INTRODUCTION.

In preparing for publication the following work the publishers have not been ignorant of the fact that several excellent histories of the region embraced in Luzerne, Lackawanna and Wyoming counties have already been published. Most of these have long been out of print, and a portion of them are exceedingly rare. In none of them is the range of topics as extensive as in this work, which embraces not only histories of these counties, but of each city, borough and township which they include.

In gathering the material for this work not only have these books and others been consulted, but information has been sought from every available source; and it is believed that many of the facts recorded have been preserved from oblivion by being thus rescued from the failing memories of those who will soon pass away.

It is hardly possible that in a work like this no errors will be found; but it is confidently hoped that if inaccuracies are discovered the great difficulty of preventing their occurrence will be considered, and that they will be regarded in a charitable rather than a censorious spirit.

The publishers desire to acknowledge the kindness and courtesy with which their efforts to obtain the facts recorded here have been almost uniformly met. To the press, for free access to the files of their journals; to the county, city and borough officers, for assistance in examining their records; to the pastors of nearly all the churches in the three counties for assistance in preparing the religious history, and to secretaries of numerous lodges and societies for data furnished, their grateful acknowledgments are due.

The following books have been consulted: Sherman Day's and Doctor Egle's histories of Pennsylvania, Annals of Philadelphia, Rutenber's Indian Tribes of Hudson's River, Heckwelder's Indian Nations, Stone's Life of Joseph Brant and his Poetry and History of Wyoming, Chapman's, Miner's and Peck's histories of Wyoming, Miss Blackman's history of Susquehanna county, Parkman's France and England in North America, Pearce's Annals of Luzerne, Wright's Sketches of Plymouth, Hollister's History of the Lackawanna Valley, the History of the Lehigh Valley, Clark's Wyoming and Lackawanna Valleys, and others. For our very complete and valuable rolls of the soldiers of the Union from Luzerne, Lackawanna and Wyoming counties we are indebted to the exhaustive History of Pennsylvania Volunteers, prepared under the authority of the State, by Samuel P. Bates, LL. D.

Of those who have aided in the preparation of the work, or furnished valuable information, the publishers desire to mention Hon. Steuben Jenkins, who contributed the article on post-Columbian Indians and kindly furnished many facts from the large and valuable store of unpublished historical matter that he has collected for future publications; Hon. William P. Miner, who wrote the chapter on the coal trade; Doctor C. F. Ingham, author of the chapter on geology; Hon. Peter M. Osterhout, who furnished valuable written and oral information; Hon. R. R. Little, who contributed the chapter on the bench and bar of Wyoming county; Hon. Hendrick B. Wright, who gave efficient aid and encouragement; Doctor Horace Hollister, Hon. Edmund L. Dana, Hon. The publishers are enabled to present the steel plate portrait of Governor Henry M. OUTLINE HISTORY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

CHAPTER I.

THE DISCOVERY OF THE DELAWARE — PENNSYLVANIA
GRANTED TO AND ORGANIZED BY WILLIAM PENN.

THE first discovery of Delaware bay, and the river which forms a portion of the eastern boundary of the State of Pennsylvania appears to have been made by Hendrick Hudson, an Englishman in the service of the Dutch, in 1609. In August of that year he entered the bay, and after a short cruise in it left and proceeded to the mouth of the Hudson river, which stream he ascended as far as Albany.

It is said that Lord Delaware visited the bay in 1610; hence the name by which it and the river are known. It was called by the Dutch South river, the Hudson being termed by them the North river.

Another Dutch navigator, Captain Mey, visited the bay in 1614; but Captain, or, as he was termed, skipper Cornelius Hendrickson first ascended the river as far as the mouth of the Schuylkill, in 1616.

A short lived settlement was made on the east bank of the Delaware under the auspices of the Dutch West India Company in 1623, under the direction of Captains Mey and Tienpont. Another settlement was made on the bay, farther down, in 1630; but this was soon destroyed by the Indians, whose enmity the colonists had indiscreetly incurred.

Maryland was granted to Lord Baltimore in 1632, and the territory on the west side of the Delaware was claimed by him, and the disputes arising out of this claim remained unsettled during many years.

In 1638 a settlement was made on the west bank of the Delaware by a colony of Swedes, under the patronage of Queen Christina. This colony was under the direction of Peter Minuit, a Hollander, who had been a director in the colony of New Amsterdam. Several Swedish governors followed Minuit in succession; prosperous settlements sprang up along the west bank of the river, and a thriving trade was carried on by the Swedes. They were watched with jealousy by the Dutch, who set up the claim of jurisdiction by reason of former occupation, and instituted intrigues and plans to dispossess the Swedes. In 1655 a force of seven vessels and six hundred men was sent up the Delaware for that purpose. The Swedish government had been kept in ignorance of this expedition, and it was easily successful.

On the restoration of Charles the Second to the throne of Great Britain, he granted the territory now including New York and New Jersey, and afterwards that of Delaware, to his brother the Duke of York. The latter immediately sent a force to take possession of the country thus granted. New Amsterdam and Fort Orange on the Hudson were at once possessed, and rechristened respectively New York, in honor of the Duke of York, and Albany. A portion of the force was then dispatched to take possession of the Dutch colonies on the Delaware, which was accomplished almost without resistance. This dispossession of the Dutch by the English led to a war between Great Britain and Holland, at the conclusion of which the title of the former to these territories was acknowledged by treaty. The Duke of York continued in possession of this region, undisturbed except by the Marylanders, who resorted to occasional acts of violence in order to assert the claim of Lord Baltimore, until, in 1663, war again broke out between Great Britain and Holland, and Dutch privateers visited the coasts and plundered the inhabitants; and during that year a Dutch squadron of vessels arrived and repossessed the dominions which had been granted to the Duke of York. These were restored by the treaty of Westminster in 1674, and in the same year, by a new patent, the title of the Duke of York was confirmed. During eight years following these events great changes took place among the proprietaries of the region, in the course of which William Penn, by reason of being a trustee of one of these proprietaries and a purchase of a portion of the territory, became quite familiar with the region, as well as with the plans for its colonization.

William Penn was the son of Sir William Penn, an admiral in the royal navy, who at his death left a claim of sixteen thousand pounds against the government of Great Britain. Though in early life he was a soldier of some distinction, he afterwards became a Quaker, and was several times imprisoned because of his religious faith. Having become, as before stated, familiar with the region on the Delaware, and with the schemes for its colonization, he conceived the plan of founding a colony there on the broad principles of equality which his faith taught. Accordingly, in 1680, he petitioned King Charles the Second for a grant of a tract of land west from the Delaware river and south from Maryland, in liquidation of the claim which he had inherited from his father. After the discussion and arrangement of the preliminaries the petition was granted, and a charter signed by the king in 1681. Penn at first desired that the province might be called New Wales, and when objections were raised against this he suggested Sylvania. To this the king and his counsellors prefixed Penn, for the double reason that the name would appropriately mean high woodlands, and that it was the name of a distinguished admiral, whose memory the king desired to honor. A royal address was at once issued informing the inhabitants that William Penn was the sole proprietor, and that he was invested with all the necessary governmental powers. A proclamation was also issued by William Penn to the people of his province, setting forth the policy which he intended to adopt in the government of the colony. A deputy was sent in the spring of the same year, with instructions to institute measures for the management of affairs and the temporary government of the province. In autumn of the same year he sent commissioners to make treaties with the Indians, and arrange for future settlement.

South from the province of Pennsylvania, along the Delaware bay, the Duke of York was still the proprietor of the country. Foreseeing the possibility of future annoyance to the commerce of his province, Penn was desirous of acquiring this territory; and accordingly entered into negotiations with the Duke of York for it, and in the autumn of 1682 he became the proprietor of the land by deeds, which, however, conveyed no political rights. In the autumn of 1682 Penn visited his province in the new world, took formal possession of the territory along Delaware bay, proceeded up the Delaware and visited the settlements along that river. During this year the celebrated treaty between William Penn and the Indians was made, it is said by some historians, under a large elm tree at Shakamaxon. By others it is insisted that no evidence exists of any such treaty at that place; but that the accounts of it that have passed into history were drawn largely from the fertile imaginatons of early writers. Whether a treaty was held there or not, it is almost certain that during that year treaties were made between Penn and the Indians, and it is a historical fact that between the Indians and Quakers perfect faith was kept. Voltaire said of the treaty which was said to have been made at Shakamaxon: "It was the only one ever made between savages and Christians that was not ratified by an oath, and the only one that was never broken."

The three principal tribes of Indians which then inhabited Pennsylvania were the Lenni Lenapes, the Mingoos and the Shawnees. Their relations with the Swedes had been of a friendly character, and the pacific and kind policy of Penn and his Quaker colonists toward them bore fruit in strong contrast with that which the dishonest and reckless policy of other colonies, and of the United States government in later times, has brought forth.

The plan of the city of Philadelphia, which had been laid out by the commissioners that had preceded the proprietor, was revised by him, and the present beautiful and regular plan adopted, and even the present names given to the principal streets.

In the latter part of the year 1682 the first legislative body in the province was convened by the proprietor, who, though he was vested with all the powers of a proprietary governor, saw fit, in the furtherance of his original plan, to adopt a purely democratic form of government. This body was a general assembly of the people, and was held at the town of Chester, which was first called by the Swedes Upland. This assembly continued in session from the fourth till the seventh of December; during which time they enacted three laws, one of which was called the great law of Pennsylvania. It was a code of laws consisting of between sixty and seventy subjects or chapters, that had been prepared by the proprietor in England, and it was intended to cover all the exigencies which were deemed likely to arise in the colony. It secured the most ample religious toleration—to all whose faith agreed with that of the Friends—and only punished others by fine and imprisonment; thus exhibiting a marked contrast with the bigoted and intolerant Puritans in some of the New England colonies. It guaranteed the rights and privileges of citizenship to all tax-payers, guarded personal liberty, secured, as far as possible, by punishing bribery, the purity of elections, abolished the English law of primogeniture, discarded the administration of religious oaths and affixed the penalty of perjury to false affirmation, and established marriage as a civil contract. Drinking healths, drunkenness, or the encouragement of it, spreading false news, clamorousness, scolding, railing, masks, revels, stage plays, cards and other games of chance, as well as evil and enticing sports, were forbidden and made punishable by fine and imprisonment. It is a curious fact that all these laws have either been superseded by others or become obsolete.

The wise, just and generous policy which the proprietor adopted in the government of his province rendered him exceedingly popular, and the tide of immigration set so strongly toward this province that during the year 1682 as many as twenty-three ships laden with settlers arrived. During this year the proprietor divided the province into the three counties of Bucks, Philadelphia and Chester; and the territory, as it was termed, which he had acquired from the Duke of York, into Kent, New Castle and Sussex. In these counties he appointed officers, and made preparations for the election of a representative Legislature, consisting of a council of eighteen members, and an assembly of fifty-four. This Legislature assembled at Philadelphia in January, 1682. One law enacted provided for the appointment in each county court of three "peace makers," to hear and determine differences. It may be noted as a matter of curiosity that bills were introduced in this Legislature providing that "only two sorts of clothes should be worn—one kind for summer and one for winter;" and another that young men should be obliged to marry at a certain age.

CHAPTER II.

GERMAN IMMIGRATION—THE ADMINISTRATIONS OF WILLIAM PENN AND SIR WILLIAM KEITH.

AS has been before stated, the first settlements in the province were made by Swedes, who occupied the country during about half a century previous to its purchase of William Penn. In all that time they made little progress toward developing the resources of the country. In the language of Watson: "They seem to have sat down contented in their log and clay huts, their leather breeches and jerkins and match-coats for their men, and their skin jackets and linsey petticoats for their women; but no sooner has the genius of Penn enlisted in the enterprise than we see it speak a city and commerce into existence. His spirit animated every part of his colony; and the consequence was that the tame and unambitious Swedes soon lost their distinctive character and existence as a separate nation.

Immigration was largely increased during 1683 and 1684. Settlers came from England, Ireland, Wales, Holland and Germany. Of those from the latter country many came from Cresheim and founded the village of Germantown. They were nearly all Quakers, and the settlement which they made was the nucleus around which collected so large a German population in after years that Pennsylvania became a German province, notwithstanding the large immigration from the British islands at first.

In 1683 and 1684 the controversy with regard to boundaries was renewed by Lord Baltimore, and the Marylanders were guilty of some acts of aggression. The province had come to number some 7,000 inhabitants, and it was a matter of importance that the boundary dispute should be settled. To accomplish this settlement, and for other reasons, Penn during 1684 sailed for England, after giving to the provincial council the executive power. Not long after his arrival in England Charles the Second died, and was succeeded on the throne by his brother James, Duke of York, between whom and Penn a strong friendship existed. The proprietary, therefore, easily obtained a favorable decree. In 1688 a revolution in England dethroned James and placed the regal power in the hands of William and Mary. This change destroyed the influence of Penn at the English court, and the friendship which had existed between him and James caused him to be regarded with suspicion. Slanders were circulated and believed concerning him, and he was even accused of treason and compelled for a time to go into retirement. In his absence discord and dissensions arose in the province, and these were made the pretext for depriving him of his proprietary government in 1693. He was, however, honorably acquitted and exonerated from suspicion, and reinstated in his proprietary rights in 1694. Dissensions in the province continued, however, till after the return of the proprietary with his family in 1699; and even his presence failed to wholly restore harmony.

Because of the increasing power of the proprietary governments in America, the plan had, since the accession of William and Mary to the crown, been entertained of purchasing these governments and converting them into regal ones. In 1701 a bill for that purpose was introduced in the House of Lords, and Penn revisited England for the purpose of endeavoring to prevent its passage. Before his departure a new constitution, which had been some time under consideration, was adopted, and a deputy governor and council of State provided for and appointed. On his arrival the project of purchasing the proprietary government was dropped. In 1702 King William died, and was succeeded by Queen Anne, who entertained for Penn a warm friendship. Though the danger of being dispossessed of his proprietary government was averted, affairs in that government were not more harmonious. The disaffection on the part of the people in the lower counties, which he had endeavored to allay, led to a separation in 1703, and the choice of a distinct assembly for the territories. Some of the deputy governors were indiscreet men, and differences between them and the provincial Legislature were constantly arising. Harassed by these, and probably disgusted at the ingratitude of his subjects, in whose behalf he had incurred large pecuniary liabilities, for the collection of which proceedings were frequently instituted against him, he finally agreed with the crown for the cession of his province and the territory granted him by the Duke of York. He was prevented from legally consummating this cession by a stroke of apoplexy, which rendered him imbecile.

The Queen died in 1714, and was succeeded by George the First. Among the early acts of Parliament in the reign of this King was one extending to the English colonies a previous act disqualifying Quakers from holding office, serving on juries, or giving evidence in criminal cases. Charles Gookin, who had been provincial governor since 1709, construed this act to be applicable to the proprietary government, and a disqualification of the Quakers in the province. This construction of the law of course called forth the indignation and opposition of the council, the Assembly, and the people, and led to the recall of Gookin in 1717, and the appointment of Sir William Keith in his stead. The latter was affable and courteous, cunning and crafty, and in all matters of difference between the crown or proprietary, on one side, and the people on the other, he espoused the popular cause.

William Penn died at the age of seventy-four, in the summer of 1718. History will ever point to him as one who accomplished more for the cause of civil and religious liberty than any other man of his time, and to the provincial government which he founded and administered as the first successful experiment in the broadest liberty of conscience which had then been conceived, and the nearest approach to a government of themselves by the people that had ever been attempted. He was the representative of a despised and proscribed sect; but by his wise and liberal administration of the government of his province, in accordance with the principles of that sect, he did more to bring it to the favorable notice of the world than could otherwise have been done.

The American colonies at that time presented a curious spectacle. Maryland, a colony of Catholics, who were stigmatized as the most bigoted and intolerant sect in Christendom, had been established under a constitution the most liberal and tolerant of all that had been granted by the government of Great Britain; and Pennsylvania, a province of Quakers, whose tenets were almost the reverse of the Catholics, had added to this almost universal tolerance the largest civil liberty that had ever been enjoyed by a people; while the Puritans of the New England colonies, who professed to have fled from religious persecution in England, and to have sought an asylum where each could worship God, the common Father of all, according to the dictates of his own conscience, in the language of Egle, "excluded from the benefits of their government all who were not members of their church, and piously flagellated or hanged those who were not convinced of its infallibility." Almost two centuries have passed since Penn established his colony in America, and—except in those governments that are purely secular, or nearly so, in their character—political science has developed little that is essential to the welfare and happiness of humanity that was not embodied in his system.

The estate of William Penn passed at his death to his family, who inherited both his property and his proprietary government. He had made a will, previous to his agreement with Queen Anne, for the sale of his province; and his agreement was decided to be void because of his mental incapacity to consummate it. The proprietary government, therefore, devolved on his widow, as executrix of his will and trustee of his property during the minority of his children, and it has been said of her that she manifested much shrewdness in the appointment of governors and general management of colonial affairs. It is said by Day: "The affectionate patriarchal relation which had subsisted between Penn and his colony ceased with his death; the interest which his family took in the affairs of the province was more mercenary in its character, and looked less to the establishment of great and pure principles of life and government."

The administration of Sir William Keith was quite successful. The favor with which he was regarded by the people enabled him to promote among them that harmony which is so essential to prosperity; and the colony was prosperous. There was a large influx of population, the character of which was more cosmopolitan than in former times. The persecutions of the Quakers in England had relaxed somewhat, and fewer, relatively, of them sought homes here; while people from other regions, and notably from Germany, came in great numbers. The popularity of Keith was such that he was able to accomplish two measures that had been looked on with great disfavor by the assembly—the establishment of a Court of Chancery, of which he was the chancellor; and the organization of a militia, of which he was the chief. On the other hand, by his good offices, "the Quakers, to their great joy, procured a renewal of the privilege of affirmation in place of an oath, and of the cherished privilege of wearing the hat whenever and wherever it suited them." He was deposed in 1726, through the influence of James Logan, the leader of the proprietary party. Franklin wrote of him: "If he sought popularity he promoted the public happiness, and his courage in resisting the demands of the family may be ascribed to a higher motive than private interest. The conduct of the Assembly toward him was neither honorable nor politic; for his sins against his principles were virtues to the people, with whom he was deservedly a favorite; and the House should have given him such substantial marks of their gratitude as would have tempted his successors to walk in his steps."

Keith's successor was Patrick Gordon. His administration continued during ten years, or until his death in 1736. Tranquillity prevailed in the province during this time; the population, which in 1727 was more than fifty thousand, received large accessions, especially from Germany; internal improvements were prosecuted, and foreign commerce increased largely. Two of the proprietaries, John and Thomas Penn, came to the province; the latter in 1732, the former in 1734. John returned to England in 1735 on account of the aggressions of the Marylanders under Lord Baltimore, but Thomas remained in the country eight years longer. The demeanor of the latter was not such as to endear him to the people.

The first public library ever established in the province was projected in 1731 by Benjamin Franklin, and was incorporated in 1742. During the two years following the death of Mr. Gordon the president of the council, James Logan, was the executive officer of the province. The celebrated fraud known as the "Indian walk" took place in 1737. That an unscrupulous Indian trader should be guilty of thus swindling ignorant savages would be no matter of surprise; but that the province of Pennsylvania should be a party to such a transaction is almost incredible. It is certain that it never would have received the sanction of William Penn, and it is equally certain that it was the foundation of an enmity that broke out in open hostility afterwards.

CHAPTER III.

THE QUESTION OF TAXING THE PROPRIETARY ESTATES—WARS WITH THE FRENCH AND INDIANS.

THE proprietaries in 1738 appointed George Thomas governor, and the position was held by him till 1747. In the war between Great Britain and Spain which was declared in 1739 the Assembly did not take measures to furnish the men required, and the governor was compelled to raise the quota of the province by his own exertions. In 1744 war broke out between France and England, and the aspect of Indian affairs in Pennsylvania and on its borders became threatening; but the storm was averted by the good offices of the Iroquois, who held the Delawares in subjection.

An unhappy condition of affairs existed at that time, and during some years afterwards, in the province. The proprietaries had little sympathy with the people, but as they grew rich by the enhanced value which the activity and enterprise of these people gave to their estates, they preferred the pomp and luxury of aristocratic life, and regarded the people with a measure of contempt. Under such circumstances it was not a matter of wonder that the people, through their representatives, should not respond with alacrity to the demands of the governors appointed by these proprietaries. Governor Thomas resigned in 1747, and after an administration of two years by Anthony Palmer, president of the council, James Hamilton became lieutenant governor in 1749. The condition of things at that time cannot be better described than in the language of Sherman Day:

"An alarming crisis was at hand. The French, now hovering around the great lakes, sedulously applied themselves to seduce the Indians from their allegiance to the English. The Shawnees had already joined them; the Delawares waited only for an opportunity to revenge their wrongs, and of the Six Nations the Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas were wavering. The French were fortifying the strong points on the Ohio. To keep the Indians in favor of the colony required much cunning diplomacy, and expensive presents. In this alarming juncture the old flame of civil dissension burst out with increased force. The presents to the Indians, with the erection of a line of forts along the frontier, and the maintenance of a military force, drew heavily on the provincial purse. The Assembly, the popular branch, urged that the proprietary estates should be taxed as well as those of humble individuals. The proprietors, through their deputies, refused, and pleaded prerogative, charter, and law. The Assembly in turn pleaded equity, common danger, and common benefit, requiring a common expense. The proprietaries offered bounties in lands yet to be conquered from the Indians, and the privilege of issuing more paper money; the Assembly wanted something more tangible. The Assembly passed laws laying taxes and granting supplies, but annexing conditions. The governors opposed the conditions, but were willing to aid the Assembly in taxing the people, but not the proprietaries. Here were the germs of revolution, not fully matured until twenty years later. Dr. Franklin was now a member and a leader in the Assembly. In the meantime the frontier were left exposed while these frivolous disputes continued. The pacific principles, too, of the Quakers and Dunkards and Menonists and Schwenckfelders came in to complicate the strife; but as the danger increased they prudently kept aloof from public office, leaving the management of the war to sects less scrupulous."

Robert H. Morris, the successor of James Hamilton, became governor in 1754, and his successor, William Denny, in 1756. The same want of harmony between the proprietaries and the people continued during their administrations, but finally, through the efforts of Franklin, the royal assent was given to a law taxing the estates of the proprietaries.

Settlements were made on lands to which the Indian title had not been extinguished, especially by the not over scrupulous Scotch Irish, and the result was a desultory Indian war, which kept up a very insecure feeling among the people of the province.

Such was the condition of the province at the breaking out of the French and Indian war a few years after the treaty of Aix-La-Chapelle, which really was scarcely more than a temporary suspension of hostilities. It is well known to every one connected with American history, that at this time the French attempted to connect their possessions in Canada and Louisiana by a chain of military posts extending from Presque Isle, now Erie, to the navigable waters of the Ohio, and along that river to the Mississippi. In furtherance of this design they sent, in 1754, 1,000 men to the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela rivers, where they built Fort Du Quesne, afterward called, in honor of the great English statesman, Fort Pitt; now Pittsburg. Against this was sent the disastrous expedition of General Braddock, a minute account of which cannot, for want of space, be given here. It may briefly be said, that by reason of his self conceit and obstinacy General Braddock sustained the most overwhelming defeat that an European army had ever met in America, and that he was mortally wounded in this action. General—then Colonel—George Washington greatly distinguished himself in this battle.

The dispute between the proprietaries and the people continued, notwithstanding the country was suffering from the horrors of an Indian war. The proprietaries insisted on the exemption of their estates from taxation and the Assembly yielded when the public safety was in jeopardy. Several councils were held with the Indians, and efforts were made through the interposition of the Six Nations, whose aid the authorities of the province invoked, to secure peace, with only partial success. In 1756 three hundred men under Colonel Armstrong crossed the Alleghenies and destroyed the Indian town of Kittanning; thus inflicting a severe blow on the savages, and driving them beyond the Allegheny river.

In 1758 a change in the ministry in England was made, and under William Pitt the war was prosecuted with great energy. An expedition consisting of about 9,000 men was organized and sent against Fort Du Quesne. On the approach of this army the French burnt the buildings, evacuated the fort, and blew up the magazine. It was rebuilt and named Fort Pitt. This terminated hostilities in the valley of the Ohio. A series of successes followed in 1759 and 1760 at the north and west, which terminated the war, though a feeble effort was made by the French to retrieve their losses in Canada. The result was the final extinction of the French dominion in the Canadian provinces, which was confirmed by the treaty of Fontainebleau in 1762. The peace which followed was of short duration. The Kyasuta and Pontiac war, so called from the chiefs who planned it, broke out in 1763. Kyasuta was a Seneca, and Pontiac an Ottawa chief; and the scheme which they devised, for a war of quick extermination against the colonists, would have been no discredit to the ability of educated military chieftains. The savages had looked with approval on the construction by the French of a chain of forts from Presque Isle to the Ohio; for they saw in them a check upon the progress westward of the tide of settlement which threatened to dispossess them of their broad domains. When they saw these forts fall into the hands of the colonists, and thus cease to be a barrier against their aggressions, they became more alarmed for their own safety; and these wily chiefs conceived the project of attacking and overpowering the different defenses on the frontier simultaneously, and then rushing upon and exterminating the defenseless inhabitants in the settlements, and thus, by the terror which they inspired, preventing future encroachments. The time of harvest was chosen for this attack, and the plan was laid with such secrecy that the first intimation of it was the appalling war whoop with which it was commenced. So nearly successful were the savages that eight of the eleven forts attacked on the western frontier were taken. Scalping parties overran the frontier settlements of Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia, and the terror stricken inhabitants fled before them. Fort Pitt was invested, after the Indian fashion, during about three months, but was relieved by a force under Colonel Boquet. About thirty of the settlers in the Wyoming valley were killed by the Delawares, in revenge for the murder of Teedyuscung by a party of Iroquois, the latter having persuaded the Delawares that the murder was committed by the whites. Although there were, after the first eruption of hostilities, no large organized bands of hostile Indians, the frontier settlements were continually harassed by small parties, who came upon them stealthily and murdered the inhabitants without pity. The protection afforded by the authorities in the province against these marauding parties was insufficient. The pacific disposition of the Quakers, who controlled the government, was such as to call forth the remark that they were "more solicitous for the welfare of the bloodthirsty Indian than for the lives of the frontiersmen." Parkman says of them: "They seemed resolved that they would neither defend the people of the frontier nor allow them to defend themselves; and vehemently inveighed against all expeditions to cut off the Indian marauders. Their security was owing to their local situation, being confined to the eastern part of the province."

John Penn, a grandson of the founder of the province, came to Pennsylvania in 1763 in the capacity of lieutenant-governor. His father and his uncle were then the proprietors and resided in England. The Penn family had all ceased to be Quakers, and had no conscientious scruples against defensive or aggressive war. General Gage had become commander of the military forces of the province, and Governor Penn vigorously seconded his efforts. He even, in 1764, offered by proclamation the following bounties for scalps, Indians, etc.: "For every male above the age of ten years captured, $150; scalped, being killed, $134; for every female Indian enemy, and every male under the age of ten years, captured, $130; for every female above the age of ten years scalped, being killed, $50."

The apathy which was manifested by the Assembly in 1763, and the insecure condition of the settlers toward the frontier, led to the formation of an independent organization known as the Paxtang Boys or Paxtang Rangers; so named because they were mostly inhabitants of Paxtang, or Paxton, and Donnegal, in Lancaster county. Such was the feeling of insecurity in advanced settlements that men were compelled to keep their rifles at their sides while at work in their fields, and even while attending divine worship. These rangers, by their vigilance and activity, and by the severe punishments which they inflicted on the savages, became in turn a terror to them. They were mostly composed of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, between whom and the Quakers no very friendly feeling existed. The latter strongly censured what they termed the barbarities of the rangers; and fierce dissensions arose between them. The Paxtang men finally fell upon a small tribe of Indians at Conestoga, in Lancaster county, and put many of them to death, because, as they alleged, they had discovered that these Indians, while professing friendliness, were secretly harboring their hostile brethren, and furnishing them with information and supplies of ammunition, etc. They also insisted that the Christian or Moravian Indians were guilty of the same treachery, and the latter were compelled to flee to Philadelphia to avoid their vengeance. These acts of the rangers called forth the still more vehement protests of the Quakers, and even at the present day historians are not agreed as to whether or not their action was justifiable. None of them were ever convicted in the courts of the province.

In 1764 General Gage instituted measures to drive the Indians from the frontiers by carrying the war into their country. He sent a corps under Colonel Bradstreet to act against the Wyandots, Chippewas and Ottawas, in the vicinity of the upper lakes; and another, under Colonel Boquet, to go to the Muskingum and attack the Delawares, Shawnees, and other nations between the Ohio and the lakes. This vigorous action had the desired effect. Peace was established, and many of the captives who had been taken were restored.

CHAPTER IV.

"MASON AND DIXON'S LINE"—CAUSES OF THE REVOLUTION—PATRIOTIC ACTION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

DURING the ten years between 1765 and 1775 two questions of boundary were settled. One, that of the line between Pennsylvania and Maryland, had long been in dispute, and several fruitless negotiations had been entered into for its settlement. In 1763 Thomas and Richard Penn and Frederick Lord Baltimore entered into an arrangement for the establishment of this line, and commissioned Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon to survey and mark it. This work they completed in 1767, having surveyed and marked with milestones of oolite brought from England) the southern boundary of Pennsylvania, except about twenty-two miles at its western end, where they were prevented by the Indian proprietors. Thus originated the celebrated "Mason and Dixon's line." The other boundary question was raised by Lord Dunmore, of Virginia, who claimed the territory that now includes the counties of Fayette, Greene and Washington, and even a portion of Allegheny. He encouraged settlers to take from Virginia the titles to their lands there, and even sent an agent to take possession of Fort Pitt, when it was evacuated by General Gage. The settlers were a bad class of men; and by reason of the lawless acts of some of them, especially two named Cresap and Greathouse, a frontier Indian war occurred. The Virginia claim was promptly repelled.

At the conclusion of the Indian war of 1763 and 1764 the old controversy concerning the taxation of the proprietary estates was revived, and Dr. Franklin at once became the champion of the popular cause in the Assembly. That body became so indignant at the conduct of the governor that they resolved to petition the King to purchase the proprietary jurisdiction, and place the province in direct relation with the crown. "Here," says Day, "was a most important step toward the Revolution. To break down the feudal power, and bring the people and the crown in direct communication, is, in all countries, the first great step toward popular freedom, and prepares the way for the next step—the direct conflict between the crown and the people. It so happened, however, that in this case the avarice of the British ministry outran the anti-feudal propensities of the people, and brought the colonies at once to the last great struggle between the people and the crown." Dr. Franklin was sent by the province to London to urge before the ministry the measure of relief from the proprietary dominion; but on his arrival he found that the conflict was with the very power the protection of which he had come to invoke

The wars which had raged in the colonies, and in which the home government had assisted, had called the attention of the ministry to the rapidly increasing wealth of those colonies. The plan was conceived of making that wealth available to the mother country, for the double purpose of replenishing her exhausted treasury and securing the exclusive control of the colonial trade. The accomplishment of this double object involved the question of taxation without consent and without representation in the legislative body imposing the tax. This was the point on which the American Revolution turned. Parliament insisted on its right to tax any part of the British dominions, and the colonies held that they were not safe if they might thus be despoiled of their property without their consent, and by a parliament in which they were not represented. In view of this momentous question the contentions with the proprietaries were forgotten. In 1764 an act was passed imposing duties on certain articles not produced in his majesty's dominions. This was followed the next year by the odious stamp act, which declared instruments of writing void if not written on stamped paper on which a duty was paid. This was resisted and the paper refused in the colonies, and the determination was formed by the colonies to establish manufactories, to the end that they might not be dependent on the mother country. By reason of the consequent clamors of English manufacturers, and the impossibility of executing the law without a resort to force, the stamp act was repealed; but the repeal was coupled with a declaration of the absolute power of parliament over the colonies.

The next offensive act was the imposition of duties on goods imported from Great Britain; but this was resisted by the colonists, who would accede to nothing which involved taxation without consent. A circular was addressed by Massachusetts to her sister colonies recapitulating their grievances, and the arguments against the oppressive acts. Governor Penn was ordered by the colonial secretary in London to urge upon the Assembly a disrepute of this, and, in case this advice was not heeded, to prorogue it. The Assembly asserted, by resolution, its right to sit at its own pleasure, and to consult with the other colonies concerning matters pertaining to the welfare of all; and it gave a cordial assent to the recommendation by Virginia for a concert of action in order to peacefully obtain a redress of their grievances. The impost was reduced in 1769, and in 1770 abolished, except that on tea, which was continued at three pence per pound. The colonists, however, were opposed to the principle on which the tax was based, and not to its amount, and their resistance to the importation of taxed goods was concentrated on the tea tax. In Pennsylvania one chest was imported and the duty paid; but generally the non-importation policy prevailed. Under these circumstances the ideal right of taxation was asserted and no collision was provoked. In order to make a practical application of this right, however, the East India Company was encouraged by parliament to send a consignment of tea to each of the principal ports in the colonies, to be disposed of by the agents appointed by the company, and thus to force it on the people. The colonists in all the provinces were indignant at this insidious attempt.

"The course of Pennsylvania was from the first firm, but temperate. A meeting at Philadelphia passed resolutions denouncing the duty on tea as a tax without their consent, laid for the express purpose of establishing the right to tax; and asserting that this method of providing a revenue for the support of government, the administration of justice and defense of the colonies, had a direct tendency to render assemblies useless and to introduce arbitrary government and slavery; and that steady opposition to this plan was necessary to preserve even the shadow of liberty. They denounced all who should aid in landing or selling the tea as enemies to their country, and enjoined the consignees to resign their appointment." Under such a pressure the consignees declined to receive it. In Charleston it was landed in a damp warehouse and permitted to rot. At New York a vigilance committee forbade the pilots to bring the vessel having the tea on board into the harbor, and escorted a captain who attempted to bring in some as a private venture out of the harbor, after airing and watering his tea. At Boston the vessel having the tea on board was boarded by a party of men disguised as Indians, and the tea thrown overboard. In consequence of these proceedings measures were adopted by the British government to coerce submission on the part of the colonists. Upon Massachusetts, which had manifested the most violent opposition, the vials of British wrath were most freely poured out. In 1774 the act known as the Boston port bill, by which the port of Boston was closed and the customhouse removed to Salem, was passed. This was soon followed by an act vesting the appointment of colonial officers in the crown; by another, authorizing the extradition for trial of persons charged with capital offences; and by still another, for quartering soldiers on the inhabitants. All the colonies sympathized and made common cause with Boston and Massachusetts, though in each colony there were some people who sympathized with the crown. These were termed tories, while the advocates of colonial rights were called whigs—names by which the two parties were known through the Revolution.

The province of Pennsylvania did not waver at this juncture in its adhesion to the colonial cause. On being requested to convene the Assembly Governor Penn of course declined, and a meeting consisting of about eight thousand people was held, at which a general colonial congress was recommended and a committee of correspondence appointed. Subsequently a convention of delegates from all the counties in the province assembled, at which a series of temperate but firm and patriotic resolutions were adopted, asserting both their loyalty and their rights, and reiterating the recommendation for a general congress. The convention also adopted instructions to the Assembly that was about to convene. These were written by John Dickinson, one of the foremost patriots in the province. The following extracts are quoted to show the animus of these patriots:

"Honor, justice and humanity call upon us to hold and transmit to our posterity that liberty which we received from our ancestors. It is not our duty to leave wealth to our children, but it is our duty to leave liberty to them. No infamy, iniquity or cruelty can exceed our own if we, born and educated in a country of freedom, entitled to its blessings and knowing their value, pusillanimously deserting the post assigned us by Divine Providence, surrender succeeding generations to a condition of wretchedness from which no human efforts, in all probability, will be sufficient to extricate them; the experience of all States mournfully demonstrating to us that when arbitrary power has been established over them even the wisest and bravest nations that have ever flourished have in a few years degenerated into abject and wretched vassals. * * * To us, therefore, it appears at this alarming period our duty to our God, our country, to ourselves and to our posterity, to exert our utmost ability in promoting and establishing harmony between Great Britain and these colonies, on a constitutional foundation." "Thus," says Sherman Day, "with loyalty on their lips, but with the spirit of resistance in their hearts, did these patriots push forward the Revolution."

The Assembly appointed delegates to the Congress, which met in September at Philadelphia. This Congress adopted resolutions approving of the resistance of the people of Massachusetts, and took measures to prohibit imports from or exports to Great Britain, unless grievances were redressed. It also adopted a declaration of rights and enumeration of grievances, an address to the people of Great Britain, another to the people of British America and a loyal address to the crown. It also adopted articles of confederation, which act may rightly be considered the beginning of the American Union.

A bill was adopted by parliament prohibiting the people of the provinces from fishing on the banks of Newfoundland, and at about the same time an ingeniously framed act, which made apparent concessions, but retained the doctrine against which the colonies contended, and which was intended to divide them. Pennsylvania was the first colony to which this proposition was presented, and the Assembly, to whom it was presented by Governor Penn, promptly rejected it; declaring that they desired no benefits for themselves the acceptance of which might injure the common cause, "and which by a generous rejection for the present might be finally secured for all."

Another provincial convention was held in Philadelphia in January, 1775, at which resolutions were adopted recommending the strict enforcement of the non-importation pledge, and the production and manufacture of every thing required for the use of the inhabitants; enumerating many of the articles to be produced or manufactured, including gunpowder, which was said to be necessary for the Indian trade.

CHAPTER V.

REVOLUTION IN THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT—PENNSYLVANIA A STATE—BATTLES OF 1776 AND 1777—INDIAN WARFARE.

IN 1775 hostilities commenced. The battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill were fought, and a British army invaded the country. Congress met and organized an army, at the head of which General Washington was placed. At the same time that it thus provided for the public defense, it adopted a "humble and dutiful petition to the King," which was presented but to which they were informed no answer would be given. A military association, having branches in each county, was formed, with a full code of rules for its government. The Assembly met and made provision for raising four thousand three hundred troops—the quota of the province. In view of the troublesome position which the Quakers occupied, the Assembly enacted that all able-bodied men who refused to bear arms (ministers and purchased servants excepted) should contribute an equivalent for the time and expense of others in acquiring the necessary discipline.

A committee of safety was appointed which assumed executive functions. A provincial navy was equipped, and measures were taken to protect Philadelphia against any naval force ascending the Delaware river. Later a continental navy was established.

The Continental Congress during its session of May, 1775, recommended to those colonies where no government sufficient to meet the exigencies of the times existed, to adopt such governments. It was determined by the whigs, in pursuance of this resolution, to throw off the proprietary government, by which they were hampered. The conservatives and tories opposed this, but the times were revolutionary and the whigs prevailed. It was resolved that the new government should emanate from the people, and that the Assembly, the members of which were shackled by their oaths of allegiance to the crown, should have no voice in its formation. A convention consisting of delegates from all the counties, for the formation of a new constitution, was called, through the committee of conference and observation of Philadelphia. In the choice of delegates to this convention no one was permitted to vote who refused to abjure all allegiance to the King of Great Britain, or who was suspected of being an enemy to American liberty.

The Declaration of Independence was adopted July 4th, 1776, and this convention assembled on the 15th of the same month. It not only entered on the task of forming a constitution, but assumed legislative powers and appointed delegates to Congress. It may here be remarked that such of these delegates as had not already done so affixed their signatures to the Declaration of Independence.

The work of the convention was completed on the 28th of September, and the new-formed constitution committed to the keeping of the council of safety until the first meeting of the General Assembly of the State. The provincial Assembly met on the 23d of the same month, and quietly expired, with a feeble denunciation on its lips of the assumed legislative power of the convention. Thus, at about the same time, the proprietary government in Pennsylvania ceased by the action of the people in the province, and the colonies cast off their allegiance to the crown of Great Britain.

The population of Pennsylvania was about 300,000 at the time when it became a State and assumed its position among its sister States in the American Union. The Declaration of Independence had been made, but that independence was to be maintained; and, as subsequently proved, by the sacrifice of many lives and the expenditure of much treasure.

The limits of this sketch will not permit a detail of Revolutionary events that occurred beyond the boundaries of the State, though many of those events were important factors in the history of the State at that time, and of the events of which Pennsylvania was the theatre little more than a brief mention can be made.

December, 1776, found General Washington on the west bank of the Delaware near Trenton. He had crossed New Jersey before the advancing army of General Howe, who was posted on the opposite side of the river, waiting for the formation of ice on which to cross, that he might move on Philadelphia. General Washington had secured all the boats on the river, and on the night of the 25th of December he recrossed the river with 2,400 men and twenty pieces of artillery, attacked the Hessians in Trenton and defeated them, capturing six cannon and 900 prisoners, with whom he again crossed into Pennsylvania. The loss of the Americans in this action was two soldiers killed and two who perished by cold. General Washington at once returned to Trenton, where he was joined by about 3,600 Pennsylvania militia under Generals Mifflin and Cadwallader. The battle of Princeton was fought soon afterward, and the army went into winter quarters at Morristown, New Jersey. The next summer, after some manœuvring in New Jersey, evidently for the purpose of drawing General Washington from his position, General Howe embarked his forces at New York, intending to attack Philadelphia by way of the Delaware river. After entering Delaware bay he returned to the ocean, sailed up the Chesapeake bay and landed near the head of Elk river. On the sailing of the British army from New York General Washington moved his army into Pennsylvania, and encamped near Germantown to watch the development of General Howe's plans. General La Fayette joined General Washington at that time, and shared with him the hardships and privations of the camp.

The army of General Howe advanced toward Philadelphia and was met by that of General Washington at the Brandywine, where a battle was fought the 11th of September, and the American forces suffered a defeat and retired to Germantown. Washington soon afterward crossed the Schuylkill and prepared for battle again, but a heavy rain storm prevented the action. General Howe entered Philadelphia with a portion of his army, and the balance encamped at Germantown. Upon this force Washington made an unsuccessful attack while a portion of it was assisting the British shipping to effect a passage through the Delaware river. This was early in October. On the 22nd of the same month an attack was made on Forts Mifflin and Mercer, which commanded the Delaware opposite the mouth of the Schuylkill. After an obstinate resistance the garrison of these forts was compelled to evacuate them. In this affair the enemy lost two ships by reason of the effective service of the Pennsylvania State fleet. After the surrender of General Burgoyne at Saratoga the army of Washington was reinforced by that of General Gates, and it encamped in a strong position at Whitemarsh. From this position the British commander endeavored to draw General Washington, but without success. The American army finally went into winter quarters at Valley Forge, a place which will ever be noted as the scene of the most intense suffering which the Revolutionary patriots were called on to endure during their struggle for independence. While they were shivering barefooted and half naked in their huts at this place, the British soldiers were snugly quartered and well fed and their officers feted and feasted by the Tories in Philadelphia.

In the spring of 1778 an attempt was made by the English government through commissioners to effect a reconciliation. Whether or not an honorable reconciliation was desired may be judged by the fact that they offered Joseph Reed, one of the delegates in Congress from Pennsylvania, £10,000 and the best office in the colonies to aid them in their purposes. His reply should be remembered:—"I am not worth purchasing, but such as I am the King of Great Britain is not rich enough to do it."

It was in the spring of 1778 that France entered into a treaty with the Americans, and sent four frigates and twelve ships to the Delaware. In consequence of this Sir Henry Clinton, who had succeeded Lord Howe in command of the British army, decided to evacuate Philadelphia, which he did, marching his forces across New Jersey toward New York. Washington pursued, and engaged the enemy at Monmouth and compelled them to give way. Philadelphia again became the capital in the latter part of June, 1778. Some trials were had for high treason, and several of those convicted were executed, greatly to the alarm of the Tories and Quakers. They had been emboldened by the temporary success of the British arms, and these examples seemed necessary to inspire them with terror and prevent future treasonable acts, as well as to appease the vengeance of the Whigs who had suffered at their hands.

By the evacuation of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania ceased to be the theatre of important warlike events. The English government had, however, induced the Indians of the Iroquois nations in New York and those of the territory west from Pennsylvania to engage in hostilities against the people of the struggling States. This warfare was waged in accordance with their "known rule." Incursions were made, defenseless settlements attacked, and people "of every age, sex and condition" were ruthlessly murdered. The settlements in many regions were left unprotected, because nearly all the men capable of bearing arms had responded to their country's call and joined the Revolutionary army. In 1777 the northern frontier of New York was the scene of many of these savage irruptions, and the frontier settlements of these States were scarcely troubled by marauding parties. They doubtless enjoyed this immunity because of the proximity of troops, which could be quickly sent to protect these settlements. In 1778 the storm of Indian warfare burst on them. A descent was made on the Wyoming valley by a force of British, Tories and Indians, commanded by Colonel John Butler. Many of the inhabitants were cruelly massacred and the valley was devastated. A descent was also made on the west branch of the Susquehanna by a force of Indians, Tories and British, under Colonel MacDonald. The frontier settlements in Westmoreland county also were ravaged by scalping parties. A force under General McIntosh was sent to protect the western frontier, which was done by the erection of forts and by expeditions into the country of the hostile savages.

The Indian villages at Wyalusing, Shesequin and Tioga were destroyed by a small force under Colonel Hartley. In order to punish the most audacious of these savages, and prevent, if possible, future depredations by them, General Sullivan was sent with a sufficient force in the summer of 1779 up the Susquehanna into the Genesee valley, the heart of the country of the Senecas—the most powerful and warlike nation of the Iroquois—with orders "to cut off their settlements, destroy their crops, and inflict on them every other mischief that time and circumstances would permit." This work was thoroughly accomplished. A battle was fought on the Chemung river at Newtown (Elmira), in which the Indians, under the celebrated Mohawk chief Brant, and the Tories, under Colonel John Butler, were routed. The valley of the Genesee was devastated, forty towns were burned, orchards were cut down, corn fields were ravaged, and one hundred and sixty thousand bushels of corn destroyed. From this blow the warlike Senecas never recovered. Though marauding parties continued to go forth, they were not afterward able to send out any large force.

Colonel Brodhead, at about the same time, went on an expedition against the Indians on the west branch of the Allegheny and destroyed the crops and villages there, and cut off a party of forty who had started on an expedition to the frontier of Westmoreland county.

CHAPTER VI.

LATER EVENTS OF THE REVOLUTION—WAR WITH THE WESTERN INDIANS—CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES.

DURING the year 1780 much difficulty was experienced on account of the depreciation of the paper currency, which the exigencies of the war had made it necessary to issue. Efforts were made by the Assembly to relieve the State from this embarrassment, with only partial success. In 1781, in accordance with a plan of Robert Morris, who justly earned the title of "the financier of the Revolution," the Bank of North America was chartered by Congress, and charters were also granted to it by Pennsylvania and Massachusetts. The effect of this measure was immediately beneficial to the commercial and financial interests of the country. The Pennsylvania charter was revoked by the Legislature in 1785, but was restored in 1787.

During 1780 the Legislature enacted a law reorganizing the militia system of the State, in order that any sudden emergency might be promptly met. In view of the exigencies of the times authority was vested in the executive to declare martial law during the recess of the Assembly, so far as should be necessary under circumstances that might arise. It was resolved, also, that in extraordinary efforts that were found necessary to obtain supplies, discrimination might be made between the friends of the country and those who had shown themselves to be otherwise. To guard against spies, authority was given to arrest all suspicious persons and prevent the admission of strangers indiscriminately. The houses and other property of domestic enemies were seized, and the houses of Quakers were searched for arms.

The entrance into New Jersey of the British army under Sir Henry Clinton was the cause of great alarm, but this army did not advance on Philadelphia. Soon afterward four thousand of the militia were ordered out to assist in a projected attack on New York, but by reason of the non-arrival of the French troops the project was abandoned, and the militia force, which had its rendezvous at Trenton, was disbanded.

The treason of Benedict Arnold occurred in the autumn of 1780. While in command at Philadelphia in 1778 General Arnold became allied by marriage with a distinguished tory family in that city, and the intimacy with British officers into which this relation threw him, together with the sting which his sensitive nature received by being court-martialed for some irregularity, may have led him to his fatal error. Soon after the receipt of the news of his treason in Philadelphia, his effigy was paraded through the streets and hanged, his wife was ordered to leave the city within fourteen days, and his estate was confiscated. Still more rigorous proceedings were instituted against the tories and Quakers, one of whom was convicted of high treason and hanged.

In January, 1781, a revolt occurred among the Pennsylvania troops, who were in winter quarters at Morristown, under command of General Wayne. About thirteen hundred of the disaffected left the camp and established their quarters at Princeton. The causes of this mutiny were depreciation of the currency in which the men were paid, arrearages of pay and suffering for want of money and clothing, and the retention in the service of some beyond the terms of their enlistment. There was nothing treasonable in their revolt. On the contrary, two emissaries who were sent to them with large offers from the commander of the British forces were seized, delivered to General Wayne, tried as spies, convicted and executed. An investigation was instituted by General Wayne and President Reed, their grievances were redressed, and they returned to their duty.

In the spring of 1781 the Pennsylvania troops under General Wayne joined the force of La Fayette, and marched to join the force of General Greene. Fearing an attack upon Philadelphia by the troops from New York, Congress recommended the calling out of three thousand militia. They were ordered to rendezvous at Newtown, in Bucks county, where they remained till the departure of the British troops from New York for the relief of Cornwallis allayed all fear for the safety of Philadelphia, when they were disbanded.

In October, 1781, the army of Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown, thus virtually ending the war of the Revolution. Pending the negotiation of a treaty of peace, which was signed November 30th, 1781, the Assembly of Pennsylvania unanimously adopted a resolution disapproving of a reunion with Great Britain on any terms; against the conclusion of a treaty of peace with England without the concurrence of France, and against the revival of the proprietary family privileges. Such had been the bitter experience of the people of Pennsylvania under the proprietary government and the British yoke that they were determined to guard against everything that could lead to a recurrence of that experience.

Although the chartered boundaries of Pennsylvania were settled before the termination of the Revolutionary war, the Indian title to all the territory within those limits had not been extinguished. Purchases from the Indians had been made in 1736 and previously, in 1749, in 1758 and in 1768. These amounted to about two-thirds of the chartered territory. The balance, lying in the northwest part of the State, was purchased from the Iroquois at the treaty of Fort Stanwix in October, 1784, and the purchase was confirmed by the Delawares and Wyandots at Fort McIntosh in January, 1785. Notwithstanding this purchase the Delawares and Wyandots kept up a barbarous warfare against the settlers, and in addition to the expeditions that had been sent against them, among which was that of the ill fated Crawford in 1782, Harmar in 1791 and Wayne from 1792 to 1795 conducted campaigns against them. The last in August, 1795, concluded a treaty with them which terminated hostilities. "Besides these expeditions," says Sherman Day, "there was an undercurrent of partisan hostilities constantly maintained between the white savages on the frontier and the red, in which it was difficult to say on which side was exhibited the greatest atrocity."

It has been said that a State constitution was adopted in 1776 to supersede the proprietary government. Under this constitution an assembly elected annually was the legislative department; a council of twelve persons was chosen for three years and by joint ballot of the assembly and council a president was elected, which constituted the executive department. It also provided for the choice septennially of a council of censors to revise the doings of the Legislature and the executive, pass censures, recommend repeals, etc. This constitution was defective, though an improvement on the proprietary government.

In December, 1779, the royal charter was annulled by an act of Assembly, and the proprietaries were granted £130,000 sterling to compensate them for their lost privileges, they retaining their real estate and rents. In 1780 the act for the gradual extinction of slavery was passed. In recommending this action the executive council said: "Honored will that State be in the annals of mankind which shall first abolish this violation of the rights of mankind."

In 1787 the convention which framed the constitution of the United States sat in Philadelphia. It concluded its labors on the 18th of September, and on the 12th of the following December a convention called for the purpose by the Assembly ratified it, thus placing Pennsylvania first on the list of States which adopted it. After the adoption of the federal constitution the defects of the State constitution of 1776 were more than ever before apparent. Chief Justice McKean had said of it: "The balance of the one, the few and the many is not well poised in the State; the Legislature is too powerful for the executive and judicial branches. We have now but one branch; we must have another branch, a negative in the executive, stability in our laws and permanency in the magistracy before we shall be reputable, safe and happy."

In accordance with a resolution of the Assembly, delegates were chosen at the October election in 1789 to frame a new constitution. They assembled in November of the same year, and after a long session completed their labors, and the constitution which they formed was adopted in September, 1790.

In this the general plan of the Federal constitution was followed. The executive department was vested in a governor, elected by the people; the legislative in a Senate and Assembly, while the judicial system was not greatly changed, except that the tenure of office of the judges of the higher courts was during good behavior instead of seven years, as before. The supreme executive council and the council of censors were of course abolished.

In 1837 the constitution was revised by a convention assembled for that purpose, and the changes which were recommended were adopted the next year. Among these were alterations in the tenure of offices, an abridgment of the powers of the Legislature, the taking away of nearly all executive patronage and an extension of the elective franchise.

Another revision of the constitution was made by a convention for that purpose in 1873, and the amended constitution was adopted the same year. This constitution abolished special legislation, changed the time of annual elections, altered the tenure of the judiciary, modified the pardoning power, provided for minority representation, for biennial sessions of the Legislature, for an increase in the number of both branches of the Legislature, and made other important changes.

In 1794 an attempt was made to lay out a town where the city of Erie—then called Presque Isle, from the peninsula which shelters the excellent harbor at that point—now stands. The small triangle necessary to secure this harbor was purchased from the Indians in 1789, and from the United States in 1792. Resistance to this settlement by the Seneca Indians was apprehended, by reason of a misunderstanding on the part of the latter, and the matter was postponed to the next year, by which time matters were arranged with them. The western tribes were at that time hostile.

CHAPTER VII.

THE PENNAMITE WAR—WHISKEY INSURRECTION—"MOLLY MAGUIRE" OUTRAGES—THE RIOTS OF 1877.

WHAT has always been known as the Pennamite war, arose out of the conflicting claims of the colonies of Connecticut and Pennsylvania to the territory included between the forty-first and forty-second parallels of latitude—now in this State.

In 1662 King Charles the Second confirmed to the colony of Connecticut the title which it had previously acquired to this territory; and in 1681 the same monarch granted a portion of the same territory to William Penn. In 1762 settlers from New England took possession of lands in the Wyoming valley, and during that and the succeeding year made some improvements there; but in the autumn of 1763 they were driven away by the Indians.

They returned in 1769, but about the same time parties claiming titles under the Pennsylvania grant took possession of a portion of the same territory. An attempt was made by the Connecticut settlers to forcibly eject these, and thus was inaugurated a contest and a series of conflicts, which, though they were suspended during the Revolutionary war, were renewed afterward, and were not finally settled till about the year 1800.

What has usually been termed the whiskey insurrection assumed somewhat formidable proportions in 1794. In 1684, 1738, 1744, 1772 and 1780 duties had been imposed on domestic spirits by the Assembly of the province, but after a time the acts imposing these duties were repealed. In 1791, by an act of Congress, an excise of four pence per gallon was laid on all distilled spirits. This tax weighed heavily on the people of western Pennsylvania, where in some districts a sixth or fifth of the farmers were distillers, and nearly all the coarse grain was converted into spirit and this sent across the mountains or down the Ohio river to market. A majority of the inhabitants of this region were Scotch-Irish or their descendants, and their recollections or traditions of resistance to the excise laws in the "old country" inclined them to follow here the examples of their fathers. In the year of the passage of the act resistance to its enforcement commenced, and meetings were held, at which resolutions were passed denouncing all who should attempt the enforcement of the law, and excise officers were tarred and feathered and otherwise maltreated. This resistance continued during the succeeding two or three years. People who were suspected of favoring the law were proscribed, socially and otherwise, and open resistance to its execution, by violence to the persons and injury to the property of those attempting to execute it, was practiced. This was the condition of things in the counties of Allegheny, Fayette, Washington and Westmoreland. In 1794 Congress amended the law, but nothing short of absolute repeal would satisfy the malcontents, whose successful resistance had greatly emboldened them. Armed and organized mobs assembled, attacked the houses of excise officers and burned their buildings, and several persons were killed in these riots. Finally a large force assembled and marched on Pittsburg, determined to burn the house of an excise officer there; but by adroit management they were prevented from doing any harm beyond burning a barn. These lawless proceedings were reported to the authorities, and the President of the United States and the governor of the State issued proclamations commanding the insurgents to disperse, and calling for troops to suppress the insurrection. In obedience to this proclamation a force of about 13,000 was raised in Virginia, Maryland, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and under the command of Governor Henry Lee, of Virginia, marched to the insurrectionary district. This awed the insurgents into obedience and no further trouble was experienced.

In 1798 the Fries insurrection, or "hot water war," as it was called because of the method adopted by the women in resisting the collection of the "house tax," occurred in Bucks and Montgomery counties. Troops were called out; Fries and others—leaders—were arrested, tried, and convicted of treason, but subsequently pardoned.

The Erie Railroad war, which occurred in the winter of 1853-4, is still fresh in the recollection of many. This arose out of the opposition of the people of Erie to the action of what is now the Lake Shore Railroad Company in laying a track of uniform width through the city. The track was torn up and bridges were destroyed by a mob encouraged by the city authorities, and travel was embarrassed during several months. Order was finally restored, and Erie has since been widely known as the "peanut city."

About the year 1862 a reign of terror was inaugurated in some portions of the mining regions in the State of Pennsylvania, by the discovery that there existed among the miners an organization of desperadoes who set the law at defiance, and aided and protected each other in the blackest crimes known. This organization is popularly known as the Mollie Maguires, and it was transplanted in this country about the year 1854 from Ireland. It was an organization for resistance to the landlords in that country, and took its name from a desperate woman, who was very active and efficient in shooting landlords' agents. In this country it is said that it never existed as a distinct organization, but that the secret acts of lawlessness and crimes that had characterized the Mollie Maguires came to be tolerated and even sanctioned and abetted by the "Ancient Order of Hibernians," a benevolent institution which had long existed and which, in some States, was incorporated. When they first attracted attention they were termed "Buckshots," and, although troublesome, they were not considered very dangerous. Their crimes came to be more frequent and audacious. They resisted the enrollment for the draft in 1862. Arson, and the assassination of those who incurred their displeasure, came to be more and more common, and were perpetrated with entire impunity, for an alibi was always proved; and during the twelve or thirteen years following the influx of foreign miners into the coal regions, which began soon after the breaking out of the Rebellion, they came to be a real terror in those regions. At length a skillful detective succeeded in gaining admission to their order and obtaining a knowledge of its secret workings, and of the perpetrators of the many murders which had been committed. The result was that many of these murderers were brought to justice, and the order was rendered impotent by the exposure of its dangerous character.

In the summer of 1877 what is known as the great strike occurred. This commenced in the city of Baltimore, among the employees of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and rapidly extended the entire length of the road. Three days later, July 19th, certain employees of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company also struck, or refused to work. The immediate cause or pretext for the strike at Pittsburg was an order from the superintendent of the road extending the trip of a "crew;" thus—as it was said—rendering a smaller number of men necessary and depriving a portion of their employment.

The exigencies of the war of 1861-65 brought about an unhealthy condition of things throughout the country. The currency was inflated; business acquired an abnormal activity; the prices of produce, of manufactured articles, and of labor, were greatly enhanced, and a general expansion took place. This engendered among all classes a degree of reckless extravagance unknown before, and when, after the lapse of a few years, business gradually came to be established on a more healthy basis, people found it difficult to adapt themselves to their changed surroundings, to practice the more rigid economy which those surroundings necessitated, and to appreciate the increased and steadily increasing value of a dollar. When, therefore, by reason of a depreciation in the prices of produce, a lessened demand for manufactured goods, and a consequent reduction of the profits of manufacturers, it became necessary to reduce the price of labor, many laborers, finding it hard to submit to these inevitable changes, and failing to appreciate the necessity for them, sought by the exercise of lawless force to compel producers, manufacturers, or carriers to continue the prices which they paid in more prosperous times.

Such was the condition of things at the commencement of this strike. At first certain railroad employees, who considered themselves aggrieved, refused to work, and sought by intimidation and force to prevent others from doing the work which they refused to do. At Pittsburg these were joined by the idle, vicious and reckless who were not in the employ of the railroad company, and at once became more and more disorderly and defiant. The authorities were called on to protect the company's property, but the force failed to control the mob. The militia were called out, and some of the soldiers fraternized with the rioters, and others proved inefficient by reason of a mistaken aversion to firing on them, and finally allowed themselves to be driven from their position. The citizens took no measures to repress disorder, but rather looked on approvingly.

Under such circumstances the crowd constantly augmented, and became more and more desperate. Incendiarism and pillage came to be the order of things, and property to the amount of millions of dollars was destroyed. Proclamations were issued by the governor, more militia were called out, and at last the citizens awoke from their apathy when they became aware that the city itself was in danger of destruction, and the riotous proceedings were finally quelled.

Meantime the strike had extended until it had become general along the Pennsylvania Railroad. Violence was resorted to and property destroyed at various places along the line of the road, but nowhere was there such a reign of terror as at Pittsburg. At Philadelphia the authorities took such ample precautions, and the police acted so promptly and efficiently when the riot broke out there, that it was at once put down. The governor visited riotous localities along the line of the road in person, accompanied by troops, and regular soldiers were furnished by order of the President and Secretary of War, on application of Governor Hartranft, to aid in restoring order.

At Reading riots broke out on the 22nd of July. The militia were called out, but proved inefficient, though one regiment, without orders, poured a volley into the assailing crowd, killing ten and wounding forty and scattering the rioters for the time. The presence of 300 regular troops finally awed the mob and restored order.

By the 24th the strike had extended to the mining regions, and was extensively participated in by the miners. Riots occurred at Pottsville, Shamokin, Bethlehem, Easton, Wilkes-Barre, Scranton and elsewhere. Work in the mines was arrested, some mines were flooded, railroad property was destroyed and many lives were sacrificed in the riots and the efforts to quell them. The greatest destruction of property, however, was at Pittsburg, where the citizens have since been punished for the tacit encouragement which they at first gave the rioters, by being compelled to pay for the property destroyed.

CHAPTER VIII.

HARRISBURG MADE THE CAPITAL—THE WAR OF 1812— INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS—SCHOOLS.

THE project of removing the capital of the State to a more central location began to be agitated during the last decade of the eighteenth century. In 1795, 1796 and 1798 efforts were made to accomplish such removal, but they failed for the want of concurrent action in the two branches of the Legislature. Carlisle, Reading, Lancaster, Wright's Ferry and Harrisburg were unsuccessfully proposed. In 1799 Lancaster was selected, and the Legislature met there for the first time in December of that year. By an act of the Legislature in 1810 it was in 1812 removed from Lancaster to Harrisburg; and the sessions of the Legislature were held in the court-house at that place till the completion of the public buildings in 1821.

The war of 1812 had its origin in aggressions against the United States by Great Britain, which were continued during many years, notwithstanding the earnest protests of this nation. The rights of the United States as neutrals were disregarded during the Napoleonic wars, and among other encroachments the English government claimed the right to board and search American vessels, and authorized its officers to examine their crews, seize all those whom they chose to regard as British subjects, and force them into their service. All remonstrances were unavailing. The English in enforcing this right of search committed great outrages, and the practice became so obnoxious as to demand some decided measures for its suppression. Under these circumstances there appeared no alternative but war; and Congress having authorized it, war against Great Britain was declared on the 19th of June, 1812. The measure was not universally sustained. The Federal party, then in the minority, opposed it; and their political opinions being apparently stronger than their patriotism, they loudly denounced it. The Federalists in New York and New England were most prominent in their opposition, and if they did not directly aid the enemy their conduct was discouraging and injurious to those who were periling their lives in their country's cause. This opposition was, however, quite impotent in Pennsylvania.

At the commencement of the war Governor Snyder issued a patriotic call for fourteen thousand volunteers; and such was the alacrity of the response that three times the number required tendered their services, and money was readily offered for the places of those who were accepted.

During this war Pennsylvania was not the scene of hostile operations, although her frontier was threatened. A force of British and Indians appeared on the north shore of the lake, opposite to Erie, in July, 1812; but the prompt measures that were taken for the defense of the port prevented an attack. The mouth of the Delaware was blockaded in 1813, and most of the foreign commerce of Philadelphia was cut off; but the river had been placed in such a state of defense that it was not invaded. A thousand men were sent to protect the shores of this river, and an equal force sent to guard the harbor of Erie, where vessels of war were in process of construction and equipment. The brilliant victory of Commodore Perry on the 10th of September, 1813, was the result of the fitting out of this naval force.

The ravaging of the shores of Chesapeake bay, and the burning of Washington, in 1813 and 1814, and the threatening attitude of the enemy after these depredations, induced Governor Snyder to issue another call for troops to defend the State against the peril which menaced it. In compliance with this a force of five thousand established a rendezvous on the Delaware, and although the soil of Pennsylvania was not invaded this force did good service in marching to the relief of Baltimore when it was attacked, and aiding to repel the enemy. It is worthy of note, as showing the difference in the patriotism of men from different sections of the country, that four thousand New York troops under General Van Rensselaer refused to cross the line into Canada, but that, soon afterward, a brigade of Pennsylvanians, consisting of two thousand, under General Tannehill, crossed without the slightest hesitation, glad to be able to meet the enemy on his own soil and do battle for their country. A treaty of peace between the two nations was ratified on the 17th of February, 1815.

The extensive system of internal improvements which has swallowed so many millions of money in this State was commenced about the year 1790. The first efforts were directed to the improvement of navigation in the rivers of the State; then, as time went on, the construction of a system of canals and turnpikes was entered on, and prosecuted beyond that of any other State in the Union. The grand project of securing the trade of the West, through a connection between Philadelphia and the waters of the Ohio at Pittsburg, by a line of public works, was realized in 1831. In order to secure the influence and votes necessary to authorize this it had been found necessary to construct other canals in various parts of the State, the inhabitants of which desired to participate in the benefits of the system of internal improvement, and thus that system in this State came to exceed in magnitude that of any other.

It was not possible, however, for the wisest of those who projected and promoted this system of improvements to foresee the rise and rapid progress of another system, which was to take the place of and wholly supersede that which, at such an enormous expense, they inaugurated and carried forward.

In 1827 a railroad, nine miles in length, the longest then in existence in America, was constructed from Mauch Chunk to some coal mines. Only two had preceded this—one, with a wooden track, at a stone quarry in the county of Delaware, Penn., and another, having a length of three miles, at a quarry in Quincy, Mass. Since that time the railroad system of this country has developed to its present magnitude. A majority of the canals are dry, many have been converted into railroad beds, and even the rivers and lakes of the country have dwindled into comparative insignificance as avenues of travel or transportation. In 1857 the principal line of public works between Pittsburg and Philadelphia was sold to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for a fraction of its cost, and measures were at once taken for the sale of the other works belonging to the State. Thus do systems, one after another, develop and pass away, and no prevision can point out what is to come.

While it is true that in some of the States of the Union the present system of internal improvements, which has been fostered and encouraged by those States, has proved to be almost the ruin of their best interests, the reverse is true in Pennsylvania. The development of the immense mineral resources of the State required the construction of these avenues of transportation, and the cost of those built by the State, though they were afterward sold for only a part of that cost, was returned many fold in the increase of wealth which was the direct result of their construction. When the first canal was projected the use of anthracite coal was hardly known, and the cost of its transportation to market was so great as to preclude the possibility of its profitable use. With every increase in the facilities for the transportation of this important mineral it has been cheapened to the consumer, and its production has been rendered more profitable; and now large areas which have no value for any other purpose are sources of immense and constantly increasing wealth.

Previous to the year 1834 many acts were passed by the Legislature pertaining in some way to the subject of education. Some of these were local in their application, and some were little more than resolutions in favor of education. Isolated schools were established in various localities, in most of which provision was made for the education of the children of the poor. The people of the different religious denominations made provision for the education of their children, often establishing parochial schools. This was the case with the Quakers, the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, the German Lutherans, the Mennonists, the Moravians, the Dunkards, etc. Nothing having the semblance of a public school system was established previous to the adoption of the constitution of 1790, which required that provision should be made by law for the general establishment of schools wherein gratuitous instruction should be given to the children of the poor. From that time till 1827 efforts were from time to time made to establish a system in accordance with this requirement, but with only partial success, the radical defect in all being the distinction between the children of the rich and poor. In 1827 earnest and systematic efforts began to be put forth for the establishment of free schools for all, and in 1834 the foundation of the present common school system was laid, in the enactment of a law for the maintenance of schools by a tax on all taxable property. This law, which was at first imperfect, was revised and amended in 1836, 1849, 1854 and 1857, in which last year the present system of normal schools was established.

In 1863 the Pennsylvania Railroad Company donated to the State $50,000 for the education of soldiers' orphans. In 1865 the Legislature added to this an appropriation of $75,000. Schools and homes were established for these wards of the State, and during several years an annual expenditure was made for this purpose of half a million of dollars. At these homes and schools soldiers' orphans were boarded, clothed, educated and taught habits of industry, and at a proper age were placed in situations to acquire trades or professions.

In 1749 an academy was established by subscription in Philadelphia "for instruction in the Latin and English languages and mathematics." This was the foundation of the University of Pennsylvania. This and Dickinson College, at Carlisle, which was founded in 1783, were the only colleges in the State previous to the commencement of the nineteenth century. There are now twenty-seven, of which five are purely secular or non-sectarian. There are also seventeen theological institutions, ten medical schools and one law school.

CHAPTER IX.

PATRIOTIC ACTION IN THE MEXICAN AND CIVIL WARS— GOVERNORS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

IN 1846 war was declared by this government against Mexico, and by virtue of authority vested in him by Congress, the President called on Pennsylvania for six volunteer regiments of infantry, to hold themselves in readiness for service during one year, or to the end of the war. Such was the alacrity with which the citizens responded to this call, that within thirty days a sufficient number of volunteers had offered their services to constitute nine full regiments. Of these, between two and three regiments were sent into the country of the enemy, and their conduct at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, Chapultepec and the city of Mexico was highly creditable to themselves as well as to the State which they represented.

The promptitude with which Pennsylvania responded to the call of the federal government in 1812 and 1846 was fully equaled by the readiness with which her citizens flew to arms at the breaking out of the great Southern rebellion. In anticipation of that event the citizens of Pittsburg had refused to allow arms to be taken from their arsenal and sent south by traitorous government officials; and, when the storm of war burst upon the country, the patriotism of the citizens of this State was aroused to such a pitch that, in response to the call for Pennsylvania's quota of the 75,000 first called for, fourteen regiments, enough for twenty-five, offered themselves.

A place of rendezvous, called, in honor of the governor of the State, Camp Curtin, was established at Harrisburg, and on the morning of April 18th, 1861, six days after the attack on Fort Sumter and three days after the proclamation calling for 75,000 men was issued, five companies of volunteers left Harrisburg for Washington. They passed through Baltimore amid the jeers and imprecations of the mob, that followed them and hurled bricks, clubs and other missiles at them as they boarded the cars, and arrived at Washington on the evening of the same day. They were the first troops that reached the national capital, and for this prompt response to the call of their country, and for their coolness and courage in passing through the mob, they were afterward thanked, in a resolution, by the House of Representatives. Within twelve days, or before the first of May, twenty-five regiments, amounting to more than twenty thousand men, were sent from this State to the field. The expense of clothing, subsisting, arming, equipping and transporting these troops was sustained by the State.

By the advance of General Lee toward the southern border of the State in September, 1862, an invasion of its territory was evidently threatened, and Governor Curtin, by proclamation, called for fifty thousand men to meet the emergency. These not only marched to the border, which they covered, but most of them crossed into the State of Maryland, and by their presence assisted in preventing the advance northward of the rebel army.

Another emergency arose in June, 1863, to meet which Governor Curtin issued a proclamation calling out the entire militia of the State. By reason of a lack of concert in the action of the State and national authorities, only a portion of this force was brought into service previous to the battle of Gettysburg. Of that battle the limits of this sketch will not permit a detailed account. It was the result of the second attempt to invade northern territory, and it was a disaster to the rebels from which they never recovered.

The territory of the State was again invaded in July, 1864, and all the available troops in the State were sent forward to repel the invasion. The inhabitants along the southern border were considerably annoyed and injured by this invasion, and the town of Chambersburg was burned. More than two hundred and fifty houses were fired by the rebels and the town was entirely destroyed, involving a loss of about $2,000,000. It was an act of wanton vandalism.

Of Camp Curtin, that was established at the commencement of the war, it may be said that it was not only a place of rendezvous for soldiers and of deposit for military stores, but a depot for prisoners and a hospital for the sick and for the wounded after some of the great battles, especially the battles of Gettysburg and Antietam. It was early placed under the control of the federal government, and so continued till the close of the war.

A brief mention should be made of the part which the loyal women of the State bore in this conflict. Not only did they part with their husbands, sons and brothers, who went forth to do battle for their country and the preservation of its institutions, and in many cases to lay down their lives, but they put forth their efforts to provide and send forward to those who languished in distant hospitals those comforts which the government could not furnish; and many a sick or wounded soldier had occasion to bless his unknown benefactress for some delicacy or comfort of which he was the recipient.

During the continuance of this war the State of Pennsylvania furnished for the army two hundred and seventy regiments and many detached companies, amounting in all to 387,284 men. The following quotation from a special message of Governor Curtin, at the close of the war, is a well deserved tribute to the self-sacrificing patriotism of the people of this State:

"Proceeding in the strict line of duty, the resources of Pennsylvania, whether in men or money, have neither been withheld or squandered. The history of the conduct of our people in the field is illuminated with incidents of heroism worthy of conspicuous notice; but it would be impossible to mention them in the proper limits of this message, without doing injustice or perhaps making invidious distinctions. It would be alike impossible to furnish a history of the associated benevolence, and of the large individual contributions to the comfort of our people in the field and hospital; or of the names and services at all times of our volunteer surgeons, when called to assist in the hospital or on the battle field. Nor is it possible to do justice to the many patriotic and Christian men who were always ready when summoned to the exercise of acts of humanity and benevolence. Our armies were sustained and strengthened in the field by the patriotic devotion of their friends at home; and we can never render full justice to the heaven-directed, patriotic, Christian benevolence of the women of the State."

CHAPTER I.

RELICS AND THEORIES OF THE EARLIEST INHABITANTS OF NORTHEASTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

THE historian of the former inhabitants of any country or region is confronted at the outset by various difficulties. The question arises, Who and what were the progenitors of these inhabitants? and who were their ancestors? and so on.

There exist in this country, and to some extent in northeastern Pennsylvania, evidences of its former occupancy by a people whose customs were, in some respects, different from those of the Indians who were found here near the close of the fifteenth century. These evidences consist of the sepulchral and other mounds or tumuli in the west and south, and of the defensive works which are found in this region. Of the people who constructed these mounds and forts no tradition was preserved by the pre-Columbian Indians, and in and around them many relics have been found concerning the former use of which even the ingenuity of archæologists has failed to form a conjecture.

The opinion has been held that these people were not the progenitors of the present race of Indians, but that they were expelled from the country or exterminated by those from whom these Indians descended. The correctness of this opinion is doubted by many modern ethnologists, who insist that gradual changes in the surroundings of a people, extending through indefinite periods of time, are sufficient to account for those things which have been regarded as evidences of a distinct race of people. They insist, too, that in the absence of a recorded history it is not strange that in the lapse of time many of the customs, the significance of the monuments and works, and even the existence of a people should pass into oblivion among their descendants.

It is not necessary, and it would be improper to discuss this question here. These mementos of the long ago exist, and as archæologists become more skilled in searching after them more are discovered, notwithstanding the fact that time, the ax and the plow tend constantly to obliterate the traces of their existence.

In recent times individuals, associations and public institutions have become impressed with the importance of preserving these relics of bygone ages, and with commendable zeal they are engaged in collecting them in cabinets and museums, where they may be preserved and studied in future. The national museum at Washington contains many thousands of these relics, and the cabinets of historical societies are constantly being enriched by accessions of them. Steuben Jenkins, Esq., of Wyoming, and Dr. H. Hollister, of Providence, have each an extensive cabinet in which may be seen many rare specimens of these relics. Their cabinets are filled mostly with specimens that were found in this region.

Want of space forbids even a catalogue of all the works that have been discovered in this and surrounding regions, of the origin and builders of which there exists not even a tradition. Probably many others have been leveled by the plough and forgotten, if their character was ever known; and perhaps still others, the relics of periods antecedent to these, have been obliterated by time.

There are regions the peculiar topography of which renders them well adapted to the wants of a people, and which at the same time does much toward shaping and molding the character of that people. Northeastern Pennsylvania appears to have long been the habitat of a wild, independent and warlike race, and the physical features of the region are adapted to the wants of just such a people as the works and relics found in it indicate, and as were represented by its inhabitants at the time of its settlement by Europeans.

The only record which these ancient people have left is to be found here and there in the remains of the fortifications or defensive works which they constructed; the village sites or camping places which they occupied, and which the practiced eye of an archæologist is able still to discern; and the relics which are found of their rude weapons, their ruder implements, and the uncouth ornaments with which they decorated themselves.

Many of their defensive works were doubtless obliterated by the agricultural operations of early settlers, and thus they have passed into oblivion. Two of these are known to have existed in the Wyoming valley. One was thus described by Chapman in his history of Wyoming:

"In the valley of Wyoming there exist some remains of ancient fortifications, which appear to have been constructed by a race of people very different in their habits from those who occupied the place when first discovered by the whites. Most of these ruins have been so much obliterated by the operations of agriculture that their forms cannot now be distinctly ascertained. That which remains the most entire was examined by the writer during the summer of 1817, and its dimensions carefully ascertained, although from frequent plowing its form had become almost destroyed. It is situated in the township of Kingston, upon a level plain on the north side of Toby's creek, about one hundred and fifty feet from its bank, and about half a mile from its confluence with the Susquehanna. It is of an oval or elliptical form, having its longest diameter from the northwest to the southeast, at right angles to the creek, three hundred and thirty-seven feet, and its shortest diameter from the northeast to the southwest two hundred and seventy-two feet. On the southwest side appears to have been a gateway about twelve feet wide, opening toward the great eddy of the river into which the creek falls. From present appearances it consisted probably of only one round or rampart, which, in height and thickness, appears to have been the same on all sides, and was constructed of earth, the plain on which it stands not abounding in stone. On the outside of the rampart is an entrenchment or ditch, formed probably by removing the earth of which it is composed, and which appears never to have been walled. The creek on which it stands is bounded by a high, steep bank on that side, and at ordinary times is sufficiently deep to admit canoes to ascend from the river to the fortification. When the first settlers came to Wyoming this plain was covered with its native forest, consisting principally of oak and yellow pine, and the trees which grew on the rampart and in the entrenchment are said to have been as large as those in any other part of the valley. One large oak particularly, upon being cut down, was ascertained to be seven hundred years old. The Indians had no tradition concerning these fortifications; neither did they appear to have any knowledge of the purpose for which they were constructed."

The other was described by Miner in his history of Wyoming as follows:

"Another fortification existed on Jacob's Plains, or the upper flats, in Wilkes-Barre. Its situation is the highest part of the low grounds, so that only in extraordinary floods is the spot covered with water. Looking over the flats in ordinarily high freshets the site of the fort presents to the eye an island in the vast sea of waters. The eastern extremity is near the line dividing the farms of Mr. John Searle and Mr. James Hancock, where, from its safety from inundation, a fence has long since been placed; and to this circumstance is to be attributed the preservation of the embankment and ditch. In the open field so entirely is the work leveled that the eye cannot trace it. But the extent west is known, for 'it reached through the meadow lot of Captain Gore' (said Cornelius Courtright, Esq., to me when visiting the ground several years ago), 'and came on to my lot one or two rods.' The lot of Captain Gore was seventeen perches in width. Taking then these two hundred and eighty feet, add the distance it extended eastwardly on the Searle lot, and the extension westerly on the lot of Esquire Courtright, we have the length of that measured by Mr. Chapman so very nearly as to render the inference almost certain that both were of the same size and dimensions.

"Huge trees were growing out of the embankment when the white people began to clear the flats for cultivation. This, too, in Wilkes-Barre, is oval, as is still manifest from the segment exhibited on the upper part, formed by the remaining rampart and fosse, the chord of the arc being the division fence. A circle is easily made, the elliptical form much more difficult for an untutored mind to trace. Trifling as these circumstances may appear, the exact coincidence in size and shape, and that shape difficult to form, they appeared to me worthy of a distinct notice. The Wilkes-Barre fortification is about eighty rods from the river, toward which a gate opened, and the ancient people concur in stating that a well existed in the interior, near the southern line.

"On the bank of the river there is an Indian burying place; not a barrow or hill, such as is described by Mr. Jefferson, but where graves have been dug and the deceased laid, horizontally, in regular rows. In excavating the canal, cutting through the bank that borders the flats, perhaps thirty rods south from the fort, was another burying place disclosed, evidently more ancient; for the bones almost immediately crumbled to dust on exposure to the air, and the deposits were far more numerous than in that near the river. By the representation of James Stark, Esq., the skeletons were countless, and the deceased had been buried in a sitting posture. In a considerable portion of the bank, though scarcely a bone remained of sufficient firmness to be lifted up, the closeness and position of the buried were apparent from the discoloration of the earth. In this place of deposit no beads were found, while they were common in that near the river.

"In 1814 I visited this fortification in company with the present Chief Justice Gibson and Jacob Cist, Esqs. The whole line, although it had been plowed for more than thirty years, was then distinctly traceable by the eye. Fortune was unexpectedly propitious to our search, for we found a medal, bearing on one side the impress of King George the First, dated 1714 (the year he commenced his reign), and on the other an Indian chief."

What was thought to be a well was doubtless a "cache," or place of concealment or storage for corn or other stores. From the description given of these works it is evident they were similar in character to other ancient defensive works that have been found east from Ohio. Where such works are sufficiently well preserved to be studied they are found to consist in each case of mural embankment, or in very rare cases of two such, enclosing areas varying in size, but usually of about two acres. They are usually surrounded by ditches, which evidently served the double purpose of furnishing the material for the walls and rendering the defensive character of the works more formidable. In some of these works the embankments give evidence of having been surmounted with palisades, and it is probable that but for the ravages of time such evidences might be found in all of them. The continuity of the walls is usually interrupted by two sally ports, or passage ways, at nearly opposite points, and one of these is almost always on the side of the work which is least accessible from without and nearest to the water supply. When excavations are made in the enclosed areas indubitable evidences are found of their former occupancy, not only as places of safety in times of peril, but as encampments, or rather as village sites or residences during very long periods. In nearly all these works are found collections of rough angular stones of sizes convenient for hurling at assaulting foes. Weapons and implements or utensils of stone, bone and terra cotta are also found; but rarely is a trace to be seen of metallic weapons or tools, and when such are found they are usually near the surface, while the others are at depths varying from six to eighteen inches.

All these circumstances are indications of the great antiquity of these works. They show not only that the works were occupied at a period anterior to the discovery of the use of metals by their occupants, but that since their abandonment sufficient time has elapsed for six inches of mould to accumulate by the slow process of growth and decay of vegetable matter in dry situations. The statement may therefore be credited that trees having seven hundred years of age were found growing on these works, and these perhaps had been preceded there by others.

In the vicinity of these works burial places are almost always found. These are of two kinds. In one the graves are isolated; and with the skeletons which they contain are found the remains of such treasures as the Indians of later times were in the habit of burying with their dead. The other kind of cemeteries are sometimes termed "bone pits" and in these immense quantities of human ossements are found, which appear to have been deposited without regard to order, and among which implements, weapons or trinkets are very rarely found. By some these are supposed to be the remains of those who have fallen in battle, and to indicate that a sanguinary conflict took place near the locality where they are found. A perusal of Parkman's account of the "feast of the dead," as witnessed and described by the earliest Jesuit missionaries among the American Indians, will place the origin of these collections of human remains beyond a question, and fully explain the peculiar appearances which they present.

About a mile above Scranton, near Providence, was found a mound which was probably an ancient place of sepulture. It was the only burial mound found in this region; and it is a matter of interest because it shows that this is not the eastern limit of the region where sepulchral mounds are found. This mound was simple in its construction, and excavations made in it nearly a century since brought to light a quantity of game arrow points, stone implements and ornaments of very great variety, a copper kettle and many broken specimens of the fictile art. Two phalanges of a finger found at this mound twenty years since by Dr. Hollister, in whose possession they still are, and the copper kettle found there before, indicate that this was used as a burial place at a period subsequent to the occupancy of the fortifications in Wyoming valley.

In the vicinity of these ancient works are usually found evidences of many camping places, or village sites; as though the fortifications were used as places of refuge in times of danger by those who at different times occupied those sites. The relics found where these villages or camps were are of a character identical with those within the fortifications; but among them, though generally nearer the surface, are found those of a later period.

The Indians who inhabited the country at the time of its discovery by the whites had no knowledge of the uses of these works, and no traditions concerning those who constructed them; hence some have inferred that the forefathers of these Indians succeeded, or, perhaps, drove away or exterminated these people. When we consider the facility with which the knowledge of historic events dies out among savages who have no written language, it will not be a matter of wonder that all knowledge of these works should pass into oblivion, even among the descendants of those who constructed them.

Time has effaced the history of the people who erected some of the most stupendous monuments of antiquity—cities are in ruins, or are buried in the earth and no record remains of the people who built or inhabited them; arts are lost to the descendants of those among whom they flourished, and the interpretation of the records which remain in the written language of ancient people is now hypothetical. If those who reared monuments, built cities, cultivated arts and had written languages, have become the prey of oblivion, how much more readily will the people be forgotten who, like the Indians of this country, have no written language, and no ambition to perpetuate their memory, and who leave only the rude arrow on the hillside, the emblem of their pursuits, and the ruder pipe, vessel or trinket, buried with their bones—the record at once of their existence and their superstition.

In the valley of the Susquehanna, and especially in the vicinity of the works spoken of, have been found many relics which seem to indicate that almost all portions of its area have at different times been occupied for encampments or villages. Large collections of these relics have been made, as before stated, by Messrs. Jenkins and Hollister. Among these may be found a great number and every variety of flint arrow points. These are the most common relics of the stone period, for they are found on every sandy plain in America. They are of various sizes and fashions, to adapt them to different uses. They are usually manufactured from flint, agate, cornelian and other native pebbles, and are worked with such skill as to excite admiration and surprise. Recently Mr. F. H. Cushing, of the Smithsonian Institution, has demonstrated the method by which this work was accomplished, and has been able to manufacture these weapons with all the peculiarities that those which are found in Europe or America possess.

The most common form of these arrow heads is that of an elongated triangle with a stem in the middle of the shortest side, and a barb on each side of the stem. These could be thrown into a victim and withdrawn with the shaft, but those which were shaped like a myrtle leaf were attached to their shafts in such a way that on withdrawing the shaft the stone point remained to prove a source of irritation and death. The varieties of this weapon are very great, but they can with propriety be placed in the two classes of peace and war arrow heads, or such as could and those which could not be withdrawn from the deep wounds which they made. The former were used in hunting. Some were delicately constructed and exquisitely finished for killing small game or fish. Some were serrated, barbed and stemmed. Sometimes they are found white as snow, but usually they are made of dark colored hornstone. Spear heads, some of which are eight inches in length, and of every size, color and finish, have, as well as arrow points, been accumulating in these collections during thirty or forty years. Bone, clay, shell and copper utensils are not found in these collections in abundance; but the stone implements used by the red men in peace or in war, such as tomahawks, death mauls, stone picks, hammers, hoes, axes, mortars, pestles, celts or hatchets, gouges, quoits, chunkee stones, sling stones, scalping stones, amulets, terra cotta and stone pipes, polished tubes, triune cups, triune pipes, beads, wampum, fictilia, whistles for signals in the forests, corn pounders, ornamented rings and other ornamental devices, highly polished stones for grinding war paint, stones for recording time, healing the sick and warding off diseases, stone implements for tilling the soil, and hundreds of other contrivances of Indian life have found a place in these collections. Many of these articles were broken while in use, but so complete are these collections in archæological specimens, and so thoroughly do they represent this region, that the "impulse, religion and habits of the tribes once living here can be traced with almost the fidelity and interest of written history."

CHAPTER II.

OPENING OF THE HISTORIC PERIOD—THE INDIANS OF WYOMING.

THE history of the Indian residents of Wyoming and its vicinity, so far as known to us, furnishes but little of interest or importance. While we have, from the general history of the Indians of the country, glimpses of a tribe or nation that once had their seat of power in this locality, who were warred upon by surrounding tribes or nations until they were driven out, yet of their local history here but little or nothing is known. Writers upon the subject of Indian history have none of them given us more than a mere reference to them while treating of their neighbors. From what can be gathered it would seem that between the Five (and subsequently Six) Nations or confederate tribes of the north, called the Iroquois—the southern gate of whose territory was at Tioga Point—and the Susquehannocks, who ruled over the territory southeast of the Kittatinny or Blue Hills, the whole of that vast region was inhabited and ruled over by a nation of natives known as the Candastogas.

All of these nations were powerful and warlike, but the Iroquois were by far the most restless and enterprising. Governor Dongan in his report on the Province of New York in 1687 says: "The Five Nations are the most warlike people in America. They are a bulwark between us and the French and all other Indians. They go as far as the South Sea, the northwest passage and Florida to war. They are so considerable that all the Indians in those parts of America are tributary to them;" and he further speaks of them as "the nations that conquered the Susquehannas."

Still earlier than this we have some slight account of some Indians living possibly within the territory of old Wyoming—possibly not. It appears from an account given by Stephen Brule, a Frenchman, that he passed from Canada through the country of the Iroquois in 1615, and reached the principal town of a tribe of Indians, whom he calls Carantouans, where he and his party were received with kindness. He spent the winter with them in visiting neighboring tribes, and in the spring of 1616 descended the Susquehanna to the sea. His account says "he returned to Carantouan and attempted to return to Canada, but was captured by the Iroquois, and was unable to meet Champlain, with whom he had set out from Canada, until in 1619." He made report of this tribe of Indians to Champlain, who, in his map of the country explored by himself and Brule, gives up the whole region of country south of the Iroquois to that people, but fails to fix the location of any of their towns at any point on the Susquehanna. Rev. Mr. Craft, author of the History of Bradford County, is well satisfied that their town, at least their chief town, if they had more than one, was at the mouth of Sugar creek, in that county.

Champlain says: "The Antouhonorons are fifteen villages near the River St. Lawrence. The Carantouanis is a nation south of the Antouhonorons, only three days distant. They formerly took prisoners from the Dutch, whom they sent back without injury, believing them to be French."

From this it would appear that the Carantouanis could hardly have lived as far south as Pennsylvania, and if in that State at all, must have been upon its extreme northern border. It appears clearly that they were no part of the Six Nations. Champlain, in his report on the explorations made by himself and the members of his party, attaches a map of the country explored, extended somewhat on the basis of information obtained from the Indians. In this map he further complicates the question of the location of the Carantouanis by placing their towns on both sides of the Delaware river, instead of on the Susquehanna. The latter river is entirely wanting in the map.

The fact is, that while the French early in the 17th century explored the whole region of the St. Lawrence and the lakes and on through to the Mississippi river, and the English surveyed the coast, the mouths of the rivers and the bays, very little or nothing was known by either the French or the English of the interior, the region of the Susquehanna and its tributaries, until a century later. No explorer had penetrated its mountain fastnesses, or threaded its rapid streams. The whole region was a terra incognita to white people, an uninhabited and unbroken wilderness, a hunting ground, or a vast forest waste, traversed by Indian braves in their predatory incursions for plunder or war. While it might be interesting to know more of the early history of the territory drained by the Susquehanna and its tributaries, as well as of the people who inhabited it, we must content ourselves with what we have. The question naturally arises, What more do we know of these Carantouanis? Were they a large and powerful nation, occupying the vast territory lying between the country of the Iroquois and the sea, or were they only a small remnant of some nation, taking their name from their town, location, or some incident connected therewith? We have no method of solving these questions satisfactorily now. Conjecture is all that is left us in the absence of that full and exact information so much to be desired. There is no doubt that the name was neither national nor tribal, but a town or local one. The mention of "visiting neighboring tribes," would indicate that they occupied but a small extent of territory; and their "going down to the sea" in winter, that they lived not far from it, a feat very difficult, if not impossible, by way of the Susquehanna, in winter. They may have been and most probably were a remnant of the great Candastoga nation.

It remains now to give some account of the Susquehannocks, at as early a day as we can get any information of importance upon the subject. Alsop wrote of them in 1666 as follows:

"The Susquehannocks are a people looked upon by the Christian Inhabitants as the most Noble and Heroic Nation of Indians that dwell upon the Confines of America. Also are so allowed and looked upon by the rest of the Indians by a submissive and tributary acknowledgment, being a people cast into the mould of a most large and warlike deportment, the men being for the most part seven foot high in latitude, and in magnitude and bulk suitable to so high a pitch; then voyce large and hollow, as ascending out of a Cave; their gait and behavior staid, stately and majestic, treading on the Earth with as much pride, contempt and disdain to so sordid a Center as can be imagined from a creature derived from the same mould and Earth.

"These Susquehannock Indians are for the most part great Warriors, and seldom sleep one Summer in the quiet arms of a peaceable Rest, but keep, by their present power as well as by their former conquest, the several Nations of Indians round about them in a forceable obedience and subjection.

"Their government is an Anarchy. He that fights best carries it. *

* * * They now and then feed on the carcasses of their enemies.

"They intomb the ruins of their deceased conquest in no other Sepulchre than their unsanctified maws.

"They are situated a hundred and odd miles distant from the Christian Plantations of Mary-Land, at the head [mouth?] of a river that runs into the Bay of Chesapeake, called by their own name the Susquehannock River, where they remain and inhabit most part of the Summer time, and seldom remove far from it, unless it be to subdue any Foreign Rebellion.

"About November the best Hunters draw off to several remote places of the Woods, where they know the Deer, Bear and Elke useth. There they build several cottages, where they remain for the space of three months."

Smith, in his history of his voyage, speaks of the Susquehannocks as "giants," "their language sounding like a voyce in a vault." He says: "They can make near 600 able bodied men, and are palisadoed in their townes to defend them from the Massawomekes, their mortal enemies."

Campanius says: "They live on a high mountain, very steep and difficult to climb, where they have a fort, or square building surrounded with palisades. This fort or town is about twelve miles from New Sweden."

We have thus gone over the history of the Indian nations or tribes that inhabited or were found connected with the early history of Wyoming and the adjacent country, and it remains for us now to come down to the period when the white man commenced to mingle his history with that of the Indian in that locality.

In 1737 Conrad Weiser, an Indian interpreter residing at Tulpehocken, in Pennsylvania, at the request of Governor Gooch, of Virginia, was sent by the provincial government of Pennsylvania to meet a council of the Six Nations, to be held at Onondaga, for the purpose of "establishing the peace between the allied Six Nations at the north and the so-called Cherokees and Cataubas at the south." He left home on his mission on the 27th of February, proceeded to the Susquehanna river, which he crossed at Shamokin, and thence by way of the west branch to his destination. After accomplishing his mission he returned home by way of the east branch of the Susquehanna, and arrived at Wyoming on the 26th of April. His entry in his journal reads as follows:

"The 26th we reached Scahantowano, where a number of Indians live, Shawanos and Mahickanders. Found there two traders from New York, and three men from the Maqua country, who were hunting land. Their names are Ludwig Rasselman, Martin Dillenbach and Pit de Niger. Here there is a large body of land, the like of which is not to be found on the river."

We are here introduced to two other tribes of Indians, remnants of nations. The Shawanos, as described by Zinzendorf and Brainard, missionaries among them, were a "ferocious, untamable and vicious people, unmoved by either sympathy or affection, and constantly bent on mischief." They were a southern nation, whose early history is involved in the deepest obscurity, and whose language bore no affinity to that of any of the surrounding nations. They were warlike, brave and energetic, and have ever retained their national character and name, being to-day a distinct people among the Indians of America. They came from the Potomac, or near there, to Wyoming in 1728, where they seemed to live in independence, and preserve all their peculiar characteristics.

The Mahicans or Mohegans were the remnants of a great nation, which had their homes and seat of power on the Thames or Pequot river, in Connecticut. Those living on the east of the river were known by the name of Pequots; those on the west as Mohegans. Upon the advance of the whites in their progress westward, the Indians were compelled to give way, and a part of this great nation sought a home at Stockbridge, Mass., a part at Shecomico, on the Hudson, and a part at Wyoming. They are described by Miss Calkins, the historian of New London, as "exceedingly fierce, warlike and crafty." The exact date of their advent into the valley of Wyoming is not known, but it is supposed they arrived there about the same time with the Shawanos, and may have been there a short time before them. They resided in the upper part of the valley, on the west side, while the Shawanos occupied the lower part of the valley, on the same side.

In 1742 the Delaware Indians, a vassal nation of the Iroquois, in consequence of their selling land and otherwise taking upon themselves the rights of a free and independent nation, were called to an account by the Iroquois, and on proof and confession of guilt were severely reprimanded and transferred from their former seat and planted at Wyoming. This was at one time one of the great nations into which the natives had been divided; but in consequence of their warlike spirit, and the incessant wars in which they were involved with surrounding nations, they became greatly reduced in numbers and strength, and were finally conquered by the Iroquois, and to keep them in subjection were reduced to the condition of vassals or slaves to their conquerors; "made women of" as one of the orators expressed it.

In a few years after the planting of the Delawares at Wyoming, in 1748, the Nanticokes, a tide water people, a small member of the Algonquin family, having their seat when the Europeans first met them on the eastern shore of the Chesapeake, in Maryland, made their way to Wyoming, following the course of the Susquehanna. They located at the lower end of the valley, on the east side, principally, and the place was called from them Nanticoke. There were about eighty of them, under a chief Ullunckquam. A few of them went on up the river and settled on the Chenango, whither the others followed in 1757.

There were other tribes or remnants of tribes of Indians neighbors to Wyoming, whose names are connected with her history, but no organized body or considerable number of them ever inhabited there. These were known as Mingoos, Ganaways or Conoys, Turkeys, Turtles or Tuteloos, and Minsies or Minisinks and Muncies.

It will thus be seen that from the time the Iroquois conquered and drove out the Candastogas, Wyoming and its region around about, particularly on the Susquehanna, was used as a penal colony or place of banishment for the remnants of tribes which the Iroquois conquered in their raids upon neighboring and even distant tribes in their predatory excursions, and a place of refuge for those who sought their favor and protecting care. It was so used when the white man first trod its soil, and so continued in part for many years.

No sooner had the white man become acquainted with Wyoming than it became the object of his deep solicitude. While one saw in it a place of trade, with great profit, another saw in it a place to propagate the gospel free from the fetters and restraints that bind and control nations that already have fixed establishments of trade and religion. Trade was opened here in 1737 or sooner, and in 1741 Rev. John Sergeant, of the Indian mission school at Stockbridge, Mass., came to Wyoming, accompanied by some Mohegans, to preach the gospel to the few of that nation and the Shawanos at that point. They were not favorably received, and after making known his mission and preaching a short sermon, "he offered to instruct them further in the Christian religion, but they rejected his offer with disdain. They reproached Christianity. They told him the traders would lie, cheat, and debauch their women, and even their wives, if their husbands were not at home. They said further that the Senecas had given them their country, but charged them withal never to receive Christianity from the English." Mr. Sergeant returned home without pressing the subject further upon their attention.

In the fall of the next year Nicholas Lewis, Count Von Zinzendorf, after he had been but nine months in the country, set out on a mission to the Indians at Shamokin, and particularly to the Shawanese at Wyoming, where he arrived on the 13th of October. His reception was anything but friendly. The Shawanese were suspicious of the object of his visit among them. He had pitched his tent at a point where it was said a mine of silver ore was located. They suspected that to be the true object of his mission, and as they had made known to Mr. Sergeant the year before that they did not want to receive Christianity, they strongly suspected his purpose to be other than that which he professed. Painted with red and black, each with a large knife in his hand, which was brandished in a threatening manner, they came in crowds around the tent, again and again wakening fearful echoes with their wild whoops and halloos.

One fine sunny day, as the disciple sat on the ground within his tent, looking over his papers that lay scattered around him, and as the rest of his party were outside, Mack, his companion and attendant, observed two blowing or hissing adders basking at the edge of the tent. Fearing they might crawl in he moved toward them, intending to dispatch them. They were, however, too quick for him. They slipped into the tent, and gliding over the disciple's thigh disappeared among his papers. On examination it was found that the count had been sitting near the mouth of their den. He wrote some verses in commemoration of this incident. The Indians, in all such cases over superstitious, saw a protecting power exercised in behalf of the disciple in this event, and became somewhat more tractable and disposed to have communication with him; but they had made up their mind that the white man was bad generally, and they did not want any of his religion. He left the valley in the early part of November, and arrived in Bethlehem, by way of Shamokin, on the 8th of the month. He did not feel sufficiently encouraged to repeat his visit.

On the 2nd of October, 1744, Rev. David Brainard, an Indian missionary, making his home about the forks of the Delaware, or just above, set out on a mission to the Indians on the Susquehanna. On the 5th of October he says: "We reached the Susquehanna river at a place called Opeholhaupung or Wapwallopen, and found there twelve Indian houses. After I had saluted the king in a friendly manner, I told him my business, and that my desire was to teach them Christianity. After some consultation the Indians gathered and I preached to them." They appeared willing to be taught and he preached to them several times. On the 9th of October he set out on his journey home. He preached to the Indians on the 5th, 6th and 8th. It is said by some that on this journey he made a call at Wyoming, but it is quite evident from his journal, which does not mention that as having been the case, that he did not visit Wyoming, his time being fully taken up at Opeholhaupung. He afterward visited Shamokin and the Juniata, but never visited Wyoming.

Nothing more is known of the Indians in Wyoming until in 1753. In that year about three hundred persons in Connecticut, "being desirous to enlarge his Majesty's English settlements in North America, and further to spread Christianity—as also to promote their own temporal interests," agreed, through a committee, "to repair to a certain tract of land lying on the Susquehanna river, at or near a place called Chi-wau-muck, in order to view said tract of land and to purchase of the natives there inhabiting their title and interest to said tract of land," &c.

In pursuance of this agreement the committee appointed proceeded to Wyoming in the fall of that year, examined the lands, and had a talk with the Indians inhabiting there. They learned from them that they were not the owners of the land, but that it belonged to the Six Nations, and they were occupying it at the will and sufferance of those nations; and consequently the committee returned without negotiating a purchase. About this time the British government, on account of the troubles existing and growing between them and France, were turning their attention to the Indians of this locality, but particularly the Six Nations. "At Albany, on the 19th day of June, 1754, assembled the memorable congress of commissioners from every colony north of the Potomac. The Virginia government, too, was represented by the presiding officer, Delancey, the lieutenant-governor of New York. They met to concert measures of defence, and to treat with the Six Nations and the tribes in the alliance." It was at this council that the representatives of the promoters of a settlement at Wyoming, now numbering about nine hundred persons, on the 11th day of July, 1754, perfected a purchase and obtained from the Six Nations a deed for the coveted lands at Wyoming—the boundaries of which are thus set forth: "Beginning from the one and fortieth degree of north latitude, at ten miles east of the Susquehanna river, and from thence with a northward line ten miles east of the river to the end of the forty-second or beginning of the forty-third degree of north latitude; and so to extend west two degrees of longitude, one hundred and twenty miles, and from thence south to the beginning of the forty second degree, and from thence east to the above mentioned boundary, which is ten miles east of the Susquehanna river." The commissioners of Pennsylvania, while at Albany, succeeded on the 6th of July in getting the Indians to execute a deed to them for a tract of land between the Blue Mountain and the forks of the Susquehanna river at Shamokin.

The Connecticut people in 1755, the next year after their purchase, sent a party of surveyors on under the charge of John Jenkins to make a survey of their purchase. In consequence, however, of the war between the British and French, in which the Indians had been induced to take sides with the one party or the other, numerous parties of hostile Indians were passing and re-passing through the valley, up and down and to and fro, so that it was dangerous to pursue the work; and after taking the latitude and longitude, and making an examination of the country, the party returned home to await the issue of the pending hostilities before proceeding with the project of settlement. So numerous were these parties that the attention of the authorities was directed toward their movements during this year, and a map of the country was made, on which were located the Indian paths and places of rendezvous through and from which they were supposed to sally forth on their work of blood and destruction; the following note, dated March 14th, 1756, accompanying the maps:

"Great Swamp lies about 40 miles W. S. W. from Cashuetunk, or Station Point; from Bethlehem about 45 miles N. N. W.; from Gnadenhutten about 23 miles N. something W. This swamp lies just over the mountains which Evans calls Cashuetunk Mountains, and is 25 miles from N. to S., and 15 from E. to W. The Bethlehem people say four or five hundred Indians keep in this swamp, and from thence 'tis imagined they send out parties to destroy the settlements. Shamokin lies on Susquehanna river, at the mouth of the east branch, on the east side of the branch. Nescopeck, the next Indian town on the east side of the same branch, is twenty-five miles from thence. Opolopong is another, five miles distant. Wyoming is on the west side of the same branch, ten miles from Opolopong. Matchasaug is on the east side of the same branch, distant from Wyoming thirteen miles. Solocka is six miles from thence, on a creek that comes out of the Great Swamp, and this place is distant from the swamp eighteen miles; thence to Canowdowsa, on the E. side of E. branch, is five miles. From thence to Owegy, the next Indian settlement, is forty-seven miles; from thence to Osewingo is eighteen miles, and from thence there are no Indian towns on the E. branch of Susquehanna, according to Evans, until you come to Onochgerage [now Windsor, Broome county, N. Y.] distant from Osewingo twelve miles. The Great Swamp is forty-two miles S. from Onochgerage; and 'tis remarkable that the situation of all these Indian towns is such as renders it highly probable that they rendezvous at the Great Swamp, as the highest part of it is but sixteen miles distant from the east branch, and 'tis not but about sixty-five miles from Shamokin to the highest part of the swamp, and almost all the way by water through the east branch. This swamp, and the Indian towns on the E. branch of the Susquehanna, should be attacked at the same time, and the parties that attack the latter should go strong, as they may possibly meet the enemy flying from the swamp to their settlements, for their own and the safety of their wives and children."

The hostile temper and situation of the Indians in and about Wyoming began at this time to become a matter of serious alarm, and efforts were made by the Pennsylvania authorities to acquire their friendship and bring them into alliance on terms of mutual protection. On the 8th of November, 1756, the different Indian tribes, represented by their chiefs and principal warriors, met Governor Dennie at Easton, where a council was opened in a dignified and friendly manner.

Teedyuscung, the Delaware chief, a lusty, raw-boned Indian, haughty and very desirous of respect and command, who had been accompanied from Wyoming by most of his principal warriors, assumed the part of chief speaker. He supported the rights and claims of the Indians, and detailed their grievances with great spirit and dignity; but assured the council that the Indians were glad to meet the English as friends, and to smoke the pipe of peace with them, and hoped that justice would be done to them for all the injuries they had received. Governor Dennie assured the Indians that he was happy to meet them as friends, and would endeavor to do them full justice for all the wrongs they had suffered, and prevent future injuries. This council continued in session nine days. All matters of difference were considered, and the Delawares and Shawnese, the principal tribes present, became reconciled to the English, with whom they concluded a treaty of peace. This gave peace to Wyoming, which continued until the close of the French war in 1763.

No means were neglected to regain the friendship and co-operation of the Six Nations, and presents having been liberally distributed, a grand council of all the Indian tribes was held by special invitation, at Easton, in October, 1758. The governors of Pennsylvania and New Jersey and Sir William Johnson were present, with other eminent citizens; Teedyuscung attended. On the way he fell in with the chief who had commanded the expedition against Gnadenhutten and Fort Allen. High words arose between them, when Teedyuscung raised his hatchet and laid the chief dead at his feet. At the conference Teedyuscung took a decided lead in the debate on the side of peace. The conference last fourteen days, and all causes of misunderstanding being removed a general peace was concluded on the 26th of October.

Peace now seemed to be fully assured between the colonists and the Indians, but the Indian nature is such that it is peace with them only when peace prevails, and when there is war they must have a hand in. Scenes of blood and plunder were the delight of their souls, and when an opportunity offered for them to take part in such scenes it was quite impossible to restrain them from doing so. They were fond of receiving presents, and were constantly seeking and bringing forward some excuse on which to demand them of the whites. The most prolific source of complaint on their part toward the whites on which to base a claim for presents was a pretended misunderstanding of the boundaries of the grants of land which they had made, though it must be confessed that their complaints were too frequently well founded. They were fond, too, of treaties and the feast that attended them, particularly the abundant supply of intoxicating drink that was furnished at the close, which they drank with great voracity, guzzling it down as long as they were able to stand.

About this time a new interest was awakened among the Moravians and Quakers upon the subject of religion among the Indians. Papoonhank, a Monsey chief, founder of the Indian town of Wyalusing, in his intercourse with the whites had learned something of their religion; and after a visit to Philadelphia, where he had been kindly and fairly treated by the Quakers, and been impressed strongly by their brotherly affection and kindness, on his return home set to work to impress his people with the importance of their becoming a Christian people, and especially that they should become sober and industrious if they would be prosperous and happy. His work did not bring forth rich fruits, although it laid the foundation for important results.

In May, 1760, Christian Frederick Post, a Polish Prussian by birth and the most adventurous of Moravian missionaries, when on his way to a grand council of the western Indians spent a night at Papoonhank's village and preached to the Indians there. This was on the 20th of May, and was probably the first sermon preached by a white man in that locality. While Papoonhank was pleased at the visit and the opportunity afforded his people for hearing the gospel, owing to a diversity of view among them as to who should bring the gospel to them, some being Moravians, but most favoring the Quakers, the sermon served rather to unsettle than to settle their views upon the subject. While Papoonhank himself favored the Quakers, Job Chilway, a native of the country about Little Egg Harbor, an intelligent and influential Indian, whose wife was a sister to Nathaniel and Anthony, two Moravian converts residing a little below Tunkhannock, favored the Moravians.

This unsettled condition of affairs lasted for some time without being resolved, and was the subject of much earnest reflection and debate. At length the brethren at Bethlehem despatched Zeisberger, an eminent and zealous missionary, to the town to ascertain the prospect for introducing the gospel there. Accompanied by Anthony he reached the town on the evening of the 23d of May, 1763. Papoonhank received them in his lodge, and thither his people flocked to hear the gospel. They continued here until the 27th, when they set out for Bethlehem, bearing to the brethren the earnest and cordial invitation from the whole town that they would speedily send a religious teacher to reside among them.

On the 10th of June Zeisberger returned again, taking

Nathaniel with him, arriving at Wyalusing on the evening of the 17th, and was welcomed by Papoonhank and his people. On the 26th Papoonhank was baptized and named John. In the evening another Indian was baptized and named Peter. These were the first who were subjects of that ordinance in this region. On the 27th, by invitation, he visited Tawandamunk and preached to the Indians there. Here an awaking took place and the gospel was received with eagerness.

But the good work was interrupted. On the 30th a runner arrived with a letter from Bethlehem recalling Zeisberger. He obeyed with reluctance.

The war that had been prevailing for some years in other quarters began to develop itself along the frontier settlements of Pennsylvania, particularly along the Susquehanna; and the whites and their Indian friends were compelled to seek safety in the more populous regions and abandon their frontier homes.

About the time of Zeisberger's first visit John Woolman, of Burlington county, N. J., a tailor by trade and a Quaker by religion, zealous for the welfare of suffering and perishing humanity, had as he says, "for many years felt a love in his heart toward the natives of this land who dwelt far back in the wilderness;" and being at Philadelphia "in the 8th month," 1761, he fell in company with some of those natives who lived on the east branch of the Susquehanna, "at an Indian town called Wehaloosing," two hundred miles from Philadelphia. In conversation with them through an interpreter, as also by observation, he believed them measurably acquainted with the divine power. At times he felt inward drawings toward a visit to that place. An Indian and three women from beyond that place being in Philadelphia, he visited them in the 5th month, 1763, and with concurrence of friends in that place, agreed to join with them as companions on their return. On the 7th of 6th month they met at Samuel Foulks's, at Richland, in Bucks county.

After taking leave of his family and friends, he set out on his journey. At Burlington he was joined by Israel and John Pemberton, who accompanied him that day. Next morning Israel left him, and he and John proceeded to Foulks's. Here Benjamin Parvin joined them, and after William Lightfoot, of Pikeland, and they traveled together to Bethlehem.

On the 10th of June they set out early in the morning. They met on the way several Indians, men and women, with a cow and a horse and some household goods, who were lately come from their dwelling at Wyoming.

On the 13th they reached the Indian settlement at Wyoming. About midnight before they got there an Indian runner came down from a town about ten miles above Wehaloosing and brought news that some Indian warriors from distant parts had come to that town with two English scalps, and told the people that it was war with the English. Hearing the news brought by the Indian warriors, and being told by the Indians where they lodged that what Indians were about Wyoming expected to move in a few days to some larger towns, he thought it dangerous traveling at that time.

On the 14th he sought out and visited all the Indians that they could meet with in Wyoming, they being chiefly in one place, about a mile from where they lodged—in all perhaps twenty. Some of them understood English and were kind and friendly. He set out and went up the river about three miles, to the house of an Indian named Jacob January, who had killed his dog, and the women were making store of bread and preparing to move up the river. Here he put his baggage in a canoe, which some of his party pushed slowly up the stream, and the rest rode on horses, which they swam across a creek called Lahawahamunk, above which they pitched their tent.

On the 16th he fell in with Job Chilaway, an Indian from Wehaloosing. Job told him that an Indian came to their town and told them that three warriors, coming from a distance, had lodged in a town above Wehaloosing a few nights past, who were going against the English at Juniata. Job was going down the river to the province store at Shamokin. On the 17th he reached Wehaloosing about the middle of the afternoon. He says:

"The first Indian we saw was a woman of a modest countenance, with a babe. She first spoke to our guide, and then, with a harmonious voice, expressed her gladness at seeing us; having heard beforehand of our coming. Then by direction of our guide we sat down on a log, and he went to the town to tell the people we were come. Sitting thus together the poor woman came and sat near us. After a while we heard a conch shell blow several times, and then came John Curtis and another Indian man, who kindly invited us into a house near the town, where we found, I suppose, about sixty people sitting in silence. After sitting a short time I stood up and in some tenderness of spirit acquainted them with the nature of my visit, and that a concern for their good had made me willing to come thus far to see them. Then I showed them my certificate, which was explained to them, and the Moravino Zeisberger, who overtook us on the way, being now here, bade me welcome."

The next morning they had another meeting, at which both Woolman and Zeisberger spoke, and Woolman says: "Our meeting ended with a degree of divine love. I observed Papunchang speak to one of the interpreters, and I was afterward told that he said, 'I love to feel where words come from.'"

On the 21st, after a very interesting visit, he set out to return home. He thus speaks of the town: "This town, Wehaloosing, stands on the bank of the Susquehanna river, and consists, I believe, of about forty houses, mostly compact together; some about thirty feet long and eighteen wide, some bigger, some less; mostly built of split plank, one end set in the ground and the other pinned to a plate, on which lay rafters, and covered with bark."

Seven Indians accompanied him on his return, some in canoes and some on horseback, and at night they arrived below a branch called Tunkhannah. On the 22nd they reached Wyoming, and understood that the Indians had mostly gone from the place. The next day they loaded their baggage, etc., on their horses, and started across the mountain toward Fort Allen, and thence down the Lehigh, and arrived at Bethlehem on the 25th; on the 26th started for home, which he reached on the 27th, finding all well.

Zeisberger paid his first visit to the Indians in the capacity of an envoy on the part of Sir William Johnson and Governor Hamilton, specially to Teedyuscung. On the 16th of March, 1762, he left Christiansbrunn on horseback, and by nightfall reached the north part of the Blue Mountains, where he found a large encampment of Delawares and Nanticokes. His heart was strangely stirred as he sat again by a camp fire in the wilderness, with members of that race around him to convert whom was the exalted mission of his life.

The next morning he proceeded on his journey, taking with him one of the Delawares as a guide, for the whole country was covered with deep snow. After three days of hard and perilous riding in forest obstructed by great drifts, through snow banks from which it was almost impossible to extricate the horses, and in "weather," says Zeisberger, "the severest I ever knew," he arrived at the lodge of Teedyuscung. Having delivered his letters he turned his attention to the converts of Wyoming. The most of them had not heard the gospel preached since the breaking out of the war. More than one backslider was reclaimed, among them George Rex, who, on the occasion of a subsequent visit to Nain, was readmitted to the church. On the 24th he returned to Bethlehem, and thence went to Philadelphia with the answer of Teedyuscung.

Near the close of autumn he visited Wyoming again, accompanied by Gottlob Senseman. The dysentery was raging in the valley, and many Indians were prostrated. Among them was Abraham, the first convert. He had sent an urgent request to Bethlehem: "Brethren, let a teacher come to see me ere I die!" But the teacher came too late; the aged Mahican had finished his course. With his dying breath he had exhorted the Indians to remain faithful to Jesus.

In the same spirit George Rex passed away, admonishing his people to avoid his evil example, and professing a sure hope of eternal life. Zeisberger spent several days in comforting the sick, and a new interest was awakened among all the scattered converts of the valley.

In May of the year 1763, as we have narrated, Zeisberger again visited Wyoming to preach to the few nations who were still in the valley, now grown to be few indeed. Among them Teedyuscung no longer had a place.

On the night of the 19th of April, while lying intoxicated in his lodge, it was set on fire, and he perished in the flames. This was no doubt the cruel work of the Iroquois warriors, whom he had offended by his proud bearing at the colonial treaties at Easton.

Thus, by the death of their chief Abraham, the Mahicans, and by the death of Teedyuscung the Delawares, were bereft of their leaders and were broken up at Wyoming. The Nanticokes some time before had moved up into the State of New York, on the Chenango and Chemung rivers, and the Shawanese as a body had joined their brethren in the west, and Wyoming was left with only a few wandering Indians, making no pretence to anything like an organized or even homogeneous body. Its Indian history therefore ends at this point, and a few words in reference to the Wyalusing mission, and one or two other matters, and this portion of the work is complete.

Notwithstanding the numerous treaties of peace and the earnest efforts made to keep the Indians in friendly relations, yet murders and the usual horrors of Indian warfare were constantly occurring on the frontier, and hence the inhabitants became deeply exasperated and vowed vengeance against all Indians without discrimination. They had sought out the guilty parties and demanded them from the Indians, but their guilt was denied, their surrender refused, and no punishment was dealt out to them. The Moravian brethren, becoming aware of the feelings of the people, sought to protect the converts at their mission stations, particularly those at Wyalusing, from the impending wrath; and to that end assembled them at Bethlehem and Nazareth, whence they were removed to the neighborhood of Philadelphia for greater safety, and camped on Province island, where they were fed and sheltered at the expense of the Pennsylvania government. "Here they remained for fifteen months, suffering untold hardships, insulted and reviled by mobs, decimated by disease, scorned alike by whites and Indians, a gazing stock both by reproaches and afflictions, yet they continued steadfast in their faith." After having borne nearly one-half their number to the potter's field, the remainder, eighty-three in all, left Philadelphia March 20th, 1765, and in pursuance of intercession and arrangements made in their behalf were permitted to locate again at Wyalusing. This was a favored and favorite locality. Here lay rich hunting grounds in their original wildness, while sufficient land was cleared to afford them corn patches for immediate use. It was situated on the Susquehanna, a stream abounding in the choicest fish, and was on the great pathway between the North and South and East and West.

"In the freedom of their forest homes and the hunting grounds of their fathers, hopeful for the future, guided and encouraged by their teachers, their hearts were filled with gratitude and joy. The new town which came into existence rang with the melody of praise, even while it was being built.

"On the 4th of June the Indians began to erect dwellings, and at the end of the month had completed four log cabins and thirty bark-covered huts. In September, at the close of the summer hunt, a commodious meeting-house and a mission-house fifteen feet square, built of unhewn logs, were erected. At the close of the year there were connected with the mission one hundred and forty-six souls, of whom thirty-three were communicants."—Craft.

This mission increased and flourished with varied success; now disturbed by rivalry between the various Indian chiefs, and now by conflicting views as to the doctrines taught, and again by the favor or disfavor with which the various teachers sent there were received. Added to this was the stubborn fact that a life devoted to labor and the cultivation of the earth, and the restraints imposed by a settled, regulated society, were not suited to the Indian nature; and we will not be astonished to learn that in the spring of 1772 the mission of Friedenshuetten, at Wyalusing, was abandoned, and those who had remained faithful to it migrated under the directions of their spiritual teachers to the west, settling at Schonbrunn, in the Tuscarawas valley, on the Muskingum, in Ohio. Early on the morning of the 11th of June, 1772, they met in their chapel for the last time for religious worship, when they commended themselves to the keeping and guidance of God, asking him to supply their wants, that they might perish not by the way.

"A few years since there was a feeble remnant of Christian Indians, ministered to by Moravians, dwelling at New Fairfield, Canada, and Westfield, Kansas. In the veins of some of these there flows the blood of the Mahicans and Delawares of old Friedenshuetten, the 'deserted village' of the plains of Wyalusing."

A monument to mark the site of this Indian mission, bearing fitting inscriptions, was erected under the auspices of the Moravian Historical Society, and dedicated with appropriate services on the site of the mission and at the Presbyterian church at Wyalusing, June 14th and 15th, 1871. This monument is thirteen feet high, and bears the following inscriptions:

On the northern face—

"To mark the site of Friedenshuetten (M'chwihilusing), a settlement of Moravian Indians between 1765 and 1772."

On the eastern face—

"This stone was erected on the 15th June, in the year of Redemption 1871, by members of the Moravian Historical Society."

While this mission at Wyalusing was more than ordinarily successful, it was not that complete success which its founders had hoped and anticipated. It was all, however, that a careful study of the Indian character would have led them to expect. The Indian, by nature, by habits and by his native education and habit of thought, was not calculated for a quiet, industrious and religious life. His wild nature, his love of the chase and his delight in predatory excursions made him uneasy and unsettled; while labor was more irksome to him than to the whites, and even they resort to every possible expedient to eke out a subsistence rather than to labor. Labor is the last resort, the extreme service which they pay to their necessities, and with them hunting and fishing and tramping around yield delights that successful labor fails to bring.

And then the Indian religion was so different from the Christian, so much easier understood and practiced, and called upon them for so many less labors and sacrifices, that it is not wonderful that they received the latter slowly—conformed to it more slowly and yielded obedience to its requirements only at the last extremity. In consequence of these hindrances to the enjoyment of a Christian life the Indians, one by one or in parties, were constantly withdrawing from the missions, and seeking their native freedom of action and thought with the wild tribes who were free from the shackles which a Christian life imposed. Even white men have done the same. Zeisberger said: "Sorcerers abound among the aborigines of our country. The majority of them are cunning jugglers, or self-deluded victims of superstition." Some existed by whom Satan himself worked "with all powers and signs and lying wonders." He disbelieved the stories he heard of what they could do until several of them were converted. These unfolded to him things from their own past experience which forced him to acknowledge the reality of Indian sorcery, and to adopt the opinion which was universal among the early church fathers that the Gods of heathenism were not visionary beings represented by idols, but Satanic powers and principalities, to worship whom was to worship demons and be under demoniacal influences. He refers to three kinds of native magic, namely: the art of producing sudden death without the use of poison; the matpassigan, a deadly charm by which epidemics could be brought upon entire villages, and persons at a distance sent to their graves; and the witchcraft of the kimochwe, who passed through the air by night, visiting towns, casting the inhabitants into an unnatural sleep and then stealing what they wanted.

The story of the Wyalusing mission has now been briefly told, and in its telling the history of the Indians at and in the territory of old Wyoming has drawn to a close. The suffering of the New England pioneers at the hands of the savages belongs to the early settlement of the valley, and as such will be narrated in another connection.

CHAPTER III.

OPERATIONS OF THE SUSQUEHANNA COMPANY—THE "PENNAMITE AND VANKEE" CONTEST.

IN 1753 an association called the Susquehanna Company was formed in Connecticut for the purpose of settling the lands in the Wyoming valley, and during the same year its agents were sent to make explorations in the region. During the next year an Indian council assembled at Albany, and the agents of the company attended this council for the purpose of extinguishing the Indian title to these lands.

The proprietary government also sent agents to this council to thwart, if possible, the designs of the Susquehanna Company; and James Hamilton, then governor of Pennsylvania, wrote to Sir William Johnson soliciting him to interpose his influence with the Six Nations (who claimed the land, though the Delawares occupied it), and prevent the sale.

Notwithstanding these efforts on the part of the governor and his agents, the company's agents succeeded in effecting a purchase, which included this valley. A purchase had been made from the Indians by the proprietary government in 1736 which it was claimed included this territory; but this claim was disputed by the Connecticut claimants.

The company was soon afterward chartered by the Connecticut government, and at about this time the project was conceived of making this, with other territory, a separate province; but the hostile attitude of the Indians, who were then under French influence, defeated its accomplishment.

After the cessation of hostilities preparations were made to settle the valley by the Susquehanna Company, and in 1762 about two hundred settlers established themselves in it, near the mouth of Mill creek, where they cleared fields, sowed wheat and built log houses. Having done this, they returned to Connecticut, to make preparations for bringing their families the next spring.

The people of Pennsylvania regarded with jealousy and displeasure these energetic preparations for settlement, and the governor, through Sir William Johnson, again sought to influence the Iroquois to repudiate their sale to the company in 1754. A deputation of the disaffected Indians visited Hartford and protested against the occupancy of this territory. The case was presented in England by both parties, and opinions favorable to both sides were obtained.

On the return of spring the Connecticut settlers, notwithstanding the fact that they had been cautioned by the governor of Connecticut against doing so, returned in largely augmented numbers, with their families, to the settlement; and during the summer made rapid progress, extending their settlement to the west side of the river.

In the autumn a party of Iroquois visited the valley, and it was said for the double purpose of exciting in the Delawares hostility to the settlers and getting rid of Teedyuscung, a chief of whose large and growing influence among the Indians they were jealous; treacherously murdered him and then induced among his subjects the belief that the murder had been committed by the settlers. The result was that these Delawares fell upon the inhabitants of the valley, killed some thirty and caused the precipitate flight of the rest, and plundered and burnt the settlement. After severe sufferings and the death of many of their number the fugitives reached Connecticut again; and thus for a time ended the attempt by the Susquehanna Company to settle the valley. The following are the names of a portion of those settlers:

John Jenkins, John Comstock, Ephraim Seely, William Buck, Oliver Jewell, Oliver Smith, David Honeywell, Ezra Dean, Jonathan Weeks, Jr., Obadiah Gore, Ezekiel Pierce, Philip Weeks, Daniel Gore, Elkanah Fuller, Wright Stevens, Isaac Underwood, Benjamin Ashley, Gideon Lawrence, Isaac Bennett, Stephen Lee, Silas Parker, James Atherton, Moses Kimball, Ebenezer Searles, Timothy Hollister, Nathaniel Terry, Ephraim Tyler, Timothy Hollister, jr., Wright Smith, Ephraim Tyler, jr., Isaac Hollister, jr., Nathaniel Chapman, John Dorrance, Thomas Marsh, Rev. W. M. Marsh, Timothy Smith, Matthew Smith, Jonathan Slocum, Benjamin Davis, Benjamin Follett, George Miner, Nathaniel Hollister, Benjamin Shoemaker, Nathaniel Hurlbut, Simun Draper, Samuel Richards, John Smith, Daniel Baldwin, Stephen Gardiner, Eliphalet Stevens, David Marvick, August Hunt, Paschall Terry, William Stephens, Thomas Bennet.

Killed by the Indians October 15th, 1763: Rev. William Marsh, Thomas Marsh, Timothy Hollister, Timothy Hollister, Jr., Nathan Terry, Wright Smith, Daniel Baldwin and wife, Jesse Wiggins, Zeruah Whitney, Isaac Hollister. Prisoners: Shepherd and Daniel Baldwin's son.

In 1768, at the general Indian council which assembled at Fort Stanwix, the proprietaries purchased from the Indians the territory which was in dispute, and some of the chiefs executed to them a deed for it. The Indians were ready to sell their land as many times as the whites were willing to pay them for it.

Early in the next year the Susquehanna Company resolved to resume possession of these lands. Five townships, each five miles square, were divided each into forty shares, to be given to the first forty settlers in each of these townships; and two hundred pounds sterling were appropriated for the purchase of agricultural implements. Forty settlers were sent to the valley in February, to be followed by two hundred in the spring. On their arrival they found that the Pennsylvanians had shortly before taken possession of their former improvements and erected a block house for their defense. They had also divided the valley into the manors of Stoke (on the eastern) and Sunbury (on the western side of the river). The Yankees soon after their arrival, invested the Pennamite block house, with its little garrison, but they were outwitted by the latter, who, under the pretext of a desire to consult and arrange their difficulties, induced three of the leaders among the Yankees to enter the block house and immediately arrested them. They were taken to the jail at Easton, but were at once released on bail and returned. This was followed by other arrests of Connecticut settlers, and the release on bail of the persons arrested. In the spring the other settlers arrived; constructed a fort on the east bank of the river, near the bend below the bridge at Wilkes-Barre, which they named Fort Durkee, in honor of its commander; erected log houses, and prosecuted their improvements with energy. The Pennsylvania claimants, finding themselves largely outnumbered, after one or two ineffectual attempts to dispossess the Yankees left them for a short period without molestation. In this interval overtures were made by the settlers for a settlement of the controversy, but the proprietaries refused to negotiate. Early in September the Pennamites came with a large force headed by the sheriff of Northampton county, took Colonel Durkee and several others prisoners, expelled the Yankees, and, regardless of a solemn pledge to respect the rights of property, plundered the settlement. The year 1769 closed with the Pennsylvanians in possession of the valley.

In February, 1770, the Yankees, together with a number of men from Lancaster, where some shareholders of the Susquehanna Company resided, again appeared in the valley, and dispossessed the Pennamites. To accomplish this they found it necessary to fire on and besiege a block house in which the latter took refuge, and during the hostilities, which lasted several days, one of the Yankees was killed, and several were wounded. The Pennsylvanians were compelled to capitulate and leave the valley in possession of the Yankees. Settlers came again, crops were planted, and during the summer they were not disturbed.

It must be remembered that at this time difficulties were arising between the colonies and Great Britain, and the power and influence of the colonial governors were on the wane. The authority of the proprietary governor of Pennsylvania declined more rapidly than that of the governors of other provinces, because of the differences between them and the people with regard to the taxation of the proprietary estates, and for other reasons; and inasmuch as the question of title was between the people from Connecticut and these proprietaries, the sympathies of the people in other parts of the province with these governors were not as active as would otherwise have been the case. After the expulsion of Captain Ogden and the Pennamites from the valley in the spring of 1770, Governor Penn called on General Gage to furnish regular troops to reinstate him in possession of the valley, alleging that there was no militia in the province on which he could call. General Gage quite properly declined to allow the use of the king's troops in a mere dispute concerning the title to property, and Governor Penn was compelled to raise forces by his personal exertions, which he finally succeeded in doing. He had in June issued a proclamation forbidding any intrusion on the lands in question, and in September his forces, numbering 140, under Captain Ogden, marched to the valley for the ostensible purpose of enforcing this proclamation. They entered the valley by an unusual route, divided in detachments and surprised the men while at work. They captured a portion, and put the rest to flight. At night they made a sudden assault on the fort, which was confusedly filled with men, women and children; and after killing a few made prisoners of the rest; and soon afterward sent them to prison at Easton, except a few, who were taken to Philadelphia. They then plundered the settlement and withdrew, leaving a small garrison in Fort Durkee. In the following December this garrison was surprised and the fort retaken by Captain Lazarus Stewart, at the head of a party of Lencastrians, with a few Yankees. Such of the garrison as did not escape were expelled from the valley.

A month later, or in January, 1771, Captain Ogden again appeared in the valley, with the sheriff of Northampton county and a posse, for the arrest of Captain Stewart. Admission to the fort was demanded and refused. The fort was finally fired on by Captain Ogden, and the fire was returned, killing Nathan Ogden, his brother, and wounding several of his men. During the ensuing night the fort was evacuated by Captain Stewart, and the next day was occupied by Captain Ogden.

For six months the valley remained in possession of the Pennsylvanians, during which time their number was augmented till it reached a total of eighty-three.

In July of the same year Captain Zebulon Butler and Lazarus Stewart, with seventy Connecticut men, entered the valley and at once took measures to repossess it. They besieged and closely invested Fort Wyoming, which had been built and occupied by Captain Ogden, about sixty rods above Fort Durkee. Notwithstanding the close and vigilant investment of the fort by the besiegers, whose number was constantly augmented by recruits from Connecticut, Captain Ogden by a bold and cunning stratagem escaped alone and went to Philadelphia for assistance. An expedition was sent for that purpose, but it was ambushed by the vigilant besiegers and its supplies were captured, though a portion of the men were allowed to enter the fort. The besieged managed to send another message for assistance, but the supplies of the garrison failed, and it capitulated when the detachment for its relief was within ten miles of the fort. During the siege several of the garrison were killed and a number were wounded, and among the latter Captain Ogden himself severely. The loss of the besiegers is not known. During the remainder of the summer and autumn the settlers from Connecticut increased largely and made ample preparations for defense, but during the succeeding four years they were not again disturbed by hostile incursions.

This interval of peace was also one of prosperity and happiness. The settlement received accessions of immigrants from Connecticut; churches and schools were established; and when it appeared that there was no prospect of establishing a separate colony, or of being immediately recognized by the General Assembly of Connecticut as a portion of that colony and enjoying the protection and benefit of its laws, the people adopted a government of their own, which was in all respects purely democratic—the legislature consisting of an assembly of all the people. Efforts were made by the settlers to effect a reconciliation with the proprietary government, but all overtures were rejected. The General Assembly of Connecticut also made an effort to negotiate a settlement, and sent commissioners to Philadelphia for that purpose, but Governor Penn declined to entertain their propositions. The General Assembly then submitted the case to eminent counsellors in England, and an opinion in favor of the company was given.

The Legislature of Connecticut then, in 1773, adopted a resolution asserting the jurisdiction of the colony and expressing a determination to maintain it. On application of the company the territory was declared to be a part of the colony of Connecticut, erected into the town of Westmoreland and attached to the county of Litchfield. The laws of Connecticut superseded those which had been adopted by the settlers, and the town was represented in the General Assembly of Connecticut. Proclamations were issued by the proprietary governor and by the governor of Connecticut, each forbidding any settlement under the authority of the other.

The following are names of settlers who were enrolled prior to 1773; those of the forty who settled in Kingston in 1769 being marked with an asterisk:

The colonists in the valley enjoyed two years more of repose and prosperity. About the year 1771 a settlement was made by Connecticut people at Muncy, on the west branch of the Susquehanna, about sixty miles above its confluence with the east branch at Northumberland. In September, 1775, this settlement was attacked by a force of Northumberland militia, commanded by Colonel Plunkett. One man was killed, several were wounded, and the rest of the settlers were made prisoners and taken to Sunbury. At about the same time some boats from Wyoming, as they were descending the river, were attacked and plundered by the Pennsylvanians.

Because of these acts the people of Northumberland were apprehensive that the Yankees might make a descent on Sunbury, burn the town and liberate the prisoners; and one of the consequences of this apprehension was the organization of a force for the invasion and subjugation of the Wyoming valley. This force was raised by Colonel Plunkett, under orders from Governor Penn, and consisted of seven hundred men well armed and furnished with ample supplies. In December, 1775, this force ascended the river in boats to the Nanticoke rapids, where it disembarked and passed on the west side of the river through the gorge by which the Susquehanna escapes from the Wyoming valley. Near the point where the gorge opens into the valley Colonel Plunkett found the vigilant Yankees, posted in an advantageous position and protected by breastworks; and, though inferior in numbers, they gave his forces such a warm reception that they fell back, with the loss of some killed and wounded. A boat was then brought up and an attempt was made by Colonel Plunkett to cross the river. In anticipation of this movement Colonel Zebulon Butler, who commanded the force in the valley, had stationed a party of men under Lieutenant Stewart in ambush on the east side of the river; and these gave the party in the boat, as it attempted to land, a volley which wounded several and killed a dog. Finding every approach to the valley guarded, the forces of Colonel Plunkett fell back to their boats, abandoned the expedition and returned to their homes.

At this time the Revolutionary war had commenced, and during its continuance the contest for the possession of this valley was suspended. It was renewed, however, immediately after the surrender of Cornwallis.

It will be remembered that in 1776 the proprietary government was superseded by that of the State, and on the cessation of hostilities the Supreme Executive Council at once petitioned Congress to adjust the question of jurisdiction. A board of commissioners was appointed for that purpose, and after a long session at Trenton they decided, in December, 1782, that the jurisdiction belonged to Pennsylvania, and that Connecticut had "no right to the land in controversy." Soon afterward magistrates and troops were sent into the valley, and measures were taken to dispossess the settlers of their lands and improvements. The settlers claimed that only the jurisdiction of the territory had been decided by the decree at Trenton, and that the titles of individuals to the soil were not affected thereby. The conduct of the soldiers and magistrates was from the first exceedingly arrogant and oppressive, and as time went on the people came to regard endurance as no longer a virtue and resolved on forcible resistance. Upon this they were treated as insurgents, and on the 12th of May, 1784, they were plundered of their property and one hundred and fifty families were driven from the valley. Such was the cruelty with which they were treated that the sympathies and indignation of the people in other parts of the State were aroused; the soldiers were discharged and the settlers invited to return. Many of the discharged soldiers lingered in the valley, living by plunder, and on the 20th of July a party of them attacked some of the settlers, killing two and wounding several. This was followed by hostilities toward the Yankees, which were resisted by them. In the course of the summer and autumn several engagements took place between the settlers and the military forces which were sent against them, in which several were killed and wounded. The people of the State became weary of this contest, and their sympathies became more actively enlisted in behalf of the inhabitants of the valley. By the middle of October the hostile force in the valley numbered only forty men, and so unpopular and even odious had the proceedings against the people there become that not a recruit could be induced to join them. On the approach of winter the commander of these forces, finding himself unable to procure either supplies or recruits, discharged his men and abandoned the valley. Thus ended the last military demonstration against the people of Wyoming.

During the succeeding two years the people were prosperous and happy, and the population rapidly increased by the influx of immigrants not only to the valley but to the circumjacent regions.

The territory now included in Wyoming and Lackawanna counties had become settled to some extent along the valleys of the two principal streams and their tributaries. These regions, however, had not been the scene of hostilities between the contending parties, although three of the Susquehanna Company's townships were included in what is now Wyoming county.

The county of Luzerne was erected in 1786. The people were satisfied with the government, and a more kindly feeling was springing up between the inhabitants of the valley and the citizens elsewhere; but the question of title was not yet adjusted, though efforts for an adjustment of it had been made.

About this time Colonel Timothy Pickering became acquainted with the facts in the case, and soon afterward he established his residence in the valley. Through his influence a compromise was effected, and a law in accordance with the terms of this compromise was enacted by the legislature. Under this law commissioners for the adjustment of claims met in the valley in May, 1787. Meantime the New England immigrants had become divided. A portion of them (mostly settlers subsequent to the decision of the question of jurisdiction by the Congressional commission) strongly opposed acquiescence in the compromise law, and sought by every means to arouse and strengthen opposition to it in others. They had in contemplation the formation of another State out of the territory which had been in dispute, and to that end they had drawn up a constitution and completed a frame of government. The most active leader in that opposition—a man named John Franklin—was finally arrested under a charge of treason in attempting to subvert the government and establish a new State, and taken to Philadelphia. Early in October, 1787, in revenge for this and to procure the release of Franklin, his friends, after several unsuccessful attempts, succeeded in abducting Colonel Pickering. He was taken up the river beyond the mouth of Tunkhannock creek, and kept concealed during nearly three weeks. His captors and guards frequently shifted camp to elude the pursuit which they knew was made. In this time some skirmishing took place between the pursuers and the Yankees at Meshoppen and Wyso, in which two men were wounded. Failing to accomplish their purpose, they liberated him at Tunkhannock and he returned to his home in Wilkes-Barre.

The results of these lawless acts on the part of a portion of the Yankees were the suspension and, in 1790, the repeal of the compromise act.

Several actions were then commenced in the courts for determining the titles to these lands, but during the eight years that followed none of these were determined. In April, 1799, the Legislature passed another compromise act, which provided for compensation to claimants under titles from Pennsylvania, and for confirmation by certificates of the titles of the Connecticut settlers who were such prior to the decree of Trenton, or their heirs or assigns. These certificates were issued by commissioners appointed under the law, which limited their action within the "seventeen townships in the county of Luzerne" that were originally surveyed and settled under the authority of the Susquehanna Company. By an act of the Legislature in 1808 the powers of these commissioners ceased, and thus was terminated the contest concerning the title to these lands, which had continued through nearly half a century, and which at the present day elicits a warm interest among the descendants of the contesting parties.

In an address on this subject, delivered recently before the historical society of Pennsylvania, Governor Hoyt tersely says: "The discussion converges upon two propositions, each somewhat paradoxical: 1. In the forum of law Connecticut, with a title regular on its face, failed justly; 2. In the forum of equity the Connecticut settlers, without other title than the 'possessio pedis,' prevailed rightly."

CHAPTER IV.

THE PIONEERS—HOW THEY CAME, SETTLED AND DEVELOPED THE RESOURCES OF THE COUNTRY.

THE settlement of the valley of Wyoming, which was the first and for many years the only inhabited part of Luzerne county, was commenced, as elsewhere stated, under the auspices of the Susquehanna Company, in 1762.

Then about two hundred, mostly from Connecticut, came and began their preparations for homes in this region, which was then sixty miles distant from any settlement of civilized people. They were not the effeminate sons of wealthy parents, who had been reared in the lap of luxury. From their infancy they had by precept and example been taught the industry and economy which had enabled their fathers to thrive among the rocks and hills of their native country. They were the hardy, active and ambitious sons of New Englanders, and in the exercise of the independent, self-reliant spirit which they had inherited from their sires, they left their paternal roofs and sought homes in this valley, far away in the untamed wilderness of what was then the west.

A few brought with them their wives and children, and came with oxen and carts, bringing a few indispensable articles of household furniture and driving a few domestic animals. Most of them, however, came on foot, with knapsacks on their backs, rifles on their shoulders and axes in their hands. Thus accoutred, they bade adieu for a time to the loved ones at home, and turned their faces westward to make for themselves homes and fortunes.

For a time they followed the trail of emigrants who had settled in other regions, but finally they abandoned this, left the borders of civilization and struck into the forest. They followed Indian trails, threaded forests and swamps, and climbed over mountains, camping in squads in the roads by night, till at length they reached the valley, and having selected their locations commenced their preparations for the future. Shanties for temporary shelter were constructed, clearings were begun, and preparations made for the erection of rude log houses for the shelter of those whom they were to bring with them on their return the next year.

While this work was in progress they subsisted largely on the game with which the surrounding forest abounded, and the fish which were taken in great numbers from the river. Their neighbors were making similar preparations at different points in the valley, and with these they often exchanged visits, to talk of home and to discuss their plans for the future, to anticipate the pleasure which they would derive from such visits the next year, when they would be accompanied by the partners who were to share their fortunes and their privations.

They frequently "changed works" in order to accomplish some of their various tasks with greater facility, and to dissipate the sense of loneliness which haunted them as they pursued their solitary labors. In this way they occasionally hired from those who had brought teams a yoke of oxen, with which to draw to their building sites the logs which they had cut for their houses, and to "log up" the timber which they desired to burn on their clearings. Thus passed their first summer in the valley. By night they lay in their shanties on their beds of boughs and dreamed of the homes they had left, or of the future homes which their fancies pictured; or in their waking intervals listened to the distant howling of the wolf on the mountain side, and the nearer hooting of the owl. Day after day they toiled on, sustained and cheered by their hopes of future happiness with their chosen companions and children in the midst of the surroundings which they were creating.

By early autumn their rude houses were erected and partially prepared for their reception on their return. Small areas had been burned off, and here they "brushed in" their first wheat. Larger areas had been cut over and made ready for burning and planting the next spring. When these preparations were completed they deposited in places of safety their axes and few other implements, and with light hearts turned their faces again toward their paternal mansions. Thus terminated the first summer with many a pioneer in Luzerne county. As he journeyed homeward the sky above him was brighter and the songs of the birds in the forest through which he passed more melodious than ever before, for he was returning to the haunts of his early life from the scenes of his prospective manhood.

In due time he arrived among the scenes of his childhood and wended his way to the old home where parents, brothers and sisters welcomed him warmly, and listened with eager attention to the story of his experience in the wilderness. He received a still more hearty welcome from another, who during his long absence had not ceased to think of him by day and dream of him by night. She listened to the recital of his doings with a deeper interest, for to her and him they were matters of equal importance.

A wedding soon occurred, and the last winter of the pair in their native State was a season of busy preparation for removal to their western home, interspersed with social gatherings and merry-makings among the scenes and companions of their childhood. They sat down to their last Thanksgiving dinner with their parents, brothers and sisters; attended their last Christmas and New Year's festivals with their former playmates and school-fellows, and on the approach of spring bade all these scenes and friends a tearful adieu, and departed for their new home, followed by the good wishes of their friends, and the benedictions and prayers of their parents.

Their outfit consisted of a yoke of oxen and a cart, loaded with a few utensils and necessary articles of household furniture. They brought with them a cow or two and a few sheep, the latter to serve as the nucleus of a flock, which, if spared by the wolves, was to furnish wool for their future clothing. Thus equipped they pursued their toilsome journey till at length their destination was reached, and they entered at once on the realities of pioneer life.

Their house was made tenable by the few preparations which pioneers found necessary for their comfort, though open holes in the walls at first served for windows and one in the roof for a chimney, and a blanket was the door. A small spot was prepared for the garden seeds which they had brought, their corn field was burned off and planted in due season, and a large area prepared for other wheat and corn fields. In this the labor of the husband was lightened by the presence and encouraging smiles, and sometimes by the assistance, of his young wife. In their solitude they were sustained by their buoyant hopes of the future, and they ever after referred to this summer as the happiest period of their lives.

Their wheat field gave good returns; the few acres which they cleared and planted with corn yielded abundantly, and early in the winter they secured a sufficient supply of venison. Their wheat and corn were ground in a "pioneer mill"—a mortar hollowed in a stump or in the end of a log. A hovel had been constructed of logs, and roofed with brush or straw, for the protection of their animals against the inclemency of the weather and the attacks of wild beasts. No hay was provided for the cattle, but from day to day trees were cut on ground that was to be cleared the next summer, and they lived on the browse which these afforded. A couple of pigs and a few fowls were fed each morning at the door of the house with corn from the wife's folded apron. Thus passed their first winter in the woods. The sound of the husband's ax echoed through the forest during the day, and the wife plied "her evening care" in the cheerful glow of the "blazing hearth" at night. Their simple fare and active exercise in the open air gave them robust health, and though their surroundings were quite different from those in the midst of which they had been reared, this was the home which they had made for themselves, and they were happy in the enjoyment of it.

During the summer other settlers had come in, some singly, others in companies, with their families; and neighbors were more numerous and less distant, and the monotony of their life was varied by occasional exchanges of evening visits among these. This social intercourse among the pioneers had none of the bad features which characterized that of later times. There were among them no conventionalities, no unmeaning expressions of civility, no unkind criticism of each others' dress or surroundings, no rivalries and jealousies, and no hypocritical manifestations of interest in each others' welfare. Each rejoiced with his neighbor in his prosperity or sympathized with him in his adversity. These visits were anticipated with pleasure and remembered without regret.

The happy life which they had just commenced here was darkened by many shadows. The Indians of the vicinity became exasperated towards the settlers, by reason of an act of treachery on the part of the members of a distant tribe, fell upon them, killed many and drove away the others. Several years later they returned and resumed their occupancy of the valley, but they were several times driven out by adverse claimants, and were compelled to resort to force for the maintenance of their rights and the protection of their property.

Notwithstanding these interruptions a few years brought evidence of increasing prosperity. The clearing had been enlarged and a portion of it fenced; a stick chimney, plastered with mud, filled the hole in the roof; glass had taken the place of greased paper in the window; a plank door swung on wooden hinges where formerly hung the blanket, and some flowering shrubbery was growing at the side of it. A more capacious and comfortable stable had been erected for the animals, a "worm" fence appeared around the house and garden, and a log bridge had been built across the stream which ran near the house. Near the edge of the clearing the crackling fire was consuming the trees that the men of a logging bee were piling together for that purpose. The corn, potatoes, pumpkins, etc., which had been planted among the stumps had attained sufficient growth to be visible from some distance. A calf frolicked at the side of its dam and a litter of grunting young porkers asserted their right to "life, liberty," etc. Every thing wore an air of thrift. The solitude of the wife was enlivened by the prattle of her children, and their playful caresses sweetened the labor and lessened the fatigue of the husband and father.

The tide of immigration, the first wave of which had borne them hither, continued with increasing flow. Settlers came more rapidly, the smoke from their hearths curled upward at shorter intervals, and clearings encroached more and more on the surrounding wilderness. The hissing and rushing of the whirlwinds of flame were oftener heard as the trees that had been felled and had become dry were consumed. Small fields of waving corn and here and there a verdant meadow were to be seen. The music of numerous cow bells was heard, and "drowsy tinklings lulled the distant folds" where sheep were herded to protect them from the wolves at night. The hum of spinning wheels might be heard in almost every house, and the merry laughter and shouts of frolicksome children resounded as they gamboled through the woods.

The Revolutionary war came upon the country, and nowhere were its horrors greater than here. On the return of peace the few surviving settlers came back to the valley, and prosperity smiled again. Settlements extended up the valleys of the Susquehanna and the Lackawanna and their tributaries, and many of the earliest experiences of the settlers in the Wyoming valley were repeated in these localities.

The lapse of time brought with it changes. The old house, which had survived the ravages of war, had come to be only the wing of a new one that had been built of squared logs, covered with a shingled roof, lighted by glazed windows and closed by a paneled door. A lawn appeared in front, tastefully ornamented with flowers, and fruit trees were growing on the former site of the garden. An apiary stood on the margin of the lawn, which was bounded by a straight fence. A commodious frame barn had been built, and where the forest once stood were fields of waving grain. Beyond the grove of sugar maples could be seen the log school-house where, "in her noisy mansion skilled to rule, the comely mistress taught her little school."

The stream that ran by was spanned by a newer bridge, and the ding-donging of a saw-mill that had been built on its bank could be heard in the distance. The eldest surviving son of the pioneer couple, now grown to be a young man, drove toward the barn with a load of hay drawn by horses instead of the oxen that for years had constituted their only team. At the well, which still had its primitive sweep, stood a somewhat portly matron, who turned to look with motherly pride at her son as he drove along. A middle-aged man was walking down the road that came from the mill. It was he who came many years since with his knapsack, rifle and ax, and built his shanty in the howling wilderness. The woman at the well was the young wife who came with him a year later. Their privations, hardships, industry and economy had been rewarded. They had acquired an honorable competence. They had, however, experienced vicissitudes. A brother of the husband and two brothers of the wife fell on the fatal field of Wyoming, and there the husband acquired an honorable scar. They had also followed two of their children to the grave.

Sixty years had gone by since the settlement of the valley. An elegant mansions tood on the site of the old log cabin, and all its surroundings indicated that it was the abode of wealth and refinement. The stream passed under a stone arch; the old saw-mill had gone to decay; the sugar orchard was no longer to be seen, and only on the mountain sides were the remains of the primitive forest visible. Spacious fields and elegant farm houses were to be seen on the extended landscape, and the tall spire of a church pointed skyward from among the houses of a village near. A gray haired man was busy with the cattle in the barnyard, and a portly woman sat by the stove knitting, while some of the grand-children were playing on the floor and others were engaged in various kinds of work.

These aged people were the ones who left their New England homes in their youth and came to this spot. They had deeded their farm to their youngest son and taken the usual life lease. Another of their children had been added to the group in the cemetery; one had settled in an adjoining town, and two were in the far west.

Another interval of half a century has passed, and brought its inevitable changes. The old pioneer couple long since passed to their rest; the son who was the solace and support of their declining years is now an octogenarian, and his grandchildren are one by one assuming their positions as citizens and members of society. The ancestral mansion, which still stands on the site of the original pioneer cabin, has from time to time changed in appearance, as changing fashion has dictated and increasing prosperity permitted, till it is among the most tasteful in the valley. The original farm, which extended back and included a portion of the mountain, received additions by purchase from time to time; and its value has been greatly enhanced by the discovery and development of the mineral resources which lie beneath the surface. The landscape in the valley has greatly changed. Along the base of either mountain range at short intervals rise coal breakers, with their immense hills of culm and the adjacent miners' villages. Populous cities and thriving boroughs have come into existence. Along the margins of the river railroad tracks with branches to the collieries extend through the valley and climb the mountain sides, and the panting and screaming of the engines that draw the long, snake-like trains of cars may be almost constantly heard. Along these tracks extend telegraph lines, and stretching from place to place may be seen the thread-like wires of the telephone. Here and there the sides of the mountain are dotted with clearings, where with great labor farms have been developed among the rocks. How different the landscape of to-day from that of a century since!

CHAPTER V.

THE CONDITION OF THE PIONEERS—THEIR WAYS AND MEANS OF LIVING.

OVER a century has passed since the first settlement of this region, and changing circumstances have brought with them such changes in many of the customs of the people that one of the present generation can form only an imperfect conception of what some of those customs were.

People are usually slow to adopt those modifications in their customs which changes in their environments render desirable, or even almost necessitate. Like the Welshman who persisted in balancing the wheat in one end of his bag by a stone in the other "because her's father did so," they follow the beaten track which their ancestors pursued, and often only turn from it when changed circumstances actually compel them to do so.

The march of improvement and the progress of invention make slow advances, except in those cases where necessity compels people to follow the one, or loudly calls for the other.

The rude implements and appliances that were in use "when the country was new" were inventions which grew out of the necessities of the times, and were adapted to the circumstances in which people found themselves. Time wore on, and those circumstances gave place to others. Inventions followed these changes; but in many cases, as in those of the cast-iron plow, the grain-cradle and the horse rake, the inventors only lived to see their improved implements scoffed at and derided. Thus have people always done, and thus they will to a greater or less extent continue to do. As in the physical world, however, one condition is evolved from another by the slow process of natural selection, so in these cases the fittest are in the end the survivors.

The first settlers in this region came when the primitive forest was growing not only here but in the country through which they had passed for many miles. The first roads, which were simply widened Indian trails, were then barely passable. Of course they could bring with them only those articles of household furniture or those agricultural implements that were indispensable.

The first work of the pioneer was to prepare a house, or dwelling place for his family. There were no mills for the manufacture of lumber, and the first houses were necessarily built of logs fastened by notching at the corners. They were usually from fifteen to eighteen feet square, and about seven feet in height, or high enough to just clear the head of a tall man. Often no floor was at first laid. A fire place was prepared at one end by erecting a back of stones, laid in mud instead of mortar, and a hole was left in the bark or slab roof for the escape of the smoke. A chimney of sticks plastered with mud was afterward erected in this aperture. A space of a width suitable for a door was cut on one side, and this was closed first by hanging in it a blanket, and afterward by a door made with split plank and hung on wooden hinges. This door was fastened by a wooden latch that could be raised from the outside by a string, which was passed through a hole above it. When the latch string was "pulled in" the door was effectually fastened. The expression used of a hospitable man—"his latch string is always out"—had its origin from this primitive method of fastening a log house door. A hole was usually cut in each side of this house to let in light, and when glazed sash could not be procured greased paper was used to keep out the blasts and snows of autumn and winter.

Holes were bored at the proper height in the logs at one corner of the room, and into these the ends of poles were fitted, the opposite ends where they crossed being supported by a crotch, or a block of the proper height. Across these poles others were laid, and these were covered by a thick mattress of hemlock or other boughs, over which blankets were spread. Thus were pioneer bedsteads constructed; and on such a bed many a pioneer couple reposed as sweetly as though "sunk in beds of down." In the absence of chairs rude seats were made with an ax and auger by boring holes in "puncheons," or planks split from basswood logs and hewn smooth on one side. Tables were often made in the same way, and after a time a floor was constructed of these "puncheons," with a bare space in lieu of a hearth about the fire place. A few necessary pieces of crockery, or sometimes wooden trenchers, were kept on rude shelves till, after a few years, lumber could be procured of which to make a cupboard.

A dinner pot, a dish kettle, a tea kettle, a frying pan and a bake kettle constituted the entire stock of iron ware. The bake kettle—a utensil that is now never seen—was a shallow vessel with legs some six inches in length, so that it could be set over coals on the hearth. It had a cover with the edges turned up so that coals could be heaped on it. This was used at first for all the baking of many a pioneer family. The fire place had, instead of the iron crane with which it was afterward furnished, a transverse pole, called a lug pole, laid across two others so that it could be moved backwards and forwards at a sufficient height to prevent burning. On this at first hooks cut from beech saplings, or limbs, were fastened by withes, but after blacksmiths' shops were established these were replaced by "trammels," or hooks so constructed that their length could be adjusted.

This room, thus furnished, served all the purposes of kitchen, drawing-room, sitting-room, parlor and bedroom; and not unfrequently workshop also, for temporary benches were erected, and sleds, ox yokes, and many other farming utensils were made and repaired there during stormy days or evenings. The light for such evening work was furnished by the blazing fire of pine knots which had been gathered and stored away for the purpose, or sometimes by a "slut," which was made by placing a rag for a wick in a dish of "coon's oil," or the fat of some other wild animal.

Here also, as time went on, were heard the raking of the hand cards and the whirl of the spinning wheel; for in those days the cloth for both the summer and winter clothing of the family was homemade, and all the technicalities of the process, from picking the wool to "taking out the piece," were as familiar to every member of the family as any household word.

At first, before the establishment of cloth dressing mills, the dyeing or coloring, even of all the woolen cloth, was done by the pioneer wives; and after clothieries made their appearance everything except "fulled cloth" was colored at home. The properties and the proper method for compounding for different colors of Nicaragua or Nic. wood, logwood, fustic, indigo, madder, copperas, alum, vitriol, etc., as well as all the various indigenous barks and plants, were known to every housewife. The old dye tub, which is still remembered by the older inhabitants, had its place at the side of every hearth, where it was frequently used as a seat for children in cases of emergency, or when the increase of the family was more rapid than that of chairs. Peter Parley (Mr. Goodrich) calls it "the institution of the dye tub, which, when the night had waned and the family had retired, frequently became the anxious seat of the lover, who was permitted to carry on his courtship, the object of his addresses sitting demurely in the opposite corner."

The flax brake, swingling knife and board, and hatchel are never seen now; and one of the present generation would be utterly unable to guess their uses were they shown to him. Then the pulling and rotting and all the details of dressing flax were known to every child; and the process of spinning the flax and tow, weaving and bleaching the different qualities of cloth, and making the thread for all the family sewing, was a part of the education of every girl. Wild nettles were at first used instead of the flax that was afterwards cultivated. The process of rotting, dressing, etc., was the same as in the case of the flax. Then cotton cloth was not manufactured in this country, and it was practically beyond the reach of most farmers. Woolen goods, other than those of domestic manufacture, were seldom seen. A "broadcloth coat" was an evidence either of unpardonable vanity or of unusual prosperity. Even the skins of animals were thus utilized for clothing; fawn skin vests, doeskin coats and buckskin breeches were not uncommon.

It is hardly necessary to speak of the ordinary food of the first settlers, such as hasty pudding, johnny cake, or corn pones, the meal for which was ground in a pioneer mill or wooden mortar; or of the dainties, such as short-cakes, mixed with the lye of cob ashes and baked in ashes on the hearth, that were set before company. The simple and substantial diet of the people then was adopted because circumstances would permit no other. They were too poor to pamper their children with sweetmeats, or to stimulate them with tea and coffee; and the incidental result was a degree of robust health such as the children in later times do not acquire.

It must not be inferred that all the settlers in this region were subjected to severe privations. The kind of fare spoken of was not looked upon as hard, for it was the best the country then afforded. There were instances where people were compelled to resort to wild roots or greens for a dinner, but these were perhaps as rare as are cases of extreme destitution now. The condition of the country was such that these habits and methods of living were necessary, and they were not regarded as hardships.

The agriculture of those times, if agriculture it may be termed, was such as is never seen now. Very few at the present day have witnessed the process of preparing the virgin soil for the first crop. The timber was often girdled in advance, so that when felled, as it often was, in what were termed wind rows, much of it would burn as it lay, being partially or wholly dried, by kindling the fire at the windward end of these rows. After the first burn some of the remaining fragments were "niggered" into pieces that could be easily moved, and the whole was drawn together with oxen and "logged up" for the final burning. Many in the neighborhood usually joined in this work, and the "logging bees," or "log frolics," were at the same time occasions when work was done and social intercourse enjoyed. When the burning was completed and the ashes collected the ground was sometimes made ready for the seed by harrowing with a three-cornered harrow, which was often hewed from a crotched tree, with either large wooden pins set at intervals, or very large and strong iron teeth. Such a harrow was drawn over the ground among the stumps to fit the soil for its first crop when the roots were not sufficiently decayed to permit the use of a plow. In using this primitive harrow in these clearings the driver found it necessary to keep always at a respectful distance, for it often bounded from side to side in a manner not compatible with safety at close quarters. In cases where plowing could be done the old bull plow was used. This was an uncouth implement, with wrought iron share and a wooden moldboard, such as is now scarcely ever seen, even among relics of the past. In rare cases a wooden plow, hewn out of a crotched tree, was used.

The wheat sown or corn planted in ground prepared in this rude way often gave good returns, such was the fertility of the soil before it was exhausted by repeated cropping. When the crop was grown and ripened, it was cut with sickles, a handful at a time. Sickles may occasionally be seen at the present day; but there are few who ever saw them used. For harvesting grain among the stumps of the first clearings the sickle was best adapted of all instruments, and no other was known; but when these stumps had decayed, and the grain cradle had been introduced, many looked upon it as a pernicious invention, by the use of which more than sufficient grain would be wasted to pay for the labor of harvesting, and some insisted that more could be harvested in the same time with the sickle—so strongly are people attached to old customs.

The grain was first threshed with the flail on the ground, and partially separated from the chaff by pouring it from a height in the wind and afterwards dextrously manipulating it in a "corn fan," a description of which would be quite difficult. For many years after barns were erected on all farms the flail and the feet of horses were the only threshing machines, but fanning-mills superseded the old corn fan.

Hay was cut with the old fashioned scythe, which has changed but very little, and the hand rake only was used to gather it. Among the stumps and stones in early times these were the most available tools, but their use continued long after improved implements were available, and after such implements had been invented.

In those days the conveyance most in use was the ox-cart. It was made available for almost everything, from hauling manure to going to meeting or to balls and weddings. Its use was thus universal because it was, like the other tools spoken of, adapted to existing conditions. The rough and stumpy roads almost forbade the use of four-wheeled conveyances.

It seems hardly necessary to call attention to the wagons, plows, harrows, threshing-machines, harvesters, mowers, wheel-rakes, etc., etc., of the present day, and contrast them with the awkward and uncouth implements of former times; but if this is done the adaptation of these to their existing circumstances should be remembered, and the additional fact should be borne in mind that the improved tools of the present day would not then have been available.

During some years after the first settlement of this region trade was carried on in a manner quite different from the way in which it is now conducted. Now all produce has a cash market and a cash value; and all the necessaries or superfluities that are purchased are reckoned according to the same standard. Then there was not sufficient money in the country to be made the medium of exchange, and trade was carried on almost wholly by what was termed barter. By reason of this nearly exclusive exchange trade, mercantile establishments were quite unlike those of the present time. Then every store was a commercial microcosm. In it was kept everything that the inhabitants required. As one who lived in those times says: "Every merchant kept dry goods, groceries, crockery, glassware, hardware, dye stuffs, iron, nails, paints, oil, window-glass, school-books, stationery, rum, brandy, gin, whiskey, drugs and medicines, ending with a string of etceteras, or every other article usually kept in a country store. Things were sometimes curiously grouped; as, for example, silks and iron, laces and fish, pins and crowbars, pork and tea, molasses and tar, cotton yarn and log chains, wheel heads and hoes, cards and pitchforks, scythes and fur hats." In exchange for these the pioneer merchant received almost every article of country produce. Coarse grain was converted into spirits at his distillery, or that of some one in the vicinity, for distilleries sprung up early. Pork was "packed," and other kinds of produce were received for goods and sent by teams over the turnpike to Easton, and thus to Philadelphia, where they were exchanged for the goods that were brought back by the same route; and so the barter trade was kept up. Some heavy articles, such as iron, salt, etc., were brought by boats on the river. Expensive methods of transportation necessarily rendered the price of goods high and that of produce low, and this condition of things continued till better facilities for transportation cheapened merchandise and enhanced the price of produce.

Gradually since that time has trade changed till it has reached a cash basis, and along with this change has come another important one—the "division of business." Now dry goods, groceries, hardware, books, drugs, liquors, etc., etc., are separate branches of business; and produce dealing is separated from all of them.

A no less marked contrast is to be seen in the manufactures of those times and the present. Then almost every article and utensil that was used was either "home-made" or manufactured at the shops which sprung up to supply the wants of the early settlers. Then, as has been stated, the cloth in which every one was clad was of domestic manufacture. The spinning-wheel and the loom were portions of the furniture of almost every house, and clothieries, or wool-carding and cloth-dressing establishments, were as common as grist-mills. Almost every hamlet had its tailor's shop, where the knight of the shears cut the clothing for the people of the vicinity, and, to avoid the responsibility of misfits, warranted "to fit if properly made up." This clothing was made up by tailoresses, or, as the tailors sometimes termed them, "she tailors." The trade of a tailoress was reckoned a very good one; for she received for her skilled labor two shillings (as currency was then talked) per day; while the price of housework help was four shillings per week.

Shoemakers' shops were abundant also, though there were itinerant shoemakers who "whipped the cat," as going from house to house with their "kits" was termed. After the establishment of tanneries the people were in the habit of having the hides of their slaughtered animals tanned on shares, and the leather thus obtained was worked up by these circulating disciples of St. Crispin.

The ubiquitous tailor shop has entirely disappeared, and only here and there is to be seen a solitary cobbler's sign. Every village has its shoe stores, and the descendants of Abraham vie with each other in supplying the gentiles with clothing "ferry sheep."

Very early it was a portion of the blacksmith business to make the nails that were required where wooden pins could not be used. Now an old fashioned wrought nail is a curious relic of the past; and even the rivets, bolts, and horse-shoe nails that were formerly made upon every anvil are now made by machinery, and furnished more cheaply than they can be hammered out by the vulcans or their apprentices.

So of almost everything. Where joiners formerly took lumber "in the rough" and did all the work of building a house, now houses are almost, like Byron's critics, "ready made;" for little is required but to put together the parts that are made by machinery.

The wheelbarrows, carts and wagons, and even the cradles and coffins, that were formerly made in the shops that sprang up when the country was first settled are now made by machinery, and sold at rates far lower than those at which handmade work can be afforded; and the old hand manufactories have gone to decay or degenerated into simple repair shops.

In early times wild animals, especially bears and wolves, and to some extent panthers, were sources of great annoyance. It is not known that any person ever became a victim to the rapacity of these animals, but instances are recorded of terrible frights. Many swine that were permitted to roam and feed in the woods were destroyed by bears, and great care was necessary to protect sheep against wolves. For years the slumbers of people were interrupted and night was made hideous by the howling of the latter.

It is recorded that during twelve years following 1808 the aggregate bounty paid for the scalps of panthers in Luzerne county was $1,822, and during the same time $2,872 for those of wolves. Of course during the years that preceded that time these animals were more abundant. The howl of the wolf and the screech of the panther are not now heard in this region. Occasionally a bear is captured in the mountains, but the time is not far distant when bruin will no more be seen here.

CHAPTER VI.

OLD LUZERNE COUNTY IN THE REVOLUTION.

THE Revolutionary history of this region limits itself to that of the Wyoming valley. Beyond this valley there were at the commencement of the Revolution hardly any settlements nearer than those on the Delaware, which were sixty miles distant, through a wilderness of swamps and mountain ranges; or Sunbury, which lay an equal distance down the Susquehanna river; a few isolated settlers, nearly all of whom were tories, had just located at Tunkhannock and at points further up the river. Wyoming was not on the outskirts of civilization; it was an isolated settlement in the midst of a country inhabited by savages that afterward became hostile. The country of the warlike Iroquois included the head waters and upper branches of the Susquehanna, down which a war party of these savages could at any time sail in their light canoes when tempted to do so by the hope of obtaining scalps or plunder. In this isolated condition, away from the theater of active hostilities and distant from any thoroughfare over which hostile parties could pass on expeditions against regions on either side of them, it was but reasonable to suppose that they stood in very little peril except from the incursions of marauding savages.

In order to form a just idea of the condition of the people here at that time, it must be remembered that the population of the valley consisted almost entirely of settlers from Connecticut, who had acquired their land titles from the Susquehanna Company and who had been engaged in actual hostilities with the Pennamites (as they termed those who claimed these lands under titles which they acquired from the proprietaries) and those who aided them in their attempts to enforce their claims. It must be remembered, too, that tolerance of those who differed with them in opinion was never a distinguishing characteristic of the Puritans who peopled the province of Connecticut, or of their descendants, from among whom these settlers came; and that the repeated attempts of these Pennamites to unjustly deprive them of their lands and expel them from the valley aroused to its fullest activity their intolerance.

On the other hand, a hatred of the Yankees equally intense existed among the Pennamites, many of whom doubtless considered themselves unjustly dispossessed of lands to which they had acquired a legitimate title. This rancorous feeling in the members of the opposing parties naturally engendered in each a hatred of everything upon which the other looked with favor; and that doubtless was the reason why fifty-eight of the sixty-one tories in the valley, as stated by one historian, were of the Pennamites who remained, and it will also account for the remarkable unanimity among the Yankees.

The population of the valley at that time has been variously estimated. By some historians it has been set down at 2,500, and by others at 5,000. Had there existed among these people no peculiar local influences, there is reason for the supposition that at least as large a proportion of them would have been loyalists as in other localities. They were located in a valley of surpassing beauty and fertility. The soil gave ample returns for the labor which they bestowed on it, the surrounding forests abounded with game, and the river was plentifully stocked with fish. They were subject only to such laws as they enacted for their own government, and the oppressive acts of the mother country were scarcely felt by them. They were contented and happy, and but for the frequent invasions of the valley by those who sought to dispossess them it would have been almost the terrestrial paradise which romancers and poets have represented. Under such circumstances they could see but little for them to gain by a separation of the colonies from Great Britain, and that little more ideal than real. On the other hand, they could see that by actively espousing the cause of the patriots they would subject themselves to the predatory and cruel warfare of the savages, by whom they were surrounded and whose alliance would be sought by the mother country; and that possibly other forces might be sent against them for strategic purposes. That under such circumstances even a larger proportion of the people here than in other regions should adhere to their loyalty would be no matter of surprise.

At nearly the same time when the colonies severed their allegiance to Great Britain the people of Pennsylvania threw off the proprietary government, under which the Yankees had several times been driven from the valley, and adopted a State constitution. With the failure of the rebellion, and the re-establishment of the regal authority in the colonies, would come the restoration of the proprietary government and a renewal of hostilities against the Connecticut settlers; while the success of the revolution and maintenance of the State government gave them reason to hope (although vainly, as subsequent events proved) for a cessation of their persecutions. In view of these circumstances, it would be reasonable to expect that the line between Yankees and Pennamites should almost exactly coincide with that between Whigs and tories.

The spirit of intolerance to which allusion has been made manifested itself with increased intensity when the objects of that intolerance came to occupy the position of foes to their country as well as local enemies. On the other hand, the feeling of enmity which the Pennamites had entertained toward the Yankees, who had resisted their claims to the land in the valley, became greatly intensified when they came to regard those Yankees as rebels against the government to which they were loyal. Such were the relations of parties, and such was the animus of those parties, at the commencement of the Revolution.

The attempted invasion of the valley by Plunkett in December, 1775, was the last hostile demonstration against the Connecticut settlers by the Pennamites previous to the Revolution. In August of that year the Yankees had at a town meeting for the town of Westmoreland (as the whole region was then called) expressed by resolution their willingness "to make any accommodations with ye Pennsylvania party that shall conduce to ye best good of ye whole, not infringing on the property of any person, and come in common cause of liberty in ye defense of America; and that we will amicably give them ye offer of joining in ye proposals as soon as may be." At a meeting held a week later, pursuant to adjournment of this, it was resolved that "we do now appoint a committee to attentively observe the conduct of all persons within this town touching the rules and regulations prescribed by the Honorable Continental Congress, and will unanimously join our brethren in America in the common cause of defending our liberty."

Notwithstanding the overtures thus made, and the patriotic resolution adopted, the attempt of Plunkett to expel the Yankees was made; and though hostilities were then suspended till after the Revolution the latent bitter feeling was without doubt more intense by reason of this attempt. As the difficulties with the mother country thickened, and hope of reconciliation diminished, the patriotic ardor of the settlers increased. Measures were adopted to provide means of defense, and as early as March, 1776, by resolution at a town meeting, the selectmen were directed to dispose of the grain in the hands of the collector or treasurer, and purchase powder and lead to the amount of forty pounds. By another resolution a bounty of £10 was offered to the man who should first manufacture fifty pounds of good saltpetre. Mr. Miner states, on the authority of Mrs. John Jenkins, that the women took up the floors of their houses, leached the earth which they dug from under them, and made saltpetre by boiling the lye; then mixed it with charcoal and sulphur, and thus produced powder for public use.

On the breaking out of the war many young men from the Wyoming valley hastened to the scene of hostilities, and in the winter of 1775-6 some removed their families to Connecticut that they might join the army. Lieutenant Obadiah Gore, with twenty or thirty others, went to the field direct from the valley. After the declaration of independence it became evident that forts for the defense of the valley and for places of refuge in times of danger should be erected; and at a town meeting held August 24th, 1776, it was voted "that this meeting do recommend it to the people to proceed forthwith in building said forts without either fee or reward from ye town." Pursuant to this recommendation was built Fort Jenkins, a stockade around the house of John Jenkins at what is now West Pittston, just above the northwest end of the Pittston ferry bridge. Fort Wintermoot, about a mile farther down the river, near a fine spring, was built by some settlers from New Jersey, who were afterward more than suspected of being tories; and Forty Fort, so named from the forty original proprietors of the township of Kingston, was built near the center of the township and included about an acre of ground. Wilkes-Barre Fort was situated just above the mouth of Mill creek, to guard the mills on the stream. Wyoming Fort was on the east bank of the river, not far from the foot of South street in Wilkes-Barre; and Stewart's block house was also on the east bank of the river, about three miles below, in Hanover. There was also a stockade at Pittston, nearly opposite Fort Jenkins.

By reason of representations that had been made to Congress of the exposed condition of the valley to incursions by the Indians, who were becoming insolent and were suspected of favoring the British, Congress by resolution August 23d, 1776, authorized the raising in the town of Westmoreland of two full companies to be "stationed in proper places for the defense of the inhabitants of said town and parts adjacent till further order of Congress." These companies were by the terms of the resolution "liable to serve in any part of the United States when ordered by Congress." On the 26th of the same month Congress appointed as officers of these companies Robert Durkee and Samuel Ransom, captains; James Wells and Perrin Ross, first lieutenants; Asahel Buck and Simon Spalding, second lieutenants; and Herman Smith and Matthias Hollenback, ensigns. Lieutenant Buck resigned and John Jenkins, jr., was appointed to fill the vacancy. These companies were already in existence, under the captains named, as volunteer organizations, but they had not their full quotas of men till the 17th of September, when they were mustered into the United States service as the two independent companies of Westmoreland. The following is a copy of the muster roll of the first independent company from Wyoming in the Revolutionary army. Except Waterman Baldwin who enlisted January 7th, 1777, the members of this company enlisted September 17th, 1776.

The following is a copy of a pay roll of the 2nd independent company from Wyoming. Its term of service was three years from January 1st, 1777.

Of those who left this company and returned to Wyoming to take part in the battle on the 3d of July, 1778, the following were killed: Captain Robert Durkee, Captain Samuel Ransom, Lieutenant Timothy Pierce, Lieutenant James Wells, and privates Samuel Cole, Daniel Denton, William Dunn, Daniel Lawrence and Constant Searle.

It will be remembered that in the autumn of 1776 the army under General Washington retired from Long Island, followed by the advancing army of General Howe, and on the 8th of December crossed the Delaware. On the 12th of the same month Congress, by resolution, directed "that the two companies raised in the town of Westmoreland be ordered to join General Washington with all possible expedition;" an order which they at once obeyed, and reached the army before the close of the year. They were in the battle of Millstone on the 2nd of January, 1777, and their good conduct there elicited the commendations of their commanding officers. They were also in the battles of Bound Brook, Brandywine, Germantown and Mud Fort.

During the year 1777 the situation in the Wyoming valley was not materially changed. The alliance between the British and Indians, which had from the first been feared, notwithstanding the professions of neutrality of the latter, was formed on the 20th of June, when the Indians were taken by General Burgoyne into the British service and the price of $10 each for human scalps was offered them by him. Tories resided on the northern border of the settlement, as well as between Tunkhannock and Wyalusing; and between these and the Indians in the vicinity of Tioga, Chemung and Newtown it was learned that communication was kept up. Evidences of sympathy with the British government on the part of settlers to the north and west from the valley who came from New York, Delaware and lower Pennsylvania, became more and more apparent. Several persons who were suspected of tory sentiments had been arrested and sent to Connecticut by the committee of inspection, and in the autumn of this year several scouting parties were sent by the same committee up the river and between thirty and forty tories were arrested, some of them taken with arms in their hands. A conspiracy among them to bring the Tioga Indians on the settlement was broken up by the arrest of these Tories.

Hon. Peter M. Osterhout relates that Zebulon Marcy was with one of these scouting parties a short distance above Tunkhannock, and that "a Tory by the name of Adam Wortman (a Dutchman) came out of his house armed with a gun. His wife called to him, 'Shoot, Adam! Shoot!' Adam fired, and the ball struck an old fashioned iron tobacco box in the vest pocket of Marcy and lodged, making an indentation of the size of the bullet but doing no other damage. One of the party fired, giving Wortman a mortal wound. He begged for help and asked that they should send for a physician. Dr. William Hooker Smith, a noted surgeon who was called, remarked as he set out that if he was not dead when he arrived he would not live long afterward. The tobacco box is still in possession of the family."

It is proper here to state that these Tories alleged they had been driven to their affiliation with the British and Indians by the hostile attitude of the Yankees at Wyoming, who had persecuted and annoyed them because they had obtained the titles to their lands from the State of Pennsylvania; and that the Indians became hostile to the Americans because of the conduct of the Connecticut settlers.

Although the Indians had up to the close of this year made no descent on the valley, they had taken prisoners some whom the Tories had betrayed into their hands, and among them Lieutenant John Jenkins, who was taken to Niagara and afterward to Montreal. He subsequently escaped, and arrived home in June of the next year.

The patriotism of the people here is attested by the fact that burdens greatly disproportioned to those of other citizens of Connecticut were imposed on them and borne for the sake of the cause with but few murmurs. The two companies that had been raised in Westmoreland for the defense of the town, and ordered to the field in an emergency, were retained to contribute toward the half filled quota of Connecticut. According to a calculation by the excellent historian Miner, Westmoreland had in the field more than eight times its proportion of the quota of that State; and these troops were retained as before stated to swell the quota of Connecticut, leaving only old men and boys to defend the settlement against sudden irruptions of Indians, notwithstanding its isolated condition. Six forts were in process of construction by these people "without fee or reward," and the military organizations of these exempt men were constantly in requisition to guard against surprise or to go upon scouts. The town was taxed by the State of Connecticut to the amount of £2,000. In view of the fact that the town had steadfastly maintained its allegiance to the province, without assistance from the latter, when it was repeatedly invaded, and had sent the flower of its youth to help fill the quota of the State, it is, as Miner says, a matter of surprise "that a sum so considerable, or indeed any sum, should be demanded of Wyoming for the purposes of the State treasury at Hartford."

A few quotations will show by what kind of a spirit the people were animated at that time:

"At a town meeting legally warned, holden December 30th, 1777, John Jenkins was chosen moderator for ye work of ye day."

"Voted by this town, that the committee of inspection be empowered to supply the soters' wives and the soters' widows and their families with the necessaries of life."

Of this vote Miner says: "Let it be engraved on plates of silver! Let it be printed in letters of gold! Challenge Rome in her republican glory, or Greece in her democratic pride, to produce, circumstances considered, an act more generous and noble."

Of the women it was said: "Justice and gratitude demand a tribute to the praiseworthy spirit of the wives and daughters of Wyoming. While their husbands and fathers were away on public duty they cheerfully assumed a large portion of the labor which females could do. They assisted to plant, made the hay, husked and gathered the corn and gathered the harvest."

The commencement of the year 1778 found the aspect of affairs somewhat changed in America. General Burgoyne had been defeated and had surrendered at Saratoga, and there was no effective British force to prosecute a campaign for that year. The avowed policy of the enemy was therefore to carry on a devastating frontier warfare by Tories and Indians. Under these circumstances, of course, the fears of the inhabitants of this valley were excited for their own safety. By their energetic measures against the Tories up the river they had incurred their deadly hatred, and they had well grounded reasons to apprehend an attack from these and the Indians of the Six Nations beyond. They also had reason to fear that for strategic purposes the settlement would be attacked. Its destruction would remove the only barrier to a descent on the German settlements farther south, or an attack on it would divert the American forces from other points. Early in the year it became known that preparations were being made for attacks on the frontiers of New York, Pennsylvania and Virginia, and appeals were made to Congress for protection. To these appeals Congress responded by authorizing the town of Westmoreland to raise a company of infantry for the defense of the town and the settlements of the neighborhood against Indians and other enemies, "and that the said company find their own arms, accoutrements and blankets." In other words, they appealed for help and received a gracious permission to help themselves, after their means for doing so had been exhausted. Miner justly says: "Wyoming seems to have been doomed by a selfishness which cannot be designated except by terms which respect forbids us to employ."

As early as May it was expected from the appearance of Indian scouts in the vicinity that an attack on the valley was meditated, and these suspicions were confirmed when, on the 2nd of June, Lieutenant John Jenkins returned from his captivity and informed the settlers that the plan had been formed at Niagara to invade the frontier. At about the same time an Indian spy who came into the settlement was made drunk, and while in that condition revealed the fact that an attack on the valley was soon to be made. During the month of June attacks were made on frontier settlements at various points. Jenkins says: "The whole frontier was aglow with fire, desolation and death, beneath the fagot, tomahawk, rifle and scalping knife of the Indians and their cruel and implacable allies the British and tories."

During the month of June some acts of hostility by the Indians and tories occurred. On the 12th William Crooks was shot and scalped about two miles above Tunkhannock at the abandoned house of the tory John Secord; and on the 17th a reconnoitering party of six were fired on about six miles below Tunkhannock, and one of the party, named Miner Robbins, killed, and another, named Joel Phelps, wounded.

When the threatening aspects of affairs in the valley came to be known in the field, Captains Durkee and Ransom, of the companies from Westmoreland, with Lieutenants Wells and Ross and about 20 privates, left and hastened home. The companies were then, by a resolution of Congress passed June 23d, 1778, consolidated, under Captain Simon Spalding; and afterward, it is said, were ordered to march to Lancaster, and still later to Wyoming, but not in season to be of service.

In the latter part of June it became known that the forces of the enemy were concentrating at Newtown and Tioga, preparatory to a descent on the valley. These forces consisted of about four hundred British and tories, under Major John Butler, and four or five hundred Indians, largely composed of Senecas. They descended the Susquehanna and landed not far from the mouth of Bowman's creek, where they remained until they were joined by about two hundred more Senecas, who had been to the west branch. They left the large boats here and passed with the smaller ones down to the "Three Islands," fifteen miles above the valley. They marched thence to Sutton's creek, where they were encamped on the evening of the 30th. On the morning of that day a party of twelve from Fort Jenkins passed up the river a few miles to their work. Toward evening they were attacked by the Indians; several were killed, others taken prisoners and four escaped, arriving at the fort on the morning of July 1st. While the settlers were marching on that day, under the command of Colonel Zebulon Butler, of the Continental army (then at home), and Colonel Denison and Lieutenant Colonel Dorrance, to bring down the bodies of their slain neighbors, the enemy were marching toward the valley on the northwestern side of the mountain, on the eastern side of which they encamped, in full view of the valley. On the morning of the 2nd Fort Wintermoot was opened to them by its tory occupants, and on the evening of the same day the garrison of Fort Jenkins capitulated. The day was spent by the settlers in gathering the women and children in places of safety, mostly in Forty Fort, which was about four miles below Fort Wintermoot, and in making preparations for defense. Steuben Jenkins thus describes the condition of things in the valley on the 3d:

"The upper part of the valley, on the west side of the river, was in the hands of the enemy, numbering 1,100 men, well armed and equipped, thirsting for conquest and blood.

"So complete and effective was their possession that no person had been able to pass their lines to give information of either their numbers, position or purpose.

"Jenkins's Fort, on the Susquehanna, just above the west end of the Pittston ferry bridge, was in their possession, having capitulated the day before, but possession had not been taken until this morning.

"Wintermoot Fort, situate on the bank of the plain, about a mile and a half below and about half a mile from the river, had been in their possession all the day before, and was used as their headquarters.

"Forty Fort, some four miles further down the river, situate on the west bank of the Susquehanna, was the largest and strongest fort in the valley. Thither had fled all the people on the west side of the river on the 1st and 2nd, and this was to be the gathering point of the patriot band. The Wilkes-Barre and Pittston forts were the gathering points for the people in their immediate neighborhood.

"The forces, such as they were, were distributed throughout the valley somewhat as follows:

"The Kingston company, commanded by Captain Aholiab Buck, numbering about forty men, was at Forty Fort.

"The Shawnee company, commanded by Captain Asaph Whittlesey, numbering about forty-four men, was at Forty Fort.

"The Hanover company, commanded by Captain William McKarrachen, numbering about thirty, was at home, in Hanover.

"The upper Wilkes-Barre company, commanded by Captain Rezin Geer, numbering about thirty men, was at Wilkes-Barre.

"The lower Wilkes-Barre company, commanded by Captain James Bidlack, jr., numbering about thirty-eight men, was at Wilkes-Barre.

"The Pittston company, commanded by Captain Jeremiah Blanchard, numbering about forty men, was at Pittston Fort.

"The Huntington and Salem company, commanded by Captain John Franklin, numbering about thirty-five men, was at home.

"These were the militia, or train-bands, of the settlement, and included all who were able to bear arms, without regard to age. Old men and boys were enrolled in them.

"Then there was Captain Detrick Hewitt's company, formed and kept together under the resolution of Congress, to which reference has already been made.

"Besides these, there was a number who were not enrolled in any of the companies, numbering about one hundred; and in addition, there were a number in the valley who had been driven from the settlements up the river. Making altogether in the valley a force of men of all ages, and boys, numbering about four hundred."

Colonel Zebulon Butler, who had been designated to command the forces in the valley, was at Wilkes-Barre, placing things in order for defense there. On the morning of the 3d a flag was sent by Major Butler demanding the unconditional surrender of Forty Fort, with Captain Hewitt's company and the public stores, and threatening to move on them at once in case of a refusal. Colonel Denison, who was in command of the fort, refused, and sent immediately for Colonel Butler, who ordered up the two companies from Wilkes-Barre and the one from Hanover. It was decided on consultation to hold the fort; and in order to secure delay for the possible arrival of the company of Captain Spalding, who it was learned was on the way, and also that of Captain Franklin, a flag was sent to Major Butler, asking for a conference. This flag was fired on, as were two others that were afterward sent out. At 3 P. M. a force of about four hundred including old men and boys, left Forty Fort and marched up the valley to protect it against the prowling Indians. They proceeded about a mile and halted at Abraham's creek, where the road now crosses it on a stone bridge. Another flag was sent from that point, but it was fired on, and up to this time the scouts which had been sent out had brought no definite information as to the strength and probable designs of the enemy. A discussion arose here as to the measures proper to be adopted in view of the circumstances, and the debate became very earnest, and even personal. Some of the most sanguine demanded to be led forward and attack the enemy at once, while the more cool and judicious opposed this course. Scouts reported that the enemy was probably preparing to leave the valley. Charges of cowardice were made, and the Hanover company became mutinous and threatened a revolt. An advance was decided on, and they proceeded to a point near the hill just below the monument, where they were met by scouts who reported Fort Wintermoot on fire and the enemy leaving the valley. They advanced to a point near the southwestern bounds of the fair ground, where they formed in line of battle, extending some 1,600 feet northwesterly from the edge of the terrace which forms the plain. In this order they advanced cautiously about a mile, and when within forty or fifty rods of Fort Wintermoot they counted the line off into odds and evens, and each advanced alternately ten paces and fired while the others loaded. As they advanced the enemy fell back before them. When the line had reached a point as far up as Fort Wintermoot, the line of the British and Tories was formed behind a log fence on the opposite side of a cleared field. The firing had become general along these lines. The Indians, who were concealed behind the shrubbery of a marsh to the left, broke from their cover and made an impetuous attack on that flank. To prevent them from gaining the rear, Colonel Denison, who commanded the left wing, gave the order to fall back and form an oblique line. This order was misunderstood and confusion was the result. Jenkins says of the battle after this:

"The Indians, meantime, rushed in upon them, yelling, brandishing their spears and tomahawks, and the British and Tories pressed down upon them in front, pouring in a terrible fire.

"Broken, borne down by overwhelming numbers, and pressed by an irresistible force, the left gave way and fell back on the right. The movement was rapid and confused and brought confusion on the right. From confusion to disorder, from disorder to broken lines, and thence to flight, were but steps in regular gradation. The flight became a slaughter, the slaughter a massacre. Such was the battle.

"It was impossible that the result of the battle should have been different. The enemy was three to one, and had the advantage of position. Our men fought bravely, but it was of no avail.

"Every captain fell at his position in the line, and there the men lay like sheaves of wheat after the harvesters."

The fugitives were pursued by the Indians and Tories, who vied with each other in the work of slaughter. Space will not permit a detail of all the horrors of that night. The following account of the tragedy at what is known as Queen Esther's Rock (which still lies on the field), is taken from Jenkins's centennial address:

"On the evening of the battle sixteen of the prisoners taken on the field of battle and in the flight, under promise of quarter, were collected together by their savage captors around a rock near the brow of the hill at the southeast of the village of Wyoming, and a little more than a mile from the field of action. The rock at that time was about two feet high on its eastern front, with a surface four or five feet square, running back to a level with the ground and beneath it at its western extremity. The prisoners were arranged in a ring around this rock, and were surrounded with a body of two hundred savages, under the leadership and inspiration of Queen Esther, a fury in the form of woman, who assumed the office of executioner. The victims, one at a time, were taken from the devoted circle and led to the east front of the rock, where they were made to sit down. They were then taken by the hair and their heads pulled back on the rock, when the bloody Queen Esther with death-maul would dash out their brains. The savages, as each victim was in this manner immolated, would dance around in a ring, holding each others' hands, shouting and hallooing, closing with the death-whoop. In this manner fourteen of the party had been put to death. The fury of the savage queen increased with the work of blood. Seeing there was no other way or hope of deliverance, Lebbeus Hammond, one of the prisoners, in a fit of desperation, with a sudden spring broke through the circle of Indians and fled toward the mountain. Rifles cracked!

Tomahawks flew! Indians yelled! But Hammond held on his course for about fifty rods, when he stumbled and fell, but sprang up again. Stopping for a moment to listen, he found his pursuers on each side of him, or a little ahead, running and yelling like demons. He stepped behind a large pine tree to take breath, when, reflecting that his pursuers being already ahead of him he would gain nothing by going on in that direction, he turned and ran for the river in such a course as to avoid the party around the fatal rock, and yet to keep an eye on them. He passed by without being seen, went down and plunged into the high grass in the swampy ground at the foot of the hill, where he remained concealed for about two hours, watching the movements and listening to the yells of his savage pursuers. He finally crawled out of his concealment, cautiously made his way to the river, and thence down to the fort."

On the morning of the 4th, Major Butler sent a flag to Forty Fort, inviting Colonel Denison to come to his headquarters and agree on terms of capitulation. During the time that was granted for consultation Colonel Zebulon Butler and the survivors of Captain Hewitt's company fled, to avoid being given up as prisoners, as demanded at first by Major Butler. The terms of capitulation agreed on were honorable, and it is believed that Major Butler exerted himself to have them strictly carried out. The Indians, however, as he alleged, could not be controlled. They set fire to the village of Wilkes-Barre, which was consumed and plundered, and burned the property of the settlers, in violation of these terms. He said to Colonel Denison: "Make out a list of the property lost, and I pledge my honor it shall be paid for." It is just to state that Major Butler requested to have a quantity of whiskey which was in the fort destroyed before he took possession, to prevent the Indians from being made mad with it; and that the barrels, sixteen in number, were rolled into the river, and the heads were knocked in after they were afloat.

It is but justice to say of Major Butler that his conduct was not marked by the atrocities that some have imputed to him. Miner says of him that his haste to depart from the valley "can only be accounted for on the supposition that he was sickened by the tortures already committed, dreaded the further cruelties of the Indians, and desired by his absence to escape the responsibility of their future conduct." He left the valley on the 8th. A portion of the Indians remained after his departure and continued the work of wanton destruction.

The statements of the number slain in this battle and massacre have varied from 160 to 360. Probably it may be safely estimated at 300. The names which have been ascertained, and inscribed on the monument that has been erected to the memory of the heroes of this battle, are given in the history of the village of Wyoming.

On the night of the massacre most of the inhabitants of the valley had fled, either down the river or to the east, and many of those who remained escaped on the night of the 4th. The number who thus became fugitives is not known, but it has been estimated at 2,000. Most of them were women and children, whose protectors were in the Continental army or were lying dead on the battle field. On crossing the river they plunged into the mountain wilderness, beyond which lay a wide and dismal swamp. How many perished in their flight over the mountains and through this swamp, or by what sufferings and lingering tortures they died, will never be known.

It is known, however, that hundreds were never again seen after they left the valley, and because of the number that perished in the swamp it was called "The Shades of Death."

At the time of the battle Captain Spalding's company was within forty or fifty miles of the valley, marching toward it. On the evening of the 5th they met the foremost of the fugitives. They continued their march till they arrived at the top of the mountain range overlooking the valley, when they separated into parties to protect the fugitives, and after a few days followed them in their flight, scouring the forest and assisting those who were exhausted by fatigue and hunger. In this way they saved many from perishing. They thus assisted the fugitives in their flight as far as Stroudsburg and remained till the 4th of August. They then, accompanied by many of these fugitives, returned to the valley, of which they held possession until the close of the war.

Although no force was afterward during the year 1778 sent against the valley, the Indians continued to prowl around the settlements, and from time to time steal on those whom they found in their fields or houses unprepared to defend themselves, for the purpose of obtaining scalps, prisoners or plunder.

In September Colonel Hartley, of the Pennsylvania troops, with a force of 130 men, including a company of Wyoming volunteers commanded by Captain Franklin, made a successful expedition against the Indians on the west branch and at Tioga, destroying their towns and property. After the return of this expedition the Indians re-appeared in this vicinity, and from their secure hiding places in the mountains continued their predatory attacks on such settlers as returned and attempted to cultivate their fields. Many were killed by savage scalping parties in their stealthy descents, and many others carried into captivity. Among the latter was Frances Slocum, whose romantic story has often been told. She was taken on the 2nd of November, when only five years old, from her father's house near Fort Wilkes-Barre and carried into captivity. No tidings were ever received of her till about sixty years later, when she was discovered near Logansport, Ind., and visited by her brothers. She had forgotten her native language, had survived her Indian husband and reared a family of children. She refused to return to her kindred, preferring to remain with her family and the people among whom her life had been passed, and whose habits, religion, etc., she had adopted.

The bodies of those who were slain at the battle and massacre of the 3d of July remained on the field till the 22nd of the following October, when a guard was detailed from Camp Westmoreland, under Lieutenant John Jenkins, for the protection of those to whom was assigned the melancholy duty of interring these martyrs.

During about two months in the winter of 1778-9 the depredations of the prowling Indians were suspended; but in March, 1779, a force of about 250 appeared in the valley, and after a demonstration against a block house in Kingston, and the theft of some sixty head of cattle, failing to draw the forces defending the valley into an ambush, they boldly approached the Wilkes-Barre fort, which was garrisoned by only 100 men, though urgent appeals for more had been made by Colonel Butler. They were repulsed from the fort, but continued their work of plunder in the valley. Colonel Butler was reinforced by a German regiment of about three hundred, and soon drove the marauders from the open portions of the valley. They hovered about in the mountains, however, waylaying people in the passes, and with much audacity making occasional descents into the valley. Near Laurel Run, some four miles from the fort, they ambushed Major Powell, with a small regiment that was marching to the valley, and succeeded in throwing his forces into confusion. Succor from the fort arrived and escorted this small force to the valley.

During the spring and early summer of 1779 active preparations were made for a campaign into the country of the Six Nations. General Sullivan was placed in command of this expedition, and the force, consisting of about three thousand men, made their rendezvous on the flats below Wilkes-Barre and in Fort Durkee. These preparations were of course watched by the wily foe, who knew well what was the object of the expedition, and who sought by attacks on Freeland's Fort on the west branch, Minisink, in Orange county, N. Y., and a settlement on the Lackawaxen, to divert the attention of General Sullivan and divide his army; but this expedient failed.

On the 24th of July a large fleet of boats from the lower Susquehanna arrived, loaded with military stores. On the 28th ninety wagons, loaded also with military stores, arrived, and on the 31st the expedition marched, leaving a garrison at Wyoming under Colonel Z. Butler. The land force marched up the east side of the river, halting from time to time and waiting at their camping places to enable the boats to keep within a safe distance. According to Colonel Hubley's journal, as published in the appendix to Miner's history, they encamped the first night at the confluence of the Lackawanna and Susquehanna rivers. On the 1st of August they marched about seven miles, to a place called Quilutimunk, where they encamped. A portion of the army passed over the mountain to guard against surprise by the savages, and the encampment was not reached till near morning. They remained at this place through the 2nd, and on the 3d marched to a point above the mouth of the Tunkhannock. On the 4th they marched about fourteen miles and encamped on Vanderlip's and Williamson's farms. On the 5th they marched to Wyalusing, passing a place called Depue's farm, where Colonel Hartley had been attacked by the Indians the previous year. On the 9th they arrived at Shesequin or Queen Esther's Plains, and on the 11th at Tioga Point. Here a junction was effected with General Clinton, who with his force had come down from Otsego lake, the head waters of the Susquehanna, in boats on an artificial freshet, made by damming the outlet of that lake. After the junction the combined army moved forward, penetrated the country of the savages on the Susquehanna and Genesee rivers, burned their towns, destroyed their crops and property, and inflicted on them injuries from which they never recovered. Having accomplished their work they returned to Wyoming, where they arrived early in October, and were welcomed at a sumptuous entertainment by Colonel Butler.

In this campaign only forty men were lost, by sickness or otherwise, out of more than three thousand. On the 10th of October this army left Wyoming for Easton. Says Marshall, as quoted by Miner: "While Sullivan laid waste the country on the Susquehanna another expedition was carried on from Pittsburg up the Allegheny against the Mingo, Muncy and Seneca tribes. At the head of between six and seven hundred men he advanced two hundred miles up the river and destroyed the villages and cornfields on its head branches."

It was confidently hoped that the chastisement which Sullivan had inflicted on the savages had so crippled them as to prevent further depredation, and a sense of security began to be entertained among the settlers who remained. This, however, was of short duration. Exasperated and thirsting for revenge, the Indians reappeared among the mountains about Wyoming in prowling marauding bands in the spring of 1780, and many depredations were committed on the settlers who had ventured farther away from the forts in the towns of Kingston, Plymouth and Hanover. Did space permit many instances might be given of the murder or capture of the inhabitants and the adventures and escapes of the prisoners. The garrison at Wilkes-Barre had come to be so weak that pursuit from it was not feared, and many scalping parties passed the settlement for the purpose of committing depredations farther south. In September, 1780, a band secretly passed Wyoming, crossed the river near the mouth of Nescopeck creek and surprised a party of men at Sugarloaf valley, killing thirteen; took away some prisoners and booty, and on their return burned the Shickshinny mills and many grain stacks. In December a raid on the valley was made by nineteen white men and five Indians and seven prisoners were taken away.

The Lackawanna valley was not, like Wyoming, the theater of active operations in the Revolutionary war. It was scarcely settled till after the close of that contest, and only afforded hiding places for scalping parties of savages.

During the years 1781 and 1782 the valley and the vicinity were several times visited by small parties of Indians, who pillaged, murdered and took away prisoners, but no attack was made by any considerable force. It is worthy of remark that no settlement on the frontiers suffered more severely in proportion to its population during the Revolution than Wyoming valley. The loss at the battle July 3d, 1778, as before stated, has been estimated at 300, and it was thought that 200 more perished in their flight. These, along with those who were from time to time during the succeeding four years murdered by the Indians, amount to more than one-fifth of the entire population of the valley at the time of the massacre.

In addition to this the sufferings of the survivors were great and the destruction of property was immense.

CHAPTER VII.

CIVIL HISTORY—BOUNDARIES, ORGANIZATION, COUNTY BUILDINGS AND CIVIL LIST.

THE struggle for the possession of this region by settlers who claimed it as a part of Connecticut has been described. The government of Connecticut took the same position; and the Assembly of that State in January, 1774, created from the territory claimed by it west of the Delaware river the town of Westmoreland, as a part of Litchfield county. On the east this vast town was bounded by the Delaware river; on the west by a meridian passing fifteen miles west of the Wyoming settlements; on the south by the forty-first and on the north by the forty-second parallel of north latitude—the present Pennsylvania and New York line.

On the 2nd of the following March the voters of the new town, in town meeting assembled, organized Westmoreland by the election of a hundred officers (about half the voting population), consisting of treasurer, selectmen, constables and collectors of rates, surveyors of highways, fence viewers, listers, leather sealers, grand jurors, tithing men, sealers of weights and measures and key keepers. Colonel Zebulon Butler was elected treasurer; Christopher Avery, John Jenkins, Nathaniel Landon, Samuel Ransom, Caleb Bates, Silas Parke and Roswell Franklin, selectmen; and Asa Stevens, Timothy Smith, Jonathan Haskel, Asaph Whittlesy, Noah Adams, Phineas Clark and William Smith, constables and collectors of rates.

At the autumn session of the Connecticut Legislature in 1776 Westmoreland was made a county, and at the next session John Jenkins was appointed judge of the county court for the ensuing year. The whole period of Westmoreland's administrative connection with Connecticut corresponds very nearly with the duration of the Revolutionary war. When made a town it contained the townships of Wilkes-Barre, Hanover, Plymouth, Kingston and Pittston, established by the Susquehanna Company; and to these were added before its severance from Connecticut Huntington, Salem, Newport, Providence, Exeter, Bedford, Northumberland, Tunkhannock, Braintrim, Springfield, Claverack and Ulster. The population of Westmoreland in 1774 was 1,922. The assessment accompanying the tax list of 1775 was £13,083.

The following list of justices of the peace at Wyoming under Connecticut was kindly contributed by the Hon. Steuben Jenkins:

Under the constitution of 1838 justices of the peace and aldermen were elected in cities, boroughs and townships to serve for five years, and under the act of Assembly of the 21st of June, 1839, the first election took place in 1840.

Under the constitution of 1873 justices of the peace and aldermen were to be elected for five years, and under the act of Assembly of the 22nd of March, 1877, commissions were to take effect from the first Monday of May, the governor having power to appoint to vacancies up to 30 days after the next municipal election.

The justices for townships, and aldermen for boroughs under the constitution of 1838 and subsequent enactments will be found in the township, borough and city histories.

When this region, by the Trenton decree of 1782, finally came under the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania, it became a part of the county of Northumberland (county seat Sunbury), which had been taken in 1772 from Northampton (county seat Easton), the latter covering a large section of the original county of Bucks, from which it was formed in 1752.

"To extend to the remote settlement at Wyoming the advantage of civil government, in which they might participate, affording them an opportunity to administer their local affairs by persons having the confidence of the inhabitants, chosen by themselves; to give the people an efficient representation in the council and Assembly, so that their voice might be heard, their interests explained and their influence fairly appreciated," a new county was formed on the 26th of September, 1786, from part of the territory of Northumberland. It was named Luzerne from the Chevalier de la Luzerne, a most popular minister from the French court during the Revolution and for many years afterward a prominent figure in the public eye; and was bounded as follows: "Beginning at the mouth of Nescopeck creek, and running along the south bank thence eastward to the head of said creek; from thence a due east course to the head branch of Lehigh creek; thence along the east bank of said Lehigh creek to the head thereof; from thence a due north course to the northern boundary of the State; thence westward along said boundary until it crosses the east branch of Susquehanna, and then along the said northern boundary fifteen miles west of the said river Susquehanna; thence by a straight line to the head of Towanda; thence along the ridge which divides the waters of the east branch of the Susquehanna from those of the west branch, to a point due west from the mouth of the Nescopeck; thence east to the place of beginning."

The act creating the county provided for an election on the second Tuesday of the following October, to choose county officers and representatives in the Legislature; and that Zebulon Butler, Nathaniel Landon, Jonah Rogers, Simon Spalding and John Phillips should be a commission to buy a site for the county buildings.

On the 27th of May, 1787, the Court of Common Pleas convened for its first session at the house of Zebulon Butler, corner of Northampton and River streets, Wilkes-Barre. The justices constituting the court were William Hooker Smith, Benjamin Carpenter and James Nesbit. They admitted to practice as attorneys Ebenezer Bowman, Putnam Catlin, Roswell Wells and William Nichols. Colonel Timothy Pickering was commissioned prothonotary of the court, surrogate and county clerk.

The original territory of Luzerne county was first reduced by the annexation of a part to Lycoming county in 1804; in 1808 its boundaries were extended south of Nescopeck creek; in 1810 Susquehanna and part of Bradford were taken off, and in 1842 Wyoming; and in 1856 the present southern boundary was established by the annexation of part of Foster township to Carbon county. The latest and most important change was the creation of Lackawanna county, of which an account is given in the history of that county.

In 1790 the county court divided the county into eleven townships. These retained the old names of Wilkes-Barre, Pittston, Hanover, Newport, Exeter, Plymouth, Kingston, Salem, Tioga, Wyalusing and Tunkhannock, but the territory of those townships which had existed under the Connecticut jurisdiction was extended. The further formation and modification of townships are described in the township histories.

The commissioners, named above, to procure a site for county buildings made choice of the public square in Wilkes-Barre; and in 1791 there was erected a two-story hewn log building, about sixty feet long and half as wide, of which the second story was the court-room (approached by steps outside), and the lower floor was for the jail and the jailer.

This structure gave way in 1801 for the building of a new court house on the same site. The old one was occupied, however, during the construction of the new, which was finished in 1804, when the log building became the Wilkes-Barre Academy.

The new court-house, which was in the shape of a cross and had a low tower and a belfry in the center of the roof, cost $9,356.06, and was used more than fifty years. In the year after the commencement of its construction a jail was built on the corner of Market and Washington streets, and between 1809 and 1812 a fireproof building for the county records, the three costing about $24,000.

In 1835 the Legislature authorized the erection of the present court-house, and its corner stone was laid August 12th, 1856. Under the supervision chiefly of Benjamin F. Pfauts, William A. Tubbs and Silas Dodson it was completed and furnished at a cost of $85,000. The architect was J. C. Wells, of New York, and the builder D. A. Fell. Provision is made in this building for the public offices, which formerly occupied a separate one.

The jail begun in 1802 served until 1870, although long before that time it had proved inadequate to the demands upon it and was unworthy of the advanced position of the commonwealth in the matter of prison discipline.

On the 2nd of April, 1867, the contract for the building of a new jail was awarded to Lewis Havens, at $189,575. On the 18th of August, 1870, the sheriff was ordered to remove the prisoners to this jail, and on the 4th of November in the same year the building was accepted from the contractor. An expenditure of $18,500.93 above the contract price was incurred for additional and extra work. From a report furnished by the clerk of the county commissioners it appears that the building and furniture cost $302,536.92. It is located above North street, between River street and the Susquehanna, in the city of Wilkes-Barre. It is built of stone brought from Campbell's ledge, opposite Pittston. It occupies a lot of five acres, and the building covers three-fourths of an acre. It is a fireproof structure, and it is at the same time substantially and tastefully built and elegantly painted inside. It has in both wings seventy-two cells, thirty-two of which are double, sufficient in all for 104 prisoners.

The building is heated by three furnaces, and all the cooking and heating of water are done by them. It is ventilated by a fan, which is propelled by an engine—precisely as coal mines are ventilated.

There are few, if any, prisons in this portion of the State that are equal to this in the excellence of their construction and arrangements, especially with regard to cleanliness and healthfulness.

Under the old State system each city, borough and township maintained and cared for the poor within its limits. About the year 1858, the question of erecting a county poor-house was submitted to the people in accordance with an act of Assembly, and decided in the negative. By special legislation portions of the county were then erected into poor districts, each under a special act.

In 1860, by an act of Assembly, the township of Wilkes-Barre was made a poor district and a farm was purchased in the township of Newport, about four miles below Nanticoke, on the east side of the river. In 1861 the Central poor district of Luzerne county was incorporated. This district embraces the townships of Wilkes-Barre, Plains, Kingston, Plymouth, Hanover and Newport, the boroughs of Kingston, Plymouth, Ashley, Sugar Notch and Nanticoke, and the city of Wilkes-Barre.

In 1863 the first poor-house was built, on the farm purchased by Wilkes-Barre in 1860. It was a framed building 35 by 74 feet, three stories in height above the basement, which was finished for cooking and dining apartments. This with the old farm house and a small kitchen constituted the poor-house up to 1879, when another building was erected. This was of brick, 35 by 76 feet, three stories in height, with a finished basement, which is used as a laundry. The female paupers occupy this building, the old wooden structure being used exclusively for males.

This was incorporated on the 8th of May, 1857, under the corporate name of "The Poor District of Jenkins township, Pittston borough and Pittston township." The first directors were John D. Stark, Peter Winters, William Ford and Ebenezer Drake.

This board of directors in 1857 purchased a farm of 160 acres in the township of Ransom, now in the county of Lackawanna. The farm house standing on this farm was used as a poor-house till the year 1877, when the present fine brick structure was erected. This is three stories in height above the basement, which is used as a kitchen and place of work. The building is capable of accommodating one hundred paupers. The present directors are Paul Bohan, L. C. Hessler, Francis Yates and Charles Banker.

Criminals convicted of capital offenses have been executed at Wilkes-Barre as follows: July 1st, 1779, Michael Rosebury, by order of General Sullivan, for instigating desertions from the latter's command; James Cadden, March 2nd, 1849, for the murder of Daniel Gilligan below Wilkes-Barre; Reese Evans, September 9th, 1853, for shooting Lewis Reese on the Kingston flats in order to rob him; James Quinn, April 21st, 1854, for the murder of Mahala Wiggins on the canal near the Nanticoke dam; William Muller, April 30th, 1858, for the murder of George Mathias, a few miles from Wilkes-Barre, on the Easton road.

In 1790 Luzerne county had a population of 4,904; in 1800, 12,839; 1810, 18,109; 1820 (after the formation of Susquehanna and Bradford), 20,027; 1830, 27,305; 1840, 44,006; 1850 (after the formation of Wyoming county), 56,072; 1860, 90,254; 1870, 160,755.

In the early history of political parties in this county, the Federalists, who favored a strong national government, had a large majority. Within the memory of the present generation the Democrats have oftenest had the ascendancy. Below will be found lists of the citizens who have administered the affairs of the county and represented it in various legislative bodies.

In the spring after the formation of the town of Westmoreland Zebulon Butler and Timothy Smith, and in the autumn of that year Christopher Avery and John Jenkins appeared before the Assembly of Connecticut on behalf of the new town. Timothy Smith had attended the last three previous sessions; Joseph Sluman the last two and John Jenkins the last one. Captain Butler and Joseph Sluman were the next representatives in that body of whom we find record. Butler was also a member in the autumn session of 1775, in which Major Ezekiel Pierce was his colleague, and in the spring session of 1776 we find John Jenkins and Solomon Strong. Colonel Nathan Denison was a member in the spring sessions of 1778 and 1779, and the autumn sessions of 1776, 1778 and 1880. John Jenkins and Isaac Tripp were the Assemblymen at both sessions of 1777; Anderson Dana in the spring, and Asahel Buck in the October session of 1778. John Hurlbut served in the spring sessions of 1779, 1780 and 1781, and the autumn session of 1780. Jonathan Fitch was a member in the spring sessions of 1780, 1781 and 1782, and the autumn session of 1782. Obadiah Gore and John Franklin were the members at the spring session of 1781, and the former attended both sessions in 1782.

John Sherman of Westmoreland was appointed judge of probate and justice of the peace for Litchfield county, Conn., in 1775.

Stewart Pearce gives the following list of president judges after the adoption of the constitution of 1790: Jacob Rush, 1791-1806; Thomas Cooper, 1806-11; Seth Chapman, 1811-13; John B. Gibson, 1813-16; Thomas Burnside, 1816-18; David Scott, 1818-38; William Jessup, 1838-41; John N. Conyngham, 1841-70. Garrick M. Harding was the incumbent in 1870-79. Charles E. Rice was commissioned in January, 1880.

Under the act of June 27th, 1867, creating the office of additional law judge in Luzerne county, H. M. Hoyt was appointed to that office. At the election the same year E. L. Dana was elected for the term of ten years. John Handley was elected under an act giving still another law judge to the county. In 1877 W. H. Stanton was elected. He resigned in about a year. In 1879 Charles E. Rice was elected, but was commissioned president judge in January, 1880, and Stanley Woodard was appointed additional law judge.

Up to 1860 this county belonged to a Congressional district which also included Berks, Bucks, Northampton, Northumberland and other counties. The first representative from Luzerne county, David Scott, of Wikes-Barre, was elected in 1816. He resigned on being appointed president judge. CHAPTER VIII.

LOCAL MILITARY ORGANIZATIONS—SERVICE IN CANADA AND MEXICO AND AT HOME.

IT does not appear that previous to the Revolutionary war there existed in the Wyoming valley any regular military organization. As a historian of those times (James A. Gordon) has said, "Every settler was practically an independent company of himself. He carried his own rifle, marched generally under the orders of the 'town meeting' either against the Indian, Pennamite or tory, as the case might be; furnished his own rations and ammunition, and paid himself from his own military chest—if he had one. But after the Declaration of Independence the State of Connecticut assumed the military control of this region, and two companies were raised here under her authority."

Even after the decree of Trenton, by which Pennsylvania acquired territorial jurisdiction, no organization except of voluntary unauthorized companies for resistance to the Pennamites existed prior to 1786. In that year the county of Luzerne was organized, and the militia laws of Pennsylvania were extended over it, as in other portions of the State. A brigade and regiments were formed here, and from the record of his commission in the recorder's office, bearing date April 11th, 1793, it appears that Jesse Fell was appointed brigade inspector for a term of seven years.

Now this same Jesse Fell was a Quaker, recently from Bucks county; yet, notwithstanding he was a professed noncombatant, he donned the regular uniform, with the appropriate feathers, and, mounted on his charger, performed the functions required of him, much to the chagrin of the "meeting" to which he belonged.

The following notice is found in the files of the Wilkes-Barre Gazette, under the date of January 16th, 1798:

"MILITIA.—The Militia officers commanding companies in the Luzerne county brigade, who have not made returns of the absentees on the company and regimental days in October last, are requested to complete their returns by the first day of February next; and those persons liable by law to militia duty charged with fines as absentees are requested to make payment by the day aforesaid, or they must pay the fees of collecting.

"JESSE FELL, Brigade Inspector."

It thus appears that those liable to military duty were required to meet for "training" two days each year, under penalty.

Among the old manuscripts in the possession of Steuben Jenkins is the record of a draft made from the companies of the third regiment in January, 1794, and another in October, 1797; but it does not appear for what purposes these drafts were made. As elsewhere stated, the militia of the State was reorganized in 1822.

To meet emergencies which arose from time to time volunteer companies were organized in Luzerne county. Such organizations did service in the suppression of the whiskey insurrection, during the prospect of war with France in 1800, and in the war of 1812.

In the early part of the present century several independent military organizations existed here at different times. The earliest among these of which anything is known was the

WYOMING BLUES.

This company, which it appears originated about the close of the last century, had a prosperous existence for some years. Gordon says:

"The members of this company were made up of the elite of Wilkes-Barre and its immediate vicinity. It is to be regretted that a complete muster roll cannot now be made up. It is barely possible that a roll of its organic members may be found in the adjutant general's office at Harrisburg, but not probable. My first personal memory of the company was in the spring of 1805. Joseph Slocum was then captain, and I suppose he was their first commander under their legal organization. They were then in full uniform, and had a flag; not the star spangled banner, but a flag bearing the coat of arms of Pennsylvania, representing 'the lion and the unicorn fighting for the crown' over the body of the American eagle. Benjamin Perry was the bearer of that standard at that time. I think Isaac Bowman was the lieutenant. They met on this occasion for inspection and drill. I remember seeing on that parade Joseph Slocum, captain; Isaac Bowman, lieutenant; Benjamin Perry, sergeant; and the latter seemed to have more to do and say in the fixing up than anybody else. Of those in the ranks I remember Charles Miner, Matthew Covell, Thomas Duane, Thomas Wright, jr., Sidney Tracy, Jehoida P. Johnson, Arnold Colt, Peter Yarrington, Josiah Wright and Zebulon Butler, jr. Colonel Benjamin Dorrance was about, but not in the ranks nor in uniform."

Mr. Gordon then sketches the feast which followed "at John P. Arndt's old Red Tavern on River street," and continues:

"In 1808 Isaac Bowman was elected captain, Charles Miner and Benjamin Perry lieutenants, and I think Godfrey Perry sergeant. I speak from memory. I was present at their first meeting after the election. It took place on Bowman's Hill, on the lawn in front of the captain's residence, where now lives Mrs. A. H. Bowman. On that occasion Captain Bowman treated the company to a liberal collation, and everybody was in good humor and fine spirits. In the manual drill Joseph Slocum, ex-captain, acted as fogleman.

"From this time until the expiration of Captain Bowman's term of service the Wyoming Blues were regarded as the star company of Northern Pennsylvania, and as far as their discipline was concerned could have competed with any company in the United States army. Besides this, its membership was made up of the best blood of the old Yankee settlers of Wyoming.

"In 1811 an election took place, and Zebulon Butler, a son of Colonel Zebulon Butler, of Revolutionary fame, was elected captain."

After the war of 1812 broke out the existence of this organization ceased, by reason of opposition in political sentiment among its members.

FIRST CAVALRY COMPANY.

In 1801 a cavalry company existed in this county, but when it was organized, or how long the organization continued, has not been ascertained. Under the date of March in that year a notice was published requiring the "First Company of Cavalry" to meet at the house of Jesse Fell on the 2nd Saturday in April, at 10 A.M. This notice was over the signature of "Eleazer Blackman, Captain."

THE KINGSTON COMPANY.

Gordon says:

"The Volunteer Matross of Kingston was organized under the command of Henry Buckingham, a merchant of Kingston, recently from Connecticut, probably about 1809, perhaps earlier. Captain Buckingham * * * was a most efficient officer in every respect, a capital drill-master, and about the only man in the company who knew anything about artillery practice. * * * I remember as first members under Captain Buckingham, Ziba Hoyt, the father of our present governor; Phineas Underwood, Absalom Roberts, Morris Cramer, Alexander Lord, William Pace and Hallet Gallup. * * * Their uniform was a long tailed blue, with brass buttons, gray pants and gaiters or leggings covering the front of the shoe by a gore. I remember their first parade in Wilkes-Barre, in 1810, I think, with a brass six pounder which was said to be one of the field pieces captured from Burgoyne at Saratoga. I do not know, however, that this was a fact.

"On this occasion the company occupied the public square for their parade ground. Their handling of their guns called forth the highest commendations from the spectators, and Captain Samuel Bowman said of them that they would pass muster to any artillery corps in the United States army."

On the breaking out of hostilities between the United States and Great Britain, in 1812, the Matross promptly offered their services to the government. The company then consisted of the following men:

Captain, Samuel Thomas; 1st lieutenant, Phineas Underwood; 2nd, Ziba Hoyt; 3rd, Andrew Sheets; ensign, Edward Gilchrist; sergeants—John Carkhuff, Jacob Taylor, Absalom Roberts, Henry Jones, George W. Smith, John Bowman; corporals—Christopher Miner, Daniel Cochevour, Samuel Parrish, Ebenezer Freeman, John Blane; gunners—Stephen Evans, Isaac Hollister, John Prince, James Bird, Morris Cramer, Festus Freeman, James Devans; drummer, Alexander Lord; fifer, Araba Amsden; privates—Daniel Hoover, John Daniels, James W. Barnum, William Pace, James Bodfish, Godfrey Bowman, Benjamin Hall, Solomon Parker, Ezekiel Hall, Sylvanus Moore, Hallet Gallup.

They left Kingston on the 13th of April, 1813, and embarked on a raft at the mouth of Shoup's creek. They landed at Danville, whence they marched, by way of Lewiston and Bedford, through Fayette county, recruiting as they went, and arrived at Erie 95 strong.

In the cannonading at Presque Isle harbor the company did efficient service. When volunteers were solicited to man the fleet of Commodore Oliver Perry before the battle of Lake Erie four from this company, among whom was James Bird, of Pittston, promptly offered themselves, and all distinguished themselves by their bravery in the battle. Bird was afterward tried by court martial for desertion, convicted and shot. He had left his post to join General Jackson at New Orleans, and though his purpose was patriotic and laudable he was technically guilty of desertion, and the stern discipline of war did not relax in his favor.

After the battle of Lake Erie the Matross, which was attached to the regiment of Colonel Hill, crossed into Canada and marched on Malden, which the enemy abandoned on their approach. They followed him to Detroit, which he also evacuated; thence, under General Harrison, they pursued him; in the battle of the Thames the Matross was commanded by Lieutenant Ziba Hoyt, Captain Thomas having been left with fourteen of his men at Detroit.

A recruiting office was opened in Wilkes-Barre during the war, and many volunteers were sent to the army from this county. Infantry barracks were established on the bank of the river, and cavalry barracks on Franklin street.

THE RALLY IN 1814.

In 1814, when Baltimore was threatened by the British, five companies of the militia of Luzerne and the counties adjoining marched for its defense. They proceeded as far as Danville; when, on the receipt of intelligence of the repulse of the enemy, they were ordered to return. On this expedition went the following detachments: From the 45th regiment, Captain Joseph Camp, Lieutenant Joseph Lott, Ensign Robert Reynolds; 129th regiment—Captain Frederick Bailey and Amos Tiffany, Lieutenant Cyrrel Giddings, Ensign Hiat Tupper; 112th regiment—Captain George Hidley, Lieutenant John Wortman, Ensign Abraham Roberts; 35th regiment—Captain Peter Hallock, Lieutenants Hosea Phillips and Jeremiah Fuller, Ensigns William Polen and George Denison; a detachment under Captain Jacob Bittenbender and Ensign John Myers.

Such of the volunteers as survived the usual casualties and perils of war and returned were received and welcomed with those honors to which the brave defenders of the country are always entitled from their fellow citizens.

Of the company here named and others Mr. Gordon wrote as follows:

THE WILKES-BARRE DRILL SQUAD.

"This squad was organized in the spring of 1813, under the command of Lieutenant Sweeney, of the 16th regiment United States infantry, then on recruiting service at Wilkes-Barre. It was never legally organized, and I should not notice it, only that in after years its membership furnished, to a large extent, the officers for independent companies subsequently organized under the militia laws of Pennsylvania. Lieutenant Sweeney was an accomplished drill-master, and under his instruction they made rapid progress in the military art. They were never uniformed nor armed. The only badge they wore was a Roman hat, ornamented with the black cockade and the American eagle. There was not a member of the company who had then reached his twenty-first year."

He mentions among the members John S. Hyde, Samuel D. Bettle, George F. Gordon, John M. Gordon, John S. Butler, one or two of the Danas, Sterne and Strange Palmer, James W. Bowman, William and Benjamin D. Wright. He continues:

"In 1820 the

"JUNIOR VOLUNTEERS,"

"the Wyoming Guards, and the Pittston Rifles came to the front, with an incipient effort to raise a horse company from Wilkes-Barre township, aided by recruits from Hanover.

"The Junior Volunteers was, as its name indicated, composed almost wholly of young men who had not reached their majority. * * * Elijah Worthington, an apprentice in the Wyoming Herald office, was the first lieutenant, and Zalman Moor, a journeyman tailor with Anthony Brower, was orderly sergeant, and a capital officer. John F. Dupuy was their second captain, who flourished at their head for a year or two, when the company was merged in the Citizen Volunteers, retaining the uniform of the Juniors, which was simply a summer dress of white dimity, roundabout and pants, Roman hat and black cockade and eagle. The first captain under the new organization was, I think, William S. Ross. * * * Subsequently he was promoted to the command of a brigade or a division, of the Pennsylvania militia. General Ross was really a military man, and made a good officer. * * *

"THE PITTSSTON BLUES,"

a rifle company, came into the field about the same time as the Junior Volunteers (1822). They were commanded by Captain John Myers, with a Mr. Blanchard for first lieutenant. They often paraded in Wilkes-Barre, and about one-half of their members were residents of the township. Then came the Wyoming County Guards, a light infantry company, first commanded by Strong Barnum, who had served one or two campaigns at West Point. I remember the names of only a few of the members—Theron Barnum, first lieutenant; Ed. Taylor, William H. Alexander, Merritt Slocum, George M. Hollenback, Henry Colt, James W. Bowman, Lewis N. Ketcham, Kesselaer Wells and Abram Tolls were among the first members, with some from Plains and about half a dozen from Kingston. * * * The company disbanded about 1834 or 1835. * * * In addition to the independent companies already noticed there was a company of light horsemen * * * not inferior to any organization of the kind in Pennsylvania. In 1822 was organized by massing the volunteer companies then in the field. The battalion was composed of the Wyoming Guards, Pittston Blues and a company from Lehman, under the command of Captain Jacob L. Bogardus. Subsequently it went into a regiment, and H. B. Wright was honored with the command, and held that station for some fourteen years.

"AN INDEPENDENT BATTALION"

"THE WYOMING YAGERS."

"This company was organized in 1843, and its members were all of foreign birth. At their first organization they were riflemen, but subsequently they changed to light infantry. The following is believed to be a correct list of the commissioned officers from 1843 to its final disorganization in 1863: John Reichard, captain; Jacob Waelder, first lieutenant; Joseph Coons, second lieutenant. At the next election, in 1847, John Reichard was re-elected captain. Lieutenant Jacob Waelder had joined the Wyoming Artillerists and gone to Mexico, and Joseph Coons was elected in his place, and Martin Baur was elected second lieutenant. In 1858 Captain Reichard became brigade inspector, and Joseph Coons became captain, Martin Baur first lieutenant, and Philip Nachbar second lieutenant. At the breaking out of the Rebellion the company was in a demoralized condition, but on the call of the President in 1861, under the energetic measures taken by George W. Reichard, it was resurrected and joined Colonel A. H. Emley's regiment of three months men, with George W. Reichard captain, John Treffinch first lieutenant and Gustave Hahn second lieutenant. The members served their term with great credit, but on their return home suffered themselves to relapse into military idleness until 1862, when they promptly responded to a call for troops to repel the threatened invasion of Pennsylvania by General Lee. These troops were known as 'emergency men.' Gustave Hahn was captain, Henry Rhode first lieutenant, and Joseph Boyer was second lieutenant."

THE WYOMING ARTILLERISTS.

The organization of the Wyoming Artillerists, of Wilkes-Barre, begun some time prior, was completed and uniforms, guns and equipments obtained early in the year 1842. Under the energetic efforts of F. L. Bowman, its first captain, the company soon acquired a reputation for excellence in drill and discipline.

Captain Edmund L. Dana succeeded to the command, and in November, 1846, in response to a call by the President for troops to serve during the war with Mexico, the services of the Wyoming Artillerists were tendered and accepted. The ranks were filled up by enlistments to the requisite number, and aided by the liberality of the citizens, the company, under Captain Dana, on Monday, the 7th of December, 1846, after listening to addresses in the old church on the public square, and bidding adieu to relatives and friends, embarked on board an old freight boat on the North Branch Canal, and in the midst of a snow storm started for Pittsburg, where, after much toil and suffering, it arrived on Tuesday, the 15th of December. On the following day it was mustered into the service of the United States, and designated as Company I in the 1st regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers. F. L. Bowman, 2nd lieutenant, was elected major of the regiment, and Jacob Waelder was chosen to fill the vacancy.

From Pittsburg the company voyaged to Vera Cruz, encamping for a time at New Orleans and at Lobos island, and landing on Mexican soil March 9th, 1847. On the 10th and 11th the investment of the city and castle was completed. In the movement of troops on the 10th the Wyoming Artillerists encountered an ambuscade in the chapparal and received the first infantry fire from the enemy; a halt was ordered, the fire returned with such precision and effect that the enemy fled, and the company resumed its march and took its position in the line of investment. It was actively engaged in the skirmishes which ensued, in repelling attacks upon and maintaining possession of the sand hills overlooking the city, in digging trenches, constructing batteries and transporting to them guns and ammunition from the beach. On the afternoon of the 22nd of March fire was opened from the American works. On the 29th the Mexican garrison moved out of the city, and in the presence of two lines of Americans, among whom were the 1st Pennsylvania regiment and the Wyoming men, laid down their arms, equipments and flags.

On the 9th of April General Patterson's division, with Pillow's brigade, to which the Wyoming Artillerists were attached, started towards the capital. In the battle of Cerro Gordo, April 18th, the Wyoming company was deployed on a declivity below and in front of the enemy's main works, and distant from them about two hundred yards, but suffered slight loss. Early on the morning of the 7th of July the Wyoming Artillerists with Company A of their regiment stormed in gallant style the hill commanding the Pass of El Pinal or the Black Pass, and dispersed a force of the enemy posted there to obstruct the passage of our troops.

On the afternoon of July 8th the command entered the City of Puebla, Company I and the other five composing the battalion were detailed under Colonel Childs to occupy the city and to take charge of about 2,000 sick and a large amount of government property. The rest of the army moved out on the 10th of August and on the following day the large and turbulent population of the city began to show unmistakable signs of hostility. Small bulletins were published, calling on the citizens to rise and crush out "the 600 sick Yankees," and a few days later a considerable military force under General Rea entered the city. It became necessary to divide the garrison into three detachments, of which one, including the Wyoming company, occupied an old brick structure called the Cuartel of San Jose, on the eastern edge of the city, on a small stream which furnished the water supply for the garrison.

In the latter part of September a summons to surrender was sent by the enemy, in which their forces were stated to be 8,000. The demand was promptly refused. On the 12th of October the troops and wagon train of General Lane were discovered approaching the city and the enemy fled. The heroic defense of its position and trust by the small garrison including the Wyoming boys against overwhelming numbers, the protection of the sick and of the government stores so that not one dollar was lost, was regarded at the time by the army as one of the remarkable achievements in the campaign in Mexico. Captain Dana and Lieutenant Waelder, who was attached to the staff of Colonel Childs as acting adjutant general, were specially commended in the official reports.

The regiment next marched to the city of Mexico, arriving there on the 8th of December, 1847. All the officers who were engaged in the siege of Puebla were specially thanked and commended by General Scott.

Two weeks later the regiment was quartered at San Angel, an old town a few miles southwest of the city, and except when detached to escort a train to Vera Cruz, and other temporary services, remained there until the signing of the treaty of peace in June, 1848. Returning with the army, the regiment landed at New Orleans, came up the Mississippi and Ohio rivers to Pittsburg, where the Wyoming Artillerists were mustered out and honorably discharged on the 20th of July, 1848. They returned from Pittsburg as they went there, by canal boat, but the season of the year, the glad greetings, with firing of cannon and display of flags at every town on the route, contrasted agreeably with their former tedious passage through the ice and snows of December, 1846. At Wilkes-Barre nearly the entire population of the valley was assembled, and a splendid reception with an address of welcome awaited them.

The total strength of the company, including recruits, was 109; fifty-one, or less than one-half, returned with the company.

The following is a roll of this company as it served in the Mexican war, with individual casualties, dates of discharge, etc.; where not otherwise noted the men returned with the company :

Captain Dana retained for a time the command; was re-elected and commissioned April 26th, 1851. He was followed successively by Thomas Parker, E. B. Collings, E. B. Harvey, Samuel Bowman, Nathaniel Pierson and A. H. Emley.

When in 1861 the call for three months men was made, their services were again offered and accepted. Mr. Emley, their captain, on their arrival at Harrisburg was elected colonel of the 8th Pennsylvania regiment, to which they were attached, and was succeeded in the command of the company by Captain E. W. Finch

After the expiration of their term the 143d Pennsylvania volunteers, under Colonel Edmund L. Dana, was formed, and the old company formerly commanded by him was recruited to the requisite number under Captain George N. Prichard, and on the 4th of August, 1862, was mustered in, and assigned, as Company C, to that regiment. For nearly three years, and up to the close of the war, it saw active service with the Army of the Potomac, and on many sanguinary fields sustained its reputation for courage and discipline.

In 1870 the company was again recruited and John Espy was elected captain. In 1871 it was transferred from the 30th Pennsylvania national guards to the artillery corps, and Captain Espy having been appointed on the staff of General Osborne, E. W. Finch was elected in his place.

The following is a list of the officers at the time of this writing, March, 1880 :

Thomas C. Parker, captain; Charles D. Hoover, first lieutenant; James A. Roat, second lieutenant; Rees Leyshon, orderly sergeant; Butler Dilley, quartermaster's sergeant; John Slyker, V. S.; John E. Mentz, first sergeant; John Dickerson, second sergeant; Thomas C. Edwards, third sergeant; Richard Moore, fourth sergeant.

Only approved men are admitted to membership, and the present strength of the rank and file, thus constituted, is sixty-three. It is supplied with four new six pounders of the Phoenix pattern, and the uniforms and equipments are of the kind adopted by the United States artillery. During the past two years, while instruction in infantry movements has been continued as usual, special attention has been devoted to gun and sabre drill; and under the able instructions of Captain Parker and his subordinates, a high degree of proficiency attained. Through the efforts of the company and the public interest awakened a large and commodious armory has been secured and fitted up, and several very flourishing infantry organizations have been formed in the city.

RECENT MILITARY SERVICE.

The militia of the State of Pennsylvania, which was established in very early times, was reorganized under an act of Assembly passed in 1822. Under this law an enrollment was made of all citizens between the ages of twenty-one and forty-five liable to military duty, who were required to appear for drill at certain times under a penalty of fifty cents. Of course except to keep up an enrollment for emergencies that might arise this system was of no account, and for that purpose it was found during the late civil war to amount to very little.

In 1864 an act was passed regulating the organization of the militia and dividing the State into twenty military divisions, in which an enrollment as before was required; but in addition to this a system of volunteer companies, regiments, etc., was established. These volunteers were required to appear in uniform for drill and exercise, and were supplied with arms and accoutrements by the State, and constituted what was termed the volunteer militia. Under that organization Luzerne and Wyoming were a part of the ninth division. The expenses of this organization were borne largely by the volunteers themselves, and this was found to be so burdensome to them that by subsequent acts of Assembly provision was made for the payment to the companies by the State of sufficient sums to meet a portion of these expenses. By an act passed in 1870 the name of "National Guard of Pennsylvania" was given to this volunteer militia, and by an act of Assembly in 1874 ten divisions of the national guard were constituted and Luzerne and Wyoming counties were included in the third division. Each of the divisions was under the command of a major general, and the divisions were divided into brigades according to the discretion of their commanding generals.

In 1878, by an act of Assembly, these divisions were abolished and the State was constituted a single division with five brigades.

Under this law Luzerne, Lackawanna and Wyoming counties became a part of the territory of the third brigade. The national guard in Luzerne county consisted of the Wyoming Artillerists—a four gun battery, Captain T. C. Parker—and the ninth regiment of infantry. The officers in this regiment are: Colonel, G. Murray Reynolds; lieutenant colonel, Morris J. Keck; major, D. S. Bennet; surgeon, Olin F. Harvey; assistant surgeon, J. Holley; adjutant, Arthur D. Moore; commissary, Oscar F. Harvey; captains—James Ginley, J. Andrew Willet, H. W. Wenner, Samuel Simpson, Charles A. Jones, John Dunn, Henry Crandall, A. H. Rush and B. F. Stark.

In 1871, during the long struggle among the miners, a riot occurred at Scranton, to quell which the Wyoming Artillerists, the McClellan Rifles—an infantry company at Pittston—the fifth regiment of infantry of Luzerne county, the Hazleton battalion—consisting of four companies of infantry—and the Wyoming County Veterans—a company of infantry from Tunkhannock—which constituted the ninth division, under the command of Major General Edwin S. Osborne, were called into service. They were called out on the 7th of April and continued in service till the 25th of May, during which time they were constantly on duty, preserving the peace and guarding the property at the collieries. Up to the 17th of May the rioters avoided any collision with the troops, but on that day it became necessary for the latter in the discharge of their duty to fire on the rioters, and two were killed. This had the effect to suppress the riot.

In 1874 the Wyoming Artillerists, the 15th (which had then come to be the 9th) regiment, the McClellan Rifles, the Telford Zouaves, of Susquehanna county, and the 1st regiment of infantry of Philadelphia, all under the command General Osborne, were called to Susquehanna Depot to suppress a riot among the employes of the N. Y. & E. Railway. They arrived on the 29th of March, restored order and left on the 1st of April.

On the 7th of April, 1875, the same troops were ordered to Hazleton for the suppression of a riot among the miners there. They remained on duty there till the 11th of May, during which time they were engaged in guard and patrol duty and aiding the authorities to preserve peace.

In the great strike of 1877 all the troops of the county were brought into requisition, under General Osborne. They were called into service on the 21st of July and were relieved on the 4th of August. They were by order of the governor concentrated at Wikes-Barre, and there held in readiness to assist the civil authorities in preserving order. No collision occurred between the troops and the strikers.

The troops called out for the suppression of these riots were commanded by the following officers: 1st regiment, Colonel R. Dale; 15th, Colonel O. K. Moore; 9th, Colonel T. D. Lewis; Hazleton battalion, Major D. C. Swank; Wyoming Artillerists, Captain E. W. Finch at Scranton, Susquehanna Depot and Hazleton, and by Captain Thomas C. Parker at Wilkes-Barre; McClellan Rifles, Captain James Ginley; Telford Zouaves, Captain James Smith; Wyoming County Veterans, Captain R. W. Bannatyne.

The services rendered by the troops in the suppression of these riots and the preservation of order in the midst of such surroundings not only reflect credit on the officers and men composing the military organizations that performed this service, but demonstrate the utility and efficiency of citizen soldiers when properly organized and disciplined. The value of the property saved from destruction in these cases was probably many times greater than the expense of maintaining these organizations.

CHAPTER IX.

EARLY WAGON ROADS AND MAIL ROUTES.

THE first roads in the country were Indian trails, that perhaps had been used during centuries. These were simply paths in the woods, of a width sufficient to allow the passage of one person at a time, for in that order the Indians always traveled. By constant and long continued use they had become well worn, and they sometimes had a depth of twelve inches or more where the soil was soft. Over these trails the first settlers in 1762 and 1763 came, and when they brought with them teams of oxen and carts it was necessary to widen these paths by cutting away the timber in places.

Thus originated the first wagon road from the Delaware to the Lackawanna and Susquehanna rivers, and to the Wyoming valley, where the first settlement was made. Mr. Allen Secord of Dunmore—the oldest resident of the Lackawanna valley—says that this road left the Lackawanna near the forks at Dyberry, came through the great swamp, crossed Cobb's Mountain, followed Roaring brook to where are now the Pennsylvania Coal Company's works at the foot of Plane No. 6; thence went directly to the Lackawanna river, which it crossed and followed on the west side to the Susquehanna. Near No. 6 stands one of the original marked trees of this road, which Mr. Secord has known more than sixty years. Hollister says of this road: "The old Connecticut or Cobb's road, shaded by giant pines, extending from the summit of the mountain to Capoose, had no diverging pathway to Slocum Hollow, No. 6, or Blakely, because neither of these places had yet acquired a settler or a name."

The following extracts from the records of Westmoreland for 1772 show what action was afterward taken concerning the construction of this road. At a meeting held in Wilkes-Barre October 2nd, 1772, it was voted "that Mr. Durkins of Kingstown, Mr. Carey of Lockaworna, Mr. Goss for Plymouth, Mr. Daniel Gore for Wilkesbarre, Mr. William Stewart for Hannover, are appointed a comtee to Draw subscriptions & see what they Can Git signed by ye adjourned meeting for ye making a Rode from Dilleware River to Pitts-town." This meeting was adjourned to the 5th of the same month, when it was "voted that Esq. Tryp, Mr. John Jenkins, Mr. Phillip Goss, Mr. John Durkins, Captain Bates, Mr. Daniel Gore, Mr. William Stewart are appointed Comtee-men to mark out ye Rode from Dilleware River to Pitts-town," etc. October 19th, 1772, it was "voted that Esq. Tryp is appointed to oversee those persons that shall from time to time be sent out from ye severall towns to work on ye Road from Dilleware River to this & so that ye work be Done according to ye Directions of ye Comtee, that was sent out to mark ye Road." The wages paid to laborers on this road would hardly be considered remunerative now. "Esq. Tryp," the overseer, was allowed "Five Shillings Lawfull money pr. Day." For the others it was "voted, that those Persons that shall Go out to work on ye Rode from Dilleware River to ye westermost part of ye Great Swamp Shall Have three sillings ye day Lawfull money for ye time they work to ye Exceptance of ye over seors; and from ye Great Swamp this way, Shall Have one shilling and sixpence pr. day and no more."

The fine road, six rods in width, which runs parallel with the river through Kingston was laid out in 1770; and about that time, or soon afterward, a road was established between Wilkes-Barre and Pittston, at both of which places ferries were established. Another was also constructed through Kingston, connecting with this across the Susquehanna just below Wilkes-Barre.

In 1779 a road from the Delaware at Easton to the Susquehanna at Wyoming was opened for the passage of General Sullivan's army. Improvements were afterward made on this, which was long known as Sullivan's road, and it became the main thoroughfare between this entire region and Philadelphia.

Another connection between the Susquehanna and Delaware was established by the construction, from 1787 to 1789, of the State road from Neseopeck Falls to the Lehigh river. These roads were constructed according to the circumstances and fashions of those times, and bore very little resemblance to the macadamized carriage drives of the present day. One feature of them, which is rarely seen now and which will soon cease to be known, was the corduroy that was used for making crossings over marshy spots or swamps. This was made of small logs laid across the track, close together. Although the passage way thus made over the swamps was dry it was anything but smooth.

The first roads through Wyoming county, although they followed the general course of the Susquehanna river, along which settlements were first made, ran over the hills a short distance from the river, especially where "narrows" occur. The construction of roads along the river through these passages where room could not be found for a path without excavating was then considered too expensive, and the hills were surmounted to avoid those places.

These primitive roads were little more than paths, which wound through the forest to avoid trees and other obstructions, with marked trees to indicate their course and here and there a tree cut away to clear the path of an unavoidable obstacle. While the settlements were limited to the shores of the river and its larger tributaries the necessity for improved highways was less urgent than afterward; for the early settlers soon became very expert in the management of canoes, and much of their business, such as marketing, milling, etc., was done over the river. At that period the river was also utilized as a highway in the winter, and temporary roads were often made through long distances on the ice.

At the commencement of the present century, by reason of the large increase of population and productions, an urgent necessity for better facilities for communication and transportation between this region and commercial centers was apparent. To supply this demand the Easton and Wilkes-Barre turnpike company was chartered in 1802; and the road, a large portion of which occupied the old Sullivan road, was completed about four years afterward, at an expense of about $75,000. Not only was a great desideratum supplied by the construction of this road, but liberal dividends were paid on the stock. The success of the enterprise gave an additional impulse to the turnpike mania which arose about that time.

On the 30th of March, 1811, the Legislature passed "an act to enable the governor to incorporate a company for making an artificial road from the northern boundary of this State, at the most suitable place near the twenty-eighth mile stone, to the place where the seat of justice is located for the county of Susquehanna; and thence by the best and nearest route to the borough of Wilkes-Barre, in the county of Luzerne."

Hon. P. M. Osterhout, of Tunkhannock, said of this turnpike in an article published by him in 1879:

"The road was to be commenced within three years, and finished within ten. The first payment on account of stock was made by Matthias Hollenback, the father of George M. Hollenback, of Wilkes-Barre, which was June 30th, 1812. Jesse Fell was then treasurer of the company. The road was located on the west side of the river until it reached Tunkhannock—from Wilkes-Barre—where it crossed the river. When the surveyors came to the mountain at Swartzwood a quite a controversy arose whether they should cross the river by ferry at that point, or go over the mountain to Asa Keeler's and from thence to Tunkhannock, and cross the river there. The Hardings, the Millers, the Lees and the Jenkines wanted the road located on the west side of the river until it reached Tunkhannock; on the other hand the Osterhouts, the Marceys, the Averages, the Sherwoods, Robertses and others desired the crossing should be at Keeler's ferry. Finally a bet was made as to the distance between the two routes, and as there was not much money in the country at that time the wager was made in cattle—young stock—and the different routes chained. The west side of the river won and the turnpike was located there. While the turnpike was being made the people on the east side of the river, to counteract the effect of the turnpike, determined to have a continuous road on their side of the river from Pittston to Tunkhannock. There was then no road along the river through the Falling Spring narrows, the narrows above Gardner's ferry, and the narrows below Buttermilk Falls—the mountains coming close to the river's edge in these localities. It was a hard place to build a road and required a great deal of labor. The people said it would save the expense of crossing the river at Wilkes-Barre and Tunkhannock, and also the tolls on the turnpike, and they were determined to have a road. The principal men interested had a consultation and it was finally agreed upon that the Pittston people should build the road through the Falling Spring narrows; that Captain John Gardoer, an old settler and prominent citizen living on the flats above Falling Spring, should see to and superintend the building of the road through the narrows above Gardner's ferry; and that David Osterhout should see to the building of the road through the narrows below Buttermilk Falls.

"These roads were built by the gratuitous labor of the men in the neighborhood, without tax or expense to the townships. The people turned out voluntarily as they would to a stone or logging bee, and worked without fee or reward."

The road which had been constructed between Nescopeck and the Lehigh was converted into the Susquehanna and Lehigh turnpike. The Susquehanna and Tioga turnpike, from Berwick to Towanda, passed through Fairmount and Huntington. A turnpike was also established between Blakely and Dundaff.

The Philadelphia and Great Bend turnpike (commonly known as the Drinker turnpike), which connected with the Easton and Wilkes-Barre road at Taylorsville, was chartered in 1819 and completed in 1826. It was an important thoroughfare. Hollister says: "It promised as it passed through Providence, with its tri-weekly stage coach and mail, to land passengers from the valley in Philadelphia after two days of unvarying jolting. This road was the first highway through Cobb's Gap." The three villages through which this road passed were Bricktown (now Dunmore), Razorville (now Providence), and Clark's Green. It was an important avenue of transportation for produce and droves of animals to Philadelphia via Easton, and for merchandise back.

Some of these roads were constructed at great expense, but after a time they were abandoned. The Easton and Wilkes-Barre road continued in operation longer than any of the others.

Plank roads were first introduced into the United States in 1846, and at once the plank-road mania became even more prevalent than the rage for turnpikes had been before. In 1851 the Wilkes-Barre and Providence Plank Road Company was chartered, and the road constructed as far as Pittston, eight miles.

The Scranton and Carbondale Plank Road was constructed in 1853 and 1854, and since that time the Providence and Waverly, the Bear Creek and Lehigh, and the Gouldsborough Plank Roads have been built, but they have met the fate of these roads generally throughout the country. Like many enterprises which are entered on in the midst of excitement, without careful consideration and prudent foresight, these have proved to be bad investments for the stockholders, though they were beneficial to the country.

According to Pearce the first post route in this region was established in 1777, between Wyoming and Hartford, Conn., and the mail was carried once in two weeks by Prince Bryant, who was paid by private subscription. The conveyance of mails in the colonies had been provided for by the British government in 1692, and at the commencement of the Revolutionary war the control of the post-office system was, of course, taken in charge by the federal government.

It appears that after the organization of Luzerne county a weekly mail between Wilkes-Barre and Easton was established, and in 1797 Clark Behe was the carrier, and advertised to carry passengers during good sleighing. A weekly mail was sent by the postmaster at Wilkes-Barre during this year to Nanticoke, Newport and Nescopeck, to Berwick, and back by way of Huntington and Plymouth. The mail matter was left at such private houses as the postmaster designated, for Wilkes-Barre was the only post town in the county.

A fortnightly mail was established between Wilkes-Barre and Great Bend in 1798, and another, once a week, between Wilkes-Barre and Owego, N. Y., in 1799. The names of Jonathan Hancock, Charles Mowry and a Mr. Peck are recorded as mail carriers in 1800 and 1803.

The Providence post-office was the first in the Lackawanna valley. It was established at Slocum Hollow in 1811, and Benjamin Slocum was appointed postmaster. The mail was carried by Zephaniah Knapp, on horseback, once a week, or in bad travelling once in two weeks. The route was from Wilkes-Barre, via Slocum Hollow, to Wilsonville then the county seat of Wayne county; returning via Bethany, Belmont, Montrose and Tunkhannock. In 1824 the office was removed from Slocum Hollow to Providence, and another established at Hyde Park, with William Merrifield postmaster. Hollister says that an old gentleman who discharged the duties of mail boy from 1811 to 1824 relates many anecdotes of his adventures, and his encounters of humanity in its "most amusing aspects" at the stopping places on his route.

"At one point," writes our informant, "the office was kept in a low log bar-room, where, after the contents of the mail pouch were emptied on the unswept floor, all the inmates gave slow and repeated motion to each respective paper and letter.

"Sometimes the mail boy, finding no one at home but the children, who were generally engaged drumming on the dinner pot, or the housewife, unctuous with lard and dough, lolly-bye-babying a boisterous child to sleep, was compelled to act as carrier and postmaster himself.

"At another point upon the route the commission of postmaster fell upon the thick shoulders of a Dutchman, remarkable for nothing but his full round stomach. This was his pride, and he would pat it incessantly while he dilated upon the virtues of his 'kront' and his 'frow.' It would have been amazingly stupid for the department to have questioned his order or integrity, for as the lean mail bag came tumbling into his door from the saddle, the old comical Dutchman and his devoted wife carried it to a rear bed room in his house, poured the contents upon the floor, where at one time it actually took them both from three o'clock one afternoon until nine the next morning to change the mail. Believing, with Lord Bacon, that 'knowledge is power,' he detained, about election time, all political documents directed to his opponents. These he carefully deposited in a safe place in his garret until after election day, when they were handed over with great liberality to those to whom they belonged, provided he was paid the postage.

"At another remote place where the office was kept, the mail bag being returned to the post-boy almost empty led him to investigate the cause of this sudden collapse in a neighborhood inhabited by few. The prolific number of ten children, graduating from one to twenty in years, all called the postmaster 'dad,' and as none could read, letters and papers came to a dead stop on arriving thus far. As these were poured out on the floor among pans and kettles each child would seize a package, exclaiming, 'This is for me!' and 'This for you!' and that for somebody else, until the greater bulk of mail matter intended for other offices was parceled out and appropriated, and never heard of again."

The first regular stage, a two-horse vehicle, was established between Easton and Philadelphia in 1806 by Messrs. Robinson and Arndt. The trip was made weekly and required a day and a half for each way. Conrad Teter is still remembered by some of the oldest citizens as one of the earliest stage proprietors. He carried the mail in his stages weekly between Sunbury and Painted Post, by way of Wilkes-Barre, Tunkhannock, etc., from 1810 to 1816. Pearce says of him: "He was a large fat man, of a jovial disposition and desirous of making a favorable impression on strangers. He drove stage, his own stage, up the river. He took pleasure in pointing out his farms to the passengers. He frequently informed them as he passed the large residence and farm of Colonel Benjamin Dorrance, in Kingston, that he was the owner, and if asked why he drove stage would reply that he loved to rein four horses but had no taste for farming."

In 1816 three brothers named Horton established a line of four-horse coaches over this route, and during eight years carried the mails between Baltimore and Owego, Wilkes-Barre and Montrose.

About the year 1822 the first stage ran between Wilkes-Barre and Dundaff. It was at first a two-horse vehicle, and was run by the brothers Daniel and John Searles. Two years later a four-horse vehicle replaced the first, and the route intersected the Milford and Owego Turnpike at Carbondale. The Searles brothers were then the proprietors of the line.

Pearce records George Root as the veteran stage driver of this region, a title to which a service of forty years entitled him.

CHAPTER X.

THE HISTORY OF THE COAL TRADE IN LUZERNE AND LACKAWANNA COUNTIES.

CENTURY has passed since anthracite coal was first taken from the Wyoming valley to be used in the forges of the United States armory at Carlisle. It was quarried from outcropping veins on the banks of the Susquehanna river, near Wilkes-Barre; floated in Durham boats to Harris's landing and thence drawn in wagons to its destination. A trade floating to market with the current, in boats which on the return trip must be towed or pulled up stream by the arms of sturdy boatmen, must have been small; but it was the beginning, and, continuing through the Revolutionary war, and through various stages of progress, it has reached giant proportions while yet, in 1880, scarce beyond its infancy.

Volney L. Maxwell, Esq., in his interesting "Lectures on Mineral Coal," read before the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society in 1858, says that the old quarry above Mill creek, from which the first coal was taken, was explored by direction of its proprietor, Colonel George M. Hollenback, some years before, when traces of the ancient mining were found, overgrown with large trees. At that early day the presence of coal was only known by its appearance or outcropping at the earth's surface, few believing that it could follow, like the under crust of a pie, from one rim of the basin to the other. Long after, in 1837, a newspaper published by Messrs. Webb & Blackman, in Kingston, replied to the question, "Does coal run under all land in the valley?" "Yes—certainly.—At Carbondale they have followed the coal under ground about a mile." Even at this date there are people in the coal field who doubt its existence beyond the reach of vision. As a rule, the deeper it lies the better it is supposed to be. Near the old mine the Lehigh Valley Coal Company has now two shafts in full operation, the coal more than six hundred feet below the surface, from which several hundred thousand tons of anthracite may be raised annually; the mines extending not only under the lands of Mr. Hollenback, but under and beyond the river Susquehanna, taking coal from the farms of Colonel Charles Dorrance and others on the Kingston side.

The trade down the Susquehanna continued and increased after the war closed. The coal, quarried from the hill sides, hauled to the river in wagons and loaded into arks built for the purpose, of rough planks, floated off on the spring and summer freshets in search of a market. Teams of mine-owners and of neighboring farmers found winter employment; labor otherwise unemployed had occupation in mining, cutting timber for the rude arks, and in manning them for the voyage. What jolly fellows were those arkmens and raftmen returning with pockets full of money from the annual frolic down the river. Few of them are left, but they insist upon their right of recognition as pioneers in the opening coal trade, earlier than 1820.

Mr. John B. Smith, senator from Luzerne in the Legislature of Pennsylvania and a son of Abijah Smith, one of the earliest operators of Plymouth and proprietor of one of the largest mines then known in the valley, wrote to the Wilkes-Barre Record of the Times October 27th, 1874: "I see you make a statement in your daily that the coal business opened in 1820, with 365 tons. Abijah Smith purchased an ark in Wilkes-Barre, of John P. Arndt, November 9th, 1807, and ran it to Columbia, loaded with fifty-five tons of coal. From that date Abijah Smith and John Smith ran several arks yearly to 1826, loaded with coal for market. In 1811 and 1812 they ran 220 tons of coal to Havre-de-Grace, had it re-loaded on a schooner named "Washington," consigned to Price & Waterbury, New York, who sold it on commission and rendered a statement February 1st, 1813. I think you should date the opening of the coal trade in 1807 instead of 1820."

Mr. Stewart Pearce in his full and usually faithful "Annals of Luzerne County" says that Colonel George M. Hollenback sent two four-horse loads of coal to Philadelphia in 1813, and that Mr. James Lee during the same year sent a four-horse load from Hanover to a blacksmith at Germantown.

The blacksmiths of this region early learned the use of anthracite coal. Obadiah and Daniel Gore were smiths, who came from Connecticut as early as 1768 and became owners of coal lands near Wilkes-Barre. Their experience in the use of the coal in their shops is said to have led Jesse Fell to his experiment with coal in the open grate, to which we are indebted for our pleasant grate fires. Judge Fell was a mason, and left on a fly leaf of his copy of "The Free Mason's Monitor" this record:

"February 11, of masonry 5808.—Made the experiment of burning the common stone coal of the valley in a grate in a common fireplace in my house, and find it will answer the purpose of fuel, making a clearer and better fire, at less expense, than burning wood in the common way.

"JESSE FELL."

"Borough of Wilkes-Barre,

"February 11, 1808."

These experiments are sufficiently authenticated to pass into history, and it would be "biting a file" to attempt to deprive the memories of Daniel Gore and Jesse Fell of the credit and honor so long and so freely accorded by those who knew them best, and who often made their glasses of "flip" foam with the poker heated red hot between the bars of the original grate, before which they toasted feet and fingers during the cold winters.

Among the papers of Jacob Cist, preserved by a grandson, Harrison Wright, Esq., of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., are certificates from several gentlemen who have made experiments at an early day in burning anthracite coal. One is from Mr. Frederick Graff, dated Philadelphia, May 13th, 1805, in which he says that in 1802 he had made trial of burning anthracite in a stove, and found it to answer exceedingly well. Mr. Graff signs as clerk of the water works of Philadelphia. This may have been some of the coal first taken out by the Lehigh Mine Company, with which many experiments were no doubt attempted besides the fruitless one described at the water works.

Another certificate is from Mr. Oliver Evans, February 15th, 1803, who says he had used anthracite coal in a stove, and in a small contracted grate in an open fireplace, producing a degree of heat greater than from any other coal he had known.

True the original draft of survey of the manor of Sunbury, made by Charles Stewart for the proprietaries, on the west side of the Susquehanna had "stone coal" marked upon it; but the date, 1768, is the same as given by Mr. Gore to Judge Fell as that of their success in using coal in their shop fires, so stated in a letter printed in Hazard's Register, and the surveyor, knowing of the use of coal for centuries in England, upon hearing of the use of it on the east side of the river would naturally suppose it to exist on the west side if he had seen it on the hill slope.

Judge Fell first made a grate of green hickory wood, in which he tried his experiments; then had one made of iron which he placed in the bar-room of his house.

There are many living yet who can remember when coal was shipped in arks from Plymouth, Wilkes-Barre and Pittston. Crandall Wilcox as early as 1814 sold coal from his mine (now operated by the Delaware & Hudson Canal Company, on Mill creek, Plains township) at $8.50 per ton in Marietta, Lancaster county, Pa. His sons at a much later date sent coal in arks to market by the river even after the canal was completed to Nanticoke, 1830.

Colonel Lord Butler owned that wonderful development of anthracite, on Coal brook, a mile east of the borough, afterwards known as the Baltimore mine, which supplied Wilkes-Barre in early times. The coal was quarried and delivered at $3 per ton.

Colonel Washington Lee sent several hundred tons from his mines in Hanover in 1820, which sold in Baltimore at $8 per ton. This brings us abreast of opening trade on the Lehigh in 1820. Seeing its 365 tons and going it much better, Mr. Pearce states the total to this date from Wyoming at 8,500 tons.

In 1823 Colonel Lee and George Chahoon leased a mine in Newport and contracted for the mining and delivery of one thousand tons of coal in arks at Lee's Ferry at $1.10 per ton—the coal selling at Columbia at a loss of $1,500.

In 1829 the Butler mine on Coal brook, near Wilkes-Barre, was purchased for Baltimore capitalists, and the "Baltimore Coal Company" was formed under a charter from the State of Maryland of February 17th, 1829, being originally incorporated as the "Baltimore and Pittsburg Coal Company." From this company the coal takes its name which has given a wide reputation as one of the finest veins of anthracite in the region. It first shipped coal in arks.

The Stockbridge mine in Pittston sent coal down the river in arks in 1828, furnishing about two thousand tons in three years. Joseph Wright had shipped coal from Pittston in 1813. This was probably the son of Thomas Wright, who had a forge on the Lackawanna near the crossing of the main road to Providence and well understood the value of coal and coal lands. The place is still known as "Old Forge." It was among the earliest tracts to change hands from original owners, having been sold by the heirs of Thomas Wright to a Mr. Armstrong, of Newburg, and Hon. Charles Augustus Murray, a gentleman from England. It was said that the location of Scranton hung in the balance at one time between "Old Forge" and "Slocum Hollow," the latter with its blast furnace and iron ore beds securing the prize.

In its issue of April 26th, 1837, the Kingston paper says of the trade: "Up to April 17th fifty arks had been dispatched from the Plymouth banks, averaging 60 tons each. This sold along the river at an average of $4 per ton. To this date but a trifle over 3,000 tons had been shipped from Mauch Chunk, and only about twice that amount from the whole Schuylkill region. With the canal from Columbia to tide completed, and the north branch by a proper route extended into the lake country, 'Old Shawnee' alone can send 150,000 tons to market per annum."

The commonwealth of Pennsylvania as early as 1824 provided for the appointment of a board of canal commissioners, with instructions to explore canal routes from Harrisburg to Pittsburg by the waters of the Juniata and Conemaugh rivers; and also a route by the west branch of the Susquehanna, the Sinnamahoning and Allegheny rivers; and the country between the Schuylkill and Susquehanna rivers through the great valley of Chester and Lancaster counties. The trade between Philadelphia and the great and growing west attracted attention and interest, but the wilds of the north branch, in which the noblest of refugees from the wilder fury of the French Revolution had sought shelter, and the still unappreciated anthracite coal of Wyoming were little known and unmentioned.

As early as 1796 a small book was published in Philadelphia which by way of preface opened with a short explanation of its object as follows: "The design of these pages is to show the importance of the great national canal—the river Susquehanna; the eligible situation for the purposes of trade and manufactures of some places on its banks and at its mouth; its great connection with other main waters of the United States, and the extensive and fertile surface of country from which it must drain the rich productions of agriculture and manufactures." No mention of coal!

In 1791 the Legislature appropriated several thousand pounds to improving the Susquehanna. In 1792 among the appropriations was one for a road "from Lehigh Gap in the Blue mountain across the Metchunk mountain to intersect the Nescopeck road made by Evan Owen, £200." Another "from Wilkes-Barre to Wyalusing, on the Meshoppen creek, and to the State line, £100." No word of coal!

Havre-de-Grace was to be a port for foreign and inland commerce. The author of the work referred to says: "The whole trade of this river must center at this spot as an entrepot, or place of exportation. Whatever may be the exertions of Pennsylvania, or the monied capital of Philadelphia, the trade of this river must ever pursue its natural channel." "Seldom ever" would seem the more appropriate expression suggested by experience. When that book was written the migratory shad had a natural channel and right of way up to its spawning grounds at the head waters; and, fat with abundance of food, furnished a luxury for the tables of people living along the river, for the loss of which even anthracite is hardly compensation—at least in shad season. The writer of 1796 evidently had no premonition of coming anthracite, or of steam wagons annihilating time and space, on iron roads; not only along the streams, but carrying the united loads of five hundred wagons with ease over some of the highest hills which border them. The age had not yet fully developed the energies of a White, a Hazard, or of Wurts. Pardee, Packer, Scranton and Parrish were yet in the future.

The great object of improving the navigation of the Susquehanna, and opening a way to market for the produce of the settlers upon the upper waters, has been accomplished, however, and by the use of its currents. Liberal appropriations followed the appointment of a canal board, and the corner stone of the first lock was laid at Harrisburg in 1827, with great rejoicings. Toward the growing west, by the valleys of the Juniata and the west branch of the Susquehanna, the public funds and energies were first directed. The north branch must take care of its own interests. Luzerne was aroused and her strongest men were selected to represent her in the State Legislature at its next session, for the purpose of securing early appropriations. Garrick Mallery and George Denison were chosen.

The canal commissioners began to place the North Branch division under contract, extending from Northumberland to the New York State line. Mr. Pearce, in his Annals of Luzerne, thus refers to it:

"The 4th day of July, 1828, was fixed upon as the day to break ground at Berwick; and the writer, then a boy, numbered one among the great multitude assembled to witness the interesting scene. The military were there with their colors and drums and gay attire. Crowds came from Wilkes-Barre, Plymouth, Kingston, Northumberland, Danville, Bloomsburg, and from all the regions round about for thirty miles or more. Old men and women were there, and the boys and girls from town and country came. And there was good cider, and a vast supply of cakes, and beer that made the eyes of the drinker snap.

"At the appointed hour the ceremonies began by plowing near the present lock at Berwick. The plow was held by Nathan Beach, Esq, and was drawn by a yoke of splendid red oxen, owned and driven by Alexander Jameson, Esq. The loose earth was removed in wheelbarrows, a rock was blasted, cannon were fired, and all returned to their homes happy and buoyant with the hope of a glorious future.

"In 1830 the canal was completed to Nanticoke dam, and the first boat, named the 'Wyoming,' built by the Hon. John Koons at Shickshinny, was launched and towed to Nanticoke, where she was loaded with ten tons of anthracite coal, a quantity of flour and other articles. Her destination was Philadelphia. The North Branch Canal being new and filling slowly with water, the 'Wyoming' passed through the Nanticoke shute and thence down the river to Northumberland, where she entered the Susquehanna division of the canal, and proceeded with considerable difficulty by way of the Union and Schuylkill canals to Philadelphia."

The first venture by river and canal was frozen up on the return trip, and its cargo of fifteen tons of dry goods was carried to Wilkes-Barre on sleds.

In 1831 the "Luzerne," built on the river bank opposite Wilkes-Barre by Captain Derrick Bird, took a cargo of coal to Philadelphia, floating down the river to the inlet lock at Nanticoke, and returned with merchandise to Nanticoke dam in July. In 1834, commanded by Captain Buskirk, the "Luzerne" made the first complete round trip by canal between Wilkes-Barre and Philadelphia, the canal having been opened to Pittston.

From Pittston to the State line, a distance of ninety-four miles, the progress of the North Branch was slow, and in 1836 work upon it was indefinitely suspended. The North Branch Canal Company was incorporated in 1842 to afford an opportunity for private capital in the coal regions to invest and carry forward the much needed and long desired improvement. "Show your faith by your works, gentlemen; you who knock so clamorously at the portals of the State treasury with the plea of public benefit and necessity—you are the ones to be directly benefited by this opening of the northern coal field to market. Dig your own ditch."

But the capital was not here in proper shape for such investment. It was asking an impossibility. The farmer with his two or three hundred acres of rough land could not do more than support his family. The opening of a canal or a railroad was to him at best but creating a market for his homestead for thirty or forty dollars an acre—say eight thousand or ten thousand dollars—an event not desired; and the subscription of one third or even one tenth of that sum meant distress and ruin when pay day came. The other side of the picture—is it not seen in the bright hues reflected from a hundred thousand fires sparkling in hall and cottage over our broad commonwealth, at a cost so light as to be almost unfelt? Not a town or city but is benefited a thousand times more in proportion to population than were the scattered people of this then wild region. The fact was not so apparent at that day, although the trade had added one tenth to its first annual production of a million of tons. Now this district alone in 1879 claimed credit for two-thirds of the enormous out-put of twenty-six millions of tons sent to market. The north and west, for whose benefit the North Branch Canal was most needed, received one-third of the product of this coal field.

It was with great apparent reluctance that appropriations were renewed and work resumed on the northern extension. The State had transferred all its rights in the unfinished work to the company, upon condition that the line from the Lackawanna river to the New York State boundary should be completed in three years. The finished portion from the lock at Solomon's creek, on Nanticoke pool, to the Lackawanna river was afterwards added as a bonus. The opinion freely expressed abroad that this was a useless ditch, only calculated, if not intended, to transfer public funds from the State treasury to the pockets of needy followers of designing politicians, was not encouraging to the capitalists of the vicinage, if such there were. But the people once more were aroused, and without regard to party united in urging its early completion, that our anthracite might have an outlet to the cold north country which was being rapidly denuded of its forests and would need the coal for fuel, while the southern and eastern markets were amply supplied by the Lackawanna and by the middle and southern coal fields.

Preparations had been made in Pittston for trade by canal, although it will be noted that trade by the cheap transportation in arks continued long after the canal was finished. Judge Mallory, John L. Butler and Lord Butler had opened a mine and made a railroad of a mile to the canal in Pittston, shipping coal as early as 1840. If any deserved success those gentlemen might claim it for liberal enterprise, energy and industry. They established agencies, produced excellent coal and bore all necessary expenses of tolls and transportation. The close competition of the region nearer the eastern markets made returns uncertain, and unreliable agents caused pecuniary embarrassments. In this way very noble men were worn out in waiting for the completion of the northern outlet.

The absence of northern connections was for a long time an obstacle to the progress of work, and it was finally intimated that it would be resumed upon condition that the Junction canal, a link required in the chain connecting the systems of Pennsylvania and New York by the Chemung canal and Seneca lake, should be pledged to completion at the same time. A meeting was called and books opened for subscriptions to the capital stock of the Junction canal. Mr. John Arnot, of Elmira, N. Y., and Mr. George M. Hollenback of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., were present, both deeply interested. There were few men along the line at that day who had ready money or securities to pledge for it, and subscriptions lagged. After some good natured badinage between the two old friends and capitalists, Colonel Hollenback said: "You subscribe first, Mr. Arnot, and I will put down as much as you do." Mr. Arnot immediately added to his signature "$100,000." Colonel Hollenback, true to his word, promptly pledged his own name for "$100,000" and insured the completion of both canals. Actions like these must not be estimated by results. The gentlemen had little to gain for themselves, but were actuated by a large-hearted public spirit. It was nobly done, but it was too late.

The North Branch extension was placed under the supervision of Mr. William Ross Maffet, an able engineer and an honest, efficient officer, for completion. Trade was opened in the fall of 1856, when eleven hundred and fifty tons of coal passed through it to western New York. In 1859 the trade had only increased to fifty-two thousand tons. Long delays had been fatal. Railroad construction and operation had been so perfected during the suspension of work on the canal that the railroads were enabled to compete successfully with internal water communication, closed by northern frosts and useless for half the year. The North Branch Canal was abandoned. "Sic Transit."

The Pennsylvania and New York Canal and Railroad Company was incorporated in 1865, absorbing the charter of the North Branch Canal Company, and by various supplements secured the right to occupy the bed of the canal, which its railway now follows north from Pittston through the Narrows, where there had been scarce room for two farm wagons to pass on the way to and from market. The railway was opened to Waverly in 1869. For those who make the delightful excursion from New York and Philadelphia by the romantic Lehigh Valley route and the Susquehanna, through the Wyoming valley, to Niagara and the west, the change is a great improvement in comfort and safety, however it may have shattered the idols of a generation reared in the faith of Joshua White—that canals were superior to any other mode of inland transportation, and that the oil which lubricated the wheels of a locomotive and its train would cost more than all the expense of carrying the same tonnage on a canal. There was a great difference between the Lehigh and North Branch canals. Joshua White carried his heavy tonnage with the stream, the current aiding. The light freight and empty boats went up stream. On the Susquehanna the downward trade still continues; but the coal taken north had to encounter the resistance of the current, and it was a serious disadvantage.

What might have been the results of an early completion of our canal, and the establishment of large markets at various points throughout the north and west, it is bootless now to inquire. Probably a long rivalry, and time wasted.

The State sold its interest in the canals in 1858 to the Sunbury and Erie Railroad Company, the North Branch Canal Company being party to the arrangement, taking the division from Northumberland north at $1,500,000. The canal from Northampton street in the city of Wilkes-Barre to Northumberland was sold to the Wyoming Canal Company, chartered in April, 1859. This company was merged in the Pennsylvania Canal Company in 1869, the name having in 1863 been changed by merger in the Wyoming Valley Canal Company. In 1878 the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which controls this canal, reported the amount of freight in net tons in 1866 as 668,706, of which 438,821 tons was anthracite coal. The company has a fine bridge over the Nanticoke pool, connecting its mines on the east side with the Lackawanna and Bloomsburg railroad on the west side of the river, over which its trade is continued through the year; having collieries upon both sides opening some of the largest and best veins of coal in this region, from lands formerly of Colonel Washington Lee, Jameson Harvey and others.

TRADE BY THE LEHIGH.

Citizens of Wyoming were early prospectors and operators in the middle coal field, engaged in efforts to introduce anthracite coal to tide water markets while the war of 1812 obstructed foreign trade and the price of coal was high. That the opening of those markets was of importance to Luzerne is attested now by the fact that nearly if not quite three million tons of coal was furnished to the trade of 1879 by this county from mines in the southern townships of Hazle, Foster, Butler and Black Creek, having outlet by the Lehigh route; besides a fair proportion of the eight and a quarter million tons credited to the trade of the Lehigh Valley and Lehigh and Susquehanna roads, which must have been Wyoming coal.

The editors of "Coal, Iron and Oil," a work of value published in 1866, say of the early history and development of the anthracite regions: "The early history of coal in America is much less obscure and uncertain than its history in England, for obvious reasons. In fact the printers themselves were among the pioneers of our coal mines: first to advocate the value of coal, first to embark in its development and first to chronicle its success, though we cannot say they were first to profit. We may notice the examples of Cist, Miner and Bannan, whose names appear prominently in the early history of anthracite coal."

In 1840 the board of managers of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company ordered the publication of its early history in a pamphlet of some seventy pages, of which free use will be made in this chapter. This will insure both conciseness and accuracy. Mr. Daddow says in "Coal, Iron and Oil" that Nicho Allen, a noted hunter, is reported to have discovered coal on Broad mountain, in Schuylkill county, in 1790. There is no written account of it, and tradition may have blended two characters in one incident; as only a year after, in 1791, another hunter, the famous Philip Ginter, made a like discovery on the "Matchunk," or Bear mountain, about nine miles west of the site of Mauch Chunk. Philip Ginter's discovery developed into the mammoth mine of the Lehigh Company at Summit Hill. Philip tells his own story as follows:

"When I first came to these mountains, some years ago, I built a cabin on the east side of the mountain, and managed by hunting and trapping to support my family in a rough way. Deer and bears were pretty thick, and during the hunting season meat was plentiful; but sometimes we ran short of that, and frequently were hard up for such necessaries as could only be purchased with the produce of the hunter.

"One day, after a poor season, when we were on short allowance, I had unusually bad luck, and was on my way home, empty handed and disheartened, tired and wet with the rain, which commenced falling, when I struck my foot against a stone and drove it on before me. It was nearly dusk, but light enough remained to show me that it was black and shiny. I had heard of 'stone coal' over in Wyoming, and had frequently pried into rocks in hopes of finding it. When I saw the black rock I knew it must be stone coal, and on looking round I discovered black dirt and a great many pieces of stone coal under the roots of a tree that had been blown down. I took pieces of this coal home with me, and the next day carried them to Colonel Jacob Weiss, at Fort Allen.

"A few weeks after this Colonel Weiss sent for me, and offered to pay me for my discovery if I would tell him where the coal was found. I accordingly offered to show him the place if he would get me a small tract of land and water power for a saw-mill I had in view. This he readily promised and afterward performed. The place was found and a quarry opened in the coal mountain. In a few years the discovery made hundreds of fortunes, but I may say it ruined me, for my land was taken from me by a man who said he owned it before I did, and now I am still a poor man."

The history authorized by the company opens with the formation of the "Lehigh Coal Mine Company":

"In 1793 a company was formed under the title of the Lehigh Coal Mine Company, who purchased from Jacob Weiss the tract of land on which the large opening at Summit Hill is made, and afterwards 'took up,' under warrants from the commonwealth, about ten thousand acres of land, embracing about five-sixths of the coal lands now owned by the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company. The Coal Mine Company proceeded to open the mines, and made an appropriation of ten pounds ($26.67) to construct a road from the mines to the landings (nine miles). After many fruitless attempts to get coal to market over this nominal road, and by the Lehigh river, which in seasons of low water in its unimproved state defied the floating of a canoe over its rocky bed, and after calling for contributions from the stockholders until calling was useless, the Lehigh Mine Company became tired of the experiment and suffered their property to lie idle for some years.

"To encourage and bring into notice the use of their coal, the company in December, 1807, gave a lease upon one of the coal veins to Rowland and Butland for twenty-one years, with the privilege of digging iron ore and coal, gratis, for the manufacture of iron. This business was abandoned, together with the lease, as from some cause they did not succeed in their work.

"In December, 1813, the company made a lease for ten years of their lands to Messrs. Miner, Cist & Robinson, with the right of cutting lumber on the lands for building boats; the whole consideration for this lease was to be the annual introduction into market of ten thousand bushels of coal, for the benefit of the lessees.

"Five ark loads of coal were despatched by these gentlemen from the landing at Mauch Chunk, two of which reached Philadelphia, the others having been wrecked in their passage."

When Colonel Weiss received the pieces of coal from the hunter he took them to Philadelphia and submitted them to the inspection of John Nicholson, Michael Hilligas and Charles Cist, who authorized Colonel Weiss to satisfy Ginter upon his pointing out the precise location of the coal. These gentlemen united with others in forming the coal mine company, but without a charter. Mr. Maxwell includes the eminent financier of the Revolutionary war, Mr. Robert Morris, among the active patrons of the early improvement of the Lehigh, but mention of his name does not occur in the early histories within reach.

Jacob Cist, a gentleman of unusually solid and brilliant scientific attainments, who had in early life removed to Wyoming, was a son of Charles Cist. In 1813 he united with Charles Miner, editor of the Gleaner, and John W. Robinson, all of Wilkes-Barre, in the lease on the Lehigh. Stephen Tuttle was a fourth. Isaac A. Chapman, afterward editor of the Gleaner, and author of an early history of Wyoming, was at one time associated in the enterprise. He was an engineer with Milnor Roberts and Solomon W. Roberts on the upper division of the navigation under Canvass White, and died at Mauch Chunk while in the company's service.

A curious old contract of January 27th, 1815, "between Chas. Miner of the one part and Benjamin Smith and James Miars of the other part, witnesseth that the said Smith and Miars have agreed to haul from the great coal bed near the Lehigh, commonly called the Weiss bed, to the landing near the Lints place sixty tons of stone coal by the first day of April, 1815, for which the said Miner is to pay them four dollars and fifty cents per ton." If the full amount was not hauled the price was to be only four dollars.

There is also a memorandum, signed and sealed by Philip Heermans, agreeing to build arks in a workmanlike manner, ready to run by the first spring freshets in the Lehigh, ten arks for four hundred dollars. "Said Charles to find all the materials on the spot; to haul the timber, board the hands, and to furnish them a reasonable quantity of whiskey. Wilkes-Barre, November 23, 1814." A note added—"Mr. Heermans was a very clever fellow and had built the arks previously used. I wish he had lived to see the present development of the coal business on his native Lackawanna."

The company's history says: "Only four dollars was paid for hauling the coal over the road before referred to, and the contractor lost money. The principal part of the coal which arrived at Philadelphia was purchased at twenty-one dollars per ton by White & Hazard, who were then manufacturing wire at the falls of the Schuylkill. But even this price did not remunerate the owners for the losses and expenses of getting the coal to market, and they were consequently compelled to abandon the prosecution of the business, and of course did not comply with the terms of the lease."

The venerable James A. Gordon, still hale and active, in memory and body, wrote from his home in Plymouth to the Wilkes-Barre Record of the Times, February, 1874, his recollections of this early Luzerne enterprise on the Lehigh:

"On the 17th July, 1814, with Abial Abbott, Sterne Palmer, Strange H. Palmer (another printer), Thomas P. Beach, Joseph Thomas, Chester Dana and Josiah Horton, shouldered knapsacks and tools for a march to the Lehigh to build arks for Messrs. Cist, Miner and Millhouse. (Hilligas?)

"Four arks were ready for loading by the first freshet. The estimated cost of fifty tons, one ark load of coal, was: Mining, $50; hauling from summit, $4.50 per ton, $225; cost of ark, $125; loading ark, $15. Total, $415.

"Lehigh pilots were on hand. The fleet moved off with the rapid current, and in fifteen minutes brought up on a reef called 'Red Rocks,' half a mile below. One ark got through. In the ensuing December peace was declared, and coal went down to six dollars. The enterprise was a financial failure."

Mr. Gordon was one of the lads on board the stranded ark who stripped nearly naked to stop the rush of water through the hole stove in the bow, and got a good wetting, of which he seems none the worse.

In 1879 Lehigh coal sold at Port Johnson for $2.50 per ton. Lackawanna coal sold as low as $2 per ton on the Hudson river. The vast expenditure of money required to purchase lands, to develop mines, and to construct lines for transportation of coal to market, which makes possible this comparison of prices between coal delivered on the Lehigh in 1815 and at tidal points in 1879, constitutes a portion of the indebtedness of companies, the interest on which must be added to the cost of production in estimating the economic or the commercial value of anthracite as a fuel.

Let those who complain of the grasping avarice of coal dealers, or of "soulless corporations," carefully compute the saving effected in cost by the sacrifices of time and money on the part of the pioneers, and rest satisfied with yet higher prices than were charged in 1879. For the increased comfort to the domestic circles in thousands of homes, and the prosperity so widely spread through the land by rendering cheap and abundant an article of such prime necessity, bless those whose labors and enterprise have produced the change, rather than revile them for imputed faults.

The early efforts of the Lehigh Coal Mine Company were said to have resulted in the transportation of a small quantity of coal to Philadelphia, which the manager of the water works purchased for use under the boiler of a steam engine in Centre Square. Erskine Hazard, in a communication to the Historical Society, says the purchaser thought it "only served to put the fire out, and the remainder was broken up and spread on the walks, instead of gravel."

Messrs. Daddow and Bannan, in their book on "Coal, Iron and Oil," say that a Mr. William Morris took a wagon load of coal from near Port Carbon, in Schuylkill, about the year 1800, without finding a market; and Mr. William Trumbull was unsuccessful with an ark load taken to Philadelphia in 1806 from Lehigh.

A few paragraphs quoted from the book will interest the reader. All the history of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company belongs to the trade of the Wyoming coal field, and every effort to introduce anthracite to the Quaker City and other markets as an article of commerce was directly in our interest.

"In 1812 Colonel George Shoemaker, of Pottsville, loaded nine wagons with coal for Philadelphia. Two loads he disposed of at cost of transportation, one to Messrs. White & Hazard, at their nail and wire works at the falls of the Schuylkill; and the other to Messrs. Mellon & Bishop, of the Delaware county rolling mill. The other seven loads he either gave away, or disposed of for a trifle, to blacksmiths, or others who promised to try it. But the colonel was not to get off so easily. Though he lost time and money, and had the trouble of his attempts to introduce a fuel which has since made Philadelphia one of the most wealthy and prosperous cities in the world, the very men to whom he had given his coal obtained a writ from the authorities of that city for his arrest as an impostor and swindler.

"In the meantime Mr. White, who was anxious to succeed in burning this coal, with some of his men spent a whole morning in trying to ignite it and raise a heat in one of their furnaces. They tried every possible expedient which skill and experience in other fuels could suggest. They raked it, and poked it, and stirred it up, and blew upon the surface through open furnace doors with perseverance and persistent determination; but all to no purpose. Colonel Shoemaker's rocks would not burn, and the attempt was abandoned. Dinner time arrived, and the men shut the furnace doors in disgust, heartily tired of the stones, or stone coal, if such it was.

"Returning from dinner at the usual time, all hands were astonished at the phenomena which they beheld. The furnace doors were red hot, and the whole furnace in danger of being melted down with a heat never before experienced. On opening the doors a glowing mass at white heat was discovered. So hot a fire had never before been seen in the furnace. From this time anthracite stone coal found friends and advocates in Philadelphia, and the motto 'let it alone' became a recipe for its use."

Mr. Hazard in a communication published in the proceedings of the Pennsylvania Historical Society says that Mr. Joshua Malin told them that he had succeeded in using Lehigh coal in his rolling mill, and that White & Hazard procured a load of it which cost one dollar per bushel. It was entirely wasted without getting up heat. Another cart load was obtained and a whole night spent in endeavoring to make a fire in the furnace, when the hands shut the furnace door and left the mill in despair. Fortunately, one of them left his jacket in the mill, and returning for it in about half an hour noticed that the furnace door was red hot, etc., etc.

This makes the fact of the experiment and its success clear. The parties narrating were interested in different mines of the same long, narrow basin of coal now known as the southern anthracite, which extends from near the Lehigh almost to the Susquehanna.

A very interesting "Memoir of Josiah White" by his son-in-law Richard Richardson, now living in Arch street, Philadelphia, published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1873, furnished many facts in connection with Mr. White's efforts to improve the navigation of the Lehigh river and introduce coal to market. It says that coal was known to exist in large quantities near the head waters of the Schuylkill river, and they procured some from there; but the price was enormously high, forty dollars a ton, brought to their works in wagons. They concluded to apply to the Legislature for the privilege of making the Schuylkill navigable and supply their own coal at a cheaper rate. It certainly would seem more reasonable than the Lehigh scheme, but the application in 1812-13 was met with ridicule of the idea of using coal as a fuel. The member from Schuylkill county affirmed to the Legislature that although they had a black stone in their county it would not burn. They were unsuccessful.

Erskine Hazard in an article in Hazard's Register says that, their application as individuals having failed, they called a public meeting and made a more formal application for a charter, which was the commencement of the present Schuylkill Navigation Company, incorporated in 1815.

Josiah White, George F. A. Hauto, and William Briggs, a stone mason, visited the Lehigh on horseback in 1817, reaching Bethlehem on Christmas eve. Mr. White says: "Upon returning home with favorable impressions of the practicability of the project [of improving the river and mining coal], it was concluded that Erskine Hazard, George F. A. Hauto and myself should join in the enterprise. I was to mature the plan; Hauto was to procure the money from his rich friends; Hazard was to be the scribe, he also being a good machinist and an excellent counselor." The pamphlet history of the company says:

"Upon their return and making a favorable report it was ascertained that the lease on the mining property (the lease to Miner, Cist & Robinson) was forfeited by non user, and that the law, the last of six which had been passed for the improvement of the navigation of the river, had just expired by its own limitation. Under these circumstances the Lehigh Coal Mine Company became completely dispirited, and executed a lease to Messrs. White, Hauto and Hazard, for twenty years, of their whole property, on condition that, after a given time for preparation, they should deliver for their own benefit at least forty thousand bushels of coal annually in Philadelphia and the districts, and should pay, upon demand, one ear of corn as an annual rent upon the property."

So Miner, Cist & Robinson, like the poor hunter Ginter, gained but a loss by their enterprise and labors, their lease having been forfeited by non user! It is the fate of nearly all who wander ahead of their kind in search of wealth or knowledge to lose or to be lost. Generations which follow profit by such losses. In this connection pardon will be granted by the kind reader for the use of space in quoting from the interesting lectures referred to in earlier pages. Mr. Maxwell, after noticing the many abortive attempts to introduce coal into Philadelphia, says:

"The fact was; the Philadelphians and the people of the Lehigh were behind the times; they did not take the Wyoming newspaper, and suffered the natural consequences of such a blunder! I have been greatly interested in turning over their old files. Politics and the stirring events of the European and American wars furnished ample materials for their columns; but home subjects were not forgotten.

"In 1813 Mr. Miner was publishing The Gleaner in Wilkes-Barre; and in a long editorial article from his pen, under date of November 19th and the head of 'State Policy,' he urged with great zeal the improvement of the descending navigation of the Susquehanna and Lehigh rivers. He then said: 'The coal of Wyoming has already become an article of considerable traffic with the lower counties of Pennsylvania. Numerous beds have been opened, and it is ascertained beyond all doubt that the valley of Wyoming contains enough coal for ages to come.' He then goes on to speak highly of its quality, and says further: 'Seven years ago our coal was thought of little value. It was then supposed that it could not be burned in a common grate. Our smiths used it, and for their use alone did we suppose it serviceable. About six years ago one of our most public spirited citizens made the experiment of using it in a grate, and succeeded to his most sanguine expectations.'

"Again, in the same paper, issued on the 31st of December, 1813, in an article headed 'The Prosperity of Philadelphia,' Mr. Miner wrote of the objects to be accomplished for her advantage: 1, The connection of the waters of the Chesapeake and the Delaware—since accomplished; 2, The connection of the Schuylkill with the Swatara—since much more than accomplished by the Union Canal; and 3, The opening of a communication from the Susquehanna to Philadelphia by a road or railway from Wilkes-Barre to the Lehigh, and thence by that river to the Delaware, and thence to Philadelphia. 'I have visited,' he said, 'Lausanne and a number of other places on the Lehigh, having particularly in view to ascertain the real situation of its navigation.' Then, in the next issue of the same paper, there is another editorial by Mr. Miner, headed 'Navigation of the Lehigh,' and occupying two and a half columns of the paper. In it he wrote earnestly and at length as to the merits of our coal, as well as to the improvement of the Lehigh. Upon this point he printed in italics the following sentence: 'I say with great confidence, this is the course pointed out by Nature for the connection between the Susquehanna and the Delaware;' and experience has since verified its truth. He then urged upon the public the improvement in question, on the ground of the comparatively small expense it would require. He was not too sanguine, as the event has proved. On the contrary, he then said: 'Our public improvements must grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength. We cannot expect in this young country, having so many points to improve, to equal the old and more populous countries of Europe. I appeal to the judicious men who have witnessed the failure of our grandest plans, if they have not miscarried because they were disproportionate to the necessity and the ability of the country;' and he closed this part of the subject by saying. 'I hope our grandchildren may live to see a complete railway from this place to the Lehigh, and a canal from thence to Philadelphia.'

"This is an interesting passage. It would be interesting to know just how many of Mr. Miner's readers understood at that day what a railway was. There was not then a railway in existence,—save the 'tram roads' in and about the mines of Newcastle,—and to those who understood this how much like the merest vagaries of the imagination must Mr. Miner's confident hope have seemed. And yet it has been more than realized. His grandchildren have indeed not only lived to see that very railroad and canal completed, but he has lived to see it himself, finished and in use; and more than this,—he has lived to see not only that particular railway and canal, but also five other railroads and two other canals diverging from this valley to the great coal marts of the country! [And since the above was written a railroad has been made north by the side of the canal; two others south to the seaboard cities and beside the Lehigh canal; and the construction of two others has also been commenced, leading into the valley from different directions and by new routes.]

"But the result of Mr. Miner's investigations, and of his explorations of the Lehigh at that early day, was the hope that even then coal could be got down the Lehigh river to Philadelphia in arks from Mauch Chunk; and in December of 1813 he, in company with Messrs. Cist and Robinson, of Wilkes-Barre, leased the mines at Mauch Chunk and made arrangements to try the experiment. Mr. Robinson withdrew early from their company.

"Of Mr. Miner I need hardly speak in this community. For a number of years he represented old Luzerne (then embracing all of northeastern Pennsylvania) in the Legislature of the State. Subsequently he represented Lancaster, Chester and Delaware counties in Congress; having for his colleague James Buchanan, now President of the United States. In 1832 he returned to his early home, and is still with us, enjoying happily, at his Retreat, the evening of a long and well spent life; the valued friend of all about him; and all are friends of his in return.

"Jacob Cist, Esq., who was associated with him in their Mauch Chunk enterprise, was the son of Charles Cist, who with Robert Morris and others had formed the Lehigh Coal Mine Company. He came to this valley in his youth, and commenced the mercantile business in this town; but he was devoted to scientific studies and held a wide correspondence with scientific men. He understood better than any other gentleman of his day the geology of this region. Highly appreciating its coal, and clearly foreseeing its importance, he was ever ready to promote its appreciation abroad; and great reason have his respected descendants in this valley to bless his honored memory, his sound judgment and far-seeing forecast, verified in his short life by his wise and ample provision for them in the purchase of coal land.

"We speak of these gentlemen thus particularly because their undertaking was depreciated at the time, and the gentlemen themselves subject to ridicule by those whom their foresight, courage and enterprise greatly benefited."

Mr. Miner lived to see, years after the lectures were read before the Historical and Geological Society, the whole of this splendid improvement upon the upper Lehigh swept away by a flood, with all his cherished theories of interior water transportation for articles of bulk and of small value; and railroads, cheapened by improved machinery, taking its place on both banks of the Lehigh, doing a business in amount far beyond the wildest of his early dreams. Mr. Charles Cist, the father of Jacob Cist, Mr. Richardson speaks of in his memoir of Joseph White as "an intelligent painter." It is not unlikely that he was both editor and painter, and from him his son inherited his genius and his taste for the fine arts. In early life Jacob Cist, while generously assisting a refugee from over the Atlantic, who was in ill health, came in possession of an old painting brought from abroad. After his decease his family discovered that it was of great value, probably the original of Rubens's "Susanna and the Elders." Exact copies of it are found among the engravings in foreign art galleries, but the original is nowhere else to be discovered. As an original Rubens it is almost priceless—the next in value to anthracite coal, to which we return.

In 1818 an act was passed by the Legislature to improve the navigation of the river Lehigh, granting to White, Hauto & Hazard (some members said, the opportunity of ruining themselves) privileges "now considered of such immense magnitude that they ought never to have been granted, and which those gentlemen were, at that time, pointed at as extremely visionary, and even crazy, for accepting." The history says:

"The stock of this company was subscribed for on condition that a committee should proceed to the Lehigh and satisfy themselves that the actual state of affairs corresponded with the representation of them. The committee consisted of two of our most respectable citizens, both men of much mechanical skill and ingenuity. They repaired to Mauch Chunk, visited the coal mines, and then built a bateau at Lausanne, in which they descended the Lehigh and made their observations. They both came to the conclusion, and so reported, that the improvement of the navigation was perfectly practicable; and that it would not exceed the cost of $50,000, as estimated, but that the making of a good road to the mines was utterly impossible; for, added one of them, to give you an idea of the country over which the road is to pass, I need only tell you that I considered it quite an easement when the wheel of my carriage struck a stump instead of a stone."

This report, of course, voided the subscription to the joint stock.

The Lehigh Navigation Company was organized on the 10th of August, 1818, with a capital of two hundred thousand dollars, in two hundred shares of stock.

The Lehigh Coal Company was organized on the 21st of October following, for the purpose of mining coal, making a road to the river and taking the coal to market. This arose from a diversity of opinion as to the relative profits of the two interests.

It was thought and suggested that the trade of the Susquehanna could be diverted by land carriage over the turnpike already made from Berwick, only thirty miles distant, and turned to Philadelphia. These far-seeing men already imagined the Danville, Hazleton and Wilkes-Barre Railroad, as well as the Lehigh and Susquehanna road. They said: "By the Susquehanna and Lehigh the western counties of New York will be nearer, in point of expense, to Philadelphia than to Albany, and consequently a large portion of the produce which now goes down the North river to New York may be calculated on for the supply of Philadelphia."

Reaching the North river by the Danville, Hazleton & Wilkes-Barre Railroad, and the Eastern States by a bridge over that stream at Poughkeepsie, must certainly have been beyond their most acute mental visions. Yet the corner stone of that bridge was laid in 1873.

In soliciting subscriptions to stock, Stephen Girard said "he formed no partnerships," and declined. Joseph Bonaparte respectfully declined, by letter through his secretary. One wrote "that his Wilkes-Barre friends believed we could not be in earnest in our navigation."

In the spring of 1820 the ice severely injured several of the dams and more money was needed. This resulted in the purchase of Hauto's interest by White & Hazard. In April the two companies amalgamated their interests and united under the title of The Lehigh Navigation and Coal Company; the navigation was repaired and three hundred and sixty-five tons of coal sent to Philadelphia, as the first fruits of the concern. This overstocked the market and was with difficulty disposed of.

By a new arrangement made the first of May, 1821, the title of the company was again changed, to the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company; the capital stock was increased and White & Hazard released to the company all their reserved rights in consideration of certain shares of stock given to them; the company assuming the settlement of Hauto's claim upon White & Hazard arising from the purchase of his interest the preceding year.

George F. A. Hauto, whose wealthy friends had been relied on to furnish capital, may not have been a capitalist, but he was evidently a very shrewd man. Mr. Richardson, in a note to his memoirs of Josiah White, says that "Hauto was a German, and had insinuated himself into their confidence by his pretensions to wealth and influence. He had to be bought off at a considerable pecuniary sacrifice." The exact terms of his agreement at settling are not at hand. He was to receive a certain royalty per ton, or bushel. A letter from Mr. Richardson conveys the following information upon this point:

"I have ascertained from some of Josiah White's old documents that in the spring of 1820, to get out of the concern, White and Hazard agreed to give him a royalty of half a cent a bushel on all coal mined and sent to market, for his interest in their partnership. Hauto afterward attempted to form what was called 'The Half Cent Company,' and issued shares of stock, of which he sold in his lifetime 1,394 shares, which, as the par price of his stock was $50, would have amounted to $69,700. This stock was given, it was said, in payment of his debts, and at a heavy discount on the par value, probably at any rate the parties would take them at, and it was thought he did not realize much on them. The company afterward, in 1830, bought the royalty for a sum agreed upon between them, but I do not know the figures. I think Hauto was then dead."

Assuming anthracite coal to average twenty-five bushels to the ton, the royalty would amount to one York shilling or 12½ cents, which would give Mr. Hauto, upon the tonnage of the company reported for 1879, an income of $87,250. If paid upon the total tonnage of the Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad and Lehigh Canal in 1879, it would be $520,000, nearly.

The rocky and stumpy road to the summit mines is now the bed of the Switchback railroad, growing so famous among tourists and excursionists to the "Switzerland of America." In 1826 it was decided to make a railroad along the turnpike as a measure of economy. The only railroad in the United States was one of three miles to the Quincy granite quarries. This road from Mauch Chunk was nine miles in length, completed in May, 1826, with a descent all the way from beyond the summit mines to the river. The empty wagons were taken back to the mines by mules, which rode down in special cars attached to the coal trains, running by gravity. He was a sturdy man who could prevent a mule from entering his pleasure car, which was also his dining car, when detached from the traces.

This improvement, increasing the facilities for production of coal, rendered further improvement of the navigation desirable, and, the Delaware division of the Pennsylvania Canal having been decided upon, it was determined to construct a canal and slack water navigation from Mauch Chunk to Easton. Mr. Canvass White, whose reputation as an engineer stood high, recommended a canal of the ordinary size to accommodate boats of twenty-five tons. The acting managers wisely overruled this, arguing that the same number of hands could manage a boat carrying a hundred and fifty tons, requiring but one additional horse to tow it; the whole cargo being coal, which could always be furnished, and the expense per ton be very much reduced. The Delaware division unfortunately was but half the size, and when both were completed two boats of the Delaware could pass the Lehigh locks. The company suffered by this short-sighted policy, which the managers, ascribing it to the "experience of Europe," said, "had thwarted a noble work by which sloops and schooners would, at this day, have taken in their cargoes at White Haven, seventy-one miles up the Lehigh, and have delivered them, without transshipment, at any of our Atlantic ports.

This "experience of Europe," acquired among the narrow and slow canals which had proved so profitable in England, operated against the early trade of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company almost as disastrously, as will be seen in the history of our eastern trade. Engineers and capitalists are, perhaps, still too prone to look back, if not now upon the "experience of Europe" yet upon the disastrous past, and only perceive when elevated upon the advancing tide of commerce of the present how limited were their vision and knowledge during the past years. There are, however, brilliant exceptions to all rules.

By act of the Legislature March 13, 1837, the company was authorized to construct a railroad to connect their Lehigh navigation with the north branch of the Susquehanna at or near Wilkes-Barre, and the capital stock was increased to $1,600,000, at the same time repealing so much of the former act as required the completion of a slack water navigation between White Haven and Stoddardsville, which had been placed under charge of Edwin A. Douglass, Esq., engineer, in 1835.

Commissioners appointed by the governor in 1838 to inspect the work—Samuel Breck, Nathan Beach and Owen Rice—reported on the 12th day of June, after thorough examination, that "the company having now fully complied with the law, and in a manner honorable to themselves, and (as Pennsylvanians the undersigned say, with pride) most honorable to the State, we deem them entitled to a license for charging and collecting the legal toll."

It may not be out of place in this history of the coal trade to give the dimensions of one of the locks—No. 27, called Pennsylvania lock—on this once magnificent improvement, the pride of the Lehigh, on which so many hopes of this Luzerne region had been based, as reported by the commissioners: "Twenty-seven feet thickness of solid wall at the bottom and ten feet on the top; thirty feet lift, three feet working guard; chamber twenty feet in width and one hundred feet in length, eighty-six feet clear of the swing of the gates, and containing nine thousand nine hundred and seventy-two cubic yards of masonry, and two hundred and forty two thousand four hundred and nineteen feet, board measure, of timber work; and the largest dams being of the height of fifty-eight feet and of the width of one hundred and ninety feet at the combing." This lock and dam sustained no serious injury by the great flood of June, 1862, which destroyed the navigation from White Haven to Mauch Chunk.

The Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad was completed in time for shipment of five thousand eight hundred and eighty-six tons from Wyoming in 1846.

How many active men of this region labored in early years for the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, earning bread and comfortable homes and money to pay taxes, and held its name and those of Josiah White and Erskine Hazard in pleasant remembrance as household words long after the tardy action of the commonwealth had given promise and hopes for the future progress of its improvements on the Susquehanna!

The Beaver Meadow railroad, chartered in 1830, was finished in 1836, extending from the Beaver Meadow coal basin which is partly in Luzerne county, to its shipping point on the canal six miles below Mauch Chunk, a distance of twenty-five miles to Parryville.

The Hazleton railroad, commenced in 1836, connected with the Beaver Meadow road at Weatherly, half way to the Lehigh, and the Hazleton coal was shipped on the canal at Penn Haven. The old planes are seen as you pass the mouth of the Quakake creek at Penn Haven, decaying relics of the past, in the midst of the progress, bustle and active business rivalry of competing railroads of the present. Instead of the lonely wilderness described by Josiah White in 1818, when with Erskine Hazard they "leveled the river from Stoddardsville to Easton, the ice not having all disappeared, there being no house between the former place and Lausanne, obliging us to lie out in the woods all night," now the whistles of a hundred locomotives startle the echoes of the hills by day and by night.

Mr. White says: "Above the gap in the Blue mountain, there were but thirteen houses, including the towns of Lausanne and Lehigh, within sight from the river, and for thirty-five miles above Lausanne there was no sign of a human habitation; everything was in a state of nature."

The coal trade of Luzerne receives full benefit of the labors of the pioneers on the Lehigh, and its history would be but partially written and incomplete without this record of their enterprise. The various basins of anthracite coal found in the townships of Hazle, Foster, Butler, Black Creek, and possibly across the boundary lines of adjoining townships in the southern portion of the county, furnish annually between three and four millions of tons in the trade, of which the Lehigh Valley Railroad, opened in 1855, perhaps carries two-thirds.

A contract was entered into between the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company and the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey on the 31st day of March, 1871, by which the latter company became lessee of the railroads of the former company, agreeing to pay one-third of the gross receipts as rental. The cost of transportation of coal, the chief item of tonnage, was to be regulated by the price at which it was sold.

At the close of the year 1873 the coal lands of the company were leased to the Lehigh and Wilkes-Barre Coal Company, which was formed by the consolidation of the Honeybrook Coal Company and the Wilkes-Barre Coal and Iron Company, at a minimum rental of five hundred thousand dollars ($500,000), on a royalty of twenty-one per cent. of the price ruling at Mauch Chunk. This included lands in Luzerne as well as those upon the Lehigh. At the same time it was agreed that the Central Railroad of New Jersey should operate the canals of the Lehigh Company from Mauch Chunk to Easton and the Delaware division purchased at the sale of the State works, paying a fixed rental of $200,000 for their use.

The stroke of apoplexy which prostrated the whole civilized business world, the first attack occurring in the failure of J. Cooke & Co., in 1873, drove the Central Railroad of New Jersey into the hands of a receiver. The leased canals were abandoned and with the Lehigh coal lands passed again into the hands of the original owners, who became once more a mining and transporting company.

The railroad now recognized as the Lehigh and Susquehanna division of the Central Railroad of New Jersey includes the Nanticoke Railroad and the Baltimore Coal and Iron Railroad, extending from Nanticoke, on the pool at the head of the Susquehanna Canal, by the foot of the planes and the light track, to its junction with the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's Railroad at Green Ridge in the City of Scranton, now the seat of justice of the new county of Lackawanna. Passing through the townships of Newport, Hanover, Wilkes-Barre, Plains, Jenkins, Pittston and Lackawanna; connecting at Wilkes-Barre with the tracks of the Plymouth and Wilkes-Barre Railroad and Bridge Company, and opening as it does the heart of this northern coal field, the New Jersey road becomes an important factor in the problem of our future coal trade.

Near White Haven the Nescopeck branch brings tonnage to the Central from the Upper Lehigh mines in the Green Mountain basin, and from the Sandy Run mines in the Little Black Creek basin. A few miles below the Sandy Run branch affords outlet to other mines of the Little Black Creek at Eckley, Jeddo, Milnesville, Ebervale, Cross Creek, Highland, etc., all producing largely.

The Hazleton and Beaver Meadow road, merged in the Lehigh Valley Railroad, affords outlet from the Hazleton, a portion of the Beaver Meadow, and the Black Creek basins in southern Luzerne.

Asa Packer, native of Connecticut, a carpenter by trade, acquired in Susquehanna county, whither he had traveled on foot from his eastern home, when a young man, found work upon the Lehigh, where his keen foresight had play and his great energy of character and indomitable will material to work upon. He acquired coal property and projected a railroad to carry his coal to market from the Hazleton region. Following the river, his line absorbed the Beaver Meadow road, already in operation from Parryville to Penn Haven, where it received coal from the now abandoned planes. Crossing the Lehigh at that point, the towing path of the upper navigation occupying the west bank, his road followed on the east side to a point opposite White Haven, where by a substantial bridge it joined the Lehigh and Susquehanna railroad at its southern terminus, and thus had uninterrupted communication by rail with the great Wyoming coal field, and transportation without transshipment to tide water.

All this was not accomplished without opposition, and when, after the disastrous flood of 1862, which swept away the upper division of its navigation, the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company decided to abandon the water and extend its Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad from White Haven along its towing path to Mauch Chunk, the head of its canal, competition between the companies developed into keen rivalry for room and right of way along the narrow passes where there had been scant room for a towing path. The Lehigh Valley Company, crossing from the east to the west side above Mauch Chunk, occupied available space by numerous sidings to accommodate its growing trade from the Quakake branch at Penn Haven, and the Lehigh and Susquehanna road had to draw upon the east bank of the stream at low water for material to make room for its tracks in the channel, along side its rival.

The Lehigh Valley Company met this new project by pushing the road northward from White Haven to Wilkes-Barre in 1866, competing with the Lehigh and Susquehanna road for through freight. A little incident, exciting at the time and now amusing, will show to what heat the friction of jarring interests had carried the immediate contestants. The Lehigh Valley road united with the Lehigh and Susquehanna road at grade, the bridge having been built, of course, with a view to amicable trade. A long construction train of gravel cars crossed the bridge one evening, and was shunted upon the rival road with tools of all kinds, ready to begin operations on the new road, the high bluff on the White Haven side at the crossing precluding any other arrangement. In the early morning an energetic employe of the Navigation Company observed this intrusion, and taking an old locomotive up the track with a full head of steam, he let it loose upon the innocently offending train, and butted it into the Lehigh, a heap of ruins. The immediate result is not remembered, but it is a curious fact, illustrating, perhaps, the admiration of Judge Packer for pluck and energy, that the chief responsible actor in that day's drama has almost from that time been in the service of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company.

The navigation company improved the planes at Solomon's Gap, and for convenience of returning trains of empty cars, light freight and passenger traffic, made a light track for locomotive power from the head of the planes north by the Laurel Run Gap and back to the foot of the planes, a distance of thirteen miles, to overcome the steep mountain grade by the planes some three miles. The steepest grade of the back track is ninety-six feet to the mile. It was considered by many to be an almost impossible feat in engineering, but it was successfully accomplished under the supervision of Dr. Charles F. Ingham, of Wilkes-Barre, an able and experienced engineer, at what cost could be now stated. It would be curious to compare old and modern estimates of cost and trade through Solomon's Gap and the Lehigh.

In 1833 the Legislature appointed Messrs. George M. Hollenback, Andrew Beaumont, Henry F. Lamb, W. S. Ross, Charles Mincer, Samuel Thomas, Joseph P. Le Clerc, Elias Hoyt, Benjamin A. Bidlack, E. Carey, Bate-man Downing, Ziba Bennett, Jedediah Irish, Thomas Craig, D. D. Wagner, Azariah Prior, Daniel Parry, Lewis S. Coryell, Joseph D. Murray, John C. Parry, William C. Livingston, Benjamin W. Richards, Robert G. Martin, Joshua Lippincott and Lewis Ryan commissioners of the Wyoming and Lehigh Railroad Company, who employed Henry Colt and Dr. C. F. Ingham, civil engineers, to examine the route through Solomon's Gap and report. The elevation of the summit above the borough of Wilkes-Barre was found to be twelve hundred and fifty-one (1,251) feet, and above the Lehigh six hundred and four (604) feet, and the distance between the two points about fourteen (14) miles. Grading for a double track was recommended, with a single track at first. The estimated cost of grading double track on the western division, eight miles, was $20,250; from the summit to the Lehigh, six miles and a quarter, $12,850—total, $33,100; and for engineering and unforeseen contingencies (twelve per cent.) $3,962; and we have the cost of graduation, $37,062. Average cost per mile, $2,647.28. Cost of one mile of superstructure, timber, iron rail plates, connecting plates and labor, with one turnout, $3,805.50. Average cost of railroad per mile, $6,452.78. Cost of 14½ miles, $91,952.11.

Cost of four inclined planes, $4,000 each, $16,000. Total, $107,952.11. Estimate made in view of the use of steam for locomotives and stationary power. The commissioners, in an address to the public, say: "Persons of intelligence and capacity to judge estimate that two hundred thousand tons of coal and three million feet of lumber, at least, will pass along this road to New York and Philadelphia from the vicinity of Wilkes-Barre, which now remain undisturbed where nature placed them; and the great and increasing trade of the Susquehanna, which now goes to Baltimore, will be diverted to New York and Philadelphia." The estimated tolls upon coal and lumber would exceed $47,000. Coal could be delivered at Easton at $2.82 per ton.

At that day, with rails of wood covered with a flat strap-iron rail, operated by horse power, solid road beds were not so necessary as they are now. The Little Schuylkill railroad ran a light locomotive on such a track, but not with success. So, too, the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company with its first imported locomotive, a mere teapot in comparison with those of modern pattern, failed because too heavy for the road. These estimates, ridiculous as they seem in the light of modern experience, were in accordance with the necessities of the times and the prospects they had of accomplishing a deliverance in that direction. The coal trade of the year preceding did not reach three hundred thousand tons from all the regions. The year before the company put their road under contract the trade was nearly seven hundred thousand tons.

From the beginning the course of the anthracite coal trade has seemed to baffle all calculations, even to the year 1880; and those who look back see many wrecks, while in danger themselves of meeting the same fate from want of faith in the future.

The failure of a loan in England, to meet the cost of improvements to make good its loss of the upper navigation, and the sums thrown away in useless opposition to its rival roads, overwhelmed the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, and its works passed into other hands, to be resumed as already stated. A modicum of the good sense of the early projectors might have shown them that there is room enough and market enough for all, and that competition for the coal trade must be open for the benefit of those most interested, the consuming millions scattered over the broad Union of States, from the great lakes to the gulf, and from the Atlantic far beyond the Mississippi, even to the Pacific Ocean.

The company has brighter prospects now, and may hope to realize its full share of the profits of the future.

The growth of eastern trade from the Lackawanna, which has followed and rivals that of the Lehigh, now demands attention, and will be found equally curious and interesting in its development.

THE DELAWARE AND HUDSON CANAL COMPANY.

The Wyoming coal field is the largest and most northern anthracite basin of Pennsylvania. In area it is something under two hundred square miles, or about one hundred and twenty-seven thousand acres.

Fifty miles in length, and in breadth averaging four miles, it extends from a point above Beach Grove, on the west side of the river Susquehanna, having a course about northeast, to its terminus a few miles above Carbondale.

Resting on the conglomerate rock of bright pebble stones cemented together, which lies in a cradle of red shale, its boundaries are easily traced along the outcroppings on the Kingston mountain on the west and the Wilkes-Barre mountain on the east, while the sinclinal axis or trough, dipping under the river, is carried deep below the rough hills of the lower townships, rising gradually with an irregular formation like solidified waves, until its measures thin out and disappear along the head waters of the Lackawanna river, having the shape of a vast canoe.

The Susquehanna forces its way through the western boundary at the middle of the basin, where it receives the waters of the Lackawanna, which have traversed the upper regions of the basin's trough, and together they leave it at Nanticoke, taking a western gorge to Shickshinny, where the stream curves and crosses the lower point of the coal formation on its course to the ocean.

The cluster of small basins in the southern townships of Luzerne county, which are opened by the Lehigh improvements, belong to the second or middle coal field.

While Josiah White, Erskine Hazard and other enterprising citizens of Philadelphia were seeking the black diamond among the rugged hills of the Lehigh to its upper waters in Luzerne county, and were solving the problem of its value as a fuel, other Philadelphians were exploring the northeastern borders of the county for mineral coal, and the passes of the Moosic mountain to find an outlet by the waters of the Lackawaxen and Delaware rivers to eastern markets.

Mr. William Wurts was the pioneer "who first conceived the idea of transporting coal of the Lackawanna valley to market by an eastern route." A note to an article on the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company in "The National Magazine," August, 1845, for which acknowledgments are due to Mr. Charles P. Wurts, of New Haven, Conn., says: "With such views, as early as 1844, and while that valley was yet an unbroken wilderness, without road or bridle path above Providence, he explored it and the passes of the Moosic mountain to find an outlet to the Lackawaxen and the Delaware rivers, selecting and purchasing such coal lands as were most eligibly situated in reference to that object."

On the 13th of March, 1823, Maurice Wurts and John Wurts, who had conceived the bold enterprise of constructing a railroad and canal to their coal lands on the Lackawanna river in Luzerne county, procured from the Legislature of Pennsylvania an act authorizing Maurice Wurts of Philadelphia, his heirs and assigns, etc., to enter upon the river Lackawaxen, or any streams emptying into the same, "to make a good and safe descending navigation at least once in every six days, except when the same may be obstructed by ice or flood," from near Wagner's Gap in Luzerne, or Rix's Gap in Wayne county, to the mouth of the said Lackawaxen, "with a channel not less than twenty feet wide and eighteen inches deep for arks and rafts, and of sufficient depth of water to float boats of the burthen of ten tons." Certainly a modest beginning.

Forty-two days after this act of Assembly was approved at Harrisburg the Legislature of New York passed "an act to incorporate the president, managers and company of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company," for the expressed purpose of forming a water communication between the rivers Delaware and Hudson, so that a supply of coal might be obtained from large bodies of this valuable article belonging to Maurice Wurts, of the State of Pennsylvania.

By an act of the Pennsylvania Legislature approved April 1st, 1825, and an act of the New York Legislature of April 20th, 1825, the two companies were consolidated and reorganized in this State as the "President, Managers and Company of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company;" with power to construct and maintain such railways or other devices as may be found necessary to provide for and facilitate the transportation of coal to the canal.

Tolls upon the canal were not to exceed eight cents per mile "for every ton weight," and on the railroad a sum not exceeding twelve per centum per annum upon the amount of money which shall have been expended in the construction of said railroad."

Soon after the consolidation of the companies work was begun, and ground broken on the 13th of July, 1826. Parts of the New York section, upon which work was first commenced, were being finished when the contractor began work on the Pennsylvania section, which runs from Honesdale to the mouth of the Lackawaxen, a distance of twenty-five miles, at which point it is joined to the New York section by an aqueduct over the Delaware. The length of the canal from the Delaware to the Hudson is eighty-three miles, making the total length of canal from Honesdale to Rondout one hundred and eight miles. The act of Assembly of April 1st, 1825, limited the maximum of tolls to be charged on stone coal to one cent and a half per ton per mile, and at the same time authorized the company to assume all the rights originally granted to Mr. Wurts. The State had reserved the right to resume all the rights and privileges granted at the expiration of thirty years from the date of the law of March 13th, 1823, without compensation to the company if the tolls received had already repaid the original cost of the canal, with six per cent. upon the capital invested.

In June, 1851, a committee appointed by the Legislature to investigate the affairs of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company met at Honesdale and examined the vice-president, Mr. Musgrave, the engineer, Mr. Russell F. Lord, Mr. Archbald, Mr. Thomas H. R. Tracy, superintendent of the Pennsylvania division, and others, with reference to time of completion, cost, tolls, income and capacity of the canal.

Mr. Lord testified that he had been in the employ of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company about twenty-five years; that work was commenced on the Pennsylvania section of their canal in 1826 or 1827, and that the contractors were at work in its construction when he came as resident engineer in 1827. Boats passed from the Hudson to the Delaware river with light cargoes in the summer of 1827, and over the whole of the New York section in 1828, when boats with very small cargoes reached Honesdale, and with large cargoes in 1829. A small quantity of coal left Honesdale in 1828. The original locks on the Pennsylvania section, of which there were thirty-seven lift locks and one guard lock used, were nine feet four inches in width, seventy-six feet long, and from nine and a half to eleven feet lift. Boats originally crossed the Delaware river by a rope ferry through the pool of the dam. The aqueduct was first used in 1849.

Mr. James Archbald testified that he had charge of the company's mines and railroad. He had been in employment with the company since 1825, excepting one year. Boats on the canal originally carried from twenty-five to thirty tons. The company owned lands for reservoirs of water to supply railroads and canals in a dry season, in Luzerne and Wayne counties. There were four reservoirs at that time. They had nearly two thousand men employed in the mines and on the railroad, at a cost of $1,800 to $2,000 per day. There were already over twenty-five miles of underground railroads at the mines.

Mr. Tracy said there were eight reservoirs of water for the use of the canal, independent of those named by Mr. Archbald, of from ten to three hundred acres.

Mr. Lord, re-examined, stated the number of locks on the New York section of the canal as seventy-two lift and one guard lock, fifteen feet wide, one hundred feet long, and from seven to twelve feet lift. The maximum of tolls in New York was eight cents per ton per mile; on the Pennsylvania section, one cent and a half per ton per mile. The company charged one cent and a half per ton on the New York side, and only one half cent per ton on the Pennsylvania section, making no allowance to the State for the company's own coal or other freight. The amount expended on the Pennsylvania section, including original construction, repairs and superintendence, improvement and general enlargement of the canal from 1828 to July 17th, 1851, was $1,413,496.98. There was another aqueduct across the Lackawaxen above the Delaware aqueduct, belonging to the Pennsylvania section. The reason given for the discrimination in tolls on the two sections was "to encourage transportation of coal by the New York and Erie railroad, which does not come so directly in competition with Hudson river markets." The Erie road passes along the Delaware, crossing the Lackawaxen on the Pennsylvania side, and now has a branch to Honesdale, passing through Hawley, to accommodate the coal trade by the Delaware and Hudson and Pennsylvania Coal Companies' roads.

This investigation was undertaken ostensibly with the view of resumption by the State, which had passed several acts for the improvement of the Delaware river, and had completed the Delaware division of its canals from Bristol, in Bucks county, to Easton, in Northampton county, sixty miles in length, to accommodate the Lehigh coal trade; and apparently on its way, as surveyed, to Carpenter's Point, now Port Jervis, a few miles below the mouth of the Lackawaxen. The company was represented by Hon. George W. Woodward and William H. Dimmick Esqs., as counsel. It is clear that whatever the object, the investigation did not lead to resumption, and the facts as elicited are given to show the progress and condition of the trade toward New York in its early stages. From the Carbondale mines the coal was carried over the mountain on a gravity road of a single track to the canal at Honesdale. It will be observed that "foreign experience" had operated injuriously in the east and at the south, and the canal was not complete at its twenty-five-ton boat capacity until the necessity of enlargement became evident. Unfortunately it is not in constructing canals alone that such experience operates disastrously in this country. But that is not a subject for comment in this portion of our coal trade history.

The sites of both Honesdale and Carbondale were in the natural state of our northern wilderness when ground was broken for these improvements. Carbondale in 1828 contained one log cabin, built to shelter Mr. Wurts in his early explorations. It is now a flourishing town, having a city charter, and has been an excellent market for products of agriculture from townships surrounding it for half a century.

Honesdale has long been the county seat of Wayne county, a populous and flourishing borough. It was named from the first president of the company, Philip Hone, Esq. The appliances at this point are claimed to be "of a capacity to handle one thousand tons of coal an hour."

The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's trade at first was feeble, and anthracite as difficult to introduce in New York as it had been in Philadelphia. Mr. John Wurts, many years afterward president of the company, wrote to Mr. Charles Miner, of Wilkes-Barre, a long and interesting account of his efforts to introduce coal upon boats on the Hudson to generate steam as motive power where wood had been used as fuel. It seems strange at this time that a city having constant communication with Liverpool and Glasgow should have had such strong prejudices against coal or so little knowledge of its use. True, improvements in making coke and the discovery of applying the hot blast to the hard coal of Wales were just beginning to revolutionize the iron trade in England. It was not till 1833 that the introduction of hot blast to the furnaces on the Clyde reduced the cost of pig iron more than one half. Then wood was still cheap in New York. Not a boat could be prevailed upon to give it a fair trial, or voluntarily to lose a day for the purpose of testing this stone coal. The greatest concession gained was permission to work at night, while the boat was lying idle, in fitting the furnace at the company's risk and in furnishing coal for the experiment on one of the small day boats. This was at last accomplished, and the fact demonstrated that steam could be generated and the boat propelled by it. In the same way the owners of a larger boat, running between New York and Albany, were induced to try the coal, and not only the power to produce sufficient steam shown, but the more important facts that the trip could be made with greater speed and at less cost for fuel than by the use of wood. This then was evidently the dawn of a prosperous trade. A large steamboat was then constructed under the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's directions, fitted with furnaces designed especially for the use of anthracite coal, with successful results. It is possible that this may have been a ferry boat, as an article in the New York Journal of Commerce in 1835 under the caption, "Steam by Anthracite Coal," stated: "The new steam ferry boat 'Essex,' to ply between New York and Jersey City, has been fitted up with Dr. Nott's patent tubular anthracite coal boiler. The 'Essex' is one hundred and twenty-six feet long on deck, with twenty-four feet beam and nine feet hold, using Lackawanna coal." The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company contracted to deliver to Dr. Nott's boat five thousand tons of coal per annum, at $4 per ton, which was one dollar per ton below the market price, for six years, coal not to be paid for unless the receipts of the boat exceeded other expenses; upon condition that the company should have the use of this patent anthracite boiler for six steam boats at a price not to exceed sixteen thousand dollars.

It has been stated that coal was used on ferry boats in New York as early as 1831. The exact date of Mr. Wurts's labors is not recorded, and his letter has been lost. Lackawanna coal acquired a high reputation as a fuel for generating steam, and the increasing demand for it compelled constant improvement in the capacity of the canal. Originally designed for boats of thirty tons, which it reached in 1843, it was in 1846 forty tons, in 1848 fifty tons, in 1853 one hundred tons, and now the average per boat is about one hundred and thirty tons, "with a capacity adequate to the transportation of two millions of gross tons annually."

The active competition between the Schuylkill Canal and the Reading Railroad, approaching completion in 1841, so reduced prices that permanent enlargement of the Delaware and Hudson Canal was hastened to lessen cost of transportation and meet this competition. But it was not enough. Canals have had their day and are out of fashion, if not out of date—"vain transitory splendors." The long, cold winters of northern climes, where the bright fires of anthracite coal are most needed to cheer the lengthened nights, render canals useless more than half the year by their frosts, and the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, with an annual trade exceeding three millions of tons, having reached the maximum capacity of its canal more than ten years ago, has now control of the trade on lines of railway leading from the heart of the Wyoming coal field to Canada, opening directly the very best prospective markets in the world; with numerous connections east and west at all important points along its route, insuring an almost unlimited demand for the products of its mines.

THE PENNSYLVANIA COAL COMPANY.

Like an oasis in the desert, the Pennsylvania Coal Company through all the misfortunes and depressions of the coal trade the past few years has maintained its position as a dividend paying corporation, and held its stock above par amidst the fierce contests of the animals in Wall street.

The reader will not confound this company with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which is now enrolled among the coal transporting companies in this region, operating under the charter of the Susquehanna Coal Company on both sides of the river at Nanticoke, and which owns that portion of the old North Branch Canal from Northampton street, Wilkes-Barre, south.

The subject of this sketch was originally engrafted upon the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, the ambition of which was limited in extent of its landed possessions and powers of expansion by restrictive clauses in its charter. Two charters were procured from the Legislature of 1838, both approved April 16th. "The Washington Coal Company" was probably organized first, and on April 1st, 1849, was authorized to sell and relinquish its property to the Pennsylvania Coal Company, under which title the two were consolidated and afterwards absorbed the rights of the Wyoming Coal Association, chartered February 15th, 1851.

Large tracts of land were purchased in certified Pittston township on the Susquehanna, and in Providence and Dunmore on the waters of the Lackawanna. A double track railroad was made, the cars propelled by stationary power and gravity by a series of inclined planes. The distance is forty-seven miles; the tracks do not run side by side, but diverge at points to the distance of two or three miles from each other. Ground for this road was broken in 1847 and it was finished in 1850. The loaded track, as it is termed, or the track upon which the loaded cars are run, starts two miles below Pittston on the Susquehanna, with a plane upon which the coal from the Port Griffith mine is hauled; and a train of cars made up at the summit runs by its own gravity, the speed regulated by one or two men at the brakes, according to the length of the train, to the town of Pittston, where it is taken in sections to the second plane, from which it takes its own way again to the foot of No. 3 at Pleasant Valley—and so on to Hawley on the Delaware & Hudson Canal, tapping in its course its mines in Luzerne, and on the Lackawanna in the present county of that name. The return track carries the empty cars back to Port Griffith, dropping the proper proportion at the different mines in its westward course.

Many gentlemen held stock in both companies and were often at the same time directors in both. At a very early day this company secured most favorable terms for rates of tolls both upon the Delaware & Hudson Canal and upon the Erie railroad. Upon the New York division of the canal a liberal rate was fixed, it was said, to induce persons or companies to provide coal to be transported on the canal. Upon the Pennsylvania section the reason given for charging one-half cent a ton per mile toll, while a cent and a half per ton was charged on the New York section, was to encourage the transportation of coal over the Erie railroad to markets which did not come in competition with their markets on the Hudson—both logical, good and sufficient, although seeming to clash. As a transporting company, through trade was to be encouraged on the canal, as experience has proven it to be cheapest on all lines of transportation. As a coal company, looking to large markets and to profits on coal far beyond the capacity of its canal, it was wise to be seeking new markets and encouraging the trade by every opportunity which presented. This foresight has been of great service to the Pennsylvania Coal Company. When coal sold at $2.50 at Rondout this company paid no tolls, but when the price was above that sum one-half the increase was charged as tolls on the Delaware and Hudson Canal. This arrangement, with the favorable terms for transportation on the Erie road, has given the company important advantages over rival companies. Without the heavy cost of locomotive railroads, owned or leased, or large indebtedness to draw interest from its treasury, it has been able to make dividends which sent its stock up to 280 per cent. while other stocks were below par in the markets. In 1850, the year the gravity railroad was opened, it was credited with one hundred and eleven thousand, one hundred and ninety-four tons upon the Delaware and Hudson Canal, according to the testimony of Mr. Musgrave before the investigating committee of the Pennsylvania Legislature in 1857. In 1879 it sent to market one million three hundred seventy-two thousand, seven hundred and thirty-nine tons. Dividends have been as high as thirty per cent., and for several years twenty per cent., in quarterly payments. During the panic of the past few years profits have of course been much reduced, but its excellent coal, with skill and economy in mining added to the foresight of its officials, have kept its record good.

Mr. William R. Griffith, a gentleman of wealth visiting Wyoming valley, became interested in its coal deposits, and was chiefly instrumental in promoting the organization of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, and in selecting its coal lands. A pleasant little episode in this narrative may be pardoned. Mr. Griffith in early life had among his favorite companions a little lady, daughter of a gentleman who had since become resident in Luzerne county and a mine engineer. For some years Mr. Griffith resided abroad, a childless aunt, whose heir he was, desiring to finish his education in France, where she resided. On his return his first thoughts turned toward the playmate of his youth, who he discovered had become the wife of a prominent merchant of Carbondale, a mother and a widow. True to his early attachment, although apparently forgotten, after waiting a decorous time he sought the valley and made her the offer of his heart, his hand and his elegant equipage. They were married and lived most happily, with the respect and esteem of all who knew them. They have passed away. Few remember their story. A brother of the lady still lives, an honored citizen of Carbondale, and a sister resides near Trenton, N. J. Her only son became a prosperous and respected physician in the city of New York. The Pennsylvania Coal Company owes its existence in a measure to this little romance.

THE DELAWARE, LACKAWANNA AND WESTERN RAILROAD.

The above named company is one of the grandest results of the many great conceptions of genius and enterprise exhibited in the course of development of this northern field. By legislative enactment "the corporate rights, powers and privileges of the Delaware and the Cobb's Gap Railway Company" were merged in the Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company, and the corporate name changed to the "name, style and title of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company." The Liggett's Gap Railroad Company, chartered in 1832, was merged in the Lackawanna and Western in 1851, and with other small charters and connections, uniting like mountain rills with larger streams, this great work was enlarged until it has become a thoroughfare for coal tonnage and for general transportation of freight and passengers from New York city to the far west and northwest.

It is not many years since the valley of Wyoming was likened to that happy vale in the kingdom of Amhara, surrounded on every side by mountains, in which "Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, was confined in a private palace, with the other sons and daughters of Abyssinian royalty, till the order of succession should call him to the throne." Colonel William L. Stone, in the preface to his pleasant book "The Poetry and History of Wyoming," published in 1841, says: "The happy valley to which the illustrious author of Rasselas introduced his reader in the opening of that charming fiction, was not much more secluded from the world than is the valley of Wyoming. Situated in the interior of the country, remote from the great thoroughfares of travel, either for business or in the idle chase of pleasure, and walled on every hand by mountains lofty and wild, and over which long and rugged roads must be traveled to reach it, Wyoming is rarely visited, except from stern necessity. And yet the imagination of Johnson has not pictured so lovely a spot in the vale of Amhara as Wyoming." Colonel Stone had a rough journey over the mountains in the stage-coaches, comfortable as they were to the mountaineers, as those who read the notes of his visit in 1839 will remember. But he had the full benefit of the glorious vision which bursts upon the traveler who, after a tedious day's ride from the Delaware, over Pocono and through the "Shades of Death," reaches the summit of the mountains bordering the valley on the east.

Sweet vale of Wyoming! whose Gertrude was once embalmed in every heart of cultivated Europe by the pen of Campbell, now deemed worthy of mention in modern guide books. Has the romance departed from it with the retiring red man? and even the Gertrude of Halleck, seen on the next field, with

"Love darting eyes and tresses like the morn, Without a shoe or stocking, hoeing corn," been driven out by flying trains of cars crossing its center on tracks leading north and south, east and west, from Baltimore to Boston, from New York to Niagara, and from Philadelphia to Saratoga and to Portland?

A mile east from the main road leading from Wilkes-Barre to Carbondale—not far from Providence Corners, then often called Razorville from the sharpness of its tavern keeper or of the winds which, sweeping the mountain gorges, occasionally blew his house and his sign post over—in a quiet nook on Roaring brook lay "Slocum Hollow," named from its proprietor, one of a large, respectable and influential family of the valley, who had there his farm and mill, and it may be a small furnace. Mr. William Henry, a gentleman of experience in ores and metals, came through Cobb's Gap from the iron lands of New Jersey on a prospecting tour, and finding iron ores and coal convenient began the manufacture of pig iron, the power of the stream furnishing blast for his furnace. George W. Scranton with his Yankee brothers had migrated from Connecticut and settled at Oxford, New Jersey, when young, and there engaged in the iron business. He visited Slocum Hollow and, like Mr. Henry, whose daughter he had married, also became interested in these ore and coal beds; and soon perceived with prophetic eye what capital, energy and enterprise combined might produce from this wilderness. Of commanding presence, strong will and persuasive manner, with but a common school education, his perceptions of business and of character were quick and clear. He went to New York and laid his plans before the money kings, and soon had capital at his locomotive wheels captive in the beech woods. The dam on Roaring brook was first too small and then too large. Then the furnace became too large, and the steam engine had power enough to provide blast for several furnaces; but as it is the coal trade and not iron that is the subject of this sketch, each reader will visit Scranton and note the result for his own satisfaction.

At the Delaware Water Gap the railroad from Scranton united with the Warren railroad, by which it reached the Central Railroad of New Jersey at Junction, in 1856, together forming the highway for Scranton coal to tide at New York. The Central railroad, feeling too independent with its immense tonnage, by insisting on terms of renewal of contract drove both the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western and the Lehigh Valley railroads from it; the one to the Morris and Essex road, which was continued to Easton, crossing it at Washington, New Jersey, and the Lehigh Valley constructing a new line from Phillipsburg to Elizabeth along side of and in direct competition with the Central, which was compelled to join fortunes with the Lehigh and Wilkes-Barre Coal Company and the Lehigh and Susquehanna road of the Navigation Company to gain its coal tonnage. It was short-sighted policy all round and led to disaster, but served ultimately to greatly increase the coal trade.

In early days Cobb's Gap on the east and Liggett's Gap on the west smiled at each other over Providence and the Capoose meadows, a little north and east of Hyde Park and Slocum Hollow, both the prospective courses of possible grade for such small locomotives as were then constructed. Colonel Scranton loved to tell of the look of incredulity which met his assertion that the time would come when the coal trade by these routes would reach hundreds of thousands of tons, and require so many locomotives—not one-third the number employed when he told it. Upon the completion of his line to New York Col. Scranton attended a meeting in Philadelphia, for the first time to consult upon the prospects of the trade for the coming season. The estimated increase was about four hundred thousand tons. Mr. Scranton suggested in behalf of his company, just entering business, that a fair share of the prospective increase, at least at eastern points, should be conceded to it. Without vanity, he was a proud man, and met the uncalled-for assumption that with the heavy grades of his road through Cobb's Gap he would not be likely to unsettle the trade with surplus of coal with a quiet determination to let them see what could be done; and their estimated increase was far exceeded, with a decided reduction in prices.

The northern division of the road, through Liggett's Gap, joined the Erie railroad at Great Bend in 1851, and its tonnage north, west and northwest in 1878 was 676,207 tons; in 1879 1,506,110 tons. Total coal forwarded north and south in 1878, 2,147,353 tons; in 1879, 3,792,368 tons.

Colonel Scranton represented this district in the thirty-sixth Congress. Re-elected to the thirty-seventh Congress, he died in Scranton, March 24th, 1861, aged fifty years, mourned by hosts of friends who honored and loved him.

Slocum Hollow became Scranton, then Scranton, a city now of 40,000 inhabitants, active and enterprising, the light of its forges and furnaces illuminating the night, and the sounds of its hammers and rolling mills making vocal the air with their music. Now the seat of justice of the new county of Lackawanna, it remains a fitting monument to the memory of its founder.

NAMES LONG FAMOUS IN THE TRADE.

Among the oldest of the operators is Mr. Ario Pardee, of Hazleton, who has been in the business more than forty, perhaps fifty, years in that district; successful and generous, as was shown by his magnificent contributions to Lafayette College, at Easton. In the list of operators will be found A. Pardee & Co., Pardee Sons & Co., C. Pardee & Co., Pardee Brothers & Co., running the heaviest collieries in that part of the county. G. B. Markle & Co., Coxé Brothers & Co., J. Leisenring & Co., Linderman, Skeer & Co., are growing old in the district.

On the Susquehanna Mr. Jameson Harvey and Mr.

H. B. Hill now survive to see the wonderful growth of the trade in which they were once active.

Mr. Charles Parrish, one of the most successful promoters and organizers of the coal companies, is at the head of the Lehigh and Wilkes-Barre Coal Company, which mines on the Lehigh as well as on the Susquehanna. Some of the finest collieries in the valley were erected by Mr. Parrish and Mr. Samuel Bonnell, jr., who has changed his venue to the silver lodes of the west.

DEMAND AND SUPPLY.

It will be noted by the intelligent observer of the coal trade as it has passed into history that with the opening of every new line for coal transportation to competitive markets they have been overstocked, and prices reduced below the point of fair profit, until the demand grew to meet the supply. Increasing consumption secured better prices, with failure of adequate supply and larger profits, until new mines were opened and increased transportation, furnished by the completion of new lines of roads or canals, repeated the experience.

The political economist of the coal regions must be convinced by the experience of the past, as reflected by the seesawing process, that "supply is a determinable quantity," and that a quantity of coal supplied without adequate demand leads to ruinous prices and loss to the trade; notwithstanding the declared opinion of eminent professors of the science that "demand and supply are perfectly analogous facts." In this age and country it seems like supreme nonsense to say that "demand cannot exist without supply, and cannot increase except in proportion as supply increases." If so, how is it that prices vary so disastrously?

Through all the depression the consumption of anthracite coal fell little, if any, below twenty millions of tons per annum. As the demand for manufacturing purposes failed new markets were found, and notwithstanding hard times and many reverses the termination of each decade has registered a substantial increase. In 1830 the total amount of anthracite sold was 174,734 tons; in 1840, 364,384; in 1850, 3,358,890; in 1860, 8,513,123; in 1870, 15,848,899; in 1879, 26,142,089.

Mr. Franklin B. Gowen, of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, in a position which entitles his estimate to credit, places the total possible production of anthracite for 1880 at not to exceed 28,500,000 tons, of which the increasing demand for the manufacture of iron and kindred industries will absorb from one-half to three-quarters of any possible increase.

But who in January, 1879, could have anticipated or predicted an increased production or consumption of nine millions of tons, a bound in one short season from seventeen millions to twenty-six millions? The influence of the iron trade was not felt or acknowledged in the early months of that year, and it is not impossible that its revival may affect the trade of 1880 to a greater extent, as the proportion of time in which it was operative in 1879, say six months, is to the whole year.

There were many collieries in the Wyoming coal region idle much of the time in 1879. Few of them were operated on full time in the early months of the year. Unless the pressure upon their resources during the reckless hurry of the later months has fearfully demoralized them, there should be a large increase in 1880. Already an arrangement has been found necessary to limit the production by working only three days in each week, from the 16th of February at least through July. But this necessity is ascribed to the accumulation of domestic sizes. The effect upon prices was magical, and the Coal Trade Journal of February 18th, said: "The man who wagered that prices would touch $6 per ton at wholesale some time this year is not regarded as so great a maniac as he was a month ago."

The increased trade of 1879 was not wholly occasioned by the revival of manufacturing industries. The demand for domestic sizes of anthracite throughout the Western States has been rapidly increasing, chiefly supplied from this region. The sales of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company in the west reached nearly half a million of tons (484,607), doubling the tonnage of 1878. The Lehigh Valley Railroad and the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company with more direct communication over their main lines, must have equaled if not largely exceeded it. A revolution in this western trade is in progress in the use of box cars of through freight lines for transportation of anthracite, the cars upon reaching their destination being swept out and loaded with grain in bulk for eastern markets or for exportation. With full loads each way transportation is so cheapened that anthracite is being used all through the west in competition with the bituminous coals which underlie many of the farms of those who use it. Its cheapness has already induced the change to stoves made expressly for anthracite, in houses which will continue its use, even at advanced prices.

Not only in the west is this improvement noted. A single train from this valley will be made up of these box cars, each containing eleven or more tons, and representing seven or eight railroad companies, from Boston to the Mississippi river and from Canada to the far south; and it is not unlikely that such cars coming north and east will regularly carry as return freight this growing luxury in fuel to every city and State in the Union.

An important question presents itself: Are the anthracite coal fields approaching the maximum of production?

More than twenty years ago gentlemen conversant with the subject estimated the limit of anthracite production at from twenty-five millions to thirty millions of tons per annum. The trade has already, by a sudden bound, exceeded the first without undue pressure upon the mining capacity during the early months of the year. But a very important change in the trade must be taken into the account since those estimates were made. Twenty years ago the size known as chestnut coal was not marketable. At auction sales in New York during the past few years that size commanded the highest price in the market. Then pea coal and other sizes smaller than chestnut could not be sold at cost of mining; now they are quoted at $1.50 per ton at Mauch Chunk, and from $2.50 to $2.80 per ton at Port Johnson and at Hudson river markets for pea coal, and Mr. Seward, in his journal of January 28th, 1880, page 39, says: "The demand for chestnut, pea and buckwheat sizes, now extensively used for steam purposes, is good." Even culm finds market now at cost of transportation.

A committee of stockholders of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, appointed in May, 1877, to visit and inspect the property of the company, reported on this subject:

"Besides this use of culm (made into bricks), repeated and long continued experiments have developed methods by which it is successfully used at the mines under the boilers of stationary engines. Only the best and most saleable sizes of coal were formerly used for steam purposes. The great consumption of these coals induced the effort to substitute for these the nearly valueless pea coal. This, after much difficulty, was successful. But success led to an increased demand for pea coal, and the next attempt was to substitute culm for pea coal at the mines. This also was finally successful, and the company now uses at the mines annually sixty thousand tons of culm, which was formerly worse than valueless. If the company were doing full work it would consume for the production of steam about two hundred thousand tons of culm annually. Thus the production of marketable coal is increased, and culm, which was formerly wasted at large cost, now possesses great value."

Although the report gives the experience of one company, these facts apply equally to the business of all; and from them, by the rule of proportion, the gain in capacity for marketable production of all the anthracite regions from this saving may easily be computed. Much greater economy in mining coal has been introduced, and with the not improbable introduction of stone or iron columns to support the roof in place of the masses of coal now left for that purpose, rendered possible by the increased price of the coal, the percentage of waste in the mines may be reduced one-half and trade increased in proportion. The terminal stake may be advanced to forty millions and still not exhaust the anthracite deposits more rapidly than with twenty millions of tons under the wasteful method of mining and preparation for the past.

The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company has been constructing coal docks on Lake Erie at Buffalo, to make that a distributing point for the western trade, which must materially increase the sales in that direction.

The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company is said to be negotiating for a connection with the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad at or near Williamsport, which will greatly facilitate and increase the western trade from the Schuylkill region by the Catawissa road, already under its control.

The Pennsylvania Railroad, from the fine deposits of coal on both sides of the Susquehanna at Nanticoke, in this region, has communication with western markets both by its canals and by the Lackawanna and Bloomsburg road, its Northern Central and Philadelphia and Erie up the west branch, and its main line on the Juniata river. All are reaching for the limitless west, to which the small sizes, always of the purest coal, can now be safely carried to a growing market.

The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company report that in 1869 eighty-one and a half per cent. of their coal was delivered at tide, and only eighteen and a half per cent. at inland markets. By gradual annual increase this inland trade in 1876 was forty-two per cent. of their production. Mr. John J. Albright, general sales agent of the company for nearly twenty years, reported the sales in the west by the "Western Coal Association" at "one million two hundred thousand tons in 1875, and nearly as much more probably went to western markets through other shippers. The figures representing this growth are remarkable: In 1851, 6,000 tons; in 1875, more than 2,200,000 tons. Toronto, Canada, in 1874 took 58,390 tons; in 1876 increased to 97,694 tons. Cleveland, Ohio, in 1852 took 8,000 tons. In 1876 it increased to 100,000 tons. Buffalo in 1852 required only 25,000 tons; in 1875 increased to 750,206 tons, and in 1879 received 1,092,184 tons, of which 550,606 tons were distributed in other markets. Chicago consumed about 500,000 tons annually, but the exact figures were not then attainable."

In 1879 the Chicago Tribune said:

"Coal sold at the lowest prices ever known, anthracite selling $1 per ton below the cheapest rate for 1878. From the beginning of the year down to May prices were steady at $3 and $6.50 for anthracite, and at $5.50 for Erie. Then there was a drop to $4.50 in the former, and to $4.75 in the latter. Those were the market quotations until August, when there was an advance of $1 per ton. Later there were further advances, and the year closed with anthracite selling at $6.50 and $7, Erie at $7 and Wilmington at $4. For the first time in the history of the trade all sizes of hard coal have sold at a uniform price. Nut, which was formerly quoted from 25 to 75 cents per ton cheaper than the larger sizes, is now in so active demand—owing to the very general use of self-feeding stoves—that our dealers are barely able to get adequate supplies, and that particular size is now quoted at 50 cents per ton above other sizes."

The coal exchange in that city reported about three hundred thousand tons of anthracite up to November 3d. The trade probably reached a million of tons for the year.

The increase in western trade was no doubt in fair proportion to the total tonnage, perhaps greater, through the increased facilities for transportation in the box freight cars, returning for the magnificent grain crops of the year, and five millions of tons may have been distributed there.

"Whatever may be the limit of demand or production, the larger portion of increase must be supplied from the Wyoming coal field. Up to 1850 this region had not reached an annual production of a million of tons, including the Luzerne basins on the Lehigh, in a total of three million, three hundred and fifty-eight thousand, eight hundred and ninety-nine tons. In 1879 it had increased to not less than fifteen millions in a total of twenty-six million tons.

That anthracite will be largely exported cannot be doubted. In 1874 the exports were four hundred and one thousand, nine hundred and twelve tons. Since the international expositions in Philadelphia and in Paris, American anthracite and stoves designed especially for burning it have been introduced into France, Italy and Switzerland; and as the Reading Company is about sending an agent abroad to extend the trade, it may yet be established as a luxury in London, Vienna, St. Petersburg and in every city of refinement in Europe.

With an annual production of one hundred and thirty millions of tons, the exports from the mines of Great Britain have reached eighteen millions of tons in a year. There can be no reason why Pennsylvania anthracite should not soon reach the same proportion and afford at least four millions of tons for export, instead of the meagre amount reported for 1879 of 421,594 tons. Of this the British possessions took 367,544 tons; Mexico, South America and West Indies 38,885 tons; China nearly 2,000 tons; while France had 940, Austria 391, Germany and England each one ton; the remainder scattering. The figures will change slowly perhaps towards European markets, as the home consumption will command high prices and freights will be costly on eastward bound vessels; unless the current of trade shall be reversed through false economy and England again supply us with manufactured goods to an extent which would send her ships home in ballast. The four hundred and seventy square miles of Pennsylvania anthracite, with its certainly limited capacity for production already approximated, must supply a territory many times greater than that of Great Britain, and a population already nearly equal in numbers and greater in its purchasing power and ability to enjoy. Whatever the limit of production, the demand must soon be limited by the price it will bear as one of the future luxuries of life.

VALUE OF ANTHRACITE.

The value of rich deposits of anthracite coal is not to be calculated alone by cash estimates in dollars and cents; but the comfort and cleanliness increased a hundred fold in the home circle, the absence of smoke, the cheering and enduring warmth of its fires through long winter nights, and the indirect influence of this increased comfort through all classes of modern society, must be added to the sum total of gain.

At an early day, while the Baltimore mine was still rudely worked at its outcroppings in the bluff on Coal brook, near Wilkes-Barre, and the full size of the vein, of nearly thirty feet, was exposed to the light, a party of ladies of the Society of Friends visited the place accompanied by others of the neighborhood. The vast cavern even at that day excavated, with its smooth floor of coal and slate, inclining downward the north; with immense pillars of coal, sixteen or eighteen feet in height, supporting the roof; the light from without, through various apertures, penetrating a distance along the gentle dip of the vein reflecting many hues from the bright faces of sparkling anthracite, furnished a scene well calculated to impress an intelligent mind with feelings of mingled awe and admiration. After a careful examination of the locality, with many inquiries and suggestions concerning the probable origin and discovery of the wonderful deposit, a profound silence settled upon them, inspired by the grandeur of the scene; when a clear, sweet voice floated upon the air in utterances of gratitude and of adoration of the Great Supreme Power which had placed such storehouses of fuel amidst the wilderness of this cold northern clime, to be preserved for the benefit of His people when the forests should be swept away and their need would be sorest. The voice of Rachel Price has long been silent, as she sleeps among her kindred and friends near the shadow of some modest meeting-house in Chester county, where the precepts of peace, wisdom, and love inculcated in her sermons still retain their influence with the descendants of those who sat under her teachings. What a blessing would be conferred if her short address at the Baltimore mine could yet be heard and heeded by those who, in pursuit of wealth, recklessly squander the precious legacy. Precept has been lost in the example of a fierce struggle for power and position until all interests have been prostrated; and now perhaps only when selfishness, from sheer necessity, is likely to be merged in justice may prudent management be hoped for.

But there is a commercial and marketable value attached to coal and to coal lands worthy to be viewed in a business light by the few still in possession of original titles. There are eight large transporting companies now in Pennsylvania, pretty fairly dividing among them the Anthracite coal lands, either by purchase or by leasing them of the owners. They are the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey, the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company, the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, the Pennsylvania Coal Company, and the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company; the railroad companies operating under charters incorporating coal companies controlled by them. There are very few properties of any profitable size yet remaining not directly or indirectly at the mercy of these large corporations.

The prices paid for coal lands in the northern or Wyoming coal field when the trade was small were very low, often less than one hundred dollars an acre for those in choice positions but yet undeveloped. The farmer who owned a large tract, from a few acres of which he succeeded in gathering a frugal subsistence with hard labor, felt rich if he could sell four hundred acres for twenty or thirty dollars an acre and buy a much better farm in the growing west for half the money. Much of course depended on the prospects of early development of the coal and the opening of ways to market. Few of them had much faith in the coal, which had never done any good to the neighborhood; and they only valued the surface as yielding fair returns for labor bestowed. With few wants, the farmer out of debt was rich.

The Pennsylvania Coal Company purchased the greater part of its best lands thirty years ago, at prices ranging from $75 to $200 per acre, farms and all. When the last farms were secured, probably $300 per acre was paid to close and connect the surveys. Some years after, for small tracts from which they could take the coal through improvements already made, $1,000 per acre was reported as the price paid, which would be cheaper to the company taking the coal out at once than $200 paid thirty years before, when the coal lay untouched by the miner's pick or drill.

To judge by the financial statements of the best companies (except the prudently managed Pennsylvania Coal Company), it might be judged that coal lands had cost them many thousands of dollars an acre. But the blending vast lines of transportation with lands to be developed makes it difficult to judge accurately. The experience of the one company excepted would indicate that the land was the only profitable part of the investment.

But again, what would the land be now worth without markets for the coal and means of transportation? Not more than it sold for twenty-five years ago. The Reading Company and the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company are the objects of most bitter attack for bad management and blundering into unnecessary expenditures and indebtedness. The Reading road has reached out its arms with seeming recklessness after new markets. Take the explanation made by Mr. President Gowen, in his recent annual report to the meeting of stockholders, January 12th, 1880: "The company is now prepared to transport direct, by its own cars and engines, to the harbor of New York the large amount of coal tonnage which heretofore, at a cash cost of fully eighty-five cents per ton, had to be transported over lines of other companies. As the actual cost of moving this coal from Philadelphia to New York over the new line cannot exceed forty cents per ton, the difference of forty-five cents per ton on a yearly tonnage of about a million tons, amounting to $450,000 per annum, will represent the saving of the company." Mr. Gowen estimates a business of 9,000,000 tons over his roads in 1880, and that the average price will be $1.50 per ton higher at tide water than in 1879.

The Delaware and Hudson Canal reported a deficiency on its leased lines, but its northern roads lead to new and growing markets. With the advance in prices of coal and the rapid increase in tonnage this deficiency must speedily disappear, and the leased lines will not only pay their own expenses; but every additional ton of anthracite carried north will add to the profits of the mines and to the trade of each branch employed in the transportation.

Increased trade and advanced prices must soon establish the value of coal lands. Hear Mr. Maxwell on this subject:

"If a population of twenty-one millions value 5,200,000 acres of coal land at $2,000 per acre, what should a population of 11,635,000, having the same wants in proportion to number, value only 279,680 acres of coal land at per acre? Who will solve this problem satisfactorily to himself? The facts bear out its terms with all the force of mathematical truth. It is to be observed that in stating this problem the lowest price of the English coal lands is adopted as one of its terms. This leaves a wide margin against the hazard of error. England, too, is much nearer her maximum of population, manufactures and coal consumption than we are, while our coal market, in area four times as large as hers, but with half her population now, is rapidly filling up with coming millions."

Mr. Maxwell estimates 1,613 tons per acre to every foot thickness. Practical men estimate 1,000 tons to the foot, clear merchantable coal, allowing liberally for pillars and waste.

The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company say: "In Great Britain coal lands are worth from $5,000 to $7,000 per acre. In the light of these facts, why should not the consumption of anthracite continue to increase, why should it not be mined at a profit, and why should not the value per acre of the small area of anthracite coal lands in the United States approximate that of the vastly larger area of coal lands in Great Britain?" Pertinent questions, which are in course of solution as rapidly as the returning good sense of the large companies will permit. The pioneers in the trade who yet live may hope to see it answered in the affirmative, and they deserve it.

Of the pioneers in the early development nearly all have passed away. Of these Hon. Hendrick B. Wright, in his Historical Sketches of Plymouth, a work of great local interest written in the author's best vein, makes honorable mention, so far as connected with old Shawnee trade:

"Freeman Thomas came to Plymouth from Northampton county about the year 1811, and purchased the Avondale property, to which he gave the name more than fifty years ago. Mr. Thomas was in advance of most of his neighbors in his knowledge of the coal measures. At an early day he commenced driving the 'Grand Tunnel' into the mountain side, with the purpose of striking the coal. This was probably as early as 1823, and was the first experiment in tunneling in the Wyoming valley through rock. After three or four years of persevering labor, and with his credit almost sunk, he struck the big red ash vein. Freeman Thomas lived to a good old age. He died at his home in Northumberland county in his eighty-eighth year. Not long after the construction of the Grand Tunnel Jameson Harvey discovered coal upon his premises near by, and these two coal properties, being most eligibly situated, were more extensively worked than any other mine in the township. William L. Lance became lessee of the Grand Tunnel property in 1851."

Col. Wright says that the red ash vein worked by the Smiths and Freeman Thomas, in Plymouth, averages twenty-six feet of pure coal, being better and thicker than the seam on the east side of the river where it crops out near the summit of the Wilkes-Barre mountain not more than eight feet in thickness. It is assumed by some that the lower vein, known as the red ash, thins out as it goes east and disappears on the Lackawanna about Scranton; which is not at all probable, as the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company has been in operation at Carbondale for fifty years, chiefly on the lower veins of the measure, which are not yet exhausted. It is asserted that a nine-foot vein has been tested at Dunmore, east of Scranton, below any of the veins now worked there. The measures on the Lackawanna are not so deep as in the parts of the basin along the Susquehanna, and the large companies established above Pittston have all secured ample stores of anthracite in Kingston, Plymouth, Newport, Hanover, Wilkes-Barre and Plains townships for centuries to come, and have facilities for transportation from them both present and future. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, on the rich properties of the late Colonel Washington Lee on the east and of Mr. Harvey on the west side of the river, has already been mentioned, with its lines of communication. The Lehigh and Wilkes-Barre Coal Company, growing from the Consolidated Coal Company through the Wilkes-Barre Coal and Iron Company is, under the management of Mr. Charles Parrish, a pioneer in the trade of Wilkes-Barre, Hanover and Newport, fast taking a leading position. Judge Francis Lathrop, in whose hands the coal company and the Central Railroad of New Jersey are, as receiver, says that they are improving in financial condition. The principal coal tonnage of the Central is from this coal company. The Erie Railway operates chiefly in Pittston, having transportation by the Pennsylvania Coal Company's road to Hawley, and by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's road to Great Bend, at which point it joins its main line. The time must come when it will possess coal lands on the Susquehanna and a road of its own to carry coal out of the valley. The tonnage will be of great importance to it. The box cars of this road are seen in almost every train leaving the valley.

Fortunes have been sunk and millions lost in the early efforts to develop the mines and introduce anthracite coal to the various uses to which it is now indispensable. Few of the pioneers lived to enjoy the fruits of their labors and enterprise. Few of the living even now comprehend the value of anthracite; either the cost value, the "exchange value," or the far greater value as one of the necessaries of life, without regard to ratio or exchange or price in open market. In the scramble for control of markets it has come to be regarded as a mere item of tonnage, by which to estimate income to rival lines of transportation. The next generation will be able to estimate it from a point of view gained through bitter experience, and will understand its full pecuniary value. The loss of one hundred lives in 1878, and the almost countless accidents resulting in loss of limbs and health, will add fearfully to the cost, which cannot be estimated.

If the estimate which places the limit of production below thirty-five millions of tons per annum shall prove correct, then will the money value soon be ascertained in the market price. New collieries are adding to productive capacity in each year, to be offset by numbers which are exhausted and abandoned. In the report from the Lehigh region for 1878 the number of collieries abandoned up to the time of report had reached sixty-three, some having been over sixty years in operation.

BREAKERS AHEAD.

As a class coal miners are not provident. Like almost any other class in society it is mixed, but it may safely be asserted that as much good common sense is to be found among the men employed in this coal region as among any class of laborers, or even professional men. True, in times of excitement they are apt to be carried away by imprudent counsels and do themselves and the trade untold injury in useless efforts to right fancied wrongs, while the men they combat suffer from the same evils as severely. The miner has this excuse, if not justification: he has no influence in adjusting prices. Those who direct the trade, and who from position should understand the question of supply and demand as affecting markets, are as apt to be carried off their feet by waves of competition and wreck prices by careless pilotage of cargoes; and miner and laborer must bear the loss in reduction of wages. Reflection might teach every laborer that the interest of the operator to secure good prices is as strong as is his to have high wages, and that necessity not appearing upon the surface forces a decline. Unfortunately too many operators have not deemed it a duty to make explanations to those they employ, and without reflecting that two wrongs never make a right the men resort to the remedy they think most direct and strike.

The strike, a mere cessation from labor, might not in all cases be objectionable in itself, if not followed by interference with the rights of others who do not desire to leave work or who cannot afford to lie idle, which is clearly illegal. One very favorable sign of the present time is the increasing willingness of employers to yield gracefully and promptly to the unquestionable equities of labor on a rising market, as it was made full partner in misfortune. A notable instance of the beneficial results of such a system in past years was that of the collieries of Messrs Sharpe, Leisenring & Company, at Eckley, on the Lehigh. When coal prices advanced the men had their full proportion in increased wages, and when prices receded they submitted to the reduction without complaint; and for years there was little trouble among them, until the great strike of December, 1874, which it was a point of pride should be made general among the men in all the coal fields, and they yielded to that disastrous suspension of more than six months, from which there has been no recovery.

The exercise of all the good sense of parties concerned will be needed to secure the trade from loss in the future. Disaster may come from too sudden prosperity, as to the apparently convalescent patient from an excess of vitality. Prices must be regulated, or the goose that lays the golden egg may be killed.

Railroad construction in 1879 was more active than in any year since 1872, and fifty per cent. greater than in 1878. Iron is needed in every degree of manufacture in the construction and equipment of new roads, and this iron in every stage from the ore must be wrought by the aid of coal. To force prices too high may check the upward movement all along the line and reflect disastrously on the coal trade. Among the select sentences in a school-book of several generations past, teaching short lessons of wisdom, was one worthy to be inscribed on tablets of brass, at every colliery and workshop in the country: "Time once past never returns; the moment which is lost is lost forever." Hundreds of industrious miners and laborers, who had accumulated homes and savings deposited during prosperous days, and saw them dwindle and vanish under enforced idleness in 1875 and other long suspensions, now realize the truth and force of that maxim. They cannot desire a renewal of that sad experience; but another generation is coming upon the stage of life to direct affairs, with fresh confidence if not with increased wisdom, full of hope that they may be able to direct the storm while riding upon the whirlwind raised against capital—the natural ally rather than the antagonist of labor. Let the whirlwind be avoided by prudent counsels and the exercise of a spirit of conciliation on both sides.

There is a quaintly expressed maxim of the courts to the effect that one who seeks equity must do equity, worthy to be posted with the short sentence before quoted, and to be borne in mind by those who seek by violent measures to enforce their claims regardless of the rights of fellow workmen, of employers or of the larger number composing the consuming public, who suffer unjustly. Sympathy will not be wasted upon labor which allows itself to be crushed in a vain and wicked attempt to block the wheels of progress promising prosperity to all who are industrious and frugal. Wages may be adjusted with the accuracy of machinery, which without attendants in the workshop moves to its limit and reverses its motion, if a few men of experience will meet for that object with an honest purpose of agreement.

Pages could not record the changes of the past few years, nor can human wisdom foresee those of the coming years. Questions are arising in the courts of vast importance to land owners and coal operators. One is that of

DAMAGE TO SURFACE PROPERTY.

At one time the large companies had surveyed numbers of lots to sell to their employes, but the policy seems to have changed. In many places near Wilkes-Barre, in Pittston, Hyde Park and in Kingston large areas of land undermined have subsided by the caving in of mines, in some instances causing damage to improvements made by purchasers of surface lots. The large brick school-house near Pittston, at the corner of the road to Yatesville, was abandoned because the walls cracked so as to be dangerous to pupils, the supports of the mines below having failed.

In Hyde Park, by the caving of the Oxford mines, some brick storehouses were injured. The question before the court is to decide who is responsible for the damage.

In most cases the surface has been purchased with knowledge of the danger incurred, and a title accepted with full release of claims for damage. Still it does not always seem just that a man's home should be wrecked by being undermined, without some recourse in damages, and in several cases recently tried in Schuylkill county damages have been awarded. In one case at West Shenandoah several lots over the Kohinoor Colliery, in February, 1879, to use the words of a reporter for the Pottsville Journal, were visited by a young earthquake, and a cave-in which followed the shake carried a portion of several lots down into the colliery, cracking the walls and foundations of the dwelling houses, putting the doors and windows out of place and leaving a yawning chasm about seventy feet deep and eighty or ninety feet in diameter in the middle of the lots. To one was awarded $800, another $1,350, a third $1,200. What the final judgment will be on appeal remains to be heard, and whether the release of all claims for damage at the time of purchase, if any such were made, avails owner or operator. An important question of public policy yet underlies the question of claims for damage. If no man who needs a place for his home has power to release the land owner or the coal operator from such claim, then no land owner or operator will hereafter dispose of building lots, and the largely increasing population of the coal regions must hunt lairs like beasts of the field. Is it good policy to invite such a state of society?

Coal companies do not, as a rule, erect buildings for the miners and laborers calculated to make homes to be proud of. A neat house, however humble, with a rose bush and fruit trees about it, are useful aids in educating the young to cleanly and careful habits and regard for the comforts of neighbors. The man who owns his house and garden is a better citizen in all respects than one who is tenant of a shanty at six or eight dollars per month.

The coal is a necessary of life which must be mined, and there should be some mode devised to mine it without damage to the surface. If this is impossible should an operator be mulcted in damages for casualties which human foresight could not prevent, any more than for that of a lightning stroke or midnight conflagration?

Mr. William S. Jones, inspector of coal mines for the eastern district of Luzerne and Carbon counties, says over date of March 8th, 1879, at Scranton, Pa. :

"Another very extensive cave occurred at the Diamond mines, and still another at the Bellevue mines, both belonging to the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company. In each of these cases they were working three veins, one over the other, and the caves were caused by the same system of working as at the Mt. Pleasant mines. In no case, so far as I know, is there any attempt made to work the pillars in one vein exactly over the pillars in the vein below, or vice versa, and so long as this is not done there is no hope of preventing these caves. I admit that it requires good mining engineering to do this, but that will not alter the facts of the case. I believe it can be done, and I believe it would pay the operators to try the experiment."

Against careless or unskillful mining of course the courts should protect every man, whatever the terms of his release. It is the very object of creating courts of law and equity not to protect man from his own acts, or from the operation of natural laws, but against the evil nature and carelessness of his fellows.

But what can be done to save all the coal left in pillars to support the upper crust of the mines? Can coal be made to pay the expense of iron or stone supports in place of coal now wasted for the purpose? In very deep mines, with veins of six or eight feet thickness, the breaking up of rocks would fill the space excavated before affecting the surface. By the long-wall system of mining the surface may be let down by taking out all support but not with entire safety.

Is it impossible for men to obtain homes without such risk to themselves as to those who mine the coal from veins below? This is becoming one of the most important questions of the near future.

WASTE OF ANTHRACITE DEPOSITS.

Another question intimately connected with that of proper support for the mines is the waste of this store of fuel in the mine and in its preparation for market. The Journal of Industry is quoted on this subject, from an article extremely apropos and timely:

"The wanton destruction of any kind of property is regarded as a crime, and the neglectful waste of the gifts of nature, bestowed for the coming good of mankind, no matter how great their present abundance, ought equally to be held as an offense against the rights of humanity, and justly censurable.

"Americans are proverbially wasteful, not alone in small matters but in great ones. This is exemplified in a striking manner in the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania, where it is estimated not less than $100,000,000 worth of fuel has been wasted in getting out and preparing the coal for market, the present average annual loss being set down at $15,000,000. This enormous waste is ascribed by men of experience to the use of imperfectly designed machinery for breaking the coal. This matter demands serious attention; for vast as our natural resources, such extravagance will not only tend to exhaust them sooner than they should be, but also to increase present cost to consumers. Land owners and miners are in this matter equally remiss in duty to their successors and the people of the country, who have a right to demand that an article of such prime necessity shall be economically worked in order to yield the best results to the various industries and comforts dependent upon this kind of fuel.

"The great cause of this waste in anthracite coal is said by competent engineers to be what are known as coal crushers, toothed cylinders geared to run towards each other, which of necessity literally crush a great part of the coal into fragments and dust too fine for use, unless it can by artificial means be again made into blocks of suitable size. The percentage of waste is estimated at one-fourth of the entire product, the greater part of which could be saved to the operators by the use of proper machinery. But the operators it would appear are a very conservative set of gentlemen, and opposed to innovations calculated to do away with time-honored methods. It is within the personal knowledge of the writer that a mechanical engineer of wide experience, and thoroughly posted in the mining and marketing of anthracite coal, invented and set up at one of the great coal centers machinery for the more economical preparation of the fuel. He invited the operators and engineers to come and witness his experiments, but few of them availed themselves of the opportunity; and although, as he claims, he can demonstrate beyond peradventure that he can save from fifty to eighty per cent. of the coal now lost, he has as yet been unable to secure the adoption of his improved methods and machinery. This gentleman is a conspicuous example of a prophet being without honor in his own country.

"The operators of leased lands have labored under a mistaken idea that waste cannot be committed by the destruction of corporeal hereditaments under as well as upon the surface, or in the unskillful preparation of coal taken from the mines. In all leases there is an implied covenant, even when not plainly expressed, to mine in a proper and skillful manner, and with as little damage as possible to remaining property, or waste in that which is taken out; just as a lessee of a farm is under an implied agreement to farm in a workmanlike manner, and not to exhaust the soil by neglectful or improper tillage. Why, then, should a coal company be permitted to waste such a valuable fuel by improper crushing to the extent of one-quarter of the entire product, when a tenant may not cut down an apple tree without committing waste and being responsible in damages to the owner of the property?

"Not only the land owner, but every citizen, now and in succeeding generations, is and will be interested in staying such waste."

Messrs. Sheaffer, engineers of mines, Pottsville, Pa., estimate the waste in mining and preparing anthracite coal at two-thirds the estimated quantity of the deposits in each coal field.

CHAPTER XI.

RIVER NAVIGATION—THE CONSTRUCTION OF CANALS.

STEWART PEARCE, in his excellent "Annals of Luzerne," gives a history of the navigation of the Susquehanna, from which much of the following is condensed.

This river was of course the natural thoroughfare over which the Indians had passed in their journeyings to and from their hunting grounds, or on their hostile expeditions. Many times have the fleets of the warlike Iroquois glided silently over it, bearing the dusky warriors on their excursions against distant southern tribes, or on their return from these expeditions bearing their trophies of victory.

As stated elsewhere the earliest settlers in this region came from Connecticut, crossed the Hudson river near Newburg and the Delaware near the mouth of Shohola creek, and thence came by Indian trails across the country to the Wyoming valley. The waters of the river were at once utilized by them for local transportation or passage, and for communication with the settlements below; but in order to render the river a safe avenue of transportation it was necessary that the drift timber should be removed and the bars of gravel be cleared away. In 1771 the provincial Legislature declared the river a public highway, and appointed commissioners to superintend the work of improving the channel. This was done, and towing paths were constructed where there were rapids. The expense of these improvements was defrayed by contributions from the settlers and an appropriation for that purpose by the Legislature.

What was called a Durham boat was first used—so called because it was built at Durham on the Delaware river. Boats of this style had a length of about sixty feet, a breadth of eight, and a depth of two; and with fifteen tons of lading they drew about twenty inches of water. They had decks at each end and running boards for "poling" at the sides. Masts with sails were erected on them when a favorable wind blew, and a steersman and two polers on each side constituted the crew. The boats built on the Susquehanna were similar, but larger, and carried larger crews.

Increasing trade soon demanded better facilities for transportation, and an attempt was made to use a "team boat," which was propelled by poles that were worked by horse power, but after a trial the plan was abandoned.

In 1826 the plan of navigating the Susquehanna by steam was tried. The "Codus," a small stern-wheel steamboat which had been built at York, ascended the river as far as Binghamton, and returned. The commander of this boat did not consider the project of steam navigation on the Susquehanna feasible. A larger boat, the "Susquehanna," built at Baltimore for the purpose, ascended the river on a trial trip in the spring of the same year, having on board commissioners to superintend the experiment. In the attempt to ascend the rapids at Nescopeck her boiler exploded, killing and injuring many of the passengers and crew and destroying the boat.

Another experiment was made on the west branch, but its success was not encouraging, and for a time all attempts at steam navigation on the river were abandoned.

Delay in the completion of the North Branch Canal, and the strong desire to introduce anthracite coal into regions up the river, induced other attempts afterward, by the citizens of Wilkes-Barre and Owego in 1835, those of Tunkhannock in 1849, and those of Bainbridge in 1851. Though in each of these attempts a partial success was achieved all proved to be failures at last. Small steamboats for carrying passengers make voyages now over portions of this river.

In early times it was thought practicable to build sea-going vessels on the banks of this river, and in times of high water float them to the sea. Accordingly, in 1803, Messrs. Arndt & Phillip built a sloop of twelve tons burden on the common in Wilkes-Barre, and launched it on the river, down which it floated in safety to tide water. The success of this experiment aroused sanguine hopes that a new branch of industry was soon to be developed along the Susquehanna. A stock company was formed at Wilkes-Barre, and in 1811 a ship of between fifty and sixty tons burden was commenced, and launched in April, 1812. As it passed down the river it was wrecked on the rocks at Conawaga Falls, near Middletown, and thus perished the anticipations of those who had dreamed of populous ship-building cities along this river.

The Susquehanna river has since about 1795 been utilized for floating rafts of lumber and timber to various markets. These rafts were floated down during the high water of spring or autumn. When the country was first settled there was very little market for lumber, and much valuable timber was piled together and burned in the process of clearing the land. As time went on a demand arose for this timber, or the lumber into which it was converted, and mills began to spring into existence for the manufacture of this lumber. These mills multiplied as the demand increased and rafts came to be more frequently seen.

The forests on the river and its tributaries above the Wyoming valley were filled with valuable timber, and during many years this timber and the lumber into which it was converted were almost the only sources of wealth to the settlers. The river furnished the outlet for this lumber, and when the business of rafting was at its height as many as one hundred rafts in a day might be seen to pass in Tunkhannock creek alone, and of course many more in the river at that point.

This lumber consisted of boards, shingles, staves, hewn timber, spars, etc., and its market was found at Harrisburg, Middletown, Columbia, Port Deposit and other places. The pine was of excellent quality, and the lumber into which it was converted would now be considered valuable far beyond what it was then.

The Lackawanna river, too, was utilized for rafting lumber from about 1808 till the country was exhausted of the pine timber with which it originally abounded. At first rafts were run in squares, with one man on each square to conduct it with a setting pole. These squares were of boards twelve or sixteen feet in length, laid crosswise, with usually eight or ten courses. On arriving at the Susquehanna these squares were doubled or placed one on the other, which could be done in the deeper water of that river. Some years later the practice came to prevail of fastening five of these squares or platforms together and steering them with large oars at each end, and on reaching the Susquehanna these were doubled as before and also made ten squares in length. The rafts were prepared, and when the freshets in the spring and fall occurred, taken down the river to market. In what was known as the "June fresh"—when it occurred (which was not every year)—rafts were also taken down. Very little rafting has been done on the Lackawanna since 1840.

It is known that in 1796 thirty rafts went down the river. The number continued to increase till during twenty-six days in the spring of 1849 2,243 rafts, containing 100,000,000 feet of lumber, passed Wilkes-Barre.

The produce raised here after the forest was partially cleared away consisted of wheat, rye, oats, corn and flax, and the nearest cash market for any of these was Easton, to which the wheat was drawn on sleighs in winter, over the Wilkes-Barre and Easton Turnpike from Wilkes-Barre; and the rye and corn were used for feed or converted into whiskey.

No arks had passed down the river previous to 1800, but subsequent to that wheat was sent down the stream in bulk in those rude vessels, and found a market generally at Baltimore, to which place it was taken in sloops and schooners from Port Deposit. It is recorded that in 1814 eighty-four arks went by Wilkes-Barre, and in the freshet of 1849 as many as two hundred and sixty-eight. Since that time timber has become more and more scarce, and other avenues of transportation have been opened; and now but few rafts are seen passing down this river, and no arks or boats used for transportation.

Action with regard to the construction of canals along the Susquehanna and other rivers in the State was taken in 1824, and in 1826 the Legislature enacted a general internal improvement law, under which the many miles of canals in the State were constructed.

At that time the existence of vast mineral wealth in this region had become known, and the people of this county felt deeply interested in the projected improvement in transportation, which when accomplished would develop that wealth; and they took measures to secure for this county a portion of the benefits of the system of improvements which the State inaugurated. They were successful; and in 1828 the North Branch Canal was commenced. It was completed as far as Nanticoke in 1830, in which year the first boat in Luzerne county, the "Wyoming," was built at Shickshinny. In 1831 the second boat, named the "Luzerne," was built on the bank of the river opposite Wilkes-Barre, and during the summer of that year it made a trip to Philadelphia and back to the Nanticoke dam; and in 1834, after the completion of the canal to the Lackawanna, this boat made the first round trip between Wilkes-Barre and Philadelphia.

Beyond the Lackawanna, toward the north line of the State, slow progress was made in the construction of this canal, and the work was suspended in 1832. In 1842 and 1843 the State made liberal offers to the North Branch Canal Company, which was incorporated in the former year; but capitalists did not see fit to invest their money in this enterprise, and in 1848 it became evident that nothing would be done by the company which had been chartered, and successful efforts were made to procure an appropriation for the prosecution of the work, and during that year the work was put under contract. It was by reason of the indefatigable efforts of Hon. R. R. Little, of Wyoming county, that this appropriation was made. Connection with the canals of New York was effected in 1856 by the Junction Canal Company, which constructed the last sixteen miles of the work.

In 1858 the State canals were sold to the Sunbury and Erie Railroad Company, and this company at once sold the north branch division, from Northumberland to Northampton street, in Wilkes-Barre, to the North Branch Canal Company.

CHAPTER XII.

THE CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROADS IN LUZERNE COUNTY.

THE Lehigh Navigation & Coal Company began in 1839, and completed in 1841, the original Lehigh & Susquehanna Railroad, from the public common at the foot of South street, Wilkes-Barre, to White Haven, then the head of slack water navigation of that company.

It was designed as a portage over which to transport boats between White Haven and Wilkes-Barre, and thus form a link in the connection between Buffalo and Philadelphia through the North Branch Canal and the canals in New York on one side, and the Lehigh and Delaware rivers on the other. This portage over the mountain was accomplished by three inclined planes, having their foot at Ashley. The aggregate ascent which these planes make is about 1,150 feet. From White Haven the road was afterward built down the Lehigh to Mauch Chunk, and thence to Easton.

At first horse cars ran between Wilkes-Barre and the planes. These planes have been much improved, and more coal is taken over them than over any similar planes in the world. The ascent of the mountain is now overcome by a circuit to the northeast, and over this passengers and ordinary freight trains are taken, and empty cars are brought back by gravity. This circuit was built about the year 1866. The same year the Lehigh and Susquehanna was extended to Green Ridge, above Scranton, where it connects with the Delaware & Hudson Canal Company's road.

The Nanticoke and Wanamie branch of the Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad connected with this road at the foot of the planes and extended northeastward a mile above Wilkes-Barre, to the Baltimore coal mines, and southwestward to Nanticoke village. It was built in 1861, by the Nanticoke Railway Company, which was composed of owners of coal lands along the route of the road. In 1866 or 1867 the Lehigh and Susquehanna Company, which had purchased this road, built a branch from near Nanticoke to Wanamie, and an extension from the Baltimore mines to Green Ridge. Subsequently a connection was made between this extension and the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's road. Another branch, now owned by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, connects the Lehigh and Susquehanna at South Wilkes-Barre with the Bloomsburg branch of the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western Railroad by a bridge in the township of Plymouth, and thereby with the collieries on the west side of the river.

Another connection between the Lehigh and Susquehanna and the Bloomsburg branch is by a short track over the bridge across the Susquehanna at Nanticoke. This branch and bridge are owned by the Susquehanna Coal Company. These extensions and bridges were built under the superintendence of the engineer Dr. Ingham.

The Nescopeck branch was built by the Lehigh and Susquehanna company in 1867, between White Haven and Upper Lehigh. In 1871 this road was leased in perpetuity by the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey, and it is now operated by that company.

LACKAWANNA AND BLOOMSBURG RAILROAD.

It became evident to the owners of real estate on the west side of the Susquehanna river in the Wyoming valley that an outlet was necessary for the coal which was known to abound there. The canal on that side of the river came no farther up than Nanticoke, and the projected railroads on the opposite side would not be available for the transportation of coal mined here. Under these circumstances capitalists and owners of coal lands on the west side of the river conceived and put in execution the project of constructing a railroad which would afford the desired outlet for this coal, and thus greatly enhance the value of their lands.

On the 5th of April, 1852, by an act of Assembly a charter was granted for a road between Scranton, Luzerne county, and Bloomsburg, Columbia county, fifty-six miles, with authority to extend the same to Danville, twelve miles. By a supplementary act passed March 3d, 1853, a further extension of twelve miles to Northumberland or Sunbury was authorized, making a total length of eighty miles. The authorized capital of the road and its extensions was $1,400,000, and the road was subsequently bonded for $2,200,000 more.

The company was organized at Kingston, April 16th, 1853, and William Sweetland was chosen president, Thomas F. Atherton secretary, and Charles D. Shoemaker treasurer. In 1855 William C. Reynolds became president, William Sweetland vice-president, Payne Pettebone treasurer, and H. Woodhouse secretary. The first directors were Selden T. Scranton, Samuel Benedict, Stephen B. Jenkins, Amos Y. Smith, Thomas F. Atherton, William Sweetland, Samuel Hoyt, George Peck, George W. Woodward, Henderson Gaylord, Mordecai W. Jackson and John R. Grotz. Some changes were subsequently made in the board of directors by the retirement of some of the members.

Payne Pettebone served the company as treasurer from the spring of 1855 till the summer of 1863. During that period the collection of stock subscriptions, raising funds, settling controversies concerning right of way, and many incidental matters affecting the interests of the company, necessarily absorbed much of his time and energies beyond what his salary would remunerate. The heavy responsibilities that the directors had incurred rendered these efforts necessary.

Among the officers and managers conspicuous for doing hard work and assuming heavy responsibilities to relieve the company from embarrassment were Judge William C. Reynolds, Samuel Hoyt, William Sweetland, Henderson Gaylord, Thomas F. Atherton, Joseph H. Scranton, Mordecai W. Jackson and Hon. George W. Woodward; and in their special departments, Hon. Warren J. Woodward and Hon. Charles R. Buckalew. Valuable aid was also rendered by R. J. Wisner, Theodore Strong and S. T. Scranton. John Brisbin and James Archbald represented the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad in the board, and they were always esteemed valuable counselors. Mr. Pettebone was succeeded by A. H. Reynolds.

Thomas F. Atherton was the first secretary, but was succeeded in 1854 by Henry Woodhouse, who served the company during the hard work of construction and who was universally commended for his faithfulness.

The grading of the road was commenced at Scranton, in 1854, and in June, 1856, the first train ran from Scranton to Kingston. In 1858 the road was opened to Rupert, connecting with the Catawissa road, and in 1860 to Danville and Northumberland.

This road was consolidated with the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western in 1872, and it is now known as the Bloomsburg branch of that road.

The shops of the Bloomsburg division are located at Kingston. They are for the manufacture of locomotives and the repair of all cars. They are five in number, and 160 men are employed in them.

The success of this road has fully demonstrated the wise prevision of its projectors.

LEHIGH VALLEY RAILROAD.

In 1846 this was chartered as the Delaware, Lehigh, Schuylkill and Susquehanna Railroad Company. In 1850 a survey of the road was first made between Easton and the mouth of Mahoning creek.

In 1851 Asa Packer became a large purchaser of stock in this company, and instituted measures to secure an early completion of the work. In 1852 Robert H. Sayre became chief engineer and located the road, and in the latter part of the same year Judge Packer undertook the construction of the road from a point opposite Mauch Chunk to Easton, where it would make such connections as would give outlets to New York and Philadelphia for its trade.

Early in 1853 the name of the corporation was changed to the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, and in 1855 trains ran over it between Easton and Mauch Chunk. In 1865 measures were adopted to extend the road to White Haven, and in 1867 it was opened to Wilkes-Barre. Judge Packer had, in 1866, purchased a controlling interest in the North Branch Canal from Wilkes-Barre to the north line of Pennsylvania, with a charter from the State authorizing a change in the name of the corporation to the Pennsylvania and New York Canal and Railroad Company, and the construction of a railroad the entire length of it; and the work was at once entered on. The road, which is practically an extension of the Lehigh Valley, was opened to its New York connections in 1869. About ten miles of it, between Wilkes-Barre and Lackawanna junction, are leased by the Lehigh Valley Company, and the remainder is operated in the interest of the latter, constituting, as before stated, an extension of that road. The connection thus formed with the New York and Erie and with other roads in New York brought a large territory into direct communication with the anthracite coal fields of Luzerne county and the region farther south, and thus greatly enhanced the importance of the mining interest in those regions, while it established more intimate commercial relations between these sections of the country.

It is a noteworthy fact that the lines on which the railroads in this section run are generally coincident with those of the old Indian war paths.

In 1868 the stock of the Hazleton Railroad Company and that of the Lehigh and Luzerne Railroad Company became merged in this corporation.

It has always been the policy of this company to secure a proportion of the coal trade by acquiring interests in coal lands and in the stock of other companies holding such lands in the vicinity of their branches. They have thus become large owners of real estate beyond what is necessary for purposes of transportation.

This road crosses the mountain range between the Susquehanna and Lehigh valleys by a wide detour to the southeast, and during the ascent many splendid views are disclosed.

The engine house and shops of this company are located about one mile north from Wilkes-Barre. They are for the repair of locomotives only. About one hundred and forty men are constantly employed in them. They were commenced in 1872 and completed as far as at present in 1874.

CHAPTER XIII.

HISTORICAL, AGRICULTURAL, MEDICAL, RELIGIOUS AND SPORTSMEN'S ASSOCIATIONS.

ON the 11th day of February, 1858, at a meeting held in the old Fell tavern, in Wilkes-Barre, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the burning of anthracite coal in an open grate, it was proposed to organize a historical and geological society, and thus collect and preserve the early records of the local history of the valley, its Indian relics, and also fossils and specimens illustrative of its geology, especially of the rich and extensive deposits of anthracite coal which underlie the entire region.

The suggestion was favorably received, and on the 10th of the following May the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society was duly incorporated. Hon. E. L. Dana was elected the first president, and a room for the cabinet was secured on Franklin street, near Market. Liberal donations were made of historical records, Indian relics, geological and mineralogical specimens; and General William S. Ross, with characteristic liberality, purchased at the expense of two thousand dollars the Chambers collection of curiosities, consisting of ancient coins, minerals, Indian relics, etc., and presented it to the society.

The monthly meetings of the association have been held with some degree of regularity, and contributions continue to be made to it. These contributions are severally numbered as they are received, and the names of the contributors recorded. The donations often include many articles and the list of them thus kept now exceeds five thousand.

A large library, including a valuable collection of public records, has also been gathered. The rare historical records, many of them originals, and the interesting cabinet of coal fossils, which it would be scarcely possible to replace in case of loss, are deserving of the protection of a fire-proof structure.

AGRICULTURE AND AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES.

During the half century succeeding the first settlement of Luzerne county agriculture was the chief employment of the inhabitants. There were among them a few hunters and trappers, and such mechanics as the wants of the people necessitated. The existence of the immense mineral wealth of the region was not then known. The farmer, as he followed his plow over the fields, scattered on them the seed, or gathered from them the grain which sprang up, matured, and ripened, little dreamed that beneath the surface on which he labored was a deposit of wealth compared with which the harvests that he reaped were mere trifles; or that the barren mountains over which the hunter pursued his game would yet reward the labor of thousands whose villages would lie scattered along their bases. The settlements were limited to the fertile lands along the Susquehanna and its affluents, where bountiful returns rewarded the labors of the husbandman.

The agriculture of those days was, compared with that of the present time, awkward and rude. Many of the implements then in use were clumsy and uncouth, though some of them were well adapted to the condition of things then existing. The different methods of culture, the proper rotation of crops, the chemical composition of the soil and its adaptation to the production of different kinds of grain; the constitution, selection and application of manures; the nature, habits and best means for preventing the ravages of or exterminating destructive insects, etc., had not been made the subject of scientific investigation to the extent to which they have in later years. Scarcely any agricultural publications were issued, and such as existed were sparsely circulated; and no associations existed among farmers for the discussion of matters pertaining to agricultural science or for comparison of views, methods or results.

The first agricultural society in this State of which any record appears was that of Philadelphia, which was established at the request of the Supreme Executive Council. In 1788 this society instituted investigations and made a report on the subject of the Hessian fly. The importation of American wheat into England had been prohibited by a proclamation of the King, and this report, by showing the uselessness of such prohibition, was of great advantage to American farmers.

The first agricultural society in Luzerne county was organized in 1810, at a meeting held in the old court-house in Wilkes-Barre. Jesse Fell was chosen president of the society, Matthias Hollenback vice-president, Thomas Dyer, Esq., treasurer, Peleg Tracy recording secretary, and Dr. R. H. Rose and Jacob Cist corresponding secretaries. It is remembered that these corresponding secretaries were very efficient members of the society, and that they were active in promoting the advancement of knowledge among the people. Only fragmentary records of the proceedings of this society are preserved. For 1811 there appears a report on some specimens of cloth presented for exhibition by Mr. Ingham, who was a cloth dresser, and the premium list for 1824 is still in existence. Though the premiums in this list were not large they were very judiciously arranged, and were only proposed for those things which were substantially useful. Five dollars each were offered for best essays on the Hessian fly and the prevention of its ravages, on the curculio and the best methods for its destruction, and on the general subject of agriculture and manufactures. The list was not disgraced by the offer of anything for horse racing.

The Agricultural Society of the State of Pennsylvania was organized in 1849, and since its organization societies have sprung up in almost every county in the State. In 1851 another Luzerne county agricultural society was organized, with General William S. Ross president, Hon. John Coons and Hon. William Hancock vice-presidents, S. D. Lewis treasurer, George H. Butler recording secretary, Washington Lee, jr., corresponding secretary, and Charles Dorrance and William P. Miner curators. Although the society had two hundred members and gave great promise of usefulness, its existence was brief, by reason of the speculation in coal lands which at about that time overshadowed almost every other interest.

The third society, which is still in existence, was organized in 1858. From the records of this society the following facts concerning it are gleaned: On the 25th of September of that year a meeting of persons interested in farming and gardening was held in the "house of Mr. Wambold," at Kingston. Rev. Thomas P. Hunt presided, and William P. Miner acted as secretary. Colonel Charles Dorrance reported a constitution and by-laws for the organization then and there to be formed, which were adopted. The constitution named the association the Luzerne County Agricultural Society; declared the object to be "to foster and improve agriculture, horticulture, and the domestic and household arts; fixed the fee for annual membership at $1, and for life membership at $5; provided for a meeting on the third Tuesday in February of each year, at which should be elected a president, nine vice-presidents (of whom "three-fourths" should be practical farmers or horticulturists) to look after the interests and report the condition of agriculture, recording and corresponding secretaries, a librarian and an agricultural chemist and geologist; also a general meeting in connection with the fair, and special meetings as called by the executive committee, which was to consist of the officers and five other members.

At this meeting one hundred and thirty-six men joined the society. They chose for president Charles Dorrance; corresponding secretary, Thomas P. Hunt; librarian, L. D. Shoemaker; and the following vice-presidents: Charles D. Shoemaker, Kingston; Samuel Wadhams, Plymouth; E. W. Sturdevant, Wilkes-Barre; Benjamin Harvey, Huntington; William W. Bronson, Carbondale; David G. Driesbach, Salem; Clark Sisson, Abington; Abram Drum, Butler, and Calvin Parsons, Plains. At a meeting of the executive committee two days later Anson A. Church was elected treasurer, and Thomas P. Atherton recording secretary.

James Jenkins offered fair grounds at Wyoming for four years free, fenced and provided with a trotting track; and the offer was accepted. Since the expiration of that time the grounds have been rented from several proprietors.

In the summer of 1859 an exhibition building, one hundred covered stalls, and a secretary's office were constructed, and a well was dug. The expense of these improvements was $1,436.48. In arranging for the fair of 1859 it was voted that there should be no "Shows or Jim cracks" on the ground.

At the annual meeting held February 21st, 1860, the number of vice-presidents was changed to twelve, and the time of meeting thereafter to the second Thursday in February.

By invitation of this society the State agricultural society held its fair on the Wyoming grounds in 1860. Additional sheds and stalls were built for the occasion, which were bought by the county society for $100.

The proceeds of the fair of 1862 were appropriated to the aid of the families of soldiers engaged in the suppression of the Rebellion.

November 14th, 1867, it was announced that James Jenkins, J. B. Schooley and John Sharps, jr., wished to resume the occupancy of portions of the fair ground belonging to them, and arrangements for reducing it were made accordingly.

On the 5th of July, 1873, it was voted to reorganize the society on a stock basis, shares being offered at $10 each. August 16th the reorganization was completed by the election of officers, including John Sharps as president, and ten vice-presidents, of which John B. Smith, of Kingston, was "first vice-president." That officer and the president, secretary and treasurer were made the executive committee.

At the annual meeting of 1879 it was voted to pay John Sharps $50 per year for the use of the fair grounds. The annual meetings, as well as the fairs of the society, have been held at Wyoming. Quarterly meetings of the executive committee were held under the old regime.

The presidents of the society have been as follows: Charles Dorrance, 1858-68; Payne Pettebone, 1869—resigned September 11th, and Peter Pursel was elected for the unfinished term and the next year; Ira Tripp, 1871; Steuben Jenkins, 1872, 1873; John Sharps, August 16th, 1873, after the reorganization, and for the succeeding term; John M. Stark, 1875; J. B. Smith, 1876-79.

LUZERNE COUNTY MEDICAL SOCIETY.

On the fourth day of March, 1861, pursuant to call, a convention of physicians was held at the court-house in Wilkes-Barre for the purpose of forming a medical society. At this convention there were present doctors P. C. H. Rooney, of Hazleton; N. P. Moody, Lehman; H. Ladd, C. Marr, William Green, B. H. Throop, Scranton; G. Urquhart, W. F. Dennis, E. R. Mayer, C. Wagner, E. B. Miner, Wilkes-Barre; R. H. Tubbs, Kingston; S. Lawton, Pittston; A. L. Cressler and J. R. Casselbery, Conyngham.

The following were chosen officers: B. H. Throop, president; E. R. Mayer and A. L. Cressler, vice presidents; G. Urquhart, secretary, and R. H. Tubbs, treasurer. A constitution was adopted, the second article of which stated the objects of the society to be "the promotion of knowledge upon subjects connected with the healing art, the advancement of the character and the protection of the interests of those engaged in the practice of medicine, and the employment of the means calculated to render the profession most useful to the public and subservient to the great interests of humanity."

The eleventh article adopted the code of ethics of the State Medical Society, and declared that any departure from its meaning and spirit might subject the offender to the discipline of the society.

At first the meetings of the society were held four times each year, but during several years they have been held every two months. At these meetings professional topics are ably discussed and a constantly increasing interest is developed.

The following gentlemen have served the society as president in the order named: Drs. N. F. Dennis, S. Lawton, jr., R. H. Tubbs, John Smith, A. L. Cressler, J. B. Crawford, Horace Ladd, S. Lawton, jr., Edward R. Mayer, James B. Lewis, Horace Ladd, E. Bulkely, C. Underwood, Charles Burr, E. R. Mayer, J. B. Crawford, J. E. Ross, J. A. Murphy.

The Luzerne County Homœopathic Society was organized about 1866 and was in existence about two years. Dr. A. C. Stevens was president; Dr. William Brisbin secretary and treasurer.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION OF LUZERNE, JACKAWANNA AND WYOMING COUNTIES.

This was first organized as the Luzerne County Sunday-School Association, at the Presbyterian church in Dunmore, September 28th, 1875, with the following officers: Rev. W. P. Hellings, president; Rev. D. A. Lindsley, Rev. W. V. White, Hon. Theodore Strong, Hon. E. C. Wadhams, vice-presidents; F. E. Nettleton, corresponding secretary; J. F. Richard, assistant corresponding secretary; E. M. Peck, recording secretary; James R. Lathrop, treasurer.

The work of the association has been carried on by means of Sunday-school institutes, till recently Mr. Crittenden has been employed as a missionary.

Rev. R. W. Van Schoick succeeded Mr. Hellings as president, and occupied the position till the present incumbent was elected.

The name of the association was changed to Luzerne and Lackawanna Sunday-School Association on the formation of Lackawanna county in 1878; and in 1879 the fifth annual convention, held at West Pittston, Wyoming county, was by request included and the present name was adopted.

The present officers are: Rev. N. I. Rubinkam, president; F. C. Johnson, S. C. Mellory, F. E. Nettleton, A. F. Levi, Halsey Lathrop, A. S. Stearns, H. E. Sutherland, E. A. Atherton, C. L. Rice, vice-presidents; T. F. Wells, corresponding secretary; B. R. Wade, recording secretary; Pierce Butler, treasurer.

In 1878 the statistics were: Number of Sunday-schools, 319; officers and teachers, 3,210; scholars, 26,566. The present number of scholars is probably about 40,000.

LUZERNE COUNTY SPORTSMEN'S CLUB.

This association was organized in October, 1875, and incorporated on the 3d of January, 1876. Its objects are "the preservation and propagation of game and fish within the county of Luzerne." It has an active membership of about fifty, and a land membership of a much greater number. Land members are those owners of lands who choose to make leases to the club for the purpose of enabling it to prevent poaching and violations of the game laws.

The influence of the club has always been used for its legitimate objects. It has prosecuted to conviction several violations of the game laws, and procured the appointment of five fish wardens by the fish commissioners of the State. It has planted 41,000 California salmon in Bowman's creek, 2,500 salmon trout and 9,000 land locked salmon in Harvey's lake, and about 25,000 brook trout in several of the public streams of the county; has imported more than 600 live quails, and has circulated upwards of 3,000 copies of the game laws. It offers rewards for the conviction of those who violate the game laws, and also for the destruction of hawks, owls, foxes, skunks, minks and weasels. It holds a meeting on the first Monday in each month. Always keeping the legitimate objects of the club in view, its members strive to accomplish these with justice to all and malice toward none.

LUZERNE BIBLE SOCIETY.

From a report made April 26th, 1879, by Rev. S. S. Kennedy, agent of this society, the following sketch is mainly gleaned.

Its first organization was effected November 1st, 1819, at a meeting in the old church on the public square. The first officers chosen were Ebenezer Bowman, president; William Ross, Esq., David Scott, Esq., and Captain David Hoyt, vice-presidents; Dr. Edward Lovell, corresponding secretary; Andrew Beaumont, recording secretary; and G. M. Hollenback, treasurer. Many of the best citizens of the county became patrons of the society, and it is recorded that a masonic lodge of Wilkes-Barre donated $25.

In 1828 David Scott was chosen president; Thomas Dyer, vice-president; John N. Conyngham, corresponding secretary; Ziba Bennett, recording secretary; and James D. Haff, treasurer.

The society was reorganized on the 25th of August, 1835, and Rev. James May was elected president; Rev. John Dorrance, Hon. David Scott, Cristus Collins, Esq., and John N. Conyngham, Esq., vice-presidents; Volney S. Maxwell, Esq., secretary; Henry C. Anheiser, treasurer; Dr. Latham Jones, Edmund Taylor and William C. Gildersleeve, executive committee. No records of this organization of a later date than 1837 appear.

On the 28th of January, 1853, after a sleep of sixteen years, the society was again reorganized, and Hon. John Conyngham was chosen president; Hon. Ziba Bennett, treasurer; Sharp D. Lewis, Esq., recording secretary; and A. T. McClintock, Esq., corresponding secretary. Judge Conyngham continued in the office of president during eighteen years, or until his death. He was succeeded by V. L. Maxwell, and at his death A. T. McClintock became president. Hon. Z. Bennett and S. D. Lewis, Esq., continued in the positions of treasurer and secretary during twenty-six years, and were very faithful and efficient officers.

Since 1853 the county has been three times canvassed by the agents of the society, and in each of these explorations many destitute families have been supplied with the Scriptures. During the last exploration about fifteen hundred families were found without Bibles and were supplied. It was remarked by the agent that the most grateful among those who were supplied were many who received the Scriptures in the German language. He also stated that the benevolent spirit which prompted the work seemed in many cases to be highly appreciated, and to exert a very favorable influence.

The present officers are: A. T. McClintock, president; E. L. Dana, vice-president; G. S. Bennett, secretary; J. W. Hollenback, treasurer; A. T. McClintock, E. L. Dana, G. S. Bennett, J. W. Hollenback, E. C. Wadhams, Richard Sharp, J. P. Hoyt, A. J. Pringle, C. A. Miner, B. G. Carpenter, H. W. Kalish, Prof. A. Albert, and C. M. Conyngham, executive committee.

CHAPTER XIV.

OPENING OF THE CIVIL WAR—PATRIOTIC SPIRIT IN LUZERNE, LACKAWANNA AND WYOMING COUNTIES.

THE limits and scope of this work will not permit even an enumeration of all the events that led to the civil war. It is quite proper, however, that a brief mention should be made of some of the more important and immediate antecedents of the contest, in which many of the citizens of these counties bore a conspicuous and honorable part, and in which many laid down their lives.

The doctrine which has by some been termed a grand political heresy—that of State sovereignty, or, as it was improperly termed at the South, State rights, was what led to the civil war. By this is meant the right of a State to set aside any act of Congress which may be deemed unconstitutional by the State authorities. This doctrine was distinctly set forth in the famous Kentucky resolutions of 1798, and was for a long time accepted by many, perhaps by a majority, in all parts of the country. It involves not the right of nullification alone, but that of secession. South Carolina in 1832 was dissatisfied with the protective tariff which Congress established, and adopted an ordinance of nullification and secession. A compromise was effected, some concessions to her prejudices were made, and she repealed her ordinances.

The question of the introduction of slavery into Kansas arose, and the people of the Northern States evinced a determination to prevent it, in which they were successful. In 1856 threats of secession were freely uttered in case of the success of the Republican party, which in 1855 had been formed on the issue of slavery extension. In 1860 Abraham Lincoln was elected President, and this was regarded by southern statesmen as the finishing stroke against the extension of their institution, and they proceeded to execute their threats. South Carolina took the lead in this, followed by Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Virginia, Florida and Louisiana, all of which before the end of November issued calls for State conventions to consider the question of secession. In this they were followed after a time by Tennessee, Texas, Arkansas and North Carolina, all of which adopted ordinances of secession.

South Carolina adopted the ordinance on the first day of December, 1860. Three days later Governor Pickens issued his proclamation, declaring it to be a "separate, sovereign, free and independent State, having a right to levy war, conclude peace, negotiate treaties," etc.

John B. Floyd, of Virginia, was at that time Secretary of War. He had caused 70,000 stands of arms to be placed in the arsenal at Charleston, and had put that arsenal in the care of the governor of South Carolina; and thus when the State seceded it was able to possess itself of these arms, and it was also found that the northern arsenals generally had been depleted and the arms sent south. Many of the ships of the navy had been sent to distant seas, and the government was left without efficient resources with which to repress a sudden uprising.

The senators from South Carolina were first to resign their seats, followed by others and by members of the cabinet and of the House of Representatives. Texas, the last of the seven States which united in forming the "Southern Confederacy," adopted the ordinance of secession February 1st, 1861. On the 4th of the month the delegates who had been appointed by the conventions for that purpose met at Montgomery, Ala., to form a government. They adopted the constitution of the United States, with some additions and alterations, as the constitution of the confederate States, and chose for provisional President and Vice-President Jefferson Davis and Alexander H. Stevens.

When South Carolina passed the ordinance of secession in December, 1860, Fort Moultrie, in Charleston harbor, was garrisoned by sixty effective men in command of Major Anderson. The fort was not secure against attack, and Major Anderson was denied reinforcements. Accordingly on the night of December 20th he removed his force to Fort Sumter, which had been quietly prepared for his occupation. He had been instructed by the President "not to take up without necessity any position which could be construed into a hostile attitude, but to hold possession of the forts, and if attacked, defend himself." This evacuation of Fort Moultrie, therefore, surprised the President and aroused the indignation of the South Carolinians, who thought that they had a pledge from the President to prevent such removal. He was induced to take this step because he entertained just apprehensions of the occupancy of Fort Sumter by the South Carolina troops, and an attack on his small force in the nearly defenseless fort where he was, in which case it would have been impossible for him to hold out a day.

Three commissioners that had been appointed by the South Carolina convention "to treat with the United States" repaired to Washington, and in obedience to their instructions demanded that Major Anderson should be ordered back to Fort Moultrie, and in case of refusal that the forts in Charleston harbor should be unconditionally evacuated. About this time the government offices, forts, etc., were possessed by the State troops, who were supplied with arms and ammunition from the arsenal.

An attempt was made by the government to revictual and reinforce Fort Sumter, and for that purpose the steamer "Star of the West" was sent in January, 1861, with two hundred men, provisions, ammunition, etc. She was fired on from Morris Island, was struck by several shot and compelled to return without landing her troops and cargo.

April 12th, 1861, at 4 A. M., the bombardment of Fort Sumter was commenced from the batteries of Fort Moultrie, Sullivan's Island and elsewhere. The rebel forces were under command of General Beauregard, who demanded the surrender of the fort. Major Anderson replied that he would only surrender when his supplies were exhausted. The cannonading was kept up with spirit on both sides. The result was the surrender of the fort on the 13th, and on the 14th Major Anderson and his command left on the steamer "Isabel" for New York.

After the attack on Fort Sumter it was feared that the confederate troops would march at once on Washington, and all the available forces were so disposed as to afford the best protection to the capital possible with the meagre number of troops available. Measures were immediately taken to raise troops in several States, and thousands of volunteers at once offered their services. President Lincoln promptly issued his proclamation and call for 75,000 troops for three months, and stated that they would first be used to "repossess the forts, places and property which had been seized from the Union." The proclamation also called a special session of Congress for the next 4th of July, to do whatever might be deemed necessary for the public safety. Another proclamation, declaring a blockade, was soon issued.

To this call for volunteers the people of the loyal States responded with the utmost alacrity. Only two days after Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, issued orders calling for troops, two regiments were on their way to Washington. In every city and almost every village in the loyal North meetings were held, large sums of money were pledged for the support of the families of volunteers, regiments were raised and sent forward, and a degree of patriotic feeling was aroused the existence of which had by some been doubted.

On the 29th of April the President called for 40,000 volunteers to serve for three years, and 25,000 regulars for five years' service. In his message to Congress, which convened in special session in July, he recommended the passage of a law authorizing the raising of 400,000 men and placing $400,000,000 at the disposal of the government, in order to make this contest a short and decisive one. During the nine days of the session acts were passed to legalize the past action of the President, to authorize the calling out of 500,000 volunteers, to appropriate some $266,000,000 for the prosecution of the war, and to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes.

At the breaking out of the war hardly any one anticipated a struggle of beyond two or three months; but instead of the short, decisive war that was at first anticipated the contest was prolonged through four years, with an expenditure of life and treasure unparalleled in the history of similar wars. During this time the Union forces experienced alternate successes and reverses till the decisive triumphs of Grant and Sheridan, the resistless march of Sherman to the sea, and the complete exhaustion of the enemy's resources, brought the consummation for which the friends of the Union had so long labored and prayed. The tension at which the feelings of the friends of humanity had been held during four years was relaxed, and the world breathed free again.

In these counties, as in all parts of the country, the departure of the first company of volunteers was an occasion of peculiar interest. It was the first time in the history of the country that the national existence had been threatened, and the patriotic feelings of every loyal citizen were roused into intense activity. It was the first general call which had been made upon the present generation for volunteers to serve in the field, and of course the first occasion on which the people had been called to bid adieu to fathers, sons or brothers, who took their lives in their hands for the defense of their country. They experienced a higher pride in the patriotism of their kindred and friends, and a more poignant grief at parting than they felt on similar occasions afterwards; for the acuteness of these feelings was to some extent worn away by frequent exercise, and after the first departure less of idle curiosity was felt.

The brave volunteers of Luzerne, Lackawanna and Wyoming counties who left the comforts of their homes, their social and domestic pleasures, and who severed for the time the ties which linked them to their families and friends, to rally for the defense of the institutions under which they had been permitted to enjoy these comforts, pleasures and affections; to face the stern realities of grim visaged war, to endure the hardships and privations of the field, to inhale the pestilential emanations from southern swamps, to languish in sickness and pain on pallets, "with no hand of kindred to smooth their lone pillows," and, too often, to find solitary graves where neither mother nor sister, wife nor children could come to drop affection's tear, deserve a more minute history than the limits of this work will permit. They constituted parts of organizations the balance of which came from other regions, and their histories are inseparably connected with those of these organizations.

When the proclamation of the President was issued calling for 75,000 troops to defend the national capital and suppress the rebellion that had thus been inaugurated, the patriotism of the people in Luzerne county found vent otherwise than in words. Several military companies at once offered their services to the government. The Wyoming Light Dragoons, the Wyoming Yagers (a Germany company), the Jackson Rifles (a company of Irishmen) and the White Haven Yagers were among the earliest to depart in response to the call. The recruiting of other companies for future exigencies was immediately commenced, and it was at once evident that, whatever had been the previous differences of opinion among the people in this country, when the time for action came patriotism triumphed over every other feeling; and here as elsewhere in the loyal North people of all parties vied with each other in their efforts to promote measures for the defense of the country in its hour of peril.

The first war meeting was held at the court-house in Wilkes-Barre, on Friday, April 26th, 1861. At this meeting Hon. H. B. Wright presided, and patriotic speeches were made by men of all previous shades of political opinion. Large sums were pledged for the care of the families of volunteers. A noteworthy feature of the patriotic feeling which existed in this county, as elsewhere, was seen in the fact that those who sought by addresses and other means to "bring public sentiment up," as they termed it, soon found that they had mistaken their mission; that public sentiment was leading them; that the patriotism of the masses was in advance of that of their self-constituted leaders.

Here as elsewhere the first burst of patriotism after the attack on Fort Sumter overshadowed every other feeling, and it was confidently hoped that past differences of opinion would not be revived to become sources of embarrassment in the time of the country's peril. Here as elsewhere, however, this hope was not realized. Sympathy with the enemies of the country manifested itself among a few after a time, under various disguises. A profound veneration for the constitution, and an active fear lest some of its provisions should be violated in prosecuting the war for the preservation of the Union, was usually professed by those whose patriotism was not stronger than their party prejudice. By reason of numerical inferiority, however, these people were comparatively impotent in Luzerne county.

From a diary kept by Captain James B. Harding the following facts relative to the organization of the first company from Wyoming county in the war of the Rebellion are gleaned:

It will be remembered that at that time no railroad or telegraph lines passed through Wyoming county, and news was not received here as early as at places where these facilities existed. Preparations for the formation of a company were commenced by Mr. Harding on the 19th, and at a war meeting held at the court-house in Tunkhannock on the evening of the 20th twenty men were enlisted. On the evening of the 22nd another war meeting was held and more men were recruited, and on the 24th drilling commenced.

Recruiting and drilling continued till the 27th, when the company was nearly full. On this day the men were drawn up in front of the court-house, where they were addressed by A. K. Peckham and George S. Fulton; and by the former, in behalf of the ladies of Tunkhannock and Eaton, presented with a flag. Of this company James B. Harding was chosen captain, John Deckover first lieutenant, and H. E. Tiffany second lieutenant.

Returns of the organization of this company were forwarded to Harrisburg by Levi H. Stevens, then inspector of the sixteenth division of Pennsylvania militia, and daily drilling was continued.

On the 4th of May news was received that the company could not be accepted for nine months' service as had been expected, but that an enlistment for three years or during the war would be the only terms of acceptance. When this alternative was presented about twenty-five men, with Captain Harding, decided to enlist as required. These united with a part of a company in Factoryville, and the consolidated company chose Captain Harding for their commander, O. N. Bailey first lieutenant, and D. N. Matthewson second lieutenant.

On the evening of May 8th the company left Factoryville for Harrisburg, via Scranton, where they tarried till the morning of the 9th. On their arrival at Sunbury the railroad company refused to take them farther, and they refused to leave the cars, which were uncoupled and left standing on the track. During the night of the 9th they were quartered in the court-house and fed by the ladies of Sunbury. On the 10th orders to go forward were received and transportation provided. The company became a part of the 41st regiment, the history of which is given elsewhere.

Meetings were from time to time held in various parts of the county for raising volunteers, and the histories of the different regiments include the lists of volunteers from this county, as well as Luzerne and Lackawanna. The patriotic spirit of the citizens of the county prompted them to make every effort in their power to sustain the country in its hour of trial. The county, by its commissioners, paid to each volunteer for nine months' service $25, and to each who went for three years $50. The commissioners also expended money under an act of the Legislature for the support of needy families of soldiers in the army.

Truth compels the statement that there were in some portions of the county manifestations of a very disloyal feeling, and even forcible resistance to the enrollment was in one instance contemplated. The strong loyal feelings which prevailed in other parts of the county overbore the disloyalty of these localities, and prevented the disgrace of an armed demonstration in favor of the enemies of the country.

The loyal women here as elsewhere did their part, through their aid societies and otherwise, to furnish such comforts for the sick and wounded, who languished in the field or in distant hospitals, as under the circumstances the government was unable to provide.

CHAPTER XV.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—THE 8TH, 11TH AND 15TH REGIMENTS OF THREE-MONTHS' MEN.

OF the 8th regiment, which was organized for three months' service, companies B, C, D, E, F, G and H were recruited in Luzerne county. A company of cavalry at Wilkes-Barre, of which Captains Hoyt and Brisbane had been commanders, was filled by recruits and became Company C of the regiment. Company F had been an artillery company of the same city, under command of Captain Emley, who became colonel of the regiment. Company G had been known as the Wyoming Yagers, which, together with a militia company from Pittston and additional recruits, constituted this company. The other companies were made up wholly of recruits.

The companies proceeded at once to camp Curtin, where the regiment was organized on the 22nd of April, 1861, seven days after the President's proclamation calling for 75,000 men was issued. On the day of its organization the regiment was ordered to the vicinity of Chambersburg, where it was attached to the 3d brigade, 1st division. June 7th it went to Greenville, and soon afterward to the vicinity of Williamsport, where it was posted to guard the forts of the Potomac. While here Lieutenant Colonel Bowman crossed the river alone to reconnoitre, and was made prisoner by rebel scouts. Soon after the Union forces advanced into Virginia. Two companies of this regiment were detailed as an escort for Captain Doubleday's battery on its march to Martinsburg. On the 6th of July the regiment joined the brigade at Martinsburg; on the 17th it participated in a flank movement toward Charleston, and was stationed at Keyes Ford during the night of the 20th. It returned about this time, via Harper's Ferry and Hagerstown, to Harrisburg, where it was disbanded.

The field and staff officers of the regiment were:—A. H. Emley, Wilkes-Barre, colonel; Samuel Bowman, Wilkes-Barre, lieutenant colonel; Joseph Phillips, Pittston, major; Joseph Wright, Wilkes-Barre, adjutant; Butler Dilley, quartermaster; Benjamin H. Throop, surgeon; H. Carey Parry, assistant-surgeon; T. P. Hunt, chaplain.

Of the companies composing the 8th, B was recruited at Moscow, Lackawanna county, and mustered in on the 23d of April, 1861; C and D were recruited at Wilkes-Barre and mustered April 22nd; E and H were recruited at Scranton and mustered April 23d; and F and G were recruited at Wilkes-Barre and mustered in, the first April 21st and the second April 23d. ELEVENTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was organized April 26th, 1861, for three month's service. After a short period of drill it was, on the 27th of May, ordered forward to guard the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, some bridges on which had been destroyed. Company E, Captain Johnson, was stationed at Charlestown. On the 18th of June the regiment went via Baltimore and Harrisburg to Chambersburg, thence to Hagerstown, Md. On the 20th of June, it was placed in the brigade commanded by Colonel (afterward General) Abercrombie, and on the 2nd of July crossed the Potomac at Williamsport under that commander and was actively engaged in the battle at Falling Water, in which the forces of Jackson were put to flight. In this action three of Company E (James Morgan, Daniel R. Stiles and Nelson Headen) were wounded. After this fight the company went with the brigade to Martinsburg, thence to Bunker Hill, and on the 17th of July to Charlestown. Here, as the expiration of their term of enlistment approached, General Patterson had the 11th paraded and requested the men to remain some days beyond this term. He asked them to signify their willingness to do so by bringing their arms to a shoulder at the word. When the order was given every musket was shouldered. By arrangement the regiment was re-mustered for three years after its muster-out and allowed to retain its number.

The field and staff officers of the 11th regiment were as follows: Colonel, Phaon Jarrett; lieutenant colonel, Richard Coulter; major, William D. Earnest; adjutant, F. Asbury Aul; quartermaster, William H. Hay; surgeon, William T. Babb; assistant surgeon, H. B. Buchler.

COMPANY E

of this company was recruited at Pittston; mustered in April 21st, 1861; and consisted of the men named below:

Officers—John B. Johnson, captain; John B. Fish, first lieutenant; Thomas DeKetta, second lieutenant; William E. Sees, first sergeant; Samuel Hodgdon, second sergeant; William C. Blair, third sergeant; Francis C. Woodhouse, fourth sergeant; Jacob Fell, first corporal; George Cleaver, second corporal; Cornelius Vanscoy, third corporal; Charles F. Stewart, fourth corporal; James D. Giddings and Thomas Helm, musicians.

FIFTEENTH REGIMENT.

This was organized at Camp Curtin May 1st, 1861. May 9th the regiment went to Camp Johnston, near Lancaster, where the men were well drilled and disciplined. June 3d they moved to near Chambersburg, and were assigned to General Negley's brigade of General Keim's division. June 16th the regiment with its brigade marched to the vicinity of Hagerstown. On the 2nd of July it crossed the Potomac with the army and Negley's brigade, which followed a road that diverged from the main line of march, threw forward Company I with a company from another regiment as skirmishers. These suddenly came upon a battalion of Ashby's cavalry, disguised as Union troops, and before they suspected their true character Lieutenant John B. Hutchinson and a portion of Company I were made prisoners, the first sergeant having been shot. They had even obeyed an order from Ashby to let down the fence between them, mistaking the cavalry for friends. Pursuit without cavalry was unavailing, and these men were hurried to Richmond, and thence through the south to New Orleans, where they were kept till that city fell into the possession of the Federal troops, when they were sent to Salisbury and soon afterward exchanged. Six of their number, however, had died from exposure and hardship. On the 3d the regiment reached Martinsburg, where it remained till the 15th; then marched successively to Bunker Hill, Charleston, Hagerstown and Carlisle, where it encamped on the 27th, and was mustered out on the 7th of August.

The colonel of the 15th regiment was Richard A. Oakford; lieutenant-colonel, Thomas Biddle; major, Stephen N. Bradford; adjutant, John R. Lynch, of Wilkes-Barre, quartermaster, Jacob Rice; surgeon, A. P. Meylert; assistant surgeon, R. H. Little.

CHAPTER XVI.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—THE TWENTY-EIGHTH REGIMENT.

THIS regiment was raised by John W. Geary, a distinguished citizen, and veteran of the Mexican war, who was its colonel, and who was finally promoted to the position of major general, and in 1867 and 1870 elected governor of the State. It consisted of fifteen companies, of which Companies A and N were recruited in Luzerne county. The regiment was first uniformed and equipped at the expense of Colonel Geary.

Authority was given to raise this regiment in June, 1861, and on the 27th of July the colonel with ten companies went forward to Harper's Ferry, leaving the other five to follow when full. The disaster at Bull Run had rendered this haste necessary.

August 13th the regiment moved to Point of Rocks, and engaged in picket duty along twenty-five miles of the frontier, on the Potomac. The disloyalty of the inhabitants was such that a picket post was required every four hundred yards, and the utmost watchfulness was necessary to prevent treasonable communications. In the latter part of September the rebels attacked Point of Rocks, but were repulsed. In October the colonel with a part of the regiment crossed into Virginia to seize and carry away a quantity of wheat, and when about to return they were attacked by a large force and a spirited fight ensued. The enemy were repulsed with considerable loss. In the latter part of the same month the command went forward to participate in the action at Ball's Bluff. During three months the regiment was on duty along the Potomac, and had frequent skirmishes with the enemy. In the latter part of February, 1862, it crossed to Harper's Ferry, drove the enemy from Bolivar Heights, crossed the Shenandoah and drove the rebels from Loudon Heights; then pushed forward to Lovellsville, Waterford and Leesburg, which General A. P. Hill abandoned on the approach of Colonel Geary's force, and which was occupied by the Union troops. From Leesburg the command advanced to Snickerville, Upperville, Ashby's Gap, Rectortown, Piedmont, Markham and Front Royal. Returning to Snickerville the force was joined by a portion of the 28th that had been left at Leesburg. They then marched successively, fighting occasionally, to Philemont, Middlebury, White Plains; Thoroughfare Gap, Greenwich, Catlett's Station, Warrentown and White Plains; and for some time, till about May 1st, guarded and repaired the Manassas Railroad.

April 25th, Colonel Geary was commissioned brigadier general of volunteers, and was succeeded as colonel by Lieutenant Colonel De Korponay. Major Tyndall was made lieutenant colonel, and he was succeeded by Captain Ario Pardee, jr. The 28th was soon afterward, or about the 17th of May, attached to the command of General Geary, and its subsequent history is so closely connected with that of his brigade that to give it fully would require a history of all the movements of that brigade. It was attached to the corps of General Banks at the time of the retreat from Virginia, and was engaged in the battle of Antietam. It also took part in the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg.

In September, 1864, the 11th and 12th corps were ordered to join the Army of the Cumberland. From this time forward the 28th was attached to the army of General Sherman, and participated in many battles, which cannot even be enumerated here for want of space. In November, 1864, with the rest of Sherman's army, it made the famous "march to the sea." After doing duty about a month in Savannah, it started across the Carolinas, which was the severest part of the march from Atlanta. As is well known, the surrender of Lee and Johnston concluded the fighting of the war; and the regiment was mustered out of the service on the 18th of July, 1865.

During its service of four years it lost about as many men as were originally on its muster roll. It is said that it was as often engaged as any regiment in the service, but that it never permitted any kind of property belonging to it to fall into the hands of the enemy. One major general and three brigadiers were furnished by it; among the latter was Ario Pardee, jr.

The term of enlistment of this regiment was three years. All the members of Company N remaining in the service until October 28th, 1862, were transferred at that date to Company C of the 147th Pennsylvania vol-unteers. The first date given in the following roll is that of muster-in, and as the year is 1861, except in case of recruits, it need not be repeated. The regimental officers and men of Company A, where not otherwise mentioned, were mustered out with the regiment July 18th, 1865:

CHAPTER XVII.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—THE 36TH AND 41ST REGIMENTS (7TH AND 12TH RESERVES).

THE Seventh Reserve regiment was organized on the 26th of June, 1861, and Elisha B. Harvey, of Wilkes-Barre, was made colonel; Joseph Totten, of Mechanicsburg, lieutenant colonel, and Chauncey A. Lyman, of Lock Haven, major.

The regiment was ordered to Washington on the 21st of July, and on the 27th was mustered into the service of the United States. On the 2nd of August it went forward to the rendezvous of the Pennsylvania reserves, and was assigned to the brigade of General George G. Meade. From this time till October it was engaged in drilling and picket duty. In the latter month it joined the army of the Potomac. From this time till March, 1863, but little service beyond drill was seen. When the army moved forward to the peninsula in April the seventh was retained, with other troops, for the defense of Washington. In June they went forward to the front and became a part of the 5th corps, under General Fitz-John Porter. On the 26th of June the battle of Mechanicsville, in which the 7th was engaged, was fought. The next day the battle of Gaines' Mill, in which the 7th also participated, took place. Then followed some marching and skirmishing, in which the regiment was engaged till the end of the "seven days" fighting. It then marched "by devious ways" to the vicinity of Groveton, where on the 29th and 30th of August, 1862, the 7th was engaged. Its next battle was at South Mountain, where it made an impetuous charge, in which Colonel Bolinger was severely wounded. At the battle of Antietam it was actively engaged and lost heavily. After this battle it moved to the Potomac, and thence, in the latter part of October, to Warrenton, Va. Thence it went, in the latter part of November, to the vicinity of Fredericksburg, where on the 11th of December it was desperately engaged. At this battle it made its most brilliant record. It made a gallant charge on the corps of Longstreet, in which it captured more than a hundred prisoners and a battle-flag—the only one taken in this action. The losses of the regiment in this action were heavy.

During the winter following the 7th remained in its camp near Belle Plain, with the exception of a short time spent on what is known as the "mud march." In February, 1863, it was transferred from the field to the Department of Washington, where it remained, in the discharge mostly of provost and guard duty, during more than a year. In this time several changes were made among the field officers, and Captain L. G. Speese was promoted to the position of major.

In the latter part of April it again took the field, and joined the army at about the commencement of the Wilderness campaign. In the course of the first action in which the 7th was engaged a large portion of the regiment was by one of the casualties of war captured, and the men were sent to the notorious and infamous prison pen at Andersonville, Georgia, where they were starved during nearly eight months. Out of about two hundred and fifty privates who were taken sixty-seven died in this prison, and many others afterward by reason of their hardships and exposure there. The surrender of the rebel armies to Grant and Sherman opened their prison doors.

Company F of the regiment whose achievements and sufferings have just been recounted, was recruited in Luzerne county. We give below the records of that company as published by the State. The time of service was three years. In the roll the date of muster-in is generally omitted, as in nearly all cases it was June 13th, 1861; in other cases it is the first date given.

FORTY-FIRST REGIMENT (TWELFTH RESERVES).

The companies composing this regiment were recruited for the three months' service, but were not accepted. They were mustered into the State service as reserves for three years, and organized into a regiment, which, on the 17th day of August, 1861, was mustered into the service of the United States. They proceeded at once to Tennytown, near Washington, where they were drilled till the 10th of October, when they crossed to Virginia and went into winter quarters at camp Langley. With the exception of the expedition to Drainesville, in which they participated, they remained at that camp till March, 1862, when, with the rest of the army, the regiment moved toward Manassas. It was sent forward to the Peninsula in June, and on the 26th of that month engaged in the battle of Cold Harbor. Immediately afterward it was engaged in the battle of Gaines's Mill. For two or three days after this battle the regiment suffered intensely from fatigue and thirst. At the battle of Malvern Hill this regiment was posted on a height from which the fighting could be seen, but it was not engaged. After remaining some time at Harrison's Landing the 12th left the Peninsula and marched to join the army of General Pope. At Groveton it was engaged, and aided in repulsing an impetuous charge by the enemy. It was next in action at South Mountain, and three days later at Antietam. In the succeeding December it was again engaged, at the battle of Fredericksburg, where it lost in killed, wounded and prisoners about one hundred men.

In February, 1863, the regiment, with its division, was ordered to the defenses of Washington, where its effective condition was greatly improved by the return of absentees and by promotions. In April it commenced provost duty in the city of Washington, under General Martindale. It rejoined the main army in June, at the commencement of the Gettysburg campaign, and was present at the battle of Gettysburg. During the campaign of that summer and autumn the 12th was engaged at Bristoe Station, Rappahannock Station, and at Mine Run. During the winter of 1863-4 it was engaged in guard and picket duty along the line of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, through a region that was infested by sneaking guerillas.

On the opening of the campaign in May, 1864, the 12th took the field again, and was engaged during three days in the Wilderness. It was again engaged in the battle near Bethesda Church, on the 30th of May. Its term of service expired about this time, and it marched to Harrisburg, where it was on the 11th of June mustered out.

Below we give the records of the officers of this regiment; and also of company B, which was recruited in Wyoming county. Nearly all the members of the company were mustered in on the 15th of May, 1861, and that date is to be understood where no other is given. The first date that appears in other cases is that of muster-in. Where nothing is said to the contrary, the men whose records are here given were mustered out with the regiment June 11th, 1864.

CHAPTER XVIII.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—HISTORIES OF THE FORTY-SIXTH AND FIFTIETH REGIMENTS.

THE Logan Guards, of Mifflin county, one of the first five companies of volunteers that reached Washington on the breaking out of the Rebellion, became Company A of the 46th regiment. Companies C and D also served in three months' regiments, and preserved their company organizations in this.

The 46th was organized September 1st, 1861, with Joseph F. Knipe colonel, James L. Selfridge lieutenant colonel, and Arnold C. Lewis major. On the death of Major Lewis, who was shot by a private of Company I soon after the organization of the regiment, J. A. Matthews became major.

Soon after the organization of the 46th it was ordered to the command of General Banks, near Harper's Ferry, and was assigned to the 1st brigade, General Crawford, 2nd division, General Williams. Camp duty, drill and occasional skirmishing occupied the regiment till the latter part of February, 1862; when, with the rest of Banks's forces, it crossed the Potomac and occupied successively Leesburg, Charlestown, Martinsburg and Winchester. In an engagement near Kernstown three companies of the 46th, under Major Matthews, participated, and in the pursuit of Jackson by Banks the regiment took an active part.

At the severe and unequal contest with the rebels under Jackson at Winchester the 46th held its ground for five hours without flinching. At the battle of Cedar Mountain, in August, 1862, the regiment charged three times across an open field, exposed to a terrific fire of shot, shell and musketry, and only retired after the colonel, major and several of the line officers were wounded. The 46th was again engaged at the battle of Antietam, where it was again commanded by Colonel Selfridge. The regiment was next engaged at Chancellorsville, after having wintered at Fairfax Station and Stafford Court-house.

At the battle of Gettysburg the regiment was engaged heavily, but by reason of its sheltered position it did not lose largely. After the battle of Gettysburg the 12th corps, of which the 46th was a part, was detached from the Army of the Potomac and sent west. The first duty to which the regiment was assigned was guarding the Chattanooga Railroad through a country infested with guerrillas.

In January, 1864, a sufficient number of the officers and men of this regiment having re-enlisted to insure its continuance, they were given a veteran furlough. During its visit at home its ranks were recruited, and after its return it remained in winter quarters till the next May. In the campaign that followed the 46th was engaged at Resaca, where, among others, Lieutenant John H. Knipe, of Company I, was killed. It participated successively in the actions at Pumpkinvine creek, New Hope Church, Dallas, Pine Knob, Kenesaw Mountain and Marietta, in all of which it had fourteen killed and about thirty wounded. In the severe fight with Hood at Peach Tree Creek, near Atlanta, the 46th lost ten killed and twenty wounded. In another action with Hood near Atlanta it lost six killed and several wounded.

The regiment had no severe fighting after the surrender of Atlanta, September 1st, 1864. General Knipe, who had been promoted, was transferred to the command of cavalry, and the 46th, under Major Griffith (Colonel Selfridge, whose promotion had followed that of General Knipe, being in command of the brigade), went on its march through Georgia and the Carolinas, after which it commenced its march homeward. It was mustered out July 16th, 1865.

Company I of the forty-sixth was recruited in Luzerne county, and we give below a synopsis of the records of its members, together with a similar statement in regard to the regimental officers. The first date given is that of muster-in; where not otherwise stated, each man was mustered out with the regiment, July 16th, 1865.

FIFTIETH REGIMENT.

Company I in this regiment was recruited in Luzerne county. The regiment was organized September 25th, 1861, with Benjamin C. Christ as colonel. It proceeded to Washington on the 2nd of October, and thence to Annapolis on the 9th. On the 19th it embarked on transports, and after a perilous voyage, in the course of which one of the vessels came very near being lost, it landed and went into camp on Port Royal island. In December the regiment went to Beaufort, which place it was the first to occupy. Here in its first skirmish it drove the enemy from the island. On the 1st of January the regiment was in its first engagement, at the battle of Coosaw, where a partially constructed fort was taken and destroyed.

May 29th the regiment, with a section of artillery and two companies of cavalry, went to Pocotaligo to assist in a demonstration on Charleston. Six companies of the regiment accomplished the perilous feat of crossing a bridge from which the plank had been removed, on the stringers, under fire, driving the enemy from his position on the opposite side and replanking the bridge, thus enabling the entire force to cross. Captain Parker, who led these companies, was killed. July 12th the regiment was ordered from Beaufort to Fortress Monroe, where it became a part of General Burnside's (9th) corps, and marched to the support of General Pope, on the Rapidan. At the second battle of Bull Run it was engaged on both days of the fight, but most severely on the second. The men recollected with pride that in every encounter they drove the enemy.

On the 1st of August the regiment was engaged in the battle of Chantilly, where General Stevens, who was in command of the division to which it was attached, was killed. On the 14th of September it participated in the battle of South Mountain, where it aided in a charge that drove the enemy from the field. Its next engagement was at Antietam, where it lost seven killed. Although present at the battle of Fredericksburg in December, it was not actively engaged.

Some time after the battle of Fredericksburg the regiment went with the 9th corps to Kentucky and subsequently, by way of Cincinnati and Cairo, to Vicksburg. After the fall of that place it was attached to General Sherman's army, and was engaged in the action for the occupancy of Jackson, Miss. In August the regiment returned to Kentucky, where the health of the men, who had suffered greatly from malaria, was recruited and sick absentees returned. In October the 50th, with the rest of the brigade commanded by Colonel Christ, went to assist in repelling a force of the enemy which had come into East Tennessee from Virginia, and was engaged in a battle by which they were driven back. Soon after returning to Knoxville they went forward again to check an invasion of the State by General Longstreet, but were driven back. In the latter part of November the regiment assisted in repelling an assault on the defenses of Knoxville, and on the 5th of December the siege was raised and the rebel army retreated, followed by the 50th among other troops. It pursued the enemy, occasionally skirmishing with the rear guard, as far as Blaine's cross roads. Here the regiment encamped, and on the 1st of January, 1864, about three hundred of the men re-enlisted. After a painful march to Nicholasville, Ky., a veteran furlough was given them.

At the expiration of their furlough they were attached to the 9th corps in Virginia, went forward, and on the 5th of May were engaged in the battle of the Wilderness. On the 9th they were engaged at Spottsylvania Courthouse, and in this battle and at the Wilderness lost in killed, wounded and missing about two hundred. On the 12th it was again engaged, and from that time forward almost daily till the battle of Cold Harbor, in which it took a part and suffered severely. It marched thence to the front of Petersburg, where it did picket duty till the latter part of July. It assisted in the assault after the explosion of the mine. On the 19th of August it marched toward the Weldon railroad, and was attacked by the enemy on two successive days. Some thirty of the men were discharged about this time by reason of the expiration of their term of service. In October 147 recruits were received, and after two weeks spent in drilling active duty was resumed.

The regiment in the latter part of November took a position in front of Petersburg, and remained there during the winter. It was engaged in the active operations of early April, 1865, and was among the first regiments that reached Petersburg when it fell. About the middle of that month it went to Washington, and remained there till the last of June. On the 4th of July it took part in the laying of the corner stone of the national monument at Gettysburg, and it was mustered out of the service on the 30th of that month.

CHAPTER XIX.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—HISTORY OF THE FIFTY-SECOND REGIMENT.

A CALL was issued by the President in July, 1861, for sixteen regiments, and under this call authority was granted by Governor Curtin, August 1st, 1861, to John C. Dodge, jr., to recruit this regiment.

John C. Dodge, jr., of Lycoming county, was appointed colonel; Henry M. Hoyt, of Luzerne county (now governor of the State), lieutenant colonel; and John B. Conyngham, also of Luzerne county, major. The rendezvous of the regiment was Camp Curtin, near Harrisburg.

November 8th, 1861, the regiment proceeded to Washington. It remained there, engaged in drill and camp duty, till the 28th of March, 1862, when it was ordered to take the field. During this time it furnished ten volunteers for gunboat service at the West, most of whom were subsequently killed by an explosion.

On taking the field it was assigned to the 1st brigade, 3d division and 4th corps. It marched to Alexandria, and thence went by transports to Newport News, where it debarked; and soon afterwards it encamped near Yorktown, where the siege was in progress. As the regiment marched to take possession of the deserted works on the 4th of May a torpedo exploded under Company F, killing one man and wounding six others.

From Yorktown it moved forward with its brigade to Williamsburg, where it arrived just in time to support Hancock in his gallant charge, which resulted in driving the enemy from the field. The regiment arrived with its brigade at the Chickahominy on the 20th of May. On the 24th it went on a reconnoissance toward Richmond, which lasted four days, and in the course of which a lively engagement occurred. In this reconnoissance a company of sharpshooters which had been selected from the regiment did excellent service.

The regiment was engaged in the battle of Fair Oaks, which occurred on the 31st of May, and out of 249 lost 125 killed and wounded, and four prisoners. Among the wounded officers were Captains Davis, Lennard and Chamberlain, and Lieutenants Weidensaul and Carskaden.

While the battle at Gaines's Mill was in progress, the 52nd, with other regiments of the brigade, was guarding the bridge across the Chickahominy; the men were often standing waist deep in the water of the swamp, and this duty continued during several consecutive days. Soon afterward the regiment retired with the army to Harrison's Landing, and on the 20th of August to Yorktown, where circumstances detained the brigade to which it was attached while a large part of the army went to the support of General Pope. While occupying the fortifications at Yorktown the men were drilled in heavy artillery tactics.

In December the 52nd, with other troops, went to Beaufort, and thence in the latter part of January, 1863, to Port Royal, S. C. From there in April, 1863, it went on a transport up the North Edisto, to co-operate in an attack on the city of Charleston. The attack failed, and the regiment, after drifting among the Sea islands some days and passing an uncomfortable night at sea, landed at Beaufort. On the 11th of July it moved to Folly island, and on the 9th went up the Stono river with another regiment to make a diversion in favor of the attack on Morris island. It landed at James island at midnight, and in the morning attacked and drove in the pickets and cavalry of the enemy. The rebel force on the island was reinforced, and on the 16th an attack was made by the enemy. On the night of the 17th the island was evacuated, and the 52nd returned to Folly island. The regiment participated in the siege of Fort Wagner during the perilous forty or fifty days that it lasted; when preparations were made for the final assault. It was formed ready to pass the fort and attack Fort Gregg, when intelligence was received that the works and the island were evacuated. During the operations against this fort the regiment suffered severely, but no exact record of its casualties can be given.

In December many of the men in the regiment re-enlisted, and were granted a veteran furlough. When they returned the regiment was recruited to the maximum and newly armed and equipped. It remained at Hilton Head till the 20th of May, 1864, during which time it made occasional expeditions among the Sea islands.

On the morning of the 4th of July the duty of surprising and taking Fort Johnson in the badly planned attempt on the rebel works at Charleston harbor was assigned to the 52nd. Accordingly, just at daybreak, one hundred and twenty-five men, under the command of Colonel Hoyt, landed, took a two-gun battery, rushed forward, scaled the parapet of the fort and entered the works. Failing to receive the support which they expected, they were overpowered by superior numbers and made prisoners. Seven of the assaulting party were killed and sixteen wounded. Of the balance, who were made prisoners, upwards of fifty died at Andersonville and Columbia, and the officers, after a period of confinement at Macon, were transferred to Charleston and placed under the fire of the Union batteries on Morris island. During the summer and autumn of 1864 the balance of the regiment was on Morris island, where the men did duty as heavy artillery.

During the winter of 1864-5 they were engaged in picketing the harbor in boats; a duty that was anything but enviable by reason of the exposures and hardships which it involved. February 18th, 1865, a boat crew under the command of Major Hennesy rowed across the harbor and landed near Fort Sumter. All was silent, and as the party cautiously entered the ruins they were not challenged. The fort was deserted, and they unfurled over it the flag of the 52nd regiment. The party at once proceeded to the city, which they entered before the last of the rebel soldiers had evacuated it.

Captain R. W. Bannahan, of Tunkhannock, and Lieutenant T. M. Burr, of Meshoppen, were of this party. The former was left in command of the party that garrisoned the fort.

The regiment joined the army of General Sherman as it marched north after crossing Georgia, and was with him when the rebel General Johnston surrendered. A week later it returned to Harrisburg, where on the 12th of July, 1865, it was mustered out the service.

The 52nd was composed of men who entered the service for three years. Those who remained in the regiment to the close of the war were mustered out July 12th, 1865, except members of Company A, who were mustered out three days later. Where a date immediately follows the name of a man in the subjoined list, it is the date of his being mustered in. Companies A, H and I were recruited in Luzerne county, the first at Wilkes-Barre; Company B in Wyoming county; Company F in Luzerne and Bradford, and Company K in Luzerne and Schuylkill.

CHAPTER XX.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—HISTORY OF THE FIFTY-THIRD REGIMENT.

HIS regiment was recruited in different portions of the State from August to November, 1861. During the latter month it moved to Washington and thence to Alexandria, where it was assigned to General French's brigade. During the winter of 1861-2 it remained at this place, perfecting itself in drill and discipline.

In the spring of 1862 it advanced with the army of the Potomac to Manassas, Warrenton Junction, and finally to the Peninsula. It was in the reserve during the siege of Yorktown. In May it went to the Chickahominy, and on the 1st of June was engaged at Fair Oaks, where it lost, in killed, wounded and missing, ninety-six men. It was engaged at Garner's Mill in the latter part of the month, and during the "change of base" it was with its brigade the rear of the rear guard, and was actively engaged at Peach Orchard. It was present, though not actively engaged, at Malvern Hill. It arrived at Alexandria too late to participate in the second battle of Bull Run, but it moved forward and assisted to cover the retreat of Pope's army. While thus engaged it became separated from its brigade, but escaped capture by a skillful manœuvre.

In September it advanced into Maryland and was among the reserves at the battle of South Mountain. During the succeeding two or three days it was skirmishing with the enemy's cavalry, and at the battle of Antietam it was hotly engaged and lost twenty-eight in killed and wounded. It forded the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, and camped on Bolivar Heights, whence it moved on the 30th of October across the Shenandoah and through Loudon valley, skirmished with the enemy at Snicker's Gap, and arrived at Warrenton November 9th. Thence it proceeded to Falmouth, and was engaged in the battle of Fredericksburg, where it lost in killed and wounded one hundred and fifty-eight out of two hundred and eighty-three who went into the battle. It was subsequently detailed to bury the dead under a flag of truce, in which melancholy duty it was engaged during two days.

It passed the winter at Falmouth, and on the 28th of April, 1863, went on the Chancellorsville campaign, during which it was engaged three days. It returned to its camp at Falmouth, whence on the 14th of June it marched on the Gettysburg campaign. At that battle it made a gallant charge in the face of a galling fire and drove a rebel battery from its position. Out of one hundred and twenty-four men who went into the fight, six were killed, sixty-seven wounded and six missing. It afterward encountered the foe at Rappahannock Station and at Bristoe, and went into winter quarters in December at Stevensburg, where the men re-enlisted and received a veteran furlough.

Recruited and refreshed the regiment broke camp on the 4th of May, crossed the Rapidan and engaged the enemy on the 5th, the 6th and the 9th. It moved to Spottsylvania Court-house, where it was engaged in the most brilliant charge of the campaign—a charge in which an entire division of the enemy was captured. It marched thence to Cold Harbor, where it was engaged and suffered severely. On the 16th of June it arrived in front of Petersburg and was engaged in a charge on the enemy's works, in which it lost nearly twenty men. From the latter part of June till the 21st of August it was employed in skirmishing on both sides of the James. It then marched to the Weldon railroad, where it again met the enemy.

In the autumn and winter of 1864 the regiment was on severe duty at the siege of Petersburg.

It went on its last campaign on the 28th of March, 1865, and was engaged at Boydton Plank Road and at Five Forks, and it assisted in capturing the enemy's wagon trains at Deep creek. It was present at the surrender of the rebel army, participated in the grand review, and on the 30th of June, 1865, was mustered out of the service.

Besides its share in the regimental staff of the 53d. Luzerne county furnished the material for Company F. In the following lists the first date gives the time the soldier was mustered into service. Where the time he was mustered out is not given it is understood to have been June 30th, 1865, unless some other disposition is noted.

CHAPTER XXI.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—HISTORIES OF THE FIFTY-SIXTH, FIFTY-SEVENTH AND FIFTY-EIGHTH REGIMENTS.

WHEN the 56th regiment left Camp Curtin, March 8th, 1862, for Washington, it had only eight and one-half companies, of which Company G was from Luzerne county. On the 27th it embarked for Acquia Landing, where it arrived the next day. It was engaged till May 10th repairing the track and landing of the Fredericksburg and Richmond Railroad. In the latter part of May it went forward on the campaign of 1862, and was first engaged at Gainesville on the 29th of August. It was engaged in the second battle of Bull Run as a support to other troops. It marched with the army to South Mountain, where it was engaged with the brigade of General Doubleday, of which it was a part, and in this action its loss was severe. It took part in the battle of Antietam, but in this action it did not suffer severely. On the 2nd of November it was again in action, at Union, where it lost five killed and ten wounded. Although under fire at the battle of Fredericksburg, it was not actively engaged and suffered no loss. It went into winter quarters at Pratt's Landing on the 28th of December, and with the exception of the "mud march," in which it participated, remained there till the latter part of April, 1863.

At the battle of Chancellorsville the 56th, which then numbered 21 officers and 289 enlisted men, was deployed as skirmishers to cover the crossing of a party for the purpose of dislodging the enemy's sharpshooters. It was not otherwise actively engaged, but in this service it lost 2 killed and 7 wounded. It was again under fire at Brandy Station.

At the battle of Gettysburg the 56th was the first that fired, and thus the battle was opened by this regiment. It was closely engaged during both days and its losses amounted to about ten killed, sixty-five wounded and eighty missing. In November at Mine Run the regiment was charged with the duty of guarding and afterward destroying a bridge, which it accomplished with the loss of five men wounded. In March, 1864, a portion of the regiment, having re-enlisted, were granted a veteran furlough.

On their return they entered upon the memorable campaign of the Wilderness, and were engaged on the 5th and 6th of May, in the first of which encounters lieutenant Miller, of Company G, was killed. The regiment fought again at Laurel Hill, at Bloody Angle on the 11th, and at Jericho ford on the 21st. It was engaged in heavy skirmishing on the 25th and was in the action at Bethesda Church on the 30th. From this time till the explosion of the mine at Petersburg the regiment shared the fortunes and vicissitudes of the army and was frequently in action. August 18th it was engaged at Yellow House, on the Weldon railroad, and captured a battle-flag; and the next day was in action with its brigade, when the enemy were driven from their works, leaving 50 killed, three battle-flags and 300 prisoners. It was engaged at Hatcher's Run in October, and again at the same place on the 5th and 6th of February, 1865. It shared the honors and hardships of the final campaign and was mustered out at Philadelphia July 1st, 1865.

Below will be found the record of Company G of the 56th. The dates of muster-in appear in connection with the names. Where nothing is said to the contrary the men were mustered out July 1st, 1865. We give also a synopsis of the record of the FIFTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT.

On the 14th of December, 1861, this regiment moved to Washington, and in February, 1862, it joined the Army of the Potomac. It was at the siege of Yorktown, where it had one man killed and five wounded, and where the health of the rest suffered greatly from malaria. While before Yorktown the regiment was in a slight engagement. It was engaged at Fair Oaks, where it lost seven killed and forty-nine wounded. It was again in action at Charles City Cross Roads, where it lost seven killed and fifty-six wounded. At Malvern Hill it was also in action, and lost two killed and eight wounded. On the 30th of August it was engaged at the second battle of Bull Run, and lost three wounded.

Four companies of the 57th were sent after the battle of Chantilly under a flag of truce to bring away the body of General Kearney, who was killed in that action. In the battle of Fredericksburg the regiment lost 21 killed, 76 wounded and 78 missing. At the battle of Chancellorsville it lost 13 killed, 48 wounded and 23 missing. It was engaged both days at Gettysburg and lost 12 killed, 45 wounded and 47 missing. It was also engaged at Auburn Creek, Kelly's Ford and Locust Grove, suffering some loss in each engagement.

A large portion of the regiment re-enlisted and received a veteran furlough in January, 1864.

In May they were engaged between Chancellorsville and Spottsylvania, where they lost heavily. From the 12th of May to the 14th of June they were often in action, with some loss.

The regiment went to the front of Petersburg, where it remained till October, most of the time at the front and once sharply engaged. In that month it was in action at Hatcher's Run, and again on the 5th of the following February. It was frequently engaged afterward and participated in the movements which resulted in the capture of Richmond and the surrender of Lee's army. It was mustered out at Alexandria, Va., June 29th, 1865.

This regiment included one company—A—recruited in Wyoming and Susquehanna counties. The best obtainable record of this company is given below. The first date is that of muster-in. Most of the men were mustered out June 29th, 1865, and that date is to be understood when none is given.

FIFTY-EIGHTH REGIMENT.

Of this regiment a portion of Company I was from Luzerne county. It was organized in February, 1862, by the consolidation of parts of two regiments that were partly full. The regiment left Philadelphia March 8th, 1862, for Fortress Monroe. May 10th, with other troops, the 58th embarked for Norfolk, debarking at Ocean View and marching to the city, which was found deserted. It soon afterward went to Portsmouth, where it engaged in guard, picket and fatigue duty, occasionally going on expeditions in which it was engaged in skirmishes.

January 5th, 1863, it sailed for Beaufort, N. C., where it arrived on the following day and camped eight miles west of Newbern. While there it encountered occasional scouting parties of the enemy, and finally, on the 12th of February, the regiment went in search of the camp of these scouts, which it found, surprised, routed and destroyed. Several skirmishes and slight battles occurred in the vicinity. In May the regiment marched to Kinston with the 25th Mass. and captured the works there and 175 prisoners. Soon afterward a battle was fought at Bachelor's Creek, and Colonel Jones of the 58th was killed. In June the regiment went to Washington, N. C., and while there occasional skirmishes and minor battles took place.

In the latter part of April, 1864, the regiment went to Fortress Monroe; thence to Yorktown, and from there via Bermuda Hundred to the vicinity of Petersburg On the 9th of May, in an encounter with the enemy, the 58th lost 20 killed and wounded. It was not engaged again south of the James. At Cold Harbor it was twice in action, losing heavily. In September the regiment participated in an assault on Fort Harrison, in which, out of 9 officers and 228 men, 6 officers and 128 men were killed or wounded. The same day they assaulted another fort and spiked its guns, and the next repulsed with terrible slaughter an attack on Fort Harrison. The regiment was twice afterward in action without casualties. It was also engaged in guard and picket duty, building fortifications, slashing timber, digging rifle pits, etc. It was in the final campaign and was afterward under the orders of the Freedmen's Bureau. It was not mustered out till January, 1866.

While the 58th was chiefly recruited at Philadelphia, Company I contained a representation from Luzerne, and we give a roll of that company, although it was partly raised in Northumberland county. Following the name of each man is the date when he was mustered in. Unless otherwise stated he was mustered out with the regiment.

CHAPTER XXII.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—HISTORIES OF THE SIXTY-FIRST AND SIXTY-FOURTH REGIMENTS.

THE 61st regiment was organized in August, 1861. So pressing was the demand for troops that within a month it was ordered to the field, only 600 strong. It remained within the defenses of Washington during the succeeding autumn and winter, but its ranks were not filled by recruits. In February, 1862, it was ordered to Bladensburg, and four companies were transferred to it.

On the 30th of March it arrived by transport at Fortress Monroe and went forward to Yorktown. On the evacuation of that place it went to Williamsburg and thence up the Peninsula. The monotony of the march was relieved by occasional reconnoissances, and on the 30th of May it arrived at Fair Oaks, where it was engaged. Space will not permit a detail of the positions in which the 61st was placed in this fight; but when it is known that eleven officers (including all the field officers) and sixty-nine men were killed, wounded or missing, the severity of the engagement will be appreciated.

It remained encamped near the old battle ground, occasionally skirmishing, for about a month, when the retreat from the Chickahominy took place. At Charles City Cross Roads, Turkey Bend and Malvern Hill, it was engaged, but did not suffer severely, its losses being only two officers and thirty-two men. It remained in camp near Malvern Hill till August 16th, when it went to Yorktown via Charles City and Williamsburg. Early in September it went by transport to Alexandria, and thence marched at once to Chantilly, where it arrived the evening after the battle at that place. With the army it returned, crossed the Potomac and entered on the Maryland campaign. It did picket duty on the Potomac till September 17th, when it marched to the Antietam battle field, arriving in the evening after the battle. It went into camp at Downsville and remained till the last of October. It then crossed the Potomac and advanced with the army of General Burnside. It was slightly engaged in the battle of Fredericksburg and suffered but little loss. It participated in the "mud march," except which it remained in camp during the winter of 1862-3. At the battle of Chancellorsville it was fiercely engaged and lost three officers and seventy-four men.

In June the regiment started on the Gettysburg campaign. It arrived on the field during the second day of the battle and was at once engaged, though not severely. It followed and harassed one of Lee's retreating columns to Waynesboro. It then marched to White Sulphur Springs, to Culpepper, to the Rapidan, to Fairfax Courthouse and to Warrenton. It was engaged at Rappahannock Station; then went to Brandy Station, where it wintered. Its strength was increased while there by the return of absentees and by recruits; and on the 5th of May, 1864, it crossed the Rapidan, and the next day was engaged in the Wilderness, losing twelve killed and thirty wounded. On the 6th it was again in battle, with a loss of 15 killed and 40 wounded. From this time during a month the regiment was constantly employed in fighting, skirmishing, picketing, digging rifle-pits, etc. During all this time, from the crossing of the Rapidan, May 4, its losses amounted in killed, wounded and missing to 30 officers and 400 enlisted men. During the remainder of the campaign of 1864 the 61st was constantly on active duty and was twice in action. A portion of the men whose terms of service had expired were mustered out in September, and the veterans and recruits consolidated into a battalion of five companies. During Sheridan's campaign in the Shenandoah valley the battalion was engaged at Opequan or Winchester, at Fisher's Mill and at Cedar Creek.

In March, 1865, its strength was increased to 9 companies, and it became a regiment again. It was a part of the besieging force before Petersburg till the final assault, in which it participated. It was in the pursuit of Lee and fired its last shot at the enemy at Sailor's Creek. After the surrender of Lee the regiment marched to Danville, where it remained nearly a month; then returned, participated in the grand review and was mustered out June 28th, 1865.

The officers of the 61st regiment, and the members of Company D, which was recruited in Luzerne county, are named in the following lists, with a synopsis of their records. Where a date immediately follows the name of a soldier it is the time when he was mustered in. If not otherwise stated he was mustered out with the regiment June 28th, 1865. The muster-in date for most of Company D was September 2nd, 1863, and that date is to be understood where no other is given.

SIXTY-FOURTH REGIMENT (FOURTH CAV-ALRY).

This regiment was recruited in the autumn of 1861. Luzerne county was represented in the organization by Company M. During the winter of 1861-2 it was at Washington, perfecting itself in drill and discipline.

It experienced some difficulty in procuring horses, but finally succeeded by resorting to sharp practice on the government. In May, 1862, the regiment joined General

McDowell's column on the Rappahannock, and entered on picket and scout duty. Through the Peninsula campaign it was engaged in the duties which at that period of the war were assigned to cavalry. It was with the army of McClellan in the Maryland campaign of 1862, and was engaged at the battle of Antietam.

The regiment was with General Pleasanton in his pursuit of Stuart, and with the army of Burnside in the Fredericksburg campaign, and guarded the fords of the Rappahannock above the town during the battle.

After the accession of General Hooker to the command of the army the cavalry arm of the service assumed an importance it had not before possessed. Two squadrons of the 4th were engaged in the action at Kelly's Ford. In the Chancellorsville campaign the cavalry did effective service in skirmishing. The 4th did some light skirmishing at the battle of Brandy Station. It was frequently engaged and did good service in the Gettysburg campaign, and was active in the pursuit of the enemy's retreating columns. On the 12th of October, 1863, the 4th was engaged in a severe fight near Jeffersonville, Va., in which it lost in killed, wounded and prisoners about 200 men. The prisoners were taken to Richmond, and thence to Andersonville, where a large portion of them died. At Bristol and near Beverly Ford it was engaged in skirmishes.

During the winter of 1863-4 the regiment was engaged in picket and guard duty along the line of the Orange & Alexandria Railroad, and during four months suffered no casualties.

Two-thirds of the men re-enlisted and had a veteran furlough, and about the same time many recruits were received. The campaign of 1864 opened before the return of the veterans, and during the Wilderness battles the regiment was used as a support to other troops.

During the raid of Sheridan the 4th was frequently engaged in skirmishing, and in a battle within the outer defenses of Richmond was under fire some four hours. At Hawes's Shop it was engaged in a severe battle, and at Trevillian Station the regiment covered itself with glory. From White House to the James the army trains were guarded by a force of which the 4th constituted a part. At St. Mary's Church an engagement took place with a superior force, in which, though the cavalry checked the enemy and covered the retreat, it suffered severely. The 4th regiment lost eighty-seven in killed, wounded and missing. The remainder of the summer of 1864 the 4th was engaged in marching, skirmishing and picket duty.

During the siege of Petersburg the regiment was in active service, supporting infantry movements and advancing and extending lines. At Boydton Plank Road and at Hatcher's Run it was warmly engaged and did excellent service. It was also in the second raid on the Weldon railroad, where it had twelve men wounded. On its return from this raid it went into winter quarters.

In the brief but brilliant final campaign the 4th with the other cavalry was constantly active; and even on the morning of the surrender, with its division, it was about to capture a body of cavalry which it had cut off when the surrender of Lee's forces arrested hostilities. After the surrender it went to Petersburg, thence to North Carolina, returned to Petersburg and went thence to Lynchburg, where on the 1st of July, 1865, it was mustered out. In the following lists every man who is not mentioned as having in some manner fallen out by the way is supposed to have been mustered out on that day. The dates of muster-in immediately follow the names.

CHAPTER XXIII.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—THE SEVENTY-FOURTH, SEVENTY-SIXTH AND SEVENTY-SEVENTH REGIMENTS.

THE 74th was recruited in the summer of 1861, mostly in Pittsburg, though Company A was in part from Wyoming county. It went to Washington in September and soon afterward to Virginia, where it went into winter quarters at Hunter's Chapel. The winter was spent in drill and fatigue duty, and on the opening of the campaign in 1862 the regiment was sent to General Fremont's command in West Virginia. Its march thither was attended with great fatigue and much suffering. After two weeks spent in picket and fatigue duty, with insufficient subsistence, it went on a hurried march to Strasburg, where it joined in the pursuit of Stonewall Jackson. At Cross Keys it was engaged, losing 6 killed and 13 wounded. The regiment arrived at Cedar Mountain too late to participate in the battle. Thence with the army it fell back toward Manassas; in the course of which movement the 74th came upon the rear of a column of the enemy, attacked it and checked its advance.

At the battle of Groveton or second Bull Run it was engaged during the two days of the fight and lost 17. Thence it went to Washington. It was engaged in the battle of Chancellorsville, where it lost 61 men. It was again engaged at Gettysburg, where its total loss was 136.

In August it was sent with its division to the islands on the South Carolina coast, where it frequently went on expeditions and encountered the enemy. It returned to Washington in 1864. During the remainder of its term of service it was engaged in guard and picket duty in various localities. It was mustered out of the service at Clarksbury on the 29th of August, 1865.

Following is the roll of Company A. The date of muster-in follows each man's name, and the date of muster-out is August 29th, 1865, where nothing appears to the contrary.

SEVENTY-SIXTH REGIMENT.

The name which this regiment assumed was the Keystone Zouaves. The regiment was recruited in the latter part of the summer of 1861, and left for Fortress Monroe on the 19th of November of that year. After a week it sailed for Hilton Head, S. C., where it remained till the last of May, 1862. During this time eight companies went to assist in taking Fort Pulaski, at the mouth of Savannah river, but they were not engaged. From Hilton Head it went to North Edisto island; thence to St. John's island, and from thence toward Charleston, and it was engaged in the attack on that city June 16th, 1862.

In October the 76th, with other troops, went on an expedition to sever the communication between Savannah and Charleston. After an engagement, in which they were defeated, the troops returned to Hilton Head. The regiment did picket duty on the islands off the coast till July, 1863, when it went to Morris island to attack Fort Wagner. The attack was made on the 11th, but was repulsed. In this action the 76th lost 53 killed and 184 wounded. On the 18th another charge was made, in which the regiment lost 17 killed and wounded. It returned to Hilton Head, where it remained six months, doing guard, picket and scout duty.

In May, 1864, with other troops, the 76th went to Virginia and became part of the Army of the James. On the 5th of that month it embarked on transports, sailed down the York river from Yorktown, up the James river, landed at Bermuda Hundred, moved to the Weldon railroad and destroyed several miles of the track. This was done under fire, and the 76th lost in killed, wounded and missing 65 men. Fighting continued at intervals during several days. The regiment was sent to Cold Harbor in the latter part of May, and took part in the fighting there the 1st, 2nd, and 3d of June, losing very heavily. It returned and went on a reconnoissance to the Richmond and Petersburg railroad; then went to Petersburg, where it did duty during the siege with frequent casualties. It was engaged occasionally from the 14th to the 17th of August at Deep Bottom, and at Bermuda Hundred on the 24th and 25th.

For some time subsequent to this the regiment was frequently engaged in fighting and skirmishing. It was in action at Chapin's Farm, at Fort Gilmer, and Fort Harrison. In October it went on a reconnoissance and was engaged in a skirmish, with a loss of 1 killed and 12 wounded. The 76th was in the battle at the taking of Fort Fisher in January, 1865, by General Terry, and from there went to Wilmington, N. C.; and finally to Raleigh, where it did provost duty till July 18th, when it was mustered out.

Company H of the 76th was recruited in Luzerne county. The men were mustered in at the dates annexed to their names in the following lists, and when not otherwise noted were mustered out July 18th, 1865.

SEVENTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT.

Company G of this regiment was raised in Scranton, and was composed mostly of Welshmen or men of Welsh descent. The first company, H, was recruited in part in Luzerne county. It was not full, and, though it was some time with the regiment and took part in one battle, it was disbanded without pay.

Recruiting for this regiment commenced in August, and in October it moved to Louisville, Ky., and thence south on the line of the Louisville railroad to Nolin river; there it had its camp during a month; then at camp Negley; then it moved leisurely forward from camp to camp, till it arrived at Nashville in March, 1862, after the victories at Forts Henry and Donelson. The first battle was at Pittsburg Landing, April 7th, 1862, to reach which it had made a forced march, arriving while the action was in progress. In this action it lost 3 killed and 7 wounded.

It reached Corinth in the latter part of May, and on the 30th the enemy blew up his works and evacuated the place. During the ensuing summer it was engaged in marching with the army and occasionally skirmishing. In December it moved forward with the army on Murfreesboro and encountered the enemy at Stone river, and was severely engaged during three days. Its conduct at this battle was such as to elicit from General Rosecranz the compliment: "It was the banner regiment at Stone river. They never broke their ranks."

For several weeks after this battle the regiment was on guard and scout duty; then till the opening of the summer campaign of 1863 it was in camp at Murfreesboro. In June it was engaged at Liberty Gap, where it lost a third of its effective force. Among the officers killed in this action was Lieutenant W. H. Thomas, of Company G.

At the battle of Chickamauga, in September, the 77th was very heavily engaged, and all its field officers, seven line officers and 79 men fell into the hands of the enemy. In January, 1864, many of the regiment re-enlisted, and received a veteran furlough. On their return they went with Sherman on his Atlanta campaign. They were engaged during several days from the 7th of May; at Resaca, at Kinston, at New Hope church on the 25th and the three following days; again, three miles from that place, on the 4th of June; from the 19th to the 23d of the same month at Kenesaw mountain, and in the same vicinity for four days from the 24th; at Smyrna, at the Chattahoochee river, and at Peach Tree creek in the latter part of July.

During August the regiment was engaged in the investment and siege of Atlanta, and after the retirement of the enemy it was engaged at Lovejoy on the 2nd, 3d, 4th and 5th of September.

After the departure of Sherman for the sea the 77th, with other Union forces, was engaged in endeavoring to out-maneuver Hood. An action took place in the latter part of November at Franklin, in which the regiment was heavily engaged. At the defense of Nashville against Hood, in December, it was hotly engaged, and it joined in the pursuit of his flying columns, occasionally skirmishing till it reached Huntsville, Ala. This was the last of its fighting. In the spring of 1865 it was reinforced and sent to the southwest, where a hostile attitude was still maintained. After a short stay in New Orleans it marched into Texas, where it arrived in August and remained till December. It then embarked at Indianola for Philadelphia, where it was mustered out of the service on the 16th of February, 1866.

In the following lists the dates of muster into the service are given with the names. When no remark follows in the list of Company H the man was not accounted for in the adjutant general's record of the company. Those of the regimental officers and of Company G not otherwise accounted for were mustered out with the regiment.

CHAPTER XXIV.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—HISTORIES OF THE 81ST, 92ND AND 96TH REGIMENTS.

THE recruiting of the 81st regiment commenced in August, 1861, and in October it proceeded to Washington. Company H was recruited in Carbon and Luzerne counties, and Company K in Luzerne. The regiment was engaged only in police and scout duty till the 1st of March, 1862, when it took the field. During the advance to the Peninsula it was engaged mostly in fatigue duty. It built the Sumner bridge and crossed on it with its brigade, had a skirmish with the enemy and returned. At Fair Oaks, on the 31st of May, the regiment was engaged and Colonel Miller was killed. On the 25th of June, three Companies—D, H and K—were engaged in a picket fight. On the 29th the regiment was in action at Peach Orchard, and on the 30th at White Oak Swamp and Charles City Cross Roads, losing heavily. July 1st it was engaged at Malvern Hill, at which battle Lieutenant Colonel Connor was killed.

The regiment returned to Acquia creek by transports, thence to Alexandria, and to the second Bull Run battle field, but was not engaged. It was next in action at Antietam on the 17th of September, where it again lost heavily. Thence it moved to Harper's Ferry and afterwards to Warrenton. When Burnside assumed command of the army the regiment moved to Falmouth, and on the 13th of December it was engaged at Fredericksburg. In this battle Lieutenant Colonel Swain was killed and Colonel McKeen wounded. It returned to quarters at Falmouth, where it remained till the latter part of May, when it broke camp and during the month of June moved from place to place, and arrived at Gettysburg on the 1st of July, having marched thirty-eight miles the preceding day. On the 2nd and 3d it was "in the thick of the fray" and lost half of its effective strength.

During the remainder of the summer it was in Virginia with the second corps, to which it was attached, and went into winter quarters near Stevensburg. In January a portion of the men re-ep-listed and received a veteran furlough, and its ranks were recruited. It took the field in the spring of 1864. During three days early in May the regiment was engaged at the battle of the Wilderness, and on the 12th at Spottsylvania. It was again engaged at Cold Harbor on the 3d of June, and its colonel was killed there. It participated in the siege of Petersburg, and was engaged there and at Strawberry Plains, Ream's Station and Deep Bottom, in all of which actions it sustained its character for bravery. It remained in front of Petersburg during the winter of 1864-5, and participated in the campaign of the next spring. It was frequently engaged, but did not suffer severe loss except at Farmville, on the 7th of April, two days before the surrender of Lee. This concluded its fighting. It returned to the vicinity of Washington and was mustered out on the 29th of June.

Its losses and casualties during its term of service were: Field and staff officers, 2 from disease, 1 prisoner, 5 wounded and 4 killed; line officers, 2 prisoners, 40 wounded and 14 killed; enlisted men, 79 deaths from disease, 152 prisoners, 516 wounded and 201 killed.

NINETY-SECOND REGIMENT (NINTH CAV-ALRY).

This organization, which at first was called the Lochiel Cavalry, was recruited during the summer of 1861. It consisted of twelve companies, of which Company D was recruited in Luzerne, and Companies K and L were composed in part of men from that county. Its colonel, E. C. Williams, of Harrisburg, was a veteran of the Mexican war. Leaving on the 20th of November, the regiment moved via Pittsburg to Louisville, Ky.; reported to General Buell and went into camp at Jeffersonville, Ind. By severe drill and discipline the men had become fitted for the field by the next January, and accordingly the regiment was ordered to the front on Greene river. When the army advanced against Johnston this regiment remained in Kentucky by request of the Legislature and citizens.

In March, 1862, it went to Tennessee, where its three battalions were stationed at different points, and the third battalion first met the enemy on the 4th of May, at Lebanon, where a brilliant victory was achieved over Morgan. It again attacked and beat him on the 14th of the same month, at Spring Creek. It was engaged at Moore's Hill on the 6th of June, and at Tompkinsville on the 9th of July.

In August the battalions were united, and the regiment was engaged in scouting and protecting the people in Kentucky against Morgan's guerillas. It had several encounters with the enemy during the retreat of the Union army from Richmond, Ky. Afterward, at the battle of Perryville, it did excellent service, losing ten killed and twenty-seven wounded. For its gallantry in this action it was complimented by General Buell. It received fresh horses, and in December went on a raid in Tennessee to destroy railroad communication with Richmond. After crossing the mountains and swimming rivers it reached the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, vanquished the defending forces, and destroyed the bridges at Watauga and Holston rivers, and returned to Kentucky, reaching Nicholasville January 13, 1863, two-thirds of the men being dismounted. It went to Louisville; thence to Nashville, where it was remounted. In February it went to Franklin, where with about three hundred Michigan cavalry it confronted a large rebel force during more than two weeks, making various attacks daily and thus deceiving the enemy concerning the strength of the opposing force; and finally, when a division of Union troops was captured at Thompson's Station it brought back to Franklin the baggage train, artillery and wounded of the army and more than two hundred prisoners.

Its next campaign was against Bragg in Tennessee, and it was engaged at Rover, Middleton, Shelbyville, Elk river, Cowan, Lafayette, Ga., and at Chickamauga. For its gallant conduct at this battle it was complimented by General Thomas. During the winter of 1863 and 1864 it did duty in East Tennessee, and was in action at Danbridge, New Market, Mossy Creek and Fair Garden. It re-enlisted, received a furlough, was recruited to full strength, and returned to the field in May, 1864. While waiting at Louisville for horses and arms, the regiment, armed with common muskets and mounted on horses seized for the purpose, went against Morgan and defeated his scheme for cutting communication between Sherman and his base of supplies.

In September it went to Chattanooga, and thence across the mountain to Murfreesboro and Readyville where it attacked and defeated a portion of the rebel Wheeler's command, taking about three hundred. The enemy was pursued and finally driven to the mountains. The regiment joined the army of Sherman, and on the 14th of November started with it on its march to the sea, under the command of General Kilpatrick. On the 16th it was in action at Lovejoy's Station. It was afterward during this march engaged at Macon, Bear Creek, Duanesboro and Buckhead Creek, in all of which the enemy's force, though superior, was beaten. After reaching Savannah, the cavalry in January, 1865, started through the Carolinas, and in its progress was engaged near Aiken, and at Black Stake's Station in South Carolina, and at Averysboro, Bentonville,—near Raleigh,—Hillsboro and Morrisville. This concluded the fighting of the war. The 9th had the honor of furnishing an escort for General Sherman when he went to negotiate with Johnston the terms of surrender.

The following lists of portions of this regiment in which Luzerne county was represented contain (immediately after the names) the dates of muster-in and subsequent records of the men here enrolled. Each man, unless otherwise stated, was mustered out with his regiment or company July 18th, 1865.

NINETY-SIXTH REGIMENT.

The nucleus of this regiment was the National Light Infantry of Pottsville, which was one of the first companies to reach the national capital on the breaking out of the Rebellion.

November 8th, 1861, it was moved to Washington. On the 25th of the same month it crossed the Potomac, and December 27th went into winter quarters. The next spring, after two or three short marches, it went with its division into the Peninsula. Its first engagement was at West Point, where it assisted in dislodging a rebel force from the woods. Up to the opening of the Seven-Day battle, late in June, the regiment was engaged in picket and fatigue duty. During these fights it was frequently closely engaged and in one of them—that of Gaines's Mill—it lost heavily.

In August it returned to Alexandria, and went thence to Bull Run and finally to South Mountain, where on the 14th of September it was engaged at Crampton's Gap so severely that its loss was 20 killed and 85 wounded out of 400.

It was again engaged at Antietam, September 17th, but suffered only slightly. It manœuvred with the army through the Fredericksburg campaign, but was only slightly engaged in the battle. Through the winter of 1862-3 it went on the mud march and did provost and fatigue duty. At Chancellorsville it was engaged, losing in killed, wounded and missing 93. Early in June it went forward on the Gettysburg campaign, and it was engaged in the battle but not severely. It took part in the pursuit of the retreating foe, occasionally skirmishing. During the winter of 1863-4 it was in camp on the Rappahannock. In May, 1864, it took the field at the battle of the Wilderness, where it skirmished during five days and finally in a fierce charge suffered severely. It was again actively engaged near Spottsylvania, and in this series of engagements it lost in killed, wounded and missing 185. It was engaged at Cold Harbor, and took part in the siege of Petersburg and the raid on the Weldon railroad. It returned to Washington, went in pursuit of Early, participated in the Shenandoah Valley campaign, and at the expiration of its term of service, September 22nd, 1864, it was mustered out.

Company E of this regiment was partially recruited in Luzerne county, and we therefore give a record of that company, dates of muster immediately following the names.

CHAPTER XXV.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—THE 107TH, 108TH, 132ND, 136TH AND 142ND REGIMENTS.

THE 107th regiment, in which Luzerne county was represented, was recruited during the autumn of 1861 and the ensuing winter. Its organization was completed in March, 1862, and on the 9th of that month it went to Washington. In April it crossed the Potomac, in May went forward toward Manassas, then through Thoroughfare Gap to Front Royal, then in July to the vicinity of Manassas. It was the first under fire at the Rappahannock, and first engaged on the second day in the second Bull Run battle, in which its loss was 125 killed, wounded and prisoners. It was next in action at South Mountain, where it made a brilliant charge on the evening of the 14th of September.

On the 17th, at Antietam, it was engaged in the "corn-field," and lost 19 killed and 45 wounded out of 190 engaged. It arrived at Brooks Station in October. It was engaged at the battle of Fredericksburg in December, losing 4 killed and 48 wounded and prisoners. It was inactive during the winter, except in the mud campaign.

At the battle of Chancellorsville the 107th was present but not actively engaged. At Gettysburg it was in action and suffered severely. It participated in the pursuit of Lee's army and the subsequent advance to Mine Run, but was not engaged till it arrived at that stream.

It received its veteran furlough on the 1st of April, 1864, more than a month after its re-enlistment. On its return it came under fire at Spottsylvania, and until it reached the James it was almost daily engaged.

After crossing the James, about the middle of June, 1864, it went to Petersburg, and it was engaged in the operations of the siege during the entire period of its continuance. It was often engaged, suffering severely at times and in one fight losing 6 officers and 145 men. Space will not permit a detail of all its engagements, marches and campaigns, of its changes from one command to another, and of the changes and promotions among its officers. It continued with the army of the James till the surrender of Lee at Appomattox on the 9th of April, 1865; participated in the grand review at Washington on the 23d of May, and was mustered out July 13th, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTH REGIMENT (ELEVENTH CAVALRY).

The 11th cavalry, which was recruited in August and September 1861, by Colonel Josiah Harlan, of Philadelphia, from several States, was chiefly raised in Pennsylvania, and Company K, was mostly enlisted in the northern part of Lackawanna county. Samuel P. Spear was the first lieutenant colonel of the regiment and succeeded Colonel Harlan, who was mustered out August 19th, 1862; and who was himself succeeded by Major George Stetzel. Samuel Wetherell and Noah M. Runyan were the other majors. The regiment consisted of 41 officers and 1,089 enlisted men.

It marched from Washington October 16th, 1861, to Camp Palmer, near Bell's Cross Roads, Va., where it was drilled and instructed. In the middle of November it was transferred to Fortress Monroe, where it spent six months in drilling and picketing. The regiment made the Peninsula campaign under McClellan, scouting and picketing, and remained nearly a year in the neighborhood of Suffolk, reconnoitering and picketing.

On the 2nd of December a battalion under Major Stratton in a sabre charge at Beaver Dam Church routed a superior force of rebel cavalry, took 25 prisoners and recaptured a section of a rocket battery which McClellan had lost; the sabre was thereafter constantly used with success.

January 30th, 1863, the 11th fought at Deserted House, and two battalions under Majors Stratton and Cornog charged the enemy's works at Franklin, March 17th. The regiment was engaged in the defense of Suffolk against Longstreet, and captured many prisoners during the pursuit which followed the raising of the siege.

In the latter part of June, 1863, this regiment took 125 prisoners in the capture of rebel works, near Hanover Court-house. Other raids followed. In July Colonel Spear, having been put in command of the brigade, was succeeded as colonel by Major Wetherell, and he a month later by Lieutenant Colonel Stetzel. A raid against the Weldon railroad was made in July, and several in the ensuing autumn to the Blackwater and the northeastern part of North Carolina. Four hundred of the men re-enlisted for three years.

Early in 1864 the 11th was stationed at Williamsburg, and made several raids, accompanying that of General Wistar against Richmond. In May the 11th again fell upon the Weldon railroad, drove a rebel infantry regiment from the Nottoway bridge, burned the bridge, and the same day beat the enemy at Jewett's Station. The Danville and South Side railroads were immediately afterward raided and great loss inflicted. The 11th participated conspicuously in attacks on Petersburg in June, and then again raided the railroads entering that city and Richmond. The enemy was encountered in force at Stony Creek and Ream's Station, and in the latter battle the 11th lost 130 killed, wounded and missing.

From the middle of July Major Stratton commanded the regiment. During the rest of the war it was actively engaged under Sheridan in the operations against Richmond and the pursuit and capture of Lee's army, suffering considerable loss, especially at Five Forks, April 1st, 1865, where it greatly distinguished itself. On the 12th it occupied Lynchburg, and on the 24th entered Richmond. In these later operations it took possession of 157 cannon and other material of war in proportion. After doing detached duty in Virginia during the summer it was mustered out at camp near Manchester, Aug.

13th, 1865. On the 17th it reached Philadelphia, and was disbanded and paid.

We append a roll of Company K. The period of enlistment was three years unless otherwise mentioned, and the prevailing date of muster-in was Aug. 31st, 1861. That date will therefore be understood where no other is given. In other cases the first date given is that of muster-in. Where not otherwise noted each man was mustered out with the company, August 13th, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SECOND REGIMENT.

This regiment was recruited for a term of nine months. Company B was raised in Wyoming county, and Companies I and K in Luzerne. The field officers were: Colonel, Richard A. Oakford, of Luzerne; lieutenant colonel, Vincent M. Wilcox, also of Luzerne, and major, Charles Albright, of Carbon county. On the 19th of August, 1862, a few days after the organization was completed, it moved to the field, and at once commenced drilling. It marched from Rockville, Md., on the 2nd of September, and continued its march with the army, arriving at South Mountain after the close of the battle.

It was first engaged at Antietam, on the 17th of September; maintained its position under a galling fire four hours, and when relieved retired in good order—very creditable behavior for fresh troops. The loss of the regiment in this action was thirty killed, one hundred and fourteen wounded and eight missing. Colonel Oakford was among the killed. The regiment moved to Harper's Ferry after the battle, participated in two reconnoissances while encamped on Bolivar Heights, and moved with the army toward Fredericksburg on the last of October. From Falmouth, where it first encamped, it went to Belle Plain, and after a month returned to Falmouth. In the battle of Fredericksburg it was actively engaged and participated in a charge on Mary's Heights, where it displayed a coolness and bravery that would have done honor to veterans. Out of 340 men who went into action, the regiment lost 140.

At the battle of Chancellorsville, though the term of a portion of the men had expired, all took part in the action. On the third day of the battle the regiment made a gallant bayonet charge in which a number of prisoners were taken. Its loss in this action was about 50. It was relieved from duty on the expiration of the term of service, and was mustered out on the 24th of May, 1863. It is said two-thirds of the men entered the service again.

Below are rolls of the regimental officers of the 132nd and of Companies B, I and K, in which this county was represented. In the case of the regimental staff the dates of muster in follow the names of the officers. Except a very few men, the members of Company B were mustered-in on the 11th, those of Company I on the 15th and those of Company K on the 14th of August, 1862.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SIXTH REGIMENT.

This regiment, of which Company B was recruited in Luzerne and Tioga counties, was organized for nine months' service.

It arrived in Washington while the second Bull Run battle was in progress, and was stationed in one of the forts which defended the capital, and afterward it was posted in detachments along these defences. In the latter part of September it moved to Frederick, Md., and afterward to Sharpsburg. During the time it remained in Maryland it was engaged in drill and picket duty. It then crossed into Virginia and encamped successively at Warrenton, Brooks Station, White Oak Church and Falmouth.

At the battle of Fredericksburg it took part in the unequal contest of the first corps against many times its number of the enemy. Its loss in this battle was 140 killed, wounded and missing.

After this battle it remained in camp near Falmouth, excepting of course during the mud campaign, till the movement on Chancellorsville. It was engaged in this battle, but did not suffer as severely as at Fredericksburg. It returned to its old camp, where it remained till the end of its term of service; then returned to Pennsylvania, and was mustered out May 29th, 1863.

The dates following the names in the list below show the time when each man was mustered into the service. Where none is given August 16th, 1862, is to be understood. The date of muster out, where not given, is May 29th, 1863.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SECOND REGIMENT.

On the 1st of September, 1862, the organization of this regiment was effected. Company K was from Luzerne county, which was also represented among the field officers by Major John Bradley.

On the day after its organization it moved to Washington, and engaged for a time in fatigue duty. It then moved to Frederick, Md., where it was on duty till October. Thence it went with the 3d division of the 1st corps, to which it was attached, to Warrenton and from there to Brooks Station, and in December to Fredericksburg, where it was heavily engaged, as may be known from its losses, which were 250 out of 550 that went into the action. Major Bradley was mortally wounded. After this battle it remained at Belle Plain (excepting the mud march) till the reorganization of the army by General Hooker. In April it moved forward to Chancellorsville, where it was under fire though not heavily engaged.

After this battle it returned to camp and remained till the opening of the Gettysburg campaign. It moved forward with the army and participated in this action, suffering a loss in killed, wounded, missing and prisoners of 225. After this battle came two months of inactivity, then two more of marching and countermarching, and the regiment went into winter quarters at Culpepper.

Early in May, 1864, the regiment moved forward and engaged in the Wilderness campaign. Then followed Laurel Hill, Spottsylvania, North Anna, Bethesda Church and Tolopotomy creek. In June it moved to Cold Harbor; then to the James, which it crossed and arrived before Petersburg on the 16th. During the remainder of its term of service it was engaged in the operations of the siege, building forts and fortifications, raiding and fighting till the surrender of Lee at Appomattox. It was mustered out at Washington on the 29th of May, 1865.

The members of Company K were mustered in at the dates following their names in the list below. If not otherwise stated they were mustered out May 29th, 1865.

CHAPTER XXVI.

LUZERNE IN THE CIVIL WAR—THE ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-THIRD REGIMENT.

COMPANIES H and K of this regiment were raised in the counties of Lycoming, Susquehanna and Wyoming, the others in Luzerne county. Their place of rendezvous was a camp about three miles from Wilkes-Barre, on the opposite side of the river, in what is known as Mill Hollow. There the regiment was organized on the 18th of October, 1862, with Edmund L. Dana as colonel, George E. Hoyt lieutenant colonel and John D. Musser major. The appointment of Colonel Dana was made without his knowledge, but his well known ability and energy of character, and the military experience which he had acquired in the Mexican war, where he commanded a company, rendered the choice a fitting one.

After a few weeks spent in drilling, the regiment moved to Harrisburg, and thence to Washington. It remained near this city, engaged in drill and fatigue duty, till February, 1863, when it went to Belle Plain and was assigned to the 2nd brigade, 3d division, 1st corps. In April, with its division, it went to a point on the Rappahanock below Fredericksburg, where it made a feint of crossing and returned. In the latter part of the same month it went to Pollock's run, where it was under fire from the opposite side of the river while fighting was going on in Chancellorsville. Thither the regiment proceeded on the 2nd of May, and on the 3d and 4th it was at times under fire. On the 8th it went into camp at Falmouth. The 1st corps was the first to reach the battle at Gettysburg, where it went into position on the 1st of July. Colonel Dana soon came in command of his brigade, and Lieutenant Colonel Musser of the regiment. The fighting was severe at the position held by the 143d, and after repeated charges on it had been made and repulsed it was compelled to fall back, which the men did doggedly and unwillingly. It was afterward related, in a foreign magazine, by an English officer, who was present with the enemy, that when the Yankee troops were compelled after an obstinate resistance to retire from this position a color bearer, who was the last of his regiment to leave the position, was seen to occasionally turn and shake his fist at the assailants; while doing so he fell, and died clinging to his standard. The rebel General Hill expressed his regret at seeing this gallant soldier fall. This color bearer was Sergeant Benjamin H. Crippen, of Company E in this regiment. The flag to which he clung in death was borne from the field by his comrades. On the 2nd and 3d the regiment was engaged, but not as heavily as on the 1st. It went into the engagement 465 strong, and lost in killed, wounded, missing and prisoners more than half that number. Among the killed were Lieutenants Lee D. Grover, Lyman R. Nicholson and Charles D. Betzinberger.

The remainder of the regiment took part in the pursuit of the rebel army into Virginia, and afterward moved to the vicinity of Bealton Station, where it was engaged in guard duty on the railroad and at a depot of stores. During the autumn of 1863 it received recruits at different times, amounting to 363 men, which gave the regiment a strength of 534.

Late in September the regiment moved with the army to the Rapidan and occupied positions successively at Raccoon Ford, Moreton's Ford and Kelly's Ford; then marched to Centerville and thence to Haymarket, where on the 9th of October it had a slight engagement, in which two men were wounded. It returned to the Rapidan and late in November was stationed at Manassas Junction, whence it went across the Rappahanock to Paoli Mills on the 5th of December, and on the 27th to Culpepper and established its winter quarters. On the 6th of February, 1864, it marched to Raccoon Ford, where it had a slight engagement, and returned the next day.

A corps reorganization took place in March and the 143d became one of the regiments of the 1st brigade 1st division 5th corps. Lieutenant Colonel Hoyt, who died in June, 1863, had been succeeded by Major Musser, and Captain Charles M. Conyngham had been made major. Early in May the regiment went to the Wilderness and was engaged in the several actions there. At these battles Colonel Dana was wounded and made prisoner, Lieutenant Colonel Musser was killed, Lieutenant Michael Keenan was mortally wounded and Captains Gordon and Little and Lieutenant Kauff taken prisoners. At Laurel Hill the regiment was in action, and for several successive days was engaged in charging and repelling assaults. In these engagements it suffered severely. Lieutenant Charles H. Riley was killed and Major Conyngham wounded. The regiment went to the North Anna, where it arrived on the 21st, and on the 23d it was engaged at Hanover Junction. It moved forward with the army, crossed the James and marched for Petersburg on the 16th of June. On the 18th, in a general advance on the enemy's works, Lieutenant E. L. Griffin was mortally wounded. During a month following this the regiment was engaged in fatigue duty, and on the 18th of August it was engaged at the taking of the Weldon railroad. About the middle of September Colonel Dana returned from his imprisonment and resumed command of his regiment, which was about the same time assigned to the 3d division, under General Crawford. On the 1st of October the regiment made an expedition on the Vaughn road, and was soon afterward quartered in Fort Howard, where it remained till the latter part of the month, when it moved with its corps on Hatcher's Run. The 143d was engaged with its division in a charge on the enemy, and in skirmishing. Under the command of General Warren the corps went early in December on the Weldon raid and succeeded in effecting the destruction of about twenty miles of the railroad and its fixtures, as well as rebel stores and other property. On the return of the corps from this raid the 143d was a portion of the rear guard, and was frequently attacked by the enemy's pursuing column. This was the last active service of the regiment during that year.

Early in February, 1865, the regiment participated in a movement against the enemy at Hatcher's Run, where the rebels and the Union troops were alternately driven. Captain Gaylord was killed in this fight and the regiment suffered greatly. Soon after this the 143d, with three other regiments in the same brigade, went north. It was placed on duty at the rendezvous on Hart island, in the East river, New York, and remained there during the remainder of its term of service. It was mustered out on the 12th of June, 1865, and on its return to Wilkes-Barre was received with those marks of esteem to which its severe and efficient service in the field entitled it.

Colonel Dana had suffered severely during his imprisonment, and was one of fifty imprisoned officers who were placed under the fire of the Union artillery at the city of Charleston. After his return, though holding the rank of a colonel, he was during a long time kept in command of his brigade. The officers of that brigade drew up and subscribed a memorial to the war department protesting against such injustice, and asking that he be promoted. This paper from some cause never reached the department, but on the facts of the case becoming known through other channels he was brevetted a brigadier-general, and retained in the service on special duty till the following August.

The 143d was so nearly all raised in Luzerne and Wyoming counties that we append a roll of the entire regiment. By way of explanation it is only necessary to say that where a date immediately follows a name it indicates the time when the man was mustered in; and that each man not otherwise accounted for was mustered out June 12th, 1865:

THE good reputation which the original Bucktail regiment acquired led to the project of raising a Bucktail brigade. Recruiting was commenced in July, 1862, and within twenty days two regiments were raised, one of which was the 149th. Some of the men composing this were from Luzerne county.

Immediately after its organization this regiment was ordered to Washington, where it remained till February, 1863. It then went to the front. It was present at the battle of Chancellorsville, though not closely engaged.

In the campaign and battle of Gettysburg the 149th bore an active part, and at the engagement displayed very great coolness and valor, eliciting the highest commendations. Its losses amounted to 34 killed, 171 wounded, and 131 missing. Subsequent to this battle it was not engaged in any active operations till the opening of the campaign of 1864. During the winter it was strengthened by recruits, and in May it left its winter quarters and moved forward to the Wilderness. There it lost 15 killed, 29 wounded, and 92 prisoners.

After leaving the scene of these battles it was engaged at Laurel Hill, Spottsylvania, North Anna and Bethesda Church. June 16th it crossed the James, and was engaged before Petersburg on the 18th. Up to this time the losses of the regiment amounted to 404. In the operations of the siege of Petersburg, and the raids, marches and fatigue duty pertaining to it, the 149th was engaged and was frequently in action. On the 9th of February, 1865, it was with other troops sent to Elmira, N. Y., where it was in charge of the rebel prisoners' camp till the end of its term of service. It was mustered out on the 29th of June, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FIRST REGIMENT (SIXTEENTH CAVALRY).

Some of the men composing this regiment were recruited in Wyoming county. On the 30th of November, 1862, the regiment, mounted and equipped, went to the vicinity of Washington, where it remained till early in January, 1863, when it went to the front near Falmouth and was engaged during the winter in guard and picket duty. It was first in action March 17th, at Kelly's Ford. In the spring of 1863 it entered on active duty, which with cavalry consists of raiding, scouting, skirmishing, marching and counter-marching, and in general those operations where celerity of movement is requisite.

It attended the army on its march toward Chancellorsville, and again on the Gettysburg campaign, and was frequently engaged, but in these battles the heaviest fighting was done by the infantry. In the pursuit after the battle of Gettysburg the 16th was active. During the autumn of 1863 the 16th was engaged in operations in northwestern Virginia, and during the succeeding winter went on several raids.

In the summer of 1864 the 16th was with the army of Sheridan and participated in the severe actions of his campaigns. Space will not permit an enumeration of the battles and skirmishes in which the 16th was engaged. It went into winter quarters in December near Hancock Station, and was comparatively inactive till February, 1865, when it again entered on active duty and was marching, scouting and fighting almost constantly till the surrender of Lee at Appomattox, on the 9th of April. After the surrender it returned to Petersburg, went to North Carolina, returned and was sent to Lynchburg to guard surrendered property. It was mustered out August 7, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SECOND REGIMENT (SEVENTEENTH CAVALRY.)

On the 18th of October, 1862, this regiment was organized. It entered at once on drill, and on the 25th of November it was ordered to Washington and soon afterward went to the front. In the latter part of December it arrived at Stafford Court-house, whence it was engaged in scouting during a great part of the winter of 1862-3.

At the battle of Chancellorsville this regiment, by the coolness which it displayed, contributed largely toward the prevention of a charge by "Stonewall" Jackson's force, and probably thus saved a panic on that part of the field. During the campaign that culminated in the battle of Gettysburg the Union cavalry, under General Buford, of which the 17th constituted a portion, were very active and were several times sharply engaged. At the commencement of the battle they held in check during four hours a third of the rebel army, thus enabling a portion of the Union force to take its position on the field. The 17th with the other cavalry aided in the pursuit of the retreating rebels, and harrassed them till they recrossed the Potomac.

During the fall campaign the regiment was constantly on duty and rendered effective service. This campaign terminated with the action at Mine Run, after which the 17th went into winter quarters at Culpepper.

In February, 1864, a detachment of the regiment went with General Kilpatrick on a raid against Richmond, in the course of which some railroad property was destroyed and some shells were thrown into the city.

The 17th was with General Sheridan on his raid toward Richmond, and was engaged in most of the battles and skirmishes of that expedition. It was also a part of the expedition toward Lynchburg, and in all the active operations of the spring and summer campaign it bore a part. In August the regiment went with Sheridan on his campaign in the Shenandoah valley. A history of the doings of the 17th during that campaign would be a history of the campaign itself, which cannot be given here. This regiment had the honor of furnishing an escort for General Sheridan on his famous "ride." It was quartered during the winter of 1864-5 at Winchester, occasionally sending out scouting parties and detachments against straggling parties of the enemy.

In February, 1865, the regiment went on its last campaign—that of Sheridan against the communications in the rear of Richmond. The brilliant achievements of that campaign are a portion of the history of the war, and it is only necessary to say here that from its commencement to the surrender of the rebel army the 17th bore its part gallantly. After the surrender it returned to Petersburg; then to Washington, where on the 16th of June it was mustered out. Said General Devin in a complimentary order at parting: "In five successive campaigns and over threescore engagements you have nobly sustained your part. Of the many gallant regiments from your State none has a brighter record; none has more freely shed its blood on every battle field from Gettysburg to Appomattox."

Company K of the 17th cavalry contained Luzerne county men, and a roll of its members will be found below. The first date in each man's record is the time he was mustered in; the date of muster out, if not given, is June 16th, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-THIRD REGIMENT (EIGHTEENTH CAVALRY).

Luzerne county furnished a portion of the men in this regiment, which was recruited in the latter part of 1862. It went to Bladensburg, near Washington, in December of that year, and on the 1st of January, 1863, it crossed the Potomac. In February it entered on picket and scout duty along the Potomac, opposite Washington. This region was then infested by Mosby's thieving, skulking guerillas, and picketing among them was more perilous than in full face of the rebel army.

On the 25th of June the command to which the 18th was attached crossed the Potomac and marched by way of Frederick to Middletown and to Hanover, Pa., where it was attacked on the 30th by the rebel general Stuart's column, and a sharp action ensued, in which the 18th was closely engaged. From there the command went to the field of Gettysburg, where it arrived in season to participate in the battle, in which it did excellent service.

On the 4th the command, under the intrepid and active General Kilpatrick, moved by the flank of the retreating rebel army, and at South Mountain captured a train of two hundred wagons and ambulances (which were destroyed), and a thousand prisoners. At Hagerstown the head of a retreating column was met and attacked, and two companies of the 18th that charged in the streets were nearly all lost. Kilpatrick continued to attack and harass the retreating enemy till they had crossed into Virginia. During the autumn and early in the winter the regiment was engaged in scouting and skirmishing through northeastern Virginia, and in several engagements suffered severe losses. In December it went into winter quarters at Stevensburg, and on the last of February, 1864, it went with General Kilpatrick on his raid upon Richmond; and in the summer campaign of that year it was constantly on the move. It was with Sheridan on his raids and campaigns of that year, and it especially distinguished itself at the battles of Mine Run and Winchester. At Cedar Creek, also, on the 19th of October the brigade to which it was attached did excellent service.

Late in November it went into winter quarters near Harper's Ferry. It subsequently participated in the capture of Early's forces, and afterward remained at Winchester on picket and scout duty till the surrender of Lee's army, in April, 1865. In May it went to West Virginia and remained till October 31st, when it was mustered out.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT.

The men composing this regiment were drafted in various sections of the State, and a portion were from Luzerne county. It was organized on the 20th of November, 1862, and on the 3d of December was ordered to Washington. Thence it went to Newport News, and on the 7th to Suffolk, where it was engaged in fatigue duty and reconnoissances to the Blackwater. March 8th, 1863, it went to Norfolk, and was stationed at Deep Creek to watch for contraband goods and rebel mails. In the discharge of this duty some amusing incidents occurred and some valuable information was intercepted. While here the regiment went on a naval expedition, in the course of which a rebel schooner was captured. Two short marches were also made, in which some boats were destroyed and a number of prisoners taken. It returned to Washington on the 10th of July, was sent to Maryland Heights, and on the 1st of August it returned to Pennsylvania, where it was mustered out.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-EIGHTH REGIMENT.

The men of Company C in this regiment were drafted in Luzerne county. The regimental organization was effected December 2nd, 1862, and on the 5th the regiment went to Washington and on the 10th to Newport News. Thence it went to Yorktown, where it spent the winter in drill and garrison duty. In April, 1863, it went to the relief of Fort Magruder, near Williamsburg, which was threatened by the enemy. No serious attack was made. In June, with other troops, it made a reconnoissance to Charles City and Providence Ferry, destroyed rebel supplies and drove away cattle. In the latter part of June it took part in a demonstration on Richmond, under General Dix. This regiment with others went to Bolton's Bridge, on the Chickahominy, where some skirmishing was done, with but few casualties. The regiment did picket duty till the 6th of July, when it went to Williamsburg; thence to Washington and from thence to Harrisburg, where it was mustered out July 27th, 1863.

Most of the members of Company C were mustered out July 27th, 1863. All who were not are noted in the following lists as having been otherwise removed from the regiment. A large majority of the members of Company C were mustered in on the 2nd of November, 1862. Those who were not have not the date of muster-in following their names.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-FOURTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was recruited for one hundred days, in the counties of York, Bedford, Cambria, Mifflin, Dauphin, Montour, Lycoming, Luzerne, Berks and Schuylkill.

Its organization was completed on the 22nd of July, 1864, and on the same day it moved to Baltimore, where it went into camp. One company was sent in the month of September to the eastern shore of Maryland for provost duty, and the others were stationed in various parts of the city for the same purpose and to serve as guards and escorts for recruits and prisoners. At the expiration of its term of service it returned to Harrisburg, where it was mustered out on the 6th of November, 1864.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

AN OUTLINE OF THE GEOLOGY OF THE WYOMING COAL FIELD

F the three anthracite coal fields of the State of Pennsylvania the Wyoming basin is the largest and the most northwardly. Its length is nearly fifty-six miles, and its average width about three and a half miles, the area closely approximating 200 square miles or more than 128,000 acres. The topography of this valley differs widely from that of any other coal area. The symmetry of the circumscribing mountains; the open expanse of the central level and fertile plain, adorned as it is by the graceful curves and stretches of the Susquehanna river, with its islands and grove-fringed shores; the more extended features of round swelling and of sharp crested hills, with their picturesque intervals of woodlands and silvery streams, form a scene of beauty and attraction unsurpassed in any land, and at complete variance with the general very rugged and uninviting conditions of other coal fields. And yet this pleasing variety of form obtains here almost without any sacrifice of either quantity or quality of the vast underlying mineral treasure, or of the economics of obtaining it; and this by reason of the very general stratigraphic conformity of the coal and its accompanying rocks to these surface contours.

The term basin is here applicable only in the wider import given it by the geologist; for the outline of this valley resembles more that of a crescent shaped trough: the course of a line or chord connecting the points of the cusps is about northeast and southwest, and would lie in its whole length outside and west of the valley; and a middle point on this chord would be outside, about two and a half miles distant from the northwesterly or nearest boundary. The southwestern extremity of the basin is in Salem township, and at a distance of about a mile from the Susquehanna river, which by its sharp deflection above, at Shickshinny, has made its course athwart the field, isolating this triangular tract of coal, the base of which triangle at the river is less than half a mile in width. The mountains forming the rim of the basin in this lower section (the Wyoming and the Nanticoke) diverge with much regularity, and the coal field expands evenly, until at the distance of about thirteen and a half miles from its southwestern extremity, in the section near the town of Plymouth, it attains a width of four and a half miles. Near the city of Wilkes-Barre, which is at a distance of about seventeen miles, the width is near five miles. At the town of Pittston, distant twenty-four miles, the maximum width of five and a half miles is reached. Above this the general lines of outcropping converge so that near the city of Scranton, thirty-four miles distant, the section will not measure over four miles. Thence to the city of Carbondale the convergence continues until the breadth of the coal field is there not much more than two miles. Carbondale is distant from the southwest end of the basin about forty-eight and a half miles, and from the northeast terminus over seven miles; at which distance the lateral lines of boundary of this upper tract of the coal formation make a terminal intersection.

The principal and most direct channels of drainage of the valley are the Susquehanna and the Lackawanna rivers, with the Nanticoke creek. The Lackawanna river has its sources at the eastwardly end of the valley, where, in consequence of the more rapid rising out of the central measures of this terminal section, the trough or basin form has nearly vanished. The general course of the stream is about central through the valley, and nearly over the axis as respects the great and deepest synclinal lines of the coal deposits; and this continues down to a point near the mouth of Spring brook, where the river inclines somewhat more to the westward, while the axis leads directly forward to the Susquehanna river at the town of Pittston, more than a mile below the mouth of the Lackawanna. From the entrance of the Susquehanna river into the valley—so well marked by the rugged flanks of the Dial Knob, or Campbell's ledge—throughout its flexuous courses onward it does not at any point cross a central line of the valley expanse; and except at the city of Wilkes-Barre it does not reach such a line, its trends being altogether on the northwest side, and, it would seem, through the ancient domain of its greatest denuding ravages.

The sources of the Nanticoke creek are in the valley on an elevated plateau, about three miles above or to the northeast of the Susquehanna river, where it passes athwart the basin. This plateau, which is nearly at the height of the marginal mountains, the Wyoming and the Nanticoke, has its elevated position not in consequence either of additional strata, or of an increased thickness of strata; but, as above stated in reference to the similar conditions of the northeast end of the basin, a more rapid outrise of the interior bottom measures of the basin. The waters of this plateau divide; a portion flows by Black creek to the southwest, through this rapidly descending and rugged remnant of the valley, to the Susquehanna river; the remainder to the northeast by Nanticoke creek, which has here two branches that flow through pretty vales, formed by a central dividing ridge of the valley, called the Hog-back. At a distance of about two miles and a half a depression in the ridge admits of the union of these branches, and in a further distance of about three and a half miles these waters are discharged into the Susquehanna river opposite the town of Nanticoke, near the former residence of Colonel Washington Lee, this point being the southerly end of the line of rupture made by the river in the removal of its rocky mountain barrier for its exit from the valley.

The other principal streams of the valley are such as have their sources outside, and enter laterally through mountain gaps of greater or less extent and depth. Those of the southeast side commencing below are Lee, Leuder's, Sugar Notch and Solomon's creeks, Laurel Run, Mill creek, Spring brook, Stafford Meadow brook, Roaring brook, White Oak run, and at Carbondale Racket brook. Those of the northwest side—commencing also below—are Toby's, Abraham's and Legitt's creeks, and Fall brook, near Carbondale. Harvey's creek, which flows into the Susquehanna on this northwest side near and above the Nanticoke dam, should be considered as outside of the valley, as it is more than half a mile below the line of upper ancient rock barrier above alluded to, which stretches from the Colonel Lee house, at the mouth of Nanticoke creek, obliquely across the river to the rocks of the entrance to the Harvey mines.

The summits of the marginal mountains of the valley

vary but little in elevation throughout, being from eight to ten hundred feet above the river; the lessening in depth of the valley is not in consequence of the depression of the mountain crests, as herein above explained. The greatest depression or depth of the coal measures exists in Hanover township, near the Dundee shaft, from which the bottom of the basin rises in both directions. To the southwest the rate of rise is rapid until a near approach to the section of Nanticoke, where the upward curvature increases more gradually and is greater the nearer it approaches the southwest end of the basin. Towards the northwest the rise continues to the locality of Spring brook; beyond this, to some section above but near the city of Scranton, the change from a level would seem to be but slight; there, however, commences a much more rapid outrise of the measures, with a decided increase of deundation, so that from Carbondale on the evidences of this rapidly increase until the lowest members of the series are in view. A cross section of the basin made in general approximate outline would vary materially from that which seems to be due if the dips of the seams on the opposite mountain slopes, and the horizontal distance between them, should alone be the data considered. These mountain slopes vary much, being greater the nearer they are to the southwest end of the basin, and lessening irregularly throughout to the northeast. Assuming the average slope of the coals on the opposite mountains in the middle section, as at Wilkes-Barre, to be thirty degrees (the Ross mines in Solomon's gap and the T. Brown slope of the Wilkes-Barre Coal Company, as generally at the mines near the outcroppings along the mountain slopes, exceed thirty degrees), and that the distance between these mountain faces on a level of the flat land is four miles, the segment of a circular curve, tangent to these slopes, would at the centre of the basin have a depression of two thousand three hundred feet; whereas sufficient is now known of the united thickness of the coal strata to warrant the belief that at no point of the basin will coal be found much below half that depth. Hence it would follow that a considerable general flattening of the measures as they stretch across the basin must take place; that this occurs mainly at or near the mountain on each side is ascertained conclusively in the progress of mining in these localities. The position of the deepest point on a great synclinal curve of any given cross section of the valley may not be assignable with accuracy; but, as herein above stated in reference to the axial line along the Lackawanna valley passing through the Susquehanna river at Pittston, it can without material error be further assumed as existing nearly under a direct line from the last mentioned locality to a point in the river near the city of Wilkes-Barre, thence passing the town of Nanticoke in the low grounds about one-third of a mile to the southeast, from which its course to the southwest end of the basin does not vary much from the centre of the lower section of the valley. The lesser orographic features of the valley which lend such beautiful diversity to the scene are to the miner more than to the artist themes of highest import; for to these flexed lines of surface the hidden work below must in the main conform.

These undulations, co-existent with and arising from the same seismic forces that formed the valley, while they have been to some extent changed superficially by torrent and by time, still notably preserve the anticlinal and synclinal forms of the underlying minerals. Prof. H. D. Rogers, who made these conditions a connected study, describes them thus (Vol. 2nd, pt. 1, page 324): "The feature of widest generality connecting these anticlinal and synclinal waves, or saddles and troughs of the strata, is their remarkable approximation to parallelism throughout the entire range of the basin, irrespective of the bending course of the main valley and its including mountains. This constancy in the direction of the waves, though singularly close, is not absolute when those of distant sections of the valley are compared; there being a difference between the anticlinals of the vicinity of Wilkes-Barre and those of the Lackawanna valley of some 6° , the former ranging about north 67° east, while the latter observe an average course of north 72° or 73° east. It is, however, with few exceptions, strictly maintained among the flexures of the same district. As a natural consequence of this approximate permanency of direction of the undulations, and the curving outline of the general basin, it is only in the lower or west end of the valley that these rolls of the strata are parallel or even nearly so, within the main course of the valley. There the chief groups among the anticlinals approach to a coincidence in direction with the mountain forming the south side of the basin. Advancing northeast to the Wilkes-Barre and Pittston districts, this parallelism with the mountain border is more and more departed from, and with its progressive deflection to the northeast along the southeast side of the Lackawanna valley the obliquity of the undulations to the line of the basin and its barriers grows conspicuously greater. From the vicinity of Wilkes-Barre, and probably from further west, the whole way to Carbondale these anticlinals come forth in succession from the mountain sides of the valley at larger and larger angles as we advance toward the northeast; the anticlinal waves, broad and flat on the slope of the mountains, pointing down obliquely west in the valley, and contracting and growing steeper; while the synclinal troughs between them rise out of the central bed of the basin, flattening and shoaling up to the east, to disappear at higher levels on the same mountain sides. This arrangement is discernible in the undulations of both sides of the basin, but those of the southeast side being more numerous, of steeper flexure, and less obscured by diluvial drift, the feature is there more conspicuous. Each of the two mountain barriers of the valley, with its set of anticlinal spurs passing off from it at successively increasing angles, may be likened to a curved fish-back, one concave and the other convex, sending out its spines or rays at increasing obliquities, but in mutual parallelism with one another.

"A further general fact connected with these undulations of the coal measures, interesting for its geological bearings and not less so for its practical consequences, is the curious declining graduation observable in the sharpness of the successive undulations as we proceed from southwest to northeast along the basin. Not only does each anticlinal of the southeast side of the valley grow gentler or flatter in its dips as it slowly rises to the east, but the successive ones are fainter and fainter at the same proportionate sections of their length as we cross them obliquely in going toward the northeast. Those of all the lower or west end of the valley, from Beech Grove to Nanticoke, show inclinations as high as 45° , those between Nanticoke and Wilkes-Barre display dips exceeding 30° , and those between Wilkes-Barre and Pittston dips averaging 20° or 25° ; while following the Lackawanna division of the basin we have no longer anything approaching this last steepness of flexure, except just near the ends of the saddles, but rather a low broad waving of the rocks, growing feebler and feebler as we advance, until, passing Scranton into the district between it and Archbald, regular undulations become almost imperceptible, and are lost in the very gradual dips into the middle of the general troughs from the two borders of the valley. Accompanying this progressive smoothing-out of the waves or corrugations of the strata from the southwest toward the northeast end of the whole basin, there is a like gradual transition of declension in its external features, from sharp and narrow-crested ridges and deep hollows to rounder and gentler spurs and valleys, and along the Lackawanna to wide-topped summits, bluffs and open denuded plains.

"Other points of general structure, appertaining to the interior undulations of the main basin, have reference to the prevailing form of the anticlinals and their troughs. A main feature of the individual waves is a progressive increase of flexure, or a steepening of the dips on both sides of the anticlinals as they advance from the mountain sides, where they originated, out into the central tracts of the valley, to near their terminations, which are therefore comparatively abrupt. Remarkably clear exemplifications of this structure present themselves to any close observer of the anticlinals between Wilkes-Barre and the Lackawanna. If these be carefully traced from the east down to this district they will be seen to grow steadily sharper and sharper in their dips until they approach in their oblique course to the banks of the Susquehanna, in the neighborhood of which they nearly all subside by bluntly rounding off. In proof of this abrupt cessation, we have only to remark the contrast between the general steepness of these undulations where they are crossed slantingly by the old stage-road, or even by the plank-road, and the extreme gentleness and absolute disappearance of many at the canal, and especially at the shore of the river. The very position in the valley which the river has taken between the mouth of the Lackawanna and Wilkes-Barre is an evidence of the sudden dying-out of this southern system of anticlinals. It would seem as if the waters, in scooping the lower valley or plain within which the Susquehanna flows, had been unable to pass the succession of barriers presented to them by these ridges in the strata, and were forced to recoil by the north flanks and bold ends which the saddles protruded against them, swinging off in their rebound to follow the deflecting course of the waves of the strata towards the outlet of the drainage of the valley, the wide notch in the northern mountain-barrier at Nanticoke.

"The north or northwest side of the valley appears to have its own set of anticlinals or saddles, as already intimated; but whether these observe the same law in their oblique descent into the valley from the west, of a progressive increase of dip on both their flanks, I am not prepared at present to maintain, as the structure of this portion of the valley is largely disguised by surface drift, and as the points of many of the spurs or saddles are hid by the deep diluvium of the Wyoming and Lackawanna flats. All analogy and every theoretical consideration of the origin of this curious feature in the anticlinals would indicate, however, that the same steepening towards their terminations belongs to these waves which characterizes those coming from the opposite mountain lying east. Whether any of the flexures of the upper strata cross the basin entirely, passing west from the southern mountain to coincide with undulations proceeding east from the northern, cannot be at present known; but the general cessation of both sets towards the middle of the basin is a strong intimation of the improbability of such a condition."

The rocks beneath the coal, the upturned and ruptured edges of which form not only the near but also the outer or second surrounding eminences or mountains, do not extend in the geologic scale lower than to the base of the carboniferous epoch; and in the nomenclature of Prof. Rogers in his geology of the strata it comprises his Umbral and Vespertine series, which are the equivalents of the upper and the lower subcarboniferous groups in the geology of Europe.

The outcropping of the base of the lower group, the Vespertine, which rests upon the red sandstone of the Ponent series (the equivalent of the old red sandstone of Europe) is generally near and in some places upon the summit of the outer mountain; while the outcroppings of the several higher members of the group form the slopes of the outer mountain down to their junction with the overlying Umbral series in or towards the depression or valley between these two mountain ridges, and consist of gray sandstones, olive colored argillaceous sandstones, with occasional thin seams of carbonaceous slates and films of anthracite coal; and generally the upper member, which is found farthest down the slope, is a white silicious sandstone at base, graduating upwards into a conglomerate of white quartz pebbles where it meets the overlying Umbral red shale. The thickness of this group varies from 300 to 600 feet, decreasing from the southwest towards the northeast.

The orographic position of this series as above described applies more especially to the middle and southwest sections of the basin, where these secondary surrounding vales, by greater depth of denudation, form more distinctly an inner and an outer mountain vein. In the upper section of the valley, from Pittston north-eastward, the inclinations of the mountain slopes decrease, while there is a corresponding decrease in the thickness of the measures, both of the Vespertine and the Umbral series, especially that of the red shale of the Umbral group; and solely in consequence of this decrease of the shale is the change referred to in the orographic features of this upper section; the separation into two ridges becomes less distinct, and at points does not exist. This mountain profile as described is throughout the result of denudation, and at no points is it the result of plication or undulation.

The Umbral series, or upper subcarboniferous formation, consists mainly of red shales which, from the underlying Vespertine or lower subcarboniferous group to the seral conglomerate, form generally more than three-fourths of the entire mass of this formation, occupying the lower place in the series; in the upper section it meets and is overlaid by harder measures, fine grained sandstones of buff, gray and reddish tints, the upper measures under the conglomerate being a fine and sharp grained sandstone somewhat calcareous, of buff and of greenish gray colors—the hone-belt of Prof. Rogers. This last named deposit is of variable thickness, from five to thirty feet.

The Umbral group, like the underlying Vespertine, is variable in its thickness; at Nanticoke, in the river gap, it has a thickness of about 500 feet; at Mill Hollow, in Kingston township, about 350 feet; at Solomon's gap about 450 feet; at Cobb's gap, on the Roaring brook, its thickness is less than 450 feet. To the northeastward of this section the formation lessens rapidly in thickness, and at some points does not exist. From this group is obtained the principal amount of the flagstones so much used in the valley—a very hard, almost vitreous sandstone, of a reddish tint, very durable, and in this respect in strong contrast with others more recently introduced from a distant region.

The iron mine on a branch of the Stafford Meadow brook, for several years mined by the D. L. & W. Iron Company, the ore being smelted in Scranton, is a deposit or segregation at the base of the red shale, immediately over the Vespertine group. This ore is a concretionary carbonate of iron, of nodular form and imbedded in an ochraceous fine clay, the bed or deposit being on the average about five feet thick. It would appear to be a local formation, as it is not found in the mountain gaps either to the northeast or to the southwest. Yet in Mill Hollow, on the northwest side of the coal field in Kingston township, Doctor W. H. Brisbane opened to a deposit of ore of the same character, and in the same strategraphic position; the ore at this point has not been mined to any extent. The above mentioned hone-belt is probably a continuous deposit underlying the entire coal basin. Many tons of this stone were sent annually to Philadelphia from a quarry in the Wyoming mountain in Newport township, to be made into hones.

While the principal material of the red shale is alumina, its proportions as a constituent are quite variable, causing a gradation from a friable, soft, true shale to a very hard brittle rock, mainly in consequence of the greater or less amount of silex it may contain. It has, diffused throughout, more or less calcareous matter, and also strata or layers containing scattered nodules of calcareous matter, from a very small size to that of a pea, being of a cream color internally while the surface is stained red by the enveloping shale. The removal of these nodules by the weather where they have been in the harder rock-like strata produces a pitted or eroded appearance of the rock. At a few points, as in Solomon's gap, this calcareous deposit assumes the form of a regular limestone seam of about two feet thickness, but of sandy, lean quality.

To the prevalence of this calcareous matter is to be attributed the stable productiveness of those farms located on the outspread of this formation, as in the valleys of the Wapwallopen and the Nescopeck creeks, and in many other surrounding localities. Throughout vast areas, both on the eastern continent and also in America, the equivalents of these two formations, the Umbral and the Vespertine, particularly the former, are made up mainly of carbonate of lime. Many of the fossil vegetable forms of the overlying true carboniferous or coal period are to be found in these groups, which circumstance is the basis for including them in the scope of the carboniferous epoch.

While in our locality, as well as throughout the anthracite area generally, the lithologic characteristics of these two groups bear no apparent indication of equivalency, yet there does exist very positive evidence of complete synchronism with the upper and lower subcarboniferous series of other regions. Westward in the bituminous coal fields calcareous marls and true limestones prevail largely in the group immediately underlying the seral conglomerate, occupying the position and there representing the Umbral series. This condition prevails generally to the westward and in Virginia, extending southwestward to Alabama; a similar predominance of calcareous matter in the Umbral group is observed. It is assumed that if the calcareous matter diffused through the great mass of red shale of the anthracite coal field was concentrated, it would be found closely approximating the average amount existing in the Umbral group under the western bituminous regions, where the lime is less mixed with the accompanying shaly matter. The several members of the Vespertine and Umbral series are conspicuously presented in the gaps around the valley; especially in Solomon's gap, in the Wilkes-Barre mountain, and in Mill or Hert-zoge hollow, in the Kingston mountains.

The contact of the Umbral series with the conglomerate under the centre of the coal basin is brought to view at the Salem Company's colliery, below Shickshinny, the line of juncture being forty or fifty feet above the level of the river, on the nearly vertical escarpment there produced undoubtedly by the erosive action of the stream, which flows directly athwart the axis of the coal basin, having cut through all its measures, and to a considerable depth in the Umbral red shales. The barren coal measures of the Vespertine series have been for many years a delusion throughout the regions surrounding the coal fields. Specimens of very bright and pure coal have been presented from time to time which were obtained from rivulets and streams outside of the coal basin, and in many instances, at cost of much toil and expense, the vein has been traced out and found in places, with the normal accompaniments of slate, fireclay and rock; but in no instance around the Wyoming coal field have these beds been found more than a few inches in thickness. Professor J. P. Lesley remarks in regard to these false coal measures (which he prefers to call the Proto-carboniferous, instead of the Vespertine), as follows:

"The false coal measures, as they have been called, the coal of No. XI, the Vespertine coal of Rogers, or, as it should properly be called, the Proto-carboniferous formation, overlies the third great sandrock of the four, precisely as the black slate of No. VIII. has been said to overlie the Oriskany sandstone, and as the great coal measures will be seen to overlie the conglomerate. This was a second and more successful effort of nature for the preservation of fuel for man, whose coming was foreseen. But still the conditions were not sufficiently fulfilled over the whole area to do more than give promise of a better future. Portions only of the earth were steady enough just at the level of the sea neither to drown the vegetation nor expose its soil. One or two beds, irregular and very thin, were everywhere indeed produced, and in one region a series of such beds of which two or three are large enough to work. But even these were almost wholly ruined by succeeding earthquake undulations, which slid their floor and roof upon each other, dislocating the layers and grinding the coal to powder.

"Everywhere along the inside foot of the mountains of X., from the Catskill to their extreme south limits; and everywhere in the body of the Alleghany mountain, these thin seams have been at different times discovered, and locally noised about. Hunters, lumbermen and land agents have picked and pried into them. Lands have been sold to eastern companies upon a faith in them, but they have never paid. In the gorge of Tipton creek, which descends from the Alleghany mountain upon the Little Juniata and the Pennsylvania Railroad near Altoona, one of those beds of coal appears six hundred feet beneath the base of the true coal measures, and nearly three feet thick. Those who believe this to be the lowest of the true coal beds made extensive arrangements for an eastern trade, and justly anticipated a prosperous adventure; whereas the whole carboniferous formation is there not only at the summit but behind the summit of the mountain."

The first effort at coal formation above referred to by Prof. Lesley is the carbonaceous slates of Prof. Rogers's Post Meridian series, or No. VII. of the original notation of the Pennsylvania survey, which are the equivalents of the slates at the base of the Upper Helderberg group of the New York survey, and in which a thin seam of coal is found in the shore-hills of Lake Erie.

Resting upon the Umbral series is the prominently marked seral conglomerate, the millstone grit of the European system, the base or floor of the coal formation in all its extent. Westward, throughout the greater portion of the bituminous coal regions, its equivalent is a silicious sandstone. A gradual decrease in the size of the constituent water worn materials of this deposit is observable. Along the south and east limits of the anthracite coal fields many of the rounded masses in the rock exceed a diameter of six inches, as at Mauch Chunk, in the Sharp mountain; while around the Wyoming basin the size of the pebbles does not often exceed that of a pigeon's egg; further to the westward, even in the adjoining county of Sullivan, the pebbles of the conglomerate, though of the same white and gray quartz kind as those of the Wyoming rock, are much less in size. This decrement is found to be in a general way continuous to the westward, until, as above stated, a quartzose sandstone of particles of varying degrees of comminution holds the stratigraphic position of the conglomerate. Upon this fact, in view of a simple dynamic law, rests the rational theory that the course of the distributive currents that prevailed during the period of deposit of the materials of this great and wide spread rock were from the east and south; and in accord with this view we find that the deposit changes, not only in the size of its constituent materials, as above stated, but also in their lithologic characters, which towards the southern border of the field are largely made up of the softer felspathic and aluminous rocks, that by the attrition of further transport would have been in a great measure reduced to mere sedimentary matter. Again, in further accord with this theory, we find that the thickness of this deposit lessens in its sweep toward the north and west. At Pottsville and Mauch Chunk it is respectively 1,030 feet and 950 feet thick, while under the Wyoming basin its average thickness is about 140 feet and in Sullivan county it is reduced to about 40 feet. In the Wyoming basin it is composed of two sets of strata. The lowest set is made up of comparatively coarse pebbles, from almond size down to sandy particles of white and gray colors, with irregular layers of coarse-grained sandstones throughout the mass. The average thickness of this lower set may be taken at seventy-five feet. The upper set is about of the same thickness, but the pebbles in it are of less size generally, and the mixed sandstone layers are of a darker gray color, while the different layers are less massive. The line of separation of these two deposits is generally indicated by the interstratification of a small seam of carbonaceous slates and smut with occasional thin seams of coal (the A seam of the Rogers report). The slates, as also the rough surface of the conglomerates in contact with these slates, bear distinct impressions of fossil coal flora.

The more sandy portions of the conglomerates make a very durable building stone, and where a fine dress or finish is not required the cost does not exceed much that of the softer micaceous sandstones of the region. The white silicious kinds have been quarried to a considerable extent in the Nanticoke gap, and at the southerly end of the basin, for hearth stones at furnaces, on account of their strong resistance to the effect of heat.

The peculiar characteristics of this rock would alone distinguish it among its associates; but apart from these its outcropping around the Wyoming basin can to a great extent be determined even in the distant view, as its white, rugged and broken terminal lines toward the summit of the near mountain are in strong contrast with the sombre hues of the underlying Umbral rocks and the forest shades, through which at many points it may be seen. While, as above stated, this formation varies greatly in thickness, it is yet a safe inference that there is not in the northern coal field an area of coal, be it ever so small, that has not for its base or floor the conglomerate rock in greater or less integrity of form or composition. There is no rock of greater persistence and none more uniform in mineral constitution, being of silex to the exclusion of almost all other mineral. The form, as has been stated, varies from pebble to sand, and this quite locally in places. Thus the valuable greenish-brown stone of Campbell's ledge, extensively quarried for building purposes, in all probability will prove to be in the stratigraphic position of the lower and coarser strata of the seral pebble conglomerate; for in Solomon's gap there is a sandstone of the same color and composition, of circumscribed extent which is seen distinctly blending in each direction into a true pebble conglomerate, the lowest of the series.

The rocks of the true or productive coal formation, in general, differ so much from those beneath them as to be readily distinguished. There are, however, found among them some beds in local positions which approximate the form of the true conglomerate so far as to be distinguishable except by means of the accompanying measures. Purely silicious sandstones form but a small proportion of the great mass of this formation, and may readily be determined as belonging to the coal by their comparatively thin and irregular stratification.

Alumina predominates in the composition of the coal measures, both in combination and in mixture with silex in the harder rock; while the carbonaceous slates and the shales consist almost purely of this mineral.

The rock strata of the upper or later deposits are in general the most friable and soft, in consequence of the greater amount of alumina contained in the bond or matrix, and the mica which enters largely into the composition of these upper measures.

Much labor and thought has been expended in the effort to identify the several seams of coal in their extent throughout this basin, and to determine their synchronisms with the seams of the other anthracite regions. In part only have these efforts been successful, and this mainly in the higher and more productive beds of the series; not alone for the reason that these seams have thus far been the principal grounds of mining operations and explorations, but mainly that they are the most persistent and even deposits of the group. Referring to the several seams below the nearly central seam, called at Wilkes-Barre the Baltimore, and in Pittston the Fourteen-Foot vein, Prof. Rogers makes the following remarks:

"This group exhibits greater fluctuations in the dimensions and quality of the coal beds than any other subdivision of the whole coal formation. These fluctuations, it is appropriate to add, belong equally or in a greater degree to the rocks which fill the intervals between the coal beds. It would seem as if the physical conditions under which these earliest coal strata were deposited were more inconstant than those which belonged to the later stages of the formation. The spaces over which the nearly perfect state of repose of the surface prevailed necessary to the accumulation by slow growth of the vegetable peaty mass producing each seam of coal were, evidently, of a narrower geographical extent than afterward; and the currents and disturbances of the earth's crust which buried these successive peat swamps under the clayey, sandy, and even coarse gravelly strata that rests upon or between them were obviously much more violent than in the middle and final ages of the great coal period.

"Nowhere, perhaps, in the anthracite country are the proofs of this instability of the surface during the first stages of the coal formation more conspicuously manifested than in the Wyoming and Lackawanna basin. Here we find in certain neighborhoods in the same few hundred feet thickness of the lower coal strata as many as ten or twelve separate beds of coal, while in other localities there exist not more than half or even a third of this number; and, what is more material, the very same individual bed which in one quarter possesses an ample or indeed superabundant thickness is in another only a dwindled seam, too thin or too impure for profitable mining. Without attempting any close continuous tracing of the several coals, which can only be done when the district shall have become much more extensively mined, I may exemplify the variability of these coal measures by appealing to the very different types which they assume in the three meridians of Solomon's gap, southwest of Wilkes-Barre, Spring brook, southeast of Pittston, and the vicinity of Scranton.

"At Solomon's gap the group of lower white ash coal measures, extending from the foot of the mountain north-west across the basin to the edge of the diluvial flats of the Susquehanna, includes in a thickness of 900 or 1,000 feet as many as thirteen beds of coal of various sizes from one foot to nineteen feet; and the total thickness of coal, fit and unfit for mining, embraced by this section may be estimated at nearly 84 feet. But out of this aggregate quantity the thickness susceptible of being profitably wrought does not probably amount in all to more than 45 or 50 feet. Traced east and west these coal beds undergo, even in the space of two or three miles, some very remarkable variations. Thus the fifth in position from the bottom enlarges in that distance from a thickness of 17 feet at Solomon's gap to the noble bulk of 28 feet opposite to Wilkes-Barre, beyond which neighborhood it seems again to decline even more rapidly than towards the southwest. These fluctuations arise partly through the coalescing of two or more beds into one; or, conversely, through a splitting and diverging of the thicker seams into two or three thinner ones; or partly, again, by the gradual alterations of size of the same coals independently of such unions and subdivisions.

"If we turn now to the district of Spring brook we shall find all the features of the formation so altered as to present not one subdivision, neither coal bed nor other stratum, which we can recognize or identify as a member of the series visible in the vicinity of Solomon's gap. In a total thickness of several hundred feet of coal measures, embraced between the outcrop of the main Pittston seam and the conglomerate of the mountain to the southeast, only six coals in all, according to the largest estimate, have ever been brought to light, after close and persevering researches, and only two of these appear to have a size and purity adapting them for successful mining. There would seem to take place between the neighborhood of Solomon's gap, or Wilkes-Barre, and this quarter a progressive impoverishment of these lower strata in the number and size of their included coal beds, and likewise in the rocks themselves, which thin down considerably. As a consequence this portion of the southern skirt of the valley contains no collieries of any magnitude.

"Another and opposite change back to a very productive condition of the coal measures is exhibited as we continue our progress along the same side of the basin northeast up the Lackawanna valley to the vicinity of Scranton."

Later observations have served to show a general correctness in these remarks, especially in reference to the great inconstancy of these lower seams. But the cause assigned for these irregularities—the slow undulatory movements, during the periods of deposition, in the planes upon which these measures were formed—may not be accepted, even though taken in connection with the idea of a probable great auxillary cause, that of currents and floods. That these wave-like creepings were confined "to narrow geographical extents," as suggested, is not in accord with the now admitted synchronisms, and the consequent idea of an original unbroken level spread of the forming measures throughout the most remote known limits of the anthracite coal formation. The agreement as regards position in the series, the order of inter-stratification of the slates with the coal of a seam, the specific characteristics of these materials, fracture, lustre, etc., and other data, have now become so familiar to practical investigators that with much confidence they may pronounce as to the identity of either of the principal seams of the series, whether in the northern, the middle, or the southern anthracite coal fields.

While this degree of certitude may not be assumable in reference to some of the lesser seams, still the idea of circumscribed formations, isolated minor basins, is at variance with the conditions of these seams as observed in their outcroppings, however remote they may be from the centre of the basin. They do not present the indication of volumes vanishing by the shoaling of basins, or any other appearance of terminal limits than those due to violent rupture and abrasion. The seams of coal cut by mountain gorges can be seen to preserve their thickness up to their present broken termini, be these ever so near the summit of the mountain upon which they spread. And this remark will apply equally to both sides of the basin.

Nor do we find in the working of these seams any evidences of limited basins of formation. If the seam proves to be of irregular thickness, the cause is as often indicated to be from the roof as from the floor, and in many instances from both roof and floor. An impingement above or from below, or in both directions of the enveloping rocks, to the extent in some instances of an entire squeezing out of the thin plastic or pulpy coal matter, is not uncommon, particularly in the smaller lower seams; but these prove to be only interruptions and not termini of the seams. These conditions have been proved at a number of mines in this region, and over a comparatively large mine area, even in the bottom seam; especially in the old Lee mine at Nanticoke, now being operated extensively by the Susquehanna Coal Company.

While we may not explain in a fully satisfactory manner the causes of these minor deviations, as the splitting or division of a seam of coal into two or more seams and their coalescence again within limited areas, yet it will be admitted as possible that they may have been from causes independent of those great seismic or plutonic rupturing forces from which resulted the mountain and the vale, subsequent, however, to the formation of the coal. The subsidence of limited areas after the growth and accumulation of a certain amount of coal forming material, in consequence of the shifting and underlying sands, the removal of mineral matter by solution, the action of sub-currents of water, the further solidifying and shrinkage of underlying earthy and vegetable matter, would all be within the scope of possible causes; requiring, then, to complete the conditions only the prevalence for a time of a turbid flood over the depressed area, and a succeeding growth or accumulation of the coal forming materials.

These views are in accord with other evidences supporting the theory of the contemporary formation of the coal of Pennsylvania and the original continuity of the several fields the one with the other, over a then level area probably of much greater extent than is indicated by the present very irregular ruptured limits. The great spread of the underlying Umbral measures through much of the now coalless areas that separate these regions, supporting as they do in many places isolated tracts of the seral conglomerate—from which, presumably, the coal has been removed by denudation—is a circumstance strong in evidence of a former uninterrupted spread of the coal formation; a continuous marsh or boggy expanse, supporting a growth of vegetation rapid beyond that of the present most luxuriant districts of the tropics, and in atmosphere reeking with warm moisture, impenetrable to the rays of the sun and surcharged with carbon to an extent that precluded the existence of vegetable life other than that of the flowerless and fruitless endogen, the palm, the fern, the club-moss and their congeners, and of animal life of higher organizations than those of the dragon-fly, the beetle and the myriapode.

Surface explorations to determine the position of a seam of coal in the order of the series for the purpose of identification may in some instances be readily accomplished, but in others it is found difficult and at some localities impossible, in consequence of hidden outcroppings, increase of the number of outcroppings by divisions of the seams, the distortion and disguise of seams by changes of the volume and quality of the coal, &c. Still, by careful attention to all the features of the seam in question, its accompanying slates and partings, the order of superposition of its beds of bony coal and its checkered coal, its basal fire-clay and its fossils, as above stated, the assemblage will in most instances prove the means of identification of the seam in other and remote localities.

By this method of comparison of the seams of the Wyoming basin with those of the middle and southern coal fields, the foregoing most generally accepted conclusions have been reached in reference to coincidence of periods of formation and identity of seams in the several anthracite coal fields of the State.

The A seam, as above stated, is in the conglomerate, and not of workable dimensions or quality.

The lower part of the B seam yields a red ash, hence its name. This property it has throughout the basin, wherever tested, while all the other coals, with very few and quite local exceptions, give a white or gray ash; and in this respect differ from the coals of the other regions, which to a great extent from the higher seam yield a red ash.

As above stated, seams of coal vary much, even within short distance, both as to thickness and quality; therefore a general statement will only present an approximate average. These figures represent the thickness of the seams in their entirety; the included slates and bone coal or refuse vary greatly in even the same seam in different localities. Deductions are further increased by the waste of some tiers of good coal, often left in the mines because of a little more work required in their separation from slates, their checkered fracture or want of lustre; much of which waste is in consequence of strong competition in a generally overstocked market. The average deduction to be made in estimating the product of a seam would probably be not less than twenty-five per cent. of the thickness above given.

As before remarked, the entire depth of the coal measures over the conglomerate varies greatly in the different sections of the Wyoming coal basin; towards the northeast end, as at Carbondale, its depth is probably not more than 250 feet; while at Scranton and the district below, as far as Pittston, it is of more than double this depth. At Wilkes-Barre the depth is over 1,200 feet, which depth increases to the section approaching the Dundee shaft, about a mile to the northeast of the town of Nanticoke, where within the narrow limits of less than a mile the great depth of 1,500 or 1,600 feet takes place. From this section southwestward the basin shoals, so that near the town of Nanticoke its depth does not probably exceed 900 feet; and this decrease of depth continues on to the southwest in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, so that on the diminishing terminal area of the Salem Coal Company, west of the Susquehanna river, the two remaining seams, B and C, are included in a depth of measures not more than 50 feet; while, as before stated, at the distance of about a mile westward from the river these measures rise out and vanish.

The latest deposits of coal of the series, and the greatest exhibit of denudation, exist in a very limited district, the ridge which stretches from North street to Mill creek, between Main street and the river, in the city of Wilkes-Barre. Here the seams J and K are found, but not elsewhere throughout the valley. There are reasons for the inference that these deposits took place at or very near the close of the carboniferous epoch; as on the summit of the ridge, near Mill creek, there is a deposit of impure reddish-brown limestone in which may be seen many traces of purely marine fossils, while in a black slate at no great distance below, but above any deposit of coal, we find marine fossil shells, the Pecten imbedded with the Modiolia; as may be seen by many specimens in the cabinet of the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society at Wilkes-Barre. This, then, would seem to be the horizon of another formation—the Permian limestone and the new red sandstone—and the period of the first appearance of air-breathing or true reptiles, the Saurians.

A portion of the middle coal field, its eastern terminal basins, is within the limits of Luzerne county. The principal basins of this section are known as the Hazleton, Big Black, Little Black, Lower Black and Green Mountain basins. The largest of these is the Hazleton basin, about fourteen miles in length. The lengths of the others vary between seven and eleven miles; while the greatest width is that of the Hazleton basin, which is three-fourths of a mile. Eastward these basins are drained by Sandy run, Laurel creek and the northerly branches of Quakake creek, tributaries of the Lehigh river; westward by Black creek, a branch of the Nescopeck, whose junction with the Susquehanna river is opposite the town of Berwick, in Columbia county.

The coal seams in these basins do not range higher in the series than the E or Mammoth; which E seam is in many places thicker than in the Wyoming basin except in the locality of Wilkes-Barre; and the lower B, C and D have in general a greater and more even thickness than those of the northern basin. There is no section of the coal fields where mining has been attended with greater success, both as respects economy of operating and financial results.

CHARLES F. INGHAM.

WILKES-BARRE.

WILKES-BARRE, one of the five townships allotted by the Susquehanna Company to the Connecticut settlers in 1768, was surveyed in 1770 by David Meade and named in honor of John Wilkes and Colonel Barre, members of Parliament and distinguished advocates for liberty and the rights of the colonies before they were won by the war for independence.

EARLY HISTORY AND SETTLEMENT.

In 1742 most of the Delawares, under their chief Tadame, came to Wyoming and built a village on the flats below the present site of Wilkes-Barre, the minority settling at the same time on the Juniata, near Lewistown. About a mile below this Delaware village, "Maughwauwame," near the line between Wilkes-Barre and Hanover, the "grasshopper" war is said to have been fought between the Delawares and the Shawanese. By order of the Supreme Executive Council, probably issued as much with an intent to crush the projects of New Englanders about to colonize in Wyoming as for any especial regard for the wishes of Teedyuscung, in 1758 ten log houses "twenty feet by fourteen in the clear, and one twenty-four by sixteen, of squared logs and dove-tailed," were built for the Delaware chief and his followers. These were the first dwelling houses erected in Wyoming. Other buildings were subsequently erected there, for on the night of April 19th, 1763, the dwelling of Teedyuscung and twenty others around it were set on fire by a party of Iroquois who had visited the village under the guise of friendship, and the chief, under the influence of liquor, perished in the flames. This was an act of savage vengeance for the death of an Iroquois warrior at the hand of Teedyuscung in 1758.

The settlement of Wilkes-Barre by whites begun within the limits of the present city. According to a certified warrant map of Wilkes-Barre, which has been consulted, the land now embraced within the township limits was granted to the following named persons: Wilbur Bennett, Ebenezer Bowman, Samuel Bowman, Robert Bennett, Lord Butler, Hugh Conner, Aziel Dana, Anderson Dana, Amelia Durkee, Jabez Fish, Jesse Fell, Hugh Forseman, Matthias Hollenback, Rev. Jacob Johnson, William Ross, Jonathan Slocum, Stephen Tuttle, Andrew Wickeizer, Conrad Wickeizer and Elizabeth Wigton.

EARLY GOVERNMENT.

Prior to 1772, the small population being busily engaged in the pioneer steps of agriculture, there was no organized local government, nor was such needed under the existing circumstances. Owing to the unsettled condition of civil affairs, arising from disputed proprietorship, the local government was inseparable from that of the five townships as organized by the Susquehanna Company in 1773; each of which was entitled to three representatives, whose duty it was to meet in Wilkes-Barre every three months for the settlement of any disputes which arose from time to time. June 2nd, 1773, Major John Durkee, Captain Zebulon Butler and Obadiah Gore, jr., residents of Wilkes-Barre, were appointed to serve in such capacity until the first Monday of the following December.

The laws were not elaborate, though sometimes enforced with undue zeal; they required that the people live orderly, soberly and peaceably and were impartially executed. Idleness and disorder were punished at the whipping-post and at the stocks. The more serious crimes of burglary and adultery were sometimes attended with exclusion from the community or forfeiture of property.

SOME EARLY LAND SALES.

Lands in Wilkes-Barre, as the town was then bounded, were very cheap in the early days. From records of sales in 1772-3 it appears that lots brought the following low prices: July 6th, 1772, Silas Gore sold to Jonathan Stowell of Ashford, Conn., for £20, one whole settling right, which included "the home or house lot No. 28, the meadow lot No. 50 and the third division or back lot No. 44." August 21st, 1772, Asa Stephens sold to Enoch Judd for £43 one settling right, "being meadow lot No. 20, house lot No. 27, and back lot No. 8." February 22nd, 1773, Elijah Loomis, of Harrington, Litchfield county, Conn., sold to Elisha Swift a whole right, including "town lot No. 2, meadow lot 28 and back lot No.

26," for £100. The old Wilkes-Barre burying ground, with an area of nearly three acres, was purchased in 1772 for £9, 10d; and in that burial place were laid to rest many whose names will live in the history of Wyoming long after the monuments erected to their memory shall have crumbled into dust—the fathers and mothers and defenders of the valley.

WILKES-BARRE A WESTMORELAND DISTRICT.

At the first town meeting for the town of Westmoreland, held March 1st and 2nd, 1774, Wilkes-Barre was made a district of the said town, which included all of the settlements from the Delaware river to fifteen miles beyond the Susquehanna and from the Lehigh north to Tioga Point.

In 1776 a struggle occurred between Wilkes-Barre and Kingston for the county seat of Westmoreland, which during that year was created a county by the Assembly of Connecticut. The contest terminated disastrously to the last named settlement. The first court of the new county was held at Fort Wyoming, on the river bank at the foot of Northampton street. From 1778 to 1782, when the Connecticut jurisdiction ceased, the courts were held in Fort Wilkes-Barre, on the public square.

In the measures taken by the authorities of the town of Westmoreland for the public weal and progress, residents of Wyoming, the Wilkes-Barre district, bore an important and conspicuous part, holding many offices; but the civil history of Westmoreland, embracing so extensive a territory, cannot be treated in an article relating to the township of Wilkes-Barre, which by a decree of the county court in 1790 became one of the eleven original townships of Luzerne county recently organized. Those honored with positions of trust in the town of Westmoreland were Zebulon Butler, Anderson Dana and other residents of Wilkes-Barre. Captain Butler was chosen moderator at the first and several succeeding town meetings.

After a period of rivalry on the part of the citizens of Kingston Wilkes-Barre was regarded as the most important point in the town, and there most of the public business was transacted. At the second town meeting, held April 11th and 12th, 1774, it was voted "that for ye present ye tree that now stands northerly from Captain Butler's house shall be ye town sign-post." This house stood on the corner of Northampton and River streets in the town-plot, and the tree stood on the river bank. "This matter of a legal sign-post," says Miner, "is of weightier import than, without explanation, might be imagined. Newspapers in those days were little known save in the larger cities. It had therefore been enacted that a sign-post be established in each town, on which notices of public sales, stray animals taken up, etc., should be nailed or placed to render them legal. It is proper to add that as an accompaniment to the sign-post, which was also the legal whipping-post, a pair of stocks was provided for a punishment of the guilty and warning to deter from crime. These (now abjured) monuments of civilization and law were derived from England, and brought over, nay, almost venerated by our Puritan fathers." That this tree had previously been used as a public sign-post is evident from a notice dated November 18th, 1772, which can be seen at the rooms of the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society. It is a call for a town meeting of the proprietors and shows the perforations of the tacks which held it to the tree. By the operation of the Trenton decree of December 30th, 1782, the jurisdiction of Wyoming was transferred from Connecticut to Pennsylvania and the town of Westmoreland ceased to exist.

WILKES-BARRE UNDER THE COUNTY ORGANIZATION.

Upon the erection of Luzerne county a strife arose between Wilkes-Barre and Forty Fort, in Kingston, as to which should be the county town, which for various reasons was ultimately decided in favor of the former. From 1782 to 1786 no courts had been held at Wilkes-Barre, as under the Trenton decree Northumberland was the seat of justice of what had been Westmoreland. The first court of the newly created Luzerne county was held May 27th, 1787, at the residence of Zebulon Butler, at the corner of River and Northampton streets, the site of the present residence of Hon. Stanley Woodward. The public offices were in that building for several years, in charge of the celebrated Timothy Pickering, who performed the multifarious duties of prothonotary, register, recorder and clerk of the courts.

The civil history of Wilkes-Barre under the Luzerne county organization is even more difficult to trace than that of a prior date, there being no regularly kept township records in existence. The township increased steadily in population after it was known that settlement would be allowed to proceed peacefully. In 1799 the list of taxable inhabitants of the township was as follows :

Charles and Stephen Abbott, Edward Austin, Christopher Avery, Thomas A. Alkin, William Askam, John Alexander, Asa Bennett, Charles Bennett, Wilbur Bennett, Eleazer Blackman, Cain Billings, Timothy Behee, Clark Behee, Isaac Bowman, Stephen Barnes, John Carey, Hugh Conner, Arnold Colt, Matthew Cover, Putnam Catlin, Cornelius Courtright, Henry Courtright, John Courtright, James Conlin, Peter Corbit, Nathan Draper, Isaac Deeker, Daniel Downing, Daniel Downing, jr., Reuben Downing, Joseph Davis, Azel Dana, Alexander Dana, Silvester Dana, Thomas Duane, James Dixon, William Dixon, Arthur Eick, Jacob Ely, Jabez Fish, Jesse Fell, Daniel Foster, Daniel Gore, Timothy Green, Willard Green, William Augustus George, Daniel Gridley, Matthias Hollenback, Jonathan Hancock, Godfrey Hitchcock, Oliver Helme, Jacob Hart, Lewis Hartsouff, Solomon Johnson, Jacob Johnson, Jehoiada P. Johnson, Christiana Johnson, Jacob Jenong, Luther Jones, Reuben Jones, John Kennedy, jr., James Kennedy, Daniel Kelly, Joseph Kelly, James Morgan, Richard Maybury, Thomas Marshal, Enoch Ogden, Jacob Ossencup, Samuel Pease, Nathan Palmer, Benjamin Perry, Benjamin Potts, John Potts, Mary Phillips, John Pooder, David Richards, William Ross, Eleph Ross, John Rosecrants, Jacob Rosecrants, Widow Rosecrants, Thomas Read, William Russell, John Paul Schott, William Slocum, Joseph Slocum, Benjamin Slocum, Ebenezer Slocum, Jonathan Slocum, Eunice Sprague, Polly Stevens, Obadiah Smith, Paul Stark, Henry Stark, William Shoemaker, Joshua Squire, Henry Tibury, Stephen Tuttle, Benjamin Truesdale, Elias Vandermark, Nathan Waller, Phineas Waller, Eliab Waller, Andrew Wickeizer, Conrad Wickeizer, Joseph Wright, Thomas Wright, Philip Weekes, Thomas Weekes, Jonathan Wildman, Henry Wilson, James Westbrook, Richard Westbrook, Justice Wollcott, Crandal Wilcox, Isaac Wilcox, William Wright and Roswell Wells.

By subsequent alterations of the township limits the lands owned by many of the above named persons fell within other township boundaries. The area of Wilkes-Barre township has been reduced as follows at the dates given: By the erection of Wilkes-Barre borough, March 17th, 1806; by the erection of Covington township in January, 1818; by the setting off of a portion to form part of Plains township, November 10th, 1851; by the erection of Bear Creek township, April 7th, 1806; and by the erection of the city of Wilkes-Barre, May 4th, 1871.

As a matter of interest, the names of some of the early constables are appended, though it has been found impossible to complete the list. The successive constables elected by the combined vote of the township and borough, previous to 1819, were as follows: Josiah Lewis, 1806; Enoch Ogden, 1807; Jonathan Bulkley, 1808; Isaac Carpenter, 1809; Peter Yarrington, 1810; Joseph Vonsick, 1811; Andrew Coget, 1812; John Hancock, 1813-15; Phineas Walker, 1816; James Gridley, 1818. The first high constable elected was George Griffin, a member of the Luzerne county bar. He did not qualify for the reason that it was decided that the two positions were incompatible. A special election was ordered to fill the vacancy thus occasioned, and Peter Yarrington was elected and sworn in. The first constable elected by the voters of the borough for "Wilkes-Barre, county town," was Barnet Ulp, in 1819. John Hancock, son of Jonathan Hancock, was his deputy.

BOROUGH HISTORY.

The Wilkes-Barre town plot was surveyed in 1772, by Colonel John Durkee. It was near the center of the township north and south, on the river, and embraced two hundred acres of land, laid out in eight squares, with a diamond (the public square) in the center. By the opening of Washington and Franklin streets these squares were afterward divided into sixteen parallelograms.

March 17th, 1806, the borough of Wilkes-Barre was duly incorporated, embracing the town plot and the public common bordering the river, according to the following survey:

Beginning at a stake at low water mark, on the south side of the northeast branch of the Susquehanna river, and running thence south thirty-four degrees forty minutes east, ninety-four perches, to a stake on the main street; thence on the south side of said street south thirty-four degrees forty minutes east, sixty-four perches and two-tenths of a perch, to the south corner of said town plot; thence on the southeast side of said back street, and continuing that course fifty-five degrees twenty minutes, four hundred and five (405) perches, to a post where that line intersects the north side of Jacob Johnson's lot; thence on the line of said lot north fifty-one degrees thirty minutes west, ninety-nine perches to a post; thence south fifty-five degrees twenty minutes west, one hundred and eighteen perches, to a post on the north side of North street; thence north thirty-four degrees forty minutes west, fifty-six perches, to an iron bolt in a rock at low water mark of the said Susquehanna river; thence down the said river the several courses thereof at low water mark to the place of beginning.

By act of Assembly approved March 13th, 1847, the borough limits were changed as follows:

That portion of the borough lying northeasterly of North street, which runs southeasterly and northwesterly below the tannery of Bowman & Lewis in said borough is separated from the borough and attached to the township of Wilkes-Barre, and the upper or northeasterly side of said North street extending from the Susquehanna river to the southeasterly line of the borough shall be the northeastern boundary, and the line between the borough and township of Wilkes-Barre.

By an act passed in 1868 the limits were a second time changed, as follows:

Beginning at a point on the Susquehanna river, at low water mark, in line with the northerly side of North street; thence along North street to the road leading to Coal brook; thence along the northerly side of said road about twenty rods; thence by a line nearly parallel with Canal street to the southerly side of the towing path of the canal; thence along the southerly side of the towing path of the North Branch Canal to a point in line with the division between lots number 22 and 23 of certified Wilkes-Barre; thence along that line about one hundred and fifty-three rods toward the river Susquehanna; thence by a line parallel with River street to a point on the river aforesaid, at low water mark; thence up the said river to the beginning.

By an ordinance approved May 2nd, 1870, the following territory was added to the borough:

Beginning at the southwesterly corner of the borough, thence southwesterly by the prolongation of the southwesterly line of the borough to a point on the westerly side of the Careytown road; thence southwesterly and along the westerly side of said road to a point opposite the division line of the lands of E. W. Sturdevant and of the estate of Mary Richards, deceased; thence southeasterly by the said division line and the prolongation thereof to a point on the easterly side of the roadway of the Lehigh and Susquehanna railroad; thence northerly along the easterly side of said railroad roadway to the westerly bank of Coal Brook; thence northerly along the westerly bank of said brook to the southerly bank of Mill creek; thence westerly along the southerly bank of Mill creek to the Susquehanna river at low water mark; thence southwestward down the river at low water mark to the northwesterly corner of the borough; and thence by the northerly, easterly and southerly lines of the borough to the point of beginning.

By an ordinance approved October 29th, 1870, another addition was made to the territory of the borough, as follows:

Beginning at a point on the easterly line of the borough in the prolongation of the southerly line of Stanton street or road toward the borough lines; thence by said line and the southerly line of said Stanton street or road southeasterly to the easterly side of the Empire road; thence northeasterly along the easterly side of said Empire road to the northerly side of Coal street; northwesterly to a point in the prolongation of the line between lands of Mrs. Ellen J. Wells and the Hollenback Coal Company; thence by said line northwesterly to a point on the easterly line of the borough in the line of the prolongation of the southerly side of Union street, and thence by the easterly line of the borough to the point of beginning.

The act creating the borough did not separate it from the township of Wilkes-Barre nor constitute it an independent election district, but left its citizens still inhabitants of the township, its voters being voters at the township elections for the township officers until 1818 or 1819, when the borough ceased to have any connection with the township election and from that time forward elected its own constable under the somewhat lengthy title of "Constable of Wilkes-Barre, County-Town;" but it was not until 1835 or 1836 that the borough was made a separate election district and ceased to vote with the township at general election. The first mentioned of the two changes above referred to was effected by an action of the voters in Wilkes-Barre township outside the borough limits, who took possession of the election board and ballot boxes and denied the right of any resident of the borough to vote for township officers; and at the succeeding session of the Legislature the borough was empowered to elect its own constable, of which right the voters availed themselves as above stated.

Jesse Fell was named in the act of incorporation as a commissioner to proclaim the first borough election, which was held May 6th, 1806. There is no record of the number of votes polled, but it has been estimated at about sixty. As the result of that election Jesse Fell became the first burgess and Matthias Hollenback, Roswell Wells, Lord Butler, Arnold Colt, Nathan Palmer, Charles Miner and Samuel Bowman constituted the first

C. D. FOSTER.

Charles D. Foster was born in the township of Dallas, Luzerne county, where his parents were residing temporarily, on the 25th of November, 1836. His father was Phineas Nash Foster, of the substantial Yankee stock from Connecticut; his mother was Mary P. Johnson, a granddaughter of the Rev. Jacob Johnson, the pioneer Congregational minister of Wyoming. Mr. P. N. Foster was a prosperous farmer of Jackson township, near Huntsville, having inherited his ancestral acres, upon which he lived from the age of seven years to the day of his death. Charles D., being the sole heir, is now the owner of one of the most extensive farms in this part of Luzerne county, covering an area of over a mile square, lying partly in Jackson and partly in Dallas. Mr. Foster assisted his father in doing the usual work on the farm until he arrived at the age of twenty years, in the meantime attending the district schools during the winter months. At that age he entered Wyoming Seminary, at Kingston, Pa., and remained there three years, graduating with the first of his class. After this he taught the village school in Jackson one year; he also taught school in the State of Illinois for a short time. Returning to his father's farm he remained there about a year, after which he entered as a law student the office of Lyman Hakes, of Wilkes-Barre, and in due time was admitted to practice as a member of the bar of Luzerne county.

Mr. Foster early identified himself with the Republican party, and has labored in a quiet way for the promotion of the principles of that party ever since; he has never sought nor obtained any office in the gift of the people. He was solicited to become a candidate for representative for the Wilkes-Barre district in the campaign of 1880, but he preferred the ease of a quiet home to the perplexities of a Pennsylvania legislator, and made no effort to secure the nomination.

In 1862 he joined a company of home guards, shouldered a musket, marched with the Pennsylvania militia into Maryland and stood ready to defend the integrity of the commonwealth, within sound of McClellan's and Lee's guns at the bloody field on the banks of the Antietam creek.

On the 4th of October, 1865, Mr. Foster married Miss Mary Jane Hoagland, daughter of Amos Hoagland, of Newark, N. J. They have two daughters, Narcissa Florence and Lillie Blanche, but no sons.

Mr. Foster's residence is an unpretending one on Franklin street, below Market; and though his business is strictly that of a lawyer with large practice, he takes great pleasure in overseeing and managing his large farm in Jackson, and makes frequent visits thither with his fine team of horses; not only as a matter of business but also to gratify his filial devotion to his aged mother, who still resides at the modest farm-house where she has spent the greater part of her long life, and prefers the familiar scenes and objects of her early womanhood to all the wealth and splendor that a city can afford.

PETER PURSEL (DECEASED).

The subject of this sketch, a prominent and influential citizen of Wilkes-Barre for many years, was born in New Jersey, October 17th, 1814, and was married April 9th, 1836, to Mary Pursel, of Bucks county, Pa. In 1839 they removed to Wilkes-Barre and soon afterward rented a farm of William Swetland, near Wyoming. It was not long, however, before Mr. Pursel bought a large lumber property in Bear Creek township, which proved to be profitable under his management. Thence he removed to Pittston, where for several years he had charge of the Maryland Coal Company's works; thence to Easton, Pa., thence again to Bear Creek township, where Mr. Pursel purchased the Williams tract and re-engaged in lumbering on a very extensive scale. After awhile he a second time made Wilkes-Barre the family home, carrying on a successful omnibus business until it was rendered unprofitable by the growing railway interests of the section, when he embarked in the livery business and other similar pursuits.

It has been said by one who knew him that "Mr. Pursel was always a successful man in business; a man of strong will; a true friend but a good hater." Like every man with such a character, he had many friends and exerted a decided influence on the public and private affairs of the community in which he lived. He was, in fact, a strictly self-made man, and as an index to his success in life it may be stated that he was for some years postmaster of Wilkes-Barre; and at the time of his death, which occurred January 8th, 1874, was president of the Wilkes-Barre Savings Bank, president of the Lee Park Trotting Association, and one of the six special members of the city council, to which honorable office Judge Garrick M. Harding appointed him, although of opposing political views, a mark of trust and distinction to which his official conduct proved him to be justly entitled. Politically, he was a steadfast and uncompromising Democrat.

Mr. and Mrs. Pursel had four children born to them, three of whom, with their mother, are living. Their names were, in the order of their nativity, Ellen, Ark, Sallie and Daniel. Sallie died at the family residence, on Union street, July 7th, 1868, in her twenty-six year. She had been an invalid for seven years. The Christian resignation with which she endured suffering was remarkable, and that she was more than ready for the great change which must come to us all could not but be apparent. She had a mind thoroughly cultivated and a spirit subservient to the will of God; she had no words except words of comfort to her sorrowing parents and brothers and sister to the end.

council. May 14th, 1806, the first meeting of the borough council took place, and a more efficient board never met. They were all first-class men socially and in business life. Messrs. Hollenback and Butler were the principal merchants of the town. Messrs. Wells and Palmer were lawyers of ability; Charles Miner, the subsequent historian of Wyoming, was a printer and the editor of the Federalist, and a leader in borough affairs as long as he remained a member of the council; Arnold Colt, a blacksmith by trade, was a man of sterling qualities. Peleg Tracy was appointed clerk. Soon after organizing, the council adopted a series of rules for the government of its proceedings, the last of which imposed a fine of twenty-five cents upon a councilman for non-attendance at regularly authorized meetings. These regulations were thirty-two in number, and are said to have been drawn up by Charles Miner. Rule thirty-second first had application in the case of Colonel Hollenback, who was absent at the second meeting of the council and was accordingly fined.

Owing to the incompleteness of the early records of the borough the names of those who served as burgess between 1806 and 1811 do not appear. The names of the successive incumbents of that office from the latter date to the incorporation of Wilkes-Barre as a city are as follows:

Lord Butler, 1811-13; Jesse Fell, 1814-18; Matthias Hollenback, 1819; Thomas Dyer, 1820-22; Ebenezer Bowman, 1823; David Scott, 1824-26; John N. Conyngnam, 1827, 1834-37; Garrick Mallery, 1828; George Denison, 1829; Josiah Orlando Lewis, 1830-32; Porter, 1833; Hendrick B. Wright, 1838; Joseph P. Le Clerc, 1839, 1840; Isaac Gray, 1841, 1842; Eleazer Carey, 1843; Augustus C. Laning, 1844, 1845; Joseph B. Williams, 1846, 1847; Gilbert Burrows, 1848; Benjamin Drake, 1849; Sidney Tracy, 1850; Oliver Helme, 1851; Charles A. Lane, 1852; H. B. Hillman, 1853, 1854; W. W. Under an act of the Legislature of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania for the regulation of boroughs, passed in 1851, a new charter was granted to Wilkes-Barre borough at the April term of court in 1855, under which it existed until 1871.

The names of those who served as justice of the peace in the districts of which Wilkes-Barre formed the whole or a portion previous to the adoption of the constitution of 1838 have been given elsewhere. The following is a list of those who have been incumbents of that office in Wilkes-Barre township and borough since that date, with the years of their election:

William P. Johnson, 1840; John Stark, 1840, 1845; Lyman C. Kidder, 1845; Matthew Wood, 1850; James Williams, 1850; Matthias Belles, 1854; John Londer, 1857, 1867; George Sleppy, 1857; Christian Gruver, 1860; Daniel Harkins, 1867; James E. WILKES-BARRE A CITY.

The city of Wilkes-Barre was incorporated by an act of Assembly approved May 24th, 1871, and included the borough of Wilkes-Barre and all of the township of Wilkes-Barre lying west of the Empire road, projected northerly to the township line of Plains and southerly to the township line of Hanover. It was divided into fifteen wards.

The first municipal election resulted in the choice of the following officers: I. M. Kirkendall, mayor; F. D. Vose, high constable; Isaac S. Osterhout, Adolph Voigt and J. A. Rippard, auditors. The following named gentlemen composed the first board of councilmen: J. E. Clarke, M. Regan, J. C. Williamson, H. B. Hillman, Hiram Wentz, William A. Swan, Walter G. Sterling, H. C. Fry, George H. Parrish, Charles A. Miner, C. P. Kidder, Joseph Schilling, Anthony Helfrich, C. B. Dana, and John Gilligan.

The following named persons have served successively as mayor: 1871-73, I. M. Kirkendall; 1874-76, M. A. Kearney; 1877-79, W. W. Loomis. Thomas Broderick was elected in 1880.

The following named citizens have been elected aldermen in their respective wards in the years given:

First.—Levi Jones, 1872; Thomas Flaherty, 1877; M. Cannon, 1879. Second.—John C. Hilbert, 1871; Edward R. Barrett, 1876. Third.—John F. Donohue, 1876. Fourth.—Charles L. Bulkeley, 1874, 1879. Fifth.—M. J. Philbin, 1871, 1878; James Thomas, 1879. Sixth.—E. H. Hawk, 1873; Michael Murphy, 1878. Seventh.—W. S. Parsons, 1872, 1877. Eighth.—Charles A. Zeigler, 1872, 1877. Sntton, 1874, 1879. Thirteenth.—Frederick A. Seybert, 1871; Jacob Gutendorf, 1874; George Baer, 1879. Fourteenth.—Owen O'Boyle, 1875. Thomas Q. Wagner, 1873; John B. Quick, 1876.

POPULATION.

In 1772 the population of Wilkes-Barre was so small that there were within its borders only five white women; but during the year several of the settlers went east to bring out their families. The whole number of buildings in 1784 was 26, and 23 of these were burned by the Pennamites during that year. The population of the village in 1800 is not definitely known; but the entire number of taxables in the township, as then bounded, the previous year was 121. At the date of the incorporation of the borough (1806) the number of persons living within its limits is said to have been about 500, and there were only 48 houses between North and South streets. The borough had attained to a population of 732 in 1820. In 1830 it was 1,201; in 1840, 1,718; in 1850, 2,723; in 1860, 4,259. About this time the borough began that rapid growth which caused the number of its inhabitants to reach 10,174 in 1870 and to increase to 23,340 in 1880 out of a total of 130,000 for Luzerne county.

EVENTS OF HISTORICAL INTEREST.

The history of the city of Wilkes-Barre has never been written. Those early events which have made its name and location famous to all readers of the pioneer history of Pennsylvania have been recorded from time to time in the various works relating to Wyoming and its tragic past, and isolated articles have appeared which treated of special elements in its growth and prosperity, while a few of the operations incident to its earlier advancement have formed not uninteresting portions of the works above referred to; but the history of the city, as such, treating of its commercial, educational, social, religious and municipal growth is first attempted in this volume. Those events which occurred within the limits of the present city subsequent to the first settlement of Wyoming, and during the trying periods of the Revolutionary and Pennamite wars, were so intimately related to others whose locale was up and down and across the river, in adjoining villages and townships, that it has been found impossible to consider them separately from those other events which, with these, formed the material for the thrilling history of Wyoming. As a remarkable chain of tragic occurrences they have, in their entirety, excited remark from the pens of distinguished historians, poets and novelists on both sides of the Atlantic. They have taken their place in the annals of the commonwealth as without parallel for the many terrible elements which rendered the beautiful Wyoming valley an abiding place for horror, rapine and murder, and to the general history of the county the reader is referred for such record as they have seemed to deserve at our hands. The erection of Forts Durkee, Wyoming and Wilkes-Barre within the borders of the town-plot, Fort Ogden just within the border of Plains and Fort Lillope or Jenkins on the Wilkes-Barre mountain; the capture of John Franklin in 1787 and of Timothy Pickering June 26th, 1788; the zeal of Wilkes-Barreans in the Revolutionary cause; the burning of the village, July 4th, 1788; the capture of Frances Slocum by the Indians and her subsequent interesting story, the sojourn of the Duke of Orleans, the Duke of Montpensier and the Count of Beaujolais, French exiles, at Arndt's tavern in June, 1797, and other noteworthy occurrences are most of them among those referred to above, and all help to form the events in a history as striking and as full of tragic interest as that of any part of the United States. Those events of which the forts mentioned were the centres would, if they could be written of as isolated occurrences, properly belong to the history of the township and present city of Wilkes-Barre. Those events and measures which have contributed to the growth and prosperity of Wilkes-Barre successively as a frontier settlement, a charming country village, a thriving borough and a busy city it is designed to consider in the following pages.

FAMILY NAMES.

"The leading families of Wilkes-Barre," says Clark, "are nearly all direct descendants of the pioneers of Wyoming valley, and are cultured to an enviable degree. * * * A few of the familiar names may be cited as exhibiting the social status of the city. Here is the Ross family, historical as descended from General William Ross; the Hollenbacks, tracing with pride to the old colonel, of whom every household in northern Pennsylvania has heard; the Butlers, from General Lord Butler; the Dorrance family, from Colonel Benjamin Dorrance; the Pettebones, from Noah Pettebone, an old hero in the early struggles; the Johnsons, from Rev. Jacob Johnson; the Myers family; Shoemaker family; the Denisons, from Colonel Nathan Denison; the Sweetlands, M'Kera-chans and Careys; the Ransom and Jenkins families; Inmans, Ives and Abbotts; Blackmans and Starks; the Harding and Dana descendants, now prominent in local history; Beach, Jameson, Perkins, Searle and Gore; Young, Durkee, Sill, Fitch, Atherton, Harvey, Pierce, Gere, Gaylord, Miner, and a long line of others too numerous to mention." It is a singular fact that Mr. Steuben Butler, a son of the colonel commanding, and a daughter of Colonel Denison (Mrs. Sarah Abbott), who was second in command on the field of massacre, are the only living immediate descendants of that fated band of heroic men who fought so desperately on the plains at Wyoming in opposing the savage invaders of the valley in 1778.

EARLY MERCHANTS AND BUILDERS.

There were numbers of young men ready to embark in mercantile enterprises in the new territory to the full extent of their means, anticipating large return profits for their limited outlays. The first settlers brought their first year's supplies with them, and a merchant would have found small resultant profits who depended upon the early settlers alone for his patronage; but here was a promising field for Indian commerce—a great volume of the peltry trade, extending from the Nanticoke falls up the Susquehanna river to Seneca lake and from thence to Niagara, the central point of the Indian traffic in furs—both before and after the Revolutionary struggle.

It is pretty certain that there were Indian traders in Wyoming before the first advent of the Yankee colonists in 1763, and subsequently in 1769; but of these traders there is no record among the archives of the Susquehanna Company, though it is a well established fact that John Jacob Astor visited the valley as early as 1775, and made the tour to Niagara with Matthias Hollenback as his guide and partner in trade. It was during this journey that Mr. Hollenback marked out his future programme as a trader from Wilkes-Barre to Niagara. He came to the valley from Lebanon county, whither his father had come from Virginia, and another branch of the family had settled in Montgomery county. It is quite certain that Mr. Hollenback kept a store on South Main street, just below the corner of Northampton, previous to the battle of July 3d, 1778; and this store was kept after the restoration of peace up to about 1820, when it was removed to the new brick store of George M. Hollenback. Mr. Hollenback was the first regular merchant of Wilkes-Barre, and one of only two merchants in Westmoreland in 1781. His business extended for many years after the war up the Susquehanna river to Niagara, with branches at Wysox, Tioga (N. Y.), and a fur trading house at Niagara, in which he had succeeded John Jacob Astor in 1783.

After the peace of 1783 and the return of the fugitive settlers to Wilkes-Barre there was no lack of storekeepers. Among the first, if not the very first, was Lord Butler, on the corner of River and Northampton streets. This establishment was continued up to 1820. About the same time John P. Schott opened a retail store on River street, between Lord Butler's and South street, but did not continue long in trade. As early as 1795, or perhaps earlier, Thomas Wright and Thomas Duane opened a store in Wilkes-Barre, on the corner of the public square and North Main street, which in 1801 was removed to Pittston Ferry and made an adjunct of Wright's "Old Forge." In 1800 Rossett & Doyle opened quite an establishment on the corner of Market and River streets, which they continued to 1803 or 1804. They were succeeded by Jacob and Joseph L. Suitan, who in 1816 removed to the corner of Franklin and Market streets, where they flourished for many years on the ground where now stands the Wyoming bank. In 1803 Allen Jack came from the north of Ireland to Wilkes-Barre and opened a store on South Main street in the residence of Dr. M. Covell, where he sold goods until his death, in 1814.

In 1804 Benjamin Perry kept a small store on the corner of Northampton and Main streets, and on the opposite corner Nathan Palmer, Esq., dispensed dry goods and groceries. Both these establishments were short-lived. Mr. Palmer sold out to Zebulon Butler, who discontinued the business after a brief period. Ziba Bennett came from Newtown (now Elmira), N. Y., in 1815, and began trade in company with Matthias Hollenback. In 1826 he embarked in business singly, on North Main street, where he continued in trade until his death, in 1878, having been connected with the mercantile business of Wilkes-Barre over sixty years, and having enjoyed the distinction of being recognized as the oldest merchant in Luzerne county.

These were the principal store-keepers of that early period, when the goods were brought from Philadelphia to Harrisburg by wagons, and shipped in Durham boats up the Susquehanna to Wilkes-Barre.

From 1800 to 1802 Joseph Hitchcock was the leading builder, and was succeeded by George Chahoon, who did a very large business up to 1816.

OTHER BUSINESS BEGINNINGS—COAL AND IRON—SHIP-BUILDING—MANUFACTURES.

The business history of the township is identical with that of the city, the commercial progress of both depending largely upon the mining and sale of coal which underlies the surface of the ground in all directions. Iron ore has also been found in the township. As an agricultural township Wilkes-Barre does not take high rank, most of the land outside of the city limits being devoted to the mining of coal and too uneven and broken to be successfully farmed.

In the early days hominy blocks were plenty in the township. The necessity for these rude appliances was done away with in 1782 by the erection of a grist mill on Mill creek, near the river. The builder was James Sutton, who had previously erected mills in Kingston and Exeter townships. It was of hewn logs and had only one run of stones. On the roof was a sentry-box, rendered necessary by the perils of the times, from which a view of the surrounding country could be had. This mill was swept away by the "pumpkin flood."

In 1804 there were six distilleries in Wilkes-Barre township. A shipyard was established on the public common, and the construction of ships was begun in the hope that they could be navigated to the ocean by way of the Susquehanna and there disposed of profitably. In 1803 a small ship named the "Franklin," in honor of John Franklin, was built and reached the ocean in safety. A stock company was organized, and begun operations in 1811; and early in the following year a vessel named the "Luzerne," of between fifty and sixty tons measurement, was finished. The builder was a Mr. Mack, but J. P. Arndt was the principal proprietor. It was launched early in April, and a few days later started on its voyage down the river, only to be dashed to pieces on the rocks at Conawaga Falls, near Middletown. The loss of this vessel was a disaster not only to its proprietors but to many who had hoped to drive a profitable trade in timber, and to others who hoped to reap profit from the sale of lots when the ship-building interest should become permanently established. But like many another alluring project before and since, this had failed and no more ships were built at Wilkes-Barre.

A small cut-nail manufactory was established by Francis McShane in 1811, and for several years a somewhat extensive wholesale and retail business was carried on. There were other enterprises which were begun early and flourished for longer or shorter periods, leaving their impress on the advancement and prosperity of the village and township, though the men who conceived them have long been dead.

EARLY PUBLIC HOUSES.

Abel Yarrington kept a house of entertainment, which was probably the first in Wilkes-Barre, on the ground now occupied by the Judge Conyngham homestead, on River street, below Market, at a very early period. In his journal John Franklin mentions having been at Mr. Yarrington's February 28th, 1789, and again in the following month. Mr. Yarrington removed to what was afterward the Wyoming Hotel, on Main street, below the public square.

Jesse Fell kept the "Old Fell house" before the beginning of this century, it having been erected in 1787 or 1788. This ancient hostelry, a part of which is incorporated in the present structure, was during its earlier days headquarters for the legal fraternity, and as such was the scene of frequent festivities. It was here that Jesse Fell, in 1808, made his first experiment of burning anthracite coal in an open grate.

Another old-time inn and one that had historic associations was the Arndt tavern, which stood on River street below Northampton, on the site of the residence of E. P. Darling, Esq. The proprietor was John P. Arndt, who with his brother Philip came from Easton at an early date and engaged in various business enterprises. Thomas H. Morgan succeeded Mr. Arndt, and he in turn was followed by Major Orlando Porter, whose stay was brief, he soon taking charge of the then new Phœnix, out of which has grown the Wyoming Valley Hotel. The fame of the old tavern declined gradually and it eventually became a dwelling house. The old Arndt tavern sheltered the royal fugitives of France, princes of the Orleans-Bourbon line, afterwards Louis Phillippe, king of the French, and his two brothers, the Duke de Montpensier and Count de Beaujolais, on their way to Bradford county, where Robert Morris had purchased for them 1,200 acres of land lying on the Susquehanna river. This place is still known as Frenchtown. Another noted visitor at the old inn, which was pre-eminently the center of social gaiety, was the beautiful and accomplished wife of Herman Blennerhasset, so graphically described by William Wirt in the trial of Aaron Burr for treason. This visit was made subsequent to Burr's conspiracy, which resulted in the ruin of the Blennerhassets.

At a later date a hotel at the corner of Market and River streets was kept by a little round fat man named Richardson, and afterwards by a widow Johnson. Thomas Duane, John Paul Scott and afterwards Jonathan Hancock kept a hotel where the Luzerne House now is. The latter also kept open house at the corner of Market and Franklin streets. Archippus Parrish kept a hotel on the public square near the site of the Daily Record of the Times office. It was set fire to and burned down in warming it for a Washington's birth-day ball. Mock's tavern, on the hillside just below South Wilkes-Barre, is well remembered by many of the present citizens of Wilkes-Barre. Years ago it was noted as the scene of too convivial Sunday gatherings, which were broken up by a few Christian workers who, with the consent of the proprietor, established a flourishing Sunday school in the old hostelry.

OTHER PRIMITIVE THINGS AND EVENTS.

Probably the first physician to minister to citizens of Wilkes-Barre was Dr. William Hooker Smith, who emigrated from New York and settled in the clearing at Wilkes-Barre in 1772. After Sullivan's campaign, in which he participated, he located permanently at Old Forge. Drs. Joseph Sprague and Gustin, who were also early settlers in the valley, were no doubt called to visit the afflicted in the settlement. Previous to 1800 Doctor Matthew Covell located permanently in Wilkes-Barre, and he and Dr. George W. Trott were both practicing there before 1810. Doctor Samuel Baldwin resided in Wilkes-Barre for a time, and afterwards crossed the river into Kingston. The first settled preacher was Rev. Jacob Johnson. The earliest professional lawyer was Anderson Dana. The first dwelling within the limits of the town plot was John Abbott's log cabin, erected at the southwest corner of Main and Northampton streets in 1769. The first brick buildings were the dwelling of Joseph Slocum, on the southeast side of the public square, afterward occupied by his son-in-law Lord Butler, and that of Benjamin Perry, at the corner of Main and Northampton streets, both erected in 1807.

The first marriage in the township was celebrated in a log cabin which stood at the corner of River and South streets, on the ground since occupied by the old Wells house, in 1769. The contracting parties were Colonel Nathan Denison and Miss Sill. The first birth occurred in 1773. It was that of Lazarus Denison, a son of the couple above mentioned. The first restaurant in the village was opened by Sam Wright, a negro, who came from New Jersey in 1822.

Professor Wise, the celebrated aeronaut, whose disaster in September, 1879, is yet fresh in the minds of the reading public, made the first balloon ascension in Wilkes-Barre in 1842, descending on the west side of the Susquehanna after a two hours' flight.

THE "COMMON" ON THE RIVER BANK.

When Colonel Durkee laid out the town plot of Wilkes-Barre he donated the public square and the common for "the use of the public forever," and they were successively under the jurisdiction of the town of Westmoreland, the township of Wilkes-Barre and the borough and afterwards the city of Wilkes-Barre. The original boundaries of the common were probably the same as those of the present day. Years ago it was much wider than now, numerous floods having washed away a portion. "As I first remember this common," wrote Mr. James A. Gordon, "it was a beautiful lawn extending from South street along the river bank to North street. Between Union and North streets, along the base of Redoubt Hill, was a low wet marsh, very imperfectly drained, or rather not drained at all. Immediately at the northern base of the redoubt, lived Mollie McCalpin, in rather a hard-looking shanty, built by herself with the aid of Job Gibbs, who was at that time reputed to be the laziest man in Wilkes-Barre. But Mollie was not the only trespasser upon these public grounds." Matthias Hollenback's warehouse and another, the property of John P. Arndt, stood on the common; but both disappeared long since, and mother McCalpin's shanty is seen no more. At various times enterprising or speculative business men have attempted to lease portions of the common for the erection of buildings in which to carry on commerce. In 1808 an effort was made by certain parties to drain that part lying between North and Union streets, the ulterior object being to obtain and hold possession of the land for the benefit of the proposed drainers; but that and all subsequent attempts failed, it having been decided that the borough had no authority to lease the common nor any portion of it; and it remains to-day the property of the public, a place much frequented by both residents and visitors, and one of the most attractive spots in the city. Forts Durkee and Wyoming stood on the common, which because of its historical associations will long remain a point of interest.

THE WILKES-BARRE FERRY AND BRIDGE.

The early settlers were too poor to build a bridge between the settlements of Wilkes-Barre and Kingston, but they had recourse to a cheap and convenient means of crossing in the way of a ferry. When the borough of Wilkes-Barre was incorporated the borough authorities were granted the exclusive right to maintain a ferry between the two localities, and until it was superseded by the bridge it was let annually to enterprising parties, who paid certain rentals into the borough treasury.

The Wilkes-Barre Bridge Company was incorporated in 1807. The bridge was completed in 1818, at a cost of $44,000. The builders were Messrs. Wernwag & Powell, and they were two years engaged in its construction. In 1819 the pier nearest to Wilkes-Barre was undermined and two reaches of the bridge lost. The damage was repaired by the State, at an expense of $13,000. In 1824 the entire bridge was lifted from the piers by a hurricane and deposited on the ice several feet distant from its original location; $15,000 to be devoted to its repair was appropriated by the State, which by this added sum became possessed of $28,000 stock in the concern, which was subsequently sold. The architect in charge of these repairs was Reuben Fields. The bridge, with occasional repairs and renewals of certain portions, has since existed, and has been a source of profit to the stockholders. Upon the introduction of the street railway between Kingston and Wilkes-Barre, the bridge became the means by which the track crosses the river, though its use as a foot and wagon bridge is in no way interfered with. Efforts have been made from time to time, but unsuccessfully thus far, to obtain authority from the court instructing the county commissioners to take possession of the bridge, with a view to its being maintained by taxation for the public benefit, and it seems not unlikely that such a measure may be carried in the future.

REMINISCENCES OF THE OLD COURT-HOUSE.

The bell on the old court-house was cast by George Hedderly, in Philadelphia, in 1805, and during the years that followed served to summon the inhabitants of the town to meetings of every kind common to such a community. It called the criminal to receive his sentence, and the man who had not been proven guilty to receive his acquittal; it summoned the people to hear the preaching of the gospel and the eloquence of political advocates; if the people were to be assembled for any purpose the old court-house bell was generally brought into requisition. Various were the uses to which the court-house was put, serving for all judicial and deliberative proceedings, and as a public or town hall. It is said to have been utilized as a dancing academy and as a church, and it is authoritatively stated that a meat market was kept in the basement at one time—as Mistress Tuttle had, before its time, sold cakes and beer in the lower story of the old log building. June 11th, 1810, an ordinance was passed by the council of Wilkes-Barre ordaining that until a suitable market house could be erected the cellar of the court-house should be used as a market place “on and after July 13th next.” Two days in the week were set apart as market days, Wednesday and Saturday being so distinguished, and the place was ordered to be kept open from five to ten A. M., and the clerk of the market was authorized to erect one or more stalls, benches and blocks, and provide scales and other articles necessary to the traffic of the place.

MAIL FACILITIES AND THE POST-OFFICE.

In 1777 a post route was opened between Hartford, Connecticut, and Wyoming, in the benefits of which the residents of Wilkes-Barre, the chief settlement, largely participated. Previous to that date what little mail passed between that point and the outside world had been carried by private messengers. The post-rider was Prince Bryant, who made the trip once in two weeks. During the period of the continued struggle between Pennsylvania and Connecticut for supremacy over Wyoming, regular mail communication was interrupted and messages were carried to and fro by men employed by the settlers for that purpose.

A post-office was established at Wilkes-Barre in 1794, with Lord Butler as postmaster. It may easily be conceived that his official labor must have been the reverse of arduous, and that his office, at the corner of River and Northampton streets, must have contrasted unfavorably with the elegant, well arranged and commodious city post-office of the present day in Music Hall block. But it was not until after the close of the Revolution, and the organization of Luzerne county in 1786, that provision was made for a weekly mail between Wilkes-Barre and Easton. Clark Behee was the post-rider, but whether the first over the route does not appear, though there is evidence that he filled that position in 1797, during which year weekly mails were carried from Wilkes-Barre to Berwick via Nanticoke, Newport and Nescopeck, the return route being via Huntington and Plymouth. At this time Wilkes-Barre enjoyed the distinction of being the only regularly established post-town in the county, and mail for residents of the townships mentioned was left at certain houses within their limits chosen by the post-master at Wilkes-Barre.

A mail route was established between Wilkes-Barre and Great Bend in 1798, and another between Wilkes-Barre and Owego, New York. The mails were received by the former route once a fortnight and by the latter once a week. Both were sustained by private contributions chiefly, if not entirely, like those of the early settlers before the war. It is said that subscribers to newspapers had to pay at the rate of $2 a year to the mail carrier for the privilege of receiving them. In 1800 Jonathan Hancock was a post-rider between Wilkes-Barre and Berwick. In 1803 Charles Mowery and a man named Peck carried the mails on foot between Wilkes-Barre and Tioga, N. Y., making the trip once in two weeks.

The history of the advance in mail facilities from this time forward is coincident with that of “staging,” nearly all the stages having carried the mails. With the first railroad came added mail conveniences, which have been increased from year to year since, until the residents of the city in 1880 can have but a faint conception of the difficulties under which their forefathers labored in this respect one hundred or seventy-five or even fifty years ago.

Lord Butler was the postmaster until 1802, when he was succeeded by John Hollenback. The names of those who have been appointed since that time are as follows: Ezekiel Hyde, 1805; Jonathan Hancock, 1805; Jacob Cist, 1808; A. Beaumont, 1826; William Ross, 1832; Daniel Collings, 1835; A. O. Chahoon, 1841; J. P. Le-Clerc, 1844; E. B. Collings, 1845; Steuben Butler, 1849; John Reichard, 1853; Jacob Sorber, 1854; E. B. Collings, 1858; S. M. Barton, 1861; E. H. Chase, 1865; Peter Pursel, 1867; Stewart Pearce, 1869; Douglass Smith, 1877.

The number of letters of all classes, including postal cards, sent from Wilkes-Barre post-office during the first week of November, 1879, was 15,765; number of regular newspapers sent, 11,232; transient newspapers, 1,129; packages of merchandise, 183; total pieces of mail matter sent, 28,309.

EDUCATIONAL HISTORY.

The educational history of Wilkes-Barre begins with the arrival of the emigrants from Connecticut in 1769. under the auspices of the Susquehanna Land Company, This company granted to the first settlers of Wyoming large bodies of land in each township as an incentive to immigration. This land was designated as a foundation for a permanent school fund for all time to come. If the school fund had been properly managed the citizens of the township would undoubtedly have long since been free from taxation for educational purposes. The town of Wilkes-Barre has no separate school history from old Westmoreland until 1773, when an effort was made to support the schools by taxation; but it was a failure, and if there were any schools in Wilkes-Barre at that period they must have been supported by private subscriptions or tuition fees up to the time when the borough accepted the provisions of the common school law.

EARLY SCHOOLS.

On the organization of Luzerne county Wilkes-Barre had her school-houses, which had previously been built by the proprietors as the trustees of the bounty of the Susquehanna Land Company, but no free school was ever based upon this educational fund.

As early as 1790 there was a school-house—the only one in the town plot—standing upon the east side of the public square just in front of where now is William H. Sporing's grocery store, which was usually occupied about nine months during the year. At a later period there was another on the plains near the residence of Henry Courtright, and another on the hill, on Dr. Covell's farm, just below the site of the depot of the passenger railroad in South Wilkes-Barre.

Among early teachers was Godlove Nicholas Lutyens, a graduate of Gottingen University. He was succeeded in 1802 by Asher Miner, the printer and editor of the Wilkes-Barre Gazette and afterwards of the Luzerne Federalist. Previous to 1806 or 1807 several select schools were opened at various times, among which was one by a Mr. Parmaly, a regular Yankee schoolmaster, in the old still-house on Main street, just at the foot of Bowman hill. There was another on East Union street, conducted for many years by William Wright, an educated Irishman. This school had a high reputation, and continued to flourish up to the time of Mr. Wright's death in 1816. There were also summer schools under the lead of old-fashioned schoolmistresses, and a Mrs. Jabez Fish's juvenile academy on the bank of the river, at the lower end of the Common, where was taught for years the Westminster Catechism from the John Rogers primer.

The Constitution of 1790 required legislative provisions for the education of the poor; and in pursuance thereof, by the act of 1809 and its supplement, the assessors of every township were required to make return of all children whose parents were unable to pay for their tuition to the county commissioners, who were required to pay the respective teachers their bills for these charity scholars. This law was a dead letter practically. Very few parents cared to put their children on the list of paupers, even for the purposes of education, and for ten years after 1824 but $3,500 was paid by the county on that account, and Wilkes-Barre's was the least amount in proportion to its population.

THE WILKES-BARRE ACADEMY.

In 1807 the Wilkes-Barre Academy was incorporated with a donation of $2,000 from the State. Ebenezer Bowman, Lord Butler, Matthias Hollenback, William Ross, Jesse Fell, Joseph Suito, Joseph Slocum and others were the trustees. Ebenezer Bowman was president of the board up to the day of his death. What memories are recalled by the mention of this institution, where many of the most influential men of the Wyoming valley received their education, and from which others have gone out to win names and fame in the outside world! It was the first and for some time the only institution of learning above the grade of common school in old Luzerne. The board of trustees obtained from the county the old court-house and jail, which they improved and converted into their school-rooms, and opened a kind of school as an apology for a classical institute. The first teacher was Samuel Jackson. He was succeeded by a Mr. Root. Then David Scott took charge of the concern and organized an English grammar class. He wrote the text-book, and each pupil had to make his own copy in manuscript, until "Murray's" was introduced in 1809. This year the trustees enlarged their building and imported from Yale Garrick Mallery (just then graduated) as principal, at a salary of $1,000 per annum; and now Wilkes-Barre began to be looked upon as the educational center of all northern Pennsylvania and southern New York. The institution was fairly opened with Garrick Mallery as principal, Edward Chapman and Thomas Bartlett as assistants, and Jacob Taylor as writing master.

The little town was crowded with students from abroad. The catalogue embraced some seventy-five non-resident pupils. The school flourished as long as Mr. Mallery remained at its head. At the end of the year he retired to

Charles P. Waller

CHARLES P. WALLER.

Charles P. Waller, son of Phineas and Elizabeth Jewett Waller, was born in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., August 7th, 1819, and is the sixth in a family of seven children, six of whom are now (1880) living, viz.: Abram B., Nathan P., William L., Rev. David J., of Bloomsburg, Harriet M. (wife of Rev. Dr. S. M. Andrews, of Doylestown, Pa.), and George G., a lawyer of Honesdale, Pa. Phineas, a native of Massachusetts, moved into the Wyoming valley in 1774, with his father's family. He was a farmer by occupation, and lived to the advanced age of eighty-six years. Nathan, his father, a farmer, settled in the Wyoming valley when Phineas was a young man, where he died in 1832.

Charles P. spent his youth at home and in the schools of Wilkes-Barre from eleven years of age, and in 1838 he entered Williams College, where he was a student for two years, when through weakness of his eyes he was obliged to discontinue his studies. During the winters of 1839 and 1840 he was principal of the Bloomsburg Academy, and was the first to organize a classical school there. In 1841 he commenced the study of law with Judge Collins, of Wilkes-Barre. He was admitted to the bar in the winter of 1843, and immediately entered upon the practice of his profession, which he successfully and continuously carried on until 1874, when he was elected president judge of Wayne county, Pa., which office he still (1880) holds. As a proof of his popularity he was elected on the Republican ticket in a district which is Democratic by 2,000 majority. On April 3d, 1845, he married Harriet W., daughter of Henry W. Stone, of Mt. Pleasant, Wayne county, Pa. She was born June 15th, 1826. The result of this union is two children—Lizzie J. (wife of William H. Stanton, of Honesdale), and Mary S. All of the family have been for several years members of the Presbyterian church. Future generations will remember Mr. Waller as a genial companion, an able counsellor and an honest man.

John S. Lampman

JOHN S. LAMPMAN, OCULIST AND AURIST.

The subject of this sketch was born in Pittston, Pa., December 20th, 1838, and is a son of Norman and Phebe Lampman. His father was skillful in treating diseases of the eye, and John early manifested great talent in locating them and in applying proper remedies. He applied himself to make discoveries and succeeded in bringing into use remedies unknown to any other oculist in the world, rendering his mode of treatment entirely original. He began his practice in his own family by treating and curing an afflicted sister in 1863. During that year the elder Lampman died and John assumed his practice, residing at Pleasant Valley, near Pittston, until 1876, when he removed to Wilkes-Barre, where, at 405 and 407 Northampton street, he has (September, 1880,) more than 500 patients under his care, with the number constantly increasing.

January 23d, 1872, he married Margaret Shales, who proved to be well fitted for the charge of her department in the infirmary. Affable and courteous, it became an easy task for her to provide for the comfort and pleasure of the afflicted, even children placed under her care having remained with perfect contentment. Dr. Lampman has been particularly successful in the treatment of amaurosis, using no instruments, but curing with medicines cases thought to be incurable without surgical operations. For the treatment of this disease he prepared a cooling wash for the head which he discovered was useful in restoring lost hair, and his "celebrated Neuralgic Cure and Universal Hair Producer" will, in time, be thrown into market as the only safe preparation for the use for which it is designed. Besides treating all diseases of the eye, he has carefully studied and successfully treated the ear, an organ peculiarly liable to disease and accident. He has never been an extensive advertiser, has never traveled as an oculist and has always lived and practiced within ten miles of the place of his birth, relying upon his cures to bring him patients, who have come to his infirmary in large numbers from every State in the union. His terms are less than one-half the usual charges of oculists, and render his treatment available to the afflicted poor.

Did such endorsement form a proper part of a biographical sketch many testimonials might be presented of the skill of Dr. Lampman and innumerable cases of his successful treatment of disease cited. To those who have been treated by him no such endorsement is necessary; and they, themselves, are his strongest recommendation to the afflicted in all parts of the country. Where he is best known his treatment is most highly spoken of, and no laudations are necessary in a work which must be restricted in its circulation to that portion of the State of Pennsylvania contiguous to the locality of his life and successful professional career. Inviting rigid scrutiny, he has, in the midst of many difficulties and beset by the petty jealousies of rival practitioners, established an extensive and lucrative practice in the county of his nativity and among the people who have known him from childhood. This has been accomplished only by the exercise of indomitable energy, great skill and rare judgment and a rigid integrity that has made every patient his friend and endorser.

pursue his law studies, and was afterward president judge of the State courts, and as an able lawyer he won a national reputation. During the administration of Mr. Mallery Andrew Beaumont, then a new comer, and an active young man of much promise, who has since been a representative in the State Assembly and in Congress, and held other important official positions, was employed as his assistant. Under their management Greek, Latin, mathematics and the higher English branches were taught. Their successor was Rev. Mr. Thayer, a Congregational minister of the Old School and a graduate of Harvard University, who retired at the end of a year. He was succeeded by Mr. Janeson and then Rev. William Woodbridge and others conducted the institution up to about 1818, when Joel Jones, a graduate of Harvard college, became the principal and remained two or three years. Upon his retirement his brother Joseph H. Jones took charge of the institution, and conducted it with great ability for several years. He was followed by Messrs. Woodbridge, Baldwin, Granger, Orton, Miner, Talcott, Ullman, Hubbard and Dana. After the erection of the second court-house the old building was converted to the uses of the academy, having been removed to a point within the public square, a little west of the present court-house. After many years' use the old edifice was sold to Colonel H. F. Lamb, and a portion of it was removed to Franklin street and constituted a part of a dwelling.

Among the students of the old academy we may mention the following, who have gained distinction in their chosen careers; Lieutenant J. C. Beaumont, of the United States navy; Major A. H. Bowman, of the United States army; Major E. W. Morgan, who served his country in Mexico and later was principal of the Newport, Ky., military school; Hon. Hendrick B. Wright, a well known lawyer and politician of Luzerne county and the State at the present time; Hon. B. A. Bidlack, who represented his district in Congress, and later was sent as United States minister to New Granada, where he died; Hon. George W. Woodward, one of the most eminent legal lights of the commonwealth; Judge Luther Kidder; Dr. S. D. Gross, an eminent professor of surgery in the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia; Rev. Samuel Bowman, D. D., at one time acting bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in Pennsylvania; ex-Attorney General Ovid F. Johnson; George Catlin, the well known American artist; Rev. Zebulon Butler, D. D., of Mississippi, and Prof. J. S. White, at one time a prominent educator of Philadelphia. With such results the older citizens of Wilkes-Barre have just reason for pride in memory of the old academy.

OTHER ACADEMIC SCHOOLS.

About 1840 Mr. Dana had erected a building on Academy street and organized a classical school, which in a measure took the position previously occupied by the old academy in the public square. A brick building was erected in 1842 on the site of the old structure, and under the direction of Messrs. Owen and Jackson a high school had a successful existence in it for a number of years; but in consequence of various causes in time it lost much of its prestige and became only an ordinary day school. E. B. Harvey, Esq., purchased this building in 1848, and moved it to Union street and converted it into a dwelling.

THE WILKES-BARRE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The public schools of the city of Wilkes-Barre are embraced in three districts. The provisions of the new constitution applying to cities of the fourth class having never been adopted by this city, the government of the schools remains the same as when the city was incorporated, and the three school districts erected under an act of Assembly approved May 24th, 1871. These districts are under the supervision of the county superintendent, and are entirely independent of one another, being each governed by a separate board of directors.

The first school district is made up of the first, second, third, sixth and ninth wards of the city, and the remaining portion of the north district of Wilkes-Barre township not included within the city limits at the time of incorporation. The school board consists of six members, one from each of the wards and one from the township. The board is now (1880) organized as follows: President, George N. Reichard; secretary, J. C. Williamson; treasurer, Fred Roth. The statement of the school board of this district for 1878 was as follows: Whole number of schools, 19; number of months taught, 10; number of male teachers, 5; number of female teachers, 14; average salary of males per month, $65; average salary of females per month, $40; whole number of scholars, 2,072; average number attending school, 949; percentage of attendance, 79; tax levy (number of mills) 20. Under the present principal, T. J. McConnor, the schools have been carefully graded, and now possess primary and grammar grades corresponding to a considerable extent to the same grades in the third district, to be described hereafter.

The second school district comprises the thirteenth and fourteenth wards of the city and the south district of Wilkes-Barre township, less what was taken into the city limits at the time of incorporation. There are five members in the school board—two from each of the wards and one from the township. The organization is as follows: President, A. H. Van Horn; secretary, Michael Gibbons; treasurer, Joseph Hendler. The report for 1878 gives the following showing: Whole number of schools, 10; number of months taught, 9; number of male teachers, 6; number of female teachers, 4; average salary of males per month, $63.33; average salary of females per month, $40; whole number of scholars, 893; average number attending school, 525; percentage of attendance, 83; tax levy (number of mills) 18. Under the direction of Henry A. Reid as principal until within two years, and more recently of J. C. Bell, these schools have been partially graded.

The third school district is essentially the old borough of Wilkes-Barre. It embraces the fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth and fifteenth wards of the city.

The history of the old borough schools is really the history of the schools of this district. In 1834 this district in common with nearly all the districts of Luzerne county approved of the provisions of the common school law, and the school board levied a school tax and set the school in operation. For over thirty years the schools were devoid of anything to distinguish them—unless it might have been their general inefficiency. Teachers were paid very poor salaries; the school term was very short; the buildings were either miserable old frame hulks, or rooms rented here and there over the town as necessity might determine for the accommodation of pupils. In the year 1850-51 there were nine teachers employed at an average salary of $23.11 per month, and the length of the school term was five months. Nor did this state of things improve in some particulars for many years later. The statement of the school board for 1865-6 reveals the following facts: number of schools, 11; number of months taught, 4; number of female teachers, 14; male teachers, 3; average salary of male teachers per month, $50; average salary of female teachers per month, $35; whole number of pupils attending school, 187. Is it to be wondered at that private and select schools were in a flourishing condition? An old settlement like Wilkes-Barre, possessed of a high degree of culture, demanded education for its children, and the private schools furnished what the public schools could not. But a new era was dawning even in 1865. The revival of business and increase of values that followed the close of the war, with the free distribution of money that attended it, made it possible for better things in the way of education. As early as November 28th, 1863, at an adjourned meeting of the board over which C. F. Reets presided, L. C. Paine offered the following resolution, which was adopted: "Resolved that the president be and is hereby directed and requested to enter into a contract with Ziba Bennett, Esq., for the purchase of a lot at the corner of Washington street and Butler alley, at a price not to exceed $1,800, * * * * and that he report his action on the same at the next meeting." At the next meeting, held December 5th, Mr. Reets reported that he had made the contract as directed; the report was accepted and adopted and an order drawn for the purchase money. At a meeting held March 19th, 1864, presided over by the same gentlemen, the building committee was authorized to advertise for proposals for the new school building ("excavating cellar, building brick and stone walls, &c., &c."). This motion was renewed and carried at a meeting held June 12th, 1865, over which Rev. George D. Miles presided. At a meeting August 1st, 1865 (Mr. Miles presiding), the size of the building was determined upon and a building committee appointed. September 19th, 1865, it was decided that the new building should be three stories high and that an addition three stories high should be added to the rear for recitation rooms. December 26, 1865, a contract was made with bricklayers for raising the walls of the building. The work of erection went on apace during the winter of 1865-6 and the spring and summer following.

The organization of the new board June 5th, 1866, was signalized by the appearance of two new members, his excellency Governor Henry M. Hoyt and Attorney General Henry W. Palmer, both elected for three years.

The new brick building was now completed. It was capable of accommodating ten schools, and had six recitation rooms besides that could be used for school rooms if required. The minutes of a meeting of the board held November 6th, 1866, contain the following: "On motion of Henry M. Hoyt it was resolved that the board do hereby employ Charles J. Collins as superintendent of the public schools of the borough of Wilkes-Barre during the balance of the current school year ending June 1, 1877, at a salary at the rate of $1,000 per year—his engagement to commence at this date." Mr. Collins accepted this appointment; at once entered into the work with enthusiasm; visited the schools of Philadelphia, New York and Boston; became familiar with their best features; returned, and on December 10th, 1866, entered upon his work as principal and superintendent of the Wilkes-Barre schools. How well he succeeded during this first year is indicated by the report of the board for this year: "The board in the most emphatic manner, desire to recognize their obligations to Rev. Charles J. Collins. To him as principal and superintendent of all the schools we attribute whatever success we have achieved. From a chaos of unclassified elements he has wrought order; he has adjusted conflicting views, and from inharmonious materials has produced an evenly balanced, perfect working machine. The amount of labor, time, well directed skill, energy and conscience which he put into his work is best known to your board. Himself a mature scholar and experienced educator, he quickly apprehended the wants of our locality, and rapidly impressed upon the crude materials before him the best features of our best schools, worked out of the latest experience. His enthusiasm was at all times unabated; his interest in the cause of education was the result of a conviction of its utility, and he most conscientiously met every responsibility before him."

This term was a short one, though longer than that of the year preceding, being five months in duration. The whole number of pupils increased from 187 to 676. The names of the members of the board on the tablet of this new building are as follows: President, George D. Miles; secretary, Charles F. Reets; treasurer, Moses D. Wilson; George B. Kulp, D. L. Rhone, Charles Roth, Samuel S. Weller, Dennis McQuillin, Lee W. Stewart.

At this time the borough contained three wards, each having three members in the board. Mr. Collins's plan embodied several distinct principles. One of these was an accurate system of grading, fixing the starting point and the limit of each branch to be studied in any particular grade. Another was the introduction of the object system of teaching in the primary grades, together with calisthenics and music. Still another and a corollary to the first two was the employment of professional teachers—those especially prepared for the work in the normal schools of the county. June 18th, 1867, the committee on teachers were instructed and authorized to employ six female teachers, "educated to teach," from abroad at a salary not exceeding $500 for nine months. The schools were opened in September with the corps reinforced by six trained teachers from the Philadelphia, Albany and Oswego normal schools. The work of this year was an improvement over the last: the number of schools increased from ten to eighteen, the number of months taught from five to eight and a half and the whole number of pupils from 676 to 817. At the beginning of the year 1868-9 the teaching force contained a still larger percentage of trained teachers from the normal schools named above and from the Pennsylvania State Normal school at Millersville, employed at better salaries and for a term of ten months. The number of pupils also increased from 817 to 943. During this year the advanced class of the grammar department (the highest grade, thus far, in the school) finished three or four of the branches of study and were prepared for advancement. But the schools still suffered one serious drawback. The large building on Washington street was not sufficient to accommodate all the schools, consequently the board was compelled to continue the occupation of the miserable old buildings heretofore described. This difficulty was met, however, by the purchase of a suitable lot and the erection thereon of the elegant and commodious brick building on Franklin street near Academy. June 8th, 1868 the purchase of the lot was authorized; January 25th, 1869, it was reported and approved; shortly after the contract was given, and before the year had ended the building was completed. It is capable of accommodating twelve grades or classes. A marble tablet in the building contains the following names of members composing the school board at that time: President, Charles Roth; treasurer, Charles F. Reets; secretary, Henry W. Palmer; Henry M. Hoyt, George B. Kulp, Philip Steinhaur, Samuel S. Weller, Dennis McQuillin and Philip Banker. Accommodations were now furnished for all the pupils of the district. The year 1869-70 was characterized by the establishment of the high school department and the election of Mr. Collins borough superintendent, with powers co-ordinate with the county superintendent. Early in 1870 the borough was declared a separate district, and January 17th Mr. Collins was duly elected and shortly afterward was commissioned borough superintendent. This position he held until August 1st, 1874, when, owing to ill health, he resigned. The system of grading adopted by Mr. Collins extended over a period of twelve years' tuition, four in the primary grades, four in the grammar and four in the high school. Later the high school course was shortened to three years, but in other respects the course of instruction, grading, rules of order and government and methods of discipline and instruction remain materially the same as when they came from the hands of Mr. Collins in 1874.

In 1873-4 the elegant new building on St. Clement's street was erected and named the Conyngham graded school building. It was rendered necessary by the rapid increase in the population of the lower parts of the city at that time. The following named gentlemen composed the board at the time of its completion: President, H. H. Derr; secretary, Dr. G. W. Guthrie; George B. Kulp, S. S. Weller, George M. Nagle, Jacob Schmitt and C. F. Reets. A few years later a fine building for the accommodation of colored children was erected at the corner of Washington and South streets.

The statement made by the board for the year ending on the first Monday of June, 1879, embodies the following facts:

Whole number of schools, 30; number of months taught, 10; number of male teachers, 7; number of female teachers, 25; average salary of males per month, $74.50; average salary of females per month, $45.60; whole number of scholars, 1,677; average number attending school, 1,316; percentage of attendance, 92; tax levy (number of mills), 10.

The board (April, 1880,) is composed as follows: President, William J. Harvey; secretary, Dr. G. W. Guthrie; Martin Frey, George S. Bennett, Dr. O. F. Harvey, J. W. Driesbach and S. H. Sturdevant.

Thus we have a brief picture of the marvelous growth of the schools of Wilkes-Barre in efficiency and general popularity. From being what the board in their report for 1866-7 pronounced them—"utterly useless, if not actually vicious—" they have become one of the chief attractive features of the city. Already there is a clamor for still better things. The first new building erected, the Washington street grammar and high school, has in it some serious defects, and the public demands a better building. There is reason to believe that still another new edifice will be erected that will be a crowning glory to the already famous schools of Wilkes-Barre.

THE WILKES-BARRE FEMALE INSTITUTE.

This educational institution, under the auspices of the Presbytery of Luzerne, was chartered April 10th, 1854. The following trustees were appointed: George M. Hollenback, Alexander Gray, Harrison Wright, Ario Pardee, Samuel Wadhams, John Brown, John Urquhart, Henry M. Fuller, Elisha B. Harvey, William R. Glen, John Faser, Andrew T. McClintock and Rev. J. Dorrance, ex officio. At a meeting held April 15th, 1854 George M. Hollenback was chosen president; John Faser, treasurer, and Edward M. Covell, secretary, and a building committee was appointed. May 8th, 1854, Rev. John Dorrance reported that the Presbyterian church of Wilkes-Barre had raised $10,000 for the establishment of the institute, and soon afterward a contract was awarded to D. A. Fell & Co. for the erection of a suitable building on River street above Smith, which was finished and the school opened in it September 13th, 1854. April 30th, 1874, this building was sold, and in May, 1876, a lot was purchased on South street, at the corner of Barnum place, on which it is intended to erect a large and convenient building for the use of the school. Since October, 1876, the Judge Conyngham homestead, on River street, has been occupied by the institute.

The first principal of the school was Rev. Joseph E. Nassau, who accepted the position June 24th, 1854, and resigned in January, 1855. He was succeeded by Rev. C. J. Collins, who resigned November 28th following. Rev. S. Hutchins was appointed in March, 1856, and resigned in July, 1857. September 5th following R. S. Howes, A. M., was chosen to the position. He was succeeded by W. S. Parsons, Esq., under whose management the school opened in September, 1864, and who served until June, 1872. From this time until October, 1876, the school was abandoned. At the date last mentioned it was reopened in its present quarters, with Dr. J. F. Rothrock as principal. Dr. Rothrock was succeeded by Mrs. F. C. Hosmer and Miss E. H. Rockwell, two ladies of large and successful experience as educators in Massachusetts and Princeton, N. J., who opened the school September 12th, 1877. The course of study is arranged for six years—two in the preparatory department and four in the academic. The grade of pupils is determined by examination. No pupils are received who are under eleven years of age. Opportunity is given for the study of the French, German, Latin and Greek languages. Ancient and modern history, in connection with progress in literature, art, science and civilization, receive particular attention. The business management of the institute is vested in the board of trustees, of which Andrew T. McClintock is president and Douglas Smith secretary and treasurer.

MALLINCKRODT CONVENT.

This institution, an academy of the Sisters of Christian Charity, a boarding and day school for young girls, was founded in 1878 by the Sisters of Christian Charity, who emigrated from Germany to America in 1873, the founder of the society being a noble lady, Miss Pauline von Mallinckrodt, sister of the much lamented Hermann von Mallinckrodt, member of the German parliament, who died some years ago. The Mallinckrodt Convent is, besides its being a pensionat for young girls, the mother-house and novitiate of the Sisters of Christian Charity who are devoted to the instruction and education of the young in parochial schools, academies, orphan-houses, etc., in many places throughout the United States. It affords many advantages to young girls desirous of acquiring a solid, polite and religious education. The course of instruction is given in both the German and English languages, and embraces a wide range of useful branches.

ST. MARY'S CONVENT.

St. Mary's school, on Canal street, in charge of the Sisters of Mercy, was opened in October, 1875. The pupils numbered over five hundred, and were divided into five classes, three of girls and two of boys. A few months later two teachers were added and a more complete classification was obtained.

The children attending this school are afforded every opportunity for obtaining a thorough English education. The annual closing exercises were held for the first time in June, 1876, at which time an academy for young ladies attached to St. Mary's Convent, on Washington street, was opened, with about forty pupils in attendance, divided into two classes. At this institution, besides a complete course of English, are taught vocal and instrumental music, drawing and wax and needle work.

LITERATURE AND LITERARY PEOPLE OF WILKES-BARRE.

As early as 1800, Abram Bradley, an ex-Revolutionary captain who had come into the valley from Connecticut four years before, published the first book ever issued at Wilkes-Barre. It was a 12mo from the press of Asher and Charles Miner, and was entitled "A New Theory of the Earth." The Messrs. Miner published in 1803 a book of 142 pages, under the somewhat lengthy title of "The Susquehanna Controversy Examined. The Material Objections against the Connecticut Claimants Answered. Done with Truth and Candor by Samuel Avery, Esq." It is said to have been a valuable publication. A poem by Joseph McCoy, cashier of the Philadelphia branch bank, entitled "The Frontier Maid, or a Tale of Wyoming," was printed and published by Steuben Butler and Samuel Maffit in 1819. It possessed little literary merit, and subsequently becoming dissatisfied with it Mr. McCoy collected and destroyed all the copies he could find. The Miners during their career at Wilkes-Barre as editors and publishers issued a hymn book, a work on alchemy by Dr. William Hooker Smith and a collection of anecdotes, edited by Charles Miner, under the title of "The Merry Fellow's Companion." "The History of Wyoming," by Isaac A. Chapman, a work now scarce and much sought for by students of the history of Wyoming, was published by S. D. Lewis, at Wilkes-Barre, in 1830. A work on the same subject, but broader in scope and more minute in treatment, is "The History of Wyoming" written about 1830 by Charles Miner, who was also an able and facile writer of general articles and poems. Like Chapman's history, there are few copies of it to be found now, and when one is procurable it is always at a high price. Another valuable work upon the same subject is Stewart Pearce's "Annals of Luzerne," published by Messrs. J. P. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia, in 1860. A second edition was issued in 1866, and a third is now in preparation and will doubtless appear ere long, its value enhanced by judicious revision and copious additions. At one time (1813-15, portions of both years inclusive) a distinctively literary periodical, the Literary Visitor, was published at Wilkes-Barre by Steuben Butler, which contained numerous contributions by Charles Miner, Josiah Wright, Edward Chapman and others. James Sinton was a writer of ability who lived in Wilkes-Barre at a comparatively early date. Andrew Beaumont was also an occasional writer of a good quality of verse, his "Sons of Wyoming," written soon after the departure of the Wyoming Artillerists for the Mexican war, being a well remembered example of his poetical ability. Edward E.

Le Clerc was also a versifier of no inconsiderable merit, as is attested by his well known poem on the death of Lieutenant James M. Bowman, in 1839. Judge Edmund L. Dana is an apt and pleasing writer of extensive and varied information. Judge G. W. Woodward was a strong and vigorous writer on legal questions. C. E. Wright, Esq., has produced some noteworthy works of fiction. Prof. John S. Hait, of Philadelphia, well known as a literary man, was a Wilkes-Barre boy. The literary abilities of Mr. W. P. Miner and Dr. Charles F. Ingham may be inferred from their contributions to this work.

LITERARY AND LIBRARY ASSOCIATIONS.

As early as 1804 the first debating society in Luzerne county of which there is any record was organized at Wilkes-Barre, under the name of the Wilkes-Barre Debating Society, by Charles Miner, Thomas Dyer, Arnold Colt, John Evans, Josiah Wright, Ezekiel Hyde, Nathan Palmer, Thomas Wells, Thomas Graham and Roswell Wells. "Is celibacy justifiable by the laws of God, or consistent with moral principles?" was the first question discussed and was decided in the negative. The name of the society was changed in 1809 to that of the Wilkes-Barre Beneficial Society. In 1806 a similar association was formed under the title of the Quincun Society or Tribe, and the Wilkes-Barre or Wyoming Library Company was organized and a collection of instructive books was procured and placed at the disposal of the public, most of which were scattered and many lost. In 1826 measures were taken to find the volumes, and such as could be reclaimed were divided among the members of the society. Many of the members of these associations became eminent in after life as orators and statesmen. Under different names literary societies were kept up in Wilkes-Barre until the organization of the Wyoming Athenæum.

THE WELSH LITERARY SOCIETY is an organization well known at the present time. Meetings are held Saturday evenings at the corner of Sherman and East Market streets.

THE WYOMING ATHENÆUM.

The stated objects of this society at the time of its organization were "to establish a public library in Wilkes-Barre; to open therein, when deemed expedient and profitable, a reading room for those who should contribute to its establishment and support; and the advancement of science and literature and the dissemination of useful knowledge." It was provided that its stock should consist of an unlimited number of shares at $5 each, and Messrs. Ziba Bennett, Joseph P. Le Clerc and Andrew T. McClintock were designated to receive payment on subscriptions. At a meeting of the subscribers held at the court-house March 23d, 1839, of which Edward Lynch was appointed chairman and Joseph P. Le Clerc secretary, the following named gentlemen were duly chosen trustees of the fund: Luther Kidder, Hendrick B. Wright, Andrew T. McClintock, Volney L. Maxwell, Amos Sisty, George W. Woodward and Joseph P. Le Clerc. The board was organized March 28th, 1839, by the election of Amos Sisty as president, Andrew T. McClintock as secretary, and Isaac S. Osterhout as treasurer.

The original subscribers to the stock of the society, embracing names then and afterwards well known in various walks of life, and many of the most influential citizens of Wilkes-Barre in the past and present, were as follows:

Charles Miner, Volney L. Maxwell, John N. Conyngham, E. Lynch, S. Butler, Joseph Dubs, Harrison Wright, William Willets, Charles White, E. B. Stiles, Samuel P. Puterbaugh, Rev. John Dorrance, B. R. Phillips, Andrew T. McClintock, E. W. Sturdevant, William Hibler, Zachariah Gray, Aldson Morse, Ziba Bennett, E. W. Reynolds, John L. Butler, Sylvester Dana, George T. Jackson, George W. Woodward, M. B. Hammar, James C. Helme, Isaac Wood, Luther Kidder, B. A. Bidlack, Thomas W. Miner, Isaac S. Osterhout, Henry C. Anbiser, Thomas Davidge, Hendrick B. Wright, Samuel Holland, N. Rutter, F. Van Fleet, Sidney Tracy, Charles A. Lane, William Wurts, John Smith, A. H. Emley, William L. Bowman, Henry Colt, John R. Jackson, Benjamin Drake, William J. Stephens, John G. Fell, David Scott, Jonathan J. Slocum, Amos Sisty, H. Collings, Gilbert Baroes, Charles P. Lane, William Jessup, P. M. Gilchrist, John T. Robinson, Henry Pettebone, Samuel T. Nicholson, John M. Burtis, William S. Cox, George M. Hollenback, Lewis Worrall, Joseph P. Le Clerc, Hezekiah Parsons, Asher Miner, S. F. Abbott, George W. Williams, Benjamin Bailey, James Stark, James Hancock, Rev. William James Clark, Charles B. Drake, Chester Tuttle, Lord Butler, William Hancock, A. O. Chahoon, A. R. Pennington, William S. Ross, William Alexander, Charles Denison, S. S. Winchester, Charles Roth, Edward M. Covell, Charles T. Barnum, Israel Dickinson, Henry Kutz, Jacob Kutz, William C. Gildersleeve, W. T. Dennis, C. M. Smith, C. I. A. Chapman and Thomas W. Miner.

The first librarian was Cyrenus M. Smith, and the library was kept in his office, in the old court-house, until his removal from Wilkes-Barre. F. J. Leavenworth was elected in 1849 and served until succeeded by Charles H. Drake in 1852, when the library was removed to the office of the latter, on South Main street. Mr. Drake died in January, 1862, and was succeeded by Volney L. Maxwell, who served until his death in January, 1873. During that year Robert L. Ayers was appointed to the office, and the library was removed to the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, on Franklin street. There are about 1,500 volumes in the library. The society was incorporated by the Court of Common Pleas January 6th, 1845. Isaac S. Osterhout has served as treasurer since its organization. Andrew T. McClintock was president in 1880.

THE WILKES-BARRE LAW AND LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

The Wilkes-Barre Law and Library Association was organized June 18th, 1850, with Hendrick B. Wright as president; Andrew T. McClintock, treasurer, and George Byron Nicholson, secretary. The original members were John N. Conyngham, Hendrick B. Wright, V. L. Maxwell, Harrison Wright, Andrew T. McClintock, Horatio W. Nicholson, George Byron Nicholson, Henry W. Fuller, Warren J. Woodward, Jonathan J. Slocum, Charles Denison, L. D. Shoemaker, Asher M. Stout, E. B. Harvey. The successive presidents have been Hendrick B. Wright, Edmund L. Dana and Andrew T. McClintock. The following were the officers in 1879: Andrew T. Mc-Clintock, president; George R. Bedford, secretary and treasurer; Stanley Woodward, H. B. Payne and E. S. Osborne, executive committee. The membership was about 100, made up from the lawyers of Luzerne and Lackawanna counties. The association is incorporated by act of Assembly, and has a law library of about 2,500 volumes. Five regular meetings are held each year.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Wilkes-Barre was organized in November, 1871, and has for its object the interests of young men. A reading room was opened shortly after and has since been maintained at 111 Franklin street. The association was made the custodian of the valuable library of the Wyoming Athenæum, which is opened to the public twice a week. The association carries on religious meetings at various points and also engages in secular work for young men. Among the former are hospital and jail meetings, gospel services, cottage meetings, Bible readings, meetings in the country, song services, etc.; and among the latter, entertainments at the rooms, night school, health talks, parlor conferences, besides other features which suggest themselves from time to time. The association has the nucleus of a building fund. The membership is about 100. The officers were as follows in 1879: President, H. H. Derr; vice-president, Robert L. Ayres; treasurer, John N. Pirrong; secretary, C. Walter; librarian, Montgomery Wildermuth.

JOURNALISM.

The earliest venture at journalism in the Wyoming valley was made by two young men from Philadelphia in 1795, who brought with them to Wilkes-Barre a small hand press and a limited quantity of type and started a weekly paper about the size of a sheet of foolscap, called the Herald of the Times. The original proprietors, finding the business not remunerative, or at least uncongenial, the concern was sold to Thomas Wright, a substantial real estate owner, who changed the title to the Wilkes-Barre Gazette, under which name it was published for several years under the editorial management of Josiah Wright, son of the proprietor. As Mr. Wright was substantially the first printer in Wilkes-Barre, so also was he the progenitor of a long line of printers in the valley, down to the present time. The Gazette, though small was ably conducted, and grew in favor with the people till its list of subscribers exceeded three hundred, and it was looked upon as a journalistic success. To us, who are in the habit of reading each morning in the daily papers of the present of the happenings in nearly all parts of the world on the preceding day, it may seem a little slow to notice, as a copy of the Gazette shows, that the latest news from Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Washington came down only to within a month of the date of issue, while news from Europe was at least from three to four months old.

The publication of the Gazette having ceased at the beginning of 1801, January 5th of that year Asher Miner, who was a practical printer and had worked for some time in the office with Mr. Wright, started the Luzerne Federalist with a new press brought from Norwich, Connecticut, on a sled, by his younger brother, Charles Miner, afterwards a distinguished journalist and member of Congress and the historian of Wyoming. The paper used at this time was made in Allentown and brought over the mountains once in two weeks on horseback. Soon after, however, Matthias Hollenback erected a small paper mill on Toby's creek, in the hollow back of Kingston, a supply from which fortunately relieved the newspaper men of one great difficulty in conducting the business of publication. The paper was ably managed by Asher and Charles Miner till 1809, when the Federalist establishment was sold to the veteran editor Steuben Butler and Sidney Tracy. Mr. Butler, a son of Colonel Zebulon Butler, who commanded the American forces on the ill-fated 3d of July, 1778, is yet (1880) living, hale and hearty, about ninety.

In 1811 the Federalist was enlarged and the name changed to the Gleaner; but it continued the organ of the Federalists as opposed to the Democrats. Charles Miner soon purchased the interest of Mr. Tracy, and in company with Steuben Butler continued its publication until 1818, when the enterprise was abandoned. It was during the latter period of his editorial labors that Mr. Miner contributed a series of articles to the columns of the Gleaner, under the nom de plume of "Robert the Scribe," in imitation of Dr. Franklin's "Poor Richard" sayings. He was a ready and entertaining writer, and these articles were very popular, and often and for a long time afterward quoted by contemporaries. A good understanding appears to have grown up between the Wrights and the Miners by this time, for both Charles and Asher had married daughters of Thomas Wright, and the printing interest of that day, and for a long time after by their descendants, was consolidated in these families.

In the meantime a young man named Samuel Maffet, who had served an apprenticeship in the office of the Aurora in Philadelphia, under John Binns, had established in 1810, as an organ of the Democracy, another paper called the Susquehanna Democrat, which had among its friends and material supporters the wealth and social influence of General William Ross and Judge Hollenback; and the political contests between the enterprising journalists of the Federalist and Democrat at times were very warm, bitter and energetic. In 1824 the Democrat was purchased by Sharp D. Lewis and Chester A. Colt. In 1831 Mr. Colt sold his interest to Robert T. Conrad, afterward a distinguished judge and mayor of the city of Philadelphia. Mr. Conrad was endowed with a brilliant literary mind, and in his maturer years produced one of our very best American tragedies—Forrest's great play of "Jack Cade," or Alymere of the Kentish rebellion. Mr. Conrad sold his interest to Luther Kidder. At about this period the Democrat had perhaps the ablest corps of editors and contributors that any paper in Wilkes-Barre ever had before or has been blessed with since.

There was the chaste and elegant Conrad; the painstaking and truth-revering Lewis; the careful and matter-of-fact Kidder, afterward president judge, who was a perfect gradgrind on facts; the logical, calm, cool George W. Woodward, afterward chief justice of Pennsylvania, and the dashing and fearless Ovid F. Johnson, who afterward became attorney general of Pennsylvania, a man of great intellect and peer to any of these, his then fellow law students, who afterward reflected honor upon the bench or bar of Pennsylvania. But the Democrat's fortune was on the wane. Mr. James Rafferty, who was an excellent practical printer, made an effort to sustain it for a while, till it finally drifted into the custody of Dr. C. J. Christel & Co., and expired.

The Wyoming Herald was established in 1818, by Steuben Butler. In 1831 Asher Miner became associated in its publication. It finally passed into the hands of Robert Miner, a son of Asher, and Eleazer Carey, who continued its publication till 1835, when it was merged with the Wyoming Republican, which had been issued in Kingston by Sharp D. Lewis in 1832. In 1837 the press and material were purchased by Dr. Thomas W. Miner, a son of Asher Miner, and removed to Wilkes-Barre. Dr. Miner and Miner S. Blackman continued its publication until 1839, when it was purchased by Samuel P. Collings and united with the Republican Farmer, which had been started by Henry Pettebone and Henry Heald in 1828 as an advocate of Democratic principles. In 1833 the concern was purchased by Benjamin A. Bidlack, who afterwards became a member of Congress, was appointed American minister to the republic of Colombia, South America, and died at his post at Bogota. Honorable William Bross, ex-lieutenant governor of Illinois, and president of the Chicago Tribune Company, received his first lessons in the printer's art as a carrier boy under Mr. Bidlack. In 1835 the Farmer again came into the possession of S. P. Collings, who continued its publication until 1852, when by a compromise of the two factions of the Democratic party it was sold to S. S. Benedict, the owner of a rival paper called the Luzerne Democrat. The two were consolidated as the Luzerne Union, which passed through many hands between 1852 and January, 1879, when it was consolidated with a rival for Democratic favor, the Leader, which had enjoyed a two-and-a-half-years' existence, under the editorial management first of E. A. Niven, and lastly of J. K. Bogart, who became the editor of the journal now known as the Union Leader, leaving no rival to dispute its claim of being the organ of the democratic party. In 1854 the Union was edited by S. S. Winchester; in 1855 a Mr. Bosee was proprietor; in 1858 Mr. E. S. Goodrich, who had just served as deputy secretary of the commonwealth, was proprietor; in 1859 Niffin Hannum, who in 1865 sold to Walter H. Hibbs. In 1871 Mr. Hibbs sold to ex-Senator H. B. Beardslee, formerly of Honesdale, from whom it passed to J. K. Bogart and the Union Leader Company. For several months an evening daily edition has been issued, which has become popular.

The Republican Farmer, under S. P. Collings's management, was conducted with marked ability in its editorial columns. Mr. Collings as a political controversialist had no superiors in his day. He was a master in the art of dealing out sarcasm, and his caustic and pointed shafts seldom flew wide of the mark in dealing with the enemies of his party. Having become enfeebled in health, in 1853 he was appointed U. S. consul to Tangier, in Africa, in hope that the change might prove beneficial in building up his wasted frame. But he did not long survive having removed there with his family, and his remains are mouldering in the land of old Carthage. The Farmer was the favorite channel through which Hon. Andrew Beaumont was wont to give to the public his sound and convincing views on all political questions of the day.

The first attempt at issuing a daily paper in Wilkes-Barre was made in 1852, by E. B. Collings and Halsey Brower. A small paper called the Daily Telegraph was started, but survived only a short time, and died for want of patronage. In 1869 Messrs. Hibbs & Linn issued a daily edition of the Luzerne Union, called the Daily Union, but the enterprise did not prove remunerative, and after a few months it was discontinued.

The Anti-Masonic Advocate was established by Elijah Worthington in 1832. In 1838 it was purchased by Amos Sisty, who dropped the anti-masonic title, and it appeared as the Wilkes-Barre Advocate, the organ of the old Whig party. Mr. Sisty was a pleasant writer, and its columns were enriched by some choice gems of poetry from his pen. After his death, in 1843, the Advocate passed into the hands of Sharp D. Lewis, and he in 1853 sold it to William P. Miner, a son of Charles Miner. Mr. Miner changed the name to the Record of the Times, which title it yet bears, and soon sold a half interest to his cousin Joseph W. Miner, a son of Asher Miner, who died a year or two afterwards, and William P. Miner became the sole editor and proprietor. The Record of the Times has always been a faithful chronicler of passing events, and shown itself to be just what its name imports, a newsy and lively paper. In 1866 the Record was published in one of a row of wooden buildings on West Market street, on the southwest side, below Franklin street, and the entire concern was totally destroyed by the big fire that laid waste both sides of the street on the 16th of April of that year; but with characteristic energy Mr. Miner obtained new material at once, including a steam power press, the first in Wilkes-Barre, and the publication of the paper was not materially interrupted. The Record had heretofore been a weekly paper, but in 1870 Mr. Miner, feeling that the time had arrived when Wilkes-Barre could sustain a daily, commenced the publication of a morning edition in connection with the weekly. The morning daily was soon changed to an evening paper, on which plan it was continued till the paper was sold to the Record of the Times Publishing Company, Dr. W. H. Bradley managing editor, in March, 1877, and by him continued as such until in the summer of 1879 the paper was enlarged and issued in the morning; and there is no better or more energetic journal to be found outside of the large cities.

A daily paper in the interest of the National Greenback party was published during a portion of 1879.

The Democratic Wachter, a German weekly paper, was established in Wilkes-Barre in 1841, by Jacob Waelder, now a prominent lawyer and politician in San Antonio, Texas. In 1851 Mr. Waelder sold out to Robert Baur, who is still editor and proprietor. Another German paper, called the Volksfreund, Republican in politics, has been published for some years. The first Sunday paper published in Wilkes-Barre was the Sunday Morning News, started in May, 1877, by Frank P. Woodward and M. F. Doran. The editors, energetic young men, desirous of creating a sensation with their paper, which was fresh and newsy, became involved in legal difficulties, and the paper ceased its publication in the fall of the same year. In 1878 Mr. J. C. Coon established a Sunday paper called The Plain Dealer. It was owned by a stock company, and under his management became a flourishing paper. In 1878 Mr. Coon retired from the company and started a similar paper called the Sunday News Dealer. The Plain Dealer was continued for a short time by Colonel J. D. Laciari, when its publication ceased, and its office was subsequently consolidated with that of the News Dealer, which goes on prosperously, and large editions are published each Sunday morning, both in Scranton and Wilkes-Barre, Frank P. Woodward, above mentioned, being in charge of the Scranton issue.

The People's Friend is a late weekly candidate for public favor. A temperance paper, the Evening Star, was issued for a time, of which Thomas C. Parker was editor in 1868 and 1869. The legal fraternity have their own peculiar periodical in the Legal Register, edited by George B. Kulp, Esq. While it has been the aim to mention every journalistic venture in Wilkes-Barre borough and city of the past and present, so numerous have been such enterprises, and so brief the existence of some of them, that it is possible all have not been recalled; nor is it necessary, perhaps, to a knowledge of the rise and progress of local journalism that some few papers that may have died in infancy should be remembered, all of those which have attained any circulation and influence having been referred to and some mention having been made of prominent editors and publishers in every period of Wilkes-Barre's newspaper career.

AMUSEMENTS.

A sketch of the amusement history of Wilkes-Barre may prove not uninteresting. The first animal show in Luzerne county was exhibited in 1806 or 1807. It consisted of a single elephant, said to have been the first ever brought to this country, in George Chahoon's barn, in the rear of the present Wyoming Valley House, on the site now occupied by Purcell's livery stable. People came from all directions to "see the elephant," and Mr. Pierce states that "one farmer carried a half bushel of wheat on his back, with which he paid the price of admission." The first drama was presented in the ball-room of the old red tavern, at the corner of Main street and the public square, in 1809. The piece was "The Babes in the Woods," and the characters were represented by puppets, into the mouths of which the words were put, apparently, by Mr. and Mrs. Sickles, both of whom were ventriloquists. As an afterpiece a panoramic and ventriloquial representation of the battle between John Paul Jones's ship the "Bon Homme" and the "Serapis," the Duke of Marlborough commanding, was given. Sickles was a showman, of whose exhibitions in the early part of the century old people in Pennsylvania and western New York often tell.

At various times peripatetic showmen have pitched their tents in different parts of the borough, or exhibited their wonders in halls or large rooms; but it was not until within the past few years that any regularly appointed places of amusement were established under local managers. In 1868 and 1869 Mr. S. Frauenthal erected a building on South Main street in which he opened a place known as Liberty Hall. In 1873 it was remodeled and renamed Frauenthal's Opera House. Here appeared many stars and combinations during the remainder of that year. The building was burned January 1st, 1874. November 22nd, 1871, Fred Meyer's Opera House, a variety theatre, on Fell, just off North Main street, was opened. Under the management of Jacob S. Berry Chahoon Hall, on Market street, was opened as a variety theatre from 1873 to 1874. The City Garden Hall, on Northampton street, has for some time been known as a variety house, frequent performances of that kind having been presented there. The manager is John S. Hinds. Music Hall Block, at the corner of Market and River streets, was erected in 1870 by W. G. Sterling and S. L. Thurlow. In 1878 the interest of Mr. Thurlow was sold to Andrew Hunlock. The seating capacity of Music Hall is 1,200, and its size, inclusive of the stage, is 60 by 105 feet. The stage is 32 by 62 feet in size, and is well supplied with scenery and modern appliances for the production of such pieces as are usually presented by traveling companies. Music Hall was opened February 2nd, 1871, by Clara Louise Kellogg and company, under the management of Mr. W. G. Sterling. It has since been successfully managed by Messrs. W. S. Parsons, W. D. White, and M. H. Burgunder.

HOME FOR FRIENDLESS CHILDREN.

The Home for Friendless Children was founded March 22nd, 1862. A society was organized by a few ladies at a meeting in a private parlor. They were instructed and encouraged by Miss Mary Bowman, sister of the late Bishop Bowman of Lancaster, who had founded a similar home in that city. A small frame house on South street was offered the society rent free, by the late Mr. William C. Gildersleeve. A small amount of money was raised and a call made upon the public for contributions of anything that could be turned to account, which met with a liberal response. Gifts of money sufficient to cover the salary of the matron for a year were received, and applications for admission were so numerous that at the end of three months the building was insufficient to accommodate any more inmates, and it was enlarged, the expense being met by private contributions. In the mean time the Legislature had passed an act legalizing the proceedings of the society, and making it a corporate institution, under the name of "The Home for Friendless Children for the Borough of Wilkes-Barre and the County of Luzerne." The management of its affairs was vested in a board of trustees consisting of sixteen gentlemen and a board of twenty-four lady managers, both organized with the usual officers.

During the war an arrangement was made with the State government by which soldiers' orphans were placed temporarily in the Home. The remuneration for their care enabled the managers to enlarge their corps of helpers and lay by a small sum annually, to form a nucleus to an endowment fund. In 1864 the Home became so crowded with soldiers' orphans that a larger building became an absolute necessity. A subscription book was opened and application made to the Legislature for an appropriation. The State promised $2,500 provided double that sum could be raised by subscription. At once four of the trustees, Messrs. G. M. Hollenback, W. S. Ross, William C. Gildersleeve and V. L. Maxwell, subscribed $1,000 each, others gave $500 each and many added smaller sums, thus securing the State appropriation and making it safe to commence building. The lot was offered at a very low price by Mr. Charles Parrish and Dr. E. R. Mayer, and the latter added as a gift an adjoining back lot for a garden. The building, a large brick edifice with ample grounds, on Franklin street, was completed and occupied in the autumn of 1866. In 1867 active steps were taken to secure the endowment fund. A book for subscriptions was opened. Judge Ross and William C. Gildersleeve each subscribed $5,000, and smaller subscriptions were added until the sum exceeded $16,000. But the fund has, from various causes, been singularly unfortunate. The amount subscribed by Judge Ross, having been invested in stocks, was entirely lost, through the failure of the company issuing them. Other sums were loaned on mortgage, but owing to the recent depression in values have become worthless. Upon other loans partial interest is paid, and hopes are entertained of ultimately collecting the principal. A second $5,000 bequeathed by the late Mr. Gildersleeve is being paid by his executors. In consequence of these misfortunes the Home is still supported almost entirely by charity from citizens of Wilkes-Barre and its immediate neighborhood. Soldiers' orphans have long since ceased to occupy the Home, and that source of aid is closed. Economy has become necessary. The corps of teachers has been greatly reduced, and smaller salaries are paid. The number of children now (September, 1879,) at the Home is between 50 and 60. Scarcely a month passes that good homes are not found for one or more. The Home is governed by a matron of superior character and abilities; the school is managed in an excellent manner by one lady teacher. The children, besides their regular school instruction, are taught sewing and various household duties. They are taken regularly to church, and are under the best of influences.

THE WILKES-BARRE CITY HOSPITAL.

The need of such a charity as the Wilkes-Barre City Hospital had long been felt. In 1870 an appeal, signed by nine of the most prominent physicians of the city, was published, urging the necessity of a place in which men injured in and around the mines could have the proper care and treatment to secure recovery. The first meeting of citizens to consider the matter was held September 10th, 1872, at the office of Hon. H. M. Hoyt. The following is an extract from the minutes of this meeting:

"A. T. McClintock was called to the chair, and W. W. Lathrope appointed secretary. The object of the meeting was stated by Dr. E. R. Mayer, who also read the draft of a proposed charter. On motion of Judge Dana it was 'resolved that we proceed to establish a hospital in the city of Wilkes-Barre.' It was moved by E. P. Darling, and carried, that a committee of seven be appointed to take into consideration the proper method to procure a charter. The chair appointed E. P. Darling, Hon. L. D. Shoemaker, Hon. E. L. Dana, Hon. H. M. Hoyt, G. R. Bedford, Dr. W. F. Dennis and Washington Lee. It was moved by Mr. Lee 'that an executive committee of three be appointed with full power to lease a building and to establish and conduct a hospital, such committee to act until a permanent organization be effected.' The motion was carried and Washington Lee, Charles A. Miner and George R. Bedford were appointed. On motion of Dr. Mayer, W. W. Lathrope was elected secretary and treasurer pro tem. Hon. L. D. Shoemaker, W. W. Neuer and H. H. Derr were appointed a committee to solicit subscriptions."

The executive committee at once rented a building on Fell street, and after fitting it up properly opened it for the reception of patients October 10th, 1872. The number of beds was at first 20, which was increased to 26 during the following year. The first medical staff was as follows: Consulting physicians, Drs. E. R. Mayer, W. F. Dennis, J. E. Bulkeley; attending physicians, Drs. J. T. Rothrock, J. V. Crawford, R. Davis, I. E. Ross, J. A. Murphy, O. F. Harvey and G. W. Guthrie. The staff remains the same with the exception of a vacancy in the consulting staff, caused by the death of Dr. W. F. Dennis, and one in the ranks of the attendant physicians made by the removal of Dr. J. T. Rothrock. A resident physician has also been added. January 3d, 1874, a permanent organization was effected under a charter granted by the Court of Common Pleas of Luzerne county, dated November 24th, 1873. The following gentlemen were chosen a board of directors: T. A. C. Lanning, A. T. McClintock, Charles Parrish, John Wells Hollenback, Charles A. Miner, Calvin Wadhams, Stanley Woodward, H. H. Derr, Ira M. Kirkendall, M. B. Houpt, George R. Bedford and George S. Bennett. The present (1879) board of directors is constituted as follows: A. T. McClintock, Charles A. Miner, E. C. Wadhams, H. H. Derr, Joseph Stickney, E. P. Darling, George S. Bennett, E. H. Chase, John Welles Hollenback, Richard Sharp, R. J. Flick, and Fred. Mercur; president, Charles A. Miner; vice-president, Richard Sharp; secretary, E. H. Chase; treasurer, H. H. Derr; executive committee, Messrs. Miner, Sharp, Mercur and Derr.

There is also a board of visiting lady managers. Prior to the winter of 1874 the support of the hospital was derived entirely from voluntary contributions, made by the people of the city. Since that time appropriations have been made by the State as follows: In 1874, $5,000; in 1876, $25,000; in 1877, $10,000; in 1878, $10,000. In 1875 a lot containing about four acres, on River street, near Mill creek, affording an elegant site for a hospital building, was presented by John Welles Hollenback. During the winter of 1875-6 the new hospital building was erected on this lot, and was occupied April 1st, 1876. It is a wooden structure two stories high, eighty-six feet square, exclusive of the verandas, and consists of four buildings surrounding a quadrangle. It is capable of accommodating from seventy-five to one hundred beds, and is now supplied with forty-two. The furniture, appliances and instruments are of the most modern and approved kind, and there is a well equipped drug store in which the medicines used by patients are prepared. The average number of patients in attendance is about thirty, a large proportion of whom belong to the surgical wards.

THE FIRE DEPARTMENTS AND FIRES OF WILKES-BARRE.

Among the many interesting objects on exhibition at the Wilkes-Barre centennial, July, 1878, was a small hand fire-engine to which was appended the legend, "In service ninety-eight years, and good yet." This was the first fire engine ever brought to the place, where it had been in use sixty years after having seen thirty-eight years' service, probably in Philadelphia, where it was purchased in 1818 by the borough council and brought to Wilkes-Barre by teams sent for the purpose. It was a "bucket" machine and was called the "Neptune." There was no organized fire company, but all were expected to assist in extinguishing fires, and the late Hon. J. N. Conyngham was the recognized leader. Ladies were frequently seen in the line of bucket-passers. The first Mrs. G. M. Hollenback was always present and worked with a will. One or more leather fire buckets hung conveniently at nearly every house, and at an alarm of fire the occupants would seize them and hurry to the scene of disaster.

In 1831 a larger bucket engine and 100 feet of hose were purchased in Philadelphia for $500. A company was organized which met occasionally in the old market-house on the square, but disbanded within six months. The late Hon. G. W. Woodward, Isaac S. Osterhout and W. Bowman were among its members. There was no organization from that time until 1849. When there were fires the course described previously was pursued, with varying success. During the year mentioned an engine known as the "Triton," a suction machine, accompanied by a hose carriage and about 1,000 feet of leather hose, was purchased. The indebtedness incurred by the purchase of the engine and part of that by the purchase of the hose and carriage was paid by private subscription. The balance, about $200, was paid by the proceeds of a ball given by the company which had been organized. Major Frank Bowman and Charles Bennett were among its early officers. For a time considerable interest in the movement was manifested, but the company had no engine house and no regular place for holding their meetings; and after a precarious existence of two years, during which the engine was kept in a barn and in the old market house—whose doors could not be fastened—and was uncared for generally, it disbanded. During this period a company of several boys was formed and operated the "Neptune." On one occasion a fire occurred near the canal, and to save themselves the trouble of filling the reservoir of the engine with buckets, the boys ran it into the canal, immersing the box, and standing up to their waists in the water worked the brakes until the fire was extinguished.

In 1859 two companies were organized, of one of which E. B. Harvey was president and C. C. Plotz foreman. This company used the "Triton" engine, which was rechristened the "Goodwill," and existed until the organization of the paid fire department. The other company used an engine which had been known as the "Reliance" but which they called the "Protector." George N. Reichard was the foreman. The organization subsequently disbanded and another was formed, which used the same engine and, with Henry Frederick as foreman, existed until superseded by the paid department. Another company worthy of mention during this period was composed of boys who "run" the old "Neptune" and were led by James Rutter. With these three companies the fire department was systematically organized. Walter G. Sterling was the first chief engineer under this organization. Hon. Henry M. Hoyt was assistant engineer. Joseph W. Patten was also for a time chief engineer. The department's annual parades and balls are well remembered affairs.

The paid fire department was established by authority of the borough council in April, 1871, with Hon. Stanley Woodward as chief engineer, and S. H. Sturdevant, C. C. Plotz, and W. Stewart assistant engineers. The apparatus consisted of one steamer, the "Mechanic," presented to the department by the late A. C. Laning, four hose carriages and one set of hook and ladder implements with the truck. The steamer had an engineer and stoker; each of the hose companies consisted of eight men besides the foreman and assistant foreman; and there were fifteen men in the hook and ladder company. Subsequently three additional hose companies with their apparatus were added to the department, and in May, 1874, the second steamer, named the "A. C. Laning," in honor of the donor of the first, was purchased. Hose Company No. 3 was attached to this steamer, and was thereafter known as No. 2 in the department.

Hon. Stanley Woodward served with much credit as chief engineer until January 1st, 1880, at which time his resignation took effect. He was succeeded by C. B.

Metzger, with T. S. Hillard and Frank Dunsmore as assistant engineers.

There have not been many sweeping conflagrations in Wilkes-Barre. In the early days, and previous to 1848, there were few fires, and when there was one it seldom destroyed more than one or two buildings. In that year the Black Bear Tavern and other buildings near the old jail were burned, it is supposed by an incendiary in the hope that in the confusion a murderer confined in the jail might escape. In 1855 the buildings on the east side of the public square, including the Exchange Hotel and the old Butler mill, from Main street to the residence of the late Judge Scott, were burned. All of the buildings on the north side of the square from the Luzerne House to Chahoon Hall were destroyed in 1859. In April, 1867, the buildings on both sides of West Market street, from Franklin street to Loomis's building on the north side, and from the Wyoming National Bank to Fraser's building on the south side, were burned. Two old taverns, the White Horse and the Dennis House, were swept away in this fire. The next fire of importance was that of January 1st, 1874, which burned the Frauenthal Opera House. The last to date (October, 1879), was that which destroyed the Stanton breaker, partly within the city limits, which burned seven hours. Had it not been for the efficiency of the fire department, which the underwriters rate only fourth or fifth in the first class, it is probable fires would have been more frequent and extensive during the years of the Wilkes-Barre's rapid growth from an enterprising borough to a busy city.

FLOODS AND HURRICANES.

The first great overflowing of the Susquehanna of which there is any local record occurred in 1785. The water was so high as to injure ammunition in Fort Wyoming on the public common. A horse was also drowned in the settlement at the same time. The next was the great "pumpkin" flood of 1786. There were other floods of greater or lesser magnitude in 1809, 1831, 1833, 1841, 1842, 1843 and 1846. The latter occurred in the spring, the water standing three and a half feet deep on the river bank in Wilkes-Barre. There was another in July, 1850, which extended to all portions of the country round about, preventing mails from reaching Wilkes-Barre for several days. In the following September the water was so high as to cover the flats between Wilkes-Barre and Kingston, and there was no communication between the two places except by means of boats. Another rise of water April 12th and 13th, 1861, filled the cellars on River street and damaged the gas works considerably. March 17th, 1865, the river overflowed the banks and stood in Market street as far up as the crossing in front of Faser & Smith's store, and in several streets in low portions of the city the only means of locomotion was by boats or rafts improvised for the occasion.

BANKS AND BANKERS.

1810 witnessed the opening of the first banking office in Wilkes-Barre. It was a branch of the Philadelphia bank. Ebenezer Bowman was president and John Bettle cashier. The office was on River street, in a building since owned and occupied by Mrs. Ulp. Notes of the Philadelphia bank were issued, deposits taken, and commercial paper discounted until 1820, when the institution was discontinued. "One effect of this branch bank," says Mr. Pearce in his "Annals of Luzerne County," "was to drain the country of its silver, gold being almost unknown." At one time $40,000 in silver were sent to Philadelphia, carefully enclosed in forty small boxes placed in one larger box, which was put in Philip Reed's four-horse wagon and covered with straw, grain, bags, &c. The valuable load was accompanied by Mr. Steuben Butler and Colonel Bowman, one of the bank directors, and five days were occupied in the journey. The Easton and Wilkes-Barre Turnpike Company issued notes of the denominations of 6¼, 12½ and 25 cents, and of $1 and $2, in 1811, the stringency of the times and the scarcity of a medium of exchange among the people seeming to demand this measure. The aggregate of these notes reached $10,000. They bore the signatures of Lord Butler and Stephen Tuttle, the president and secretary of the company, and under their management every one of these obligations were called in and redeemed. Wilkes-Barre was an important recruiting station in the war of 1812-14, and the army officers are said to have issued their individual notes for $1 and $2, which were accepted by the soldiers in payment for their services, and by the farmers in exchange for provisions, all of which are said to have been redeemed.

The Susquehanna Bank, of Wilkes-Barre, was incorporated and organized in 1816, with Joseph Sinton as president. The notes were engraved, printed and signed, but were never issued, in consequence of the depression in the money market which prevailed at that time, and the bank was never opened. The business here, as elsewhere, demanded some kind of a circulating medium, and recourse was had by individuals and corporations to the previously tried plan of issuing "shinplasters," as the private money was denominated. At this crisis the progress of trade was aided by the utterance of large amounts of such obligations by the Wilkes-Barre Bridge Company, all of which were redeemed.

The Wyoming National Bank.—This institution was organized November 16th, 1829, under the name of the "Wyoming Bank of Wilkes-Barre," under a charter issued from the commonwealth of Pennsylvania November 4th, 1829. William Ross, Henderson Gaylord, John N. Conyngham, William Swetland and Isaac Bowman were appointed commissioners to receive subscriptions for the stock. The directors were William Ross, Benjamin Dorrance, John N. Conyngham, G. M. Hollenback, O. Collins, Ziba Bennett, William Swetland, H. Gaylord, James Nesbit, jr., Steuben Butler, Abraham Thomas and Miller Horton. At the first meeting of the board of directors, held November 6th, 1829, Colonel Benjamin Dorrance was elected president and Ziba Bennett was appointed secretary of the board until a cashier should be appointed. December 19th Edward Lynch was appointed cashier, at a salary of $600 per annum. Colonel Benjamin Dorrance resigned the office of president November 22nd, 1830, and at the same meeting Garrick Mallery was elected to fill the vacancy thus occasioned, continuing in the position till May 18th, 1831, when he resigned both the presidency and his directorship and a week later Colonel Benjamin Dorrance was again chosen to the presidency. May 30th, 1832, Colonel Dorrance a second time resigned and the position was filled by the election of G. M. Hollenback, who served until his death, November 1st, 1866. General William S. Ross was elected his successor November 21st, and died July 11th, 1868. Four days later he was succeeded by Hon. Ziba Bennett, who resigned January 9th, 1878, and Colonel Charles Dorrance, the present incumbent, was elected. Edward Lynch, elected December 7th, 1853, was the first vice-president. Ziba Bennett was elected November 21st, 1866; Colonel Charles Dorrance July 15th, 1868; Thomas Derr January 14th, 1879. When Edward Lynch was promoted to the office of vice-president his place as cashier was filled by the appointment of Edward S. Loop, who was succeeded September 3d, 1874, by Lathan W. Jones, the present cashier. Colonel Benjamin Dorrance having died, Colonel Charles Dorrance was elected, in November, 1837, to the vacancy thus made in the board of directors. A well remembered attache of the bank, one of the early directors, was Steuben Butler, who was appointed a clerk at a salary of $300 per annum, January 12th, 1831. March 17th, 1861, the offices of the institution were removed to the new bank building at the corner of Market and Franklin streets, which, with the adjoining building on Market street, is owned by the corporation. Under the provision of the national banking laws the bank became a national bank, under the title of the Wyoming National Bank of Wilkes-Barre, January 19th, 1865. It has a capital of $150,000. The following were its officers in 1879: Colonel Charles Dorrance, president; Thompson Derr, vice-president; Lathan W. Jones, cashier; James Jones, assistant cashier; Charles Dorrance, jr., teller. Directors: Colonel Charles Dorrance, Thompson Derr, Payne Pettebone, J. R. Williams, Joseph Stickney, J. Frank Lee, Hon. Henry M. Hoyt, Hon. Charles A. Miner and Hon. E. C. Wadhams.

The First National Bank was organized April 24th, 1863, and chartered July 21st following. It was opened for business August 3d, 1863, with a capital of $51,500. The present capital (1879) is $375,000. The first president and cashier were James McLean and Thomas Wilson, respectively. The present officers are: Charles Parish, president; Thomas Long, vice-president; Henry C. Smith, cashier; James McLean, teller; W. R. Kingman, bookkeeper.

The Second National Bank was organized September 23d, 1863, with a capital of $250,000, which was subsequently increased to $450,000. The first officers were Thomas T. Atherton, president; M. L. Everett, cashier; Thomas T. Atherton, M. L. Everett, Abram Nesbitt, Samuel Hoyt, Hendrick B. Wright, R. F. Walsh, George Coray, John Sharp, jr., and A. H. Reynolds, directors. The officers in 1879 were as follows: President, Abram Nesbitt; vice-president, R. F. Walsh; cashier, E. A. Spalding; directors—Abram Nesbitt, R. F. Walsh, Isaac Everett, R. F. Black, Isaac Rice, John M. Ward, S. E. Atherton, J. P. Atherton, Abram Goodwam, John R. Crellin and E. A. Spalding.

The Miners' Savings Bank was incorporated by an act of February 13th, 1868, and was the first savings bank in the city, the purpose being to establish a savings bank and loan company with powers to transact any other business done by banks in Pennsylvania, and to act as executor or administrator of any deceased testator or intestate. The capital stock is $150,000; the surplus over $50,000. The first officers chosen were: A. C. Laning, president; Ziba Bennett, Walter G. Sterling and A. T. McClintock, vice-presidents; J. A. Rippard, cashier. The present officers (1879) are John S. Law, president; A. T. McClintock and N. Rutter, vice-presidents; David P. Ayers, cashier; W. G. Sterling, assistant cashier; John G. Law, clerk. Directors—John S. Law, N. Rutter, C. L. Lamberton, Payne Pettebone, Hubbard B. Payne, A. T. McClintock, E. P. Darling, Samuel R. Marshall, Thomas Derr and William L. Conyngham.

The Wilkes-Barre Deposit and Savings Bank was organized under a charter from the authorities of the State of Pennsylvania and approved by Governor John W. Geary May 20th, 1871, with an authorized capital of $300,000, $150,000 of which was paid in by the stockholders, and began business July 1, 1871. The first directors were Joseph Lippincott, C. L. Lamberton, Stanley Woodward, C. Brahl, J. McNeish, jr., W. W. Ketcham, J. P. Williamson, A. J. Pringle, and F. J. Helfrich; president, Joseph Lippincott; cashier, J. P. Williamson. The directors for 1879 were as follows: Thomas Long, A. N. Van Horn, A. J. Pringle, C. Brahl, F. J. Helfrich, W. S. McLean, J. P. Williamson and Fred Ahlborn; president, Thomas Long; cashier, Adolph Voigt.

The People's Bank.—This bank was organized and commenced business July 1, 1872, under a State charter obtained by R. J. Flick with four others named as incorporators, with a board of eleven directors, with a capital of $250,000 with authority to increase the same to $1,000,000. $125,000 was called in immediately and in 1874 the balance of the $250,000 was called in and paid up, since which time (with two exceptions) a regular semi-annual dividend has been declared and paid free of all taxes. A surplus of $45,000 has accumulated. The present officers (1879) are: R. J. Flick, president; J. W. Hollenback, vice-president; A. A. Sterling, cashier.

Other Banks.—At different periods other banks have been established in the city, whose general history does not differ much from the same number of similar enterprises in any locality. Some of them have been private banks and there are some of that kind at the present time. Among the best remembered is the Wilkes-Barre Savings Bank. This bank was organized May 2nd, 1870, with a capital of $100,000. The officers were as follows: Payne Pettebone, president; Peter Purcel, vice-president;

John Peters, cashier; Charles Dorrance, jr., teller; Payne Pettebone, Peter Purcel, Charles Dorrance, Joseph Stickney, G. M. Harding and M. J. Philbin, directors. December 24th, 1878, this bank went into liquidation, paying off all its depositors and stockholders in full.

WATER AND GAS COMPANIES.

The Wilkes-Barre Water Company was incorporated by act of the Legislature February 12th, 1850. The incorporators were George M. Hollenback, Samuel P. Collings, Henry M. Fuller, W. J. Woodward, Lord Butler, Thomas W. Miner, Peter C. McGilchrist, Harrison Wright, Calvin Parsons, Ziba Bennett, George P. Steel, Samuel Puterbaugh, Oliver B. Hillard, Edward M. Covel, Sharp D. Lewis, Francis L. Bowman and Joseph Le Clerc. The company was organized at Chahoon Hall July 16th, 1859, at which time and place the following officers were chosen: President, Hendrick B. Wright; secretary and treasurer, Isaac S. Osterhout; managers, Alexander Gray, John Urquhart, William Wood, Charles Parrish, John Reichard and Samuel R. Marshall. The original capital stock was $40,000, with the privilege of increasing it to $80,000. By subsequent amendments it has been increased from time to time, and in 1879 amounted to $220,000. The present officers are: Hendrick B. Wright, president; Isaac S. Osterhout, secretary and treasurer; Samuel R. Marshall, Benjamin G. Carpenter, William H. Sturdevant, John M. Courtright, John Espy and Isaac S. Osterhout, managers; John Farrell, superintendent. The company has about thirty-five miles of cement and wrought iron pipe laid, the source of water supply being Laurel run and Mill creek.

The Crystal Spring Water Company.—This company was chartered April 11th, 1861. Its source of supply is a large pond of the same name in the northeast part of Wright township, south of Wilkes-Barre, one of the sources of Big Wapwallopen creek. The company has $80,000 in capital stock and bonds to the same amount. The officers are as follows: Charles Parrish, president; David Caird, superintendent; Byron Shoemaker, secretary and treasurer; W. S. Hillard, Washington Lee, L. D. Shoemaker, Samuel Roberts, George H. Parrish and Woodward Leavenworth, directors.

The Wilkes-Barre Gas Company was chartered in 1854 and the works were constructed in 1856. The present capital stock of the company is $130,000. It has eighteen miles of main laid and makes 20,000,000 cubic feet of gas per annum, furnishing gas for city lamps and lighting most of the leading business places and private residences. The officers for 1879 were: W. L. Conyngham, president; Thomas Derr, treasurer; Marcus Smith, secretary and superintendent.

HOLLENBACK CEMETERY.

The old Wilkes-Barre Cemetery had become so crowded with graves in 1850 that it was deemed advisable to obtain a charter for a new cemetery association. The charter was granted to George M. Hollenback, Ziba Bennett, John L. Butler, Hendrick B. Wright, Henry M.

Fuller, Jonathan J. Slocum, H. W. Nicholson, Thomas W. Miner, Charles Denison, V. L. Maxwell, Henry Pettebone, O. B. Hillard and Robert Porter, with such other persons as they might associate with them, and their successors, who were thereby created a body politic and corporate in law, by the name of the Wilkes-Barre Cemetery Association, and approved January 29th, 1850. Under it the members of the association and their successors jointly were empowered to purchase and to hold real estate to the amount of twenty-five acres in the vicinity of Wilkes-Barre for the purpose of establishing a cemetery, and granted authority to receive as gifts or bequests, for the purpose of ornamenting or improving the cemetery, such personal property as might be deemed necessary to carry out the purpose of the act. It was further decreed that the affairs of the corporation should be entrusted to a president and five managers, to be elected by the members of the association. After several unsuccessful attempts to purchase a suitable lot, in 1855 George M. Hollenback gave to the association for the purpose of the charter about seventeen acres of land lying north-easterly from the then borough between the river and the Pittston road. As an expression of thankfulness the managers resolved that the name of the association should be changed to "The Hollenback Cemetery Association of Wilkes-Barre and its Vicinity," which change was confirmed by an act of Legislature May 7th, 1855. The aid of J. M. Grumman, a civil engineer of Brooklyn, N. Y., who had had experience in laying out cemeteries, was obtained; and in the course of the summer of 1855 he presented to the managers a draft of the land, divided by avenues into blocks, and sub-divided by pathways into suitable lots. Lithographic maps of this plan of division and allotment were procured, and the people proceeded to make their selection of lots, which, with the exception of three reserved for Mr. Hollenback, were opened to all. They were offered at public sale, and now unsold lots may be selected by any one. No distinction is made among the people and no denominational or sectarian feeling is permitted to enter into the question of allotment. There is a portion of the grounds devoted to single grave spots, where strangers, or those unable to buy an entire lot, can procure graves at a reasonable price. The price of lots and incidental charges were fixed as low as the estimated expenses in erecting a dwelling-house for the superintendent and a receiving vault, in laying out and fencing the grounds, with proper gate or entrance way, and in providing for the superintendence and charge of the property, would allow. The first officers of the association were: George M. Hollenback, president; Isaac S. Osterhout, secretary and treasurer; John L. Conyngham, Ziba Bennett, Henry M. Fuller, Warren J. Woodward and Andrew T. McClintock, managers; John Mullany, superintendent. The successive presidents have been George M. Hollenback, John L. Conyngham, Ziba Bennett and the present (1879) incumbent, Andrew T. McClintock. Isaac S. Osterhout has continuously held the offices of secretary and treasurer. The present managers are John Wells Hollenback, William P. Miner, William L. Conyngham, Daniel A. Fell and George S. Bennett.

MINING OPERATIONS—LABOR TROUBLES.

Wilkes-Barre's manifest natural advantage as a point of commercial importance in the anthracite coal field can scarcely be too highly estimated. The existence of coal deposits was known to the Indians before white settlement begun. Fuel for the early forges was supplied from them, and later, it is claimed, a citizen of Wilkes-Barre made the discovery that coal could be burned for domestic purposes. In an appendix to Chapman's history, written in 1830, it was said: "No portion of the valley affords greater facilities for the transportation of coal, or offers stronger inducements to capitalists to engage in the coal trade than the coal lands in Wilkes-Barre." The truth of these remarks has been amply verified by subsequent experience. In all directions from the center of the city can be seen the dark outlines of giant breakers, where the "black diamonds," mined in and about Wilkes-Barre, are prepared for the market. The part played by Wilkes-Barre in the development of the vast coal interest is treated in its proper connection. As a matter of purely local interest a mention of the mines in and near the city, with the names of those prominent in their operation, will doubtless be deemed in place here. Young's slope, Baltimore tunnel and Conyngham shaft are operated by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, with A. H. Vandling, of Scranton, as general superintendent, Christopher Scharar as assistant superintendent and inside foreman, and J. M. Chittenden as general outside foreman. When the latest report of the inspector of mines was issued Young's slope was not in operation. William W. Reese was mine boss, and Edward Mackin outside foreman of the Baltimore tunnel, and James Tretheway mine boss of Conyngham shaft.

"Turn-outs" and "strikes" seem to be inseparable from mining enterprises, and the history of coal mining shows that they have been of frequent occurrence in the collieries of the old world and the new. So common have been such movements in the anthracite region of Pennsylvania that an ordinary demonstration on the part of dissatisfied miners excites no more than passing notice. Since the coal interest was developed in Wilkes-Barre, and workmen began to congregate there in considerable numbers, strikes of greater or less importance and of longer or shorter duration have been inaugurated, with or without success. In the majority of cases they have proven disastrous alike to labor and capital. Seldom have they been so formidable as to excite public apprehension. Not many of them are remembered as events of importance; only one of them, which occurred in 1877—during that gigantic game of "bluff" between capital and labor now passed into the industrial history of the United States—is deemed to demand extended mention here.

The employes of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company identified themselves with the great strike of 1877 July 25th. At Bethlehem the trains were stopped and the engineers and firemen compelled to leave them during the day. During the following night the employes at Easton and Wilkes-Barre joined the movement, thus placing the entire length of the road in the hands of the strikers. Freight and passenger trains had been stopped at Bethlehem during the day, but the company was permitted to carry the mails. That night all trains were stopped at Wilkes-Barre. They were permitted to move on, however, the next morning, in order that such men employed on them as were residents of other places might go home. The disaffected employes retained possession of the road during the remainder of the month, the railroad company only succeeding in running a train from Bethlehem to Mauch Chunk on the 31st. The announcement was made to the strikers that the abandonment of their trains was nothing less than a forfeiture of their positions in the employ of the company, and that their places would be filled by new men. This measure was adopted to a great extent. In response to an application for armed assistance, the governor ordered a force of regulars and State militia to protect the road. Thus strengthened, the company resolved to resume business on the 1st of August, regardless of resistance. The strikers were no less determined. Assembling in large numbers at the depot in Wilkes-Barre, they resolved that no train should pass in either direction. But in defiance of this demonstration the authorities of the road prepared to send a train northward, observing which the rioters became greatly excited and were loud in their threatenings. At this juncture the mayor of the city, W. W. Loomis, forced his way through the crowd and reached and mounted the engine of the waiting train. He read the riot act to the crowd and followed with a brief address of counsel. When he descended from the locomotive he was surrounded by the excited men, who began plying him with questions. During the confusion the train was backed a few hundred yards. This action was not unexpected, as it was the customary preparation for a change of engines. But though, as usual, another locomotive stood waiting on a side track, and the strikers thought they would have plenty of time to act before the anticipated change could be made, they were doomed to disappointment; for engineer Drumheller let on the steam with such force as to cause the train to dart forward with a velocity that took it out of the crowd before the strikers realized that they were baffled, and their rage at this unexpected turn of affairs can be better imagined than described. A scene of confusion ensued, and the men were loud in their threats to get even with the company before night. Upon the arrival of the 3:45 train from Elmira, with engineer Drumheller in charge of the locomotive, the strikers assembled and determined to stop him at all hazards. As the train, which was made up similarly to the one which had gone north, stopped at the depot two of the mob mounted to the cab of the engine and seized Drumheller, while others uncoupled the locomotive from the train and severed the bell cord.

At this juncture another engineer leaped into the cab and opening the throttle ran the engine out, bearing away a dozen or more of men and boys who mounted the tender as it started. For a moment the shrill tones of the shrieking whistle drowned the sounds of a melee at the station, in which a United States detective who had been crowded off the platform by a car was badly injured. Drumheller, the engineer, was roughly handled, the excited crowd threatening and cursing in a reckless manner, and some of them brandishing knives and revolvers; and one of the company's constables was attacked, but succeeded in making his escape, despite the fact that he was lame, and sought protection at police headquarters. But signal as it was, the triumph of the rioters was of brief duration. Soon after the engine had been run out of the town the following order was posted on the Lehigh Valley depot: "Notice.—All peaceful and lawful measures have failed to secure safe transit of mail, passenger and freight trains. Notice is hereby given that all trains are abandoned indefinitely, till further notice, on the Wyoming division. By order Robert Sayre, Superintendent."

On the night of August 1st it became known in the city that the State and Federal troops were on their way to Wilkes-Barre and Scranton, and not many hours elapsed ere the strikers, many of whom concealed their identity under masks, were engaged in the lawless work of tearing up the railway tracks with the hope of thus preventing the approach of the soldiers; but Plymouth was invested by the forces early in the morning of the 2nd without resistance on the part of the citizens, and they marched to Wilkes-Barre, occupying the city before daybreak the same morning. The magistrates, strikers and all citizens found in the streets were secured and placed under guard until they could be identified. This unexpected movement paralyzed the strikers, who offered no resistance, and about seventy of them were arrested and held by the troops. A considerable force was stationed at Wilkes-Barre, and under such protection the tracks were repaired and the strike was at an end on the Lehigh Valley road. Governor Hartranft and two trains loaded with troops passed through the city about noon en route for Scranton. Some of the strikers sought and were granted employment in their old places.

MILITARY ORGANIZATIONS.—THE ARMORY.

The part played by the citizens of Wilkes-Barre in various military movements will be found in the military history of the county. There are at present four companies with headquarters in the city, all of which receive due attention, the fact that they form parts of regiments made up in part of companies located elsewhere forbidding their extended treatment in this connection.

The armory on Northampton street, the headquarters of the local military organizations, is a place of interest. For some years it had been the endeavor of Captain Thomas C. Parker and others interested in the Wyoming Artillerists to obtain the commodious building now in use for military purposes, and it was not until 1879 that it was successful, when the privilege was granted to the battery alone, with the provision that should any other military organizations be recruited they should be accorded equal favor. At the expense of a few liberal minded citizens, seconded by the enterprising owner of the building, it is being fitted up as a military rendezvous, and when finished will be as fine an armory as any in the State.

MANUFACTURING HISTORY.

EARLY MANUFACTURING AND MECHANICAL ITEMS.

In 1810 there were in the township thirty-three hand looms, and during a year which included a portion of the one mentioned 129 yards of cotton, 1,717 yards of woolen and 6,531 yards of linen cloth were manufactured. Francis McShane established a small cut-nail factory at Wilkes-Barre, using anthracite coal for smelting iron, and for several years conducted a successful wholesale and retail business. There was in the early days of the borough the usual diversity of mechanics' shops, and the proprietors changed from time to time, rendering the tracing of the history of these common industries more than difficult. In 1833 Wilkes-Barreans saw the construction and completion of what was then justly regarded as a triumph of mechanical ingenuity. Richard Jones, a very ingenious young mechanic, who it is said had no knowledge of a steam engine except such as he had been able to obtain by a study of engravings of them in books, constructed a working model of one with a one-and-a-half-inch cylinder and a three-inch stroke. This was the first steam engine ever manufactured in Luzerne, Lackawanna and Wyoming counties. The first one constructed within the same territory for service was built three years later by Benjamin Drake and J. C. Smith, and placed in Smith's mill in Plymouth. It was a 15-horse power engine, with a 9-inch cylinder and a 3-foot stroke.

LATER MANUFACTURING HISTORY.

A large rolling mill and nail factory were erected at South Wilkes-Barre by Thomas Chambers, E. R. Biddle & Co., in 1840, at a cost of $300,000. The firm became involved and the establishment was sold to satisfy a debt due the Wyoming Bank; and, passing into the hands of the Montour Iron Company, was removed to Danville, Montour county. During the period of the successful operation of this establishment Wilkes-Barre increased immeasurably in business and population. In 1840 Lewis Le Grand opened a blacksmithing and general jobbing, ironing and repair shop on South Main street. In 1859 he began the manufacture of wagons—his main shop, which he now occupies, having been erected in 1857. In 1871-73 D. R. Malvin was a partner in the concern. December 4th, 1872, C. D. Le Grand, son of Lewis Le Grand, patented the well-known buckboard wagon, since so extensively manufactured at this establishment. November 11th, 1878, the patent was renewed to cover recently perfected improvements. In 1842 H. S. & E.

Renwick, of New York, erected an anthracite furnace, operated by steam power, and carried on the manufacture of pig-iron for about a year; but the furnace was subsequently permitted to lie idle until 1854, when it was purchased by John McCanley and the Messrs. Carter of Tamaqua, who enlarged it and began business on quite an extensive scale. The iron ore and limestone were brought from Columbia county by canal, and the works, under the supervision of Mr. McCanley, yielded six tons of iron per day. In 1856 the establishment was burned.

Planing Mills.—In 1844 S. Y. Kittle established himself as a manufacturer of furniture on South Main street, below Ross. He introduced improved machinery from time to time, and putting in power planers about twenty years later, engaged quite extensively in the manufacture of planed lumber and mouldings. In January, 1854, Price & Wetzel established a planing mill at the corner of Canal and Union streets, where buildings were erected for that purpose. A year later the firm became Price & Haas. Ten years afterward Mr. C. B. Price became sole proprietor, and remained so until 1876, when the firm became C. B. Price & Son. About 1864 the original buildings were burnt and replaced by others, which were torn down in a dozen years, after the erection of the present commodious accommodations on Canal street, near Market. Operations at the planing mill on Canal street now the property of the estate of Stephen Lee, deceased, were begun about 1855. The establishment, after passing through the hands of several proprietors, became the property of Hamilton & Brew, of whom the late Stephen Lee purchased it in 1867. Since his death, in 1874, the business has been conducted by his sons Conrad and Samuel N. Lee, executors of his will, and builders, furnishers and dealers in all kinds of lumber. Another leading establishment in this line of manufacture and trade is that of J. E. Patterson & Co., on Canal street at the corner of Jackson, which has an extended trade and reputation, having received the Centennial medal for its doors, etc.

The Vulcan Iron Works.—The Vulcan Iron Works, one of the most important manufacturing interests in the city, were founded by Richard Jones in 1849, and successfully conducted by him until 1866, when a stock company was formed and incorporated with a capital stock of $100,000, of which Richard Jones was president and superintendent, and Robert T. Block secretary and treasurer. The company began at once to increase the capacity of the works by building a substantial brick machine shop seventy-five by one hundred feet, and equipped with the most modern tools, and a three-story brick pattern house. The constant demand for heavy machinery manufactured at these works compelled the company to further enlarge their manufacturing capacity by the erection of a new foundry and pattern shop eighty by one hundred and sixty-five feet, and a smith and boiler shop sixty-six by one hundred and thirty feet, in 1873, when the capital stock had increased to $200,000. During the progress of these improvements Mr. Richard Jones died. He was succeeded by L. C. Paine as president, and E. H. Jones, son of the former president, became superintendent. The works are built within an area of about eight acres, fronting four hundred feet on Main street and extending six hundred and thirty-four feet back to the Pennsylvania Canal. Tracks and sidings run into the shops from the Lehigh Valley Railroad, with a turn-table by which cars can be directed into any department of the establishment. The class of work manufactured embraces machinery of every description. These works, founded on a small scale but suited for the work then required, are of a capacity to make the heaviest machinery needed for the deepest shafts (some being nine hundred feet in depth) including pumps, ventilating fans, boilers, coal breakers, rolls, screens, etc. The quality of the work has kept pace with the increased weight, and it stands pre-eminent for its adaptation to heavy and deep mining.

The Wyoming Valley Manufacturing Company.—In 1866 Jonathan Mooers & Son had a small foundry at the corner of Main and Dana streets. Mr. Milton Dana and others afterwards became interested, the firm name was changed to Dana & Co. April 5th, 1867, a charter was granted by the Legislature of Pennsylvania to William L. Stewart and others under the name of the Wyoming Valley Manufacturing Company, and the 30th of the ensuing month the following officers were elected: E. W. Sturdevant, president; E. Robinson, vice-president; F. Koerner, secretary and treasurer; Milton Dana, assistant secretary; superintendent, William L. Stewart. The company enlarged the capacity of the foundry and erected a frame machine shop, a car shop and other necessary buildings on the same location, but as the business increased it became necessary to secure more room. New brick buildings were erected on lands purchased of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, immediately adjoining the railroad and affording increased facilities for receiving material and shipping manufactured articles. At these works are manufactured every description of light and heavy machinery, including steam engines for shafts, slopes, planes, coal breakers, blast and rolling mills; double and single acting pumps of every variety, for mining and other purposes; mills for powder making, locomotives, flue, tubral and cylinder boilers, of the best Pennsylvania charcoal boiler plate; forging of all kinds, and iron and brass casting of every description. The wire rope machinery of the Hazard Manufacturing Company was made at this establishment. The present (1880) officers of the company are as follows: Richard Sharpe, president; A. H. Van Horn, vice-president; Richard Sharpe, jr., treasurer; H. K. McLean, superintendent and J. N. Davison, bookkeeper. The company has at present an authorized stock of $100,000.

The Hazard Manufacturing Company.—The Hazard Manufacturing Company, manufacturers of iron and steel wire ropes, is the outgrowth of a business in the same line established by Fisher Hazard, of Mauch Chunk, at that place in 1848. The growing demand for such a manufactory in the heart of the anthracite coal region led to its removal to Wilkes-Barre. A stock company was formed, of which Fisher Hazard was elected president, E. B. Leisenring treasurer, and T. C. North superintendent and secretary, December 1st, 1867. In 1868 the company was chartered, Charles Parrish, E. B. Leisenring and Fisher Hazard being the incorporators. A second election of officers was held January 18th, 1876, which resulted in the choice of the gentlemen now (1880) serving: Charles Parrish, president; Woodward Leavenworth, secretary and treasurer, and T. C. North, superintendent. The ropes manufactured by this company are made of wire drawn at their own factory from the best brands of Swedes' and Norway iron and a superior quality of steel. All sizes of round and flat, coarse or fine, iron or steel wire rope, for the transmission of power and use on slopes, derricks, shafts and ferries, and as guy ropes, are manufactured. The machinery is of the most approved style, and capable of turning out 6,000 feet of three-inch wire rope in one piece. The trade of the company extends throughout the United States and Canadas, wire rope being extensively employed in coal mining districts upon planes, slopes and shafts, in the silver and gold regions of the west, and in cities upon elevators and hoists. Round wire rope is usually used in the coal regions, and flat wire rope in silver and gold mining. This company has sent much of the latter variety to the silver mining district of Nevada.

The Dickson Manufacturing Company.—The Dickson Manufacturing Company of Scranton have established an important branch in Wilkes-Barre, under the management of James Dickson, superintendent, which is duly mentioned in connection with the history of that corporation. The Wilkes-Barre establishment is largely devoted to the manufacture of engines, boilers and general mining machinery. The shops are located on Canal street above East Market, and were formerly occupied by the firm of Laning & Marshall, formerly extensive manufacturers in Wilkes-Barre for a considerable period.

The Wyoming Blue Stone Works.—This company had its origin in January, 1867, when a partnership was formed between J. S. Lum, P. A. Wine and J. P. Brownscombe. In 1869 the firm became Lum & Brownscombe, who were succeeded a few months later by J. P. Brownscombe. In April, 1878, a partnership was formed between J. P. Brownscombe, of Wilkes-Barre, and D. H. King, of New York. The quarries of the firm are at Meshoppen, Wyoming county, the main office at Wilkes-Barre, and the New York office at 37 and 39 Wall street. The business was established for the manufacture of flagging stone. In 1870 the manufacture of cut stone was introduced, and a wholesale trade was begun in 1871. The firm has shipped flagging and curb stone to New York city, Elmira, Oswego and Binghamton, N. Y.; to Easton, Reading, Harrisburg and Philadelphia, Pa., and to Elizabeth and Newark, N. J. A quarry of heavy stone was opened at Meshoppen in 1875, and building stone has been sent in all directions. One car load was shipped to New York in 1875. During the early part of 1880

600 car loads were sold, and the demand exceeded the ability of the firm to supply.

Miscellaneous Manufactures.—In the spring of 1860 Fred Ahlborn began the manufacture of soap and chandlers' ware at the corner of Canal and Northampton streets. The present factory was erected on the same ground in 1874. In 1876 the firm became Ahlborn Brothers. They are extensive manufacturers of soap and candles and dealers in tallow, sal-soda and similar goods. J. H. Brock began the manufacture of wire screens on Canal street about 1874. In 1876 he sold the establishment to Mr. E. H. Hunt, who is doing an extensive and constantly increasing business in the manufacture of woven wrought-iron screens for screening coal. There is a smaller establishment of the kind in the city. C. A. Becker, manufacturer and dealer in all kinds of earthen ware, Rockingham and yellow ware and a great variety of stove linings, terra cotta garden vases and flower pots, began business in 1874. His factory is on Canal street near Northampton. The Oliver Powder Works have obtained an excellent reputation, and through the energy and persistence of their founder and owner, General P. A. Oliver, are established permanently and successfully, and are doing a very extensive business. These works are situated at Laurel Run station on the Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad, and near the celebrated Prospect Rock on the mountain overlooking the valley on the east. There are also manufactories of paper packing boxes and flouring-mills, packing houses and the usual variety of mechanic's shops, large and small.

MANUFACTURERS' AID ASSOCIATION.

In pursuance of previous announcement, a meeting was held at the office of Messrs. Farnham & Paine, on Franklin street, on the evening of March 20th, 1880, at which the following gentlemen were present: John Welles Hollenback, Charles D. Foster, L. C. Paine, Mayor-elect Brodrick, Jonas Long, Daniel H. Frantz, Richard Sharpe, B. G. Carpenter, Col. George N. Reichard, Marcus Smith, William Dickover, Daniel Fell, G. M. Miller, Fred. C. Johnson, L. L. Ayres, W. F. Goff, C. L. Lamb, William Stoddard, B. F. Dorrance, George S. Bennett, M. B. Houpt, R. J. Flick, Col. C. M. Conyngnam, George A. Wells and J. R. Coolbaugh.

It was proposed to organize an association for the purpose of protecting the interests of manufacturers, and of inducing such people to locate in Wilkes-Barre as it might be thought would aid to advance the best interests of the city. A general plan of operations was adopted, and Charles Parrish was elected president and George N. Reichard secretary and treasurer of the organization, which it was voted to call the Wilkes-Barre Manufacturers' Aid Association. The following resolution was adopted: "That our city government and the three district school boards be requested to adopt proper legislation whereby manufacturers desiring to locate in our city may be exempt for a term of years from taxation on their real estate and machinery for either municipal or school purposes, and that the executive committee shall confer with the city council and the school board on this exemption."

After some discussion concerning the prices of coal, gas and water, and the necessity for liberality on the part of real estate owners in dealing with such parties as might be induced to invest in manufacturing enterprises in the city, assurances were given that the necessities mentioned would be supplied to such persons at a reasonable figure, and it was deemed probable that gifts of lots will be made should occasion require. A small fund being necessary to defray current expenses, such as advertising in New York and New England papers, sending out committees to manufacturing centers, etc., a subscription was started, and in a few minutes an amount sufficient for the present exigencies was pledged. The importance of this movement on the part of Wilkes-Barre's most enterprising business men on the future of the city can be but dimly foreshadowed.

WILKES-BARRE AS A MANUFACTURING CENTER.

The city of Wilkes-Barre offers decided advantages for manufacturers and capitalists desiring a location for factories, etc. Its close proximity to the great iron producing districts of the Lehigh valley, as well as of the Susquehanna, gives it a decided advantage for iron work of any description. Its railroad connections place manufacturers of iron products in immediate and cheap communication with the great iron producing sections. Its close contiguity to the large and prosperous agricultural counties of Bradford, Wyoming and Susquehanna insures a favorable price and abundant supply of farm products, while the low prices for fuel combine to make the cost of living as low as in any other eastern city, and probably lower than in most of them. But its greatest advantages are the abundance of women and children laborers and its cheap fuel. Of the former it has an almost untouched field to select from. The male members of the family are largely engaged in and about the mines, while to the female members no occupation is attainable. It is estimated that in and around the city there are 5,000 or more of this class ready and willing to work at low wages. As to coal suitable for steam purposes, millions of tons can be had for a trifle above the cost of hauling. The coal, or culm, is constantly increasing in amount and is readily accessible from any portion of the city. It is now largely used by steam makers for the production of power, and in quantity is practically inexhaustible, and can be delivered for fifty cents per ton. Manufacturers preferring to use lump or steam sizes can get these at low prices compared with the cost elsewhere. Building materials are also obtainable at low figures. The great lumber interests are in close proximity and easily accessible. Building stone is abundant and cheap, and large quantities of brick are made within the city limits. Building sites for desirable manufacturing uses can be had at very low figures, and some are offered gratuitously. The city has three separate and independent railroad connections with the west as well as with the seaboard, and also canal facilities with the lower Susquehanna, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and points south, and railroad transportation can be arranged on favorable terms to large transporters. A prominent advantage also is the low rate of assessment and taxation, likely to be continued in the future.

The banking capital is abundant, there being between $1,500,000 and $2,000,000 thus invested and insuring to manufacturers a full supply of capital for business purposes. The water system is unsurpassed in its excellence of water and the supply is full.

SECRET, SOCIAL AND OTHER ORGANIZATIONS.

MASONIC.

June 24th, 1779, while General Sullivan's army was encamped on the plain where Wilkes-Barre now is, a lodge of masons met in the tent of Colonel Proctor. A chaplain read on this occasion, which was probably the first convention of a lodge on the Susquehanna, one of Rev. Dr. Smith's masonic sermons. A few days afterward the funeral services of the order were read at the graves of Captain J. Davis and Lieutenant William Jones of the 11th Pennsylvania regiment, two masons who had been killed during the preceding April a few miles east of Wilkes-Barre. They were reinterred in the Wilkes-Barre burying ground.

Wilkes-Barre Lodge, No. 61, F. & A. M.—February 27th, 1794, the second lodge of Ancient York Masons that convened in Luzerne county was opened in the "Old Fell house," with the following principal officers: W. M., George Seytz; S. W., John Paul Schott; J. W., Peter Grubb; secretary, Arnold Colt; treasurer, Samuel Bowman.

Among the early members of this lodge were Asa Dimmock, Ezekiel Hyde, Stephen Tuttle, Isaac Bowen, J. and E. Bulkley, Caleb Hoyt, Peter Yarrington, Charles Miner, Joseph Wright, Oliver Helme, James Campbell, Josiah Wright, Samuel Jameson, Jonathan Hancock, Zebulon Marcy, Eleazer Blackman and F. Depuy. Revs. Drake, Cox, and William Bishop were early chaplains. On St. John's day, 1794, the first named preached a sermon to the assembled lodge in the court-house. December 23d, 1799, the members of the lodge heard with much sadness the announcement of the death of Washington, and four days later assembled in the court-house to hear an eulogy upon the great deceased mason from Roswell Wells. The regular communications and other sessions of the lodge were held at the house of Jesse Fell until 1804, when a room was rented in the court-house for an annual consideration of $10. The anti-masonic excitement induced by the alleged abduction of William Morgan in 1826 resulted more disastrously to lodges throughout New York and northern Pennsylvania than elsewhere. The last regular communication of the Wilkes-Barre lodge prior to 1844 was held August 12th, 1832.

CHURCH HISTORY.

PRESBYTERIANISM.

Early Religious History.—The earliest efforts to establish religious worship in Wyoming, after the labors of the Moravian missionaries, were made, it is believed, by the Presbyterians, though the honor is by some contested in behalf of the Baptists. Opposing claims to priority and conflicting evidence as to the sectarian preferences of some of the pioneer preachers tend to envelop the early church history of Wyoming in considerable uncertainty. The pioneer Presbyterian preacher who visited the locality was Rev. David Brainerd, who was succeeded by his brother John before the French war, which compelled both the Moravian and Presbyterian missionaries to leave the frontiers. Rev. William Marsh, a Congregationalist (or Baptist), accompanied the Mill creek settlers in 1763, and was slain with others October 15th of that year. Rev. George Beckwith, jr., came with the second New England colony to Wyoming February 8th, 1769, and remained about a year. Whether these preachers had come in the capacity of spiritual advisers, or, like others, as adventurers, is not certain; though it is probable they were induced to visit the locality as bearers of gospel truth by those whom they accompanied or followed.

The earliest record of any general movement for establishing the gospel in the valley is dated September 11th, 1772, when at a town meeting it was voted to invite Rev. Jacob Johnson, of Groton, Conn., to come to labor with the people as their pastor, and a liberal donation in land was voted him in case he should accept their invitation. Mr. Johnson came to the valley in response to this offer, and one year later appears this record:

"August 23d, 1773, at a town meeting regularly convened a final call was extended to Rev. Jacob Johnson, who has been some time laboring for us, to become our pastor."

This was the first actual settlement of any minister of the gospel north of the Blue mountains in the territory now comprising the State of Pennsylvania. Mr. Johnson was a New England Congregationalist, and as such his people and their successors continued to be governed more than fifty years. In 1778 the little church seems to have been in a prosperous condition, and the erection of a primitive house of worship of respectable dimensions is said to have been nearly completed when savages swept away everything in the settlement.

Rev. Jacob Johnson, inured to the dangers of pioneer life and zealous in Christian work, seems to have been peculiarly adapted to the demands of the place and the period. He was born in Wallingford, Conn., in 1713, graduated at Yale College in 1740, and was ordained to the gospel ministry in 1749. For some time he had officiated as pastor of the church of North Groton (now Ledyard), Conn., and had subsequently spent several years as a missionary among the Indians on the Mohawk, principally with the Oneidas, at Upper Oneida Castle, where he was brought into intimate and friendly relations with Sir William Johnson. Soon acquiring a knowledge of the language of the tribes with whom he labored, he was enabled to preach to them in their own tongue with signal power and effect. Tall and of commanding figure, with dark hair, eyes and complexion, he soon became a favorite with the Indians and was several times employed as interpreter at important treaty negotiations. He had won the confidence of the tribes and exerted so considerable an influence over them that in 1768, when Governor Penn sought to obtain from the Six Nations by treaty a relinquishment of the Indian title to the lands on the upper Susquehanna, Conrad Weiser wrote to the agent of Penn to "beware of that wicked priest of Canajoharie," and to keep the matter a secret from him, or otherwise his influence with the Indians might frustrate their designs. At the capitulation of Forty Fort he was one of the commissioners who treated for terms with the victorious invaders, and the conditions of surrender were reduced to writing by him. In common with the other survivors he fled with his family to Connecticut. Returning to Wyoming in 1781, full of ardor for religion, liberty, and the Connecticut claim to the soil, he was welcomed by his flock with cordial congratulations. He went from place to place awakening sinners to repentance, arousing the people to new efforts in the common cause of the country against English tyranny, and advising them by all means to adhere to and support their claim to their lands. He shared the sufferings and humiliations of his people in their threatened expulsion by the Pennsylvania land claimants after an adverse decision had been recorded in the Trenton decree; and so vigorous was he in denouncing the authority of the Pennsylvania claimants and the terms imposed upon the settlers under Connecticut title (though they had made an exception in his case, and generously offered to permit him to occupy his land two years longer), that he was arrested in 1784 and held to bail to answer to a charge of sedition against the commonwealth of Pennsylvania; but the case was never brought to trial.

The Old Ship Zion.—Meetings were held in private houses until the completion of the court-house; and not liking to worship in that building, Mr. Johnson took such energetic measures for the erection of a church for the accommodation of his congregation that in 1791 the town authorities of Wilkes-Barre appointed Zebulon Butler, John Paul Schott, Timothy Pickering, Daniel Gore and Nathan Waller a committee to select a site for a suitable edifice. A place in the public square was chosen, and the following year the proceeds from the sale of the public ferry were given, and a committee appointed to secure subscriptions toward a building fund. Rev. Mr. Johnson did not live, however, to see any substantial promise of the fruition of his labors, for the building was not enclosed until June, 1801. He was to some extent visionary toward the close of his life, believing himself endowed with preternatural knowledge of coming events; and in the beginning of March, 1797, being in his accustomed good health, he informed his family that he was soon to die and immediately set about selecting a spot for his burial place and the preparation of a grave. The place chosen was on top of the ridge overlooking Wilkes-Barre at the upper end of Franklin street as now opened, and he labored at the task till the grave was completed (March 15th, 1797). On the evening of that day he conversed cheerfully with his family, telling them that he did not expect to live until another morning, and retired to rest. During the night one of his sons, who occupied an adjoining room, heard an unusual sound, and upon repairing to his bedside found his prediction about to be verified, and in a few minutes life was extinct.

Many of the early members of his congregation were laid in their graves before the church was finished, in 1812, after a hard struggle to raise the funds necessary to its completion, one of the means resorted to having been a lottery, which did not accomplish the end desired. The steeple, which had been erected in 1801, was three times struck by lightning before the edifice was finished and the bell hung.

The bell was cast in Philadelphia August 6th, 1811, by George Hedderly, and weighed 680 pounds. It bore the inscription in Latin "Gloria in Excelsis Deo-Fili Dei Miserere," and the English sentence "I will sound and resound unto thy people, O Lord, to call them to thy word." It tolled the curfew, or knell of parting day, from 1812 to 1845. The erection of the "Old Ship Zion," as the old church came to be known, was performed under contract by Joseph Hitchcock.

The First Presbyterian Church.—Mr. Johnson was succeeded by Rev. Jabez Chadwick and James W. Woodworth, and perhaps other missionaries from the missionary society of Connecticut served during a period ensuing. Messrs. Chadwick and Woodworth drew up a statement of doctrine and a covenant and effected a more formal organization than had hitherto existed, the following named persons subscribing to the covenant July 1st, 1803: Luke Sweatland, William Dickson, Hugh Conner, Nehemiah Ide, Daniel Hoyt, Stephen Hollister, John Gore, William Colwell, Darius Preston, Hannah Breese, Wealthy Smith, Eunice Sprague, Elizabeth Sill, Martha Blackman,

Susanna Fish, Polly Mulford, Naomi Schott, Martha Ide Hannah Chapman, Eliser Ross, Niece Hollister, Ruth Keeler, Jane Colwell, Sarah Hollenback, Hannah Bradley Susannah Dana, Joanna Fish. The signatures were attested as having been "signed in the presence of Jabez Chadwick and James W. Woodward." A missionary named Porter also labored here about this time. Rev. Ard Hoyt became pastor of the church in 1806, and resigned November 10th, 1811, to go as a missionary to the Indians in Tennessee. The following pastors followed successively:

Rev. Hutchings Taylor, from the fall of 1817 to the fall of 1818; Rev. D. Moulton, 1819, 1820; Rev. Cyrus Gildersleeve, 1821 to the spring of 1829; Rev. Nicholas Murray, who afterwards gained considerable notoriety as "Kirwan" in his celebrated contest with John, afterwards Archbishop Hughes, of the Catholic Church, 1829-33. During Mr. Murray's administration the church, which had been partly Congregational hitherto, fully adopted the Presbyterian form of government, electing Henry C. Anhauser, William C. Gildersleeve and Oristus Collins as elders.

In 1853 Rev. John Dorrance, D. D., was installed pastor of the church, which he served with unswerving faithfulness and signal success until his death, April 13th, 1861. Mr. Dorrance's successor, Rev. A. A. Hodge, D. D., became pastor September 7th, 1861, and remained until the autumn of 1864. He was followed by Rev. S. B. Dodd, whose pastorate extended from Nov. 10th, 1864, to October 12th, 1868. The present pastor, Rev. F. B. Hodge, began his work February 23d following, and his pastorate has been eminently successful and mutually pleasant to pastor and people. The elders of the church are: Oristus Collins, Calvin Parsons, Nathaniel Rutter, A. T. McClintock, John W. Hollenback, Douglass Smith, Dickson Lewers and George Loveland; deacons, Dr. C. S. Beek and Dr. J. A. Murphy; president of the session, Colonel G. M. Reynolds; secretary, S. H. Lynch; treasurer, Douglass Smith; Harrison Wright and Dr. G. W. Guthrie. The Presbyterian churches of Nanticoke and Ashley, the Memorial Presbyterian church of Wilkes-Barre and the First Presbyterian church of Pittston have been organized from the First Presbyterian Church of Wilkes-Barre, and many persons have united with and in some cases largely constituted other churches in this region.

The membership of the church in the spring of 1880 was 420. During the ten years ending April, 1879, the total contributions of the church to charitable objects amount to $104,000, and $66,339 has been expended for congregational purposes.

About 1830 a series of incidents began which are sometimes referred to as the church war between the Presbyterians and Methodists. Wilkes-Barre had only recently been embraced within the limits of the newly organized Oneida Methodist Conference, and constituted a regular charge. The Methodist circuit preachers had held meetings from time to time and had obtained a considerable following, their services often being held in the old church, the exclusive right to the use of which was claimed by the Presbyterians; but which, on account of its having been erected by the joint contributions of persons of all denominations, and many unconnected with any, the Methodists maintained ought to be open for their services a portion of the time. The Presbyterians had possession of the keys, and in time the doors were locked against the Methodists, who were so aggressive as to force them with a crowbar. A number of amusing incidents of this period, during which, at times, both denominations attempted to hold meetings in the church at the same time, are related; but it would be both uninteresting and unprofitable to enter into detail in treating this unfortunate religious strife. It was finally brought to an end by the purchase by the Methodists of the interests of the Presbyterians in the building, the latter denomination having at that time erected a more commodious house of worship, which long since was superseded by other improvements which have culminated in the present elegant and costly structure on Franklin street, near Northampton.

Early Sunday-Schools.—Previous to the organization of Sunday-schools in Wyoming the children were met by office bearers in the church more or less frequently, and instructed in the catechism and most likely in general religious truths suggested thereby. The following note appears in the church record under date of July 9th, 1814:

"Voted unanimously that in the opinion of members present it is the duty of the church to meet frequently with their children for catechism, etc., and that this church concurs with the assembly in recommending the first Tuesday in each month for such meeting."

"All present covenanted to attend with all their children if in providence it should be so ordained that they can.' Four places were appointed for these monthly meetings.

In the spring of 1818 a union Sunday-school of Presbyterians, Episcopalians and Methodists was organized. Oristus Collins, Dr. Edward Covell and Zachariah B. Peet started the enterprise, and Judge Oristus Collins is supposed to have been the superintendent. In the fall objection was made to the use of the shorter catechism in the school and a division took place. A portion of the school met in the office of Judge David Scott, who was its first superintendent. The records of these early Sunday-schools are very meagre, and their history cannot be written with that certainty that is desirable. By some authorities there is a claim that in the Sunday-school under the superintendency of Judge Scott the Episcopalian element predominated. Sectarianism undoubtedly had small place in the plans of the originators of the first Sunday-school. Judge Collins has always been prominently identified with the Presbyterian cause, and he continued to act as superintendent of the original school, or became its superintendent after the division, and its sessions are believed to have been held in the old Wilkes-Barre Academy. It is probable that with more or less regularity a Sunday-school was maintained during the succeeding seven years, though there are no records that such was the case. In 1825 the school was strengthened, or a new organization effected (it is uncertain which), by some ladies from Philadelphia, among whom were Misses Mary Gardner and Susan Mitchell, under whose management it soon manifested a vigorous life. It was held in a building, now destroyed, which stood on the site of Music Hall block. About this time a general interest in the Sunday-school cause became manifest, and schools were opened in various localities around Wilkes-Barre, which have many of them been maintained since.

Later Sunday-School History.—March 31st, 1837, the "Home" school was organized, Mr. W. C. Gildersleeve being reappointed superintendent, a position which he had long held, and serving until June 30th following, when he was succeeded by John M. Burtis. The school has since had a continuous existence under a number of successive superintendents, among the earlier of whom were John O. Baker, Dickinson, Grier, Wurts, Nathaniel Rutter, Andrew T. McClintock, W. S. Parsons and Judge Collins, the latter serving from 1858 to 1867. In the latter year W. S. Parsons was again chosen superintendent, and held the office for five or six years. His successor was Mrs. S. H. Lynch, who was succeeded by the present superintendent, Rev. F. B. Hodge. A number of mission schools have been established in various localities in and around the city, some of which have disbanded or become connected with other churches. According to the last annual report the aggregate membership of the Presbyterian Sunday-schools of Wilkes-Barre was as follows: Teachers and officers, 114; scholars, 1,229; total, 1,343.

Welsh Presbyterian Church.—The house of worship of this church is located at the corner of Northampton and Meade streets. It was erected in 1867. Previous to that date the congregation worshiped in a small wooden building in the locality known as "the Empire." The church was organized in 1864, with the following named members: Robert Wright and wife, Lewis S. Jones and wife, Mary Lewis, Richard Roderick, Stephen Jones, William J. Lewis and wife, David Moses and wife, James Roderick, John C. Jones, J. W. Jones and wife, Thomas Lewis and wife, Elizabeth H. Jones, David L. Richards and John T. Griffith and wife.

The first pastor was Rev. J. Hughes, who was in charge for seven years. During the three succeeding years the church was without a pastor. In 1874 Rev. T. B. Thomas, the present pastor, took charge.

This is the strongest Welsh church, numerically, in the city. It supports missions on Rolling-mill Hill and in Ashley. The number of members enrolled is 195; the congregation numbers about 500.

The Sunday-school has a membership of 290. The superintendents are Mr. Samuel Williams and Mrs. C. S. Jones.

The Memorial Presbyterian.—This church was erected as a memorial to Frank Cleveland, Mary Catlin and Lynde Henderson, only children of Calvin and Fanny D. L. Wadhams, who died of scarlet fever in the order in which they are named January 4th and 16th and February 9th, 1871.

The work was begun May 21st, 1872, and July 20th the corner stone was laid with appropriate services.

While waiting for the completion of the edifice the necessary steps were taken to secure the organization of a church. The need of another Presbyterian church in the city was apparent, the large house of the prosperous First Presbyterian Church of Wilkes-Barre being more than filled. On the minutes of Lackawanna Presbytery, of April 17th, 1873, is the following record; "The undersigned (Calvin and Fanny D. L. Wadhams) petition that a committee be appointed with power to organize a church in the city of Wilkes-Barre, to be known as Memorial Church." This request was granted, and February 24th, 1874, the church was organized, with the following members, who presented letters of dismissal from other churches:

Calvin Wadhams, Fanny D. L. Wadhams, John W. Lynde, Stella M. Shoemaker, R. C. Shoemaker, Frederick M. Shoemaker, Charles P. Hunt, Anna M. Hunt, P. M. Barber, Mary B. Barber, Susan C. Hunt, J. A. Rippard, Catharine P. Rippard, George S. Rippard, Mary E. W. Rippard, Jennie Rippard, Christian Sleppy, Juliet H. Metzger, Malinda A. Metzger, Ann M. Hunt, John Roderick, Margaret Roderick, Eleanor Griffith, Nettie McNeish, Joseph Brown, Ann Brown, Elizabeth S. Spence, Elizabeth S. Harrower, Anna M. Doran, Elizabeth Doran, Frances L. Doran, Gertrude Blackman, Albert Barnes, Sarah Barnes and George H. Lake, from the First Presbyterian Church of Wilkes-Barre; Hattie Lake, from the First Presbyterian Church, Scranton; Anna M. Wells, from the Congregational Church, Glastonbury, Conn.; Elvira B. Hathaway, from the Presbyterian church, Tioga, Pa., and O. F. Harvey, from the Brainerd Presbyterian Church, Easton, Pa.

Silas B. Hathaway and Sophia J. Harvey, after examination, were received on profession of their faith. J. A. and George S. Rippard were elected elders. Immediately after the organization a meeting was held for the purpose of calling a pastor, which resulted in the choice of Rev. W. H. Swift, who was ordained and installed May 7th following, and has served continuously since. The dedication of the church took place April 8th, 1874, with appropriate ceremonies, after which it was given to the congregation by Mr. and Mrs. Wadhams upon certain specified conditions.

The history of the Sabbath-school antedates that of the church. A Sunday-school was organized by J. A. Rippard and Calvin Wadhams, in the upper room of a beer house at the corner of Washington and Jackson streets, on the first Sunday in November, 1870. There were only thirteen persons present, but by April, 1871, the membership had increased to 75. At that date the school changed its place of meeting, occupying a store room in Hillard's block, on North Main street, where its membership increased to 100, until March, 1872, when it was discontinued on account of the prevalence of small-pox among those attending. It was reopened in the following June, however, with an attendance of only 23, in an old building which stood near the Memorial church,

Samuel Pell

THE PELL FAMILY.

Josiah Pell, sen., was born in New York city, April 24th, 1734, and married Elizabeth Jackson, born in New London, Conn., in 1758, for his second wife. Josiah Pell, jr., was his son by a former marriage. Mary, eldest child of Josiah, sen., and Elizabeth Pell, was born in Hanover, August 15th, 1792; married John James, an English gentleman, of Hollidaysburg, Pa., and died May 22nd, 1860. Thomas Pell was born in Hanover, March 20th, 1794, and died September 25th, 1804. Samuel Pell was born in Hanover, November 4th, 1796. Silas Pell was born in Hanover, August 9th, 1800, and died July 14th, 1836.

Mr. Pell came from New York to Hanover during the Revolutionary struggle, being obliged to leave his former home on account of the confiscation of an ample fortune, arising out of political troubles. With what little he could save he purchased the old Pell homestead in Hanover. While the war was in progress he, with his father-in-law, was taken prisoner by the Indians. Mr. Jackson was killed, and Mr. Pell effected his escape. He died May 15th, 1801; his wife September 24th, 1805, leaving their young children to the care of an uncle in Newport until Samuel was eighteen years old, when they removed to Hanover on the old farm. May 15th, 1830, Samuel married Margaret, daughter of Henry and Anna Lines, born in Hanover, May 2nd, 1807. Mrs. Pell's grandfather, Conrad Lines, was a settler in Wyoming before the massacre; was driven off and returned to New York, whence he had come, remaining there five years before again locating in Hanover. Henry Lines was born in 1773, and died in March, 1835.

Samuel Pell was a well known farmer, and for many years a prominent man in Hanover, where he was justice of the peace fifteen years. He was characterized by integrity, industry, benevolence and sterling worth. He removed to Wilkes-Barre in 1861, and died October 22nd, 1873. The children born to Samuel and Margaret Pell were: Elizabeth, February 1st, 1831 (died November 25th, 1833); Mary, November 10th, 1832 (married Matthias Petty December 28th, 1854); Harriet, September 24th, 1835 (married Maurice Hann, of New Jersey, December 19th, 1860); Margaret, February 26th, 1839 (died July 4th, 1854); Anna, March 18th, 1842 (married M. H. Post August 24th, 1869); Harrison, August 12th, 1844 (died June 28th, 1847); and Emily, February 15th, 1847 (married John Lee).

JAMES CLARKSON.

The subject of this sketch was born in Hermonch, Scotland, and resided there in the employ of Lord Maitland, having charge of his estate. During his engagement he married Margaret McGill, of Hermonch. In the year 1830 he emigrated with his wife and one child to America and settled in Philadelphia, engaging with a Mr. Graham to labor on his farm. Not feeling contented living in that avocation, he removed to Carbondale, Luzerne (now Lackawanna) county, Pa., where he formed a partnership with Mr. Peter Campbell and engaged in cattle dealing and slaughtering. In this he was moderately successful for a time, when he and his partner entered into the employ of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company as contractors. Mr. Clarkson was soon appointed superintendent of the mines of the company, which position he held for thirty years. He then resigned and lived retired until his death, which occurred November 10th, 1876. His family consisted of two children, Jennie and Edward Clarkson. Jennie died in 1852. Edward Clarkson is still living. Mr. James Clarkson was one of the earliest pioneers of Carbondale, and his business connections with the interests of that town were of such importance that much of its progress has been due to his efforts. He was a man respected by all who knew him, and the fruits of his integrity will always be held in respect by his fellow citizens.

but which has since been removed to North Franklin street, near North. Obligated to seek other quarters in the spring of 1873, the school met in the unfinished church edifice, and on the first Sunday in September following took possession of the chapel in the rear of the church. Mr. Wadhams resigned the superintendency May 1st, 1878, when he was succeeded by Samuel Roberts. As first organized the school was one of the auxiliaries of the First Presbyterian Church. In 1874 the membership was 303, including 156 colored children. Early in 1879 there were 305 officers, teachers and scholars, and the colored element had almost entirely disappeared, there being only sixteen of the latter race in the school.

The missionary work of the ladies of the church has been successful. The church membership is constantly increasing. The session of the church has been strengthened by the election of additional elders:—Lewis H. Litts, who had previously been ordained at Newton Presbyterian church, Pa., in 1851, and Samuel Roberts, ordained and installed June 8th, 1876. Two deacons, Charles Pearce and Dr. O. F. Harvey, were ordained June 1st of the same year.

The Covenant Presbyterian Church was organized June 23d, 1876, in the First Presbyterian Church, by Revs. T. P. Hunt, N. G. Parke, W. H. Swift and F. B. Hodge. The original members were eighteen in number, viz.: Horace F. Owens, Samuel Andrews, Anthony Jackson, Levi Brown, B. Dorsey, Decatur Blue, John Logan, O. T. Hazen, William Jones, Washington Williams, Mrs. L. Hazen, Mrs. Mary Logan, Mrs. Ellen Brown, Mrs. Jane Owens, Mrs. Mary Hill, Mrs. Sarah Walker, Mrs. Lizzie Logan and Mrs. C. Andrews.

Horace F. Owens, Samuel Andrews and Anthony Jackson were duly elected and ordained the first elders of the church, and the former was the first superintendent of the Sunday-school. The number of scholars in 1879 was 45.

The first pastor of the church was the present incumbent, Rev. William D. Robeson, who has sustained the pastoral relation without intermission. Mr. Robeson is a graduate of Lincoln University. He was installed over his people in the Memorial Presbyterian Church, August 10th, 1876. Covenant Church has no house of worship. Its services are held in Gildersleve's Sunday-school mission room.

METHODISM.

Early Methodism.—Methodism was brought to the shores of America in 1766. It took root in the Wyoming valley at a very early day, although it was but partially organized and poorly equipped. It was introduced into this section of Pennsylvania in the following way. Anning Owen, a blacksmith, lived and worked at his trade a short distance above the present borough of Kingston on the main road leading to Pittston. In the stirring times of 1778 he joined the little band that went out to meet the invading forces of British and Indians. He escaped from the field of battle, but was hotly pursued by an Indian foe. In this moment of peril he promise his Maker that if spared he would lead a new life, and in the future would devote his energies to His service. He outran his pursuer and concealed himself along the shore of the river, and in due time made good his escape. When in the Eastern States he attended a Methodist service, and was deeply convicted of sin and converted to God. He obtained a license to exhort, and in 1788 returned to the valley and began his Christian work by holding prayer meetings at his own house, the influences of which were productive of much good. Similar meetings were soon held in other portions of the valley, and it was not long before Methodist classes were formed at most of the principal points in this region.

In 1789 the Rev. Nathaniel R. Mills, who traveled Newburg circuit, visited Wyoming. He was the first Methodist itinerant who came to this part of the State. In 1791 Wyoming was made a circuit. Rev. Robert Cloud was the presiding elder, and Rev. James Campbell was appointed minister. The district embraced Newburg, Wyoming, New York, New Rochelle and Long Island. One hundred members were reported as belonging to the Wyoming circuit, and 50 of these belonged to the class on Ross hill. In 1793 Bishop Asbury visited Wyoming and preached in the court-house at Wilkes-Barre. He remained but a short time. Wyoming circuit was transferred from conference to conference, and its size was from time to time diminished. The early preachers, plain and uneducated men, pious, earnest and of a heroic mould, followed closely the pioneer settlers, and shared their dangers and hardships. The work done and the seed sown by their faithful hands have not been in vain. Their meetings were often held in private houses, and when these were found too small for their congregations they resorted to barns and the open air. The quarterly meetings and camp meetings were memorable occasions, and people came from settlements many miles away, large numbers coming under the influence of the Cross. Thus was laid the foundation upon which have since been erected, so many Methodist churches and flourishing congregations throughout all northeastern Pennsylvania.

The Methodists had held service in Wilkes-Barre for thirty years. The society was small and their means scanty, and they had no special place of worship. In 1826 Rev. George Peck was appointed to Wyoming circuit, with Philo Barberry. There seemed to be a necessity that Wilkes-Barre should have the entire services of one man. The presiding elder consequently took George Peck from the circuit and stationed him at Wilkes-Barre, which was thus early made a station, with three outside preaching places—Hanover, Newport and the Plains. In 1827 the commissioners of Luzerne county leased to the Methodists the large upper room in the old court-house for a period of ten years, at a yearly rental of ten cents, for a church or place of public worship. June 26th, 1827, the first Methodist conference ever held in Wyoming convened at Wilkes-Barre. Bishop George was the presiding bishop. In 1829 the Oneida Conference was formed out of the Genesee Conference, and Wilkes-Barre became a conference appointment in the following year. In 1831 the Methodists became the undisputed proprietors of the old church on the public square by the purchase from the Presbyterians of all their right, title and interest in the same for $1,000.

First Methodist Episcopal.—September 16th, 1830, the Methodist church in Wilkes-Barre was formally organized. Rev. Charles Nash was preacher in charge, and the following persons were its first official members: Exhorters—Robert Miner and Comfort Cary. Stewards—Gilbert Barnes, Sharp D. Lewis, Ziba Bennett, Robert Miner and David Thompson. Class leaders—Gilbert Barnes, Robert Miner, Thomas Brown, Lorenzo Ruggles, David Thompson and Samuel Gaskill. Trustees—John Carey, Joseph Slocum, Ziba Bennett, Sharp D. Lewis, Lewis Worrall, Abraham Thomas and Anning O. Chahoon.

The church continued to grow in numbers and influence. As there were no accommodations in the church on the square for social meetings, Ziba Bennett in 1836 built and gave to the church the use of a building for such purpose on North Main street, on the site of J. H. Montanye's tin store. The public preaching services and the Sunday-school continued to be held in the old church. The increasing prosperity of the church soon demanded other and more suitable quarters. In 1846 the subject of a new church edifice was considered, and a committee was appointed to solicit the necessary funds to erect the building, Ziba Bennett having donated a lot on Franklin street for that purpose. In 1847 sufficient funds had been subscribed to warrant the trustees in commencing the erection of the new church edifice. The old church on the square was offered for sale and arrangements were made to begin the new church in the spring of 1848. Ziba Bennett, Lord Butler, William Wood and Sharp D. Lewis were appointed a building committee. In 1849 the old church was sold to O. Collins, G. M. Hollenback and Charles Dennison for $600. It was subsequently pulled down and removed.

The new church on Franklin street was completed and dedicated October 4th, 1849, by Rev. Jesse T. Peck, D. D., now Bishop Peck. It cost exclusive of the lot $8,200, and was dedicated free from debt. At that time it was the finest and most commodious building of the kind in the country round about. The enterprise was started under the pastorate of Rev. David Shepherd, prosecuted and continued under that of Rev. Bostwick Hawley and completed under that of Rev. Thomas H. Pearne.

The following pastors served this church from 1826 to 1850:

Rev. George Peck, 1826-28; Revs. Joseph Castle and Silas Comfort, 1828-30 (Wilkes-Barre and Wyoming were united for these two years, when Wilkes-Barre was again made a station); Rev. Charles Nash 1830-32; Rev. H. F. Rowe, 1832, 1833; Rev. Selah Stocking, 1833-35; Rev. J. M. Snyder, 1835-37; Rev. Robert Fox, 1837, 1838; Rev. D. Holmes, 1838-40; Rev. John Davison, part of 1840; Rev. D. W. Bristol, 1840-42; Rev. John Seys, 1842, 1843;

Rev. D. Holmes, 1843, 1844; Rev. D. A. Shepherd, 1844-46; Rev. B. Hawley, 1846-48; Rev. Thomas H. Pearne, 1848-50.

In 1851 Newport, one of the outside preaching places, was taken from this charge and made a separate station. In 1852 the population had increased and the churches multiplied to such an extent in this section that a new conference, the Wyoming, was set off from the Oneida Conference. The present Wyoming Conference does not include more than one third of the territory that was embraced in the Wyoming circuit in the year 1800. In 1854 the church on the Plains was made a separate charge.

Ross Street Methodist Episcopal.—The growth of the church and the increasing population of Wilkes-Barre soon required another church in the southwestern portion of the town. For a number of years there had been a church class and a flourishing Sunday-school at Woodville. In 1855 the project of building a second church took form, and in May, 1857, the Ross Street M. E. Church was organized; and soon after their house of worship, a brick edifice which cost, including its enlargement in 1876, about $6,000, was completed. It was built on a lot generously donated by Moses Wood. A parsonage was erected in 1856. Rev. William Wyatt, then presiding elder of the district, and Mrs. Wyatt were active in the organization of the church and the erection of the house of worship. The membership in 1879 was about 200. The first pastor was Rev. A. Brooks, who remained two years. His successors and their terms of service have been as follows: Revs. S. Weiss, two years; H. Wheeler, three years; J. G. Eckman, three years; L. C. Floyd, three years; L. W. Peck, two years; F. L. Hiller, three years; D. C. Olmstead, two years; H. M. Crydenwise, present incumbent (1879).

There is an efficient Sunday-school connected with this church. It has a membership of 342. The first superintendent was "Mother" Wood; the present superintendent is Hon. C. Wadhams.

In 1869 the old parsonage, which stood where William Tuck's residence now stands on Franklin street, was sold and a new and fine one was built on the lot adjoining the present church, at a cost of about $10,000.

In 1870, as Wilkes-Barre had grown to such an extent in the northern part of the town, and as there was no place for worship near by, a mission chapel was erected on North Franklin street at a cost of $2,700. The lot was kindly donated by Charles A. Miner, George B. Kulp and Edward H. Chase. A Sunday-school had been started the year before, and was held in the public school building on Courtright avenue. When the chapel was completed it was removed there. The following persons have been superintendents of the school: Theron Burnet, P. M. Carhart, Charles H. Wheelock, W. G. Weaver; D. Sturdevant, A. C. Montanye and Frank Puckey. The school numbers at present 1 superintendent, 17 officers and teachers, 79 scholars in main school, 80 scholars in the primary school; total, 177.

Parrish Street Methodist Episcopal.—There were no church accommodations for a large population in the southeastern portion of Wilkes-Barre, and early in 1870 Revs. Charles and A. D. Alexander, the latter of whom was the pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church at Ashley, held a series of meetings in the Parrish street school-house, and formed a class with Mr. John Benning, a member of the Ross street Methodist church as leader. Rev. A. D. Alexander was succeeded at Ashley by Rev. A. C. Bowdish, who had charge of the Parrish street class, which was annexed to the Ashley charge and known as "the Hill class." In the spring of 1872 the class was organized as a mission charge and was ministered to by Rev. D. Marvin for one year. At the conference of 1873 Rev. Henry Brownscombe was sent to the charge as pastor, and remained three years. In 1876 he was succeeded by Rev. Oscar L. Severson. A year later the Parrish street church was self-supporting. Mr. Severson remained three years and was succeeded in the spring of 1879 by Rev. E. L. Santee. The house of worship of this society is a wooden building 40 by 60 feet, standing on the south side of Parrish street. It was erected early in the history of the society and dedicated March 17th, 1872, and valued at $8,000. The Parrish street Methodist Sunday-school was organized in the school-house aboved mentioned on the first Sunday in January, 1869, though the first meeting for that purpose was held a week earlier. Rev. J. G. Eckman, then pastor of the Ross Street Methodist Episcopal Church was a leader in the movement. Mr. J. D. L. Harvey, a member of the Franklin street Methodist church was chosen superintendent, Jesse Briggs assistant superintendent, and A. B. Sands treasurer. The attendance the first Sunday was twenty-five. The library contains 325 volumes, the teachers and officers are efficient, and the school is in a flourishing condition.

The following pastors have served the mother church (the First Methodist Episcopal) from 1850 to 1880: Rev. Nelson Rounds, 1850-52; Rev. George Peck, D. D., 1852-54; Rev. William Wyatt, 1854, 1855; Rev. Henry Brownscombe, 1855-57; Rev. J. M. Snyder, 1857, 1858; Rev. Reuben Nelson, part of 1858 and 1859; Rev. Z. Paddock, D. D., 1859, 1860; Rev. Jacob Miller, 1860-62; Rev. J. A. Wood, 1862-64; Rev. Y. C. Smith, 1864-67; Rev. Henry Brownscombe, 1867-69; Rev. Thomas M. Reese, 1869-72; Rev. A. H. Wyatt, 1872-74; Rev. W. H. Olin, 1874-77; Rev. J. E. Smith, D. D., 1877-80.

The present official members are: Rev. W. H. Olin, D. D., presiding elder; Rev. J. E. Smith, D. D., pastor; Rev. W. W. Loomis, local elder; Rev. James Thomas, local deacon; class leaders, Rev. J. E. Smith, Rev. W. W. Loomis, A. Kesler, T. Burnet, W. L. Stewart and G. A. Wells; Stewards, H. H. Derr, Urbane Dilley, E. S. Morgan, Elias Robins, A. Mitchell, John Espy, William Tuck, Robert Tucker and W. H. Sturdevant; board of trustees, L. D. Shoemaker (president), George S. Bennett (secretary), P. Abbott (treasurer), A. Kesler, D. L. Rhone, B. G. Carpenter and H. H. Derr; superintendents of Sunday-schools, George S. Bennett (church school) and Frank Puckey (mission school).

The church numbers in full connection 400. The number of probationers is 50.

Sunday-Schools.—Many who then were or subsequently became Methodists attended or taught in the early Sunday-school whose sessions were held in Judge Scott's office. When the Methodists obtained the upper room of the old court-house as a place of worship they started a school of their own. Gilbert Barnes is thought to have been its first superintendent. The first official record of the Sunday-schools connected with this church is found in the minutes of the quarterly conference held Aug. 23d, 1834. Rev. S. Stocking, preacher, reported that there were within his charge 4 Sabbath-schools, with 216 scholars, 5 superintendents; 4 libraries with 365 volumes. One school was the church school, which met in the church on the square; Gilbert Barnes superintendent, Ziba Bennett assistant. The other schools were at Hanover, Laurel Run and the Plains. In 1829 an infant school was started by Miss Abi Slocum, now Mrs. Lord Butler, in the jury room of the old court-house. This school, the first of its kind ever held here, was maintained for a number of years and then discontinued. September 29th, 1844, Mrs. Charles B. Drake, now Mrs. Henry Lewis, of Madison, N. Y., commenced teaching an infant class in the gallery of the old church. In a few weeks this class was removed to the second story of the prayer room on North Main street, which had been fitted up for that purpose. It remained there until the church on Franklin street was built. Mrs. Drake continued in charge of this primary school until April 26th, 1868. Mrs. J. E. Patterson, who had been Mrs. Drake's assistant for six years, succeeded her as teacher. She held the position until 1872. Mrs. E. B. Hopkins served as teacher for a short time, and then Mrs. W. N. Jennings was elected to the office, which she held for nearly a year. In April, 1873, Miss Sarah Overton, now Mrs. Elias Robbins, was chosen teacher of this primary class, and she has been continued as such to the present time.

Gilbert Barnes was superintendent of the main Sunday-school of this church until 1850, when he removed from Wilkes-Barre. In that year the school had two superintendents, 25 teachers, 125 scholars in the main school, 75 scholars in the primary class and 800 volumes in the library. Lord Butler was appointed Mr. Barnes's successor. He held the office about a year, and Ziba Bennett was appointed, and remained in office until 1866, when W. W. Loomis was elected. In 1868 George S. Bennett was elected and he has held the office since. In 1868 an intermediate class was established as an advanced grade of the primary class, and as preparatory to the junior department or main school.

In 1873, the accommodations of the church edifice not being sufficient to meet the wants of the increasing numbers of the Sunday-school and the social meetings of the church, the project of erecting a chapel in the rear of the church was started. George S. Bennett, B. G. Carpenter and H. H. Derr were appointed a committee to procure suitable plans and an estimate of the cost of the proposed building. In 1874 Mrs. Priscilla L. Bennett proposed to build the new chapel, provided the church and congregation would raise an equal amount of money to remodel the present church edifice or erect a new structure. This generous proposition was accepted, and in 1875 plans were procured for the chapel and new church and subscriptions received. In 1876 the building of the chapel commenced. The following persons constituted the building committee: Geo. S. Bennett, B. G. Carpenter, D. L. Rhone, P. Abbott and H. H. Derr. The chapel was completed early in 1877, and cost, exclusive of the ground, furnished throughout, $27,500. It was dedicated February 11th, 1877. Rev. J. H. Vincent, D. D., preached the dedicatory sermon. Rev. R. Nelson, D. D., in behalf of the donors presented to the trustees the land on which it stands—the gift of Hon. Ziba Bennett and Mrs. Martha B. Phelps—and the building and furnishings, the gift of Mrs. Priscilla L. Bennett, wife of Judge Bennett. The ladies of the church contributed the furniture and fittings of the church rooms in the building. Hon. L. D. Shoemaker, president of the board of trustees, received the same. The chapel was then formally dedicated by Rev. W. H. Olin, pastor. The officers of the school were as follows in 1880: Superintendent, George S. Bennett; male assistant superintendent, H. H. Derr; female assistant superintendent, Mrs. P. L. Bennett; secretary, D. S. Morgan; assistant secretary, W. S. Carpenter; treasurer, Elias Robbins; chorister, George A. Wells; cornetist, John Hughes; pianist, C. E. Clark; librarian, P. Abbott; assistant librarians, C. D. Wells, J. P. Brownscombe, Willard Post and W. G. Phelps. The total membership of the school is 709; number of volumes in the library, 700.

First Free Methodist.—This church was organized March 27th, 1870, by Rev. John Glen, its first pastor. The original members were W. B. Bertels, S. A. Bertels, H. H. Pease, Mercy Pease, Eliza Pryor, J. Pryor, John Yocum, Mary Yocum, Lewis Hitchler, Wm. Dobson, Sarah Youngst, Mary Newhardt, J. D. Pembleton, Solomon Pursell, Joseph Smith, L. Smith, Emma Allen, Levi Ranch, C. Smith and Rachel Alden.

The place of meeting at organization was Harvey's Hall on Franklin street, where services were held till the congregation removed to the hall on the corner of Market and Canal streets. A lot has recently been purchased on South Main, between Ross and Academy streets, on which it is purposed to erect a house of worship. The pastors of this society have been: Revs. J. Glen, 1870; G. R. Harvey, 1870-72; George Edwards, 1872, 1873; M. D. McDougal, 1873-75; T. S. Labue, 1875, 1876; Wm. Jones, 1876, 1877; I. S. Bradbrook, 1877, 1878; and George Eakins, 1878-80.

There is a Sunday-school connected with the church of which Joseph Smith was first and Henry Wood is the present superintendent. The school has 50 scholars and 6 teachers, and a library of 250 volumes.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1842 by Rev. Thomas M. D. Ward, with twelve constituent members. The present house of worship was finished and dedicated in September, 1870, having been erected largely by aid extended by white sympathizers.

The African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church was organized in 1842 by Rev. Thomas Jackson. The house of worship was erected in 1845, and was the first for the use of the colored people in the city. This church is connected with the Genesec Conference. The present membership is 30.

EPISCOPAL CHURCHES.

St. Stephen's Protestant Episcopal.—The first service of the Episcopal church in Wilkes-Barre was held in the old academy on the public square in 1814, by Rev. Jackson Kemper, then a missionary in the borough. Rev. Richard Mason followed him before the close of the same year. There was no church organization until 1817, in which year the vestry was organized, September 19th. The date of the charter was October 17th following. The wardens were Ebenezer Bowman and Henry Clymer. Roswell Wells, Garrick Mallery, Samuel Bowman, Peleg Trasy, Eleazer Blackman, Jacob A. Dennis, Benjamin Drake, Andrew Beaumont, Lord Butler and Samuel Maffett were the vestrymen.

The rite of baptism was first administered in Wilkes-Barre according to the ordinances of the Episcopal church December 8th, 1814. The Episcopal Sunday-school originated in that branch of the pioneer Sunday-school of Wilkes-Barre of which Judge Scott was superintendent and which began its existence in the fall of 1818. The present Sunday-school superintendent is Mr. W. W. Lathrope; the number of scholars is 625.

St. Stephen's Church was admitted into union with the convention May 2nd, 1821.

The first house of worship, a frame building on Franklin street, was consecrated by Bishop White, June 14th, 1823. It was torn down and replaced by the present brick edifice, which cost $11,000 and was consecrated by Bishop Potter April 19th, 1855.

The successive rectors since Rev. Richard Mason, and the dates at which they came, have been as follows: Revs. Samuel Phinney, 1817; Manning B. Roach, 1819; Mr. Samuel Bowman, lay reader, 1821; Samuel Sitgreaves, 1823; Enoch Huntington, 1824; James May, 1827; W. J. Clark, 1838; R. B. Claxton, 1840; George D. Miles, 1848; R. H. Williamson; Henry L. Jones (present rector), 1874.

The number of families who are regular attendants upon the services of this church is 259; the number of communicants is 261. The offerings for 1878 amounted to $12,314.80.

Lewis C. Paine and C. M. Conyngham were the wardens in 1879. The vestry was composed as follows: W. L. Conyngham, F. J. Leavenworth, A. R. Brundage, W. W. Lathrope, Charles A. Miner, Richard Sharpe, J. Pryor Williamson, David Caird, Ned Johnson and A. M. Brandon.

Saint Clement's Episcopal Church, on Hanover street, was duly incorporated April 8th, 1869, the following named persons being the original incorporators: E. W.

Sturdevant, Charles Sturdevant, John W. Horton, C. E. Butler, Daniel Harkins, N. M. Horton, B. F. Pfouts, G. F. Pfouts, Miller H. Cooke, Isaac E. Ross, Thomas Quick, John B. Quick, Elijah W. Richards, Thomas Carpenter, C. W. Gates, Moses Drumheller, J. G. Horton and W. Lee, jr.

In the early period of the existence of the church occasional services were held by Rev. John Long, missionary. The first regularly installed rector was Rev. William J. Cleveland, who was ordained deacon April 18th, 1872, and entered upon his duties as rector April 21st following. He was succeeded the following year by Rev. George W. Knapp, who remained about four years. Rev. P. Baldy Lightner became rector March 31st, 1878, and remained for nearly a year. The present rector, Rev. Edward M. Pecke, was elected to the rectorship April 23d, 1879, and entered upon his duties immediately.

May 18th, 1869, the lot upon which the church stands, on Hanover street, was given by Mr. Washington Lee, jr. June 5th of the same year the vestry resolved "to proceed forthwith to the building of a stone church on the said lot, according to the plan furnished by the architect, Mr. C. M. Burns, of Philadelphia." The corner stone was laid by the Rt. Rev. William Bacon Stevens, D. D., bishop of the diocese, September 13th, 1869. The building was completed at a cost of $10,000, in June, 1871; and the first service was held in it on the 24th of the same month, the Rev. Leighton Coleman, Mauch Chunk, preaching the sermon. July 11th, 1871, the church was consecrated by Bishop Stevens, twenty-two clergymen being present.

The Sunday-school numbers about 100 pupils. The superintendent in 1879 was Mr. Lyman E. Phillips. An earnest effort was being made at that time to erect a suitable rectory, on land adjoining the church lot, offered for the purpose by Mr. Andrew Lee.

BAPTIST CHURCHES.

The Wilkes-Barre and Kingston Church—Baptist services were held occasionally before there was any church organization of that denomination, in the "Old Ship Zion" on the public square. The Wilkes-Barre and Kingston church, of 33 members, was constituted in 1842 at Forty Fort, and recognized by a council of churches December 7th of that year. This movement was the result of the labors of Rev. P. L. Post, of Montrose, Pa., a missionary of the Pennsylvania State Baptist Convention, and others. The first pastor was Rev. A. C. Hewitt, who was called in 1845, the church then meeting for worship in hired rooms or in the old court-house. In 1846 steps were taken toward the erection of a house of worship. A lot was secured on the south side of Northampton street, upon which was built a church which was opened for service in 1848. In 1849 the Wilkes-Barre portion of the membership withdrew from the Kingston branch.

The Northampton Street Baptist.—This is the name by which the Wilkes-Barre branch was recognized, and the Kingston church ultimately, becoming merged in the Wilkes-Barre and Pittston churches, lost its identity. Mr. Hewitt continued his relation with the Wilkes-Barre church until 1851, when he was succeeded by Rev. John Boyd. The subsequent pastors were Revs. E. M. Alden, who came in 1859; James L. Andrews, 1866; D. E. Bowen, 1869; Charles A. Fox, 1870; J. D. Griebel, 1871. Mr. Fox's pastorate was rendered thus brief by his death before the close of 1870.

By advice of a council of Baptist churches, held November 10th, 1873, the church disbanded, and the members deposited their letters with the Pittston Baptist church, while the church property was transferred in trust to the Pennsylvania Baptist General Association until a reorganization could be effected under more favorable auspices.

The Centennial Baptist.—Under appointment by the Pennsylvania Baptist General Association Rev. J. Blanchard Hutchinson, of Philadelphia, began to labor at Wilkes-Barre July 1st, 1874, and on the 16th of that month organized a mission, and a Bible-school a month later. The congregation increased, the school enlarged, eleven converts were baptized and Mr. Hutchinson was encouraged by such favorable indications, and the Centennial Baptist Church was organized July 1st, 1875, with 70 members (10 of whom united by baptism, 16 by expression of their faith and 44 by letter), and recognized by a council of sister churches September 15th.

Rev. Mr. Hutchinson was called to the pastorate, and has continued the pastoral relation continuously since. The following officers were elected: William G. Colley, T. S. Parker and C. F. Nauman, deacons; P. S. Bailey, church clerk; J. R. Bogart, treasurer; R. Humphreys, M. V. B. Dann, G. S. Weeks, Isaac Tyler, William Toombs, M. S. Harding and T. M. Mason, trustees.

The following is an abstract of the report of the condition of the church October 1st, 1879: Value of church property (in good repair and free from debt), $15,000; membership, 130; membership of Bible school, 106; number of volumes in library, 200; superintendent, Frank B. Mahoney; church officers:—deacons, William G. Colley, William Wheelock; church clerk, P. H. Bailey; treasurer, William Toombs; trustees, M. S. Harding, George Mason, H. W. Kalisch, F. M. Mason, E. P. Phillips, W. H. Carey, William Wheelock.

The Welsh Baptist.—For some time prior to organization as a church a few Welsh Baptists had attempted in private dwellings to form the nucleus to a church and a Sunday-school. The names of William McGregor, William Richards and John Haskins were prominent in this formative period. For some months services were held Sunday afternoons in the English Baptist church; but later Phenix Hall was engaged by the Welsh Baptists for church and Sunday-school services. An assistant preacher named John Rees, subsequently ordained to the ministry in Ohio, made himself useful at this juncture. The Sunday-school was promising. The first superintendent was Nathaniel Griffiths, deceased. The organization of the church in the above named hall occurred in the spring of 1867. Of the 27 constituent members but

1 remains in the church at present. The first deacons were John Haskins and William Richards. Thomas J. Morgans, one of the present deacons, was the first person baptized in the church. Rev. Frederick Evans, D. D.; then of Hyde Park, took part with others in the organization ceremonies.

In July, 1870, Rev. Theophilus Jones, of Mahanoy City, Pa., was called to the pastorate. He remained until September, 1874. The present pastor, Rev. E. Edwards, removed at the call of the church from Webster, Monroe county, N. Y., in November, 1876, and considerable progress has been made under his pastorate.

In 1872 a lot was presented to the church by, and another purchased of, Charles Parrish, Esq., as president of the Lehigh and Wilkes-Barre Coal Company, making a double lot on Harrison street. A commodious but not costly edifice was erected by Robert Thomas, architect, under contract with the authorities of the church, and completed and opened for worship in the spring of 1874. About three-fourths of the indebtedness incurred in the purchase of the lot and erection of the church has already been canceled, and it is confidently hoped that the balance will soon disappear.

During a little more than a dozen years of its existence this church has dismissed members to form other churches at Nanticoke, Plymouth, Kingston and Parsons. Although the colonies referred to went out before the commencement of the present pastorate, this period has been marked by so many removals and deaths that, while fifty or more have been added by baptism and otherwise since the fall of 1876, the number of members (nearly 100) in 1879 was hardly a score in excess of the total at that date, owing to the shifting and unreliable condition of Welsh churches in the mining regions. The church has a branch Sunday-school on Rolling Mill hill, which, together with that in the church, numbers about 140 pupils. There are 19 teachers, and the number of volumes in the library is 150.

CATHOLIC CHURCHES.

St. Mary's.—Father Henry Fitzsimmons, of Carbon-dale, was the first Catholic priest who preached in Wilkes-Barre, where he began to labor as a missionary in 1840, when the Roman Catholic population was only 50 or 60. In 1842 a small frame church was erected on Canal street between Northampton and South streets, service having been formerly held in the house of a Mr. Keating. In 1845 a brick building was begun on the same lot, which was seven years in course of construction. In September, 1870, was begun the present commodious and elegant church on Washington street, of which an engraving appears below, and it was dedicated December 16th, 1872, since which time the old brick church has been occupied by St. Mary's parochial school.

Father Fitzsimmons was succeeded, in 1847, by Father Pendergast. The succeeding pastors have been Father Edhoffer, who came in 1848 and was succeeded by Father O'Shaugnessy in the latter part of the same year;

Father Sharp, 1849; Father Burgess, 1851; Father Fitzsimmons, 1856; and Father Dennis O'Haran, 1869.

Father O'Haran is assisted in the now onerous duties of the pastorate by Revs. P. McManus and Francis B. McNally. Under his management the church, the parochial residence and St. Mary's Academy have been built and the old church remodeled for school purposes as stated; parishes have been established at Plymouth, Nanticoke, Sugar Notch and Plainsville, and churches have been erected in each parish except Plainsville, and there one will be erected at an early date. The membership of St. Mary's Church is about 8,000, and the church property is valued at $250,000; $200,000 has been collected and disbursed by Father O'Haran.

The Mallinckrodt Convent, of which a notice appears on page 204 and an engraving herewith, has for a part of its mission the training of teachers for such schools as those connected with the Catholic churches of Wilkes-Barre.

St. Nicholas German Catholic.—The German Catholics of Wilkes-Barre were many years ago visited occasionally by priests from abroad. In 1856 the corner stone was laid for the first German Catholic church edifice, at the corner of South and Washington streets, and the congregation was organized under its present name. In 1868 the church was enlarged. There was no regular pastor until 1858, when Rev. Peter C. Nagel came. He has sustained the pastoral relation to the congregation continuously to the present time. For several years he was the only German Catholic priest in Luzerne, Wayne and Pike counties. In 1874 an assistant pastor was added, in the person of Rev. William Dassel, now pastor of Mary Magdalen Church, of Honesdale, Pa. The present assistant is Rev. Peter Crist.

In 1858 the membership of this church was about 100 families. The membership in 1879 was about 400 families, and a parochial school was connected with the church.

OTHER CHURCHES.

Bnai Brith Jewish Synagogue.—The Jewish synagogue, on Washington street, was organized in October, 1840. The following are the names of the constituent members: Joseph Coons, Martin Long, Marx Long, John Constine, David Maier, M. Rosenbaum, Solomon Kramer, Marx Straub, S. Wilzinsky, H. Ansbacher, Joseph Shwabacher, A. Lederer, J. Lowenstein, Isaac Lengfeld, A. Frahllich, M. Silberbach, B. Burgunder, W. Baum, H. Lowenstein, Moritz Straus, Joseph Hamburger, David Mordochar, L. Ullman, David Coons, J. Merzbacher, Leopold Schwabacher, J. Lengfeld, Solomon Schloss, Louis Ries, L. Ackerman, Simon Long, Abram Strauss, Lehman Rosenbaum, L. Steinhard, Moritz Sulzbacher and Lieb Heimer. These were all then young men. Some of them are now among the well-to-do business men of Wilkes-Barre, advanced in years, but still members of the synagogue. Until the erection of the church, in 1849 they worshiped in a small room on New Year's day and the day of the atonement.

The church edifice is a brick building worth about $5,000. The corner stone was laid in 1848 and it was consecrated in August of the following year by Rev. Dr. Leeser of Philadelphia and Rev. Mr. Isaacs, of New York.

The successive pastors have been as follows: Revs. Maus, from October, 1848, to August, 1849; M. Strasser, from August, 1849, to August, 1851; Rev. Isaac Strouse, from August, 1851, to May 13th, 1853; Rev. Herman Rubin, from June 5th, 1853, to the present time.

With the congregation is connected a school of about 40 pupils, under the charge of Rev. Herman Rubin. The catechism, the Bible, history, Hebrew reading and German reading and writing are taught, together with translation of the Hebrew and German languages into English.

Welsh Congregational.—The only Congregational church in Wilkes-Barre is the Welsh Congregational, which was organized in 1869 by a few Congregationalists who emigrated from Wales. As early as 1850 there was a union Welsh church, comprising all denominations and worshiping in the Newtown school-house. The church under consideration first worshiped in the school-house near the Empire shaft. In March, 1872, they removed to their own church building on Hillside street. April 1st, 1872, it was dedicated, Rev. E. B. Evans, D. Daniels and others officiating. The church edifice has since been enlarged and over $8,000 of the debt incurred in its erection and subsequent alterations paid off. The total cost was $10,000.

The first officers of the church were D. T. Jones, S. R. Williams, Morgan Davies and Lewis Anthony, deacons; and Daniel W. Evans, secretary. The first and only pastor to the present time is Rev. T. C. Edwards. September 1st, 1879, the membership was 175. A large and flourishing Sunday-school is connected with the church. The average attendance is 115. There is a library of 160 volumes. Connected with the Sunday-school is a vigorous band of hope and children's choir, which is under such thorough discipline as to be able to render cantatas and oratorios with a high degree of perfection.

Salem Church of the Evangelical Association.—The religious work now in progress at Wilkes-Barre under the management of the Evangelical Association was begun in 1871 by the labors of Rev. Andrew Ziegenfuss, then stationed at Mauch Chunk, who preached occasionally during that year in private houses, organizing a class of ten members, named as follows: William Hawk, Christian Leigh, Charles Frederic, Flora Stermer, — Snyder, G. Leymarter, Catharine Leymarter, — Schleicher, Morris Eisley and Catharine Eisley. In 1872 Wilkes-Barre was made a regular charge and annexed to the Mauch Chunk circuit. In 1873 Wilkes-Barre and Scranton were united as a mission. In 1874 Wilkes-Barre became a separate mission.

In 1872 meetings were held in a school-house at South Wilkes-Barre. In 1873 a chapel was built on Grove street, which was dedicated November 30th, and a Sabbath-school organized in it soon afterward. In 1875 the chapel was burned, and services were held in a rented hall at the corner of Douglass and Hazel streets until the completion of the present church, which was dedicated July 25th, 1875.

The successive pastors since Rev. Andrew Ziegenfuss have been Revs. D. A. Medler, J. K. Frehr, Anthony Kindt and J. Savitz. The present (1879) membership is 103 and the Sunday-school numbers 124. The value of the church property is $3,500.

Zion's Reformed Church Congregation.—This congregation was organized January 12th, 1873. Until the year 1877 it bore the name Evangelical Protestant Church, and stood independent of any synodical connection. During that year it secured for itself a charter, ratified by the unanimous vote of the members, placing it under the jurisdiction of the East Susquehanna Classis of the Reformed Church in the United States.

Cause for the organization of this congregation was given by difficulties which had arisen in the St. Paul's Evangelical Lutheran Congregation, with which the Protestant Germans of the city had been principally worshipping for a long time. Feeling ran high in 1872, and parties were formed. Efforts at reconciliation failed. As a consequence the pastor, Rev. John Philip Lichtenberg, and many others, organized a new congregation in the basement of the old church and withdrew from the old connection.

Public worship was at first held in Landmesser's Hall, and was well attended. The lot on South Washington street now occupied by the congregation was bought for $4,000 from Messrs. Miner, Wadhams & Maffitt. The building was put under contract, and on Sunday, March 29th, 1873, at 3 P. M., the corner stone was laid. In the autumn following the church was completed and consecrated. The cost of building and furnishing the edifice was about $8,000.

The successive pastors, with their terms of service, have been as follows: Revs. John Philip Lichtenberg, from January 12th, 1873, to August, 1874; John E. Lang, September, 1874, to December, 1875; Rudolph Kunz, January, 1876, to December, 1877; Franklin Klein Levan, January, 1878, to the present (1880). Rev. Mr. Levan was called both by this congregation and an English Reformed mission, which had existed a year past in the city. It was intended to unite the two under the charter of the older congregation, and to establish public worship both in the German and the English languages; the former in the morning, the latter in the evening. This has been harmoniously done; and the growth of the congregation in membership and influence has since then been rapid. The membership was 280 in 1879; the Sunday-school numbers 150, and its library several hundred volumes.

German Evangelical Lutheran St. Paul's Congregation.

—This congregation was organized in the winter of 1845-46 by Rev. Herman Eggers, who was sent for that purpose as a missionary to the Wyoming valley by the Evangelical Lutheran ministerium of Pennsylvania. The following are the names of some of the earliest members: John Pfeiffer, Jacob Bertels, Jacob Jacoby, John Bergold, Henry Pleifichman, Jacob Mathias, Jacob Jerg, Christoph Hilbert, Conrad Frey, Jacob Karcher, George Gomer, Justus Reinman, Adam Guth, Adam Andrie.

The congregation worshiped for a time in the houses of different members and later, by permission of the county commissioners, in the court-house. At a meeting of the congregation May 24th, 1846, plans and specifications for a house of worship were submitted for approval and a committee were empowered to purchase a suitable building lot, the property of General William S. Ross, situated on Washington street near South; and soon afterward the purchase was consummated, at a cost of $140, and a church erected, which cost $776 and was consecrated October 31st, 1846.

The following are the names of the successive pastors who have served the congregation, with the times of service of each: Revs. Herman Eggers, 1845-48; A. O. Brickman, 1848-50; A. Lachenmaier, 1851, 1852; Joseph A. Reubelt, 1852; J. Schwalm, 1853, 1854; G. H. Bosse-ler, 1854-58; C. M. Jager, 1858-61; Edward Speidel, 1861, 1862; Christian Oefinger, 1862-68; Karl Schlenker, 1868-70; J. P. Lichtenberg, 1871, 1872; E. A. Fuenfstueck, 1872-76, and Emanuel Nidecker, 1876 to the present time (1879).

During Rev. Christian Oefinger's administration the church was enlarged and subsequently sold, with the lot, and the present church property at the corner of Main and South streets purchased and improved at an expense of about $3,500. Rev. Mr. Oefinger died September 9th, 1868, and was buried from the Presbyterian church two days later, Revs. Haskarl, Zizelman and Brobst officiating. In 1872 the congregation built a parsonage which, with the lot, cost $5,300. The lamented Mr. Oefinger also established a parochial school, which has enjoyed a continuous and prosperous existence. The Sunday-school was organized about 1863. The membership is now (1879) about 125 and there are 350 volumes in the library.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of St. John.—As far as can be learned no services of the Lutheran church had been held in the English language in Wilkes-Barre previous to the year 1872. In the autumn of that year the president of the Lutheran ministerium of Pennsylvania, Rev. C. W. Schaeffer, D. D., authorized Rev. F. F. Buermeyer, of Brooklyn, N. Y., to visit Wilkes-Barre and ascertain what possibility there might be of establishing a congregation of English Lutherans. An English service was held in the church of the German Lutherans of Wilkes-Barre, and at its close persons expressed their willingness to unite in the formation of a mission church, and November 5th, 1872, the first service of the mission was held in the so-called "long room" of Music Hall. In the afternoon of the same day a Sunday-school, consisting of 21 scholars and 5 teachers, was opened.

The congregation had been fully organized, and Rev. F. F. Buermeyer, Henry Hirner, Enos Royer, A. Herring, Lewis Brown, W. G. Stout, Henry Fick, John Spare and Martin Frey were appointed its first board of officers; and in the summer of 1873 a lot at the corner of Academy and River streets was purchased, and October 10th the corner stone of a house of worship was laid. The plan of the church was drawn by Mr. Gustave Heiner of Philadelphia, and its erection was the handiwork of members of the congregation. August 30th, 1874, the church was formally opened, but was not consecrated, as there was still some debt resting upon it. The president of the ministerium of Pennsylvania, Rev. C. W. Schaeffer, D. D., of Germantown, and Rev. E. Greenwald, D. D. of Lancaster, Pa., assisted the pastor on that occasion. The lot and building cost $15,000, of which $3,000 yet remain to be paid. The church has 76 communicants. The Sunday-school numbers 150 scholars.

WYOMING VALLEY MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S BUILDINGS.

The history of the Wyoming Valley Manufacturing Company is given on page 216. The buildings of this corporation, an illustration representing which is here given, are located between Hazle avenue and Main street, the North Branch Canal and Lehigh Valley Railroad being near on the north, and the Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad on the south, with a switch or branch connecting, by which iron, coal and other heavy material are received, a branch passing directly through the machine shop, enabling the loading, by means of cranes, of heavy machinery on transportation cars.

The building in the foreground is a pattern shop, of brick, 75 by 42 feet. Next is the foundry, also of brick, 104 by 54 feet, with leanto of 12 feet. The farthest building shown is the machine shop, a frame structure 165 by 60 feet, with leanto for boilers and engine room. In the rear are the smith shop, 60 by 28 feet, and the boiler shop, 40 by 27 feet, both of which are temporary buildings and not shown in the engraving.

The tools in the machine shop are of modern design, and capable of turning out work of the best character. The narrow-gauge and mine locomotives and hoisting and mine machinery manufactured by this company are extensively known and widely used.

REICHARD & SON'S STEAM BREWERY is an outgrowth of an old brewery at the corner of River and Union streets, built by one Ingham. From him it passed into the hands of John Reichard in 1834. At that time and up to 1851 strong beer, ale and porter were the only articles manufactured. In 1850 the old brewery was torn down, and a new one built immediately in the rear. In 1851 lager beer was first made. It has from that time constantly increased in use, until the manufacture of ale, porter, etc., has almost ceased. In 1870 the present brewery was built, on Water street, near the county prison, in order to give such facilities as a modern brewery demanded. It was furnished with all the appliances that belong to a first class establishment. In 1874 John Reichard took into the firm George N. Reichard and Heinrich Stauff, under the name of Reichards & Stauff. This firm lasted until the fall of 1878, when Mr. Stauff retired from the firm. The two remaining partners have since carried on the business as Reichard & Son. The brewery is supplied with all modern machinery, and patent ice-houses and vaults; uses the Laurel Run water—the purest that can be had—and has a capacity of 25,000 barrels per year. There is a bottling establishment connected with it, where the firm does its own bottling.

PRICE & SON'S planing mill, and sash, door and blind factory, of which an account is given on page 216, is the establishment shown in the above cut.

consist of a machine shop 75 by 150 feet in size, a foundry 80 by 165 feet, a blacksmith and boiler shop 66 by 130 feet, a two-story pattern storehouse 40 by 50 feet, a pattern shop connected with the foundry for the purpose of making their own patterns, 40 by 80 feet, and a brass foundry 24 feet square. These are all brick buildings, constructed in the most substantial manner. They are built within an area of about eight acres of ground, fronting 400 feet on Main street, and extending back 634 feet to the Pennsylvania Canal. Tracks and sidings run into the works from the L. V. Railroad, with a turntable so that cars can be directed into any department of the establishment. The class of work turned out embraces mining machinery of every description, such as coal breakers, pumps, steam engines, etc.; but their great specialty is the manufacture of steam engines, of which they have made the most noted and powerful ones in use in the coal regions.

The Vulcan Iron Works are also making an improved coal breaker, which is in great demand. In this breaker the rolls are solid, and the teeth are cast steel driven into these solid rolls. The teeth are easily replaced at any time, and being tempered wear better than those of an ordinary breaker. Every part is made as strong and durable as possible. The above may be called the regular and staple work of the establishment, which does brass and iron casting of every description promptly to order, and furnishes at the shortest notice machine work of all kinds, large and small, and warrants every piece to give entire satisfaction. The practical part of this complicated business is under the immediate charge of the superintendent, Mr. E. H. Jones, the son of the original projector and founder of the works. It is to his efficiency and thorough knowledge of the business that the company is largely indebted for its continued prosperity. The establishment was kept running during the financial depression known as the panic, while most iron working concerns were idle.

HUNT & BROTHER'S HARDWARE STORE.

We present herewith a view of the extensive hardware establishment of the firm of Charles P. Hunt & Brother. The senior member of this firm, Mr. Charles P. Hunt, began business in 1859 as clerk with Rutter & Reading. In April, 1866, he became junior partner in that house, and in 1869 the firm of Reading & Hunt was formed, and began business at 114 South Main street. April 1st, 1876, this firm was succeeded by Charles P. Hunt, who in 1879-80 put up the building represented in the accompanying cut. In April, 1880, he associated with him Mr. Elwood H. Hunt, forming the present firm.

CHARLES BENNET.

Charles Bennet, Esq., was the only son of Mr. John Bennet, of Kingston, Pa. He was born February 28th, 1819, and died August 12th, 1886, aged 67 years. He received a liberal education, and applying himself diligently to the advantages within his reach became a man of fine scholarly attainments and of large and varied scientific knowledge.

His father was a man of strong mind, and, though he did not have the educational advantages of his son, he by his continued research and study became one of the best mathematicians of his day. The Bennet family, who emigrated from England, were highly distinguished, some of them belonging to the court party and others to the Puritans. Of the former was Sir Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington, born of an ancient family in Middlesex and a distinguished statesman in the reign of Charles II.; he was raised to the peerage by the titles of Baron Arlington, Viscount Thetford and Earl of Arlington. Of the latter party was John Bennet, brother of Sir Henry, who would not espouse the royal cause, but loving his religious liberty more than he loved his country, emigrated to America that he might enjoy liberty of conscience in the worship of God. From this stock comes the Bennet family of the Wyoming valley, but few male members of which remain. Among them are George Bennet and family, who now reside near Williamsport, Pa.; Andrew Bennet, of Kingston; and Major D. S. Bennett, of Wilkes-Barre. Mr. Charles Bennet after completing his education studied law and was admitted to the bar of Luzerne county; but preferring a life of out-door activity he did not devote himself entirely to the practice of his profession, but turned his knowledge of its principles to good account in every day life. He commenced his career of usefulness at a time of great excitement; coal had been discovered in the valley and was new to be utilized for fuel instead of wood, which had nearly been exhausted. The mineral wealth was to be developed. Shafts were to be sunk and breakers built to prepare the new fuel for market. Railroads and other ways of transportation must be started in all directions and the difficulties to be overcome were formidable. Men were required to overcome these difficulties, and such a man was Charles Bennet, who by his pleasant manners and address, his thorough knowledge of human nature and persuasive powers, enlisted capitalists in the large cities in the enterprise. The right of way for the various railroads was to be secured and the routes ascertained. Mr. Bennet took hold of the work with his characteristic energy and persistence, and success crowned his efforts. The valley, which had been well nigh isolated and inaccessible, was thrown open, property advanced in value, and many in moderate circumstances become suddenly rich. The actors in such scenes had need of well balanced minds, and such was Mr. Bennet's. Not elated by prosperity nor depressed by adversity, but hopeful in the midst of discouragement, he had the faculty of making friends and attaching them to him, and was liberal in his expenditures, generous in his benefactions and abundant in his hospitalities. Mr. Bennet was a true patriot, a kind friend and an affectionate father and devoted husband. Mrs. Bennet and his two daughters survive him, and now reside in their pleasant home on River street, Wilkes-Barre, and dispense its hospitalities.

MAJOR D. S. BENNET.

Major Daniel Streibigh Bennet was born near Williamsport, Pa., September 3d, 1853, and received his education at the high school near by and subsequently at the Pennsylvania State College. He studied law and and aside from his other studies while at college took the prescribed was admitted to the bar of Luzerne county in 1877, and is now engaged in the practice of his profession in Wilkes-Barre. Major Bennet from early boyhood has always been connected with military organizations; three years course in military science, thus fitting him well for the position he was to afterward occupy in the military of the State. After having served some time as captain of a company he was elected by his fellow officers major of the 9th Regiment (Infantry) National Guard of Pennsylvania, which position he now holds. He has a long line of illustrious ancestors dating from early English history, and is of the Puritan stock. Major Bennet holds the respect of all classes, from his upright dealing, and is active in politics, being an earnest worker for the success of the Republican party and fully identified with the best interests of the city.

BENJAMIN COURTRIGHT.

Benjamin Courtright, whose portrait may be seen elsewhere, was born in Wilkes-Barre township, Luzerne county, Pa., March 17th, 1789. His father was Hon. Cornelius Courtright, who came to the valley in 1784 and settled on the farm afterward known as the Hancock farm, in Plains. Here the subject of this memoir was born.

The Courtright family came from Holland to New Amsterdam among the first emigrants, and long before the Duke of York had conquered it from the Dutch. They found their way across the State of New Jersey to the Delaware river, in the neighborhood of Brodhead's creek, from whence Cornelius Courtright came to the valley, as above stated. At his new home he soon made his mark as the representative man of his immediate neighborhood, and subsequently one of the representative men of Luzerne county, which position he held for many years. He was elected to the Legislature in 1820, 1821 and 1823. Luzerne county at that time was hopelessly Democratic, but Mr. Courtright, though a Whig, was never defeated. His colleagues during these years were Andrew Beaumont, Jacob Durmeheller, Benjamin Dorrance and Jabez Hyde, jr. At Harrisburg he was the acknowledged peer of the best of them.

Benjamin Courtright spent his early life at home on his father's farm, up to the time of his marriage with Clarissa Williams, a daughter of Thomas Williams, a continental soldier under Washington during the war of the Revolution. Soon after his marriage he purchased a farm about half way between Wilkes-Barre and Pittston, where he commenced housekeeping, and where he continued to reside until the death of his wife. He then made his residence with his son John Milton in Wilkes-Barre, where he died on the 22nd of January, 1867, aged seventy-eight years.

He had five sons and one daughter—William H., Benjamin P., John Milton, James W., Thomas W. and Mary E.—all of whom are living. John Milton is now the popular proprietor of the Courtright House, in Wilkes-Barre. When he had just attained his majority his education was quite limited, yet no one could fail to recognize his mature judgment as exhibited in all his business transactions. He was the president of the Franklin Debating Society during its existence. After a long and peaceful life he has passed away. He was a man of exalted nature, and incapable of a mean action. He was just in his dealings, truthful in every declaration and faithful to every promise. Purity of conduct was habitual to him. It pervaded his whole life in every relation.

DEUBEN JAY FLICK.

The subject of this biographical sketch was born at Flicksville, Northampton county, Pa., July 10th, 1816, and is the eldest son of John and Eve B. Flick. His mother's maiden name was Coster. His earlier opportunities for education were limited. Trudging three miles away to the district school in the winter, and working on the farm during the spring, summer and autumn, his life was a busy but uneventful one until his fifteenth year, when he engaged as clerk in the village store. After several years spent in mastering the details of trade as developed in the circumscribed field in which he labored, Mr. Flick went to Easton, Pa., and entered the store of J. & M. Butts. His business career at Easton was limited to a year, when he decided to accept a position which he had been offered in the establishment of G. M. Hollenback, at Wilkes-Barre. Much against the wishes of his father he proceeded to Wilkes-Barre April 8th, 1838, with money scarcely sufficient to pay his fare by stage; and, penurious and almost friendless, began in the store of Mr. Hollenback those experiences out of which resulted the prompt, energetic and methodical business habits on which was based an enviable reputation, which served him well in after life.

In 1841 Mr. Flick purchased Mr. Hollenback's half interest in a stock of general merchandise, and began business for himself in partnership with Benjamin R. Phillips, under the firm name of Phillips & Flick. In 1842 Mr. Phillips died, and the conduct of the enterprise was left solely to Mr. Flick. By good management and the counsel and financial aid of Mr. Hollenback, who was his staunch friend, he was enabled to outstride the monetary storms of 1842 and 1857. In 1864 he disposed of his entire stock of goods, in order to devote his undivided attention to his powder and oil business, in which he had for some time been engaged, and which, owing to the steady and rapid development of the coal mining interest, had grown to be very extensive. Five years later, feeling the need of rest, he retired from this business.

But his untiring industry does not permit him to remain long idle. In 1870 he procured a charter for a State bank. Two years later a capital of $250,000 was subscribed and the People's Bank was opened, with Mr. Flick as president and J. W. Hollenback as vice-president. The rapid and healthy growth of this institution, notwithstanding the fact that it was started in a period of general financial depression, after the establishment of eleven other local banks, and its recognition as one of the soundest in the city, are sufficient evidence of the ability of its management. Mr. Flick is largely interested in local manufactures and corporations, and in real estate. He is treasurer of the Vulcan Iron Works, and a director of the Wilkes-Barre & Kingston Street Railroad Company, the Wyoming Valley Ice Company and the Wilkes-Barre City Hospital. As a partner of Calvin Parsons, Esq., he is interested in coal lands in Plains township.

The leading charitable interests of the city and vicinity have ever found in him a friend and benefactor. He has long been recognized as such by the colored people of Wilkes-Barre. In many ways has he befriended them, and aided institutions established for their benefit. For many years he has been superintendent of a large and prosperous colored Sunday-school.

Mr. Flick was married January 9th, 1858, to Margaret J. Arnold, an estimable lady, a loving wife and a kind mother. They have a family of five children—Welcome J. L., Warren J., Helen J., Harry L. and Reuben Jay, jr.

HENDRICK BRADLEY WRIGHT.

Our biographical notice of this gentleman is mostly taken from a folio volume, issued in 1871, by the New York and Hartford Publishing Company, entitled "Men of Mark"; prepared by Hon. William C. Robinson, Professor of Law in Yale College and Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, of New Haven, Conn. The sketch comes down to 1871. Not liking the steel plate engraving which accompanied that article we had one prepared by our own artist, which is a much better likeness.

"Hendrick Bradley Wright was born at Plymouth, Luzerne county, Pa., on the 24th day of April, A. D. 1808. His father was of that family of Wrights whose ancestor came to America with William Penn, and settling at Wrightstown, near Burlington, in West Jersey, there exercised the office of a justice of the peace under the royal commission, and at the same time was an ardent member and supporter of the Society of Friends. His mother, whose maiden name was Hendrick, was descended from one of the earlier Dutch colonists of New York.

"The father of Mr. Wright removed from Wrightstown to Plymouth in the year 1795, and soon became one of its most prominent and substantial inhabitants. Ambitious for the welfare of his son he secured for him the best educational advantages which the locality afforded, and in due course of time sent him to Dickinson College, where he pursued the usual classical and mathematical studies. Upon leaving college he began the study of law in the office of the late Judge Conyngham, of Wilkes-Barre. Under the wise counsels and kind encouragement of that able jurist and truly admirable man he made rapid progress, and was admitted to the bar in 1831.

"During the ten years which followed Mr. Wright devoted himself assiduously to his profession. The bar of Luzerne county at that period contained many of the most learned and eminent counsellors of Pennsylvania. Among these Mr. Wright soon took a high position, and as an advocate before the jury achieved a marked pre-eminence. Above the middle height, of large frame, of erect and commanding figure, with great power and flexibility of voice and a countenance full of life and expression, he was an orator who arrested and continued to compel attention. It was not without reason that his clients believed and said that no jury could resist him. Armed at all points with evidence, drawn from every available source and brought to bear upon the minds of the triers in such order and with such strength as to render the cause of an opponent almost hopeless from the outset, he followed these attacks with arguments of such earnestness and energy as rarely failed to complete the rout and secure an easy victory. In truth it may be said that in a just cause he never knew defeat. Such success could not otherwise than win for him an extensive reputation and a laborious as well as a lucrative practice.

"In the year 1841, partly to satisfy his numerous friends and partly as a respite from professional toil, he accepted a nomination to the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania and was elected. He at once became prominent as a committeeman and debater and was soon acknowledged as one of the leaders of the House. In 1842 he was again elected and appointed chairman of the Committee on Canals and Internal Improvements, a subject that had always deeply interested him and to which he now devoted much attention. He also took a position on the Judiciary Committee under his friend Judge Elwell, of the Columbia judicial district, for the express purpose of procuring a repeal of the law providing for the imprisonment of poor debtors. In this matter his efforts were untiring and he had at last the satisfaction of seeing that barbarous law blotted out of the statute book of his native State. He also strenuously endeavored to procure the abolition from the prison discipline of Pennsylvania of the system of solitary confinement, a method of punishment which always appeared to him as equally needless and inhuman. But in this effort he was unsuccessful. In 1843 the nomination of State senator was offered to him, but preferring the popular branch of the Assembly he declined the honor, and was again elected to the House. Upon the opening of the session he was chosen speaker, a position which he ably filled, and where he acquired a facility in parliamentary rules and usages which proved of singular advantage to him in the years that followed.

"In May, 1844, the Democratic national convention met in Baltimore to nominate a candidate for the Presidency. It was a time of great excitement growing out of the Texas annexation question. The convention was almost equally divided in sentiment upon the subject, and great fears of serious dissensions were entertained. The friends of annexation met in council, and after a long discussion determined that every other consideration must yield to the necessity of appointing to the chairmanship of the convention some man skilled in parliamentary rules, and of sufficient tact and courage to secure their enforcement in every possible emergency. Mr. Wright, then a delegate at large from Pennsylvania, was at once recognized as the man for the occasion, and, having been first unanimously elected temporary chairman, discharged his difficult and responsible task with such efficiency during the organization of the convention that he was unanimously chosen its permanent presiding officer. At this convention, whose session lasted nearly a week, and over whose stormy discussions its able chairman held an unrelaxing and impartial rein, James K. Polk, a Texas-annexation candidate, was finally nominated. At the close of the convention Mr. Wright bade farewell to the assembled delegates in these words:

"Our labor is terminated; our work is done. In a few hours we leave this arena of the last four days' action, but my voice falters under the thought that we part forever. This body, composed of the most distinguished men of the country, was assembled to discharge as solemn and sacred a trust as that committed to the men who met in the hall of the Continental Congress when the great charter of American liberty was born. If the eastern conqueror wept over the millions of human beings passing in review before him—for that in a short time not one of them should be left—how much more reason have I to weep at the thought that this concentrated monument of mind before me must pass away in the change of all things. But it cannot be. It will be fresh on the page of history when the pyramids of the Nile shall have crumbled, stone by stone, to atoms. The man may die, but the fruits of his mind are the growth of eternity.

"From 1841 to 1852 Mr. Wright was again engrossed in the duties of his profession. In the latter year he was elected to Congress, and served a term with marked ability. He was renominated in 1854, but was defeated by the "Know Nothing" element, of whose narrow and exclusive policy he had always been a most uncompromising foe. He then retired from public life, and determined to devote the remainder of his days to the law. But upon the breaking out of the Rebellion, in 1861, he was again called from retirement. The nomination to Congress was tendered him by both political parties. He accepted, and was of course elected; and amid the perplexities and dangers which surrounded the Federal Congress during the next two years he was distinguished as a consistent and untiring advocate of an undivided Union. Although a lifelong Democrat, and as such wedded by the strongest political ties to the doctrine of State sovereignty, yet in him the citizen ever rose above the politician, and in the hour of national peril he was contented to let political opinions slumber until the great and pressing work of national salvation was accomplished. Thus, while he advocated no measure of subjugation, and regarded interference with domestic institutions for their own sake as unadvisable, he constantly supported the government by his vote and his voice in its every attempt to overthrow the internal enemy. In a speech delivered January 14th, 1863, not long after he had followed his eldest and best loved son to a soldier's grave, he thus replied to the peace resolutions of Mr. Vallandigham:

"Sir, there is no patriotic man who does not desire peace; not peace, however, upon dishonorable terms; not peace that would destroy our great government; not peace that would place us in an humble attitude at the feet of traitors; but that peace which will make liberty live, peace that shall maintain and perpetuate the eternal principles of union based upon equality handed down to us by our fathers and sealed with their blood; the peace of Washington and La Fayette, whose images decorate the walls of this house; a peace that shall not defame and belie the memory of those illustrious men is the one I would see established in this land. * * * Our army went to the field to suppress rebellion. Its numbers have reached over eight hundred thousand men, larger than any army of ancient or modern times. It is still in the field, and its destiny is to preserve entire this Union and protect the flag, and it has the courage and the power to do it. * * * I bring my remarks to a close. Where I stood when the Rebellion began I stand to-day—on the same platform. My opinions have undergone no change. I denounce rebellion at the threshold; I denounce it now. I have no terms to make with the enemy of my country which will destroy the Union; I am satisfied that no other can be obtained. Time will determine whether my position is right or not, and I calmly abide it. The war, sir, has cost me its trials and tribulations, and I can truly close my remarks with a quotation from an ancient philosopher, uttered over the dead body of his son slain in battle:—

"I should have blushed if Cain's house had stood Secure and flourished in a civil war."

"After the close of the XXXVIIth Congress Mr. Wright retired from politics and from business, and has since lived in the enjoyment of the competency and honors which the labors of his earlier years acquired. He has not, however, been idle, but has occupied his working hours in the preparation of a "Practical Treatise upon Labor," in which he has embodied the thoughts and observation of forty active years, and which he has intended as a last legacy to that portion of the American people in whom he has felt most interest, and for whom he has most diligently toiled.

"And, although of private character the present is no place to speak, yet one thing may be said which entitles him of whom it is uttered to be held in everlasting remembrance—that throughout his entire professional and public life Hendrick B. Wright has been emphatically the poor man's friend; the advocate and supporter of the laborer against the encroachments of capital and of political ostracism; liberal to him in word and in gift, true to him in promise and fulfillment, and that he still lives and works for the working man of the nation and his native commonwealth.

"W. C. R."

Since the foregoing notice Col. Wright has published his "Historical Sketches of Plymouth," his native town; a work gotten up with taste, containing thirty beautiful illustrations—likenesses of the leading men of the early settlement of the town, some of the old landmarks, private residences, public buildings, coal mines, etc., etc. In tracing the pages of this book, in which the author gives a vivid description of the plain and frugal habits and simple customs of a primitive people, the reader will discover the deep and indelible impression which they made upon the mind of the author. A generous and heartfelt offering to a race of men all of whom he personally knew, but who now, with an exception of one or two, have left the stage of human action. His work was the design of a memorial for these pioneers. The author of this history makes no effort to assume an elevated plane of rhetoric or finished diction; but treats his subject in simple and plain language; but which, in his narrative of events showing the perils and exposures of frontier life, touches the heart and kindles sympathetic emotion.

In 1876 Mr. Wright was nominated for Congress in the Luzerne district, while absent from home and without his solicitation or even knowledge. He was returned as a member of the XLVth Congress. He was re-elected in 1878 to the XLVIth Congress; his term will expire on the 4th of March, 1881, and will close his political life, after a service of thirteen years in the State and National Legislatures. In his refusal of further political honors he is persistent, and will listen to no inducements which will break his resolve. Mr. Wright was during his long period of time in Congress what may be called a working man, in committee and in the House ever on time, and ready to share in the public labors. During the last four years of his public service in Congress, his untiring aim and object have been to aid, by legislation, the working men of the country; to accomplish which he introduced a supplement to the homestead law (in the passage of which he took an important part in 1862), by which a small loan by the government should be made to poor and deserving men, repayable in ten years, at a small rate of interest, secured on the premises by mortgage, to enable men of small means to enter and settle upon the public land, which to them is otherwise unavailable. In the accomplishment of this great and philanthropic measure he failed; but this abated none of his zeal or indomitable perseverance. His bill was defeated in the XLVth Congress, but he renewed it in the XLVIth and it was defeated in committee of the whole House by three majority only. The committee reported it to the House with a negative recommendation. It is still therefore pending. Mr. Wright was more successful in his support of the eight-hour law. This bill was passed at the last session of Congress by more than a two-third vote. It provides that all men employed in the government shops shall not be required to labor more than eight hours for the day's work. His speeches on the homestead bill and the eight-hour bill should be carefully read by every laboring man in the land. They show a progress much in advance of the age—noble efforts in a great cause. The support of these two great measures has been the daily work of Mr. Wright for the last four years, and the advancement of the social condition of the laboring classes has occupied his attention for the last twenty years. His "Practical Treatise on Labor" was published some ten years since. It is an index to the man's heart. It shows clearly that his great object of life is not personal, but that he is in sympathy with his less fortunate fellow creatures. These ideas he has made a manly effort to impress on the law-making power of the country. Will he live to see their accomplishment?

But it is not in a legislative capacity only that we are to deal with the subject of this notice. Mr. Wright has shown by his acts in the whole course of his life that charity and benevolence were the ruling features of his heart. The distribution of his holiday leaves to the city poor—a practice he has continued for years and which he informs us it is his purpose to continue while he lives; his acts of generosity to the poor the year round; his aid to people in debt and contributions to public charities and various subscriptions for public purposes, all indicate the existence in him of that priceless feature of exalted manhood and the true ornament of human life.

Colonel Wright is now in his seventy-third year; unbent with the weight of more than "three score and ten," and in the enjoyment of good health. With his retirement from political life he also retires from business pursuits. He is now engaged in the erection of a place of retreat at Harvey's lake, some twelve miles north of Wilkes-Barre, where he designs to spend most of his time for the remainder of his days. He and the Hon. Charles T. Barnum, who resides on the western shore, purchased the lake of the State some years ago and have stocked it with fine fish. It is some ten miles in circumference and a delightful mountain home a thousand feet above the sea. It is to be hoped that Mr. Wright in his new home and with leisure on hand will continue to chronicle and put in print for the public those unwritten matters connected with Wyoming's history which would afford so much pleasure to the residents of the valley. His knowledge of men and public affairs, gathered up during a long and eventful public life, might, too, be a source of employment to him and pleasure to others. An experience of about three quarters of a century, by an observing man, must necessarily have accumulated a pretty good stock of local general history. But our limits prevent us from a more extended notice of this surviving veteran of past days.

The steel engraving which accompanies our short biographical sketch is an excellent likeness and will be familiar to most of the residents of the valley. There are few of them who have not seen Colonel Wright. His name is a household word with the poor and the lowly. His voice, too, upon the hustings, and in the halls of justice, still echoes upon their ears.

MAJOR GENERAL E. W. STURDEVANT.

Samuel Sturdevant, father of General E. W. Sturdevant, was born at Danbury, Conn., September 16th, 1773, and died March 4th, 1847. His wife, Elizabeth Skinner, was born at Hebron, Conn., July 16th, 1773, and died August 23th, 1833. His father, Rev. Samuel Sturdevant, took an active part in the struggle for American independence, entering the army as an orderly sergeant and being promoted to a captaincy, serving uninterruptedly from the battle of Lexington to the surrender at Yorktown, when he soon emigrated to Braintree, where, at the place known as Black Walnut Bottom, he bought a large farm and resided there until his death, in 1828. Ebenezer Skinner, General Sturdevant's grandfather on his mother's side, had located in 1776 at the mouth of Tuscarora creek, only two miles distant, on lands adjoining the after purchase of the Rev. Mr. Sturdevant. At the advance of the Indians down the valley in 1778 he, with his family, went by canoe down the river to Forty Fort, that being then and for many years afterward the only means of travel up and down the Susquehanna. One of his sons, John N. Skinner, was in the battle of Wyoming and the old man was one of those in charge of the fort as protectors of the women and children. General Sturdevant's mother, then but seven years old, was with her mother in the fort and after the massacre went on foot, with the women and children spared by the Indians, through the wilderness called the "Shades of Death," to the Delaware river and thence to Connecticut.

General Ebenezer Warren Sturdevant was born June 11th, 1806, in Braintree, Luzerne (now Wyoming) county, Pa., on the property there originally owned by his maternal grandfather, then by his father, and which he now owns. He remained at home until the age of fifteen, living the uneventful but careless life of a boy on a country farm. At that age he entered the old Wilkes-Barre Academy, then under charge of Doctor Orton as principal, and remained under his tuition a year, making such advancement educationally that he was fitted to continue his studies at Hamilton Academy, at Hamilton, Madison county, N. Y. Remaining at that institution two years, he entered the sophomore class at Hamilton College, under the presidency of Doctor Davis. A year later a large number of the class, including General Sturdevant, left Hamilton to enter at various other colleges, General Sturdevant entering the junior class at Union College, under the presidency of Doctor Nott. Here he took all the degrees conferred at the institution, was the junior and senior orator, and graduated in June, 1830, receiving all the honors in a class of 106, the largest that had at that time graduated from any American educational institution.

In the July following his graduation General Sturdevant entered the law office of Hon. Garrick Mallery, at Wilkes-Barre, and remained two years as a co-student with the late Hon. G. W. Woodward, justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. He was duly admitted to the bar, and when he came into practice was appointed prosecuting attorney of Luzerne county by Governor Wolf, and one of the aides of the governor, with the rank of colonel. He was a delegate to the constitutional convention of 1838-39, and in 1842 was elected brigadier general of the brigade comprising the northeastern counties of Pennsylvania, and subsequently promoted to the office of major general of the division to which his brigade was attached. He held the two offices consecutively during a period of seventeen years, and is known as the oldest major general in the State.

General Sturdevant was in the active practice of his profession, successfully, up to 1857. In 1840 he removed to his present residence, then just completed, on Firwood farm, which he had purchased four years before, from the residence since owned by Hon. L. D. Shoemaker, which General Sturdevant had erected in 1834 and sold in 1838. During the years of his active business and professional life General Sturdevant accumulated a large amount of real estate, enhanced in value by deposits of coal, from the royalties upon which he is in receipt of a handsome income. Since his retirement from an active practice he has been chiefly engaged in the management of his real estate interests, but formerly he was identified with many of the most important enterprises of the State and section, acting as director of one of the branches of the Reading Railroad, for which he procured a charter, and taking an active part in securing legislation authorizing the construction of the North Branch Canal. He has been for thirty years a manager of the Wilkes-Barre Bridge Company, and was a director of the old Wyoming Bank, and for years he was president of the Wilkes-Barre borough council. At present he is a director of the First National Bank of Wilkes-Barre, and has long been a member of the city council and chairman of the committee on law and ordinances.

During a long term of years General Sturdevant has been in some manner connected with most of the important business enterprises looking to the development and improvement of the various interests of the Wyoming and Lackawanna valleys. His connection with the now gigantic iron interest of the Lackawanna in the days of its infancy is peculiarly interesting. In 1839 he was requested by the president of the Bank of North America, Philadelphia, as the agent and attorney of the bank, to visit a body of the land owned by the bank in the old township of Providence, Luzerne county, with a view to looking after iron ore reported to have been discovered on one of the bank tracts by a well known hunter of that vicinity. On a pleasant morning he set out in his buggy, carrying with him a saddle, a pair of saddle bags and a hatchet in preparation for a journey through the woods if it should be necessary. Passing through the locality of Seranton, then called Slocum Hollow, where were then the old red Slocum house, the old forge on Roaring brook, and in the vicinity the residence of Elisha Hitchcock, he found about two miles beyond the man he sought, to whom he agreed to pay $50 in consideration of his showing him the ore, provided that a test should prove it to be valuable. After unharnessing his horse, which he accoutered in saddle and saddle-bags, the general mounted and followed the old hunter (who carried his rifle with an eye to the possibility that they might arouse a deer from his mid-day nap) about five miles, over a foot path pretty well obstructed by fallen trees, to Stafford Meadow brook, near which, in a small ravine, on a tract in the warrantee name of Daniel Van Campen, and owned by the Bank of North America, they found outcroppings of iron ore on both sides of the gully. Taking as much of the ore as the general could carry in his saddle-bags, the two returned to the hunter's house, and hastily harnessing the horse the general drove back to Wilkes-Barre by moonlight. The next day the ore was securely boxed and sent to the president of the bank by stage. Soon General Sturdevant received a letter from the president enclosing a statement of the very favorable analysis of the ore by Professor Booth. The general paid the promised $50 to his friend the hunter, and the Serantons a little later bought the Daniel Van Campen tract, with other lands adjoining, and took initial steps leading to the wonderful development of the interests of the Lackawanna Iron and Coal Company, and through them of the thriving, energetic and rapidly growing city of Seranton.

General Sturdevant, who has been a life-long Democrat, was for a long time quite prominent in public affairs; but during the last few years he has not been active politically. Though often tendered the candidacy for high political honors, he has never willingly consented to the use of his name except as a nominee for delegate to the State convention to amend the constitution of Pennsylvania, of which he was elected a member. He was the youngest delegate in that body.

For many years General Sturdevant has been a member of the Protestant Episcopal church. For more than thirty years he was a vestryman of St. Stephen's church, Wilkes-Barre. He was a liberal contributor towards the establishment of St. Clement's parish, in which Firwood is located, and the erection of its house of worship, and since the organization of the parish he has been senior warden of this church.

General Sturdevant was married May 1st, 1832, to Martha Dwight Denison, of Wilkes-Barre, daughter of Austin Denison, of New Haven, and Martha Dwight, and a niece of President Dwight, of Yale College. On her mother's side she was of the seventh generation of descendants of Colonel Timothy Dwight, grandson of John Dwight, of Dedham, Mass., the common ancestor it is believed of all who legitimately bear his family name on this continent. She was a lady of very superior education and fine accomplishments, as honest a Christian woman as ever lived, proud of the old Dwight name and cherishing through life every incident of the history of the family, with which she was thoroughly acquainted. She died October 20th, 1842. Only one child, Mary Elizabeth Sturdevant, who was born April 10th, 1833, and died June 18th, 1835, was born of this marriage. May 12th, 1847, General Sturdevant married Lucy, daughter of Judge Charles Huston, a judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, who bore him four children—Charles Huston, Mary Elizabeth, Edward Warren and Lucy Huston—and died May 3d, 1879, at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. J. N. Stone, jr., in Philadelphia, surrounded by her husband and children, in the fullest confidence of faith and holy hope, in the sixtieth year of her age. For more than thirty years Mrs. Sturdevant had lived in Wilkes-Barre amid an increasing circle of appreciative and loving friends. A devoted wife and mother, a faithful and exemplary church member, a constant worshiper in her parish church, a most efficient teacher in the Sunday-school, and a true friend to all, to whom her friendship was helpful and full of comfort, her loss to the whole community, and especially to the parish of St.

Clement's church, was so great as to seem irreparable. She was born in Bellefonte, Center county, Pa., and was trained under the pastoral care of Rev. George W. Natt. She left, besides her husband and her two sons and two daughters, a countless number of mourning friends, to whom the bereavement of her loss was greater than can be told.

General Sturdevant, still in active business life and identified with the leading interests of Wilkes-Barre and vicinity, an efficient and prominent member of the city council, sound in health and thoroughly alive to the important events of the time, is passing the latter years of his life at Firwood farm, the care of which is his daily occupation and pleasure.

THE WADHAMS FAMILY.

The family of Wadham had its origin in Devonshire, England, and derived its name from the place of its residence, Wadham, in the parish of Knowston, near the incorporate town of Molton. Lyon, in his Magna Britannica, says: "The manor of Wadham, at the time of the Domesday survey, in 1086, belonged to an old Saxon by the name of Ulfr, who held it in demesne since the time of Edward the Confessor, A. D. 1042. It is not improbable that he, Ulfr, might be the ancestor of Wadham of whom this was the original residence." William de Wadham was freeholder of this land in the time of King Edward I., A. D. 1272, and both East and West Wadham descended in this name and posterity until the death of Nicholas Wadham, founder of Wadham College, Oxford, when it passed to his sisters' families, and is still in possession of their descendants. Merrifield, in Somersetshire, came into possession of Sir John Wadham, knight, by his marriage with Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Stephen Popham, and was inherited by their son, Sir John Wadham, whose descendants were called "Wadham of Merrifield." The principal places of residence of this family in England were in the counties of Devon, Somerset and Dorset; and from Somersetshire came John Wadham to America and settled in Wethersfield, Conn., where he was a farmer, as may be seen from deeds of purchase of lands and other records of the town as early as 1650. He died in Wethersfield in 1676. His widow, Susannah, married as second wife a Bushnell, of Saybrook (probably William, sen.), and died in 1683.

John Wadham (or Wadhams as the name is now spelled), born July 8th, 1655, only child of John and Susannah Wadham, also lived in Wethersfield. His children by his first wife, Hannah, were Hannah, Susannah, John, Sarah, Daniel, Caleb and Noah. The last mentioned, Noah Wadham, born August 10th, 1695, son of John and Hannah Wadhams, married Anne Hurlbut, and removed from Wethersfield to Middletown about 1736; thence, about 1773, to Goshen, Conn., where he died in 1783, aged eighty-eight years.

The children of Noah and Anne Wadhams were Noah (died early), Hannah, Elizabeth, Noah, Solomon (died early), Jonathan, John, Deliverance, Mary, Anne, Solomon, Nicholas and Seth. John Marsh Wadhams, grandson of the above named John, residing upon the paternal lands in Goshen, is a man of position in the society and town, of large business abilities and financial success; at present a member of the House of Representatives, which position he has filled on two former occasions; also the position of Senator of Connecticut. His son, John H. Wadhams, has also been a member of the Legislature of his State.

Albert Wadhams, a descendant of Solomon, is an attorney-at-law, and of prominence in his town, having been a contributor of many valuable articles for the press.

Rt. Rev. Edward Prindle Wadhams, a descendant of Jonathan, is now bishop in the Roman Catholic church at Ogdensburg, N. Y.

Noah Wadhams, son of Noah and Anne Wadhams, was born May 17th, 1726, and educated at Princeton College, where he graduated. His diploma, dated September 25th, 1754, is now in the custody of his great grandson. It bears the name of Aaron Burr, father of the celebrated man of Revolutionary fame, as president of the college. "The document is the surviving witness of three generations past and gone, a testament also of the times of George III. and when the present State of New Jersey was one of the colonies of his realm." Mr. Wadhams was ordained minister of the New Preston society of the Congregational church in the town of Milford, Conn., at its organization, in 1757, and continued his pastoral relations to that society for eleven years.

At a meeting of the Susquehanna Company in Connecticut in 1768 "the standing committee was directed to procure a pastor to accompany the second colony, called the 'first forty,' for carrying on religious worship and services according to the best of his ability in a wilderness country." Rev. Noah Wadhams was chosen for the purpose, and he accepted. He had married Elizabeth Ingersoll, of New Haven, November 8th, 1758, and they had a family of small children. "Leaving his family at their home in Litchfield he embarked with his flock in 1769, amid the perils which lay before them on the distant shores of the Susquehanna, in a wilderness made more forbidding because of the savage people who were in possession of the valley. He continued his pastoral relations, interrupted by an occasional visit to his family in Litchfield, until the year succeeding the Wyoming massacre, when he removed them to Plymouth." Soon after this his theological views underwent a change, and "he became a Methodist, and faithfully pursued his religious duties as a local preacher of that denomination, holding meetings in Plymouth and other parts of the valley more or less frequently during the remainder of his life." He married as his second wife Diana Ross, daughter of Jeremiah Ross and sister of General William S. Ross, of Wilkes-Barre, by whom he had no children, and who died in October, 1804. He died May 22nd, 1806. "He was a man of very considerable talents, having received a liberal education, as already stated, and as a mark of merit he had also conferred upon him by Yale College, in 1764, the degree of Master of Arts." Four sons, Ingersol, Calvin, Noah and Moses, and one daughter, Anoe, were the children of Rev. Noah Wadhams by his first wife. "They were too young to have taken any part in the early and angry strifes of the valley. Their names were, however, all upon the assessment list of the township returned in 1796."

Ingersol was educated in Litchfield, Conn. He married a Miss Brinsmade, of New Milford, Conn. He died in 1845, aged eighty-four years, leaving two daughters—a Mrs. Myers, whose descendants are in the western States, and Mrs. Amy Stone, now living in New Milford, Conn.

Moses Wadhams died of yellow fever in 1804, aged thirty years. His business abilities are evidenced in the desirable financial condition in which he left a widow and two children at the time of his death. He was a leading member of the Methodist Episcopal church, occupying the position of steward and class leader. His children were Phoebe, who died in 1867, aged sixty-six years, and Lydia, now living, the widow of Samuel French.

The widow of Moses Wadhams, born Ellen Hendricks, married Joseph Wright, of Plymouth. She died in 1871, aged ninety-six years.

Anne Wadhams, born in 1763, married a Mr. Hatch, of Connecticut. Her descendants are living in Farmington and New Milford, Conn.

Calvin and Noah were for many years prominent business men of Plymouth. The latter, the younger of the two, was one of the early justices of the peace of the county. He was a graduate of the famous law school of early days at Litchfield, Conn., under the management of Judge Reeve. He was admitted to the bar of Luzerne county not far from 1800; but the legal profession did not seem to have afforded him any attractions, and he settled down in Plymouth, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was an industrious, upright man, a model magistrate, and for many years did he enjoy the confidence of his neighbors. He died in 1846, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. In his politics, which were of the Jefferson school, he was as positive as his brother Calvin was in his, which were Washingtonian—"one a radical Democrat, the other a radical Federalist."

The "success of Calvin Wadhams was remarkable. As to his habits of frugality and industry he was a genuine type of the men of the valley in his time. Labor, temperance and economy, in his judgment, proved the true standard of manhood, and made up the rule of his long and prosperous life. He was a religious man, strongly devoted to the church of his faith, and while his home was markedly open to the brethren of the Methodist church, his hospitality was broad and all embracing." February 10th, 1791, he married Esther Waller, of Connecticut, who was born June 10th, 1768, and died February 19th, 1818. April 28th, 1820, he married widow Lucy Lucas, born Lucy Starr August 13th, 1762, who died September 21st, 1840.

When Calvin Wadhams died, April 22nd, 1845, aged 80 years, only one of his children survived him—the late Samuel Wadhams, Esq., who was born in Plymouth, August 21st, 1806. He inherited largely the energy of character and views of his father. He was a man of good business qualities, calm, even tempered, and of friendly disposition; a remarkably methodical man in his business affairs, exhibiting great skill, judgment and industry in their management. He understood their every detail and knew how to control and direct them to good purpose. By caution, prudence and forethought he came to his conclusions with moderation and they were generally correct.

April 7th, 1824, he married Florinda Starr Catlin, of New Marlboro, Mass. "He died as he had lived, December 15th, 1868, aged sixty-two, a man of unblemished integrity, upright in his dealings, and a worthy Christian member of society." His wife died April 28th, 1870.

They left three sons, Elijah Catlin, Calvin and Moses, and one daughter, Esther Waller, who married Hon. L. D. Shoemaker, of Wilkes-Barre. To Mr. and Mrs. L. D. Shoemaker have been born nine children, of whom six are living.

Calvin was born December 14th, 1833, and is an attorney at law. He has one son living, having buried three children.

Moses was born November 23d, 1836, and died March 28th, 1878, leaving a widow, his second wife, and an only daughter by his first wife.

Hon. Elijah Catlin Wadhams was born in Plymouth, July 17th, 1825, in the same house where his father, Samuel Wadhams, was born. This house, a view of which is shown on another page, was built about 1807, by his grandfather, Calvin Wadhams, third son of Rev. Noah Wadhams, and stands on land adjoining the homestead. The barn across the street was built during Washington's administration. Mr. Wadhams was educated at Dana's Academy, Wilkes-Barre, and Dickinson College, Carlisle, and graduated from the University of the City of New York in 1847. Locating in Plymouth he embarked in a successful mercantile career, and was justice of the peace in Plymouth borough twenty years and burgess seven years. While a resident of Plymouth he was active in developing and supporting all interests tending to the advancement of the public prosperity, and has been identified as a member and officer with the leading social and secret societies there. For many years he has been a director of the Wyoming National Bank and he is now a director of the First National Bank of Wilkes-Barre. In 1873 he removed to Wilkes-Barre and in 1874-75 erected his residence, No. 330 South Franklin street. In November, 1876, he was elected a senator of the State of Pennsylvania. A marked characteristic of Mr. Wadhams, one which it has been seen has been developed in many generations of the family, is industry, which he recognizes as the key to success in life under any and all circumstances.

October 7th, 1851, he married Esther Taylor French, daughter of Samuel French, who was the son of Samuel and Francis Holberton French, of Bridgeport, Conn. Other branches of the family now reside near Vergennes, Vt. All of them are descendants of Samuel and Sarah Hall French, of Derby, Conn.

His children are: Samuel French Wadhams, attorney-at-law, who graduated at Dartmouth College, N. H., in 1875; Ellen Hendrick Wadhams, a graduate of Drew Ladies' Seminary, Carmel, N. Y.; Cornelia Frances Wadhams, a graduate of Bordentown Female College, N. J.; Moses Waller Wadhams, a graduate of Dartmouth College, N. H., of the class of 1880; Stella Catlin Wadhams, Lydia French Wadhams and Ralph Holberton Wadhams.

HON. CHARLES MINER—WILLIAM P. MINER.

Born at Norwich, Conn., on the first day of February, 1780, Charles Miner came to Pennsylvania at the age of nineteen to take charge of lands held by his father, Seth Miner, under the Connecticut claim, in the wild forests of Luzerne, now in Susquehanna county.

The question of jurisdiction had been settled by the decree at Trenton, 1782, and surveys were progressing under the compromise laws securing title to Yankee claimants. Mr. Miner worked in a sugar camp after his arrival in February, 1799, until he earned one hundred and five pounds of maple sugar, which he carried on his back to the Wyalusing and exchanged for provisions, and then began chopping timber and making a clearing for a farm three miles west of Montrose.

Ambitious to be an editor, Mr. Miner sold his improvements soon after he came of age and removed to Wilkes-Barre, where his brother, Asher Miner, had established the Luzerne County Federalist in place of the Wilkes-Barre Gazette, which had been the only paper of the town since 1797, owned by Thomas Wright, Esq., a large landed proprietor, and published until the close of 1800 by his son, Joseph Wright. Asher Miner married the only daughter of Thomas Wright, and Charles, after teaching school two terms, married one of his pupils, Letitia, daughter of Joseph Wright. The brothers had been apprentices in the office of Muster Samuel Green, who published the Connecticut Gazette and Commercial Intelligencer of New London. The Wrights were Democrats; the Miners Federalists.

The first contribution to the Federalist was received by the elder brother with hesitation; but when it returned in the columns of a Philadelphia daily doubt vanished, and in a year afterward, May 3d, 1802, the Federalist was "printed by A. & C. Miner," the partnership continuing two years, when Asher removed to Doylestown.

In October, 1807, Charles was elected to the Pennsylvania Legislature, which then met at Lancaster. The proprietor of the only newspaper in the county, he announced that his columns were free to his opponents to "taunt my faults with such full license as truth and malice have power to utter." Re-elected in 1808, he became the early advocate of the rights and liberties of the people, and was a fair debater. He opposed the circulation of small notes of banks in other States, and proposed that excellent law exempting tools of the poor mechanic, the spinning wheel, cow and bed, from execution and sale for debt.

Foreseeing the growth of the coal trade at a very early day, he advocated the improvement of the Susquehanna and the Lehigh, predicting the connection of their waters by a railroad long before such roads were generally known or thought of.

In May, 1810, Messrs. Sidney Tracy and Steuben Butler, who had been apprentices, assumed control of the Federalist, and under their management September 7th appeared the first of a series of essays from the pen of Mr. Miner, entitled, "Essays from the Desk of Poor Robert the Scribe," which became very popular, and his first one, "Who'll Turn Grindstone?" still goes its annual rounds of the press ascribed to the pen of Dr. Franklin.

Mr. Miner resumed the editorial chair in 1811, and in 1816 disposed of the establishment to Isaac A. Chapman, Esq., to take charge of the editorial columns of the True American, under an agreement of partnership with the proprietor, Mr. Thomas T. Stiles, at Philadelphia; an arrangement which was not lasting, as Mr. Miner founded the Village Record in the pleasant village of West Chester, Chester county, Pa., in August, 1817.

The young Yankee printer, ridiculed by the democracy of Chester as a "Yankee tin peddler," won his way to the esteem and confidence of the plain and practical members of the society of Friends in that fine old county; and in 1824 he was elected to represent the district composed of Lancaster, Chester and Delaware counties in Congress, with James Buchanan and Samuel Edwards. Re-elected in 1826, he served four years, retiring in 1829, on the inauguration of General Jackson.

In July, 1825, brother Asher came from Doylestown, where he had for twenty years published the Doylestown Correspondent (now the Intelligencer), and from that time the Record was published by Asher & Charles Miner till 1834, when it was sold to Henry S. Evans, Esq.

Charles returned to Wyoming valley in 1832. Asher followed on disposal of the paper and they ended their lives on adjoining farms near Wilkes-Barre.

Before the day of fast presses of Hoe and Campbell the country press was not so over-shadowed by the immense circulation of the city dailies, and Mr. Miner's position as editor and representative in the Legislature and in Congress was highly respectable and influential, as indicated by his correspondence with Webster, Clay, John Quincy Adams, Rush, Sergeant and others. A warm friend of internal improvements and of home industry, he became attached to Mr. Clay, the great advocate of our American system. As a Yankee, when circumstances induced a coolness between the eminent Kentuckian and the Defender of the Constitution his sympathies went out warmly towards his brother Yankee, who long after sent him his portrait endorsed "To my highly valued friend the Hon. Charles Miner. Daniel Webster."

Mr. Miner advocated the encouragement of wool growing while dressed in homespun in the Pennsylvania Legislature. In Congress he introduced a bill for the suppression of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, which he advocated in an able speech, contrary to the wishes and advice of timid friends. He procured the signatures of a majority of property owners of the District to a memorial in its favor; but the slave power, not seriously objecting to the suppression, thought best to defend every outpost in view of the coming conflict, and defeated it.

Mr. Miner had joined Lodge 61, Ancient York Masons, at an early day in Wilkes-Barre. When the wave of anti-masonry swept the land and carried Mr. Adams from the side of his old political friends, he wrote a long letter to Mr. Miner, deprecating any estrangement or breach of personal friendship on that account, and enclosed some verses which concluded with the following lines:

Be thine the compass and the square,
While I discard them both;
And thou shalt take, while I forbear,
The secret and the oath.

Mr. Miner's pen continued actively engaged on subjects of interest until after his eightieth year. His "History of Wyoming," published in 1845, was written at the request of many friends interested, who knew how early and intimate his knowledge had been of its progress, his acquaintance with survivors of the battle, and with the civil conflicts of the generation before him.

The Philadelphia Press, in noticing his decease, said: "Charles Miner was a model journalist and statesman; the father of a school of sound thinkers, and the most practical philanthropist of his time."

He quietly passed away in his eighty-sixth year, at his Retreat, on the 26th day of October, 1865. The accompanying portrait was painted in 1822 by a rising artist, B. Otis, who died young. Among his memoranda was a paper requesting to be laid in the old grave yard in Wilkes-Barre, where the mould was soft and pleasant and he would be surrounded by dear friends who had gone before; and a plain stone from the mountains surrounding to mark the spot, inscribed:

"CHARLES MINER,
Born February 1st, 1780,
Died October 26th, 1865.
THE HISTORIAN OF WYOMING."

William Penn Miner, son of Charles Miner, has been, like his father before him, a prominent figure in the history of Wilkes-Barre Journalism. He was born in Wilkes-Barre, September 8th, 1818, and married Miss Elizabeth D. Liggett, of Philadelphia, Pa. He has served Luzerne county as prothonotary, and in 1846 was elected clerk of the courts for three years.

He began publishing the Weekly Record of the Times April 19th, 1853, and started the daily edition October 5th, 1873. Mr. Miner is the author of the very interesting and valuable history of the coal trade embraced in chapter X of this work.

HON. CHARLES A. MINER.

Hon. Charles A. Miner, a son of Robert and a grandson of Asher Miner, both of whom were well and favorably known to the inhabitants of Wyoming valley, was born in Plains township, August 30th, 1830, and received his education at the academies of Wilkes-Barre and Westchester, Pa. Since attaining his majority he has been engaged in milling with an interregnum of only a few years. The first grist-mill erected at the place now known as Miner's Station, near Wilkes-Barre, was built by Mr. Miner's great grandfather, Thomas Wright, who emigrated from Ireland and settled at that place, which was long known as Wrightsville. Mr. Miner's partner in his milling operations is his cousin, I. M. Thomas.

Much time and attention have been devoted by Mr. Miner to real estate transactions in Wilkes-Barre and to coal lands adjacent, in which he has been fortunate. He has been connected with most of the successful business enterprises of Wilkes-Barre, having been president of a street railway company, director of the Wyoming National and People's Bunks, and president and for years a member of the city council. He is president of the Luzerne County Agricultural Society and of the Pennsylvania Millers' State Association, and in 1873 he represented the State as honorary commissioner at the world's exhibition at Vienna, Austria. He has been elected to the Pennsylvania House of Representatives three times in succession, and was almost unanimously nominated by the convention of 1880 to the State senate.

Mr. Miner was one of the first to take an interest in the establishment of a hospital for the relief of the anthracite coal regions centering at Wilkes-Barre, and he has been president of the board of managers of that institution since its incorporation. To this hospital he has secured appropriations of $45,000 since his first election to the Legislature in 1874, and he has secured other legislation of much value to his constituents and the coal interests of the valley. He is deservedly popular with his constituents, as well as with his fellow legislators of all parties, and is an upright and conscientious man in all the public and private relations of life.

A. R. Brundage

ASA R BRUNDAOE.

Mr. Brundage is a leading member of the bar of Luzerne county. A native of the county, educated at the University of Mississippi, where he became the valedictorian of his class, he removed to Wilkes-Barre immediately upon his graduation and entered the office of Hon. H. B. Wright as a student at law. His father, the late M. S. Brundage, was among the early settlers of the county, and during a long life maintained an influential character. His mother was a daughter of Hon. Richard Brodhead, an early and distinguished settler on the Delaware river in Pike county, Pa., and a sister of Hon. Richard Brodhead, jr., late a U. S. senator of Pennsylvania.

Admitted to the bar very early in life, Mr. Brundage was soon elected district attorney of the county, and has since pursued his profession with distinction and success. As an advocate before a jury he has taken front rank and will be classed among the leading lawyers of the bar of Luzerne. A gentleman of culture and refinement, he has honored the profession of which he is a member. For many years Mr. Brundage has been prominent in the politics of the State and county; of pronounced Democratic proclivities, he has frequently represented the county in State and National conventions, and whether as lawyer, citizen, or politician, his whole life has been prominent and influential, productive of good and not of evil. Such men are valuable as citizens and give character to the community in which they reside.

HON. ZIBA BENNETT.

Ziba Bennett was born at Weston, Conn., November 10th, 1800. He was the son of Platt Bennett, who had a family of three daughters and two sons. During his childhood his parents moved to Westchester county, N. Y., but subsequently settled in Newtown (now Elmira), N. Y. Matthias Hollenback, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., had established a branch of his business there. In his store Mr. Bennett, at a very early age, found employment as junior clerk. In 1815, when only fourteen years old, he was transferred to the main establishment in Wilkes-Barre. It was located on South Main street and Mr. Bennett commenced his labors there June 16th, 1815.

Five years later Matthias Hollenback and his son George M. Hollenback, who had become associated with him in business, moved into new quarters at the corner of River and Market streets, Mr. Bennett having in the mean time gained the position of chief clerk. In 1822 Mr. Bennett was admitted as a partner with the late George M. Hollenback, and in 1826 he purchased the property of Stephen Tuttle on North Main street and started business on his own account. He continued the same until his death, thus covering an actual mercantile experience of over sixty years and making him at his demise the oldest merchant in Luzerne county.

On the 25th of November, 1825, Mr. Bennett was married to Miss Hannah F. Slocum, the eldest daughter of the late Joseph Slocum. Mrs. Bennett passed away on the 5th of February, 1855, leaving behind a precious memory, fragrant of Christian deeds and noble virtues. Two children, Mrs. John C. Phelps and George S. Bennett, survive their parents. Mr. Bennett was married the second time, November 18th, 1856, to Miss Priscilla E. Lee, daughter of the late James Lee, an estimable and benevolent lady who survives him. Mr. Bennett was chosen to represent Luzerne county in the State Legislature in the years 1833 and 1834.

In 1842 he was called to assume judicial honors as the associate of Judge John N. Conyngham. On one or two occasions he was solicited to accept a Congressional nomination, but declined, as he preferred the duties and comforts of private life to the excitements incident to political concerns. During his life Mr. Bennett was identified with most of the large business enterprises and corporations of Wilkes-Barre. He was interested in the Wyoming Bank from its beginning, serving almost constantly as a director and holding for nearly a decade the office of president. He was president of the Wilkes-Barre Bridge Company and of the Hollenback Cemetery Association, treasurer of the Luzerne County Bible Society, and, up to the time of his death, senior partner of the hardware firm of Z. Bennett & Co. and of the banking firm of Bennett, Phelps & Co.

For over a half century Mr. Bennett was a most useful member and a prominent officer of the Methodist Episcopal church, having been converted when he was twenty-one years of age. His house was the home of the early itinerant and he gave largely of his means for the support of the church as well as to various benevolent causes. He was for many years superintendent of the First M. E. Church Sunday-school and succeeded in making it one of the most flourishing institutions in the city. He was a trustee and officer of the Wyoming Seminary and founded its library, which now bears his name.

In 1872 he was sent as the first lay delegate from the Wyoming annual conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church held at Brooklyn, N. Y. He died November 4th, 1878, after several months of feeble health, and his body is buried in the cemetery which he took so much interest in starting and in maintaining. He was a noble man, a true friend, an honored citizen and a sincere Christian.

THE DANA FAMILY.

The Dana family came to America about 1640. Its various members all through the history of our country have borne a conspicuous and highly honorable part, as well in political positions they have occupied as in the paths of science, law and literature; and through the pre-eminent literary accomplishments of Richard H. Dana the name has become endeared to every scholar and household throughout our land. To particularize and give the names and history of the various leading and prominent men of this family would lead too far from the purpose of this sketch, which is to give an account of the Danas of Wyoming.

The name of Anderson Dana is first found at Wyoming in "a list of the inhabitants of Pittstown, April 30th, 1772," where he owned a share of the town. He soon sold out, purchased and removed to a farm at Wilkes-Barre, a part of which, including the old homestead, still remains in the family and name. When the enemy came to desolate the valley in 1778, he mounted his horse and rode through the settlement arousing and urging the people to the conflict. Although exempt he went out with the little force, acted as adjutant and aid to Colonel Zebulon Butler on the field and fell in the midst of the hottest of the strife.

"He came from Ashford, Conn.; was a lawyer of handsome attainments and the leader in the establishment of free schools and a gospel ministry. He represented Wyoming in the Connecticut assembly and had just returned home when the news of the invasion reached the valley."

He left a family of children of whom his son Anderson became his successor in keeping the old homestead farm and raised there a large family of children. The latter married a daughter of Asa Stevens, who fell in the battle. Stephen Whiton, son-in-law of the elder Anderson, also fell in the battle. He was deputy sheriff at the time. Captain Hezekiah Parsons married his daughter, who was born several months after the battle.

Anderson Dana, the elder, was the grandson of Jacob Dana, of Cambridge, Mass., where the family first settled. One of the sons of Anderson Dana, jr., Asa Stevens Dana, married Ann Pruner, and to them was born in Wilkes-Barre, January 29th, 1817, a son, Edmund Lovell Dana; and in the spring of 1819 they removed to Eaton, now Wyoming county, just opposite Tunkhannock, where they resided till their death. Here Edmund L. with a number of brothers and sisters grew up, working on the farm and attending school in the winters. At the age of fifteen he began preparing for college at Wilkes-Barre academy, entered the sophomore class in Yale in October, 1835, and graduated in 1839. He commenced the study of law under Hon. Luther Kidder, April 7th, 1839; was admitted to the bar April 6th, 1841, and entered the office of Hon. George W. Woodward, late chief justice of Pennsylvania, on his appointment to the bench, and took charge of his large business, which he successfully managed, and from that time to December, 1848, was actively engaged in practice in the counties of Luzerne and Wyoming.

In December, 1846, when a call was made by the government for troops to aid in prosecuting the war with Mexico, he tendered the services of the Wyoming Artillerists, of which company he was captain, which was accepted; started by canal boat for Pittsburg December 7th, 1846, and was there mustered into the service to serve during the war, December 16th, 1846. His company was assigned to the 1st regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, and designated as Company I. Upon the arrival of the advance transport and troops at Lobos Island on their way to Vera Cruz he was selected to make a survey of Lobos harbor. He was in the landing of the troops, participated actively in the siege of Vera Cruz, and his company was part of the troops assigned to receive the surrender of the city and the castle of San Juan D'Ulloa. He accompanied General Scott into the interior of Mexico; was at the battle of Cerro Gordo, April 18th, 1847; accompanied the movement to and occupation of Perote Castle and the cities of Jalapa and Puebla; in the siege of the latter was actively engaged and for good and soldierly conduct there he received special mention in general orders. He led the charge at the pass of El Pinal; marched to the city of Mexico, remained there until peace in June, 1848, and returning was mustered out of service at Pittsburg, July 20th, 1848. He and his company were welcomed home with the highest honors by an immense concourse of people. He at once resumed the practice of law.

At the breaking out of the late war he was major-general of the 9th division of Pennsylvania militia, and in the summer of 1862 was appointed by the governor commandant of camp Luzerne, in Kingston; and upon the organization of the 143d regiment at the camp, October 18th, 1862, he was elected its colonel. November 7th the regiment broke camp and left for the seat of war; was assigned for a time to the defense of Washington, and July 17th, 1863, went into camp at Belle Plain, where it was attached to the 2nd brigade of the 3d division of the 1st army corps, under Gen. John F. Reynolds; was in the march on Port Royal April 21st, in the skirmish below Fredericksburg April 28th and 29th, at the battle of Chancellorsville May 2nd, 3d and 4th, and at the battle of Gettysburg July 1st, 2nd and 3d. In this battle Colonel Dana commanded the 2nd brigade 3d division 1st corps, and at its close was active in following Lee's forces, encountering them in a skirmish at Funkstown.

During the winter of 1863-4 he was engaged in the several skirmishes at the fords of the Rappahannock. In the first day's battle of the Wilderness, May 5th, 1864, he was wounded and taken prisoner, his horse being shot under him. He was taken to Danville, Lynchburg, Moccasin and Charleston, arriving June 15th, and was one of the fifty officers placed under fire in retaliation for our forces shelling the city. He was exchanged August 3d, 1864, with fifty federal officers, for a like number and rank of Confederates, and rejoined his command at Petersburg, then a part of the 5th corps; was engaged in the several movements in the fall of 1864, and on the 8th of October was assigned to conduct an advance of the entire corps. He had a sharp encounter with the enemy's outposts, and for his conduct in the affair was complimented by the general commanding, in special orders, crediting him with "performing important, arduous and responsible duties with credit to himself and his command."

He was in the first battle of Hatcher's Run, October 28th and 29th; on the Weldon raid from the 7th to the 12th of December, and in the second battle of Hatcher's Run, February 6th and 7th, 1865. His regiment was sent with others on special service to Baltimore, and thence to Hart's Island, and was mustered out June 13th, 1865. The regiment and its officers received a most enthusiastic reception on its return home, after its nearly three years active and honorable service.

Colonel Dana was retained in the service, and detailed on court-martials, first at Elmira and then at Syracuse, N. Y. For his long, faithful and approved services he was brevetted brigadier general, and honorably mustered out of the service August 23d, 1865.

As an officer his well earned reputation is attested by his comrades in arms, the 143d regiment, who revere and worship him with a devotion rarely excelled.

After his return he again resumed the practice of law, and in the fall of 1867 was nominated and elected over Governor Hoyt to the office of additional law judge of Luzerne county. Upon the expiration of his term he was nominated by the Democratic and Republican conventions, without opposition, for the same place, so well and satisfactorily had he discharged the duties of his high office. But at that time a new party sprung into existence, known as the Greenback-Labor party, which by means of a most earnest and efficient organization and effort swept the county of Luzerne like a tornado and carried all their men into office over both the other political parties. Of course General Dana went down with the rest. But his defeat did not detract from his high character and reputation as a jurist, or from the regard of his friends and neighbors. He is a man of fine culture, of scholastic tastes and acquirements, true and honorable, and a fitting representative of an old Wyoming family whose homestead he still retains as his residence.

Although not an active partisan, he has always acted with the Democratic party. For more than thirty years he has been connected with St. Stephen's Episcopal Church, at Wilkes-Barre. He is an ardent lover of field sports, indulges much in hunting and fishing, filling out his time snatched from the care of business in these his favorite pastimes.

He was married in 1842, and has one son, Charles Edmund, married and engaged in the study of art, in which he has made gratifying progress.

HON. HARRY HAKES.

Harry Hakes was born June 10th, 1825, at Harpersfield, Delaware county, N. Y. His father, Hon. Lyman Hakes, late of Delaware county, N. Y., was born in Massachusetts, in 1788. His mother, Nancy Dayton, was born in 1790, at Watertown, Litchfield county, Connecticut. The family of Judge Hakes consisted of eight children, four sons and four daughters. Of the sons Harry was the youngest, and Lyman Hakes, for many years a resident and prominent lawyer of Luzerne county, Pa., was the eldest. Homer Hakes, another of the sons, died in 1854. The remaining son, Hon. Harlo Hakes, resides at Hornellsville, N. Y. Two of the sisters are still living.

The boyhood of Harry Hakes combined the usual experiences of farmers' sons, work upon the farm during the summer and attendance at the district school during the winter. His habit of study and taste for general reading made him a proficient in all the branches taught, and supplied him with a good English education.

Leaving the farm he entered the Castleton Medical College, of Vermont, and after completing the usual course of study graduated in 1846, opened an office at Davenport Centre, N. Y., and there began and for three years continued the practice of medicine with gratifying success. In June, 1849, he married Miss Maria E. Dana, eldest daughter of Anderson Dana, jr., then late of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., deceased. After her death, in the December following, he devoted the year 1850 to attendance at the schools and hospitals of New York city. He then removed to the rapidly growing village of Nanticoke, where he continued in active practice for three years, and in the fall of 1854 he visited Europe and spent another year of study in the medical institutions of London and Paris. Returning at the expiration of this period, he married Miss Harriet L. Lape of Nanticoke, his present wife; resumed his practice, interspersing with it the care and culture of his farm, and continued to be thus employed until the spring of 1857.

Although Dr. Hakes was a zealous student of medicine, and a successful physician, he seemed to possess by hereditary transmission an aptitude for the law. His father, as above intimated, was judge of the courts of Delaware county, N. Y.; his brother Hon. Harlo Hakes, of Hornellsville, a prominent lawyer in central and western New York; and his only other surviving brother, Lyman Hakes, Esq., was a prominent and successful lawyer, with a large clientage at Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Dr. Hakes began the study of the law in the office of the latter in 1857, and at the January term of court in 1860, after passing the usual examination, was admitted to practice in the several courts of Luzerne county. Elected on the Democratic ticket, he represented the county of Luzerne in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, with ability and integrity, during the eventful years of 1863 and 1864. After the close of his official term he returned to the profession of the law, occasionally visiting, at his urgent request, his old patients, giving his leisure to his farm and applying to its culture thorough practical knowledge, with all the aids derived from science and from modern agricultural appliances and improvements. In addition to raising the usual farming crops he planted a vineyard of several acres with choice varieties of grapes, from which the neighboring markets were supplied and considerable quantities of wine manufactured.

In 1874 he removed to the city of Wilkes-Barre, and built for himself and family a tasteful and commodious residence, where he delights to welcome his friends and to dispense a liberal hospitality. Although he still keeps up his relations with his brethren of the healing art, and takes an active part in business and discussions as a member of the Luzerne County Medical Society, his attention and time are chiefly given to the law, with an occasional digression at the proper season with the rod and creel along some mountain stream, or an incursion with dog and gun into the haunts of the quail, the pheasant and other denizens of the wood.

The doctor is a life-long, earnest Democrat, and is always ready both in public and in private to give a reason for the faith that is in him.

He is a genial friend, a kind neighbor and a public spirited citizen.

Over six feet in height, he unites with a large frame a large heart, and a grasp, a vigor and independence of mind, which renders empiricism and the small arts and details of professional life distasteful, but especially qualifies and inclines him to subject every question, whether in medicine, law or theology, to the rigid test of principle, and to that measure and amount of proof of which it is reasonably susceptible.

HON. GARRICK MALLERY HARDING.

Appropriate notices of living men are sometimes difficult to obtain. Such has been the case in a marked degree with respect to Judge Harding. Aided by a recent publication entitled "Biographical Encyclopedia of Pennsylvania," a personal friend of the judge has furnished the following sketch:

Hon. Garrick M. Harding, president judge of the eleventh judicial district of Pennsylvania, was born at Exeter, Luzerne county, on the 12th of July, 1830. He is of that strong New England stock which in the early days of the republic was transplanted from the rugged shores of Massachusetts Bay to the more congenial soil of Pennsylvania. Exeter bears the same relation to Wyoming that Concord in Massachusetts bears to Bunker's Hill. Bunker's Hill became classical ground through the early struggles of the colonists, which began at Concord; and Wyoming a classical history dates from the massacre, which had its beginning at Exeter, wherein two of the Hardings were slaughtered, and whereof John Harding, the grandfather of Garrick M. Harding, was the only survivor. The latter graduated at Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., in 1848, in the class with John A. Creswell, late Postmaster General. He was admitted to the bar in Wilkes-Barre, in 1850, when the bar of Luzerne county was conspicuous for the strength and ability of its members, among whom were the Hon. George W. Woodward, Hon. Luther Kidder and Hon. Oristus Collins, ex-judges of the Supreme Court and the Court of Common Pleas, and Hon. Hendrick B. Wright, Hon. Henry M. Fuller, Harrison Wright and H. W. Nicholson, men of great acquirements and marked ability. His tastes and temperament naturally led him into the active practice of the courts; he speedily attained great success in jury trials, and as an advocate soon came to be without an equal at the Luzerne bar. In 1858 he was elected district attorney of Luzerne county on the Republican ticket by more than 1,700 majority, though the county was largely Democratic. On the 12th of July, 1870, at the exact age of forty years, he was appointed by Gov. Geary president judge of the eleventh judicial district (excepting Philadelphia and Allegheny the largest in the State) to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. J. N. Conyngham. In the fall of 1870 he was unanimously nominated by the Republicans of Luzerne for the same position; and the election which followed fully demonstrated his strength and popularity. His competitor was the Hon. George W. Woodward, ex-chief justice of the Supreme Court, who had been elected to Congress in 1868 by a majority in Luzerne county of more than 3,000. Yet, notwithstanding there was a large Democratic majority in the district, and despite Judge Woodward's pre-eminence and ability and pure and spotless character, Judge Harding was elected by a majority of 2,365. On the bench he was distinguished for his great dispatch of business, for his industry, his legal acquirements, his devotion to the public weal, his strong and even-handed dispensation of justice, and for that fearless, earnest and undeviating judicial course which comes from a clear mind, a vigorous body and an honest purpose. The period over which his discharge of official duty extended was a stormy one in the great coal county of Luzerne. After nine years and a half of service, and with another year of his term unexpired, he determined to return to the more congenial practice of the law. Accordingly, on the last day of the year 1879, his resignation, which had been previously filed with the governor, took effect. In private life he is generous and charitable, devoted to his family and his books, a faithful friend and an outspoken opponent. In fine, he is a worthy representative of those men whose stout hearts and arms made the valley of Wyoming classical ground, and whose vigor of body and mind, force of character and native integrity still bloom and flourish among their children.

"Full-hearted, and heart-full of fire and soul,
As rich in treasures of a searching mind;
The shells of beauty, where life's billows roll,
And learning's pearls, leave trace of him behind;
In whom are blent, in happy union sweet,
Genius, to shape those jewels into thought,
And wondrous skill to find expression meet;
Pouring them forth—in golden words inwrought!
A jurist ripe, entrenched in generous views,
Who scorns a flaw where justice makes it plain;
And legal truth with living warmth in hues,
With Orpheus' powers his audience to enchain,
Apollo's bow, to speed his shafts at wrong,
A great man, of a tender spirit—grandly strong!"

AUGUSTUS C. LANING (DECEASED).

The name of A. C. Laning has long been identified with the advancement of the iron and manufacturing industry of the Wyoming and Lackawanna valleys and the development and progress of Wilkes-Barre. Born in Owego, N. Y., September 30th, 1808, at the age of fourteen he made his advent in Wilkes-Barre, a place afterwards to receive the impress of his energy, his industry and his benevolence, and became an inmate of the family of his uncle, G. M. Hollenback, and an assistant in the business of his grandfather, Colonel Matthias Hollenback, of pioneer fame. At times he was sent upon important missions, the performance of which called for the exercise of that courage, perseverance and fidelity which were marked characteristics of his career, often going on horseback to Philadelphia, south, with his grandfather, and to Elmira (then Newtown), Buffalo, Niagara and other places north. He frequently carried money secured in a belt on his person to complete purchases negotiated by his grandfather. Often, before there were any canals or railroads, he went down the river to southern markets with arks laden with grain and flour. These duties were varied by assisting his uncle in the conduct of the business of the Hollenback store, and he was identified with the important business of Colonel and G. M. Hollenback until he engaged in trade on his own account.

Opening a store in Kingston Mr. Laning soon removed to Wilkes-Barre, and for a time carried on a mercantile business on the east side of the public square. His attention having been early directed to the possibilities of the iron industry in northeastern Pennsylvania, in 1833 and 1834 he erected a foundry on the west side of the public square, a stone building which was burned on the night of January 3d, 1850, where he manufactured part of the castings that went into the first rolling-mill at Scranton. The destruction of this building hastened the execution of long-formed plans for the extension of the business by Mr. Laning by the erection of large buildings on Canal street and the introduction of new and improved facilities for manufacture. Mr. Samuel R. Marshall, an experienced manufacturer from Philadelphia, was secured as foreman, and subsequently admitted to partnership by Mr. Laning, and for a number of years the firm of Laning & Marshall was one well known throughout a wide extent of country, until the business was sold to and became a branch of the Dickson Manufacturing Company of Scranton.

Mr. Laning was twice in Europe, going first in 1858 to store his mind with a knowledge of the vast iron and steel industries of England and Wales, the effects of which have since been apparent in the advancement of those interests in the Wyoming and Lackawanna valleys; and again in 1865, accompanied by his daughter, spending the winter in Vienna and traveling on the continent, remaining nearly a year. With the intricate details of the important business of which he was manager he was thoroughly familiar, and by his long experience and constant familiarity with every branch of industry he comprehended at a glance its full extent and scope.

Nearly all of the enterprises which grew up in Wilkes-Barre had in Mr. Laning an active and efficient counsellor and supporter. Careful, shrewd and energetic, every detail of his enterprises received his constant and unwearied attention, and from their cares he took little recreation until his retirement, except what was afforded by an occasional hunting and camping expedition on the mountains environing Wilkes-Barre, the love for the wildwood which he had imbibed with the rugged experiences of his youth never lessening as he advanced in life; but his last years were free from the cares of business.

Politically Mr. Laning was a good "old line Whig," but took no part in politics and never sought nor held any political office. His interest in educational and charitable objects was active rather than ostentatious. His domestic life was such as to compensate him for the harder every day life of business. He was married December 8th, 1831, to Amanda E., daughter of Dr. C. J. Christel, of Wilkes-Barre, who survives him. Four children were born to them, three of whom—Elizabeth V. (Smith), John and Amanda M. (Merritt)—are living.

Mr. Laning's death occurred May 29th, 1875. Resolutions of respect and condolence were passed by the directors of the Miners' Savings Bank, Wilkes-Barre, of which he had long been president; by the members of the Wilkes-Bridge Company, of which he had been treasurer and manager through an extended period; by the board of prison commissioners, of which body he had been a member, and by the directors of the Dickson Manufacturing Company, Scranton, and other organizations in the city and county. Commenting on his successful and useful business career, in the preamble to their resolutions, the directors of the Dickson Manufacturing Company said that Mr. Laning "was long identified prominently with the industrial interests of this region, extending over the period of an entire generation; from the day that, as the pioneer manufacturer, he sent upward the first jet of steam from the then only engine of the valley, in the little foundry on the public square at Wilkes-Barre, on through the years of wonderful progress and amazing development to the present time, when the atmosphere in our sixty miles of valley is moistened with the vapor of a thousand engines, its railroads burdened and the air made dusky by the products of innumerable mines." He was one of the few prominent men whose lives spanned the division between the old Wilkes-Barre and the Wilkes-Barre of the last decade. He had assisted in and witnessed the gradual development of those social and commercial elements which render it one of the most noteworthy inland cities of the east, and by its citizens he is held in grateful remembrance.

C. B. PRICE.

C. B. Price was born August 1st, 1819, in Bucks county, Pa., and is a son of George Price. He learned the carpenters' trade in Doylestown, and came to Wilkes-Barre in 1841 and engaged in journeyman's work for Ira Marcy and afterward for Gilbert Barnes, on Main street. Returning to Bucks county he married Mary Ann Goucher, in the fall of 1841, and brought her to Wilkes-Barre, his home since that date, where he entered business as a carpenter and undertaker, in which he continued until he erected the first planing-mill in Luzerne county and embarked in the business which is elsewhere noticed in the history of the city. He has been identified with various projects and enterprises looking to the improvement of the city and vicinity. He early adopted Whig principles; has been connected with the Republican party since its organization, and long a member of the Methodist church.

HON. W. S. ROSS.

At a meeting of the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society held on Monday evening, August 3d, 1868, at their room, Col. Hendrick B. Wright, from the committee appointed at a previous meeting, offered the following report, which was unanimously adopted, and ordered to be printed in pamphlet form and in the newspapers of the town:

William Sterling Ross was born in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., on the 11th day of August, 1802. He died on the 11th day of July, 1868, lacking just one month of being sixty-six years of age. His birth and death occurred in the same room; the southwest part of the Ross mansion—erected of oak materials, frame and clapboards, by Timothy Pickering, in the year 1787. He came into the world at an eventful and interesting period in the history of the Wyoming valley. The bitter and vindictive conflict between the Pennsylvania and Connecticut claimants, in which his father had borne so conspicuous a part, had culminated; peace had succeeded the desperate strife which at times was marked with blood. The supreme jurisdiction of Pennsylvania was established upon a firm basis, and the Connecticut settler yielded his resistance upon the confirmation of his title by the State, and general quiet prevailed throughout the Wyoming valley for the first time during the third of a century.

The settlers upon the broad banks of the Susquehanna, for thirty years previous to this, had known but few comforts. The Revolution had done its work in the depopulation of more than half its fighting men; everywhere were visible its blackened and charred monuments. The inroads, before and long after the colonial war, of the savages compelled the hardy pioneer to place sentinels around the field while he was engaged in planting and gathering his crops, and to recline upon his trusty rifle at night. He must be ready at all hours to answer the alarm of battle; to these add the troubles growing out of the angry conflicts among the Pennsylvania and Connecticut people, and it made almost a constant scene of discord and war. It was indeed the military, if not the chivalrous age of Wyoming. The tradition of these exciting events, heightened by the narration of them by the men who had passed through them, made a deep impression upon the young.

The father of the subject of our biographical notice, General William Ross, had participated in many of these scenes. Born in New London, Connecticut, in 1761, he emigrated with his father to the valley about 1775. Of too tender an age to carry a musket at "the massacre," he joined the retreating fugitives after that disastrous day, to return again to renewed scenes of anarchy and discord.

With the surrender of the sword of Cornwallis peace succeeded the Revolutionary strife, but not in Wyoming. The Indian border feud, and the question whether Pennsylvania or Connecticut should rule, still agitated the valley of Wyoming. Timothy Pickering, a New England man by birth, clothed with official power by the State, and invested with all the county offices, was sent here to pacify and heal up the local strife. It only aggravated the Connecticut settlers; they invaded his home, took him a prisoner by night and carried him away captive. He was rescued by General, then Captain, William Ross, at the head of a force of State militia, who received a serious wound in the struggle. He was rewarded by the State Executive Committee, who also presented him with a sword, upon the scabbard of which is the following inscription:

"CAPT. WM. ROSS:—The S. E. Council present this mark of their approbation acquired by your firmness in support of the laws of the Commonwealth on the 4th of July, 1788.

"C. BIDDLE, Secretary."

The mission of Mr. Pickering having ended in a failure, he was called into Washington's cabinet, and on the 9th of January, 1796, for the consideration of £2,000—Pennsylvania currency—he conveyed his real estate in this place and vicinity to William Ross. An estate at that time which changed hands for a consideration of $6,500 is worth probably to-day over $2,000,000! A progress in the increase in value which excites our wonder.

Stirring scenes were these truly which preceded the birth of the subject of our notice. As the son of a man of wealth he inherited privileges which but a few at that early period in the valley possessed. Having passed the preparatory schools, he entered and was graduated at the College of New Jersey. His inclination, however, did not lead to a learned profession. The pursuit of agriculture was his theme. In this he took great pride, and in it he excelled. He was a practical farmer—no man better understood its detail and theory—and no man produced better crops. And this was his chief occupation during a long and prosperous life, an occupation suited to his mind, and one which conduced to his happiness and enjoyment.

At an early period of his life he conceived a fancy for military affairs. It was natural that this should be; the son of a military officer, born and educated at a time when the stirring events of a long continued, eventful and successful war were the household words of a united, happy people. He entered into the subject with a will, passed through all the official grades, from that of captain of volunteers to that of brigadier. For a period of thirty years General Ross was the acknowledged head of the volunteer system of this county. In this employment and the pursuit of military knowledge he took an especial delight, and his word in military affairs was ever regarded as authority. At his drills he always wore the sword which the executive council of Pennsylvania had presented to his father as a reward of merit. And there are few of the men in this county who were interested in military matters during the last forty years that have not often seen and (those of them now living) would not recognize this sword as an old and honorable acquaintance.

As the family name becomes extinct in the death of General Ross, would it be appropriate that this blade should be treasured up with the many other interesting local relics of early times in this valley among the archives of the Historical and Geological Society? As that same society was one of the objects of his watchful care and bounty, this suggestion is one that may well be considered by those who have the care and control of his estate.

General Ross possessed a sound and discriminating mind; evinced fully in the discharge of the numerous and responsible positions with which he was intrusted by the public. And whether on the judicial bench, in the legislative hall or in the council chamber, he exhibited ever the same strong common sense view of the varied subjects which the particular place presented. His long continuance as director in the various municipal, charitable and business corporations of the town showed that the public appreciated the man, and had great confidence in his ability, judgment and integrity. He was commissioned associate judge of the courts of the county in 1830, as the successor of Han. Jesse Fell, which he retained until 1839—the time of the adoption of the amended constitution of the State. The duties of this office were discharged with much credit to himself, and the entire approbation of the bar and community at large. For a long succession of years he was a member of the borough council, and generally its presiding officer. Quite as long he was a director and general manager of the Easton and Wilkes-Barre Turnpike Company, down to 1840 the only great thoroughfare leading to the seaboard from the Susquehanna east. He was for many years a director in the Wyoming Bank, and at the time of his death the president; he was also the president of the Wyoming Insurance Company at his decease, and was also a director in the following corporations: The Wilkes-Barre Water Company, the Wilkes-Barre Bridge Company, the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society, and the Home for Friendless Children. He was also a member of the vestry of St. Stephen's Church. Probably no one of General Ross's cotemporaries had more to do with the various local associations of the town for a third of a century than he had. And he was remarkably punctual in his duties in all the labors these associations demanded and required of him.

He represented the Luzerne district in the Senate of this State during the session of 1845-6-7. The last year of his term he was the speaker of that body. He was also elected to the General Assembly for the session of 1862, and in this service his conduct and business capacity were marked with much ability and unblemished integrity. His charitable impulses were large. He ever had a generous heart and open hand. Those who appealed to him, in trouble and adversity, almost always met with a liberal response. Neither were his gifts limited or restrained; as they were the offspring of a warm and impulsive heart, so they corresponded with its noble emotion. His donations to the Home for Friendless Children, considering the character of his estate, were indeed exceedingly liberal. Those amounted, from time to time, including the bequest of his last will of $5,000, to $10,000. The helpless and dependent condition of these poor friendless children made a deep impression on his mind. It was a theme that often engaged his thoughts and his conversations, and resulted in a liberality that should impose a subject for the reflection of others, who would do well to imitate his noble and praiseworthy example. Of this institution he was the firm and steadfast friend. His memory will long be revered by the forsaken objects of that noble enterprise; and many of them who shall hereafter reach manhood, and become respectable and useful citizens, will praise the name and honor the noble virtues of their friend and benefactor.

He was a man of unbending integrity and unblemished honor. His word was his bond. He was scrupulously exact in complying with all the engagements he made. He used no subterfuge to evade a promise, and his mind was above the contemplation of a wrong. In this particular his actions and life furnish a model worthy of imitation.

It was a generous act in his life which prompted the purchase of the "Chambers collection" of coins and other curiosities, at a cost of $2,000, and the presentation of them to the "Wyoming Historical and Geological Society," of this town. It was the grand nucleus around which other contributions gathered, and which really gave the society success. It gave the institution a prestige and a name, that commended it to the friends of science everywhere. The name of its most munificent founder will live with the institution.

These random and hasty reflections may not be closed without an allusion to his firm, unwavering love of country. The blood of his ancestors had sealed the band of American independence. His birth was amid the closing scenes of the Revolution; his young mind had been elated with the rejoicings over the advent of a nation, flung into life from the ruins and fragments of one overthrown. From the lips of the same man who had produced this result he received the impression of the magnitude of the struggle and its cost. The subdued language of history had not disrobed those events of the freshness and power with which they came from the men who had achieved them. They were before him in person, and they wore the marks and scars of the campaign—the soldiers of liberty—the men of the Revolution. When, therefore, treason walked abroad in the land, and threatened the overthrow and destruction of the Federal Union, General Ross was among the first to rise up in its defence; his contributions in money were not stinted; he gave, and he gave with his accustomed liberality. He encouraged the enlistment of volunteers; he took an open and manly stand on the side of his country. And so he remained during the whole of that long and eventful strife. He lived to see treason discomfited, and the time-honored flag triumphant.

In his private character there was no duplicity; he was as you saw him—frank and open in his opinions, just and upright in all his intercourse with the world; cautious in forming a friendship, but when established it was positive and enduring.

He left a large estate to his widow and relatives. Such of it as he did not inherit, but gathered by his own industry and economy, is not tainted with the accusation that it did not come into his hands honestly. No devices, or trickery, or deception (that men sometimes dignify with the legitimate name of business) added one dollar to his fortune. It all came in a lawful and proper manner. No one can impugn the memory of General Ross by the charge that he was impoverished to augment the other's estate. The world of usury and exaction was not the world in which he lived and moved. He was rich, he was liberal. Alas, how seldom do these go hand in hand!

The death of a man thus connected with the various enterprises of his residence, its charitable and scientific associations, its municipal and local institutions, is a public loss. It is a vacancy not easily to be supplied; a link broken in the social chain that many generations may not replace; to his family a severe affliction, but to the poor and destitute, the widow and orphan, it is a loss that language can but poorly express. To such he was a friend in need, and their prayers and blessings will long, long linger above his grave.

His decease was sudden and unexpected, though he had all but reached the allotted age to man. Friends were not prepared for the event, but "We know that moons shall wane,

That summer birds, from far, shall cross the sea,
But who shall tell us when to look for death!"

H. B. W.

He was married December 1st, 1825, to Ruth T. Slocum, niece of Francis Slocum, and a descendant of a pioneer family in Wyoming valley.

THE SHOEMAKER FAMILY.

Elijah Shoemaker was born at Forty Fort on the fourth day of June, 1778. The place of his nativity is near the spacious residence erected by him and now owned and occupied by Robert C. Shoemaker, his grandson. His parents were Elijah Shoemaker and Jane McDowell, daughter of John McDowell, of Cherry Valley, Northampton (now Monroe) county, Pa. The latter emigrated from Ireland to this country in 1735, and became a warm friend to the early settlers on their way here from New England. The road, or rather path, from his house, near the Delaware river, to Wyoming was through an unbroken forest, and the timely aid rendered by McDowell saved many worn and weary families from perishing. The grandparents of Shoemaker were Benjamin and Elizabeth, daughter of Nicholas Depuy, both being among the earliest settlers in the neighborhood of Stroudsburg, Monroe county, Pa. The former was of German extraction and the latter a French Huguenot from Artois, a northern province of France. Benjamin died in 1775, leaving two sons, Elijah and Daniel, and six daughters. The children disposed of the paternal estate soon after the decease of their father. Daniel inherited his portion in the rich agricultural lands near Nichols, in the State of New York, having first married Ann, daughter of John McDowell. He lived to a good old age and died August 18th, 1836, in his eighty-fifth year, leaving a large property and a large number of children to enjoy it. His wife died December 9th, 1824, in the sixty-sixth year of her age. The daughters married and settled in the neighborhood of their brother Daniel. Some of their descendants still remain there and others removed to the west and south.

With his portion of the paternal estate Elijah purchased a right in the Susquehanna Land Company, which was organized in the State of Connecticut, and which purported to convey to him a large tract of land in Kingston township. The title to this land and the seventeen adjoining townships was disputed by claimants of title under Pennsylvania grants of the same territory. After several years of controversy between the rival claimants, which often led to fatal encounters and threatened to involve two States in war, the dispute was adjusted by a committee appointed by Congress, which gave the jurisdiction over this section of country to the State of Pennsylvania, and the land to the owners of rights conveyed by the Susquehanna Land Company, subject to a small price per acre to compensate the Pennsylvania claimants. During the pendency of these disputes over the right of possession between the rival claimants Shoemaker built his unpretentious habitation, cleared the land, sowed, planted and provided as best he could for the support of his little family. At the battle of Wyoming he acted as lieutenant in the little band of patriots, and was among the slain. His body was recovered and now lies in the family burying ground at Forty Fort.

The unfortunate issue of this engagement left Elijah Shoemaker, then an infant, and his widowed mother with scanty means of subsistence, everything in their little home having been carried off or destroyed by the enemy. The mother was a woman of great energy and equal to the emergency. It is scarcely possible to appreciate the trials and hardships endured by the people in those early days. It is some consolation, however, to realize that the adverse circumstances surrounding them were such as to produce a race of hardy, independent and self-reliant people. Trained under such influences Elijah Shoemaker reached the age of manhood, supporting himself and mother by his industry. In May, 1806, he married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Col. Nathan Denison. This proved a fortunate and happy marriage. She was a lady of refined intellect, and known in the community for her kindness and benevolence to the poor. Her father's children, like their father, Col. Denison, have a conspicuous place in the history of the valley. Her brother George Denison was a distinguished lawyer among such competitors as Judges Gibson, Conyngham, Bowman and Mallery, and was elected to the State Legislature for several sessions, and to the Congress of the United States for two terms. He took a high rank in both positions. Her nephew Charles Denison was also an able lawyer, and elected to Congress for three terms. The children of her sister Mary Patterson are all noted for their integrity of character and success in business. Her brother John moved to Ohio at an early day and left a large family in affluent circumstances, who are distinguished for the same characteristics. Her only surviving sister, Mrs. Sarah Abbot, though at the advanced age of eighty-seven years, is still remarkable for her strong common sense and dignity of character.

The chief occupation of Mr. Shoemaker was improving his large farm. Its successful management required the exercise of both judgment and industry. The dwelling house he built in place of the log house of primitive times is still considered a model of taste and convenience. In 1814 he was elected sheriff of the county of Luzerne, and he is said to have performed the duties of the position with great satisfaction to the people. At that time the settlers were poor and many of them burdened with debt. By his leniency in the performance of his duty, and by his own individual aid, many were enabled to save their homes. He was a strong man physically and intellectually, and was brave and fearless in time of danger. His education was limited, being only such as could be acquired at the country school-house; yet he had sufficient culture and learning to make him a good and useful citizen and an honest man of the olden time. In July, 1823, he was seized with a fever, which caused his death after a few days' sickness, in the fifty-first year of his age. He left a fine estate, still occupied by his descendants, and a family of nine children—six sons and three daughters. His widow survived him two years. They both sleep in the beautiful cemetery at Forty Fort, near the place which knew them so well in life and which is fragrant to their posterity with sweet memories of the past.

The eldest son, Charles D., was educated at Yale College, graduating in the class of 1825. The same year he was appointed by the governor of Pennsylvania prothonotary and register and recorder for the county of Luzerne. He held these offices for several years and was afterwards appointed associate judge. He held other public trusts, all the duties of which he performed with signal ability. The latter part of his life was passed on his farm at the old homestead in Kingston, in the midst of a loving family, and in dispensing a generous hospitality. He died in 1861, leaving four sons, all of whom are worthy and successful business men. One graduated at Yale College in 1835 and another at the West Point Military Academy in the class of 1863, and the other two were officers in the Union army in the war of the Rebellion.

Of the other four sons of Elijah Shoemaker three, Elijah, George and Nathan, are deceased; each one leaving an enviable record for industry and integrity, and a competency for his family. The only son of the former was educated at Lafayette College, Pennsylvania, and devotes himself to the management of his father's estate. The eldest son of George Shoemaker was admitted to the practice of law, but preferred to devote himself to farming and general business pursuits.

Robert resides at Forty Fort on his share of the parental estate, and enjoys the confidence and good will of the neighborhood.

The youngest son, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, graduated at Yale College in the class of 1840, and is now practicing law in Wilkes-Barre. In 1866 he was elected to the State senate for the term of three years, and was afterward elected a member of Congress for two successive terms. In 1848 he married Esther W. Wadhams, daughter of Samuel Wadhams, of Plymouth, Pa., and he has one son and five daughters living. The son is a student at Yale College, and the eldest daughter, Clarinda W., is married to Irving A. Stearns, civil and mining engineer.

The eldest of the three daughters of Elijah Shoemaker, Elizabeth, widow of Dr. Spence, resides with her children in Wilkes-Barre, beloved by a large circle of friends and relatives. Of the two remaining daughters, Jane, wife of Judge Passmore, died in Rome, Bradford county, Pa., October 15th, 1883, a noble and pure minded woman. The youngest daughter, Caroline, married Dr. L. Ives, a distinguished physician, and resides in the city of New Haven, Conn.

HON. SAMUEL G. TURNER (DECEASED).

The name of Turner has been familiar to residents of the valley from an early date. The first of the name who located in Wyoming was John Turner, who came about 1780 to Plymouth from near Hackettstown, N. J., and died of an epidemic in 1803. Four sons survived him, Emanuel, Daniel, John and Jonah. Emanuel settled in Huntington, Daniel in Kingston, Jonah at Hope, N. J., and John remained upon the homestead in Plymouth, where he was born in 1789. He was public spirited and progressive and a friend of education, at times paying more than liberally toward the support of schools in Plymouth, and succeeded after considerable trouble and against much opposition in introducing the study of the dead languages into the school course.

He died July 3d, 1871, greatly regretted by a wide circle of friends and acquaintances.

To those acquainted with the characteristics and aims of John Turner it is no matter for wonder that his second son, Hon. Samuel G. Turner, deceased, should have been a man of progressive ideas, of energy and integrity, and eminently fitted to stand as a representative man of the valley. Born in Plymouth in March, 1819, he grew to manhood there, laying surely the foundations of a successful career by the acquirement of an education and habits of industry and application which brought to him their own legitimate reward. He had no wealthy kinsmen to prosper him with power and patronage in the early struggles of life. Hard work, good habits, business talents, strict integrity and rigid economy brought him an ample fortune; and while among the wealthiest he was at the same time one of the self-made men in the valley. At a suitable age he embarked in business life as a merchant and coal dealer in Plymouth, subsequently removing to Shickshinny to assume the duties of president of the Shickshinny Coal and Iron Company; thence to Wilkes-Barre a few years prior to his death. He attained considerable political prominence and was honored on several occasions by election as representative of his district in the Pennsylvania legislature. He was a candidate for the lower house in 1854, but was defeated. He ran again in 1857 and was elected. During that session of the Legislature he was chairman of the committee of canal commissioners and reported favoring the abolishment of the office of such commissioners. The next year he was a candidate again but was defeated. In 1868 he received the nomination of the Democratic convention for State senator and was elected by the people, serving his term with credit to himself and his constituents. It was chiefly through his instrumentality that the mine ventilation bill was passed, of which he is said to have been the author. Concerning Mr. Turner's political career, Hon. Hendrick B. Wright has written: "In his capacity of legislator there attaches not the least suspicion of a want of fidelity." This testimony in the times in which we are writing is eminently deserving of notice.

Mr. Turner was married June 6th, 1855, to Miss E. G. Dietrick, born in Salem, Columbia county, Pa., April 21st, 1841, and who survives him with their children, three in number. As a neighbor he was eulogized most highly, and it is said he was a devoted husband and the tenderest of parents. Just prior to his death he was not actively engaged in business, but he was interested in and aided with his means and influence several important enterprises, and he was a director of the Plymouth Savings Bank, an institution founded chiefly by his earnest endeavors. He was a member and communicant of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church, Wilkes-Barre, toward the support of which, as well as to all religious, charitable and educational objects, he was a liberal contributor. His death occurred December 20th, 1872, after an illness of only a few days. His funeral was solemnized from his residence, on Washington street, Revs. Snowden and Williamson officiating, and Messrs. E. L. Dana, E. C. Wadhams, F. J. Leavenwerth, John J. Sheak, F. Reynolds and Ira Davenport acting as pall bearers, and Peter Pursel directing the order of ceremonies. It was largely attended, and a long procession of carriages and sleighs accompanied the remains to Hollenbeck cemetery.

At the time of his death Mr. Turner was physically so strong and robust as to appear to have scarcely reached the prime of life. Possessed of an extraordinary degree of intelligence, honor, energy and good judgment, he was one of the most successful business men in the city, and his prospects of a future successful commercial and political career were very brilliant.

HENRY M. HOYT
Governor of Pennsylvania

J. PRYOR WILLIAMSON (DECEASED).

J. Pryor Williamson was born in Baltimore, Md., December 3d, 1830, and was a grandnephew of Thomas Wilson, for many years president of the old Baltimore Coal Company, of Wilkes-Barre, and was for several years in business with the latter. He came to Wilkes-Barre in 1862, and became a partner in the business connected with the Baltimore store. Subsequently the firm opened a banking house on the public square, near South Main street. This enterprise was merged in the Wilkes-Barre Deposit and Savings Bank, and Mr. Williamson was made cashier—an office which he resigned in July, 1878, but remained a director until his death. October 7th, 1869, he married Miss Mary H., youngest daughter of the late Hon. G. W. Woodward. He was a valuable member and vestryman of St. Stephen's church, and for several years superintendent of Calvary Mission Sunday-school. He was a member of Coeur de Lion commandery, Knights Templar, of Scranton, and past master of Landmark Lodge F. and A. M., of Wilkes-Barre. An earnest and enthusiastic friend of the fire department of Wilkes-Barre, he was connected with it during his residence in the city, and at the time of his death was foreman of Hose Company No. 2. He was secretary and a member of the board of trustees of the Home for the Friendless, and for many years secretary and treasurer of the Wyoming Valley Ice Company, and was interested in all public enterprises looking to the advancement of the prosperity of the city. Politically he was a Democrat and was active in politics. His courteous manner, kindly disposition and warm heart won him hosts of friends, who sincerely mourn his death, which occurred October 24th, 1879.

GOVERNOR HENRY M. HOYT.

Ziba Hoyt, the father of the subject of this sketch and son of Daniel and Anne Hoyt, was born September 8th, 1788, at Danbury, Connecticut. In 1794 the family moved to Kingston, Luzerne county, Pennsylvania. In the war of 1812 Ziba Hoyt was first lieutenant of artillery, and was on duty at Lake Erie. He served fifteen months in Colonel Hill's regiment of Pennsylvania militia, the "Wyoming Volunteers." January 23d, 1815, he was married to Nancy Hurlbut.

They had four children—Anne, who married Rev. Mr. Corss, John D., Henry M., and Elizabeth, who married Abram Nesbitt.

Deacon Ziba Hoyt, as he was always called, was a man of unusual abilities. He was of large frame, strong mind, wide acquaintance, great influence and of the utmost purity and integrity of character. He was a leading Presbyterian. At the time of his death, December 23d, 1853, he was as well known and thoroughly respected as any man in the Wyoming valley.

Henry Martyn Hoyt was born June 8th, 1830, in Kingston. He remained at home until 1844, when he entered the Wyoming Seminary, then just opened by Rev. Dr. Reuben Nelson, where he prepared for college. The following year he entered Williams College, and graduated in 1849. In 1850 he went away and opened a school, which he conducted a year, when he returned to Kingston, having been elected professor of mathematics in the Wyoming Seminary, which position he held two years. Subsequently he became a student at law in the office of the Hon. George W. Woodward. In 1853 he went to Memphis, and there taught the graded school until recalled to Pennsylvania by the death of his father. He then returned to the study of law, this time in the office of Hon. Warren J. Woodward, with whom he remained until the election of Judge Woodward to the bench.

September 25th, 1855, he married Mary E. Lovcland, of Kingston. In 1856 he began the practice of his profession. He devoted himself both to the study and practice of law assiduously and laboriously, and almost immediately secured a large and lucrative practice.

He took part in the Fremont campaign in 1856, and in 1861 was active in raising the 52nd regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers. He was commissioned lieutenant colonel by Governor Curtin. His regiment was in the brigade of General Negley, and participated in the Peninsula campaign of 1862.

Early in the winter of 1863 the brigade, then under General W. W. H. Davis, was sent to the department of the south to co-operate in the naval attack on Fort Sumter. It participated under General Gilmore in the siege operations conducted on Morris Island against Fort Wagner and Fort Sumter. During the summer of 1864 a night attack was organized by General Foster against Fort Johnson, in Charleston harbor. It was made in boats across the harbor. The five boat loads of men, commanded by General Hoyt, pushed forward and succeeded in reaching and entering the fort; but the reinforcements did not arrive, and General Hoyt's party became prisoners of war. They were first confined at Macon, and then brought to Charleston jail, so that they might be under fire from Morris Island. While en route from Macon to Charleston General Hoyt, with four other officers, escaped from the cars. After several days and nights of wearisome but fruitless efforts for liberty they were recaptured by the rebels with the aid of bloodhounds. Upon being exchanged General Hoyt rejoined his regiment, and remained with it until the close of the war. He then returned to Wilkes-Barre and resumed the practice of his profession.

During the year 1867 he fulfilled the duties of additional law judge of his judicial district, under appointment by Governor Geary. His record on the bench was of the first order. He was able, fearless, faithful and dignified. He was for years a member of the school board, and was largely instrumental in the reorganization and improvement of the public schools of Wilkes-Barre, making them second to none in the State. He was attorney for many of the large mining and railroad corporations, as well as numerous individuals. His reputation as a lawyer was second to none. His legal knowledge was not only broad and comprehensive but accurate to the slightest detail. His arguments were concise, logical and philosophical—too much so perhaps for success before juries, but of the utmost value and importance in legal discussions before the courts. He was truly learned in the law. As a counselor he was pre-eminently valuable. His advice was sought after by his brethren at the bar in important and critical emergencies, and when given all who knew him knew it might be relied upon. His knowledge of the fundamental principles of the law was so thorough that the greatest respect was always expressed by lawyers for even an "off hand" opinion on matters under discussion at the various meetings of the members of the bar. But his education and study were by no means confined to legal matters. Mathematics in its highest branches was his favorite pursuit, while history, philosophy, science, theology and general literature were alike studied with great zeal and relish and all contributed abundantly to enrich a mind well capable of enjoying their most hidden treasures.

The training which Governor Hoyt received in early life, as farmer boy, as scholar and as teacher, always within the influence of his father's example, taught him at least the value of thoroughness and accuracy in whatever is undertaken. And it may well be stated as characteristic of the man that to whatever subject he has given his attention he has spared no effort to reach the very marrow of it and understand it in all its details. His library is large and extends over a very broad field of literature.

In 1875 he became chairman of the Republican State committee and he conducted the campaigns of that and the succeeding year with success. May 15th, 1878, he was nominated by the Republican party for the position of governor of the State of Pennsylvania. It was at the time of the greatest excitement in the State on the question of the resumption of specie payments. Many believed that no one could be elected on an unqualified hard money campaign; but Hoyt, scorning all subtleties, sounded the key note of the campaign in his first address by declaring:—"Professing to be an honest man, and the candidate of an honest party, I believe in honest money." He was elected by a very large plurality and was inaugurated January 14th, 1879. His term is for four years, he being the first governor who in pursuance of the new constitution of 1879 serves for that term. The oath of office was administered to him by Hon. Warren J. Woodward, his former instructor and then a judge of the Supreme Court of the State. Subsequently to his election Governor Hoyt wrote for the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, "Brief of a title in the seventeen townships in the county of Luzerne; a syllabus of the controversy between Connecticut and Pennsylvania. Printed by Lane S. Hart, Harrisburg, Pa., 1879."

He is now the most highly educated and ablest man in political life in Pennsylvania. Being positive by nature in all the habits of his mind, he is naturally positive in his political views; but in all political discussion he has shown that this positiveness is not a result of partisan bitterness but a conclusion from a thorough and careful study of the constitution and history of his country.

COLONEL WASHINGTON LEE.

Washington Lee was born in the city of Harrisburg, Pa., June 18th, 1786. His father, Andrew Lee, captain of dragoons in the army of the Revolution and one of the band celebrated in Pennsylvania history as "the Paxtang Boys," had served his country with some distinction under General Sullivan, and had even been permitted to see the interior of one of the British prison hulks in New York harbor, famous then as now as "floating hells." The captain survived the horrors which were fatal to so many of his comrades, and being finally exchanged hastened home to Paxtang, Dauphin county, Pa., to recruit his shattered health. Before the close of the year, however, Cornwallis had surrendered. Great Britain saw the futility of her efforts to retain these colonies, and finally, September 3d, 1783, signed with her late rebellious subjects a definitive treaty of peace. With this conclusion Captain Andrew found his occupation gone, and taking unto himself a wife, in the person of Mrs. Priscilla Stewart, the widow of James Stewart, he moved to Harrisburg, purchased a well known inn there, and prepared to entertain the traveling public. In this house were born Washington, his brother James S. and his sister Priscilla. James, in after years, moved to Hanover township, Luzerne county, about six miles from Wilkes-Barre, where still remain some of his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. Priscilla, the sister, died at her brother's house in Hanover, at the age of nineteen, unmarried. Washington, after attending school in Harrisburg, March 20th, 1803, entered the law office of Mr. Fisher, a prominent practitioner of that place, and March 3d, 1806, was duly admitted to practice law in the courts of Dauphin county. He had determined, however, that a mil-

tary career would be more to his taste, and he early sought the influence of his friends to aid him in gaining a position in the army. A staunch friend of his father, Hon. John Joseph Henry, was then presiding on the bench of Dauphin county, and from him he readily secured a commendatory letter to Henry Dearborn, the Secretary of War. By the same influence he also enlisted Hon. A. Gregg, senator from Pennsylvania, in his service, and May 3d, 1808, he rejoiced in the receipt of his commission as second lieutenant in the army of the United States, and a letter from the war department ordering him to report at the rendezvous at Lancaster. In compliance with this order he hastened to his post, and immediately entered upon the performance of his duties. From this date until that of his retirement from the service, eight years later, his career was one unbroken series of successes. He was commissioned first lieutenant of the fifth regiment of infantry April 1st, 1811. He had already served as judge advocate of the southern army under General Wade Hampton since February 19th, 1810, and continued so to act until appointed assistant adjutant general June 24th, 1812. July 23d following he was commissioned captain of the eleventh infantry and March 3d, 1813, received his majority. In June of this year he was appointed deputy paymaster general of the United States forces, and he received his commission as lieutenant colonel of the eleventh infantry January 1st, 1815. May 3d, 1816, Colonel Lee withdrew from the military service and June 16th, 1817, he married Miss Elizabeth Campbell, the daughter of an Episcopal minister, of Carlisle, Pa. The young couple immediately removed to Nanticoke, Luzerne county, where Colonel Lee had purchased a farm of about one thousand acres. Here, in a comfortable mansion erected on the east bank of the Susquehanna, at the very foot of the valley of Wyoming, they began, passed and ended a half a century of wedded life. In December, 1867, just fifty years from the date of her first acquaintance with the old homestead, Mrs. Lee died, childless. Her husband, full of years and feeble in health, bore with his loneliness until May, 1869, when, at the urgent solicitation of his friends, he removed to Wilkes-Barre. Here two years later, September 10th, 1871, ready and willing, he peacefully breathed his last. His remains now rest beneath a simple shaft of granite in the churchyard of Hanover Green. Standing by his grave on the hill slope one can see with wonderful distinctness the old mansion four miles away, and at its feet the river, never changing. All else of the old land marks have disappeared, swallowed up in huge culm piles, or blackened beyond recognition with the dust of half a dozen collieries. Miners' houses crowd each other up to the very gateway of the humstead and even the old rope ferry has given place to a long, rambling covered bridge.

In person Colonel Lee was tall and of dignified presence. His gentle manners and courtly bearing greatly endeared him to all who possessed his acquaintance. His habits were of the strictest simplicity. His mind had always been of a studious character, and in the later years of his life he found refuge from his isolation in his acquaintance with the philosophy and classics of the ancients. He was the impersonation of integrity and rectitude. He preserved his faculties to the very end, and with the utmost composure saw the approach of that messenger from whose coming old and young alike shrink with dread.

W. L. P.

ANDREW LEE.

Andrew Lee was born on the 31st day of January, 1815, at the homestead of his grandfather, Captain Andrew Lee, situate on the east bank of the Susquehanna river, at the mouth of Nanticoke creek, about two miles above the present borough of Nanticoke, Luzerne county, Pa. He was the eldest of the seven children of James Stewart Lee and Martha Campbell. His life has been spent in the immediate neighborhood of his birthplace. He early became engaged in the operation of the coal mines on the property of Colonel Washington Lee, and subsequently became interested in the mercantile business in Nanticoke. In 1872 he retired from an active business life and removed to Wilkes-Barre. In 1853, on the 23d day of January, he married Sarah Jane Buckhout, by whom he has had three children, James Stewart, William Washington and Minnie. Mr. Lee still enjoys vigorous health notwithstanding his years. His elegant home on the corner of River and Hanover streets is one of the handsomest residences in Wilkes-Barre, and is marked with every evidence of a cultured taste.

Aside from those sketched in the foregoing biographies the following may be mentioned as among the well-known citizens of Wilkes-Barre:

TOWNSHIP AND BOROUGH HISTORIES,

LUZERNE COUNTY.

BEAR CREEK TOWNSHIP.

THIS township was taken from Denison, April 7th, 1856, and named after a stream which rises in the northeast part and flows in a most picturesque channel through the township.

The land is not adapted to agriculture, and is uncultivated. The surface is mountainous, Bald mountain, near the north border, rising 1,825 feet above the level of the Lehigh, and the Wyoming mountain, just west of Bald, showing an altitude of 1,550 feet.

The Wilkes-Barre and Easton road crosses near the center of the township, from northwest to southeast, and where it crosses the creek there is a hamlet of half a dozen houses.

The principal productions of the township are hemlock logs and game, the supply of which is annually diminishing.

Eight votes were polled in this township at the fall election of 1879.

Stiles Williams was elected and commissioned justice of the peace for Bear Creek May 26th, 1856.

BLACK CREEK TOWNSHIP.

THIS township was taken from Sugarloaf, August 8th, 1848. It derives its name from a creek which flows through it.

In 1806 Barney Huntsinger, who was surveying this then wilderness, took as his pay the land where Christian Benninger now lives, near Mountain Grove railroad station. Martin Rittenhouse located in 1810 where his grandson Joseph Rittenhouse now lives, and the Shelhamer family soon after, farther down the stream, and over on the Nescopeck, in the northeastern part of the town.

The old Indian trail from the Lehigh to the Susquehanna ran down the west bank of the creek. On the farms now owned by the Smiths, a little below Rittenhouse's mills, is a good spring, and here was one of the favorite camping grounds of the Indians. Their paths are still to be seen along the banks of the creek.

The first grist and saw-mills were built in 1810, by William Rittenhouse, on the farm now owned by Joseph Rittenhouse. The grist-mill had but one run of stones. There is a saw-mill on the site of the old one. The stone used in the grist-mill for grinding was brought from Reading, Pa., and now lies between the gate posts in front of William Rittenhouse's residence. The first frame houses were built by Martin Rittenhouse and Philip Shelhamer soon after the saw-mill was put in operation.

Rittenhouse's old log house was converted into the first school-house in the township as soon as he moved into his frame house; and the first teacher was a Mr. Tripp. The old log house was soon burned, and the school was then kept near where the brown church now stands. The surviving pupils of the school are Amos Rittenhouse; William Wolf, Nancy A. Rittenhouse and Sylvester Shelhamer.

The first brick houses were built by David Shelhamer and Stephen Turnbach in 1850, Mr. Shelhamer making the brick upon his own farm in the northeastern part of the township. The first postmaster was Amos Rittenhouse. He was appointed in 1856, and kept the office in the house just east of where he now lives. The mails were received once a week from Conyngham, and Joseph Rittenhouse was the first mail carrier. The office was removed to Stephen Turnbach's, and in 1872 to the railroad station at Rock Glen, or Falls Run City, the railroad station being known by the former and the post-office by the latter name.

The first town meeting was held at the house of Elias Smith, a few rods east of Rittenhouse's mill.

In 1820 there was a distillery on the farm now owned by C. Benninger, built by Huntsinger. It has now gone to decay. The first blacksmith shop in this end of the valley was John Barnes's, who was among the first settlers. He lived where Mrs. J. I. Pegg now lives. The first store in this township was kept by Daniel Stiles, where Stephen Turnbach now lives. There was also a store where D. Shelhamer lives. The first tavern was about a quarter of a mile west of where the Rittenhouse mill now stands, and was kept by George Klinger. The place is now owned by the heirs of Michael Smith. The first tannery was a small concern on the farm now owned by P. Swoyer, opposite the mouth of Scotch Run creek. The first death in the township was that of Mrs. John Kittner, a daughter of Huntsinger. She died in 1818, and was buried in the old graveyard near the Lutheran church.

PRESENT BUSINESS CENTERS.

Falls Run City has a store, two taverns, a cabinet shop and 15 dwellings.

Rock Glen is a few rods above Falls Run on the same side of the creek. There is a railroad station and a post-office, with George Fry postmaster. He was appointed in 1870 or 1871.

Mountain Grove, formerly Wolfton, lies on the eastern border of the township. Here are the Mountain Grove camp grounds, German Reformed church, a hotel, a school-house, railroad station and post-office. George Claas is postmaster; he was appointed in 1875.

The hamlet of Rittenhouse Mill, on Black creek near the center of the township, consists of a grist-mill, a saw-mill, a tannery run by steam, built in 1847 by James Pegg, now owned by Samuel Rouse, and several dwellings.

At Gowen, a station on the D. H. & W. Railroad, are a coal mine and breaker, a store, a post-office and about 20 dwellings.

CHURCHES OF BLACK CREEK.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

This society was formed as early as 1810, at the house of John Barnes, where Mrs. J. I. Pegg now lives, half a mile west of Amos Rittenhouse's grist-mill. Methodism at that time in which is now Black Creek was quite a novelty. The first preacher to wend his way thither was the Rev. Christian Bowman, a Methodist itinerant. He came by way of the Nescopeck mountains, and made his visits once in four weeks. That none might mistake the time of his coming, he heralded his approach when on the top of the Nescopeck mountains by blowing a tin horn, whereupon the people gathered at the house of John Barnes, or that of Isaac Shelhamer. The first members of the class were: John Barnes, Isaac Shelhamer, John Wolf, Andrew A. Wood and a Mrs. Jackson; with John Barnes as leader.

Meetings were held in houses and barns until 1831 or 1832, when a church and school-house combined was built where the Roberts school-house stands. Here the society worshiped until 1861, when the present church, standing across the road from the old one, was built, costing about $1,400. It is thirty-two by forty-four feet, of wood, and was dedicated the first Sunday in November, 1861, by Rev. G. H. Day, the pastor.

This part of the Conyngham charge formerly belonged to the old Sunbury circuit, together with Northumberland county, Carbon, parts of Luzerne and Wyoming, and the whole of Schuylkill and Columbia counties. Among the early preachers were Rev. Messrs. Christian Bowman, Cook, Steele, John Rhodes, E. McCollum, Joseph Lee, Bergstresser, Shepherd, Dolls, Charles Colfus and Thomas Bowman. Thomas T. Hill preached in 1833; James H. Brown, James Clark, G. H. Day and — Wells in 1842; J. Ross and Thomas McClure in 1843; — Consor and — Barnhard in 1844. The pastors in more recent years have been as follows: G. H. Day, in 1861; B. P. King, 1862; Josiah Forrest and J. C. Hagey, 1864; James F. Porter, 1866; Henry S. Mendenhall, 1867; James B. Creddy, C. S. Bencottan, and Pemberton Bird, 1868; A. S. Bowman and N. W. Colburn, 1870; J. Farran Brown and J. B. Moore, 1873. In 1874 J. Horning came in place of Mr. Moore. At this time the Jeansville circuit was divided, leaving the townships of Butler, Sugarloaf and Black Creek in one charge. In 1875 Rev. J. Stiner was stationed here, and in 1877 G. M. Larned, the present pastor. The present membership is 70. Stephen Turnbach is class leader. The present value of the church property is $1,500. The trustees are Stephen Turnbach, Peter Roberts, Perry Boone, W. G. Gregory, David Shelhamer, Martin Basbuscheck, John A. Wagner and D. W. Lauer. The Sunday-school was organized in 1834, with 30 scholars, and Uzel O. Barnes as superintendent. The present superintendent is W. G. Gregory. The total number of scholars is 115; average attendance 80.

MOUNTAIN GROVE CAMP MEETING ASSOCIATION.

June 20th, 1872, at a meeting of Methodist ministers and laymen, held in Bloomsburg, Columbia county, G. M. Shoop, of Danville, reported that he had secured about twenty-eight acres of land at Mountain Grove station, on the Danville, Hazleton and Wilkes-Barre railroad, which he would transfer to a camp meeting association should such an organization be effected. The following were appointed an executive committee to make the necessary arrangements for the camp meeting: Rev. S. Barnes, P. E., chairman; Rev. S. Creighton, Rev. B. P. King, Rev. E. T. Swartz, G. M. Shoop, M. Hartman, H. E. Sutherland (first secretary), J. W. Clever, J. W. Eyer.

Under the supervision of this committee the first camp-meeting was held, on the grounds of G. M. Shoop, at Mountain Grove, August 14th, 1872.

August 19th, 1872, at a meeting of the executive committee and friends of the enterprise, it was resolved to organize a joint stock company to buy the grounds and improvements already made for the purpose of making the institution permanent.

The first annual meeting of the stockholders of the association was held on the camp ground August 19th, 1873. The following managers were elected for the ensuing year: M. W. Jackson, Rev. S. Barnes, Rev. S. Creighton, S. Turnbach, N. P. John, Rev. B. P. King, B. G. Welsh, Joseph Smith, A. J. Amerman, E. M. Warden and G. M. Shoop.

On the same day the board of managers met and elected the following officers for the ensuing year: President, Rev. S. Barnes; vice-president, E. M. Warden; secretary, G. M. Shoop; treasurer, N. P. John.

The amount of the capital stock has since been increased to $14,000, and the association has bought three acres more of ground, and improvements consisting of hotel and other buildings, and enclosed the grounds with fence. Last year the gates were closed on the Sabbath.

The present board of managers consists of G. M. Shoop, Rev. B. P. King, C. C. Sharpless, Loyd Sharpless, J. C. Brown, E. W. M. Low, M. W. Jackson, N. H. Sutherland, S. Turnbach, Rev. S. Creighton and Cyrus Straw. Officers—G. M. Shoop, president; E. W. M. Low, vice-president; C. C. Sharpless, treasurer, and Cyrus Straw, secretary.

FRIEDEN'S LUTHERAN AND GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH, located near the Mountain Grove railroad station was built in 1830; the land, one and a half acres, was donated by Mr. Huntsinger. The two congregations continue to occupy it alternately. The present Lutheran minister is Rev. J. H. Neiman, and there are 100 members in his charge. The German Reformed minister is Rev. John M. Clemens. The church property is valued at $1,000.

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH.

The church edifice of this society was built in 1854, and is locally known as the "brown church," from the fact of its not being painted. It is half a mile west of Black creek, near the Nungesser school-house, on the road to Mountain Grove. The church property is valued at $1,000. Rev. J. Wagner, of Hazleton, is the present pastor. The present membership is 22.

GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH.

This church is located in the northeast corner of the township, and known as the "Shelhamer Church," from its being near David Shelhamer's house. Rev. J. M. Clemens, of Conyngham, is the present pastor. The value of the church property is $1,200.

ALBRIGHT CHURCH.

The society known as "Albrights" is nearly or quite extinct in this township. About 1854 it built a church near the German Reformed, and the building is still standing.

MINING INTERESTS OF BLACK CREEK.

The West Lehigh coal mine is located at Gowen, on the southwest line of the township, and partly in Schuylkill county, and is owned by the West Buck Mountain Coal Company, and operated by Lewis Rothermel, with John T. Evans as superintendent. There are two engines, with a total of 80 horse power. There are 64 men and boys employed under ground and 24 on the surface. The coal mined during the year 1878 amounted to about 11,000 tons.

The Stanton mine, at the same point, is owned by Anspach, Stanton & Weightman, and operated by I. Martial Stout, with I. M. Stout as superintendent. This is a chute.

The Conyngham coal mine was originally in Sugarloaf, but is now in Black Creek, on the north bank of Black creek, on a tract of land surveyed in 1873 to John McGowan. It never belonged to the Conyngham family. The tract was taken up by warrant in the name of J. McGowan by Tench Coxe, Esq. (grandfather of Coxe Bros. of Drifton), among other lands. Subsequently through tax sales and division, or the adjusting of the line between Northumberland and Luzerne counties, the Deringer family also claimed title to the same land. To avoid an endless litigation the Coxe and Deringer titles were thrown together, and now Coxe Bros. & Co., of Drifton, have the land under lease, and are proving the coal with a view of putting up works. The first coal was mined there by the Conyngham family while residing in the valley; hence the name. According to the best information the coal must have been opened about 1820, and a load taken away occasionally over the rough mountain.

JUSTICES.

Justices of the peace have been elected for the township as follows:

William Wolf, 1849, 1856, 1862; James T. Pegg, 1849; Josiah Thomas, 1854; Henry B. Bowman, 1855; Henry Croll, 1866; Stephen Turnbach, 1868, 1873, 1878; M. L. Hutchins, 1872, 1877.

BUCK TOWNSHIP.

THIS township was formed from Covington in 1833, and named in honor of Samuel Buck, one of the pioneer settlers. Upon the formation of Lackawanna county in August, 1878, this township was divided, making the east boundary line to run from the mouth of Choke creek up that creek to a point in range with the easterly line of Bear Creek township, and thence to the southeast corner of the latter township.

The surface of Buck is very mountainous, excepting that portion known as the great swamp, or Shades of Death, which lies between the mountains near the center of the township.

The following have been the justices for Buck, together with the years of their election: Thomas Tattershall, 1840; Elwood Buckman, 1848; Temple Hinds, 1854, 1859; Adam S. Edinger, 1858; S. M. Edwards, 1861; G. W. Williamson, 1867; J. S. Bachman, 1869.

STODDARDSVILLE.

The pioner store here was kept by John Stoddard, who also kept the first tavern, built a grist-mill as early as 1816 and a saw-mill ten years before, and had a blacksmith shop, wagon shop and cooper shop. Mr. Stoddard and Thomas Arnott owned the site of the village. Here there are about 75 inhabitants, a Methodist Episcopal church, a store and a post-office.

From 1835 to 1860 much business was done here. Large quantities of logs and lumber were sent down the Lehigh from this point. Here, too, the Easton and Wilkes-Barre turnpike of long ago crossed the Lehigh. During the great freshet of 1865, that swept nearly all of the old canal works out of the Lehigh, the business interests of this place suffered fatally.

Stoddardsville, the only village in the township, was settled by John Stoddard, of Philadelphia, John Nagle and John Simpson. Henry Drinker and his sons, Henry W. and Richard, made it their headquarters during the early surveys of their territory around the head waters of the Lehigh. From this point Mr. Drinker caused to be made the road up the Lehigh to his possessions twelve miles east. From this point also he went up the Lehigh in a canoe, employing axemen to clear the way where the trees had fallen across the stream and accumulated driftwood.

Stoddardsville M. E. Church.—As early as 1818 or 1819 the itinerant found his way to Stoddardsville and formed a society, and a church was built about 1820. Gilbert Barnes was a member of the Stoddardsville class, which was connected with the Wilkes-Barre church, and as sexton would walk over the mountains on Sunday mornings and have the church in readiness for services at the morning hour.

The preachers have been Revs. George Peck, Grace, Millard, Potts, Flannery, Quigerly, Cox, Sistray, Collo-way, George Brown, Mayer, Illman, William Morse, G. L. Staples, Joshua Lewis, two years; Baldwin, one; John F. Staples, one; J. G. Eckman, two; William Ware, one; S. F. Wright, two; Marlsbury, one; J. C. Leacock, two; J. D. Woodruff, one; D. Larish, two; Paddock, three; P. M. Mott, three; P. Houck, two; and Rev. R. C. Gill, who is closing his third year on this charge.

The membership is thirteen; value of church property $600.

The first Sunday-school superintendent was Louis Stull, sen., and the present superintendent is Robert Stull.

BUTLER TOWNSHIP.

THIS township was taken from Sugarloaf at the August sessions of 1839. Part was annexed to Hazle November 30th, 1861.

Upon the banks of the streams have been and are still quite a number of mills and manufacturing establishments, while many have gone to decay.

Mr. Samuel Benner, of Conyngham, writes us as follows in regard to a tree in this township which constitutes a noteworthy natural curiosity: "The tree is a white oak with a rock oak limb; is nearly nine feet in circumference about two feet from the ground. The limb starts about fifteen feet from the ground, and is nearly the size of the main tree. The tree stands in a field west of the main road leading from Hazleton to Drum's, near the foot of Buck mountain and about fifty-five yards from the road. Some suppose an acorn to have dropped into a rotten spot of the tree, sprouted and formed the limb; but I have it directly from Daniel Grosz (dead a number of years), who cleared the land nearly fifty years ago, that the rock oak tree had leaned against the white oak and formed the connection, and that when he chopped off the rock oak near the ground he found it so much decayed and burnt near the junction with the white oak that it broke off there, and the upper part remained attached to the white oak, where it can be seen yet."

BUTLER'S FIRST SETTLERS, MILLS, ETC.

As soon as peace was assured to settlers they began to make permanent settlements in this beautiful valley. From the very favorable reports brought back by the party of men sent out to bury the victims of the Sugarloaf massacre, others were induced to journey to this new Eldorado.

The first settler was G. H. Reip, who came about 1782 and located on lands now owned by Joseph Woodring. He died in 1794, and was buried at the German church.

Among the pioneers was John Balliett, of Whitehall, Lehigh (then Northumberland) county, who emigrated hither in the spring of 1784 and located on what is now known as the Beisel farm, about one mile west of Drum's, and about the same distance southwest of Hughesville. The Indian trails, crossing mountains and streams, afforded no passage for wagons, and precluded his "moving" more than what he was able to carry on horseback. His children were placed in two bee-hives—typical, perhaps, of that industry that transformed the wilderness into a smiling garden—and these were tied together and hung across the back of one of the horses. In descending Broad mountain, south of Buck mountain, on their journey, the cord uniting the hives broke, and in the language of the old nursery-maid's song, "down came rockaby, baby and all." After a short gymnastic exercise in turning somersaults down the mountain side, the children were again comfortably ensconced in the hives, and the party moved on their way rejoicing. Upon reaching their destination Balliett and his family improvised a rude habitation by setting poles around and against a tree, over which some sort of a covering was thrown to shelter them until a house could be built. Their first house, which was of logs, was in a year or two after destroyed by fire, together with all their household goods except a bed.

Balliett was soon followed to this place by others from the same county, the earliest of whom were men named Reab, Benner, Shober, Dolph, Hill, Bachelor, Spaide and others, whose descendants still live in this valley. These pioneers coveted none of the superfluities of this life, or the expensive follies of the present day, but were humbly thankful for their "daily bread" and for the rough couches upon which they were wont to repose their weary limbs. As soon as they raised any crops of grain they were obliged to carry their grists on foot or horseback to Sultz's mill, on Lizard creek, one mile below the present town of Lehighton, and usually waited until the grist was ground (which was generally done during the night), and returned the following day.

Balliett's was not only the first farm settled upon, but here was the first orchard set out, the little trees being brought from his former residence on horse-back. His was also the first log house, and his is supposed to have been the first frame house built in what is now Butler township.

The pioneer saw and grist mills on the Little Nescopeck creek, in the southwestern part of the township, were built by Redmond Conyngnam. The saw-mill was built in 1809 on lands now owned by M. Beishline, and went to decay many years ago. The grist-mill was built in 1814 on the opposite side of the creek, where Silas Jacobs now lives, and is now owned by Charles Knelley.

The pioneer saw-mill on the Big Nescopeck creek, in the northeastern part of the township, was built in 1813 by Samuel Woodring, near the site now occupied by A. Straw & Son's saw-mill; and in 1820 Redmond Conyngnam built a grist-mill on the site now occupied by Straw's saw-mill.

The pioneer carding-mill was built about 1810 at what is now Ashville, on the Little Nescopeck creek, on the Linderman property; and the first woolen-mill was built in 1835 by Philip Drum, on the Little Nescopeck, a short distance above Ashville.

The pioneer school-house, built of logs, stood near what is known as the German Church, and went to decay many years ago.

John Balliett, one of the pioneer settlers, was also the pioneer tavern keeper. He located on the farm now owned by John Beisel, west of Drum's.

Philip Woodring was the pioneer blacksmith. He located here in 1800, on the place now owned by Henry Koenig.

The first merchant in this township was Henry B. Yost. He located here in 1832, on the place now owned by D. W. Jenkins, sen. Mr. Yost was also the pioneer postmaster. The mails were received once a week, and the name of the office was East Sugarloaf. This was previous to the formation of the township of Butler. Cyrus Straw is the present postmaster and receives a daily mail.

George Hughes's saw-mill, above Straw's, was built in 1833, and is still standing. The house where William B. Doud lives, owned by Mr. Straw, was built in 1812. The first weavers here were Michael Klouse, Elias Balliett and Jacob Schaubert. They all lived a little southwest of Hughesville. The oldest graveyard in this township is the one in the corner of the lot opposite the M. E. church, DRUM'S.

The first house built here was the one in which Andrew Straw now lives. The first tavern in this place was built by George Drum, and kept as a hotel by Abram Drum in 1820, where the present hotel stands. The first store here was kept by Henry B. Yost, in 1837, where D. W. Jenkins now lives. The first shoemaker was Isaac Drum, who in 1842 had a shop in what is now the bar-room of Drum's Hotel. The first blacksmith shop was on the hill above Cyrus Straw's, on the Wilkes-Barre road. John Sheide was the blacksmith. The shop has gone to decay. There was also a shop at the four corners near the Little Nescopeck, where George Krissingner lives, half a mile south of Drums. The first doctor at Drums was Samuel Beers. He lived where Silas Andrews now lives. The first school-house stood in the corner of the roads southwest of Drum's hotel. The first postmaster at Drum's was Henry B. Yost. He was appointed in 1839, and kept the office opposite where George Roth's blacksmith shop now stands. The present postmaster is Cyrus Straw.

At present there are at Drum's a church (Methodist Episcopal), a school-house, a blacksmith shop, a shoe shop, a tailor shop, a harness shop, two stores and a hotel. The population is about 200.

RELIGIOUS INTERESTS AT DRUM'S.

The first regular preaching, that we have any account of, at what is now Drum's was in 1833 or 1834, when the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church commissioned Rev. Joseph Lee as a missionary on the old Jeansville circuit, which took in White Haven, Beaver Meadow, Mifflin and other places, including Drum's, which was on the route from White Haven to Mifflin. There was no church here then. There was one at Hughesville, a mile and a half distant, but at that "no Methodist need apply" seemed to be the sentiment of the managers. The school-house at Drum's seemed to be the only available place, and that was not sure; for it was said by some that "if the Methodists git in here once, the devil can't git 'em out." But those days of unrest and fear of the "sect" have long since passed away. Lee was one of those aggressive preachers who not only always went armed with the Bible, but for small arms and weapons of warfare used Wesley's sermons; and the feather that broke the camel's back was that he had them to sell, thereby breeding dissensions among the elect. After preaching by him once or twice in the school-house, the trustees of the school district became alarmed, and decided that it was "prejudicial to the cause of the Redeemer's kingdom here on earth, and to the morals of this community, and against the wishes of the people to allow Methodist preaching in the school-house, and more especially so in the evening." James Gilmore, father of Henry Gilmore, being present, gave notice that his house was not controlled by trustees and that the Methodists could occupy it any time. Therefore for about six years the services were held alternately at Gilmore's house and Mr. Hoover's house, where Andrew Straw now lives. In the summer and on extra occasions the meetings were held in James Smith's barn.

In 1840 it was decided by the congregation that it was expedient to build a union church. The church was built of wood, 32 by 41 feet, and stood in the corner of the burying ground opposite the present M. E. church. It was built by subscription or contribution, and John Strunk, the builder, was appointed to apportion to each subscriber the amount and kind of timber he must furnish for the building. James Gilmore's share was as follows, as per bill given him: 2 sills, 41 feet long, 8 by 10, $5.46; 3 sills, 32 feet long, 8 by 10, $6.39; 6 sills, 16 feet long, 8 by 10, $2.14; 24 joists, 10 feet long, 5 by 6, $6; total, $19.99; 9 sleepers, 25 feet. The church was dedicated in December, 1840, by Revs. J. A. Ross, E. McCollum and G. H. Day, all Methodist preachers. The first Methodist class was formed in the fall of 1840, with Henry B. Yost as leader, and among the early members were Catharine Hunt, Harriet J. Yost, James Smith, Daniel Durst and others.

Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church.—The society worshipping in this church is merely a continuation of that worshipping in the old union church. But as the old church had served its purpose, and many repairs were necessary to make it what the congregation and the times demanded, a public meeting was held May 20th, 1870, when it was decided to build a new church. A building committee was appointed, consisting of Rev. N. W. Colborn, Cyrus Straw, A. P. Goedecke, Stephen Drum and Andrew Straw. May 19th, 1870, the committee met and decided upon the site where the church now stands, known as the school-house lot, and the balance of the lot was donated and deeded by George Drum to the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal church and their successors in office, June 11th, 1873, Jonah P. Drum and Daniel P. Raikes witnesses.

The church is of wood, of modern architecture, 34 by 56 feet, with basement, and cost $7,500. Andrew Straw was the builder. The building was commenced in June, 1873; the first public service was held in the basement February 18th, 1874, and the church was dedicated July 12th, 1874.

The following named clergymen have served in the years given as preachers on this charge, which is now composed of Butler, Sugarloaf and Black Creek, and known as Conyngham charge: Joseph Lee, 1833, 1834; Thomas Hill, 1833-42; James H. Brown, James Clark and G. H. Day; J. A. Ross and Thomas McClure, 1843; Revs. Messrs. Consor and Barnhart, 1844; G. H. Day, 1861; 1862, 1863, B. P. King; 1864, 1865, Josiah Forrest and J. C. Hagey; 1866, James F. Porter; 1867, Henry S. Mendenhall; 1868, 1869, James B. Cuddy, C. S. Benscoten, and Pemberton Bird; 1870-72, A. S. Bowman, and N. W. Colburn; 1873, J. Farron Brown and J. B. Moore; 1874, J. Horning, in place of Mr. Moore; 1875, 1876, J. Stiner; 1877-79, G. M. Larned, the present pastor. The present membership is 84; value of the church property, $8,000.

The Sunday-school connected with this church was organized May 6th, 1844, as a union Sunday-school, and is still under the same auspices. The first officers were as follows: Superintendent, James Smith; president, Isaac Drum; secretary, Henry Gilman (the only one now left of the original school); treasurer, William Harker; managers—Adam Beisel, Daniel Durst, Mrs. Beisel, Mrs. Yost, and Mrs. Hunt. A constitution and by-laws were adopted August 25th, 1844. At present the superintendent is Cyrus Straw; president, N. S. Drum; vice-president, John S. Spencer; secretary, A. A. Drum; librarian, Mary Jacobs; treasurer, Josiah Drum; managers—Cyrus Straw, Henry Gilmore, John T. Spencer, Mrs. Hedian, Mrs. L. Straw, Miss E. Jacobs. The total number of scholars is 193; average attendance 95; volumes in library, 471; collections for the year for missions, $33.88.

The first Presbyterian preaching in this vicinity was in 1835 or 1836, by Rev. Mr. Gaston, who came here soon after Joseph Lee. Mr. Gaston preached in the church at Hughesville; and about 1840, when the union church was built at Drum's, the Presbyterians formed a church and society, and assisted in building the union church. James Gilmore was the leading man of that denomination at the time. Their church was small, but they have succeeded in holding together a membership of about 20, with Henry Gilmore as their leader. Rev. Homer S. Newcomb, of Conyngham, is the pastor, occupying the pulpit of Trinity M. E. Church on alternate Sunday evenings, if not occupied by the pastor of Trinity Church.

has a population of about 150. The place was named in honor of George Hughes, an early settler. The old saw-mill at Hughesville was built in 1836 by H. Benner. The grist-mill at this place was built in 1853 by George Hughes, and April 22nd, 1854, commenced running as a flouring mill. The first store here was opened by Sheide & Wenner, where Dr. Hevener now lives. Henry Benner was the first blacksmith; his shop stood near the saw-mill. The first shoe shop was started in 1868 by J. W. Woodring, and it is still in operation. The first tavern was opened by the present proprietor, Stephen Krehns, in 1870. There are here at present a grist mill, a store, a shoe shop, a blacksmith shop, a school-house and a church,—St. John's,—owned and occupied jointly by the German Reformed and Lutheran congregations.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, OF HUGHESVILLE.

This church was organized December 26th, 1799, when the first meeting was held. Two organizations are worshipping in this church, the Evangelical Lutheran and German Reformed denominations. January 12th, 1800, a meeting of the two congregations was held, at which it was resolved to build an edifice for both church and school purposes. Public services were held in private houses until the fall of 1808, when twelve acres of land were purchased of Stephen Balliett, and a log church was built on the bank of the Nescopeck, nearly opposite the present church. The structure was built by voluntary subscription, and was to remain a German Reformed and Lutheran church and school-house. Rev. George Mann was the pastor at the time. April 18th, 1809, Rev. Frederick W. Van de Sloat, a German Reformed preacher, visited this people, when the consistory and members of both denominations requested him to draft a constitution and by-laws for the government of the congregation. The constitution and by-laws drawn by him, and subscribed to by members of both denominations, provided that the German language should be used exclusively in all public services except for schools, and that no services of any kind should be held in the church after dark. The subscribers to this document were John Balliett, George Drum, Philip Woodring, Jacob Speth, George Wenner, Samuel Earles, Jacob Balliett, Peter Hill, John Balliett, sen., Peter Sheide, Michael Beishline, Jacob Drumheller, Andrew Maurer, Philip Ruth, Jacob Fuse, Jacob Wenner, Henry Maurer, George Beishline and George Bitterle. The twelve acres of land purchased of Stephen Balliett included the grave yard and the lot upon which the present church building stands. In 1825, the old church and school building having become not only superannuated but too small for church purposes, the congregation built a larger one, nearly where the present church stands, and this in turn gave place to the present beautiful edifice. January 31st, 1868, it was decided at a joint meeting of the congregations that a new and a larger church building was a necessity, and a building committee was appointed, consisting of Jacob Thomas, Charles W. Knealey, Simon Santee, Daniel O. Klinger and George Hughes. The ministers at this time were Rev. H. Hoffman, German Reformed, and Rev. S. S. Kline, Lutheran.

The elders at the time of building the new church were George Hughes, George Drum, Henry Beck and Michael Beishline. The deacons were John A. Kleigh, Daniel Dauber, Charles W. Knolley and Reuben Beninger. The church is of wood, 45 by 60, with basement story, and is finished throughout in the latest and most substantial style of architecture, costing $14,000. It was dedicated September 24th, 1873, by Rev. Messrs. Bauer, Kepner and Steinmitz. The pastors, besides those named, have been: Rev. John N. Seizer, in 1826; Rev. Frederick Croll, in 1812; Rev. John A. Foersch, 1846; Rev. H. Daniels, 1847-51. The present pastors are: John M. Clemens, German Reformed, and J. H. Neiman, Evangelical Lutheran. The present church officers are: Reformed elders, George Drum and Henry Koenig; Reformed deacons, L. Dreucher and J. Hemerly; Lutheran elders, H. Walp and F. Rifenberg; Lutheran deacons, A. Smith and William Kemp.

Godfrey and Thomas Hughes, April 14th, 1840, 1845; Fillmore Santee, April 12th, 1842, and April 13th, 1847; Jacob Drum, April 13th, 1847 and 1852, April 14th, 1857; Samuel Benner, April 13th, 1852, April 14th, 1857, and (elected) April 29th, 1862; Henry Gilmore, May 3d, 1862 (elected), April 9th, 1867, April 10th, 1872, and (elected) March 26th, 1877; Daniel P. Rake, April 9th, 1851, and April 10th, 1872; Charles Bock (elected), March 17th, 1877.

CONYNGHAM TOWNSHIP.

CONYNGHAM township, named in honor of the late Judge Conyngham of Wilkes-Barre, was set off from Hollenback in 1875.

The first and only post-office is Wapwallopen, Tobias Schobert postmaster. The office was established on the completion of the Lackawanna and Bloomsburg railroad in 1832.

The township is thinly settled, not more than one-third of the land being improved. The population is 488. Supervisors have been elected as follows: 1876, Philip Weiss and Reuben Andreas; 1877, Isaac Miller and Jeremiah Hess; 1878, Isaac Miller and Nathan Bittenbender; 1879, John Fenstermacher, jr., and Nathan Bittenbender. J. A. Kepner was elected justice in 1876 and A. D. Miller in 1879.

The first permanent settler was Martin Harter, from Northampton county, who in 1795 settled near the mouth of the Little Wapwallopen creek. He was soon followed by James McNiel, James Santee, Philip Fenstermacher, John Andreas, John Fenstermacher, Michael Weiss, Jeremiah Hess and one or two others from Lehigh and Northampton counties. The descendants of these thrifty German farmers constitute a majority of the farming population of the present.

John Fenstermacher, jr., Esq., of Wapwallopen, son of John Fenstermacher and grandson of Martin Harter, was the first white child born in Conyngham township, having been born in 1804.

The first road built was the one along the river, which was cut out by the earliest settlers.

The first frame house was built by Martin Harter, about 1797, on the lands now owned by the heirs of Absalom Heller. Philip Fenstermacher built the only brick house about 1822. This house is now owned by A. K. Harter. In 1829 George Fenstermacher built a stone house on the site where Martin Harter's house had stood. A frame addition was afterward built to this house, and a tavern kept here for several years. The first tavern and store were kept by Philip Fenstermacher, beginning in 1805 and continuing only a few years. John Heller kept a store in 1836. The first blacksmith was Jacob Romick, whose shop stood on the site of the stone house. Peter Mauer learned the trade of Mr. Romick and succeeded him. The first grist-mill was built by a widow lady named Lewis, from Philadelphia. It stood just above the site of the present mill of Samuel Heller on Wapwallopen creek. The deed conveying the lands to Frances Lewis, widow, bears the date of 1806, and the mill must have been built about that time. This mill was followed by a stone mill three stories high, which was finished about 1825 by two brothers named McPherson, who operated the mill under a lease for five years. Samuel Heller moved from Salem in 1836 and built the present mill, and he continues to operate it. Philip Fenstermacher built the first saw-mill in 1811, on a small stream near where A. Boyd now lives. John Fenstermacher had a distillery near the blacksmith shop of Jacob Romick. The first school was taught by a preacher named Kroll in a small building belonging to Martin Harter, about 1808, and was taught in German. This building is now used as a pig-sty by A. K. Harter. The first English school was taught in an old house belonging to Michael Weiss, in 1811. The first school-house was erected on the site of the church in 1813. In 1878 there were four schools in the township, with an average total attendance during the year of 85 pupils, and $1,652.43 was expended for educational purposes.

WAPWALLOPEN.

Wapwallopen signifies "the place where the messengers were murdered," and the place is situated on the first tract of land patented in the township, a tract called Campania, being on both sides of the creek, having been granted to Daniel Grant in 1769, and patented by George Campbell in 1773. This is the same land which passed through the hands of the widow Lewis, and finally to John Heller, by whom it was divided and sold to different parties. The village contains three stores, a post-office, a hotel, a blacksmith shop and two millinery shops.

THE MOCANAQUA COAL COMPANY.

Operations were begun on the property in 1837, under the superintendence of Henry Colt. A small quantity of coal was mined during the winter months. The property was sold to Carey & Hart, who operated the works during the winter months until 1856, when Jedediah Irish organized the Mocanaqua Coal Company and purchased the works, which he operated up to 1865. Dupont Brothers, of Wilmington, Del., then purchased the property and increased the number of acres to 1,900. They worked the mines until 1872, when the men struck for higher wages and were all discharged. The works were closed and have not been started since. The engine in the breaker was 100 horse-power, and the breaker has a capacity of 1,000 tons daily. The works were of the most complete kind. The company had their own machine and repair shops. The coal was mined about one mile from the breaker, which was on the east bank of the river, opposite Shickshinny. They employed about 500 men, and owned thirty tenant houses.

REFORMED CHURCH.

The Reformed congregation in Conyngham began its history in 1820. In July, 1820, the Rev. John N. Zeizer visited this and adjoining townships, preaching trial sermons with a view of becoming pastor. He preached one year as a licentiate, and was ordained by the Synod of Reading in September, 1821. The congregation was immediately organized, and remained under the pastoral care of Rev. Mr. Zeizer for nineteen years. Near the close of the year 1839 he died and was buried in the churchyard where lie nearly all of the early settlers of Conyngham. He was followed by the Rev. Isaac Shellhammer, who began his ministry in 1840 and continued until 1858. Mr. Shellhammer died in Black Creek township, February 22nd, 1873. Rev. Henry Hoffman became pastor in the fall of 1858, and remained until 1871. About the beginning of his pastorate the change was made from German to English, all preaching having been in German. In 1871 the congregation was connected with the North Susquehanna charge, Rev. A. R. Hottenstein pastor. The present pastor, Rev. Tilgham Derr, took charge of the congregation in the fall of 1876. The congregation, in conjunction with the Lutherans, built a good brick church in 1833, previous to which time both societies had worshiped in the school-house.

During the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Derr the church has been repaired. Both societies continue to use it. The present officers of the church are: Joseph Hess and Philip Weiss, elders; M. J. Harter and A. D. Brader deacons. There are 115 communicants.

The history of the Lutheran congregation is identical with that of the Reformed congregation, except that each congregation had its own minister.

ST. JOHN'S EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

The society bearing this name has always been under the charge of the pastors located in Hollenback township, and was organized about the same time. Meetings were held in the school-house until 1867, when a church was built. There are now 55 communicants.

DALLAS TOWNSHIP.

DALLAS township was formed from Kingston in 1817, and embraces a portion of one of the "certified townships," called Bedford. It was named in honor of Alexander J. Dallas, of Philadelphia.

Ephraim McCoy, a Revolutionary soldier, erected the first log house near or on the present site of Dallas borough, in 1797. A small log cabin had been previously erected, which was supposed to have been a hunter's cabin, without floors, and showing evidences of having been standing for several years. The second residence was built soon after McCoy's, by William Briggs.

Daniel Spencer, John Wort and John Kelley, Revolutionary soldiers, Elam Spencer, J. Mears, John and John Honeywell, jr., William Honeywell, Isaac Montanye and two Ayers brothers were among the first settlers. In 1808 William Honeywell came from New Jersey, bought five hundred acres of land and completed a log house upon it which had been partly built, and in the following year built a frame addition to it, the first frame building erected in Dallas. R. M. Duffy did the carpenter work.

The first saw-mill in Dallas was built in 1813 by Judge Baldwin, on a branch of Toby's creek. The second one was built in 1818, on Toby's creek, by Christian Rice; the ruins of it are yet to be seen on lands owned by his son, Capt. Jacob Rice, in Dallas borough. This mill was in use until 1875.

Among the pioneer preachers were Marmaduke Pierce (now a Doctor of Divinity in the M. E. Church) and Benjamin Bidlack, a Revolutionary soldier, who was at the siege of Yorktown. Religious meetings were held in the rude residences until the school-houses were built, after which services were held in them.

The first school-house was erected in Dallas (now Dallas borough) in 1816, of hewn logs, by William Honeywell, Philip Shaver (who gave the site), William Hunt and John Honeywell.

Peter B. Roushey built the first tavern in Dallas, at the fork of the village, and sold grog. Other taverns were kept by Miles C. Orr and Jacob Miers.

Almond Goss built and conducted the first store, about 1840. Charles Harris and his father made the first clearing in Dallas. They came from the adjoining section, found a desirable tract, chopped one day and returned home. They were never able to find the place again; this was soon after the Wyoming massacre.

Henry Hagaman was the first post-rider through Dallas. He carried the mail from Wilkes-Barre to Bowman's creek.

Among the early marriages were those of Abram S. Honeywell to Miss Lydia Hawk, and Joseph Montanye to a Miss Spencer, both on the same day in 1820. The former is now a resident of Wyoming, aged eighty-eight years. Demon Spencer was the first white child born in Dallas. Among the first deaths were those of the wife of John Honeywell and a Mr. Hunt.

Peter Ryman was the first and only pettifogger in Dallas, and proved his ability by his many successes.

The first justice of the peace was Thomas Irwin.

Jacob Rice owned the first painted house, in 1843. He purchased the first spring buggy owned in Dallas in 1837. Abram S. Honeywell owned the first cast-iron plow, and William J. Honeywell the first patent wagon brake in Dallas.

The first tannery was built by Edgar Marsh in 1848. It was burned and a new one erected, owned by John Lawler, who manufactured large quantities of leather annually.

There are two post-offices in the township. Kunkle was named for J. Wesley Kunkle, who was appointed the first postmaster. Ketchum post-office was named for Hon. W. W. Ketchum, judge of the supreme court and member of Congress. Sanford Morse was the first and is the present postmaster.

The early records having been destroyed, no account of the first township meeting, or of other interesting matter concerning its organization and much of its subsequent history, can be obtained. The present board of officers is constituted as follows: Justice, Samuel Hess; judge of elections, A. B. Shaver; inspectors of elections, S. Warden, A. Ayers; constable, W. J. Riley; assessor, G. P. Anderson; supervisors, Samuel Vanscoy, J. B. Honeywell, John Spencer, Joseph Hoover, Theodore Major, Jacob Nulton; auditors, Harrison Honeywell, S. A. Spencer; treasurer, W. K. Goss; overseers of poor, R. B. Wilson, T. A. Kriedler; school directors, W. P. Johnston, Robert Halley; clerk, T. M. Lazo.

The area of Dallas is twenty-one square miles, the much larger portion of which is cleared and cultivated. Farming and lumbering are the principal occupations of the citizens. There are eight saw mills in operation, which manufacture large quantities of lumber annually for the Pittston and Wilkes-Barre markets. Smith & Garrahan and Ryman & Sons are among the most extensive lumber merchants. Pittston and Wilkes-Barre are also the markets for grain, cattle, leather and other products. The population of the township is 879.

DALLAS BOROUGH.

THE organization of Dallas borough was effected for the purpose of protecting the interests of the high school. The charter was granted April 21st, 1879, and on the 13th of May the following officers were chosen at a special election held at Raub's Hotel: Dwight Wolcott, burgess; Parkerson Perrego, high constable; William Snyder and John Ferguson, inspectors; Barney Stroud, judge of election; school directors, Leonard Machell and James Garrahan, for three years, Chester White and J. B. Williamson for two years, Barney Stroud and Parkerson Perrego for one year; auditors, William J. Honeywell for three years, Doctor C. A. Spencer for two years, Thomas Garrahan for one year; assessors, William J. Honeywell and John Ferguson; council, Capt. Jacob Rice, Ira D. Shaver, Theodore F. Ryman, William Snyder, Charles Henderson, and Philip T. Raub. Charles H. Cook was appointed justice of the peace. At the first annual election, held February 17th, 1880, the same officers were elected except one auditor and one inspector, viz: Smith Perrego, in place of Thomas Garrahan resigned, and Adney Snyder in place of William Snyder. The borough's population is 272.

BUSINESS ENTERPRISES.

Dallas is connected by telephone with Wilkes-Barre and Harvey's Lake. In 1878 a company was formed and the line built at a cost of about $800. The company consists of the following named gentlemen, and is called the "Dallas Telephone Company:" H. S. Rutter, E. P. Darling, William J. Honeywell, W. P. Ryman, T. F. and J. J. Ryman, G. M. Lewis, and Dr. C. A. Spencer.

A daily mail arrives from Wilkes-Barre by a stage, which also carries passengers, express matter, etc.

There is but one hotel in Dallas, Andrew Raub proprietor, and this is the only place where intoxicating liquors are sold.

The dry goods and grocery trade is represented by Ryman & Sons, Smith & Garrahan, and Ira D. Shaver.

C. H. Hall is proprietor of the first and only drug store in town.

C. A. Spencer, M. D., and James G. Laing, M. D., represent the medical profession.

William Brickle carries on undertaking and cabinet making.

The post-office in the borough was instituted in 1825, and Joseph Shunk was appointed postmaster. The present postmaster is C. H. Hall.

THE DALLAS HIGH SCHOOL was founded in 1879, by the following liberal minded gentlemen: Leonard Machell, William J. Honeywell, James Garrahan, Esq., J. G. Laing, M. D., William Snyder, William P. Kirkendall, Joseph Atherholt, Andrew Raub, Joseph Shaver, Capt. Jacob Rice, Ira D. Shaver, Chester White, Theodore F. Ryman, C. A. Spencer, M. D., G. W. Kirkendall, J. J. Ryman.

In 1878 the beautiful and well arranged high school building was erected at a cost of about $3,500, including site. It is situated on an eminence with a commanding view, with grounds beautiful and spacious, nicely shaded with maples, and offering a fine opportunity to students for healthful exercise.

The founders have kindly given the use of the building to the school directors of Dallas borough for the advancement of the school interest in the borough. This school furnishes instruction in all those branches of education which legitimately belong to an institution of the kind. In selecting the subjects for study, two objects have been kept in view: the thorough and symmetrical discipline of the mental powers and the acquisition of knowledge.

The following departments of study are provided: common English, higher English, ancient languages, modern languages, commercial department.

The first principal of the school was Prof. John T. Fuller, a graduate of Lafayette College and a young man of high culture, sterling character and moral worth. He died on the 21st of January, 1880, deeply mourned by patrons and students and all with whom he mingled. He was assisted by Miss Lettie Kitchen, of Dallas.

The present principal is Prof. W. P. Taylor, a graduate of Lafayette College and a teacher of large experience and signal success in his profession. He is assisted by Miss Lydia A. Seward, of New Columbus. The high school of Dallas has attained a degree of success and importance highly satisfactory to its founders and the public, and is receiving a liberal patronage at home and from abroad. The efforts of the directors are being put forth to make this school second to none of its class, and the utmost care is observed by the faculty in promoting the moral, intellectual and physical welfare of students.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

In 1854 the M. E. church edifice was erected, at a cost of $1,000. It was built on contract by Almond Goss, of Dallas.

The following named gentlemen were the trustees at that time: William J. Honeywell, Abraham Ryman, Simeon Spencer, Richard S. Ryman, William C. Roushey, Christian Rice, Jacob Rice, 2nd. Rev. F. A. King is the present pastor.

There are several branch societies in the township which use the school-houses for religious services. Their present pastor is F. A. King.

THE MILITARY.

Some of the early residents of Dallas had been soldiers of the Revolution. Among these were Benjamin Bidlack, Daniel Spencer, John Wort, John Kelley and Ephraim McCoy.

Dallas furnished its complete quota for the civil war. From its pine crowned hills went sturdy yeomen with willing hearts to sustain the flag their fathers bore to honorable and successful battle for liberty and the right. Company F of the 53d Pennsylvania volunteers was organized in Dallas, under the direction of Capt. Rice, of Dallas, and consisted of one hundred men, a portion of whom enlisted from neighboring townships. This company performed well its part in the war, and returned laden with honors, though greatly reduced in numbers. Other citizens of Dallas enlisted in various commands, this being the only organization with its rendezvous in Dallas township.

Captain Rice is the representative military man of Dallas. He was commissioned first lieutenant in the 115th Pennsylvania militia, May 6th, 1839; captain of the Dallas rifle company, August 20th, 1849; captain of the Dallas artillery, November 15th, 1857; lieutenant colonel of the Rhodes regiment in 1859; quartermaster of the 15th Pennsylvania volunteers May 1st, 1861, for three months, and of the 53d October 12th, 1861; received recommendations from line officers of his regiment to General Hancock, commanding the 2nd corps, and to General Ingalls, chief quartermaster of the U. S. army, for the appointment of captain and quartermaster in his brigade; but he did not present his recommendations to the Secretary of War on account of the pressing need of his presence at home.

Myron Strickland enlisted in Dallas September 1st, 1861, with Captain Rice, of the 53d. He was wounded at Chancellorsville, Va., May 3d, 1863, by a minie ball, which penetrated his clothing and lodged in a New Testament which he carried in his left side pocket. The shock was a severe one and he has never entirely recovered. He was again wounded at Gettysburg, July 2nd, 1863. He was a prisoner seven months, at Libby, Salisbury and Belle Isle.

DENISON TOWNSHIP.

THIS township was taken from Hanover in November, 1839. November 15th, 1855, Foster was taken off, and Bear Creek April 7th, 1856. Justices of the peace from Denison have been chosen as follows: Abiathar Tuttle, 1840; Joseph H. Taylor, 1840; Lucius Blakeslee, 1845; Thomas Morrison, 1845, 1850, 1855; Harvey Lloyd, 1853; George Wharen, 1867, 1872; Henry H. Wood, 1873, 1878. The township was named in honor of Colonel Nathan Denison, of Wyoming battle fame.

While the forests remained to furnish the supply, lumbering was the only business. Nearly the whole population of the township is centered in the southeast corner along the Lehigh river, between the borough of White Haven and the mouth of Wright's creek.

The first settler in this township of any enterprise was Israel Inman. He followed the Nescopeck creek through what is now the townships of Black Creek, Sugarloaf and Butler, and three quarters of the way across this township, and located about half a mile below where the Lehigh and Susquehanna railroad crosses the Nescopeck west of the tunnel. This is up among the head waters of the Nescopeck, and was at that time a dense wilderness. Here Mr. Inman built a rude log house and a saw-mill, the first of their kind in the township. This was in 1833. He also built a forge or triphammer shop, and "Inman's Works" soon became known throughout the southeastern portion of Luzerne county. He was also the owner of a large tract of land in the immediate vicinity of his shop and mill. For several years he was the successful business man of his part of the township, but at length trade was drawn to the Lehigh, and the mildew of time has hidden every vestige of the place once so well known as "Inman's Works."

Soon after Inman came others followed, and in a short time there were several saw-mills along the Nescopeck, all of which have either gone to decay or are suffering for want of business.

The southeast corner of the township was next settled, and in 1835 the first house was built there by A. P. Childs. Later in the same year John Lines, jr., built another house. In 1838 this place was called Middleburg, and a post-office of that name was established. The neighborhood, being just above the upper dam on the Lehigh and adjoining White Haven, was soon abandoned as a business point, and the post-office was abolished as soon as White Haven was made a town, Middleburg being only a continuation up stream of the larger village.

The first tavern at Middleburg was built in 1850, and kept by John and Frank Lynch. It is still standing, on the upper side of the road. There were several stores and shops at this place, all of which have been abandoned.

The first road of any importance in or through this township was the Lehigh and Wilkes-Barre road, cut out and partially built by the Lehigh Navigation and Coal Company in 1837. It ran diagonally across the township, in a northwesterly direction, from the southeast corner of the township, adjoining White Haven. It crosses the Nescopeck creek about a mile below where Inman's works were located. Until the railroad was built this was the only route between Wilkes-Barre and Mauch Chunk. By leaving Wilkes-Barre in the morning by this route, and taking the swift sailing packet "Washington" at White Haven, one would arrive at Mauch Chunk in time for supper, if not particular about eating early in the evening. The great freshet of 1862 ruined the canal, and in 1863 the Lehigh Valley Company commenced building their road between Mauch Chunk and Wilkes-Barre. Passenger trains began running in 1865, superseding all travel by stage coach through Denison. The Lehigh Navigation and Coal Company ran a parallel road between the two places, also crossing the township.

The present business of the township is confined to one steam saw-mill at Middleburg in the southeast corner of the township, Braden & Brown's steam mill on Crissy creek, two mills on the Nescopeck creek and the Luzerne ochre works at Moosehead, where is a station on the Lehigh Valley Railroad and a post-office; Mr. Bell post-master. Denison's population is 976.

DORRANCE TOWNSHIP.

NEW JERSEY furnished the early settlers of Dorrance, who located along the creeks. Among the pioneers in the south part of the township were the families of Eroh, Whitebread, Heller, Werner, Rhineheimer, Eishenbrount, Woodring and Balliett; in the north half, the families of Myers, Bleim, Vandemark, Engler, Lutz, Stuart and Heimbach. The numerous descendants of these families chiefly make up the present population of the township, which is 639.

In the early days the land was covered with a dense forest, affording ample material for the manufacture of lumber at the various saw-mills which were soon built. As late as 1873, there were no less than nine saw-mills in the township, one of which was a steam mill built by E. Gruver on the west side of the township. The only tannery is the one built by F. K. Miller and brother in the southwest corner of the township. There are two grist-mills, one on the Big Wapwallopen south of Dorrance corners, and the other on the Little Wapwallopen in the northwest corner of the township.

Dorrance was taken from Newport and formed into a township in November, 1840, and named in honor of the late Benjamin Dorrance of this county.

The following are the names and dates of election of justices of the peace chosen in this township since its formation: Thomas Finn, 1841, 1850, 1862, 1872, 1877; Matthew H. Engler, 1845; Enos Seiple, 1854; Samuel I. Horlacher, 1856; Samuel Shelhammer, 1860; George D. Engler, 1873; Abraham Guldin, 1878.

DORRANCE CORNERS.

Dorrance Corners, the only village, is located near the center of the township. It was here that two of the pioneer settlers made their "pitch," and from their humble beginning has grown the hamlet known as Dorrance Corners. Here are a hotel, a store, a school-house, blacksmith, wagon and shoe shops, and about 75 inhabitants.

CHURCHES.

Stairsville Methodist Episcopal Church.—The Methodist society in this township was organized under the ministry of Rev. Messrs. Moyster and Owen, when the country was yet a wilderness and when the townships of Dorrance, Hollenback, Slocum, Conyngham and Nescopeck were in the old Hanover circuit. Some of the early members were John Arnold, George Stair and wife, John Hawk and wife, Stephen Lee and wife, and George Moon and wife.

In the days of the itinerants Moyster and Owen, preaching services were held in log houses and barns, and in suitable weather in the groves, until the building of the school-house in the northwest corner of the township near the site of the present M. E. church, when that school-house was used until 1873. In 1873 Rev. Josiah Wagner was on this charge, and under his administration the church was built at a cost of about $1,800.

The pastors who have served this people since Mr. Wagner are Revs. J. T. Burall, Wilson, Trible, William Ruggles, William Edgar and Rev. J. A. Transur, the present pastor. The first superintendent of the Sunday-school connected with the church was Stephen Lee, and the present superintendent is Lyman Engler. The church property is valued at $2,000.

Emanuel Church.—This church is about half a mile southwest from Dorrance Corners. It was built by the Lutheran and Reformed societies and occupied jointly by them. The corner stone was laid and the church dedicated according to the usages of the two denominations. It cost about $3,000. It was dedicated by Rev. Messrs. Day and Cline.

The Reformed church was organized at the school-house at Dorrance Corners about 1850. The members at that time were Daniel Bouglman, John and Elias Keiner, Jonas and John Searfoss, Peter Erbb and Daniel, William, Adam and Thomas Moyer. Rev. J. Shelhammer was their first pastor and remained about twelve years. He was succeeded by Rev. Messrs. Solomon, Henry Hoffman, Cline and John McClemens in succession. The present membership is 80. The first Sunday-school superintendent was S. H. Holleker; there were 40 members. The Sunday-school is under the superintendence of A. Guldin, and averages 60 pupils.

The Lutheran church was organized at Schlear's store in Dorrance, with A. Guldin, Henry Schenbread, Bleman Morgan, Henry Hoffman, Solomon Spade, Nicholas Hildebrand and Samuel Snyder as members. The present membership is 60. The first Sunday-school superintendent was George Moore, and there were 35 scholars. The present superintendent is Simon Erbb. There is an average of 60 scholars.

S. D. ENGLE.

Stephen D. Engle, whose scientific and mechanical inventions have given him a national if not a world-wide fame, was born in Sugarloaf township, Luzerne county, Pa., December 18th, 1837. When young he enjoyed no other advantages for education than were afforded by the common schools of that day, but he has been an inveterate reader, especially of scientific works, and has thus acquired rare intelligence. Since arriving at maturity he has been a resident of Hazleton, in his native county, where he married a daughter of Joseph Grenawalt, Esq., a wealthy and public spirited citizen of that borough. When the rebels entered Pennsylvania in 1863 Mr. Engle served with the "emergency men" until the soil of his native State was no longer pressed by hostile feet. Mr Engle's father was a watchmaker as well as a farmer, and the subject of this sketch became the leading watchmaker and jeweler of Hazleton. He also studied and for a number of years practiced dentistry in connection with his business as a jeweler. One of his inventions is "Engle's Patent for Securing Porcelain Teeth to Gold or Silver Plates." The "Association for the Protection of the Rights of Dentists" officially approved this device and hastened to secure an assignment and abandonment to the public of the patent. Another invention of intrinsic worth is "Engle's Dust Proof Watch Case," affording such protection to the movement as would not now be dispensed with by manufacturers of the best watches. The first astronomical, musical and apostolic clock ever built in the United States was invented and built by Mr. Engle, and it has never been equalled in automatic wonders, or in the scientific accuracy of the astronomical mechanism. So absorbed was Mr. Engle in the planning and construction of this clock that he afterwards wrote to a friend: "During the last year before its completion I had no night or day, but slept when I was sleepy and ate when I was hungry, without any regard to old Sol." It was perhaps fortunate for him that he was a disciple of Nimrod and Izaak Walton, for without the recreation found in his hunting and fishing excursions he would probably have succumbed long ago to an excess of brain work and confinement to rooms filled with machinery, crucibles, metals and acids. Captain Jacob Reid has exhibited this clock to crowded houses in every part of the country and Canada. A description of this grand piece of mechanism, with its forty-eight moving figures, its movements illustrating day and night, changes of seasons, ebbing and flowing of tides and other phenomena, cannot here be given. Suffice it to say that everywhere the press was loud in its praise. While Joel Cook, Esq., one of the editors of the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, was visiting Strasburg in 1878, he saw the renowned Strasburg clock, and in his book entitled "A Holiday Trip to Europe" he makes the following comparison: "The Engle clock, which has been exhibited in Philadelphia, is not so large, and yet does all that this clock does, and much more, and does it better." The latest invention of Mr. Engle is "Engle's Tellurion." For illustrating celestial as well as terrestrial phenomena this is far in advance of any apparatus hitherto constructed. It is the only apparatus yet in existence that shows the true motion of the earth around the sun in an actual ellipse. The parallelism of the axis is at all times preserved and all the phenomena of the changes of day and night and of the seasons, the greater length of time the sun remains north than south of the equator, etc., etc., are clearly shown. This instrument shows the length of the day and night at any season of the year in any latitude, as well as the heavenly constellations visible at any hour in any and every season of the year. The moon is seen in its gibbous and crescent phases as well as with a full enlightened hemisphere and in total darkness, its place being in a mask or hollow hemisphere with the convex surface thereof black. This invention has attracted the attention of astronomers and teachers, and it is believed that nearly all the best institutions of learning in the land will possess themselves of it when it becomes an article of manufacture and sale. Parties have endeavored to negotiate with Mr. Engle with a view to the manufacture of this improved tellurion, but the inventor has thus far been engaged during his leisure moments in considering further improvements in the machinery and has not entertained any of these propositions. Stephen D. Engle is universally recognized by his neighbors as an upright, honorable and kind-hearted man. No case of suffering or distress ever came to his knowledge without enlisting his sympathy, and to awaken his sympathy is to open his purse strings.

EXETER TOWNSHIP.

EXETER, as now existing, is the remainder of old Exeter, one of the "seventeen townships," which originally included Franklin and Ransom. It contains an area of about twenty-three square miles in the extreme north-eastern corner of Luzerne county, on the right bank of the Susquehanna. The census of 1880 shows that there are 91 farms and a population of 1,023 in the township.

Agriculture succeeded lumbering as the chief employment of the people, and since Pittston and West Pittston have become large consuming markets gardening has come to be profitable on the farms along the river and in the southern part of the township, while the upland farms are used quite largely for dairy purposes, the milk finding a market in the boroughs.

PIONEERS.

The first settlements were made near the river, but improvements have been at last extended to the remote corners of the township. In 1796, while Franklin and Ransom were included in Exeter, a list of the taxable people was made and recorded. Stewart Pearce in his Annals of Luzerne has carefully preserved this list with slight changes. The names were:

Joel Atherton, Joseph Black, Moses Bennett, Timothy Beebe, Roswell Beach, Peleg Comstock, Joseph Dailey, David Dailey, Jacob Drake, William Foster, Isaac Finch, Richard Gardner, John Gardner, Thomas Gardner, Abraham Goodwin, Richard Halsted, William Harding, Samuel Hadley, James Hadley, Stephen Harding, David Harding, Edward Hadsall, John Hadsall, Joseph Hadsall, William Hadsall, Peter Harris, Micajah Harding, Thomas Harding, Artimedorus Ingersol, Benjamin Jones, sen., Nathaniel Jones, sen., Majah Jones, Justus Jones, Benjamin Jones, jr., Thomas Joslin, sen., Palmer Jenkins, Thomas Joslin, jr., John Jenkins, Thomas Jenkins, John Knapp, Comfort Kinyan, Andrew Montanye, John McMillen, Benjamin McAfee, Benjamin Newbury, William Ogden, Jacob Wright, William Slocum, William Stage, James Sutton, Moses Scovell, Elisha Scovell, James Scovell, David Shauotz, David Smith, David Skeel, William Tripp, Abner Tuttle, David Smith, jr., Gilbert Townsend, Lazarus Townsend, William Thompson, Thomas Williams, Ebenezer Williams, Allen Whitman, Zebediah Whitman, Nathan Whitlock, Joseph Whitlock and John Scott.

Two years later Captain Stephen Harding, John Jenkins, Peter Harris, David Smith, S. Dailey and J. Phillips were made commissioners to lay out additional public roads in the township.

EXETER IN 1778.

It was near the site of the Harding Cemetery that some men hoeing corn were attacked by the Indians just before the massacre of 1778. The Indians are said to have first attempted, by stealth, to gain possession of their rifles; but the youth John Harding had been left to watch them, and gave the alarm. The men all ran toward the river pursued by the Indians. Benjamin and Stukeley Harding reached their boats, but both were shot—one after he was in his boat and the other as he was entering it. John Harding swam under the willows and escaped. Daniel Weller and John Gardner were made prisoners.

The Indians then passed over to Sutton's creek, and encamped by a spring one or two rods in the rear of Samuel Bailey's house. Near here they killed James Hadsall and his negro, and his nephew, James Hadsall. Daniel Carr and Neezer Reynolds, both sons-in-law of the elder Hadsall, were taken prisoners. Reynolds made his escape, took his wife and children, departed, and has never been heard from. Carr returned after a captivity of seven years.

His wife, supposing him to be dead and thinking she had waited a proper time, had engaged herself to be married to another man, and was preparing for the wedding. One day she heard some one come into the house; she went to see who it was, and met her husband face to face. She was so overcome she fainted. Of course the new match was never consummated.

The British and Tories continued down the river, and landed at fort Wintermoot. Parties have since the Revolution been here inquiring about the lands at the old fort who were thought to be descendants of the Wintermoots, who left the valley with the British after the massacre. Here the Indians joined their forces, and near by the battle of Wyoming was begun.

EARLY BUSINESS ENTERPRISES.

Exeter, being an old settlement, was among those having the earliest business establishments.

In 1776 James Sutton, with James Hadsall as partner, built the first grist-mill and saw-mill on Sutton's creek, (now called at that place Coray creek). There the first grist was ground, and the first board sawed. Hadsall was murdered and the mill destroyed during the invasion of 1778, and all that remains of the old mill is a crank preserved by the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society as a relic of the oldest mill in the Wyoming valley.

Several years later Samuel Sutton, a son of James Sutton, built a second grist-mill on the same site, and in 1846 E. A. Coray, having become owner of this site, erected the present grist-mill. Subsequently another saw-mill was built farther up the creek, which is operating at the present time.

Lloyd Jones operated a plaster and clover mill on Lewis creek in 1845. The farmers brought their clover seed in the chaff to the mill to be separated and cleaned. The introduction of horse power threshers put an end to this enterprise.

The Indian trail through Exeter was along the old turnpike, now the public road along the river. One of the first taverns here was built by Lewis Jones in 1806, near the present residence of George Miller.

The old "Red Tavern" on Peter Sharpe's place was built the same year, and was kept by John Harding. Mr. Sharpe's house was formerly kept as a stage house by Isaac Harding. There was also another tavern, kept by the Scovells, down the river near Esquire Slocum's. It was used for years as headquarters for the raftsmen on the river.

Mr. Jones had near his inn a still house, which did a business of fair proportions and constituted a valuable auxiliary to his tavern.

Another of Mr. Jones's enterprises was the building of a store, which he kept during 1806 and 1807. Salt, which at that time cost $4 per bushel, was the principal article of commerce. The salt was necessary for preserving the shad which the settlers took from the river, they being their only article of meat diet. The bears claimed and enforced the first right to all the hogs.

The goods were carted from Philadelphia by James Hadsall, a man now 93 years old.

CHURCHES.

BAPTISTS.

In 1793 the few Baptists of Exeter and Northumberland united to secure the services of a minister.

In February, 1794, John Jenkins, James Scovell, Thomas Jenkins, Benjamin Smith and Elisha Scovell, subscribed about $65 toward building a church. Although they failed to erect the building the effort had its results, for the Baptists farther down the valley were made favorable to their schemes and a supply of preaching was secured for the settlement.

The first church regularly organized here was the Northumberland and Exeter Baptist church. This society first met in a barn belonging to Henry Jackson, as early as 1798. Among the early members were John Strong, David Adams, Henry Jackson, Stephen Hadsall, Richard Gardner and Jesse White. This church was supplied for half a century with preaching by heroic circuit riders. On the 8th of June, 1850, a division was effected in this society, a part taking the name of the Exeter Baptist Church of Christ. This church has usually had a pastor, but is at present supplied by Rev. A. D. Willifer, of Pittston. The trustees for 1880 were J. B. Jones (also clerk), George Miller and Aaron Brown. A prosperous Sunday-school is maintained in connection with this church.

MT. ZION M. E. CHURCH.

The Mt. Zion M. E. church was formed from parts of two societies or classes at Sutton's creek and the "Old Red School-house" district. Levi C. Lewis was the first class leader of the new society, and the first superintendent of the Sunday-school. They worshiped in the school-house at Mt. Zion until 1851, when their present church was built. On February 19th of that year, the trustees, Isaac Stephens, Evi Wilson and Robert S. Lewis, entered into a contract with Levi C. Lewis to build a church in "as good a style as the Truxville meeting house." A site was given by Valentine De Witt. The building was finished Nov. 1st, 1851, at a cost of about $1,000. The money was pledged by subscriptions and the contractor took the pledges for his pay. The house was dedicated in November by Rev. Mr. Shepard. Among the early preachers here are remembered Rev. O. F. Morse and Rev. Asa Brunson, who preached alternately once in two weeks. The society is now supplied with preaching by Rev. F. A. King, of Carverton. It became connected with the Carverton circuit in 1858, when Rev. John Labar was pastor and George Holmes class leader, and the membership was 80. Mr. Labar preached two years; C. L. Reid, one; W. Munger, two; G. C. Smith, one; A. J. Van Clift, two; Joseph Madison, J. Austin, S. Elwell and F. A. King, three years each. The last named is the present pastor. The present superintendent of the Sunday-school is Vincent Lewis. It has 77 members. The trustees for 1880 were William Heisler, Smith Lewis, Joseph Whipp, Merritt Rozell, Evi D. Wilson, George B. Holmes, G. Ailesworth, and S. Kitchen.

DIAMOND HOLLOW M. E. CHURCH.

As early as 1800 the Methodist circuit rider found his way into Exeter. The circuit which included this appointment extended over a large territory, and included Dallas, Lehman, Mehoopany, Plymouth, Truxville, Nanticoke and Plains. Once in a month was as often as the preacher could be at this appointment.

Joseph Whitlock, an old settler, was the first class leader and the meetings were held at his house.

After the school-house was built at Diamond Hollow services were held in it, but the Protestant Methodists came then and the result was an amount of friction which led to the erection at last of an M. E. church in 1835. The present building was erected in 1870 under the direction of a building committee consisting of Andrew Montanye, Enoch Whitlock, and John Diamond. A Sunday-school is maintained here during the summer.

CEMETERIES.

The Mt. Zion cemetery was originally a private burying ground, but when the church was organized there it was enlarged and became the property of the society. The lot is handsomely fenced and well cared for.

The Harding cemetery is the oldest in the township and contains several handsome monuments. The first burial in it was that of Capt. Stephen Harding, August 4th, 1816. It was then a cultivated field on his farm, and the grave-digger cut the growing grain to make room for the grave. This grave was enclosed, with about one-quarter acre of land, and was used by the Harding family until the farm changed hands, when an acre was reserved for a neighborhood burying-place.

SCHOOLS.

The educational ideas of the primitive Yankee settlers were exceedingly vague. Schools had been maintained before the beginning of the present century in such of the communities as chose to raise by subscription the small amount necessary to pay the itinerant school-master a few weeks during the winter for such services as he could render.

The Yankee schoolmasters of that day were a peculiar institution. It appears that the ranks of this army of literary tramps were swelled by many easy good fellows like Irving's Ichabod Crane, and the result, or possibly the cause, as a generation caring little for educational pursuits.

NESCOPECK CREEK

A few years showed the fruits of this neglect in a generation of illiterate young men and women, who had to avail themselves, even after they were of age, of such advantages as were afforded by the schools of 1800. In the old log school-house, which stood near George Miller's, long rows of these young men and women came to have Master Josiah Beach teach them to read. The first term begun by him was finished by John McMillen, whose descendants are among the present residents of the township. James Hadsall, now ninety-three years of age, is the only survivor of those who attended this first district school.

During the last decade of the past century this township voted to levy a small tax for the support of a winter school. In 1809 the State law providing for the admission of poor children was the next step toward Pennsylvania's present admirable system of free schools.

For about fifteen years after the passage of the free school act of 1833, Exeter continued to support the district schools by the old rate bill system, but finally met the provisions of the law by electing a board of school directors, &c.

There are now five school districts and two parts of districts in this township. One of these schools partly in Exeter is supported by this township, so it is reckoned that there are six public free schools in Exeter. The only one requiring two teachers is the Sturmerville school. The first school here was kept in a log school-house, in 1819-20. The building was burned during the winter and the term was finished in Joseph Schooley's house. Mrs. Rachael Goodwin, daughter of Colonel Jenkins, was one of the early teachers here.

The officers of the Exeter school board are William Heisler, president; A. J. Van Tuyle, clerk.

THE WYOMING CAMP GROUND.

These grounds, now occupied by the Wyoming Camp-Meeting Association, were first pointed out to Rev. Jos. Madison in 1871. During this year the association purchased from Richard Sutton for $4,000 the farm including these grounds. The officers then were: Payne Pettebone, president; Rev. Fred. L. Hiller, secretary; B. D. Beyea, treasurer; and Evi D. Wilson was made superintendent of the grounds. They set apart ten acres for their camp ground. The grounds are finely adapted to their purpose, being well shaded and having a good slope toward the ministers' stand. The space in front of the stand is now surrounded with cottages fantastically trimmed, making a very pretty and comfortable summer home to those interested. The grounds are plentifully supplied with water pumped by a steam-engine from a spring near by. George Peck, D. D., the presiding elder, cut the first stick of timber on the ground where the ministers' stand now is. He also preached the first sermon, taking for his text: "This is none other but the house of God." The present officers of the association are: Payne Pettebone, president; Rev. W. H. Olin, vice-president; Rev. J. C. Shellard, secretary; George Wells, treasurer; Evi D. Wilson, superintendent.

POST-OFFICES.

There are now two post-offices in the township. The oldest is the Exeter post-office. Aaron Brown has been the postmaster for the last 25 years.

The Charleston post-office was established about fifteen years ago, with Charles Montanye as post master. The name, Charleston, was in allusion to his name. In 1873 the name was changed to Harding, through the instrumentality of William H. Wetherbee, the post master. Casper Orberdorfer, the present post master, was commissioned in 1875.

MINES.

The northern limit of the Northern coal field crosses Exeter just above Scovell's island; so that fully two-thirds of the township is outside of the anthracite field. The earliest mining in the township was on the cropping west of William Schooley's in 1842. A company drove a tunnel on James S. Slocum's farm in 1856. Both of these tunnels are practically abandoned. The Lehigh Valley Coal Company owns the principal coal works in the township, employing about 225 men and 100 boys. Abednego Reese is mine boss, and A. G. Mason, outside foreman. On May 27th, 1871, the West Pittston breaker, belonging to the Lehigh Valley Coal Company, burned. There were 28 men in the mines when the fire broke out, of whom 19 were either dead when brought out, or died very soon after reaching the top of the ground. The fire originated in the tower of the breaker, and was caused by friction of the journals of the faw.

STURMERVILLE.

This rapidly growing village is located on the Wyoming battle ground.

About 1874 Capt. Solomon Sturmer bought the site from Mrs. Rachael Goodwin, daughter of Colonel John Jenkins, and laid it out in building lots. Thomas McNeil bought a lot and built the first dwelling in the place. It now contains about 35 families, who are mostly engaged in the mines or at the Lee Arms Company's Manufactory.

This large institution was first incorporated as the Pittston Arms Company, and was started through the encouragement and enterprise of the citizens in the vicinity, who donated the grounds and subscribed for $9,000 of the stock.

Later the name was changed to its present one, The Lee Arms Company.

The cheapness of fuel enables the company to successfully compete with the manufacturers of New England, and they are now prosecuting an extensive business. J. Frank Lee, Esq., of Wilkes-Barre, is president and R. L. Brewer superintendent.

WEST PITTSTON BOROUGH.

WEST PITTSTON borough is practically a suburb of Pittston and there is very little commercial business done here. The manufacturing consist of the Wyoming Valley Knitting Mills and Wisner & Strong's foundry and machine shop. The population is 2,543.

The first store opened in West Pittston was the one on Exeter street now owned by T. W. & H. D. Kyte. It was built in the fall of 1856 by Samuel Price, who after doing a general merchandise business for two years was succeeded by G. B. Romell.

FORT JENKINS.

This fort was simply a single log house surrounded by a stockade, and at the time of the massacre was occupied by three old men and a few women and children. It is of interest as being the most northern of the stockades constructed in the valley, and having figured conspicuously in the struggles with the Indians. It was situated about fifty yards above the west end of the ferry bridge, but the ground where it stood has since been washed away. An orchard once stood above the West Pittston end of the depot bridge, but the gradual encroachments of the river have uprooted nearly all of it.

A few old landmarks are still left. The residence of Mr. Carr, corner of Wyoming and Luzerne avenues, is one of the old original farm houses built when this was a part of Exeter township. J. W. Miller's house, the old ferry house and John S. Jenkins's residence are also points of historic interest.

The place was known in early times as Fort Jenkins, and the name was applied to the town until it was incorporated as a borough.

THE JENKINS AND HARDING CEMETERY.

This ground was given for a place of burial by Judge Jenkins, who for the Susquehanna Company made the treaty with the Indians for the lands lying on the Susquehanna. Judge Jenkins's wife, Lydia Gardner, and his sons John, Stephen and Thomas were buried here, also twenty or more of his grandchildren and great-grandchildren, and several great-great-grandchildren; together with Capt. Stephen Harding, a brother-in-law of Judge Jenkins, with his wife, Amy Gardner, and their sons Benjamin and Stukely. The last two were slain by the Indians June 30th, 1778, aged 25 and 23 years. Their grave attracts universal attention, and is about the oldest in this vicinity, but many others are very old and of historic interest.

MUNICIPAL ORGANIZATION.

West Pittston was incorporated as a borough in the autumn of 1857, the court taking action November 23d. The first election was held January 7th, 1858, at the Vine street school-house. Samuel Price was appointed judge and Miles C. Orr and Thomas Ford inspectors of the election, which resulted in the choice of Amherst Wisner, burgess; A. J. Griffith, William Apple, Cornelius Stark, Bradley Downing and Theodore Strong, councilmen. The council appointed Isaac W. Moister clerk, and Peter Polen treasurer.

Since then the burgesses elected have been: 1859-61, William Apple; 1862, Peter Polen; 1863, A. J. Griffith; 1864, J. H. Jenkins; 1865, R. J. Wisner; 1866, 1867, David T. Bound; 1868, Ralph D. Lacoë; 1869, 1870, J. C. F. Rommel; 1871, 1872, B. D. Beyea; 1873, Samuel Price; 1874, Barnard Sharkey; 1875, W. H. Cool; 1876, 1877, Bradley Downing, 1878, B. D. Beyea; 1879, George Corey; 1880, James Mantayne.

Clerks.—1859-61, Smith Sutherland; 1862 until August 10th, 1863, Samuel Price; August 10th, 1863, A. J. Loomis appointed; 1864, J. B. Hoyt; 1865, G. M. Richard (acting); 1866, 1867, Smith Sutherland; 1868-70, October, Charles H. Foster; 1870, October, 1872, R. J. Wisner; 1873, 1874, William R. Sax; 1875, B. D. Beyea; 1876, 1877, S. P. Fenn; 1878-80, J. B. Hoyt.

THE WYOMING VALLEY KNITTING-MILLS.

This enterprise was started under the name of Ellithorp & Delahunty, in the spring of 1874, by E. L. Ellithorp and J. P. Delahunty, formerly engaged in the same business at Cohoes, N. Y.

Feeling the need of more means they procured $15,000 from Pittston capitalists to provide buildings and power. The original building was fifty by one hundred feet, two stories high, with attic and basement, picker and boiler buildings attached. The business first employed sixty operatives, but after one year the third set of machinery was added and A. McI. De Witt was admitted as a partner, with $15,000 cash capital. The close of that year witnessing an increased demand for their products the capital was increased to $50,000, and R. D. Lacoë, J. B. Shiffer, Joseph Hilman, William Allen and Thomas Ford became partners with the original owners, under the firm name of Ellithorp & Co., Limited. Subsequently the buildings were enlarged and a fourth set of machinery added. Over one hundred hands are now employed, the annual product being about 16,000 dozens of all wool shirts and drawers, in white and scarlet. Their scarlet goods are a specialty in the market.

When running wholly on woolen goods they consume about 250,000 pounds of cleansed wool. Since the first the machinery has never been idle, except for repairs.

WEST PITTSTON CHURCHES.

The First Methodist Episcopal Church of West Pittston, on the corner of Wyoming and Montgomery avenues, is a semi-Gothic brick edifice with a corner tower and spire. It has a fine basement, containing a large lecture-room and four class-rooms. The auditorium has a seating capacity of seven hundred. The church, with site and furnishing, cost in 1873 $45,000.

The society was organized from the Pittston M. E. Church on the 27th of January, 1873, by Rev. George Peck, D. D., presiding elder of the district, by the election of B. D. Beyea, Charles Pugh, W. R. Sax, C. S. Stark, Bradley Downing, Daniel Jones, Barnard Sharkey, George B. Rommel and Thomas Ford as trustees, and H. C. Dewey, Peter Rinker, Chandler Williams, Henry Searl, B. D. Beyea, W. R. Sax, T. B. Lana, William McCabe and Thomas Nichols as stewards. The society numbered about 200 members, transferred from the old church.

The corner stone for the church edifice was laid in the fall of 1872 by Rev. G. P. Porter, of Scranton. The church was dedicated September 2nd, 1873. Rev. R. Nelson, D. D., preached to a very large congregation from Heb. 1, xiv. Rev. B. I. Ives, of Auburn, N. Y., preached in the evening from Rom. 12, i., and secured pledges for $31,000 needed to fully pay for the church.

The church had in December, 1879, 325 members, with 450 scholars and teachers in its Sunday-school. Charles Pugh, Esq., has been superintendent of the Sunday-school since its organization.

The following clergymen have been pastors: Rev. W. B. Westlake, 1873, 1874; Rev. S. Moore, 1875-77; Rev. A. Griffin, the present pastor, appointed in 1878.

First Presbyterian Church.—This society was an overflow of the Presbyterian church of Pittston. In the winter of 1877, at a meeting held in the M. E. church of West Pittston, it was decided to organize a church in that borough, and a petition for its formation was sent to the Presbytery of Lackawanna signed by many of its promoters. A building committee was appointed, and the work of building a chapel was speedily under way, a lot having been purchased on the corner of Exeter and Warren streets. The chapel was begun in May and completed the following December. It is built of brick, in the Gothic style of architecture, and has a seating capacity of 350. The design of the building was drawn by Mr. J. J. Merriam of Pittston. The cost of its erection and furniture was about $6,500. A committee appointed by the Presbytery of Lackawanna for the formation of the church met in the new chapel December 21st, 1877, and the organization was then effected. The rotary system of eldership was adopted, and Messrs. E. L. Elli-thorpe, J. B. Hoyt, William Slocum, Theodore Strong, J. J. Merriam and S. P. Fenn were elected elders for a term varying from five to three years. The church originally numbered 119 members, nearly all of whom were dismissed from the Presbyterian church of Pittston and received into the new organization. December 31st, 1877, Mr. N. I. Rubinkam, then completing his studies in the Princeton Theological Seminary, was called to become pastor. He being unable to take charge until the following May, Rev. R. E. Wilson, of Hudson, N. Y., supplied the pulpit until that time. Rev. Mr. Rubinkam was installed April 31st, 1878. The Sabbath-school of which Mr. E. L. Ellithorpe is superintendent, numbers 250 members. Its library contains over 300 volumes.

In the summer of 1879 an annex was built on the west side of the chapel for increased Sabbath-school facilities and for the enlargement of the audience room. This addition with furniture cost about $600. Sixty new members have been added to the original number. The church indebtedness has been materially diminished and very creditable contributions have also been made toward the benevolent objects of the church.

Mr. Rubinkam was born in Berks county, Pa., in 1851; entered Princeton college in 1870, and graduated in 1874; spent the winter and spring of 1874-75 in the University of Halle, Germany; entered Princeton Theological Seminary in September, 1875; was licensed to preach by the Central Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1877; graduated in theology at Princeton in 1878; was ordained by the Presbytery of Lackawanna, and installed pastor over the above church. After a pastorate of two years he was called to the Second Reformed church of Philadelphia, where he begun his labors in May, 1880.

FAIRMOUNT TOWNSHIP.

FAIRMOUNT was taken from Huntington in April, 1834. It has 1085 inhabitants.

Previous to the adoption of the State constitution of 1838 Jacob Ogden and Levi Seward were commissioned by the governor as justices. Justices have been elected under the new constitution as follows: Levi Seward and Silas Callender, 1840; Jonathan Pennington and James Lacock, 1845; J. C. Pennington and James F. Lacock, 1850; James F. Lacock and John H. Smith, 1855; William P. Robinson and Jacob Seeley, 1860; William P. Robinson and Thomas Ogden, 1865 and 1870. Nathan Kleintob and Thomas Ogden, 1875.

The south half of the township is quite thickly settled, and embraces some fertile farming lands. The north portion of the township embraces North mountain, a spur of the Alleghanies. This mountain was so named from the fact of its being the northerly one of two mountains over which the old turnpike crossed. Its summit is some 2,000 feet above the Susquehanna at Beach Haven, and from it can be seen ten of the counties in this State, also the celebrated Water Gap on the Delaware.

In the summer of 1878 Colonel Rickets built an observatory on the top of this mountain, and made it easy of access by a winding road up the mountain. This tower, 50 feet in height, with a 16-foot base, was destroyed by a gale in the latter part of 1878. Another, broader and higher, is being built by the same gentleman.

One of the most important industries of this township is the manufacture of maple sugar and syrup. The harvest is usually abundant, and lasts about six weeks each year. Most of the timber in the township is sugar maple. There are several large sugar orchards containing from 500 to 5,000 trees each, averaging one and a quarter pounds of sugar per tree.

There are hotel accommodations at Fairmount Springs for those visiting that place as a summer resort. There is also a store at this place, one at Red Rock, and one at Lacock's, on Huntington creek, in the southeast corner of the township. At this place also is a wagon and sleigh manufactory. There are also several blacksmiths and other artisans in the township, and a number of saw-mills.

EARLY SETTLERS AND BUSINESS ENTERPRISES.

Jacob Long is supposed to have been one of the first settlers, if not the first. Some of his descendants are still on the old homestead in the south part of the township. He came in 1792, journeying from the Delaware river with an ox team, and brought with him quite a large family and a stock of provisions, which was expected to last until more could be raised. As often happens in a new country the provisions would not last unless served out in rations. The old mortar and pestle constituted the only grist-mill until one was built at Wapwallopen, and then there was no road to it, and the old pioneer had to take his grist on his shoulder and his rifle in hand and march, marking the route as he went through the woods that he might not go astray as he returned.

Joseph Potter, a soldier of the Revolutionary war, was the first settler at Fairmount Springs. He located here long before the old Tioga turnpike was built.

Charles Fritz is one of the early settlers in the south part of the township. He was a soldier of the war of 1812, and is now eighty-eight years of age. He has several children living near him.

George Gearhart, another pioneer and also a soldier of the war of 1812, located in the southwest part of the township. Although eighty-eight years old he is as ready and intelligent as most men at fifty. He has lived to bestow his blessing upon twelve children, eighty-two grandchildren and fifty-three great-grandchildren.

Peter Boston, another early settler, now eighty-five years of age, located on Maple run, near the center of the south half of the township. He owns and operates a saw-mill, doing most of the work himself. He came here in 1820, and has been one of the most successful hunters of his day. He has killed over 400 bears, 1,000 deer, 20 catamounts, and wolves ad infinitum.

Joseph Moss located at what is now known as Moss's Corners, south of Boston's, in the Maple run valley. At this crossing are the Moss Methodist church and the Moss school-house.

The pioneer tavern was kept by Gad Seward, in 1818, at Fairmount Springs. It was a favorite resort for all inclined to mirth, as Gad was always ready with a sharp repartee or a side-splitting story, and for a mug of hot "flip" he could not be beaten. His larder was always supplied with the best game and fish of the season, and the traveler, wearied with stage coaching on the Tioga turnpike, was sure to leave Gad's hostelry refreshed as with new wine.

About the same time Andrew Horn opened a popular tavern at Red Rock, at the foot of North mountain. His place, being nearer the North mountain, became more of a resort for hunters and fishermen.

The pioneer foundry of Fairmount was built by Shadrach Lacock in 1830, in the southeast corner of the township, on Huntington creek. The Lacock plow, quite celebrated in its day, was made here. In 1874 D. E. Rittenhouse built his present foundry.

The first post-office was established in 1835, with J. C. Pennington as postmaster. He was succeeded by Jeremiah Britton. The office was that now called Fairmount Springs. It was first named "Fairmount Township" post-office. The next office was established at Red Rock, and the first postmaster there was Truman D. Taylor.

THOROUGHFARES.

As in other newly settled portions of our country, the pioneer of Fairmount traveled from place to place guided only by marked trees. Next would come the under-brushing and cutting out, to make room for the ox team and sled, and then other improvements followed until roads were made. The first of these were in the southeast part of the township, and from there they ran westerly and northwesterly along Maple run.

The Susquehanna and Tioga turnpike runs along and nearly parallel with the west border of the township, from its south line near S. White's place, northerly through Fairmount Springs and Red Rock, to a point south of Dodson's pond, where it turns into Sullivan county. It was commenced in 1811; work was suspended during the war of 1812, but resumed in 1816, and the road was completed through this township in 1818. It was built by a stock company, and paid a good dividend till travel was diverted to the steam channel. In 1845 it was abandoned by the company and surrendered to the township.

The first stage-drivers and mail-carriers over this line were Joshua Dodson, Timothy H. Tubbs and S. F. Headley.

EARLY AND LATER SCHOOLS.

The pioneer school-house in this township was built, of logs, in or about 1794, near the site of the Methodist Episcopal camp ground, between Huntington and Kitchen's creeks. The first teacher of whom we have any account was Mrs. Margaret Trescott, mother of Colonel E. L. Trescott, now living in Huntington. She taught the school in the summer of 1796.

In 1824 a school-house was built at Fairmount Springs, on the old Susquehanna and Tioga turnpike. This was a double log house, built both for church and school purposes. The pioneer teacher was Miss Paulina Culver, who taught there in the summer and fall of 1824.

The next school-house was also of logs, and built in 1826, at what is known as Red Rock, at the foot of North mountain, on the old turnpike. The first teachers were James Park and Elias Myers.

These three old log pioneer school-houses have given place to others of modern architecture, and there are now eight in this township, with all the modern appliances, and occupied by teachers of the first grade. Several of the school-houses in the township are also used for religious purposes.

RELIGIOUS.

As early as 1800 the veteran itinerants, in their journeyings around the circuit, preached at what was known in later years as Lacock's school-house. Although no organization was formed at this place for a number of years, the circuit-riders, including Gideon Draper, Morris Howe, James Paynter, John Rhodes, Nicholas Willis and others, continued to find their way to this settlement, also to that on the west side of the township at Fairmount Springs.

In 1824 Elder Elias Dodson, a Baptist preacher, found his way to Fairmount Springs, preaching there occasionally in the old log school-house at that place. Just how long Mr. Dodson continued his labors at this place is not now known. In 1843, when Revs. J. W. Haughwout and Irving H. Torrence were traveling the Bloomingdale circuit, Methodist classes were formed at the Lacock school-house, at the Moss church and at the Taylor church. In 1847 the class at the Bethel school-house was formed, in 1849 the one at Oakland, and in 1852 the one at Hoover's, thus making six classes in all in the township, one at each of the two churches and four at school-houses. Public services are held by the preacher in charge once in two weeks with each class. A Sunday-school is organized at each appointment, and kept up during the summer season.

FOSTER TOWNSHIP.

ON November 15th, 1855, this township was set off from Denison and named after A. L. Foster, Esq., the principal early benefactor of the village of Eckley. It is noted for the excellent quality and large quantity of coal produced at its mines. John Lines was the pioneer settler. Besides his garden patch where he first located he cleared a piece of land at Terrapin Pond, about three miles southwest, and raised the first farm crop in this township. At that time Foster was not surveyed into lots, but was an unbroken and almost unknown wilderness, filled with wild beasts. The nearest neighbor was at Lowerytown, now Rockport, seven miles down the river, and visiting, especially in the evening, was a rare luxury.

About 1840 Thomas Morrison came in from the valley and located on Pond creek, three miles south of White Haven. Here he built two saw-mills and a grist-mill. The timber was soon exhausted and the saw-mills went to decay. Soon after Mr. Morrison settled he was appointed post-master, and the little settlement became known as Morrison's post-office. The grist-mill, yet in operation, is owned by Peter Moyer.

The following is a list of justices elected in Foster since its formation as a township, with the years of their election: Reuben Leisenring, 1857; Thomas Morrison, 1860, 1869; Edward McHugh, 1864, 1869; James Morrison, 1865; John C. Roach, 1870; Francis Gabrio, 1870; William Sneddon, sen., 1874; William Sneddon, 1875.

The population of the township in 1880 was 5,118, against 3,000 in 1870.

COLLIERIES.

Highland colliery, in the west part of the town, two and a half miles northeast of Jeddo, is owned by the Highland Coal Company and operated by G. B. Markle & Co. G. B. Markle is superintendent. At slope No. 1 there are four engines, with a total of 140 horse power, and 123 men and boys employed under ground and 75 on the surface. At colliery No. 2 there are three engines, with a total of 110 horse power. There are 81 men and boys employed under ground and 77 above. At slope No. 1 there were mined in 1878, 60,087 tons of coal and at colliery No 2, 55,942 tons.

Sandy Run colliery, on a creek of that name southwest from White Haven, is owned by the Richardson estate and operated by M. S. Kemmerer & Co., with Thomas M. Righter as superintendent. There are nine engines at this colliery, with a total of 700 horse power. There are 97 men and boys employed under ground and 57 on the surface. In 212 days in 1878 they mined 82,032 tons of coal.

Buck Mountain colliery is partly in Carbon county. It is owned and operated by the Buck Mountain Coal Company. William Spencer is superintendent. The twelve engines have 525 horse power. There are 256 men and boys employed under ground, and 124 above the surface. The amount of coal mined in 1878 was 113,208 tons.

HEBERTON CIRCUIT.

The Heberton circuit of the Methodist Episcopal church was organized May 15th, 1875, and embraced the following appointments: Upper Lehigh, South Heberton, Highland and Jeddo borough in the township of Foster, and Latimer, Milnesville, Ebervale and Humbolt in the township of Hazle. Eckley was added, and Humbolt was dropped the same year. In 1876 Harleigh, in Hazle township, and Sandy Run, in Foster, were added to the circuit. All of the above were school-house appointments except South Heberton and Milnesville. There were then 112 members and 46 probationers. Rev. N. S. Buckingham was the presiding elder, and Rev. John Horning preacher in charge, with Rev. Charles Buck junior preacher. The local preachers were Revs. George Bird and Joseph Evans.

Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, at South Heberton, was built in 1874, at a cost of $3,500, and opened for service without any formal dedication. There are 18 members at this place. The board of trustees consists of John M. Cunius, Jacob Mack, William H. Thomas, William Chalinger, John Burton, Joseph Evans, Alexander Steward, George Turner and William Carter.

Latimer Methodist Episcopal Church was built in 1878, and dedicated the same year by Rev. J. W. Leckie. It cost $1,300. The trustees are D. S. Stine, William Martin, Joseph Evans, H. Wolf and Alexander Steward. Rev. William Porter was the preacher in charge in 1879.

The Methodist Episcopal church at Jeddo was formerly a large school-house, and was purchased by the society, remodeled and fitted up for a church. The trustees are Jacob Mack, Robert Cowen, William Thomas, Edward Johnson, sen., and Thomas Miller.

At Ebervale the Methodist Episcopal society worships in a neat and substantial hall, built jointly by the society and the Young Men's Christian Association of that place. There is also a flourishing union Sunday-school connected with the society, under the superintendence of Cyrus Young, Esq.

In October, 1876, the M. E. church at Milnesville was destroyed by fire, and the services have since been held in the school-house at that place.

According to the conference minutes in 1879 there were 352 members on the whole circuit.

The following preachers besides those named have served on this circuit since 1875: Rev. John Horning, 1875, 1876; Rev. C. L. Bennett, 1877, 1878, and the present pastor, Rev. Edmund White, 1879. The junior preachers have been: Rev. Charles J. Buck, 1875; Rev. J. R. Shipe, 1876, 1877; Revs. O. H. Huston and George E. King for a part of 1878, and Rev. J. C. Brown, 1879.

A union Sunday-school exists in nearly every school-house within the borders of the circuit, and at each church. There are 39 officers and teachers, and 297 scholars. The benevolent collections in these schools for 1878 amounted to $107.

SOUTH HEBERTON.

Joseph Birkbeck was born at Todd's House, Windmer End, near Brough, Westmoreland county, England, May 2nd, 1802, and married Elizabeth Johnson, who was born at Buck Hills, Stainmoor, near Brough, February 12th, 1804. They came to America in 1844, and the same year located at South Heberton, where he bought a tract of land of Edward Lynch. Here he built a log house, the first in this then wilderness, on the site of the frame house built in 1860, now occupied by his widow, Mrs. Elizabeth Birkbeck. The next settler was N. Howes, who purchased land of Mr. Birkbeck and built the first frame house in this section, just west of Birkbeck's. Soon after this other settlers came in, and ere long the forest began to melt away. Coal fields were developed and the prospect of a large consequent population and demand for building lots led Mr. Birkbeck to have surveyed the town plot of South Heberton, and soon a thriving village was growing up, depending on surrounding mining towns for support.

Mr. Birkbeck's was the first clearing in this then forest; in it were raised the first crops, and here the first orchard was set out.

The first child born at South Heberton was Elizabeth, daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth Birkbeck, born in 1845. The first death at this place was that of William, son of Joseph and Elizabeth Birkbeck, which occurred Feb. 11th, 1846. He was aged 4 years, 3 months and 15 days.

In 1845 and 1846 Mr. Joseph Birkbeck cut the road through the woods from South Heberton through Eckley to Buck mountain. Eckley was then known as Shingletown, as no business was done there except by two or three parties whose occupation was making shingles, carting them to either White Haven or Hazleton and trading them for the necessaries of life, such as whiskey, pork and tobacco.

The first store at South Heberton was kept by a man named Feist, a little west of Birkbeck's. Soon afterward a Mr. Minig kept a little store near Feist's.

The first tavern was kept by N. Howes, where Joseph Jamison now lives, a little west of Birkbeck's. Previous, however, to the opening of Howes's tavern, Mr. Birkbeck accommodated parties who were prospecting in this region for anthracite deposits, with the best the house afforded. Among the guests who partook of Mr. and Mrs. Birkbeck's hospitality, were Judge Tench Coxe, Prof. William F. Roberts, Hon. Ario Pardee, Mr. Leisenring, Mr. Sharp and others.

The first school-house at this place was built in 1878, and is a frame building.

When Mr. and Mrs. Birkbeck moved into this then wilderness they were far from any settlement. At Morrison, near White Haven, was the nearest store, and Straw's, over in Butler, was the nearest grist-mill. For meat they depended upon such as the forest afforded, which was taken in different ways. Mrs. Birkbeck related to us the manner in which she captured the "pride of the forest." One afternoon in the fall of the second year after they had cleared a patch on the hillside above the house, her attention was attracted by some dogs making a "great fuss" in the clearing, and she discovered a noble buck with his wide spreading antlers coming down the hillside. The thought flashed through her mind what nice venison he would make. With a noble matronly spirit of providing for an impoverished larder, she laid down her child Elizabeth, caught up an ax that lay near by, and started for the deer. The deer seeing her, and having been worried and maddened by the dogs, changed his course direct for Mrs. Birkbeck. She, not dreaming of the danger she was in, met the proud antlered son of the forest, and the battle commenced. The matron finally struck the deer with the ax on one of his fore-legs, and breaking it brought him to the ground, where with the aid of the dogs the venison was soon secured.

South Heberton now contains a church (Methodist Episcopal), a school-house, two stores, two hotels, a tin shop, a shoe shop, a blacksmith shop, three saloons, and about 500 inhabitants.

ECKLEY.

Eckley first came into public notice in 1854, when Messrs. Sharp, Leisenring & Weiss opened the coal mines here. A branch of the Lehigh Valley Railroad was built to this place in 1855, and a shipment of coal was made in September of that year. A large and commodious hotel was built here in 1857, and subsequently converted into a dwelling house. The school-house was built in 1858, and the steam saw-mill in 1856. The Protestant Episcopal and Presbyterian churches were built in 1858, and since then the Catholic church. The population is about 600. E. T. Dodson is the present postmaster.

The colliery at this place is known as Council Ridge Colliery, and is owned by the estate of Tench Coxe, and operated by J. Leisenring & Co. At slope No. 2 there are 160 men and boys employed under ground, and 70 on the surface. There are eight engines, with a total of 375 horse power. At No. 5 there are 77 men employed under ground, and 44 on the surface. There are seven engines, of 375 horse power. The number of tons of coal mined in 1878 for both slopes was 143,884.

UPPER LEHIGH.

Upper Lehigh is an exception to the rule in mining towns, as it is a model of neatness, presenting the appearance of a tidy New England village. The property is all owned by the Upper Lehigh Coal Company, and the stockholders are personally represented in every department of the work. The village was laid out in 1865 into regular streets and blocks, and the miners' houses, 205 in number, making 410 tenements of that class, are substantially built upon solid foundations, and are of a uniform size and neatly painted. The streets are broad and are kept scrupulously clean, as no rubbish of any kind is allowed to be deposited in the streets or alleys. The houses of the proprietors, superintendent, chief clerk and foreman are of modern architecture, and are painted a different color from those of the miners. The town is about 700 feet higher than the Lehigh at White Haven, and is approached from the east by the Nescopeck branch of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, which was built to this place in 1867. The first building put up was the steam saw-mill, which was built in the fall of 1865 and commenced running that winter; in the spring of 1866 the company built 25 double houses, making 50 tenements. The first school-house, the double one on the Foster side of the line, was built in 1867, the second one in 1870, and the third one in 1876. The last two are on the Butler side of the line. George W. Kemmerer was appointed postmaster in 1867. At first the mails were received from Eckley; they are now received daily by the railroad. H. M. Merrick is the postmaster. In 1866 the company built a first class machine shop, where all its own work is done from the raw material. The company store, the only one here, was built in 1866. The Upper Lehigh Hotel, built by the Upper Lehigh Coal Company, was opened for the reception of guests January 28th, 1869, by Conrad Seiple as manager. This is the only hotel in the place.

The village is well supplied with pure spring water from the reservoir on the north side, above the double school-house. The water is carried in pipes to all parts of the town, and to the breakers.

The Upper Lehigh cemetery was laid out into lots in 1866.

T. J. Mays is the resident physician, employed on a salary and paid by assessment alike upon the employers and employed.

There are at this place two churches (Presbyterian and Welsh), and a Methodist Episcopal society without a church; a store, three school-houses and four schools, a hall, a shoemaker, and 1,400 inhabitants.

MINES AT UPPER LEHIGH.

The mines were opened by the Upper Lehigh Coal Company in the summer of 1866, and the first shipment of coal was made in March, 1867. There are two CHURCHES AT UPPER LEHIGH.

Welsh Baptist.—This society was organized in 1868 in the double school-house, by Rev. John Johnson. He was succeeded by George H. Hammer, who was the first regularly installed pastor of the church, and remained with it seven years. The church is located on the south side of Main street, and was built in 1873 at a cost of $3,500. William Powell was at first and is now one of the deacons, elders, and trustees. The church is without a pastor. The present membership is 90. The value of the church property is $3,000. There is a flourishing Sunday-school, with E. M. Williams as superintendent.

Presbyterian.—This church owes its origin at this place to members of the Upper Lehigh Coal Company who belonged to the Presbyterian Church previous to locating here. John Leisenring, now of Mauch Chunk but at the time referred to mining coal at Eckley, was the first to purchase the land on which the present church edifice is built. With him were associated such Christian gentlemen as Samuel B. Price, Daniel Bertsch, jr., and Walter Leisenring. No sooner were the mines in full operation than these men set about securing a place of worship, not only for themselves but for those in their employ. For a time they were supplied alternately by Presbyterian and Methodist ministers, and used an extemporized house of worship. The church was formally organized June 28th, 1868, by a committee appointed by the Presbytery of Luzerne for that purpose, with the following members: Mrs. Harriet B. Price, Miss Leisenring, Parker Price, Mrs. Anna Oliver and Mrs. Mary Jamison. An election for elder was held, which resulted in the choice of Parker Price.

The present church was built in 1871 at a cost for building and furnishing of about $4,500. The present value of the church property is $4,000.

Rev. John Johnson was the minister who gathered a nucleus for a church. With him Rev. Mr. Day, a Methodist minister, labored in preaching the gospel. Mr. Johnson continued to supply the pulpit, with the approval of the Presbytery, until the spring of 1870. Nov. 1st, 1870, Rev. George H. Hammer commenced his labors as a supply, which he continued until Nov. 18th, 1877. The present pastor, Rev. D. McLeod, a member of the Presbytery of Hudson, N. Y., commenced his labors as stated supply.

GOOD TEMPLARS' LODGE AT UPPER LEHIGH.

Peerless Lodge, No. 1,283, Independent Order of Good Templars was instituted Feb. 5th, 1878. The original officers of the lodge were Thomas Jackson, W. P. C. T.; William Stafford, W. C. T.; M. E. Boyer, W. V. T.; George Vanauker, W. S.; Alexander Vanauker, W. F. S.; W. M. Trescott, W. T.; Henry Helmer, W. M.; Emory Shelley, W. I. G.; Evan Moses, W. O. G.; Charles Trescott, W. C.; W. D. Stafford, L. D.

The regular meetings of the lodge were held in the Butler school-house from the date of organization until the following October, since which time the lodge has occupied the Foster school-house.

The succeeding presiding officers have been M. E. Boyer, George Vanauker, James Brookmire, Thomas Eastwood, Charles Croll, and W. G. Stafford.

The lodge is in a flourishing condition. The officers for 1880 are: J. W. McMurtrie, W. C. T.; Thomas Eastwood, W. V. T.; M. E. Boyer, W. S.; W. W. Trescott, W. F. S.; Emory Shelley, W. T.; J. Sneddon, W. M.; William Kloss, W. S. G.; William Shelley, W. O. G.; Thomas Terry, W. C.; W. G. Stafford, L. D.

WHITE HAVEN BOROUGH.

THE act of the General Assembly of 1843 by which this borough was incorporated stipulated that the place of holding the borough elections should be "the house of Isaac Ripple," and that the first election for borough purposes should be on the first Monday of September following, and others annually thereafter on the third Friday in March.

The first annual borough election took place March 17th, 1843. George W. Butler was elected judge for the occasion, George Straub inspector, and Edward P. Tuttle clerk. The following persons were elected to fill the several offices of the borough: Chief Burgess, Joseph Yardley; councilmen—Abiathar Tuttle, John Shefferstine, Jacob Zink, Samuel Hunter, Jonathan Brock and David Dean; constable, James B. Weller; street commissioner, John Wasscr; overseer of the poor, Lucius Blakeslee.

At a meeting of the town council March 20th, 1843, at the office of Abiathar Tuttle, they formed themselves into a board, and by lot divided themselves into two classes as follows: First class—David Dean, Samuel Hunter and John Shefferstine; second class—Abiathar Tuttle, Jacob Zink and Jonathan Brock. David Dean was appointed clerk of the council for the ensuing year.

The election held March 17th, 1843, having been declared null and void by the Court of Common Pleas of Luzerne county, the Legislature authorized a special election for the third Monday of May, 1848. An election was accordingly held "at the house of Samuel House," when the following officers were elected: Chief Burgess, Joseph Yardley; councilmen—David H. Taylor, Edward Lockwood, Horatio G. Hoven, David Dean, Daniel Wasser and I. Cowley Past; street commissioner, George Arnold; high constable, Wayne Sprowl; director of the poor, David Dean. I. Cowley Past was appointed clerk of the council for the ensuing year.

Since Mr. Yardley the following persons have served as chief burgess for the borough, and for the years named: 1849-51, Edward Lockwood; 1852, Frederick H. Bund; 1853, John H. Nace; 1854, David H. Taylor; 1855, Washington Torbert; 1856, Josiah W. Enbody; 1857, Stephen Bolles; 1858, 1860, 1863, Jacob Wirtler; 1859, Samuel Hunter; 1861, 1862, Robert R. Morgan; 1864, S. W. Trimmer; 1865, George R. Crellin; 1866, Lucius Blakeslee; 1867, 1870, Theodore Smith; 1868, 1869, 1872, Bradley Childs; 1871, Otto Kaiser; 1873, Edwin Shortz; 1874, Daniel Steele; 1875-77, Henry Kaiser; 1878, 1879, Charles Kleckner, the present burgess.

The town council for 1879 was composed of the following named persons: John J. Baker, jr., John W. Levan, Jerome Scott, George W. Horton, Rudolph Feist and Samuel Wallace. The clerk was S. Maguire.

The following is a list of the justices of the peace elected for the borough since it was chartered, and the year of their election:

David Dean, 1850, 1862, 1870, 1875; G. L. Staples, 1852, 1857; Joseph Knauss, 1855; Lucius Blakeslee, 1860; Jacob Ruger, 1865; William Eddinger, 1868, 1873; B. F. Ricker, 1873; E. C. Wasser, 1873; E. P. Tuttle, 1875; E. P. Morris, 1876.

BEGINNINGS AND GROWTH.

White Haven was first settled in 1824, by John Lines, and named in honor of Josiah White, who was an early, prominent and enterprising citizen and the builder of the old fashioned "bear trap" locks that made the Lehigh navigable as far above here as Stoddardsville, and were in use as late as 1860, when the old Lehigh Navigation and Coal Company used the river above and the so-called canal below White Haven as a means of transportation. The Lehigh valley canal was built from Easton to Mauch Chunk and packets commenced running in July, 1829. In 1835 the canal was commenced at White Haven. A basin was constructed along the bank of the river at the upper end of the town, with a lock and a dam across the river at the upper end of the basin. This basin, lock and dam still remain intact, as a monument to the indomitable perseverance and enterprise of Mr. White and the Lehigh Navigation and Coal Company. This dam and lock were designated as dam No. 1, the numbers increasing down stream.

At that time the hills on either side of the river at this place were thickly covered with pine timber, that would now be considered very valuable. The company as soon as possible, and even before the canal was finished, built a saw-mill near the upper end of the basin, on the river side, and cut out the lumber necessary in building the original dam across the river a little above where the Lehigh Valley Railroad crosses. Other saw-mills were soon built, and in a short time White Haven was one of the busiest lumber depots in the State. It continued so as long as plenty of logs were within a reasonable distance, and as late as 1860 there were ten large saw-mills at this place, cutting out annually an aggregate of 20,000,000 feet of lumber. White Haven at that time was an interesting place, both on account of the gigantic series of dams and locks and the magnificent wildness of the natural scenery. This also became the great depot for the sale of the immense amount of lumber manufactured at the then numerous mills on the river above, between here and Stoddardsville, as the navigation company ran their boats up through the old bear-trap locks to that place. The second saw-mill at White Haven was built in 1836 by Mr. Stenson Crouse, a little further down the river.

The old canal locks and dams were swept away by the great freshet of 1862. The fast canal packet "Washington," commanded in 1835 by Captain Hillman, is superseded by two first class lines of railroad. The little old school-house and church combined has given place to a fine large school building and five churches of modern size and architecture, and the three or four houses have so multiplied as to contain a population of 1,408. The single old road that lay along the bank of the river has become the main street of a flourishing town, and the little old tavern has been superseded by the railroad restaurant, where hundreds of travelers are daily fed.

The first family to make a permanent location in this township and borough was that of John Lines. He came from Hanover township, six miles below Wilkes-Barre, in the latter part of April, 1824, having his household goods on a sled, drawn by a yoke of oxen. Aside from his family, and good health, the sled load of goods comprised all his earthly possessions. He located at Linesville, just over the hill back of White Haven, on Lines creek. Here he built a log house in May, 1824, which was subsequently destroyed by fire, when he built a house of hewed logs, which is still standing, and now owned by the Lehigh Navigation and Coal Company.

In that house Mr. Lines kept the first tavern in White Haven. The next tavern in the borough was where the White Haven House now stands, on the corner of Wilkes-Barre and Railroad streets.

The first plank house in the borough was built by John Fordsman in 1837, on the corner opposite the White Haven House, and it is now owned by James Trimmer.

The first school-house in the borough was built in 1838, of rough logs, and stood in the rear of where C. Kleckner's store now stands, on Basin street. The site is occupied by the track of the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

The iron foundry and machine shops at White Haven were built in 1839, by the Lehigh Navigation and Coal Company, and Messrs. Miner & Lippincott were the operators. The concern originally stood about half way up the basin, and in 1866 or 1867 was moved to where it now stands, between the lower end of the basin and the river. It is now owned and operated by Samuel Wallace.

The pioneer store was kept by A. O. Chahoon. It was of rough logs, was built in 1835, and stood at the lower end of Susquehanna street, near where the Lehigh Hotel formerly stood. The nearest trading points at that time were Wilkes-Barre, Berwick and Mauch Chunk.

The pioneer physician in this place was Dr. Boyd. He came from Wilkes-Barre, and was employed by the Lehigh Navigation Company on a salary raised by assessment upon the men employed by the company. Most of the large coal companies employ physicians and pay them in the same way.

The first resident lawyer here was Gaius Halsey, a native of the borough. He commenced practice in 1870.

The post-office was established in 1835, with William Hoven as postmaster. It was kept in the old log store at the foot of Susquehanna street. The mails were brought on horseback once a week from Wilkes-Barre.

The first saw-mill was built by John Lines in 1826 or 1827, on Lines creek, near where he built his house. He had in connection with his mill a turning lathe, for making posts and rounds for old-fashioned splint bottom chairs. The market for them was at Wilkes-Barre, Berwick and Allentown. They had to be hauled to those places with an ox team, and the boy John, who is now an old man, living in White Haven, was the teamster on those long trips. The journey to Wilkes-Barre and back took three days, to and from Berwick four, and to Allentown and return six days; provided the roads were passable, and the "chair stuff" found a brisk market in exchange for such things as were necessary for the sustenance of the family.

The first brick building in the borough was built in 1851, by the Odd Fellows' Hall Association, and it is now standing on Basin street.

The White Haven Standard was published by Mr. Miner from 1876 till the 1st of November, 1879.

The White Haven water works reservoir was built in 1856 on lots 20, 22 and 24, which were purchased of the Lehigh Navigation and Coal Company for $300. The borough is bountifully supplied with pure spring water from the mountains of Foster township.

During the war of 1861-65 the borough furnished more than its full quota of men, paying large bounties, for which bonds were issued. The bonds are all paid and the borough is free from debt.

The Lehigh Boom Company was organized May 7th, 1868. The original directors and officers were as follows: Directors—John Brown, Bradley Childs, Edwin Shortz, David H. Taylor and William D. Brown; president, John Brown; secretary and treasurer, Edwin Shortz. The booms were located on the Lehigh river in the immediate vicinity of White Haven, and their capacity is 30,000,000 feet of lumber. The present directors are John Brown, William D. Brown, C. L. Keck, A. Lewis and J. Stauffir. President, John Brown; secretary and treasurer, Charles L. Keck. Besides the mills in White Haven the company supplies four other mills farther down the stream and a steam saw-mill above the upper dam.

The Knickerbocker Ice Company, of New York, has built a large ice house at this place, and gathers large crops of ice here.

There are now at this place four saw-mills, a foundry and machine shop, four hotels (White Haven, Mansion, Eagle and Pacific), several saloons, the usual number of dry goods and grocery stores for a place of this size, several wagon, blacksmith and other shops, a job printing office, a graded school building, a public hall, five churches (Methodist Episcopal, Protestant Episcopal, Lutheran, Presbyterian and Roman Catholic), and the stations of the Lehigh Valley Railroad and the Central Railroad of New Jersey, at both of which all passenger trains stop. John K. Torbert is the postmaster, and the office is kept on Basin street.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The White Haven fire department was organized June 25th, 1877, at a meeting of the following named gentlemen: R. I. Westover, Henry Kaiser, John Fisher, Samuel Wallace, Bradley Childs, John Fiel, Stephen Maguire, Benjamin Jacoby and James Ray. The following officers were elected: Henry Kaiser, president; Samuel Wallace, chief engineer; Stephen Maguire, secretary and treasurer.

The White Haven Water Company was organized in 1856, and a reservoir built on Church, between Buffalo and Hemlock streets; over it was built a brick building, the lower part of which is used for an engine and hose house, and the upper rooms for a town hall.

The borough the same year bought a steam fire engine of the Silsby Manufacturing Company, of Seneca Falls, N. Y.

Charles Kleckner is the president of the department. The rest of the officers are the same as at first.

WHITE HAVEN SAVINGS BANK.

This bank was opened January 2nd, 1872, with the following directors: A. F. Peters, Charles L. Heck, John R. Crellin, Samuel Wallace, Gaius L. Halsey and Charles Kleckner. The officers were: President, A. F. Peters; vice-president, Charles L. Keck; cashier, Samuel Dunbar. Mr. Dunbar resigned in three months, and Reuben King, his successor, served but three months. Stephen Maguire, the present cashier, was then elected. The directors, president, and vice-president are as at first. The authorized capital of the bank is $25,000, with the privilege of increasing it to $50,000.

CHURCHES OF WHITE HAVEN.

PRESBYTERIAN.

Rev. Richard Webster, for a long time pastor of the Presbyterian church at Mauch Chunk, a man of much missionary spirit, was intimately connected with the organizing of this section as a missionary enterprise, as was also Dr. John Dorrance, of Wilkes-Barre. At the first meeting of the Presbytery of Luzerne, in September, 1843, supplies were appointed for White Haven. In the spring of 1844 Rev. Darwin Cook, a missionary, was directed to give one Sabbath a month to White Haven. There was only one Presbyterian in the neighborhood. A Sabbath-school was also started at the time. Subsequently Rev. Mr. Moore, who preached at Beaver Meadow, was appointed to spend one Sabbath morning in each month at White Haven. In February, 1848, Rev. David Harbison entered upon ministerial labor in connection with Beaver Meadow.

The Presbyterians having held their services thus far in a plain one-story school-house, it was determined to erect a church, and in the summer of 1849 the corner stone was laid by Rev. Richard Webster, of Mauch Chunk. The edifice was placed on the public ground, means being limited. The building was dedicated free from debt December 25th, 1851, and stood on the northeast corner of the graveyard on the hill. It now stands on Northumberland street and is used as a dwelling.

The present Presbyterian church of White Haven was organized December 6, 1850, with twenty-three members, three of whom are still in White Haven—Mrs. Rosanna Morris, Mrs. Lavina Peters and Mrs. Margery S. Childs. At the time of the organization William Davis was ordained elder.

Rev. Samuel A. Gayley came here in June, 1850, and labored six months. He organized the Sunday-school and preached with much success.

Rev. James Scott preached here in the summer of 1851; Rev. John F. Baker from 1852 to 1854; Rev. Joseph W. Porter, a licentiate, from May, 1854, till the autumn of 1857, when he was succeeded by Rev. Jonathan Osmond.

Rev. James M. Salmon was pastor from August 1st, 1863, till August 1st, 1873. During his pastorate the present church on Berwick street was built. The corner stone was laid October 4th, 1868, with a sermon by Rev. Dr. I. Z. Grant, of Easton; and Rev. Dr. S. C. Logan preached at the dedication, December 2nd, 1869. The amount of indebtedness, $1,400, was provided for at the time, so that this house, like the first one, was dedicated free of debt.

Mr. Salmon was the first installed pastor. Rev. P. B. Cook was the supply here from November, 1873, till November, 1875; and the present pastor, Rev. N. I. M. Bogert, began his labors April 1st, 1876.

The elders are E. P. Morris and Samuel R. Porter; deacons, J. E. King and L. Levan; trustees, E. P. Morris, S. R. Porter, J. E. King, A. F. Peters, C. S. Keck and William Buckalew. The church has a membership of sixty-three. The Sunday-school numbers one hundred and twenty-five scholars.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

The Methodist Episcopal church of White Haven was organized in 1835, in the old log school-house that stood back of where Charles Kleckner's store now stands. The following were among the original members: Abiathar Tuttle and wife, Elizabeth Torbert, George F. Tench and George Muer. Rev. George Bergstresser, a veteran itinerant, was the first Methodist preacher in this immediate vicinity, and was present at the organization of the society. The first class leader is supposed to have been Abiathar Tuttle.

The present church was built in 1839, when Rev. Joseph A. Ross was the pastor. In 1858 the annual conference made White Haven a station, with Rev. John A. Price as pastor, who remained two years. Since then the pastors have been: Revs. R. E. Wilson, two years; D. S. Monroe, one year; B. F. Stephens, two years; Samuel Thomas, two years; Henry G. Dill, one year; William C. Hesser, three years; John A. De Moyer, one year; J. B. Akers, two years; Emery T. Swarts, two years; A. M. Kester, two years, and J. T. Wilson, the present pastor (1879), two years.

The value of the church property is $5,000.

The Sunday-school is in a flourishing condition, under the superintendence of the pastor.

ST. PAUL'S EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CONGREGATION.

This congregation was organized February 28th, 1864, by the Rev. Hermann Reif, who had been sent as a missionary to this region by the Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania.

At its first communion, held April 3d, 1864, the following persons communed: John G. Baetz, Adam Baetz, John Feil, Nicolaus Geuss, Frederick Holmann, Frederick Krueger, Frederick Mellies, J. Peter Moyer, Daniel Shantz, Margaret Baetz, Barbara Braudmeier, Gertrude Fuehr, Barbara Geuss, Lavina Heimbach, Catharine Krueger, Johanna Kaiser, Pauline Mellies, Ella A. Moyer, Kate Moyer, Sophia Vollmer, Susanna Washburn.

The first officers of the congregation were: Elders, Nicolaus Geuss, Frederick Krueger; deacons—Frederick Mellies, J. Christian Heimbach.

At the meeting of the Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania held at Pottstown in May, 1864, the congregation was regularly received into that body, and it has ever since been in connection with it—the constitution of the congregation does not allow any minister to be called as its pastor unless he is or is about to be connected with that body.

For more than a year the congregation worshiped in the Presbyterian church, but difficulties arising, and the want of a place of worship of its own being more and more felt, two lots were purchased during the summer of 1865, and a church and parsonage erected thereon. The corner stone of the church was laid June 25th, 1865, by the Rev. C. F. Weldon, missionary superintendent of the ministerium, assisted by Rev. F. J. F. Shantz and the pastor, Rev. G. F. W. Guensch; and on Christmas of the same year it was consecrated by the Rev. C. W. Shaeffer, president of the ministerium, assisted by Rev. A. T. Garsenheimer and the pastor. The present value of the church property is about $4,000. The congregation was organized as a German congregation, but on February 3d, 1868, by-laws were adopted allowing the pastor, "if willing and able," to preach sometimes in the English language. Since then the evening services have been regularly held in the English language, and with most favorable results—the attendance at these being fully as large as that of the German morning service.

For eleven years this was a mission congregation, and in connection with the congregations at Eckley, Jeddo and Weatherly formed the White Haven charge. In 1875 the congregation became self-supporting, called its own pastor, and has ever since faithfully and liberally supported him.

Since its organization about 300 persons have been received from other churches and by confirmation. The present communicant membership is about 225.

The following ministers have served this congregation: Rev. H. Reif, 1864, 1865; Rev. G. F. W. Guensch, 1865-68; Rev. J. H. Schmidt, 1868-75; Rev. W. H. Laubenstein, 1875-77. Rev. G. T. Weibel, the present pastor, took charge of the congregation June 1st, 1878. The present officers of the congregation are: Pastor, Rev. G. T. Weibel; elders, Henry Hemsath, Jacob Klumb; trustees, John Kolb, Henry Hemsath; deacons, Owen Moyer, John Kolb, G. Huettinger, Robert Farnhard.

There is a flourishing Sunday-school connected with the congregation. It was organized in May, 1866, with about 40 scholars and but few teachers. Its first superintendent was Mr. Samuel Tucker.

The school is now conducted alternately in the German and English languages. German and English hymn books and text books are used, and the classes are arranged according to language—German classes with German teachers, and English classes with English teachers. The school numbers about 300 scholars and 40 teachers. It has a fine library of about 300 volumes of German and English books. Its present officers are: German superintendent, John Kolb; English superintendent, James Deterline; sec., Frederick Baetz; treas., John Feil; librarian, Edwin W. Feist.

ST. PATRICK'S CHURCH AND CONGREGATION.

St. Patrick's Roman Catholic church is situated in the southwest portion of the town, on rising ground sufficiently elevated to overlook the entire borough. It is built on two lots each 40 by 150 feet, extending north and south from Maple to Alleghany street, and fronting on another street. The building is of wood, 34 by 60 feet, and 18 feet in the clear. It makes no pretension whatever to architectural beauty; is painted plain white on the outside, the pews in walnut color. The corner stone was laid in October, 1866, by the Right Rev. James Wood, D. D., his immediate jurisdiction at that time still extending over Luzerne county. He was attended during the ceremonies by Revs. Noonan and Filan. The concourse of spectators was very large, very few of the inhabitants of the borough ever having witnessed such a ceremony before. The frame work of the church was put up by contract during the year, without, however, being plastered or having any pews inserted. The work was done under the supervision of the Rev. Mr. Noonan, and together with the lots cost about $2,400. Money was most liberally donated by the Rev. gentleman, members of the congregation and men of all denominations residing in the borough, donations ranging from $100 downward. Mr. John McAndrews and John Glynn acted as collectors, and the latter also as treasurer.

The number of Catholics in the borough and vicinity was estimated at eight or nine hundred. They were mostly employed on the railroads then in process of construction. This number has since, as employment became more scarce in the vicinity, steadily decreased by emigration to other parts, till at present the congregation does not number more than 450 souls all told.

The first Catholic settlers of this region were Francis Lynch and Patrick Dolan; the former made his home here about 1840. In the next ten years the number of Catholics gradually increased and they were visited once a year from Honesdale by the Rev. Mr. Fitzsimmons, who used to hold services at the house of James and afterward of Francis Lynch. During 1850 the Rev. Mr. Sharp attended to the spiritual wants of the Catholics of White Haven, and the Rev. P. O'Shaughnessy during 1851, both coming across the mountains from Wilkes-Barre, the whole distance covered by an almost unbroken forest. A congregation being organized about this time at Lowrytown, Carbon county, White Haven and vicinity was attended from there by the Rev. A. Sullivan, who in 1853 bought a house in Denison township, in the portion commonly known as "Jerusalem." This house served as a church till the present structure was erected within the borough. After the Rev. Mr. Sullivan's death, which occurred about four years later, the Rev. Mr. Noonan succeeded to the charge of the congregation. He visited White Haven every three months when circumstances permitted during a period of ten years. It was by his exertions that the present church was finally erected, the old one having long since become far too small. He was succeeded in 1867 by the Rev. Mr. Mullen, who visited the church once a month from Eckley, to which place he transferred his residence. In 1868 the diocese of Scranton was organized, which comprised both Eckley and White Haven in this direction, and the latter place was henceforth attended by the clergyman in charge of St. Mary's church, Eckley. The Rev. Mr. Mullen was for some time assisted by the Rev. Mr. Tracy, and afterwards by Rev. M. J. Fallihu, who after the death of Father Mullen remained in charge of both places. He held services at White Haven every two weeks until, in 1873, he received an assistant in the person of Rev. J. Bergan. After this St. Patrick's church was visited every Sunday.

Finally, in Sept., 1874, the Rev. M. J. Bergath was appointed resident pastor of this congregation. He took rooms at the White Haven Hotel, where he continued to board for two years. During the same autumn he went about from house to house among his parishioners to take up a collection to purchase ground to be used as a cemetery, there being no Catholic burying place up to this time nearer than Lowrytown, a distance of at least eight miles. Enough money was raised to purchase three acres of suitable ground, from F. Lynch, on the Wilkes-Barre turnpike about one mile from the church. The ground cost $300, and about $80 more was expended to clear one acre from stumps and stones, and lay it out in lots according to a plan drawn by the pastor. This work was completed in the spring of 1875, and at the same time a choir gallery was added to the church. On the 18th of July, 1875, the Rt. Rev. William O'Hara, bishop of Scranton, visited White Haven and administered the sacrament of confirmation to a large number of persons, and in the afternoon of the same day he solemnly blessed the new cemetery in the presence of an immense concourse of respectful spectators. During the ceremony he was attended by the Revs. James Corcoran, D. D., of Philadelphia, E. V. McElhone, of Lowrytown, J. J. Cummiskey, of Hazleton, M. J. Fallihu, J. Bergan, of Eckley. During the fore part of the summer a choir was successfully organized, and made its first appearance at public worship on this occasion of the bishop's visit. A substantial picket fence was put around the lot on which the church is erected; vestments and other necessary church furniture and ornaments for the altar were procured.

During the last week of August, 1876, a fair was held to raise funds for the erection of a residence for the pastor. It was liberally patronized and had an unprecedented success. On the 1st of October the contract for the building was awarded to William O'Malley, of Pittston, for the sum of $1,980. The building was to be completed before the new year, but on account of some unnecessary delay was not finished until near April, 1877. It is quite a handsome structure, fronting on Alleghany street. The house is handsomely furnished and all the work and furniture was paid for at once, so that no debt rests on it.

On New Year's day, 1878, the pastor announced to the congregation that he had determined with their co-operation to erect a building for school purposes, two lots adjoining the church lots having already been purchased for the purpose. Quite a number of men volunteered to clear the lots, and this preliminary labor was soon accomplished. Next the foundations were dug and the walls built, the lumber was soon on the ground and work was at once begun. The weather was mild during this season, and the work was never interrupted on that account. The building is thirty by forty feet, with entrance and hall, making an addition of twelve by fourteen feet to the main building. The first floor is divided into two class-rooms, each eighteen by twenty-nine feet, lighted by six large windows. The second story, ten feet high, is occupied as a temporary dwelling by the teachers.

A subscription list was opened before the building began, and funds were most liberally contributed, one generous Protestant gentleman, who would not permit his name to be made known, making a donation of $100. September 1st, 1879, Sisters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, from St. Cecilia's Academy, Scranton, opened school in the building with an attendance of 186 pupils. Three sisters were left in charge—Sister M. Boniface, superior; Sister M. Seraphine and Sister M. Rosalia. The branches taught at the school are, Christian doctrine, history sacred and secular, grammar, geography, arithmetic mental and written, reading, spelling and penmanship; besides this the girls receive practical instructions in plain and ornamental sewing, etc. The more advanced boys are taught the elements of bookkeeping. Attendance at the school is free to all without distinction of creed or nationality. Instruction is imparted gratuitously, no charge being made any one for attending. The sisters' salary is raised by voluntary contributions, festivals, etc. The last debt on the school was paid in the summer of 1879, so that at present there is not a cent of indebtedness resting on church, school or pastoral residence of St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Congregation of White Haven.

FREELAND BOROUGH.

THE site of Freeland is a part of the old Lindsay tract, purchased by Tench Coxe, who sold to Joseph Birkbeck, and he to Mrs. Margaretha Donop, wife of A. Donop, Esq., in 1872. They came from New York city and were the first settlers at Freeland. Their house, on the estate of Mrs. Donop, Front and Centre streets, was the first built here. She also owns and controls forty of the buildings and lots surrounding it. Immediately after the purchase Mr. and Mrs. Donop caused the land to be surveyed into a town plat, which they called Freehold, and September 11th, 1876, the town was chartered as Freeland borough.

The miners' co-operative store on Walnut street, the first in this place, was opened in 1874, under the management of Joseph Lindsay.

The town hall, on Ridge street between Front and Walnut, was built by Mrs. Donop in 1875.

Henry Coons opened the second store in 1877, on the corner of Walnut and Centre streets, where he still remains in trade.

Welch & Furey were the next to engage in the mercantile business, locating on the corner of Washington and Walnut streets.

The first tavern was on Walnut street, built by A. Donop, and kept by John Jones, who is the present landlord.

The first blacksmith in this place was Peter Cunningham, who located on the corner of Washington and Front streets, where he is still engaged in the business.

The first shoemaker was Ernest Stein, and the first physician Dr. Lloyd; and the first meat market was opened by Rudolph Ludwig. The present resident physician is Dr. King.

There are two churches, Lutheran and Presbyterian. The first was built in 1876, by the united contributions of Presbyterians and Lutherans, and the other in 1880, by the Presbyterians. The present school-house was built in 1878, and John McDonald has thus far been the teacher.

The works by which the town is supplied with water were constructed in 1880, by A. Donop and J. Birkbeck.

There are in the borough eight stores, a bakery, eight taverns, two undertakers, two blacksmith shops, a town hall, and a boot and shoe store. There are three building and loan associations.

The justices of the peace are A. Donop, elected December 14th, 1876, and Isaac Goodman, elected in February, 1880. The first Burgess of the borough, Rudolph Lubrecht, was elected in 1876, and the present Burgess, Dennis McCarthy, in February, 1879. Luther Dodson has been the only postmaster. The population of the borough is 624.

The cemetery between Freeland and South Heberton is owned by the Freeland Cemetery Association. The first interment in these grounds was that of William Birkbeck, in 1846. Mrs. Birkbeck has three other children buried in this cemetery, viz.: Agnes, John and Ann Victoria.

FRANKLIN TOWNSHIP.

THIS township was formed from portions of Kingston, Exeter and Dallas, in 1843, and was named in honor of Colonel John Franklin, one of the first settlers in Wyoming. The population is 593.

One of the first settlers was Gideon Bebee, who lived on land now owned by the heirs of the late Rev. Oliver Lewis. The family moved away and the clearing was overgrown with bushes and young trees.

About this time a Mr. Pease, living in Hanover, cleared a field adjoining Bebee, walking about sixteen miles to his day's work. He naturally gave it up, but the improvement was known as Pease's field long after. These improvements were in the northeastern part of the township.

Olds hill takes its name from Ezra Olds, who came with his family from Connecticut as early as 1782. Michael Munson, also from Connecticut, built a house about this time where Salmon Munson now lives. He soon afterward moved to Ohio. Walter Munson, a relative of Michael, came with his family from Connecticut in 1807, and built a house near where his son George now lives, below the Olds property. Mrs. Munson's maiden name was Mehetabel Trowbridge. They had ten children, of whom Salmon now lives on a part of the large tract once owned by his father. Mrs. Munson was Rhamah Lewis, from Orange county, N. Y. Rev. George W. Munson married Sally Ann Lewis, and lives on the old homestead, where his parents died many years ago. Walter Munson, sen., lived on the banks of the Susquehanna, opposite Wyoming, before the massacre, and went back to Connecticut on foot when he was five years old, under the conduct of his brother Wilmot.

Captain Artemadorus Ingersol lived on lot 46 of the Connecticut claim, just below the Munsons. He was born in Connecticut, and was one of the Revolutionary soldiers entering the army when but fourteen years of age. He served throughout the war, married a Miss Newberry, and moved to Pennsylvania. He was a farmer and owned a saw-mill. His family consisted of six children who grew up, besides one little girl that died. His daughter Fanny married one of her teachers, named Guy Clark. At the close of the war of 1812 he became dissipated and violent, and killed his wife with an ax, when she was living at Ithaca, N. Y., with their two children. Clark was executed, and the affair caused a great excitement at the time. Minerva Ingersoll married Alvin Holmes, from New York State, and died nearly two years ago, aged about seventy-seven. The last one of the Ingersoll family in this part of the country, Mr. Holmes, died some years ago. They left quite a family. Captain Ingersoll died about forty years ago, and his wife soon afterward.

Alexander Lord, born in Boston on the 19th of June, 1777, came to Pennsylvania in 1809. In 1813 he was a drummer for the Wyoming volunteers when they went to the frontier. He died on the 7th of September, 1859, aged eighty-two. Of his children (Cyrus, John, Stephen, Murphy, Alexander, George, David and one daughter) only Stephen and Murphy now live in the township.

Abel Hall came from Connecticut about the same time as the Munsons, and settled on a farm near Mr. Lord's, just below what is now known as the Flat Rock school-house. The family lived there many years.

The Rodgers family came from Connecticut about the same time as the other Connecticut people. They lived many years in Franklin, and it is said that Elisha Rodgers built the first frame house in the village of Orange, which was standing a few years ago. He and his wife Rhoda both lived to a good old age. Their son Alamanza married a Mrs. Tyrrel. Her grave, and that of Sylva, wife of Cyrus Mann, were probably marked by the first marble tombstones in the burying ground near the church.

Elijah Brace came, it is believed, from Connecticut. He built a saw-mill and the first grist-mill in the township, below the present village of Orange, on the road to Dallas. These mills were rebuilt in 1828 by Conrad Kunkle (who was the first postmaster in the township), but all traces of them are gone. Elijah Brace lived where Ira Hallock built his barn. He died in the prime of life, but his wife, whose maiden name was Susannah Burrell, lived to be old. Of their children Harvey Brace lives in the village of Orange. He and his sister Perlina are the only members of the family left in the township. Daniel Brace, a relative of Elijah's, came afterward from New York State. He died in the township. His son William (about eighty years old) is living in Franklin.

Thomas Mann was one of the early settlers, coming from New Jersey. He lived where Charles Frantz lives.

Josephus Cone (who lived near where Isaac Davenport lives), Amos Jackson, Robert Moore, Jacob Halstead, Benjamin Decker and Jonas Wood, were all old settlers.

David O. Culver about 1790 moved from near Schooley's mountain, New Jersey, to the farm where he lived and died, in the northeast part of the township. The Culver family sprung from two brothers, who were among the pilgrims in the "May Flower." The father of David Culver, whose name was also David, came to Pennsylvania and bought three hundred acres of land, on which his son David settled. The latter married, before coming to Pennsylvania, Eunice Osborne, of Scotch origin. They had nine children. Of these Oliver was drafted in the war of 1812, and was on his way to Lake Erie when the news of peace came. He was afterward captain of a militia company. John Culver died in 1877, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, on the farm where he had always lived. Lewis, the youngest son, is still living in the township, being the last one of the family. Of the children of John, Mary Dale and P. A. are known as contributors to various periodicals, both in prose and verse. On the eastern part of the Culver property, while the land was yet covered with woods, there was a rude fireplace, showing that it had been made for the purpose of cooking, in a spot that looked as if it had been an Indian camp ground. When the land was cleared it was destroyed.

Rev. Oliver Lewis came to Pennsylvania some time after the Culvers and settled below them on the land once owned by Bebee. He was born in Connecticut, but from two years old lived in Orange county, N. Y., until he came here. He was for many years a local preacher of the M. E. church. He died a few years ago aged 77 years.

Samuel Snell, from Tioga Point, N. Y., lived many years in Franklin and died a few years ago. His eldest son, Abram V. Snell, is the present justice of the peace.

Most of the later settlers came from New York or New Jersey. The Winters family, the Badles, the Corwins, the Swards, the Hallocks and the Durlands came from Orange county, N. Y.; the Casterlins, the Longwells and Dewitts from New Jersey. John Dewitt came with his family from New Jersey about sixty years ago, and settled in the southeastern part of the township, where his children still live. The Wintz family came from Germany and live near Flat Rock.

The first saw-mill, known as the Ingersoll mill, was built by Lewis Jones, of Exeter.

The first circuit preacher was George Peck.

The first blacksmith was probably Abner Jackson.

ORANGE.

The village of Orange is situated nearly in the centre of Franklin township. We have learned from some of the oldest inhabitants that its original name was Drake Town, in honor of Jacob Drake, one of the first settlers at this point. Afterward it was named Unison, the post-office being of that name. After the township of Franklin was formed A. C. Thompson, who kept a store there, called the place Franklin Centre. It was not universally known by that name; and, as there were other Franklins in the State, a new name had to be chosen. As quite a number of the families living there had come from Orange county, N. Y., it was decided to call the post-office Orange.

The place has also been afflicted with one of those foolish and whimsical names which seem to be favorites with a certain class, namely, Pinchersville, derived as follows: Almanza Rodgers kept a store there forty or fifty years ago. All kinds of produce from the farm were taken in exchange for goods, as well as shingles, ax-handles, splint-brooms, etc. As a general thing the shingles were good, but a few dishonest backwoodsmen formed the habit of putting poor shingles in the inside of the bunch while all the good ones were in the outside. The merchant was cheated several times in this way, and he determined to outwit them. He got a pair of pincers so that he could pull out and examine the shingles. This became known, and the place came to be called Pinchersville. The merchant soon after removed to Illinois. Harley Green, from Orange county, N. Y., kept the store afterward. James Lawrence Brown, from Exeter, kept it a while. Abel C. Thompson kept the store after that; he sold out to Benjamin Saylor, from Plains, called "Uncle Ben." Benjamin Saylor generally followed mercantile pursuits, and finally sold out to James Holcomb. Since then the store has changed hands several times; it is now kept by Henry Bodle.

The post-office has usually been kept at this store, but it is now at the store of John B. Winters, the other merchant of the place.

The population of Orange numbers about eighty persons. The village contains two stores, a hotel, school-house, a wagon shop, a harness shop, a shoe shop, and two blacksmith shops. The church stands a little above the village, on the road leading to Tunkhannock.

The first hotel was kept by Peter Hallock. After him the landlords were John Worden, Jacob Shales, Dennis Alsop, — Felton, Hiram Brace, Harvey Brace, Major Warring, Mrs. Warring, — Housenick, — Robinson, Thomas Totten, Albert Smith, Chauncey Calkins and the present proprietor D. A. La Barre.

Some twenty-five years ago there was a Good Templars' lodge in the village. About nine years ago the Sons of Temperance had a lodge, but this like the other was discontinued. The Orange Band of Hope is their successor, and perhaps the most successful of all. It was founded by Mrs. Victoria Seward, some four years ago. She was an earnest worker in the cause of religion and was the means of doing much good. She died suddenly, two years ago. She was the only daughter of Harvey Brace. A. V. Snell was the president a long time, and helped to keep the organization in a flourishing condition. The membership includes both young and old. The first physician in the place was Dr. Skeels, who lived many years ago where the Courtright's reside. Forty or fifty years ago Dr. Brace practiced here, and after him Dr. Parker. Later came Dr. Wm. Thomson, who now lives in Northmoreland; and after him Dr.

McKee, who is now in Plymouth. The present physician is John C. Morris.

The first roads passing through the place were the one from Wyoming, over Olds hill, to Tunkhannock; the road to Northmoreland, and the one that started at the river, following Sutton creek and meeting the Wyoming road at Olds hill. This road has been somewhat changed at several points from its first location.

SCHOOLS.

The township contains five school-houses (Dymond Hollow, Michigan, Orange, Flat Rock and Good's), and about half of the pupils at the Sutton creek school-house are from Franklin, the school-house being near the township line. This school has always been one of the best as several graduates from Wyoming Seminary and other well educated people whose early education commenced here can testify. The first school within the memory of the oldest inhabitants was taught by Amarilla Newberry, where Mr. Casterlin now lives. The next was in a log house above Raub's, and was taught by Ambrose Fuller; the next in another log house opposite Brace's saw-mill, taught by a sister of Elisha Harris, of Kingston township. School was also taught by William Calkins, in a log house that stood just back of John B. Winters's store. George Ochmig, of Wyoming, also taught there. Other teachers who taught in the vicinity were, Susan Farver, afterwards the wife of Daniel Lee, of Wyoming county; Henry Osborne, James Dickinson and — Herring.

The first house built for school purposes was a two story building, commenced about 1815, which stood where the present one in Orange now stands. During the past thirty years as many as forty school teachers have received their first instruction in Franklin.

RELIGIOUS INTERESTS OF FRANKLIN.

The early settlers were, like the present inhabitants, members of different churches; the Braces were Presbyterians; the Rodgerses Baptists, and the Munsons Methodists; and ministers of these different creeds used to preach occasionally in school-houses and private residences.

Joel Rodgers and Griffin Lewis were Baptist preachers, though they were called Independent, as they differed in some respects from their church as to forms, &c.

As there was a Presbyterian church at Northmoreland the ministers used to preach sometimes in Franklin, and ministers of the "Christian" church occasionally came. The first Sabbath-school here was organized in 1820 by the Rev. John Dorrance, a Presbyterian minister from Wilkes-Barre.

The only church ever built in the place was the M. E. church, commenced in 1835 and finished some years after. The Methodist preachers meanwhile held meetings in the school-house. Some of the members of the first class were Samuel Carver and wife and Walter Munson and wife. Rev. George Peck was the minister, and Samuel Carver local preacher. Jabez Carver, a brother of Samuel, used to preach, and Marmaduke

Pearce used to hold meetings. The names of different ministers of the M. E. church who have officiated as circuit preachers in Franklin are: "Father" Rounds, King Elwell, McRandall and Blackman, who preached here over forty years ago; Cooper, George Porter, Boswell, Dean, "Father" Davy, John D. Safford, John Mulkey, C. E. Taylor, Chubbuck, S. S. Kennedy, A. S. Shoemaker, Bronson, Olaf Morse, S. W. Weiss, Kellog D. Personens, Henry Wheeler, J. G. Eckman, P. Holbrook, J. S. Lewis, Isaac Austin, A. J. Arnold, S. E. Walworth, William Shelp and the present minister, Isaac Austin, who was formerly on the charge. C. E. Rice was also on this circuit, and George Greenfield.

Taylor D. Swartz was on this charge in 1864, and in August of that year, when the Franklin and Exeter boys rallied to the call of their country by raising a company, he enlisted as a soldier among them, leaving his pastoral charge to be supplied by another. Being a universal favorite with all, he was soon promoted chaplain of the regiment. He died of typhoid fever in March, 1865, at City Point, Virginia. His death was supposed to have been caused by his making too great exertions in building a chapel in camp. His remains were taken to Moscow, his early home, for interment. His age was 29 years.

THE OLDEST INHABITANTS.

Among the people have died at an advanced age in Franklin, Mrs. Mary Besteder died at the house of her son-in-law, John Culver, in 1861, in her 92nd year. Her maiden name was Mary Schuyler, and she was a near relative of General Schuyler of the Revolution. She lived in New Jersey when a child, and said she remembered hearing the roar of the cannon at the battle of Princeton. She had lived through the Revolution, and died just at the time when our civil war commenced. She had lived many years in Pennsylvania.

Mrs. Mary Dymond died about five years ago, at the house of her son, Isaac Dymond, aged 105 years. She remembered many interesting events of the Revolution; among them, seeing General Washington and other great men. Her maiden name was Mary Lossing. She was born in New Jersey, but had lived many years in Pennsylvania. These old ladies retained the powers of intellect until they died.

The oldest man in the township is James Hadsall, whose 94th birthday occurred on the 20th of March, 1880. He is the son of Edward Hadsall, whose father James was killed by the Indians in 1778, just a little way down Sutton creek below where Mr. Hadsall now lives. He has spent most of his life in Exeter, but has lived in Franklin about thirty years. His wife is some years his junior. They have been married more than seventy years.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

The first justice of the peace was Benjamin Newberry, who came with the early settlers and located where James Casterlin now lives. The following is a list of the justices who have been elected (the elections of 1875 and 1880 in March, the others in April):

John R. Moore, 1844, 1853; Henry B. Howell, 1845; Ira Hallock, 1849; Eli R. Hallock, 1851; Charles Durland, 1851, 1856; James E. Durland, 1855; Milton Good, 1856, 1861; Palmer Harding, 1859; Daniel Davenport, 1864; Moses D. Ketcham, 1867, 1875; A. V. Snell, 1872, 1877; William Chandler, 1872; Walter Bodle, 1880.

M. D. Ketcham moved to Nebraska, and Walter Bodle was elected to finish his term of office.

FRANKLIN DURING THE REBELLION.

Franklin township did her share toward putting down the Rebellion. A number of young men enlisted in the beginning of the war. There were drafts in 1862, 1863 and 1865. To prevent the draft in 1864 the township raised by subscription over $2,000, which was paid as a bounty to volunteers. There was a war tax in Franklin, which amounted to $3,000. The news of the draft of 1865 came about the time that peace was declared. The following are the names of the soldiers who went from Franklin:

Of these soldiers Joseph Hess was killed on the day that his term of service expired. George Waring, Oliver Smith and Adelbert Lord died in the service. Mallery Williams was a while in Libby prison. Samuel B. Snell was wounded on the 1st of July, 1863, at Gettysburg, by a ball which entered his cheek and remained in his head until the following Christmas morning, when in coughing the ball came out of his mouth.

Dr. J. B. Culver enlisted in 1862 at Shickshinny, with a company that afterward formed a part of the 149th Bucktail brigade. He was taken sick and discharged, but served as a surgeon until the close of the war, when he returned to Franklin, his former home. So far as is known, all of those soldiers who returned are yet living.

John Price, of Franklin, enlisted in Wilkes-Barre in 1872, with a recruiting officer, and went out to fight the Indians. He served five years and returned to his home.

Although Franklin was in the main loyal, there were some persons who were said to be in sympathy with the Rebellion. On this supposition, perhaps, a party of that class of people from some of the other townships came into Orange and entered a hotel, and began to hurrah for Jeff Davis. As it happened a party of loyal young men were present, among whom were Rasselas and Myron Brown, Dr. J. B. and D. O. Culver, Chandler and Mallery Williams and Calvin Dymond. These young men soon cleared the room of the friends of Jeff Davis, besides whipping two or three of them soundly. Myron Brown and Calvin Dymond especially distinguished themselves. The party left, not as they came, in defiant mood, but glad to escape without broken bones.

HANOVER TOWNSHIP.

THIS is one of the original townships laid out by the Susquehanna Company. It was first named Nanticoke, from the Indians who had a village on the site of Nanticoke borough.

After the grant of the township was made to Captain Lazarus Stewart and his associates in 1770, under the Connecticut title, the name was changed to Hanover, which was the name of the township from whence they came, now in Dauphin county. In 1790, when the county was divided into eleven townships, the boundaries of Hanover included also what is now Wright, Denison and Foster. In 1796 this whole territory contained but 96 taxable inhabitants, 58 horses, 111 yoke of oxen and 152 cows. The population is now 2,000.

The present township contains about 28 square miles, and is one of the chief coal producing townships of the Wyoming coal fields. Nearly the whole township is owned by five great coal companies, viz. the Lehigh Navigation and Coal, Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, Wilkes-Barre Coal and Iron, New Jersey Coal and Susquehanna Coal Company.

The following is a list of the justices of the peace elected in this township under the State constitution of 1838:

Samuel Jameson, 1840; Israel Inman, 1840; John E. Inman, 1842; Samuel Pell, 1843, 1848, 1853; John Mensch, 1847; Bateman Downing, 1852; Levi L. Nyhart, 1857, 1862, 1876; John Robins, 1858; Matthias H. Petty, 1865; Francis H. Clark, 1866; Reuben Downing, 1870; John Reilly, 1872; Lewis C. Green, 1873; John Evers, 1875.

EARLY TIMES.

The first house was built by Captain Lazarus Stewart, in 1771, on the road between Buttonwood creek and the river, and north of the canal, the place known as the Alexander Jameson property. It was one and a half stories high, with an overshoot or projection all round, and loop holes on each side, so that it might be defended against an enemy. The second house was built by Lieutenant Lazarus Stewart 2nd, in the same year, on the road between Buttonwood creek and the canal.

The pioneer grist-mill was built in 1783, of logs, by Mr. Delano, on the site of the Behee mill, on Sugar Notch creek, where it crosses the road leading from Plumbton to the river road near the "red tavern." This mill had but one run of stones, and, like others of that day, was a slow concern. A grist-mill was built as early as 1825 by Richard Inman, at the foot of the falls on Solomon's creek, above Ashley. It was converted into a dwelling, and in the spring of 1850 it was carried down to the flats by high water. The mill at Nanticoke was built about 1820 by Colonel Washington Lee.

The first school-house was on what is known as "the green," on the river road, and Henry Ernhart was the first teacher.

One of the first roads through the township was the Middle road, from Wilkes-Barre to Hanover Centre and Newport. There was a road previous to this from Wilkes-Barre to the mouth of Buttonwood creek.

Lorenzo Ruggles was one of the pioneer blacksmiths. His shop was on the Middle road east of Askam. He was also a plowmaker.

The pioneer carding-mill was at Behee's, on the Sugar Notch creek, between Hanover Centre, or Askam, and the river road.

The first public burying ground was that at "the green," adjoining the Reformed church.

Among the pioneers were Comfort and Benjamin Casey. Comfort located where William O'Donnell now lives, a little north of Ashley. Benjamin settled at Askam. They built frame houses, the first in this township.

The following is a complete list of persons against whom a tax was levied in Hanover township in 1796:

John Alden, Abraham Adams, David Adams, Edward Adgerton, Nathan Abbott, Jonas Buss, Elisha Blackman, jr., Stephen Burrett, Gideon Burrett, Joel Burrett, Thomas Brink, Rufus Bennett, Ismael Bennett, Frederick Crisman, Nathan Carey, William Caldwell, Elisha Delano, Richard Diely, Richard Diely, jr., George Espy, Samuel Ensign, Jacob Flanders, Jacob Fisher, Cornelius Garretson, Andrew Gray, John Hanes, Benjamin Hopkins, John Hendershot, Henry Huber, Jacob Holdner, William Hyde, Ebenezer Hibbard, Calvin Hibbard, John Hurlbert, Naphthali Hurlbert, Christopher Hurlbert, Willis Hyde, John Jacobs, John Jacobs, jr., Edward Inman, Richard Inman, John Inman, Elijah Inman, jr., Jonathan Kellogg, Conrad Lyons or Lines, Conrad Lyons or Lines, jr., James Lesley, John Lutzey, John Leckerly, Adrian Lyons or Lines, Michael Marr, Thomas Martin, Samuel Moore, J. S. Miller, Darius Preston, Josiah Pell, Benjamin Pett, Josiah Pell, jr., John Phillips, Jeremiah Roberts, John Ryan, John Robinson, David Robinson, James A. Rathbone, George Ronch, George Stewart, Edward Spencer, David Stewart, James Stewart, Derens Stewart, Josiah Stewart, William Stewart, Daniel Simons, Peter Steel, David Steel, Abraham Sarver, Christian Saune, Archibald Smiley, John Spencer, John Treadway, Nathaniel Wardee, Abner Wade, Arthur Van Wie, Ira Winter, Ashbel Wallis and William Young. Total 91.

THE COAL INTEREST OF HANOVER.

At what date or by whom all the mines in this township were opened it is impossible to state, as some of them have changed ownership so many times that all records that would furnish dates have been placed beyond our reach. However, we find in Pearce's Annals of Luzerne some items of interest, which we give. He says that in 1813 James Lee, Esq., sent one four-horse load of coal from Hanover to Germantown, and continues:

"In 1820 Colonel Washington Lee discovered coal in Hanover, on the Stewart property, which he had purchased, and in the same year he mined and sent to Baltimore 1,000 tons, which he sold at $8 per ton. In 1838 the Wyoming Company connected their lands, 500 acres in Hanover, with the Nanticoke pool or slake water, by a railroad two miles in length and a basin, at a cost of $22,700. They shipped their first coal in 1840, and in 1847 Colonel Hillman shipped 10,000 tons of coal from the old Blackman and Solomon's Gap, or Ross mines, to New York and Philadelphia. The shaft of the Dundee Company in this township was sunk in 1866 to the depth of 792 feet, when the Nanticoke or Mill vein is struck, which is twelve feet in thickness. It is the first vein below the surface and the sixth from the bottom. This proves the theory that the flats or low lands are underlain with coal."

The following brief accounts of the different mines and their workings are gleaned from the report of the inspector of mines for 1878, as none later had been published at the time of writing.

ASKAM.

Many years ago this place was known as Hanover Center. It is located on the Middle road, about a mile north of the west end of Sugar Notch borough, or Plumbton. When the post-office was established, in 1864, Joseph Neuhart was appointed postmaster, and the office was named Askam, in memory of an eccentric gentleman who located here in the early settlement of this township. One day, many years ago, the wife of William Askam requested him to go out and get her some oven wood. He obeyed orders as far as going out was concerned. After an absence of seven years he returned, having in the meantime visited England. His family had remained in the same cabin in which he left them, and upon his approach to the house he gathered up an armful of oven wood, carried it in, laid it down carefully, and turning to his wife said, "There is the oven wood you sent me after." He lived at this place many years afterward, and died kindly remembered by all who knew him as eccentric "Billy" Askam.

There are a Methodist church, two stores, a hotel and about twenty dwellings at this place. R. R. Metcalf is postmaster.

HANOVER CENTER METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

This society was organized as early as 1820, in an old log school-house on Hoover hill, on the Middle road, a little northwest of Plumbton. The first class leader was Nathan Carey, and the early members of the society were: Sarah Carey, Sally Bennett, Harvey and Celestia Holcomb, Elsie and William Askam, Catharine, Angeline and Lorenzo Ruggles, Sarah Blackman, Ruth Ann Edgerton, Sarah Downing, Elisha Blackman, Lovinia Smiley, Mary Ann Carey, Joseph, Sarah and Margaret Steele, Elizabeth and Joseph Inman and Lucinda Marcy.

This class belonged to a large circuit, under the pastoral care of Rev. Epenetus Owen, who was succeeded in the itineracy by such noble men as Thomas Wilcox, James B. Cooper, John D. Safford, T. D. Walker, Z. S. Kellogg, O. F. Morse, N. Patrick, J. K. Peck, B. B. Emory, F. Illman, Erastus Smith, and others of a later date.

In 1861 the society built the present church of wood, twenty-eight by thirty-six feet, costing $500. B. Metcalf was then leader of the class. The society numbers 50 members. Rev. Mr. Davis is the pastor.

The Sunday-school was organized about as early as the society, and is still prosperous.

ASHLEY BOROUGH.

SEVERAL names have been applied to this place and vicinity, including Skunktown, Hard Scrabble, Peestown, Hightown, and as late as 1830 Newtown, Hendricksburgh, Coalville and Nanticoke Junction. Previous to 1865 there were but a few houses here, and on the north side of Main street only the one on the flat where John Carey now lives. But a very few years before this the neighborhood burying ground was along the south side of Main street, where Dr. Deifenderfer's drug store and residence stand.

As near as can be ascertained, the pioneer settler was Abner Wade. He built his log hut on the site of the residence of Charles Frederick.

The first tavern was kept by Fritz Deitrick on the site of Payne & Conyngham's store. The old log hotel now serves as the private office of the store. Samuel Pease, or Pees, had a log tavern where McKernan's hotel now stands. These taverns were there previous to 1815. Samuel Black had the first frame tavern. The house, on West Main street, is still occupied by his aged widow. Lewis Landmesser also had a tavern here many years ago.

As early as 1810, a log school-house was built. It stood on the site of the Lehigh and Susquehanna repair and machine shops. This was the church as well as school-house, and soon became too small for the congregation, when Fritz Deitrick, Daniel Deitrick, Samuel Pease, Comfort Carey and others built on the site of Deifenderfer's drug store the first frame school-house in this township. The same building is the session room of the Presbyterian church. Among the first preachers in the old school-house were: Rev. George Dorrance, a Presbyterian, Rev. Mr. Boyd, a Baptist preacher, and Rev. Epenetus Owen, a Methodist itinerant.

The pioneer store was kept by Alexander Gray, near the Abner Wade mansion. In 1815 there was a saw-mill on the site of the barn behind T. P. Blodgett's store on West Main street. The mill was built by Jacob Bobb.

The old stone foundry and trip hammer shop of Joseph Van Lear stood near Solomon's creek, west of Charles Frederick's. Van Lear made nearly all kinds of light castings, besides cylinder stoves for burning the newly discovered anthracite coal. The shop was destroyed by high water in the spring of 1850.

The Coalville Building Association was organized in 1869 and expired in 1877. Its stock was in one thousand shares. The Ashley Building Association, with fifteen hundred shares, was organized in 1871 and expired in 1879. J. C. Wells, who figures so prominently in the history of Ashley, and of whom a portrait appears herewith, was the president of both associations.

He was also president of the Ashley Cemetery Association, which was organized in 1870, with $3,000 capital, and bought eighteen acres from the Lehigh Navigation and Coal Company. James M. Snyder was secretary, and James Black treasurer.

which employ annually about 350 men. Here is also the foot of the "Plane," the longest in the world, built primarily for the transportation of loaded boats from the Susquehanna over the mountain to the Lehigh river, but now used for coal cars.

There are three coal mines, which employ, when working, about 600 persons. Jersey breaker No. 2, near Ashley, and Hartford colliery, in Ashley, belong to the Lehigh and Wilkes-Barre Coal Company.

There are four general dry goods and grocery stores, besides about twenty smaller establishments; three taverns, several saloons, meat markets, shoe, tailor and milliner shops; a two-story brick school-house, built in 1874, at a cost of $18,000; and three churches—Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian and Protestant Episcopal. The post-office has formerly been known as Hendricksburgh and Coalville. Charles Hay is now postmaster. There are two drug stores and one savings bank. E. L. Deifenderfer and A. D. Tewksbury are the resident physicians. The population of Ashley is about 2,800.

At the time of the construction of the public school building the directors were A. T. Joslin (president), J. C. Wells (secretary), James Fisher (treasurer), J. W. Colburn, Charles Caffrey and William Thomas. The building committee consisted of J. C. Wells, Charles Caffrey and James Fisher.

The Wilkes-Barre and Ashley (Coalville) Passenger Railroad Company was organized June 18th, 1869, under an act of the Legislature approved March 24th, 1868, and a supplement approved April 15th, 1869.
