It is presended that the House of Representatives cannot possess this right like the English House of Commons, and this becouse the different branches of the government are better defined in the United States than in Great Britain. He would ask of honorable members, whether this was a reaso why we should permit ourselves to be insulted. He be lieved that this power was accorded to the House noces situte, for it was once understood that we had not the power to defend ourselves, what would prevent a band of mirauders from arresting our legislative deliberations errained, and distinctly, understood. A triat He thought the house would be lost to a sense of duty. it did not solemnly affirm this principle, not that he wished to make any application to the present case; for he knew not yet what might be his decision; he wished to have the evidences for and against, before he formed his judgment. But, this should not prevent the House from declaring that it had the power to punish all attacks made against its dignity. If it was necessary to find precedents in foreign countries, he was propared to show that this right was always maintained in the British Porliament, and was acknowledged by men of the most distinguished talents in that kingdom. In the observations he had made, he thought this house had constitutionally he right to exercise this power.

Mr. Grymes thought it necessary to explain that part of his answer in which he denied that he had struck the speaker, at the hour at which he was about to enter upon a discharge of his duties, by stating that he was not the regulator of the clock in the House; that the clock by which we was guided, and the one which should guide this body, was the city clock.
