the shaik's decree. As a small token of our respect, on our return home, we made up such a present as we judged would be most acceptable to a man of his turn of mind, and sent it to the shaik by Ibrahim. It consisted of a couple of fine shawls, an Indian carpet and palampore, and an handsome sabre and case of pistols. The sabre and pistols, tho' articles of the greatest value, he returned, and sent us many thanks for our remembrance of him in the rest, which he said he would keep for our sake. He also told Ibrahim, that he had directed a merchant to furnish us with camels for our journey, as the river was too perilous for us to venture on. This last instance of his attention served to rivet in our minds the character of Isman Abu Ally, who is indeed a pearl thrown to the swine of Ghinnah.

M O N D A Y, 1st SEPTEMBER.

Our whole thoughts now are turned to our departure. The merchant attended us early this morning, in company with the hakeem, to settle the price of our camels. The common price is from eight to ten dollars each, and it is not surprizing that we pay the highest. But the number of camels which they obliged us to take, was what vexed us the most. We want but nine for ourselves and servants, and they insist upon our providing six more for the use of our guard. These are our camel-drivers, who, in our late journey, were wont to ride two upon a camel; but in the longer one we are about to enter upon, are to have a beast apiece. These additional camels will greatly encrease the expence; but were the demand an imposition, we are determined to submit to it with a good grace, rather than trouble the shaik any further upon our score. We wish not to add to the number of enemies we have in this town, and mean to quit it with the utmost dispatch. We desired the hakeem, therefore, to advance the merchant the eighty dollars lars which he was to levy upon Ally, as an earnest for the hire of his camels.

A thought struck me during our examination yesterday, which I would not have had verified for the treasures of Egypt. The shaik is old and very corpulent; and had it so happened that he had burst a blood-vessel in the heat of his passion, I was revolving the probable consequences in my mind. There was not a man of rank present, whom we could consider in the light of our friend. Even the nephew was neuter; and there is no certainty of the part he would have taken, had such an accident befallen his uncle. In truth, there is little doubt but we should have paid for his favor with our lives. Such a backwardness had been shewn before his arrival to bring the offenders to justice, and such a forwardness in his presence to screen them from punishment, that the shaik saw through the partiality of his officers, and reprehended them for it. One particular circumstance that betrayed their bent, is worthy of remark, and escaped me in the relation of the business of yesterday. The gold buckles which had been taken by Ally were put down in the list of our losses, at what the Arabs imagined an exorbitant value. They could not slip such an occasion of gratifying their malice, and lowering our interest with the king. They boldly taxed us with exaggerating our losses, and endeavoring to profit by their master's clemency. They demanded that a jeweller might be sent for, to ascertain the truth of their charge. To this the shaik was averſe, as, perhaps, conceiving we might have erred through miſtake. But at our inſtance a jeweller attended, whoſe evidence defeated the malice of our enemies. He weighed them in the preſence of the court, and pronounced the gold to be equal to the value affixed, independent of the workmanſhip, which was ſo rare and ſo curious, that he ſuppoſed it muſt have enhanced the price of the buckles more than one half. It muſt be obſerved, that this jeweller, like the other mechanics of this country, was a Chriſtian, and knew the ſhaik too well, to be afraid of ſpeaking the truth, to the great confuſion of our accuſers, who were completely creſt-fallen at this retort.

We had a freſh proof in the afternoon of the ſhaik's concern for our welfare. It ſeems that the camels which went to Cairo with the company of Turks, luckily returned this forenoon, and as they belong to the ſhaik, he is determined to accommodate us with them. This intelligence is juſt brought us by the hakeem, who was ſent to the merchant for our money to pay to the ſhaik's people. We are not a little rejoiced at this change, which will add not only to our ſecurity, but enſure us good treatment from the camel-drivers on the road. At five o'clock they came to pay their reſpects to us; and we have promiſed the head-man, who we find is the chief of the camel-drivers of Ghinnah, and an officer of no ſmall conſequence, a preſent of a dreſs on our arrival at Cairo. His camels are to be ready to-morrow evening, when we are to set out on our journey through the wilderness. We shall, in all likelihood, fall into the track of the children of Israel, when they fled from the verdant banks of the Nile, and took refuge on the shores of Arabia. We are to strike into the road to Suez, to shun the parties that hover about the river; and it was not far below that city, that the Israelites were supposed to have crossed the Red-sea. I cannot, however, suppress my regret, at losing this opportunity of going down the Nile. Had I been a man who travelled for his amusement, I should not probably have experienced this disappointment. I would have waited here, agreeably to an offer which the shaik made, or have gone to Jirje, as the little Turk proposed, until the troubles on the river were subsided. No obstacle should have deterred me from exploring the course of so celebrated a stream, but my being charged with business of a public nature, which will not admit of delay. The importance of this charge has been the rule of conduct of, at least, Mr. Hammond and myself. It induced us to commit ourselves to an open boat in the Red-sea, in the hottest and most unfavorable season of the year; and it now prompts us to embark cheerfully in a journey through a desert, unknown even to the inhabitants of the country; and which, except in the instances I have recited, has not been traversed for this century past, by any but the outcasts of the human kind!

In the afternoon we were visited by three Christian merchants,

merchants, who live at Dundara, a town about three hours, or twelve miles distance down the river. They are come here to compliment the shaik on his return, and are the most creditable people of the mercantile class whom we have seen. They had turbans of a blue checkered pattern, to distinguish them from Mussulmen; and no native Christian is allowed to wear them of other colors, though this restriction is not enforced with strangers. These merchants inform us, that there is an Italian gentleman, who has resided at Dundara for these thirty years past, and who is a painter by profession. But we find that he has exercised his art rather for his amusement than profit; and that his own house alone is adorned with the productions of his pencil. We are curious to know the adventures which brought such a character to settle in this obscure corner, and, did our time permit, we should readily accept of these merchants' offer to bring us together. Notwithstanding the unfavorable disposition of his subjects towards them, every thing conspires to prove the shaik's affection for Christians. All his principal domestics, and particularly his secretaries, who enjoy his unlimited confidence, are of this persuasion. Indeed, all ranks of them join to sound the praises of the present shaik, who stands between them and the oppression of the Arabs. He has been their guardian for forty years and upwards; and I fear there will be a great change in their situation at his death.

T U E S D A Y, 2d SEPTEMBER.

We were surrounded this morning by a croud of servants belonging to the shaik, who expect money from us. Though we might have got rid of them by threatening to complain of their insolence, we chose to avoid the odium of such a measure; and called upon the hakeem to accommodate the matter for us. Those who assisted to punish the offenders, we agreed to gratify with a piece of gold each: and the hakeem dismissed the rest, as not being entitled to our bounty.

At eight o'clock we had a message from the shaik to attend him. We found him, as before, encompassed by his principal courtiers; and he obligingly desired us to seat ourselves upon carpets beside him. He told us, that he had solicited our presence, to give us into the charge of the master of his camels, who is dignified with the title of a shaik. This man was accordingly called before us, and the shaik addressing him by the name of Hadgee Uttalah, informed him, that he was to convey us and our baggage safe to Cairo; and that should we prefer the least complaint against his conduct, his head should answer for it. Nothing could be more satisfactory to us, than a charge like this, so publicly delivered; and of the weight of which, Hadgee Uttalah himself appeared to be so fully sensible. It not only tended to secure us from the danger of treachery on the road, but the warmth with which the shaik espoused our cause, was, in our opinion, the strongest bulwark we could have against the secret malevolence of our enemies. The good old man became very familiar with us, and asked a thousand questions concerning the natural and artificial productions of our country. He admired a china bowl which belonged to the major; but declined taking it, as common earthen-ware was full good enough for him. From this, however, he took occasion to mention an European, who had been long in his service, and had the ingenuity to imitate china very closely. He called for a specimen of this fellow's skill; and we were surprized to see a couple of vases delicately wrought and painted. We were desirous to behold the artist, but were informed by the shaik, that he was left behind at a town up the river. We now heard many droll anecdotes of this Englishman, as he called himself. That he delighted in high-seasoned dishes, and drank such a quantity of spirits, that it was a wonder his inside was not consumed by fire. This intemperance suited but ill with the simplicity and sobriety of the Arabians. But the shaik was polite enough to say, that the report which had been made to him of our mode of living, had effaced the disagreeable impressions which he had received of our countrymen. He would venture to add, however, that one article of luxury, which he observed to be in use at our table, had given rise to the ideas of our wealth, and singled us out as a beneficial prize to his covetous subjects. And this was the silver, of which our cups and spoons were composed. To a people who were accustomed to wooden utensils, that glittering metal was a bait, which had allured them to an unjust though tempting pursuit. Far as it was from exculpating the conduct of the Arabs, we could not but feel the force of this oblique reproof. The modest manners of the antient Romans, when in the meridian of their greatness, recurred to our imaginations. We blushed for our deviating so much from their example, in the presence of a man, who trod in their footsteps without a mark to direct him. And perhaps, for once in our lives, we despised the symbols of ostentation and the effeminacy of fashion!

While we were thus engaged, the relations of the foldier who murdered Mahomet, together with the camel-drivers of the caravan, were brought before the shaik. They were accompanied by the father and brother of the deceased, who appeared as prosecutors. The witnesses for the culprit making little or no defence, the trial was soon concluded; and sentence of death was passed upon him by the shaik. Although the murderer came a prisoner yesterday from Cosire, it is remarkable, that he was not present on this occasion, nor allowed to offer any thing in bar to his condemnation. If, however, the salutary laws of our free constitution are wanting here, the loss would not be felt, could this country continue to boast of its present equitable judge. But those laws were provided to guard as much against the encroachments of the crown, as the machinations of the subject. Happy the soil in which they flourish! Thrice happy the people who bask beneath the sunshine of freedom; and depend not upon the uncertain character of a chief magistrate; upon the virtues or vices of a king!

As the name of the young shaik of Cosire has not been mentioned in this trial, we suppose that he was wronged by report, or screened by interest from the charge in which his comrade was involved. It had come to the Shaik UI Arab's ears, that this young man and his father had extorted money and effects from us. The accusation had been framed by his courtiers, who were perhaps, jealous of the advantages they had derived from us; and every persuasion was now used to make us acquiesce in it. Had we given scope to our resentment against this treacherous pair, it is likely, that we should have supported the accusation; which opened a way to redress for their impositions at Cosire, and their inhumanity in betraying us into the hands of such villains at Ghinnah. But one good action which they performed towards us, outweighed the multitude of their misdeeds in our minds. We remembered that our lives and property had been at their mercy, both at Cosire, and in the road to this place. The first had not been attempted by them; and when the last could not have been withheld from them, we acknowledged a merit in their forbearance, when the principle which excited them to extort a part, could have put them in possession of the whole. Weak as this reasoning may appear to the sticklers for justice, it had force enough with us to operate in favor of the delinquents. We knew the unlicensed tempers of the Arabs, and it was but fair to judge of them by their own rule of action. We declined, therefore, the shaik's kind offer to call these fellows to account; and professed an ignorance of their being any otherwise accessory to our misfortunes, than by their fatal recommendation to the family now before us.

We had no latent meaning in this application, but the venerable shaik did not let it pass unnoticed. He pointed out the certainty of the detection of villainy, either sooner or later. He deduced it from the instance which was now before him; where, without a friend to take our part, the wrongs which we had suffered had accidentally come to his knowledge, and the authors thereof had been punished according to their deserts. He called upon the father of Ally to own, that the hand of Providence was to be seen through the whole of this transaction. That his sons were but the instruments of our safety, though avowedly our enemies; and under the notion of enriching themselves at our expence, had prevented our falling into the lurking perils which awaited us on the river. But that their intentions had been justly rewarded. While we were sheltered under royal patronage, one of his sons had fallen in a contest, about the very property of which he had deprived us; and the

the other was crippled with blows, and covered with disgrace on the same account. The confusion of Ally and his father was not to be concealed at this incident. They seemed to be sufficiently humbled by the melancholy end of Mahomet, but this pathetic exhortation of the shaik's had an evident effect upon their feelings; and the heart must be corrupt indeed, that was not amended by it. For my own part, I never was so edified by the discourse of a divine, as I have been, by listening to the sentiments of this unlearned Mahometan. And it is not to be wondered at. His language was that of the heart, and his opinions breathed the fragrance of truth. His doctrine was a reflection of his life, and both equally bright and unfulled. When he admonished, he directed himself to the consciences of his audience; and he never failed to convince, though it is plain he failed to reform*.

* From a passage which I have lately met with in Dr. Pococke's Travels through Egypt, I am induced to think that he encountered this amiable personage, and was indebted to him for letters, which procured him both civility and protection during his voyage up the Nile. Isman Abu Ally was, from our information, possessed of his present dignity in the year 1737, and, of all the Arabians, was the most likely to extend his humanity to strangers. The passage is this:

“ On the 3d of January, the wind not favoring us, we stopped at a place about three miles from † Furskout. Here resides the great shaik ‡, who is governor of all the country on † Furskout is in the neighborhood of Ghinnah.

‡ The literal meaning of the Shaik Ul Arab.

At ten o'clock we took our leave of the shaik, but are to see him again before our departure, which is fixed for ten o'clock at night. On our return home we met a man carrying a red flag, and uttering aloud some proclamation. His head was crowned with a chaplet of bays, and the croud were very attentive to his words. We enquired into the purport of his business, and were told, that he was an herald, who daily gives notice of the rising of the Nile. We understand that it is now near its greatest height; and expect, when we get into the flats of Lower Egypt, to find the country entirely under water.

the west as far as Assouan. I waited on the shaik's secretary, with a present of five or six pounds of coffee; in return, he sent a live sheep to the convent to entertain me with, and introduced me to the shaik, who was in an Arab dress, sitting in a corner of a room. He rose on my entrance, and my servant brought in my present, which consisted of two boxes of prunellas, two of other sweetmeats, and some glass vessels. He asked where I intended to go? I told him, to the Cataract. He replied, with a good-natured smile, that a boat of Franks* lately went up; and that the people said, they came to discover the way into the country, in order to return and take it; and then desired to know what I wanted to see? I told him the ruined cities. He observed, that we had no such ruins in England, and asked, whether, if they should go into our country, we would permit them to see every thing; adding, that he would give me letters, and a man to go with me, so that I might be assured I should travel securely.

Chap. 6. Poccoke's Travels.

* In this boat was Capt. Norden, well known for his accurate accounts of the antiquities of Egypt.

We have been employed the whole day in preparing for our expedition. Bread, biscuit, and flour were brought us in the afternoon, sufficient to serve us a fortnight; and with the beans provided for our camels, run us up a bill of eighty dollars. But in this account are included a sheep and an half, which are fried down in clarified ghee or butter, and twenty new skins to carry our water. With this stock, we trust at least to keep famine from our heels, in this journey through the inhospitable wild which divides us from Cairo. We had paid the balance of our camel-hire, which amounted in the whole to 150 dollars; and were in readiness to attend the shaik, previous to our departure. But the camel-drivers are either superstitious, or have something to detain them until to-morrow night. They came to us about eight o'clock, and told the hakeem it had just occurred to them, that to-morrow was the new moon; a time above all other the most lucky to commence a journey. He appeared very angry at their having adopted such an idea at so late an hour; and finding that no arguments could conquer their desire to remain here to-night, he referred them to the shaik for an answer. The good old man was vexed at the delay they intended us. But his good-nature inclined him to their side. He sent for Ibrahim, and directed him to tell us, that though the request was absurd in itself, the humoring their prejudices would be the readiest way to ensure the regard of these people. We submitted without a murmur to this this irksome detention; and the more so, as the shaik has added to his former kindness, by giving a camel to our conductor Hodgee Uttalah, to save us that expence.

We have just heard that the shaik has changed the sentence of death which was passed on the prisoner this morning, to a long imprisonment. It seems, that an execution has not been known during his reign; and he means to continue this ill-judged lenity. But this will be but of little avail to the assassins, provided one of his family does not fall a sacrifice in the interim, to the relations of the deceased. This kind of retribution is exercised with impunity in this country; and one life will glut the vengeance of the prosecutors, though the offender himself escape. But this is only in respect to each other. Should a Christian but accidentally spill the blood of a Mussulman, an hecatomb of his persuasion would scarcely suffice to expiate the offence.

W E D N E S D A Y, 3d SEPTEMBER.

It now appears likely that none of our letters have reached Mr. Baldwin. The camels are returned that carried the company of Turks away; and we were surprized that no answer was come to the letter, which we entrusted to the Christian domestic. But on discoursing with Hodgee Uttalah, we find that he did not go to Cairo. The Turks were formerly in the service of Ibrahim Beg, and though they purposed to have deserted to the party of Ismaul Beg, their hearts either relented or failed them, and they halted at a town on the river, two days short of the capital. We have, therefore, the greater reason to congratulate ourselves on the generosity of the Shaik Ul Arab; as no application could have been made to him on our behalf, until our misfortunes reached Mr. Baldwin. By his influence, we are in every respect better provided for a journey, than when we left Cosire. We can depend more upon the goodness of the camels, and the honesty of the drivers. We have provisions in plenty, and are furnished besides with limes, to assist in quenching our thirst. We have dried dates with us, to vary our meals. This fruit, when dried, is much preferable to that fresh from the tree; and when eaten with bread, is both a pleasant and nourishing food. We expect to be but nine or ten days on the road; and as we go by ourselves, we are in hopes to persuade the Arabs to follow our directions—to travel the greater part of the night, and to lie by during the heat of the day. This mode of action will preserve us much from the sufferings, which we underwent during our late journey. But we must trust to chance for a shelter from the sun at our different halting-places, as there is no such conveniency as a tent to be procured here.

As we are on the point of leaving Ghinnah, it may be expected that I drop some observations on the customs and manners of the inhabitants. But in a narrative of this kind, the reader will gather more information from the conduct of the actors themselves, than from an author's description of them. Their general treatment of us is the best glass from which their pictures can be reflected; while the particular behavior of one or two individuals, is a convincing proof, that virtue is the common inheritance of mankind, and is confined to no enlightened spot. It remains then only for me to say a few words on points, too unimportant to have come into view before. No people are plainer in their dress, which in the lower class is generally of blue linen. Those of the higher rank endeavor to ape the fashion of the Turks. They are arrayed indeed in silks and woollens, but without lace and embroidery. They are universally modest in their behavior, decent in their conversation, and sober in their way of life. Gaming is unknown to them; and strong liquors in such little request, that we found but few Arabians, who broke through the precept of their religion, which forbids the use of them. But the vices they possess, are sufficient to eclipse the lustre of these good qualities. Were it not for the cheapness of provisions, the poverty of the people would bear hard upon them. But for the value of a penny, each man can provide for the day. Beside meat and poultry, which are in great plenty, the river supplies them with fine fish at the lowest rates; and eggs are sold at a penny the dozen. These things we can declare from ocular demonstration; and from our window we can see the menial servants of the shaik receive their daily pay, which, we are assured, does not exceed the value of a penny. Water is their only drink, except it be mixed with coffee; enough of which may be procured for a penny, to treat a company of visitors; a fact of which we had frequent experience. But the simplicity of this race is best to be deduced from the figure which their head makes. The Shaik Ul Arab is very abstemious in his diet, and plain in his equipage. There is nothing magnificent about him; and he generally appears in a black gown, which is very fine, and resembles our bombasin. His turban is of muslin; and the only finery about him, an orange or straw-colored shawl, which is carelessly thrown across his shoulders. He carries no arms about him; which we observed to be the case of all the old men, to proclaim, we suppose, that war is no longer their province.

There is no trust to be reposed in the word of a camel-driver. We sent to the shaik at five o'clock in the evening, to request our final audience; and found to our surprize, that Hadjee Uttalah was with him, to demand our journey to be postponed until the morning. Ibrahim remonstrated in our name against this proceeding, and the shaik was enraged at its insolence. But his anger was of as little consequence as our regret. There was no prejudice now to be removed, but an obstacle more insurmountable. The camels are not ready, and there is no help for the delay.

T H U R S D A Y,

THURSDAY, 4th SEPTEMBER.

It is a matter of the greatest surprize to a rational being, to perceive mankind given to falsehood, without a beneficial end in view. And no where, as I have had occasion elsewhere to observe, is this practice so frequently to be met with, as among the Arabians. By telling one lye, the camel-drivers have reduced themselves to the necessity of adding an hundred to it. On their coming to us this morning, we reproached them with their duplicity in the presence of the hakeem; and demanded to depart immediately, as the only recompence they could make us for our many disappointments. On this the whole mystery was unravelled. We found that some of their camels had been so much fatigued in their late expedition, that they were not able to travel before. But it is their genius to disguise the truth at all times; and they made use of a thousand shifts to evade our departure, rather than disclose the real state of the case. Our displeasure is, therefore, rather directed at their folly, than their villainy; and now we have got to the bottom of the affair, our chagrin is considerably lessened at this unexpected detention. We have even consented, by their advice, to postpone our departure until night; when our movement will be more private, and not interrupted by the croud of mendicants which await our charity. This step was enforced enforced by the hakeem's report, who recommended, by all means, that we should set out after dark.

At nine o'clock we attended the hakeem to the shaik's house, to receive our passes, and to take our leave of our benefactor. We arrived there in the midst of a trial of the camel-people, for a robbery on the deceased Mahomet. After sitting about half an hour in a kind of lobby, we were advised to send in our names. On doing this, we were ushered into the room where the court was held, and after the usual salutations, we were seated on a raised place to the right of the shaik. His politeness dictated a few questions to us, after which he proceeded to the trial. We were not sorry to have our curiosity satisfied in this particular; and we attended with great patience to the process. There is no jury in this court of justice, nor any judge but the shaik, whose will is the law of the realm. When the evidences have been given by the witnesses, they are cross-examined by the grandees, who compose the council. The shaik listens attentively to all that passes, forms a judgment of the fact, and at length pronounces the final sentence. At eleven o'clock we made a motion to take our leave, and were dismissed by the good old man with an hearty benediction, and very cordial wishes for the success of our journey. In our hearing he repeated the charge to Hadgee Uttalah, to put us down at the English factory at Cairo; and not to return, without a letter under our hands and seals, to advise him of our safety, at the peril of his life. To secure his fidelity beyond the reach of temptation, the shaik also directed, that the family of Hadgee Uttalah should be placed under a guard, as the surest hostages for the integrity of his conduct. Our hearts were full enough at the idea of parting with this amiable character, but this last proof of his more than paternal care of us, had such an effect upon our feelings, that we were glad to retire, and conceal the ebullitions of our gratitude. The uniform greatness of soul which distinguishes this Mahometan, will encourage strangers to enter his country without fear. And it is not displeasing to us to reflect, that our misfortunes may contribute to the security of future travellers. They called forth the virtues of this prince from the shade of obscurity; and will be a lesson to his subjects, ever to respect the rights of humanity.

As we returned home we were joined by the little Turk, who was so assiduous to engage our company by water. We are concerned to separate from him, but he declines our offer to accommodate him by land. He confesses, however, that he is under no apprehensions for us, though he does not chuse to risk his property in the desert. There is something inexplicable in this; but our confidence in the shaik is too firmly rooted, to be shaken by the suspicions of others. We observed that the Turk was much dejected at our approaching departure; and partly guessing at the cause, when we got home, with the concurrence of my companions, I slipped twelve dollars into his hand, to bear his expences down the Nile. His countenance instantly brightened up at this present; and he resumed his facetious disposition during the day, which he dedicated to us. We had already been indebted to his assistance in preparing for our journey; and the major now gave him the charge of his china bowls, which were to be delivered to Mr. Baldwin at Cairo. We also obliged the Turk with many odd things, which were superfluous to us. But he had some trouble in conveying them out of the house, from the vigilance of the domestics, who were doubtless directed by their master to have an eye to his motions.

Now we have seen our last of the shaik, the ha-keem intimates that he cannot part with us, without a further gratification. This Abassée! this slave! who cannot sit down in the presence of his master, though raised by his favor to the government of this city, has the assurance to assume airs of consequence, and to trust to our moderation for putting up with them. Besides our former gifts, he came in for one of the shauls which we recovered from the vizier, who, in our opinion, was as much entitled to it as himself. He is now desirous of my silver hookah, though Ibrahim has informed him of its being packed up. Its value chiefly lies in the workmanship; and it is more curious than useful to me. To prevent further importunities, I have sent it to this fellow, though it gave me the trouble of unpacking a trunk. I am sensible that he would be degraded from his office, were the shaik acquainted with his behavior. But he too much confides in our former concealment of his meanness, to be afraid of the consequences: and builds upon our generosity to repeat the offence. The shaik has been already put to so much trouble on our account, that we would overlook a great many impositions, sooner than disturb his repose with fresh complaints. We have already caused some changes in his administration; and it would be in us but a bad requital for all his favors, to foment differences between him and his favorite servants, on light occasions.

We quickly experienced the good effects of our compliance with the hakeem's humor. He sent for the camel-drivers, to remind them of the treatment which they were to give us on the road; and settled the œconomy of our journey, and other points, which they had disputed with Ibrahim. When the sun sets, the camels are to be brought to the door to take up our baggage, which is now reduced to half of its original bulk. After supper we are to bid our long-wished-for adieu to Ghinnah; which it must be remembered, we owe to the virtue of one man!

At sun-set Hadgee Uttalah came hastily to our house, and told us, that as we had paid ten dollars apiece for the other camels, he expected fifteen to be paid him, for the prime beast he was to ride himself. We were congratulating ourselves before we were quit of this griping cast. We knew the shaik had presented him with the price of this very camel, but the fellow had timed his application so well, that we were fain to comply with it. We were about to set off, and neither our haste nor the late hour, would have admitted of our communicating the affair to the shaik. We had no money remaining that the Arabs knew of; but the old fox got over this difficulty, by offering to take our note of hand, payable at Cairo. We were the more reconciled to this expedient, as it seemed to interest our conductor in our arrival at that city.

END OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

At page 241, line 2, the reader is requested to add the following Note :

* From a passage in Strabo it would appear, that the extensive ruins in question, are the only vestiges of Cophtos, which, by the favor of Ptolemy Philadelphus, enjoyed the commerce of India by the port of Berenice, whence a canal communicated with the Nile. This commerce has, for some ages, reverted to Ghinnah and Cosire. Cophtos, persecuted by Dioclesian, for having abjured paganism, felt a sad reverse of fortune. Its inhabitants saw its fine edifices rased by the emperor's command; and the haste in which the author passed its remains, in all likelihood, prevented his discovering the marbles, which, in the days of Abulfeda the geographer, covered its site. It should be observed, that the Christians of Egypt are called after this city; a circumstance, that at once declares the cause of its destruction, and the chance of its outliving the duration of the cities which now exist around it!
