It was with those boys in 1897-98 as it was in 1861-64, and as soon as the drums and fifes were sounding the youth of this country from every State were marching and keeping step and going to the front. I had the honor of being one of those who, when war was unavoidable, stood by those who declared it; and at the solemn hour in the Senate you could have heard a pin drop on the floor, and amongst those who had been to war there was the grave sense that comes to every soldier on the eve of battle. Many discourses were made; but I tell you, my comrades and countrymen, that the one which was to my mind broadest in its patriotism, finest in its suggestion came from a one-legged soldier in the person of a Confederate, and he said as he concluded his wise observation: "I hope, my fellow-Senators, that when the Spanish War is over all over this country there may be the sense that no man can tell and none dare say which did best, the soldiers of the North or the soldiers of the South."

I have not had time in this speech to allude to the different States of the South. With some of them my contact was more frequent than with others in the war, and you must permit something of that personality and comradeship which can never be effaced from the memory of our experience. I have some memories of you, sir, our Commander in Chief, though I did not have the honor to be in your command or to share your sufferings; but on an afternoon of August, 1862, being young and unemployed and with a horse to go, I rode to the front to see what was happening in the front of Jackson. I saw a handsome person near Robert E. Lee who was putting some artillery into action. It was Lieut. Col. Stephen D. Lee. He passed to higher fortunes, and soon became a lieutenant general of the Army of the West. The last time I had the pleasure of grasping his hand was in the city of Chicago, when he and I were both engaged in addressing an assemblage of the Grand Army Club. No treason in it, boys—not a bit. I went there because the city of Chicago, in her beautiful park, out of her own pocket, had put up money to build a monument to your comrades who sleep upon her borders. We may get a little mean sometimes; we may sometimes use some words and make observations that would not be countersigned by our worthy, prudent, and careful friend, the Rev. James William Jones; but, notwithstanding that, when a great and noble magnanimity is displayed, I hope it may always be that the surviving Confederate soldier and his son will ride, walk, or crawl with those who will go farthest to show that it is appreciated and try hardest to follow it.

I was in a division that contained for a long time Hoke's Tar Heel Brigade, Gordon's Georgia Brigade, Hay's Louisiana Brigade, and Billie Smith's and sometimes Pegram's Brigade, first commanded by Jubal Early. I tell you, boys, it would have taken a keener eye than the Senator of Arkansas to tell which was the best in that division. It was always the one who had fought the last battle. I saw the Tar Heels and the Louisianians together when to the left of Gordon (he assembled on the right) they broke the line at Gettysburg, and I saw Avery lead the Tar Heels and the Louisianians when they climbed the top of Cemetery Hill. They would have had Meade's army cut in two and beaten, and I knew that the Tar Heel State is always ready to lead where duty calls and where patriotism invites us; that amongst the riders into the future generation there will be the figures of Robert Hoke, Ramsey, and D. H. Hill, and many of those other illustrious spirits that led her. [A voice: "What of Culberson?"] I know nothing about him as a Confederate soldier. You mean Colonel Culberson? He was all right.

I have talked about the soldier; a word about our great leaders. We rejoice in the high character of the political leaders of the South as well as in that of her soldiery. I never heard of a Southern Confederate Senator or Representative who stole anything. I never hear that any one of them was engaged in any kind of grafting. No matter what his enemies may have said or may say about him, Jefferson Davis, the first and only President of the Confederate States, was as pure and clean as any white marble that will ever bear his name. He did all that he could; neither angels nor men could do more. He has been much misrepresented, much misapprehended; he has been the object of a stream of prejudices because he was so faithful and uncompromising for you and for your country. Fame is often of slow birth and slow growth, and what grows the quickest is not always the strongest or most enduring. It was two hundred and fifty years after the enemies of Cromwell cut off his head and lifted it in derision and contempt before England could forget its animosities, realize the greatness of the man, and rear a monument to his memory. The fame of Jefferson Davis throughout all this country has not grown as fast as that of some other people; neither will it be fading away when some of those are forgotten. Understand, my countrymen, that the fame of Jefferson Davis is young yet, and is growing slowly and compactly and so well knit together that when it has gotten in full bloom it will stay so while generations and generations pass into the forgotten past.

I see around me now some young-looking and a great many quite handsome men who were old soldiers when their cause went down. More, many are yet in the prime of life, while their nerves still thrill and their hearts rebound with the aspirations of love's ambition. Old hates and enmities, old prejudices, and words of dislike are whirling down the wind like autumn leaves, and the sunshine of a beautiful spring is bringing forth bloom and beflowering our country. I thank God, my comrades, to have seen this day, and I thank him too that he has given to all of you this privilege, for this is the greatest gathering of Confederates that will ever take place this side of the great white throne. None of you have come here to mourn; none of you have here a temple of vain regrets. You carried from the last battlefield on which you fought, back to your home when you returned to labor, the consciousness of duty faithfully performed. It has abided with you as your "buckler and your shield," and all men now recognize you not only as knights of war but knights of glorious peace and of happy fraternity amongst all American people. Let it fade or let it flame and the war roll down like a wind, you proved you had hearts in your cause, you are noble still; we acknowledge the purpose of God and bow humbly to his will.

Of all things that have been said about that war, the wisest, the most profound, the most Christianlike and best was a line written by our great commander, Robert E. Lee: "God beside, let that suffice; he who rides upon the whirlwind and directs the storm in the hollow of his hand is the Defender of men and nations." He also said another thing. When I see the old Confederates coming together I recall it: "Wear your religion gayly. See you have it before you; wear it at all times." That first expression, "Wear your religion gayly," was worthy of the splendid commander in chief, that human fortitude must be equal to human misfortune. So, my comrades, from the States of the South, from New York (which has a great colony of you), from Baltimore and West Virginia, from the Chickasaw and the Cherokee Nation—North, South, East, West—welcome here, have a good time as the first of your duties while you are here. "Wear your religion gayly," and so let the wide world wag as it will, we will be gay and happy still. Gay and happy, gay and happy; may you all be gay and happy still!

HOW THREE MEN HELD AN ARMY IN CHECK.

BY R. J. BLACK, MEMPHIS, TENN.

Col. W. L. Duckworth, who commanded the 7th Tennessee Cavalry Regiment under Gen. N. B. Forrest, had been relieved from his post of duty upon the reorganization of the brigade, which was disagreeable to his views, and Lieut. Col. W. F. Taylor was commanding the regiment in Gen. E. W. Rucker's Brigade on Hood's movement from Georgia to Nashville during the months of November and December, 1864. Rucker's Brigade was with Chalmers's Division, Forrest's Cavalry, and moved on Hood's left wing prior to and succeeding the battle of Franklin, Tenn., November 30, 1864, while Gen. A. Buford's Division was on the right wing.

Although contrary to the advice of General Forrest, the battle of Franklin was fought while the enemy was strongly intrenched there. General Hood insisted on throwing his entire strength forward and waging battle.

The Federal army, commanded by Major General Schofield with some twenty thousand infantry, assisted in his flanks by nearly ten thousand cavalry under command of General Wilson, was safely covered by excellent breastworks surrounding Franklin on the south, while General Hood had to fight with less than twenty-nine thousand men without any protection whatever. Franklin was the most unfortunate battle of the entire war. The Confederates lost some seventy-five hundred men in killed, wounded, and captured.

On the morning of December 1 the Federals fell back to Nashville after a loss of some forty-five hundred in killed, wounded, and missing, going into their breastworks around Nashville well protected, the Confederates surrounding in a state of siege on the south side to the Cumberland River above and below the city. The Federals made detours frequently from their fortifications with cavalry on land and gunboats by river, until they had been reënforced by General Smith with about eleven thousand troops from St. Louis. Then Gen. George H. Thomas, in command of all the forces, including what he had at Nashville, was joined by Generals Schofield and Smith, making his army nearly fifty thousand as against about twenty-two thousand Confederates. General Hood's army, receiving no reënforcements whatever, just waited and lay still without an effort until the Federals were prepared to do just what they wanted.

On December 15 they advanced all of their lines, forcing the Confederates, who had no substantial protection, until in the night. Then they were checked because of the report from Gen. E. W. Rucker, who had been wounded and captured, that Gen. N. B. Forrest was in their front. * * * The 7th Tennessee had been ordered to Franklin for escort duty, except Col. W. F. Taylor, who, with a portion of his command, remained north of the Harpeth River until later for the purpose of watching the movements of the enemy, who were already advancing in three columns. Colonel Taylor, accompanied by his sergeant, Maj. John Somerville, and the writer, proceeded to the Franklin Pike, just north of Franklin, where a strong Federal force, led by General Wilson, commanding cavalry, was pushing ahead with determination. Remarkable as it was, this trio of Confederates threw themselves between the enemy and the pontoon bridge across the Harpeth above Franklin, and there held the entire Federal army at bay for some ten or fifteen minutes, firing their pistols while moving to and fro to make show of numbers.

Of course the Federals did not know the situation. Having expended all the loads from his pistol, Col. W. F. Taylor called to the writer, having two pistols, who loaned him one, and they all kept on shooting. In the meantime several of the enemy charged below these men, but returned to their command, seemingly afraid to remain.

As soon as we knew that the other two columns of Federals had crossed the river we marched deliberately over and passed through Franklin, hurrying some infantrymen before us, and passed beyond the breastworks south of town. Immediately a solid line of cavalry was in our rear, and in front of us was the Confederate corps of Gen. Stephen D. Lee, at the time in command of the rear of the army.

All this time the Federals had been firing at these three men, probably expending more than one thousand shots, but not one had touched a man. We moved deliberately to the left of our army and took position with our regiment.

On December 17 General Lee was wounded, and Gen. Carter L. Stevenson assumed command. Generals Buford and Chalmers were sustaining the infantry on the two flanks. Meanwhile the enemy were becoming troublesome, though not following with that vigor which might have been expected. At this particular time Capt. W. A. Goodman, adjutant general for Gen. James R. Chalmers, narrowly escaped capture. Gen. B. F. Cheatham's Corps relieved General Lee's as the infantry rear guard until relieved in turn by General Forrest and his men, sustained by Gen. E. C. Walthall with his infantry, safely guarding Hood's army while crossing the Tennessee River. Col. W. F. Taylor commanded the 7th Tennessee to the close of the war, the other soldiers mentioned remaining with the regiment. After the war they all resided in Memphis, Tenn.

GEN. ROBERT E. RODES.

BY J. L. SCHAUB, LAGRANGE, GA.

I read in the November VETERAN a request from some patron asking for a sketch of Gen. Robert E. Rodes, who commanded first a brigade of Alabamians, then a division in Lee's army. It is surprising to me that so little has been published about one so high in rank, so brilliant in service, and so glorious in death.

General Rodes was born and reared in Lynchburg, Va.; but his profession of civil engineering led him to settle in Tuscaloosa, Ala., just previous to the opening of the war.

In May, 1861, Captain Rodes was elected colonel of the 5th Alabama Regiment, and was sent with his regiment to Virginia and placed in General Ewell's Brigade. In October following he was promoted to brigadier general to command the 1st Alabama Brigade, of which his regiment formed a part.

Passing through the Peninsular campaign, he led his brigade through the battles of Williamsburg and Seven Pines, where he acted with great gallantry and was severely wounded in the arm.

General Lee took command of the army and reorganized it, forming brigades as near as possible of regiments from each State. They began to be called Alabama brigades, Georgia brigades, etc., each brigade taking the name of its commander; and as the commanders changed by death or promotion, the brigade or division took the name of the new commander. D. H. Hill's Division was composed of the brigades commanded by Ripley, Garland, Rodes, G. B. Anderson, and Colquitt.

General Rodes commanded his brigade through the first Maryland campaign and back to and including the first battle of Fredericksburg, December 13 and 14, 1862. When General Hooker opened the Chancellorsville campaign, General Rodes was in command of the division, Gen. D. H. Hill having been transferred to another department. The names of three of the brigades also changed—viz., Garland's to Iverson's, Ripley's to Doles's, and Anderson's to Ramseur's.

This division formed part of Stonewall Jackson's Second Corps, and was the leading division in the flanking movement which routed Howard's Corps on May 2, 1863. Brigadier General Rodes displayed such gallantry and efficiency on this and the next day's fighting that he was promoted to major general, and he was especially commended by General Jackson to General Lee, as appears in his report of the campaign. An incident occurred just here which shows General Rodes's indomitable courage. It was told to me since the war by a field officer, who must have heard it at the time: A General Johnson had been sent from Richmond to take command of our division, and reached us on the march. General Rodes coolly told him that, as he had started in the fight, he would not be relieved until it was over unless he was put under arrest. Johnson declined to do this, and Rodes's promotion soon followed.

General Rodes led his division now in Ewell's Corps through the Gettysburg campaign and the maneuvers in the fall of 1863, ending with the battle of Mine Run. This division spent the winter near Orange C. H., and picketing on the Rapidan until May 5, 1864, when Grant crossed over at the Wilderness. General Rodes called his division together promptly and marched to concentrate with the rest of Lee's army to meet Grant. Then commenced that terrible fighting campaign—Lee with his 52,000 and Grant with his 120,000—terminating at the second battle of Cold Harbor, June 3, Grant being completely foiled.

Our corps now, under General Early, was detached and sent to Lynchburg to meet an attack by General Hunter, who was marching on that point. Hunter fell back into West Virginia, and our division, with the rest of the corps, marched to Staunton, then on down the valley, crossed the Potomac River, and threatened Washington City, of which we were in sight several days. We then fell back into Virginia, after fighting and routing Gen. Lew Wallace at Monocacy. General Rodes still in command of his division, which was the largest in the corps, though it had suffered heavily in continued losses since the campaign opened in May.

On September 19 at Winchester we met General Sheridan's forces with about four to our one. Our division was lying near Stephenson's Depot, several miles from Winchester, when we got orders to move rapidly to the aid of General Ramseur, who with his small division was holding back Sheridan's army and was about to be overwhelmed. Rodes threw the division in line on Ramseur's right flank to meet a large force of the enemy, who were coming around that flank to envelop Ramseur, and moved forward at once. As we passed through a strip of woods, driving the Yankee sharpshooters out, we came to a large open field in full view of long lines of the enemy. They appeared to be disconcerted, and the nearest line to us began to fall back. We were ordered forward after them, and just then the enemy opened fire on us with a battery. They had good range, and almost every shell burst in our faces. Rodes was a few paces behind us. His fine black horse, which he had ridden so long, got excited under the bursting shells, and the General held him with difficulty. But it was but a few minutes until a piece of shell struck General Rodes on the head, knocking him to the ground, where he died in a few minutes. His horse ran to the rear.

GEN. R. E. RODES.

We fought on until nearly sundown, when Sheridan made his last grand charge, flanking us on both sides with his large cavalry force and bringing three solid lines of infantry against us. Our thin line could hold out no longer, and retreated back through Winchester. In all of the battles I had been in I had never seen our army driven off the field before.

The death of General Rodes was a great loss to the army. He ranked next to Early, and many thought he would have been more successful, as he had the confidence of not only his division but the entire corps. He was brave without rashness, and General Lee often complimented him. Could more be desired?

RODES'S BRIGADE AT SEVEN PINES.

[There appeared in the Herald and Mississippian on Saturday, August 17, 1867, the following tribute to Rodes's Brigade at Seven Pines. The author of the poem is supposed to have been Maj. H. A. Whiting, who served on General Rodes's staff.]

Down by the valley, 'mid thunder and lightning,
Down by the valley, 'mid jettings of light,
Down by the deep crimsoned valley of Richmond
The twenty-five hundred moved on to the fight.
Onward, still onward, to the portals of glory,
To the sepulchered chambers, yet never dismayed;
Down to the deep crimsoned valley of Richmond
Marched the bold warriors of Rodes's Brigade.

See ye the fires and flashings still leaping,
Hear ye the pelting and beating of storm,
See ye the banners of proud Alabama
In front of her columns move steadily on;
Hear ye the music that gladdens each comrade
As it floats through the air 'mid the torrent of sounds;
Hear ye booming adown the red valley,
Carter unbuckles his swarthy old hounds.

Twelfth Mississippi, I saw your brave columns
Rush through the channels of living and dead;
Twelfth Alabama, why weep ye your old war horse?
He died, as he wished, in the gear at your head.
Seven Pines, ye will tell on the pages of glory
How the blood of the South ebbed away 'neath the shade;
How lads of Virginia fought in the red valley
And fell in the columns of Rodes's Brigade.

Fathers and mothers, ye weep for your jewels;
Sisters, ye weep for your brothers in vain;
Maidens, ye weep for your sunny-eyed lovers—
Weep, for they never will come back again!
Weep ye, but know what a halo of glory
Encircles each chamber of death newly made,
And know ye that victory, the shrine of the mighty,
Stands forth on the banners of Rodes's Brigade.

Daughters of Southland, come bring ye bright flowers,
Weave ye a chaplet for the brow of the brave;
Bring ye some emblem of freedom and victory,
Bring ye some emblem of death and the grave;
Bring ye some motto befitting a hero,
Bring ye exotics that never will fade;
Come to the deep crimsoned valley of Richmond
And crown the young chieftain who led his brigade.

UNVEILING OF MONUMENT AT MT. PLEASANT.

BY OCTAVIA ZOLLICOFFER BOND.

Between the wide-stretched arms of Bigby Creek, in Maury County, lies the "garden spot of Tennessee." For a half century before the war for Southern rights the noted Bigby valley was a seed bed for refinement and culture. The men who entered life in this surpassingly fertile region were born to wealth, honor, and power. Yet three generations of luxury since the clearing of Bigby canebrakes had not weakened the fiber of their manhood nor dulled the keen edge of their patriotic spirit. Prompt as they were practical in protest against sectional coercion, they were among the earliest to offer for the Confederate service.

Neither delaying nor holding back the best, Bigby Valley ungrudgingly gave to the cause her sixteen-year-old boys of promise, her choice young men of twenty-five. It was the hope and pride of each Bigby family who hastened in the early spring of 1861 to join the company being then organized in the vilage of Mt. Pleasant by Capt. (afterwards Col.) Fount Wade under the name of "Bigby Grays," a picked band that was one of the first ten companies of Tennessee volunteers enlisted in the war. At Nashville on May 16 they were mustered in as Company C of the 3d Tennessee Infantry.

From Donelson to Bentonville those youthful soldiers bore the hardships of march, bivouac, and battle with the fortitude of veterans. Under Gens. John C. Brown, Albert Sidney Johnston, Bragg, Polk, and Hood they were dedicated to Southern principles in the fires of Chickasaw Bayou, Port Hudson, Chickamauga, and in the holocausts around Atlanta. Few came back to the beautiful valley unmaimed or alive except as their memories persist in the hearts of their grateful countrymen. In such sense, indeed, they, with all good Confederates, still live. Nor shall they die so long as the records of the U. D. C. are preserved, so long as a file of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN is in existence, so long as tongue can tell and ear receive the folk tales of their valor, and so long as there remains a fragment of the monument shown in the accompanying illustration.

The shaft here pictured was erected by the Mt. Pleasant Chapter, U. D. C., called "Bigby Grays" Chapter. Their purpose of thus crystallizing the affectionate memory in which they hold all Confederate soldiers took solid shape and form largely through the untiring work of the efficient President of the Chapter, Mrs. J. T. Jenkins. Executive ability is Mrs. Jenkins's gift; loyalty to the South is her inheritance through fighting ancestry. It was her day of achievement when on the 27th of September, 1907, the monument was unveiled in the now important phosphate city of Mt. Pleasant on the spot where forty-seven years ago the Bigby Grays had made their vows of war and accepted their virgin banner from the hands of a typical Bigby maiden, Miss Matt Dobbins. It was a day of grace for all in the green lands of Big and Little Bigby when Capt. W. S. Jennings, a former commander of the Grays, led a troop of mounted Veterans and Sons of Veterans, flying the colors of the State and the Confederacy, on their way to meet the arriving speakers and visitors who had come to honor the occasion.

Thousands of hearts beat "double-quick" when the Fayetteville band emerged from the train to the strains of "Dixie," escorting Senator E. W. Carmack and Judge S. F. Wilson, with Mrs. M. B. Pilcher and other State officers of the U. D. C., to their awaiting carriages; while the Leonidas Polk Bivouac, in full uniform of gray and carrying the banner on which the portrait of their warrior bishop had been painted by Miss A. M. Zollicoffer, fell into line of march, under Sergeant J. N. Meroney, with the home Veterans. These, with numerous decorated vehicles, including a brilliant float containing thirteen beautiful girls in charge of Mr. Rufus Jackson, formed a procession under the skillful guidance of Dr. C. Y. Clarke, the marshal of the day, which wound through the streets of Mt. Pleasant to the Public Square, where the monument stands.

On a platform at its base a number of children waving national flags at once grouped themselves about the State President and Vice President U. D. C., Mesdames M. B. Pilcher and J. D. Dobbins, and to the accompaniment of the Fayetteville band sang "America." For the remainder of the forenoon programme there were an invocation by Rev. A. S. Allen, addresses of welcome by Hon. Percy S. Chandler on behalf of the citizens and for the Daughters of the Confederacy by Mrs. J. G. Frierson, and a poem, "Remembering," by Mrs. Octavia Zollicoffer Bond. Prof. James A. Bostick's remarks which followed ended with an invitation to all present to partake of the feast spread for them in the Cumberland Presbyterian church, near by.

The delightful function began with a choicely worded toast by Miss Matt Dobbins, who passed the loving cup to the old soldiers assembled. It was fitting that she should cheer the twelve, or fewer, surviving members of the Bigby Grays as well as other comrades in their declining years as she had encouraged them in their youth.

After the noon recess, the exercises were continued on the handsomely shaded lawn of Dr. Robert Williams's residence. The portico of the ante-bellum home, from which Dr. Williams had started for the war as a Bigby Gray lad in years gone by, now formed the rostrum from which Professor Bostick introduced Judge S. F. Wilson, who spoke in behalf of the old soldiers. Listening to his eloquence, a generous enemy might well have applauded, and old Confederates wept without shame. Senator Carmack's glowing tribute to the Daughters of the Confederacy brought to a magnificent close the programme on the lawn.

Immediately afterwards the unveiling took place on the Public Square. While the band played softly the ribbons were drawn by the thirteen maidens who had personified on the float the thirteen Confederate States. A shout went up when the parting drapery revealed the stately column surmounted by Darricoat's statue of a Confederate soldier.

The monument, which was made by the Southern Granite and Marble Company, of Dalton, Ga., is a standing testimonial to the conscientious skill of the company.

PIKNEY KILLINGSWORTH'S WAR RECORD WANTED.

C. A. Killingsworth, of 5450 Second Avenue, Pittsburg, Pa., sends a clipping from the Pittsburg Dispatch which states: "Would suggest that you write to the editor of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, Nashville, Tenn., giving the name and all the information you can of your father's service. He will know where the records of the Southern army are kept, and may be able to inform you where you can secure the record of his service. If possible, find out what regiment or company he served in, so that it will give some clew to where to look."

The foregoing is copied as good advice to those who make similar inquiry. Mr. C. A. K. writes that his father served through the war from South Carolina, but he doesn't know the regiment or company. Veteran Killingsworth was born and reared near Dunbarton, and enlisted while in business at Williston, S. C. Any comrade who knew him would confer a great favor by writing to the son.

"THOU SHALT NOT SWEAR."—The VETERAN is willing to depart occasionally from its specific work to condemn profanity. In Atlanta a woman was before the court seeking to establish a respectable reputation. Matters were proceeding favorably for her plea, when under excitement from some incidental circumstances she exclaimed, "Great G—!" in such blasphemous tones that the justice at once stopped her defense, assessed heavy fines against her and another woman, her associate, and required that they move out of the premises that they sought to retain. This was a good example. Profanity among young men who assume gentility on public carriages and highways is so common that regulators should insist that the laws be executed and heavy fines imposed. What a pity that gentlemen do not realize the absolute pain to auditors of their profanity and that they do not realize their wickedness in breaking one of the great commandments and that they are thereby discredited and lowered in public esteem!

REPLY TO THE LETTER THAT CAME "TOO LATE."

[A time-worn, dingy newspaper clipping by Mrs. H. C. Barrow as a reply to that pathetic poem by Maj. Will S. Hawkins, so widely known, of a letter by a young lady to her lover received the day after he died in prison.]

Thy taunting words, so fraught with scorn and hate,
I have just seen, but they have come too late;
Ah, yes, too late! I cannot banish now
The shade of care thou'st seen upon his brow.
And didst thou then think he would have borne the pain
Of one more day to read those words in vain
Which I from fancied wrong so thoughtless sent?
Thinkest thou it would have brought to him content?
O, no! They would have deeper made the trace
Of saintly care that dwelt upon his face—
That pallid face. O Heaven, it haunts me still
And sends into my soul a sudden thrill
Of woe intense, and now I loathe the part
I took to wound a trusting, noble heart.
God knows I love him—would have died to save
His manly form from death and from the grave;
But O, I did not dream that he would die,
And lie forever 'neath the Northern sky.
Say, wilt thou for me plant upon his tomb
A simple cluster with the heartfelt prayer
That I some day may weep above him there?
And O, I beg that thou wilt take the trees
That's hallowed now by his dear parting kiss
And place beside his grave, for angels know
This heart for him beats pure as stainless snow.
Then taunt me not with wiles that I have wrought
To gain his love; "there's madness in the thought."
I used no art; my soul went out to him
As freely as the blest to cherubim.
Thou'st said my rooms were gay with wit and song,
And I forgave thee for the cruel wrong;
For now of joyous mirth and wine instead
My heart doth darkly mourn its gallant dead,
And is as free from guilt's reproachful stain
As this poor hand that penned those words of pain.
Thou wert his friend, thou'st caught his parting breath,
And smoothed those limbs ere they waxed cold in death.
O, blessed boom! too blest for one like me,
Yet would to God I could have been with thee!
Then ne'er had been upon that heart the trace
Of "saintly sadness" seen upon his face;
Yet now, thank God, before the great white throne
He knows this pure, true heart was all his own.

The writer of this reply states: "I have no acquaintance whatever with Colonel H., and am ignorant of the circumstances under which his poem was written. I merely responded upon the impulse of the moment and a sympathy for the young lady he alluded to, though all parties are strangers to me."

BATTLE OF WILSON'S CREEK.

BY GEORGE M. JONES, SPRINGFIELD, MO.

Flattery, according to the common acceptance of that word, is detestable, but merited commendation is right and proper; and it is in this spirit that I desire to call attention to, and express my hearty approval of, the broad catholicity of spirit of the VETERAN in general, but especially as manifested in your editorial, and in putting side by side with it an extract from the Indianapolis News on a general decoration day, as contained in your September issue. One or two sentences from that editorial will bear repeating: "The man who talks on the war is speaking for eternity, and it behooves him to speak words of soberness; but there is a habit of too many orators to speak extravagantly of what their side did, and they often weaken their cause by representing the other side discreditably." Many of us have realized the truthfulness of these utterances, but have been slow to make known our disapproval.

The time for crimination and recrimination has long since passed, if it ever existed. Surely we of the South have enough to boast of without disparaging the other side. While life's sinking sun is still above the horizon, we veterans of both sides ought to hasten to put away from us all animosity and bitterness. That heaven will be inhabited by both the "Blue and the Gray," none of us can doubt; but we also know that bitterness and hatred can find no place in "that land where everlasting peace abides."

In keeping with these thoughts, and in accord with yourself and the editor of the paper above referred to, I would express the hope that the 30th of May be adopted for the annual decoration of our graves. This ceremony is not, and ought not to be, in honor of any one man. It ought to be on a day convenient for the largest number to attend; and with this end in view, some have urged that Sunday be observed as the day most suitable. We of the South can afford to adopt the national holiday for the performance of this beautiful and impressive ceremonial, since it is admitted by our Northern friends that it had its origin in the South.

Without trespassing at too great length on your time and space, but for the truth of history, I wish to correct a statement that is calculated to create a wrong impression as to which side was victorious in the battle of Wilson's Creek, and which is contained in General Dodge's otherwise most excellent article in the October number of the VETERAN. General Dodge says: "Schofield was adjutant of that army [Lyon's], and in a large degree it was his efforts and advice that brought the force that had really won a great victory and did not know it safely to Springfield and Rolla." Major Schofield (for such he was then), if he really believed that the Union army was victorious at Wilson's Creek, must have come to that conclusion when a hundred and forty miles had separated him from the battlefield; for it was at Rolla that his report was made. I was present on that memorable 10th of August, 1861; and if ever an army left a field more precipitately or in greater disorder, I do not know where or how it could have been.

The Confederates were in possession of the entire field, never had been off of it, together with the body of General Lyon and nearly all of their killed and wounded. Early in the day General Seigel's wing of the army, in utter demoralization, had been driven from the field, leaving his artillery behind, and on reaching Springfield, ten miles away, it consisted of the General and his orderly.

Major Schofield was then young and ambitious, and doubtless possessed of a vivid imagination, and he seems to have drawn on it without stint. It should not be forgotten that General Lyon at the start had the great advantage of taking the Confederates completely by surprise, the pickets having been drawn in the night before, preparatory to the march on Springfield, and, through neglect or forgetfulness on the part of somebody, not having been replaced. Possibly, for obvious reasons, this fact was not mentioned in either of the official reports.

PORTRAIT OF MR. DAVIS AT BEAUVOIR.

No more fitting time than the present can be chosen for reference to the portrait of President Davis presented by

Flora Adams Darling to the Confederate Home at Beauvoir. The following letters are in regard to it:

"My Dear Mrs. Darling: Thanks for your kind letter and faithful memory of my dear husband's virtues and political integrity, than whom no man living or dead ever had more. I have in vain tried to look forward to the day when I could have a good painting of him made to place in the Home at Beauvoir; but I had an opportunity to get two stained-glass windows in the church at Biloxi, and at the price I never could hope to get them again, one to my husband and one to my Winnie. They are to come from Munich. One is to be the resurrection of our Lord; motto, 'Blessed are ye when men shall persecute you for righteousness' sake,' etc. The other will be the raising of Jairus's daughter: 'The maid is not dead, but sleepeth.' These two windows have taken all my spare money, or I should offer to join you in your sweet tribute to Mr. Davis.

"I am on the confines of eternity—alas! trying vainly to pierce the veil where almost everything I love has preceded me for the long and silent wait for the trump which is to wake us all to reunion and a perpetuity at last—and I live with the dead hopes and loves which are fallen silent. It seems a long time to me until the universal triumph of truth; but I saw in the New York World an editorial which astounded me, in which it was distinctly asserted that State rights would be our only bulwark against the paternalism and encroachments of the centralized power of the general government. * * *

"My health does not improve, or I would go South and meet you there; but if you are still South when my windows are to be put in, I do hope you will be with me at the church, and that I may be with you at the Beauvoir Home if I can go South. With affectionate regards, always yours,

V. JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Governor Vardaman wrote from Jackson, Miss., March 6, 1907, to Mrs. Darling: "Your generous favor of the 1st inst. came to hand this morning. I shall make a trip to Beauvoir for the sole purpose of supervising the placing of the portrait of Jefferson Davis which you have been so kind as to give to the Soldiers' Home. In the name of the people of Mississippi generally, and the Confederate men and women particularly, I thank you from the depths of my heart for this portrait."

In this connection the VETERAN presents a picture of Mrs. Darling not only because of her zeal on behalf of all that the South has stood for, but in gratitude that she has in many ways aided without stint the maintenance of the principles dear to all Southern hearts. It is most noteworthy that Mrs.

Darling is of New England stock, and that many traditions of her family are flavored with reference to the early days, her name itself, "Adams," indicating close connection with the second and sixth Presidents of the United States.

R. C. CROUCH VISITS JOHNSON'S ISLAND.

Forty-four years ago Robert C. Crouch, a Tennessee Confederate soldier nineteen years of age, entered the prison gates at Johnson's Island for what afterwards proved an incarceration of twenty-one months. The same Robert C. Crouch, now of Morristown, Tenn., tall and erect in spite of his sixty-three years, and with the distinguished air of the Southern gentleman one is wont to picture, has again visited the scene of his imprisonment and gazed upon the changes brought about in almost half a century.

Forty-four years is a long lapse, yet Mr. Crouch had but little trouble in locating the spots where at one time stood the Federal prison that held hundreds of Southern soldiers, nearly all officers. He visited the little cemetery, and on the headstones read the names of many of his friends who had shared the life of a prisoner with him. He was the guest while in Sandusky of Theodore Gerold, a well-known citizen, this being his first visit since the day he left for the South after his release from the prison. Mr. Crouch made the pilgrimage with the end in view of determining what changes had been wrought in the many years and for information relative to the Confederate cemetery.

Mr. Crouch is a fine type of the refined Southern gentleman. He is of distinguished appearance and pleasing personality, being a very interesting talker. He is prominent in his State, and is known as a contributor to Southern papers and magazines on Civil War stories, and it was partly for material for future writings that he visited the North. He secured the names of all of the known dead at the Johnson's Island Cemetery.

Mr. Crouch enlisted in the Confederate army when but a young man, and the twenty-one months he spent at the Johnson's Island Prison were not entirely wasted to him. Inside the prison walls he came in contact with many older officers of refinement and intellect, and his association with them was really a school of higher learning to him. For that reason his prison life is not entirely regretted by him.

CONFEDERATES HONOR ADMIRAL EVANS.

The entire country has learned of the splendid landing and entertainment at San Diego, Cal., of Admiral Robley D. Evans and his fleet; but the part taken in the reception by men who fought for the Confederacy will be read with interest by contributors to the VETERAN.

The officers and members of John H. Morgan Camp, Confederate Veterans, have been advised that it is the intention of your Post to present to Admiral Robley D. Evans a sword of honor in token of your admiration of him as a brave and efficient officer and a partial recognition of his eminent services to the nation.

Maj. Hugh Gwyn, who was grand marshal of the great parade, was a major and inspector general in Morgan's Kentucky Cavalry, and was with Mr. Davis at the time of the surrender. Three of his aids for the parade were Southern men. Possibly to Major Gwyn more than to any other man in the far West is due the credit of bringing about friendly relations between the organizations representing the North and the South, and the sentiment by which he accomplishes such results is evidenced in his letter to Capt. Dan F. Jones, Chairman of the local G. A. R., concerning the sword to be presented to Admiral Evans.

After paying special tribute to the Admiral, Major Gwyn's letter continues: "A reunited nation should know how to honor a great soldier or sailor without regard to the side on which he fought. We hand you forthwith check to cover the modest contribution of this Camp to augment the fund in purchase of the sword of honor to be contributed by our comrades of the G. A. R. and Spanish War Veterans, and beg in a spirit of fraternity your acceptance of the same."

That the sentiment is duly appreciated by the Grand Army and other bodies is shown by the following letter which has been received by Major Gwyn from Montgomery M. Moulton, Secretary of the Military Fraternities Committee of the Fleet Celebration: "I have been directed by the Military Fraternities Committee to acknowledge the receipt of your kind favor of the 10th, inclosing your Camp's substantial contribution toward the Evans sword fund. The committee accepts your assistance in the same spirit of fraternity in which it is offered, and will with pleasure place upon the sword's inscription the name of your organization in conjunction with the names of the two local Posts of the G. A. R. and of the Camp of Spanish War Veterans. We recognize the patriotic impulses which cause the Confederate guard to join us in this testimonial to a great American commander, and we are certain that Admiral Evans will appreciate this tribute, coming as it does from the men who wore the blue, the gray, and the khaki. With friendly regards to yourself and comrades of Morgan Camp, and assuring you that the other military societies of this city will always be glad to cooperate with the honorable gentlemen and good citizens who comprise your organization."

CONFEDERATE ORGANIZATIONS COMMENDED.

AN ADDRESS BY JUDGE TARLTON, UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS,
TO A U. D. C. CONVENTION.

Ladies, United Daughters of the Confederacy: It goes without saying that I feel greatly honored in the fact that the pleasing task devolves upon me of representing the university in addressing the Daughters of the Confederacy on this occasion. This honor is enhanced in that it was tendered me through our good friend, Judge Clark, who is regarded as the Nestor of the faculty of the university, and who gracefully wears on his bosom the bronze cross of a Confederate veteran. This honor is further enhanced in that it was tendered by the good wife of Judge Clark, a member and representative of the Daughters of the Confederacy. The Daughters of the Confederacy are representative Texas women who reflect the honor, the glory, and the name of the State's highest institution of learning.

Some deprecate the existence of organizations such as yours. They say that organizations of this character tend to keep alive memories of a strife, with all its attendant bitterness, which should be buried forever. If the charge were true, the objection would be well founded. But the purpose of this organization is not to perpetuate bitterness, prejudice, and hostility. The heritage of the Daughters of the Confederacy is one of undying glory. This is the solemn truth which impartial history teaches, and the purpose of this organization is to vindicate this truth. The same principle with a different application inspires the organization known as the "Daughters of the American Revolution," which assembled here a few days ago. The same principle inspires the organization of the Daughters of the Republic, which meets here year after year, perhaps. Your organization is inspired not by hatred of the North but by love of the South, of admiration for its statesmen and its soldiers, and by the suggestions of the loftiest patriotism. Your organization would not keep alive the fires of fratricidal strife. On the contrary, it would forever quench them. From the grave of this strife it would pluck the fragrant flowers of peace, reconciliation, and good will between the sections of our common country.

Why is it that whenever a native of the South hears the strains of "Dixie" he is tempted to rise and shout with all possible acclaim? If this air be played on an occasion when large numbers are present, a shout will go up such as marked the entrance into Rome of a victorious general, when "Tiber trembled underneath her bonds"

To hear the replication of the sounds made in her concave shores."

The air of "Dixie" was composed by an Englishman named Emmett, as I understand it, accompanying a troupe of negro minstrels traveling over the country during the period just preceding the war. The air itself possesses little of musical merit, though there are about it a swing, an élan, an impetus that suggest the steady and firm tread of the march on the one hand and the dread impetuosity of the charge on the other hand. If its music be of little merit, the words to which the air was originally set, regarded as poetry, were of less. They are extremely suggestive of a jingle which laughs at meter, mingled with an unhappy attempt at rhyme.

"Way down yonder in the land of cotton,
Cinnamon seed, and sandy bottom,
Look away! away! away down
South in Dixie.

I wish I was in Dixie, away, away:
In Dixie's Land I'll take my stand
And live and die for Dixie."

What, then, was and is the witchery about this song? Why was it adopted as the battle cry of the South? Because of the sentiment expressed in the concluding lines of the refrain:

"In Dixie's Land I'll take my stand
And live and die for Dixie.
Away, away down South in Dixie."

"Dixie" and the South were thus identified, the former being the designation of the latter. The resolve to do, dare, and die for Southern homes and firesides found expression in the words and in the air. This love of country, this love of your beautiful and your native land, is at the basis of your organization and is its motive and its inspiration.

To the churlish critic who says, "Away with such organizations!" "Let the dead past bury its dead," I reply: "We may not sever ourselves from the past." It is true of a people as it is of an individual:

"Our acts our angels are for good or ill,
The silent specters that walk by us still."

History has been aptly described as "philosophy teaching by example." The past is made up of example or a succession of examples. A people without a glorious past has little of a present and less of a future. The American people, regarded as a unit, is a people with a glorious past. The Northern section of the Union may be said to consist of a people with a glorious past; the South may be said to consist of a people with a glorious past. The Daughters of the Confederacy constitute an organization the birth and existence of which are linked with a glorious past. The mind is busy with the contemplation of that past. It lives and animates us to-day. It is not dead. It is immortal. It will survive the marble which is designed to perpetuate it.

We revert to the formation of our government. A convention composed of delegates from the several States constituting the thirteen colonies meets at Philadelphia in 1787. It sits with closed doors from May to September. It adopts a dual form of government, foreshadowed, indeed, by the fine Greek mind in the Amphictyonic Council, but never realized until it assumed shape in the American Constitution. This instrument received encomium from publicists such as the late Lord Brougham in England and De Tocqueville in France, and especially from the great statesman, Mr. Gladstone, who pronounced it in effect the greatest governmental product of the human mind. But in spite of this merited encomium this product had within itself the seeds of dissension in the ambiguity which inhered in it, so that honest minds, under the impulse of conflicting sectional interests, differed as to its true scope and meaning with reference to the States in relation to the government created by it. Ultimately this difference could be settled only by an appeal to arms. The South stood by the construction of Jefferson, Madison, Calhoun, Toombs, and Davis; the North, by that of Hamilton, Wilson, Webster, Seward, and Lincoln. It avails nothing in this connection to consider the merits of the controversy. Suffice it to say that in appealing to arms impartial history will attest the honesty and patriotism of the Southern people and the fact that they were able to give a "reason for the faith that was in them." And hence this fratricidal strife—the most stupendous of the last century.

I recall the happy days that preceded this contest. In many respects the South was the home of culture, chivalry, and refinement. It had supplied much of the wealth of national intellect and military prowess. The eloquence of its sons was heard on the hustings and in the council chamber. The valor of its soldiers added luster to the military glory of the Union, the wisdom of its statesmen aided greatly in shaping the destiny of the great republic, and the learning of its jurists illumined the pages of judicial lore. The clash of angry debate in Congress preceded the bugle call to arms, rendered inevitable by the irreconcilable differences of construction with reference to the supreme and fundamental law. Though a lad at the time, I well recall the days of 1861—the drilling of the volunteer troops (Hardee's "Manual of Arms"); the formation of companies, battalions, and regiments; the gay uniforms of the soldiers, and how resplendent they looked as, "burning with high hope," they marched to the field of battle, many soon to "molder, cold and low." Every neighborhood in the South, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, was the scene of the formation of companies, battalions, and regiments. The army thus composed was mighty and brave. Was there ever one mightier or braver? Of its leader, Gen. Robert E. Lee, President Roosevelt writes that he was the greatest English-speaking general since Marlborough. This testimonial will not be suspected of partiality, and its source thus guarantees its reliability.

The impetuosity of Stonewall Jackson, whose tragic fate was a blow to the Confederacy as irreparable as that of the subsequent loss of the battle of Gettysburg, was not excelled by the prowess of the marshals of Napoleon. "Let us cross over the river and rest under the shade of the trees"—words of the mighty warrior, mingled of poesy and of prophecy. He crossed and he rests. His memory rests green in the hearts and minds of his countrymen.

And of Jefferson Davis, leader of the Confederacy, what shall we say? He had served as a gallant officer in the army of the United States in the war with Mexico. He had won renown in that capacity. He there showed that he was a "knight without fear and without reproach." He had served subsequently as Secretary of War in the Cabinet of President Pierce. He had reorganized the army of the United States, and had thus prepared it for bitter contest against the battalions afterwards to be organized under the captains of the South. He was, over his protest, elected President of the Confederacy. He called to his Cabinet distinguished citizens of the Southern States, including the Hon. John H. Reagan, whose memory is honored and revered by the people of the State of Texas and whose great mind brought aid to the cause of the Confederacy, as subsequently it added to the statesmanship of the Federal Congress.

From the beginning to the end the burden of the contest rested upon the shoulders of the great President of the South; and after its close, it was his to bear the unspeakable contumely that waits on defeat and disaster. Through dreary days and weary nights of imprisonment he endured the horrors of the gyve and the dungeon as a prisoner of State in Fortress Monroe. Indicted for treason in the Federal court at Richmond, great constitutional lawyers, such as Charles O'Connor, of New York, tendered their services in his behalf, and former adversaries, such as Horace Greeley, as if in tardy recognition of the persecution to which he was subjected, hastened to make his bond to secure his liberty. The indictment was dismissed. The alleged traitor was never accorded a trial. He survived all of his great adversaries. The closing years of his eventful career were passed peacefully and serenely. He died beloved of his countrymen. At his funeral were the Governors of all the great States whose soldiers had followed his standard. The warfare of the soldier was over! The tongue of the orator was hushed! The intellect of the statesman wrought no more! The pen of the historian was laid aside!

"Bury the great chief
With a people's lamentation.
Let us bury the great chief
To the noise of the mourning of a mighty nation,
Mourning when their leaders fall.
Warriors carry the warrior's pall
And sorrow darkens hamlet and hall!"

The present President of the United States, writing in his earlier manhood the life of Thomas H. Benton, compared Jefferson Davis to Benedict Arnold—not to the disparagement of the latter. The distinguished author was then writing under the impulse of that partisanship not unnatural to one subjected to the influence of sectional environments. Under such conditions it is not surprising that a youthful aspirant to literary honors should unwittingly sacrifice the truth of history to the behests of a rounded period or of a striking antithesis.

During the recent Southern tour of the President, whom I greatly admire, he referred in a speech at Vicksburg to the late President of the Confederacy as a gallant soldier and the famed leader of a great people. Should the next President of the United States be a Republican, and should he chance to be of the same courageous temperament as that which characterizes Mr. Roosevelt, he will doubtless truthfully state that the bust of Mr. Davis as a great American is entitled to a niche in the national Hall of Fame, and thus "From President to President will judgment broaden slowly down."

It is natural to dwell upon the virtues and the prowess of the leader, and yet it were well to reflect that the fame of the leader rests upon the courage of the follower. Where would have been the fame of the leaders of the Confederate army without the bravery, the fortitude, and the unparalleled patriotism of the private soldier? The chaplet of fame garlanded the brow of the leader. The private soldier sought and hoped for no promotion. He was inspired solely by the consciousness of duty done. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." The private soldier of the Confederate army met this supreme test. Riding along the public road which courses with the Bayou Teche, in Louisiana, I once noticed a soldier's grave among the seaweed near the borders of that stream. It was near the scene of the battle of Bisland, fought by the armies of General Banks and General Taylor during the month of April, 1863. It was the grave of a private soldier of Gen. Tom Green's Texas Brigade. As I gazed at it the paraphrase of a stanza from Gray's immortal "Elegy" occurred to my mind:

"No marble column rears its stately head
To tell of him who here doth unknown lie;
No proud memorial of the heroic dead
Draws forth a tear or begs a passing sigh."

The wild flowers blushed near by, the wild birds sang their matin and their vesper carols there, the leaves of the primeval oak whispered a requiem over the lonely resting place, and in some far-off Texas home the mother and the wife and the sisters poured forth their souls in sad lament:

"We shall meet, but we shall miss him;
There will be a vacant chair.
We shall linger to caress him
While we breathe our evening prayer."

Alas! alas! they lingered in vain to caress him! The fall of his returning footsteps was never heard! The aspirations of the evening prayer followed his soul in its flight to that brighter realm which lies beyond the stars.

If courage characterized the sons of the Confederacy, this courage found its mainstay and support in the fortitude of the Daughters of the Confederacy. Mr. Davis dedicated to the women of the South the work designated to perpetuate the vindication of himself and of his people in the momentous struggle of 1861. In eloquent words he seeks to do justice to their pious ministrations to their wounded soldiers, to their domestic labors, to their fortitude, to their affectionate remembrance, to their lofty patriotism.

Children of luxury as they had been, the women of the South met the storm with dauntless fortitude and plucked from the "ugly and venomous toad's head of adversity" the precious jewel that lies incased therein.

"O woman! in our hours of ease
Uncertain, coy, and hard to please,
And variable as the shade
By the light, quivering aspen made;
When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou."

The women of the South were angels ministering to the anguish of the wounded soldier. They stifled the sighs of the sick; they smoothed the pillow of the dying.

After four years of struggle, the hour of Appomattox arrived. The land of the South was in ruins! No "evergreen smiled in the midst of the blast and desolation" that prevailed. "They made it a solitude and mocked it with the appellation of peace!"

The poet-priest of the South, Father Ryan, referring to the banner which symbolized its fate, thus portrayed the condition of the South in elegiac verse:

"Furl that banner, softly, slowly!
Treat it gently—it is holy.
For it droops above the dead,
Touch it not—unfold it never;
Let it droop there, furled forever,
For its people's hopes are fled."

And thus it seemed! Not so, however! Across the pallid brow of the South was written the word "Resurgam" ("I shall rise again"). The prophecy has been fulfilled. In spite of "destruction and reconstruction" the people of the South are to-day in the vanguard of civilization. The arts of peace succeed the arts of war, and fair fortune smiles upon the hills and the vales and the fields and the mountains of the South! And if this be true of the South generally, it is especially and emphatically true of the State of Texas. To the bravery of the Texas and Louisiana troops in the battle of Mansfield and of the forty immortal Irishmen at Sabine Pass is due the fact that during those years the touch of a hostile foot never tainted the soil of Texas! Hence Texas was more fortunate than her sister States. Hence, too, the brawn and the brain of the sturdy citizenship of those sister States sought refuge here and contributed to the upbuilding of this mighty commonwealth.

"Imperial Texas, thy past is starred with the splendor of great deeds done!
Thy present is fraught with the plenty of a magnificent prosperity!
Thy future what 'mystical lore,' what human ken may foretell?"

HUMOR AND PATHOS IN THE ARMY.

BY H. H. STURGIS, SANFORD, FLA.

After the Spottsylvania battle, early in the morning (I had been on picket duty during the night) I made a scout in front to ascertain what the Yanks were doing, and had gone near their rifle pits just as one of them rose up and stretched himself. He dropped down immediately, when I made for the rear. Looking back just in time to see two aim at me, I fell and heard the Minies whistle overhead. I reached our lines and jumped over where Lieutenant Colonel Campbell, of the 47th Alabama, lay dead. He was shot through the head. I was informed that three others had been killed only a few minutes before.

Major Carey ordered me to find the sharpshooter who was doing such harm. This I finally did. He was in the top of a pine tree three-quarters of a mile away. I fired three times at the top of the tree, he replying as many times, the last shot knocking the bark into my face, striking only an inch below the top of the log. I went to a battery on our right (Reiley's, I think) and got the captain to shoot off the top of the tree, and had the satisfaction of seeing him tumble fully sixty feet to the ground.

Many anecdotes of the guying of our officers by the men might be related. One illustration I give: Col. Michael J. Bulger, of the 47th Alabama Regiment, being field officer of the day, was making the round in full regimentals when Private Wiley Brown threw a hard ball of snow, striking the Colonel squarely on the head. The Colonel went at Brown and wallowed him in the snow. That night from all parts of the brigade (Law's) was heard, "Who wallowed Wiley Brown?" and hundreds would answer, "Bulger;" and all over camp came the refrain: "Lie down, Wiley Brown, Bulger is coming!" This was kept up for some time. Finally on a march General Law issued orders to the brigade not to let Colonel Bulger catch them hallooing it any more. Colonel Bulger could not catch one, though the whole brigade joined in the gibe whenever Colonel Bulger made his appearance until he was captured at Suffolk. After his return to the army, we gave him one more. I was standing next to Wiley Brown when Colonel Bulger came by at the head of his regiment, when I put my hand on Brown's head as the Colonel rode past and said: "Lie down, Wiley Brown, Bulger is coming!" When Colonel Bulger took off his hat, made a profound bow, and, saluting, said, "Good morning, 4th," "Three cheers for Colonel Bulger!" was given with a will.

Our camp prayer meetings were memorable. Every regiment had true soldiers of Jesus Christ who were not ashamed to acknowledge him as the Captain of their salvation. Even after the tedious march of the day some of the boys would seek a quiet place and begin a song, when others would gather and then were held our nightly prayer meetings. The last we held was after Lee's surrender, the night before we broke camp to return to our loved ones at home. The influence of those meetings can never be lost. Many packs of cards were burned by our boys, not waiting till the eve of battle to throw them away, which was ever an indication of a battle. It will be recalled that always along the line of march just before a battle the road would be strewn with cards. Why did the boys do this if there is no harm in cards? No one wanted to be shot with cards in his pocket. Many comforting associations cluster around the camp prayer meetings when officers and men would bow to the only One to whom they could look in time of danger. The sweet influences of mothers, sisters,

When I returned home after the sad day at Appomattox, my first thought after hearing of the safety of my two brothers, one being a prisoner, was as to who of the neighbor soldiers were safe. Not one was missing. Every one able to bear arms had been in the service, and all were safe at home. Why? There is only one solution. During the entire war a prayer meeting was kept up for special prayer for those in the front. Mother told me that no night was too stormy to prevent their meeting at the church to pray God's protecting care over the boys.

A comrade once said to me: "You are the most reckless fool in the camp, and yet you always come out safe. I would give anything if I had such an assurance of my life. Why is it?" I replied that my father, mother, and sisters were praying for me all the time.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF VETERANS.

Henry W. Smiley, Kankakee, Ill., writes: "Referring to our departed comrade, Spencer Eakin, on the skirmish line at Jackson. I recall that I was a volunteer on that line from Company E, 41st Tennessee. The detail was made up by Lieut. Walter S. Bearden, of Company C, now Judge Bearden, of Shelbyville. The man whose time it was to go on hesitated, and I took his place and went with Spencer Eakin into that death trap. Serving the delinquent's time and my own twenty-four hours which followed left me on duty forty-eight hours, as the man whose time I had taken showed no willingness to relieve me of mine. I was in every engagement of the dear old 41st up to August, 1864, and was captured before Atlanta on the skirmish line and taken to Camp Chase, where I remained a prisoner until the war ended. The skirmish line at Jackson was the most trying place I was in during the entire war, for personal danger became a trifle compared with the pain of seeing our brave boys fall around me. I would like to know how many of the survivors of that line are alive to-day."

D. C. Grayson, Washington, D. C., writes:

"After reading dear Comrade Hempstead's article in the February number concerning the treatment of six hundred Confederate officers placed on Morris Island by the Federal government, I am impelled to furnish the VETERAN with extracts from my diary written at that time. A few will suffice:

"October 12, 1864, Morris Island. Our rations are worse now than at any time since we were placed here, and all are suffering more from hunger. A half pint of mush, half pint of beans, half pint of rice, and a small piece of meat are our daily allowance. The mush is in such a wormy condition that we will not eat it unless forced to do so by excessive hunger.

"January 1, 1865, Fort Pulaski, Ga. Our rations beginning to-day consist of ten ounces of corn meal, fourth of loaf of bread, with pickles. The meal is spoiled and wormy, and pickles most inferior; but I hope it will sustain life and give the Confederate officers strength to maintain their independence. God forbid that it should last long!"

"No body of men ever had their loyalty more severely tested. With confinement and hunger daily ravaging their ranks and the thunder of Sherman's guns at Savannah roaring in their ears, all remained loyal to the final surrender. When we embarked in August, 1864, for Morris Island, we were six hundred able-bodied men; but history knows the story of reduced numbers and physical weakness when we returned to Fort Delaware, in March, 1865."

LIEUT. COL. HENRY D. CAPERS, C. S. A.

BY VALNEY W. BROWN (CO. D, 64TH GA. REGT.), ATLANTA, GA.

There is no living person whose life's history was more closely identified with that of the Confederate States in its civil and military than Lieut. Col. Henry D. Capers. From the organization of the Confederate government, at Montgomery, Ala., to the bitter ending, at Appomattox and Bentonville, Henry D. Capers was a devoted and active patriot.

Resolutions of the officers of the Confederate Treasury taken from the records of the department evidently justify me in placing him first in the list of those whose labors brought to rapid organization the Confederate government. The testimonial of Mr. Memminger, Secretary of the Confederate States Treasury Department, strengthens the claim.

"Records of Confederate States Treasury Department" (Volume I, page 406), dated Richmond, Va., Feb. 24, 1862, say:

"At a meeting of the officers and clerks of the Treasury Department of the Confederate States of America, held in the office of the first auditor to express their sense upon the resignation of Henry D. Capers, chief clerk and disbursing officer of the said department, Hon. Robert Tyler, of Virginia, was called to preside and Silas W. Hamilton, of Maryland, requested to act as secretary.

"Mr. Tyler stated the object of the meeting to be for the expression in some substantial manner of the esteem in which the late chief clerk had been held as a faithful public officer and courteous Southern gentleman.

"Mr. Hamilton stated to the meeting that as the representative of the officers of the Treasury Department he had purchased a dress sword and had caused a suitable inscription to be placed upon it, and, handing the sword to the chairman, moved that he present the same to Mr. Capers as a testimonial of our regard for him as an officer and friend.

"Mr. Tyler, in an eloquent speech, discharged the duty thus imposed. He stated that during his entire term of administration, which commenced with the inauguration of the Confederate government, Mr. Capers had by his courteous demeanor and firm adherence to principles of equity won the respect and esteem of all who had been brought in contact with him. He extolled the patriotic motive that prompted Mr. Capers to voluntarily lay aside the security of an honorable position in the civil service and accept the hazard of the battlefield.

"Mr. Capers accepted the sword in a graceful address of thanks, in which he feelingly alluded to the happy relations existing between the officers of the department and himself.

"He entered the army of the Confederate not from motives of ambition, but from a conviction of duty. The time had come when every honorable influence should be exercised to recruit the armies of our struggling country. He would rather suffer martyrdom in this cause than secure exemption from peril at the outrage of his conscience.

"At the conclusion of this address the following resolutions were read by Mr. Robertson, of Mississippi, and unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That in the resignation of Henry D. Capers, chief clerk and disbursing officer of the Confederate States Treasury Department, the civil service has lost a most efficient and trustworthy officer.

"Resolved, That in parting with Mr. Capers we extend to him the assurances of our highest esteem and earnestly express the wish that his life may be spared for future usefulness.

"Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the newspapers of Richmond, that they be entered upon the records of the Treasury Department, and that an engrossed copy be furnished Mr. Capers."

"Upon the adoption of these resolutions letters were read from the Secretary of the Treasury and from President Davis."

The proceedings were signed by Robert Tyler, President, and Silas W. Hamilton, Secretary.

TRIBUTE FROM SECRETARY MEMMINGER.

Mr. Memminger wrote from Richmond, Va., February 22, 1864, to Mr. Henry D. Capers, chief clerk: "I am in receipt of your resignation as chief clerk and disbursing officer, an office you have filled from the initial day of the Confederate government. In season and out of season the faithful manner in which you have discharged the laborious and responsible duties incumbent upon you have not escaped my notice, and have greatly aided me. While I and the government lose the services of an efficient officer, I cannot but commend the spirit which prompts you to enter the army of our struggling country. My well-wishes go with you."

Mr. Memminger wrote to Colonel Capers from Charleston, S. C., October 3, 1886, thanking him for the pamphlets containing his graphic details of the organization of the Confederate government and its small beginnings, and added: "If you were to receive that consideration to which you are entitled for your faithful services in those days, none of your earthly wants would be unsupplied."

The military career of Colonel Capers is well known to his living comrades. Leaving the security of a high office in the civil service, he was appointed by President Davis a captain in the regular army of the Confederacy, and in March, 1862, was assigned to the staff of General Magruder, then at Yorktown, Va. At the request of General Magruder, Captain

COL. H. D. CAPERS AND A GRANDDAUGHTER.

Capers was promoted to the rank of major by the Secretary of War and ordered to organize a battalion of light artillery for service on the Peninsula of Virginia. This battalion he organized at Augusta, Ga., from four companies of the 1st Georgia Regiment of Infantry, whose term of enlistment had expired as twelve months' troops—the first enlistment called for by the Confederate government. No command in the Confederate armies was more distinguished for its gallant, soldierly bearing on the march, in the camp, or on the field of battle than this, the 12th Georgia Battalion of Artillery.

In the Western Army, under the immediate command of Gen. E. Kirby Smith, at Charleston, S. C., in the defense of Forts Sumter and Wagner, later in the ever-memorable campaign of General Lee in 1864, and to the end at Appomattox the 12th Georgia Battalion was noted for all that made the Confederate soldier the pride of Southern men and women.

In October, 1862, Major Capers, on the recommendation of Gen. Kirby Smith and approved by General Bragg, was promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel of artillery for "gallant and meritorious service."

In the battle of Cold Harbor, Virginia, June 2, 1864, Colonel Capers was severely wounded. Incapacitated for field service, he was assigned to duty by the Secretary of War with Gen. J. A. Gorgas in the ordnance department and placed in charge of the bureau of field artillery. He held this official position until the end of the war.

Returning to his home, in Georgia, Colonel Capers has devoted his remarkable energies in the most unselfish manner to advance the best interest of his people. With the last farewell order of General Lee to his immortal veterans as his guide, the Colonel has been untiring in his efforts to restore the peace and prosperity of his loved Southland. Well advanced in age, he is still in the vigor of manly strength. No one is better known and none more beloved by those who know him best. As an author his "Life and Times of C. C. Memminger, Secretary of the Confederate Treasury," is regarded as a standard work of reference, and has been so reported on by the American Historical Society.

It is really delightful to converse with this accomplished gentleman. He lives in Atlanta, and is actively engaged in the practice of law.

Since the death of Mr. Davis and Mr. Memminger Colonel Capers by date of commission is the oldest Confederate official living.

CAPTORS OF GEN. CROOK AND KELLEY, U. S. A.

BY J. B. FAY, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Having spent several years in the self-imposed task of securing the names of all those who participated in the capture of Major Generals Crook and Kelley at Cumberland, Md., February 21, 1865, and the list being now complete, I take pleasure in laying it before the readers of the VETERAN, who may be interested therein.

An account of the affair by Lieutenant McNeill appeared in the September (1906) VETERAN, and made a very interesting narrative of what is now an almost forgotten episode of the war. It is to be regretted, however, that there were a few inaccuracies of statement, almost unavoidable after the lapse of so many years when the record is made from memory alone.

My perusal of this last discloses the remarkable fact that of the sixty-six men, including Lieutenant McNeill, who rode through two lines of pickets into the city of Cumberland, then occupied by nearly eight thousand troops, and rode out with two major generals and one adjutant general on that memorable night, just forty-three years ago, there are to-day more than forty survivors.

This list has been established and verified by evidence of the most conclusive character; and while it is possible that one or two names (not more) are omitted that should appear and a corresponding number are on the list that should not be there, I do not think that at this late day a more accurate roll can be made.

The full list, including last known address of each soldier in McNeill's Partisan Rangers (forty-eight in all), is as follows:

WITHOUT CASUS BELLI.

BY MISS MARY H. STEPHENSON, PETERSBURG, ILL.

The old poem says: "For men must fight and women must weep." And so I read the CONFEDERATE VETERAN and weep. My heart grows sad and my eyes fill with tears as I read of those dreadful times of suffering so vividly described in its pages. And my heart goes out to them. These, too, are my heroes. And one hand stretches to them and one to those who wore the blue (among whom was my father), and I cannot bear the thought that we shall not effect a complete reconciliation.

The North and the South have no real casus belli any more. Of old, the North stood against slavery and for an indissoluble Union between the States. The fight the government made seems to have firmly established the principle that the Union is to all practicable intents and purposes indissoluble, and it also was the means of abolishing slavery. And the South seems to cheerfully acquiesce in both of these results at the present day. As one dear old Confederate veteran from Virginia writes me: "God has ordained that we should be one united people. I can begin to see the hand of God as it quietly works out his plans." The North, then, has no reasonable excuse or grounds for keeping up sectional feeling against the South. This is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. At least, it was so designed by the fathers. And the people in each section of the country should be on an equality with each other. The North has no more right to dictate to the South in regard to its internal affairs than the South has to the North. The South is not on a reconstruction basis, but is a legitimate, integral part of our united commonwealth.

The South, on its part, in our great national struggle stood for the principle of State rights, and, by reason of the magnificent fight she made, so emphasized that fundamental principle of our government that the national government has been cautious about attempting to infringe the rights reserved to the States. This was a very valuable contribution to our national welfare. The Constitution of the United States seems never to have been clearly understood on these two points until after the War between the States. And, so far as I have observed, the Southern contribution to the better understanding resulting from the Civil War has never been clearly acknowledged at the North. A dear old Southern lady corrected my diction in the first article I wrote for the VETERAN in one particular. She said instead of referring to the "Civil War" I should have said the "War for the Constitution." I am inclined to think the correction is just. I wrote to her, but could not clearly make out her post office. So the letter came back to me from the dead-letter office.

It is very important that there be a clear understanding on both these points of the Constitution. It would seem quite plain, even to the legally unlearned mind, that, while our national Constitution clearly indicates the supremacy of the general government, it just as clearly recognizes the autonomy of the States. In other words, our United States government is a close Federal union, practically indissoluble, but not a merger. The States are still distinct entities not only with local self-government, but with certain rights with which the general government has no right to interfere. Just at this time the clear understanding of these two points is specially important because the tendency in some quarters to develop the powers of the national government at the expense of the State governments is becoming very marked. The great size and large and varied population and the complicated machinery of commerce, also the very different internal conditions of the several States—all these things make our general government a knotty problem to solve. But if the autonomy of the States is obscured, the injury to our liberty and the freedom of our institutions would surely greatly overbalance any good which might be done by this means. Surely a free people learning to govern themselves well by means of corrected mistakes is far preferable to a government monarchical in essence if not in name, however able and orderly may be the administration.

In conclusion, I must be allowed to say that it seems hard to visit such long-continued displeasure on the South because she honestly misunderstood the degree of solidarity of our Union, since the East had similarly construed the Constitution for a long time; and, moreover, the autonomy of the States is so clearly and emphatically taught in the Constitution that it would be very easy to emphasize that at the expense of the supremacy of the national government and the solidarity of the Union, which are just as clearly taught.

PRISONERS TAKEN IN DAHLGREN'S RAID.

B. F. Foley (Company K, 6th Virginia Cavalry), Berryville, Va.: "I have seen several accounts of Colonel Dahlgren's raid near Richmond, but nothing has been said about the men who were captured when he was killed. How long were they held in close confinement before they were put on equal terms with other prisoners of war? I was a prisoner of war about the same time Colonel Dahlgren was killed, and was taken out of Old Capital at Washington and put in Old Carroll Prison, about a block from Old Capital Prison. There were sixty of us held as hostages for Dahlgren's men. I know of only one besides myself that is living. He is H. H. Ratrie, of Culpeper, Va. Through the VETERAN I should like to hear from them and others who may be yet living. We were taken from different Southern States. One of the sixty was Captain Hinnagan, of South Carolina. We were held nine weeks, with a gallows ready to hang us if Dahlgren's men were executed."

MISS ELLIOT TODHUNTER, LEXINGTON, MO.

SEVERAL IMPORTANT CONFEDERATE TOPICS.

BY MRS. CORNELIA BRANCH STONE, PRESIDENT.

To the United Daughters of the Confederacy: With an earnest desire to promote the speedy erection of the Arlington Confederate monument, to be placed in the Arlington National Cemetery, your President is again urging the active interest of the Divisions and the Chapters toward this end.

We owe this not only to our valiant dead now sleeping on the spot made sacred as the home of Robert E. Lee, but we owe it also to the government, which by placing these, our precious soldiers, in the National Cemetery declares that they are brothers and their valor is a national heritage. Let us, then, show our love and reverence for the memory of their service by placing there the shaft that will speak to all future generations of their sacrifice unto death for the cause which they defended and the memory of which we are pledged to protect and preserve. This work of the General Association is asked with a full realization that each Division, each Chapter is, or should be, enlisted in some special work along the lines of the purposes of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, but the erection of this monument is an imperative duty. In our organization now there are nearly twelve hundred Chapters; and if each will contribute to this fund, a substantial result may be had.

It is gratifying to note that wherever we have organizations there is great and active interest manifested in the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of our beloved chieftain, Jefferson Davis, inspiring a close study of his life and character, his service to the United States and to the Confederate States. In the schools this has been stimulated by the offer of prizes for the best essays on this subject, and this year 1908 will be made a memorable centennial of the birth of this great soldier, scholar, statesman, and Christian gentleman.

The Reunion of our dear veterans will take place in Birmingham June 9-11, and many of the Daughters will attend, with assurances of abiding love and reverence for these heroes, defenders of constitutional liberty, whose devoted service is never forgotten, and it will be a loving privilege to meet them again in general convention.

It is not necessary to call your attention to the Shiloh monument fund, for the able Chairman, Mrs. A. B. White, of Tennessee, keeps you fully apprised of the needs of this work; but your President will remind you of a duty in that connection, which is the placing of pictures of Gen. Robert E. Lee in the public and private schools. These are sold by the Shiloh Monument Committee for the benefit of that fund, thus giving you the opportunity of a double service in one.

The memory of General Lee fills the world, for he has been placed by high authority in the list of five of the world's greatest generals and commanders. We honor ourselves in honoring him, and let us place the pictures of Davis and Lee where the boys and girls of our land will learn of the nobility of character and service of these great chieftains.

The Recording Secretary General, Mrs. Dowdell, notifies you that there are still about five hundred copies of the proceedings of the Norfolk Convention in her hands, and that by sending the amount of postage for mailing, which is nine cents per copy, this valuable book may be secured. It is not necessary to say to you that this report should be read by every Daughter of the Confederacy, for it puts you in intelligent touch with what is being accomplished wherever we are organized.

Galveston, May 11, 1908.

FROM PARTICIPANT IN BATTLE OF SHILOH.

LIEUT. COL. T. H. PEEBLES'S LETTER TO HIS WIFE.

[The following letter was intended only for the recipient, but, by favor of the family to publish, it will be read by thousands with interest. It breathes of the spirit of the time.]

My Dearest: The great battle of Shiloh Church is past. Commenced on Sunday morning about seven o'clock, and we drove them for three miles in confusion. They left the woods strewn with their dead and dying. We had marched two days and slept on our arms two nights with scanty rations, and entered the fight Sunday morning without a bite to eat; but Sunday night we slept in fine tents with a profusion of blankets and cots, crackers and cheese, nuts and apples, and parched coffee by the barrel.

Sunday night the enemy got reinforcements, and with the help of their gunboats (for we were then near the river) held us at bay. Toward night we made a drawn battle, and both parties retired as if by mutual agreement. Our brigade opened the ball, and the 24th carried the left wing of the brigade. Our brigade sustained the heaviest loss in the army and the 24th the heaviest in the brigade. We had fifty-two men killed on the field (three have since died) and one hundred and sixty-six wounded. Oliver Sage, Jerry Hampton, and Henry Walker, of Captain Shannon's company, were killed and fifteen or sixteen wounded. One of the company officers, Frank Hill, was wounded. By the interposition of a kind Providence I came out with only the loss of my horse and voice. The latter I am recovering; but poor

LIEUT. COL. T. H. PEEBLES.

Buck, that had borne me so bravely through the day, was shot through the heart at its close. My clothes were shot in several places, but I received not a scratch. My heart is full of gratitude to the Unseen Hand that led me.

Cease not, my love, to pray for my safety. God will still preserve me, I hope. In the midst of the conflict I took out your picture and, kissing it, gathered new inspiration.

I cannot tell you anything satisfactory as to what I shall do in the future. I doubt whether my health will allow me to continue in the service.

Don't be alarmed. I am able to attend to duty, but feeble. I entertain not the remotest doubt that we shall finally establish our government (it may be through much blood) upon a firm basis; and Tennessee is as surely ours as Mississippi; so are Kentucky and Missouri.

God and our own strong arms will bring all things right.

Forever yours,

T. H. PEEBLES.

Near Corinth, April 19, 1862.

[The foregoing led to an investigation of the career of Colonel Peebles, and it will be found deeply interesting.]

Ill health compelled Colonel Peebles to retire from active service for a while after Shiloh. After returning to service, he was captured on September 5, 1863, by "Rickman's Home Guards" near Holt's Corner, in Marshall County, Tenn., and was confined in the military prison at Nashville. An incident connected with his capture illustrates his reputation for integrity. A member of his regiment named Lum Biggers for some reason is said to have deserted the Confederate forces and joined Rickman's command. Colonel Peebles was captured at night, and had in his saddlebags some papers belonging to Gen. Pat Cleburne. He was inside the Federal lines, though not serving as a spy. Upon the demand to give up his arms, he handed over his pistols, not having his sword with him. He was then asked if he had any other arms; and when he said that he had none, some one said, "Search his saddlebags," whereupon a voice in the dark said: "No; if Colonel Peebles says he has no other arms, you shall not insult him by searching him." This was Lum Biggers.

Rev. J. W. Cullom, responding to the request of a son, T. H. Peebles, writes of Colonel Peebles as follows:

"As Chaplain of Col. T. H. Peebles's regiment, 24th Tennessee Infantry, I was very intimate with him. We ate our rations at the same camp chest and slept in the same tent—when we had one.

"Colonel Peebles, born and reared near Triune, Tenn., was one of the finest specimens of physical manhood I ever saw. His weight was generally about two hundred and forty pounds. Nearly all of his life he had been a teacher of boys. If a father had an obstreperous boy that neither he nor any other teacher could control, he sent him to Tom Peebles. The writer could tell of some rather strenuous as well as humorous conflicts that occurred, but the teacher's authority was never questioned after the first round.

"Colonel Peebles commanded the regiment in the battle of Shiloh, and had his horse killed and his clothes cut in different places; but he did not receive a scratch. He told me afterwards that when he entered the battle he so completely gave himself into the hand of God that he never for a moment had a feeling of personal danger. At our first dress parade after the battle the commander in chief issued an order, which was read at the head of the regiment, giving our battle flag to Colonel Peebles in testimony of gallantry on the field. At the time the flag, with twenty-seven bullet holes in it, was floating at our headquarters. I well remember seeing Peebles that evening tear the torn banner from the staff and take it into his tent.

"He was a prominent and consistent Church member, and among other traits he never touched intoxicating liquor. I remember while we were stationed at Bowling Green, Ky., we had been out on a raid for several days and were returning to camp. Allen Oldfield was a splendid soldier, and it was said he could find whisky as well where it was't as where it was. I had given up my horse to a lame soldier, and Allen and I were footing it, and were a good deal ahead of the regiment. We were approaching the little town of Horse Cave, and Allen was pulling, as it were, for dear life. Just then Colonel Peebles galloped by us and entered the village.

"There,' said my comrade with disgust. 'I was in hopes of getting a dram, and he has gone on to close up the saloons.' But sometime afterwards the Colonel was officer of the day, and Allen was on guard near by. One of the generals called to Colonel Peebles and told him he had some of the best old peach brandy he ever put to his lips. Peebles replied that he never indulged in such things, but he had a mighty good soldier out there on guard who would enjoy such a favor; and so Allen had a good drink with the general and forgave Colonel Peebles.

"Colonel Peebles was a great wrestler; and having thrown every man in his own command that would tackle him, he stepped out and challenged the brigade. A hefty champion picked up the gauntlet, and the boys gathered to witness the contest. To tell the truth, Peebles felt some doubt and uneasiness as to the result, and so played bluff on the fellow. He stooped down and made a cross mark in the dust, and explained that he intended to put the cross of the other fellow's gallows right into the cross in the dust, and his antagonist backed down.

"In every way Colonel Peebles was a manly man. His long experience in the schoolroom made him appear a trifle haughty to those who did not know him intimately; but his close friends and family knew that he was one of the kindest of men, and a braver man I have never known. I esteem it a great privilege that I had his unmeasured confidence and friendship."

FIRST DEMAND FOR SURRENDER TO GEN. LEE.

The death of Judge Heman H. Perry, who was major and adjutant general of Wright's Brigade in the Army of Northern Virginia and which brigade formed the rear guard of that army on April 7, brings out the first correspondence in regard to the surrender which took place at Appomattox two days later. Capt. James W. English, of Atlanta, states to the Constitution:

"The division had just crossed the river near Farmville, Va., and immediately formed line of battle about 5 P.M.

JUDGE H. H. PERRY.

Their skirmish line at once engaged the enemy and the battle was on. General Miles's Brigade of the Federal army attempted to turn the left flank of Wright's Brigade. Wright was reinforced by Tige Anderson's Brigade, and Miles was badly punished. There was fighting at that point until about 7 P.M. When firing ceased, attention was given to the wounded and burial of the dead.

"About 10 P.M. a Federal officer called and stated that he wanted to send a communication from General Grant to General Lee. I was in command of the skirmish lines, and reported the officer's request by messenger to brigade headquarters. In response Major Perry came to me on the skirmish line. The truce was established, and we met Gen. Seth Williams, of General Grant's staff, the officer bearing the communication from General Grant to General Lee. He then handed Major Perry a letter and requested that it be delivered to General Lee immediately if possible. He then took from his pocket a silver flask and offered us a drink, stating that it was a fine article of cognac brandy. Major Perry declined with thanks, and out of respect to my superior officer I of course had to decline then. As Major Perry was leaving, by request of General Williams we met a colonel from Miles's Brigade, who delivered to Major Perry some pictures of General Mahone's family and letters from Mrs. Mahone to the General. They had captured Mahone's baggage wagon that afternoon.

"The colonel made inquiry about some officers of Miles's Brigade who were missing, and especially about a Captain Boyd, of Miles's staff. I knew where Captain Boyd was, and that he was dangerously wounded. At Major Perry's request, I had Captain Boyd delivered to the colonel and a detail of his men, who then took him within their own lines.

"After Major Perry left, I had a brief conversation with General Williams, in which he said that the note delivered from General Grant to General Lee was a demand for the surrender of Lee's army. Although I knew that we had lost a good many men and were without food, his statement rather amused me, and I suggested that Grant had better look after his flanks, as I thought General Lee was just about ready to fight. So the interview ended. In a little while we were on the move to Appomattox C. H.

"The correspondence on the subject was as follows:

"April 7.

"Gen. R. E. Lee, Commander C. S. A.—Sir: The result of last week must convince you of the utter hopelessness of further resistance on the part of the Army of Northern Virginia in this struggle. I feel that it is so, and regret it as my duty to shift from myself the responsibility of any further effusion of blood by asking of you the surrender of that portion of the Confederate States army known as the Army of Northern Virginia.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant, U. S. GRANT.

"Lieutenant General, Commanding the Armies of the United States."

"General Lee replied as follows:

"April 7.

"General: I have received your note of this date. Though not entirely of the opinion you express of the hopelessness of further resistance on the part of the Army of Northern Virginia, I reciprocate your desire to avoid useless effusion of blood, and therefore, considering your proposition, ask the terms you will offer on condition of its surrender.

"To Lieut. Gen. U. S. Grant, Commanding Armies of the United States."

"General Grant's reply was as follows:

"April 8.

"Gen. R. E. Lee, Commanding Confederate Army—General: Your note of yesterday, the 7th, in reply to mine asking the condition on which I will accept the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia is just received. In reply I would say that, peace being my first desire, there is but one condition that I will insist upon—viz., that the men surrendered shall be disqualified for taking up arms against the government of the United States until properly exchanged. I will meet you or designate officers to meet any officers you may name for the same purpose at any point agreeable to you for the purpose of arranging definitely the terms upon which the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia will be received.

U. S. GRANT.

"Lieutenant General, Commanding Armies of the United States."

JUDGE H. H. PERRY.

Judge Heman H. Perry, of Waynesboro, Ga., died March 14, 1908. An interesting sketch concludes as follows: "He participated in the most important battles of the war in the Army of Northern Virginia as orderly sergeant, as lieutenant, and as captain. He left home with the Burke Sharpshooters, Company D, the color company of the 2d Georgia Infantry, under command of Col. Paul J. Semmes. He was subsequently assigned to duty as brigade adjutant general Wright's Brigade, commanded by Gen. G. M. Sorrell, Mahone's Division, Longstreet's Corps. He was the officer sent to meet Gen. Seth Williams, of General Grant's staff, bearer of the first flag of truce looking to a surrender of General Lee's army at Appomattox."

"THE SOUTH IS GOING DRY."

[This was read by Charles F. Moore at the Hotel Astor when five hundred Sons and Daughters of Dixie attended the annual dinner of the Southern Society.]

Lay the jest about the julep in the camphor balls at last,
For the miracle has happened and the olden days are past;
That which made Milwaukee famous doesn't foam in Tennessee,

And the lid in Alabama is as tight locked as can be,
And the comic paper Colonel and his cronies well may sigh,
For the mint is waving gayly
And the South is going dry.

By the stillside on the hillside in Kentucky all is still,
And the only damp refreshment must be dipped up from the rill.

North Carolina's stately Governor gives his soda glass a shove,
And discusses local option with the South Carolina Gov.
It is useless at the fountain to be winkful of the eye,
For the cocktail glass is dusty
And the South is going dry.

It is water, water everywhere, and not a drop to drink.
We no longer hear the music of the mellow crystal clink
When the Colonel and the General and the Major and the Judge

Meet to have a little nip to give the appetite an edge;
For the eggnog it is nogless and the rye has gone awry,
The punch bowl holds carnations,
And the South is going dry.

"The cross Electa clasped to breast,
 We all must one day wear;
 Death calls, and lo! in every home
 Shall stand one vacant chair.
 God grant us grace to wear that cross
 With sweetened, chastened wills
 Until we meet our loved, not 'lost,'
 Upon the heavenly hills."

CAPT. M. J. BILLMYER.

In the death of Capt. Milton J. Billmyer, which occurred recently at his home, near Shepherdstown, W. Va., a gallant Confederate veteran has passed away. At the beginning of the Civil War he enlisted in Company F, 1st Virginia Cavalry, and was elected a lieutenant. When the late Col. William A. Morgan was promoted to colonel of the regiment, Captain Billmyer was elected to fill his place, and he gallantly commanded the company until the surrender at Appomattox, being among the very last who drew saber during the closing days of the great struggle. Captain Billmyer was a brave and daring soldier, and was ever in the front when fighting was going on. He was shot at the battle of Hawes's Mill, but was in the saddle again before the wound was fairly healed. Straight as an arrow, of soldierly bearing and courageous temperament, he was a splendid type of the Southern soldier. After the war he came back to the farm, where he enjoyed the respect of all who knew him until he passed away, in the seventy-third year of his age. He wrote many valuable and interesting contributions to the local papers of incidents and events connected with the war, and maintained a lively interest in the cause as long as he lived. In his death the community lost a good citizen and his fellows an honored comrade.

COL. JOHN R. GRAVES.

Death, the common enemy, has again invaded our camp, and another loved comrade has fallen, another Confederate tried and true has gone to his reward, has gone to join his fellow-soldiers in the camp beyond the river, leaving in the care and keeping of his friends and comrades a soldier's record that has no stain upon it.

In early colonial days the ancestors of Colonel Graves came from England and settled in Virginia. His great-grandfather was a soldier in the war for American independence, and was present when the British army surrendered to Washington at Yorktown. In 1786 Col. J. R. Graves's grandfather crossed the mountains and settled on a large tract of land within the present limits of Fayette County, Ky. Here John Robinson Graves was born in the year 1832. His boyhood days were spent on his father's farm. When of proper age, he was sent to a military school at Georgetown, Ky., and later he attended Transylvania University, from which he was graduated in 1853.

The beginning of the Civil War found him a resident of Lexington, Mo. He early enlisted in the Confederate service under Gen. Sterling Price, and was given command of a regiment of infantry, his military education aiding him very materially in securing the position. He was a brave soldier and an excellent officer, and for more than a year prior to his capture, in 1864, he commanded a brigade of gallant Missourians. He was wounded—shot through the right arm—and captured some months before the war closed, remaining a prisoner till all was over.

In 1865 he returned to Lexington, Ky., and very soon after accepted the place of principal in one of her city schools. This and similar positions he held till pneumonia succeeding an attack of grip ended his earthly career March 17, 1908. Ever since its establishment, five years ago, he had been principal of Lexington High School, one of the very best institutions of its kind to be found anywhere; and to him and his corps of excellent teachers much credit is due for the superiority of this school.

In our beautiful cemetery, tenderly, lovingly laid away by comrades and friends, Col. John R. Graves, the soldier-teacher, rests in his lonely home to-night—sleeps under a covering of lovely flowers, the offerings of fellow-soldiers, of associate teachers, of pupils, and of others—while not far away, bowed down with grief, is the loving wife with whom he shared life's joys and woes for half a century, and in many parts of the city are gray-haired men and women whose hearts are made sad because of the death of him who had once been their teacher.

SAMPSON BARBEE.

Comrade Sampson Barbee, who died at his home, in Wagoner, Okla., was a native of Tennessee, but was reared in Yalobusha County, Miss. He enlisted in Company I, 15th Mississippi Regiment, with which he served until after the battle of Fishing Creek; he then returned home and raised a company of cavalry, which he commanded. He was captured at Selma, Ala., and paroled at Macon, Ga. He removed to the Indian Territory in 1902, and assisted in organizing Camp W. L. Cabell at Wagoner, of which he had been made Commander a short while before his death.

R. B. MORRIS

Comrade R. B. Morris passed away on June 28, 1907, in the Richmond (Va.) Hospital. He enlisted in the first company to leave Fluvanna County, Va., on May 10, 1861—Company C, 14th Virginia Regiment, Pickett's Division, that scaled the heights of Gettysburg.

He was a member of the Baptist Church, and died with Christian resignation, leaving a wife and eight children; also three brothers and one sister, all in Virginia, except Thomas A. Morris, now of Batavia, Ark.

EIGHT MEMBERS OF A GEORGIA CAMP.

During the past two years eight members of Coweta Camp, No. 1161, U. C. V., Newnan, Ga., have passed to the great beyond: Judge H. W. Camp, Company B, 1st Georgia Cavalry; Maj. W. J. Ransom, Company D, Phillips's Legion; R. T. Carpenter, Company C, 34th Georgia; Maj. W. W. Thomas, Company F, Phillips's Legion; J. M. Coggin, 10th North Carolina Battalion; C. B. Brown, Company B, 7th Georgia Regiment; Capt. T. W. Powell, Company —, 19th Tennessee Regiment; W. F. Summers, Company D, Phillips's Legion. Suitable resolutions were recently offered by the Camp to the memory of these gallant soldiers.

SAMUEL E. HAYS.

Camp Ben McCulloch, 563, U. C. V., Brady, Tex., announces the death on March 21, 1908, of Comrade Samuel E. Hays, aged seventy-two. Comrade Hays was born at Emmitsburg, Md., in 1836, and in the fall of 1861 enlisted at Fayetteville, Ark., in Captain Carnahan's company (G), 16th Arkansas Infantry, Maury's Brigade, McCulloch's Division. He was in the battle of Elk Horn, and rose to the rank of captain and adjutant of his regiment. He was in the surrender at Port Hudson, and was a prisoner at Johnson's Island. Among his last words he expressed tender love for the old Confederate soldiers.

WALTER G. PASCHALL.

Atlanta Camp, 150, U. C. V., announces the death on February 12, 1908, of one of its most worthy and gallant members, Comrade Walter G. Paschall.

R. G. EMBRY.

R. G. Embry was born in Walker County, Ala., in 1847. In young manhood's impulsiveness he mounted his sturdy farm horse and became a member of Wheeler's Cavalry, and was in the struggle during the last eighteen months, passing in that short time from the dauntless, fearless lad to a bearded man who, with many other foot-sore, tired comrades, wended their way to desolated homes. Of late years he had been a resident of Paris, Tex., where he was an active member of A. S. Johnston Camp, U. C. V., until the passing into the better land.

[The daughter of this comrade, Mrs. May Embry Lever, of Paris, asks that any member of Shepherd's Battalion write to her, and especially any who remember the soldier lad who on a cold, stormy night, while a division of the enemy was camped near a church (she thinks it was somewhere in the mountains of Alabama), with some other comrades, was confined by the side of a church, and pushed his way daringly out from the ranks of the enemy at the shoulder of a young Union lieutenant and made good his escape to his own lines again. She wishes to learn the names of his comrades there confined as well as of the young lieutenant who so easily allowed the boy to escape while thinking it was one of his own men.]

COL. I. E. SHUMATE.

In the death of Col. I. E. Shumate, of Dalton, Ga., the South lost one of its loyal Christian gentlemen, able lawyers, and trust workers in many things pertaining to Confederate interests. Though never in active service, the quality of Colonel Shumate's loyalty and sympathy became evident when the Joseph E. Johnston Camp, U. C. V., of Dalton, met and adopted resolutions. Embodied in these beautiful resolutions is the assurance of his ability, fidelity, eloquence, and untiring energy in all things pertaining to the good of the private citizen and the betterment of the public weal.

COL. I. E. SHUMATE.

Colonel Shumate was a highly valued clerk and assistant in the subsistence department of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army, and in later years he was always a brilliant advocate at the bar and occupied many responsible positions both in public and private life. He was attorney for the old E. T., V. & G. Railroad; and when this road was bought by the Southern, his services were retained by the officials of the Southern.

SENATOR STEPHEN R. MALLORY.

The death of Stephen R. Mallory at Pensacola, Fla., was a threefold calamity, bringing as it did a loss to his State, to the Senate, and to hundreds North and South whose esteem, love, and respect he had won through long years of service. He was born in 1848; and, entering the Confederate army as a private at fifteen, won recognition for his courage and fidelity. After the war he entered Georgetown College, and for a time was a teacher there. Subsequently he studied law and engaged in its practice in New Orleans until 1876, when he returned to Pensacola and pursued his profession. After having served one term in the Legislature and two in the Senate, he was elected to the Fifty-Second and Fifty-Third Congresses. He was then elected to the United States Senate, the term beginning March 4, 1897, and reelected in 1903. His term of service would have expired March 3, 1909. He was a man of strong intellectual force and magnetic personality, which made him an influential member of the Senate in practical legislation, while he enjoyed to a high degree the esteem and friendship of his associates in that body.

DR. JOSEPH DANIEL POPE.

Dr. Joseph D. Pope, aged eighty-eight years, Dean of the Law School of the University of South Carolina, which he founded, and one of the three surviving signers of the ordinance of secession, died at Columbia, S. C., March 21, 1908. During the war he was chief of the revenue department and superintendent of the currency under the Confederate government. He was a writer, lecturer, and foremost among South Carolina's citizens for many years.

CAPT. J. C. HODGES.

[The following is from a memorial adopted by Camp J. W. Fulkerson, No. 1340, at Tazewell, Tenn., May 5, 1908.]

Capt. James Calloway Hodges was born on a farm in Claiborne, Tenn., May 1, 1837; and passed to the other life from his home, in Morristown, Tenn., on March 22, 1908. He was reared in the vicinity where he was born, amid the rural surroundings incident to country life. He attended the common schools in the neighborhood and the college in Tazewell, having among his teachers and associates such men as John M. Southern, James D. Thomas, and James G. Rose, all of whom rose to distinction. He taught school for a number of years in different sections of Claiborne and Hancock Counties, and shortly before the Civil War he took up his residence in Morristown as a clerk in the store of Mr. Morris, for whom the city was named (a large merchant for that place), and while clerking in the store he read law.

On the breaking out of the War between the States, before the State of Tennessee had passed the ordinance of secession, Captain Hodges joined as a private the 19th Regiment of Confederate Volunteers, commanded by Colonel Cummings, and immediately went into active military service. Soon thereafter he was made first lieutenant, and at or about the time of the battle of Shiloh was made captain of his company. In the retreat after the death of Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston (in the battle of Shiloh) Captain Hodges was seriously wounded, and he carried the bullet until his death. During the time that he was disabled he visited his home, in Morristown, and on September 18, 1862, he married Miss M. A. Witt, of a prominent family of that community, who survives him.

As soon as Captain Hodges recovered from this wound he returned to the military service as a captain in the 60th Tennessee Regiment. He was captured at Big Black River just before the siege of Vicksburg, and was taken to Johnson's Island, on Lake Erie, where he was confined as a prisoner of war until in February, 1865, when he was exchanged and returned to the army and served under General Vaughn until after the surrender at Appomattox.

Returning to his home at Morristown, he resumed the duties of a private citizen. He was soon prominent and active in the practice of the law, having a large and lucrative practice in Hamblen and adjoining counties, including Claiborne, his native county. He was for a time a law partner of Judge James G. Rose, and in November, 1874, he was elected to the State Senate from the district composed of the counties of Claiborne, Hamblen, Hancock, Hawkins, and Sullivan, and served in the session of the Legislature of 1875 with marked ability. After his term as a member of the Legislature ended, he resumed his law practice, and later became Recorder of the city of Morristown, which position he held at the time of his death.

In his early manhood he attached himself to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and during all of his long life he was a prominent, devoted, and consistent member of that organization, and died as he had lived, a Christian gentleman.

Captain Hodges had not striven to attain great endowments of wealth nor to scale the ramparts of selfish ambition. His had been the more humble career of conscientious service in the routine of a consecrated home, the rôle of good citizenship in the community where he lived, and of active interest in behalf of the adjustment of the laws of the State where he lived, so that they might not lead the weak and weary into temptation. * * *

It was resolved by the Camp: "That Captain Hodges was a good man, an affectionate husband and father, an exemplary citizen, and a Christian gentleman; and as a member of the legal profession he was ever courteous, kind, industrious, honorable, and high-minded. He was in every way worthy of the profession that he honored by his professional conduct. Also that we tender to his bereaved widow and family our earnest and sincere sympathy."

JOHN MORTIMER KILGOUR.

John Mortimer Kilgour, who died near Round Hill, Va., April 4, 1905, was the son of an eminent Maryland judge, Charles Jordan Kilgour, and Louisa MacIlhaney. His mother died in his infancy; and his father departing this life a few years afterwards, his education was left to his faithful guardians at Rockville. He studied law at Harvard University.

From his youth he exhibited those talents which marked him throughout a long career as an orator of unusual ability. While still very young he was elected to the Reform Convention to make a new Constitution for the State of Maryland. A few years later he removed to Frederick City, and was engaged in the practice of his profession during the years preceding the Civil War. His sentiments were with the South, and all the gifts of his brilliant intellect were devoted to her service. His eloquence was exerted and its influence felt in arousing the enthusiasm and sending to the front those thousands of brave young Marylanders who gave their service to the Confederacy.

John Kilgour was enrolled among the defenders of his beloved Southland with the commission of major and served under Col. Elijah B. White, commanding the 35th Battalion of Virginia Volunteers. The historian of that noted command refers to his never-failing effort to arouse the boys, and those who survive him and who were with him then tenderly revere the memory of their comradeship with him.

An instance of his extraordinary power as an orator is related in connection with his service during the war. A Virginia division had been selected to make a desperate attack upon the enemy, and Major Kilgour was asked to address them. Under the influence of his eloquence they moved forward, but attained their object with fearful loss. After the fight an old mountaineer exclaimed: "If they have that Kilgour speaking to us when we go into another fight, there'll not be a man of us left."

He did not return to Maryland after the war, but spent the remainder of his days in Virginia, the home of his maternal ancestors. As his voice had thrilled men to deeds of heroism, he continued in the period that followed the war to cry: "Courage! we have not yet ended our fight."

Through such spirits the South was able to rise triumphant out of the gloom and depression that settled over desolated homes and hearts after the conflict of four years had ended.

Major Kilgour lived to the advanced age of eighty-nine years, and held the affection and respect of his people to the last. When his friends looked upon his earthly form for the last time, it was enveloped in the Confederate flag.

CAPT. J. F. WRIGHT.

Joseph Fulton Wright died at his home, in Chattanooga, on March 4, 1908, after a long illness. Captain Wright was born in Bedford County, Va., January 8, 1833. In 1868 he was married to Miss Fannie Wells, of that place, to which union six children were born. Only two daughters survive, Mrs. John C. Twinam and Miss Frances Wright. The death of his wife, on April 11, 1906, was a shock from which Captain Wright never recovered, and his health had steadily failed to the end. Captain Wright served with distinction throughout the four years of the Civil War as captain in a Virginia regiment, and at the close of the war settled in Knoxville, Tenn. In 1871 he went to Chattanooga and established the first brickyard ever in the city.

Captain Wright was a gentleman of the old school, with the courtly manner and genial personality that characterize the Virginian. His uprightness of character and splendid qualities won for him the love and respect of a large circle of friends. He had been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, from boyhood. He was also a member of N. B. Forrest Camp and a prominent Mason.

LIEUT. JOHN B. LEONARD.

At his home, in Alexander City, Ala., March 19, 1908, in his seventy-sixth year, occurred the death of Lieut. John B. Leonard. He was born in Washington, Ga., of Virginia ancestry, and went with his father's family to Alabama when about sixteen years of age. His father, Maj. J. B. Leonard, was a soldier in the Florida War, and later was a member of the Secession Convention in 1861. His mother was a Miss Marshall, and related to that distinguished family of Virginia.

John Leonard enlisted in 1862 in the cause of the South as a first lieutenant in Hilliard's Legion, afterwards known as the 1st Alabama Legion, and later as the 60th Alabama Regiment (commanded by Col. J. W. A. Sanford), Gracie's Brigade. On Bragg's retreat from Kentucky Lieutenant Leonard contracted a severe case of typhoid pneumonia, and was disabled for more than six months. He was in the battle of Chickamauga, and later went with his comrades into Virginia, and was for many months in the trenches at Petersburg, surrendering at Appomattox.

V. A. W.

MEMBERS OF WILLIAM RICHARDSON CAMP, FRONT ROYAL, VA.

J. W. Kendrick died November 17, 1907, aged eighty years. He was a member of Company E, 7th Virginia Cavalry. He was a good soldier, an honorable, upright citizen, and an exemplary Christian.

Jonathan B. Lehwew died March 2, 1908, aged seventy-nine. He was a member of Company A, 39th Virginia Cavalry, and was on duty at Gen. R. E. Lee's headquarters until the close of the war. He was laid to rest by his comrades of William Richardson Camp.

Charles A. Brown died March 17, 1908. He was a member of Company E, 7th Virginia Cavalry. He was captured at Five Forks, Va., and confined at Hart's Island until the close of the war.

William Williams died March 19, 1908. He was a member of Company E, 12th Virginia Cavalry, Rosser's Laurel Brigade. He was wounded several times, and on November 1, 1864, was shot through the lung. This was indirectly the cause of his death.

DECEASED MEMBERS OF CAMP PELHAM.

The following members of Camp Pelham, No. 258, Anniston, Ala., have recently died: George Bell, Company I, 1st Georgia Cavalry; A. J. Coner, Company I, 4th Kentucky Infantry; W. P. Downing, Alabama Cavalry; J. F. Distauke, Company C, 46th Alabama Infantry; A. S. Heath, Company D, 28th Alabama Infantry; — Mayfield, Company D, 1st Alabama Infantry; W. M. Rogers, Columbus (Ga.) Artillery; J. L. Whisenant, Company D, 51st Alabama Cavalry; T. A. Davis, Surgeon.

REUBEN M. WHITESCARVER.

Comrade R. M. Whitescarver was born in Logan County, Ky., March 2, 1839. Just prior to the Confederate war he moved to Lebanon, Tenn., where in the spring of 1862 he enlisted in Capt. J. R. Lester's company, which at once became a part of Maj. John R. Davis's 4th Tennessee Battalion, the other companies of which were commanded by Captains Nichols, Wiley, and Phillips. Comrade Whitescarver was soon elected first sergeant of his company, and remained in that position until the flag was furled at Greensboro, N. C.

It can be truthfully said of Comrade Whitescarver that a truer sword never was drawn in defense of human liberty nor a more untarnished blade returned to its scabbard when the conflict was over. His fidelity to duty rendered him very popular as an officer and as a man. He never missed a day's duty nor a fight except once, and that was occasioned by his horse breaking down when pursuing Kilpatrick's raid on Augusta, Ga.

An interesting episode occurred at Tunnel Hill, Ga., just previous to General Sherman's advance on General Johnston at Dalton. General Wheeler's Corps was bivouacked at Tunnel Hill when he ordered a field report of total men able for duty and those absent. Comrade Whitescarver, after a fruitless search for paper on which to make his report, found a piece of plank, and made it on that. As he handed the plank to Colonel Anderson, General Wheeler rode up and dismounted, and Old Paul, after introducing Sergeant Whitescarver to the General, said: "General, here is a sergeant in my regiment who has never failed to comply with orders." The battles in which Comrade Whitescarver participated were Perryville, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Resaca, Tunnel Hill, Rocky Face Ridge, Allatoona, Kennesaw Mountain, New Hope Church, Atlanta, Bentonville, and a thousand cavalry fights.

Sergeant Whitescarver was a knight without his armor, a gentleman without ostentation, a Christian because of his devotion to right, a citizen without reproach, and a soldier without faltering when duty called him. Requiescat in pace.

JOSEPH H. ALEXANDER.

A typical Confederate in every way was Comrade Joseph H. Alexander, who passed away at his home, in Malvern, Ark., March 6, 1908, in his seventy-sixth year. He was a native of Tennessee, coming to Arkansas when quite a young man and locating at Rockport, Hot Spring County, in 1852.

In June, 1861, he enlisted in the first company leaving the county, which became Company F, of the 3d Arkansas Regiment and of the famous Texas Brigade, Hood's Division, Longstreet's Corps, Army of Northern Virginia. He was in all the hard-fought battles through which that army passed up to the Wilderness, in which battle he lost his right arm in the famous charge when General Lee undertook to lead the brigade. He leaves an aged wife, son, and daughter, and a host of friends.

[By Sam H. Emerson, Company F, 3d Arkansas Regiment.]

T. S. DUNCAN.

Mr. Thaddens S. Duncan died at his home, in Newberry, S. C., in April, at the age of seventy-five years. Mr. Duncan was a man of high character, a Confederate veteran, a faithful member of the Baptist Church, and a good citizen. He was well known, and was cashier for many years of the Newberry National Bank. Mr. Duncan was never married. He leaves two sisters (Mrs. Ella Boyd and Mrs. W. A. Dunn) and three brothers (Messrs. John T., S. M., and James C. Duncan).

CAPT. HENRY C. BURNETT.

The Reaper gathering his sheaves has enfolded another Southern soldier to the roll of honor. Capt. Henry C. Burnett was born at Kingston Springs, Tenn., October 6, 1844. He enlisted as a private in October, 1861, at Columbus, Ky., in Company I, 6th Tennessee Infantry, at seventeen years of age. He was elected second lieutenant of his company in October, 1862. In the spring of 1865 he served as adjutant of camp of organization at Hamburg, S. C. A short while before the surrender he was commissioned captain of cavalry and ordered to report to Col. Dick McCann, then scouting near Nashville. Arriving at Meridian, Miss., he found that General Forrest had surrendered, and he was paroled at Meridian.

Captain Burnett was wounded in three battles—Shiloh, Chickamauga, and New Hope Church, Ga. When the strife was ended, he displayed the same courage in peaceful endeavor to aid in the restoration of the Southland. Energetic, keen of penetration, and with practical judgment, he was a useful citizen. Pure in his motives, steadfast for the right, he won the respect and admiration of his fellow-men.

"A noble heart in peace and strife,

This man of modest mien Appeared a model citizen."

He camped with the silent bivouac of the dead March 5, 1908. Captain Burnett is survived by his wife, Mrs. Mattie Burnett, and a daughter, Mrs. J. N. Cornatzar, of Memphis.

JOSEPH W. CRENIR.

Joseph W. Crenir, who was born near Buena Vista, Ark., in 1846, died near the place of his birth in April, 1908, of paralysis. In the latter part of 1861 he volunteered in a company organized by Capt. Robert Jordon and was mustered into service in the 15th Arkansas Regiment, commanded by J. M. Gee.

In 1862, when General Grant moved on Fort Donelson and the terms of "unconditional surrender" were demanded, Joe Crenir overheard some of Forrest's officers say that the fort was to be surrendered at daybreak and that Forrest and some of his men had threatened to cut their way through the lines. Crenir ran back and tried to persuade some of his company to follow in the track of Forrest's Cavalry, but his comrade, Pleas Cross, was the only one who consented. In the fort were horses and artillery left by General Forrest, and each secured a horse, saddle, and bridle and followed in the recently made tracks of Forrest's horses. They forded one stream and soon came to another and entered into a compact to go one at a time, as the current was dangerous. Cross went first, and his horse ran out of sight; but he made his way over in safety, and was followed by Crenir, both boys afterwards joining the 6th Arkansas Regiment.

In Tennessee, after the battle of Murfreesboro, they were ordered to join their old command, the 15th Arkansas, at Port Hudson, where they fought bravely under Col. B. W. Johnson.

HENDERSON.—Richard Henderson died suddenly June 22, 1905. When quite young he entered the Confederate army, and served all the time, belonging to Company G, 2d Virginia Regiment, Stonewall Brigade. As a sharpshooter, he stood well. He surrendered at Appomattox. He came home and went to farming. He was a fine soldier and a true man, and was a member of the Episcopal Church. He left a widow, who was Miss Bettie Beall. He was a great loss to his neighborhood. His sterling qualities made him much respected.

SALLEY.—B. F. Salley died at his home, in Saline County, Ark., on April 3, 1908, in his eighty-first year. He was born in South Carolina in 1827, removing early to Alabama with his parents. With his brother, T. J. Salley, he entered the Confederate army as a member of Captain Rudolph's company, Hilliard's Legion, during Bragg's march into Kentucky. He reenlisted in the 2d Alabama Cavalry, Ferguson's Brigade, to which his brother had been transferred, and they were continually together till the end at Greensboro, N. C.

MONTGOMERY.—William Montgomery died at his home, in Madison Parish, La., February 5, 1908. He was born in Hinds County, Miss., in 1843. He enlisted as a private in Company C, 12th Mississippi Volunteers, and was in all the battles of the regiment until wounded at Chancellorsville. When not fully recovered he joined Wirt Adams's cavalry at Jackson, Miss., and helped in the charge against the invading foe. He was in the trenches at "Bloody Angle" for thirty-six hours. Returning to Virginia, he received a commission as lieutenant in the 4th Alabama Cavalry, sharing the fortunes of Col. F. M. Winde's Regiment, of Roddy's Cavalry, to the end.

WATSON.—William A. Watson, born in Alabama in 1835; died at his home, in Limestone County, Tex., January 11, 1908. He went to Texas with his parents in 1841, and enlisted from that State in the Confederate army, serving as a member of Company H, 4th Texas Infantry, and surrendered at Appomattox. He was in twenty of the great battles of the war, and was wounded at Gaines's Mill, the Wilderness, and Cold Harbor.

BEALL.—After a protracted illness, William Beall entered into rest on June 16, 1907, aged sixty-three. He served in Company G, 2d Virginia Regiment, Stonewall Brigade. For a while he was in the navy with his brother, Capt. John G. Beall, who was executed on Governor's Island, N. Y. He was a prisoner at Fortress Monroe, both brothers being in irons. He surrendered at Appomattox. He returned to his native county (Jefferson), and was a successful farmer, a good soldier, an honored citizen. He was also a useful member of the Episcopal Church. Many miss and mourn him.

MILLER.—Col. Will A. Miller, who died at Arcadia, La., February 21, 1908, was born in Millersburg, Ind., May 3, 1839. In 1860 he removed to Louisiana, where in February, 1862, he enlisted for the Confederacy in the "Morehouse Stars," which became Company F of the 12th Louisiana Regiment. He was promoted from a private to orderly sergeant, and then elected lieutenant, as which he served till the surrender at Greensboro, N. C. He was with the regiment in all important engagements except Hood's campaign from Atlanta to Nashville, and was a gallant soldier. He served as Commander of the Camp at Arcadia from its organization to his death, and was lieutenant colonel on the staff of twelve major generals of the U. C. V., being on the staff of General Castleman as Assistant Quartermaster General at the last.

[The editor of the VETERAN wishes to add to the above a tribute to the worth of this friend and comrade. Since the first publication of the VETERAN he had been an interested and zealous worker for it, and to such as he is due much of the success to which the publication has attained.]

RAMSEY.—Charles A. Ramsey died at his home, in Greensboro, Ala., March 1, 1908, in his sixty-first year. When a youth of sixteen he joined the forces of the Confederacy as a member of a company commanded by Capt. James Winston, of Sumter. He was of Forrest's escort, and a valiant soldier.

BISHOP ELLISON CAPERS.

Bishop Ellison Capers was born in Charleston, S. C., in October, 1837, and was the fourth son of Bishop William Capers, of that State. At an early age he entered the South Carolina Military Academy as a cadet, and graduated in the class of 1856. After graduation he was appointed adjunct professor of English literature at his Alma Mater, and continued as such until 1861, when he entered the Confederate army and was made major of the first Regiment of Rifles. In 1862 he became colonel of the 23d South Carolina Regiment, and served as such with distinction. He was severely wounded at Jackson, Miss., and again at Chickamauga, where, on recommendation of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, he was promoted to brigadier general for gallant and meritorious services. At Franklin, Tenn., he was again wounded. Rejoining his command at Bentonville, N. C., he was at the surrender of General Johnston's army in 1865.

BISHOP CAPERS.

General Capers had begun to prepare himself for the Episcopal ministry before entering the army. Immediately after the close of hostilities he was appointed Secretary of State by Governor Orr, holding this position until his State was given over to the radical reconstruction of Republican rule. Soon after his resignation of this civil office Bishop Capers was consecrated a priest in the Episcopal Church and called to the parish of Greenville, S. C., where he remained for over twenty years, greatly beloved by the people of all religious denominations. In 1893 he was unanimously elected Bishop of South Carolina by the Diocesan Convention to succeed Bishop Howe, and continued to minister with singular devotion to the wants of that large and growing Diocese. No one member of the House of Bishops was more beloved or more highly respected than Bishop Capers.

For several months prior to his death—which occurred at his home, in Columbia, S. C., on the 24th of April, 1908—Bishop Capers suffered from a stroke of paralysis. He bore up with great fortitude; and although in great physical pain, he was always cheerful and perfectly resigned to the will of a gracious Providence. Just after the Easter dawn his strength began to fail rapidly; and while conscious to the last, it was apparent that the end of his long, beautiful, and useful life was at hand. Surrounded by his devoted family and friends, this great and good man's life went out "as sets the morning star, which goes not out behind a darkened west or sets obscured amid the tempests of the sky, but melts away into the light of heaven." A few seconds before the last breath left his body his face became radiant with a smile of triumph, and he exclaimed: "Cease firing; the victory is won!"

DEATHS IN A GEORGIA CAMP.

Butler, Chatham's Artillery, Savannah, Ga.; and W. King Parnell, 12th South Carolina Regiment.

JUDGE JAMES D. WATTERS.

The recent death of ex-Judge James D. Watters at his home, in Bel Air, Md., is a reminder of the part taken by so many young Marylanders for the South in the sixties. When the war broke out, he, as a Southern sympathizer, crossed the Potomac River and fought gallantly for the Confederacy, most of the time as a member of the cavalry regiment under Col. Ridgely Brown. When the war ended, he accepted the result and gave his influence toward uniting the divided sections of the country. He studied law and began its practice in November, 1865, soon becoming prominent for the supremacy of the party most friendly to the South, and in company with William Bouldin established the Harford Democrat. In 1871 he was elected one of the associate judges of the Third Judicial Circuit, in which position he served with distinction for thirty-two years, and his splendid career as a jurist added new honors to the fame of the Maryland judiciary.

Judge Watters was of a good Maryland family, and was born in Harford County in January, 1834, the son of Henry G. Watters, a man of prominence in his day.

COL. ROBERT HOUGH.

Robert Hough, a loyal and gallant Confederate, died at his home, in Baltimore, March 18, 1907, his death due to congestion of the lungs.

Colonel Hough, who was sixty years of age, was in the employ of the United Railways and Electric Company at the time of his death, having charge of the suburban parks of the company and of the old Baltimore Traction Company before that corporation was absorbed by the United. He spent the afternoon downtown, and but a short time before he died had been chatting with his daughters, Mrs. Mary Dickinson Dunott and Miss Fannie Tilghman Hough.

When Colonel Hough was stricken, about nine o'clock, it was seen at once that it would be fatal. Messages were sent to his children, and they arrived but a few minutes before he died. Mrs. Hough started to California the day before and was recalled.

Colonel Hough was born in Baltimore in September, 1841. At the outbreak of the Civil War he served Col. Robert E. Lee as a volunteer aid in Virginia. He was later transferred to the staff of Gen. Albert S. Johnston, and toward the close of the war served as an aid on the staff of Gen. E. Kirby Smith in the Valley of the Mississippi. (After the war he served as a colonel on the staff of Governor McLane, of Maryland.)

At the close of the war Colonel Hough became a member of the firm of Robert Hough & Sons, but severed his connection in 1877 and took up farming near Easton, Md. He returned to Baltimore in 1887, and became secretary to ex-Governor Brown when Mr. Brown was postmaster at Baltimore. In 1889 he was associated in the formation of the Pimlico Driving Club, and was secretary of the club until the end of 1895. When Governor Brown became President of the Consolidated Railways, Colonel Hough went with that company as manager of suburban resorts, and it was under his jurisdiction that Lakeside Park, Gwynn Oak Park, and Point Breeze (now known as River View) were developed.

Racing horses were a hobby with Colonel Hough. He was a charter member of the old Maryland Club in 1870, and had been secretary of the Maryland and Virginia circuit and other trotting and horse show associations, and for about ten years had been an official starter throughout the State.

Colonel Hough married Miss Fannie Tilghman in 1873 in St. John's Church, Miles River, Md. His widow, one son, and two daughters survive.

U. C. V. COMRADES IN MISSISSIPPI.

J. M. Bailey, Conehatta, Miss., reports the passing of comrades who were members of Patron Union Camp, No. 272:

Thomas Faucett, Company C, 13th Mississippi Regiment.

H. J. Brown, Company B, 2d Mississippi Regiment.

Rev. A. M. McBryde, Company K, 5th Miss. Regiment.

John W. O'Brien, Company D, 9th Kentucky Regiment.

WARE.—At his home, in Amherst County, Va., April 11 Mr. Lud Ware, who was a member of Capt. Thomas Kirkpatrick's Battery, of Lynchburg, Va., died in his eighty-fifth year. He was born in that county, and lived there all his life with the exception of the four years in the Confederate army.

STEVENS.—On April 10, 1908, Mr. Solon Stevens passed away at his home, in Amherst County, Va. He served as third lieutenant of Company G, 51st Virginia Infantry, under Capt. J. W. Henley, of that county. He was in the seventieth year of his age.

WILLIAM JOSEPH BYNUM.

William Joseph Bynum, youngest son of Britton Sugust and Virginia (Dupree) Bynum, was born August 3, 1826, in Greenville County, Va. His father was a planter and slaveholder, and built the first cotton gin in that part of Virginia. His mother died September 8, 1828, and his father October 8, 1834, at which time he became a member of the family of his eldest brother and guardian, Maj. Benjamin C. D. Bynum. He was educated in a private academy near his home, and moved with his brother's family and a company of relatives and neighbors from Virginia to DeSoto County, Miss., in 1844. His brother bought land from Martin Colbert, Chief of the Chickasaw Indians, and built his home by that of the Chief; and thus they lived as neighbors for more than a year, the families becoming great friends. He was married to Miss Martha Gibbs December 18, 1855. His wife and their infant child died in less than two years after their marriage. On September 21, 1859, near Horn Lake, Miss., he was married to Miss Katherine Anne Walker. To this union seven children were born.

W. J. BYNUM.

William J. Bynum entered the service of the Confederate States early in the war as a private in Company A, 7th Tennessee Cavalry Regiment, W. F. Taylor captain, and was wounded in the right arm on September 9, 1862, near Byhalia, Miss. This wound left the arm almost useless, causing great suffering at times the remainder of his life. On July 23, 1863, he was honorably discharged as unfit for further service; but in 1865, when the Confederacy's needs were so great, though crippled and disabled from long suffering, he went back to his command. When Lee surrendered, he returned home with his comrades.

During the days of reconstruction he stood as a pillar of adamant against the terror and ruin that tried the endurance and character of Southern manhood. He was appointed sheriff and tax collector soon after the war closed. Fearing to cause trouble and loss to his bondsmen through clashes with the Freedmen's Bureau, he resigned the office and entered the mercantile business at Horn Lake. In November, 1875, he was elected sheriff and tax collector, being the first Democrat to be elected to any office in DeSoto County after the war. After serving several terms, he retired to his home, near Horn Lake, where he lived until October, 1903. Ill health carried him from the country he loved, and with his wife and youngest daughter he moved to Amarillo, Tex., to join his other children.

For nearly sixty years he lived in DeSoto County, and his life was interwoven with the traditions and history of its early settlement. He knew and loved the people, and his interest extended to rich and poor, white and black.

He became a Christian in September, 1862, while in the hospital suffering from the wound which left him a cripple through life. He tried to live by the teaching set forth in the thirteenth chapter of Corinthians. He died at Amarillo, Tex., December 10, 1907; and Camp W. B. Plemons, Amarillo, of which he was a member, drew feeling resolutions on his death. His body was laid to rest in the old churchyard of the New Bethlehem Church, near Horn Lake, Miss.

ANDREW R. BLAKELY.

A Special Order from headquarters United Confederate Veterans, New Orleans, La., April 10, 1908, states:

"With a profound sense of loss, the General commanding announces the death of his warm friend, Col. Andrew R. Blakely, of this city, which sad event took place this morning at ten o'clock after a very brief illness. This bare announcement will shock Confederates in all parts of the land, for no man was more extensively known or more universally loved.

"Colonel Blakely was born in Banger, Ireland, on the 24th of January, 1841, and had therefore but just passed his sixty-seventh birthday. He was a member of the famous Washington Artillery of New Orleans, and served with the most distinguished gallantry in all the engagements in which he took part, losing his right eye at Second Manassas.

"He was engaged in the hotel business almost all of his life, and as the proprietor of the St. Charles Hotel made the acquaintance of men from all parts of the world. Amiable in disposition, with all the wit and humor of his native land, full of life and energy, kindly and considerate to all with whom he was associated, generous, noble, and lovable, the void left by his untimely death cannot be estimated and can never be filled.

STEPHEN D. LEE, General Commanding.

WILLIAM E. MICKLE, Adjutant General and Chief of Staff."

The editor of the VETERAN seldom records the death of a comrade with deeper personal sorrow.

Colonel Blakely (or Corporal, as he preferred to be called) was a man whose genial nature, kindly humor, and ever-courteous attitude toward his fellow-man did much to eliminate the word "stranger." No man felt strange in his presence, for he was every man's friend, and those who knew his generous graciousness as a host will rarely if ever look upon his like again.

An estimate of Comrade Blakely's character in no sense exaggerated, and worthy of being preserved in the VETERAN, appeared in the New Orleans Times-Democrat at the time of his death:

"Paeans of praise from lips unused to flattery, the tears of women and the moistened eyes of men, the hush of reverence, the sigh of profound regret, the grief unspeakable of the chief mourners, and the sorrowful attitude of a community that had lost one of its cherished friends and valiant champions marked the funeral services of Andrew R. Blakely.

"It was no conventional demonstration. The tribute to Andrew R. Blakely was a spontaneous outpouring of the hearts of the people, with no distinctions of rank or class, for he came up to the measure of the man who was described as the 'favorite of all circles and the idol of his own.'

"The opulent banker, the prosperous merchant, the high and mighty political chiefs, the leaders in journalism, art, law, medicine, commerce, and labor—all were there at his bier and gazed with reverent affection at the placid face that even death could not rob of its benevolent aspect. The big heart whose every pulsation had throbbed in sympathy with the sorrows of humanity had ceased to beat; the smiling lips that had carried comfort to many a despairing soul had conveyed their last message of hope and bore the seal of eternity; but the resolute soul that had done so much for humankind still seemed to hover over the inanimate frame that once sheltered it, as if reluctant to leave the scene where it had so long battled for God and humanity, dropping here and there seeds that will make for the betterment of men and women even unto the humblest of their kind.

"All day people of all classes passed before the bier, gazing reverently and affectionately upon the features of him that some knew only from hearsay, while others had reason to bless his memory for timely acts of thoughtfulness and kindness. Grouped around his bier were faithful sentinels, a detachment of veterans of the Soldiers' Home, commanded by Superintendent Ward. For hours they sat there, silent, tearful, gray-robed figures of rugged manhood, honoring the remains of a departed comrade and testifying their attachment to one of the beloved defenders of the cause. They brought no flowers; but of all the elements of the pathetic picture that the funeral ceremonies of Andrew R. Blakely presented, there was none more touching than the sight of those gray-clad veterans, with uniforms faded by time and themselves tottering on the brink of the grave, waiting to do honor to the memory of a public benefactor and a devoted comrade."

DEATH OF A LOVELY WOMAN.—The Southern people generally will sympathize deeply with Col. W. H. Knauss and his son-in-law, Mr. J. T. Gamble, in the death of the latter's wife. Mrs. Gamble was the elder daughter of Col. Knauss. She attended the Richmond Reunion last year with her husband and seemed to be very happy that the Confederates had so joyous a time. The thousands of friends throughout the South will sympathize the more deeply with the family because of the severe illness of Mrs. Knauss, which has continued for some time. She has attended many gatherings of Confederates with her husband, and participated heartily in the work he has so faithfully done for our dead in Camp Chase.

MRS. MARY GENTRY HILLMAN.

The funeral of Mrs. Mary Gentry Hillman took place in Nashville from the residence of Mr. D. C. Scales, being conducted by Drs. D. C. Kelley and R. Liu Cave on May 21, 1908.

The death of this noble and gifted woman causes widespread sorrow. She was the oldest child of Meredith Poin-dexter Gentry, who is remembered with fondest admiration. He was a native of Williamson County, Tenn., and at an early age began public service as a member of the United States Congress, and later served in the Confederate Congress. He purchased a large estate in Bedford County and erected a palatial residence, where he entertained lavishly eminent men of Church and State.

His royal integrity and gift of eloquence gave him a princely place among the people; and although an ardent Whig, he was most highly esteemed by the Democracy. While loyal to his party, he was forceful in its councils. The strongest illustration recalled of his power in the Whig party was in his opposition to Scott's nomination for the presidency. His first defeat was by Andrew Johnson, with whom he canvassed the State for Governor. It is believed that a more gifted orator was never known. Mary and Emily were daughters by his first marriage, while two sons, Albert and Charles, were of a second marriage. The second wife died early, and it devolved upon Mary to be mistress of the magnificent home. With gifts of her eloquent father, she presided in the home so charmingly that there is to this day by those who knew her ardent admiration and esteem.

All the people loved her; and however distinguished their guests from a distance, the plain people of the neighborhood were made to feel entirely at home with the other guests. The hospitality of Hillside was ever without stint, and the many servants were proud of belonging to Mr. Gentry.

The school days of Mary Gentry were principally at the Nashville Academy under Prof. C. D. Elliott, and after her marriage the family resided here while the four children (Daniel Hillman, Jr., and a daughter having died) were small.

In later years, as the widow of Daniel Hillman, this gifted woman resided on their large plantation in Kentucky, idolized by the common people, ever diligent for their comfort and happiness. Halting at Cadiz on the way to Nashville for the funeral, there was a brief service to a great gathering of friends who are the more deeply grieved by the suddenness of her death.

The only survivors of the Gentry family are one daughter, Mrs. T. T. Hillman, two sons of Mrs. Daniel Hillman and their families, and the widow and children of Albert Gentry, residing in Clarendon, Tex.

The editor of the VETERAN as a boy received inspiration from this great neighbor that continues with him. He procured a life sketch of Mr. Gentry by Alexander H. Stephens, which concludes as follows: "This brief tribute is given to the memory of one of the truest and noblest gentlemen the writer ever met with in his eventful life. No profounder philanthropist, no one more devoted to constitutional liberty ever lived in this or any other country than Meredith Poin-dexter Gentry."

The last prolonged conference the writer ever had with Mr. Gentry was about the great and good Gen. R. E. Lee, and as eloquence flowed from his lips tears ran down his noble cheeks. In Dr. Kelley's remarks at Mrs. Hillman's funeral he had with him and read from the VETERAN a tribute to Mr. Gentry by Alexander H. Stephens. While opposed in the outset to the war, Mr. Gentry and his family were steadfast for the South, and upon this noble woman the editor relied for succor in his last trying emergency.

S. B. PYROM.

S. B. Pyrom in his life presented a splendid example of true Southern manhood. He began early in life to establish that high character which ever guided him to a coveted position in the minds of thinking men. His rugged integrity, his devotion to family, the moral purity of his life, his exhaustless energy in varied useful and unselfish undertakings, and his loyalty to his friends, combined with the shirking modesty peculiar to refined natures, placed him near the head of the column of his fellows, fighting the battles of life always manfully and well.

He was a member of Company G, 2d Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, Bell's Brigade, Forrest's Command. His record as a soldier stands untarnished by a single unworthy deed and characterized throughout by the same fidelity and loyalty of purpose as exhibited in his daily walks of life as a citizen. At the final roll call he will gladly greet his old comrades.

S. B. PYROM, WITH HIS WIFE, SON, AND DAUGHTER.

An illustration of Comrade Pyrom's devotion to the Confederate cause is recalled. In 1897, at the close of the Centennial Exposition, Mr. Cox, who had charge of the government exhibit, remained over to visit the battlefield of Nashville with the editor of the VETERAN. Mr. Cox's father was an officer in the Federal army, and this son, having a pony, had roamed the hills about Nashville and was amazingly familiar with the old lines. Halting at the tollgate, copies of the VETERAN were handed to Comrade Pyrom, not realizing that he had ever seen one. "Wait a minute!" said he; and going into the house, he soon returned with bound volumes of the VETERAN from its first issue.

REV. L. W. CRAWFORD.

Rev. L. W. Crawford, the beloved Chaplain of Guilford Camp, of Greensboro, N. C., died at his home, in Asheville, in February, 1908. He had been a prominent minister of the Methodist Church, and was presiding elder at the time of his death. The burial was at Greensboro, his former home.

Comrade Crawford entered the Confederate army at the age of seventeen, and was a lieutenant in the 41st North Carolina, making a gallant soldier. He returned home from Delaware when the war closed, and in 1868 was ordained a minister in the North Carolina Methodist Conference. He was a man of much ability, well known, and beloved.

THREE MORRISTOWN (TENN.) COMRADES.

During the first months of 1908 Morristown (Tenn.) Camp has lost three of its most prominent and influential members, Captain Hodges being Treasurer:

J. C. Hodges, captain Company H, 60th Tennessee; died at his home, in Morristown, March 22.

J. W. Godwin, orderly sergeant Company F, 1st Tennessee Cavalry; died at his home, in Jefferson City, March 22.

O. D. Lacky, private Company D, 3d Engineering Corps; died January 17.

JOHN THOMPSON.

Sad news comes to the VETERAN from Lewisburg by John R. Freeman in reporting the death of John ("Sheep") Thompson, who was a messmate of the editor during much of the war—in Company B, 41st Tennessee Infantry. From school-boy days and on to his death he had been a zealous, faithful friend. John Thompson deserves what honor is due to a plain countryman whose family owned no slaves, but who was steadfast through the long, hard ordeals of a private in the Confederate army. He endured privations as a prisoner in Camp Morton for six months, and through all of the trials of the four years no murmur escaped his lips. John Freeman, who reports the sad event, telling how gently our comrade fell sleep, has had a marvelous experience. In the first battle he was so daring that his death was expected momentarily. Then he was so ill in prison that his life was saved evidently by the irritation of the surgeons.

SAMUEL J. SULLIVAN.

Samuel J. Sullivan was born in Baltimore January 17, 1842; and died at his home, in River Forest, Ill., April 19, 1908. Mr. Sullivan enlisted in the Confederate service from Baltimore in 1862 in Morgan's command, and in 1863 was taken prisoner and was confined at Camp Douglas until near the close of the war, when he was paroled for exchange by Secretary of War Stanton as the result of a personal interview with the Secretary on the part of his mother. One of the touching incidents of Mr. Sullivan's long illness preceding his death was the daily solicitude of Federal veterans, who called him "comrade" because he was a good neighbor and a brave enemy in the old days. John Humphrey, a Union soldier, felt honored when asked to serve as pallbearer with two Confederate veterans, Mr. Forrester and Mr. Bradley.

M. P. DELLINGER.

On the night of April 17, 1908, the spirit of M. P. Dellinger, a soldier tried and true, passed into the better land. He was a native of Lincoln County, N. C., and since the war he had been associated with his brother, David Dellinger, at Shelby, N. C., as a contractor and builder, where he was most highly esteemed. Among the first to take up arms for his beloved Southland, he went to the front as a member of the Cleveland Guards, under Capt. Augustus Burton, which was assigned to the 2d North Carolina Regiment. He was terribly wounded in the battle of Brandy Station, his skull being crushed by a piece of shell, the sight of one eye being entirely lost. Several years ago his remaining eye was so injured as to cause the loss of sight in that also, and during all these weary years of suffering and affliction he bore it with the fortitude of the soldier which had distinguished him on many battlefields.

Surviving Comrade Dellinger are two brothers and a niece, Miss Mattie Adams, who tenderly ministered to him in his last hours. His wife died some seven years ago.

THREE NORTH CAROLINA COMRADES.

W. A. Curtis, Adjutant Charles L. Robinson Camp, U. C. V., Franklin, N. C., reports the deaths of three comrades and members since the beginning of 1908:

B. M. Allen served as a private in Company A, 65th Regiment (6th cavalry) North Carolina troops; died January 17.

H. G. Trotter was a private in Company I, 62d Regiment North Carolina Infantry; died January 19. He was Commissary of Camp Robinson.

W. P. Allison served as a private in Company B, 62d Regiment North Carolina Infantry; died April 10. He was Third Lieutenant Commander of Camp Robinson at the time of his death.

R. G. CHILDRRESS.

R. G. Childress was born in Marshall County, Ala., in 1838; died at Roscoe, Tex., April 30, 1908, after an illness of six months. He went with his parents to Texas in 1845, settling in Rusk County, and during 1854-55 he served in the company of Rangers commanded by Captain Boggess. Volunteering for the Confederacy in 1861, he served most of the time in the Army of Tennessee and Georgia. For two years he was a scout in the command of Gen. L. S. Ross, and was a great favorite with that gallant commander. After the war he was for a period in Mississippi, but returned to Texas in 1870 and settled in Bosque County, whose people he afterwards served as Justice of the Peace, Judge of the County Court, and as Mayor of Meridian for two years. He was married in 1866 to Miss Mary Holmes, of Mississippi, and leaves a family of seven children.

Comrade Childress was Calendar Clerk of the twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-third sessions of the Senate of Texas, and was prominent in the ranks of Masons. He was admitted to the bar in 1887.

JAMES CHAMBERLAYNE JONES.

Few more popular men than Capt. James C. Jones have ever lived in Shelby County, Tenn., and his death in June, 1907, removed one who had established himself worthily in the regard of his people. He was born in Lebanon, Tenn., in 1844, the son of Hon. James C. Jones, who served Tennessee both as Governor and in the United States Senate. The family came from Virginia to Tennessee, and in 1849 removed to Memphis. Comrade Jones left college to bear arms for the Confederate cause, enlisting as a private in Company A, 7th Tennessee Cavalry, under W. F. Taylor, afterwards colonel. Efficient service won for him a lieutenantancy, and later he was an adjutant general on the staff of Gen. W. H. Jackson, of Forrest's Cavalry.

After the surrender, Captain Jones returned to Memphis, where he was in business until 1878, when his health failed and for some time he was an invalid; but undiscouraged, he established a school and devoted his energies to the work of teaching. Closing his school in 1901, he became a private tutor in Mississippi. He was elected to the office of County Register of Shelby County, Tenn., in 1902, and reelected to the same office in 1906, being the only man who ever succeeded himself to this office. He was married in 1878 to Miss Alice Tait.

In the business life of the city of Memphis Mr. Jones held an honored place. He was intensely public-spirited, honestly and actively interested in the development and prosperity of his city. He graduated hundreds of young men from his school, most of whom have done him honor.

SWORD OF CAPT. CHARLES S. MONTGOMERY, U. S. A.—Mrs. N. V. Randolph, President Richmond Chapter, U. D. C., Richmond, Va., wishes to locate a sword taken from Capt. Charles S. Montgomery, of the 5th New York Volunteers (Duryea's Zouaves), when he was wounded and captured in the second battle of Bull Run. On the sword were the names of his four brothers: Henry F. Montgomery, Thomas C. Montgomery, H. M. Montgomery, William R. Montgomery. Captain Montgomery was paroled and exchanged, returned to his regiment after the battle of Antietam, and in time to take part in the battle of Fredericksburg. He was instantly killed in the battle of Hatcher's Run. A reward will be given for the return of the sword.

CHARLES SUMNER'S ESTIMATE OF NEGROES.—February 24, 1834, Charles Sumner on his trip to the South: "For the first time I saw slaves, and my worst preconception of their appearance and ignorance did not fall as low as their actual stupidity. They appeared to be nothing more than masses of flesh unendowed with anything of intelligence above the brutes. I have now an idea of the blight upon that part of our country in which they live."

[The foregoing is from a letter of young Sumner to his parents while making the journey from Baltimore to Washington. Had he lived longer, he might have expressed his appreciation of what the South did to develop the slaves.]

GERTIE ROGERS ZUBER.

Gertie Rogers, now Mrs. John W. Zuber, is well known among Confederates. She was born and reared in Chattanooga. As her father is a traveling passenger agent (N., C. & St. L. Railway), she began traveling with him at the age of five, and continued to do so until twenty years old. She went with her father to Camp Chase to decorate the graves four years in succession; was at the unveiling of the monument there, and took an active part in the exercises. She has luxuriated in the Atlantic Ocean at four different places, and also in the Pacific Ocean. She has been on the great lakes of the North and the Gulf of Mexico. Her faith in her father to make good his promises to her never failed her. Her faith was so great that she once received a card from a lady in the City of Mexico addressed to her as "Miss Gertie Rogers, the sweet child of faith." When a small child she demonstrated absolute trust in her father by perilous leaps into his strong arms. Those who witnessed such action learned a lesson of childlike trust that it is pleasant to remember.

GERTIE ROGERS.

ANGUISH OF RECONSTRUCTION IN CUBA.

A letter published on March 24, 1908, in regard to reconstruction in Cuba will elicit the sympathy of all Southerners. It is given as "Observations of Lloyd Damron," of a prominent insurance company, in the Rome (Ga.) Tribune, he having recently spent some time in Havana:

"That the spirit of the Kuklux, who redeemed the Southern States from the shadow of Africa forty years ago, is not personified by clans in Cuba to-day is due perhaps to temperamental differences of the Anglo-Saxon and Latin nations, but mainly to the unwelcome intervention of the United States government.

"The beautiful Prado, once the joy of Havana, harbors now an incongruous assembly of people. Once the dons and doñas were out almost nightly, circling about the Prado with the music of Spanish and Cuban bands, enlivening the paseo on gala occasions. The great parades followed the course of the Prado or boulevard, which is the main street of the city, for hours in the day and into the morning hours. Recently, however, the Prado has lost much of its charm to the traveler or native who reveled in its joys during the reign of the haughty Spaniard. Then the don and the doña and the caballero and the señorita walked hand and hand in the affectionate way of these romantic people and shied coquettish glances at each other, oblivious to the invasion and conquest of the beautiful parks and boulevards that overshadowed them. The negro, whom the Spanish grandees trained to tread the narrow calles, or streets, now jostles along the quaintly narrow sidewalks, while perhaps the proud doña keeps to the middle of the street to avoid measuring rights with the negro, to whom the amended Constitution of the United States guarantees a form of social equality.

"The ways of the races in Cuba are reminiscent of local reconstruction incidents, even up to the characteristic inclination of the overindulged black man to shunt into the street white women whom he meets on the narrow sidewalks.

"'You people in the Southern States,' said a native Cuban to me the other day, 'understand the proper control of the negro, and I am told that you exercise a very good control in spite of this Constitution of yours which we do not yet understand perfectly. We have the United States to thank for our present troubles with the negro.'

"This is pretty generally the feeling in Cuba when one is asked to fix a responsibility for the precipitate change in social conditions which has driven the Spaniard and the equally proud Cuban, through whose veins courses the noblest Castilian and Caucasian blood, from the beautiful Prado, parks, and boulevards, adorned more than ever by the hand of the American government of intervention, back to the Malecon, the boulevard by the sea, which the negro has not yet captured in his sweeping movement for recognition in Cuba.

"There is some danger even of electing a negro for Vice President in Cuba at the next election, which takes place in October. Whatever the result of the election, riots will be imminent and possibly revolution. The mailed fist of Uncle Sam is the restraining influence in the island to-day without which the races would clash. President Roosevelt is talking of withdrawing many of our troops in the island, and it is freely predicted that this course will be followed by bloodshed. The negroes declare openly that they will not be ruled warfare for generations and centuries, which shows few visible traces of warfare over its broad, sunny expanses might even now be resting on a volcanic race problem the extent of whose eruption may convince the United States government of the difficulties which beset the Constitution as it follows the flag.

"It is true that the business men in the higher classes are largely in favor of the annexation of the island to the United States. This is due to the fact that business interests have been much more prosperous since the United States has interfered to put down the perennial riot and rebellion of the island. Even the Spaniard, who has been accused of sinking the Maine, is equally desirous with the Cuban of coming under the stars and stripes if he has money invested in Cuban business interests. 'Cuba Libre,' typified by the flag which floats over the Cuban business houses to-day, doubtless will fade finally into a territorial form of government administered by this nation; for the substantial business interests of Cuba now demand such course, and the dominant political party of this country doubtless will lend a sympathetic ear. One of the problems to be worked out, however, is the proper adjustment of social conditions in the island under the uncompromising restrictions of the fourteenth amendment of our Constitution. The magnitude of this undertaking may be appreciated when it is understood that the thousands of negroes in Cuba, who still cling largely to their native gibberish, were freed from slavery only thirty years ago."

In connection with the foregoing, a delightful picture of home life is given. Mr. Nicolas Altuzarra, looking to closer relations with the United States, purchased a residence in Atlanta, Ga., when his children were small, and kept his family in Atlanta, Ga., for several years, until the English language became quite familiar to them.

This residence of Mr. Altuzarra, on the Paseo Marti, Havana, is an excellent example of the best Spanish-American domestic architecture. The ornate, two-story façade, with double balconies, is more than fifty feet in height, giving the ample ceiling space for both stories so necessary in a warm climate. Within is a large court, ornamented by flowers; and leading from it to the second floor, which is the residence proper, there is a wide marble staircase. The large door at the right of the front is a porte-cochere, and within are quarters for the carriage and horses as well as for the servants. The house is much larger than it appears, containing fourteen rooms, besides servants' quarters.

The notable difference between it and the houses most of us are accustomed to is in that its yard is inside. This gives great privacy along with the abundant ventilation which that climate demands. In the rooms which open on the patio within there are wide windows and doors, and a balcony runs around these courts on the second floor, which is the resort of the family by day or night whenever it is pleasanter outdoors than in. The front balcony of this house commands a fine view of the Paseo, or Prado, as it is called. In a sense in which it is not even known to us such a house is its owner's castle. The great door (which has a small door within it) is kept closed and barred and in charge of a porter day and night. The few outside windows are protected by iron gratings. But there are no more hospitable homes than these of the better class in Spanish America.

"We can all be philanthropists; a kind word is as thankfully received as a dollar."

by white men. Since the Spanish inhabitants of the island are debarred from voting, the negroes may very easily in votes outnumber the Cuban whites. In the meeting of their Sociedad Secreta, or secret society, which includes most of the negroes on the island, they lay their plans secretly and with great cunning, using the native African tongue, which they still cling to in some measure in their junta. The whites, of course, revolt at any suggestion of Ethiopian domination, and they resent the growing tendency toward social equality, daily evidences of which are furnished in the commingling of the lower classes. The haughty Spaniard and the proud Cuban of to-day are sensitive to the intrusion of the negro; but they cannot offer protest when files of the darker race usurp the benches along the Prado or when the negroes are interspersed among their daughters in audiences of theaters or in refreshment places, for they are overawed by the United States and its Constitution. On the surface all is quiet, remarkably so; but I was impressed that a land constantly in

FROM AUTHOR OF "CONFEDERATE ECHOES."

A. T. Goodloe, Nashville, Tenn., writes: "Our Confederacy is not dead, and it will never die if I can assist in preventing such a melancholy catastrophe. The editor of the VETERAN paid me a great compliment in calling attention to the advertisement of 'Confederate Echoes' when he said that I was one of the most unreconstructed of Confederate survivors. And Mrs. Sue Mooney, the gifted Southern writer, also paid me a tribute when she said, 'He is the best illustration I have ever known of a man who would not change his colors nor his coat,' thus reminding me of the old saying, 'I can wear an old coat, a worn coat, a torn coat, but never a turn coat.' Let me quote another thing, this from the Nashville American, 1893: 'There is no page in the history of any people which should arouse deeper sentiments of love for its heroes and admiration for their sacrifices than should the memories of the Confederate cause inspire in the hearts of Southern people for those who dedicated themselves to its service. This feeling is strongly entrenched in the Southern breast, yet it should be brought more to the surface that it may not possibly grow less. A good publication has been needed to keep in activity these patriotic memories. This want is now supplied by the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, published monthly in Nashville and edited by Mr. S. A. Cunningham. The first number has just been issued, and contains thirty-two pages replete with interesting articles,' etc."

FIRST IN THE CLASS.—The first man in the class of 1829, in which Robert E. Lee graduated second, was Charles Mason, of New York, who was assigned to the engineers, but resigned in 1831 to become a lawyer. He was for two years editor of the New York Evening Post, and then went to Iowa, where he became Chief Justice of the State. Later he was a railroad president, and then returned to the practice of the law. He practiced law in Washington during the war.

Good photographs of this fine life-size painting, by Mrs. L. Kirby-Parrish, as seen by delighted thousands at the Jamestown Exposition, can be obtained from the artist. The picture is in two sizes: 20x24 inches, $3; 12x15 inches, $2. Mounted on best white cardboard, with wide margin, ready for framing.

This is admitted to be the most striking and lovable portrait of the great Southern commander. It is based on the only life photograph ever taken of Traveler, and consequently the only one of General Lee on his famous war horse.

Address orders, with remittance, to Mrs. L. Kirby-Parrish, 1908 Grand Avenue, Nashville, Tenn.

One of the most fascinating war books ever written is "Two Wars," by Gen. S. G. French. His history of the Mexican War is one of the most interesting accounts of that period on record, and deserves place in all libraries.

GEN. S. G. FRENCH.

Then his part as a major general in the Confederate army is vividly presented. As a West Point graduate, thoroughly trained, what he writes must be of interest to all soldiers, and then his account of reconstruction experiences deserves the special consideration of every student of history who desires the whole truth and nothing else.

LAST HEADQUARTERS OF GENERAL FORREST.

Gen. N. B. Forrest surrendered in this house to Gen. E. R. S. Canby in April, 1865. It is now the home of Mr. Gray Ellis.

THE VETERAN'S CROSS OF HONOR.

(To the air of "The Old Oaken Bucket.")

How dear to the heart of each gray-headed soldier
 Are the thoughts of the days when all wore the gray,
 While memory recalls every trial and danger
 And scenes of the past live in battle array!
 Though long since discarding our arms and equipments,
 There's one thing a Veteran most surely will note:
 The first thing he sees on the form of a comrade
 Is the little bronze cross he wears on his coat.

Chorus.

The little bronze cross, the sacred bronze cross,
 The U. D. C. cross that he wears on his coat.

"How much did it cost?" said a man to a soldier,
 "That little flat cross you wear on your coat?"
 "A fortune in money," he answered the stranger,
 "And four years of marching and fighting to boot.
 The wealth of the world cannot purchase this emblem,
 Except that the buyer once wore the gray too;
 For it shows to mankind the full marks of a hero—
 A man who to honor and country was true."

Then let us be proud of this emblem of honor,
 And wear it with spirit both loyal and hold;
 Fraternal welcome each one who supports it

With love in our hearts for the comrades of old.
 Each day musters out whole battalions of wearers,
 And soon will be missed this token so dear;
 But ages to come will remember with honor
 The man who'd the right this bronze emblem to wear.

H. H. Sturgis, Fort Pierce, Fla., writes: "I was born in Monroe County, Ga., and my father was the founder of the Monroe Female Academy and its first president. I was reared in Dallas County, Ala., and entered the cavalry service during the war, but was ill from typhoid fever and discharged. As soon as I was able I enlisted in Company G, 44th Alabama Volunteers, and remained in the service until the surrender. I have been in the ministry since the war, and am living at Sanford, Fla."

GAVELS FROM BEAUVOIR FOR NEW CHAPTERS.—The General U. D. C. have offered a gavel made of Beauvoir wood to all Chapters organized during 1908 that shall be named for President Davis, any member of his family, or any of his three homes. The birthday of many Camps and Chapters during the month of June would be a splendid tribute to the sentiment back of the centenary to be celebrated by thousands of Southerners who revere the name and memory of Jefferson Davis. During this year every loyal son and daughter of the South should be interested in all that concerns the character of President Davis.

GENERAL LEE'S SERVICE TO ST. LOUIS.

Cornelius H. Fauntleroy, of St. Louis, mentions a fact in connection with the career of Gen. Robert E. Lee that is either often forgotten or entirely overlooked, and he gives it as one of several reasons why the new high school at St. Louis should be called "The Robert E. Lee Memorial School." He says: "When he was an engineer officer of the United States army, stationed here sixty years ago and in charge of the improvements of the Mississippi River, he devised and carried through a plan to prevent the river from leaving its natural and usual channel some miles above St. Louis and cutting close to the bluffs in Illinois east of the present site of East St. Louis, the result of which, unless it had been stopped by General Lee, would have been to leave St. Louis on a swamp or slough instead of a navigable river, and instead of the splendid city it is to-day St. Louis would be a straggling village."

COTTON TAX FOR CONFEDERATE PENSIONS.

At a regular meeting of Lowden Butler Camp No. 409, U. C. V., held in Benton, La., March 14, 1908, it was proposed that a bill be introduced in Congress by some Southern Congressman with a view of having the internal revenue tax collected on cotton during and after the war given to the respective Southern States to be used in pensioning Confederate veterans.

It being the sense of this Camp that it would be impossible for the owners to establish their claims at this late day, and believing that all having claims would be glad to see the national government return to each State the amount of taxes collected in said State on cotton, the same to be used as a fund for pensioning worthy Confederate soldiers and their widows, the introduction of the bill was recommended. This would enable the States to increase the pensions of soldiers to the amount that would give them a support, as at present it is sadly difficult.

It was further ordered that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to J. T. Watkins, our representative in Congress, also to the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, soliciting coöperation.

[The paper comes officially signed by J. H. Nattin, Commander, and W. D. Lassiter, Adjutant.]

GALLANTRY OF TIPTON DAVIS JENNINGS.

Hon. Tipton Davis Jennings is a native of Lynchburg, Va., which was founded by his ancestor, John Lynch, son of Charles Lynch, of colonial fame. Being descended from a race of men of unusual mental endowment, he combines a brilliant mind with the modesty of a woman. Throughout the War between the States Mr. Jennings served with distinguished gallantry as sergeant major of the 11th Virginia Regiment, being twice severely wounded.

In the Daily Republican of Lynchburg, Va., Thursday, June 2, 1864, appears the following under the head of "Gallantry:" "In the recent fight near Drewry's Bluff a young gentleman of this city was conspicuous for gallantry and daring. In the charge upon the fortifications of the enemy Sergeant Tipton D. Jennings, Company G, 11th Virginia Infantry, rushed ahead of his comrades, and amidst a shower of bullets won the high distinction of being the first to reach the enemy's works. Arrived there, he vaulted upon the breastworks and commanded a surrender. Two Yankee colonels surrendered to him in person and delivered him their swords. These trophies of his valor the hero bore off in triumph.

Mr. Jennings is Commander of Garland-Rodes Camp, U.

C. V., having previously served that organization for ten or twelve years in the capacity of Adjutant. Many positions of honor and trust in his native city have been held by him, he being for four years postmaster; also serving as bank director and cashier, on Board of Stewards M. E. Church, South, and as Master of Marshall Lodge, A. F. and A. M.

CAPT. T. D. JENNINGS.

Mr. Jennings has for ten years represented Lynchburg in the Legislature of Virginia, where he is considered one of the most watchful and forceful members of the House, and he is a thoroughly equipped business man of varied qualifications.

DAUGHTERS OF THE CONFEDERACY.

BY DOUGLAS JARNAGAN.

O woman! thou unexplained puzzle of all the ages; the unsolved problem of wise men, poets, and sages. The world sees her as she goes about in a quiet, mysterious way, with angel hand gathers the debris of man's ruined and desolated home, and builds for herself a temple, at whose shrine her heart worships, until the fires of love die out upon its altar. Then she takes the cold ashes of his dead hope, and with immaculate hand places them in Memory's urn; then hides them away in the silent chamber of her desolate heart, where the inquiring gaze of the world can never enter. Yet the Invisible Hand that holds the little stars in their places and bids them shine for Him, takes the cold, dead ashes of woman's despair and plants them in the flower of a new hope, which will bud and blossom on the "evergreen shore" forever.

FOURTH LOUISIANA REGIMENT.

BY W. R. CAMPBELL, ROGILLOVILLE, LA.

In the April VETERAN, page 202, I notice an article by Col. D. F. Boyd and mention of the death of John T. Harris, of the 4th Louisiana (Hays's) Brigade, and further mention that the writer cannot locate the 4th Louisiana, that it must have been in the Trans-Mississippi Department. This is incorrect, for the 4th Louisiana was organized early in 1861 at Camp Moore, La., with Robert H. Barrow as colonel, who was soon succeeded by H. W. Allen. The regiment was assigned to duty on the Louisiana and Mississippi Gulf Coast, with headquarters at Ship Island, and remained in that locality until Shiloh, where they went with rejoicing after long and trying inactivity.

They went into the Shiloh engagement with twelve hundred men, and many were left lifeless on that bloody field. After Shiloh the regiment was ordered to Vicksburg, where it thoroughly reorganized, and did arduous picket and fatigue duty at that place until July 1, 1862, when the 4th and 30th Louisiana Regiments were put in a brigade commanded by Col. H. W. Allen, and went with Gen. J. C. Breckinridge to the battle of Baton Rouge, La. There many more offered their lives on the battlefield, many in sight of their homes. Colonel Allen was desperately wounded, being shot through both hips. He was never able to take the field again. He was promoted to major general, and was afterwards elected Governor of Louisiana.

The 4th remained in and around Baton Rouge until October, when they were sent to Port Hudson, and the fortifying of that place was begun. It was then brigaded with the 30th Louisiana, 42d, 43d, 48th, 53d, and 55th Tennessee Regiments, and a battalion of Texas sharpshooters and put in command of Brig. Gen. S. B. Maxey, and stood the heavy bombardment of Port Hudson. Later we left on an expedition to capture Grayson's raiders, missed them, and campaigned in Mississippi around Vicksburg until it surrendered. We then retreated to Jackson and fought there for two weeks, and later crossed to Mobile, from which place we were ordered out in various engagements, always losing men.

In October General Maxey was promoted and went to Texas, and Col. W. A. Quarles commanded us until June, 1864, when the 4th and 30th Louisiana Regiments were transferred to Gibson's Louisiana Brigade, Army of Tennessee. When we left the Gulf Department, May 20, 1864, the 4th Louisiana mustered eight hundred guns and full quota of officers.

I was severely wounded the last of July, 1864, and remained many months in a hospital; but in March, 1865, I went to my command at Mobile and found eighteen men and one third lieutenant, all that was left of the noble old regiment.

THE EPWORTH ERA, Nashville, Tenn.

The Reily-Taylor Company, of New Orleans, Coffee Importers and Roasters, was organized in 1903, and did business for three years in a small building on South Peters Street. Two years ago they purchased the large four-story building now occupied by them fronting on Magazine, Girard, and Constance Streets, and increased the size of their roasting plant from two to eight cylinders. In four years their business has increased more than six hundred per cent. They are particularly proud of the success they have met with in the sale of their famous Luzianne Coffee. So good is the quality of this coffee (and its being sold at the popular retail price of twenty-five cents) that they are having orders for it from Boston, Mass., to San Francisco. The Vice President of this concern, Hon. D. W. Pipes, of Clinton, La., is a Confederate veteran, having served for four years in the Army of Northern Virginia with the Washington Artillery of New Orleans.

What is a gentleman? Men connected with the newspaper trade have a canon of their own. "Mr. Editor," said a patron one day, "how is it you never call on me to pay for your paper?" "O," said the man of types, "we never ask a gentleman for money." "Indeed!" the patron replied. "How do you manage to get along when they don't pay?" "Why," said Mr. Editor, "after a certain time, we conclude he is not a gentleman and we then ask him."—Selected.

A mistake was made in giving the address of Mrs. N. E. Edgerton, Treasurer Henry Wyatt Monumental Fund, as Salem, N. C., when it should have been Selma, N. C.

George Jones, Wisner, Nebr., Rural Route No. 2, would like to hear from surviving members of Company E, 12th Mississippi, Featherston's Brigade, Longstreet's Corps, A. N. V.

A. H. French, 1427 Third Avenue, Birmingham, Ala., wishes to hear from any surviving members of the 2d Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, also from any members of Morton's Battery—as many as possible—before the Reunion at Birmingham.

A new story is attributed to our popular Comrade Polk Miller, the inimitable imitator of the old-time dandy. It is to the effect that the old man offered a turkey for sale to a gentleman who wanted a "tame" one. "Dis is a tame turkey, mars'r. It sho' is." "Well, how is it that bird shot are in it?" "Ah, boss, it's sho'-nuff a tame turkey. Dat shot, you see, was intended for me."

A. S. Bennett writes from Paris, Ark., that he served in the 6th Georgia (Colquitt's) Regiment, Company B, beginning service in 1861. His regiment was sent to Virginia, and kept at Yorktown until that historic place was evacuated by the Confederates, and he afterwards served in many of the severe battles of Virginia. Comrade Bennett hopes to meet members of his old regiment at the Birmingham Reunion.

Alex Russell, 3218 Avenue I, Galveston, Tex., wishes to obtain his father's army record. He was Emanuel Russell, a naturalized Greek, about forty-five or fifty years old when he enlisted. He went from Alexandria, La., a barber by profession and a splendid cook, and the son remembers to have heard him speak of having been cook for General Polk in Tennessee. He thinks he was in the battle of Lookout Mountain and in the company of Capt. Thomas W. Jack, of Texas; also has the impression that he went in the army the second time as a substitute for some one at Alexandria.

Confederate War Pictures

BY GILBERT GAUL,
NATIONAL ACADEMICIAN.

With Introductory Sketches by
THORNWELL JACOBS.

Exquisitely reproduced in four colors, on heavy polychrome paper.

Those who love the South and her brave old veterans have desired for many years to have their courage, their devotion, their unmatched heroism and the home-life of their families crystallized on canvas. After nearly a half century this has just been done. Gilbert Gaul, of New York, was employed several years ago, and has now finished the series. It is called With the Confederate Colors, 1861-5, and consists of six paintings, as follows:

No. 1. Leaving Home.—Shows a typical Southern interior of the period. A lad is telling his homefolks good-bye. One sees the newspaper fallen to the floor, the favorite bird-dog pleading infinitely with his eye, the father, mother, sister, slaves—all done as if a photograph had been magically turned into colors.

No. 2. Holding the Line at all Hazards.—A battle scene. The last magnificent stand of "those who had fate against them." One of the finest battle scenes ever painted.

No. 3. Waiting for Dawn.—A campfire scene. The snow covers the ground. A farm house burns in the distance. The "enemy's" battle line glows on the horizon. A masterpiece.

No. 4. The Picket and the Forager.—Companion pieces sold as one picture. The first shows a lonely picket on duty. The second presents a bread and chicken-laden forager returning to camp after a day's excursion.

No. 5. Betting on the Flag.—The boys in blue are backing their cause with a pile of coffee in a social game of cards between the lines. Southern tobacco is the bet of the "Johnny Rebs" that the bars will be victorious. One of the most popular of the series.

No. 6. Tidings.—A pretty Southern girl is reading eagerly to listen, and a wounded soldier on furlough forgets his bandaged arm as he hears tidings from the firing line. A beautiful and touching picture.

of Gilbert Gaul's Famous War
Paintings.

Gentlemen: I congratulate you on publishing the portfolio of pictures, "With Confederate Colors," by the most distinguished painter of military subjects in this country. As an artist he is endorsed by the National Academy of Design and others of highest repute. It seems most timely that the South is at last to have pictures which are really historic documents, and which must appeal to her people, because Mr. Gaul's pictures are really a sympathetic translation of the war period. The portfolio should be not only in every Southern, but in every American, family. These paintings, with their pathos, their tragedy, and the great sorrow of the great war period, will perform a great duty in pointing the younger generation to avoid drifting into channels which might provoke a like repetition of our great Civil War.

With kindest wishes for the success of your praiseworthy undertaking, I am,
Yours truly,
STEPHEN D. LEE.

a letter from the front to the groups of women and slaves. A grandfather bends forward eagerly to listen, and a wounded soldier on furlough forgets his bandaged arm as he hears tidings from the firing line. A beautiful and touching picture.

Mr. Gaul's strong brush has portrayed with much realism, not their bitterness and re-meritions, but their magnificent motive, their magnanimous courage, their unmatched devotion. Those who love the real values of the Old South will prize these pictures beyond price, and indeed they should appeal to every intelligent American, man or woman.

Pictures 15x19 inches, reproducing every shade of tone and motif, and embossed so as to give perfect canvas effect. Each one is a masterpiece, depicting the courage, sacrifice, heroism, sufferings and home life of the Southern soldier.

We have made arrangements with the publishers to supply our subscribers with one or more of the above masterpieces at an exceedingly low price. We make the following is to learn as to the relative standing and reliability of the leading manufacturers of medicinal agents, as the most eminent physicians are the most careful as to the uniform quality and perfect purity of remedies prescribed by them, and it is well known to physicians and the Well-Informed generally that the California Fig Syrup Co., by reason of its correct methods and perfect equipment and the ethical character of its product has attained to the high standing in scientific and commercial circles which is accorded to successful and reliable houses only, and, therefore, that the name of the Company has become a guarantee of the excellence of its remedy.

TRUTH AND QUALITY

appeal to the Well-Informed in every walk of life and are essential to permanent success and creditable standing, therefore we wish to call the attention of all who would enjoy good health, with its blessings, to the fact that it involves the question of right living with all the term implies. With proper knowledge of what is best each hour of recreation, of enjoyment, of contemplation and of effort may be made to contribute to that end and the use of medicines dispensed with generally to great advantage, but as in many instances a simple, wholesome remedy may be invaluable if taken at the proper time, the California Fig Syrup Co. feels that it is alike important to present truthfully the subject and to supply the one perfect laxative remedy which has won the approval of physicians and the world-wide acceptance of the Well-Informed because of the excellence, of the combination, known to all, and the original method of manufacture, which is known to the California Fig Syrup Co. only.

This valuable remedy has been long and favorably known under the name of—Syrup of Figs—and has attained to world-wide acceptance as the most excellent of family laxatives, and as its pure laxative principles, obtained from Senna, are well known to physicians and the Well-Informed of the world to be the best of natural laxatives, we have adopted the more elaborate name of—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—as more fully descriptive of the remedy, but doubtless it will always be called for by the shorter name of Syrup of Figs—and to get its beneficial effects always note, when purchasing, the full name of the Company—California Fig Syrup Co.—plainly printed on the front of every package, whether you simply call for—Syrup of Figs—or by the full name—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—as—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—is the one laxative remedy manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. and the same heretofore known by the name—Syrup of Figs—which has given satisfaction to millions. The genuine is for sale by all leading druggists throughout the United States in original packages of one size only, the regular price of which is fifty cents per bottle.

Every bottle is sold under the general guarantee of the Company, filed with the Secretary of Agriculture, at Washington, D. C., that the remedy is not adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act, June 30th, 1906.

DIXIE LAND.

BY DICKISON DOWD.

There is a land not far away,
A land of song and soldiers gray;
It lies out there just off the shore—
'Tis Dixie land for evermore.

Once Dixie stood in honest fight,
Herself defending, and the right;
Four years her deeds amazed the world,
But ah! too soon her flag was furled.

Four millions came and trod it down,
And crushed her heroes to the ground;
Their bodies strewed o'er all the plain—
O Dixie mine! the slain, the slain!

Her heart was sore, her heroes dead;
To yon fair isle for peace she fled.
No more in war her armor gleams,
For Dixie's in the land of dreams.

Her home is in a wondrous clime,
Yon island in the stream of Time;
The showers that wash its clouds away
Are tears for her dead boys in gray.

To her you cannot find the way
Unless you wore or loved the gray;
The "Stars and Bars" wave o'er the door
In Dixie land for evermore.

'Tis there the Veterans go each year,
And there they held reunions rare;
With songs and tales and yells the boys
Retaste their bravest, sweetest joys.

The boys that died for Dixie land
Come back and take them by the hand;
And on that glory-lighted shore
They sing their glory songs once more.

There Dixie calls the roll each year,
And fewer, fewer answer, "Here!"
"I fought with Lee; I wore the gray."

GUNNING FOR ORDERS

is much like gunning for birds. You must have a definite aim, because indiscriminate advertising, like indiscriminate shooting, results in empty pockets. The printer furnishes the shot, and postage is the powder that carries it wherever you direct.

And you must have good ammunition. Foolish indeed the sportsman who would use pebbles for shot to save expense, yet equally foolish is the advertiser who wastes energy, postage and opportunity on weak, ineffective printing Think it over; then let's talk it over. We have furnished ammunition for so many successful campaigns that we know you will find our experience of value.

Anyway, let's talk it over.

H., Va., though no one saw him fall nor was his body found after recapturing the skirmish line. It is thought that he must have been captured and doubtless died in prison or hospital. ## THE BIRMINGHAM REUNION.

While history records the heroic deeds of the Confederate conflict, the world needs no further evidence of what the South can do in time of war; but if she be asked to furnish proof of her ability to construct and build up in time of peace, let her point to Birmingham, Ala., the Reunion city of 1908, a municipality which came into existence long after the smoldering camp fires had gone to sleep on the breast of mother earth and the "blood of martyrs" had enriched the Southland's soil.

It can truly be said that Birmingham has been reared and attained her majority in these very recent years, and possibly more than any other Southern city illustrates that the South fought for principle and not through animosity, as the children of the war time enemy represent a large part of her citizenship and live in harmony with the progeny of Southern men who fought for the rights of States.

In Birmingham's homes, hotels, public buildings and along the principal thoroughfares and less traveled byways the visitors were welcome guests, although the occasion was especially to do homage to the Confederate heroes.

Only one cloud rested on the Reunion—the very recent passage of the beloved Commander, Gen. Stephen D. Lee—and yet in reflecting on his going to sleep one might contemplate the sinking sun with the comforting knowledge that it is shining elsewhere and will rise in God's own time.

The eighteenth annual Reunion of United Confederate Veterans formally opened in the Birmingham Hippodrome on Tuesday morning, June 9, and during its progress memorable addresses were delivered by Mayor George B. Ward, Governor Comer, Mr. Rufus Rhodes, of the Birmingham News (on behalf of the Sons of Confederate Veterans), Mrs. Charles G. Brown (on behalf of the Alabama U. D. C.), Gen. George P. Harrison, Commander Alabama Division, U. C. V., Gen. W. L. Cabell, Mrs. Cornelia Branch Stone, and others.

Matters of deep import to the U. C. V. and to Sons and Daughters were discussed and settled. Gen. Clement A. Evans, of Atlanta, Ga., was chosen by the convention as Commander in Chief to succeed Gen. Stephen D. Lee. The Convention voted, as usual, by Divisions in proportion to authorized delegates. It was a spirited contest between Gen. W. L. Cabell and General Evans, although the former in an address in the outset declined to compete for the honor.

Memphis, Tenn., was chosen by the Convention as the meeting place for 1909 over Atlanta, although Colonel Lyon, of Georgia, emphasized the fact that Tennessee has had the Reunion four times, while Georgia had been so honored but once.

It is deeply regretted that so much of the Reunion proceedings deserving place in the VETERAN is deferred. Some official papers have not been accessible in time. Of the deferred reports, action by the Jefferson Davis Home Association, of the Confederate Memorial Association, and of the History Committee will have attention in an early issue; while many incidental features will have attention also.

JUNE 3 AT FAIRVIEW, KY.

It was gratifying on June 3, 1908, to be at Fairview, Ky., where Jefferson Davis was born one hundred years before. Sheltered from the severe rain in the beautiful church that he deeded to the Baptists some twenty years before, there was occasion for reminiscences which included the sentimental interest of millions of people. Concern was added to the event because the multitude present were wondering whether there would be action on the part of Southern patriots to secure lands and erect a memorial there.

Dr. C. S. Stuart, one of the speakers on the occasion, whose aunt lived in the Davis home and nursed "little Jeff" and had often told him many things of the distinguished man's childhood days, said: "It seems only reasonable that deep and general interest at home, coupled with yearning hope and expectation, should cause decided action in the premises in honor of the noble character born in our midst. Let us to-day with our united voices resolve ourselves into a Memorial Association, establishing this day, June 3, to one who was born where this stately temple stands."

The speaker then gave a brief review of the great events with which Jefferson Davis was indissolubly connected, saying: "Such a character commends itself to serious consideration." He urged that we teach the rising generation to emulate the noble example, and that an annual memorial service would tend to general exaltation of character.

An interesting address was made by Rev. Millard A. Jenkins, pastor of the Baptist Church in Hopkinsville; but it was devoted rather to the character of the Confederate soldier than to the career of President Davis.

Other addresses and appropriate songs were given. The excessive rain detracted from the excellence of the service, which the day and the place should have made inspiring.

Hon. W. B. Brewer, master of ceremonies, invited the editor of the VETERAN to address the assembly, which he did briefly, expressing gratitude in being present and in calling attention to the interest of millions of people in Fairview on that centennial day of an event that will be of concern to all educated patriots in this great country while history shall be written.

The people of Fairview are deeply interested in the memorial projected, and are liberal-minded in the main toward helping to secure it. The undertaking of the project by the United Confederate Veterans—who succeed in such undertakings, when they transfer the responsibilities to the United Daughters of the Confederacy—insures success.

Mr. Cunningham presented an approved portrait of Jefferson Davis to the Church, and suggested that the date of the presentation be recorded and that it be placed in the pastor's study if not in the auditorium of the church.

STEPHEN DILL LEE.

That there is one "straggler" less in the "great march," and that the splendid Commander in Chief who uttered the prophetic words should have been summoned to reduce the number by answering to the last reveille on the morning of May 28, is a fact that has caused every Confederate heart to throb and every Confederate head to bow low at the passing of a good man.

Knightly gentleman, chivalrous soldier, Christian man, he was beloved by a multitude, and it is a significant fact that his last earthly service before making his final report to the Great Commander was his eloquent greeting to four regiments of Iowa and Wisconsin troops, old-time enemies whom he had not met for forty-five years.

Stephen Lee's heart was pure, his mind and motives dwelt on the mounts of high endeavor, and his being interpreted the truer, deeper meaning of the Christian ideal.

Of the many worthy beautiful tributes to him from the platform and press, none have equaled that manifested at his funeral by students of the Mississippi Agricultural College, at Starkville. General Lee may be regarded as the founder of that college, and was its president for eighteen years. There were perhaps five hundred of these students, many in mature life, while the cadets were the most conspicuous feature of the procession. The general comment by these men who knew him so well was upon his goodness. They seemed to grieve as though he had been their own father.

Stephen D. Lee was born April 22, 1833, in Charleston, S. C. He graduated from the West Point Military Academy in 1854, and was first lieutenant in the 1st Artillery, U. S. A., from 1854 to 1861. He resigned to go with the South; and beginning at captain, his promotions were regular all the way up to lieutenant general. He served acceptably in both armies, first in Virginia and then with the Army of Tennessee. In 1899 he was made Commissioner for the Vicksburg National Park, which position he held until his death. He succeeded Gen. John B. Gordon as Commander in Chief of the United Confederate Veterans in 1904. He left one son, Blewett Lee, now Assistant General Counsel Illinois Central Railroad.

A pathetic illustration of General Lee's determination was shown in his resolution to go to Columbus. When the fatal illness had almost completed its work, he got out of bed, put on his trousers, and said: "I'm going home."

On May 8 a friend of the VETERAN wrote from Columbus a personal letter in which the following appears: "On the 7th and 8th Gen. S. D. Lee addressed our entire Industrial Institute and College on 'The Siege of Vicksburg.'" This was making history alive to them. He did it ably and concluded by a broad, patriotic expression of feeling regarding the other side and our country of to-day.

MOORMAN MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

The many friends of the late Gen. George Moorman, Adjutant General and Chief of Staff U. C. V., from its organization, will be gratified to learn of the organization of an association for the purpose of raising funds for a suitable memorial in his honor, the purpose being to purchase a lot in Metarie Cemetery, New Orleans, and erect the memorial there. General Moorman died in December, 1902, and his remains were temporarily deposited in the vault of the Army of Tennessee tomb; but not having been a member of that organization, the permanent interment had to be elsewhere. General Moorman died a poor man, and the friends who loved and esteemed him wish to honor him with a suitable memorial, for which your contribution will be appreciated. Over $400 has already been promised to the fund, of which there is $104.90 in bank.

The Chairman of the Association is J. A. Harral; Vice Chairman, B. T. Walshe; Secretary, W. T. Blakemore—all of New Orleans. An Executive Committee has also been appointed, and the movement will be carried vigorously forward.

FUND FOR THE ARLINGTON MONUMENT.

Just at press time news comes from Wallace Streater that the Arlington monument fund is still growing. The exact amount is $5,250.92. The list includes $100 from Hon. John Sharp Williams, Yazoo City, Miss.

GEN. JOHN A. LOGAN'S RELATION TO THE UNION.

Much has been written for the VETERAN concerning the relation of Gen. John A. Logan to the South in the beginning of the war, in 1861. Some of these articles have been published with the view of showing that there were those in sympathy with the South who lived across the border.

Mr. Logan was a member of Congress at the time, and so good a Democrat that the Southern people owed him gratitude. He deplored the threatened war, and sought its aversion, just as did the Whigs in the South; but when sectional lines were established, Mr. Logan put on his armor for the defense of the Union, as did Whigs in the South who gave their lives for the Confederacy.

The unhappy mystery about General Logan was in his ultra position against the South in later years. His wife's people were of the South—Cummings of Tennessee—and he might have been a tower of strength in the years of reconstruction; but he wasn't. However, his position for maintaining the Union is so clearly set out in the Congressional Record of April 20, 1881, that the VETERAN accepts it freely.

In a speech on the day in question he said that since 1866 his enemies had persistently pursued him with falsehood concerning his action in 1861. He was "elected to Congress in 1859 as an anti-Lecompton Democrat and not as a Bourbon," according to Senator Hill's intimation in a recent speech. He produced records to show that on January 7, 1861, he fully approved the act of Major Anderson and the course of the President in maintaining all measures to save the Union.

Confederate Veteran.

S. A. CUNNINGHAM, Editor and Proprietor.

Office: Methodist Publishing House Building, Nashville, Tenn.

This publication is the personal property of S. A. Cunningham. All persons who approve its principles and realize its benefits as an organ for Associations throughout the South are requested to commend its patronage and to cooperate in extending its circulation. Let each one be constantly diligent.

OF CONCERN TO YOU IF YOU ARE A SOUTHERNER

Many good friends of the VETERAN seem not to comprehend the responsibility of publications. To avoid their embarrassment, the VETERAN receives and publishes long articles which have sorely taxed its space. The extra pages, required largely in this way, have cost the management during the past six months approximately $1,000. Illustrating the lack of knowledge on these points, the statement is sometimes made that if such an article be published extra copies of the issue will be bought—say, ten or twenty copies—with an article that costs to print from $20 to $50. One man who wanted to publish a series of articles wrote that, if accepted, on receipt of the first paper he would “proceed to send a year’s subscription.” It would save embarrassment if people would before asking for long articles on subjects that are being discussed throughout the land—more than enough of good articles to fill an issue—ascertain from the VETERAN the propriety of procuring such article. Again, impulsive friends will procure photos of the writer or some relative and send to go with the article, and each engraving will cost more than two yearly subscriptions.

It is advised that every paper sent for publication be prepared most carefully and as closely condensed as practicable with scrupulous diligence for the truth. Rigid rules would be exacted in this matter but for the fact that some of our faithful comrades cannot comply. Therefore the appeal is made in faith that those who can prepare legible manuscripts do it in the manner indicated.

VOLUNTEER TO SUBSCRIBE FOR THE VETERAN.

To every Southern family plea is made for patronage. A multitude of people who can easily afford the VETERAN do not take it. Many who are familiar with and enjoy reading it do not subscribe, procuring copies from some neighbor. Many admit that they “ought to take it.” Let such consider its merits and its needs. Try it for a year, read half of the issues; and if it is not accepted as worth the investment, the money will be returned. Subscribe for it and then give it to some one who can’t pay for it, and you will be doubly compensated. For fifteen and a half years it has proven worthy; hence it may be assumed that it is well established and is meritorious. See to it that the VETERAN is in your own home, and, as proposed, the money will be returned if it be not regarded as worth more than the cost.

Personal friends are asked to give this matter immediate attention. There has never been in the South a periodical so long successful, and surely thousands more would enlist as readers if they realized its value and how interesting it is. Some have said: “The war is over, and its issues should be forgotten.” In response to this sentiment, it is stated that for the fifteen years men who fought for the Union have been subscribers, and they are loyal, good friends. Do you feel that for any reason this subject merits your attention?

ANOTHER MATTER OF CONCERN IS ADVERTISING.

The best friends of the VETERAN are surprised at its sparse advertising patronage. Suppose when you order something by mail you suggest advertising in the VETERAN. In truth, it is the best medium in existence for reaching the well-to-do and the rich in every part of the South. The rate is so low that some agencies won’t handle it, the higher rate being to them the larger commission. Ask your merchant at home and elsewhere. The result would amaze you.

Gen. Clement A. Evans, the new Commander in Chief of the U. C. V., wrote April 6, 1908: “I design emphasizing the VETERAN in the Historical Committee’s report, and will refer to the success of the appeal made by Commanders of Brigades, Divisions, Departments, etc., last year. I shall also mention the VETERAN in my Department Orders and ask the Camps to take the matter up thoroughly. It would be a good move to get the United Sons of Confederate Veterans to take up the success of the VETERAN as being now their specific work. It has been founded and sustained by the Veterans, and they desire the Sons and Daughters to carry it forward to complete fulfillment.”

The author of the poem, “The Veteran’s Cross of Honor,” published on page 297 of the VETERAN for June, is H. H. Stevens, of Byhalia, Miss. This statement is made that Comrade Stevens may have due credit for the production.

WORK ON THE SAM DAVIS MONUMENT.

The committee appointed by the Tennessee Legislature with authority to erect the Sam Davis monument on Capitol Hill, in Nashville, is diligently at work now, and expects to have the monument—a bronze statue eight feet high—mounted on a magnificent pedestal. The monument will be more elaborate than the funds in hand warrant, but it is expected that the additional amount will be secured readily.

The funds for this monument come from so broad an area that the committee desires to be able to say that they are from every State and territory in the United States. Let it not be forgotten that the lead in this movement was taken by the Union soldiers who were present at the execution; so every Northern State is desired in the list as well as each of the Southern. There are contributions already from all of the States except Colorado, Delaware, Idaho, Indiana, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, Utah, Vermont, West Virginia, Wisconsin.

GEN. CLEMENT ANSELM EVANS.

The new Commander in Chief of the United Confederate Veterans, Gen. Clement A. Evans, was born and educated in Georgia. He practiced law and served as judge of the county court for some time prior to the Civil War, and in 1859 he was State Senator.

He enlisted promptly in the South’s effort for independence, going to the army in Virginia, and was promoted to major, colonel, and brigadier general, and commanded a division as major general late in the war.

After Lee’s surrender at Appomattox, he returned to Georgia and practiced law. Later he engaged in literary work, and is at present a Prison Commissioner for the State.

In the Veteran organization he commanded the Georgia Division, U. C. V., until the death of General Gordon, when Gen. S. D. Lee was promoted to Commander in Chief, and General Evans was advanced to command of the Army of Tennessee Department, and then at Birmingham he was elected successor to Gen. S. D. Lee.

PRESIDENT C. S. M. A. PRAISES BIRMINGHAM.

In writing of the Birmingham Reunion, Mrs. W. J. Behan, President of the Confederated Southern Memorial Association, states:

"It was one of the finest we have ever had in numbers and enthusiasm. It was equaled only by that of Richmond, Va., in 1907. The Executive Committee deserves the highest praise for the admirable manner in which the crowd was handled and for the generous provision made for the several organizations there in convention.

"The Confederated Southern Memorial Association returns thanks in a special manner to the members of the Executive Committee, to the officers and members of the Pelham Chapter, U. D. C., to his Excellency, Gov. and Mrs. B. B. Comer, and to the Southern and Country Clubs for numerous courtesies extended to us during the convention; to the citizens of Birmingham for their hospitality, to the press for accurate reports of all meetings, and to the Mayor and members of the City Council for use of Council chamber, where our sessions were held daily."

CAREER OF JEFFERSON DAVIS FOR SCHOOLS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Dunbar Rowland, Director Department of Archives and History State of Mississippi, writes from Jackson, Miss., May 27, 1908 to Mrs. W. J. Behan, President Confederated Southern Memorial Association: "I have your letter of the 20th advising me of the generous donation made by the Times-Democrat of a pamphlet bearing on the life of our beloved 'Chieftain of the Confederacy' in which you ask me if I would take charge of the distribution of the pamphlets to the public schools of Mississippi. The performance of such a labor of love is a pleasure to me, and I not only esteem your request as a compliment, but count myself fortunate in being placed in position to do such honorable service to the people; and I assure you that the opportunity of serving the noble organization of which you are the honored head is a pleasure to me as well as a duty."

LOVING CUP TO MISS DAISY M. L. HODGSON.

A very pleasant incident took place in the parlor of the Hillman Hotel on Thursday, June 11, after the veteran parade had been disbanded. It was the presentation of a handsome loving cup to Miss Daisy M. L. Hodgson, Secretary of the Confederated Southern Memorial Association. The loving cup was a testimonial from friends who had learned to love the sweet-mannered, gentle Secretary and who desired to express their appreciation of her efficiency and faithful service for eight years. Miss Hodgson, who was completely taken by surprise, thanked the kind friends who had thus honored her with their friendship, and said laughingly: "If this were not a dry town, we would fill the cup and drink the health of those near and dear to us."

To Mrs. J. C. Lee, of Montgomery, Ala., is due the credit of this happy thought, and it was a cause of general regret that she was prevented by reason of ill health from being present at the presentation. At her request Dr. Thomas M. Owen presented the "testimonial in the name of Mrs. Lee and other friends."

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT OF THE U. D. C. FOR THE SUMMER.—The address of Mrs. Cornelia Branch Stone, President General U. D. C., will be Blue Ridge Springs, Va., from July 1 until October 1. She has removed her office and work to a cooler climate for the summer months.

GEN. CLEMENT A. EVANS, ATLANTA, GA.,
Commander in Chief United Confederate Veterans.

SKETCH OF GEN. STEPHEN D. LEE.

BY GEN. W. L. CABELL.

General Lee was born in the city of Charleston, S. C., September 22, 1833, and had nearly reached his seventy-fifth birthday. He graduated from West Point Military Academy in the class of 1854, in which were many who took leading parts in the great war of the sixties. On the breaking out of hostilities he was at the front, and as an aid on the staff of General Beauregard he bore the notification to Colonel Anderson that fire would be opened on Fort Sumter on the morning of April 12, 1861—the first guns of the great conflict. Thence his promotion was most marked and rapid, passing through all grades till commissioned lieutenant general, June 23, 1864. He enjoyed the distinction of earning the highest commendation in each arm of the service; and so great was the value placed on his ability by the President of the Confederate States that in recommending his promotion from one rank to another Mr. Davis expressed regret that he could not serve in both, as the position from which he was transferred would feel the great loss of his presence.

Since the war, in addition to educating the minds of the young of the South like his great namesake, he, as was the case with his predecessor in the U. C. V., bent his energies to healing the wounds left by the conflict, and there is something peculiarly touching in the fact that his death was brought about by his efforts in this direction. On Friday, two weeks ago, he threw himself with enthusiastic whole-heartedness into the entertainment of the visitors who were at the park in Vicksburg, thereby rendering all most proud and happy; but becoming overheated, complications were brought about which resulted in death. He would have desired no more beautiful end to life.

As a citizen with a character as pure as snow, as a Confederate soldier with a record equal to the best, as a husband, father, and brother measuring up to all the requirements, as an officer and consistent member of the Church, he lived a blameless life, and has gone to his reward universally loved and respected, leaving another great break in the ranks of the United Confederate Veterans.

GEN. S. D. LEE AS THE VETERANS PASSED IN REVIEW AT LOUISVILLE REUNION, JUNE 16, 1905.

GEN. W. L. CABELL'S APPEAL FOR ORGANIZATION.

My old comrades, I greet you with a sad heart full of love and affection. Noble sons of these brave old gray-headed men, I greet you also with love and affection. I appeal to you by the memory of your brave fathers and brothers who died on the battlefield, in prison, or from wounds to organize! I appeal to you by the memories of the sufferings and hardships borne by the noble women of the South—your mothers and sisters, who with tears on their cheeks will tell you with pride of the heroism of the husband and brothers—to organize! In the name of all that is dear to our past history, be ready to take the place of the old gray-headed men who are the heroes of more than a hundred battles. Be ready.

Noble Daughters of the Confederacy, I greet you with a heart full of love, admiration, and affection. Continue your glorious mission. Beautiful young women of our Southland, proud daughters of the noblest women that ever lived in any country or in any age, I greet you with the heart of an old Confederate soldier, and I urge you to continue your good work and encourage your brothers and other young men to remain steadfast and true to the memories of the past. I heard that grand old soldier, Gen. Bernard E. Bee, a son of glorious old South Carolina, at the battle of Bull Run say to his men, "Stand steady, boys, stand steady," when the Federal bullets were flying thick and fast.

"Remember the Alamo," was the battle cry of the Texans at the battle of San Jacinto. Then let the battle cry of the young men and women of the South be: "Remember the heroism of our fathers. Remember the loyalty, patriotism, and suffering of our mothers."

City of Birmingham, glorious Alabama, in behalf of my old comrades I lay at your feet the thanks of grateful hearts.

OFFICIAL TRIBUTE TO GEN. S. D. LEE.

Mr. William T. Rigby, Chairman of the Vicksburg National Military Park Commission, wrote as follows from Vicksburg, Miss., May 28, 1908:

"To the Honorable Secretary of War—Sir: It is my sad duty to report that Commissioner Lieut. Gen. Stephen Dill Lee died in this city at six o'clock this morning. The country has lost a good and great citizen and each member of the Commission a dear friend. His last public utterance, an address of welcome to the Union Veterans of Lawler's Brigade, assembled in reunion on the battlefield last Friday afternoon, the 22d, was an inspiration to love of country and devotion to its service."

COL. E. L. RUSSELL, ORATOR OF THE OCCASION.

[Gen. Stephen D. Lee, Commander in Chief, had selected Col. E. L. Russell, of Mobile, as the Reunion orator, and he was on hand to comply. His address, it will be seen, was different to what it would have been had General Lee lived.]

COLONEL RUSSELL'S ADDRESS.

Commander and Comrades: It is with the greatest diffidence and misgiving that I undertake to perform the duties assigned to me by our late Commander in Chief, so as to meet your expectations. I recognize my unfitness for the performance of these sacred duties; and when General Lee invited me to be the orator on this occasion, I frankly wrote him that it was impossible for a variety of reasons, and positively declined to speak to you at this Reunion. General Lee then wrote me a very earnest letter, urging me to reconsider. It was so earnest and full of affection that I could not gracefully further refuse to do as he wished. After reading his letter, I wired him that I had reconsidered and would accept the appointment. He then wrote me the following letter:

"COLUMBUS, MISS., March 14, 1908.

"Col. E. L. Russell, My Dear Comrade: I have your telegram of March 13, saying that at my earnest personal request you had reconsidered your declination to deliver the oration to the veterans at Birmingham and would make the address.

"I write to thank you, for I had my heart set on your doing this last military duty for me, and did not feel like failing. With kindest wishes for you and Mrs. Russell, I am sincerely your comrade and friend,

STEPHEN D. LEE."

It is useless to say to you that I value this letter above gems and diamonds. General Lee was acquainted with my record as a Confederate soldier. He knew that I was appointed color bearer of a Mississippi regiment by Gen. Jake Sharp, who lived in the same city as General Lee, Columbus.

I have read you General Lee's letter in order that you might look upon my shortcomings with forbearance and indulgence. Whether I come up to the standard of past orations or not, I shall always feel happy that I accepted the last request of the matchless and fearless soldier, our worthy Commander, General Lee.

The death of our brilliant Commander compelled me to change my entire speech to be made on this occasion. My close personal relations with General Lee for the past thirty years have been such that I feel it my duty to speak to you about my knowledge of his character, not only as a soldier, but as a Christian citizen. In his conduct and intercourse with his fellow-men, his comrades, and the young men of the country his example in support of the Christian religion was as peerless as that of Gen. Robert E. Lee. We have every reason not only to admire the character of Gen. Stephen D. Lee as a soldier, but such was his character as both soldier and citizen as to excite the admiration and pride of every Southern man and woman.

Comrades, we meet surrounded by a pall of gloom and sorrow. Only a few days ago our incomparable Commander was in full health, heroically and patriotically discharging the important duties that had been confided to his trust by the President of the United States.

General Lee lived at Columbus, Miss., a point on the Mobile and Ohio railroad [Colonel Russell has for many years been president and manager of that road]; hence this gave me the opportunity of seeing much of him during the past thirty years, and such has been my occupation that it has brought me into personal contact with a great many of the leading men of this country during the period of time above mentioned—soldiers and statesmen and business men of large affairs—and I can truthfully state that in my opinion Gen. Stephen D. Lee was the most conscientious man, both as a soldier and as a citizen, that I ever saw. Often have we sat and talked over the campaigns and battles that we fought. He was a lieutenant general, commanding a corps, and I was a private until appointed color bearer of a Mississippi regiment, which under the act of the Confederate Congress caused me to rank as a first lieutenant.

The first time I ever saw General Lee was near Atlanta two or three days after the bloody battle of what is known as the "22d day of July, 1864." This battle was fought east of Atlanta, and it was during this engagement that General McPherson, who commanded the left wing of Sherman's army, was killed. You will recall that President Davis removed Gen. Joseph E. Johnston and appointed Gen. John B. Hood as his successor to take command of the army. General Hood had been our corps commander, and on his promotion Gen. Stephen D. Lee as a lieutenant general was appointed to take command of our corps, which was Hood's old corps. He appealed to our patriotism and referred with pride to the record that the troops composing the corps had made.

On the night of the 27th of July, 1864, he marched Hindman's Division of the corps through Atlanta to a point on the extreme wing of Hood's army. My recollection is that it was about eight miles southwest of Atlanta. On the morning of the 28th of July Hindman's Division, to which I belonged, under the direction of General Lee, assaulted the right wing of Sherman's army. After two hours of fierce and bloody fighting, we, having failed to drive the enemy from his position, were withdrawn to the top of a ridge from the point where we had started. General Lee then re-formed us and supplied us with ammunition, and then ordered us to renew the assault, but to move farther to our left and the enemy's right. In this assault we succeeded in turning the enemy's right, and were pressing them back when we came suddenly into contact with an entirely fresh corps of the enemy's troops. We were not in condition to fight fresh troops, for the reason that we had been fighting for five or six hours, and the day was one of the hottest I ever experienced. We were without any water, and on account of the thirst and heat our tongues were swollen so as to protrude from our mouths.

I can see before me now as plain as on that day the fresh corps of troops pressing down upon us with their magnificent silk flags emblazoned with great golden eagles. They outflanked us, and of course gradually drove us back to the ridge from which we had originally started. On reaching this position we were so exhausted and broken to pieces as to be unable to hold the ridge against fresh troops. General Lee had foreseen from the time we struck the fresh troops what would be the result, and had immediately collected and concentrated about sixty 12-pound brass Napoleon guns and had them planted on a ridge, so that as soon as we passed behind them he could open fire upon the confident advancing column of the enemy. We took position on the side of a ridge behind the artillery, where we were comparatively out of danger. General Lee was on his horse with his sword drawn, holding it in the air and riding back and forth from one end of this great battery of artillery to the other. He was directing the fire of the guns and encouraging his men. The gunners fell thick and fast, but their places were filled immediately; and I do not believe there is a case in history where artillery was more successfully and courageously employed to drive back a victorious army. General Lee looked like the God of War. I can see his face now, positively radiant, as he had these guns to mow down the enemy and check the assault. I expected to see him fall every minute, but the God of battles protected him and spared his life to his country and countrymen. This unequal contest continued for an hour, when he finally succeeded in breaking the enemy's ranks and driving them from the field with his artillery.

The next time I saw General Lee in battle was on the field at Jonesboro. You are all familiar with that terrible and bloody assault that he made upon Logan's Corps. When we struck the enemy's breastworks with the guns under the logs not more than a foot apart, they opened fire upon us, and our troops went down like grain before a scythe. Never did I witness such destruction of life, and those that were left were within forty feet of the breastworks and stood there stubbornly and fought while being shot down without the prospect of accomplishing anything. Again General Lee collected seventy-five or one hundred pieces of artillery, and prevented Logan from capturing the railroad to Augusta.

I served under General Lee the remainder of the war and saw a great deal of him. He was one of the soldiers that refused to take intoxicants. At that time he was as true a specimen of the follower of the meek and lowly Saviour as was to be found throughout our country. Of course you will take proper action to express the affection and admiration that you and every Confederate soldier entertain for Gen. Stephen D. Lee. Our country has sustained a great loss. He was a useful man, full of intense love of old Confederates and his people with whom he lived. There never was a time since the war but that he was perfectly willing to give his life to redeem them from the horrors of reconstruction. Peace to his ashes!

Now, comrades, I will devote a few moments to speaking of the Confederate soldier. It is unnecessary to consume time in discussing the question whether or not the South was justified in appealing to arms to secure the constitutional rights that our fathers had coined out of their sacrifices, hardships, and own blood for our benefit. The world now concedes that they were perfectly justified in going to war. The abolition party, led by the Hon. William H. Seward, had years before the Southern States indulged in secession announced what he was pleased to call "the higher law." He and his followers contended that there was a law higher than the Constitution, higher than the acts of Congress, and that these higher laws had to take the place of the Constitution, which had for their purpose robbing the South, of the property which represented the sweat and toil of the Southern people for a hundred years, although it was jealously guarded by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Of course the announcement of the higher law was to all intents and purposes revolutionary; and when this party had secured control of the government, it was perfectly natural for the Northern people to assume that the higher law would be put into operation and that it would displace all of our constitutional rights and thus deprive us of legitimate and legal property.

This left the South the option of following one of two courses: First, the Southern people had the right to remain in the Union and draw their swords in preservation of its honor and of its Constitution and laws; second, they had the right, which had been reserved by each State, to withdraw from the Union. They chose the latter course. Whether this was wise or not, it is now not necessary to discuss.

The Southern army was composed of citizens that had enjoyed a peculiar civilization. It was altogether dissimilar in its customs and practices from the civilization of our Northern neighbors. They were a commercial people and a seafaring people, and consequently had different environments, politically and socially, from the Southern people. The Southern people were an agricultural people. They lived at home. They were trained to ride wild horses, use firearms in the chase, and to lead an outdoor life that tended to make them absolutely independent and rather disposed to be arbitrary. Now when the war was precipitated between the States, these Southern men volunteered, and the Southern army was composed of just such a class of citizens. They never had been in the habit of observing any self-restraint or having any power above them to restrain them from doing what they thought was honorable and legitimate. They volunteered, made up their own messes, and never was any army that had more intelligent discipline than the Southern army. These men promptly and cheerfully submitted to every hardship in the camp, on the march, and on the battlefield.

The esprit de corps and morale of the Southern army was equal to any that had ever been organized, and another singular feature connected with that army was that these men were allowed to elect their own field officers, lieutenants, captains, majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels of the regiments, and I challenge history to furnish a parallel where the field officers of any army were superior to those of the Confederate army, although elected by the free ballot of the soldiers themselves. These officers understood their men. They never resorted to cruel and brutal methods to control them. It was not necessary. Their hearts were in the cause, and life to them was not considered when the question of duty was involved. The record of the Confederate soldier was equal to that of any to be found in history. He fought battles that will be the wonder of mankind as long as the world lasts, and that under adverse circumstances, hunger, lack of clothing, and with inferior equipment except where he took it from the enemy.

Comrades, you have the right to be proud of your career as soldiers. The young men and the young women of the South have the right to have their hearts thrill with pride and admiration when the Confederate soldier is even mentioned.

Our comrades lie upon the hillsides of Gettysburg, amid the brambles and briars of the Wilderness. Comrades, the flowers that bloom in the spring on the beautiful plains of Perryville, among the rocks and cedar brakes around Murfreesboro, on the rugged hillsides of Chickamauga, or on the banks of the rippling waters of Harper's Creek are crimsoned with the blood of our comrades.

And now, comrades, a word of tribute to our Southern women, God bless them! Our Southern girls, who had been accustomed to wearing imported bonnets and dresses, were reduced to the extremity of having to go to their mother's looms to weave for themselves homespun cloth out of which to fashion their garments, and then go to their fathers' oat fields to gather straw and with their own deft fingers weave themselves oat straw bonnets. You have seen them thus appareled, and I know that you will agree with me in saying that they looked as sweet, as beautiful, as refined and cultured as any queen that ever sat upon a throne.

During a banquet given to Admiral Luce and his officers in this city some years ago I said to Admiral Luce, who at that time commanded the North Atlantic squadron: "Admiral, our young women had to wear homespun dresses and oat straw bonnets; but when I looked into their clear, beautiful blue or black eyes, I felt a strange sentiment come over me. Perhaps you have felt it, Admiral?" "O yes, I have felt it, and I want to feel it again," he said. I said: "Admiral, I have come to the conclusion that the character of the dress or the bonnet does not have anything to do with causing these strange but pleasing sensations." He replied: "None in the world, Russell, none in the world."

In conclusion, comrades, we are to be congratulated in having a reunited country. The passions and prejudices engendered by the war, as far as the soldiers are concerned on both sides, have disappeared. We have one country and one flag, and none are more loyal in the support of that flag than the ex-Confederate soldiers.

When you cross the river, comrades, you will rest in the shade on the other side, and will again in the spirit land be comrades of Gen. Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Stephen D. Lee, and our other comrades that have gone before.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS ON GEN. S. D. LEE.

DELIVERED BY W. A. MONTGOMERY, EDWARDS, MISS.

Commander, Comrades, Ladies and Gentlemen: Death of our beloved ones at any time is sad. Day by day the gray line of Confederate veterans is being thinned out by the scythe of time, and we know that ere long every one of us will have answered to the last roll call of earth. We drop a tear upon the graves of those who fall, and hearts of love go out in tenderest sympathy for those who survive. To-day the climax is reached, as we mourn for him who but for that summons would have presided over this gathering.

Stephen D. Lee is no more in life. He has crossed over the river and rests under the shade of the trees with Stonewall Jackson and associates, that glorious galaxy of Christian Confederate soldiers who have passed over before and whose deeds have made them immortal in Confederate memories. But his life and character will live so long as men love the great and good of earth, so long as heroes are admired and patriots are honored. His life's work stands out prominent for all that goes to make up a well-rounded character. Whether we see him leading his charging battalions where none but heroes dare to go, where the shriek of the shell and whistle of Minies tell that death is claiming the bravest and best, or whether we see him in Anglo-Saxon caucuses of a defeated people devising means in their extremity to preserve the integrity of a race who glory in their ancestral blood and are proud of the mighty deeds of their forefathers; whether sitting in the legislative halls of his State making laws for the government of a people or directing the youth of the land in her classic halls to higher and nobler living; whether in public invoking the blessing of God upon the people and country or at the family altar asking the direction of Providence for himself and his own loved ones—his impress has been left and his country has been blessed and made better.

May I not therefore, before presenting the resolutions that I have prepared by order of the General that assumed command of this organization in his stead, say a few words of the life of our dead chieftain? Born in Charleston, S. C., in September, 1833; educated at West Point Military Academy, where he graduated in the class of 1854; served the United States government faithfully on the frontier and in her petty wars until he resigned his commission as lieutenant and tendered his services to his native State when peaceable secession seemed impossible.

As a Confederate soldier we see him first at Fort Sumter hearing the demand of General Beauregard for Major Anderson to surrender that fort—which demand being refused, there soon is heard the first gun of that war for State rights and constitutional liberty. As the scene changes we see this son of South Carolina on Virginia's fields in command of the batteries in Hampton's famous legion, defending the Southland from the armed invasion of the North.

Promoted to major of artillery in November, 1861, to lieutenant colonel the same year, he took part and won distinction at Williamsburg, Seven Pines, and in the seven days' fight around Richmond and along the Chickahominy. He soon demonstrated that he was a born artilleryist. He dragged his wearied horses and men through the mud and water, marching and countermarching with Magruder, and so kept up a constant artillery fire upon the enemy that he held them south of the Chickahominy. There his daring maneuvers at Savage Station and Malvern Hill placed him in the line of promotion, which he received soon afterwards.

At Sharpsburg he won renewed distinction, as he had done at Second Manassas with his boy battalion of artillery, where his magnificent service in the very nick of time brought from Mr. Davis the declaration: "I have reason to believe that he turned the tide of battle and consummated a victory." He always said that it was his "gallant boys of the batteries that placed the wreath around his stars." At Sharpsburg he was moved to tears as he rode up in the heat of the fight to his "boy battery" from Richmond, Va., under Capt. W. W. Parker, and found thirty of them dead or wounded around their guns and the remnant obeying the commands of their officers as gallantly as if on dress parade. After the battle of Sharpsburg, Mr. Davis asked Gen. Robert E. Lee to select his most efficient and accomplished artillery officer for duty on the Mississippi, and Col. S. D. Lee was ordered to report to Richmond, where on November 6, 1862, he was commissioned as brigadier general and sent to Vicksburg.

On the 29th of December following the battle of Chickasaw Bayou was fought, and S. D. Lee commanded the troops that received the assault of Sherman, whose army, according to official reports, consisted of thirty-two thousand men, besides the whole Federal naval squadron on the Mississippi, being at the mouth of the Yazoo River. Lee with twenty-seven hundred men drove him back after he (Sherman) had sustained a loss, according to official returns, of 1,652 men.

At Champion Hill on May 16, 1863, he was conspicuous for his gallantry in attempting to rally the Confederate forces after the repulse of General Stevenson's Division. Three horses paid the penalty of his personal daring.

It was on this field that I first met him. After the fall of Vicksburg, he was soon exchanged and promoted to major general and placed in command of all the cavalry of the department. This was in August, 1863. While in this position I made many reports to him as a scout, and on the famous raid of General Sherman to Meridian in the winter of 1864 I became intimately associated with and learned to love him, and my admiration for him grew stronger and stronger until the day of his death. At Ezra Church on July 28, 1864, when the tide of battle seemed to turn against him I saw him ride to the color bearer of a South Carolina regiment and, taking the flag, seek to advance it himself, when our distinguished comrade here, Gen. C. I. Walker, said to him: "General Lee, I am the lieutenant colonel of this regiment. Give me that flag, tell me where you want it planted, and it shall be done." We see him again at Nashville holding Overton Hill till the left and center of our army is driven back. And again the next day, the day of the retreat, we see him severely wounded in the foot as he meets charge after charge of Wilson's Cavalry. He surrendered when the army of Johnston capitulated as the commander of a corps. His military career was ended. His chieftain, Mr. Davis, said of him: "He was a great and good soldier."

Great as was Stephen D. Lee in war, he was greater still in peace. I served a session with him in the Mississippi Senate before he took charge of the State A. and M. College. His wise counsel and splendid services as a citizen did much in helping us in our defeat to rise above the calumny of our enemies and stand before the world in peace, as we had stood in war, the greatest citizen soldiery who ever trod the earth, the greatest people who ever suffered defeat.

I saw him on May 22, before he died on the 28th, standing upon the historic field of Vicksburg in front of the remnant of the Iowa Regiment that assaulted and crossed the breast-works of which he had command forty-five years before, when he made the grandest speech of his life, sending conviction to those men that he was a true and patriotic American citizen, loyal to his country, and proud of her achievements; but bade them "remember that he and his comrades fought for constitutional government as it had been taught them by their fathers and defended homes and American liberty, and that a united country would learn that she was not the loser by the sacrifices we had made." We loved him in life and are true to his memory in death. As he commanded the respect of a nation who placed her flags at half-mast on the day of his funeral, so he commands our regard; therefore be it

Resolved: 1. That this organization of United Confederate Veterans do hereby express to the world and to each other our esteem for him by rising with bowed heads. We feel deeply our loss. The South has been deprived of a knightly defender, the whole country of a patriotic citizen, and Mississippi of an adopted son of whom she was justly proud.

2. We declare our love for him as a Christian gentleman and citizen, whose life and character we commend to the generations who are to follow us as worthy of emulation. He was a man without guile, true to every duty that devolved upon him, and filling the Psalmist's description of a citizen of Zion: "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbor."

3. We admired him as a soldier worthy of the cause for which he fought and bled, and as one of our comrades whose rise to distinction entitles him to be honored by the true soldiers of our country for all the years that are to come; the embodiment of chivalry, as knightly as any soldier who followed the banner of Charlemagne or planted the Roman eagle on conquered turret or tower, whose courteous manner to every foe challenged the admiration of his enemies.

4. We cherish his memory, so full of love for his fellow-men, fired with so much zeal for the uplifting of the youth of our land, so tender in manner toward his loved ones, beloved by them and by us. We tender our deepest sympathies to his family with the cheering comfort of having so glorious a heritage as to be the descendants of Stephen D. Lee.

5. That the Adjutant General be requested to communicate these resolutions to the Camps and send a copy to his family. Their adoption was made by rising vote.

GREETING PREPARED BY GEN. S. D. LEE.

[The following address was prepared by Gen. Stephen D. Lee shortly before his fatal illness to be made by him at the Birmingham Reunion; but fate decreed that this last greeting, which throbs with the noblest sentiments of which the human heart is capable, should be delivered by another. These parting words of the beloved leader of the Confederate hosts will be cherished by every survivor of the Confederate cause so long as one remains to pay tribute to those who have fallen.]

TEXT OF GENERAL LEE'S ADDRESS.

It is now fourteen years since the Confederate Veterans enjoyed the hospitality of this Magic City. We remember gratefully the courtesy of our former unsurpassed welcome, but to-day we are ready to believe that Birmingham can surpass itself. Then there was with us the incomparable Gordon, soldier, statesman, and orator, who along with the valorous Longstreet and the gallant Wheeler were Alabama's Paladins in the armies of the Confederacy. It was from Alabama that Yancey's voice, like a silver trumpet, called the South to arms with an eloquence more potent than Clan Alpine's fiery cross. Alabama was the cradle of the Confederacy. Here was installed the provisional government of the new nation, and here her illustrious chief took the oath of office which no man but himself was ever to take. And from Alabama came the great admiral who floated the stars and bars upon every sea and single-handed swept the nation's commerce from the waves.

Since the war I have heard many addresses to Confederate Veterans. Our orators have been rich in arguments to demonstrate the correctness of State rights views and the soundness of the interpretation of the Constitution held by Southern statesmen. They have displayed the firm historic basis of our political faith; they have spoken in comforting words of unexpected beneficent results of the war, of the preservation of the rights of the States in the Union, of the discipline of adversity which prepared us to meet the terrible race problem with unflinching courage, indefatigable patience, and united strength; they have taught us that the Confederate cause was not wholly lost, that the best fruits of the great conflict came to the South when the master was freed from the slave, and the old icebergs of sectional hate were set adrift in the warm gulf stream of a new national patriotism.

Nevertheless it has not seemed the whole truth to me that the Confederate soldier went into battle to vindicate a constitutional argument. He went to war because he loved his people, because his country was invaded, because his heart was throbbing for his hearthstone. Here was the land which gave him birth; here was his childhood's home; here were the graves of his dead; here was the church spire where he had learned it was not all of life to live nor all of death to die. No hostile foot should ever tread this consecrated ground except over his dead body. It was the prospect of invasion that made the men of the border States with bleeding hearts go and cast their lot with the Confederacy. He who could have expected a Lee to do battle against Virginia or a Hampton to draw his sword against South Carolina has never learned the language of the human heart. Nothing but the most devoted love of country could ever have sustained the Confederate soldier in his unequal and terrible struggle.

It was not necessary to find a reward for the Confederate soldier in unexpected good results of the great conflict. The reward of noble actions lies in the capacity to do them. The Confederate soldier who fought with unflinching courage had the reward of being a brave man. He who loved his country had the reward of being a true patriot. He who faced the cannon's mouth for those he loved dearer than life had the reward of being a hero. He who was faithful unto death had the reward of a stainless honor. What other course could a Southerner have taken?

Behind him were the great traditions of his English race. There were Hastings and Cressy and Agincourt; there were Naseby, Blenheim, and Quebec; there were King's Mountain and Valley Forge. In his veins flowed the blood of a thousand years of chivalry. He could face the line of fire, but not the shame of standing back.

"All merit comes
From facing the unequal;
All glory comes from daring to begin.

Fame loves the State
That, reckless of the sequel, Fights long and well, whether it lose or win."

"If it might be imagined," said Seneca, "that the Almighty should take off his thought from the care of his whole work, what more glorious spectacle could he reflect upon than a valiant man struggling with adverse fortune?"

Not long ago I read from an English review these words: "When all is done that man could do and all is done in vain, the human heart goes out to the weaker side, to the soldiers who fought on ragged and starving to the bitter, inevitable end, to the leaders who would never admit that hope was lost, and to the noble women of the South who gave of their bravest and their best without a murmur."

"States are not great, except as men shall make them; Men are not great, except they do and dare."

These men fell bleeding and with broken swords before the altar of their country. Their reward was the imperishable knighthood of their service. I imagine that the knights of the Holy Grail never sought other reward than just to serve. The Confederate soldier was the flower of noble and heroic courage. Duty laid her kiss upon his brow and love of country folded him in her arms. He enriched the world in honor; he added to the spiritual riches of mankind. The memory of his deeds is the treasure of his people, incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. No noble action is ever lost, no brave deed shall ever pass away. They are written upon the everlasting pages of the universe, they are inscribed upon the heart of God. The mountains and hills shall be made low and there shall be no more sea, but nothing of moral worth shall perish. Upon the coral of such lives as these God's islands lift "their fronded palms in air." But if religion were superstition and faith were folly, if death ends all and icy night awaits the world, these men lived the only life fit to be lived.

To those who keep alive in loyal hearts the memory of the Confederate dead I would say these men chose the noblest part. This is the best life offers any man: to strive for the highest, the greatest, the bravest that he knows. Is it not better to achieve these things, even at the cost of life itself, than to purchase length of days by mean and sordid living, by cowardice or craft, by surrender of the fine ideals of manhood in base compliance to dishonor? In the heart of every man the everlasting has made answer. If the cause failed, the men were not lost. Looking beyond the little span of human life into the white light of eternity, what better could we have wished for the Confederate soldier than to have played his part as he did? He has left heroic memories that chasten and purify the hearts of all who shall come after him. He has lifted life above the low level of the commonplace into the realm of precious and immutable things, which abide above all change, beyond the reach of years.

The story of the dying Sidney, who gave his glass of water to a wounded soldier, saying, "Thy necessity is greater than mine," is one of the fine memories of the English race. I would that the pen of Milton or Gibbon were mine, that I might place beside it the story of Pat Cleburne at Franklin as he drew off his boots to place them on the bleeding feet of a comrade and then rode on to lead the fatal charge! He fell near the breastworks of the enemy, saying: "I'm killed, boys; but fight it out!"

"Far out on the crest of the battle,
 Up, up toward the death—
 'To die for one's country is sweet!' he remembered,
 And then, out of breath,
 Met the shock and the pain and the terror
 Unflinching, and knew
 In one instant's unbearable brightness
 It was true! It was true!"

Of him also it might have been written:

"Right in the van on the red rampart's slippery swell,
 With hearts that beat a charge, he fell
 Forward, as fits a man;
 But the high soul burns on to light men's feet
 Where death for noble ends makes dying sweet."

The old masterful type of Southern statesmen passed away with slavery. Whatever may be said of that institution, it trained men for leadership and government. The presence of the bondman wrought in the master a love of liberty which has been the portion of Southern men for so many years. May it be the lot of our children to perform the duty of freemen in a republic with as willing hearts as ours, but at no such fearful cost!

The reason why I have this hope that the old-time Southerner shall live once more is because the Southern boys love and cherish the freedom and a sense of honor that will never be surpassed. Wonderful men those old Southerners were: great in counsel, great in battle, but greater than all in the integrity which felt dishonor like a wound. They would have fallen upon the sordid plunderers which in later times have infested public life like Elijah upon the prophets of Baal. I cherish the hope that our Southern blood will produce the type again; that with renewed prosperity we will again introduce into public life a class of men able and willing to devote themselves with pure and unwavering fidelity to the public service. The deeds of their ancestors they do not forget. The ideals of the fathers are real to the sons. The homage these young men pay to us old Confederates is sweet to our declining years, but sweetest of all because it bespeaks a love for the dreams which we cherished and a willingness to die for them if need be.

The story is told of Bertrand Du Guesclin, the national hero of France, that just before his death he succeeded in the reduction of a fortress. The commander refused to surrender to any but Du Guesclin himself. So the body of the great leader was laid upon his bier, and the stern defender gave his fortress boys into the hands of the dead. There have been brave soldiers and pure statesmen since the days of the sixties; brave sailors, too, as none better than Alabama knows; but the keys of our Southern hearts were laid long ago in the hands of Robert E. Lee and Jefferson Davis.

These two great souls before they passed from us gave us the same counsel. They advised us to accept loyally the results of the war and to devote ourselves to the upbuilding of our wasted country. That counsel was accepted. The Confederate soldier has given to the government at Washington the same faithful support which he gave to the government at Richmond. His patriotism has expanded its boundaries without losing its quality. He yields to no man in his love of the whole country and his devotion to her cause. In the war with Spain he gave proof that his sword was not asleep. It is all his country wherever the flag floats which his ancestors filled with stars. That he has rebuilt the prosperity of the South, that he has restored the commercial majesty of this glorious land, this great city is witness. The brain of a Confederate soldier conceived it, and the hands of Confederate soldiers have been busy in its work. They served their country in peace as in war. They point their children to the busy, happy, prosperous land, beautiful as the dawn, strong in developing resources, rich in promise of all that makes a State, and say:

"Behold our greatest victory!
 They loved their land
 With love far brought
 From out the storied past and used Within present, but transferred Through future time by power of thought."

We old soldiers are sitting in the twilight of life waiting for the evening detail, waiting for the shining angel

"With things like chevrons on his wings."

We are the stragglers in the great march. The victory is already won, and our comrades expect our coming to share the glory of their triumph. In the little time left us before we report to our great Commander let us acquit ourselves like men. When the pale sergeant comes, we shall listen for voices in the upper air saying: "Welcome, comrade! Do they love us still in Dixie?"

DO THEY LOVE US STILL IN DIXIE?

(Answer by Emmet Rodwell Calhoun, Birmingham, Ala.)

Do they love you still in Dixie?
 Ah, how they love you still!
 The deathless courage of your lives
 Makes every true heart thrill
 And beat with loving warmth and pride
 At deeds so nobly done;
 So shall it be throughout the years
 Till quick and dead are one.

Do they love you still in Dixie?
 Ah, could you have a doubt
 That Dixie sons of Dixie sires
 Would ever turn about
 And worship at a lesser shrine
 Than that you raised so high?
 Its matchless glory cannot wane,
 Its stars yet pierce the sky.

Do they love you still in Dixie?
 Ah, can they e'er forget
 How nobly strove those ranks of gray
 When Hope's fair sun had set,
 And bleeding died their cause to save,
 Nor dying won the day,
 Though cause more just man ne'er has known
 Or deadlier yet the fray?

Yes, we love you still in Dixie!
 You and your sweethearts, too,
 For your sweethearts are our mothers—
 Can you doubt that we are true?
 Though your ranks now fast are melting
 And the Stars and Bars are furled,
 Yet the South will live forever
 In the glory of your world.

JEFFERSON DAVIS—A JUDICIAL ESTIMATE.

BY BISHOP CHARLES B. GALLOWAY, JACKSON, MISS.

[The following address by Bishop Galloway is not given in full, but such parts of it as apply directly to the great character of Mr. Davis. Let every man and woman who reads it be warned in advance that it is without extravagance of praise. The editor was blessed with a cordial personal friendship with the man, and believes that the able and distinguished Bishop has in no instance made an extravagant statement.

BISHOP GALLOWAY.

"When the roll is called up yonder," one of the brightest stars will answer to the call for Jefferson Davis. Read this address without prejudice. The VETERAN would be glad for its readers to give the Bishop their approval.]

The unanswered question in England for two hundred and forty years was: "Shall Cromwell have a statue?" It required nearly two and a half centuries for public opinion to reach a just estimate of the most colossal figure in English history. The great Lord Protector died at Whitehall and was laid to rest with royal honors in Westminster Abbey. But when the monarchy was restored and Charles II. ascended the throne, his body was disinterred, gibbeted at Tyburn Hill, and buried under the gallows, the head being placed on Westminster Hall. Now a magnificent statue of the great Oliver stands opposite where his head was exposed to the jeers of every passer-by—England's sane and final estimate of the mightiest man who ever led her legions to victory or guided the course of her civil history. In this new world events move faster, popular passion cools quicker, and calm judgment more speedily reascends its sacred throne. After only forty years since the Civil War, the nation's estimate of Jefferson Davis, the Oliver Cromwell of our constitutional crisis, has almost entirely changed, and points to the not far-off day when no place in our Federal Capitol will be too conspicuous for his heroic statue. Mr. Davis can no more be understood by reading the heated columns of the political newspapers and historical writers of times immediately succeeding the Civil War than Oliver Cromwell could be judicially interpreted by the obsequious litterateurs of the reign of Charles II.

Mr. Davis had his limitations, and was not without his measure of human faults and frailties; but he also had extraordinary gifts and radiant virtues and a brilliant genius that ranked him among the mightiest men of the centuries. He made mistakes because he was mortal, and he excited antagonisms because his convictions were stronger than his tactful graces; but no one who knew him and no dispassionate student of his history ever doubted the sincerity of his great soul or the absolute integrity of his imperial purpose. * * *

While I would not needlessly stir the embers of settled strife or reopen the grave of buried issues or by a word revive the bitter memories of a stormy past, it is due the truth of history that the fundamental principles for which our fathers contended should be often reiterated, in order that the purpose which inspired them may be correctly estimated and the purity of their motives be abundantly vindicated.

If the condition of affairs in 1860 be thoroughly understood and one has a clear and accurate knowledge of the nature and character of the Federal government, together with the rights of the States under the Constitution, we need not fear the judgments that may be formed and the conclusions that will be reached. * * *

Upon his weary shoulders have been piled the sins of the South, and he has been execrated as the archtraitor of American politics. * * *

I know there is a certain glamour that gathers about a military hero which commands admiration and calls for extravagant laudation. One who braves the shout of battle and wins the chaplet of victory is unconsciously invested with a halo more brilliant than the crown of any civilian, however marvelous his gifts or magnificent his achievements or immortal the results of his public labors. People will applaud the returning conqueror while they forget the founder of an empire or the author of a nation's constitution. * * * In the North he was charged with everything, from the sin of secession to the "horrors of Andersonville" and the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. In the South he was held accountable for everything, from the failure to capture Washington after the first battle of Manassas to the unsuccessful return of the peace commission and the surrender of Lee's tattered legions at Appomattox. * * *

The son of a gallant revolutionary soldier and with the finest strain of Welsh blood flowing in his generous veins, Jefferson Davis was born in the State of Kentucky. In infancy he was brought by his father to Mississippi. At the county school he was prepared for Transylvania College, from which at the age of sixteen he passed to the United States Military Academy at West Point. In that institution he was distinguished as a student and a gentleman, and in due time was graduated with high honor.

Jefferson Davis began life well. He had a clean boyhood, with no tendency to vice or immorality. That is the universal testimony of neighbors, teachers, and fellow-students. He grew up a stranger to deceit and a lover of the truth. He formed no evil habits that he had to correct, and forged upon himself no chains that he had to break. His nature was as transparent as the light that shone about him, his heart was as open as the soft skies that bent in benediction over his country home, and his temper as sweet and cheery as the limpid stream that made music in its flow through the neighboring fields and forests.

Graduating from West Point in 1828, he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the regular army, and spent seven laborious years in the military service, chiefly in the middle Northwest, and had some conspicuous part in the Black Hawk War. In 1835 Lieutenant Davis resigned from the regular army, married the charming daughter of Gen. Zachary Taylor, and settled on his Mississippi plantation to follow the luxurious, literary life of a cultured Southern gentleman. But the untimely death in a few short months of his fair young bride crushed his radiant hopes and disappointed all his life plans. After seven years, spent mostly in agricultural pursuits and in literary study, especially the study of political philosophy and constitutional history, he entered public life, and almost immediately rose to trusted and conspicuous leadership.

In 1844 Mr. Davis was elected to Congress, and ever thereafter, up to the fall of the Confederate government, was in some distinguished capacity or other connected with the public service of his country. When he entered the halls of Congress, the "Oregon question," the reannexation of Texas, and the revision of the tariff were the stormy issues that divided the nation into two hostile camps. The scholarly young representative from Mississippi soon appeared in the lists, and by his thorough mastery of the questions involved attracted national attention. The venerable ex-President John Quincy Adams, the "old man eloquent," at that time a member of the House, was greatly impressed with his extraordinary ability, and predicted his brilliant parliamentary career. Referring to his first set speech in Congress, a recent biographer makes this just and suggestive observation: "He manifests here in his early efforts as a legislator some of the larger views of national life and development which have been so persistently ignored by those who have chronicled his career."

In that first great speech, which had all the marks and carried all the credentials of the profoundest statesmanship, Mr. Davis made this broad declaration, from the principle of which he never receded: "The extent of our Union has never been to me the cause of apprehension; its cohesion can only be disturbed by violation of the compact which cements it."

Believing, as he did, in the righteousness of the conflict with Mexico, Mr. Davis earnestly advocated the most liberal supply of means and men to prosecute the war, and announced himself as ready, should his services be needed, to take his place in the tented field. In June, 1846, a regiment of Mississippi volunteers was organized at Vicksburg, and Jefferson Davis was elected its colonel. He accordingly resigned his seat in Congress, hastened to join his regiment, which he overtook at New Orleans, and reported for duty to General Taylor on the Mexican border. At Monterey and Buena Vista, crucial positions of the war, his command rendered conspicuously heroic service. Our American knighthood was in fairest flower that day, especially on the plains of Buena Vista, when Colonel Davis, against overwhelming numbers, snatched victory from almost certain defeat and won immortal fame for himself and his gallant Mississippi Rifles. By a brilliant tactical movement he broke the strength of the Mexican army and sent General Santa Anna southward with only half the force of the day before. Though severely wounded, he remained in his saddle, refusing to quit the field, until the day of glorious triumph was complete. Gen. Zachary Taylor, commander in chief of the American forces, paid this eloquent tribute to the soldierly courage and genius of the distinguished Mississippian: "Napoleon never had a marshal who behaved more superbly than did Colonel Davis to-day."

Returning from Mexico, having won the highest honors of war, Colonel Davis and the brave remnant of his magnificent regiment were everywhere welcomed with boundless enthusiasm. He was tendered the position of brigadier general of volunteers by President Polk, but declined on constitutional grounds, holding that such appointment inhered only in the State.

Within two months after his return from Mexico Mr. Davis was appointed by the Governor to represent Mississippi in the United States Senate, a vacancy having occurred by the death of Senator Spaight. When the Legislature met, he was elected unanimously for the remainder of the unexpired term, all party lines having disappeared in a universal desire to honor the brilliant young colonel of the Mississippi Rifles. That was a position most congenial to his tastes and ambitions, and there his superb abilities shone with a splendor rarely equaled in the parliamentary history of America. He was an ideal Senator, dignified, self-mastered, serious, dispassionate, always bent on the great things that concerned the welfare of the nation. * * *

When Jefferson Davis entered the United States Senate, the glory of that upper chamber was at its height. Possibly never at one time had so many illustrious men sat in the highest council of the nation. There sat John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina; Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts; Henry Clay, of Kentucky; Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri; Louis Cass, of Michigan; Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio; Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois. In that company of giants Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, at once took rank among the greatest, "eloquent among the most eloquent in debate," and worthy to be the premier at any council table of American statesmen. The historian, Prescott, pronounced him "the most accomplished" member of the body.

One who spoke by the authority of large experience with the upper chamber thus correctly characterized our brilliant and accomplished young Senator: "It is but simple justice to say that in ripe scholarship, wide and accurate information on all subjects coming before the body, native ability, readiness as a debater, true honor, and stainless character Jefferson Davis stood in the very first rank, and did as much to influence legislation and leave his mark on the Senate and the country as any other who served in his day."

Senator Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, afterwards spoke of him as "the clear-headed, practical, dominating Davis."

That which preëminently signalizes the public character and parliamentary career of Jefferson Davis was his sincere, unwavering devotion to the doctrine of State sovereignty and all the practical questions that flowed therefrom. He held with unrelaxing grasp to the fundamental fact that the Union was composed of separate, independent, sovereign States, and that all Federal power was delegated, specifically limited, and clearly defined. The titanic struggles of his entire public life were over this one vital issue, with all that it logically involved for the weal or woe of his beloved country. The Articles of Confederation declared in express terms that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled," and that principle was transferred intact to the Constitution itself. And as one function of sovereignty was the right to withdraw from a compact, if occasion demanded, he planted himself squarely upon that doctrine, and never wavered in its able and fearless advocacy—a doctrine, by the way, that was never questioned by any jurist or statesman for forty years after the Constitution was adopted. * * * And it is an interesting and suggestive fact that the latest historians and writers on constitutional government sustain the fundamental contention of Southern statesmen. * * *

The position of Jefferson Davis, though by his enemies often denied and persistently obscured, was that, while consistently and unanswerably defending the right of a State to secede, he never urged it as a policy and deplored it as a possible necessity. Or, to use the language of the resolution adopted by the States Right Convention of Mississippi in June, 1851, drawn by his own hand, "Secession is the last alternative, the final remedy, and should not be resorted to under existing circumstances."

It may be interesting in this connection to inquire where the exercise of a State's right to secede had its first and most threatening assertion. Alexander H. Stephens affirms that the right of a State to withdraw from the Union was never denied or questioned by any jurist, publicist, or statesman of character and standing "until Kent's Commentaries appeared in 1826, nearly forty years after the government had gone into operation." And it is historic truth to state that the first threat to exercise this right universally recognized in the early days of the republic was not heard in the South: "it first sprang up in the North." Not only so, but from 1795 to 1815 and again in 1845 there was an influential party in New England who favored and threatened the formation of a Northern Confederacy. * * *

In a famous speech delivered by Josiah Quincy in Congress on January 14, 1811, against the admission of Louisiana into the Union as a State these sentiments were defiantly uttered: "I am compelled to declare it as my deliberate opinion that if this bill passes the bonds of this Union are virtually dissolved; that the States which compose it are free from their moral obligations; and that, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some to prepare definitely for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must." It must not be forgotten that these are not the words of Jefferson Davis. * * *

The right or wrong of slavery we need not discuss or attempt to determine who was most responsible therefor. The institution is dead beyond the possibility of resurrection, and the whole nation is glad. The later geographical limitations of slavery in the United States were determined not by conscience, but by climate. It was climate at the North and the cotton gin in the South that regulated the distribution of slave labor. I have scant respect for a conscience too sensitive to own certain property because it is immoral, but without compunction will sell the same to another at full market value. Had the slaveholders of the North manumitted their slaves and not sold them because their labor ceased to be profitable, there would have been more regard for their subsequent abolition zeal. * * *

But apart from the ethical question involved as we now see it, slave property was recognized by the Constitution and existed in every State but one when the Union was formed. And a clear mandate of the Constitution required slaves to be delivered up to their owners when escaping into another State. Congress passed laws to enforce the same, and their constitutionality was sustained by the Supreme Court in the famous Dred-Scott decision. Daniel Webster, too great to be provincial and too broad to be a narrow partisan, in a noble speech at Capon Springs, Va., in 1851 made this emphatic declaration: "I have not hesitated to say, and I repeat, that if the Northern States refuse willfully and deliberately to carry into effect that part of the Constitution which respects the restoration of fugitive slaves and Congress provides no remedy the South would no longer be bound to observe the compact. A bargain cannot be broken on one side and still bind the other side. I say to you, gentlemen in Virginia, as I said on the shores of Lake Erie and in the city of Boston, as I may say again, that you of the South have as much right to receive fugitive slaves as the North has to any of its rights and privileges of navigation and commerce."

And yet Charles Sumner, speaking for a great party growing in strength and dominance with the rising sun of every day, said the North could not and would not obey the law. William H. Seward declared that there was a "higher law" than the Constitution which would be the rule of their political conduct.

Now the insistence of Mr. Davis and his compatriots was that the Constitution and laws should be obeyed, that the individual, sovereign States must regulate their own domestic affairs without Federal interference, and that their property of whatever kind must be respected and protected. They resisted any invasion of the State's right to control its own internal affairs as a violation of the sacred Federal compact. Over that one fundamental question an "irrepressible conflict" was waged for many stormy years. The advocates of State sovereignty were charged with disloyalty to the Union, while the Federalists were denounced as enemies of the Constitution and usurpers of the rights of the States.

And, by the way, our present-day political discussions are eloquently vindicating the patriotic jealousy of Mr. Davis for the rights of the States. The most significant fact of these strenuous times is the solemn warnings in endless iteration and from both political parties against the ominous encroachment of Federal authority. More and more the nation is seeing that Jefferson Davis was not an alarmist or an academic theorist, but a practical, sagacious, far-seeing statesman, when he contended so persistently for the rights and unconstrained functions of each member of the Federal Union. * * *

Horace Greeley, a most potential voice in the councils of his party, did not hesitate to say: "I have no doubt but the free and slave States ought to be separated; the Union is not worth supporting in connection with the South."

William Lloyd Garrison, at first derided as a fanatic, but afterwards followed as the voice of an apostle, thus advocated the cause of disunion: "The Union is a lie. The American Union is an imposture, a covenant with death and an agreement with hell. We are for its overthrow. Up with the flag of disunion, that we may have a free and glorious republic of our own." * * *

But through all the years this storm was fiercely raging the cool, sagacious Jefferson Davis never lost the clearness of his vision or allowed himself to be swept from his political moorings. He fought with all his superb skill and herculean strength for the rights of the States and warned his opponents that continued Federal invasion might drive them from the Union. * * *

In an eloquent speech delivered at Portland, Maine, in 1858 Mr. Davis strikingly demonstrated the fact that State pride and devotion to State integrity strengthened rather than weakened our attachment to the Federal Union; that the larger love we have for our national flag is fed by the passionate devotion we manifest in the welfare of an individual State. He said: "No one more than myself recognizes the binding force of the allegiance which the citizen owes to the State of his citizenship; but the State being a party to our compact, a member of the Union, fealty to the Federal Constitution is not in opposition to, but flows from, the allegiance due to one of the United States. Washington was not less a Virginian when he commanded at Boston, nor did Gates and Greene weaken the bonds which bound them to their several States by their campaigns in the South. In proportion as a citizen loves his own State will he strive to honor her by preserving her name and her fame free from the tarnish of having failed to observe her obligations and to fulfill her duties to her sister States. Do not our whole people, interior and seaboard, north, south, east, and west, alike feel proud of the Yankee sailor, who has borne our flag as far as the ocean bears its foam and caused the name and character of the United States to be known and respected where there is wealth enough to woo commerce and intelligence to honor merit? So long as we preserve and appreciate the achievements of Jefferson and Adams, of Franklin and Madison, of Hamilton, of Hancock, and of Rutledge—men who labored for the whole country and lived for mankind—we cannot sink to the petty strife which saps the foundations and destroys the political fabric our fathers erected and bequeathed as an inheritance to our posterity forever."

And a few weeks thereafter, when on a visit to Boston, addressing a great audience in Faneuil Hall and speaking not only for himself, but for the entire South as well, he uttered sentiments as broadly and loyally national as were ever spoken by Thomas Jefferson or sung in the Battle Hymn of the Republic. "As we have shared in the toils," said he, "so we have gloried in the triumphs of our country. In our hearts, as in our history, are mingled the names of Concord and Camden and Saratoga and Lexington and Plattsburg and Chippewa and Erie and Moultrie and New Orleans and Yorktown and Bunker Hill. Grouped all together, they form a record of triumphs of our cause, a monument of the common glory of our Union. What Southern man would wish it less by one of the Northern names of which it is composed? Or where is he who, gazing on the obelisk that rises from the ground made sacred by the blood of Warren, would feel his patriot's pride suppressed by local jealousy?"

As late as December 20, 1860, after the presidential election and when events were hastening to a crisis, on the floor of the United States Senate Mr. Davis reannounced his passionate love for the Union and pathetically pleaded for a spirit of conciliation that would make unnecessary the withdrawal of the South from their national fraternity. He said: "The Union is dear to me as a union of fraternal States. It would lose its value if I had to regard it as a union held together by physical force. I would be happy to know that every State now felt that fraternity which made this union possible; and if that evidence could go out, if evidence satisfactory to the people of the South could be given that that feeling existed in the hearts of the Northern people, you might burn your statute books and we would cling to the Union still."

Instead of conspiring to disrupt the Union, as has been charged, Mr. Davis loved this great republic with passionate ardor and sealed that devotion with his richest blood. He served his country with a conscientious fidelity that knew no flagging. He went out at last in obedience to what he felt was imperative necessity, and the going almost broke his great heart. So reluctant was he to sever relations with the Union that some more ardent friends became impatient with his hesitation and almost suspected his loyalty. Despairing of any fair and final adjustment of the issues that had agitated the nation for more than a half century, and believing that the election of Mr. Lincoln would embolden his party to greater aggressions upon the constitutional rights of the Southern States, he at length with many a heartache yielded to the inevitable and joined his people in the establishment of a separate civil government.

In a letter to his special friend, Ex-President Franklin Pierce, in January he thus expressed the grief of his patriotic heart: "I have often and sadly turned my thoughts to you during the troublous times through which we have been passing, and now I come to the hard task of announcing to you that the hour is at hand which closes my connection with the United States, for the independence and union of which my father bled and in the severance of which I have sought to emulate the example he set for my guidance." * * *

And so consistent was his entire public career and so conspicuous the unstained purity of his motives that when nearing the close of his eventful life he could challenge the world and triumphantly say: "The history of my public life bears evidence that I did all in my power to prevent the war; that I did nothing to precipitate collision; that I did not seek the post of Chief Executive, but advised my friends that I preferred not to fill it."

Long after Yancey and Rhett and Toombs and others had thrown hesitancy to the winds Mr. Davis still wrought with all his great ability and influence to preserve the Union. He favored and earnestly advocated the "Crittenden resolutions" on condition that the Republican members of the peace committee would accept them. Had they not stubbornly refused (and they did it on the advice of Mr. Lincoln), war would have been averted and the dissolution of the Union prevented or postponed. All the undoubted facts go to prove that Jefferson Davis, at the peril of sacrificing the confidence of his people, exhausted all resources consistent with sacred honor and the rights of the States to stay the fatal dismemberment of the Union.

Jefferson Davis's farewell to the United States Senate, in which he had so long towered as a commanding figure and where he had rendered his country such distinguished service, was one of the most dramatic and memorable scenes in the life of that historic chamber. Mississippi by solemn ordinance and in the exercise of her sovereign right had severed her relation with the Union, and he as her representative must make official announcement of the fact, surrender his high commission, and return home to await the further orders of his devoted people. It was a supreme—a fateful—hour in our country's history. The hush of death fell upon the chamber when Jefferson Davis arose. The trusted leader and authoritative voice of the South was about to speak, and an anxious nation was eager to hear. Every Senator was in his seat, members of the House stood in every available place, and the galleries were thronged with those whose faces expressed the alternating hopes and fears of their patriotic hearts. The fate of a nation seemed to hang upon that awful hour.

Pale, sad of countenance, weak in body from patriotic grief and loss of sleep, evidently under the strain of sacred and suppressed emotion, and yet with the calmness of fixed determination and settled conviction, the majestic Senator of Mississippi stood, hesitant for a moment, in painful silence. The natural melancholy in his face had a deeper tinge, "as if the shadow of his country's sorrow had been cast upon it." His good wife, who witnessed the fatal scene and felt the oppressive burden that almost crushed the brave heart of her great husband, said: "Had he been bending over his bleeding father, needlessly slain by his countrymen, he could not have been more pathetic and inconsolable."

At first there was a slight tremor in his speech; but as he proceeded his voice recovered its full flutelike tones and rang through the chamber with its old-time clearness and confident strength. But there was in it no note of defiance, and he spoke no word of bitterness or reproach. He was listened to in profound silence. Hearts were too sad for words and hands too heavy for applause. Many eyes unused to weeping were dimmed with tears. And when he closed with these solemn words, there was a sense of unutterable sorrow in the entire assembly: "Mr. President and Senators, having made the announcement which the occasion seemed to me to require, it only remains for me to bid you a final adieu." Senators moved softly out of the chamber, as though they were turning away from a new-made grave in which were laid their dearest hopes. Mrs. Davis says that the night after this memorable day brought no sleep to his eyelids, and all through its restless hours she could hear the oft-reiterated prayer: "May God have us in his holy keeping, and grant that before it is too late peaceful councils may prevail!"

In this open, manly, but painful way the Southern States withdrew, with never a suggestion of conspiracy against anything or anybody. The men of the South wore no disguises, held no secret councils, concealed no plans, concocted no sinister schemes, organized no conclaves, and adopted no dark lantern methods; they spoke out their honest convictions, made their pathetic pleas for justice, and openly announced their final, lamented purpose if all efforts at a peaceful adjustment should fail. And at length, whether wisely or unwisely, feeling that nothing else would avail, they determined to take the final step and fling defiance in the face of what they considered an aggressive, overbearing, tyrannous majority.

As Alexander H. Stephens admirably and correctly says, the real object of those who resorted to secession "was not to overthrow the government of the United States, but to perpetuate the principles upon which it was founded. The object of quitting the Union was not to destroy but to save the principles of the Constitution." And it is a significant fact that the historic instrument in almost its exact language became the organic law of the Confederate government. The Southern States withdrew from the Union for the very reason that induced them at first to enter it—that is, for their own better protection and security.

Secession was not a war measure; it was intended to be a peace measure. It was a deeply regretted effort on the part of the South to flee from continued strife, feeling that "peace with two governments was better than a union of discordant States." Horace Greeley himself said: "If the cotton States shall decide that they can do better out of the Union than in it, we insist on letting them go in peace." And, while fearing the direful possibility, the Southern States seceded without the slightest preparation for war. As Dr. J. L. M. Curry said: "Not a gun, not an establishment for their manufacture or repair, nor a soldier, nor a vessel had been provided as a preparation for war, offensive or defensive. On the contrary, they desired to live in peace and friendship with their late confederates, and took all the necessary steps to secure that desired result. There was no appeal to the arbitrament of arms nor any provocation to war. They desired and earnestly sought to make a fair and equitable settlement of common interests and disputed questions." And the very first act of the Confederate government was to appoint commissioners to Washington to make terms of peace and establish relations of amity between the sections.

Some days after his farewell to the Senate Mr. Davis returned to his home, in Mississippi, to await results and render any service to which his country might call him. He did not, however, desire the headship of the Confederacy that was in process of organization. But the people who knew his pre-eminent abilities and trusted his leadership declined to release him. By a unanimous and enthusiastic vote he was elected to the presidency of the young republic, and felt compelled to accept responsibilities from which he hoped to escape. It was the thought of his countrymen, voiced by the eloquent William L. Yancey, that "the man and the hour have met." He could well say, therefore, in his inaugural address, delivered a few days after: "It is joyous in the midst of perilous times to look around upon a people united in heart when one purpose of high resolve animates and actuates the whole, when the sacrifices to be made are not weighed in the balance against honor and right and liberty and equality." His address was conservative and dispassionate, but strong and resolute, not unequal to the luminous and lofty utterances of Thomas Jefferson. If others failed to measure the awful import of that epochal hour, not so the serious and far-seeing man about to assume high office, who was at once an educated and trained soldier and a great statesman of long experience and extraordinary genius.

To rehearse in detail the well-known story of the four years of carnage and struggle is not within the purpose of this discussion. Nor is it necessary to consider at length the many and perplexing problems which signalized the administration of the young nation's first and only President. It is sufficient to say that he conducted the affairs of the stormy government with consummate wisdom, meeting the sternest responsibilities, awed by no reverses, discouraged by no disaster, and cherishing an unshaken faith that a cause could not fail which was "sanctified by its justice and sustained by a virtuous people." Even after Richmond was evacuated and the sun of Appomattox was about to go down amid blood and tears, a final appeal was issued in which he said: "Let us not despair, my countrymen, but meet the foe with fresh defiance and with unconquered and unconquerable hearts."

Mr. Davis was a great President. In administering the affairs of the Confederate government he displayed remarkable constructive and executive genius. Considering the resources at his command, all the Southern ports blockaded and without the recognition of any foreign nation, with no opportunity to sell cotton abroad and import supplies in return, having to rely entirely upon the fields and strong arms of the home land, and constantly menaced by one of the greatest armies of the world, it was remarkable that the young nation could have survived a few months instead of four memorable years. And much of that wonderful history is due to its Chief Executive. In answer to one who sought General Lee's estimate of Mr. Davis as the head of the government, he thus replied: "If my opinion is worth anything, you can always say that few people could have done better than Mr. Davis. I know of none that could have done as well."

And on the other side harsh criticism is giving way to generous and discriminating judgment. The Hon. Charles Francis Adams in a recent review of the latest "Life of Jefferson Davis," which has issued from the press, pays fitting tribute to the extraordinary ability displayed by the Confederacy's great President. "No fatal mistake," says he, "either of administration or strategy was made which can fairly be laid to his account. He did the best that was possible with the means that he had at command. Merely the opposing forces were too many and too strong for him. Of his austerity, earnestness, and fidelity, it seems to me there can be no more question than can be entertained of his capacity."

Mr. Davis has been charged with cruelty to prisoners, and on his shoulders have been laid the so-called "horrors of Andersonville," a charge as utterly baseless as it is despicably mean. No more humane or gentle spirit ever walked this earth than Jefferson Davis. As a matter of fact there was no deliberate purpose on either side to maltreat prisoners of war or fail to make proper provision for their care. The sufferings endured were only the exigencies of the awful days when great armies were in the death struggle for mastery. All that humanity could suggest and the meager resources of the South could provide were freely given the brave men captured in battle. Mr. Davis said they were given exactly the same rations "in quantity and quality as those served to our gallant soldiers in the field, which have been found sufficient to support them in their arduous campaigns." On the contrary, goaded doubtless by false reports from the South, the United States War Department on April 20, 1864, reduced by one-fifth the rations issued to Confederate prisons.

"With sixty thousand more Federal prisoners in the South," said Senator Daniel, "than there were Confederate prisoners in the North, four thousand more Confederates than Federals died in prison." If those figures are correct, the very repetition of the charge is an insult to intelligence and blasphemy against truth. The real reason for so much suffering and mortality among the men in Southern prisons was that the Federal government refused to observe the cartel agreed upon for the exchange of prisoners. And General Grant boldly assumed the responsibility for such refusal in these words: "It is hard on our men in Southern prisons not to exchange them, but it is humanity to those left to fight our battles. If we commence a system of exchanges which liberates all prisoners taken, we will have to fight until the whole South is exterminated. If we hold those caught, they amount to no more than dead men. At this particular time to release all Rebel prisoners North would insure Sherman's defeat and compromise our own safety here."

If any unfortunate prisoner was not comfortably provided for, it was not because the South would be cruel to a brother, but on account of her exhausted source of supply. During the last year of the war General Lee had meat only twice a week, and his unusual dinner was "a head of cabbage boiled in salt water, sweet potatoes, and a pone of corn bread." If the peerless commander in chief of the Confederate armies was reduced to such scanty fare, the government could not well provide very liberally for the gallant men in the ranks or behind prison doors.

Now with this very imperfect sketch of a most remarkable career, I shall briefly refer to some of the qualities that made this heroic history a sublime possibility.

He was an accomplished orator and a magnificent debater. Having always complete mastery of himself and of the subject in hand, he became a veritable master of assemblies. He met Sargent S. Prentiss in debate—that inspired wizard of persuasive and powerful speech—and his friends had no occasion to regret the contest. Stephen A. Douglas found in him the mightiest champion with whom he ever shivered a lance. During an exciting discussion in 1850 Henry Clay turned to the Mississippi Senator and announced his purpose at some future day to debate with him a certain question. "Now is the moment," was the prompt reply of the brilliant Southern leader, whose intrepid courage and diligent student habits kept him fully armed for the issues of any hour.

"He was an archer regal

Who laid the mighty low,

But his arrows were fledged by the eagle

And sought not a fallen foe."

One of Mr. Davis's biographers, well acquainted with his parliamentary career, who knew his mastery in debate and his superb power as a statesman and an orator, and who witnessed his brilliant gladiatorial combat in the Senate with Stephen A. Douglas, gives this discriminating estimate of the great Mississippian: "In nearly all of Mr. Davis's speeches is recognized the pervasion of intellect, which is preserved even in his most impassioned passages. He goes to the very foundations of jurisprudence, illustrates by historical example, and throws upon his subject the full radiance of that light which is shed by diligent inquiry into the abstract truths of political and moral science. Strength, animation, energy without vehemence, classical elegance, and a luminous simplicity are features in Davis's oratory which rendered him one of the most finished, logical, and effective of contemporary parliamentary speakers." * * *

His sensitiveness to personal and official honor and his exceeding conscientiousness in the discharge of public duties were among the chief characteristics of this serious and stainless man. "Great politicians," said Voltaire, "ought always to deceive the people." But such was not the sacred creed of

Jefferson Davis, who held that public men should invariably and scrupulously be honest with the people, having no confidences from which they are excluded and no policies in which they are not invited to share. Free from conscious sophistry and the very soul of candor, he never sought to conceal or obscure, but to make the truth so luminous that he who ran could read. His own eloquent characterization of President Franklin Pierce might be fittingly applied to Jefferson Davis himself: "If treachery had come near him, it would have stood abashed in the presence of his truth, his manliness, and his confiding simplicity."

In official life he knew no word but duty. When in Congress a rivers and harbors bill was pending on one occasion, and seeing that combinations had been formed to secure certain local, trivial appropriations, he opposed the measure with characteristic vigor. In the course of the debate he was asked if he did not favor appropriations for Mississippi, in response to which he retorted sharply and concluded: "I feel, sir, that I am incapable of sectional distinctions upon such a subject. I abhor and reject all interested combinations."

He was the very soul of chivalry. No plumed knight of the Middle Ages ever had higher regard for the virtue of woman or the integrity of man or the sacredness of a cause. Sensitive to wrong, cherishing above measure his stainless honor, he never in the least betrayed it nor allowed another to impugn it. * * *

His was a proud, but a noble and affectionate nature. Some have thought him a cold, austere, severe man, lacking in the gentler elements and sympathies of a generous soul. But nothing could be farther from the fact. His affections were most ardent, his friendships partook of the pathetic, and the tenderness of his heart often dimmed his eyes with tears. And he was at all times most approachable. No citizen was so poor, no soldier so humble, no man so obscure as not to have ready access to his presence and sympathetic attention.

Mr. Davis was a statesman, with neither taste nor ability for mere political manipulation. * * * He was a profound, philosophical statesman with a thoroughly trained intellect and an exalted sense of moral responsibility. In his logical processes he quite resembled the illustrious John C. Calhoun, whose genius he greatly admired and with whose political creed he was in substantial accord. And when Mr. Calhoun passed away, amid the lamentations of the whole nation, the great party he had led with such consummate skill turned instinctively to Jefferson Davis as incomparably the ablest exponent of the basic principles for which they fearlessly stood. His superb and commanding leadership vindicated their generous confidence and vastly enlarged the strength and measure of his national influence.

As Secretary of War in the Cabinet of Franklin Pierce (and by common consent he was the premier in that body of statesmen), it is no disparagement of others to say that no abler or more accomplished Secretary ever sat at the council table of an American President. * * *

The verdict of history will be, notwithstanding the fall of the Confederate government, that he was preëminently the man for a crisis. His genius was most resplendent when the clouds were darkest and the danger was nearest. When passion swayed the hour, he was in the most perfect command of his highest powers and seemed to exercise the coolest judgment. He was cautious without timidity, intrepid without rashness, courteous without condescension, pious without pretense. * * *

Mr. Davis was a devout believer in the fundamental verities of our Christian faith, and sought to make them the inspiring rule of his daily life. He was acquainted with the Scriptures from a child and knew the place and power of prayer. His unshaken faith gave him sublime courage for duty, a serene fortitude in calamity, softened the rigors of the cruel prison, and made radiant the evening's skies of life's long, stormy day. His intimate friend, the eloquent Senator Benjamin H. Hill, of Georgia, paid this heart tribute to the beauty and consistency of his Christian character: "I knew Jefferson Davis as I know few men. I have been near him in his public duties. I have seen him by his private fireside. I have witnessed his humble Christian devotions, and I challenge the judgment of history when I say no people were ever led through the fiery struggle for liberty by a nobler, truer patriot, while the carnage of war and the trials of public life never revealed a purer and more beautiful Christian character."

When, after their capture, his friend, the Hon. John H. Reagan, the Postmaster General of the Confederacy, was separated from him to be sent to a Northern prison, while he remained at Fortress Monroe, Mr. Davis said: "My old friend frequently read the twenty-sixth Psalm. It has often given me the surest consolation." While enduring in agony and chains his imprisonment at Fortress Monroe—a cruelty that will ever be a blot upon our country's fair name—he wrote thus cheerfully to his anxious and devoted wife: "Tarry thou the Lord's leisure, be strong, and he will comfort thy heart. Every day, twice or oftener, I repeat the prayer of St. Chrysostom." Again from his dungeon he wrote to a friend: "Separated from my friends of this world, my Heavenly Father has drawn nearer to me."

When his two pitiless years of imprisonment were ended, broken in health, but unbroken in spirit, and when the short court proceedings were concluded in Richmond which restored him to liberty and the bosom of his family and a party of friends had joined Mrs. Davis at the hotel, the venerable chief of the Confederate cause turned to his pastor and said: "Mr. Minnegarode, you have been with me in my sufferings and comforted and strengthened me with your prayers; is it not right that we now once more should kneel together and return thanks?"

After his release, in shattered health and poverty (his fortune having gone with the cause he served and for which he suffered), but rich in the affectionate devotion of the people who vied with each other in doing him honor, he returned to his beloved Mississippi and here spent the remnant of his heroic years. Out of fire and tempest and baptism of blood he came with an unfaltering purpose and an unclouded sky.

There is something strangely beautiful in the old age of a great and good man. No sun sweeping through the opening gates of the morning has ever the radiant glory of its calm setting. Beautiful and buoyant as is the springtime, it fades before the color and splendor of the autumn. And so there is a sweet serenity and chastened beauty about the evening of a cheerful, well-spent life that far exceeds the brightness and bloom of its fair young morning.

The last days of Jefferson Davis were peaceful and beautiful. They were spent in dignified retirement, cultivating the sweet companionship of books, enjoying the association of friends, and in writing a masterly exposition of the great principles of government that had been the creed of his political faith and the ground of his people's hopes. This was his last will and testament to those "who have glorified a fallen cause by the simple manhood of their lives, the patient endurance of suffering, and the heroism of death."

Though never an indifferent observer of passing events, he wisely took no part in public affairs and rarely ever appeared on public occasions. When occasionally one of the numerous invitations with which he was overwhelmed was accepted, it was to speak words of encouragement and hope to his people, urging them with stout hearts and strong hands to labor for the largest good of our reunited country.

In a notable address before the Legislature of Mississippi in 1884, when in age and feebleness extreme, standing in the old hall where in the days of his splendid prime he swayed enraptured audiences as with the wand of a mighty magician, he thus spoke to the people who had ever held the highest place in his affectionate heart: "Reared on the soil of Mississippi, the ambition of my boyhood was to do something which would redound to the honor and welfare of the State. The weight of many years admonishes me that my day of actual services has passed, yet the desire remains undiminished to see the people of Mississippi prosperous and happy and her fame gradually growing wider and brighter as the years roll away. * * *

And now, young men of our reunited country, sons of heroic sires, proud of the flag that floats over us and jealous of its increasing and unfading glory, glad that there is a star on it that answers to the name of Mississippi, I commend to your emulation the words of solemn counsel and patriotic encouragement with which Mr. Davis concluded his masterly and monumental work, "The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government:" "In asserting the right of secession, it has not been my wish to incite to its exercise. I recognize the fact that the war showed it to be impracticable, but this did not prove that it was wrong; and now, that it may not be again attempted and the Union may promote the general welfare, it is needful that the truth, the whole truth, should be known, so that crimination and recrimination may forever cease, and then on the basis of fraternity and faithful regard for the rights of the States there may be written on the arch of the Union, 'Esto Perpetua.'"

By the sacred political convictions which had inspired his every public and patriotic service he consistently lived to the end, and went down to his grave without laying any sacrifice of repentance upon the altar of his conscience or his country. Without compromise or modification and with never a suggestion of contrition or concession, he died in the accepted faith of his fathers. And for that fearless and unshaken fidelity to his honest conception of truth and duty the South will continue to adore him, the world will never cease to admire him, and with a wreath of unfading glory the genius of history will not fail to crown him.

For the future he had not fear. In the last public paper that emanated from his pen, representing himself and his countrymen, he calmly reiterated his unfaltering faith in these words: "We do not fear the verdict of posterity on the purity of our motives or the sincerity of our belief, which our sacrifices and our career sufficiently attested." Had he ever recanted or even receded, had he ever apostatized or even compromised, had he shown in any way that his often reiterated doctrines were not the undying convictions of his sincere soul, had he ever pleaded for pardon on the ground that he had misconceived the truth and misguided his people, the South would have spurned him, the North would have executed him, and the verdict of history would have deservedly and eternally condemned him. But in the calm consciousness of having done what sacred duty and the cause of constitutional liberty seemed to demand, to the end of his days he walked with a steady step that knew no variableness or shadow of turning. The banner under which he fought went down in clouds and gloom, but was never furled by his hands.

For us to be honestly and absolutely loyal to the whole country and our glorious flag we need not and will not forget or cease to venerate the exalted character and splendid virtues and unsullied patriotism of Jefferson Davis and his compeers.

"Time cannot teach forgetfulness

When grief's full heart is fed by fame."

Over the portico of the Pantheon in Paris are these words in large letters: "To Great Men, the Grateful Fatherland." Fellow-Mississippians, I cannot repress the painful regret that it is not the proud privilege of Mississippi to be the "Grateful Fatherland" of the greatest Mississippian and to keep holy watch and ward over the sacred dust of her most illustrious son.

He was great to those who knew him best—those who were nearest to him in intimate, confidential companionship—and he will grow greater with the growing years. Caleb Cushing in introducing him to a vast audience in Faneuil Hall said he was "eloquent among the most eloquent in debate, wise among the wisest in council, and brave among the bravest in battle." Senator Reagan, of Texas, the Postmaster General of the Confederate government, said: "He was a man of great labor, of great learning, of great integrity, of great purity." The great-hearted and eloquent Senator Hill, of Georgia, said: "I declare to you that he was the most honest, the truest, gentlest, bravest, tenderest man I ever knew."

He died without citizenship here, but he has become a fellow-citizen with the heroes of the skies.

Marvelous, many-sided, masterful man, his virtues will grow brighter and his name be writ larger with each passing century. Soldier, hero, statesman, gentleman, American, a prince of Christian chivalry, "the uncrowned chief of an invisible republic of loving and loyal hearts," when another hundred years have passed, no intelligent voice will fail to praise him and no patriotic hand will refuse to place a laurel wreath upon his radiant brow.

"Nothing need cover his high fame but heaven,
No pyramid set off his memories
But the eternal substance of his greatness—
To which I leave him."

ABOUT ESCORT TO PRESIDENT DAVIS.

BY S. A. HORNBECK, SHEPHERDSVILLE, KY.

I wish to indorse every word in the March VETERAN from Comrades Overby and John Lewis, of Lexington, Ky., in regard to President Davis's last escort. The account is perfectly true as I remember it, and I recall the events of those days more vividly than more recent happenings.

I was a member of Company D, 1st Kentucky Cavalry, and was with the escort every day and hour from Charlotte to the end. Having approved this, let me add a bit of history concerning Gen. John S. Williams, familiarly known as "Cerro Gordo" Williams, who prior to Breckinridge commanded the Kentucky Cavalry Brigade. He disobeyed orders and whipped the enemy at Saltville, Va., and was placed under arrest until Mr. Davis reinstated him with his old command at Abbeville. I have been told that this was the last official act of Mr. Davis.

SANFORD THEODORE KINGSBERY.

The South, and particularly Georgia, his native State, can boast of no truer patriot, braver soldier, or one more loyal to the Confederacy than Capt. Sanford T. Kingsbery, who is yet numbered among the noble survivors of the tragic drama of the sixties.

Carrollton, Ga., was his birthplace, November 12, 1837. Captain Kingsbery attended school at Derby, Vt. Returning home, he completed his education at Carrollton Masonic Institute, after which, in 1858, he began reading law with Buchanan & Wright, Newnan, Ga., and in 1859 was admitted to the bar. He had located at Quitman, Ga.; and when the first roar of cannon had sounded from Fort Sumter, Captain Kingsbery enlisted as a private with the Piscola Volunteers. He was made commissary sergeant of his company, and remained with the Volunteers until after the Seven Days' fight around Richmond. In these battles he displayed much gallantry. In 1862 he was elected without his knowledge second lieutenant of a cavalry company organized at Carrollton, and was accordingly transferred to this command. With this company he did valiant service in Eastern North Carolina and in Southeast Virginia until the advance of Grant on Petersburg. His command, the 7th Confederate Cavalry, was assigned to Brig. Gen. James Dearing's command. He remained with General Dearing until October, 1864, at which time his regiment was reorganized into the 10th Georgia Cavalry, Gen. P. M. B. Young commanding.

SANFORD T. KINGSBERY.

In the same year Comrade Kingsbery was made captain of the company, and so continued until the surrender. His command was disbanded at Greensboro, N. C.

Captain Kingsbery encountered many dangers. He was under fire one hundred and thirty odd times, had nine horses killed under him, and was hit only once, and that on the memorable day of Grant's advance on Petersburg, when a spent ball struck him on the knee. After the bloody struggle he returned home without having been paroled, discharged, or surrendering, still loyal to the cause.

Captain Kingsbery's two brothers, Joseph and Charles, also returned to Carrollton with him. As they neared home they looked upon the venerable form of the old father toiling patiently behind the plow in the endeavor to earn a livelihood. Meeting these adverse circumstances bravely, the brothers went manfully to work.

Captain Kingsbery returned to South Georgia, where he and his wife taught school during 1866; he then resumed his practice of law at Quitman. During the reconstruction period he efficiently discharged the duties of Secretary of the County Democratic Committee. In 1874 he became local attorney for the Atlantic & Gulf Railway, retaining the position until 1883, when he became Assistant General Counsel for the Savannah, Florida & Western and the Charleston & Savannah Railway Companies. In 1902 Captain Kingsbery removed from Savannah to Valdosta, Ga., where he resumed general practice, but still retained the position as Assistant General Counsel for Georgia of the S. F. & W. Railway.

In his days of activity Captain Kingsbery ranked among the foremost of his profession. In his career as a lawyer he was never known to take a case when he believed his client to be in the wrong, however large the fee.

In 1900 his health began to fail, and one by one his professional duties were given up, until February, 1905, when he was forced to abandon all business matters. Since that time he has had a much-needed rest, free from business cares.

Captain Kingsbery's wife was Jane Margaret Smith, daughter of Rev. John Brown Smith, formerly an eminent Presbyterian minister of North Carolina, and she was a lineal descendant of "Light-Horse Harry" Lee, of Revolutionary fame. She passed away in August, 1900.

Captain Kingsbery was a Council Mason, and as long as health permitted was Master of the lodge at Valdosta, being untiring in his efforts for the upbuilding of the order at that place. In token of their appreciation a movement has recently been set on foot to have a life-size portrait of him placed in the lodge room at Valdosta.

In South Georgia he is familiarly known as "Captain," and has many friends who love and honor him and regret that he is no longer able to be actively at work. He has three children living: James S. Kingsbery, of Texas, and Edwin P. and H. Annie Kingsbery, of Thomasville, Ga.

ANNUAL SERMON AT DALTON, GA.—When Rev. J. T. Lowe was asked to preach the annual sermon for the soldiers at Dalton, Ga., his answer was in part: "When the roll is called up yonder, I'll be there. I have my parole, dated April 26, 1865, Greensboro, N. C." He was licensed to preach before the war, and might have kept out of the conflict on this plea, but he preferred to do otherwise. He served throughout the war in Company H, 30th Georgia Regiment, and Comrade R. P. Neal, of Company C, same regiment, says of him: "He served his country and his Creator. He planned always to have suitable persons conduct prayer meetings in the command. On one of these occasions an intelligent soldier was heard to offer the prayer: 'Lord, if the war is sent us as a punishment, grant that its form may be changed.'"

A FORGOTTEN HERO—R. C. KENNEDY.

BY EDWARD A. JACKSON, YAZOO CITY, MISS.

"R. C. Kennedy, Rebel spy, executed January, 1865." So reads the inscription over one of the bravest and truest of Confederate soldiers, who in life served his country and in death is forgotten.

Robert C. Kennedy went to West Point from the Shreveport district of Louisiana, and graduated in 1856. His Confederate rank was lieutenant in the 1st Louisiana, General Gladden's old regiment. He was captured, and for a time was confined in prison; but escaped to Canada, where he met some fifty of us, who had escaped from various military prisons. I was twenty-two years old, a member of the Wirt Adams Cavalry Regiment, captured in Jefferson County, Miss. I escaped from Camp Morton, and for a time I roomed with Kennedy at Toronto.

We were commanded by John Y. Beall, and were employed by the Confederate government to annoy the Federals in as many ways as possible. It seemed to us that if our fifty could detain some fifteen or twenty thousand Federal troops on the Northern frontier—troops that otherwise would have helped in crushing our comrades down South—we were doing as much for the cause as any fifty men in the ranks. We ran, besides, risks greater and more fearful than those faced by the regular service, as was proved by the fate of Beall and Kennedy.

We did things that one regrets being obliged to do; but we were responsible for our obedience, not our orders. We did what was commanded by our lawful superiors, and our actions were all legitimate under the horrible usages of war. The Federals fought us with fire and we fought them with fire; but it was a weapon that we did not love as did Sherman, Sheridan, Butler, and others, and we in no way inconvenienced the crows, as they did.

At last we lost our chief, John Y. Beall, and our party began to break up and scatter. Twelve of us remained with Kennedy for a time; but finally we parted, the twelve going by way of Halifax; while Kennedy, being the boldest of men, undertook to make his way directly through the hostile States.

Amongst the truest and bravest is often found a traitor, and amongst us was one who betrayed Kennedy's movements to the enemy. He was arrested at Suspension Bridge as quickly as he entered Federal territory, was taken to New York Harbor, confined in Fort Lafayette, and, like Beall, was soon condemned to die as a spy. Beneath the gallows he sang some lines which ran somewhat as follows:

"Trust to luck, trust to luck,
Stare Fate in the face;
Your heart will be easy
If it's in the right place."

When the executioners would have blinded him, he refused the black cap, saying: "I'll show you that a Southern soldier can die facing you fellows. If I had a dozen lives, I'd give them all for the same cause. Turn my face to the South; crack your whip; I'm ready."

Seven years afterwards (1872) I visited the grave of my friend, which lay some two hundred yards back of Fort Hamilton; and while sitting there the Federal commandant of the fort, Captain Sinclair, came up to me and asked: "Did you know that young man?" I told him of my intimacy, and he seized my hand with evident pleasure, saying: "I'm glad to meet anybody who knew Bob Kennedy. We graduated together from West Point in the class of 1856." He told me the story of Kennedy's last hour, took me over the fort, showed me every attention, and proved himself in every way a gentleman and a most agreeable man; but all his courtesies were meant as honor to Kennedy, and by me so taken.

So far as I know, Kennedy still lies in that unhonored and all but dishonored grave under that misleading inscription. Some new building may have covered him, all marks may have been obliterated, he may have been thrust away somewhere else; but wherever he lies he does not lie in Southern soil nor under a stone testifying to his patriotic devotion. Beall sleeps with his comrades in the land for which he died, but Kennedy among strangers in the land which overwhelmed his people.

I think it were only worthy of such a man's comrades that we should do his poor body such inadequate honor as we now may. Forty years is long enough to have left him in exile; let him come home and sleep with us. Will not some comrade who knew him second my motion?

KENNEDY'S DEATH SONG.

Trust to luck, trust to luck, stare Fate in the face;
Your heart will be easy if it's in the right place.

Though Luck may betray, though Fate may destroy,
Be faithful to Duty, and she'll give you joy.

O, had I a score of lives, I would give
One and all to my Southland; I'm hers, die or live.

Though life it is sweet, though earth it is dear,
To die for my country brings heaven more near.

Take away your black cap; I'll look in your eye.
No, don't turn it from me; see a Southerner die.

Turn my face to the South; it follows my heart.
I'm ready; crack your whip, sir, and on with your cart!

—R. B. Mayes, Yazoo City, Miss.

CAPT. JOHN REDDICK.

BY MRS. GRAFTON FENNO, LYNN, MASS.

I have sent the VETERAN office many things from time to time relative to New England history, and I realize the unsuitableness of such matter for a Confederate war paper; but those who wore the gray may be interested in some of the knowledge that came to me of Capt. John Reddick through his friendship with my husband during the California days when the two men were interested in mining.

John Reddick in early life was a slaveholder in the South, and during the progress of the Confederate war he traversed the State of California, working and speaking against the Union League. He was imprisoned in San Francisco Harbor, and the Union League officials took possession of his personal and private papers, including his discharge from the Mexican War and a daily journal in which were recorded conversations between Generals Grant and Sherman and himself.

Captain Reddick's wife was the daughter of Rev. James B. Gage, a Baptist minister, and her two brothers were surgeons in the Confederate army; but they did not survive the war. I have been told that Mrs. Reddick made and raised the first Confederate flag that floated in Mississippi, her native State. During the war she visited on the plantation of a Mr. Saunders, and I have in my possession pieces of dress cloth that she and her sisters and "old black mammy" wove and colored.

On a photograph of Captain Reddick, which I am sending the VETERAN, I copy a fragment of his history which he wrote in my autograph album at Los Angeles, Cal., in 1893: "I was born in Fairfax County, Va., January 19, 1809. My early home was near the battlefield of Bull Run. I was a graduate of West Point, and Gens. Robert E. Lee and Joseph Johnston were my schoolmates. I was captain of Company C, 1st Regiment Dragoons; fought Santa Anna at Buena Vista, and went through the Mexican War. I commanded the first train of emigrants from Missouri to Southern California through the Southern route in 1849. I was in the Black Hawk War under Captain Hall, Col. Sam Briggs, and General Dodge. I was in the battle of the Alamo under Fannin, John Duval and myself making our escape by swimming the river. I settled in San José, Cal., in 1849."

CAPT. JOHN REDDICK.

A portrait of Captain Reddick and his complete history will be placed in the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass., along with all my Confederate souvenirs, pictures, and books. There is a good picture of Gen. Robert Lee in the Civil War Department. Reddick died a few years ago of neuralgia of the heart.

I hope I have not tried the patience of your readers; but I do want the brave ones to be honored and remembered, and I am working for all such where opportunity opens the way.

J. D. HARWELL, MERIDIAN, MISS., SEEKS HIS BROTHER'S BIBLE.—For forty-three years I have believed my only brother was killed near Spottsylvania C. H., Va., on the skirmish line May 8, 1864, as he was reported killed by his company and his body supposed to have been buried by a farmer living near by. We have endeavored in vain to locate his grave at different times since the Civil War. Last August at a Reunion of old Confederate veterans at Demopolis, Ala., I met, for the first time since July, 1861, his old messmate and best friend, who was on the line that day with him, and he told me that my brother was not hurt the last he saw of him, but another comrade named Ben Rayfield was shot through the head and killed, and was left on the line when they retreated; that my brother (who was a bright Christian) was sitting down reading his Bible when the sudden advance of the Federals took place and the order to retreat was given. They thought he was with them until they reached their horses. The next day they drove the enemy beyond that line and found only one body, which had been buried by a farmer who lived close by, and it was shot through the head. I now know this was Ben Rayfield, yet some of the company reported to my family that it was my brother. If any Federal has my brother's Bible, I would be glad indeed to get it, and also to correspond with the one who has it, for I am convinced that brother was captured and possibly wounded, but died either in prison or hospital North. His Bible had his name, company, and legion written in a beautiful and legible hand in it; and if he died in prison or hospital, the records should show his name—William Thomas Harwell, Company D, Jeff Davis's Legion. His captain's name was A. K. Ramsey, and he was under J. E. B. Stuart. The date of his disappearance was May 8, 1864, on picket line near Spottsylvania C. H., Va. Any information regarding the Bible would be gladly and gratefully received, and I sincerely hope that through the valued magazine, the VETERAN, I may some day gain it.

COMMENT OF A UNION VETERAN IN MAINE.

BY A. I. MATHER, ROCKLAND, MAINE.

I have noticed in the columns of the VETERAN frequent allusions to the spirit of comradeship and brotherhood that prevailed during the Civil War between comrades of the blue and the gray. I have seen numerous incidents of the same, proving beyond dispute that there was not that animosity that many people of to-day imagined did exist.

I remember well one April day, 1865, we were halted for a few hours waiting to form a junction with Sheridan. It was at the edge of a piece of woods. Just across the narrow road there had been fierce fighting the day before, and I strolled through the wood where the fight had been the hottest,

"And there I saw distorted limbs
And many an eye aglare
In the soft purple twilight of
The thunder-smitten air;
Along the slope and on the sward
In ghastly ranks they lay,
And there was blood upon the blue
And blood upon the gray."

Our surgeons were busily attending to both friend and foe. Compassion had supplanted animosity. One who wore the gray, shot through the body, was breathing his life away; yet one of our men had rigged a shelter over him to keep off the glare of the sun, and was moistening his lips with water. The dead and dying were being ministered unto by those who the day before had sought their lives. It was a scene of true brotherhood.

Who that were present on that memorable day at Appomattox will ever forget that fraternal scene when word came down the line that fighting was to cease? Men wept and embraced each other, the blue and gray mingled together as one, rations were shared, and brotherly love prevailed everywhere.

Dear loyal old comrades, comrades who wore the blue and the gray, all brothers and comrades, my heart is tender to you all to-day and a moisture in my eyes as I rake up the scenes of long ago. As we stood together shoulder to shoulder for what we deemed right, so may we all in other lives to come be again reunited and once more press onward in an unbroken phalanx of brotherhood and plant firmly on the battlements of selfishness and error the standard of eternal truth that shall wave in triumph through æons of time. Dear old comrades! Many, very many are now sleeping the long sleep and time is mustering us out rapidly. Many are lying in unknown and neglected graves,

"Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day;
Love and tears for the blue,
Tears and love for the gray."

On the battlefield mentioned above I picked up many letters, weather-stained and worn. Some of these I have now. They are as follows: To Col. Garrete, from Anne Busbee. To W. T. Purcell, at General Lee's headquarters, from S. Hatcher. Emily Dautneys, of Front Royal, to her brother, C. P. E. To "Miss Mollie," from D. Painter. One dated Front Royal, signed Lucy A. Roberts. To "Dear Husband," from C. S. F. Jones. Petition to the Hon. James A. Sedden, Secretary of War, signed John H. Coffey. From Halifax, to "My Dear Son," from Sarah G. Woodhall; also in the same letter another to "My Dear Peter," signed Sally Woodall. To "Dear and Affectionate Son," signed Samuel Rader. To "Dear Cousin ——" (name illegible), signed Annie E. Hunt.

Should these meet the eye of interested parties, they will be forwarded to owners. These letters have never been out of my possession and have been safely guarded. It is more than probable that some of the above recipients were killed during that fight.

A LETTER FROM CAMP.

[Below is a letter written by Mr. Bob Whitaker in camp on the Chattahoochee July 16, 1864, to his sister, Mrs. Bettie Askins, President of Charity Green Trevathan Chapter, U. D. C., Union City, Tenn. It is hoped that the letter will call forth some expression from the comrades who were with brave Bob Whitaker during his last hours on earth.]

ON THE CHATTAHOOCHEE RIVER.

Dear Sister: I have passed through the mills since I last wrote to you. We have marched hard, worked hard, and fought hard. Our efforts commenced at Dalton, Rocky Face Ridge, where we skirmished two or three days. Had seven men slightly wounded. We next met the enemy at Resaca, where we built breastworks and waited for an attack, which was made after two days of heavy skirmishing and cannonading, though not on our part of the line. However, we were not destined to miss the fight. Our brigade was sent to the right and marched forward to meet the enemy, whom we soon encountered. We fought about fifteen minutes, when we were ordered to fall back. Night came, and we retreated.

The next place, New Hope Church and Kennesaw Mountain, we held the enemy in check three or four weeks. We were under fire most of the time, and suffered much from the heat of the sun. It was on this line of battle that the enemy attacked our line the first time. We fought behind breastworks. They came on us in five lines of battle, and drove in our pickets; but before those of our regiment had got in the right of the brigade were pouring in volley after volley, the fire running along down the line until all were engaged. The fire was most terrific. On they came until within a few feet of the breastworks. The contest now became doubtful. However, there was no time to be lost, and every man rapidly loaded and discharged his piece.

The enemy pressed on until they planted their colors on the top of the breastworks; but they did not remain long, the position being too hot for the bluecoats. They tore their colors down and took to their heels in confusion, leaving their dead and wounded on the field. They did not fall back far before they stopped and fortified under the hill within thirty yards of our works.

All was quiet for two days, when the odor of the dead bodies of the Yankees began to be intolerable for them as well as for ourselves. A flag of truce went over, hostilities ceased, and the dead were buried. During the time some of the boys were engaged in traffic with the Yanks, giving tobacco for canteens, old clothes, coffee, sugar. Our loss was only twenty-five or thirty in the brigade, while that of the enemy was five hundred.

We are now on picket on the bank of the Chattahoochee. Our whole division is out here in front of the army watching the enemy and keeping them from crossing the river. Our line is on one bank and the Federals on the other. We have established a kind of friendly picketing, and there is no shooting done. I was on picket duty the other night when a hard storm came up, blowing down a great many trees, one of which killed one of the boys who was on duty with me. We were under shelter trying to keep dry, and the wind was blowing so hard that some of the boys had left the shelter to get out of the way of the trees. I had just started when the alarm was given, and I made good my escape. We had to stand out and take the rain, wind, and hail. Our men have done extremely well, being in every fight since we left Dalton.

Everything seems to be at a standstill with both sides. The soldiers seem to have the utmost confidence in Johnston. They think it will all be for the best, and all seem confident of success. I think when the time comes for a regular open field fight we will whip them very badly.

HENRY A. STEUART—REBEL SPY.

BY RICHARD D. STEUART, OF THE BALTIMORE SUN.

On the little knoll to the left of the main entrance of Greenmount Cemetery, Baltimore, stands a granite shaft which marks the grave of a son of the late Gen. Roger Pryor, United States army. Within the shadow of the column is a grave with a white headstone bearing a cross and inscription:

*In the Old Capitol Prison,

HENRY A. STEUART,

SON OF

ANN AND WILLIAM F. STEUART,

In the twenty-first year of his age."

A captain in the Confederate army, young Steuart was a blockade runner, and his daring trips through the lines were made under the direction of the Confederate government. His baggage consisted mainly of medical supplies for the sick and wounded soldiers, which the Federal government had declared contraband and munitions of war. The story of Captain Steuart's life and death is a part of the history of the great Civil War. In his veins flowed the blood of St. David, Robert Bruce, Lord Robert Steuart, and of Sir Dudley Digges, who fell fighting under the banner of Charles I. His family had served the old State of Maryland, and his father, brothers, and kinsmen wore the gray and filled every rank from private to major general.

Henry Augustus Steuart was the eldest son of Dr. William Frederick Steuart, afterwards chief surgeon of the brigade of his kinsman, Gen. George H. Steuart. He was born at Pemberton, near West River, Anne Arundel County, in 1841, and at the time of his death was not twenty-one years old.

When the boom of Sumter's guns first sounded, Harry Stuart was among the first to leave his father's home, and with a few comrades made his way across the Potomac into Virginia. He enlisted as a private in the Black Horse Cavalry, a troop superbly mounted and equipped, organized in Fauquier County sometime before the outbreak of the war by Col. John Scott.

Young Stuart was engaged in the battle of Manassas, where our cavalry made several brilliant charges upon the enemy's infantry and won a name which the lapse of years has not erased. Not long after the victory at Manassas young Stuart was selected as a special agent of the Confederate States, with the rank of captain, and ordered to Baltimore to procure medical supplies. Captain Stuart's appointment was a high tribute to his courage. In his capacity as agent for the Confederate government he made several trips through the lines, carrying medical supplies, fuses, and musket caps. His route was through St. Mary's County and by ferry across the Potomac.

While passing from Baltimore to Virginia "Our Harry" obtained relays of horses at Mount Airy, the manor house of his kinsmen, the Calverts, in Prince George's County, about sixteen miles from Washington. At the auction sale of the treasures of Mount Airy held in Washington in February, 1903, there was sold a gutta percha ring bearing the label: "Presented to Eleanor A. Calvert by her cousin, Harry Stuart."

Official war records show that on October 29, 1861, Captain Stuart wrote to Hon. Judah P. Benjamin, Confederate Secretary of War, as follows: "The gentleman who will hand you this comes on very important business with the Navy Department. * * * Anything that I can do for you here let me know immediately. Any communication directed to Mr. Hermange, Sun office, Baltimore, will reach me safely. This is a better arrangement than the one mentioned in my former letter. General Dix has announced his intention of hanging me as a spy if he can find me. That for his intentions."

No official data concerning Captain Stuart's arrest can be found; but newspaper accounts say that he was captured about December 15, 1861, at the home of Mr. Henry J. Carroll, St. Mary's County. Tradition says that Captain Stuart left Baltimore in charge of a wagon loaded with medical supplies and military stores, and was near Camp Parole, Anne Arundel County, when halted by a detachment of United States cavalry. Captain Stuart charged through the lines of the cavalry and made his escape, hotly pursued. With the evident intention of returning to Virginia, he made his way to Mr. Carroll's home. Here he was placed under arrest.

Captain Stuart was taken to Capitol Prison, in Washington, charged with being a spy. His roommates in prison were Mr. Rudolph Watkins and Mr. Judson J. Jarboe, of St. Mary's County. In February the trio received a recruit in the person of Mr. William J. Rasin, afterwards captain of Company E, 1st Maryland Cavalry. Mr. Rasin was arrested at Stoneton, Kent County, the residence of Mr. Price, on the night of February 12 by two detectives, and he was hurried in a closed carriage to Elkton and taken thence to Washington, charged with being a spy.

Captain Stuart had been in confinement only a few weeks when he began to look about him for some means of escape. He found that the thought of escape was foremost in the minds of both Mr. Rasin and Mr. Watkins, and the three became bound by the tie of mutual confidence and a common purpose. One of the trio knew of a rope which had been woven from an old manila door mat found in the prison by Mansfield Walworth, a political prisoner who had been reduced to solitary confinement. This rope was concealed in a certain mattress.

A letter to friends outside of the prison had been sent safely through the guards, and was answered through a box of cigars sent to Mr. Rasin. The box was opened and examined by the prison authorities and delivered to Mr. Rasin.

In the seclusion of their room the three prisoners took the cigars from the box and bit off the end of each. About half of the cigars had been thus treated when one of the prisoners gave an exclamation. His teeth had struck a pin. Then the three men stripped the cigar of its wrapper and crumbled up the tobacco to disclose a tiny ball of paper. The ball was carefully straightened and smoothed out and the answer to their communication was eagerly read. It furnished detailed information of a valuable nature to the anxious prisoners.

The next important thing to be done was the removal of one of the heavy wooden bars on the outside of the window. A common table knife was procured, and teeth were filed in it. With this improvised saw the work of cutting was begun. The work could be done only on dark nights, the prisoners taking turns at the task, and at the end of two weeks the bar was sawed.

One day, when the work of sawing was about half completed, Colonel Wood, prison superintendent, entered the room and demanded to know why a curtain was hung over the window, at the same time pulling the curtain aside. Mr. Watkins quickly replied: "O, that's our pantry, Colonel. The curtain keeps the flies off the preserves." The jars and other rubbish concealed the cuts in the bar, and Colonel Wood was satisfied.

For nearly a month the prisoners waited an opportunity to put their plan in operation. On a dark, stormy night it was determined to make the attempt. Cards were cut to decide who should go first, and Mr. Rasin cut high. Quickly removing jars and bottles from the window, the sawed bar was broken, the rope produced and fastened to another bar, and all was in readiness for the escape. Mr. Rasin swung himself out of the window and started down the rope hand over hand, when it broke and the two waiting prisoners heard their comrade's body fall with a thud upon a cellar door many feet below. Then all was quiet.

Believing that the game was up and that Rasin was either dead or maimed and captured, Captain Stuart and Mr. Watkins replaced the sawed bar in position, concealed the end of the rope, and retired to their bunks to await the morning's developments. Shortly before daybreak a strong gust of wind dislodged the sawed bar and it fell with a clatter on the cellar door beneath. A few minutes later several guards rushed into the room occupied by the prisoners, and then both guards and prisoners learned to their amazement that Mr. Rasin had escaped.

Mr. Rasin had landed squarely on his feet on the cellar door, and the wind had carried the sound away from the two guards, who were engaged in a quiet flirtation with a girl. Summoning all his nerve, Mr. Rasin walked directly toward the guards and passed between them, they saluting, undoubtedly believing him to be one of their officers. For three days Mr. Rasin lay concealed in Washington while the city and surrounding country were being scoured for him. He escaped in disguise and was soon with the Army of Northern Virginia.

Colonel Wood instituted a rigid but fruitless examination to ascertain if any prisoners were implicated in Mr. Rasin's escape. Mr. Rasin carried his end of the rope with him, and the other end was burned by Captain Steuart. So the prison authorities concluded that Mr. Rasin had performed the feat of dropping to the ground.

The failure of their own attempt to escape was a terrible blow to Captain Steuart and Mr. Watkins, and made the former desperate. Mr. Watkins says that he seemed to lose all discretion, and frequently walked about the prison at night with yarn socks over his boots, trying to bribe some of the guards into letting him pass. Mr. Watkins and other friends warned him of the danger, but he was heedless. His prison mates noticed him often in conversation with a guard, and suspected that Steuart had made a proposition to him. On the night before his death he was seen to count fifty dollars and roll the notes in paper and tie a string around it. As he did so he appeared as buoyant as a child. As he placed the money in his pocket one of his roommates said to him: "Harry, are you going to trust that devil with your life?"

"It's all right," was the cheery reply. "Please don't say anything to discourage me."

Mr. Watkins, when he heard that Captain Steuart had made an arrangement with the guard whereby the latter for fifty dollars agreed to permit him to drop from the window to the ground and then, if he escaped the fall uninjured, allow him to pass, endeavored to dissuade his friend from the desperate attempt, but in vain.

In an article published in the Rockville (Md.) Sentinel nearly twenty years ago Mr. Watkins, Captain Steuart's prison mate, gave the following details of the shooting of Steuart on the morning of Sunday, May 11, 1862:

"My bunk was under Steuart's in a tier of two that occupied the space from one wall of the corridor to the other against the locked door opening into the corridor in a little room formed by throwing a partition wall across the corridor. This little room opened into the larger room.

"When I turned in, I left Steuart leaning on the sill of the window with the sash thrown up and his head pressed forward against the 'guard crib.' Several times during the night I awakened and saw him in the same position, and once I asked him to come to bed, but he gave me no audible answer. In my sleep I heard some one calling, 'Come on,' and I think the calling continued for some time, and Steuart, I have no doubt, had dropped asleep.

"At last, in a half-wakened condition, I heard the voice in a low tone say: 'Come on; it will soon be too late.' Then I saw Steuart climb over the crib, and he must have rested his feet on the granite ledge below the window to steady himself before letting go his hold; but he had scarcely passed over the crib when I distinctly heard the guard say, 'Halt!' and almost at the same instant came the report of a rifle and the ball tearing the plaster from above my head.

"He got back and fell on the floor under the window before I could reach him; in fact, it seemed that he was blown in, he got back so quickly. The first thing I did was to raise his head and place my pillow under him. Then I ran my knife blade through his clothing and boot and removed them, when the wounded joint, the knee of the right leg, was exposed, with blood spurting out.

"A tourniquet was brought from the hospital steward's room and applied above the wound, but it had very little effect in checking the flow of blood. He was bleeding from 4 A.M. until his leg was amputated late in the forenoon, and he received no surgical treatment before 9 A.M. There was not really any reason for his being allowed to die; but it did not seem to us that a prisoner's sufferings were regarded as of any material importance by any authorities except Colonel Wood. He on this occasion did everything in his power, but he could not do much, owing to circumstances.

"Steuart's sufferings were dreadful, the Minie ball having ground the joint to atoms. He seemed to care little for self, his sympathy for his mother being uppermost. Later I saw her bending over him as he lay dead in the ward; and though it has been twenty-five years since then, I can see her still, the most sublime and exquisite picture of grief I ever looked upon."

Senator Mahoney, of Iowa, in his interesting book, "The Prisoner of State," gives particulars of Captain Steuart's death, and says: "The fifty dollars was found in the young man's pockets wrapped for the sentry, and written upon the paper containing the funds was the sentence: 'This is the money I promised you.' The bribery was fairly proved, the deliberation attending the murder was apparent and proof that the sentry called him was ready, and yet the authorities did not even punish him, but actually put the villain on guard afterwards. The same sentinel deserted and was brought back to Old Capitol a prisoner."

The sentry who shot Captain Steuart was a member of the 86th New York Volunteers.

Captain Steuart's family found difficulty in getting his remains from the prison authorities. Through the intercession of Mrs. Voorhees, however, wife of Senator Voorhees, of Indiana, the body was finally delivered to Steuart's parents.

WHAT A LETTER MAY DO.

A letter of inquiry is a simple but oftentimes potent mis-sive, and the VETERAN may take a pardonable pride in its success as a detective agency. Every month brings to light the revival of old friendships by establishing the identity or abiding place of many an old and loved comrade who would otherwise remain in obscurity to the friend who seeks him.

Can there be a more touching picture than the one the mind conjures of an aged veteran of a splendid conflict standing so near the border of two worlds and seeking the whereabouts of a comrade dear to memory who may have already journeyed to that other land, where the soldier rests whose warfare's o'er? To find and unite the living and to be the bearer of messages is a service in which the VETERAN rejoices, and in this connection a story is told that will furnish interest to many readers.

UNCLE JOHN COATS.

One of the most thrilling and daring incidents of the war has come to light within the past few months, the central figure being Uncle John Coats, of Montevallo, Mo. Mr. Coats enlisted in the Confederate army while but a youth. He fought like a hero and served the cause he had espoused with great bravery and was a daring scout. Just before the battle of Jenkins's Ferry Coats and a comrade were sent out ahead to locate the Federals. He and his comrade went out horseback, and suddenly saw just ahead of them ten Federal soldiers and other evidences that told them they had passed the Federal pickets and were between the pickets and the Federal army. Coats's comrade put spurs to his horse and escaped, but Mr. Coats rode up and was halted. When asked who he was, he said, "I am a Confederate soldier;" and, firing two shots from his big trusty revolver, rode away. He soon came to a house, and, having eaten no food for many hours, asked for his dinner. The good woman of the house told Coats that she could give him something to eat, but for him to stop would mean his capture, as he was still between the pickets and the Federals. Coats replied that he knew his danger, but he would take the chances. When asked who he was and where he came from, he told her that his name was John Coats, and that he came from Holden, Johnson County, Mo.; and this information is responsible for his being located at this time.

Coats went into the house, took a seat at the table, and placed his two revolvers on each side of his place. In front of him, behind him, and at one side were windows, and at the other a door. His horse was tied where it could be quickly reached in time of emergency. When Coats had about half finished his meal, he was startled by the command to surrender. The unwelcome command came from two windows, and quicker than a flash Coats grabbed his two revolvers, fired at each window, and kept on firing until he reached his horse and then mounted, and as the bullets whizzed around his head he returned the fire and speedily left the place. He escaped; but never knew what effect his shots had until a short time ago, when he learned that his aim was true to the mark.

The good woman who prepared his dinner could never locate Mr. Coats, though she sought for his whereabouts through many channels. Her daughter determined to continue the search, and through the CONFEDERATE VETERAN was rewarded by a reply from Mr. Coats himself.

In answer to Mr. Coats's reply through the VETERAN, Mrs. Bettie Taylor, of Springfield, Mo., wrote the following letter:

"ATLANTA, GA., July 5, 1907.

"Mr. John Coats: It is with inexpressible pleasure that I tell you I received your most welcome letter. I have unceasingly tried to locate you since the war. I put several notices in the St. Louis papers, then in the Warrensburg paper, in Johnson County. About a year ago I met Captain Blucher, of Arkansas. He said he knew you very well, and that he met you in Kansas City some three years ago. That gave me new courage, and I sent a notice to the Kansas City Times, but got no word. Captain Blucher said he had been in several engagements with you; said you were as brave a soldier as ever fired a gun. I told him I was a witness to that. Last February I sent a notice to the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, and am very thankful that my last effort was crowned with success. You don't know how glad I am to know you got home to your dear kindred and friends and have passed so many happy years with them.

"I will answer your questions. Yes, I am the girl that was there. I married a Confederate soldier when I was twenty-three years old. He went through the war with my father. He is sixty-five and I am fifty-nine. We live in Springfield. I am in Georgia visiting my parents. My father is eighty-four and my mother eighty-one.

"You want to know if you hurt any one on that never-to-be-forgotten day. I will tell you, and then you can judge for yourself. When you got up from the table, there was a man at each window. They both fell dead. As you went out the back door you killed two more; the one east of the house who told you to stop also fell dead. The one who shot at you jumped over the fence and fell mortally wounded when you fired back and died four hours later at our house. I don't think I ever grew a particle after that day. My mother and I walked four miles that evening to my uncle's; and when we got there, we found two more Yankee soldiers wounded. We told them what had happened at our home, and one of them said: 'That is the very Rebel that shot us.' One of them died at my uncle's and the other one got well. He said he was from Pettis County, Mo. I told him what you said your name was, and he said he knew a John Coats; of Windsor, Mo., and you had a brother-in-law in Pettis County named Bell; but he did not think it could be you, for you were too young. His name was Elliot. I wrote to Mr. Elliot after the war asking him about you, and he answered saying he did not know anything of you and had no desire to see you. So now you can judge for yourself whether you hurt any one or not.

"My mother prayed for you thousands of times that you might live to get home. O, I shall never forget how you looked as you rode away and looked back with pistol in hand, bidding defiance to all pursuers.

"The Yankees came next day and buried their dead. They made us take care of the wounded man till he died. We expected to be burned out and perhaps killed, but the officers were very kind to us; did not allow anything molested. My mother told them it was no fault of hers. The officer told her if six United States soldiers let one Rebel get away he thought the credit was due to the Rebel. * * *"

SCOUTING IN GEORGIA.

BY W. A. CAMPBELL, COLUMBUS, MISS.

While on a scout inside Sherman's lines near Marietta, Ga., we heard that a foraging party was advancing. Our captain laid his plans to take them in; and coming across some infantry scouts, we enlisted them in our well-laid plans. We hid our horses in a thick skirt of wood, leaving one man to guard them.

The infantry scouts were to hide in the woods at the head of a long lane, while we made our way back of the open fields and came out at the lower end of the lane. This we did along the worm of the rail fence. Our scheme came near failing just here, as the foragers had left a picket, who had dismounted and was sitting on the horse block at a little country church. The picket saw us break from the cover of the fence, and he started to raise his gun; but he was immediately covered with several of our carbines, and in a low tone told to throw up his hands. This he did, and in a moment was a prisoner. He and his horse were turned over to a guard. The foraging party by this time had passed up the lane nearing the head, when our infantry scouts fired on them from ambush.

The lane had a good high fence on both sides, and the enemy came tearing down our end of it, the driver of the wagon lashing his horses to a dead run. The wagon was loaded with men, and all but the driver, seeing us, fell down in the bottom of the wagon and a few men mounted in the rear. We signaled to surrender; but as the driver failed to check his team, some of our men fired at him, and he tumbled over in the wagon to avoid the balls. I was near enough to touch the horse on my side of the road, and had to spring aside to avoid being run over. That foraging party got through without a scratch, and a sillier-looking set of scouts you never saw as we looked each other in the face. The only man of the entire number who looked as if he could smile was the captured picket, and it would have been dangerous for him to have smiled too broadly. We took our prisoner and made tracks for our horses, lest our enemy might come back and try it again. We did not tell this when we got back to our command.

Some of them were from Saginaw, Mich.; and if any of them should see this, they would laugh again at how they got away from the Mississippi cavalry.

MEMBERS OF GENERAL LEE'S STAFF.

BY DR. E. D. NEWTON, ATHENS, GA.

Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget. —Kipling.

How few of our veterans and the general public know who constituted the staffs of Gen. Robert E. Lee, the noble commander of the Army of Northern Virginia! Col. W. H. Taylor, now the President of the Marine Bank of Norfolk and for four years a member of the staff of General Lee, gives me a list of the staff members. For the benefit of the survivors of Lee's army, for the Confederate army, and for the future historians of the War between the States, I ask that you find space in the VETERAN for this list. Gen. E. P. Alexander, in answer to my request to inform me who of said list were living and who were dead, wrote:

"SOUTH ISLAND, S. C., May 8, 1904.

"My Dear Dr. Newton: I have remembered you most pleasantly from the days of my boyhood when I was a West Point cadet on furlough and madly in love with one of the most beautiful and charming young ladies of Athens, Ga., and on down through the war. I am delighted to hear from you again and to know that you are alive and well. I only wish I could answer your questions about old associates of the Army of Northern Virginia. I return herewith Colonel Taylor's letter, General Lee's adjutant general. I have notes in pencil opposite each name, the State, and whether alive or dead, as far as I know. I am living here on my plantation and rarely see anybody. I am trying to write out my recollections of the war, and am busy at it all the while. Progress, however, is slow. I have been at it two years, and am just half through."

[It is well known that the book has been published and is very interesting.—ED. VETERAN.]

COLONEL TAYLOR'S LETTER.

NORFOLK, VA., May 11, 1903.

* * * As you are no doubt aware, all the records of the headquarters of the Army of Northern Virginia were destroyed by our own men on the retreat to Appomattox, and my memory is not equal to the task of giving any more than the chief officers of the several departments of the army who were attached to General Lee's headquarters at the different periods of his service during the years of 1861-65. And even in an attempt to do this I would only claim to be approximately correct.

General Lee's first service in the field was in the western part of the State of Virginia. In this campaign he was attended at first by his aids-de-camp, Col. John A. Washington and Capt. Walter H. Taylor, and after Colonel Washington was killed by his one remaining aid.

During his three months' service in South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida he had the following staff: Virginia—Capt. Thornton Washington, Assistant Adjutant and Inspector General, dead; Capt. W. H. Taylor, Assistant Adjutant and Inspector General, living; Maj. A. L. Long, Chief of Artillery, dead. Connecticut—Captain Ives, Chief of the Engineers, dead; Captain Maffitt, Naval Aid-de-Camp. South Carolina—Capt. James Manigault, Volunteer Aid.

On his return to Richmond, under a special act of Congress, the following constituted his staff: Col. A. L. Long, Military Secretary; Maj. Walter H. Taylor, Aid-de-Camp; Maj. T. M. R. Talcott, Aid-de-Camp, living; Maj. Charles S. Venable, Aid-de-Camp, dead; Maj. Charles Marshall, Aid-de-Camp, dead.

After the wounding of Gen. J. E. Johnston and the assumption of the personal command of the Army of Northern Virginia by General Lee, he carried with him the staff last named and continued in their several positions all of the officers of the general staff of General Johnston except Col. Thomas Jordan, who accompanied General Johnston in his temporary retirement.

In the Seven Days' battles around Richmond the personal staff and the chiefs of the several departments of the service embraced the following officers: Personal Staff—Col. R. H. Chilton, Assistant Adjutant and Inspector General, Virginia; Col. A. L. Long; Majors Taylor, Talcott, Venable, and Marshall, Aids; Capt. A. P. Mason, Assistant Adjutant and Inspector General, Virginia, dead. Chief of Departments—General Pentleton, Artillery, Virginia, dead; Lieutenant Colonel Corley, Chief Quartermaster, South Carolina, dead; Lieut. Col. R. G. Cole, Chief Commissary, Florida, dead; Lieutenant Colonel Alexander, Chief Ordnance, Georgia; Surgeon Lafayette Guild, Medical Director, dead; Col. G. W. Lay, Assistant Inspector General; Lieut. Col. E. J. Harvie, Assistant Inspector General, living; Lieut. Col. W. H. Stevens, Chief of Engineers, New York, dead.

At a subsequent period (I will not attempt to give dates) the staff of General Lee was reorganized and continued to the end as follows: Personal Staff—Lieut. Col. Walter H. Taylor, Adjutant General; Lieut. Col. Charles S. Venable, Aid-de-Camp; Lieut. Col. Charles Marshall, Aid-de-Camp. Chief of Departments—General Pendleton, Chief of Artillery; Lieut. Col. J. L. Corley, Chief Quartermaster; Lieut. Col. R. G. Cole, Chief Commissary; Lieut. Col. B. G. Baldwin, Chief of Ordnance, dead; Lieut. Col. H. L. Peyton, Inspector General, dead; Maj. G. B. Cooke, Assistant Inspector General; Surgeon Lafayette Guild, Medical Director; Maj. Henry E. Young, Judge-Advocate General, South Carolina; Capt. Samuel Johnston, Engineer Officer, Virginia.

Surgeon Lafayette Guild was the chief medical staff officer attached to General Lee's headquarters during the periods mentioned—and, indeed, from Richmond to Appomattox—and the following officers were assigned by order of the War Department to report to Surgeon Guild as his assistants in the performance of the duties that devolved upon him, Surgeon Wingfield, Surgeon Herndon, Surgeon Newton, Surgeon Clagett, all of whom rendered most faithful service. General Lee made special and most favorable mention of the services in his campaigns by the officers of the medical corps in several of his reports, and I can testify to the efficiency of the medical department of that army and the very high esteem in which it was held by our great commander.

What tender memories are evoked by the recalling of all of the names written above! The circle that incloses the names of those now living who stood shoulder to shoulder in the eventful days of 1861-65 is growing smaller and smaller, and those of us that yet remain should be drawn all the more closely together.

I will amend the list of medical officers on duty at headquarters A. N. V. My associates were: Dr. Lafayette Guild, Chief Surgeon and Medical Director, of Alabama, and a surgeon of eighteen years in the old United States army, died at Oakland, Cal.; Dr. R. J. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, died at Houston, Tex.; Dr. J. H. Wingfield, of North Carolina, died at Towson town, Md.; Dr. W. H. Giddings, of South Carolina, Medical Purveyor, died at Aiken, S. C.; Dr. James C. Herndon, of Virginia, died of yellow fever at Fernandina, Fla.; Dr. Edwin D. Newton, of Georgia, living at Athens, Ga.; Dr. Joseph E. Clagett, of Maryland, living at Baltimore, Md.

He was surgeon in charge of the receiving and forwarding hospital and ambulance train, A. N. V. The following, who were members of his immediate staff, are all dead: Dr. Samuel H. Moffitt, of Virginia, Surgeon; Dr. John D. Butts, of Maryland, Assistant Surgeon; Dr. Charles M. Hunter, of Virginia, Assistant Surgeon; Dr. J. W. Sears, of Virginia, Assistant Surgeon.

In his book, "General Lee, His Campaigns in Virginia, 1861-65," Colonel Taylor produces the parole signed by General Lee and the members of his staff: "R. E. Lee, General; W. H. Taylor, Lieutenant Colonel and Assistant Adjutant General; Charles S. Venable, Lieutenant Colonel and Assistant Adjutant General; Charles Marshall, Lieutenant Colonel and Assistant Adjutant General; H. E. Peyton, Lieutenant Colonel and Assistant Adjutant and Inspector General; Giles B. Cooke, Major and Assistant Adjutant and Inspector General; H. E. Young, Major and Assistant Adjutant and Inspector General. Done at Appomattox C. H., Va., 9th April, 1865."

Colonel Taylor, Maj. H. E. Young, and Maj. Giles B. Cooke are the only survivors. Major Cooke wrote recently inquiring for Colonel Peyton.

MEMORIAL DAY IN JACKSONVILLE.

Many features of the Memorial Day observance in Jacksonville, Fla., were distinctively impressive. Heretofore the exercises have been carried out under the united direction of R. E. Lee Camp and Martha Reid Chapter. This time, however, the programme bears the inscription: "Under the auspices of R. E. Lee Camp, No. 58, U. C. V., and Martha Reid Chapter, No. 19, U. D. C., Jacksonville Chapter, No. 1128, U. D. C., Annie Perdue Sebring Chapter, No. 1136, U. D. C." This is significant of the fact that Martha Reid Chapter is proud to initiate her two young sister Chapters (one not yet a year old, the other scarcely two months) into the work she has so long and zealously furthered.

Judge J. L. Doggett, the young and talented orator, thrilled the audience with his splendid memorial address. The musical programme followed under the direction of Mrs. Estelle T. Oltrogge. Threatening skies diminished the number of singers, who were equal to the occasion, and sang "The Sword of Robert E. Lee" and also "In Memoriam," the music set to the latter having been composed by the gifted directress. This song should be in the possession of every Chapter of the U. D. C. to be used on similar occasions.

In addition to the usual programme of distributing crosses of honor, firing the salute over the graves, the soft-sounding "taps" from the bugle, Judge Doggett was presented with a cane cut from the battlefield of Murfreesboro, Tenn. Comrade A. G. Tompkins had no idea of the fact that the company of which the young man's father had been captain had camped during battle in the identical cedar grove from which the cane was cut until the presentation took place.

JUDGE DOGGETT'S ADDRESS.

Ladies and Gentlemen: A communistic or universal custom has most always been the result of a good individual habit. All religious beliefs even were originally cradled in an unattended mind, and thereafter eventualized into a collection of concurrent and confederated faiths. It is indeed, however, most interesting to note that in the evolution of the decoration of the grave our beautiful and sentimental custom at time of burial is unquestionably the product of a most humane and material theory.

Antique history gleaned from physical relics teaches us that the earliest form of grave decoration (if I may use the term in this sense) evidenced itself under the strange belief that the body (the spirit), the tangible entity, needed sustenance and material cheer during its long silence; and hence, whatever form the shroud took, be it of cloth or of stone, there were placed with it in the sarcophagus little grains of wheat and of corn, as if emblematic of the accepted belief now that with every death a new and simpler life begins. And, too, those very little cereal grains have, after thousands of years of silence and of sleep, been resurrected from those graves, sown on good ground, and in a burst of life again their fruition has been plucked by the hand of the latter-day civilization. Thus it seems that with the ancients the decoration of the grave was a material necessity; with us it is a sentimental but beautiful memorial.

While there had for a long time been in vogue the individual custom of having little flowers star the elastic sod beneath which a body awaits another bugle call, yet it took internal strife in this great republic, a fratricidal war, and the sudden making of thousands upon thousands of widows and orphans to create one memorial day. And though it is a cruel and an iniquitous historical truth that ever since nations were formed they have warred with each other, and although throughout the ages death has scattered itself in the wake of contending armies like the trail of a great serpent that went widowing and orphanizing homes with its hissing, it was left to a sweet, sympathetic, and patriotic Madonna who, though her heart was dead within her, yet with a smile on her face and a kiss on her lips bade you go forth and do your duty, then sat at home and thought and mourned you dead and heard the little voice at her knee of your child, who was too young to understand, "Where is papa?" then sewed and stitched, made bandages out of her skirts, nursed the wounded, soothed the dying—I say it was left to the Southern woman out of the fullness of a bleeding but patriotic heart, and too while the war was in progress, to originate and send sounding through the ages to come the virgin and inspiring custom of a memorial day.

Let me digress and ask you a question. Don't you think there should also be a memorial day for the Daughters of the Confederacy? I consider that the moral and material aid the Southern woman so cheerfully gave in that crisis had as much to do with handing down to posterity the wonderful achievements of the Confederate soldier as did all the lead that was fired throughout the war.

It is, therefore, pardonable pride on my part as the son of an intensely patriotic Southern woman at this season of vernal bloom and at this hour which we memorialize, under these gnarled and sturdy oaks, while nature smiles and adds her little flower faces to the scene, to also remember and pay homage to the memory of another Confederate soldier who gave her heart and life to the cause of the stars and bars because she also thought it was right—the Confederate woman, as grand and as brave a soldier as ever charged to the jaws of death-belching artillery. And she too had a crown of thorns pressed upon her brow; but by the angelic force of her soul it sat like a dove upon her loyal face, where goodness, sympathy, and sorrow had harbored together so long and where the passion of bitterness may have flitted but found no resting place. Place a little flag upon her grave, for she was indeed also "a poor Confederate soldier."

But it is of the former Confederate soldier that I would now speak to you, and I am unable to make any distinction between an officer and a private, for a general, after all, is only a soldier leading or directing other soldiers. And so it was amid the armies that bore aloft the flag that stood for the distinct sovereignty of the States, an aggregation of Southern gentlemen, all soldiers and aristocrats, and yet the most democratic body of men that ever graced a field of battle in the history of the world.

Of the many, many attributes that I have known of the Confederate soldier that compel me to love him and his memory, there is one that stands out preëminently in bold relief, that to me characterizes him as at once the most unique and at the same time the most genuine soldier yet recorded.

Europe, Asia, and Africa have each had their frequent and frightful baptisms in the blood of their soldiers; but it has rarely, and certainly not generally, if ever, been otherwise than that there was a deep, broad line of demarcation from a social and material standpoint between the officer and the so-called common soldier. The serfs, the liegemen, the retainers, the peasants most always formed the soldiery class among the nations of the world and did the real fighting; while with us we are an agricultural people, and every white man was his own liege lord and every liege lord was a Southern man and every real Southerner was a real gentleman.

Hence the uniqueness and incomparableness of the Confederate soldier. History never recorded before whole armies being composed of such soldiers—each soldier with a musket by his side, the equal, if not the peer, of any man in the world, save possibly another Southern gentleman. And they were the same in adversity and defeat as they were in temporary good fortune and seeming victory. They were as identical on the mournful slopes of Missionary Ridge as they were on the carmine banks of the Red River. It made no difference whether they were provisioned and equipped at glorious Manassas or foot-sore, covered with rags and hungry, when the sun went down forever at Appomattox.

Let the flag of State sovereignty be elevated, and for that principle alone they cheerfully took each other by the hand, dragging foot after foot, procrastinating even with the hope of sustenance, putting off until another day the despair of beggary; but with head erect and eyes upon their shattered banner, a mere rag in appearance, but incasing ever within its folds the Southland heart, they marched proudly to their Calvary and crucified themselves upon a cross of political righteousness.

Indeed, the Confederate soldier exemplifies the quaintest composite picture in the history of the world—a plain soldier, a proud aristocrat, and an actual democrat.

While it is a beautiful fact, I say there were no classes among the soldiers of the Confederate armies; yet that war as well as all others in a measure organized the Confederate soldier into two parts, the army of the dead and the regiment of the living; and yet again the dead into two divisions, those with marked and those with unmarked graves.

Many of us who are here to-day at this garden of everlasting sleep have a partial crumb of cheer and comfort in that our dead are at least here or identified in other graves; but what of the sons of the South whose graves are unidentified and never decorated, who were buried where they fell, thus sanctifying and making holy that poor soil that has not a voice to heave into sound the secret of its consecrated bosom? 'Tis indeed fitting that they are not forgotten. They performed the very highest function of a soldier. They gave a death gasp on the field of battle in an attempt at the preservation of the true sovereignty of their State that was heard all over the world and will echo through successive ages of heroism as the sterling enthronement of sacrifice, the veritable coronation of patriotism. No, indeed, they are not forgotten.

Their graves are kept green and fresh in the minds of every son and daughter of the South, and that emblem of Southland chivalry and valor waves proudly over them in the hearts of all living Southerners, as it will with their loyal posterity in this land that loves, reveres, and cherishes the memory of a dead Confederate soldier.

All glory to the sons of the South who to-day sleep in undecorated graves! May the dews of heaven continue to refresh your immortal spirit, as the tears of the living keep green your imperishable and immortal sacrifice!

"But beneath a cedar or a pine

In solitude austere,

Unknown, unarmed, but not forgotten,

Rests a faithful volunteer."

To you, the living heroes of that sanctified army, was left the duty of memorializing the dead and vitalizing the throttled industries of your desolate and shattered Southland. What you, brave soldiers, did since that war can be measured only by what you did during the war. You had to clear new fields because the forests had begun to grow in the old ones. You had to construct new mills, because the old ones had felt the demolishing hand of war. You had to build new homes, because the old ones were burned and charred. You had to again immolate yourselves upon the threshold of patriotism and accept the kind of government that your victors demanded that you accept. But the same heroic spirit that immortalized you a soldier, praise be to God! remained with you a citizen.

And now, since it cannot be undone, it makes no difference to you whether the Union soldiers whipped you or whether you wore yourselves out whipping the Union soldiers, this Heaven-protected confederation of States is again a solid compact and an enduring national Union, and this Southland and that Northland now grasp the shaft of the bonny blue flag and raise it aloft amid the nations of the world and bid them listen to the grand hymn sung by the Union and Confederate soldier, imparting the tidings that in this reunited nation now and forever political liberty and religious freedom worship and glorify God.

LAST GUN FIRED IN JOHNSTON'S ARMY.

BY J. E. WHITSITT.

There was one engagement of the late Civil War of which I have never seen any account, and I claim that the last gun fired in Joseph E. Johnston's army was fired by General Ashby in person. This occurred a few days after the battle of Bentonville, N. C. The Federals attempted to take and cross a small stream that was held by a part of General Ashby's Brigade. A courier was sent to inform the General, and he soon appeared on the scene with his staff and escort.

In a short while the enemy advanced on the ford with treble our number, but the dashing little Ashby held the place. We were sheltered somewhat by trees, and the only loss I now remember was the horse of Capt. James Lester, of Ashby's staff, which was shot in the neck. This was late in the afternoon, and the next morning the armistice was declared.

I think Capt. George Guild was in this engagement. I never saw General Ashby appear to better advantage than he did on this occasion. There are scores of us yet who mourn the untimely end of our beloved chieftain.

The South Carolina Division, U. C. V., will hold its State Reunion at Greenville August 11, 12.

THIRTEENTH VIRGINIA INFANTRY—HUMOR.

BY ALEXANDER HUNTER.

For a limited time no regiment in the army had more glorious enjoyment than the 13th Virginia Infantry. Fully they deserved it, for it had been their first opportunity during the war of falling into a soft place. They were in the van of Ewell's Corps when he advanced, and had taken a distinguished part in driving Milroy out of Winchester in June, 1863, and capturing his entire stores.

Such an abundance of plunder they had never seen before, and each man in the regiment was arrayed in style: among other things, linen, underwear, shining patent leather boots, and black slouch hats to cap the climax. There were creature comforts and almost forgotten delicacies too numerous to mention which went far to swelling the full tide of that earthly content which rolled in upon each man's soul and reflected itself in every lineament of his face.

The 13th was then placed on guard duty in Winchester while the army moved on its invading march. Ah, what a bright, sunny spot they found it, amid all the desolation of want, of woe, of hardship! It shines out like a rare, bright jewel from a jet setting, and makes for a brief period the memory of a soldier's life the happiest to him in the world. Scores of barrels of liquor had been captured from the common stone fence for distribution among the rank and file and the delicate "Otard" for the general and staff. Shades of old Bacchus! what a splendid judge of whisky was old Milroy! We pardoned his numerous shortcomings, his cruelty as we drank his favorite brands.

These stores were placed under charge of the 13th, and in truth they kept them well. Especially faithful in seeing that none were wasted was Company A, for the time Colonel Terrill's bodyguard. Theirs was only clerking duty, such as sorting the liquor, counting the stores (which had a lamentable way of getting mixed so as to require arranging every day), and attending the Colonel. The other nine companies had the watches, the details, and the guarding to do. They also had flat beer to drink, while Company A regaled itself on wine. But then flat beer to the thirsty is palatable enough, so who could complain? Not Company A, forsooth, who never touched it.

What a jovial set were those choice spirits of the regiment! men Prince Hal and Jack Falstaff would have loved, courtiers who would have made the rafters ring over poor Yorick's quips, cranks, and jests.

There was Captain George, the quartermaster, the oracle and wit of the 13th, a fellow like Foote of most infinite mirth, irresistible when he chose, and capable of bringing tears of laughter from the face of grim, grave Ben Jonson himself. There too was Towles, he with the remarkable memory, who never forgot anything except his debts; a queer, Dutch-built-looking individual who could tell more marvelous yarns and get drunker quicker than any other man. Then who could forget Tom Beckham or Dick Bernard,

"The best comrade in a feast
And the best friend in a fray," and withal the most generous, the most genial, the kindest of heart, and the sweetest singer that ever sang and—died? His voice, a baritone, was rich and deep, and lingered in one's memory like an echo; his laugh thawed and warmed like sunshine. Men loved and women adored him, and both grieved sorely when, after two short months, they laid him in the grave. "Whom the gods love die young."

It was an idle life we led, sleeping late, drinking Milroy juleps, smoking Milroy Havanas, and in stumping toilet visiting the "Flying Artillery."

Where was the officer or the gentleman private in the ranks who did not know them—those beauties, the names and fame of whom were household words in the Army of Northern Virginia, sweet Annie and Katie and Alice? No princess or duchess ever commanded half your universal homage! On parade, in the pauses of the dance, in the parlor with the lamp turned down, arm in arm ou claire de la lune, hundreds told their love.

In the meantime high ran the words, many and heated were the arguments in every mess room and camp over the comparative beauty of the three. Venus herself would have taken the golden apple back; for, while she would have given it to one alone unchallenged, yet when together she saw them in their glowing loveliness she must have despaired and left it for mortals to decide. Annie was a blonde of purest type, with a face like a water nymph's and a bust like Juno's. The sentimental and romantic gathered about her. But both Katie and Alice were brunettes of the most pronounced type, with such full, voluptuous figures as Rubens loved to limn. Talk of the "Arabian Nights," with its Scheherazades and Fatimas painted in such glowing colors; how might they compare one hour with this trio of living beauty?

At this time they were holding court at Winchester, and later on in Richmond; but wherever they might be, their parlor was thronged daily by soldiers of every grade, from the major generals down to the private in the rear rank. In one continuous stream the throng of visitors poured in. They were called the "Flying Artillery" for two reasons: the first on account of the execution they did among the infantry, and second because they were ladies of accelerated gait—not too fast, but just fast enough.

The morning passed in this charming society only too soon; but about sunset, after Milroy's health had been drunk at dinner in draughts of his own generous wine whose fumes had been slept off in evening naps, Captain George appointed regular details to do the courting, or rather to relieve those who had guarded the "Flying Artillery" during the forenoon. He would so arrange his relief that only three at a time should visit that trio of charms, those three rosebuds in the rosebud garden of girls, and their time was allotted to one hour apiece—only one short hour to listen to the voice of the sirens—and then the relief would remorselessly enter and assume the posts.

The girls never interfered with one another. Each had her lovers; and while Kate sat in the entry, Alice would occupy the parlor, so cool, so dark, so refreshing in contrast to the flaming heat outside. Annie would be in the sitting room, where old Mrs. C. (mother of Annie and Katie) in a capacious arm-chair would sit and slumber peacefully for hours. Apparently she was asleep, but she was a wise mother and kept one eye open. Should you wish to prove it, just become a little too ardent in your behavior, and see if a nuzzle and a grunt would not bring you back to your senses.

She kept away the married men most determinedly. Many and many an officer swore to her he was single in a way that, could his spouse have heard him, would have turned her hair gray. Old Mrs. C. seemed to have an army roster of her own, and knew more than a life insurance agent or the adjutant general himself.

"My girls," she would say, "have to marry, and I don't want them to fool away their time on nothing."

At eleven o'clock to the minute this maternal hen called her chicks together, and close up the house she would. No prayers, no entreaties availed. A mule could not have been more obdurate or the sphinx deaf. No one could manage the old lady except Captain George. He could talk like an angel, and then he had charge of the captured stores besides. It might be that the barrels of flour, the hams, the sugar and coffee which were rolled gently into the back yard might have come from him; if so, the mother said nothing, and the Captain was silent. At any rate, no one but a suspicious Paul Pry of a fellow would have cherished the idea for a moment or imagined these divinities cared to eat. No, it was the Captain's winning tongue.

At midnight—that time when, as popular superstition hath it, the churchyards yawn and spirits walk abroad—the regular fun commenced. As the clock struck that solemn hour the provost marshal's office would be closed, the doors and shutters barred so that not a chink of light could glimmer through, blankets were hung on all crevices, and even the keyholes were plugged, and silence and slumber reigned without. But within were gathered the quartermaster and the choice spirits of Company A. They would run a long table through the room, on which were many candles stuck in bottles, the general commanding having forgotten to leave the plate behind him. On one end of the table were bottles of every kind, while several kegs were rolled into the center of the room. The soldiers would stand ready, and Captain George would pass the wine. Every cup would be filled with Chambertin, for with that the Captain always commenced. Each man stood expectant while in a resonant and loud voice the quartermaster gave the leading toast: "Here's to our friend, General Milroy." And the wine would be drunk with a rousing hurrah.

Bernard would then make the roof ring with his magnificent voice, Bob Rogers would outpick the celebrated Joe Sweeney on the banjo, Towles would give us an oration, Beckham would sing a comic song with the whole company as chorus, and the mirth would grow fast and furious. The bottles with heads knocked off are empty now and pitched with a crash into the corner; the kegs have taken their places. Cans are emptied without waiting for the sentiment. Faces have flushed and articulation grown indistinct; a perfect babel of commingled sounds arises, every man talking as rapidly as he can, regardless of his listeners.

"Said I to her, 'Katie, I'll swear you are'— "Little, you may be sure, only half rations and"— "Well, old fellow, here's to you and me"— "Give me Annie forever"— "The Colonel says"— "I kissed her, and then the old lady woke up and"— "Hair black as the raven's wing"— "The bullet struck him fair in the"— "Forty-five miles we made that day, or else I'm a"— "Confounded moon calf came in just as Katie was about to"— "Open with the guns." And so on in a ceaseless babble.

At last would come a double knock on the door, the signal of a friendly guard notifying us that the day was breaking. The office would be made tidy and the men dispersed to their quarters, those who could not walk being carried to the captain's rooms, where he kept every requisite to sober a drunken man.

Our little squad of men transferred to the cavalry began now to look out for their horses, and for two hundred dollars apiece we each secured a mount, and a good one at that. We bought them without asking questions and kept them in a deserted stable, declining Captain George's invitation to place them in the officers' stalls, a declination afterwards much to be regretted.

At this time horse-stealing had come to be a fine art, and in our army so thorough and established had the system become that it possessed every horseman with a feeling of insecurity. Many desperadoes made it a business, and plied their trade with such success and so fearlessly that no cavalryman could sleep away from his command without the end of the halter in his hand. For outside of the regular camp a stray horse would disappear as suddenly and certainly as the night would come and never be heard of again.

It was an easy and a safe business, this horse-stealing, with the chances of detection at zero. A horse once gone, it was well-nigh impossible to trace him among so many thousand; and then the purchaser (even though he found that his money had been paid for a stolen animal) would be far more apt to conceal his bargain than yield the horse to the rightful owner.

It would have been rather an unfortunate thing for the thief to have been caught in the act by any one of the cavalry. They hated this class of culprits worse than they did even a deserter, and would have shot any such offender on the spot without judge or jury, as they did several during the war, whose "taking off" was somewhat different from their expectations.

The sultry days of July, 1863, passed swiftly, an era in the lives of the soldiers, who were tasting the very romance of war, such as had come to them in dreams, but which was all too rare in the experience of the volunteers of the Rebel army. In the meanwhile the "Flying Artillery" kept up their levees, and with many the situation was becoming desperate; even Captain George was alarmed. "I cannot let any of these youngsters become involved," he said. "I will even be glad when the march commences. The Old Scratch only knows how many of them mean business."

Yes, it was true: the "Artillery" were securing their victims by scores, and many were the offers of marriage. But mamma shook that cool old head of hers: "No." For the courtiers who aspired to be sons-in-law were either officers from the far South, who probably had living wives, or nameless poverty-stricken privates with never a dollar in their pockets or the hope of any. Sometimes a big fish would be nearly landed or some young innocent eligible, but for some unexplained reason the affair never culminated in marriage.

Why this was so became a mystery no one could solve. It could not be that they lacked beauty, it could not be that they were averse to the state matrimonial, for they took particular pains to impress the fact that marriage was the chief aim of a woman's life. Who of the fortunate ones of the old army cannot recall over an after-dinner's cigar sweet Katie C— as in the soft summer night she would rest her head upon the masculine shoulder and murmur that couplet from "Lalla Rookh," which had worked the mischief with so many,

"Two souls with but a single thought,
Two hearts that beat as one?"

But it was the leave-taking that was the touching part of the whole experience, calculated to put feeling into a stone. Why, it was worth a month's pay in advance to hide behind the curtains and hear the vows registered on high of deep affection, unalterable attachment; to watch the tears glisten in Katie's eyes, blue as summer ether, while she promised to be faithful, probably about the thirtieth time that day; to hear her murmur,

"Farewell! a word that hath been and must be A sound that makes us linger."

About the middle of July our army passed through Winchester en route to their old camping grounds. The battle of Gettysburg had taken many thousands from the ranks; still, no eye could tell the difference. Their step was as proud, their lines as well dressed as when they advanced to battle. With colors flying, bands playing, they filed for hours in one unbroken, unceasing line through the principal streets of the town.

In the evening Colonel Terrill, acting provost marshal, received orders to evacuate Winchester the next morning, and in accordance therewith he commanded his subordinates to make the necessary preparations.

Upon the receipt of this intelligence Captain George, the quartermaster, called an informal meeting. Speeches were made and a committee duly appointed, who returned with the following resolutions, which were at once acted upon:

"Whereas the order to evacuate Winchester has been given, thereby deranging our plans and causing the hearts of the girls to grow heavy at our leaving;

Resolved, That we hereby bequeath them our memories to cherish.

"Whereas, being good and loyal soldiers to the Confederacy, we feel bound to obey the order to retreat;

Resolved, That we appoint Dick Bernard and Tom Beckham to wait upon the Flying Artillery and assure them of our lasting love and regard; and also to request of the said Flying Artillery that eighteen of us may have a ten-minute walk each in the moonlight, the names to go alphabetically.

"Whereas, owing to the uncertainty of the future and the many and various vicissitudes of war, it is doubtful—nay, improbable—whether the comrades in arms herein assembled will after to-morrow ever meet in this world again; and whereas we have to leave in the morning; it is

Resolved, That our last night together shall be one to commemorate the sad occasion; that we will celebrate it by a final banquet; that at twelve o'clock sharp the present company is requested to meet at the provost marshal's office."

That evening the appointed committee of two returned from their interview with the "Flying Artillery," from whom they brought a favorable answer. At the hour decreed the aggregate swains repaired in a body to bid farewell to their enslavers. The mass of them remained at the front gate while each lover took his prescribed ten minutes. Vows were breathed, tears wept; and if locks were exchanged with all, the young ladies would have been as bald as a squash.

Punctual to the time, the party assembled at the guard-house; and after going through the formula of securing the doors and concealing the lights, the business of the night commenced. Captain George took the chair, and alluded feelingly to the last meeting of congenial comrades who to-morrow would each go on his separate path, acting well his part, doing his duty whatever it might be, or else yielding up his life in willing sacrifice on his country's altar. He hoped every man would live to see the end of the war and the triumph of the cause he espoused. Lastly, he paid a high compliment to the good taste of our predecessors who had left behind such fine liquor; and as the toasts were now in order, he would give the usual one—"To Johnny Reb's best friend, Quartermaster General Milroy."

Some one then gave the sentiment which always followed, "The Flying Artillery," adding, "May they each get a rich husband, change their names, and cease to be camp belles!"

Just here he was interrupted suddenly by a young soldier, who arose and with flushed face and unsteady voice begged leave to inform the company that he did not intend to listen to remarks about those ladies, since one of them, whose name was too sacred to be handed from lip to lip at a mess supper, was his affianced wife. He would consider the first repetition an insult to himself.

A storm of laughter broke out, and he was pulled peaceably down, while the toast was drunk with honors.

Dick Bernard's toast, "To the women of Virginia, who clothe us in the field, who nurse us in the hospital, who cheer and comfort us in all our sorrows," was drunk standing. His rich baritone voice rang out in song once more on the theme he best loved, while not a sound interrupted when he sang:

"No ribbons nor stars would a soldier prize,
Such baubles could never inspire him.
Were the ribbons not loved for the hand that ties,
The stars for the eyes that admire him."

Now Pat Keely has broken in upon the pause with a toast of his own: "To my countrymen of New York City, the true sons of the Auld Isle, who kicked up the first shindy against the draft. May they always have a head to crack!" After it was drunk, he had commenced in a high but not unmusical voice,

"I like to lie down in the sun
And drame when my faytures is scorchin';
And when I'm too old for more fun,
I'll marry a wife with a forchin.
And then"— when the song came to an untimely end.

A tremendous crash was heard and the door was burst in by the shock. Instantly the room was filled with soldiers with their guns at a charge, and behind them was the colonel. In a strange voice he cried: "Fire, men, fire!"

Paralyzed by the suddenness of the assault, not a man moved at first; but when the meaning of the order broke in on our astonished minds, we dropped flat on the floor with simultaneous alacrity and crawled under the table with haste, all except one cool hand, who with a comprehensive sweep knocked the lights off the table and shrouded the place in utter darkness. Lying flat upon the floor, the crowd awaited developments.

After a while a light was struck, and behold, the group crouching on the ground and the guard gone! Had there ever been a guard or had it been all a dream? We rose and stared at one another in blank amazement, until Captain George returned with a solution of the mystery.

"The Colonel is very drunk," he said; "and having heard a noise in the office, he gathered a file of soldiers and broke open the door. Hardly knowing what he was saying, he ordered the guards to shoot, which of course they refused to do. Had they been green soldiers, the consequences might have been deplorable. As it was, with a glance they understood the condition of affairs, and went off laughing at our terror. The sudden darkness seemed to have sobered the Colonel, and he will apologize to you to-morrow, for I made him understand how he had compromised himself by being intoxicated and then ordering his escort not only to fire upon his own men but actually upon his own staff."

This affair effectually ended all desire to continue the revel; so the late feasters hied off to bed.

The next morning the 13th was drawn up in line, and the little squad of recent infantrymen hastened to get their horses. But on reaching the stables we found that they were gone.

We stood for a moment trying to realize the situation. Two hundred pounds of baggage and saddles, bridles, and horses gone! No money and two hundred miles from the command! Those mountains to cross on foot! It was a cruel summing up, and strong expletives expressed it; for a Black Horse cavalryman on foot was a forlorn being to be jeered and mocked at.

With the vindictive hope that we might meet the rogues face to face (and the horses), we returned to the barracks, threw away two-thirds of our clothes, put ourselves in light marching order, took our places for the nonce in the ranks of Company A, and filed down the street with them.

We passed out of the town, and by the little cottage sitting back into the yard, fraught with so many fond recollections, there were the three Graces, looking lovelier in their tears than they ever appeared in their joy. The troops made the marching salute, the flag was lowered in their honor, the band broke into those familiar strains, "The Girl I Left Behind Me," and, striking southward, we left the pretty "Artillery" and Winchester far in the distance.

In about two weeks of leisurely marching we reached our commands, then picketing the Rappahannock near Fredericksburg.

HAMPTON'S LEGION AND HOOD'S BRIGADE.

BY E. SCOTT CARSON, SUMTER, S. C.

To avoid apparent egotism I have refrained from writing some things for the VETERAN; but after reading the statement of a Federal officer, who says, "The only criticism I have to make is that there is not enough of personal experience of the boys from your side," I feel impelled to lay aside my modesty. I had the honor of being a member of the Hampton Legion in Hood's Texas Brigade, and was present at the battle of Sharpsburg. My senior officer having been killed in the early part of the engagement, the command of my company fell upon me. I have often wished that some dear comrade who was present would write some account of the part taken by the Hampton Legion, but I have seen none.

While in the Texas Brigade our regiment did its hardest fighting, having been with them at Second Manassas, Boonsboro, Sharpsburg, and elsewhere, and I have no hesitancy in saying that no troops ever exhibited such bravery as did the Texas Brigade at Sharpsburg. In referring to my regiment, in our immediate front there came up three successive lines of Federal troops. We repulsed the first two; and as the third came on, being reinforced with those who had fallen back, it seemed that the whole world was in arms against us. A grander sight I never witnessed. Their new, bright flags were waving in every direction. They had, as I then thought, massed in our front. The firing was fast and furious at very close range; a gun becoming too hot or a ramrod lodging in a foul barrel, the gun was thrown down and replaced with one that had fallen from the hands of a comrade either killed or wounded.

Our regiment, like the Texans, was thinned down to a mere skirmish line. Officers and men fought with the rifle, and the dead and wounded lay in heaps. The sun was obscured by the smoke that hung over us, and partly hid the horrible sight from view. Our flag fell time and again until the entire color guard was swept away, when our gallant Maj. Harvey Dingle took it up and was instantly killed, the flag falling over him. Immediately the order to "fall back and take care of the colors" was given by our Col. Mart Gary, and with a few others I brought out the dear old flag.

I heard Colonel Gary ask General Hood if we would get reinforcements. The reply was, "I have sent for them, but they are not to be had;" and General Hood wiped his eyes as the tears ran down his cheeks. I thought the day had gone against us, for we fell back, passing through the woods by Dunkard church. Coming into a field, we made another stand in the edge of the woods, awaiting the Federals, who were following us up not far off. When we fell back again, my heart leaped with joy, for I beheld the field full of fresh troops—the long-looked-for reinforcements. Kershaw's South Carolina Brigade was at hand marching in column of regiments, their brave old general at their head. They had come from Harper's Ferry; and as we passed his brigade to the rear, the General waved his hat and said: "Cheer up, men! South Carolina is not whipped yet; here are more of her boys." I thanked God and felt like a new man. They had not gone far when they wheeled into line and drove the Federals beyond Dunkard church. The Hampton Legion when halted made four or five stacks of arms and had saved the colors of their regiment. The Legion resembled an ordinary company, and did not regain its regimental appearance until we recrossed the Potomac and went into camp at Winchester, Va.

The Hampton Legion was sometime afterwards placed in Jenkins's South Carolina Brigade. Think of it! six regiments of South Carolinians, the flower of the old Palmetto State, a noble and brave body of young men with as fine a man, as gallant an officer to command them as ever lived. While in East Tennessee, after our failure to capture Knoxville, Colonel Gary received orders to have his regiment mounted. In the meantime he was promoted to brigadier general. Leaving Jenkins's Brigade and marching across the Blue Ridge Mountains, we came to Greenville, S. C., and received twenty days' furlough to visit home, get horses, and report back mounted to Columbia.

The Legion then went to Virginia and was brigaded with Haskell's South Carolina Cavalry and the 24th Virginia Cavalry, all under the command of Gen. Mart Gary. He had the implicit confidence of his old regiment, who had served under him from the time he was made colonel, at the reorganization of the army at Yorktown, Va. He was a brave and fearless officer with a heart full of love for his old regiment, an officer who always studied the comforts and wants of his men, and did not hesitate to show by promotion his high appreciation of gallantry on the part of an officer or the most humble private in his command. Such was Gen. Mart Gary, and his blessed memory follows me through life.

During our stay in Hood's Texas Brigade there had sprung up a feeling of brotherly love between the Hampton Legion and the Texans. We placed great confidence in our Texas brothers that lasted through the war. On more than one occasion I heard the question, "What troops on our right or left?" and when the reply would come, "The Texans!" a feeling of delight and confidence would thrill the breasts of the entire regiment.

I have mentioned only a few facts in connection with my old regiment, trusting they may reach the eyes of some of my comrades. I was taken prisoner a night or two before the surrender, and after the surrender was taken in a box car to Farmville, Va. To my old comrades I would say: "When thinking of friends and loved ones whom death claimed on many hard-fought battlefields and your eyes moisten with tears, harbor no feeling of resentment, but add a fervent prayer for the good of our common country and teach our children to love it and our flag!"

REMNANT OF ARMY THAT CAN'T BE INCREASED.

[Part of Gen. Bennett H. Young's address before the United Confederate Veteran Association in Birmingham in 1908.]

The United Confederate Veteran Association in many respects is one of the most remarkable institutions in the history of the world. Its plans, organization, and membership give it a commanding position amongst those who understand its purposes and witness its workings.

It is composed of a fixed and given number of men. Not a single additional recruit can ever find a place on its rolls. Day by day death with relentless hand and tireless pursuit strikes down its members; but none can be called to fill the ever-decimating files, and a gradual but speedy extinction awaits this unarmed host that with souls full of heroic courage stand without fear to meet the only foe that Confederate legions could not defeat with even chances.

Hundreds of thousands would gladly take the places of those who have fallen; but the inexorable decree of fate will not allow another name to be entered on that immortal scroll which contains the names of those who so grandly and fearlessly "followed the stars and bars" and stood so manfully and faithfully for the honor and the independence of our beloved Southland.

This great aggregation seeks no profit and asks no power. Its best achievements are in the past, and the records of those who compose it are so glorious that they would not efface a single line nor add a single word to the story of what they did, dared, and suffered.

Its insignia everywhere is a passport to the companionship of the good, the true, and the brave, and the shout of its decreasing legions is an inspiration to the noblest courage and loftiest patriotism. Unnumbered millions could not buy a place in its ranks nor sign one name to its roster. It represents the survivors of the superbest volunteer army that ever aligned under any flag or fought for any cause. In all that made dauntless valor, noblest heroism, fearless intrepidity, and magnanimous chivalry the Confederate soldier takes second place to none. Neither spoils nor personal glory nor national aggrandizement nor lust for power animated his bosom or nerved his arm. He contended for the most precious principle that ever dominated a human soul, the inalienable right of self-government, and he bared his heart to the storms and dangers of war only to defend his fireside and home. No army of equal numbers ever covered a wider territory of defense or sacrificed a greater percentage of its numbers in any conflict of which history has kept an account. Three hundred thousand dead on battlefields or in hospitals, one-half of all its enlistments, tell the world how brave were its legions and how unconquerable their spirit, and challenge Time, the keeper of all human records, to produce from his annals any who have exhibited higher consecration to duty or more faithful performance of all that manhood could suggest.

This splendid organization has for its primary purpose the conservation of the story of the courage and daring of the men who wore the gray, and it seeks to place in printed forms what these men did for the cause to which they swore allegiance and offered their lives; and with that truthfully told, they calmly and fearlessly appeal to the judgment of mankind for the splendor of their service and the loyalty of their devotion to that holy cause which called them into the greatest war that was ever waged between civilized people in any age.

Here to-day the living and the dead meet in sweetest communion. The past and the present are in harmonious accord.

The dead brood over the living with affectionate inspiration, and the living defend and glorify the dead as amongst the noblest of earth's heroes. Together we stand for a true history and a just portrayal of what was done on the two thousand battlefields that tell the story of Confederate courage and achievement from 1861 to 1865, what was said and decreed in the councils of the Confederate government; and with such record, fairly and honestly made, the men of the South confidently and serenely appeal for vindication and justification to those who shall follow them in ages to come.

POEM BY FATHER RYAN NOT IN THE BOOK.

[Mrs. Jo W. Allison, of Texas, is responsible for the appearance of a poem by Father Ryan that has never appeared with his published poems; though one that conveys the same thought is found in the complete collection under the title "Remembrance." Mrs. Allison sent the poem to the Ennis News, and it appeared in that paper in January. It was written and dedicated to a friend in deep affliction.]

In the eclipse of your soul
How oft the shadows fall
On you and me and all
In life's lonesome days of dole!
And when you cry,
"O God, give less of dark and more of light!"
And when you sigh,
"Sweet Christ, give more of day and less of night!"
And when you pray,
Heart wearied of some cross your soul must bear;
And when you say,
"How hard the crown of thorns my brow must wear!"
Hard when your eyes are showers of tears;
And when your lips the home of sighs—
Then ponder this thought that floats from me,
Veiled in the song I sing to thee:

Every sorrow is the shadow
Of God closely passing by;
He is near us when we are smiling,
He is near us when we sigh!

He is by us in our gladness,
When our hearts are all at right;
He is near us in life's daytime,
He is nearest in the night.

He is with us in joy's losses,
With a love that never parts;
He is with us when life's crosses
Seem to crush our very hearts.

SHARING CREDIT WITH GENERAL WHEELER

BY S. B. LOVE, RICHLAND, TEX.

Reviewing my VETERAN, I notice an article from D. M. Guthrey (page 267, 1905) in which he claims that Wheeler's command had not received the credit it deserved for its services around Atlanta. This no doubt is true; but it seems to me that he is claiming too much, as he ignores the presence of W. H. Jackson's Division, composed of General Armstrong's Brigade of Mississippians and Ross's Brigade of Texans. Jackson's Division commenced the pursuit of McCook at nine o'clock at night July 28, and did not halt for any purpose until about four on the 29th.

We overhauled the Federal command and charged it in column, scattering quite a number of them in the woods and demoralizing them to such an extent that sixteen surrendered to a citizen, and he turned them over to Ross's Brigade. Some three hours after we commenced the fight we learned that a part of Wheeler's command had come to our assistance. I never saw them, but understood that General Wheeler was in command of the entire force after he arrived. I do not know to whom the surrender was made; but Ross's Brigade took charge of them, and the writer of this was one of the detail to take them to headquarters.

I also know that the captured horses were left to the control of Ross, as I was afterwards detailed by Ross in person to go to Newnan and order the captured horses up to the command, and I exchanged my own for a Federal horse.

Wheeler's command has enough to its credit without attempting to claim more than is due.

CONCERNING BATTLE OF SHILOH.

BY W. B. PIPPEN, SHEFFIELD, ALA.

I am writing this article because I take considerable interest in the battle of Shiloh. I was a member of Company E, 28th Tennessee Infantry, Statham's Brigade, Breckinridge's Division, consequently was in the very heart of the battle of Shiloh. Sometime ago I saw an article in the VETERAN from Mr. Alex Van Winkle, of Franklin, Ill., wanting to hear from some one through the VETERAN concerning the fighting on the ground near where General Johnston was killed. Statham's Brigade fought near this place from eleven in the morning till one o'clock in the afternoon. About one o'clock General Breckinridge rode through our lines and ordered us to cease firing, to fix bayonets and fall in line; that we had been giving them hot lead all day, and now we would give them cold steel; that the enemy could not stand cold steel, for he could feel that they were giving way. As soon as we were in place (and this was quickly done) the General ordered us forward on quick time, he riding in front of the 28th Tennessee Regiment. As he gave the order, "Forward on double-quick time; come on, boys," the Rebel yell thrilled as never before.

The enemy formed in the ravine where Johnston died, and they held it till our forces came within forty yards of them. As they were crossing the ravine we fired upon them, and this volley seemed to cut down about one-half of them. Breckinridge ordered us to reload and fire, saying that this volley got half and another would get the other half.

I heard the General say after the battle that this charge was the bloodiest that was made. It is generally admitted that Johnston came to the front in the afternoon and stated that this position was the "key to the landing" and we would have to "unlock it" with bayonets. This was evidently Statham's Brigade, as there was no other charge made on this part of the field till Statham's and Stevens's Brigades made a dash through the Bell peach orchard and fell back to where some of our men had been fighting at the Bloody Pond. I have heard men of different regiments say they saw General Johnston taken off his horse. Mr. Latimer, of the 20th Tennessee, says that he saw him taken off, and that there were no other troops on the ground except Statham's Brigade. I never saw General Johnston on the field where he died, but he evidently expired on the ground where Statham had been fighting in the forenoon. I think Latimer was right, for Isham G. Harris said that he left the General and went to place Statham in position south of the peach orchard, and that when he returned he saw General Johnston reel in his saddle and conveyed him to where the monument stands on the battlefield, taking him off his horse and carrying him down in the ravine, where he died.

If my recollection serves me right, my regiment fought the 9th Illinois. If I am wrong about what I have written, I would be glad to be corrected. I wish particularly to hear from some one in my regiment as to the correctness of my recollection. Major Reed has told me that Statham never made any report of the battle. General Statham died in Vicksburg, Miss., in 1862. Major Reed has told me that I was the only man of this brigade who had ever been on the field to locate any ground. He informed me that if I would locate any ground that we fought on before we formed south of the peach orchard at 2:30 P.M. he would have it marked.

On the 6th of April I went on the battlefield, and met there Mr. Alex Van Winkle, of the 31st Illinois, and several others who fought on this particular ground. We talked over the battle, relating different experiences, and spent a very pleasant time together—very different from our experiences in that fearful deluge of blood. They told me that they had never known before whose brigade fought against them till we met there.

Mr. Van Winkle told me that he had examined every report of the battle, and there was nothing to show who fought on that ground. I would be glad to meet some of my brigade there next spring, so that we could show that the soldiers of the brigade did as hard fighting there as any others; and, in fact, closed the battle by charging the Hornets' Nest and capturing Prentiss's Brigade.

Mrs. A. J. Emerson, Denver, Colo., writes: "In a recent daydream a mental picture came to me of the great memorial building to be erected at Richmond. I saw splendid memorial windows in the edifice, and my imagination supplied scenes from the Confederate war as subjects for these windows: Lee and Jackson at Manassas, Lee to the rear. Death of Stonewall Jackson, execution of Sam Davis, negroes defending their mistress, burial of Latane, putting manacles on Jefferson Davis, 'Gloria Victis' (by Ruckstuhl), Merrimac and Monitor, Lee as college president. This may act as a hint or suggestion when the edifice and its windows materialize."

BATTLE OF BELMONT.

BY R. F. LEWIS, PITTSBURG, TEX.

I read in the April VETERAN four accounts of the battle of Belmont, November 7, 1861. At that time I was clerk in the general commissary department under Maj. W. W. Guy, with headquarters on the wharf boat at Columbus. My business was to receive all commissary stores from the transports and railroad. I had ten or twelve drays with negro teamsters. When the fight opened, the negroes all left me. As the saying is, "they burnt the wind." My recollection is that Colonel Tappan's 13th Arkansas Regiment and some of Jeff Thompson's Missouri troops, a small cavalry force, and perhaps two pieces of light artillery constituted all the forces we had on the Missouri side; but when the enemy began landing a force on the Missouri side, General Pillow with the 2d Tennessee Infantry was sent over. A part, if not all, of this regiment was poorly armed. I know one company in this regiment was armed with flintlock muskets, and I think the rest of the command was armed with old British muskets with buck and ball cartridges. I could see the soldiers who took shelter under the bluff for protection at the time of the engagement. There were about seventy-five or a hundred of them there, and none of them were run into the river, as stated by a correspondent of the VETERAN. I talked with one of these soldiers who was under the bluff several days after the fight, and he told me that after firing five or six rounds he lost his flint, and he didn't see any use in staying in line as a target for the enemy.

Getting a gun from one of the wounded that had been brought over, I crossed the river with the 154th Senior Tennessee Regiment—the regiment I enlisted in at its organization. Generals Polk and Cheatham crossed at the same time. My recollection is that we had but one boat at Columbus at the time the fight commenced, which I think was the Charm. On the trip this boat made before we crossed a part of her stairway was shot off by a cannon ball. When we started across the river, the enemy started for their transports. When we landed, we struck the ground at a double-quick, not taking time to form. When we got to their transports, a distance of about two miles, they were backing out in the stream, and kept as close to the opposite shore as possible. We ran to the bank of the river and commenced firing, every man getting the best position he could. The enemy's gunboats did most of the firing at us, being well out near the opposite shore and having good range at us.

One of these transports was the City or the Belle of Memphis, which I fired several shots into. On our route to the transports I saw only very few of the dead and wounded of the enemy, as they had all the time needed to remove them. Within thirty minutes of the time we landed there was not a Federal on the field except dead, wounded, or prisoners. We had about three thousand engaged in this fight, and from my best information the enemy had about seven thousand. We captured about one hundred and seventy-five of them. There was one field officer in this squad, and he was badly wounded in the foot, which was amputated by our surgeons. In trying to save a part of his foot the operation didn't prove successful, and in about fifteen days afterwards it was cut off above the ankle. We captured two fine horses, one dark stallion and one dapple-gray horse. One of Company K of the 154th picked up on the field a fine rain coat marked under the collar "U. S. A." We supposed he sold it to Lieutenant Chairs, of the same company. The enemy captured about twelve or fifteen of our men.

The first or second day after the fight General Grant came down to Columbus with the prisoners for exchange. At that time we had no boat in port to meet them out in midstream, and they were allowed to land at the landing. There was a newsboy selling papers. One of the Yankee officers on board got permission from our commanding officer to buy a paper. The boy sold him the paper; and when he gave a silver coin, the boy threw the coin in the river, saying: "I don't want any Yankee money."

This artillery we had on the Missouri side, I think, was captured. I think there were but two pieces, maybe four. I was talking with one of the Memphis Light Dragoons several days after the fight, and he told me about dragging a slough up the river for these guns, thinking the enemy in their scramble hadn't time to get them on their transports. The enemy fired one shot into Columbus with light artillery (a 6-pounder solid shot) and one shot from the gunboats (24- or 32-pounder), which landed close to our heavy batteries. This shell or solid shot was sent to Memphis, and was on exhibition there for some time. The people of Memphis at that time were greatly enthused, and wanted to change the name of Union Street to Belmont Street.

In the April VETERAN some witnesses think this battle badly managed. I don't see how it could have been managed better. The reason we didn't send troops over sooner was, I understood, that we were looking for an attack on the Columbus side from Paducah.

I notice that the city of Memphis, after a lapse of forty-seven years, is going to restore the motto, "The Union Must Be Preserved," on Jackson Monument in Court Square. I suppose there are not many living who know much about the chiseling off of this motto. I was many a mile from Memphis, and it was a long time ago, when I first heard of it.

ABOUT BATTLE OF BELMONT.

BY WILLIAM TAYLOR, ALTUS, OKLA.

I belonged to Company H, Russell's 12th Tennessee Infantry. In the fall of 1861, or at the time of the Belmont battle, our brigade (Pillow's), composed of the 12th, 13th, and 21st Tennessee Regiments, was in line in the morning with orders, as we understood, to move to Bowling Green, Ky. I was detailed to go with Jackson's Battery when the brigade had moved up opposite Columbus from our camp below the railroad. There seemed to be a hurried demand for troops across the river, and our brigade was sent at once to the Belmont side. When I heard the firing and learned that our command had been sent to the Belmont side, I left the battery immediately, crossed the river, joined my company, and remained with it until the fight was over.

There was no command or any part of any command of the Confederates driven across or who went across to the Columbus side until Grant's command were on their boats or well up the river. Grant's loss in killed and wounded was not less than one thousand or twelve hundred, while ours did not exceed two hundred. I think the loss in killed and wounded in the 12th Tennessee was thirty-two. Our company lost B. Hale (killed), and Capt. B. H. Sandeford, Lieut. W. W. McDowell, Jim Johnson, and William Thomas (wounded). Johnson died a few days later.

Our company was nearly out of ammunition, and had to fall back to the river for cartridges when the boat arrived. We then went back to the line and remained to the end.

If Grant's other reports are as incorrect as his report of Belmont, they would make bad history.

Lieutenant McDowell was wounded while we were falling back to the river, and not, as your former correspondent said, while loading a charge. When wounded he was showing as fine courage in being behind and keeping his men in line as he could have displayed in leading the most desperate charge. While some of your correspondent's statements were wrong, he was right when he said McDowell was kind to his men. He was the kindest and most thoughtful of the welfare of his men of any officer I ever knew.

About the middle of February, 1862, our company was sent to the upper part of Columbus on guard duty. We were to be relieved at 4 P.M. At two o'clock Captain Sandeford carried all the company back to quarters except the third relief, and that kept me on guard. McDowell was left with us, and the relief company did not arrive until six o'clock. The day was very cold and my position was exposed. McDowell came around the line about four; and seeing that I was suffering from cold, he took my gun and told me to go to the house and get warm. I was gone nearly an hour, and returned comfortable and ready for duty. He was certainly brave and kind.

My staff as Commander of the Third Brigade, Oklahoma Division, is: Lieut. Col. Robert Heath, of Mangum, Adjutant General and Chief of Staff; Maj. W. C. Sears, of Frederick, Inspector General; Maj. E. S. Cook, of Altus, Quartermaster General; Maj. Martin Hentim, of Greer, Commissary General; Maj. James Baker, of Headrick, Chaplain.

GEN. A. P. HILL AT SHARPSBURG.

BY C. A. RICHARDSON.

The kindly light of day on the 17th of September, 1862, broke with quiet, tender beauty over the lovely valley of the Antietam, a locality so soon destined to be ever-memorable in American annals. This day of bloody strife dawned upon the mighty hosts that there confronted each other in battle array, conscious that the issue not only of a campaign but of the war itself hung on what should that day be done. The collision was not delayed, and with early light the morning stillness was broken by the rattle of musketry and the hoarse clamor of more than two hundred guns.

The writer requests only brief space to say a few words in reply to Comrade R. T. Mockbee in the April VETERAN, "Why Sharpsburg Was a Drawn Battle," an admirable contribution splendidly and graphically descriptive of Gen. A. P. Hill and his "Light Division" and their heroic work at Sharpsburg about 4 P.M. September 17, 1862. Comrade Mockbee writes with beauty, vigor, and truthfulness anent the grand exploits of A. P. Hill's "two thousand men" that memorable September afternoon when the "dubious tide of battle" hung in the balance ere Burnside was hurled back and Sharpsburg thus became a "drawn battle." Every surviving ex-Confederate knows the gallant and heroic reputation of Gen. A. P. Hill's "Light Division." It is well known how A. P. Hill was regarded by Generals Lee and Jackson; he was to these great commanders the tried and invincible soldier that Marshal Ney was to Napoleon.

There was no need or occasion for Comrade Mockbee to recite A. P. Hill's career, including in part his timely service at Mechanicsville and Gaines's Mill, Frazier's Farm, Cedar Run, and Second Manassas. The survivors of the "Light Division" and all of us will ever cherish the memory of the peerless soldiers who contributed so greatly to making the battle of Sharpsburg or Antietam the "drawn battle" that history records it as duly ascertained by facts and results.

In the first of several published articles on the Sharpsburg fight it was the writer's privilege to coin the expression:

"The gamest fight of the nineteenth century." He cheerfully admits that Gen. A. P. Hill's "Light Division" largely contributed to this truthful phrase.

"MY BAMBOO BIBLE"—A WAR RELIC.

BY LEOLA T. PARK.

'Tis not inscribed with letters from inspired hand;

'Tis not a book of canons well and nobly planned;

'Tis just a wooden trinket whittled while in camp—

A toy mailed to mother with a queer Confederate stamp,

That the little one at home might have at Christmaste
A Santa Claus remembrance Southern stores could not provide.

But like as love divine is conned from Holy Writ
An earthly father's love I humbly read in it.

ROCK ISLAND PRISON.

BY W. J. BOHON, DANVILLE, KY.

I have read with much interest "Inside and Outside of Rock Island Prison," by J. W. Minnich. I was a prisoner there from June, 1864, to March 6, 1865, and was started from there to Richmond, Va., for exchange.

I was a member of the Seven Confederate Knights, and took oath with the other members of that order to suffer death rather than swear allegiance to effect a release from prison. I regret to say there were some who yielded to the temptation, but I have no unkind word for any of those poor sufferers from disease and starvation. The world should know these facts, for the Confederacy has been persistently misrepresented by the Northern press, either through prejudice or ignorance.

All who have informed themselves know that the South did all in her power to care for those of the North in Southern prisons; and when medicine could no longer be furnished for the sick or necessary comforts provided, thousands were tendered to the United States government without demanding an equal number of men in exchange. But the government not only refused to receive their own sick men, but also denied them medicine and comforts in the face of assurances that physicians and nurses might be sent to minister to their prisoners and that we asked nothing at their hands for our own stricken fellows.

The world knows how they persistently refused to exchange able-bodied prisoners. Every word Mr. Minnich has written is true, and yet the half has not been told. I saw a prisoner shot down in cold blood for picking up a loaf of bread which was thrown into the prison from the "calf pen" (the place of confinement for those who had enlisted in the United States army "to go to fight Indians"). This man was strictly within the bounds marked off for the prisoners, not being within fifty feet of the "dead line."

The most humiliating ordeal to which the prisoners were subjected was after the "calf pen" became well filled with "Indian fighters." Each morning a squad of soldiers was brought into the prison and a detail of prisoners from our barrack were marched at the front of bayonets and muzzles of rifles into the "calf pen" and compelled to carry out the filth. Only a coward could have conceived any such system. What weight has a protest from an unarmed man to a coward with a gun in his hand?

I cannot refrain from mentioning the article of Mrs. Kate E. Perry Mosher, known to the prisoners as "Faithful." It is thrillingly interesting and adds much to Mr. Minnich's book. This splendid woman, known as "Faithful," has long been crowned a queen of all that is beautiful and lovable in the hearts of every prisoner of Rock Island who ever heard of her bravery and unselfish devotion. Through her I received money sent from my home which otherwise would never have reached me. My earnest prayer is that she may receive the reward due one who is ever striving to lessen the tide of human sorrow and increase the sum of happiness.

FIFTEENTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY REUNION.

Gen. William J. Palmer, who commanded the 15th Illinois Regiment early in the war, has set an example for rich Southerners who ought to be proud of their less fortunate comrades. General Palmer lives in Colorado, and he extended an invitation to his old soldiers to hold their reunion (the thirty-fifth) for 1897 with him in Colorado Springs, becoming his guests from the time of leaving home to their arrival there again. The two hundred and sixty-seven survivors who went were gathered from twenty-five States. The special train of seven Pullman cars and two dining cars was moved by the pleasantest possible schedule. Every delegate was supplied with a bronze badge, the face of General Palmer being its leading feature. He was presented with one of these in solid gold. The railroad fare for the comrades cost $32.90 each—nearly $9,000—besides the Pullman and dining car service.

At the banquet table were seated two hundred and sixty-three of the old regiment, besides quite a number of other invited guests, among them Maj. A. W. Wills, of Nashville.

HOW GENERAL SEDGWICK WAS KILLED.

BY V. M. FLEMING, FREDERICKSBURG, VA.

Thinking you would like an interesting incident connected with the life of an old Confederate veteran who passed away April 5, 1908, in his eighty-fourth year, I give you the following:

Thomas Burgess, the subject of this little notice, was born in Spartanburg County, S. C.; and died at Jonesville, S. C., some fifteen miles below the town of Spartanburg. He belonged to Company H, 15th Regiment South Carolina Volunteers, Anderson's Division, Longstreet's Corps.

At the battle of Spotsylvania, May 9, 1864, Jenkins's Brigade was thrown on the right of General Lee's line and left of Spotsylvania C. II. to watch the enemy approaching in heavy force. This body of Federal troops was commanded by Gen. John Sedgwick, one of the finest corps commanders in General Grant's army. Jenkins's Brigade was massed in a body of timber with open field in front. Beyond this open space and some four hundred yards in front was a very heavy pine thicket in which Sedgwick's Corps was concealed.

A number of Confederate pickets were thrown out in front of their lines to determine the exact locality of the Federal force, with positive instructions not to fire, so as to conceal the whereabouts of Jenkins's command, but to watch the movement of the Federal forces. Thomas Burgess, of the 15th South Carolina Regiment, was one of these pickets. While on duty and concealed in front of the Confederate line they discovered several Federal officers who rode out in front of their lines reconnoitering and selecting positions for the artillery. The opportunity being inviting, Burgess, contrary to orders, fired at one of these officers, who proved to be General Sedgwick. The shot was fatal, and Sedgwick was carried back into the Federal lines. I think he was killed instantly. Burgess was the only picket who fired, and the fact was incontestably settled that he killed Sedgwick; there can be no question about this.

Burgess never recurred to the circumstance in after life; and when the matter was mentioned in his presence, he always changed the topic of conversation or retired. Somehow he was sensitive on the subject, and could never divorce the thought from his mind that the occurrence was something akin to murder. A less sensitive nature would never have viewed the matter from his angle of observation. During his last night on earth, though, a week ago, his mind wandered back to the scenes of that campaign—the "Bloody Angle," Spotsylvania, and the tragic death of Sedgwick.

I was at Jonesville, S. C., a few days after his death, and was informed that he would wake up in his passing hours and relate the whole occurrence. This is a statement of facts and an addition to history.

DESTRUCTION OF FEDERAL GUNBOAT.

BY MISS CLARA BACOT, U. D. C. AUXILIARY, CHARLESTON.

In the spring of the year 1862, just before Charleston was evacuated, the people were annoyed by a small Yankee gunboat that ran up Warpool Cut and fired on the city from the rear. General Beauregard picked twelve of the Stone Scouts that had done heroic work in defense of the forts and the city of Charleston to put a stop to this boat's destructive work.

These scouts, with Mr. Jerney for captain, at the dead of night carried the only old cannon that could be spared from the forts in a rowboat to an old barn that overlooked the cut; there they cut a door in the back of the barn, hauled the old cannon in, loaded her to the muzzle with grape and canister, and silently awaited the coming of the Yankee boat. Soon the boat rounded the curve into the cut and began throwing shells into the city.

Upstream she came till in front of the old barn, where she turned to go back; but as her prow directly turned to the barn she stuck, throwing the pilot house about twelve yards from the muzzle of the old cannon in the barn. As quick as lightning the barn door was thrown open and the old cannon, with a roar like thunder, belched forth its contents into the boat; and when the smoke cleared away, the scouts saw that the pilot house was gone and that most of the men were dead or dying on board and that the boat was tossing from side to side, while the remaining men were trying to get her turned and started downstream to get back to the fleet, thus giving the scouts time to load the old cannon again. Just as the boat started Captain Jerney pulled the lark string, and with another roar the old cannon burst, but sent its contents as true as before; and this was the first, last, and only Yankee boat that threw shells into Charleston from the rear.

INQUIRY FOR AND ABOUT VETERANS.

W. H. Duff, of Monroe, La., seeks information of the commander of a detail from his regiment. This detachment of Pioneers, as they were called, was of details from companies in the 16th and 25th Louisiana Regiments.

Comrade Duff writes: "The Pioneers were commanded by a Lieutenant or a Captain McPheatas or McPheely, of the old 16th Louisiana, and was in Dan Adams's Brigade, Breckinridge's Division. Our position was on the left of Johnston's army, south of Jackson, and where the breastworks crossed the railroad. West of the railroad and between the contending armies was a family residence, and the family had left it on account of the danger they were in. The Pioneers were ordered to take possession of this house and protect it. As the enemy began to advance near this point the Pioneers were ordered to burn the house to prevent the enemy's sharpshooters from occupying it. The Pioneers took from this house a piano and carried it back to the Confederate breastworks and left it at the position of the fifth company (Washington Artillery), where the piano remained during the siege, and in a few hours it fell to my lot to apply the torch that destroyed the beautiful home of the unfortunate family. On the 12th of July the enemy made a heavy assault against our line east of the railroad and were repulsed with heavy loss. On the 14th the Pioneers were ordered to bury the dead. Col. Seth C. Earle, of the 53d Illinois Volunteer Infantry, was among the slain, and I assisted in burying him under the shade of a tree near the railroad. During the past few years I have received pleasant letters from members of the 53d Illinois Regiment who were with it in that battle."

Comrade Duff prints a letter from Miss Minnie Hemstreet, of Pontiac, Ill., whose father was killed and his body buried by Confederates. Of course Miss Hemstreet grieves that no trace of his grave can be found. She and her mother visited Jackson in 1906, but sought in vain for the grave of their dead. "I had never realized how the South suffered as I did by going down there. It was my first trip there. They lost their men and property as well. The people we met in the South were very nice to us, and I liked them very much.

Comrade Duff thinks his commander of that detail lived in the southern part of Mississippi. He would like to know if he survived the war, and would be glad to hear from any one who knew him and saw him after he left Jackson. If there are any living who were in any way connected with the Breckinridge hospital during the siege of Jackson, he would appreciate it very much if they would write him.

He concludes as follows: "For forty-two years I did not know whose house we burned or the name of the colonel we buried at Jackson, and I wrote a letter to the Adjutant General of the State about the house, asking him to find out if possible whose house it was. A few days later I received a letter from Mrs. A. Q. May, of Jackson, telling me that the house that was burned was the Cooper home, and at that time was the property of Mrs. Cooper, the grandmother of Mrs. May, and that the piano belonged to Mrs. May's mother and was in Memorial Hall, New Orleans, La. Mrs. May sent me a picture of the piano as it is shown in the hall."

Comrade J. P. Churchman, of Field Creek, Llano County, Tex., wishes to correspond with any survivor of Company F, 8th Missouri Infantry who may aid him in his application for a Confederate pension.

Rev. W. E. Towson writes from Boston, Ga.: "James Fitzgerald, who went out from Prattville, Autauga County, Ala., with Company I, 61st Alabama, Colonel Swanson, afterwards Col. Lewis Hill, is anxious to hear from any survivor of his company. Address James Fitzgerald, Box 42, Boston, Ga. In the battle of Petersburg only Mr. Fitzgerald and five others survived of his company as far as he knows. He was taken prisoner at High Bridge, Va., on the 6th of April, 1865, and paroled June 12. He is seventy-eight years old; but he plans to be at the Reunion at Birmingham, where he hopes to meet some of his old comrades."

John T. Rowe, Medina, Tex., refers to an account in the VETERAN some time ago on the reorganization of Govan's old brigade, 1st Arkansas, at Greensboro, N. C., into one regiment, of which Lieut. Col. Peter Snyder was made commander. He is anxious to get the number of that regiment after its reorganization, saying: "I learned that Colonel Snyder died in North Carolina without ever assuming command. We lost Col. John E. Murray on the 22d of July at Peachtree Creek, near Atlanta, Ga., near the spot where Major General McPherson was killed."

M. J. Clark, Mobile, Ala., writes: "I am an old Confederate who went out at the age of sixteen, and am now in the best of health, though I served as a private through the four years of the war. I served two years in the 11th Mississippi Infantry in Virginia and two years under the grand N. B. Forrest in the 1st Mississippi Cavalry. I am a member of Semmes Camp, No. 11, U. C. V., of this city, and the time of our meeting, the third Thursday night, is the best night in every month."

J. T. Brady, Kosse, Tex., writes: "I am one of the old roosters of the Merrimac at Hampton Roads March 8 and 9, 1862. I was reared in Charleston, S. C., and for twelve months after the war commenced was with the harbor and coast defense of South Carolina on board the gunboat Lady Davis, Lieutenant Pelot, commander. After Sumter we shipped on the Patrick Henry at Richmond, but could not get out. After the blowing up of the Merrimac, we were marched to Drewry's Bluff, where we fought the Galena about six hours. I was one of the boys who helped to capture two Yankee gunboats on the Rappahannock below Fredericksburg, Va. Our commander was Colonel Woods, of Richmond. One of our boys helped in the capture of the Underwriter at Newbern, N. C., under the same commander. If any of the old comrades read this, I should like to hear from them."

W. E. Thompson, Atlanta, Ga., writes: "Though unfortunately too young for service, many of my people entered. My father's brothers, William H. Thompson and Ivy F. Thompson, were in Rock Island from the siege of Knoxville until the end of the war. They had a cousin there, William Thompson, who was killed by the blasting of rocks by the Federals among the prisoners on the island. My wife's brother, Benjamin Waller, was similarly killed in the same prison."

Letter to Mr. Newton Cannon, Franklin, Tenn., from J. E. Gadsey, Greenwood, S. C.: "You do not know how my heart rejoiced to hear from you, for you know we all loved you and you were the idol of our company. I could not help shedding tears when I saw your name, and my wife asked why I was crying, and I could not tell her, for I did not know exactly why—only that I could not restrain the tears when the memory of your happy little face in the old long ago came back to me. Even the mention of dear old 'Sockdolager' stirred my emotions. I am glad to hear of the old comrades still living. Now, if I could see you as you were in the old days, I would ask for no greater pleasure. * * * I want one of those crosses of honor. Do you think I was worthy of it? I do not recollect disobeying one of your orders, and I tried to do my duty to my country while I was in the C. S. A."

J. T. Fitzpatrick, Royse City, Tex.: "During July, 1862, I was in the penitentiary at Nashville, Tenn., with several hundred other Confederate prisoners. One dark, rainy night we were called into line about midnight and the roll called, when thirteen of us were selected from the number, formed in a squad with a double guard, and then marched to the dungeon, which we afterwards learned was the jail. We never knew why we were put in there; but the rumor was that we belonged to General Forrest's command and were not entitled to the treatment of prisoners of war, but would be safe there for retaliation purposes. Will McFadden, of Murfreesboro, Tenn., and George Poindexter, of Fayetteville, are the only two I have ever seen or heard of who were in there with me. If there are any of the others living, I would be glad to hear from them."

W. S. Ray, De Queen, Ark., writes: "In a private letter Capt. T. D. McGillicuddy says: 'I was pleased to hear from you and to know you are a subscriber to the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, and I am glad you read my Grant paper. I think all the old boys in gray should take it.'" W. S. Ray met Captain McGillicuddy, who was provost marshal, at Corinth, Miss., in 1863, while going into town for the purchase of clothing and pistol caps for a scouting party to which he belonged. Thinking Ray to be a farmer boy, the provost marshal showed him many kindnesses; and when McGillicuddy's letter appeared in the VETERAN, Ray wrote to him and told him how he had treated a Rebel boy who scouted with "Dock" Smith in 1863. Ray belonged to Jeffrey Forrest's Regiment, Roddy's command.

J. W. Todd, Jefferson, N. C.: "In the fall of 1861, while we were encamped near Centerville, Va., our Col. R. Ransom, 1st North Carolina Cavalry, went on a scouting expedition with about half of his men. We traveled northward toward the Potomac, seven or eight miles, then turned to the right and came to a place called Vienna. There we found signs of a body of horsemen going southward and were informed that Colonel Averill, 3d Pennsylvania Cavalry, had just passed with his regiment, also on a scout. We turned and followed him, soon overtaking him, when Colonel Ransom ordered the charge to be sounded. Averill and his men soon showed us their heels, and, having good horses, made their escape. We secured twenty-six prisoners, however, and I think we killed two or three men. Lieut. James L. Gaines, of Nashville, Tenn., may recall the day, as he was with me and was in the act of killing one of Averill's men when he discovered that the poor fellow was surrendering the best way he knew how—in death."

George H. Brown, Norfolk, Va., writes: "I was reared in Petersburg, Va., and the 'Crater' and the locations of the forts and breastworks around the city are all familiar to me. I was detailed and carried a special pass signed by General Lee, for I had the repair of the cannon along the lines. I was orderly sergeant of Company D, Hood's Detailed Battalion, which was composed of the mechanics of Petersburg. I worked on the powder mill and on the railroad cars and repaired the Light Artillery when brought to Tappay's Foundry in Petersburg. The 10-inch Columbiads and 8-inch sea-coast Howitzers, which were on the lines, I kept in order. I was with Hood's Battalion on the 9th of June, 1864, when Kantz and Spear made the first advance on Petersburg and were repulsed, and was with them on June 15 when General Grant crossed the James River and twenty-five hundred men and boys held General Smith with sixteen thousand men in check from 10 A.M. until sundown, when General Beauregard, with the advance of Lee's army, arrived. Gen. E. P. Alexander, in the Century, calls this the 'crisis of the war;' and I believe if the twenty-five hundred old men and boys and soldiers from the hospitals, with some companies of General Wise's Brigade and two or three companies of artillery, had given way and the advance of General Grant's army then taken Petersburg, the war would have ended nine months before it did. There were in the City Battalion of Petersburg five hundred boys under the age of eighteen years who were in these engagements and who served around Petersburg during 1864 whose history has never been written."

L. H. Ridout, of Beaumont, Tex., writes of having secured his father's war record by inquiry through the VETERAN, and adds: "I will certainly remain a permanent subscriber to the VETERAN, as I well know it depends on the children of Confederate veterans to perpetuate such a worthy magazine, and I feel proud of having enough patriotic blood in my veins to be one to help perpetuate it."

J. S. Thomas, Clarendon, Ark., writes: "In the VETERAN for April there is a statement from L. H. Kemp that reminds me of other days. I belonged to the 4th Arkansas Battalion; was surrendered at Island No. 10 April 8, 1862, and was exchanged at Vicksburg, Miss.; was acquainted with Lieutenant Gibson, who was shot in front of No. 11, if my memory is correct, and I was among the number attending his burial. There was great excitement over the murder. I have a drawing of the military prison made by Capt. J. T. Hogane, topographic engineer of Gen. Jeff Thompson's Division, who was a prisoner at the time. The drawing was concealed in my clothing and brought South with me, and is now framed and hangs in my office, the only relic of the war that I have."

Mrs. T. J. Rutledge, 3528 Avenue O, Galveston, Tex., makes inquiry for Capt. James M. Dedman, commanding Company B, 20th Alabama Infantry. He entered the service September 11, 1861, at Selma, Ala., and he became major, then colonel of the same regiment. She wishes to know of his birthplace, where, when, and whom he married, and where any relatives may be living.

Capt. D. H. Bruce, Joppa, Tenn., asked sometime since that correction be made as to his article on the battle of New Market, Va., page 553 of the December (1907) VETERAN, wherein it is stated that his regiment, the 51st Virginia, lost five per cent of its men in that battle, when it should have been twenty per cent. He says one hundred out of five hundred men were killed and wounded, mostly wounded. He was captain of Company A.

T. A. Nettles, Tunnel Springs, Ala., writes: "I was nineteen years old September 24, 1861, and started to war next day. I was detailed with my company to guard a boat load of Yankee prisoners to Mobile, Ala. We thwarted their plot to run the blockade below Mobile, and turned them over safe when we reached the city. My company, M, Wirt Adams's Cavalry, went to Memphis and from there to Bowling Green. After Shiloh we detached, doing active scout duty; but later joined the 3d Alabama Cavalry, under Gen. Joe Wheeler. I was captured at Shelbyville in June, 1863, imprisoned at Nashville a few days, and from there was carried to Camp Chase, where we hoped for speedy exchange. In about two months we were placed on some box cars and in August were imprisoned in Camp Douglas. On the night of our arrival, August 24, there was a big frost. We were first guarded by Chippewa Indians and Michiganders. We fared tolerably well for a time as to rations, but most of us were thinly clad and in poor shape for the approaching winter. By spring they reduced our rations, as they thought they had learned how little it took to keep a man alive; but they failed on their calculation, for several who had been hearty eaters died for want of nourishment. I was fortunate enough to secure the address of a lady at Georgetown, Ky., who sent me clothing.

and she has since visited my home in Dixie. We were not allowed at Camp Douglas to wear our top clothing when we went to the sinks at night, to prevent us from scaling the prison walls."

A. K. Sharp, Port Gibson, Miss., writes: "I wish to add my experience to an account I read in the October VETERAN of the defense of Fort Gregg. I was a member of Davidson's Battery and on the front line near Fort Gregg on the morning of April 2, 1865. The enemy charged over the works to our left near Fort Alexandria, then charged down the line, killing three men of my company and wounding seven. We were ordered to fall back to Fort Gregg. There Captain Chamberlain gave our men muskets and we charged with the infantry. We recaptured our guns, held them twenty minutes or more, and were again ordered back to Fort Gregg. I have been a subscriber to the VETERAN for ten years."

W. Wood King, Blackburn, La., writes: "Referring to an article in the VETERAN that gives a record of two families furnishing sixteen soldiers to the Confederate army, I take pride in stating that the family of which I am a member gave eight brothers to the service. These represented four States: Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas. They belonged to the 52d Georgia, 47th Alabama, 14th Alabama (two in this), 19th Louisiana, 10th Cavalry, 3d Arkansas, and 6th Alabama Cavalry. They endured many hardships, some being captured and imprisoned and others wounded; but all were alive and returned to their homes at the close of the war, and five of the eight are still living. The family lived at Dadeville, Ala., before the war."

J. T. Wilson, Sherman, Tex., writes: "I have noticed the unjust criticism in the April number in regard to Gen. J. E. B. Stuart's shelling Carlisle, Pa. General Stuart was not at Carlisle. Gen. Edward Johnson's Division of Ewell's Corps was encamped within three miles of the town a part of June 29 and all of Sunday, the 30th, leaving there very early on July 1 for Gettysburg. I spent much of June 30 in Carlisle. Only the barracks and government property were burned by a detachment of cavalry, but General Stuart was still in Maryland and had not yet joined General Lee with the main body of his command; therefore he could not have given any orders for the alleged shelling of the town."

R. C. May, Miami, Fla., writes: "There is an article in the April (1908) number charging Gen. J. E. B. Stuart with shelling Carlisle, Pa. This is the first I knew of such. I was with General Stuart from 1862 until his death, and never knew him guilty of any inhumanity or allowing his guns, great or small, to be fired on a noncombatant. General Stuart had his cavalry command on a road between Washington, D. C., and Gettysburg, and did not reach the battlefield until the last day of the fight, when the army moved southward toward the Potomac, which route carried them east of Carlisle. If he had shelled it out of existence, it would have been no worse than Sheridan, Hunter, and others' devastation of the Valley of Virginia, General Grant's shelling of Petersburg, Va., or Sherman's burning of Atlanta, Ga., and Columbia, S. C. Both of these last-named cities went through the bombarding ordeal before they were cremated. Before the Pennsylvania campaign General Stuart raided Carlisle and burned the government property, the evidence being plainly visible when the battle of Gettysburg was fought."

LETTER FROM UNION VETERAN IN FLORIDA.

W. W. James, Commander Eustis Post, G. A. R., Florida, writes: "I am an old soldier who wore the blue for four years in that fearful conflict of the sixties; but having made Florida my home for the past eleven years, and in that time having been thrown in contact with the old boys of the gray, I am in a position to state that without exception they have been true friends and comrades. Our relations have been such that we have on several occasions held joint Camp fires, and in every instance they have proved enjoyable."

On the anniversary of William McKinley's birth Commander W. W. James, Eustis Post 5, G. A. R., invited Confederate Camp 279 (H. H. Duncan, Commander) as guests, and Rev. E. L. Guerrant, late captain in the Confederate service, was orator of the day. He is an earnest Christian soldier of the Lord and doing much good for the mountaineers among whom he labors. Three years ago the Presbyterian college of Florida opened at Eustis without equipment in some lines, and on its opening day Commander James, of Eustis Post, announced to the president of the college that in the near future the members of G. A. R. Post and Confederate Veteran Camp would furnish the college with a United States flag. The flag was volunteered without authority; but when Commander Duncan, of Camp 279, was consulted, he approved of the action, and invited Commander James to attend the annual meeting of the Camp at Umatilla to be held on Lee's birthday. Upon accepting this invitation Commander James stated the proposition of presenting the flag, and they not only agreed unanimously on the presentation but elected Commander James an honorary member of Camp 279.

Capt. H. H. Duncan made the presentation address on February 22 of that year. This one incident has done more to cement the comradeship of the blue and the gray and establish love and good will in this section than anything that has transpired in many years.

LIVING HOUSTON (TEX.) CONFEDERATE HEROES.

BY ABBIE FRANK SMITH.

At the celebration of Confederate Heroes' Day at the First Baptist Church of Houston March 19, in the presence of members of various patriotic associations, Col. Philip Fall, Commander of Dick Dowling Camp, U. C. V., made this addition to the interesting Confederate folklore of Texas:

"Having been ordered by the ladies of R. E. Lee Chapter, U. D. C., to ascertain who of the Houstonians that went to the war from Houston are yet living in Houston, and having received my instructions only last evening, I fear the record I shall present will prove to a great extent incomplete. However, I know that whenever an ex-Confederate soldier fails to comply with any demand made upon him by the Daughters of the Confederacy he is unworthy to be a recipient of their courtesies.

"Forty odd years have passed since so many noble and gallant men offered their lives to their Southland, and of that number perhaps not one-tenth live to-day. The tottering forms of gray-headed men whom we meet daily upon our streets were once young and active, filled with a love of Houston first, Texas next, and then their whole Southland; and for that Southland the moment that the Federals brought their thousands of Hessians to old Virginia's soil these patriotic Houston boys bade good-by to mother, sister, sweetheart, and pressed to the front in defense of their country.

"It brings a bitter pang to our hearts to know that so many of Houston's noble youths laid down their lives and are sleeping their last sleep in Virginia's soil. All over the Southland and wherever a prison existed in the North there may be found the grave of a Houston boy. You have a few of them with you yet; but soon not one will be left to remind the younger generation of that bravest, grandest, most patriotic army, such as the world had never before witnessed and will never again see.

"In the short time at my disposal I have endeavored to collect and present to you to-night the names of this band of patriots who are still living in their beloved Houston.

"There is Albert McKinney, the dear old soldier who made war his business. He expected the enemy to kill him, and he killed all of them that he could.

"William E. Paschall was a true and noble boy.

"Capt. B. F. Weems, a brave soldier of Terry's Rangers, still clings to Houston.

"Almarion F. Amerman, so much beloved by his fellow-citizens and old comrades, is yet a vigorous man and could engage in another war if necessary.

"Capt. Sam Ashe and Gaston Ashe were mere boys of Terry's Rangers, and both are now beloved and respected citizens.

"George Herman, a plain, unvarnished citizen, just as he was a soldier, obeyed orders while a Confederate soldier and received an honorable discharge from the army. He is a benefactor to his Camp and those who served with him in the army.

"Theodore Lubbock, Thomas Ewing, Curtis Noble, John Farmer, and Samuel McIlhenny are still with us.

"M. E. McCloud, as true and brave a soldier as ever trod Virginia's soil, is Flag Bearer of Dick Dowling Camp, and he would defend it with his life as he would his regimental flag away back in the sixties.

"Ed H. Wilson still holds himself straight and soldierly as in the days of war.

"Sam M. Williams when he tells of the fun he had in Vicksburg fighting in Waul's Legion causes a smile to mount to the face of the unsophisticated. Sam really believes that the whistling shell and the zip of the Minie were fun. Had one found him, his broad grin would have been less broad.

"F. M. Poland, a Hood's Brigade veteran, still looks serious from the memory of thrilling experiences, and his comrades appreciate his many noble qualities.

"Poor John Cameron, over eighty years of age, walking with crutches, yet remains. John was one of the bravest, and he is surprised that he ever got back to Houston after having passed through his wonderful experiences.

"Comrades Leverton, Coleman, White, and Hardy are also living in our city.

"Maj. Pat Christian, a Houston-reared boy, eagerly joined the command which proved to be the banner regiment of Texas. When the war closed, he was in command of Terry's Texas Rangers. General Wheeler in his history alludes to Major Christian as the bravest of the brave. Severely wounded, he would not be retired, and he remained with his regiment until the close of the war.

"Captain William Christian, a brother of Pat, was also reared in Houston. He was a captain in the 2d Texas Infantry, and at the siege of Vicksburg he killed more of the enemy than he had men in his command. He is one of Houston's most beloved and respected citizens.

"Last, but not least, there is William D. Cleveland, who fought in Terry's Texas Cavalry. He never showed the white feather during the four years; and when the war closed, he came back to Houston, pulled off his coat, and went to work. To-day his name is a household word throughout all Texas, known as that of a Christian gentleman, an honest, upright man. He accumulated his wealth by being just to his fellow-men, which course of action inspired such confidence in him that business was forced upon him.

"If I have overlooked any of my dear old comrades, it is not my fault, as I had such short notice to secure their names. God bless them one and all!"

So identified with Houston is Colonel Fall himself that a voice cried out: "You have overlooked Philip Fall." "No," replied the Commander of Dick Dowling Camp, U. C. V., "Philip Fall went into the service from Vicksburg."

GAVEL FROM FAMOUS TREE.

Mr. J. J. McSwain, of Greenville, S. C., has in his possession a gavel made from one of the trees under which the speakers stood at Abbeville at the great mass meeting in 1860, when the first action was taken in South Carolina looking to immediate secession. It is related that venerable Judge Wardlaw addressed the assembly, and urged that no radical action be taken such as would precipitate war, and that he raised his hands over the crowd as a father would bless his children, and with tears streaming down his cheeks stated that if all present lived through the struggle thereby made certain they would regret their action and wish they had listened to his counsel. However, when secession was finally decided upon, Judge Wardlaw and all his family cast their lives and fortunes with the Confederacy. Action on the part of the North was worse than such men expected in many ways.

This gavel was presented many years ago to the South Carolina Sons of Confederate Veterans, and came into possession of Mr. McSwain while he was Commander, from 1903 to 1906. He was not present when his successor was elected; but he will deliver the gavel to Commander Hon. George Bell Timmerman at the Reunion in Greenville this summer.

"LEST YE FORGET"—VIRGINIA PATRIOTISM.

BY E. H. LIVELY, ABERDEEN, WASH

At the outbreak of the war of the sixties Col. James Ma-gruder, near Somerset, in Orange County, Va., had five sons. He was an old-time Whig and loved the Union; but when the tocsin of war sounded, his boys went to the front, together with the old gentleman's son-in-law, Edward T. H. Warren, afterwards colonel of the 10th Virginia Infantry. The oldest of the boys was wounded seven times. Colonel Warren was killed in battle; the second son was killed in battle. The next son was a doctor, but became a captain of one of the companies of Ashby's Regiment, and was killed in a charge near Rochelle, Madison County, almost in sight of his home. The next son, David, died of wounds soon after the war. George was killed in battle in the Valley of Virginia. Thus passed away five sons and a son-in-law.

Virginians, come to attention, uncover, and listen! Lancelot Burrus, of the same county, had six boys, one of whom was too young in 1862. Of the five, in one battle (Gaines's Mill, near Richmond, Va.) three were killed outright and the other two wounded. The youngest joined the army in 1864, and was shot in the head near Luray. Of the other two surviving, Lancelot was several times wounded, and Tandy in every battle with his regiment.

The fathers of these children, old-line Whigs nevertheless, would have sent the last of twenty more children to maintain the well-understood civilized theory of government, as imbibed by the mother's milk of State rights, the shibboleth between the North and the South; otherwise our E Pluribus Unum would be unstable as a rope of sand.

REMINISCENCES ABOUT GENERAL SHERMAN.

The death, which occurred recently in Atlanta, of Mr. John C. Peck, a remarkable octogenarian or nearly so, recalls reminiscences of "Joe Brown's Pikes." These pikes were blades of steel mounted on handles about the size and length of those used for garden hoes. They were intended for the same kind of emergency that the dirks and bowie knives were, which were supplied by thousands to soldiers in the early days of service. These "war togs" were made at Graysville in a stone building that still stands by the Chickamauga River. This event recalls a journey by that place with General Sherman, who remarked on seeing the splendid stone building: "In that house an Englishman made swords for the Confederate army." Other reminiscences are recalled in that connection. In passing the unchanged condition of Chickamauga Station he pointed to a spot where he said that a negro stepped upon a gun that lay in the mud which fired and wounded three of his soldiers.

Another circumstance is recalled that shows how unappreciative he was of our law-abiding people. When the train stopped at Cartersville, there was an assembly of about two hundred men, knowing he was to pass. On seeing the crowd he went out on the platform. There was no demonstration, but as he looked over the crowd one man in the distance said, "General, we have improved since you were here," and he replied promptly: "Yes, we left a clean field for you." Just then the bell rang to start, and he added: "I see you have the same depot, but you put a new roof on it." He was traveling wholly unattended, and this just as the South was emerging from reconstruction. However able this Federal commander, the South will recall in sorrow that he never manifested a spirit of kindness toward the people whose homes he desolated even after the Union was "restored."

AMBROSE McEVoy, INVENTOR.

Mr. Hayden Church has recently treated the press readers of the country to an intensely interesting article on Charles McEvoy, the young author of "David Ballard," who, the writer predicts, is to be the coming "prophet of the 'new drama.'"

Charles McEvoy's name has peculiar interest for readers of the VETERAN, he being the son of Ambrose McEvoy, once of Virginia, the celebrated inventor of submarine mines and who manufactured many explosives for the Confederate army.

Ambrose McEvoy died in Europe in 1905, and the writer says: "It would be a tragical thing if America knew how her old veterans are living and dying all over Europe." Mr. McEvoy had the wolf more than once approach his door. The life of this remarkable man is filled with stirring incidents. He was a native of Wexford County, Ireland, and went to Baltimore, Md., with his parents in 1828. He ran away from home at the age of sixteen and embarked for Cuba, but was wrecked on the Virginia coast near Cape Henry. Later he was adopted by a wealthy Norfolk family. He joined the militia, and was one of the force who captured John Brown. He told his son in later years that he was permitted to visit the noted abolitionist in his cell. With the outbreak of the war Ambrose entered the service and became a captain in the Confederate army. He numbered Lee, Jackson, and Mosby among his friends, and a Confederate physician named Whistler was also his friend, the relation later leading the inventor to form a friendship with the physician's famous brother, James MacNeill Whistler, which lasted for nearly a half century.

Ambrose McEvoy's first invention was a fuse for the use of shells, and this was brought to the notice of General Lee. "Go and see Brook," was the General's instruction, and the Brook referred to is Colonel Brook, now residing at Virginia Military Institute, at that time in charge of the ordnance department. Mr. Church says: "Brook instantly saw the merit of McEvoy's idea, adopted it forthwith, and shells of the type suggested thereafter were turned out in millions at the Richmond arsenal. It was many months later that McEvoy turned his attention to the problem of submarine mines, which he solved so brilliantly."

He went to England after the war, married, and settled there.

"As the only man who knew anything about submarine mines," says Mr. Church, "he did not lack for attention from the British admiralty, and England is defended to-day by his mercurial circuit closer. Another of Mr. McEvoy's later inventions was the 'Spar' torpedo, which remained in general use until the advent of the 'Whitehead,' and the famous 'Elswick Sights' were also devised by him."

H. C. White, who was a member of the 3d Arkansas Infantry, writes from Crossett, Ark.: "A year or two ago I copied the following from a headstone in the cemetery of the Soldiers' Home at Mountain Creek, Ala., which may interest some VETERAN readers:

"Gabriel Capers,
Company C, 40th Tenn. Regt.;
Died Feb. 11, 1905,
Aged 107."

It seems unreasonably that so old a man was in service.

A prominent Confederate of Maryland requests that the VETERAN get the sentiment of Confederate veterans generally on the matter of titles now given to officials of Confederate Veteran Camps. He says: "We have generals, colonels, majors galore. Possibly nearly all were good soldiers; I believe and hope so. Some few I know were not. But the giving of these titles is wrong, all wrong, and should be abolished. It is most confusing to history, and the few gallant generals and colonels who won their titles in battle are overwhelmed and lost sight of in the myriads of new generals and colonels with their wreaths and stars. You will do all of us veterans a favor by having all these imitation titles abolished."

Alex Moore, of Checotah, Okla.: "I was on outpost and scouting duty in all the fighting around Mobile Bay, and I think we had the last brush with General Canby's forces at Eight Mile Creek, east of the river. I was the officer who met Major Perkins (General Canby's adjutant general) and arranged a meeting place for General Canby and General Taylor at Dr. Burden's home, in the village of Citronelle, Ala. Colonel Spence came with an escort with General Taylor, and we together witnessed the surrender to the men we had so long defied. I can think of Colonel Spence only as one of the most gallant soldiers of the cause of self-government and the government established by our revolutionary sires."

GOVERNMENT PENSIONS FOR CONFEDERATES.

BY GEORGE M. JONES, SPRINGFIELD, MO.

Is it possible that anybody could have thought it wrong for a wounded Confederate soldier to accept a drink of water from the canteen of a Union soldier? Surely it was not dishonorable for the men of Lee's army when surrendered at Appomattox to retain the horses "needed to cultivate their crops" when given permission to do so by General Grant.

It was my good fortune to be able to visit historic "Arlington on the Potomac" recently; and of the many points of interest in that wonderful place, the one which retains first place in my memory is the large and well-kept plot of ground devoted to the burial of Confederates, all under the care of the government.

With these thoughts and recollections in mind it seems strange that there should be any opposition to the passage by Congress of law granting a pension to worthy and needy ex-Confederates who might want it. As has been well said, the pension would not be forced on those who did not want it.

I hope never to want or need a pension, but I will not put myself in the way of those who so badly need and who would so gladly receive a pension from the government in the way now open.

MONUMENT TO EMMA SANSOM IN GADSDEN.

The ceremony of dedicating a monument to Emma Sansom at Gadsden, Ala., called forth her version as follows:

"As we got to the top of the hill we saw the rails were already piled on the bridge and were on fire, and the Yankees were in line on the other side guarding it. We turned back toward the house, and had gone but a few steps before we saw a Yankee coming at full speed, and behind were some more men on horses. I heard them shout: 'Halt! and surrender!' The man stopped, threw up his hand, and handed over his gun. The officer to whom the soldier surrendered said: 'Ladies, do not be alarmed; I am General Forrest. I and my men will protect you from harm.' He inquired: 'Where are the Yankees?' Mother said: 'They have set the bridge on fire and are standing in line on the other side; and if you go down that hill, they will kill the last one of you.' By this time our men had come up, and some went out in the field and both sides commenced shooting. We ran to the house, and I got there ahead of all. General Forrest dashed up to the gate and said to me: 'Can you tell me where I can get across that creek?' I told him there was an unsafe bridge about two miles farther down the stream, but that I knew of a trail about two hundred yards above the bridge on our farm where our cows used to cross in low water, and I believed he could get his men over there, and that if he would have my saddle put on a horse I would show him the way. He said: 'There is no time to saddle a horse; get up here behind me.' As he said this he rode close to the bank on the side of the road, and I jumped up behind him. Just as we started off mother came up out of breath and gasped: 'Emma, what do you mean?' General Forrest said: 'She is going to show me a ford where I can get my men over in time to catch those Yankees before they get to Rome. Don't be uneasy; I will bring her back safe.'

"We rode out into a field through which ran a branch or small ravine and along which there was a thick undergrowth that protected us for a while from being seen by the Yankees at the bridge or on the other side of the creek. This branch emptied into the creek just above the ford. When we got close to the creek, I said: 'General Forrest, I think we had better get off the horse, as we are now where we can be seen.' We both got down and crept through the bushes, and when we were right at the ford I happened to be in front. He stepped quickly between me and the Yankees, saying: 'I am glad to have you for a pilot, but I am not going to make breastworks of you.' The cannon and the other guns were firing fast by this time, as I pointed out to him where to go into the water and out on the other bank, and then we went back toward the house. He asked me my name and asked me to give him a lock of my hair. The cannon balls were screaming over us so loud that we were told to leave and hide in some place out of danger, which we did. Soon all the firing stopped, and I started back home. On the way I met General Forrest again, and he told me that he had written a note for me and left it on the bureau. He asked me again for a lock of my hair."

MAJ. GEORGE B. HUNT.

A recent newspaper article says the survivors of the class of '59 at Chapel Hill, N. C., are to have a reunion:

"Chapel Hill was a great educational center for Southern boys before the sixties, and the class of '59 numbered ninety. They were a band of noble young men of the flower of the South. Twenty-six of these survive. One of them, Maj. George B. Hunt, was a native of Washington County, Miss. His earthly career was brief, but was marked by duty nobly done, by faith strongly exemplified, and by courage undimmed during the four years of bloody war, even in the storm of battle.

"Washington County, though sparsely settled at that time, furnished over six hundred men to the Confederate army. The Erin Guards, all Irishmen, was raised and equipped by Capt. G. B. Hunt, who rose to the rank of major by reason of his efficiency as an officer and valor as a soldier. Captain Hunt took his command promptly to the front and took prominent part in the battle of Belmont. From this, his first fight, Captain Hunt pressed on through all the great battles, under General Cleburne mainly, till Cleburne was killed at Franklin.

"Returning to his home after the war, he settled down, as General Lee advised, to build anew the desolate places. Suffering greatly from the effect of two severe wounds received in battle, he yet maintained a cheerful countenance and encouraged all who came near him by his patient continuance in well-doing. Within a decade after Appomattox he succumbed to the effects of wounds, exposure, and overexertion.

"Of over one hundred and twenty-five men he first led, only twelve escaped the marks of war, and far more than half perished on the field of battle. His memory still lives in the hearts of his family, while he rests quietly under the shade of the trees."

CONFEDERATES IN TACOMA, WASH.

The Tacoma Daily Ledger reports: "Interesting reminiscences of experiences as a member of Jefferson Davis's body-guard were related by Capt. J. C. Weathered Wednesday night at the Jefferson Davis centenary birthday reunion of Sons and Daughters of the Confederacy in the Tacoma Music Hall. Other stories of 'the late unpleasantness' were related by J. J. Anderson, John B. Fine, J. T. Freeman, Lon Griffith, and Steve W. DeLacey. The programme included a reading by John D. Fletcher, music by Mrs. Libby, and a talk by Attorney Chester Maunsel Mitchell, a grandnephew of the President of the Confederacy, was present."

"Go to thy rest well earned, thou noble soul!
We hold thy memory green and praise thy name;
Won is the goal, and paradise thy gain,
Leaving a legacy of love and fame!"

NEIL A. McDONALD.

Entering the Confederate army when barely sixteen years of age, Neil McDonald first joined Capt. Kit Allen's company at Edinburg, Miss., about September 1, 1863, and stayed with them until early in 1864. This company had been detailed to gather up the hogs and cattle that had been left in the Big Black and Sunflower river bottoms by the people who had fled. At one time they drove one thousand hogs to Demopolis, Ala., and turned them over to the government agents. When that work was finished, the company broke up. Captain Allen was killed afterwards by falling from his horse in Meridian, Miss. Young McDonald then went to Shuqualak, Miss., and joined Company A of the 13th Mississippi Regiment of Cavalry. They went from there to Big Black, Miss., and were in the campaigns around Vicksburg and Jackson, but were not in the siege of Vicksburg. Sherman chased them from there to Meridian, Miss., and they in turn followed him back to Vicksburg, where they were ordered to the Army of Tennessee, which they joined at Dalton, Ga. They were in the battles and campaigns around Atlanta, and from here they were ahead of Sherman on his march to the sea.

Comrade McDonald was surrendered at Ninety-Six, S. C., in May, 1865. He went to Texas immediately after the war. He was a member of Matt Ashcroft Camp, U. C. V., of Sulphur Springs, and was buried under the auspices of his comrades. He had been an invalid for more than a year before death came to his relief on February 14, 1908.

MAJ. WILLIAM M. MCGREGOR.

(From a tribute by H. H. Matthews, Pikesville, Md.)

The death of Maj. William M. McGregor, of the Stuart Horse Artillery, A. N. V., is announced. Major McGregor joined the gallant Pelham-Breathed Battery, S. H. A., on their organization near Centerville, Va., November 14, 1861. He, John Pelham, and others were members of an Alabama regiment of infantry at the commencement of the War between the States. They went to Virginia in time to participate in the first battle of Manassas, July 21, 1861. Capt. John Pelham applied for a transfer from his command to the Stuart Horse Artillery that was being recruited and organized at Centerville, Va. When the battery had received its quota of men and orders came from the War Department, young William M. McGregor was elected as junior first lieutenant and James Breathed senior first lieutenant, with the gallant Pelham as their leader. The history of the celebrated battery is well known. It was in eighty-seven engagements.

Lieutenant McGregor was with Pelham and Breathed when Capt. John Pelham received the star of a major of artillery. The 8-gun battery was divided, forming a battalion of two 4-gun batteries, Lieut. James Breathed being captain of one battery and Lieut. William M. McGregor of the other. McGregor and his battery figured in every campaign in which the Army of Northern Virginia participated, operating with Gen. W. H. F. Lee's Brigade. In 1864 Captain McGregor was promoted to major of Horse Artillery, and continued in that capacity until the close of the war, when he returned the guns to the Federals from whom they were captured at Manassas in August, 1862.

At the close of the struggle Major McGregor moved from Alabama to Texas and engaged in business, gaining the love and admiration of all who came in contact with him. About a year ago he was stricken with paralysis while visiting his son. He was afterwards removed to his home, at Cameron, where he passed away, aged about seventy years.

It was my privilege and great pleasure to have known the gallant soldier intimately and to have been classed as one of his friends. When he first came to the battery, we messed together and slept in the same tent. He had a pleasant manner and a most lovely disposition. I was attracted to him by his manly ways, his utter abhorrence of anything that was deceitful or of self-glorification. He, like Breathed, was simple and plain in his habits, easy to approach, loving his soldiers as he did his life. I pay this tribute to the brilliant artillery officer, who always nobly led his heroic men into the very gate of death itself.

VEN. HARRY CASSIL.

Rev. V. Harry Cassil, rector of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, Hardinsville, Ga., died suddenly on May 9. Mr. Cassil had been in a declining state of health for some time, though he was as well as usual the night previous. His sudden death was due to a weak heart.

Mr. Cassil was born at Marysville, Ohio, January 10, 1838, and was in his seventy-first year. He graduated from Ohio Wesleyan University of Law and Theology in 1859. He engaged in newspaper work, and for twenty-one years was an editor, filling positions on a number of leading daily Democratic papers in some of the Western States. He was a Confederate soldier, and served in the 1st Missouri Cavalry under General Price in 1861. He was badly wounded in the battle at Pea Ridge. Last June, though quite a sick man, he and his wife attended the Reunion at Richmond, Va.; and had he lived, they would have been at Birmingham.

He was ordained deacon in 1885 and priest in 1886 by Bishop Alex C. Gregg at Bryan, Tex.; was rector of the Church at Calvert, Tex., with adjoining missions, 1885-90; of San Angelo and Brownwood, Tex., 1890-93; of St. Andrew's, Fort Worth, Tex., 1893-96; of the Church at Sanford, Fla., 1896-97; vicar of the missions in Camden County, Ga., 1897-99; Archdeacon of Savannah, with residence at Brunswick, Ga., 1899 to 1907; and Archdeacon of Macon, with residence in Hawkinsville, 1907-08.

Comrade Cassil was a prominent Mason and also a Past Grand Patron of the O. E. S. of Georgia. Mr. Cassil was a companionable gentleman, and those who knew him best esteemed him most.

He is survived by his wife (formerly Miss Jennie Smith, to whom he was married in 1876) and three children (Mrs. Juanita Burbridge and Mrs. Leila Woodcock, of Jacksonville, Fla., and Mr. Reginald Cassil, of Hardinsville, Ga.).

The following local organizations attended the funeral in bodies: The Veterans, the U. D. C., the O. E. S., and the Masons.

CAPT. R. C. GUNTER.

On the morning of April 4, 1907, Capt. R. C. Gunter, of Bridgeport, Ala., passed from this life into the great beyond. He was a prominent citizen of that place and a man of strong character and high principles. He was born near where he was laid to rest, in Jackson County, in May, 1846, the son of Augustus Gunter, who went to that community in 1821 from Warren County, Tenn. He married Elizabeth Hobbs, and to them were born three sons: W. M., R. C., and John H. Gunter.

CAPTAIN GUNTER.

Captain Gunter entered the Confederate service with Company H, 4th Tennessee, and served throughout the war except while in prison at Camp Morton. For a long while he served as scout under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, and it was just such a lad as he that the Federals found in Sam Davis. He came out of the war penniless and with no opportunity for education; but his success from humble beginnings was greater than that of many others with better opportunities. He was long associated with the steamboat traffic of the Tennessee River, in which he gained his title. Many splendid crafts were built and operated by him. His excellent business sagacity brought him a fortune, yet his purse was always open to the calls of humanity.

In 1878 Captain Gunter was married to Miss Fannie Johnson, daughter of Dr. J. R. Johnson, of Lebanon, Ala., who survives him.

CAPT. FRANK DUFFY.

After a lingering illness, Capt. Frank Duffy died at his home, in Guthrie, Ky., on May 20, 1908. He was the son of Col. Francis Duffy, who came to this country from Ireland. He was a man of very brilliant mental attainments, and for many years had been in the newspaper business in Tennessee and Kentucky. During that time he edited the Vidette at Hartsville, Tenn., the Franklin Patriot at Franklin, Ky., and the Chronicle at Clarksville, Tenn. He was one of the few remaining forty-niners. He was born in 1829 at Hartsville, Tenn., where he spent his boyhood and early manhood, though the greater part of his life was spent at Guthrie.

When the war broke out, Captain Duffy enlisted in the 30th Tennessee Infantry in 1861, and served with distinction during the entire war. He enlisted in Capt. B. G. Bidwell's company at Springfield, was given the rank of captain, and appointed quartermaster of the regiment until after the battle of Shiloh, when he was assigned to various duties in the quartermaster's department under Colonel O'Bannon. When the 3d Regiment of Engineer Troops was organized in Atlanta, Captain Duffy was appointed captain of the Engineer Corps, in which capacity he served until the close of the war. During the later years of his life he followed the profession of surveyor and civil engineer, being one of the finest ever in that section of country. He was also a notary public. He is survived by his second wife.

CAPT. FRED WOLF.

From the resolutions passed by Company A, Confederate Veterans of Memphis, Tenn., in honor of Capt. Fred Wolf, long a member of the Company, the following are extracts:

"Fred Wolf was born in Hesse Darmstadt, Germany, April 26, 1835, and designed by education for the ministry; but he early joined the tide of immigration westward, and at the age of seventeen had arrived in New York City. From there he went to Memphis, Tenn., in 1857, in which city he joined the Washington Rifles and was made its second sergeant. Early in the war this company became a part of the 15th Tennessee Infantry. Soon after the consolidation of this regiment with the 35th Tennessee at Hoover's Gap Comrade Wolf was appointed by the Secretary of War as assistant quartermaster with rank of captain, and he cherished his commission until the day of his death. He participated in many important battles—Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Perryville—and on the Atlanta campaign he had charge of all the ambulances of General Bate's Division, acquitting himself with highest credit under perilous and trying circumstances. Later on he was assigned to McCausland's Brigade, with which he served to the end.

"Returning to Memphis after the surrender, he became a part of the life of that city, entering actively into the work of the Confederate Relief and Historic Association, of which he was an early member along with Jefferson Davis, Bedford Forrest, and other distinguished patriots. He was also an active and enthusiastic member of Company A from its organization, and with it attended many of the Confederate Reunions.

"By nature Comrade Wolf was genial and companionable, and was much beloved by all who knew him. He was married in 1868 to Mrs. Minna Pretzel, of which marriage there are four children surviving."

MAJ. ANDREW J. FURR.

The John B. Clark Camp, U. C. V., of Fayette, Mo., reports the passing of a beloved comrade and ex-Commander, Maj. Andrew J. Furr, one of its most enthusiastic and devoted members. He made a gallant, fearless soldier, and as a Virginia gentleman was a typical representative of that people.

He was born in Warren County, Tenn., in 1843, and in 1862 enlisted in the Confederate army under Gen. N. B. Forrest as a member of Company A, 11th Tennessee Cavalry, serving until the close of the war. He took part in many battles, some of which were Chickamauga, Vicksburg, and Lookout Mountain. At the close of the war he returned home without having received a wound or been a prisoner. He was married in 1870, and in 1874 removed his family to Arkansas, thence in 1876 to North Missouri, residing at Golden City until 1888, when he removed his family to Stotts City.

EDWARDS.—Sergeant S. T. Edwards died at his home, in Saluda, S. C., on the 10th of April, in his seventy-third year. He served during the war in Company D, 19th Regiment, S. C. V., Manigault's Brigade, Army of the West; was four times wounded in the engagements around Atlanta, his leg being crushed below the knee. He was captured and his leg amputated by the Federals. An impressive sight was his casket being borne by his four brothers and four sons to his last resting place between the lines of veterans standing with uncovered heads. He was buried in the cemetery of historic old Red Bank Church, where he had for thirty-two years been its Sunday school superintendent.

GRIMMETTE.—Robert H. Grimmette was born in Chattooga County, Ga., in 1835; and died at his home, near Little Rock, Ark., on November 4, 1907. At the beginning of the war he enlisted in the first company raised in Summerville, Ga., afterwards Company G, of the 9th Georgia, and was offered promotion before taking the field, but preferred to remain a private. The regiment was ordered to Virginia, and arrived on the field of Manassas as the Federals were retreating. After a furlough on account of illness, he served the latter part of the war in Monroe's noted cavalry regiment, Cabell's Brigade. He was in Price's memorable raid through Missouri.

McBRYDE.—Sergeant John A. McBryde, First Lieutenant of Camp 342, New Albany, Miss., died on February 16, of apoplexy. Born in Alabama in 1839, he was taken by his parents to Mississippi when three years old; and he served the Confederacy from that State as a member of the 2d Mississippi Volunteer Infantry, being orderly sergeant of his company. He was captured at Gettysburg, and spent the remainder of the war at Fort Delaware. After the war, he was a farmer with the exception of two terms when he served as sheriff of Union County. He was a noble, big-hearted man, and beloved by all who knew him.

GRAY.—H. T. Gray, member of Breckinridge Camp, U. C. V., Danville, Ky., passed to his reward February 3, 1907. He was captured in Ohio in 1863, exchanged, and at the close of the war received his honorable discharge.

BEALL.—Thomaston, Ga., has met with a great loss in the death of Mr. W. X. Beall, who died in April near the place of his birth at the age of sixty-five. Mr. Beall was a valiant Confederate soldier, a faithful friend, and a man whose influence in the community where he lived was daily exerted for the good of his fellow-man.

BRIGHTMAN.—W. M. Brightman was born in Albany, N. Y., in 1828; and died in Hayneville, Ala., in January, 1908. He enlisted in Company M, 5th Alabama Regiment, Battle's Brigade, A. N. V., and served continuously until the surrender at Appomattox. His war record showed that he was a loyal patriot, and as a citizen in times of peace he proved himself ever ready to suffer the same sacrifices.

JOHN M. WEIGLE.

In the death of Adjutant John M. Weigle, November 20, 1907, Camp 435 U. C. V., Augusta, Ga., lost one of its most devoted and honored members. Though born in Baltimore, Md., he had lived in Augusta from early boyhood. At the first call to arms, in 1861, he enlisted in Company I, 1st Georgia Regiment, and served gallantly in the West Virginia campaign under Garnett, Lee, Loring, and Stonewall Jackson, bearing bravely his share in the fighting at Belington, Laurel Hill, Cheat Mountain, Greenbrier River, and Bath, and suffering all privations of the Laurel Hill retreat. After the 1st Georgia was mustered out, he served as orderly sergeant in Maj. George T. Jackson's Battalion, participating in Griswoldville, East Macon, Honey Hill, and other battles on the Carolina coast. During the forty years since the Southern flag was furled his devotion to memories of the old days was unremitting; he never missed a reunion of his comrades, and for years his leisure had been devoted to conducting a Confederate department in the Augusta Chronicle.

As soldier, as citizen, as friend, as city officer, as an honored Church official, he was faithful in public station and in private life to every charge committed to his care. Gentle and loving and genial, the fragrance of his kindly deeds and loyal, consecrated life will linger as a tender, loving memory for years to come.

GEORGE WASHINGTON COCHRAN.

Comrade G. W. Cochran died at his home, in Newton, N. C., on March 15, in his sixty-seventh year. He served the Southern Confederacy with loyalty and bravery as second lieutenant of Company G, 37th North Carolina Infantry, the sergeant of which was his twin brother, Francis Marion Cochran, who was killed in the battle of Chancellorsville. In this same battle G. W. Cochran lost his leg, and for a number of years after the war was unable to work. He was elected Register of Deeds for Catawba County, and served sixteen years with ability and satisfaction. A widow and seven children survive him.

Comrade Cochran answered the call of the South early, and throughout life carried her cause in his heart. He was ever a friend of the old soldier; and though a man of slender means, he was always ready to divide with his comrades.

CAPT. GEORGE MONROE AUTREY.

George M. Autrey was born near Salem, Tippah County, Miss.; and died at Rockport, Tex., in February, 1907. He was left an orphan at an early age. He enlisted for the Confederacy in March, 1862, at Salem, Miss., joining a company of which Ben Lax was captain, and which afterwards became a part of the 34th Mississippi Infantry in Anderson's Brigade under Beauregard. From Corinth it was with General Bragg on his Kentucky campaign. After returning to Tennessee, the regiment was placed in Walthall's Brigade. Comrade Autrey was continuously with his command until captured in the "battle above the clouds," Lookout Mountain, in November, 1863. He was in prison at Rock Island until March 13, 1865, when he was exchanged. He received a furlough a few days later, but before he reached home General Lee had surrendered.

Comrade Autrey was married at Chewalla, Tenn., in December, 1857, to Miss Angelina E. Wilson, who, with eight children, survives him. He removed with his family to Texas in 1860, settling near Houston. Removing afterwards to Guadalupe County, he served for many years as sheriff; and in 1895 he made his home at Kenedy, Karnes County, residing there until death.

WIGGINTON.—Dr. James D. Wigginton, of Summit Point, W. Va., passed into perfect rest on the 11th of February, known and loved by a large circle of friends. He was born in December, 1840, and had lived in Jefferson County all his life. He served during the whole war in Company D, 6th Virginia Cavalry, and was a member of the J. E. B. Stuart Camp, U. C. V., and prominent in all its undertakings.

TIPTON.—Pleas Tipton was born March 8, 1834; and died February 26, 1908, at Dyersburg, Tenn. He enlisted in the Confederate army in April, 1861, under Capt. (later Gen.) O. F. Strahl, 4th Tennessee Regiment, Cheatham's Brigade. He was afterwards transferred to Forrest's Cavalry, with which he served to the end, and was honorably paroled at the surrender in 1865.

BUTTS.—Baker V. Butts died at Enfield, N. C., in February. He was a veteran of the war, having served with an honorable record from the beginning of hostilities as a member of the 23d North Carolina Regiment, Ransom's Brigade, until desperately wounded at Plymouth in April, 1864. He recovered from his wounds, but was a cripple for life; and after a stroke of paralysis several years ago, he became an invalid and failed rapidly. He is survived by one daughter.

"If we could push ajar the gates of life
And all God's workings see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery find there a key"

COMRADES IN OKLAHOMA ANSWER.

From William L. Byrd Camp, U. C. V., Ada, Okla., comes report of the loss of three more comrades who, "worn out by the labors of the day, have retired from the battlefield of life to take their well-earned rest in the silent bivouac of departed heroes:"

J. R. Lawrence, Captain Thompson's company, 1st Choctaw Regiment. He was Commander of W. L. Byrd Camp.

W. A. Golden, Company C, Marlin's Artillery.

J. M. Chronister, Company B, 15th Arkansas Regiment.

NOTES.—Mr. Allan Motes, who died at Laurens, S. C., in April, 1908, was ninety-five years of age, and among his papers was found proof of his enlistment in the Confederate army at the age of fifty years. When he volunteered for service in 1862, he was assigned to Company B, 9th Regiment, 1st Corps, South Carolina Reserves.

CAPT. WILLIAM BROWN.

Capt. William Brown, who died in Washington, D. C., on May 15, was of a distinguished colonial family having their home for about three hundred years in Northumberland County, Va., to which place he was taken for interment in the ancestral burial ground. He leaves a wife, son, and daughter.

At the outbreak of the Civil War Captain Brown was a student at the University of Virginia. He returned home and immediately entered the Confederate army in 1861, serving in the 47th Virginia Infantry, Stonewall Jackson's command, and also as assistant adjutant and inspector general of Breckinridge's Brigade, Heth's Division, Hill's Corps, A. N. V. He was captured at Cold Harbor in 1864 and sent to Johnson's Island, from which prison he was paroled in June, 1865. As Adjutant of the Charles Broadway Rouss Camp, U. C. V., of Washington, Captain Brown had served faithfully from the date of its organization, in 1868.

CLARENCE C. OLNEY.

Clarence Crosby Olney, Sr., Confederate veteran, Assistant Treasurer of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, died from heart disease at Charleston, S. C., March 7, 1908. Mr. Olney, who was for many years prominent in financial and educational affairs in Charleston and connected with its railroad interests over forty years, was a native of that city, where he was born in 1843. He came from a fighting family, his paternal ancestors being famous Indian fighters in colonial times; and his grandfather, Capt. Stephen Olney, of the first Rhode Island Continental Line, was the gallant leader of the assault on the last British redoubt at Yorktown. His father, George Washington Olney, for sixty years a merchant of Charleston, served in the War of 1812.

When the War between the States broke out, Mr. Clarence C. Olney was at school, and he promptly forsook his books to volunteer for the Confederate cause and was sent into the field. His most important army service was with the Palmetto Guard of Charleston in the operations around that city from February, 1862, to April 25, 1865, the date of the final surrender. After the war he went into the service of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad, and when that road became insolvent was appointed its receiver by the courts. It was in 1876, while administering the affairs of the receivership in Savannah, that the fatal yellow fever epidemic of that year broke out there, and, sticking to his post, he devoted his entire time to the succor of the sick, earning the repeated manifestations of the gratitude of that community and almost becoming a victim of the scourge himself. Subsequently he was appointed General Freight Agent at Charleston of the Atlantic Coast Line, and in 1893 Treasurer of the Northeastern Railroad Company, which afterwards became a part of the Atlantic Coast Line System. On the enlargement and reorganization of the system he was appointed Assistant Treasurer at Charleston, holding the place until his death.

He was Vice Commander of the Palmetto Guard Veteran Corps, and at his funeral services, which were held at St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church, Charleston, of which he was senior warden, the honorary pallbearers represented the Veteran Corps, the Church, and the various business interests with which he was connected. He was a brother of the late Capt. Hiram Bartlett Olney, of the 25th South Carolina Regiment, a sketch of whom appeared in the CONFEDERATE VETERAN of June, 1906, and of Sergeant Alfred E. Olney, of the same regiment, who died at Richmond after the shelling of Petersburg in 1864.

WILLIAM M. BRIGHTMAN.

W. M. Brightman was born in New York City in 1828, but went to Alabama in 1850, locating at Hayneville, in Lowndes County. When the war came on, he joined Company K, 5th Alabama, as a private; but for three years he was orderly sergeant of his company, and commanded it after the commissioned officers had been killed or wounded. His service was in the Virginia Army under Gordon and Stonewall Jackson, and he participated in the battles of Seven Pines, Malvern Hill, Second Manassas, Antietam, Gettysburg, Chancellorsville, Fredericksburg, and the Shenandoah Valley campaign, and was always ready for duty.

Returning home after the war, Comrade Brightman resumed his business as a merchant, and his name was a synonym of honor and integrity. A devout Christian, he endeared himself to all by his unostentatious benevolence and charity, and in his death Lowndes County lost one of its noblest citizens. He was married in 1856 to Miss Mary Tobler, of Mobile, and leaves a large family of children who are among the best citizens of the county.

MR. CHARLES E. CANTZON.

Charles Eugene Cantzon was born on March 18, 1841, in the city of New Orleans, the son of Henry F. Cantzon, of South Carolina, of Huguenot ancestry. His mother was Eliza Ann Paxton, of Philadelphia, granddaughter of Col. James Paxton, an officer of the American Revolution and a member of the Order of Cincinnati. Charles Cantzon enlisted in the third company of the Orleans Cadets, which was later attached to the 18th Regiment of Louisiana Volunteers. He served throughout the war and was paroled on the 6th of June, 1865. His service was under A. S. Johnston, Beauregard, Bragg, and with Dick Taylor's command in Western Louisiana.

LEWIS H. FOSTER.

A veteran of two wars was our venerable comrade, Lewis H. Foster—that with Mexico and the one between the States—and of him an extended sketch was given in the November (1906) VETERAN. During his service for the Confederacy he was a member of the North Carolina Battalion of Light Infantry, J. W. Moore commanding, and during the entire war he did not miss a roll call and asked for but one furlough. Death came to him on February 23, surrounded by friends and kindred. As truly was he a veteran of the Lord's army, having been a devoted Christian for over sixty years.

J. H. MYERS.

Comrade J. H. Myers died recently at Tracy City, Tenn., at the age of seventy-one years. The local paper, Mrs. Grundy, says of him: "'Uncle Jack,' as he was familiarly known, was well liked by all and was one of the few surviving Confederate veterans of this county. He served in the 16th Tennessee Regiment in the War between the States, and was classed by his comrades as a brave and true soldier. He was ever active in perpetuating the memory of the Confederacy. He was the father of a large family—five sons and three daughters—all of whom and his widow survive him. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. P. Luton, who paid a beautiful tribute to the memory of the deceased."

MAJ. WILLIAM H. ETHEREDGE.

Maj. William H. Etheredge is dead! A Christian hero has passed from earth to eternity! This was no ordinary man, for he fulfilled all the requirements of a clean and true life. He was a faithful, fearless, and magnanimous soldier of the South. He was born on July 27, 1820, near Great Bridge, in Norfolk County, Va.; and died in Norfolk June 3, 1908. He left his farm and family in 1861 to be a soldier, and was elected captain of a splendid company of riflemen, leading it in war until he was promoted to be major of the 41st Infantry Regiment of Mahone's famous brigade.

His first active duty with his company was to guard the Portsmouth Navy Yard while the Virginia was being constructed out of the wreck of the Merrimac. This was a most important mission, for spies and incendiaries were at hand ready for the opportunity to destroy the monster of war, having in view the large reward from the Federal government; but the vigilance of Major Etheredge kept them from her decks, and five attempts to burn the navy yard were frustrated during his service on this mission.

He fought with his company and regiment in the Army of Northern Virginia in all its great battles from the Peninsula to Appomattox, where he surrendered. Everywhere he was a true and brave officer. He was highly complimented for gallantry at Seven Pines by Col. John R. Chambliss, and his courage was conspicuous in the bloody charge of the Crater.

When the war closed, he returned to his native county and gave his unflinching energies to rebuilding his home. He was a devoted husband, a loving father, a citizen of noble purpose, and a Christian of humble heart. He was stricken with paralysis and lingered long from its stroke, bearing his pains with fortitude and praying unceasingly for God's care. His life passed out as a breath of wind in the June morning.

REUBEN M. MARTIN.

Reuben M. Martin entered into rest at his home, in Rienzi, Miss., on January 2, 1908, after an illness of several months. He was born in Marion County, Ala., in 1840, removing with his family to Rienzi, Miss., when seven years of age. From there he enlisted in the Confederate army under Col. Robert Lowry, of the 32d Mississippi Regiment, serving with Company A, and with this command he participated in most of the fighting under Bragg, Johnston, and Hood. Just before the surrender he was captured at Atlanta and carried to Camp Chase, remaining in prison till the close of the war.

He returned home to take up life with only a stout heart and a resolute purpose to succeed. He was married to Miss Jane Rowland on June 13, 1865, and lived happily with her until death separated them. Children, grandchildren, and many friends mourn their loss.

JOHN E. BEST.

John E. Best was born in the State of New York, and went to Arkansas County, Ark., just before the war and settled at St. Charles, on White River. When the war broke out, he was the first man to enlist under Capt. Robert H. Crockett when organizing Company H, 1st Arkansas Infantry, and he served throughout the war, participating in many severe battles east of the Mississippi.

He returned to St. Charles after the war, and resided there until his death, on the 2d of March, 1908, except for the few months he was in the Confederate Home at Little Rock. Comrade Best was seventy-seven years old, and left no relatives in this country.

MAJ. ROBERT L. MCWHORTER.

One of the oldest of our Georgia veterans, Maj. R. L. McWhorter, died at his home, Woodville, near Athens, on May 20, aged eighty-nine years. He became prominent in early life, and from 1845 until 1861 he served in the Georgia Legislature as Representative and Senator.

He promptly enlisted in the cause of the South when the war began, raising a company for the 3d Regiment, and he made a gallant soldier. He was later promoted to major and attached to the staff of Gen. A. R. Wright. He was noted for kindness to his men. After the war he again entered the legislative life of his State, but retired some thirty years ago.

CAPT. R. P. ALEXANDER.

Died in Scotland Neck, N. C., February 7, Dr. Robert Park Alexander, in his seventieth year. He was a son of the Hon. Mark Alexander, of Mecklenburg County, Va., and entered the service of the Confederacy as a first lieutenant in the 14th Virginia Infantry, his company being one of the first to go from Mecklenburg County. He was soon made captain of the company, and later was in the 3d Cavalry and Signal Corps.

LIEUT. COL. WEST STEEVER.

Lieut. Col. West Steever, who died at his home, in Washington, D. C., in September, 1907, was of a distinguished, wealthy, and influential family of Louisiana, and prior to the war he was a resident of New Orleans. He was appointed second lieutenant Southern Cadets, Louisiana Militia, April 30, 1861, and later first lieutenant of Company C, 7th Louisiana Infantry. He became major of the Jackson Regiment, Louisiana Infantry. He was lieutenant colonel of Walker's Confederate Infantry, and still later lieutenant colonel commanding a battalion of artillery in May, 1862. When lieutenant colonel and chief of artillery of Forney's Division, he was taken prisoner at Vicksburg, Miss., July 4, 1863, but was paroled the next day. In May, 1864, he was lieutenant colonel and acting inspector general at Rome, Ga. In early life Colonel Steever had shown his fitness for a military career, and was sent to France for his education.

He was Commander of the Charles Broadway Rouss Camp, U. C. V., of Washington, for something over a year, and took active part in the efforts of this Camp to establish the Confederate section at Arlington Cemetery, and it was among these comrades that he was laid to rest. He had also been active in securing the appropriation by Congress toward caring for the graves of Confederate dead in the North.

JAMES A. LATHROP.

At the first call to arms, in 1861, James A. Lathrop on January 9, 1861, volunteered at Newberry, S. C., for the Confederacy under Capt. Whitfield Walker, who took his company to Charleston, S. C., and united with Maxey Gregg's First Regiment, S. C. V. They assisted in building forts and batteries until after the surrender of Fort Sumter. He was then transferred to the Virginia forces, remaining at Richmond and Fairfax C. H. until the expiration of his six months' term of service. Upon the reorganization of his company he was one of the first to reenlist for three years or the war. He remained with his command—absent only when wounded, always ready for any duty in camp or on the firing line—until the surrender at Appomattox. His recent death has left a gap in the ranks of his comrades at Newberry, where he was Lieutenant Commander of Stonewall Jackson Camp and one of its most active and zealous members.

JAMES S. MILLER.

Of the many faithful and true soldiers of the Confederacy, James S. Miller was excelled by none in his devotion to the cause for which he offered his life. He was born in Lowndes County, Miss., in 1827; but when very young his parents removed to Oktibbeha County, where he grew to manhood and where he lived to a ripe old age. He enlisted for the Confederacy in March, 1862, in a company which became a part of the 35th Mississippi Regiment. As he performed the duties of a soldier in war, no less did his after life in peace exhibit the same qualities of faithfulness.

Comrade Miller's third wife survives him.

JAMES K. P. HOLCOMB.

James K. P. Holcomb, one of the old and honorable citizens of Graves County, Ky., died at his home, in Mayfield, on the 16th of March. He was born in Maury County, Tenn., in 1840, and served in the Confederate army as a member of the 1st Tennessee Cavalry, making a brave and gallant soldier. He went to Kentucky immediately after the war.

Just a week after the death of this comrade his devoted wife died, leaving two sons and a daughter.

JAMES WILLIAMS.

James Williams, County Treasurer at Austin, Tex., died on the 28th of May. He was born in Travis County, Tex., in 1842, and enlisted in Company C, 1st Texas Regiment, Hood's Brigade, with which brigade he was identified up to the battle of Knoxville, Tenn., where he was severely wounded and captured. He lost his leg from this wound, and was still a prisoner at Camp Chase when the war closed. Though he never acquired much worldly goods, he was rich in the esteem of his fellow-citizens, who honored him with the office of Tax Assessor and then of County Treasurer for many years. He reared a large and highly respected family.

WILLIAM ASHMEAD COURTENAY.

Capt. W. A. Courtenay, one of the best-known of South Carolina's sons, died at his home, in Columbia, March 19, 1908. He was born in Charleston, S. C., February 4, 1831, and during his life was a valuable patron of art and literature.

Captain Courtenay was practically the founder of the South Carolina Historical Commission, and up to a few months of his death he was the leader in the work of preserving the historical records of the State. It was due to him that the department was finally recognized by the General Assembly and an office established in the State Capitol.

From early manhood Mr. Courtenay was an enthusiastic member of the Washington Light Infantry. He was among the first to respond to the call to arms at the commencement of the war, serving with fidelity in South Carolina and Virginia and rising to the rank of captain.

JACOB WHITLEY.

Jacob Whitley died on the morning of February 22 at his home, in Ocilla, Ga. He was born and reared in Irwin County, Ga., and made a gallant soldier of the Southern cause, serving through the entire war as a member of Company F, 49th Georgia Regiment, Thomas's Brigade, Hill's Corps, A. N. V., and surrendering with his command at Appomattox. Although in many battles he escaped with but one slight wound, received in the battle of the Wilderness. He was an honored member of Irwin County Camp, U. C. V.

OTHER WORDS FOR DIXIE.

[In the VETERAN for March, 1904, Hon. Joseph M. Brown, of Marietta, now the nominee for Governor of Georgia, wrote the following words to be sung to the tune of "Dixie."]

Comrades, hear the war drum rattle;
 Trumpets, too, call to the battle.
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!
 The voice of Justice cries: "I need you!"
 Honor shouts: "Southrons, I'll lead you!"
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!

Chorus.

I'm glad I live in Dixie,
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 In Dixie's land I'll take my stand
 To live or die in Dixie.
 I will live, I will live,
 I will live for God and Dixie.

Hark, the words of proud Oppression,
 "Sunny land, Glory's possession."
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!
 "Thy white cotton fields, I crave them, Thy mounts rich with gold, I'll have them."
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!

Right, which God withholds from no man;
 Purity, jewel of woman.
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!
 Clasp ye hands before the altar,
 Swear that ye will never falter.
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!

Rouse, ye sons of might and duty;
 Wake, ye daughters, types of beauty.
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!
 Strike, ye brave, like bolts of thunder!
 Fair ones, work till foes shall wonder!
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!

Hark, the shouts of triumph ringing!
 Hark, the peans fair ones singing!
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!
 "God of justice, thou hast blessed us!
 God in holy love e'er rest us!"
 Ho, awake! Ho, awake!
 Ho, awake, Dixie land!

MISS ROBERTA FISHER, PENSACOLA, FLA.,
 Maid of Honor Florida Division, U. C. V.

FLORENCE LOUISE WEYRICH.

This fair girl is a granddaughter of A. G. Peterson, Past Commander of Ransom Post, G. A. R., St. Louis, and Past Department Commander of Missouri G. A. R. Little Miss Weyrich took one of the leading parts in an entertainment given by the St. Louis ladies who are raising funds for a monument to the Confederate dead of Missouri.

Miss Florence Peterson, his daughter, very popular in Nashville, took an active part for a Confederate cause in this city some weeks ago. The real American soldiers of gentle birth who fought for the Union have ever entertained such sentiments as are shown by the two generations following this genial comrade.

TRIBUTE TO A GOOD MAN.

The recent sudden death of Mr. J. K. Robinson, brother of Mr. A. H. Robinson, of Nashville, at his country place in Connecticut, was a shock to many friends. Mr. Robinson was a man of large affairs, yet his wealth did not prevent a kindly interest in behalf of the less fortunate. One of these, a neighbor, who had been benefited by many of his deeds of kindness, wrote:

"The shadow has left our dial
 And a cloud is on the sun,
 And death demands our master,
 But Heaven's will be done,

Self on him had no bondage;
 He left no debt to pride;
 He knew his poorest workman
 With rich men by his side,

Disinterested kindness
 And hidden acts of love
 Crowned wealth's responsibility
 With blessings from above.

There was blended in his nature
 The Godhead's humble plan;
 He was ever human master Unto his fellow-man."

SEEKS HER FATHER'S SWORD.—Mrs. R. M. Galloway, 114-115 Shiel Apartments, Indianapolis, Ind., is making efforts to locate the sword of her father, Lieut. Col. Benjamin H. Myers, of the 83d Regiment Indiana Volunteers, who fell in the battle of Dallas, Ga., about May 23, 1864. He fell near or within the Confederate lines, and his sword, which had been presented to him by his regiment, has never been found.

J. R. Board, of Koshkonong, Mo., wishes to locate an old sword which he lost near Fredericktown, Mo., sometime in October, 1861. The sword was an heirloom and highly prized. The handle was made of horn with an eagle head carved on it. He will appreciate any information in regard to it.

DID LEE NOT HAVE FAITH IN SUCCESS?

Maj. James B. Hodgkin, "one of Lee's men," wrote the Baltimore Sun from Irvington, Va., in regard to a remark which John S. Wise claims was made by General Lee to him. The battle of Sailor's Creek had been fought, which was disastrous to the Confederate forces, as all will remember, and Captain Wise's statement is that he had been sent by President Davis with a message to General Lee requesting to be kept advised as to the movements of the army and the time of retreat, and that General Lee had said: "How can I tell? A few more Sailor's Creeks and it will all be over—just where I thought it would end from the beginning."

Captain Wise states that his recollection of this has been corroborated by two officers of General Lee's staff, yet there has been dissatisfaction with many statements from this sprightly officer. Major Hodgkin comments thus: "Did Lee say this? I have my doubts. It is so unlike him. After having led his men for four years confidently, as it appeared to us who followed him, courageously, and with a skill that has had no parallel in history, never quailing in the midst of difficulties and never faltering from beginning to end of the most famous campaigns that history has recorded, how could he have felt all the time of those splendid four years that the struggle was futile, that he was wasting his men, wasting his country all for a cause that he felt was foredoomed? For myself, I feel that it was impossible and that no man could have done what Lee did unless he had faith in the results aimed at. Who will not agree to this rather than to anything which would tend to throw a shadow over the spirit which animated our leader?"

Major Hodgkin further says: "There is nothing in the after life of Robert E. Lee to indicate that he entertained such views. That Lee, the nobleman that he was, with a heart full of pity for the men under him—men whom he knew would go unfalteringly to death for him—should have felt when leading them to battle that he was wasting their lives and that the 'cause' was already 'lost' seems simply incredible. Whatever might have been the secret feeling of those who followed him, it seems to me that Lee could not have kept up the sublime courage that he possessed with the feeling ever in his heart: 'All this is in vain, and I am sacrificing lives uselessly.' For no matter what Lee felt and did as a soldier, and no matter how he gloried in deeds of valor, he was first and foremost a man, and a man with a heart. And no man with such a gentle nature as he possessed could have seen his men fall by shot and shell, by disease and famine (for they were often starved) had he really believed from the start that the cause was foredoomed. Until Captain Wise brings better proof I prefer to believe that Robert Edward Lee felt, as did so many of his men, 'Give us a chance, and we'll whip them yet.'"

Wise claims that two staff officers heard the remark; but he does not give their testimony, nor does he even name them.

"RE-ENFORCE THE RIGHT!"

BY ANNIE P. CREIGHT.

[Lines suggested by reading of the death of gallant young Adjutant Holliday, 11th Mississippi Regiment, of Aberdeen, who was killed at the battle of the Wilderness. The enemy were pressing the right of Davis's Brigade and about to turn its flanks, exposed by the failure of Perry's Alabama Brigade to connect with it. Adjutant Holliday was sent to the left of the line with orders to have the right of Davis's Brigade re-enforced. Just as he reached the right of the 16th Mississippi he fell, mortally wounded, but to the lieutenant colonel of the 16th he delivered his order, "Reënforce the right," and expired. The order was promptly obeyed; the 16th extended its line, and enabled Davis's and Perry's Brigades to connect, and thus repulse the enemy.]

Night brooded o'er the battlefield and on the valleys crept,
And fell with solemn stillness o'er the spot where brave ones slept;

Upon the broad, extended plains that round were widely spread

The cold dews shed a clammy blight o'er dying and o'er dead.

Well might a shade be cast o'er earth, for there in youth's dream time

Lay calm in death a fair, bright boy who scarce knew man-hood's prime.

The bright stars from their throne on high cast trembling rays of light

Upon the boy whose dying words were: "Reënforce the Right."

Amid the sons of his fair land upon the glorious field
He strove to drive the Northmen back, determined ne'er to yield.

Where Mississippi's battle flag waved foremost in the fight,
He called unto his comrades brave to "Reënforce the Right."

He fell amid the cannon's roar, that seemed to rend the sky,
And where artillery sent forth a loud appeal on high;
His dreams were free from fear or woe, as on the evening air
Went up from his young pallid lips a meek and fervent prayer:

"O Heavenly Father, on thy throne, if 'tis thy will divine, Crown freedom's flag with victory and save this land of mine."
He heard the dying words of those who met his darkened sight,

And from the bloody ground he called to "Reënforce the Right."

He gave a thought to his sweet home and loved ones far away,
And how they'd mourn for him who fell upon that glorious day.

He longed to meet his mother's kiss and feel her fond caress;
O that upon his dying brow her tender hand might press!

But that fond mother far away, within his childhood's home,
Heard not, alas! his plaintive prayer nor heard his dying moan.
He sadly yearned for sisters dear, who were his heart's delight;

They'll see no more the boy who strove to "Reënforce the Right"

O God, like that brave boy, we kneel submissive in thy sight
And pray that in our Southern land thou'lt "Reënforce the Right"

Till "home again" our loved ones come, the war cloud passed away,

And star of peace shine o'er the spot where dark strife now holds sway.

MEMORIAL DAY AT CAMP CHASE.—Mrs. D. B. Ulry, President, and Mrs. L. W. Carl, Secretary, R. E. Lee Chapter, U. D. C., Columbus, Ohio, announce that Memorial Day will be observed at Camp Chase Cemetery Saturday, June 6, 1908.
The Chapter earnestly solicits contributions of flowers or money, and requests that the floral offerings be sent to Room 204 Eberly Building and donations of money to Miss Louise Trabue, 124 South Washington Avenue, Columbus.

"THE SOUTH IN HISTORY AND LITERATURE."

Mildred Lewis Rutherford, of Cobb Institute, Athens, Ga., who has previously published "English Authors," "American Authors," "French Authors," has recently issued a splendid handbook of Southern authors, "The South in History and Literature."

Either with individuals or books we must first become acquainted, and out of the impression created grows a desire for fuller knowledge. Miss Rutherford has introduced the reading world to the better known and humbler writers of the South, and in preparing attractive vistas she has succeeded in furnishing a clearly outlined handbook of nearly four thousand writers who have contributed to Southern literature from the settlement of Jamestown down to the present.

The handbook seems to carry the reader into some dear old Southern library, and the writer's reference to and extracts from books hitherto unknown produce a desire to lift each volume from its shelf. Both from the standpoints of history and literature the book is a valuable outline, and the author's "English" and "style" richly enhance the merit of her work.

"The South in History and Literature." By Mildred Lewis Rutherford. The Franklin-Turner Co., Atlanta, Ga.

"ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS."

Both for his prominence as a writer and the subject he has chosen Mr. Louis Pendleton has contributed a valuable work to the American Crisis Biographies in his "Alexander H. Stephens."

Few men furnished more consistent support during the long struggle between the adherents of State sovereignty and Federal supremacy than the subject of Mr. Pendleton's exhaustive study, and the writer of his biography proves a careful student of the underlying causes of the Civil War.

Careful research and logical discrimination leave the writer free from the charge of partisan bias in the preparation of biography, and Mr. Pendleton has overlooked none of the requirements in summing up the life and personality of the Confederacy's Vice President and Georgia's statesman.

"Alexander H. Stephens." By Louis Pendleton. Being Volume IX. in American Crisis Series of Biographies. $1.25.

"MY LIFE AND MY LECTURES"—FONTAINE.

The "Arabian Nights" furnish no more thrilling reading matter than "My Life and My Lectures," by Lamar Fontaine, C.E., Ph.D. The writer, who was born in 1829, has had a unique history; and as captive, hunter, explorer, traveler, soldier, he has accumulated data which furnish the reader with stirring romance written in virile, animated style, graphic to an amazing degree.

The Confederate war veteran will not willingly lay aside Mr. Fontaine's book while there remains still another page, for the writer's wide experience by land and sea and his active part in the Confederate war, to which he devotes most of his book, add material to the literature of the South.

Neale Publishing Company, Washington, D. C. Cloth-bound, $3; postage, 20 cents.

"ALL AROUND THE CIVIL WAR."

A neat, cloth-bound booklet, purporting to present in concise form the reason why the South seceded, is recently from the pen of Mr. William Hawn, late of the 7th Louisiana Regiment. The work, "All Around the Civil War; or, Before and After," is original in its arrangement, presents salient points with forceful lucidity, and will prove a revelation to the unthinking who prefer to misread history.

The writer's motive for publishing the booklet is an added recommendation for its sale: "'Because man goeth to his long home' I desire to contribute my mite to perpetuating in honor the memories of the heroes who fought for the Southern Confederacy."

"All Around the Civil War." Price, 75 cents. Address William Hawn, 442, Claxson Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

"REMINISCENCES OF WILLIAM M. STEWART."

A book splendidly edited by George R. Brown, being the "Reminiscences of United States Senator William M. Stewart," will interest readers who enjoy facts, anecdotes, and incidents concerning public life and characters as seen by one who for many years has figured conspicuously before the American public. That Senator Stewart is eighty-three years of age and has preserved his rare mental vigor is an evidence that his book will be popular with a large class of readers.

"Reminiscences of Senator William M. Stewart." Edited by George Rothwell Brown. Neale Publishing Co., Washington. Price, $3; postage, 20 cents.

"THE HUNTSMAN IN THE SOUTH."

Alexander Hunter, who has published "The Huntsman in the South," is better qualified than most men to handle such a theme, for his varied experience has given him the key to all lore dear to the heart of the hunter. The book is essentially a huntsman's book and one adapted to interest and instruct boys. Over bog, thicket, stream, and field, by canoe, horse, and cart, the writer leads the absorbed reader until things of the workyday world are forgot, and he finds himself close to the heart of nature.

"The Huntsman in the South." By Alexander Hunter. Neale Publishing Co., Washington. Price, $1.50; postage, 14 cents.

Resolutions adopted by the U. D. C. generally to have the pictures of Hon. Jefferson Davis and Gen. R. E. Lee placed in the public schools of the country have brought many inquiries as to where good portraits of them could be procured. The VETERAN has for some time offered a handsome engraving of General Lee, known as the Lowell portrait, printed in brown tones, at $5. The likeness is considered very fine, and the engraving is most suitable for this purpose.

The most satisfactory picture now procurable of Jefferson Davis, printed in black and white, is a copy of the engraving presented to Miss Sue Tarpley, of Jackson, Miss., by Mr. Davis himself after having been a guest in her home while on his way to Montgomery to be inaugurated President of the Confederacy. This was printed in the VETERAN for May, 1902. The likeness has been commended by Mrs. Hayes, daughter of Mr. Davis, and the picture is nicely printed on good paper. Orders can be sent the VETERAN. Price, $1. A copy will be sent for three new subscriptions. In this way it would be easy for Chapters to procure the picture.

Gen. C. I. Walker, of Charleston, S. C., engaged in the woman's monument movement, is actively interested in behalf of having this picture procured by the schools of the South.

REPORT ON CONFEDERATE GENERALS.

Some corrections made by Mr. Charles Edgeworth Jones in the list of Confederate generals as published in the VERERAN for January have been awaiting attention, which should have been given promptly after that publication. He says:

"Brig. Gen. Shindler's correct name is Wm. P. Shingler.

"Lieut. Gen. Buckner, Kentucky, bore rank from Sept., 1864.

"Five omissions from the list were: John Dunovant, South Carolina, July, 1864; Alfred E. Jackson, Tennessee, February, 1863; George D. Johnston, Alabama, 1864; William H. Wallace, South Carolina, September, 1864; Henry C. Wayne, Georgia, December, 1861.

"The name of Brig. Gen. George B. Anderson (North Carolina, June, 1862) should be substituted for that of the first George T. Anderson in list.

"Brig. Gen. Hogg's correct name was Joseph L. Hogg.

"Brig. Gen. James A. McMurray, Tennessee, should rank from September, 1863."

"THE ARTILLERY."

The manuscript of the book by Capt. John W. Morton, Forrest's chief of artillery, is well advanced and its early issue is anticipated. It will be a handsome volume of some three or four hundred pages, giving account of the remarkable services of the artillery under that most remarkable general, N. B. Forrest. An interesting narrative may be expected.

A VALUABLE CONFEDERATE HISTORY.

BY DR. J. WILLIAM JONES, RICHMOND, VA.

The "History of the Twentieth Tennessee Infantry Regiment, C. S. A." by the late Dr. W. J. McMurray, is a much more valuable book than its title would seem to indicate. To any of the old members or friends of the regiment it is of course invaluable as a detailed history of the command with which they served or in which they were specially interested, but the book has also other features of great interest and historic value. The treatment of the cause of the war is admirable, clear, able, and accurate. It will be very valuable, especially to our young people, who know so little about the causes of the war, and have been told so repeatedly in Yankee books that it was a fight to destroy the Union and perpetuate slavery on the part of the "Rebels," so that many are growing up to believe these falsehoods, and do not appreciate that on our part it was a fight for the God-given principles of self-government and the defense of our homes and firesides against unjust invasion.

There is another valuable feature of the book: it treats of the Army of Tennessee and tells of its most important battles. The Army of Northern Virginia has been a good deal more talked about and written about and is much better known than the Army of Tennessee, and yet any intelligent Confederate knows that the men who rode with Bedford Forrest, Joe Wheeler, and John H. Morgan, who charged with Pat Cleburne and Breckinridge and Bate, who followed Sidney Johnston or Beauregard or Joseph E. Johnston or John B. Hood were worthy compeers of the men of the Army of Northern Virginia or any other men who ever marched under any flag or fought for any cause in all the tide of time. The book is especially valuable, therefore, as giving some insight into the Army of Tennessee.

Collectors who have not added this book to their libraries may yet do so by applying to Mrs. W. J. McMurray, Nashville, Tenn.

Gen. William B. Bate, its first commander, said: "The 20th Regiment did more to make me a major general than any other command, and this book is the best history of the Army of Tennessee that I have seen."

Gen. Stephen D. Lee wrote of it: "I congratulate you upon your valuable book. It sets forth in logical terms the causes of our great Civil War and the mighty struggle of the Southern people for four years. I am glad to sign myself your friend and comrade."

VALUABLE WORKS ON CONFEDERATE HISTORY.

RISE AND FALL OF THE CONFEDERATE GOVERNMENT. By Hon. Jefferson Davis. Foremost among the works on Confederate history is that by the President of the Confederate States, sets of which are now procurable only in the half morocco at $20. Two volumes.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, by President Jefferson Davis, gives in a condensed form the most important facts relating to the secession of the Southern States and the organization of the Southern Confederacy, with descriptions of the leading engagements on the field, making a record of accurate historical data. It should be used in schools as well as have a place in every Southern library. Only a few copies left. Bound in cloth. Price, $4. postpaid.

LIFE OF GEN. R. E. LEE. By Gen. Fitzhugh Lee. More especially a history of his military campaigns and valuable for its accuracy. Cloth-bound. Price, $1.50.

FROM MANASSAS TO APPOMATTOX. By Gen. James Longstreet. A handsome volume of some seven hundred pages. Edition nearly exhausted. Cloth. Price, $3.

BY GILBERT GAUL,
NATIONAL ACADEMICIAN.
With Introductory Sketches by
THORNWELL JACOBS.

Exquisitely reproduced in four colors, on heavy polychrome paper.

Those who love the South and her brave old veterans have desired for many years to have their courage, their devotion, their unmatched heroism and the home-life of their families crystallized on canvas. After nearly a half century this has just been done. Gilbert Gaul, of New York, was employed several years ago, and has now finished the series. It is called With the Confederate Colors, 1861-5, and consists of six paintings, as follows:

No. 1. Leaving Home.—Shows a typical Southern interior of the period. A lad is telling his homefolks good-bye. One sees the newspaper fallen to the floor, the favorite bird-dog pleading infinitely with his eye, the father, mother, sister, slaves—all done as if a photograph had been magically turned into colors.

No. 2. Holding the Line at all Hazards.—A battle scene. The last magnificent stand of "those who had fate against them." One of the finest battle scenes ever painted.

No. 3. Waiting for Dawn.—A campfire scene. The snow covers the ground. A farm house burns in the distance. The "enemies" battle line glows on the horizon. A masterpiece.

No. 4. The Picket and the Forager.—Companion pieces sold as one picture. The first shows a lonely picket on duty. The second presents a bread and chicken-laden forager returning to camp after a day's excursion.

No. 5. Betting on the Flag.—The boys in blue are backing their cause with a pile of coffee in a social game of cards between the lines. Southern tobacco is the bet of the "Johnny Rebs" that the bars will be victorious. One of the most popular of the series.

No. 6. Tidings.—A pretty Southern girl is reading a letter from the front to the groups of women and slaves. A grandfather bends forward eagerly to listen, and a wounded soldier on furlough forgets his bandaged arm as he hears tidings from the firing line. A beautiful and touching picture.

of Gilbert Gaul's Famous War Paintings.
Gentlemen: I congratulate you on publishing the portfolio of pictures, "With Confederate Colors," by the most distinguished painter of military subjects in this country. As an artist he is endorsed by the National Academy of Design and others of highest repute. It seems most timely that the South is at last to have pictures which are really historic documents, and which must appeal to her people, because Mr. Gaul's pictures are really a sympathetic translation of the war period. The portfolio should be not only in every Southern, but in every American, family. These paintings, with their pathos, their tragedy, and the great sorrow of the great war period, will perform a great duty in pointing the younger generation to avoid drifting into channels which might provoke a like repetition of our great Civil War.
With kindest wishes for the success of your praiseworthy undertaking, I am,
Yours truly,
STEPHEN D. LEE.

Mr. Gaul's strong brush has portrayed with much realism, not their bitterness and recriminations, but their magnificent motive, their magnanimous courage, their unmatched devotion. Those who love the real values of the Old South will prize these pictures beyond price, and indeed they should appeal to every intelligent American, man or woman.

Pictures 15x19 inches, reproducing every shade of tone and motif, and embossed so as to give perfect canvas effect. Each one is a masterpiece, depicting the courage, sacrifice, heroism, sufferings and home life of the Southern soldier.
We have made arrangements with the publishers to supply our subscribers with one or more of the above masterpieces at an exceedingly low price. We make the following

THE VALUE OF PERSONAL KNOWLEDGE

Personal knowledge is the winning factor in the culminating contests of this competitive age and when of ample character it places its fortunate possessor in the front ranks of

The Well Informed of the World.

A vast fund of personal knowledge is really essential to the achievement of the highest excellence in any field of human effort.

A Knowledge of Forms, Knowledge of Functions and Knowledge of Products are all of the utmost value and in questions of life and health when a true and wholesome remedy is desired it should be remembered that Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna, manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co., is an ethical product which has met with the approval of the most eminent physicians and gives universal satisfaction, because it is a remedy of Known Quality, Known Excellence and Known Component Parts and has won the valuable patronage of millions of the Well Informed of the world, who know of their own personal knowledge and from actual use that it is the first and best of family laxatives, for which no extravagant or unreasonable claims are made.

This valuable remedy has been long and favorably known under the name of—Syrup of Figs—and has attained to world-wide acceptance as the most excellent family laxative. As its pure laxative principles, obtained from Senna, are well known to physicians and the Well Informed of the world to be the best we have adopted the more elaborate name of—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—as more fully descriptive of the remedy, but doubtless it will always be called for by the shorter name of—Syrup of Figs—and to get its beneficial effects, always note, when purchasing the full name of the Company—California Fig Syrup Co.—printed on the front of every package, whether you call for—Syrup of Figs—or by the full name—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna.

DIRGE FOR STEPHEN D. LEE.

Gone!
And the South lives on,
While his great soul is borne
To meet his comrades
On the hills of dawn.

Gone!
Let the "Old South" weep
And endless vigils keep;
To meet his comrades,
Lee has fallen on sleep.

Gone
From the city of great renown,
Of siege and battle ground,
To meet his comrades,
Crowned with a deathless crown.

Gone!
Let the shadows flee
And the pages of history
Tell that Stephen D. Lee
Has gone to meet his comrades
Encamped by the crystal sea.

Gone
Into the land of mist,
By the angels kissed,
To meet his comrades
In an immortal tryst.

Gone—
O sweet release!
Chant it, poet and priest—
To meet his comrades
On the sunlit hills of peace.

Gone
From the chastening rod,
This body beneath the sod;
But his soul has gone to meet his comrades
Before the throne of God.

is much like gunning for birds. You must have a definite aim, because indiscriminate advertising, like indiscriminate shooting, results in empty pockets. The printer furnishes the shot, and postage is the powder that carries it wherever you direct.

And you must have good ammunition. Foolish indeed the sportsman who would use pebbles for shot to save expense, yet equally foolish is the advertiser who wastes energy, postage and opportunity on weak, ineffective printing.

Think it over; then let's talk it over. We have furnished ammunition for so many successful campaigns that we know you will find our experience of value.

CONFEDERATE DEAD AT MARIETTA, GA.

July 7, 1908, was an eventful and happy day to the Confederate women in Marietta, Ga. That lovely, quiet, cultured town was the delight of Confederate soldiers who served in the Army of Tennessee, and particularly in the Georgia campaign. Culture and hospitality were conspicuous characteristics of the people, and refugees from Kentucky and Tennessee made it homelike to many who knew little of Georgia.

The marvelous achievements by the good women of Marietta become the subject of pride and gratitude to the entire South.

A beautiful area of several acres in the part of the cemetery adjacent to the town and close by the railroad, though hidden in part from passengers by the cut for the track, is a worthy location for the sacred purpose. It seems hardly credible that such a Chapter as might be expected in a town of the size could have achieved so much. And, in such proportion, do they merit the gratitude of the entire South.

FROM REPORT BY MRS. R. L. NESBITT.

The Kennesaw (Ga.) Chapter is rejoicing over the completion and dedication of the Confederate monument at Marietta, which event was the culmination of years of persevering struggle against many difficulties.

A brief history of this cemetery through a period of forty-five years is given. The first bodies were interred there on September 14, 1863, and after that the hospital records show how many of our brave men, most of them far away from home and friends, were laid to rest in Georgia soil. During those troublous years the "Ladies' Aid Society" was organized; and as Johnston retired from the section and Sherman advanced, the town was filled with the sick, the wounded, and the dead. This band of devoted women, though borne down by the stress of those fearful events, bravely and lovingly went into the hospitals to cheer the sick, comfort the dying, and aid in burying the dead. When Sherman swept through the town, many families fled; and when they returned to desolated homes, the fierce struggle for bread left little time for the lonely graves on the hill, but they were never forgotten.

The first flowers brought by any organization in the South as loving tribute to our Confederate dead were laid on these graves by the survivors of this Ladies' Aid Society, afterwards merged into the Ladies' Memorial Association. This was in the spring of 1866; and when Mrs. Charles Williams, of Columbus, Ga., conceived the plan of each year commemorating the heroism and the sacrifice of our noble slain by the ceremonies of Memorial Day, Marietta was among the first to join in the movement; and no matter what the stress of circumstances, from then until the present time no Memorial Day has been allowed to pass without the tribute of flowers and words of remembrance.

All along the line of the Western and Atlantic railroad, on the battlefields of Chickamauga, New Hope, Kolb's Farm, in isolated spots in the surrounding country were graves, sometimes marked by rude headboards on which the name and command had been hastily carved or lying underneath the spreading branches of a tree on whose bark the faint lettering was fast disappearing, yet many, alas! unmarked or "unknown."

In the late sixties Mrs. Williams, long gone to her reward, and Miss M. J. Greene, now residing in Atlanta, applied to the Legislature for funds to remove these bodies to Marietta; and this being granted and the land being donated for the purpose, these noble women set about their arduous task, and now three thousand Confederate soldiers, representing every Southern State, sleep on the gentle slopes of this lovely site in full view of historic Kennesaw Mountain and near the historic Western and Atlantic railroad. For a year or so after the bodies were removed the Legislature appropriated money to care for the graves. Then, the task being too heavy for the depleted ranks of the Memorial Association, the cemetery gradually fell into neglect. About fifteen years ago the Memorial Association was reorganized, and, receiving a fresh impetus and fresh courage, determined to rescue the cemetery from ruin. There was not a dollar in the treasury, and the task was one before which hearts less steadfast, less devoted would have quailed.

But by patient, persistent work the Kennesaw Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, our younger and more vigorous sister, has nobly aided in the work, and to-day the cemetery is no longer a reproach. Sewers have been put in, driveways repaired, a speaker's stand of brick and marble built, the six acres seeded in Bermuda grass, shrubbery planted, three thousand marble headstones put in place, and, to crown all, Kennesaw Chapter has unveiled a chaste and artistic monument.

The cemetery now belongs, by deed of gift from the Memorial Association, to the State of Georgia, which, having accepted the trust, will doubtless see that the work so earnestly begun by the Memorial Association and Kennesaw Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, is completed at an early day, and that the last resting place of our dead will compare favorably with the beautiful national cemetery just across the town, where are buried over ten thousand Federal soldiers

MRS. MATTIE B. SHEBLEY GIVES REMINISCENCES.

"Sweet is communion and kindly sympathy kindled by a common cause." So in the "red-letter day," which on Tuesday marked the happy consummation of Kennesaw Chapter's cherished hopes, the cordial hand of Georgia daughters is extended in warmest congratulations. * * *

Notably inspiring were the silvern speeches emanating from golden hearts throbbing with patriotism and glowing with the spirit of the Confederacy. Perfect the picture thrown upon the background of a faultless day in that holy God's acre when thousands assembled to do homage to a heroic dead. Until time is no more will it proudly live in the memory of the happy promoters.

Like a sentinel upon the crest of the hill, the massive monument stands in symmetry and beauty just above, as General Evans said, "not a cemetery of graves, but a rare garden of heroes." Graven with splendid inscriptions, it tells to generations that shall follow after "the story of the glory of the men who wore the gray." And yet more it recites. As the heroine mothers who lived in the crimson days of battle loved the Southern soldier and applauded his valorous deeds, so their daughters crown him with a halo of reverence and adoration to-day.

Thoughtful is the conception of a monument to the women of the Confederacy, of which Hon. Seaborn Wright spoke so eloquently Tuesday; but after all, in their wholly unselfish work of erecting stones to their heroes, they build memorials to themselves. In honoring valor they are unconsciously doing honor to themselves.

The shaft is a story of fidelity, love, and sacrifice wrought in enduring granite. It points a moral to sister Chapters. The spire is the capstone to a noble work of many years. Many build monuments and glory in a great achievement, but these of Kennesaw Chapter have builded far more. In season and out, in dark days and sunlit ones they have undauntedly striven with Southern courage to bear a burden not wholly theirs.

As their charge, this band of the Georgia Division assumed the care of the Confederate cemetery because it was within their territory, and a most onerous task it was. To keep the several acres neat was of itself a care. This year after year they did, and meanwhile they stored away annually a nucleus of purchase money for headstones. Glad indeed was the day when each mound was marked by gleaming marble. Then was born the thought of a great stone to perpetuate the memory of all who "fought and died and fought and lived."

The loyal one who suggested that beautiful idea to-day sleeps hard by the stone, for long before the consummation of that beautiful dream she had "joined the loved in paradise."

Now the cemetery has by deed of gift from the Ladies' Memorial Association passed into the hands of the State, and no more inspiring words were spoken than the utterances made by President James J. Flynt, of the Senate, when he promised to lend his influence to gain an appropriation to properly keep and beautify this resting place of our own dead.

When that is done, this cemetery will be worthy of those who sleep there.

Blessed in deeds, beautiful in fruition, rich in promise, the conspicuous day of July 7 passes into history.

FEATURES OF GEN. CLEMENT EVANS'S ADDRESS.

Gen. Clement A. Evans, the orator of the occasion, was introduced by Gen. William Phillips. The principal part of his speech was on the battles of the invasion of Georgia from Dalton to Atlanta, giving the disparity of numbers engaged as being two to one, showing the splendid behavior of the Southern soldiery of all arms—infantry, cavalry, and artillery—in the unusually great number of battles and skirmishes. Sherman was criticised for his very slow march through Georgia from Dalton to Atlanta with double the number of men against Johnston. He did not, in fact, win a battle. His cavalry was kept away from Johnston's rear by Wheeler's magnificent management. Sherman was either afraid of Johnston or he was not his equal. Sherman's army was held back near Marietta for twenty-six days by the superb fighting of Johnston's army. The battle of Kennesaw Mountain was a decided victory over Sherman.

The many battles in North Georgia account for the three thousand Confederates buried at Marietta and the ten thousand Union soldiery in the neighboring National Cemetery. The bodies of these equally brave antagonists dwell together in peace. They rest in perfect concord in the soil of the South. So may the living soldiers forget their animosities while cherishing all the best patriotic memories.

General Evans concluded by describing the successful efforts of the Southern ladies in collecting these three thousand bodies from the woods and fields where battles were fought in North Georgia. Beginning their gracious labors immediately after the war closed, now, in placing a splendid monument in this Garden of Heroes to commemorate the valor of the Southern soldier, they have unconsciously built an everlasting monument to their loving, patriotic work.

N. W. Phillips, of Weatherford, Tex., who was detailed as a scout from Company B, 43d Alabama Regiment, inquires for a man he intercepted while trying to locate the enemy near Chattanooga in the night while the battle of Chickamauga was on. The man went with this scout back to the 43d Alabama Regiment. Comrade Phillips doesn't recall the name.

FLORAL PARADE AT BIRMINGHAM REUNION.

THE PRIZE WINNER—AND HER MOTHER'S WORK.

One of the special features of the Reunion at Birmingham was the floral parade given in honor of the visiting veterans, which came as a happy diversion from the serious things of war. The VETERAN presents its readers with a picture of one of the prizes for child's turnout and the little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John W. Sibley, now of Birmingham, but a family cherished in war days at Augusta, Ga. Those who had the pleasure of attending receptions by the Alabama Daughters of the Confederacy and later at the General U. C. V. Reunion will recall the charming wife and mother of Mr. Sibley in contributing royally to the social pleasures of those occasions.

The picture comes as a souvenir post card showing the youthful prize winner in her decorated stanhope, flying the colors of the "Bonnie Blue Flag."

The decoration was done entirely by Mrs. John W. Sibley, who designed it all and made the flowers, eight hundred, everything being original. The "single star" was seen in each wheel and on the dashboard in front in white, the rest of sky blue, with the flag of yale blue, a harmonious blending with the sweet faces of the young girls. A large silver loving cup was the trophy.

WORK ON THE SAM DAVIS MONUMENT.

REPORT OF MRS. E. H. HATCHER, TREASURER OF TENNESSEE DIVISION, U. D. C.

It affords me great pleasure to announce to this Convention that plans for the Sam Davis monument have taken definite shape, and it is now the hope of the committee to have the statue ready for unveiling before many months.

About ten years ago the Legislature appropriated a site for the Davis monument in the Capitol grounds at Nashville, and a committee was appointed consisting of Joseph W. Allen, J. M. Lea, J. W. Thomas, J. W. Childress, E. C. Lewis, R. H. Dudley, G. H. Baskette, J. C. Kennedy, and S. A. Cunningham. About $3,000 was in the hands of this committee, having been given in answer to the eloquent appeal made by Mr. S. A. Cunningham through the columns of the VETERAN. Several years ago Mr. Cunningham came from this committee asking help from the Tennessee Daughters of the Confederacy. The matter was discussed in convention, and we decided to take up the work and finish the monument.

At a meeting of the committee held in Major Lewis's office May 6, as your chairman, I was invited to be present. Major Lewis reported a most satisfactory conference with and proposition from Sculptor Zolnay, who submits a most liberal offer for an eight-foot standing figure in bronze for $4,000, the base to be of Tennessee marble and as handsome as our funds will allow. The design for the base made by Major Lewis is very beautiful and admirably adapted to the site in the Capitol grounds. The Zolnay bust of Sam Davis exhibited to a million people at the Tennessee Centennial is the accepted personification of the hero, and the sculptor is designing the full figure of heroic size clothed in his Confederate gray jacket with trousers tacked in cavalry boots just as worn by the martyr when he so heroically met his death.

All who are familiar with the sad story and have observed the pose, features, expression, and air of this conception of Sam Davis will be gratified to anticipate its perfection in complete heroic figure of bronze. Mr. Zolnay is making a two-foot plaster cast of this figure to be approved by the committee. The committee feels most grateful for aid given by the Tennessee Division, Daughters of the Confederacy, and sends you resolutions of appreciation which were unanimously adopted at the last meeting.

The sum collected for the Davis monument during the past year is $223.50 of the $338.50 contributed at the Columbia Convention, leaving a balance of $115 subscribed. I wrote to every contributor and inclosed a stamped envelope for reply. Thirteen contributors only have failed to respond. As Chairman of the Sam Davis Monument Committee I have tried to serve you faithfully. It is true the fund has grown slowly; but we can feel when we look upon the completed statue that it was builded little by little by loyal and devoted people to commemorate the life and deeds of a great hero.

I want every Chapter to have a share in this beautiful work. Let us make it so suitable, so beautiful, so suggestive, so true that those living who knew him and his record for truth and honor and those who may come after and read his story in this monument will feel only pride in the conscientiousness that they are fellow-countrymen of Sam Davis, of Tennessee.

Amount contributed to the Sam Davis monument at Chattanooga Convention: Caroline M. Goodlett Chapter, $5; Sarah Law Chapter, $10; Kate L. Hickman Chapter, $5; First Tennessee Regiment Chapter, $10; Francis M. Walker Chapter, $5; William B. Bate Chapter, $25; Mrs. T. J. Latham, $5; Mary Latham Chapter, $5; Memphis Children's Auxiliary, $10; Colonel Dinwiddie, $10.

TRUE GALLANTRY AMONG BRAVE MEN.

BY HON. Z. W. EWING, PULASKI, TENN.

The contribution made by the 23d New Jersey Infantry, on the Northern side of the Civil War, to the monument proposed to be erected to the Confederates buried in Arlington Cemetery calls to mind an incident well worth telling as illustrating both bravery and gallantry. It is related by Comrade R. L. Culp, of the 9th Alabama Infantry, now living in Pulaski, Tenn., and an honored and useful member of the County Court of Giles County, Tenn.

In the battle of Salem Church, Va., on May 3, 1863, the 23d New Jersey and the 9th Alabama were opposing each other. The former had been driven back and was being rallied by Gen. E. Burd Grubb, who rode in front and most conspicuously exposed himself to the fire of the Confederates, two of whom were in the act of firing point-blank at the brave leader, when George Stewart, now of Athens, Ala., cried out, "Don't shoot him, boys; he is too brave to be killed!" and the guns were at once lowered and the life of the daring soldier was saved. That he is as noble and generous as brave is shown by his interest in this monument.

Confederate Veteran.

S. A. CUNNINGHAM, Editor and Proprietor.
Office: Methodist Publishing House Building, Nashville, Tenn.

This publication is the personal property of S. A. Cunningham. All persons who approve its principles and realize its benefits as an organ for Associations throughout the South are requested to commend its patronage and to cooperate in extending its circulation. Let each one be constantly diligent.

SPACE FOR SALE AT HALF PRICE.

A feature that has long detracted from the VETERAN to the business public has been the trivial space in its pages devoted to advertising, and it is with good reason. There is no other periodical in the United States which accepts advertising at all that has not many times as much space so occupied.

In explanation of the cause of this lack of advertising it is stated that the VETERAN was not launched as a money-making venture. Its merit, however, was at once shown by a subscription patronage that assured prosperity, and no vigilant, systematic plans were adopted to secure a merited proportion of advertising.

Again, it has been very exacting in regard to the purpose for which space would be given, and it has permitted no agency to misrepresent the circulation, which, unhappily, is a rare exception; so there has not been enterprise enough shown in its pages to interest vigilant advertisers.

Another reason which will seem peculiar is that the rate has been so low that agents have declined to undertake its use for the commission. The foregoing is in no spirit of complaint.

PROPOSITION DIRECT TO PATRONS.

The lowest cash rate given for years has been $1 per inch or $25 per page. In order to make a test and to prove the "pulling" power of the VETERAN, the reckless offer is made for the remainder of this year to give

SPACE AT HALF THE PRICE.

This offer is not to affect any contracts now existing; it is not to extend beyond the December issue, and not over a page will be given any person or firm.

Here is, therefore, the offer: One page, $12.50; a half page, $6.25; a column (1-3 page, 9¼ inches), $4.25 for each insertion; less space, 50 cents per inch. No commissions will be allowed on this proposition. With this offer there ought to be a heavy tax on the space at once.

To advertisers not familiar with the VETERAN the statement is made—and any subscriber is referred to—that it is the most popular periodical and is the most lavishly indorsed magazine in the country.

The circulation has averaged above 21,000 per issue for several years, and the low rate given above will be canceled upon failure to prove a circulation of over 20,000 during the remainder of the year—the time of this unprecedented offer.

To all who want to reach the most representative people in every part of the South with articles acceptable, this is the best medium that ever has existed. Contracts will be accepted to extend beyond December, if made before that time, at the low rate, and the double of that beginning with January, 1909. This half rate will be given from August 1, 1908.

SERIOUSNESS OF THE VETERAN CRITICISED.

Though the diminishing ranks of the Confederate Veterans become dearer to the people of the South year by year, and though death has created far too many broken battalions, the recent Reunion at Birmingham leads the thoughtful observer to the conclusion that too much has been said of "the sweep of the Reaper's blade," in spite of the decimated ranks.

In addition to the regularly appointed delegates from various States, numbering over two thousand, there were in Birmingham several thousand veteran visitors, and these marched, cheered, and held their own with the Sons upon whose shoulders the mantles of heroes will some day fall.

Why need the end be near at hand for men who are inspired through the memory of a splendid past to be so alive to the present? With the tramp of soldier feet and the ring of soldier voices still fresh in memory after the glorious Reunion of 1908, the heart throbs with intense and triumphant feeling that those whom the gods love never grow old.

Dear "stragglers" in eternity's march! The world loves you, your enemies of the past are become friends of the present, and the multitude as you pass to-day cries: "Long live the Confederate veterans!"

May God be thanked that you are neither foot-sore, heart-sore, nor hungry, and that you travel paths of peace in a land of plenty, where the arms of your children and your children's children will enfold you when you finally "lie down to quiet dreams!"

PATRIOTIC DAY AT APPOMATTOX C. H.

Confederate interests were revived at Appomattox C. H., Va., in May, 1908, through the bestowal of crosses of honor to more than a hundred veterans of that community. A large number of the members of the Old Dominion Chapter at Lynchburg, with other prominent guests, went to Appomattox and took part in the exercises of the day. Addresses were made by Mr. J. P. L. Fleshman, Rev. Dr. Carter Helm Jones, and Judge William Hodges Mann, the latter making the special address of the occasion. After the bestowal of the crosses, which was specially under the direction of Mrs. Christian, President of the Old Dominion Chapter, the members of Appomattox Camp, U. C. V., through Major Joel Flood, presented to her a beautiful U. D. C. badge in recognition of her generous work in their behalf.

In the afternoon Mrs. C. B. Tate, as State President, re-established the local chapter as "Appomattox Chapter No. 6," of which Mrs. Joel W. Flood was elected President; Mrs. W. J. Trent, Vice President; Miss Nina Jones, Secretary and Treasurer. Fifty members were enrolled and good work is expected from the chapter.

TEXAS WOMAN STANDS FOR DIXIE.

At the California Chautauqua, recently in session at Venice, there was a lecture on "The Wars of Our Country," the War Between the States being given its due prominence. The lecturer dwelt long and lovingly upon the heroic deeds of the Federal soldiers. At the close Mrs. Simms, of Bryan, Tex., a visitor at the Chautauqua, arose in the audience and said: "Mrs. President, in this large and apparently intelligent audience it seems there is no one to represent the other side. While none will deny that in many instances your Northern soldiers rose to the sublimity of duty, we know that our men were unsurpassed in bravery, endurance, heroism, and nobility. It would require the eloquence of a Demosthenes to do justice to the heroes of the Confederacy, but as a true Southern woman I must tell you that we love and honor the memory of our boys in gray."

As the crowd passed out an old Federal soldier from the Home at Sawtelle, Cal., hobbled across the hall and asked to shake hands with the woman who was not ashamed to show her colors.

UNVEILING CEREMONIES AT GAINESVILLE, TEX.

The centennial of the birth of Jefferson Davis was celebrated at Gainesville, Tex., by the unveiling of the monument erected by the Lou Dougherty Chapter, U. D. C., to the heroes of the South.

In the parade line from City Square to City Park there were many elaborately decorated floats and carriages. But the old veterans proudly marched on foot, their "tramp, tramp" keeping time to the war tunes played by the accompanying band, their hearts keeping time to the long-ago sixties when martial music led them to victory and inspired hopes instead of memories.

Prominent features of the celebration were:

Inspiring music, voice and band

God's blessing invoked by ministers of the Churches.

Welcoming voice of the city through Mayor Leonard.

Address by Mrs. J. M. Wright, President Lou Dougherty Chapter.

Oration by Hon. Morris Shepard, of Texarkana.

THE MONUMENT AT GAINESVILLE, TEX.

There were other addresses by Mr. Clarence Ousley, of Fort Worth, Mr. H. L. Stuart, of Gainesville, and Judge C. B. Potter, of Gainesville.

Pulling the cord, Miss Dougherty and her maids of honor, Miss Houston and Miss Francis.

"Under the stirring notes of 'Dixie' by a touch of the cord the flag of the Confederacy that had lovingly shrouded the marble form of its soldier-champion was slowly lifted by a breeze from heaven, then it reverently hovered, and the rich folds of its glory descended on sponsor and maids, baptizing them as children of the Confederacy." and giving the multitude present a view of the typical soldier herewith referred to by the President of the Lou Dougherty Chapter, U. D. C.

ADDRESS BY MRS. J. M. WRIGHT, PRESIDENT LOU DOUGHERTY CHAPTER, U. D. C.

The Lou Dougherty Chapter extends cordial greeting to all friends and organizations, but especially do we welcome that noble body of men who are veterans in the sacred cause we are assembled to honor. Our devotion to the South embraces those who maintained her birthright—constitutional liberty! Our reverence for Southern history extends to those who wrote in sacrificial blood the record of the War between the States.

Our enthusiasm in glorious memories includes those who made the memories possible!

Our perpetuation of all this in stone finds expression in the heroic form of a Confederate soldier invoking the judgment of God upon our sacred cause, the cause of right against might!

In the sixties the mission of woman was to inspire. Now the mission of woman is to commemorate, and in commemorating inspire future generations to be like the mothers of the South, like the veterans of the South!

"In the camp, on the march, pierced with saber or shell, crucifixion was your bitter part.

But they bore the griefs and the anguish of war, the Gethsemane's travail of heart;

And never a soldier grew weary or faltered, but some woman's voice from afar Stopped singing her little one's lullaby song to sing 'Dixie' for those at the war."

In the sixties woman wore the gray uniform and kissed the patriot sword that would defend home and children. Now she plants flowers on Confederate graves and establishes Confederate homes.

In the sixties woman by sacrifice and practical management made possible the maintenance of an army to defend country and rights. Now by sacrifice and practical management she makes possible the erection of monumental stones that perpetuate the principles for which that army fighting died or fighting lived and endured.

Conspicuous among the heroes of Gainesville and Cooke County was Capt. Frank Dougherty, remembered by the younger generation as an honored citizen in the peaceful years of his declining life. But his brother veterans love best to think of him as the gallant young captain who led them forth to make history, to place Cooke County high in the record of Texas! Texas, whose valiant sons made her star one of the brightest in the galaxy of stars on the bonny blue flag!

Not only the Confederate veterans but also the Confederate daughters of this county like best to think of Captain Dougherty as a veteran, and in christening their Chapter have linked his name and that of his wife with the name of the Confederacy he served.

Our Chapter bears the name of Lou Dougherty, the patriotic wife of Captain Dougherty, to whom destiny was kind in making her natal day (June 3) the same as that of the immortal Jefferson Davis—Lou Dougherty, whose mantle of distinction has fallen upon her fair granddaughter in the honor conferred upon Miss Lucie Dougherty of unveiling that monumental embodiment of glorious memories—unveiling it on this 3d day of June, when every son and daughter of the South is kneeling in spirit at the tomb of the Confederacy, is kneeling at the shrine of Jefferson Davis, the dead President of our just cause!

Granddaughter of a Confederate soldier, lift the veil from that shrouded spirit of the past! Lift the veil, and let the sunlight from Southern skies fall in benediction upon the spirit of Confederacy!

ANNIE PERDUE SEBRING CHAPTER.

The Annie Perdue Sebring Chapter of the U. D. C. was organized at Jacksonville, Fla., March 26, 1908, with thirty-three members. The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Annie Perdue Sebring; Vice Presidents, Mrs. Mollie Thomas and Miss M. Gertrude Anderson; Recording Secretary, Miss Willie Thomas; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Angela Howard; Treasurer, Miss Vera Parsons; Registrar, Mrs. Caroline Hopkins.

The honored President of this Chapter is a Baltimorean by birth, and figured conspicuously during the war. Just prior to the election of Mr. Lincoln her family moved to Tennessee. Being Southern by birth, environment, education, and feeling, they were true sympathizers with the South. She telegraphed to a very wealthy friend in Baltimore for one thousand rifles to be used by the Confederate soldiers. The telegram, going over the wires to Washington, was caught and taken to President Lincoln, and he said: "See to the gentleman and let the lady go until after the war."

She painted a portrait of Gen. Sterling Price which sold for $375. The proceeds were to buy medicines for soldiers in Arkansas. Many of the army were down with fever; but crossing the Mississippi from Arkansas into Memphis, they soon recuperated, and instead of the money being used for that purpose musical instruments were purchased for a brass regimental band, and on every instrument of the band was engraved "Miss Annie Perdue," and the band was ever called the Annie Perdue Division Band. This was done by Gen. Sterling Price and his soldiers. The band played a prominent part in the conflict.

Miss Annie Perdue crossed the picket lines many times, carrying letters, clothing, and food to the Southern soldiers, and was exiled for so doing. She bore a sacred reputation that had won her honor and fame in the Federal lines, and that was her absolute loyalty to veracity and the South. Her truthfulness was never questioned.

Mrs. Mollie Thomas, First Vice President, is closely related to Henry Clay.

The Second Vice President, Miss Anderson, also comes from the same line of ancestors as the Chapter Historian, Miss Wallace; and Miss Sallie Yewell comes in direct ancestral line with Gen. R. E. Lee.

USEFUL WOMAN MUCH HONORED IN HER WORK.

The appointment by Gen. K. M. Vanzandt of Mrs. Rountree as matron of honor for the Texas Division at the Birmingham Reunion was especially fitting.

Mrs. Rountree's father, John S. McIver, was a member of Company B, 8th Texas Cavalry (Terry's Texas Rangers), whose sister made and presented through him to the Rangers their famous battle flag which occasioned such public notice and created such universal interest in 1899, when Governor Mount, of Indiana, accompanied by his entire staff, the members of the Indiana Legislature, and a large membership of the G. A. R., went on a special train to Texas to return it to the Rangers.

The flag was not captured from the Rangers, but was lost near Gaylesville, Ala., on October 22, 1864, during a retreat.

MRS. J. A. ROUNTREE, BIRMINGHAM, ALA.,
Matron of Honor for Texas Division.

It was not unfurled at the time, but was incased in oilcloth, and in the haste was torn from the staff by the thick underbrush and was found next day by an Indiana regiment and kept by them until 1899, although they freely acknowledged that it was found, not captured.

When the Reunion met in Nashville in 1897, having lost all hope of a return of the original flag, Miss McIver made a duplicate and presented it to the Rangers with fitting ceremony.

Unfortunately when the flag was returned Miss McIver's health prevented her from accepting the urgent invitation of the Rangers to be present; but when in 1906, shortly before her death, the Reunion was again held in Nashville, they called upon her in a body bearing the original flag.

Mrs. Rountree as Miss McIver was reared in Nashville. Her personal work in Alabama is well known. She is a charter member of Pelham Chapter, U. D. C., one of the first Chapters organized in that State, over twelve years ago. She has ever been closely identified with the work of the State Division, having served as Historian, Secretary, Director, Vice President, and President of her Chapter, as well as Chapter Editor of the State for nearly four years. She has been Custodian of the Crosses of Honor for the past two years. She has been doubly honored in being the chaperon of the sponsors and maids of honor of the Alabama Division of the United Sons of Confederate Veterans at the Birmingham Reunion.

JEFFERSON DAVIS HOME ASSOCIATION.

LARGEST CONTRIBUTOR SO FAR TO THE FUND.

Capt. C. J. VanMeter, who was born May 22, 1826, in Bowling Green, Ky., gives one hundred dollars to the Jefferson Davis Home Association. This great-hearted, patriotic gentleman engaged in the mercantile business early in life and later in steamboating. When the war came on, he was asked by Gen. A. S. Johnston to assist the Confederates; so, furnishing a warehouse, he acted as grain receiver and dispenser for the army for more than two years, doing valuable service. He transported provisions and grain, and carried mail to different commands, many times at great personal risk.

Since the war Captain VanMeter has lived quietly on his farm, near Bowling Green, in one of the most beautiful homes of Kentucky. He was married in 1878 to Mrs. Woodall, originally Miss Kate Moss, sister to Col. J. W. Moss, a soldier in the Mexican War and also a daring soldier of the Confederacy. He died from the effect of wounds. She had three other brothers in the Confederate army—Gen. Thomas E., L. C., and William Moss. Mrs. VanMeter has been President of the Bowling Green Chapter, U. D. C., for years.

Captain VanMeter has always been noted for his liberality, giving largely to the schools and charity of his town, and is esteemed as one of its best citizens.

HOW FORT PULASKI WAS CAPTURED.

Mr. E. S. Lathrop, of Decatur, Ga., tells the story.

Among the ladies who had gathered to dedicate a monument one of them expressed her ignorance of the fact that Mr. Lathrop was a veteran. To this he replied that he had not only served the entire four years with the Confederates, but that, so far as Georgia is concerned, he began the war.

Mr. Lathrop was a sergeant of the Savannah Volunteer Guards; and when orders came from Governor Brown to the commander of the Guards to take charge of Fort Pulaski in the name of the State of Georgia, they were passed on to Sergeant Lathrop, who, accompanied by a squad of men, marched to the fort. He halted his men near the fort, went alone across the drawbridge, and rapped loudly on the massive door.

His hail was answered by the Irish sergeant who had been left in charge. "Plat does yez want?" asked the Irishman. "I demand in the name of the State of Georgia the surrender of the fort," replied Lathrop. "Faith, an' ye don't get it," replied the Irishman. "Do you see that moat full of water, and do you see that squad of men there? Well, if you don't hand over the keys of this fort immediately, those men will throw you into the water and take the fort, anyway. And if you will surrender, you can go uptown and enjoy yourself for the next two weeks."

The Irishman scratched his head, thought awhile, then turned the keys over to Sergeant Lathrop, and Fort Pulaski was surrendered to the State of Georgia.

AGES OF OLDEST CONFEDERATES.

D. G. Fleming, of Hawkinsville, Ga., writes: "On page 352 of the VETERAN for July mention is made of a headstone over a grave at Mountain Creek, Ala., which bears the inscription, 'Gabriel Capers, Company C, 40th Tennessee Regiment; died February 11, 1905, aged 105 years,' with the comment: 'It seems unreasonable that so old a man was in service.' It does seem unreasonable, but it is not improbable. I will not let an Arkansas man outdo a Georgian in a 'fish story,' so will state an actual fact. In May, 1861, James Argo, Sr., of Pulaski County, Ga., was mustered into the service of the Confederate States as a member of Company G, 8th Georgia Infantry, at the age of seventy years, and did several months' good service, as I can testify, being a member of the same company. If I mistake not, he was actively engaged in the first battle of Manassas. If he had lived until 1905, as Mr. Capers did, he would have been about one hundred and fourteen years old. His grave is certainly entitled to a handsome Confederate monument. His son, James Argo, Jr., who was in the same command, is now living in Ovideo, Fla. We had another old gentleman, Jacob Stephens, nearly as old, who entered as a substitute. Of course neither could hold out when real activities began, and both were discharged after a few months of excellent service."

FIRST SOLDIER KILLED IN THE WAR.

John Quincy Marr, captain of the Warrenton Rifles (Company K), 17th Virginia Regiment Infantry, was evidently the first soldier killed in the war, having been shot through the heart at Fairfax C. H. on June 1, 1861, in a night attack by the Federals under Lieutenant Tompkins, Company B, United States Dragoons, ten days before the battle of Big Bethel, which occurred on June 10. Captain Marr was a son of John and Catherine Inman Marr, born in Warrenton, Fauquier County, Va., May 27, 1825. He was a member of the Virginia State Convention of 1861, which he left for battle. Four soldiers of his company have testified to the facts as stated—Joseph A. Jeffries, of Warrenton, Va., B. L. McCouchie, A. Fletcher, and Capt. J. D. Kirby.

A more extended notice was given this in the VETERAN for July, 1898, page 320.

AUTHOR OF "THE SOUTH IS GOING DRY."

The publication of that amusing poem, "The South Is Going Dry," in the VETERAN for June brought the following tribute to the author from Dr. R. A. Halley, editor of Fuel, Chicago: "Do you know Wilbur Nesbit? He is a poet, and a good 'one. I have written a little editorial about how everybody is claiming that poem of his entitled 'The South Is Going Dry.' Nesbit wrote it for the Chicago Evening Post and a bunch of other papers which print his matter. It caught on, and a number of papers copied it with due credit. Then others began to appropriate it, the first I heard of being a young lawyer of Houston, Tex., who 'dashed it off' and recited it at an entertainment. Then a man named Moore recited it at the Southern Society dinner in New York, and either knowingly or unknowingly allowed the credit for writing it to be given him. Fifty-eight papers and magazines have named various people as having written it. Most of them just 'dashed it off,' and Nesbit in a short year has been forgotten. I don't know that he cares, but it goes to show how little credit a man gets when he does write a good thing. Seeing it in the VETERAN without the author's name, 'that reminds me.' Nesbit is a nephew of S. L. Ewing, at one time with the Tennessee Centennial Exposition, and then with the Nashville American, but now dead, I think. Nesbit is living in St. Louis, but is a member of the Chicago Press Club. His full name is Wilbur D. Nesbit. He copyrighted the poem at the time of its first publication, but it didn't do him much good."

[The quoted "that reminds me" to the above is a heading that Dr. Halley used for many articles contributed to the Nashville American by this editor over the initials S. A. C. before he began the VETERAN.]

SONS OF VETERANS FAITHFUL TO THE CAUSE.

Referring to the statement by Gen. W. E. Mickle, Adjutant General U. C. V., that in his judgment the sons of Confederate veterans seemed to care very little for the principles for which their fathers fought, R. J. Gosney, of 310 W. 123d Street, New York, says: "If there are such sons of Confederates, they are not worthy of their fathers. I wish to advise that there are no such sons of Confederates in New York as General Mickle describes. * * * I would like to have a ten minutes' talk with any son of a Confederate veteran who does not care for the principles for which his father fought or has lost interest in the Cause (not the lost cause)."

CONFEDERATE CHOIR NO. 1 IN ARKANSAS.

A most successful series of Chautauqua engagements was recently filled by Confederate Choir No. 1, of the Arkansas Division, located at Fayetteville, Ark. This is an entirely new departure for Confederate Choirs, but the signal success of this should be an inducement to others to enter the field. A prelude programme was given to the lecture by Hon. R. L. Taylor at Fayetteville, and in Fort Smith the Choir joined Mrs. LaSalle Corbelle Pickett, furnishing an interesting programme of old Southern songs, including "Dixie," as a preface to her thrilling story of "Pickett's Charge at Gettysburg." Mrs. Pickett was charmed with the Confederate Choir, as they with her, and she was officially made an honorary member of the Arkansas Choir by Miss L. Byrd Mock, Captain of the Choir, and the beautiful Choir pin presented to her.

Another appearance of the Choir in Fort Smith was in a prelude programme to Senator James H. Berry's address, "Twenty-Five Years in the United States Senate." The same programmes were repeated in South McAlester, Okla., where a great ovation was given the Choir. So deeply impressed with their work was Mr. Edward Amherst Ott, the distinguished lecturer and President of the American Lyceum Association, that he is trying to arrange for the Choir to make a tour of the North. Mr. Ott is an instructor in the University of Chicago, and is a Northern man.

The officers and members of the Arkansas Choir are as follows: Miss L. Byrd Mock, Captain; Mrs. Willie Vandeventer Crockett and Miss Grace Davis, Lieutenants; Miss Annie Rosser, Adjutant; Miss Lillian Chandler, Treasurer; Miss Leah Baum, Quartermaster; Miss Mamie Phillips, Miss Grace Phillips, Miss Marguerite Boggett, Miss Barbara Davis, Miss Georgia Oliver, Miss Eula Evans, Miss Editha Harris, Miss Ruth Wood, Miss Maydelle Benson, Miss Laura Benson, Mrs. B. E. Grabill, Miss Mabel Chapman.

This was the first Confederate Choir organized in the Trans-Mississippi Department.

CONFEDERATE CHOIR NO. 1, MISSOURI DIVISION.

A recent addition to the United Confederate Choirs of America is the St. Louis Choir, organized May 25 by Miss L. Byrd Mock, of Fayetteville, Ark. The Choir was unanimously adopted by Camp 731. Dr. R. C. Atkinson, a former Virginian, the newly elected Commander of the Camp, is very enthusiastic over this Choir. He congratulates them on their new version of "Dixie."

The singing of the new words of "Dixie" brought about a spirited discussion in St. Louis. The majority of the veterans prefer the old words of this immortal song. The discussion thus started was taken up by some of the leading New York, Chicago, and Washington City journals, and lively editorials were written on the subject of "Changing 'Dixie.'" The New York World said, "Let 'Dixie' alone;" while the Globe Democrat, of St. Louis, heartily approves of the change in an article headed "Putting Sense in 'Dixie.'"

The St. Louis Choir made its first appearance at the Jefferson Davis memorial service on the 3d of June. After a rousing demonstration from the audience on hearing the new words to "Dixie," the Choir sang as an encore the original words, knowing that many of the old veterans preferred them. The St. Louis Choir thinks the problem of the new version will be solved satisfactorily only by the Choirs being prepared to sing both the old and the new.

A number of very talented young women belong to the St. Louis Choir. Miss Grace McCulloch is Captain of this Choir, and she is also Major General of the Missouri Division of the United Confederate Choirs of America. She is a fine singer, and is the daughter of Capt. Robert McCulloch, Vice President and General Manager United Railways of St. Louis.

MISS GRACE McCULLOCH.

Captain McCulloch has been Commander of the St. Louis Camp of Confederate Veterans for the last five years. He belonged to the Army of Northern Virginia and commanded Company B, 18th Virginia Infantry. He went into service as a cadet from the Virginia Military Institute in 1861, and served in every capacity from drillmaster to captain. He was wounded five times, being shot once through the body.

Mrs. James Bannerman is First Lieutenant of the St. Louis Choir. She has a beautifully trained voice, and is quite an acquisition to the Choir. Mrs. Marguerite Hopkins is Second Lieutenant. Miss May Atkinson, daughter of Commander R. C. Atkinson, is Adjutant. Miss Elizabeth Hickok is Quartermaster. Mrs. A. D. Chappell, a brilliant soloist of the Morning Choral Club, is Director of the Choir. Miss Frances Trumbo, a talented young concert pianist, is the Official Accompanist. Other members of the Choir are: Miss Mary Coker, Mrs. E. S. Tracy, Miss Roberta Morrison, and Miss Margaret Scott; Mrs. Frank Estes, also a member of the Choral Club, and Miss Edna Ramsey, a gifted singer, just returned from a three years' course of study in Europe.

The Confederate Choir of St. Louis has been most enthusiastically received, and the stamp of approval set on it by both North and South. For example, the following article from the Censor, a St. Louis weekly, whose editor, Mr. Dyer, is a Northern man, will be gratifying to Southern readers: "Mrs. A. D. Chappell, one of the queen bees of the Morning Choral Club, is the Director of the recently organized Confederate Choir. What splendid words those are, 'Confederate Choir!' How the old melodies of the South will tingle in our ears, recalling sad memories, but firing new flames of patriotism, when we hear this splendid band of women sing the old familiar songs! They will appear at all Confederate Reunions and at the funerals of Southern veterans. Miss Grace McCulloch, the well-known singer, is Captain. How jaunty and patriotic the girls will look with their gray jackets and brass buttons, red shoulder sashes and soft gray hats! The Choir is making its first appearance to-day at the celebration of Jefferson Davis's birthday. All hail to the new Confederate Choir of St. Louis! Why did not some one think of such an organization before? They did not, but waited for Miss L. Byrd Mock, whose rank is that of Major General, to come here from the South and bring the idea with her. Miss Mock is herself not only a musician, but a composer, who has written some charming music. It was she who started all this discussion over the question of 'dignifying' the words of 'Dixie.'"

CONFEDERATE HALF DOLLAR COINS.

BY DR. M. S. BROWNE, OF WINCHESTER, KY.

In order to set right Comrade Maj. Ben C. Truman, of Los Angeles, and correct the erroneous impression as to Confederate coinage made by his communication to the VETERAN in the February number, I will state that the coinage was suspended after the coining of the four half dollars by reason of a lack of bullion for the purpose. A careful search some years ago into the subsequent history of those four pieces proved that three of them have been so lost as to make their identification impossible. The fourth one, sent to Memminger, the then Secretary of the Confederate Treasury, evaded a most persistent effort on my part to locate it. I utterly failed to get any trace of his family even. The coins of General Nichols, of Oscar Taylor, of Roberts, of Gen. John Boyd, of Lexington, Ky., and a number of others, of which I have knowledge, are known as "Restrikes." But just the details of these "Restrikes," how many were made before Uncle Sam's secret service men secured the dies, etc., I should like to know. Since the publication in the VETERAN a few years ago of an article by me on "Confederate Coinage" and the "Restrikes," I have traced a few more of the latter and dispelled some delusions of fortunes in a Confederate half dollar.

TENDENCY OF NORTHERN SENTIMENT.

In this connection an extract from an editorial in the Defender at the time of Mrs. Davis's death seems appropriate: "Of Jefferson Davis as a man the North is ready to render a true verdict. He was an honest man. His convictions were founded upon mistakes, but he was true to them. His hands were clean. No man ever charged him with the sins that have disgraced so many American public men. In ability he ranked among the foremost of Americans. The North will probably never build him a monument, but we are ready at least to concede that in happier times he might have been one of the greatest factors for the upbuilding of our common nation."

CONFEDERATE MONUMENT FOR RICHMOND, KY.

A movement has been started in Madison County, Ky., for the erection of a Confederate monument in the beautiful cemetery at Richmond, the county seat. Commander N. B. Deatherage, of T. B. Collins Camp, and Commander David Chenault, of Waller-Chenault Camp, with a committee composed of Joseph Collins, C. D. Pattie, and James B. McCreary, have sent out a statement with the purpose of interesting others in this cause, and it is hoped that good response will be made.

The greater number of Confederates buried on this lot were killed in the battle of Richmond, Ky. It is hoped that many comrades who were in that battle are still living, are prosperous, and will be inclined to help along this undertaking. Subscriptions can be sent to either of the comrades mentioned above or to the Citizens' National Bank at Richmond, Ky.

CONFEDERATE WHO SERVED IN MEXICAN ARMY.

BY T. W. WESTLAKE, COLUMBIA, MO.

I went into the Confederate army in September, 1861, and served continuously until the close of the war except the three or four months I was in prison. I was captured on Price's raid to Missouri in the fall of 1864, sent to the penitentiary at Alton, Ill., and kept there a prisoner of war until February, 1865, when I with others was sent to Richmond on exchange. From there we were started to Mobile, Ala., as recruits. While traveling through Georgia our train met with an accident (a wheel broke), and I was thrown from the top of the coach, where I was riding, and so badly hurt that I was taken to the hospital at Montgomery, remaining about ten days. By this time orders came to move the hospital, as the Federals were expected at Montgomery soon; so all who could take care of themselves were discharged from the hospital and ordered to report to their commands.

Gen. Joe Shelby's Brigade, to which I belonged, was then in Eastern Texas, with the Mississippi River between us overflowed from bluff to bluff. However, I secured a dugout, crossed over, and got to my command in time to go with Shelby's expedition to Mexico. It started a few days after I arrived. We took several six-mule loads of small arms and a few pieces of artillery with us to the Rio Grande River at Eagle Pass, where we sold them to the Mexican government, then at war with the imperial government under Maximilian. After a division of the money for which the arms were sold, General Shelby and a majority of the men set off for the City of Mexico to offer their services to Maximilian; while thirty-six of us, under Col. Ben Elliott, of Jackson County, Mo., started to Mazatlan, on the Pacific Coast. From there we did not know or care much where we should go. Most all went to California or South America. I alone of the company of thirty-six joined the Mexican army, remaining with it until Maximilian was captured and executed. I was with the Mexican army a little over one year, and still have my discharge, prizing it very highly.

I would be gratified if I could find any of the boys who were in the company of thirty-six from Eagle Pass on the Texas border to Mazatlan, Mex., on the Pacific Coast, whom I will appreciate hearing from at Columbia, Mo.

SPIRIT OF CONFEDERATE REUNIONS.

Of all times, a general Confederate Reunion is the South's most joyous. Care and all animosity are left behind. Veterans who are old and feeble and often bent with age go to these Reunions to have "a good time," and they have it. The same spirit actuates the good women who are still inspired by faith of merit in the cause. Younger people make it the occasion to honor father and mother, whether living or dead. Then the children are happy, of course. Everybody is happy.

HUGH T. MORTON, JR., SNUG IN HIS BABY CARRIAGE.

Master Hugh T. Morton, Jr., illustrates the spirit of his class. His grandfathers were both colonels in the Confederate army, and the little fellow, though but eight months old, was manifestly as happy as older persons. He was evidently the youngest "Rebel" who participated in the memorable occasion of the Birmingham Reunion.

ERROR IN OFFER OF GAVELS TO THE U. D. C.

BY MRS. CORNELIA BRANCH STONE, PRESIDENT.

By an inadvertence gavels were offered to Chapters of the United Daughters of the Confederacy which should be named for President Davis, any member of his family, or either of his homes, Brierfield or Beauvoir.

In a resolution presented by the State of Mississippi and adopted by the General Convention U. D. C., assembled in November, 1907, at Norfolk, Va., the offer was made as follows:

Resolved, That this body does agree to present a gavel made of Beauvoir wood with silver name plate to each literary club or society which shall be organized during the year 1908, provided that each club or society shall be named for Jefferson Davis, any member of his family, or either of his homes, Brierfield and Beauvoir."

This mistake is regretted, as some Chapters, U. D. C., have organized, complied with conditions, and have applied for gavels, which, under the resolution adopted, cannot be given, as the offer is made only to "literary clubs or societies."

ADVICE IN REGARD TO PENSIONS.

BY GEN. JOHN B. STONE, KANSAS CITY, MO.

I read everything published in every issue of the VETERAN from the first page to the last. Almost every item which you publish is interesting to the Confederate soldier, his friends and relatives, and all these should be subscribers to the VETERAN. I would not be without the paper for $100 per year.

I notice in every issue of the VETERAN inquiries from comrades seeking information so as to prove their record in the Confederate army. So many of the old soldiers have died or have moved away from their place of enlistment that it is a very difficult matter to prove a record by living witnesses.

The United States government has a copy of the muster roll of every regularly enlisted company and regiment which served in the Confederate army; and if any Confederate soldier wishing his war record will write to the Adjutant General, War Department, Washington, D. C., his letter will receive prompt attention, and the applicant will get his record with less trouble than by any other method. It is a better and much quicker plan to write or see in person either the United States Senator or Representative of the Congressional district in which the applicant lives and let him apply to the Adjutant General for the desired information.

FORM OF APPLICATION.

FITZHUGH, OKLA., July —, 1908.

The Adjutant General, War Department, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sir: Will you please furnish me my Confederate war record. I enlisted in Company A, 4th Alabama Regiment, April, 1861, at Selma, Ala.

JOHN B. ———.

The information received from the War Department of our government is reliable; and while it may not be complete, it will be of great benefit to comrades who apply for pensions and admission to the State Confederate Homes.

[The VETERAN regrets the fact that the most essential feature to comrades seeking pensions—viz., the conditions of getting out of service—is in many instances not given because of the chaotic conditions at the close. However, he should procure what there is of record at Washington, and then as diligently as practicable establish proof of his parole, even if he never expects to apply for a pension. It is a record that should be preserved in the family.—ED. VETERAN.]

HOME LIFE OF GEN. STEPHEN D. LEE.

BY MRS. GEORGIA P. YOUNG, COLUMBUS, MISS.

[A tribute on the occasion of the memorial exercises of the Columbus Chapter, U. D. C., June 12, 1908.]

By the order of Mrs. Stone, President General of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, as well as the promptings of our own hearts, we are here to-day to offer a tribute to the memory of our fallen chieftain and honored friend, Gen. Stephen D. Lee. We come not with words of burning eloquence that thrill the soul, but as friend talks to friend of one whom they have loved, one who has gone in and out before them for years, and who when life's weary pilgrimage had ended had "crossed over the river and rests under the shade of the trees."

History has already embalmed in her pages the public career of General Lee—his valor as a soldier, his skill as a military leader, his fidelity as an educator. Ours is the loving task of calling to mind that sphere in which we knew him best—his private life. We will remember him as a neighbor, a friend, a brother, a father, a husband, and, more than all and best of all, as the Christian man. General Lee came into the social life of our community in February, 1865, when he took in holy wedlock as his wife the charming and gifted Regina Blewett Harrison.

Our sister, the late Mrs. Helen Garner, has preserved for us in our Chapter book of "Reminiscences of the War" some of the details of that brilliant social function, the marriage of General Lee and Miss Harrison. She tells us of the gathering of the élite of Columbus in the stately old mansion, of the flash of gilded stars and buttons on the officers and other military men present, and of the lovely bride in her shimmering satin and sparkling jewels. Alas! of all that gay assemblage only a handful remain who can recall the glittering pageant and the joy-filled hours.

Sacred as the subject is, and with no purpose of trespassing upon that inner precinct, the holy relationship of husband and wife, one may be pardoned for recalling General Lee's chivalric devotion to his wife during those long, weary years of her hopeless invalidism. How tenderly he watched over her, how carefully he sought to screen her from every discomfort, how unceasingly he strove to make the rough places smooth, how unflinchingly he labored to alleviate her sufferings, and how almost to the last every new achievement in the science of surgery was levied upon with the hope of removing her unconquerable malady! A more admirable example of marital devotion we have not known.

General Lee was a wise father. To his son, the only child that was given him, he was a companion. Together they read and studied, together they talked and walked. How often we saw them on our streets in this sweet companionship! I was visiting at the home about the time this son, Blewett Lee, in the first flush of his young manhood was called to a professorship in a Chicago university. My mother heart ached in sympathy with these parents, and I said: "General, I cannot see how you and Mrs. Lee can consent to this separation from your only child." With emphasis he replied: "We love our boy too well to stand between him and what we conceive to be his best interests." That little speech impressed me as having the true ring, for too often parental love is selfish, seeking its own ease and pleasure to the detriment of the child.

Separated from his own relatives and living among those of his wife's, he seemed to be thoroughly identified with them. His noble and generous nature manifested itself in many beautiful acts of brotherly kindness from day to day. Sadly indeed is he missed by the "little sister," as he was wont to call her, to whom he was father, counselor, guide, and unfailing comforter.

Loyalty to every cause that engaged him and fidelity to every trust committed to him were two of General Lee's marked characteristics. When some forty years ago he became a member of the Baptist Church, he gave not only his name but his hand and heart to its upbuilding and to the establishment of righteousness within its borders. He was indeed "a pillar" in the Church. Generous in his donations, wise in his counsels, constant in his attendance on its ministrations, faithful in his adherence to its doctrines, he stood as an exemplar of the well-rounded Christian man. One of his last conscious utterances was in reference to a matter he had in hand for the new church building. He expressed the wish to get home that he might give it personal attention. We could wish that it had been the Father's will that he should have lived to see the completion of the noble structure now being erected and for a few years at least to have worshiped within its courts.

Many of us will remember his absorbing interest in the Cates revival meeting of last year. When leading in prayer his ringing voice would fill the large auditorium, and every petition seemed freighted with love for his fellow-man and fired with zeal for the cause of the Great Captain of his salvation.

As a Chapter of the U. D. C. we can never forget General Lee's uniform interest in our organization. Never did he fail to coöperate with us in our plans and purposes, and he always cheerfully and graciously met every demand. In my last conversation with him, when speaking of Dr. Lipscomb's history that our Chapter proposed publishing, I said: "General, I know that you are continually beset with requests, yet I must beg that you will give us your picture and that of your house to be among the illustrations of our book." Heartily he responded: "You shall have them, and I will do anything else that I can for you."

Remembering that General Lee was but a few months over thirty years of age when he had attained the high military position in the Confederate army of lieutenant general, and that added honors came in civil life with added years, we are impressed with the fact that he never exhibited the least spirit of vainglory or self-exaltation. He was as unassuming and modest as he was great.

After one of our Chapter meetings at which a President of a U. D. C. Chapter of another State was present, I asked Miss Harrison if it would be convenient to have my friend meet General Lee. With a soldier's promptness, so characteristic of him, he came directly in. During the little interview allusion was made to his being Commander in Chief of that honored band, the gray-haired, gray-coated veterans. With beautiful modesty (I could almost say he blushed) General Lee closed his eyes and, turning his face upward, said: "I am only chief because my comrades have gone before me."

We who know the story of Sharpsburg, Second Manassas, Chickasaw Bayou, Vicksburg, and Franklin know that he was the peer of any commander on those battlefields. General Lee never thought of his greatness nor felt himself superior to the lowliest with whom he companied. His was always the kindly word and cordial handclasp. When one brought tidings to King David that Abner, the commander in chief of Saul's army, had been slain by the hand of the treacherous Joab, the magnanimous king burst into a touching eulogy over his fallen foe. That eulogy concludes with: "Know ye not that a prince and a great man hath fallen in Israel to-day?" We may borrow the words and say: "Know ye not that a prince and a great man has fallen in our Israel to-day?" General Lee was great in all that makes for true greatness. He was a prince among men whose chivalry, whose courage, whose fidelity, whose magnanimity, whose integrity, whose purity, whose modesty command our admiration and demand our homage. Let us ever hold him in loving remembrance and hand down his example as a gracious heritage to our children's children.

THE U. D. C. HISTORICAL ADDRESS.

BY GEN. CLEMENT A. EVANS, CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE.

This assembly is representative of the people of that part of the country commonly called the South. It stands as a body for the true citizenry of a powerful section of the United States. The people thus represented have views of true civic virtues and of the true social status and the distinct responsibilities of the American people which are shared by the greater number of our countrymen everywhere. It cannot be suspected without a shudder that their ideas and ideals are scorned by a majority of the people of the Union. In fact, this truly grand gathering represents the intelligence and the energies, the traditions and the history, the intense patriotism and the exalted hopes of a chivalric people whose ancestors were leaders of great prominence in the founding of our constitutional republic.

The special work chosen by the great soldiers' organization here in annual session is purely patriotic, peace-making, beneficial to the whole country and valuable to posterity forever. Its principal objects are to preserve comradeship, to establish justice and purity in all literature, especially in history, to abolish sectional discord, and to promote genuine and generous courtesies among the people whose fathers nearly half a century ago strove for the mastery with bloody severity four years upon many historical battlefields. In proper furtherance of these grand designs, heroism is being also commemorated by durable monuments as well as by every other token that can inspire men with the true heroic spirit and the love of truth which makes a people free indeed. And it must be further stated that among this cluster of starry guides to national glory it has become necessary to place Southern and national insistence that the reasonable claims of the South for better recognition should be allowed, that its local problems should be more fairly considered, and that it should be unhindered in its efforts to maintain under existing embarrassments the social and racial integrity of all that people who developed and civilized North America and established the democratic republican government which we enjoy.

The people of the South have made history which teaches moral and civic virtues by example, and they are greatly concerned in the true narration of their deeds and the fair statements of their motives. In beginning to discharge this duty as to their own recent history, the Southern people were startled by the discovery that the youth of the country were threatened with a perpetuation of sectional strife through the evil influences of sectional literature. History books were complacently presented for adoption by school boards, although infested with sectional unfairness. Statements were printed in such books which were but half truths, while truths were so adulterated with errors as to be no longer true and pure, while paragraphs were adroitly constructed so as to carry concealed the deadly dagger of misrepresentation. It was evident that duty demanded resistance to this corruption of a literature pretending to be historical truth, and it is gratifying to know that the efforts to strike down the pernicious evil has been rewarded by considerable success; but the strict exclusion of all unfair publications must be vigorously enforced, and the books themselves must be consigned to the flames of patriotic indignation.

Southern authorship is winning high appreciation by the public. The South is rich in talents, experience, and other wealth to enter the fields of literature where the greater success awaits only the greater endeavor to achieve it. Glaring wrongs can be best remedied by the Southern writers doing their part in the literature reformation. If the youth of the South shall not hereafter know the splendid history of their own section and the true value of Southern history, that privation will be the fault of their fathers. The fact is lamentable that the passing of forty years has been required to satisfy the public mind that broad generosity and not a narrow animosity should be the pervading spirit of American literature, that praise and not obloquy, fair play and not foul play should distinguish signally and specially the permanent narration of that mighty struggle between the sections which closed without the loss of even one essential principle that lessened the rights and duties of our people, our States, and our general government.

The Southern people of 1861 did not linger long at the tomb of the Confederacy. Their brave soldiers garlanded the ideal sepulcher with their own chivalric glory and committed the Confederate movement to the memory of what it was and what its defenders did to sustain it. The South would not live in the past alone. Its people gazed awhile sadly on the rich and radiant glow of the setting sun, but they firmly faced the duties of the coming day. The severity of the new conditions was appalling, but in battling bravely with their obstacles this heavily burdened gallant people are achieving well-deserved success. Out of extreme desolations the hopeful Southland citizenry have risen majestically by their own splendid achievements without capital except a credit good as gold and a land that responded to the enterprise of its owners. They had a genius for honesty in business and fidelity to the laws of true trade which so directed their financing that they have never in all history produced a financial panic. Their energy is clasping with its glad hand the present opportunities, and with honorable thrift they will preserve their prosperity.

Behold this sunny South! See how it beams in varied beauty, how it exults in its temperate climate, how it teems with products that meet the wants of the world! Glance at its stretches of prosperous domain, from Maryland to Arizona, from St. Louis to Charleston, from Louisville to New Orleans! It embraces seventeen extensive States—more than one-third of the Union—nearly as many as all the great West contains, and twice as many as all the thrifty East. Count its twenty-four millions of people, nearly one-third of the population of the United States. Think of its marvelous natural resources. Hear with gladdened hearts the music of its mills and mines, its commerce and its fields and forests singing in harmonious chorus: "Hurrah for the sunny South!"

There are conditions existing at times in special situations which produce problems for people to solve, and in our country there are varieties of local problems which can be solved only by local wisdom. But our form of government is better adapted to settle such problems in the interest of all the people than any other government on earth. In our Union the responsibilities for good government are shared among the people, the States, and the general government in such a manner that each has sufficient authority to do the duties required, and therefore when special local problems arise the task of solving them presses first upon the locality most concerned.

The Southern States have their own problems, which they desire to solve for the common good. It is true also that there are other questions not exclusively Southern in which the people of the South are concerned equally with all citizens; such, for instance, as the general questions of the just relations between the States and between any State and the general government. But even this problem was made local as to the Southern States and became acutely sectional in the years between 1850 and 1861, when the circumstance that African slavery had become an institution was used to create a dangerous Southern problem.

After many unsuccessful expedients, the States in the South fled for refuge to secession; and that being denied, they were forced to fight; and having failed in that, they surrendered without any settlement by negotiations or war. Hence the old disturbing presence in our country of a people of African descent became more serious than ever because the problem was loaded from 1865 with new and insupportable conditions. These negroes in the Southern States were merely turned loose with nothing but the power to vote and hold office without qualifications. They were not offered homes anywhere except in the South, and they fell as a load on the Southern people. But the South assumed the burden, and the assertion is here made that no body of people in any age of the world has treated this negro race with real kindness except the people of the Southern States.

All nations have enslaved them, and not one has trained them into that physical, intelligent, moral manhood which is the indisputable qualification of a valuable population. For example, consider the negroes in Africa under European rule. The Southern States have over six millions of this race to care for, and the Southern people are qualified to execute the trust justly, benevolently, and for the general welfare. It is, therefore, insisted that the hindering intermeddling with the purposes to righteously solve this problem shall cease; for whatever the motive may be, such interference is misdirected, hurtful, and often open to suspicion as being accompanied with insincerity, selfishness, or ignorance of Southern conditions.

The mere argument on certain debatable questions of great importance has been exhausted. These issues have been ably discussed in conventions like this for many years with cleanliness, truthfulness, and power by the most eminent men of the country. None of them need further discussion at this hour before this well-informed assembly. The South rests its reasons and its acts in the effort of the States to form a separate government on the law and the testimony with absolute confidence in the justice of its cause.

The Southern people stand upon the firm basis of their sound and solid character and upon the principles of constitutional law, civic right, and moral duty which ruled their actions. With profound satisfaction they contemplate their history from the first settlement in Virginia centuries ago and their immense contribution since then to the greatness of our country. With the purest spirit of patriotism they are yet devoting their energies to the moral, the educational, the industrial, and the financial uplift of all the people to those lofty civic conditions which alone truly exalt a nation.

This attitude of the South thus firmly taken on questions formerly debatable even by war permits in present conditions the fair concession on all sides that "points of view" may be considered and honest difference of opinion may be indulged provided neither side will do the other any harm. The remark has been prominently made in praise of the soldiery of the Confederate and Union armies that "each fought for the right as he saw the right."

This favorite fraternal phrase may be accepted to mean that honesty in opinion as well as valor in action may be found on both sides. Take as illustration: One man could see from his one point of view that the saving of the Union was his supreme obligation, while the other saw clearly that saving the Constitution was his supreme duty; but each may now see that there is an honest way to keep both the Union and the Constitution in perfect safety, and may it not be urged incidentally that as the Union is safe from danger of secession let us save the Constitution from the dangers of perversion?

It will profit our statesmen and all other students of our government if they will fully consider the estimate placed by the citizens of the United States on the present value of the Union together with the intense devotion of the people, also on the Constitution as the protector of their personal liberties and the saviour of the powers and dignities of their respective States from a possible ruthless ravage. These two potent, popular estimates of the Constitution and the Union are consistent and coöperative. They are the indissoluble components of a good government, and both are sentiments very dear to the American heart.

We remember the power of the masterful Union sentiment when the appeal was made to save the imperiled life of the Union, even by war. It was a feeling inherited from our ancestors of the American Revolution, and had been at various times displayed throughout the South and in the North when threats of secession were made by the Northern statesmen. Our fathers felt that in forming this Union they had gained a true government of United States which would abide forever. They were thrilled by the patriotic sensation that safety was secured for all rights and defense was provided against all wrongs. This has been in all our country's history a powerful sentiment, and it is that same love of country which still warms the soul of the true citizen when he sees the Union truly illustrated by the full exercise of all powers delegated and reserved so as to serve every section, to protect the interests of every citizen, to save every right, and thus achieve a durable magnificent greatness.

MISS DUNCAN,

But there is another element in the enthusiasm of our sires and their sons, which is the twin brother to the Union sentiment. What is that other twin constituent which was laid in the cradle of our government? What is that crowning glory of our country which distinguishes it even as the glory of the sun is greater than the glory of the stars? It is the equally masterful popular sentiment concerning the value of the sacred sentiment which was ordained and established as the "Constitution of the United States of America."

Let us follow that popular sentiment for the Constitution to its source as we have followed the feeling for the Union. For more than a century the colonial States had held their few liberties by the uncertain tenure of royal charters and edicts; and these failing, they fought for independence; and having won it, they undertook to act together without the compact of a written constitution. But the plan produced such harassing discords and perils that a constitutional government of United States became clearly the imperative need. The problem before these colonial States in this situation was such as no other people had ever solved.

The joining together of separate State sovereignties so as to create an indissoluble union of them as such in perfect equality, retaining sovereignty in the States, preserving fundamental sovereignty in the States, preserving fundamental sovereignty in the people, while conferring sovereign powers upon a general government, was a problem indeed not even dreamed of in all political philosophy. But the complex problem was solved by the minds and even more by the patriotic hearts of those great Americans of our Revolution who were the wisest as well as the truest statesmen in the world.

It was no easy task. They had anxieties and fears which no history has fully portrayed. They were in the crucible themselves when they moulded that Constitution into form, and their finished work deserves a sentiment of reverence like that which is felt for the Decalogue given by Moses to be the law of the world.

In the keeping of that Constitution there is great reward. If sacredly observed, it will be the perpetual foundation of civic blessings, because the States will be the everlasting springs which shall keep that fountain full, and the people shall have their liberties secured as permanently as the stars are fixed in the firmament of heaven.

Within the range of the true patriot's present view there are four ideals of equal worth. They are the State, the Constitution, the Union, and the general welfare of all the people. Consider these four great entities as they arise in order of time, sequence, and relations. They are the people, the States, the Constitution, the Union.

Out of these our government arose in its remarkable form. As such it was dedicated to liberty, as such it is devoted to maintain equality, and as such it is organized to promote fraternity. We will therefore take the sentiments which were laid in the cradle of our government and make their unity the basis of our amity, their concord the assurance of our liberties, their united reign the protection of our country from every foe. These principles ruling the hearts of the people will make our land the leader of the world by the blessing of Almighty God.

After concluding the address of the Historical Committee, the Chairman offered the following special resolution as part of the annual report: "The Historical Committee consider that the United Confederate Veterans and their cooperating associations, the United Sons of Confederate Veterans, the Southern Woman's Confederated Memorial Association, and the United Daughters of the Confederacy, are joined indissolubly in great patriotic common work, and that there is no auxiliary supporting them so effectively as their official organ, the monthly magazine, the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, conducted by our Comrade S. A. Cunningham, Nashville, Tenn. Through this able magazine our history, our biography, and the knowledge of all the facts and principles of the War between the States are made known monthly to thousands of our countrymen. It represents the present noble attitude of the South toward every part of our country, and deserves the careful reading of our entire people."

THE MAN BEHIND THE GUN—AND THE BOOK.

[Remarks of Gen. Bennett H. Young in presenting the editor of the VETERAN to the Association at Birmingham.]

We hear much to-day of the "man behind the gun." He is the most potential of all factors in war. The soldiers of the Confederate States demonstrated that, while there was much in the gun, there was more in the man behind it, and their splendid achievements with their inferior equipments are the noblest and highest tribute to their immeasurable courage.

With more than forty years between us as the survivors of the mightiest struggle of which modern history tells, there comes now a persistent, earnest, and universal call for the conservation and preservation in some permanent form of the countless deeds of valor and unparalleled suffering of the men and women of the South in their heroic efforts to win national independence.

The glorious record of immortality which fate decreed as a reasonable and just compensation for its denial of success in the gigantic contest waged by the Confederate States for their liberty will be of little value unless we shall find some means or method for its faithful presentment to those who shall follow us.

And now, comrades, as the shadows lengthen and we face the inevitable which awaits, all our thoughts are turned toward the plans necessary to tell the true story of the deeds of the men who wore the gray. Who they were is not the great thing, what they were the world ought to know and must know, and so a new demand comes from the hearts of those who yet stand on the "nigher shore," and we plead for the "man behind the book," who shall adequately perform this last and essential duty to those who stood as the representatives of the South's heroism, womanhood, and manhood in that tremendous conflict, the splendor and glory of which can never fade until all things shall forever pass away.

There is one who has been raised up by Providence to perform this illustrious service, and with absolute unselfishness has consecrated the resistless energies of a patient and laborious life to this great work, and in this respect done more than any other Confederate soldier can ever hope to do for the perpetuation of the real records of Southern achievement, suffering, and sacrifice from 1861 to 1865. He stands as a noble benefactor single-handed and almost alone, oftentimes unappreciated and sometimes opposed, yet he wearieth not in well-doing. He has performed this splendid mission, and through the CONFEDERATE VETERAN with incalculable labor has gathered into its printed pages more of what the Southern soldier accomplished and suffered than any other work ever printed. It has no superior as a military periodical in the world of letters, and all Confederates everywhere should gratefully and sincerely acknowledge their obligations to S. A. Cunningham for his incomparable zeal, for his unflinching fidelity, for his unwavering allegiance to his chosen calling in life—to place in printed form, as far as may be possible, the story of the immeasurable sacrifices and the magnificent courage of the men and women of the Southland in the mighty struggle they made to win the Confederate States the right of nationhood.

And so in presenting Comrade Cunningham to you I pat him on the back and we all say: "Hurrah for Cunningham, the man behind the Confederate book."

[It was not intended to print the foregoing in the VETERAN, but no modesty should prevent service which will help the cause.—EDITOR VETERAN.]

TRIBUTE TO J. E. AND S. D. McDONALD.

BY DR. W. N. HOLMES, NASHVILLE, TENN.

Prof. John Uri Lloyd, of Cincinnati, in an address before a medical association in Nashville a few years ago said: "There are great buildings, monuments, and structures of various kinds in Nashville, and the city itself stands upon solid limestone; but, ladies and gentlemen, I say to you that you have here a monument that will prove more enduring than all the handiwork of man, and that is the CONFEDERATE VETERAN. It will go down in history as associated with a race of people, recording their bravery and deeds of valor, surviving in the minds and hearts of men and women long after the marble, the bronze, the stone, and the steel of Nashville have moldered and crumbled into dust."

If a citizen of Ohio will come among us and pass such eulogy as the above on a periodical the object of which is to perpetuate and keep alive the memories of those whose prosperity, chivalry, and happiness had commanded the admiration of the world and the envy of the North, keeping alive the acts of bravery and heroism of our fathers in defense of what they knew to be their own by right and inheritance, then is it not a duty we owe both to ourselves and the VETERAN to do everything possible to give to future generations a complete knowledge of the character of those who fought and died that they might by their sacrifice secure to their children a combined legacy more glorious and more lasting than silver and gold? And is it not fitting that this should be done through the columns of the VETERAN?

The foregoing sentiment has inspired the writer to add some personal history, knowing that those to whom reference shall be made are worthy of a place among the records of the brave and noble, because they were of that caste and character for which the Southern States have been and ever will be so famous. Notably among these were Maj. Joseph E. McDonald and his brother, Samuel D. McDonald.

Joseph E. McDonald was born in Madison County, Tenn., May 30, 1831; and was killed in the battle of Franklin, November 30, 1864, while in command of the 55th Tennessee Regiment. He enlisted with a company formed at Trezevant, Tenn., with Jack Hillsman as captain, in October, 1861, being made first lieutenant of the company. During the following winter he was elected captain.

He was captured at Island No. 10 in the following April, and was in prison at Johnson's Island until September, when he was exchanged at Vicksburg and with the command was sent to Port Hudson, remaining there until the following summer, when they were ordered to Mobile, Ala. While at Mobile Captain McDonald was appointed major of the regiment, and went with the command on the Tennessee campaign, and his body now lies among his comrades in McGavock Cemetery, a stone marking his last resting place.

MAJ. J. E. McDONALD

Samuel D. McDonald was also born in Madison County, Tenn., November 10, 1835; and enlisted with the 12th Tennessee Regiment in July, 1861, serving throughout the remainder of the war. He was in the battles of Belmont, Missionary Ridge, Chickamauga, and all the fighting in which the gallant Cheatham's Division was engaged.

In the battle of Peach Tree Creek, at Atlanta, Ga., he was slightly wounded in the head. On the same day his sleeve was cut open by a Minie ball.

After the war he resided in his native county, and was a member of the John Ingram Bivouac several years. He died in Jackson, Tenn., of paralysis on March 22, 1908.

They were of Scotch-Irish origin. Their ancestors came into Tennessee from Virginia and North Carolina. They owned a great many slaves, and were regarded as among the wealthiest of the early settlers of West Tennessee. The family entered largely into the establishment of customs governing the higher classes of society.

There were three McDonald sisters: Mrs. R. F. Greer, Mrs. Persons, and Miss Jennie, who never married. To these women many men of my age from Jackson to McMoresville owe their standing in morals, religion, and society.

On October 6, 1859, Major McDonald was married to Miss Emma Warlick, of Madison County. To them three children were born, two of whom were twin brothers, John J. and Joseph W. They were almost exactly alike. John J. died in Louisville December 3, 1895. Joseph W. served in the Spanish-American War as surgeon of the 4th Tennessee Regiment, and was in Cuba part of his time. He died in Jackson, Tenn., March 16, 1900.

Just ten years after Mrs. McDonald's marriage to J. E. McDonald she was married to his brother, S. D. McDonald, on November 4, 1869. To their union were born two children, Samuel and Carrie.

Mrs. McDonald still lives in Jackson, Tenn., a worthy representative of those noble people; and while she as a widow with three small children passed through the last and darkest days of the Civil War as well as several years thereafter, she held up bravely. Her second marriage being a very happy union, with success and prosperity attending their career, she now, though bereaved a second time of a noble husband, enjoys the satisfaction of knowing that her own children as well as the children of the other members of both the McDonald and Warlick families have upheld and protected the pristine excellence of the names.

GRATITUDE FOR KINDNESS AT BIRMINGHAM.

The association of Confederate soldiers known as "United Confederate Veterans" is not a mercenary or selfish organization, but one that stands for a worthy purpose, a broad principle, and a noble sentiment. Its purpose is to honor the feeling of true patriotism that inspired the toil and sacrifice of the men of 1861-65 and to secure for the real nature and character of their cause just recognition in the public opinion of to-day and on the pages of history in the future. The principle for which these men acted is the constitutional right of a free people to regulate their own local affairs as they may deem best and the inalienable right of all free men to defend their homes from invasion and plunder. The sentiment that the organization represents is comradeship among all of the survivors of the great struggle, the hand of fellowship and aid for the needy, and fitting memorials in honor of the dead. Our annual Reunions are intended to promote all of these and by a series of grand object lessons to educate the younger generation in the character, the spirit, and the worth of their fathers. Whoever contributes in any measure to this end is, in our opinion, doing all the people of this great republic a valuable service and one that demands recognition and thanks from every Confederate soldier; therefore be it

Resolved by John Ingram Camp, No. 37, of Jackson, Tenn., in regular session assembled July 2, 1908: 1. That we remember with grateful pleasure the courteous and efficient service of the Mobile and Ohio and the Frisco Railroads in transporting us to and from the Birmingham Reunion of 1908, and assure all officials and employees connected with that delightful trip that this resolution is passed in no perfunctory spirit, but as a deserved tribute to their care and thoughtfulness in promoting our comfort on the road.

2. That we send greeting and thanks to the people of Birmingham, who opened wide the gates of their beautiful city for our reception, who took us to their hearts and homes during our stay among them, who laid their plans of entertainment so wisely and generously, who carried them out with such skill and kindness, and who made each of us feel "I'm glad I live in Dixie," especially as Birmingham is a part of it. With hats off we make our best bow as we quote the words of the "wise man" to this fair Reunion city of the South: "Other daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest."

Unanimously adopted. D. T. TURNER, Commander; G. R. MCGEE, Adjutant.

CONFEDERATE HOME AT BEAUVOIR.

The following cheerful letter came from the Superintendent of the Confederate Home at Beauvoir, Miss.:

"Our Home is doing nicely, and all in better moral and physical condition than ever before. We have ninety inmates, with twenty-six approved applications on file awaiting admission. There is not a spare bed; but we will soon have ample room for all who are accepted, as a contract has been let for two dormitories sufficient to accommodate forty more inmates. The hospital is also to be enlarged by a department for the wives and widows of veterans; the dining room will be enlarged and two servant houses built. A steam laundry is also in prospect. Everything is being done to make the old comrades comfortable and happy. I think we have the ideal Home in the South. There is no serious sickness. Mrs. Wallace, our Matron and Mother, is one of the biggest-hearted and grandest of women.

"A recent large and handsome donation to the Home came from Mrs. James DuBuys, of New Orleans, a generous, noble, and patriotic woman. It consisted of a large lot of glassware and chinaware, linen for the hospital, books and periodicals—the largest and handsomest donation of the kind the Home has ever received."

M. Lewis, of Clarksburg, W. Va., makes correction as to the authorship of the poem on Rodes's Brigade as given in the VETERAN for June, page 270, saying: "The poem was written by Capt. William Page Carter, and may be found in his book, 'Echoes from the Glen.' Captain Carter was a lieutenant in the battery of his brother, Capt. Thomas Carter, which was attached to Rodes's Brigade at Seven Pines, and he was afterwards captain of the battery, Capt. Thomas Carter having been promoted to command of a battalion of artillery. In the battle of Spottsylvania, May 12, 1864, Carter's Battery was stationed on our right in the 'bloody angle;' and after all of his men were killed, wounded, or captured, he was loading and firing one of his guns as best he could when he felt something cold behind his ear, and upon turning around discovered a six-foot Yankee with his musket to his head, saying, 'Young man, don't fire that gun any more,' to which Carter replied: 'Why, no, I have no intention of doing so.' He was taken to the rear and sent to Fort Delaware, at which place and other Northern prisons he was kept until after the war ended."

MEMORIAL TO GEN. S. D. LEE IN OKLAHOMA.

At Altus, Okla., an appropriate memorial service was held in honor of Gen. Stephen D. Lee. The old veterans of Altus Camp, No. 1417, met in the courthouse and held a short business meeting and then formed in line and marched to the First Baptist Church, on Main Street, where they were given a hearty welcome by the Sunday school, which had just been dismissed. The veterans were given front seats in the large church, which was packed for the occasion. They planted the Confederate flag just in front of the pulpit. The choir rendered some excellent music, after which the assembly was led in prayer by Rev. Arthur Leake. Then a stirring address was made by the pastor, Rev. J. Frank Leake.

Attorney E. E. Gore, a brother to Senator T. P. Gore, of Oklahoma, made an address. After a vocal solo by Miss Romonia Leake, there was the formal address by Attorney M. L. Haukins, which was in the main historic.

COLONEL MCCLURE'S ARTICLE CRITICISED.

BY REV. FRANK STRINGFELLOW, POWHATAN, VA.

Col. A. K. McClure's article in the June VETERAN amused me. Mr. Lincoln's innocent little effort to send hungry men a meal or two to relieve their suffering for a few days until peace could be made was so pathetically told that it would touch the hearts of ladies and children and I fear may mislead a few weak-minded old Rebs as they totter to their graves.

It might not be amiss to get our dear old friend, Colonel McClure, to answer a few questions. For instance, we might ask the kind of ships employed to carry the harmless rations. How many ships did it take to deliver rations enough to last Major Anderson a few days? Were rations the only thing sent on that fearful mission for the relief of those hungry men? He is in a position to tell how many soldiers and sailors it took to issue the two days' rations and what arms and ammunition were required to make Major Anderson and his hungry men eat the rations after they were brought. The Colonel's article was ingenious enough. It was cleverly planned and pleasantly written. * * *

The North forced the South to fire the first shot of the war, and she has been trying ever since that shot was fired to make the world, even the Southern people, believe that we began the war, when the truth is very different.

CORRECTED AUTHORSHIP OF A POEM.

BY J. D. HARBY, CONWAY, S. C.

In the June VETERAN, page 270, there appears a poem to Rhodes's Brigade, said to be written by Maj. H. A. Whiting, published in 1867. Let us keep the record straight. This poem appeared in the Houston Telegraph in the early part of the war. It was soon after the battle of Seven Pines. It was dedicated to "Hood's Texas Brigade," and was written by Mrs. Jane Young, of Houston. It is almost word for word as published in the VETERAN except that "Rhodes's Brigade" has been substituted for "Hood's Texas Brigade."

It was set to music at that time, and was a popular song in Houston. This can be verified by referring to the files of the Telegraph or to Mrs. Mollie Moore Davis, of New Orleans, or to Dr. Sam Young, Secretary of Cotton Exchange, Galveston, Tex., or to E. B. H. Cushing, with Southern Pacific Railroad, whose father was editor of the Telegraph at that time. Let justice be done.

[Comrade Harby reports that his service was with Fontaine's Eighth Company, Texas Light Artillery.]

MORE ABOUT GEN. JAMES E. RAINS.

BY JOSEPH HUTCHESON, DECATUR, GA.

The May (1908) VETERAN brought again to view the battle of Murfreesboro, December 31, 1862, which ranks with the severest battles of the War between the States. It also presented a picture of that gallant and daring officer, Gen. James E. Rains, of Nashville, Tenn. It carried me back to my first knowledge of this splendid officer.

Our 3d Georgia Battalion joined Rains's Brigade at Cumberland Gap in the early part of 1862. He was commandant of this important post, and his command consisted then of the 11th Tennessee, the 20th North Carolina, the 42d Georgia Regiments, the 3d Georgia Battalion, an artillery command, and, I think, one company of North Carolina Indians.

We remained at Cumberland Gap until midsummer without special incident of note, save at one time when the enemy made a feint upon our works. General Rains on that occasion rode along the lines of intrenchments and made stirring appeals to the boys, declaring that no such thing as surrender must be considered. A few shells were thrown into our works, one passing through a mess chest and wounding in the hand Private Robert Sparks, of Company C, 3d Georgia.

At another time General Rains, with two or three companies of the 3d Georgia Battalion, made a night raid into Kentucky, routing the enemy's outpost and capturing a few prisoners. As a result of this raid, Private David Hightower, of the Barnesville Blues, was severely wounded which caused the loss of a leg.

At another time with Captain Kendrick's company General Rains went on a night raid a few miles south of the Gap and attacked one of the enemy's picket posts, capturing a young Kentucky boy and two horses, one of which was a fine roan said to belong to a Federal surgeon. This horse was taken by Colonel Stovall and appropriated to his own use. This arbitrary act met with a shower of denunciation from Company C, who held that "to the victors belonged the spoils."

A warm friendship and mutual admiration sprang up between General Rains and Captain Kendrick, both being talented and naturally gifted. Both were lawyers and attorney-generals of their respective districts—General Rains of the Nashville circuit and Captain Kendrick of the Newnan or Coweta circuit in Georgia. This mutual admiration caused General Rains to detach Kendrick's company for special duty frequently.

In the summer or fall of 1862 General Rains's command went into Kentucky with Gen. E. Kirby Smith, between whose forces and the Federals, under Gen. Lew Wallace, a spirited engagement took place at Richmond, resulting in the complete rout of the latter, leaving their dead on the field. We discovered the next day that much clothing and other supplies were left by the enemy in his flight.

Lexington being our objective point, we soon arrived at that beautiful city, where we met with a generous welcome by those friendly to our Southland. Here we camped at the fair grounds, two miles south of the city, about two weeks. Our stay here was a treat to the weary soldier, marred only by some few cases of sickness. One of these was W. A. Johnson, of Company C, 3d Georgia Battalion, who died at the hospitable home of a Mr. Montague, about two miles south of our camp. From this ideal camp we were ordered to Harrodsburg with the view of taking part in the battle of Perryville; but before we could reach the field the battle was over and Bragg began his retreat to Tennessee. Our company returned through Cumberland Gap on our way to Knoxville, from which point we made our way into Middle Tennessee, where we were destined to play an important part in

THE GREAT BATTLE OF MURFREESBORO.

On December 30, 1862, we found our command, General Rains's Brigade, in front of the right wing of Rosecrans's army, our brigade of McCown's Division occupying the extreme left of Bragg's army. During the night of the 30th Company C (Kendrick's) spent the night in a large cornfield (the corn still on the stalk), with stacks of fodder here and there from which we drew bundles to rest upon as we listened all night long to the sound of the axes of the enemy, who were felling trees for breastworks. An all-night drizzle of rain added much to our discomfort "as we bitterly thought of the morrow."

Just before the dawn of that bloody day our company was thrown forward again as skirmishers. But we had scarcely gotten away from our command before the impetuous Rains gave the ringing order to his entire command, "Forward!" We swept everything before us for miles. We struck the enemy at surprise while arms were in stack and their breakfast was being prepared.

About 11 A.M. the enemy came to a stubborn halt, having been strongly reënforced, and here in a dense cedar thicket the leaden hail was terrible, our loss in killed and wounded being severe. In this cedar wood our gallant Rains was right at the front, encouraging his men onward by the most daring example and patriotic words, when pierced by a bullet which sent that knightly soul back to the God who gave it.

The sound of cannon and the rattle of small arms were as inspiring to General Rains as the first sounds of ballroom music to the lover of the dance; and when a battle was in prospect, his flashing eye and graceful horsemanship were the admiration of his command.

On the extreme right of the brigade another gallant officer, Capt. Meredith Kendrick, had been disabled from a severe wound in the thigh, lying with his head against a tree pale from the loss of blood. W. D. Clark, a private in Company C, seeing his captain stricken down, went to him, offering to help him to the rear, but he declined the proffered assistance. Private Clark, then looking toward the enemy with a view to resuming his fire, was struck in the jugular vein and fell dead at Captain Kendrick's feet. Within a few feet the writer was wounded in the left arm. W. B. Allen, of the same company, was wounded in the foot, which wound disabled him for further service in the war, and all along the line destruction reigned.

Later in the day Captain Kendrick and I were able to get to a Federal hospital that had been brought within our lines by our success during the day, which was said to be the home of Mr. or General Smith, a wealthy planter near the Nolensville Pike. There was a large white house with numbers of smaller cabins on the outer edge of a beautiful yard, in one of which we found lodging for the night. A good Samaritan in the person of a Federal surgeon kindly dressed our wounds and spoke words of comfort to us.

The next morning, January 1, 1863, with arm in sling I strolled over the yard, where lay in rows hundreds of Federal dead, with narrow aisles between along which one might walk and read the name, company, regiment, and State of each. Oftentimes the simple word "unknown" was pinned upon the dead soldier's breast.

On the outer edge of this yard a long ditch was being dug the size of a large grave, but of great length, to receive these unfortunate victims of war. While they were our enemies, my heart went out in sadness for their bereaved loved ones.

From that veritable charnel house we made our way to Murfreesboro, where confusion reigned supreme. Thousands of prisoners and wounded without number occupied the town, which was almost entirely set apart for a hospital for the wounded and dying. We saw in the town the long black casket containing the body of our beloved General Rains, which cast a deep gloom over our spirits. His presence in battle had been equal to a regiment of men.

In one of the hospitals we took our last look at Lieutenant Pryor, of Augusta, Ga., an officer in the Augusta Rifles.

THRILLING ESCAPE OF FEDERAL PRISONERS.

BY MISS BESSIE BAGBY, OF POWHATAN COUNTY, VA.

In the spring of 1864, during the campaign of the Wilderness, two Federal officers—Col. M. B. Birdseye, of the 2d New York Cavalry, and Col. O. V. Tracy, of General Shaler's staff—were captured by the Confederates and taken as prisoners of war to Gordonsville, Va. While there Colonel Birdseye succeeded in exchanging his Federal coat for the guard's Confederate jacket, and later, when they had been removed by their captors to Lynchburg, Colonel Tracy was fortunate enough to make a similar exchange with his guard, both officers being careful to conceal their new possessions. After a short confinement in Lynchburg, they made their escape and started out on foot to join the Federal army at Harper's Ferry. Fearing detection, they traveled mostly at night, passing through nine counties and a number of small towns en route. Wherever they stopped for food or shelter they declared themselves Confederate soldiers on their way to join General Early's army in the Valley. Near Woodville, Rappahannock County, they called one morning at the house of a Mrs. Fisher. While they were enjoying a good breakfast Miss Annie Fisher, the pretty young daughter of their hostess, wrote a letter and begged them to take it to her friend, Mr. Thomas Vigis, of General Hampton's scouts. Colonel Birdseye, masquerading as a Confederate, readily agreed to accommodate her. After several narrow escapes, they reached Harper's Ferry and served out the remainder of their time in the Northern army.

In the year 1904, just forty years after his escape from the Confederates at Lynchburg, Colonel Birdseye, while sorting over some old papers, came across the letter, still sealed, which Miss Annie Fisher had intrusted to him. Determined to find out its rightful owner, he wrote at once to the postmaster at Sperryville, inquiring the whereabouts of Mr. Thomas Vigis. Very promptly he was informed that the gentleman in question could be found at Hawlin, Va., to which address the long-delayed love letter was soon speeding, with a note of explanation from Colonel Birdseye. Mr. Vigis, in acknowledging the letter, told Colonel Birdseye that he could commend him for his faithfulness to a promise, but not for promptness. This led to a friendly correspondence between the two, resulting later in a pleasant meeting.

In October, 1905, Colonel Birdseye and Colonel Tracy, having long cherished a desire to retrace their memorable route from Lynchburg to Harper's Ferry, decided to make the journey in a carriage, accompanied by their wives. Accordingly they traveled by rail from their homes in New York to Natural Bridge, Va., where they took a carriage and went to Lynchburg, from which city they followed their own trail as closely as possible.

Mr. Vigis, having been informed of their plans, rode out on horseback and met them three miles from his home, where they spent two days by special invitation. Here they were royally entertained, and an elegant reception was tendered them, to which were invited, among others, Mr. Wingfield, of Beale's Brigade of Confederate Cavalry, Mr. R. S. Vanhorn, of the 6th Virginia Cavalry, and Mr. S. R. Armstrong, one of Mosby's Rangers. A royal banquet was spread before them by their charming hostess, Mrs. Thomas Vigis, née Miss Annie Fisher.

With so many old soldiers present, the conversation naturally turned on the war, and many spirited discussions ensued. Mr. Armstrong recounted the hanging of some of Mosby's men at Front Royal, whereupon Colonel Birdseye said he had never heard of the incident and could not believe it. In proof, however, Mr. Armstrong referred him to the proprietor at Flint Hill, who had witnessed the hanging of one of Mosby's men by the Federals on a tree at that place. He also suggested that he visit Front Royal to see the monument erected there to the memory of seven of Mosby's Rangers who were hanged by General Custer's orders. Colonel Birdseye did go and afterwards wrote Mr. Armstrong that he was convinced of the truth of his assertion. In retaliation for the hanging of these men an equal number of General Custer's soldiers were hanged by Mosby's men at Berryville, Va. Lots were drawn first and they were condemned at Rectortown. Two of the number asked permission to pray before they were swung into eternity, and when it was granted one of them, knocking his guard down, escaped and reported to Colonel Birdseye, who went back and buried the unfortunates. Colonel Birdseye remembered this incident very distinctly.

During the conversation Colonel Birdseye took from his pocket an old manuscript, faded and torn, which proved to be an application from George D. Shadburne, one of General Hampton's scouts, for authority to organize a company of independent scouts. The paper was indorsed by Generals Gordon, Lee, Stuart, and Young in their own handwriting; therefore it was a valuable relic. For this reason Colonel Birdseye was very anxious to restore it to its owner. He explained that it had come into his possession while he was camped near Petersburg. There had been a truce between him and the Confederates, which was broken, the result being a fight and the killing of one man on each side. In the saddle pocket of the dead Confederate was found the application, which was given to Colonel Birdseye. All the guests were interested in the recital, and Mr. Armstrong agreed to put forth diligent effort to find Mr. Shadburne.

When the distinguished Northern visitors had returned to New York, Mr. Armstrong began a diligent search for Mr. Shadburne. After writing to Bishop Gibson, of Virginia, Mr. Frank Stringfellow, of Virginia, and J. W. Ward, Commander of Camp Sumter, U. C. V., South Carolina, he received the information that Mr. George D. Shadburne was a prominent lawyer of San Francisco, and his address could be obtained by writing to the Judge of the Superior Court of San Francisco. After some delay, Mr. Armstrong received the following reply from Mr. Shadburne:

"SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 10, 1906.

"My Dear Mr. Armstrong: I am the man of whom you wrote on the 3d inst. I was General Hampton's Chief of Scouts for about two years. I would be indeed grateful to you for the paper you describe. And may God bless you! is the wish and prayer of

"Yours, etc., GEO. D. SHADBURNE."

Mr. Armstrong immediately wrote to Colonel Birdseye, with whom he had been keeping up a pleasant correspondence, and gave him Mr. Shadburne's address. Colonel Birdseye was delighted that the search was at last rewarded with success, and afterwards wrote Mr. Armstrong that this incident had been the means of establishing a friendship between Mr. Shadburne and Colonel Birdseye's son, who was then living in San Francisco.

The application was as follows:

"STAFFORD COUNTY, VA., April 10, 1864.

"Secretary Sedden, Honored Sir: I respectfully make application for authority to organize a company to operate in the enemy's lines as scouts for the division, and be subject to the orders of yourself and Major General Wade Hampton or the officer commanding his division. That said company be allowed all the privileges of an independent command whilst detached. That I may be allowed eight soldiers from General Hampton's Division, three to be promoted (commissioned) and five to be (noncommissioned) officers. I now have the men for the company. There need be but little or no expense to the Confederate government.

"Hoping to receive your approval and authority, I remain, sir, your most obedient servant, "GEO. D. SHADBURNE,

"Commanding Scouts General Hampton's Division."

INDORSEMENTS UPON THE COMMISSION.

HEADQUARTERS N. C. C. BRIGADE, April 11, 1864.

Respectfully forwarded and most earnestly recommended. Shadburne is a scout of well-known gallantry and ability, and has had long experience in such duty and is well worthy of promotion.

J. B. GORDON,

Brigadier General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS HAMPTON'S CAVALRY DIVISION, April 17, 1864.

Forwarded, approved, and respectfully recommended. Sergeant Shadburne has always been a zealous, faithful, and gallant soldier. He has served as principal scout for this command for the past twelve months within the enemy's lines. No one has been more zealous in his duties than this man.

P. M. B. YOUNG,

Brigadier General Commanding Division.

HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY CORPS, April 13, 1864.

Respectfully forwarded. I concur in the high opinion expressed of Sergeant Shadburne. The objection, however, to such an organization is that many men will be incorporated who are entirely unfit for such duty; the very nature of the service requires it to be performed by small, detached parties; the condition of the country makes the maintenance of such a force an impossibility, if kept together. It, moreover, would cut off a source of supply of recruits to the companies raised in those counties which those same men might be induced to join.

J. E. B. STUART, Major General.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY NORTHERN VIRGINIA, April 14, 1864.

Respectfully forwarded. The remarks of Major General Stuart are concurred in.

R. E. LEE, General.

Respectfully returned. The Department invariably declines to grant authorities to form new commands. The remarks of General Stuart are approved. By command of the Secretary of War,

SAMUEL MELTON,
Major and A. A. G.

OWINGSVILLE CONFEDERATE MONUMENT.

The people of Owingsville and Bath County, Ky., deserve great credit for the faithful persistence with which they worked for twelve years to secure necessary funds for the erection of a Confederate monument to the soldiers of Bath County.

CONFEDERATE MONUMENT AT OWINGSVILLE, KY.

When the plan for erecting a monument first assumed definite shape, the Pat Cleburne Camp of Owingsville bought a lot and appointed Mrs. Joseph Arrasmith to collect funds. A year or more after her appointment Mrs. Arrasmith lost her husband, and the funds already collected were intrusted to Mrs. A. W. Bascom.

When Bath County Chapter, U. D. C., was organized, in 1900, its members determined to devote their best efforts to the completion of the monument fund; and when the beautiful fourteen-foot shaft of Confederate gray stone was unveiled in August, 1907, much praise was expressed for the loyal women who had shown unflinching enthusiasm in order that the monument might become a reality.

FLAG OF FIFTH KENTUCKY REGIMENT.

In 1862 the young women of Owingsville presented a handsome silk flag to Colonel Hawkins, of the 5th Kentucky Cavalry, who now resides at Hawkinsville, Ala.

Wishing to secure this flag if possible for the Owingsville Chapter, Mrs. Bascom wrote to Mr. Hawkins asking its return, and in reply he wrote: "The regiment loved, cared for, defended, and followed the beautiful silk flag on many blood-stained fields and waved it triumphantly over many. At Chickamauga it led the brigade in a gallant rush and captured and led from the field an Ohio regiment, field and staff officers, but left ninety of its followers killed or wounded. This flag led the charge at Princeton, Va., covered the retreat from Missionary Ridge to Ringgold Gap, and was in the thick of the fighting from Dalton to Atlanta. It led the advance on the extreme right of Hardee's Corps July 22, 1864. The Kentucky Brigade was rushed far in advance of any troops on our left; and having no support on our right, was thus exposed to a direct fire from troops in breastworks in front and an enfilading right and left all along our brigade line. The 5th was fearfully exposed; every third man killed or wounded within a few minutes; my color company, officers and men, with few exceptions, shot down. I received the only wound I had during the war. This was a sad day for our cause, our beloved 5th Regiment—sad because of the loss of brave men and of the death of the commandant of the color company and color bearer, and sad because our beautiful flag and all the men near it were lost. I have never been able to hear of the flag since that engagement."

INCIDENTS.—A story is related of Jim Easley and two comrades with Company D at the battle of the Wilderness who ran into a squad of twenty Federals, a surgeon, and a litter corps of ten armed men. Easley met them very cordially, exclaiming: "You are the men we are looking for. We are tired of this foolishness." Whereupon the Federals stacked arms and prepared for a good time. Easley and his companions, seizing their opportunity, each grabbed a gun and marched the men and litters in, at the same time capturing the surgeon's fine horse. The same Jim Easley and Jim Dunklin and Aquila Wiles were on the march from Staunton, Va. All had received their orders to answer no questions and to have no stragglers; but the boys could not pass a tree full of cherries. Easley had climbed into the tree, when Gen. Stonewall Jackson and his staff rode up, and the General interrogated the young man, who was ravenously devouring the fruit of the tree: "What are you doing here?" "I don't know." "Where is your command?" "I don't know." "What command do you belong to?" "I don't know." "Who am I?" "I don't know." "What is your name?" "I don't know." "What do you know?" "I don't know nothing. Old Jackson said we had to know nothing on this march, and I don't know a thing." The General rode on without a reprimand and left the boys eating cherries. During the years 1863-64 there were no married men in Company D. J. C. Robinson keeps the battered lead that wounded him in the mouth. Dr. A. C. Oliver has preserved his sword, canteen, and pocket knife as souvenirs of his service; also a curious old pipe with his name and "Compliments of First Texas Brigade" engraved upon it. The pipe was made by Comrade "Spott" Brown.

"CLAIMING HIGHER CREDIT THAN DUE THE A. N. V."

Charles B. Martin, Shubuta, Miss., writes: "With all due respect to the Army of Northern Virginia, I think more should be written of the glorious history of the Western Army for the benefit of posterity. Let more be said of the men who very unwillingly surrendered after the A. N. V. had laid down their arms. The men in the Western Army came in contact with a very different class, and those whom they fought were principally Western men familiar with arms and who could shoot straight; while many who opposed Lee's men in Virginia were fresh from European States and New Englanders, many of whom hardly knew one end of a gun from the other. Thousands of the A. N. V. could neither speak nor understand the English language. While the Army of Northern Virginia fought in only three States, the Army of Tennessee engaged the enemy in seven States."

COMMENT ON ROCK ISLAND PRISON.

BY J. W. MINNICH, GRAND ISLE, LA.

In the May VETERAN, page 216, is an article by A. J. Cantrell on Rock Island Prison which contains some errors. Cantrell says: "One coal stove for one hundred men." Now I say that there were three stoves in each barrack—one in the kitchen and two in the main quarters—from the beginning. This is verified by the statement of a comrade who went there in December, 1863. Again: "The only bedding was two thin blankets and some straw." I agree as to the blankets; but as to the straw, none was issued to us; and though I visited many barracks during my sixteen months' residence, I can remember only bare bunks except when some one gathered leaves.

Trading, "tinker's work," making rings, etc., is correct. And there was some very fine work done in the jewelry line from gutta percha buttons, mussel shells, etc. We also had a violin maker who turned out several creditable instruments. John Tutt, the fiddler mentioned, used one of the make several times in my barrack. He was a character among us whom I have often had in mind—a jovial, good-natured fellow who did much to cheer us up when we grew despondent. But Colonel Johnson's putting a stop to the industries engaged in by the boys to earn a few dimes is news to me.

Cantrell states: "Some Arkansas boys got out in the dark and knocked the negro guards off the parapet with rocks." I learned at the time about the rocking affair proposed, but never put into execution. A report once came to our barrack that some hot, reckless prisoner proposed that "we ought to gather rocks and in the night knock the niggers off the wall;" but wiser counsels prevailed, and the matter was dropped. Nothing of the kind was ever carried out to my knowledge.

Young, vigorous, and in good health when I entered the prison, I suffered severely from the cold during that terrible latter half of February and first half of March, 1864. There were hundreds less able to endure it, but let us not make matters worse than they really were.

NAVAL AND TRAINING STATION FOR NORFOLK.

Senator John W. Daniel, of Virginia, has introduced in the Senate a bill providing that the government shall buy from the Jamestown Exposition Company two hundred and fifty acres of the site of the recent Exposition on Hampton Roads, in consideration of which the amount due the government for money advanced for Exposition purposes is to be remitted, and the company is to be paid $900,000.

The ground which it is proposed to purchase includes that upon which the principal buildings of the Exposition stood, and the permanent improvements thereon are to be embraced in the sale. The ground if bought is to be used as a naval training and coaling station and for any other purposes for which it may be deemed suitable.

Of the $960,000 purchase price, $100,000 is made immediately available, and the remainder is payable on April 1, 1909.

H. S. Fuller, Donaldson, Ark., writes: "I said in a former communication that our own guns sank the boat Sumter at Charleston, S. C., and the article would leave the impression that I had said it was sunk by the enemy's boat. I further said in the same communication that my regiment was being relieved from Morris Island, and the article made me say we were evacuating Morris Island. I was criticised by a comrade from Savannah, Ga."

DEFENSE OF HIGH BRIDGE, NEAR FARMVILLE.

BY R. P. CHEW, CHARLESTOWN, W. VA.

Toward the end of the campaign of 1865, terminating in the surrender at Appomattox, some very desperate fighting was done by the cavalry. Among the severe engagements that took place during these last few days was one near High Bridge on April 7. General Ord had directed General Reed, with two regiments of infantry and a squadron of cavalry under Colonel Washburn, to proceed to High Bridge, near Farmville, and destroy it. This bold attempt was intercepted by Gen. T. L. Rosser with Dearing's and Munford's Brigade. The Federals were overtaken about a mile from High Bridge. Munford's Brigade was dismounted and promptly commenced an attack upon Reed's troops, strongly posted on a hill. Dearing was ordered to charge, and with his brigade made a bold dash upon the flank of the enemy. The enemy met the attack with great courage. General Dearing, Colonel Boston, and Major Knott, of the cavalry, and Major Thompson, of the horse artillery, were killed. On the Federal side General Reed and Colonel Washburn were both killed and their troops put to rout, leaving in our hands seven hundred and eighty prisoners. About twenty-two hundred troops all told were engaged, the advantage in numbers being with the Confederates. Thirty men were said to have been killed in hand-to-hand engagements.

Immediately after the enemy retired Maj. James Breathed, of the Horse Artillery, and a companion, riding out in front of our lines, were challenged by two Federal horsemen, who galloped forward from their ranks and attacked them. A desperate fight with sabers followed. Lieut. W. B. Conrad, of the 12th Virginia Cavalry, happened to be near; and observing Breathed's antagonist, a very expert swordsman, gaining some advantage, galloped forward and, using his pistol, put a bullet through his head. Then turning his attention to the other two men, who were engaged in a fierce fight, he fired two bullets into the Federal soldier and stretched him on the ground. Major Breathed, one of the most gallant officers in the army, greatly distinguished himself as an artillery officer, and often, leaving his battery when not in action, was seen boldly leading cavalry charges. On this occasion he would probably have been killed save for Conrad's timely arrival.

ORIGIN OF "YANKEE."—There has been much discussion, research, and inquiry in regard to the original use of the term "Yankee," and the most popular theory seems to be that it came from the Indian effort to pronounce "English." "Yenghies," "Yanghies," "Yankees." The word first came into common use during the Revolution as the name the British troops applied to their New England enemies.

Mrs. Susan Allen, widow of Benjamin F. Allen, who was a member of Company C, 18th Tennessee Regiment, desires information of her husband's service in the war in the interest of a pension. He died several years ago, but there is with his papers an affidavit stating that his "discharge was burned in Ashland City, Tenn.," when he lost all of his household goods. Any comrade who can furnish data in regard to his service will oblige her very much. Her address is 1011 Second Avenue North, Nashville, Tenn.

J. M. Whitney, Franklin, Mo., writes: "I send four dollars; and if you find out who was kind enough to send in my name, I will send the man one dollar if he is living or the same amount to his widow."

SERVICE OF BRIG. GEN. W. H. KING.

BY "AN OLD CONFEDERATE FRIEND," L. M. M.

The rank and file of the Confederate army furnished thousands of brave men equal to the Spartans of old. Among them was one whom his old comrades in arms remember with love and pride—Gen. W. H. King, of Sulphur Springs, Tex., who enlisted as a private soldier early in 1861 in Johnson

GEN. W. H. KING.

Cuads from Warrensburg, Mo., commanded by Captain Ruth, and in the 3d Missouri Regiment. In the early summer of 1861 he had been promoted to first lieutenant and then captain of the company.

After the desperate battle of Oak Hill, or Wilson Creek, as the Federals called it, and the principal campaign in Missouri was over, he resigned and came to Texas. He then enlisted as a private in Company B, 18th Texas Infantry, which was commanded by Col. W. B. Ochiltree. When this regiment was mustered into service, May 13, 1862, Comrade King was made its major; and when Colonel Ochiltree and Lieutenant Colonel Culberson resigned, King became the colonel of the regiment. In the battle of Mansfield, La., April 8, 1864, wherein that regiment distinguished itself for bravery, Colonel King was severely wounded.

Later, by order of Gen. E. Kirby Smith, he was promoted to the rank of brigadier general. As soon as he was able to return to duty he was put in command of Walker's Division; but his wound compelled him to seek a less laborious position, and he was put in command of Polignac's Brigade, Monton's Division. General Mouton had been killed, and Gen. C. J. Polignac, who had been in command of the Texas Brigade in this division, was promoted to be a major general and placed in charge of this division, and General King was ordered to the command of the Polignac Brigade

Military exigencies soon caused General Polignac to be sent to France, whereupon General King assumed the command of the division. Soon after that he was transferred to a brigade of five regiments of infantry in his old division. Shortly after he again found himself in command of the famous Walker Division, and so remained until it was disbanded, at Hempstead, Tex., in May, 1865.

During all these terrible four years General King was constantly in the field and on duty except when disabled by wounds. Since the war he has served with honor in the Texas Legislature, and filled the position of Adjutant General of the State two terms.

"THE OLD BLACK HEN"—BROWN'S EXECUTION.

BY E. E. STICKLEY, WOODSTOCK, VA.

Returning from Bethany College on the last train that came from Wheeling to Harper's Ferry, Va., I entered the Southern army full of life and vigor and enthusiasm, enlisting in Company A, Marion Rifles, 5th Virginia Infantry, Stonewall Brigade, in the spring of 1861, a student-farmer boy from the old Stone Shop Farm, located on the Valley Turnpike, two miles northeast of Strasburg, Va., and near the Cedar Creek battlefield. Our house and barn, used as a temporary hospital during that battle, stood close by the turnpike, and was dangerously exposed the entire four years of the war to the Confederate and Federal armies, passing as they did up and down this great thoroughfare in advance and retreat alternately, and vibrating, as it were, not unlike the pendulum of a clock, according to war's vicissitudes.

Several of us boys were in the army; the others, too small, remained at home with father and mother all through the trying ordeal and thrilling period of war and reconstruction, suffering oftentimes for food and raiment. The horses, cattle, sheep, and other stock were all taken by one or the other of the two armies. And at the close of the war fences were all burned and outside property gone. One "old black hen" was the sole survivor of the poultry yard. Mother often recounted to us with much amusement the doings, history, preservation, and escape of "the hen." She was evidently a chicken of some intelligence and full grown at the opening of the war, and soon learned that the Confederate army was as much her enemy as the Federal. She had no friends in either. When she heard the tramp, tramp, tramp of troopers, she would hastily run under the dwelling house till the danger was past, if it were days, before she would risk an appearance in the opening. This she did as a rule during the four long, tedious years of the war, and thus escaped the ravages of both armies, and in the end was the last survivor of the chicken coop. Mother would not permit her to be in any wise ill treated or killed for food; but she was allowed to die of old age, and was buried.

After their long period of suffering and deprivation, mother and father continued in the old home, refenced and rehabilitated the farm, reared their large family, and some fifteen years ago father died at the age of seventy-three, and eight years later mother passed away at the age of eighty-six.

THE HANGING OF JOHN BROWN.

Immediately after her death, in the examination of the papers in the "old desk," for which we boys had a reverence and which we looked upon with deep interest, I found the following letter, written in my boyish style, descriptive of the hanging of that scoundrel, "Old John Brown," at which I was present. I participated in or witnessed every movement, and the scene became so indelibly impressed on my memory that I can see him hanging now.

I was then at Winchester, Va., at high school, preparing for college, and got leave of my parents and teacher to join the Continental Military Company of Winchester (temporarily) and go with them to Charlestown, Va., where there were assembled several thousand soldiers for guard duty, as the trial of Brown and other conspirators was going on. I was with them for some days, and was present at the noted execution. On the evening of that eventful day I sat down and wrote my father a short account of it as it occurred before my eyes. Our line of troops was stationed on the right of the scaffold, forming the south line of the hollow square.

COPY OF THE CHARLESTOWN LETTER.

CHARLESTOWN, VA., December 2, 1859.

Dear Father: I received your letter. * * * I am in Charlestown, and have been here for some days, but expect to go back to Winchester to-morrow. I stood guard one day and one night since I have been here.

Old Brown was hung to-day about eleven o'clock, and there were many present. Some of the companies were stationed around and through the town, and a great many of them stationed in the field around the gallows. They made a splendid show. Our company was stationed on the right of the gallows. So I could see all the proceedings. Our guns were Colt's five-shooters, and all loaded.

Old Brown was hauled to the gallows in a wagon (sitting) on the coffin made for him. He marched up on the gallows bravely and told them to hurry on with him. He shook hands with the sheriff and another man and laughed or smiled at the crowd, which was around him on the ground. Then they put the rope around his neck and covered his head with a white covering. A few moments after the trapdoor fell, and he swung. They let him hang about forty or forty-five minutes, and the surgeons, numbering twenty-five, examined him and pronounced him dead. Then the troops brought him back to the jail. He will soon be sent to New York.

His wife was to see him yesterday evening, but she was allowed to stay only a short time. They have been very strict here with the sentinels at their post. I suppose there were more than three hundred soldiers on duty.

ATTACK ON FEDERAL WAGON TRAIN.

BY W. H. MOORE, MERETA, TEX.

I have been requested to write you an account of an attack on a Federal wagon train.

General Brooks was in North Arkansas with a brigade of cavalry. Learning of some government supplies at Cassville, Mo., he was moving on that place to capture them; but had advanced only some fifty or sixty miles when he was informed that there was a large government train, consisting of some two hundred wagons, loaded with all kinds of supplies for Fayetteville and Fort Smith posts, and at that time was north of Cassville moving south on the Springfield and Fayetteville road. We commenced our advance in the afternoon about three o'clock and marched all night. First Lieut. Patton Inks, of Capt. Pleasant Buchanan's company, was ordered to select thirty men from Buchanan's, Brown's, and Beaty's companies and move in the advance. We moved on till just before day, when General Brooks came up with us, halted us, and told us that we were all picked men from a fighting battalion and that he had great confidence in us. The General told us to move on and capture the pickets and charge into the Federal camp and we should not have to fall back one inch, and we obeyed orders to the letter.

Now I will tell you what we charged. The Federal train was camped in an old field about three hundred yards wide by one-fourth of a mile long with five hundred infantry and two hundred cavalry on the south side of the field in the edge of the timber, with two pieces of artillery on the hill-side. We were well armed and well mounted, having from two to four Colt's and Remington's pistols apiece, and we moved on them like a cyclone. The Federals had made their fires to get breakfast, but it was not yet light enough to see well. We were challenged and asked who we were by a Federal officer. Lieutenant Inks replied, "Confederate soldiers," and we opened fire, and they stampeded like wild cattle. We deployed in front of the train, and continued to fire on the infantry until they reached the edge of the timber on the south side of the field, where cavalry and artillery were stationed.

We had full possession of the train, and were expecting support every minute; but its failure to arrive left no other alternative but to hold the train as long as we could. As it grew light the Federals could see that there was only a small squad of us, for thirty men in line in front of their train did not make a very formidable line of battle. About sunrise the infantry and cavalry formed a line and moved down on us, and when about one hundred yards from us commenced firing. Comrade J. Mont Wilson tells of the experience after they opened fire on us: "I had been in some close places, but I do not remember anywhere that they were shooting so close to me. I know I heard bullets over me, behind me, before me, and under my horse, and realized that they were very close."

When we could hold the train no longer, we moved out of the field without the loss of a man or a horse. Comrade Wilson thinks we held the field one hour. I remember well the sun was shining when we left the field. The only thing General Brooks did was to form the brigade in line a half mile from the field where we were engaged and deploy Captain Buchanan's company as skirmishers. Please do not ask me why he did not move forward and take possession of that train.

I will give the names of all the brave boys I remember: Lieutenant Inks, Bob Inks, Cola Marrow, Polk Crozier, Charley McClellan, Guy Blake, John Norwood, Dock Pass, John Selvage, Hugh Crawford, Harvy McGoffin, August Sager, James White, James Odell, Walter Parks, Carl Clark, Cris Kerby, Will Polston, Calvin Mayberry, Asberry Jordan, J. Mount Wilson. The other eight names I do not remember.

DANGER OF "LOADED" SHELLS.

Henry Spence, a farmer living about four miles from Poynter, Ark., had a very narrow escape from death recently. During the War between the States his father, Daniel Spence, picked up a six-pound shell which had been left by the soldiers at Pitman's Ferry and carried it to his home. The old shell lay around the house and about the yard. It was used as a door weight, and was played with by the children.

On the day in question Mr. Henry Spence began making preparations to kill hogs. Two large kettles were filled with water and a fire started under them. One hog had been killed, scalded, and hung up to drain. Mr. Spence, several members of his family, and his neighbors who were helping him butcher were standing around the fire when a terrific explosion occurred. Both the kettles were blown to fragments, but miraculously no one was injured. Mr. Spence was stunned for a short time, but soon recovered.

MORE OF THE LAST DEFENSE OF RICHMOND.

[In an article to the Times-Dispatch H. E. Wood, of Brems Bluff, Va., writes at length in regard to closing events of the war from which the following extracts are made.]

I was a member of Company E, 18th Regiment, Virginia Infantry, Hunton's Brigade, Pickett's Division. The 18th Regiment was commanded by Col. Robert E. Withers, of Wytheville, Va. Our color sergeant, Solon A. Boston, was killed at Williamsburg, Va., and Colonel Withers appointed me color sergeant for his regiment, which position I filled until the battle of Gaines's Mill, when I was severely wounded. I was a patient at Chimborazo Hospital when General Ewell directed me to form an organization at the hospital composed of clerks, hospital stewards, and soldiers convalescing from wounds and diseases—scarcely an able-bodied soldier among them. I suppose every State in the Southern Confederacy was represented. Arms, ammunition, and equipments for war had been deposited at the hospital to be used by this organization in defending the city against raids and sudden dashes of the enemy.

On Saturday night, April 1, 1865, I had retired, and was awakened during the night by some one calling for me. I went out and found on horseback Major Chesnut, who handed me an order from General Ewell commanding me to have my organization formed as speedily as possible and report to him on the Capitol Square. Major Chesnut called my attention to the continued lightninglike flashes "painting hell on the sky" in the direction of Petersburg. It was the glare from the flashes of the artillery and musket-firing going on between the two contending armies. I marched my command over to the Capitol Square. I found General Ewell near where the marble statue of Mr. Clay now stands, surrounded by his staff officers and the officials of the city, with whom he was busily engaged in conversation. I touched him to engage his attention. He turned to me and said: "If you have anything to say, say it quickly." Not realizing my mission, I handed him the order Major Chesnut had given me. He read it and told me that he wanted me with my command, numbering twelve hundred or fifteen hundred, to take the place then occupied, I think, by General Field's Division on the Williamsburg or river road, and that he would send a guide or courier to direct me.

We marched down Main Street and through Rocketts, and after going a few miles we came to a fortified position. As we left the city we were joined by the cadets of the Virginia Military Institute, and they took their position near us on this line of defense. We relieved the division. To fill the space occupied by these soldiers, I had to stretch my skeleton of a command all it could bear by placing a soldier here and there in sight of and in calling distance of each other. I made the most formidable and warlike display possible of these soldiers along the intrenchments. Nothing unusual occurred during the day to disturb the quietude of an ordinary Sabbath day. About noon Dr. J. B. McCaw with his commissary sergeant issued us rations. Dr. McCaw was not a soldier, but a resident of the city.

I will digress here from my subject long enough to say that this was the last installment of rations I received until fed the next night by a Mr. Pace, a benevolent, kind-hearted old man keeping a lock house near Cedar Point, in Goochland County, Va. Thirty-six hours afterwards, soon after nightfall, I received an order directing me with my command to report in Richmond.

We marched back by way of Rocketts, and soon after reaching the city limits we were met by a band of women going hand in hand singing. They gave us the first information of the impending doom awaiting our capital—its evacuation. As we marched along Main Street I could see by the lamplight that whisky had been poured into the side drains. I suppose this was done to prevent its being improperly used by disorderly people. We reached Capitol Square and stacked our arms and awaited orders from Major Carrington, at that time provost marshal of the city. He sent for me to report. He then informed me that the city was being evacuated and its surrender expected the next day. He told me to keep my command subject to orders; that we would be expected to suppress all disorderly or riotous conduct and as far as possible to protect the property and lives of the citizens. He also told me he would expect me to have the warehouses with tobacco in them and some other buildings in the city burned during the night, and he would notify me again when this should be done. He did not, however, but these buildings were burned. Soon after returning to where my command was there was a call for a squad to quiet a disturbance on Broad Street, where a mob was breaking into and looting stores. This condition of affairs continued during the night, making it hideous indeed. My command was sent for repeatedly during the night. It was divided out into squads and sent to different sections of the city to keep order; and when day dawned upon us, not more than a corporal's guard remained. About sunrise I went down with this remnant to the American Hotel. After getting to the hotel, I saw a body of cavalry on the Manchester side of the river, and was told it was a brigade of South Carolinians en route to join General Lee's army. I was at the hotel expecting the Federal advance guard to come by Williamsburg on the river road.

The first I saw of this was a dozen or more troopers as they came riding abreast along Main Street, near where the market house then stood. As they approached us we became satisfied that they were Federal soldiers. The soldiers with me began firing at them. This caused some commotion and deflection in their ranks. I suppose it was this firing referred to in Sergeant Zimmer's account when General Weitzel returned and threatened him. The Federals soon rallied, re-formed their line, and came at a full gallop in our direction. I made my escape on foot to the towing path along the James River and Kanawha Canal, making Lynchburg, Va., my objective point, where I hoped to again join General Lee's army. I had for my traveling companions Dr. Walter L. Withers and Nicholas Bolling. Dr. Withers at this time was an invalid from a chronic trouble, and Nicholas Bolling was lame from a gunshot wound in the foot. (Dr. Withers is now a practitioner of medicine at Massie's Mill, Nelson County, Va.) These companions, disabled as they were, could not make much progress on foot. We reached Cedar Point on the canal, in Goochland County, Monday night. We were fed by Mr. Pace, rested awhile, and continued our sad journey. We reached Brems, eighty miles from Lynchburg, the night of the 6th of April, "foresore and weary." At Brems we learned of General Lee's surrender. It has always been a source of great gratification to me, a Confederate soldier, to have cause to believe that perhaps I had been the last defender of our Confederate capital. While the resistance offered by my improvised command was meager and inadequate to the duty and service imposed upon us, I feel assured that all was accomplished that was required of us; while General Lee with his Army of Northern Virginia did not do more.

MILES CARY'S REPORT CRITICISED.

BY COL. CLEMENT SULIVANE.

An article concerning the repulse of Colonel Dahlgren in front of Richmond, Va., by Gen. G. W. C. Lee's Brigade on the midnight of March 1, 1864, written by Mr. Miles Cary, and which appeared in the December (1907) VETERAN, contained a statement of the facts with which I must take issue.

I was in a position to know of what I am about to speak, for I was assistant adjutant general and chief of staff to Brig. Gen. G. W. C. Lee from the day he was appointed brigadier general in June, 1863, and organized the "Local Defense Brigade" out of the detailed soldiers in the various departments of the government at Richmond—quartermaster and commissary departments, the arsenal, and the armory, with the regiment of clerks in the War and Treasury Departments—down to the date of our retreat from Richmond. At this time I was placed in command of his old brigade (he having been previously made major general), April 2, 1865; and I brought off the rear guard, and in the face of General Weitzel's pursuing army, despite their efforts to prevent it. I with my own hands burned the last bridge over the James (Mayo's, foot of Fourteenth Street, Richmond) at 6:15 A.M. on April 3, 1865. I had just ten minutes to spare.

1. Mr. Cary writes the date March 1, 1863; but this is an error into which he or any man might easily have fallen.

2. He states that Major Henley, the commander of the Clerks' Battalion, was ill, and that it was commanded by Captain Dillon on the occasion in question. It is true Henley was ill and never returned to the command. However, the battalion was not commanded that night by Captain Dill, but by Capt. John McAnerney, the senior captain and one of the best officers in the battalion and brigade. He subsequently became its lieutenant colonel, and is still alive, being president of a New York city bank.

I cannot understand how Mr. Cary was out with his battalion and could make such a mistake. The battalion remained at Green's Farm until the following Thursday, March 4, and McAnerney was in command all the time.

3. He writes that Dahlgren routed the Armory Battalion and then wisely fell back, dismounted his men, and attacked the Clerks' Battalion on foot. This is an error. I in person saw all the commanding officers when the alarm of Dahlgren's approach was given, directed them to get out their battalions in haste, and without waiting for further orders to march immediately on the river road west to the fortifications, and I would overtake and place them in position. The Armory got off first under Lieutenant Colonel Ayres, the Clerks next under Captain McAnerney; and after seeing them both perhaps a mile apart marching out on the road past Camp Lee, I rode back to hurry on the other four commands (two regiments and two battalions), got them together on Broad Street, started them in the wake of the two preceding battalions, and then, as previously ordered by Gen. Custis Lee, I repaired to the outer office of the President (which was occupied by Lee) and informed him that his command was well under way. He joined me, and we rode out to the head of the marching column, overtaking it just beyond Camp Lee (the Falls Church road). We discussed the situation, and I received my instructions as to how to place the men in the earthworks, etc., and I was in the act of leaving him when we heard a considerable firing about a mile and a half ahead of us or perhaps less.

General Lee ordered me to go forward and ascertain the cause of the firing, for Dahlgren should have been ten miles away, according to our reports, and he would rapidly bring up the command. This was just at dusk, the darkness coming on earlier than usual. It was snowing, raining, and freezing all at the same time, and I have never seen a blacker night. On my reaching Green's Farm the action was just on, and I could plainly hear the confusion of many voices and the hoofs of Dahlgren's horses as they retired into the darkness.

At the precise point where the action took place (where the high ground of the Green Farm sloped down into a valley to the westward, which extended about a half mile to the opposite slope) I found the Clerks' Battalion on the right of the road and the Armory on a line with it on the left. How many companies of the latter were there, I cannot say, for the darkness was impenetrable, and no man could have seen the whitest object six feet distant; but that this command was aligned with the other I knew positively from what I saw later on that night and next morning. With the morning light both battalions could be seen still occupying the Green ground and in fair force, though of course there had been stragglers during the night.

As I galloped up and reined in my horse I called the left captain of McAnerney and the right captain of Ayres to the roadside, learned from them what had happened, but urged them to have McAnerney and Ayres re-form their men and hold their position, while I rode forward to learn whether or not Dahlgren was preparing for a second charge, and that in fifteen minutes General Lee would be up with his whole brigade. Then cautioning them not to let their men fire on me as I returned, I trotted on down the road in the darkness, pausing again and again to listen, for it was impossible to see a yard off. The second time I paused a voice called out from the roadside near by, "For God's sake, don't shoot; I surrender;" and though very much startled, I bade the man come to me, which he did, surrendering to me his saber and Colt's pistols. His horse had been shot in the charge, and he lost his carbine at the same time, he said. He was shot through the leg, but could walk a little. I carried him back and delivered him to the Armory Battalion, where I had just left them, about fifty or sixty yards back. I then resumed my scout, rode to the foot of the ascent across the valley, and found Dahlgren was beginning his retreat instead of re-forming for a second attack. I again hastened back and reported the situation to General Lee, who had arrived; and after bivouacking the troops for the night just as they stood and looking after the dead and wounded (we had one officer killed and six or seven wounded and some two or three men killed and fifteen or twenty wounded), by direction of General Lee, and establishing an outpost at a house in which Dahlgren had left some twenty or more wounded men, I followed General Lee to Camp Lee, where we spent the night.

Dahlgren's loss on this occasion was twenty-seven killed and between sixty and seventy wounded. He did not charge on foot, but rode straight at and through and over the Clerks' Battalion, his whole command of one thousand men having kept on our right (his north) side of the road, firing at the flashes of our guns and our men firing at their carbine flashes in the darkness. They then turned about and galloped back again to the other side of the valley, where they had originally deployed for the attack on hearing the two battalions getting into line on the crest of Green's Farm. That was the whole of it!

MAJOR CLARE AND MARY HADLEY.

A SKETCH BY EMMA LOOK SCOTT.

In the glad splendor of the days of the Old South the name of Mary Hadley was one to excite a pleasant interest. Of a long line of illustrious and aristocratic ancestry, she was fair to look upon; as a child, heiress to broad acres and many slaves, affable in manner and affectionate of nature, it was not to be wondered at that gallant William Clare persisted in his suit for her favor until he held her plighted troth to wed him when the war cloud, then breaking in mad fury over the land to which they both owed birth, should have been dissipated.

Early in the strife between the States young Clare, having just passed his twenty-first birthday, had eagerly donned the gray uniform of the Confederacy, and as captain of a goodly company gone forth from his home in Alabama to battle for the cause of the South he loved.

He was a stalwart and handsome youth, who won quick recognition and promotion to the office of assistant general inspector of the army, with the rank of major.

As time wore on and the war storm, contrary to his hope and expectation, deepened in its intensity, his heart turned ever in deep concern to the welfare of his betrothed; for were not the Yankees even then swarming about her mother's home in recurring revels of devastation and plunder? And of what might befall her with her ardent and outspoken sympathies for the Southern cause he feared even to think.

Only a few days before word had come to him that Black Beauty, the noble little animal always ridden by his beloved, had been impressed by the hated bluecoats through the order of General Rousseau.

The story as it came to his ears, and later corroborated by the fair lady herself, was that she was one day riding near her home, in the outskirts of Nashville, the dainty, high-bred mare stepping in time as she had been taught to do to the love tune softly falling from her mistress's lips, when up rode a company of bluecoats, who in coarse, familiar tones accosted her and ordered her off her horse, as it was "wanted for the daughter of General Rousseau," they said, and at once.

Wild-eyed and pallid with the fear of losing her pet, the girl gazed at the intruders for a brief second of time, and then in an agonizing desire to save her horse she called to Black Beauty in a terrified whisper, and the little creature, seeming to understand, put off at a rapid gallop toward home. The satirical whoop of the angry squad of horsemen stung her ears as they followed in mad pursuit.

For Mary Hadley and Black Beauty, alas! it was a useless run. For no sooner had they entered the driveway leading up to her home than the ruffians were close upon her, and as she stepped out of the saddle at her mother's door caught the bridle of the pony to lead her away.

To the anguished exclamations and entreaties of the girl they paid no heed; nor were the efforts of her mother, who had come out upon the piazza and was a witness of the scene, of greater avail. In the vain hope of preserving to her daughter her four-footed beloved companion, she offered the men a pair of fine carriage horses in exchange; and seeing denial in their faces, she added five hundred dollars in gold besides, only to meet with a discourteous refusal as they started cantering down the drive with the pet in their possession.

If the thought of this uncalled-for outrage to her he loved stirred the heart of the young officer to greater deeds of arms against the enemy, it was no wonder. If he could but protect her, could but shield her with his love, his name, he mused. Of little use were that, his name, in such a time as this, he smiled bitterly; naught but a comfort could it be to him to know that she bore it.

He had urged her when last they met to marry him; but she had not consented, and his thoughts reverted to those days after the terrible battle of Shiloh, when in a desperate charge that brought him promotion his horse was shot from under him and he fell with two bullet wounds in his side; of how they bore him to a stately mansion in Huntsville, where with blurred and rapidly dimming eyes he joyfully recognized in a tender face bent above him his heart's best beloved. From whence came she, he cared little; that she was there was quite enough. And the days of convalescence that followed—days when he welcomed pain, because of her continued presence.

What a dolt he had been, he told himself for the thousandth time, when in the beginning of the strife fortune sent him to Nashville, and he was invited by a friend to meet her, and had arrogantly asserted that he desired not the privilege of her acquaintance; and when questioned as to his meaning had said he had heard her name mentioned in connection with a noble young Confederate who, because of his unreciprocated love for her, had gone to his death in a voluntary and uncalled-for sacrifice! Thank Heaven, a blessed Providence had later thrown him in her path, and he smiled, reflecting that in that meeting his after fate was sealed!

If Nashville should be recaptured, he further mused, the thing planned for now and which seems hopeful—ah, then, his dearest wish, to make her his own, should then be consummated!

Meanwhile Mary Hadley with a girl friend had gone across the city, through the close-drawn Federal lines, for a few days' visit to a classmate at the home of the distinguished Tennessean, Col. John Overton, distant about six miles from Nashville on the Franklin Pike.

Upon leaving home she had laughingly said to her mother as she bade her adieu: "Mother, if our boys come in to run these Yankees out while I am there, and if I meet Major Clare, I'm going to marry him." Prophetic words! But of what gay and of what grave import the fair speaker little dreamed.

It was a bleak December night of 1864. At the hospitable mansion of Colonel Overton (known to the Confederates and other wayfarers as Travelers' Rest, so often had they received succor there) the members of the family with their guests had gathered for the evening in the living room. Without, the wind shrieked through the branches of the great trees. The snow lay thick upon the ground. In the distance, toward the city, the Federal camp fires gleamed. Suddenly an unaccustomed sound caught her ear; and turning excitedly to the little group, Mary Hadley exclaimed: "I hear a Confederate bugle!"

"Mary, Mary," rejoined one of the company, "you are in love with a Confederate officer."

MAJ. WILLIAM CLARE.

With one accord the little company arose and moved to the door. "Do our ears, our eyes deceive us?" wonderingly they looked at each other and mutely asked. There was Hood's army coming in at the gates, overspreading the plantation, hordes of soldiers in their tattered jackets, all disheveled—the Army of Tennessee, in the words of Clayton, the historian, "coming from a five months' grapple with Sherman in Georgia by a long and tortuous and painful march over the mountains of Alabama, through the bloody gates of Franklin, where its flower was cut down in its eager ardor to overreach and bring to bay a retreating but desperate foe. As it now faced the long angular lines of defense that lay between it and the coveted prize, it was but the remains of a once mighty host. Of its individual members, there was scarce one who did not bear upon his body the scars of battle. In numbers it fell short of twenty thousand effectives, while its equipment of clothing was totally inadequate to the needs of a winter campaign. Many of these men were without shoes, and had their feet covered with rags or pieces of green hides obtained from the butcher's pen as a protection against the frozen and stony roads. Under such circumstances to the casual observer it seemed but the mockery of an army and its attitude that of the sheerest bravado. But four years of varying and shifting fortune had schooled it to a degree of endurance and hardihood that made it yet a formidable power on a field where the odds were not too greatly against it or circumstances would have inspired a reasonable hope of victory. That it was so regarded by General Thomas is a matter of history. The force under Gen. John B. Hood thus audaciously taking up line before Nashville was laying siege to a place defended by thrice its numbers."

Of the officers commanding the troops, Maj. Gen. Frank Cheatham was the first to advance to the piazza where the little group of friends stood watching. Making his salutations, he pleasantly remarked in an aside to Mary Hadley: "Your bird has flown. He has braved the Yankee rifles to get to your home."

Alarmed, the girl cried: "He will never reach there alive. Ten thousand of the enemy are encamped upon my mother's place. Send after him, I beg of you, General Cheatham."

In compliance with her request an orderly was at once dispatched after the daring Major, and thirty minutes later saw him in the longed-for companionship of his affianced.

"Mary," urged Major Clare upon finding himself for a moment alone with his betrothed, "you must marry me. Who knows what a day will bring forth? We are on the eve of a great battle, as you are aware. And, hopeful though we may be, the end is all uncertain. I may be taken prisoner; I may be killed; but surrender I will not. Let me carry with me in this great struggle the comforting assurance that you are mine."

Listening to his persuasions, to which her heart was already inclined (for had he not braved death to see her face?), she gave consent, and arrangements for the marriage were at once begun.

The uselessness of an attempt to enter Nashville to secure the marriage license was quite apparent; so Major Clare set off the following morning at break of day to the adjoining county for the necessary papers and arranged for the marriage ceremony to take place at the little Brentwood church, three miles distant from the Overton plantation.

A unique wedding procession it was that left the mansion for the little church a few hours after. How different, thought the bride, from that wedding she had planned in the happy future when the war had ceased and the South had come again into its own!

Never perhaps were pomp and pathos more closely allied than in this little wedding cortège.

Acting as military escort to the carriage containing Colonel and Mrs. Overton and the bride and groom, rode in all the glittering splendor of their official regalia the noted generals of the Confederacy, John B. Hood, Nathan Bedford Forrest, Joseph Wheeler, A. P. Stewart, Frank Cheatham, and Stephen D. Lee.

The vehicle following carried the attendants of the groom, Col. B. Prescott and another young officer whose name is not recalled, and Miss White May and Miss Rebecca Allison, those of the bride. This vehicle was an ambulance belonging to the Confederate army, the old family carriage of Colonel Overton being the only conveyance left to him by the ravishing Federals out of a once magnificently equipped establishment.

In the interest of the occasion the horrors of war were for the moment forgotten, when suddenly a Minie ball whistled through the air to the feet of the carriage horses, bringing the martial escort to quick attention. Again and again they fell in quick succession, a rattling accompaniment of martial music unasked for and unappreciated by the wedding company. In fear of a Federal attack, which the whistling balls presaged and for which they were then unprepared, the officers of the escort wheeled and galloped rapidly back to the field and took immediate command of their regiments, when the firing ceased.

The gallant Major was not thus to be diverted from his purpose, however, and, proceeding on their way, the wedding ceremony was quickly performed by Bishop Quintard, chaplain of the army, and the party returned to the home of Colonel Overton, where later in the day a sumptuous feast was spread, and of which the officers, robbed of their gala hour of the wedding, were enabled to appreciatively partake without further disturbance from the Yankees.

WOMAN'S WIT VERSUS FEDERAL VIGILANCE.

BY MRS. BETTIE J. LINDSEY, EUFAULA, ALA.

(Paper read before Stephen D. Lee Chapter, U. D. C.)

Having been solicited by your worthy President and other members of your order to write an incident of the Civil War, I have consented to assume the task, though I fear there may be discrepancies as to time, though not as to places or facts. The writer could fill a book with incidents of the war, but one experience will suffice now to give those of you who were not on the stage then an idea of the trying hours of that bitter period of blood and carnage. I have copied this story (true in all its details) from an old diary of one of my aunts, Mrs. E. L. McElrath. It was written in July, 1864, under the caption, "Unearthing the Gold;" but I have reproduced the most of it in my own language.

In July, 1864, a Colonel Ewing, of the Federal army, procured from headquarters an order for the arrest of my aunt, Mrs. McElrath, her two daughters (aged sixteen and eighteen), and myself, her widowed niece. My aunt's home was near Calhoun, McMinn County, Tenn. All the other members of our immediate family were within the lines of the Southern army, the men in service and the women doing what they could, and we four Rebel women were trying to hold our own with the enemy, then occupying our native soil.

One hot July day our feminine quartet was seated at dinner on a vine-clad and deliciously cool back porch discussing the merits of a blackberry pie along with topics of a more serious and less appetizing nature. We had been canning berries all morning, and were warm, tired, and hungry, and quite ready to enjoy the needed rest, supplemented by a good dinner, when, to our utter dismay, we were suddenly surrounded by a guard of United States soldiers. They filed around us and stood motionless while the corporal of the guard advanced toward my aunt with an ominous-looking paper and said: "Madam, I arrest you and your family in the name of the United States government and by special order of General Sherman, commanding general of the United States army."

My aunt was more comfortably than stylishly attired in an old linen duster, and she wore a straw hat of my deceased uncle. Let me add, my sisters, that the women of the South in that day and time could not be fastidious or hard to please in their manner of dress. As spokesman and looking anything but a criminal, my aunt turned and interrogated the officer, "And for what, sir, do you arrest us?" to which he glibly replied: "For your rebellious sentiments, sympathies, and aid to the South." Then said my aunt: "You have made no mistake. I admit the charge, for I do assure you that if our duty to God and love to him were measured by our devotion and entire allegiance to the Southland and its cause the chariot and horses of Elijah would swoop down to our rescue. Do your worst!"

Immediately a guard of men, disgracefully strong numerically, were placed around the house, our jail, where we were to be kept under strict military rule until a place and punishment befitting such high treason could be decided upon. These fifty armed soldiers were detailed to watch and prevent the escape of four frail but not helpless women or creatures devoid of mother wit, as my story will prove.

Early in the sixties, before the advance of the Federals, my aunt had taken the precaution to bury her jewelry and other valuable trinkets along with five thousand dollars in gold, sealing them hermetically in tin cans, which she dropped into holes made by the lifting up of cedar posts supporting a trellis at the end of a back porch. The cans were fitted in and the posts replaced as near the original place as possible to mark the spot, and dirt and gravel were placed over the whole, concealing all evidence of the work, and not over six inches from the surface of the walk where the hilarious soldiers raved and swore in unconscious innocence of the glittering treasure beneath their boot heels. The guards on several occasions had the negro servants on the witness stand, trying to induce them by the hope of reward or fear of punishment to betray the hiding place of any valuables belonging to the family; but in vain, for all they could learn from this source was that all the money and jewels had been sent South.

With her woman's instinct of coming disaster my aunt had taken precaution against treachery of the servants by having them assist her in sealing up the cans long before the advent of the Yankees, and she resorted to a clever subterfuge to protect her valuables. Her only son had paid her a short visit on one occasion, and she had the servants hand their young master a pair of old-fashioned saddlebags heavily laden, they thought, with gold; but she had substituted cans filled with gravel for those of gold, and at a convenient time, when the servants were all out of the way, the cans of value were dropped into their hiding places. How to extract them again with so many pairs of vigilant eyes looking on was a problem, and many secret councils of ways and means were held. "Impossible" was the verdict at every meeting of the committee of four, all plans seeming futile; and when the eve of our departure for parts unknown arrived, we were well-nigh hopeless of inventing a reasonable excuse for remaining any length of time at that end of the porch where the gold was buried.

My aunt afterwards said that she had a prayer on her lips as she approached an old rain barrel filled with water at the end of the porch; and, like an inspiration, this idea seized her brain and she immediately called the officer of the guard. In the suave and polite tones not heretofore so dulcet she said: "My dear sir, will you kindly place your guard just on the outside of the yard, the one who patrols this end of the house, and the other a little lower down. My daughters, niece, and myself wish to take a footbath from this barrel to-night; and this, sir, would be a great favor and one I assure you will be highly appreciated."

With a profound military salute, the unsuspecting officer consented without the least hesitation and with no suspicion of duplicity on our part. Soon we heard the gate latch click and the steady tramp of the guard as he kept his ceaseless, useless round of vigilance, and we almost felt that victory was ours.

Our plans were quickly made. It was a bright moonlight night, not a breeze stirring the leaves, and the air was sultry in the extreme; but, fortunately for us, the shadows were long and deep over and around the place of excavation. My aunt, her eldest daughter, Mrs. Morris, and I repaired to the scene of our labor armed with a stout butcher knife and an old rusty file, the only implements we could safely use in digging, and we carried an old wheezy accordion. The youngest daughter meanwhile went to the parlor, which was a safe distance from our "foot washing." She threw open the wide French windows, and, raising the cover of the piano, which had been closed since the day of our arrest, two weeks before, she made the welkin ring with "Rebel" ditties, so dear and inspiring to the heart of our beloved South. The charm worked, and every soldier from three sides of the house was attracted to the windows, where she graciously invited them to remain and condescendingly asked them to name their favorite selection. She continued until her arms ached and fingers tingled. We had agreed upon a signal when our task was accomplished. I was to whistle a "solo" called "The Watcher."

We had a pet dog who always went into hysterical fits of howling whenever the dismal notes of our old accordion pierced his ears, and the use of this and the splashing of feet in the foot tub effectually drowned the noise made by our digging, as the soil was entirely made up of gravel when the cans were buried. A pair of us dug while the third splashed in the water to carry out the ruse; and when the sweet notes of the accordion were heard, "harps of a thousand strings" were touched in the throat of our dog! We sat flat on the ground, and for once lost our identity as "Cherokees" and merged into that tribe called "Digger Indians." At last our task was ended and our efforts rewarded by lifting out every can. These we placed in the bath tub, and my aunt carried the treasure into her room. My cousin and I then strolled around the yard awhile, I humming the song agreed upon, and the tired musician in the parlor, who with strained ears had been listening for other music than her own, closed the piano with a bang and said: "Gentlemen, I'm tired!" Thereupon she left them, feeling that their cordial "thank you" might have come from her lips.

Later, when all was still, with curtains drawn and lowered lights, we four lay flat on the floor, and each with a buckskin belt divided the gold stealthily, lifting out each piece and slipping the golden eagles we had captured from these brave sons of liberty into the pockets made for them, and we thought for once that the regal wings of the emblem of American liberty had been clipped by a weak and defenseless foe!

The following morning we were marched out of our home to the lively tune of "Yankee Doodle," but we had the satisfaction of knowing that we had outgeneraled our captors. We not only had the gold securely belted around our waist, but many other valuables and household goods tucked away in huge pockets completely concealed under the large hoop skirts, then in vogue, which each wore that morning with peculiar satisfaction; and blessed be the man who invented them! for we could never have escaped with our booty under the present tight-laced mode of dress. We were dumped in a filthy box car along with other prisoners and refugees, and through "grit and grace," though the latter was sorely tried, we reached Nashville, where we were detained three months. At the suggestion of the gentlemanly provost marshal, Captain Goodwin, under whose care we had been placed, my aunt decided to go in person and try her persuasive power on President Lincoln, leaving us in the city with relatives, who for their hospitality in giving us shelter were ordered out of their beautiful home.

I may at some future day give you an account of my aunt's visit to Mr. Lincoln and of her ultimate success with that kind-hearted and often unjustly abused old man. Too late the South found out that he was not the bitter enemy they thought him!

FOREIGNERS AGAINST THE CONFEDERACY.

BY F. L. FULGHAM, JACKSON, MISS.

There are a number of facts, stubborn facts, that should be recorded in that truthful, unbiased history of the War between the States which in years to come will be written and studied as a text-book in American schools. After all the bitterness engendered by the conflict has ceased and the actors in the struggle have been gathered to their fathers, it has been the hope of every Southern soldier that some Gibbon or Macaulay may arise who will balance the scales of justice fairly and equally between the North and the South.

With a desire that posterity shall know the truth in all things, and especially as to the numbers and nationality of the contending forces, the writer begs to ask a few pertinent questions. If answers are not forthcoming, he will have the satisfaction of knowing that they have been recorded in your splendid journal, the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, which is the chief chronicler and expositor of the deeds of the Southern soldier. The questions are as follows:

1. How many men of American birth and how many of foreign birth composed the army and navy of the Southern Confederacy?

2. The number of men of American birth, the number of foreign birth, and the number of Southern negroes which composed the army and navy of the Federal government?

3. Is there a history of the great war which gives a correct, or an approximately correct, answer to these questions?

4. The amount of pensions, if any, sent to foreign lands for the surviving soldiers and widows of the soldiers who lost their lives in the Civil War?

This line of thought came to me while reading "The Reminiscences of a Long Life," by Gen. Carl Schurz, of the Union army. The article is published in McClure's Magazine of 1907, and is both interesting and instructive. This brilliant German, himself an exile from his native land, gives some astonishing figures which show that the army of Gen. Joe Hooker, which confronted Gen. Robert E. Lee on the Rappahannock, had in it very nearly one entire corps of Germans. Many of them were trained soldiers fresh from the armies of the Kaiser. He tells the story of the victory of Lee (with 60,000 troops) over the boastful Hooker (with 130,000) in a way that entrances the reader, especially should he be a veteran and a participant in that series of battles of Chancellorsville and Fredericksburg in the early days of May, 1863.

History tells of the four thousand Irishmen under Gen. Francis Meagher, who led them against the stone wall at the foot of Marye's Hill on December 13, 1862, only eighty-one answering to roll call the day after the battle.

The story of Garibaldi as told in the November (1907) number of the Century Magazine is of special interest in this connection. The fact that the Italian patriot was solicited by President Lincoln to accept a major general commission in the Army of the Potomac shows to what straits the North was reduced, and that the Lincoln government not only relied upon Europe for men, but for officers who had gained reputation for generalship in continental wars. If the narrative of the German general be correct, there were enlisted under the stars and stripes entire regiments, brigades, divisions, and, with few exceptions, army corps of foreigners commanded by officers of their own blood and nationality. Such names as Sigel, Schurz, Schoeffe, Sedgwick, Osterhaus, Steinwehr, Hecker, Schimmelfennig, and Meagher are familiar to the readers of the history of the great war, and there were hundreds of other foreign officers who gained less distinction on the battlefield, but did valiant service in the war against the South.

In 1861, soon after the inauguration of President Lincoln, General Schurz was appointed Minister to Spain. He says: "I opened my heart to Mr. Lincoln about my troubles of conscience. I told him that, having helped as a public speaker to bring about the present state of things, I thought I would rather bear my share of the consequences; that I had seen some field service in the revolutionary conflicts of my native country, had made military matters a favorite study, and wanted to resign my mission to Spain and join the volunteer army. * * * I laid before him a plan. There were in New York many hundreds of able-bodied immigrants who had served in German regiments. These had only to be armed and put upon horses to make them cavalrymen fit for active service. There were also with them a number of officers trained in the Prussian army to command, and they thought that I, being somewhat known among the German-born citizens, was a suitable person to organize such a regiment if the government gave me the proper authority."

This quotation from the writings of General Schurz shows how easy it was to get German or other foreign recruits, trained soldiers fresh from European wars, thus early in the struggle for the Federal army. When in a short while bounties were offered by city, State, and the Federal government [and by individuals for substitutes.—ED. VETERAN.], a steady stream came over from Europe until the Army of the Potomac was filled to repletion. These bounties amounted to thousands of dollars in greenbacks, and the hireling was ready to fight for the money, caring nothing for the cause, whether it was to free the slaves or to restore the Union. It was not thus with Garibaldi, however.

In the November number of the Century Magazine is an article by H. Nelson Gay, the title to which is "Lincoln's Offer of a Command to Garibaldi: Light upon a Disputed Point of History." It is my purpose to give only a part of the correspondence which passed between the agents of the United States government abroad and the Italian patriot, who was resting at his island home at Caprera, near Naples.

"He had a changing group of old comrades about him, helping in the farm work and acting as his secretaries. * * * They were a lively group of patriots devoted to their leader and impatient for new adventures in the cause of freedom."

On January 8, 1861, J. W. Quiggle, American Consul to Antwerp, who had met Garibaldi not long before, addressed to him the following letter:

"General Garibaldi: The papers report that you are going to the United States to join the army of the North in the conflict of my country. If you do, the name of Lafayette will not surpass yours. There are thousands of Italians and Hungarians who will rush to your ranks, and there are thousands and tens of thousands of American citizens who will glory to be under the command of this 'Washington of Italy.'

"I would thank you to let me know if this is really your intention. If it be true, I will resign my position here as Consul and join you.

"With assurances of my profound regards, yours, etc.,

J. W. QUIGGLE."

Garibaldi replied from Caprera June 27, 1861:

"My Dear Friend: The news given in the journals that I am going to the United States is not exact. * * * If, however, in writing to your government they believe my services of some use, I would go to America if I did not find myself occupied in the defense of my own country. Tell me, is this agitation for the emancipation of the negroes or not? I would be very happy to be your companion in a war in which I could take part by duty as well as sympathy.

"Kiss with affection the hand of your lady, and I am with gratitude yours, G. GARIBALDI."

As Mr. Gay says: "It was a straightforward letter; and, furthermore, the single consideration which prompted him to enter our civil struggle was the emancipation of the negroes."

In another letter to Garibaldi Consul Quiggle writes: "You propound the question whether the present war in the United States is to emancipate the negroes from slavery. I say this is not the intention of the Federal government, but to put down rebellion, etc. You have lived in the United States, and you must have observed what a dreadful calamity it would be to throw at once upon the South, in looseness, four millions of slaves; but if this war be prosecuted with the bitterness with which it has been begun, I would not be surprised if it resulted in the extinction of slavery in the United States, whatever may be the consequences."

The correspondence reached Secretary Seward at a critical moment. The disaster at Bull Run had occurred on July 21. On the 27th Secretary Seward sent to H. S. Sandford, Minister to Brussels, the following dispatch:

"I send you copy of correspondence between late Consul at Antwerp and General Garibaldi. Proceed at once and enter into correspondence with the distinguished soldier of freedom.

"Tell him that this government believes he will if possible accept this call, because it is too certain that the fall of the American Union would be a disastrous blow to the cause of human freedom equally here, in Europe, and throughout the world. Tell him he will receive a major general's commission, with the hearty welcome of the American people. * * * You will submit this correspondence to Mr. Marsh, Minister to Italy, and he is expected to act concurrently with you.

"I am your obedient servant, WILLIAM H. SEWARD."

The writer continues: "On August 11, 1861, the New York Tribune contained the following notice: 'Our Washington correspondent states positively that Garibaldi has offered his services to the national government, and the offer was promptly accepted. Should the liberator of Italy revisit this country, he would be greeted with an enthusiasm beyond the power of words to express.'"

This correspondence, a part of which I have reproduced, seems to have been voluminous, and the letters translated and submitted by Mr. Gay are so numerous as to forbid further quotations; but enough has been taken to show the earnestness of the Federal government in its effort to supply its armies with the most distinguished general the world contained at that time.

These thrilling incidents which transpired nearly half a century ago, gleaned from the writings of men not in sympathy with the Southern cause, appeal to the future historian and plead to be recorded in fairness and equity.

It will at once occur to the careful reader how tremendous the odds against the South in her struggle for the great principle, "the rights of the States."

These letters quoted here, compiled from the archives of the American Legation at Brussels and the American Embassy at Rome and from the Century Magazine, show also the abhorrence of many of the enemies of the South at the mere mention of the wholesale emancipation of the slaves, leaving the white women and children on the plantations a prey to the brutish instincts of the savage. This one act of Mr. Lincoln, although executed as a war measure, should forbid the fulsome eulogies passed upon him by Southern men. God only stayed the hand of the liberated slave, and threw a mantle of protection over our helpless ones while their fathers, husbands, and sons were at the front, battling for rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution.

THE BATTLE OF FIVE FORKS.

BY J. STAUNTON MOORE, RICHMOND, VA.

The battle of Five Forks occurred forty-three years ago, the last pitched battle of the Civil War. The fighting after this was desultory, mere skirmishing incident to hasty retreat and rapid pursuit. Looking back to those days, incidents long dormant arise in the mind's storehouse; for,

"Lulled in the countless chambers of the brain,

Our thoughts are linked by many a hidden chain;

Awake but one, and lo, what myriads rise!

Each stamps its image as the other flies."

The writer recalls some of the incidents of the battle of Five Forks, where he was captured and consigned to Point Lookout. Corse's Brigade, Pickett's Division, had marched from the south side of the James, on the Howlett line, to the north side a few days before to repel a movement made by General Grant in that direction; but it soon developed that this was a feint to conceal or divert his movements to the right of our line in front of Petersburg, and our brigade was quickly marched through Richmond. From this point we went to Petersburg and on to Hatcher's Run, where we arrived March 30. In our front could be seen large numbers of the enemy, and I recall General Lee's meeting General Pickett and his quiet remark: "General, those people are getting too near us. We must drive them back."

The march through Richmond, Petersburg, and to Hatcher's Run was very trying through mud and sleet. The bridges over the run had been burned, and we had to wade the stream filled with floating ice and hold our cartridge boxes over our heads, the water reaching above our waists. The ground was soaked from steady rains, and at night we dared not light our fires to cook our scant rations, warm our chilled bodies, or dry our wet clothing.

On the morning of April 1 the sun came out for the first time in many days. We were preparing our morning meal when the order sounded, "Fall in, men," and we could see the blue lines forming in our front toward the edge of the woods. Our regiment, the 15th Virginia Infantry, had their alignment on the main road in the rear of the Gilliam house, which fronted one of the five forks or crossroads that converged at this point. I recall that I had just prepared a large tin cup of coffee, and was anticipating its refreshing influence when I had to decant it in its boiling condition in obedience to orders.

We soon formed into line. Our company (B), being armed with Enfield rifles, were detailed as skirmishers or pickets in front of our regiment, posted behind a rail fence running parallel with the road. Between our line and the enemy there was a distance of less than a mile. Our position as pickets in the middle of the intervening held was exposed, leaving us practically subject to the fire of friend and foe. After deploying to our positions, we secured some straw and crossed it with fence rails, making a convenient loophole or rest for our guns when the moment for action arrived.

We had not long to wait, for soon the ringing bugle call of Sheridan's Rough Riders floated on the air and the bright flash of their sabers gleamed in the sunlight as they prepared for their charge. On they came, the earth trembling beneath the impact of that mighty host. As soon as the cavalry debouched from the cover of the woods the skirmishers opened fire from behind our breastworks of straw. Lying face downward, we fired through our fence, then, turning on our backs, we reloaded.

Our troops, infantry and artillery, fired over us, and there was a storm of projectiles from friend and foe alike above our defenseless heads. We had fired about a dozen rounds before the cavalry advanced near enough to commence firing at us with their revolvers. Just at this time my ramrod became caught in my rifle; and as I could not get it down or out, I was contemplating letting the enemy have both through his body, when one of my comrades dropped him as he was about to shoot me.

We repulsed this charge, but they came a second time and rode over us up to our line. This second charge was repulsed with considerable slaughter. Firing then commenced in our rear, and our troops began to retreat. We could see the thin gray line vanishing in the distance, and the enemy approached us from every side. I was about to empty my gun into a squad, when I heard an ominous click, click in my rear, followed by an order to surrender. Seeing I was outnumbered by several Federals, I threw down my gun and in obedience to orders marched to the rear.

The last I saw of General Pickett his long hair was streaming behind him as he rode from the ill-fated field. Thus closed the last pitched battle of the war, which proved the beginning of the overthrow of the Army of Northern Virginia. Of our division, fully half were captured, and thus commenced the disastrous retreat culminating in Appomattox and its dramatic surrender.

PORTRAIT OF COL. AUSTIN SMITH.

[The Richmond Times-Dispatch of March 15 contained an interesting account of the presentation of a portrait of Col. Austin Smith to the R. E. Lee Camp of Richmond. The address was by Maj. Robert Hunter, and gives interesting data.]

MAJOR HUNTER'S ADDRESS.

I feel highly honored by the request from Miss Mary Amelia Smith and Col. Thomas Smith, of Warrenton, to present to Lee Camp a portrait of their brother, Lieut. Col. Austin E. Smith, a son of Gov. William and Elizabeth H. Smith, who gave his life in defense of his native State in the battle of Gaines's Mill, June 27, 1862, when McClellan's formidable army was menacing this capital city of our State and the Confederacy.

Artistically conceived and executed by a Richmond artist, himself a soldier, it is eminently worthy of a place upon your historic walls among the portraits of the heroes of the South whose names have gone into history and reflected imperishable luster upon Confederate arms and our righteous Confederate cause.

Colonel Smith's record as a soldier is brief, but brilliant. He fell mortally wounded in the forefront of his first battle—a battle which General Whiting, upon whose staff Colonel Smith was serving, described as "very severe, hotly contested, and gallantly won."

There has been some post-bellum dispute as to whose command made the first breach in the Federal lines at Gaines's Mill. Longstreet's men made a magnificent charge on the right, and D.-H. Hill claimed to have turned the flank of the regulars. But the fact is "in even scale the battle hung," and Jackson had become impatient. He sent his last orders to his division commanders. "Tell them," he said, "this affair must hang in suspense no longer; let them sweep the field with the bayonet." Lee, almost at the same moment as Jackson, had given the word for a general advance. As the supports came thronging up the shout was carried down the line, "The Valley men are here," and with the cry of Stonewall Jackson for their slogan the Southern army dashed across the deep ravine. "And," says Colonel Henderson, "as the sun, low on the horizon, loomed blood red through the murky atmosphere the Confederate colors waved along the line of the abandoned breastworks. But," as Colonel Henderson, whose account of this battle is the fairest and fullest I have read, further says, "it is abundantly evident that the advent of Jackson's fresh troops and the vigor of their assault broke down the resistance of the Federals. Against the very center of the Federal line the attack was pushed home by Whiting's men with extraordinary resolution. His two brigades under Hood and Law were the first to sweep over the intrenchments, outflank the Federal brigades, which still held out to right and left, and compel them to retreat." * * *

"Of my staff," says General Whiting in his report, "I cannot speak too highly. The chief, Maj. J. H. Hill, fell, painfully wounded, while leading the charge. The chivalrous Col. (Maj.) Austin E. Smith, aid-de-camp, received a mortal wound in the same onset."

It was of a Spartan soldier of the stamp of Austin Smith that the Spartan General Tyrtaeus, who was also a poet, wrote:

"How glorious fell the valiant, sword in hand,
In front of battle for their native land,
Disdaining fear and deeming light the cost
Of life itself in glorious battle lost!
More sacred than in life and lovelier far
For having perished in the front of war."

General Whiting used the word "chivalrous" advisedly in his tribute to Austin Smith's splendid bearing in this battle, for he was indeed

"From plume to spur a cavalier,
Whose soul ne'er parleyed with a fear
Nor cheek bore tinge of shame."

Another touching tribute is from John S. Farley, of Charleston, S. C., who was a private in the Hampton Legion Cavalry and a courier with General Whiting when Colonel Smith was killed: "A more courteous or kindly gentleman than Colonel Smith I never knew. As an instance of his considerate kindness I mention that on the night before I reached our bivouac at Totopotamy Creek without a blanket. Colonel Smith, having observed it, insisted on sharing his with me, and we slept together, heads in saddle, until four o'clock in the morning, when his servant led up his favorite horse, a light dappled gray, a magnificent animal, but lame. He told the servant to saddle another horse, and, turning to me with a disturbed look, said: 'Farley, that's a bad omen; I will be killed to-day.' 'O, no,' I said; 'on the contrary, I think it fortunate you can't ride the gray to-day. You would be a conspicuous mark for every sharpshooter. You will be safer on the other horse.' But, alas! his premonition was verified. That day the gallant gentleman fell, shot through the shoulder, and died before morning of the next day, lamented by everybody who knew him."

Of him might we truly say with Sir Ector: "He was the meekest man and the gentlest that ever ate in hall with ladies, and he was the sternest knight to his mortal foe." * * *

Immediately upon Virginia's secession he resigned his lucrative office of Naval Agent of San Francisco, abandoned large property interests, and started to place his life, his fortune, and his sacred honor in her service. En route he was seized by the Federal authorities and held a prisoner until exchanged. No caged eagle ever longed for freedom and sunlight more than he while held a captive in Forts Lafayette and Warren. From his military prison he wrote his father to try to effect his exchange. The following letter in furtherance of that request reveals the patriotism of father and son:

"HEADQUARTERS 49TH REG. VA. VOLS.,
February 10, 1862.

"President Davis—Dear Sir: Having just received a letter from my son and not having heard from the Secretary of War, to whom I wrote, I have concluded to inclose the letter to you that you may see that he adheres inflexibly to his resolve in the first instance: 'that the granite of his prison home would crumble into dust before he would acknowledge the slightest allegiance to the tyranny which oppressed him or have his devoted loyalty to the South to become a question.'

COL. ROBERT HUNTER.

With you, my dear sir, now rests my hopes—all my hopes and his. I know not, care not how he has managed about our pecuniary interests. Money is but dust in the balance against liberty—the liberty to defy, to conquer our enemies; the liberty to fight, to bleed, and if need be to die for our country.

"I am, Mr. President, very truly and sincerely yours, WILLIAM SMITH."

In this connection it is proper to add that Col. Austin Smith was offered full liberty to return to his adopted State without taking the oath to the United States, but he indignantly and scornfully declined the tempting proposal.

Austin Smith was of heroic stock on both sides—none truer, none braver. His inheritance was indomitable pluck, unyielding adherence to principle and honor, and intense—aye, passionate—devotion to his native State. The proudest British nobleman who can trace his title back through Burk's Peerage to Hastings or Cressy or Agincourt or Blenheim can claim no richer or more heroic ancestral blood than that which dripped from three wounds of the colonel of the 49th Virginia

Infantry upon the field of Sharpsburg, the bloodiest and perhaps the most fiercely contested battle of the war, or from that same blood which swelled the veins and flushed the cheek and pulsed the heart of the then Governor elect of Virginia as he double-quickened his brigade into the arena of fire and blood to save Lee's left flank at Gettysburg. But I said he was of heroic stock on both sides, and so indeed he was.

Governor Smith left Washington after Lincoln's proclamation of war in somewhat of a hurry. Upon reaching Warrenton he was taken sick, having already applied for a commission as colonel with the view to the organization of a regiment. When convalescing, in order to test the mettle of his wife he asked her views about his going into the army, with the suggestion that he was then past three score years and "muster free." She promptly replied: "You have preached secession as a right of the State and have told the people the time had arrived to act; and though you are 'muster free,' you are able to stand the hardships and trials of camp and field and should show the public your readiness to stand by your teachings. You know I did not believe in secession, and have been opposed to Virginia leaving the Union."

He thereupon told her he had already anticipated her reply, and would take the field at the earliest moment practicable.

On that ever-memorable Sunday, April 2, 1865, when notified by General Breckinridge, then Secretary of War, that Richmond would be evacuated that night, Governor Smith commenced preparations for removing the State archives as far as practicable. His wife observed these preparations and asked what they meant in regard to the situation. Receiving an evasive reply, she said to him: "Smith [her usual address to him], be frank with me; for though I may think like a woman, I can act like a man." It is superfluous to add that the situation was explained, and the Governor's preparations were thereby facilitated.

Two famous duels occurred in California during these eventful days which attracted widespread interest because of the prominence of the principal figures. One was between Judge J. Cabet Smith, a brother of Col. Austin Smith, and David C. Broderick, then a member of the State Legislature and a leader of the Abolition faction. There were no anti-dueling laws at that time, and the affair was witnessed by hundreds of spectators, among them Governor Smith himself. Broderick was twice wounded, his life being saved by a large gold watch which he was allowed to retain upon his person and which Smith's bullet struck and shattered. The other was between this same Broderick, who had then become a United States Senator, and Judge Terry, of the Supreme Court of California, in which Broderick lost his life. Austin Smith was a recognized leader of the Southern party in these exciting times and scenes—a fearless advocate, defender, and champion of the principles and fundamental rights for which he subsequently fought and died so gallantly and so gloriously upon the battlefield.

VILLAINOUS "INSPECTORS" AT CAMP DOUGLAS.

BY J. W. COOK, CO. A, 43D MISS. REGT., HELENA, ARK.

A Texas comrade in the April VETERAN asks if any Camp Douglas prisoner remembers "Prairie Bull" and "Billie Hell." My recollections of them are more vivid than pleasant. They were inside guards, but called themselves inspectors. The prison discipline was very rigid, and they seemed to delight in inflicting the severest punishment on the least infraction of the rules. Bull (his real name was McCrley; don't remember Billie's real name) usually carried a leather strap that he used unmercifully with little or no cause. The prisoners would not betray each other; and when he failed to designate the individual "culprit" as called then he would call out the whole barracks, one hundred and ninety men. His favorite punishment then was "reaching for grub," as he called it. He made them stand in line stiff-kneed and lean forward, touching the ground with their fingers, and stand so until many would fall exhausted, to be beaten cruelly and put back in line. At another time he would make them sit down in the snow in an almost nude condition. Refusal or even protest brought club or pistol into use.

One morning a half-starved prisoner stood at the bone barrel at our kitchen door. Bull came along and began kicking him with all his might. The man reached his hand back to shield himself, and accidentally tripped him. He jumped up, drew his pistol, and shot the prisoner dead. He seemed always looking for a pretext for such things, and was entitled to three notches on his pistol handle that I knew of.

The prison bugle sounded at sunset, and all prisoners must go to bed, and no sound must issue from the barracks until sunrise. One evening just after retiring Terrell A. Crenshaw, of Athens, Ala., and I, who occupied a top bunk away back at the end of the barracks next to the kitchen, got into a little scuffle, and I spoke a little above the ordinary tone. A shadow passed the little window, and in a minute more stalked Bull. "Who made that noise in here?" he asked. No one answered. He repeated the question; no answer. Again he asked, and, coming farther back and a little short of me, he called to Parker, of North Carolina: "Come down from there." "I did not make the noise," he said. "You lie," said Bill. "Come down," and Parker started down.

I could not stand that, but told him that I was the man. "Come down, d— you," he said. I came, but he would not let me get my coat. There he stood within six feet of me, cursing me in the vilest language he could use. I replied: "I am a prisoner; my hands are tied." I knew he was trying to provoke me to resist or even protest, but I knew him too well. "Get down to that gate, d— you," he said. I knew what was coming then, and passed out, intending to dodge him. I knew he would shoot, and the guards on the east and west works would also; but it was getting dusk, and I did not fear his hitting me much. It flashed into my mind that he could locate me the next day, and it would be worse for me. So I slowed up and he came up, and we walked side by side, he cursing me at every step and I saying nothing. We walked up to "Morgan's mule." "Now," he said, "d— you, mount him." It was made like a carpenter's sawhorse, only it was made on an inch-and-a-half plank and fifteen feet high and pieces nailed across to climb up on.

I had been up there about an hour, when I heard the gate keeper say: "Don't forget and let that fellow freeze and fall off." He then turned to me and said: "Get down and go to your quarters." But Bull objected, and kept me as long again on it. I was almost frozen. Then he came and told me to go. I noticed that he took his stand at the bottom of the steps, and, taking his club in his right hand, intended to strike me as I came down; but I threw myself on the opposite side and came down facing him. I had heard of people facing wild beasts to prevent them from springing on them. So I looked Bull square in the eye. He satisfied himself by another round of cursing; and being told to go, I backed off until entirely out of reach of that dreaded club. Thousands of men will remember Bull, many of whom have long ago answered the last roll, brought on by exposure just to satisfy his spleen.

LETTER DELIVERED AFTER MANY YEARS.

The following letter was recently found in possession of a lady near Winchester, Va., and the supposition is that it was picked up near that town during the war. The letter was addressed to Miss Fannie Coiner, Waynesboro, Augusta, Va., and was written by Dr. Casper Henkel.

Miss Coiner married Capt. Ben Patterson, of the 23d Regiment Virginia Cavalry; and, her husband being dead, she resides with her children and grandchildren, all of whom have recently seen the letter that remained undelivered for nearly forty-five years.

Dr. Henkel has been one of the most prominent physicians in the Valley of Virginia since the war, and is now seventy-three years of age. Many old soldiers suffering from wounds received during the war have gone to his home in later years and received surgical treatment as freely and with as little thought of compensation as when he tenderly and untiringly ministered to their needs on the field.

LETTER TO MISS COINER.

ON THE "FIELD," NEAR HAGERSTOWN, MD.,

July 12, 1863.

Dear Cousin: We were drawn up in line of battle yesterday near Hagerstown and still lie in wait for the enemy to attack us—had some picket firing last evening, and this morning the enemy's cavalry made an attack upon our cavalry on the left and drove in our pickets from Hagerstown and now hold the town; captured some of our sharpshooters. Gen. A. P. Hill captured a large number of Yankee cavalry on the right. Our men have thrown up breastworks on a good position, and feel confident of giving the Yankees a whipping if they come up to them. It is now two o'clock and no indications of an advance. The river has been past crossing for some days, so that the most of our wagons still remain on this side; so should we be repulsed, what a scattation there will be! We must lose all. The pontoon bridge will be completed to-day, and by morning the river can be forded. If we had the Yankees in the fix they have had us in for several days, I do not think many of them would escape. Our men and officers seem very confident of saving all. Cattle and extra horses have been driven across the river in large numbers. We crossed over the river on the 19th and camped on the old battlefield near Sharpsburg. Since that time we have been almost constantly on the march in battle line or fighting. We passed through Hagerstown on to Greencastle and Mercersburg; there we (3d Brigade) took the Pittsburg road and crossed over the North Mountain to the town of McConnellsburg, Fulton County, Pa., where we frightened a body of "malich" and heard of General Milroy at Bedford C. H.

We remained at McConnellsburg one day and took the road leading to Chambersburg, where we rejoined our division, and marched on to Shippensburg and camped near Carlisle. Here we remained a day, then made for Gettysburg, attacked the enemy on the 1st, repulsed them in fine style, they admitting a loss of ten thousand in killed, wounded, and prisoners. On the 2d they took a strong position east of Gettysburg on a little mountain with very rugged sides, with a creek and marshes around its base. Our troops attacked them furiously in this stronghold, repulsing them at times, then being repulsed again. Our men fought desperately, and overcame many almost incredible difficulties, but did not succeed in dislodging the Yanks from their last stronghold.

On the night of the 3d and 4th our army withdrew in their own time. The enemy made a very feeble effort at pursuing us, only in sufficient force to pick up stragglers and to watch our movements. Our losses are about ten or twelve thousand killed and wounded. Our division (Johnston's) lost 1,142 men killed and wounded; our brigade (Stuart's) lost 360 wounded, 84 killed; 37th Virginia had 44 wounded, 10 killed on the field, 1 lieutenant killed. The Northern papers admit tremendous losses, some as many as forty thousand. We certainly failed in our undertaking. General Lee was too confident in his men, expecting them to overcome difficulties too great. Troops never fought better or more obstinately, and succeeded in driving the enemy whenever they could get to them. The enemy's success was owing to their advantage in position, not in valor. My opinion is that if General Lee had taken a position and allowed himself to be attacked he would have been victorious. Our men were very much mortified at the result, but say they can whip the Yanks—have done so and can whip them still.

At no time during the engagement were our men panic-stricken or routed. Every one seemed to turn his back on the enemy with regret. The roads were in wretched condition from the heavy rains of the 4th, 5th, and 6th, which added much to the depression which already weighed so heavily on us. Our wagon trains were attacked on their way to Williamsport by Yankee cavalry and some wagons taken. Our wagon train must have been twenty-five miles in length, and could not be protected at all points. I have just seen Lieutenant Stephens, an ordnance officer with Jenkins's Cavalry, and he states that he saw Major Eakle two hours ago quite well. He is on our right two miles distant, and will be past here to-day, provided the enemy attack us in passing to our left. I have seen very little of the cavalry on this trip. They have always been in advance or on the right or left.

Very few bright faces or "God bless you!" have greeted us since we crossed the river. The few sympathizers we meet are very cautious. A party called "Copperhead" Democrats seem more free to meet us than any other party. They profess to denounce Lincoln and cry for peace upon any terms. The citizens seem to be much relieved that we do not give them their dues. We treat them civilly, and not as they have treated us. Our officers do everything they can to protect citizens and their property. As far as I am concerned, I do not care how much property they destroy just so they respect the old and women and children.

I have found it a very difficult matter to procure anything in the way of goods that is desirable. Persons owning them are very loath to sell, and it requires a permit from a major general to visit a town or to stop on the way. Jenkins has been less lenient than any of the commanders. He has procured thousands of horses and cattle. We have fared bountifully most of the time on butter, milk, apple butter, and the nicest light bread I have ever seen. We have had a colored man foraging for our mess, who has kept us very well supplied. He disappeared a few days ago, however, with Colonel Williams's horse. Colonel Williams joined us yesterday. He has been home since the Chancellorsville fight; has almost recovered from his wound. Dr. Shultz Miller is with me now at the hospital.

As to the country through which we passed, it is beautiful and all in the highest state of cultivation. Most splendid barns and farm buildings I have seen. The people are very much such people as we have in Shenandoah and Rockingham Counties—the German portion.

Mercersburg, Shippensburg, and Chambersburg are beautiful towns, and everything unmolested by the war. I did not see any of the Coiners about Shippensburg and Carlisle. I learned they were quite numerous, some of them Copperheads, others Lincolnites. I thought best not to visit them, as I could not expect to be kindly received. Mr. John Alexander (of the 25th Virginia), living near you, has just been to me to have a tooth extracted. He is quite well, and says he saw a Mr. Gilkison, of the cavalry, who states that all the Coiner boys are safe.

The Winchester girls were all in fine glee when I saw them; but all looked careworn, having been under Yankee rule so long. The 13th Virginia Regiment has been on duty since we took Winchester, which has given the boys a chance of visiting their homes and being with friends.

Four o'clock P.M. The pickets along the line are firing fiercely at this time; otherwise all seems quiet. I have just received a lot of bandages, dressings, candles, chloroform, morphia, sponges, etc., for field use, and have everything in readiness for action. Eight o'clock P.M. I have just returned from the 14th Regiment; saw Major Eakle. He has had much hard work. Your pet "Charlie," Major Eakle's horse, was killed whilst the Major was leading a charge at Gettysburg.

Thank your father for his kindness in visiting mother.

Good-by. Your cousin, CASPAR C. HENKEL.

DISAGREEABLE EXPERIENCES IN WAR TIMES.

BY MAJ. E. B. CARRUTH, AUSTIN, TEX.

At the beginning of the Confederate war there were very few men in the South that knew anything of military tactics. Companies and battalions were drilled in camps of instruction. After the fall of Fort Donelson, on the Cumberland River, these green troops were hurried to Corinth, Miss., where Gens. Albert Sidney Johnston, Braxton Bragg, and Beauregard were mobilizing an army to check General Grant's movement into the South. The 7th Mississippi Regiment, to which I belonged, was sent from Bay St. Louis, on the coast, to reinforce the troops at Fort Donelson, and arrived at Jackson, Tenn., the day that Fort Donelson surrendered, and was ordered to Corinth. The regiment arrived there and bivouacked by the side of the railroad on Friday before the battle of Shiloh in the midst of a cold, drizzly, sleety rain. About the same time a train load of provisions was shoved out on a switch of the railroad near by. Soon a staff officer from General Bragg's headquarters appeared and read an order to me to take charge of a large detail of men and to have these provisions unloaded from the cars and covered up with a tarpaulin. This was accomplished by dark; so after eating a hasty supper of crackers, broiled bacon, and coffee, I crawled under the edge of the tarpaulin that covered the provisions, and had myself comfortable for the night (?). The patterning rain and sleet upon the tent cloth would have been productive of a fine sleep; but just as I got comfortably straightened out in my blankets the same little staff officer appeared and called me again. I poked my head out from under the tarpaulin and answered like Samuel of old: "Here am I." He stooped down near me, and by the aid of a lantern read a long order. It was a "stunner." I was directed to go to the southern end of the western switch of the railroad, where I would find a detail of one hundred and twenty men ready to report to me; also that I would find a train load of wagons all "knocked down," wheels in one car, axles in another, bodies, bows, and sheets in the other cars. And the harness was likewise "knocked down." There were bundles of harness, bundles of breeching, bundles of bridles and lines, large bundles of collars of all sorts and sizes. And, to cap the climax, on a cold, rainy night, the order called for one hundred and thirty mules that were in a field one-half mile southeast of the switch.

The instructions were to have the provisions mentioned above all loaded and be ready to move at sunrise. The staff officer gave me a copy of the order and a lantern, and advised me that the order was "imperative." I felt that I was simply stranded. It seemed impossible in the cold, rain, and mud, with mules in the field and "knocked down" wagons, to load those supplies and move by sunup. Just then there was little prospect that the sun ever would shine again. However, I got out, put my boy Caleb in the warm nook that I left, and went to the south end of the western switch. Sure enough, there was the detail, well supplied with lanterns. I read the order to the detail. I called for wheelwrights and mechanics, and put fifty men to work getting out the wagons and fitting them together. Another large detail was made, each man being furnished with two bridles and sent to the field after the mules; while still others were directed to arrange the harness. Thus the work proceeded much more cheerfully than I had anticipated. Many jokes and witticisms kept the men's spirits up, while numerous inquiries were made as to "the cause of such a rush." Later in the night the mules arrived, wet, cold, and all drawn up; so it was not easy to fit the harness.

By four o'clock in the morning a number of wagons had been adjusted and fitted out with bows and sheets, and four strong mules to each wagon. Just as we were ready to start a little incident occurred that afforded considerable amusement. Four men of the detail who had shirked duty were found hid away in one of the wagons. As soon as they were discovered the other men of the detail caught them, dragged them out of the wagon, and treated them to a mud bath. Order having been restored, the first wagon started for the "grub pile" amid deafening applause and shouts of the men. The "impossible" had been accomplished. With a pilot carrying a lantern ahead and a man to lead each mule, the first wagon arrived at the "grub pile" and proceeded to load with flour. By sunup the stores were all loaded on the wagons and ready to move.

Daylight the next morning—Sunday, April 6, 1862—found us in line of battle near the Shiloh Church in front of General Grant's army. The sequel is well known.

STONEWALL JACKSON.

BY F. A. WISE, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

"Let us cross over the river and rest under the shade."

With the descending mists of eternal night,

As the spark of life was nearly gone,

The endless shades of rest within his sight,

The warrior General's work was done

From the heat of the battle's ray,

From the dust of war and strife,

His soul was weary and would stray

O'er the river's tide to the tree of life;

There under its shade forever resting

'Midst Eden's bloom of blessed peace,

No human struggle there contesting

Where heavenly life would never cease.

And over the river, under the trees,

In the shade where he longed to rest,

His soul took flight, and under the trees

He waits the dawn of heavenly light

MAJ. BELL G. BIDWELL.

[From an extended sketch by M. V. Ingram, of Clarksville, Tenn., the following extracts are made on the life and character of that brave soldier and noble citizen, Maj. Bell G. Bidwell, of Tennessee and Texas.]

The name of Maj. Bell G. Bidwell brings to memory one of the noblest, bravest, and most lovable of the many true men who graced the Confederate army, and he certainly merits distinguished mention in the VETERAN'S roll of honor.

Bell G. Bidwell was a native of Robertson County, Tenn., born February 19, 1837, and there he grew to young manhood. Developing a brilliant intellect, he soon acquired a fine education, graduating at the Nashville Medical University. Medicine not being the profession he desired to follow, he at once entered the Law School at Lebanon, Tenn., from which he graduated in 1860 with distinguished honor. Finding himself thus early in life the possessor of diplomas in two of the noblest professions, medicine and law, he at once impressed his personality upon the community in which he lived, and early after the war came to the front as the most brilliant young orator in the State, a strong rival in debate with Hon. John F. House, long a distinguished member of Congress.

With the fall of Fort Sumter, in 1861, Bidwell was among the first to call for volunteers and to leave Robertson County as captain in command of a full company of men, who were of the noblest and truest soldiers that ever marched to battle; and every man was devoted to the captain from the beginning to the end of the struggle. Other companies were soon formed, and the 30th Tennessee Regiment was formed of nine hundred and seventy-five men from Robertson and Sumner Counties, in which Captain Bidwell's company was assigned to first rank (Company A). He was then the youngest officer in the command. John W. Head, of Gallatin, was Colonel; R. H. Murphy, Lieutenant Colonel; J. J. Turner, Major. The regiment went into camp at Red Springs for drill, and in November was ordered to Fort Henry, and later to Fort Donelson, which battle began on February 13, 1862. The 1st Tennessee Brigade was formed, composed of the 30th, 49th, and 50th Tennessee Regiments, and McCoot's company of cavalry under Forrest.

Sometime previous General Tilghman had asked for a company from the 30th Tennessee for heavy artillery service, and at Captain Bidwell's request his company was chosen. The companies of Captains Beaumont and Bidwell were assigned to take charge of the water batteries, with Captain Dixon, of the Engineer Corps, as chief of artillery. Captain Beaumont being absent on furlough, Captain Bidwell was placed in command of the batteries. The large Federal fleet had steamed up to within three hundred yards of the little fort. The battle was terrific, with all the odds in favor of the Federal fleet, so this was a test which demonstrated Captain Bidwell's extraordinary military capacity. His coolness, courage, and great skill in handling the situation secured the admiration of that fine officer, General Forrest, and received his highest commendation in report of that battle.

Within an hour Bidwell had the situation in hand, and handled it with consummate skill, never losing a chance or wasting a shot. If a gunner was out of place, Bidwell took charge, and aimed in person some of the deadliest shots fired at the fleet. A shot from the flagship Carondelet disabled his large 32-pound gun and killed Captain Dixon, the chief of artillery. The fight was renewed on the following day, resulting in much disaster to the fleet and a heavy loss of men. The admiral was wounded and his flagship completely disabled. The crippled fleet withdrew, and victory perched on the Confederate banner, the first and only time the gunboats were defeated during the war.

In this battle the fleet fired two thousand shots and shells, receiving four hundred effective messengers in reply. The withdrawal of the fleet was not the end of the fight, however, for during the night of the 14th the land forces were reinforced by twelve thousand fresh troops under command of Gen. U. S. Grant, and on the morning of February 15 the attack was again renewed; but the Federals were repulsed in every attack. Reinforcements continued to arrive until the Federal force reached fifty-five thousand men. In the fort there were about thirteen thousand men, with no hope of reinforcements and cut off from a possibility of supplies. A council of war was held at midnight, at which Captain Bidwell was present and heard Colonel Forrest's (he was yet only a colonel) earnest protest against surrendering and his emphatic announcement that he and his men would go out, which they did with many others, and which the whole garrison could have done. That surrender will ever be considered as one of the mistakes of the war. Captain Bidwell and one of his men escaped and made their way to Nashville, where he attached himself to General Gregg's command, and was assigned optional service until the reorganization of his regiment after the exchange of prisoners. The reorganization took place in Mississippi, when J. J. Turner was chosen colonel and B. G. Bidwell major. He thus continued to the close of the war.

Through many other hardships and dangers of war Captain Bidwell passed; always being called to the place where greatest courage and keenest perception were required. Among these were Shiloh, Vicksburg, Port Hudson, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, and Nashville, during all of which time Major Bidwell and his command were under almost constant fire. At the end of the war the 30th Tennessee had lost half of its men and endured untold suffering and privations.

An incident of Major Bidwell's army career is given as illustrative of his unselfish devotion to his men. The Confederates had been attacked by a large force and retreat was decided upon; but the enemy was so near that the order must be passed from man to man down the line, and at a given signal from the officer they were to leap from the rifle pits and rush up the hill to the cover of the forest. The word was passed, and he gave the signal; but so interested was he in rescuing his men that he forgot himself and was left alone in the ditch. To surrender was disgrace, to go up the hill alone was certain death, the guns of the enemy being now turned upon that point; but he decided to risk the issue and challenge death. Leaping from the pit with a bound, he rushed up the hill, while cannon roared and musketry shrieked and showers of bursting shells and rain of rifle balls seemed to indicate that the whole Federal force was shooting at the one little officer in gray. Shells plowed up the earth about him, bullets cut off the twigs above his head, barked the trees at his side, singing their fearful song of death close to his ears; but up the hill he fled, unmindful of the leaden hail, and reached the cover of the woods, unscathed, preserved as it were miraculously from death.

Major Bidwell returned to his home broken in health, suffering from malaria, and for almost a year was a confirmed invalid. He opened a law office at Springfield, Tenn., but was later drawn to Paducah, Ky., where he again opened an office, and soon secured a lucrative practice. He always won the confidence and esteem of the people. Major Bidwell was married in 1871 to Miss Eleanor Patrick Flournoy, and a son and daughter came to bless their home. He served two terms in the Kentucky Legislature, 1873-76, where he made a record for himself and became a leader in the House. That he served with distinction was evidenced by a statement in the Courier-Journal that "if we had a man of his talent in Louisville we would push a man out of place to push him on."

Friends urged Major Bidwell to run for Congress; but circumstances decided him to remove to Texas, which he did in the fall of 1879, locating in Weatherford, where he soon established a lucrative law practice and made friends. He was shortly afterwards employed by the Texas and Pacific Railway, and held a prominent position in the law department of the road for twenty years. As a corporation lawyer, he became eminent. The company manifested many evidences of esteem and friendship for him; while the confidence, friendship, and regard of the managers for him was unbounded.

In his home town of Weatherford no man was held in higher esteem or loved and trusted more. After several years of illness, his old enemy, rheumatism, having once more attacked him, he quietly passed away on the 30th of June, 1904, leaving a memory that will live green and bloom in the hearts of his friends during life.

R. M. AND J. H. CAMPBELL, TWINS.

These Confederate twins were sixty-three years old in May, 1908; born in Rich Valley, Washington County, Va., on the Fall Hill road, five miles north of Abingdon. In 1862 they joined Davidson's Battery together, and so continued throughout the entire war.

R. M. surrendered at Appomattox on the 9th of April, 1865. He went to Delaware, and remained there until in July. J. H. was injured by lifting at a gun of the battery. These twin brothers are farmers, and have lived in Washington, their native county, ever since the war. They belong to the William E. Jones Camp, U. C. V. Both have lost their wives; the families of each are scattered, and the two brothers are now living together.

SCOUTING IN VIRGINIA.

BY I. S. CURTIS, SHERMAN, TEX.

During the fall of 1863 the Confederate army was west of the Rappahannock River, in Culpeper County, Va. The Federal army was on the east side of the river, in Fauquier County. General Meade, who was in command of the Army of the Potomac, had his headquarters near Catlett Station. General Lee's headquarters were in Culpeper Courthouse. As scouts we employed our time in keeping General Lee informed of the movements and positions of the Federal army. Confederate scouts often went into Alexandria, across the river from Washington City.

I had at that time an associate whose name was Johnson, a member of the 2d Tennessee Regiment. He was about my age—twenty-one years. We mapped out a trip to go into the Federal lines at Fairfax C. H. and come around by way of Warrenton, a journey which would consume two days and nights. Upon investigation at Fairfax C. H. we found that the risk would be too great; so we left the Federal lines and came around by way of Catlett Station. Nearing Weaversville, which is close to Catlett Station, we were unexpectedly halted by an infantry picket, who demanded our identity. I replied promptly: "We are members of the 8th New York Cavalry." He ordered one of us to advance, which I promptly did. This act seemingly convinced him that I was speaking the truth. As soon as I allayed his suspicion he dropped his gun to rest. I immediately presented my pistol to his head and ordered him to surrender, which he did, and I signaled to Johnson to come to my side.

At a short distance we discovered three cavalymen, one of them up a persimmon tree and the other two on the ground. Johnson remained in charge of the prisoner, and I announced that I would go down and capture the three cavalymen, and his reply was: "Yes, and you will get killed." I rode carelessly toward them, dismounted, and told them I would join them in the feast, to which they consented. In a few minutes I saw I had the advantage of the two on the ground, and I ordered them to drop their arms, and I had then only to order the third to come down out of the tree. He was unarmed, his pistols being on the ground. I remarked to Johnson that we were in a dangerous condition with four prisoners, a long distance from the Confederate and in full view of the Federal army. However, we started toward the Confederate line with our four captives and three horses.

A Mr. Smith lived a few miles from Catlett Station, and I decided to pass his home. On nearing the place we discovered a lone horseman, who upon seeing us fled to the timber. We approached the house and inquired of Mr. Smith who the man was. He replied that he was a member of a South Carolina regiment, and had mistaken us for Federals. Mr. Smith volunteered to overtake him and bring him back to our assistance, which he did. We found the man to be a Jew by the name of Cohn; we had a conviction that he was deserting the Confederate army. After talking with Cohn, we proposed to give him all the horses and accouterments if he would take charge of the prisoners and turn them over to the Confederate pickets at the United States Ford on the Rappahannock River. This he consented to do. We also suggested that he take the prisoners to Mr. Comb's and lock them in his barn for the night. We afterwards learned that he did this. Our next news of him was that his prisoners had captured him. I have never heard from the Jew since, and I am very sure he took the oath of allegiance to the Federal government.

Johnson and I were very hungry, and Mr. Smith served us a delightful supper of stewed rabbit and crackers, after which we retired to the straw rick and had a good night. Early next morning I proposed to Johnson that we go into Weaversville and Catlett Station and capture some Federal general to hold as a hostage for Gen. W. H. F. Lee, who was then a prisoner. Between daylight and sunrise we rode up to the home of a Mrs. Sayers, just on the hill above Weaversville, and we inquired of her if she had any information of our (Federals) men who had been captured the previous day. She replied that she had seen them. We told her that we had instructions to notify all the citizens on the Federal line that if any scouts were aided or assisted their property would be destroyed. To this a Federal safeguard replied that he knew Mrs. Sayers had never rendered any assistance to them. We then rode down to a flour mill on Cedar Run, where the Federals had pickets stationed. When halted by them, we made them the same statement that we had made Mrs. Sayers. They crossed us over the stream, and we proceeded to Weaversville, and thence to Catlett Station, a distance of one mile.

The whole country was covered with tents. We were endeavoring to locate one occupied by some prominent officer. This we could not do. Returning into Weaversville from Catlett Station, we approached a tent in a cavalry camp. Johnson held my horse while I rushed into the tent, where six men were sleeping, and ordered them to put on their arms and follow me. Their horses were already saddled, and they promptly put on their bridles. We mounted and rode on through Weaversville and crossed Cedar Run between Mrs. Weaver's house and the flour mill and proceeded on the road to Belton. I was riding in front by the side of two men, and Johnson was in the rear. Before reaching Belton we ordered them to surrender, and it took them so completely by surprise that five of the six surrendered. Our captives claimed that they took me to be a Lieutenant Wilson of their regiment, the 17th Pennsylvania, who often scouted through that portion of the country. We turned these prisoners over to General Hampton at Richards Ferry, on the Rappahannock River.

This incident was read to the different commands on dress parade a short time afterwards.

"You need not weep for me now;
Don't wish me back to that shore;
For now all truth is before me—
I know as I ne'er knew before."

MAJ. THOMAS J. KEY.

"He who spends life to help the world alone Comes nearest following Jehovah's plan."

The character of Maj. Thomas J. Key, whose life passed out so suddenly on April 5, 1908, is most fittingly expressed in the above lines taken from a tribute to him by Will T. Hale, of Tennessee. The greater part of his life had been devoted to the betterment of agricultural conditions in the South, and as the editor of the Southern Agriculturist since its establishment, in 1869, he was able to help the farmers of the South get the best results from their work.

Thomas J. Key was born at Bolivar, Tenn., January 17, 1831. His father, Chesley Daniel Key, had come from Virginia, where he was reared on a farm adjoining that of Thomas Jefferson. Removing to Mississippi while his son was still a young boy, Mr. Key built the second house at Jacinto, then selected as the county seat of Tishomingo County, but which is now in Alcorn County. When about eleven years old Thomas Key was apprenticed to the publisher of a weekly paper at Tuscumbia, Ala. He learned the trade and bought the paper. Removing soon afterwards to Kansas City, Kans., while still in his twenties, he began the publication of a Democratic paper there, daring to edit it as he believed right in the heart of the Abolitionist territory. He braved the several attempts to do him violence until his paper proved a failure, when he removed to Helena, Ark., and edited a paper until he was sent to the Legislature, defeating a law partner of Gen. Pat Cleburne.

He was thirty years old when the war broke out, and was married; and after helping to bring the body of his cousin, Capt. Robert Lambuth, from Shiloh, he decided to enter the army and enlisted as an infantryman private, but was shortly commissioned by General Cleburne as second lieutenant of artillery. As such he was in most of the fighting in Northern Mississippi, including Corinth, and later with his command at Chattanooga. At Chickamauga he commanded the battery, and from then till the close of the war it won fame as "Key's Battery." He was in the fiercest of the battles in the "hundred days" fighting between Dalton and Atlanta, and won the rank of major. After the fall of Atlanta, Major Key came back to Tennessee with Hood and directed the guns in dislodging a negro garrison near Fort Negley in the battle of Nashville. Having been detailed to command a wagon train escort, he did not get to Franklin until a considerable part of that battle was over. He was in Johnston's army at the final surrender.

Soon after the war he began his fight for the farmers of the South through the newspapers with which he was connected. A few years after establishing the Southern Agriculturist he removed to Louisville, and during his residence in Kentucky he organized the Grangers throughout the State and was President of the State Horticultural Society. The paper was later published in Montgomery, Ala., and then in Sheffield, and during Governor Johnson's administration Major Key was Assistant Commissioner of Agriculture. He removed to Nashville, Tenn., in 1897, and under better conditions his sphere of influence broadened throughout the land. He bravely did his part to build up the South, and now rests from his labors.

CAPT. H. D. WADE.

Capt. Hamilton D. Wade joined the Montgomery or Wise Fencibles, under Captain (later Colonel) Trigg, at Christiansburg, Va., as orderly sergeant. The company was assigned to the Valley of Virginia, under Gen. T. J. Jackson, then at Harper's Ferry. It afterwards became Company G, 4th Virginia Infantry, under Col. J. F. Preston. This regiment, with the 2d, 5th, 23d, and 27th, made up the famous Stonewall Brigade. While at Harper's Ferry Company G was detailed on the skirmish line for the brigade, and was the last to leave Harper's Ferry when evacuated. This company helped to blow up and destroy the bridges over the Potomac River. While at the Ferry Mr. Wade was so severely wounded that for a while it was considered fatal. He was wounded again in the first battle of Manassas. He was the first man wounded in the company. In 1862 he was wounded in the second battle of Manassas, and in 1863 he was wounded at Mine Run.

At Cold Harbor in 1862 he was promoted to first lieutenant, and was made captain at the battle of the Wilderness.

Captain Wade was in twenty-two battles, including that great battle of Chancellorsville, which Gen. Fitzhugh Lee said "was as high a type of a defensive battle as ever adorned the pages of history," and Col. W. Taylor said: "Of all the battles fought by the Army of Northern Virginia, that of Chancellorsville stands first as illustrating the consummate skill, audacity, and military genius of the commanders and the valor and determination of the men."

The courage and determination which Captain Wade showed in being always in the thick of the fight, despite the many times he was wounded, were remarkable. The physical man, no doubt, many a time had fought hard battles with the mental; but his indomitable courage and stern sense of duty, united with an unusually strong will, prevailed. Gen. Stonewall Jackson, recognizing the courage of the man, gave him the very important and dangerous position of commander of the sharpshooters. He was the gallant and fearless commander of this brave company until the close of the war, Gen. John B. Gordon keeping him there until the surrender.

Mr. Kyle Montague, of Christiansburg, who was in Gen. Bradley T. Johnson's Brigade while Johnson was fighting Sheridan on the Occoquan, below Winchester, in August, 1864, said they had been heavily engaged from five in the morning until three in the afternoon fighting ten to one, when all had suddenly become quiet, and he asked Captain Junkin, who was in command: "What does this mean?" The Captain replied: "I don't like it. They have something up their sleeve." "There was a line of infantry as far as the eye could reach. Many of our men were wounded; we were well-nigh exhausted. Junkin said: 'Look what we have to face.' Just then we looked and saw Captain Wade coming at the head of a long line of sharpshooters on horseback. They seemed to be almost flying, so rapidly did they ride to our aid.

CAPT. H. D. WADE.

Such a Rebel yell as went up from our midst has seldom been heard! Never shall I forget the gallant appearance of Captain Wade that day as he rode in front of his men, his face aglow, and also the sound of his voice as he cheered them on. On that same spot we had a big battle sometime afterwards. Gen. Bradley Johnson's command had been sent back there, and Captain Wade with his sharpshooters in the advance had been gone about an hour when we heard a volley on the main pike. General Johnson stopped the command, listened, and waited. After another volley, we marched to see what it meant. Sheridan was charging the sharpshooters with five thousand men. Captain Wade's men were in such a position that they could only see the horses of the enemy. He commanded, 'Aim at the horses!' and as horse after horse fell, the victory was gained."

Gen. Titus Williams, commander of the consolidated Virginia regiments, said: "I saw the signature of General Lee promoting Captain Wade to colonel, but in the confusion at the close the commission was never received by him."

Captain Wade was a most modest man; no praise of himself in any position could ever be obtained from him. He never told of a duel fought face to face with one on the other side with such bravery that long after the war the family received letters asking if the brave man whose name had been in some way obtained could be Capt. H. D. Wade, of this place. Once he had a hand-to-hand fight with five United States soldiers, and killed four of them and wounded the fifth, who surrendered. The story was told by an eyewitness, and Captain Wade admitted it, explaining: "I would have run, but had on a pair of new shoes and couldn't."

Like Stonewall Jackson, Captain Wade was a man of the highest Christian character. He was as brave and true a soldier in the hard battle of life for all the South after the war as he was when facing the enemy at Chancellorsville. On Saturday at midnight, May 9, his spirit returned to God, who gave it.

The Methodist Church here loses a most valued and efficient officer, the Camp of Confederate Veterans a beloved Commander, the Hamilton Wade Chapter, U. D. C., which was named in his honor, a most efficient and kind helper and adviser. Of course these bodies and a large circle of friends and relatives can in no wise sorrow as do his bereaved widow and children; but as long as love for the South endures men like him must live in the hearts of those for whom they gave their blood and for whom they fought with such unflinching courage in the face of the greatest difficulties.

JUDGE TILLMAN SMITH.

Judge Tillman Smith, of Fort Worth, Tex., a member of the R. E. Lee Camp, U. C. V., died at his home January 30, 1908. He was born in Lilesville, Anson County, N. C., September 8, 1844. Educated at the University of North Carolina, and leaving school he enlisted July 22, 1861, at Suffolk, Va., in Company C, 14th North Carolina Infantry, Ransom's Brigade, G. H. Hill's Division, Jackson's Corps, Army of Northern Virginia.

He served in the campaign from Yorktown to Richmond, participating in the battles of Williamsburg, Seven Pines, around Richmond, and in the Maryland campaign. He was wounded September 7, 1862, at Sharpsburg and May 3, 1863, at Chancellorsville, and discharged on account of disability from wounds October 28, 1863.

Coming to Texas at the close of the war, he entered the practice of law, and was a member of the lower branch of the Texas Legislature in 1864 and 1865 and of the Senate in 1866. He was for many years a prominent member of the bar at Cleburne, Tex., and from 1891 to the date of his death stood in the front rank of his profession in Fort Worth, Tex.

His courage and loyalty to the South were proven by a lofty, soldierly bearing and the sacrifice he made on the firing line. A brilliant, unblemished, and successful career in his profession leaves irrefutable evidence of marked energy, intellectual vigor, and unquestioned integrity of character.

[From W. T. Shaw, Adjutant General Texas Division, U. C. V., Fort Worth.]

B. N. WORD.

Benjamin N. Word was born in Limestone County, Ala., September 18, 1840; and died at DeWitt, Ark., February 26, 1908. He went to Arkansas with his father, William Word, in 1852, and settled near Crockett's Bluff, on the White River. At the beginning of the war he enlisted in the Confederate army in Company 11, 1st Arkansas Regiment of Infantry, under Capt. Robert H. Crockett, and served to the end. He was in many severe battles, among them Shiloh and Franklin, Tenn., and other battles east of the Mississippi River. After the war he returned to Arkansas County, and served both as sheriff and clerk of the county. Surviving him are three sons and a daughter, and his brother, Thomas M. Word, who was also a Confederate soldier.

GETTYS.—Robert T. Gettys died near Athens, Miss., March 9, eighty-six years old. He was born in Lancaster County, S. C., and went into the war in Capt. Bob Armstrong's company, the "Red Rovers," with which he served till the evacuation of Corinth. He was discharged at Tupelo on account of bad health; but was in the cavalry afterwards, and then sent to the government shops at Selma, Ala., where he continued until the surrender.

NOLLEY.—T. S. Nolley died suddenly on May 13 at his home, near Josiah, Tenn. He was born in August, 1842, and enlisted in the Confederate army in May, 1861, at Germantown, Tenn., and took part in many battles, including Perryville, Jonesboro, Franklin, and Nashville. In the latter he was taken prisoner. He was a good soldier in every way.

SIMMONS.—John Hiram Simmons was born October 1, 1840; and died June 6, 1908. He enlisted in the Confederate army in Troy, Pike County, Ala., in 1861 as a private in Company H, 18th Alabama Regiment, and served through the war except for a short while in prison at Camp Chase. He was a good soldier during the war and made a good citizen after the war, bearing an exceptionally good name, rather to be chosen than great riches. He left a wife and two daughters.

COOPER.—Joseph Cooper died at his home, at Fairfax C. H., Va., on the 26th of February, aged seventy-four years. He was born in Alexandria, Va.; but in early life went to Fairfax, and there resided through life with the exception of his term of service in the Confederate army. He early enlisted in the 8th Virginia Infantry, serving with honor to the close of the war. He resumed business at Fairfax after the war, and was one of the most honored citizens of the community, an upright Christian gentleman. At the time of his death he was Adjutant of Marr Camp, No. 72, of Fairfax.

LOVELACE.—After a few days' illness, John Thornton Lovelace died at Como, Tenn., at the age of sixty-eight years. He served in the 14th Virginia Infantry, and was captured on the second day of the battle of Gettysburg while participating in the famous charge of Pickett's Brigade, and afterwards spent two years in Point Lookout Prison. He was the only son of his parents, he and his father joining the same army and leaving mother and seven sisters at home. He went to Como in 1868, and was there a prosperous merchant and farmer, a citizen esteemed for his past record as well as his worth to the community.

SWEARINGEN.—G. B. Swearingen died at McKenzie, Tenn., in January, 1908. He went into the Confederate service in 1862, at the age of fifteen, and served until the close of the war. He belonged to Forrest's Cavalry.

COOK.—Mr. W. E. Cook, of Young's Township, S. C., a war veteran and substantial citizen, died at his home the second week in April.

A coincidence occurred in the death of G. Howard Jordan and Montgomery Settle, two veteran comrades of Howard County, Mo., on the 10th of March. Both were veterans of Company B, 9th Missouri Volunteers, 2d Brigade. Both made excellent soldiers, Jordan serving to the end and surrendering at Shreveport, while Settle was wounded at Pleasant Hill, La., and was not able for further service, but was in the surrender at Shreveport.

HARRISON TANKERSLEY.

Harrison Tankersley, who died at his home, the Tankersley Plantation, near Sandy Point, Tex., on June 1, was of an old and prominent Alabama family. He was born at Livingston, Ala., in 1841, the youngest of thirteen children born to George

HARRISON TANKERSLEY.

G. and Sarah Tankersley. During the war of 1812 one grandfather was in command at Savannah, Ga., and another at the same time in command at Charleston, S. C. His father was one of the largest planters and slaveholders in Alabama; and finding it difficult and costly to procure enough land in Alabama for his numerous children and slaves, he purchased in Texas what is now known as the "Tankersley Prairie Plantation," to which he brought his son Harrison in 1860. When the war broke out, the latter joined Company H, 8th Texas Cavalry, Terry's Texas Rangers, and served the entire war, never having a furlough nor being absent from his command but once, and that from sickness. He was in all the battles of his regiment from Bowling Green, Ky., to Johnston's surrender in North Carolina, following the fortunes of Bragg, Hood, and Johnston in the Kentucky, Tennessee, and Georgia campaigns, participating in such battles as Shiloh, Chickamauga, around Atlanta, Franklin, Nashville, and other engagements in which his regiment took part. He had several horses killed under him, but escaped any serious wounds.

After the war Comrade Tankersley returned to his home, in Texas, and resumed the life of a planter, and for many years served as County Commissioner, one of the most responsible positions in the county and which had not been sought. This he filled with credit to himself and decided benefit to the county. He was of the old type of Southern manhood, brave and honest and true to every trust. He left no family, but a devoted niece ministered to him in his declining years. He lost two brothers during the war.

WILLIAM PUGH JOHNSON.

William Pugh Johnson was born at Selma, Ala., February 22, 1842; and died at Malvern, Ark., January 14, 1908. He was a student at Irving College, Tennessee, when he volunteered for Confederate service, at the age of eighteen. He joined a company at Portland, Ark., and was with the 3d Arkansas Regiment in all of its campaigns as it followed General Lee through Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, serving as color bearer on many noted battlefields. He was frequently commended for his bravery; was shot down four times during his service, and often expressed pride that his "wounds were all in front." After the war his vocation was teaching, and for nearly thirty-five years he filled many positions in the schools of Arkansas, from primary department to principal, being rewarded by the tenderest affection of his pupils.

Professor Johnson was happily married in 1890 to Miss Marion Glassell Thornton, of Richmond, Va., whom he had known and loved since the surrender at Appomattox, when she was three years old. She survives him with one daughter, an only son having been burned in the third destruction of his home by fire. This and other catastrophes he met as only the hero can, of whom it has been so beautifully written:

"If working on through pain and loss

His earnest soul be not cast down,

He heareth patiently his cross

While winning steadily his crown:

The man is a hero, and we give

The meed of love which is his due;

No idle praise, but while we live

The wreath of bay, the knot of blue."

COL. WILLIAM A. TEASLEY.

The long and useful life of Col. William A. Teasley, of Canton, Ga., calmly and peacefully closed on the 16th of April, 1908. Among the first to enlist in defense of his native State, after a term of service on the coast near Savannah, he enlisted in Company A, 43d Georgia Regiment, and was soon promoted to the rank of lieutenant. After the battle of Shiloh, the regiment was assigned to the Army of Tennessee, went into the Kentucky campaign, afterwards into Mississippi, and served with distinction to the surrender of Vicksburg. Lieutenant Teasley was among those surrendered, but was exchanged in time to take part in the Atlanta campaign. He was a valiant soldier, a kind and brave officer, and a faithful and well-beloved comrade. He was one of the founders of Camp Skid Harris, and always a zealous and active member, and held the office of Historian of the Camp.

D. J. HAISTEN.

D. J. Haisten died at his home, near Centerton, Ark., Saturday, May 2, 1908. If he had lived until the 3d of June, he would have been sixty-six years old. He was born in Cedar County, Mo. He was a Confederate soldier, a lieutenant in Hunter's Regiment of Shelby's Brigade, and was badly wounded at Hartsville, Mo. He suffered much for twenty-five years, but bore it as a true soldier would.

Benton County had no better citizen, no more honest man, no truer gentleman than Dave Haisten. He told the truth and wronged no man. He was always on the moral side of every public question; and while he was kind and courteous to all, he was bold, frank, and outspoken, and never hesitated to express his views. Thirteen years ago he became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and from that time until his death he was an earnest, consistent Christian, doing his duty fully; but he was free from prejudice and intolerance, and had charity, love, and kindness for all Churches and all people. He was loyal and devoted to his wife and daughter, loved the South and loved his State, and loved truth and honor and justice. No man had truer or more devoted friends, and his death is greatly regretted by all who knew him.

[By James H. Berry, Major General commanding Arkansas Division, U. C. V.]

He was commissioned first lieutenant of his company, and served in the Trans-Mississippi Department. In 1862 he enlisted in the 26th Tennessee Infantry, and in February, 1862, he was captured at Fort Donelson and sent to Camp Douglas, where he remained until September, when he was taken to Vicksburg and exchanged. He returned to Tennessee and soon rejoined his regiment at Knoxville. In its reorganization he was chosen lieutenant of his company; but he declined, preferring to remain in the ranks. Later he secured a transfer to Company F, 1st Tennessee Cavalry, and was made its orderly sergeant. Late in 1863 he was captured at Henderson's Mills, in East Tennessee, and was taken to Camp Chase and later to Rock Island. In 1865 he was taken to Richmond and there paroled. By all who knew him in service, in private life, and around the camp fires with his old comrades in these later days of peace he was beloved.

At the close of the war he returned to Tennessee and made his home at Bryant Station, where he was known and loved by a large circle of friends. He went back to Texas later with his brother's family.

DEATHS IN CAMP AT WATER VALLEY, MISS.

Davis, 31st Mississippi Infantry; H. A. Goforth, 15th Mississippi Infantry; William M. Lovejoy, Mississippi Infantry; J. N. Hudson, William Dye, Ward-Butler's Artillery. ## COL. ROBERT HOUGH.

Col. Robert Hough, who died suddenly at his home, in Baltimore, Md., in March, 1908, was a prominent and well-known resident of that city. He was born in 1841, and upon the outbreak of the Civil War associated himself with Col. Richard Lee, and served as volunteer aid in Virginia. He was later transferred to the staff of Gen. A. S. Johnston, and near the close of the war was on the staff of Gen. Kirby Smith in the valley of the Mississippi.

After the war he reentered business in Baltimore, but later began farming near Easton, Md. Returning to Baltimore in 1887, he became secretary to Ex-Governor Brown, then postmaster of the city, and two years later was associated with him in forming the Pimlico Driving Club, of which he was secretary until the end of 1895. He had always been interested in racing stock, was a charter member of the old Maryland Jockey Club in 1870, and had been prominently identified with the racing interests of the State ever since. When Governor Brown became president of the consolidated railroads, Colonel Hough went with the company as manager of suburban resorts, and under his jurisdiction several fine parks were developed.

In 1873 Colonel Hough was married to Miss Fannie Tilghman, who survives him with a son and two daughters.

YOUNGBLOOD.—G. W. Youngblood was born in Warren County, Tenn., October 11, 1843, and served four years in Company A, 11th Tennessee Cavalry, commanded by Gen. N. B. Forrest. He died at his home, in Stotts City, Mo., November 7, 1907, of cancer.

JOHN R. PHARR.

Comrade John R. Pharr, a wounded Confederate veteran, died at the home of his brother, Dr. D. C. Pharr, near Gap Mills, W. Va., on the 28th of June. He was born at Covington, Va., in 1838, a son of the late Rev. Dion C. Pharr, of the Presbyterian Church. He served bravely in the 14th Virginia Cavalry until he received an ankle wound in the battle of Moorefield, W. Va. It caused the loss of his leg. His home had always been at Covington, Va., where he was highly esteemed, and for some time he had been sheriff of Alleghany County. His health giving way, he had been brought to the home of his brother, Dr. Pharr, who tenderly ministered to him to the end.

ALLEN G. NEEL.

Another valiant comrade, Allen G. Neel, has finished the fight and passed over the river. His death occurred on June 25 at his home, near Gap Mills, W. Va., in his seventy-fifth year. He had suffered for some years with cancer of the throat. The memory of his beautiful Christian life will dwell with his family and friends as an inheritance far beyond the worth of gold. He had led an active life since the war, diligent in business and prompt in the advancement of his community for good, and as a county official he gave the best service possible. He is survived by his wife, two sons, two daughters, and three brothers.

In 1861 Comrade Neel enlisted in the Monroe Guards, which was assigned to the 27th Virginia Infantry, Stonewall Brigade, and served throughout the war with conspicuous courage and fidelity. He was in every fight of his regiment except one, when suffering with a wounded hand, and was one of that heroic few who at last laid down their arms with Lee at Appomattox.

CAPT. CININNATUS D. BELL.

The death of Capt. Cincinnatus D. Bell, of Hopkinsville, Ky., on March 6, 1908, caused genuine sorrow among hundreds of friends and acquaintances throughout the section of Kentucky in which he had long resided. He was born in 1833 in Christian County, Ky., a son of Dr. John T. Bell, a

CAPT. C. D. BELL.

Virginian by birth and of fine ancestry. Dr. Bell went to Kentucky in 1811, and became one of the foremost physicians of Western Kentucky. Cincinnatus Bell grew to manhood in the vicinity of Oak Grove, and there resided until a few years ago, when he removed to Hopkinsville. He was graduated from Georgetown College in 1854, but liked agriculture and became a successful farmer.

Captain Bell had a splendid record as a Confederate soldier, serving in Woodward's 2d Kentucky Cavalry as adjutant. His gallantry and efficiency were often commended by his superior officers.

He was married in 1857 to Miss Annie M. Peay, a daughter of Austin Peay, and of this marriage three sons survive—Drs. John and Austin Bell and Judge Douglas Bell. His second wife, who was Miss Mattie Buckner, survives him.

Captain Bell was a man of strong intellect, a positive character, and a very attractive personality. He was a devout Christian, and also deeply interested in political movements for the welfare of the South.

S. G. ELEAZER.

Stephen Gibson Eleazer at his home, in Burns, Dickson County, Tenn., on June 6, 1908, was honorably discharged from life's long warfare. In his death there passed away a good citizen, a faithful soldier, a true friend, a noble man. It was my privilege to know him intimately from the days when we were schoolboys to the day of his death. For three years we messed together during the Civil War. I saw him under all circumstances, and I never knew him to do a little or a mean act. Brave, generous, kind, full of humor, he won the warmest affection of his comrades. Sincere, plain-spoken, open in all his dealings, he was always ready to do a kindness if it involved no dishonor.

He was born September 25, 1833, and he received a good English education at Tracy Academy, in Charlotte, Tenn. In 1858 he was married to Miss Susan O. Woodward. Their union was blessed with eight children, five sons and three daughters. Three sons and two daughters survive him.

When the war came on, in 1861, he was comfortably settled on his farm, but he felt it his duty to give his service to his country. So he enlisted in Company B, 49th Tennessee Infantry. He was captured in the battle of Fort Donelson. In September, 1862, the regiment was exchanged and reorganized, and he was made commissary sergeant. He was with the regiment in all of its subsequent service until the end. In the campaign around Vicksburg in 1863, in North Georgia in 1864, in the rear guard of the army after the disaster at Nashville, and in the last campaign in North Carolina he did his duty until the final surrender.

Then he came home to retrieve his fortunes, and by his industry and thrift he achieved a comfortable competence. He was as good a citizen as he had been a soldier. He never connected himself with any Church; but in his last illness, which was protracted, I went to see him, and found that he had given the subject of religion long and serious thought, and he expressed to me his confident hope of eternal life through the merits of Jesus Christ.

His funeral was held at his old home, near Burns, and he was buried beside his wife in the family graveyard.

W. F. BRITTINGHAM.

William Franklin Brittingham died early in July at the residence of Dr. C. M. Bradbury, Richmond, Va. He had an eventful and distinguished career. He was born near Hampton, Va., September 26, 1841, and was educated in the Hampton Military Academy. After spending one term at Madison College, Pennsylvania, he entered the United States navy in the summer of 1850. When the Civil War began, he was attached to the United States frigate Congress, subsequently destroyed by the Confederate ram Merrimac.

The Congress returned from a South American station late in the fall of 1861, when Mr. Brittingham made his way South to fight for his native land. He was commissioned in the Confederate navy and ordered to Fredericksburg.

On the evacuation of Fredericksburg, in the spring of 1862, he was ordered with his command to the Norfolk Navy Yard, being later assigned to the gunboat Hampton. With this ship he joined the James River squadron when Norfolk was evacuated. On the establishment of the Confederate Naval School he was ordered to the school ship Patrick Henry as gunner and instructor in gunnery. In January, 1864, he was assigned to the Confederate ship Chicora at Charleston, where he experienced hard service until the evacuation of that city, in March, 1865.

He then returned to Richmond, where he was appointed ordnance officer to Battery Cook, under the command of Commodore John R. Tucker, being stationed on James River below Drury's Bluff. On the retreat from Richmond he was ordnance officer of Tucker's Naval Brigade on the extreme left of General Lee's army, which, after several days of severe fighting, was captured with Ewell's Corps at Sailor's Creek April 6, 1865.

The officers captured were sent to the Old Capitol Prison, Washington, D. C., arriving there late in the afternoon of April 14, a few hours before the assassination of President Lincoln. Mr. Brittingham was paroled on the last of the following June and returned to his old home, at Hampton.

After the war Comrade Brittingham went to Galveston, Tex. In 1872 he took charge of the business department of the Galveston Daily News, beginning a career in the newspaper business which lasted more than thirty years—as business manager, advertising manager, and special agent of some of the leading papers of the South, among them the Galveston News, the Houston Post, the Fort Worth Gazette, and the Louisville Courier-Journal. His duties with these newspapers took him to the leading cities of the country for years. For some time he made his home in New York City. He sought connection with the VETERAN, and it was regretted that the arrangement was not perfected.

He was married on September 10, 1868, to Miss Annie M. Hopkins in Richmond. Two sons of this union are dead. Mr. Brittingham was a member of the New York Camp of Confederate Veterans and of Lee Camp at Hampton.

The funeral services were conducted by the Rev. Gerald Culberson, of the Third Christian Church, assisted by the Rev. H. D. C. MacLachlan, of the Seventh Street Church. Captain Frank Cunningham sang at the house and at the grave. The interment was at Hollywood, the services at the grave being conducted by Meridian Lodge, No. 284, A. F. and A. M.

CAPT. JOHN COLEMAN ROBERTS.

Capt. John C. Roberts died at Bremond, Tex., on February 17, 1908. He was born in Halifax County, Va., in October, 1831, and in 1852 went to Texas, where he resided for fifty-six years. He gave up his business at the commencement of the war and enlisted in Company C, 4th Texas, Hood's Brigade, making a brave and gallant soldier until deprived of his right arm during a charge at Gaines's Mill, June 27, 1862.

Comrade Roberts was married in 1860 to Miss Mary Louise Walker, of Lancaster County, Pa., who survives him with one son. His life was marked by stern integrity, and by wisdom and foresight he succeeded in amassing a large estate; yet in his prosperity he did not forget those who had not been so fortunate.

A. C. WHITE.

A. C. White was born June 5, 1838; and died at his home, near Patroon, Tex., October 18, 1906. He was a Confederate soldier, enlisting at his Mississippi home in Company C, — Mississippi Infantry, Barksdale's Brigade. After the war he went to Texas. He joined the M. E. Church, South, about twenty-five years ago. He was not demonstrative, said but little; but such was his life that he won the confidence of those who knew him; and when he saw that the end had come, he told his faithful wife that his way was clear.

The great crowd of people that assembled at the cemetery to witness the last honors to his memory showed in what esteem he was held by his countrymen.

MRS. EUGENIA ANDERSON HICKMAN.

In the latter part of June, 1908, Mrs. Eugenia Anderson Hickman passed peacefully away at the family home, Vandalia, Ill. She had been an invalid for two years. The illness which resulted in her death was of only four days' duration. Although of a quiet, retiring disposition, she had many friends whom she loved dearly. She was ever devoted to her native place.

Mrs. Hickman was born in Nashville, Tenn. In 1872 she was united in marriage to Dr. T. G. Hickman. After their marriage, they resided for a year and a half in Vandalia; then, after six months' residence in St. Louis, returned to Vandalia, where they made their home until death. Dr. Hickman died September 21, 1899. In Tennessee Mrs. Hickman was a member of the Baptist Church; but as there was no Church of that denomination in Vandalia, she identified herself with the Methodists.

MRS. T. G. HICKMAN.

She was the last of her immediate family. The funeral was held at the Methodist Episcopal church, Vandalia. She was buried by the side of her father, mother, husband, brother, and sister in the family lot in Mount Olivet Cemetery, Nashville. The remains were accompanied by her two sons, Harry and Paschal. These fine young men have the sympathy of the friends of their parents in the break-up of the old home.

Dr. Hickman was a surgeon in the Federal army, located in hospital service at Nashville during much of the war, and he endeared himself to many Southern people by his unstinted efforts to relieve the prisoners under his charge who were sick or wounded. Mrs. Hickman was a sister of the late Maj. Charles W. Anderson, who was a staff officer and intimate friend of Gen. N. B. Forrest.

McDONALD.—Meredith Helm McDonald died on the 26th of January, aged sixty-four years. He enlisted in April, 1861, in Company B, 2d Tennessee Infantry, serving until the battle of Missionary Ridge, where he was captured and never exchanged.

WILLIAM PENN COMPTON.

Sergeant William Penn Compton, one of Maryland's most gallant soldiers of the C. S. A., died at Pikesville, Md., July 14, 1908. He was a native of Charles County, Md., and at the commencement of hostilities between the States left his home and went to Richmond, Va., enlisting in the 1st Maryland Artillery in May, 1861, commanded by the late Lieut. Col. Snowden Andrews, of Baltimore. He was in the battery but a short while when he was promoted to corporal and then to sergeant. He was recognized by the members of the battery as a peerless, dashing soldier, fearless and devoted to the cause he had espoused, and made an enviable record for himself and his command. On five different occasions he was mentioned in the reports of officers high in rank. He was particularly active during the Valley of Virginia and Gettysburg campaigns, displaying conspicuous gallantry that called forth special plaudits from all who witnessed his cool, intrepid conduct. He was a cousin of the late Hon. Barnes Compton, of Charles County, one of Maryland's most gifted sons.

BUTTES.—P. A. Buttes, Quartermaster of Camp Gray, Timothy, La., died November 14, 1907. He served in Company C, 62d Alabama Regiment, and was honorably discharged at Meridian, Miss.

GOD'S ACRE.

I like that ancient Saxon phrase which calls
The burial ground "God's Acre." It is just;
It consecrates each grave within its walls
And breathes a benison o'er the sleeping dust.

God's Acre! Yes, that blessed name imparts
Comfort to those who in the grave have sown
The seed that they had garnered in their hearts,
Their bread of life, alas! no more their own.

Into its furrows shall we all be cast
In the sure faith that we shall rise again
At the great harvest, when the archangel's blast
Shall winnow, like a fan, the chaff and grain.

Then shall the good stand in immortal bloom
In the fair gardens of that second birth,
And each bright blossom mingle its perfume
With that of flowers which never bloomed on earth.

With thy rude plowshare, Death, then turn up the sod
And spread the furrow for the seed we sow.
This is the field and acre of our God;
This is the place where human harvests grow.

SABIN ROBBINS, SR.

The VETERAN joins his family in sorrow for the death of Mr. Sabin Robbins, who founded the Sabin Robbins Paper Company at Middletown, Ohio, seventeen years ago. The business grew under his able management and direction to be one of the largest paper jobbing houses in the West.

Mr. Robbins was a man of the strongest convictions, and always stood for what he believed to be right and for the best interests of the community.

A local paper states: "He will be missed in Middletown not only in business circles, but in other places where he took an active part in the moral uplifting of the community."

THE ELEVENTH TENNESSEE INFANTRY.

BY JOHN H. WARD, NASHVILLE, TENN.

[The late John H. Ward was zealous for due merit in his regiment, the 11th Tennessee, which was organized in Nashville about May 10, 1861. Three companies were of Nashville, and the others were made up in Dickson, Humphreys, and adjacent counties. Mr. Ward's narrative states that they were sent to Camp Cheatham to drill and "get ready for soldier life." Mr. Ward was born in New York in 1839. He came with his father and family to Tennessee in 1850. He enlisted on May 10, 1861, in Company B, 11th Tennessee Regiment. He was married to Tabitha Webb in December, 1866, and to this union there were ten children—eight daughters and two sons. After a prolonged illness, Comrade Ward gave up the battles of life early in 1908. This partial sketch of his regiment was written several years ago.]

We were soon ordered to Cumberland Gap, and en route, while in Nashville, we were drawn up in line in front of the old Nashville Academy, on Church Street, and there presented with our regimental colors, which I understand are still in the possession of General Gordon. We arrived at Cumberland Gap after a march from Knoxville and built our quarters, guarding the Gap. That was quite a trial for soldiers who had no experience in warfare, surrounded by the worst of enemies, the bushwhackers of Tennessee and Kentucky, and many a one of our boys was picked off without warning. We had been there but a short time before we were relieved of outside picket duty for a while by several companies of Indians, who brought in many scalps.

We had several skirmishes with the Federals from Cumberland Gap to Barboursville, Ky. On one occasion we were marching before day from the Gap toward the enemy, when an officer (I think it was General Zollicoffer) halted at a house and asked for a cup of coffee. The woman told him to go on up the road and he would get coffee "as hot as h—."

After leaving the Gap, we were stationed in front of it on the hills. I was temporarily Colonel Rains's orderly. He had been off somewhere, and on return to his headquarters the enemy was shelling us severely, his officers and men hiding behind trees to protect ourselves; but as he rode up his servant took his horse and he pulled a chair to a tree and seated himself there, and was soon as coolly reading as if at home in time of peace. He never dodged a bullet. The Federals soon retreated, and we marched to Richmond, Ky., where we were in that terrific charge through the graveyard.

Passing other engagements in Kentucky, I recall how we suffered from dust and heat and bad water, filling our canteens from ponds at night after raking off the green scum and drinking that the next day; also how we suffered for something to eat until we reached Camp Dick Robinson, where we destroyed great quantities of Federal rations.

Our next engagement was in the battle of Murfreesboro, where we were put in line on our extreme left; and the following morning just before day we charged the Federals, routing them several times with their artillery, and we drove them into the railroad cut and back on their center. There we lost our gallant Rains, who the day before had received his commission as brigadier. The fighting was very severe, and the Federals had received support and made a stand. General Rains rushed forward and commanded the boys to follow him, when he fell mortally wounded. I think it was Saturday afternoon. I was ordered with a squad to load commissaries. We worked faithfully until dark, when I slipped off to call on one of my lady friends. I returned about one o'clock at night, and found all the boys asleep except the commanding officer. I went to an old house to take a nap; and when I awoke, the sun was up and no one to be seen. I went to the depot, and everything was gone. I was master of the situation. Our troops were retiring to Shelbyville and the Federals toward Nashville. I made a bee line for Shelbyville, my home. I caught up with our rear guard of cavalry about six miles out; but I was bound for home, which was not far away. After meeting my good old mother and father and friends, I went to see my sweetheart, who became my wife. While conversing pleasantly with her I felt something crawling on my neck. Boys, you know what it was. I slyly put my fingers on it and held it till I got an opportunity to go outdoors and make away with it. My captain (Clark) had been wounded, and I took him to my home in Shelbyville, his care giving me the liberty of being at home and spending the happiest part of my life; but the day came at last for a retreat. The Federals had outflanked us, and we made no stand of importance until we reached Chattanooga, our command bringing up the rear.

The next battle I can remember was Chattanooga, where we were on the extreme left on the first day's fight, which was severe. I will here write of my messmate and bosom friend, Will Miller. We were both taking shelter behind a tree, and would step out one at a time and fire, when he received a shot between the eyes. Peace to his ashes! He was as noble as he was brave. As the day's battle was drawing to a close and dark was hanging over us, two regiments of Federal soldiers, it seems, were lost as they marched right up to us. They were ordered to surrender, and in doing so our gallant commander, Gen. Preston Smith, was shot dead from his horse. We were moved to the right wing on the afternoon of the next day, and engaged in the hottest of the fight there. About dark our command, Polk's Corps, was ordered to follow the enemy to Mission Ridge; but, I understood from the darkness of the night, our guides could not find the way; so we started again the next morning, and that afternoon charged them on Mission Ridge, the Federals going pell-mell into Chattanooga with Forrest's Cavalry following them. What a mistake was made in not ordering us to continue our charge and capturing them or routing them into the Tennessee River! After the rest of the army came up, we took our position at the foot of the Ridge, and there remained until the end of the battle, which proved so disastrous. We had orders, I think, not to shoot until we could see the whites of their eyes, and then retreat up the ridge. After we reached the top, we fought a hand-to-hand conflict, lasting till night, when we fell back to Dalton. I went through the fight barefooted.

It is useless for me to attempt to give you a description of the battles under Joseph E. Johnston from Dalton to Atlanta. Those who were there will remember Resaca and (Cheatham's) Dead Angle, and then the battles around Atlanta and Lovejoy, where we suffered severely.

Then came the long march under Hood back into Tennessee, and at Franklin we suffered greater loss, having hardly a commissioned officer left. Charging on the left of the pike, our gallant Gordon dismounted and took his position in front of our regiment, saying: "Boys, come on!" We kept in line the best we could; but about a hundred kept up with Gordon, charging over the second line of works and were captured, the regiment following and falling into the ditch of the second line of works, where we remained, fighting over the works the best we could, until about midnight.

IN CAMP DOUGLAS PRISON IN 1865.

BY J. S. ROSAMOND, DURANT, MISS., CO. G, 4TH MISS. REGT.

I was captured in December, 1864, at the last battle of Nashville, Tenn., and was sent with other prisoners to Camp Douglas Prison, the coldest place I was ever at. We arrived in Chicago about two o'clock in the morning, and were hustled out of cold box cars into snow about a foot deep. Being already almost frozen, that nearly finished us. I had on a coat, but no vest, a thin cotton shirt without undershirt, and a thin blanket. Well, it was four miles out to prison along the banks of Lake Michigan, and we got the full benefit of that lake wind. We got to the prison about daybreak, and some of us had to stand out in the snow all that day. We were passed into the prison as our names were called by two men. Every prisoner was searched to see if he had anything on him that he could do any harm with. My name beginning with R, I got into prison about sundown.

I saw old men cry that day like children, they were so cold. I was very small, only twenty years old, yet full of life; so I ran and jumped up and down in the space allowed us (about fifty yards), and in that way I kept up circulation, but my feet were frozen. When they turned me into prison, a guard took me to my barrack, which was about one hundred feet long. There was a red-hot stove in each end, and men were so thick around them that I couldn't get near; so I gave it up and climbed to a top bunk, pulled off my shoes, and wrapped my feet in my blanket. I did very well, it being warm up there; but every man that got to the red-hot stoves had to have his big toes cut off. They thawed too quick; so I saved my toes by wrapping them up in the blanket.

In March it began to moderate, so we could get out of doors a little. To every barrack was a cookroom, and no one but the cook was allowed in there. At the back door of each cookroom an empty barrel was kept for the bones and slops, which would be carried out of prison by scavenger wagons. Our daily ration for breakfast, which was about nine o'clock, was a third of a loaf of baker's bread and a piece of fat pickled pork just one inch square. Dinner, at three o'clock, was the same, only it was cooked and stirred up together. Each man drew a gill of the "soup," and that was all we got each day for seven months.

They would punish men in different ways, one of which was, if they caught a man getting any bones out of those barrels, to make him put the bone down on the ground and then get down on his all fours and walk around the bone and growl like a dog, making him stop occasionally and bark, and so on for a half hour or more, and then make him get down in the dirt and gnaw at the bone and growl like a dog when another dog is near. Another form of punishment was to make the prisoner sit astride a wooden "horse" for an hour or so. These carpenter's horses were made sharp on top purposely; so it didn't take long for a fellow to get tired and to hurt. One day they had two men on the horse, and just for mischief one of them began kicking and asked the guard to give him a pair of spurs. There happened to be an old stove lying near by, the top and bottom of which were tied to his feet, and he was told: "Now, d—n you, kick and spur." It was not long till he was begging for those weights to be taken off. He finally began to cry like a child, and begged most piteously for them to be taken off before they would do so. That Rebel couldn't walk for about ten days afterwards. If he is still alive, I would like for him to write about Camp Douglas for the VETERAN.

I was hungry from the time I entered that prison until turned out, on the 8th of May, 1865, by taking the oath of allegiance to the United States. I have that oath yet, and will keep it as long as I live. The guards of that prison were as mean to us prisoners as the devil could make them. They had never been to the front, else we might have been treated as human beings. A soldier who had seen service at the front would treat a prisoner as he would a brother, his sympathy going out to a man captured in battle. I have guarded prisoners captured in battle, and treated them with as much respect and kindness as I did my own men.

I was at Camp Douglas when that Rebel climbed the flag pole, one hundred and eighty feet high, and put the rope in the pulley. The pole was so small toward the top that he would vibrate two or three feet. I looked at him all the time.

My bunk mate at Camp Douglas was a man from Florida by the name of Pine. If he is still alive, I would like to hear from him. It was the rule at Camp Douglas for every light to be put out when the cannon was fired at nine o'clock. One night the men above my bunk commenced talking, and would not stop when requested to by Comrade Pine. The first thing we knew two Yankees were pounding on the bunk above us with their billets, and they made the four men come down, then made Mr. Pine come out, and reached back for me; but I was very small and crouched back as far as I could get, so they missed finding me. They took the five men out and made them stand perfectly stiff at the knee and bend over and put the tip end of their four fingers to the ground, and kept them in that position for a half hour, which is hard to do and is a very severe punishment, more especially for an innocent man who was doing all he could to stop the talking. I know Pine was the maddest man I ever saw when he came back to bed, and he told those fellows that if they ever talked any more after the cannon fired he would get up and bring the guard and point them out to him. They didn't talk any more while I was there. I left in about two weeks after that.

One good thing the Yankees did for us was to give us plenty of coal to burn; but the grub was very scant, and some days they would cut off the water and make us go for a whole day without any to drink, which was very cruel, for we had to keep tanked up on water to keep alive.

There was a dead line about ten feet from the wall, and it was a death penalty to step over that line. One day a prisoner's hat blew over the dead line, and to get it he had to put one foot over, and the guard shot him, from which he died afterwards. If there are any of those Yankees alive who guarded Camp Douglas in 1865, if I were in their shoes, I would not tell that I was one of them.

Comrade Rosamond was addressed in regard to the severe statements above mentioned, and he declares them to be literally true and that the half is not told. He states that he doesn't think the officers knew of the inhuman acts of the guards. This comrade had another prison experience in Camp Morton, being captured in the surrender of Fort Donelson.

Any reader of the VETERAN who knows aught of Joe Winters, of Maryland, color bearer of 62d Virginia Volunteers, whether living, and if so where, will confer a favor by writing to Thomas H. Neilson, 302 Broadway, New York City.

THE BIRMINGHAM CONFEDERATE MONUMENT.

The rallying point for the Confederate veterans during the Reunion at Birmingham, June 9-11, was around the Confederate monument in Capitol Park. This monument stands like a sentinel at the head of Twentieth Street and entrance to the park. An interesting history attaches to the erection of this monument, which covers a period of eleven years. Two elements entered into its building—Camp Clayton, Sons of Veterans, and Pelham Chapter, U. D. C. The former had charge of the work of building the base, and so well was it done that it proved the incentive for the beautiful shaft later.

CONFEDERATE MONUMENT, BIRMINGHAM.

The corner stone of the base was laid on the afternoon of Thursday, April 26, 1894, and was the crowning event of a former Reunion held in Birmingham. Some months before the Reunion Mr. William Bemey, of Camp Hardee, said to Mr. Rufus N. Rhodes, editor of the Birmingham News and Commander in Chief of the Sons of Confederate Veterans: "Why did you not undertake the laying of the corner stone of a Confederate monument during the Reunion?"

The suggestion was favorably received, and Mr. Rhodes at once opened a subscription in the columns of the News and named Capitol Park as the most desirable location. Instant and spontaneous was the response of the people of Birmingham, and the cost of the base ($1,020) was raised in four days.

On March 16 Camp Hardee heartily indorsed the project, and appointed a committee to act with a similar one from Camp Clayton. The contract was awarded to Joseph M. Meigham, of Birmingham, and on the same day Mayor David J. Fox's recommendation to the City Council caused the granting of permission to place the base in Capitol Park, and appointed a committee to confer with the joint committee from the two Camps.

On March 22 the site was chosen. Mayor Fox made a short talk, dedicating the ground for the sacred uses of a Confederate monument, and baptized the spot with a bottle of wine. The first stroke of the pick was made by Commander Rhodes, of Camp Clayton, the second by Gen. Fred S. Ferguson, of the U. C. V., and the third by Mayor Fox. The foundation was gotten ready on time, and on Memorial Day on the reviewing stand stood Gen. John B. Gordon, Commander in Chief of the U. C. V., with the ranking officers of that organization, the Governors of several Southern States, and about one hundred distinguished personages.

Mr. Rufus N. Rhodes was master of ceremonies and called the vast assemblage together, making a short address outlining the purpose of the occasion and introducing the speaker of the day, Gen. Stephen D. Lee, of Mississippi. Commander Jones, of Camp Hardee, deposited the articles in the box of the corner stone, consisting of a Bible, Confederate flag, a bronze medal struck in honor of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence May 27, 1775, copies of numerous newspapers, and various lists of Confederate organizations.

The corner stone was then laid by the Hon. Francis L. Pettus, Grand Master of the Masons of Alabama. The corn, wine, and oil were poured by three dainty little misses costumed for the occasion: one red, another white, and the third blue. General Gordon declared it set amid great enthusiasm. The benediction was pronounced by Rev. Dr. J. E. Martin, of Tennessee, and the band played "Dixie."

The base stood several years unadorned, then the city of Birmingham mounted on it an old Spanish gun captured in the Spanish-American War and donated to the city. Then it seemed that all interest in the monument was over. Such was not the case. The subject was so near the heart of one Daughter of the U. D. C., Mrs. James U. Hardman, that she felt impelled to make an attempt to arouse the interest of her Chapter to especial effort for the noble cause. The idea met with opposition, as some thought it too large an undertaking. But her faith being like the eagles that soar to meet the sun, coupled with the slogan, "Right, and not might, must prevail," she felt that no righteous cause baptized in blood is ever lost; for as in the throbs of winter's surly blast we hope and dream of spring, so principles of truth for a time suppressed would surely rise again. And that monuments were needed, like milestones, to tell a future generation the story of the past it was a noble ambition.

Noticing at the State Fair in November, 1899, a handsome piece of marble taken out of the Talladega mines, and having been honored at said State Fair by the gift of a handsome victoria and pair of Kentucky horses, she was emboldened to ask the management for the piece of marble. Mr. Falkner, President, referred her to the Alabama Marble Company, and encouraged her to believe she might receive it, donating to her all rights of the State Fair.

Not willing to act further without the consent of her Chapter, Mrs. Hardman waited several months before acting further. Then a meeting was called at the Florence Hotel. Mrs. A. A. Clisby, the President, stated that the object of the meeting was to pass resolutions making a formal request upon the Alabama Marble and Stone Company and the Alabama Fair Association for the shaft. A committee, consisting of Mrs. James U. Hardman (Chairman), Mrs. Herman Saks, and Mrs. Virginia Ruffner, was appointed to make the request.

The letter addressed to Mr. Frank V. Evans, representing the Alabama Marble and Stone Company, dated May 30, 1901, was published the following morning in the Age Herald and Mr. Evans's reply, donating the marble and stating that it was the largest shaft ever quarried south of the Ohio and Potomac and valuing it at $2,000.

At the next meeting of Pelham Chapter Mrs. Hardman's committee was asked to ascertain the cost to dress and set the stone, and Mr. L. N. Archer estimated that it would be about $550. Mrs. J. U. Hardman conferred with Confederate veterans and procured a donation of a reserve left in their treasury given by the public to defray expenses at the Reunion. Mr. Rhodes was called upon, and he opened a subscription list in the columns of the Birmingham News and raised $540. In the meantime Mrs. Hardman received the promise of Camp Hardee, U. C. V., for $500. Then Mr. Archer notified the Chapter that the expense of handling the stone would be greater than to use sandstone like the base, and that in squaring up the marble it would not be in the proper proportion to mount on the base. The added cost of marble caps would make the use of the sandstone very much cheaper.

The Chapter accepted Mr. Archer's recommendation, the committee was enlarged, and with $1,040 for a start Pelham Chapter went enthusiastically to work to raise the money, and by bazaars and various methods in five years had raised the desired amount. Eleven years from the time the corner stone was laid, again on Memorial Day a large concourse of people assembled to unveil the handsome shaft, standing fifty-two feet high and whose estimated value is about $4,000.

On the east of the corner stone facing the rising sun are the words: "In Honor of the Confederate Soldiers and Sailors." On the north side are the words: "Corner Stone Laid April 26, A. D. 1864." The monument stands as a straight shaft on a die and cap. On the die are the inscriptions and the designs: the crossed sabers for the cavalry, the muskets for the infantry, and the anchor for the navy. On the four corners of the base are balls representing the artillery. The inscription on one side reads (quoted from Jefferson Davis): "The manner of their death was the crowning glory of their lives." The other inscription is on the front and reads: "To the memory of the Confederate soldiers and sailors. Erected by Pelham Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, Birmingham, Ala., April 26, 1905."

PROSPERITY IN TEXAS.—A glowing account of the prosperity of Fisher County, Tex., comes from R. M. McMullin, of Rotan, who says: "This is a new county and has the finest crop that ever grew out of the ground. Rotan is the terminus of the Texas Central Railroad, two hundred and sixty miles west of Waco, and has two thousand inhabitants. The town is a year old, has an $18,000 hotel, two brick banks, two churches, two depots, passenger and freight, and an $18,000 brick school building under construction. A reunion picnic was held on the 9th, 10th, and 11th of July, with a barbecue of twenty beeves, shows, automobile and horse races."

MORTON AT HIS GUNS UNDER FORREST.

BY WILLIAM H. PASCOE, PRIVATE 4TH MISSISSIPPI CAVALRY, MABRY'S BRIGADE, FORREST'S CAVALRY.

"Unlimber your guns," brave Morton said
As the shells from the enemy screamed o'erhead.
"Load your guns, fire at will;
The enemy's in view on that distant hill."

Then we rained on our foe both shot and shell
Until 'twas earth no more, but a seething hell.
"Train your guns low," the captain said,
And the ground around was strewn with dead.

"Double shot your guns and fire at will."
Their infantry now advances up the hill;
The earth's all a-tremble as our cannon roar,
While grape and canister in their blue ranks we pour.

"Stand by your guns," the captain said
While the sun was sinking in a cloud of red,
Their columns re-form, their bayonets flash
As they charge the battery with cheers and a dash.

"Stand by your guns," the captain said
And the carpet of earth was a crimson red.
We stood by our guns, the sun sunk in the west,
The stars shone down on those folk forever "at rest."

THE "IMMORTAL SIX HUNDRED" MAY HAVE A MONUMENT.—The Society of the Immortal Six Hundred held their annual meeting on June 11 during the U. C. V. Reunion at Birmingham, at which a resolution was offered looking to the building of a monument to the dead and living members who were true throughout the tortures inflicted upon them. The Secretary was directed to obtain all the data possible of the six hundred, make collections, accept contributions, and report at the next meeting. The old officers of the Society were reelected as follows: President, J. L. Hempstead, Louisiana; Vice Presidents, J. W. Matthews, West Virginia, and F. C. Chandler, Virginia; Secretary, J. Ogden Murray, Charleston, W. Va.; Color Bearer, W. W. George, Virginia; Chaplain, Rev. T. A. Armistead.

The total labor force actually at work on the Isthmian Canal operations on the last day of May was 21,036. With this large number at work under proper discipline the prospect is encouraging for the completion of the great waterway during the days yet remaining to seniors who have yearned to realize its blessings to the South.

Dr. R. L. McClung, Atlanta, Tex., writes: "Dear old VETERAN, I cannot do without you, for you speak with wisdom of the past and sing like a prophet for the future. You are preparing a scroll from which young hearts may learn lessons of history as the years go by."

AN INTERESTING BOOK AND A GOOD CAUSE.

As chairman of the committee of the United Confederate Veterans, as special representative of the Sons of Confederate Veterans, and with the kindly assistance of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, C. Irvine Walker has issued in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Arkansas supplements to various leading newspapers. These supplements contain almost exclusively incidents of the devotion and heroism of the women of the Confederacy. The articles containing such are historic.

The object of these publications was to assist a movement to erect memorials to the women of the Confederacy. These supplements and this movement have the earnest indorsement and deepest interest of those three great Confederate organizations, the U. C. V., U. S. C. V., and U. D. C., which means directly and through their widespread influence the entire South.

In response to a general demand and to further benefit said movement it is now proposed to select the best of these incidents and publish the same in book form, and for this a publisher is wanted.

To the publisher C. Irvine Walker believes he can secure the coöperation of these three powerful Confederate organizations, and he will arrange so that each selling agent can secure the local assistance and influence of these influential Confederate bodies to aid in the work.

It is thought that the best manner to secure the best results will be through a subscription book publishing house, and preferably situated in the South.

The profits going to the grand object—i. e., erecting memorials to the women of the Confederacy—will largely popularize the book. A little later the artist will have completed the model for the woman's monuments, and then the committees will actively agitate the movement to create a sentiment which will largely help the sales.

"LIFE OF WILLIAM B. BATE."

The successful writer of a public man's biography must be a historian of the period in which such a man lived, a philosopher as to the events relating to the period, a judge in his estimates and a friend in the sense that he is fair-minded to the subject with which he is dealing, while he betrays none of the flagrant weaknesses of the mediocre partisan.

In his recently published "Life of William B. Bate, Citizen, Soldier, Statesman," Mr. Park Marshall, of Tennessee, proves himself a man of unusual vistas by furnishing to the annals of his native State a faithful record of one of her worthiest sons and an intensely interesting background of the circumstances and events that surrounded his life.

Mr. Marshall shows that the life of William B. Bate covered a period of over seventy-eight years, in which were embraced "the political activity of Webster, Clay, Calhoun, and Benton; important questions relating to the tariff, State rights, public lands, and banking systems of the country; the rise and decline of the Whig party; the period of invention and construction of the great railway and steamship transportation systems; the telegraph and telephone; the time of the war with Mexico, the great Civil War, and the war with Spain."

By dividing his work into the early life of William Bate, his service in the Confederate war, his sustained courage in meeting the exigencies of the period that followed and his later career of Governor and Senator, Mr. Marshall proves himself a liberal historian—withal a loyal Southerner—a careful, though never tedious, chronicler of events, and a thorough master of lucid English and its power to lift obscure incidents to their proper setting in the multiform mosaic of a worthy man's career.

The reader who values the fair name of the Volunteer State will feel that Mr. Marshall has emphasized her importance as an individual commonwealth in her relation to a common country, and those who hold dear the name of William Brimage Bate will be grateful to the writer that he has placed the name of this citizen, soldier, statesman in his well-earned niche in the State's historical library of valued sons.

"Life of William B. Bate." By Park Marshall. For sale by Hunter & Co., Nashville, Tenn., or furnished by the VETERAN for $1.25. The book and a new subscription for $2.

GILBERT GAUL'S WAR PAINTINGS.

Gen. S. D. Lee wrote the Southern Art Publishing Co.:

"Gentlemen: I congratulate you on publishing the 'Portfolio of Pictures' with 'Confederate colors' by the most distinguished painter of military subjects in this country. As an artist he is indorsed by the National Academy of Design and others of highest repute. It seems most timely that the South is at last to have pictures which are really historic documents and which must appeal to her people, because Mr. Gaul's pictures are really a sympathetic translation of the war period. The 'Portfolio' should be not only in every Southern but in every American family. These paintings, with their pathos, their tragedy, and the great sorrow of the great war period, will perform a duty in directing the younger generation to avoid getting into channels which might provoke a like repetition to that of our great Civil War."

These war paintings are supplied by the VETERAN.

THE PASSING OF JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS.

BY MRS. L. H. HARRIS.

The death of Joel Chandler Harris, better known as Uncle Remus, marks the passing not only of the most learned man among us in the knowledge and interpretation of primitive folklore, but of a curious phenomenon from the literary world. He was born sixty years ago in a Georgia village under circumstances utterly lacking in distinction. There was in the homely, red-headed, barefooted boy who lounged about the village post office in Eatonton no prescience of his great future. At the age of twelve he learned the trade of a printer in the office of the Countryman, the only plantation newspaper ever published in the South. It was owned by Mr. Joseph Addison Turner, who, taking a fancy to young Harris, allowed him the run of his library, a library composed, as libraries in the South were in those days, exclusively of literary classics. And Mr. Harris undoubtedly acquired a taste from this reading which enabled him to speak with distinction and a certain whimsical authority upon matters of literary style whenever he chose to abandon the rôle of briar-patch philosopher long enough to express his views in conventional form. After leaving the Countryman, he engaged in newspaper work in Savannah, Macon, New Orleans, and in Forsyth, Ga. In 1876 he became an editorial writer on the Atlanta Constitution, a position he held for twenty-five years without more distinction than comes to the average newspaper editor. The reputation he had made in an "aside," so to speak, with a series of folklore tales, beginning with the famous Tar Baby, that Mr. Harris had heard from the negroes on the Turner plantation when he was a boy. It was not until he had chronicled many of these legends in his inimitable manner that ethnologists like J. W. Powell, of Smithsonian Institute, and others interested in negro and Indian mythology discovered that Mr. Harris's stories all had their equivalents among the South and North American Indians, as well as among the peoples of Upper Egypt and throughout the African tribes. Thus aside from its peculiar charm, half humorous, half mystical, his work became an invaluable contribution to the world's literature and thickened the mystery while it confirmed the remote kinship of the primitive races.

Now comes the most remarkable fact of Mr. Harris's life, not his fame as an author, not even the peculiar devotion he enjoyed from children and from men and women who could slip back into childhood through some incantation with which his tales seem charged, but it was the effect of his work upon the writer himself. As a young newspaper man we hear nothing of his being "timid or shy or bashful," adjectives that were afterwards fitted to his personality like a hat with the brim turned low over wonderfully quizzical blue eyes. It was not till Mr. Harris became the briar-patch companion of Bre'r Rabbit, the knight-errant with Bre'r Fox to "Mis' Meadows and the gals," that he became famous as the most "bashful man in America," as the hermit who lived at "The Sign of the Wren's Nest." And it is to the possible explanation of this psychic change in him that the writer ventures to call attention. Some men experience conversion, a sort of personal polygenesis upon the birth or realization of their genius. It is the instinct of one to wear his gift like a cockade, of another to dramatize his temperament accordingly, to let go, or to tighten up and add a cubit to his star stature. This explains the frequent departures from the normal in the lives of gifted and even pseudo gifted people. It is the reason why a man who once made an eloquent speech, excited by some outside inspiration, will adopt a bellows-breasted stage pose for the rest of his days. One borrowed flash of the divine fire in his brain has forged him into a kind of phonetic record of one event in his life. It is the explanation of why a one-poem poet will tune up and take himself seriously longer than any one else does. Nothing is more common among artists of every degree and kind than this pathetic effort at premature immortality, or stranger when the effort goes deeper, as in the case of Mr. Harris in an instinctive attempt to realize in the quality of his own spirit some of the mystical elements which belong to his folklore tales. He was nearly or quite thirty years of age before he began to write the Uncle Remus stories. His trained mind made him merely an average editorial writer; but suddenly, almost by accident, he came into possession of an original faculty. It was a sort of psychic miner's gift for discovering and lifting into the most illuminating of primitive phraseology certain early philosophical conclusions of primitive folk that still lay half obliterated in their recollections in the form of myths, just as the very early records of the ancients are written in the pictures of men and birds and beasts.

From that time Mr. Harris's own character changed. He developed that reserve as a man which is known in creatures as a wildness. The same instinct that kept Bre'r Rabbit in the briar patch kept Uncle Remus hid behind his own study door when he invited Clark Howell's political friends to a reception on his front lawn. It made him slip off once to the Grand Central Station in New York and hurriedly take the train for home when he was to be the guest of honor at a great dinner that evening. It made the precaution necessary of placing a guard to watch him to keep him from running away a few years ago when he was booked to ride with the President through the streets of Atlanta. He had come into a personal realization of strange half creature, half human knowledges that cast him out of psychic relation to the artificial manifestation of the social life of his times. Doubtless Mr. Harris would have met any sort of man with perfect ease in the woods and fields that were native to his own spirit. And he did meet many great ones in the past. For he traveled down the centuries softly, with keen scent for his kindred along the way. He peered into it as other men peer into the future, and found his familiars in it rather than in the clearings of the present. No man of tenderness was ever less of a mere sentimentalist, and for the same reason. He belonged to the elements and realities out of which man first sprang, and where nothing trite or unfaithful to them can exist. And if the press notices of this world are read in the one where he has gone, the inane efforts of some shallow men and women to express their grief at his passing will drive Uncle Remus into an agony of heaven shyness to the remotest briar patch of eternity.—Children's Visitor.

UNCLE REMUS.

Mr. Grantland Rice, in the Nashville Tennessean, pays the following tribute to Uncle Remus:

"There's a shadow on the cotton patch; the blue has left the sky.
The mountain meadows echo with the south wind's saddened sigh,
And the gold of all the sunshine in Dixie's turned to gray;
But the roses and the violets shall hide his face away.

'The Little Boy' is lonesome and his eyes are dim with tears;
Beyond the mists he only sees the shadows of the years;
The light all lies behind him with his best friend gone away;
But the softest winds of Dixie at his heart will kneel to pray.

The people of the woodlands—the fur and feathered clan,
The bear, the fox, the rabbit—will mourn him more than man;
But the rose that sways above him in his blossom-tented tomb
Shall turn its crimson lips of love to kiss away the gloom.

The shadow's on the cotton path, the light has left the sky,
A world shall bow in sorrow at his message of good-by,
And the gold of all the sunshine in Dixie's turned to gray;
But the sweetest flowers of the South shall hide his face away."

RICHARD B. KIRKLAND.

[As is the case of Sam Davis and David O. Dodd, who gave their lives for principle, the name of Richard Kirkland and his deed at Fredericksburg inspire the highest admiration. (See VETERAN for March, 1908, page 105). Walter A. Clark has written a tribute under the heading,

"THE ANGEL OF MARYE'S HEIGHTS."]

A sunken road and a wall of stone
And Cobb's grim line of gray
Lay still at the base of Marye's hill
On the morn of a winter's day.

And crowning the frowning crest above
Sleep Alexander's guns,
While gleaming fair in the sunlit air
The Rappahannock runs.

On the plains below the blue lines glow
And the bugle rings out clear,
As with bated breath they march to death
And a soldier's honored bier.

For the slumbering guns awake to life
And the screaming shell and ball
From the front and flanks crash through the ranks
And leave them where they fall.

And the gray stone wall is ringed with fire
And the pitiless leaden hail Drives back the foe to the plain below,
Shattered and crippled and frail.

Again and again a new line forms
And the gallant charge is made,
And again and again they fall like grain
In the sweep of the reaper's blade.

And then from out of the battle smoke
There falls on the lead-swept air
From the whitening lips that are ready to die
The piteous moan and the plaintive cry
For "water" everywhere.

And into the presence of Kershaw brave
There comes a fair-faced lad
With quivering lips as his cap he tips.
"I can't stand this," he said.

"Stand what?" the general sternly said
As he looked on the field of slaughter.
"To see those poor boys dying out there
With no one to help them, no one to care,
And crying for 'water! water!'"

If you'll let me go, I'll give them some."
"Why, boy, you're simply mad;
They'll kill you as soon as you scale the wall
In this terrible storm of shell and ball."
The general kindly said.

"Please let me go," the lad replied.
"May the Lord protect you, then!"
And over the wall in the hissing air
He carried comfort to grim despair
And balm to the stricken men.

And as he straightened the mangled limbs
On their earthen bed of pain,
The whitening lips all eagerly quaffed
From the canteen's mouth the cooling draught
And blessed him again and again.

Like Daniel of old in the lions' den,
He walked through the murderous air
With never a breath of the leaden storm
To touch or to tear his gray-clad form.
For the hand of God was there.

And I am sure in the Book of Gold,
Where the blessed angel writes
The names that are blessed of God and men,
He wrote that day with his shining pen,
Then smiled and lovingly wrote again:
"The Angel of Marye's Heights."

TRAVELING LIBRARY IN CALIFORNIA.

Though far removed from the land of their birth, the Southern men and women now living in California or other Western States have treasured in their hearts love and admiration for the land and people of the sunny South, and among the many Confederate organizations can be found no more loyal members than those of distant Camps and Chapters. And they are progressive, too, as evidenced by the plan of the California State Division, U. D. C., for a Traveling Library. At the suggestion of Mrs. Victor Montgomery, of Santa Ana, Cal., the Camps and Chapters of that State are to contribute what they feel inclined to give toward a fund for the purchase of books which give a true account of the conflict between the States. Mrs. Montgomery selects and buys these books, which will be shipped from Camp to Camp at the expense of the Camp requesting the books to be sent. In this way the members can read all the books and their children learn to know and to honor the brave men who gave their all for a principle they believed to be right.

Mrs. Montgomery writes: "We are so far removed from the field of action, and necessarily out of touch with the sentiment of the South, that my children did not know and appreciate that sentiment until my son and daughter visited in the South. Both returned home from a visit there in love with its people."

NASHVILLE "BOOSTERS" CLUB ON ITS RAID AT THE CAPITOL OF MISSISSIPPI.

IN THE CENTRAL PART ARE GOVERNOR NOEL AND UNITED STATES SENATOR ELECT J. K. VARDAMAN. THE TENNESSEANS PRESENT COMPRISE AS ENTERPRISING A BODY OF BUSINESS MEN AS CAN BE MUSTERED.

The Nashville Booster Club is an auxiliary of the Nashville Board of Trade, and its membership is composed of those who have gone on some or all of the Annual Trade Expansion Tours, that have been a feature of the work of the "Boosters" for many years past.

The plan is to charter a special train of Pullman sleepers, dining and baggage cars, and to spend about a week visiting towns and cities and meeting the business men and citizens in one section or another, where there is a probability of building up and extending the trade and good name of Nashville. On the special train are always representatives of Nashville's wholesale houses, her manufacturing plants, her corporations, her educational institutions, and, indeed, the many and various features that go to make up the most important of the city's interests.

The "Booster" organization is made up along the strictest business lines. They have a President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, and a Director General, the latter being in charge of the "Boosters" whenever they are on one of their trade-hunting and advertising tours.

As a general rule, the members of the party are the merchants, manufacturers, corporation officials—not the clerks or salesmen—the idea being to afford this opportunity of making it possible for the business man to meet and greet his customers and show by his presence his appreciation of their patronage and his desire to form additional trade relations.

The "Boosters" are very jealous of their reputation, and would not permit any misconduct upon the part of any member without taking action which would amount to his expulsion, consequently the various tours have been conspicuously successful; and the "Boosters" have not only made friends, but have won the regard and respect of the people in the many and varied sections that they have visited.

In the recent tour through the northeastern portion of the grand old commonwealth of Mississippi the "Boosters" perhaps eclipsed any of their previous records in point of territory covered, good towns and cities visited, and substantial friends and customers which they were able to meet and make. They had the kindest and most pronounced attention shown to them at all points visited. The programmes, however, at Meridian, Jackson, and Oxford were perhaps the most complete. At Jackson the "Boosters" were received by a large and representative delegation from the Jackson Board of Trade and escorted in special electric cars to the beautiful new State Capitol building, where in the House of Representatives they were most cordially and eloquently welcomed by two of Mississippi's distinguished sons, Gov. E. F. Noel and Ex-Gov. James K. Vardaman.

In a word of comment Mr. Leland Hume, the first President of the Board of Trade and always General Manager, said: "The 'Booster' is a serious-minded, sober-minded, whole-hearted lover of his fellow-man and of his God and believes in the city of Nashville first, last, and all the time."

HEROISM OF UNION OFFICER AT PORT HUDSON.

BY CAPT. JAMES M'MURRAY (A. Q. M. 23D ARKANSAS INFANTRY), LUNA LANDING, ARK.

In some sketches of "Dare-Devil War Fighters" in the Sunday Globe-Democrat of May 24 First Corporal Francis E. Warren, now United States Senator from Wyoming, is mentioned as one of "the forlorn hope" which led the attack on our works at Port Hudson, La., on the 27th of May, 1863.

I was one of the pickets stationed at intervals of twenty yards on the line of breastworks, in front of which the Federal force, under General Bartlett, formed for an attack. It was composed, as we understood, of a brigade of New England troops, a mixed brigade of Western troops, and a battalion of New York Zouaves. They formed at the edge of the woods about half a mile in front of the south central section of our three miles of breastworks. The attack was preceded by a terrific bombardment of our lines, to which we made no reply, for the reason that all our guns had been dismounted with the exception of a few brass 12-pounders, loaded to the muzzle with grape and canister and held in reserve behind the breastworks to be used only in repulsing an infantry attack.

Between the lines of the Federal army and our breastworks was an open field, part of the Slaughter plantation, about half a mile wide, level, and destitute of cover to protect the advance at any stage of it. Not all the command in line of battle at the edge of the woods essayed to cross that open field. The Federal batteries ceased their rain of shrieking shells upon our works, and amid profound silence the brigade of Western troops on the Federal right advanced at a double-quick. Then the New York Zouaves double-quickened on a line obliquely to the main attack and to the left of it.

My position on the breastworks was about forty yards north of the point of attack made by the Zouaves, and forty yards south of the point aimed at by the brigade. At first my attention was absorbed by the Zouaves, whose intrepid advance appeared to me so futile that I never once thought of leveling my musket at them. On they came in face of a heavy fire now assembled in their front, and drop, drop, drop they went, dotting the plain singly and in groups, until on their gaining the breastworks there were only sixty of them left to jump into the ditch and surrender. About that time the advance of the brigade, commanded by General Bartlett, had arrived within one hundred and fifty yards of our works in fairly good order, and were evidently rallying for a final charge; but our fire now, reinforced from both flanks moving up to the point of attack, became heavier and heavier, the attacking line became disordered, and their officers could not rally them effectually. Still they would not fall back. It was at this critical moment that an officer on horseback, who I afterwards learned was General Bartlett, seized the colors of a regiment and carried them on horseback a hundred yards in front of his men until he fell within sixty yards of the breastworks. Severely wounded and lying on his back with his head toward the works and his feet toward his command, he lifted the flag as high as he could and waved it as a signal to his men to come on. High above the rattle of the musketry on our side a voice rang out, "Don't shoot him!" and the word passed along our line. So he lay there unmolested, still waving the flag, while his horse trotted off, making a circle to get to the rear of the command.

The attack was over. The Federals broke and sought cover from the withering fire that was thinning their ranks. I thought then, and still think, that General Bartlett's exhibit in this action was as gallant as any recorded in story. Strange I have never seen it mentioned in all the records of the war I have read in the last forty-five years.

Another gallant action on the part of that brigade should be mentioned in this connection. First, let me say in illustration of the demoralizing effect of artillery when General Bartlett's Brigade had been brought to a halt by the infantry fire in its front, it was in a position to be enfiladed by a little four-pounder Parrott gun which had been used to repel the Zouave attack. It was fired at intervals of less than a minute; and when the explosion was due, I could see the Federals turn their faces about, as a man, in the direction whence the shot came, apparently disregarding the deadlier infantry fire that had stopped them and was decimating their ranks. Flesh and blood could stand no more. The command disintegrated, and each member sought the best cover available. A strange thing now happened. The defeated brigade resolved itself into a line of sharpshooters, and the deadly accuracy of their fire silenced our guns and forced us to take refuge behind the breastworks without the ability to reply. Night now coming on, the Federals retired under cover of the darkness to their lines, carrying with them most of their wounded and, I suppose, General Bartlett also.

General Bartlett is dead, no doubt, but the memory of his gallant action at Port Hudson will live long in the hearts of its defenders and their children, to whom it has been repeated often. He deserves a monument to commemorate his valor.

FAKE OF PRISONERS ON JOHNSON'S ISLAND.

Referring to the article on Johnson's Island by Capt. H. A. Smith, of the 128th Ohio, which appeared in the VETERAN for May, page 222. Jacob Warden, who was captain of Company I, 18th Virginia Cavalry, Berryville, Va., comments:

"As to the grocery store that Captain Smith speaks of in the pen, at which, as he says, the prisoners could purchase tobacco, fruit, eggs, etc., this was a benefit only to those who were fortunate enough to have ready cash. Unfortunately, however, not one in ten had the money; besides, the store was closed most of the time, and nothing could be procured.

"As to the clothing he speaks of being given to prisoners, I have no recollection of any being issued in my room, which was in Block 8 upstairs next to the hospital. He says the rations were just the same as the soldiers had. I presume he means the guard there, and not the soldiers in the field. If he means the latter, any soldier knows it is not so. No soldier performing arduous duty consumes a United States army ration. I can't believe any one so benighted as to accept that prisoners got a full United States ration. Some facts came under my observation, experienced by members in my room, that I hope will dispel the fallacy of the statement. We drew our rations on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Now, I saw two young men eat at one meal their three days' rations in order to say they had one full meal. They never tried it but once, however; not that they did not survive the accomplished undertaking, but to fast from Friday to Monday reminded them that 'a half loaf is better than no bread.'

"Now, the Captain says we were gentlemen as far as he knew. I will ask him if he ever saw any of his 'gentlemen' soldiers, who were receiving the same ration, experience anything like it. Did Captain Smith ever see any of his comrades rake over the garbage pile from the hospital for food?"

MRS. E. G. BUFORD, President

A. N. McMillan, of Waldo, Miss., writes of the grave of a soldier in that neighborhood—one Thomas Alexander Curvain, who belonged to Company C, 10th Texas Cavalry, and died before the end of the war. It may be that some member of his family will be glad to learn of his last resting place.

W. Z. A. Doster, of Campbellville, Tenn., writes in regard to a young man who was buried near that place in November, 1864. His name was Stephen Chandler, his age about thirty-three years, and he was in a Kentucky regiment of cavalry in Hood's raid. Any one interested in this young soldier should write to Mr. Doster.

Any information that can be given about a gold-handled sword with inscription, "Presented to J. A. [or Alex] Laird by Capt. Ben Williams [between the years 1850 and 1855, Nashville, Tenn.]" will be greatly appreciated by Henry M. Laird, a son of Alex Laird, of 109 W. Baker Street, Atlanta, Ga. The sword was loaned a friend to be used during the Confederate war, and was either lost or misplaced.

THE OPELIKA DAILY POST.

Many comrades of the Western Army will recall Opelika, Ala., and not a small proportion the blind peddler who plied his trade much if not all the four years of 1861-65. A familiar cry comes to the writer: "Come this way. Help the blind man. Hard-b'iled eggs." It is gratifying to note the prosperity of the town in the publication of a daily paper which has emerged from the Weekly Post. To every one who reads the VETERAN a plea is made for the enterprise. A daily paper is a blessing, and every citizen should be liberal-minded toward it. The community will be greatly benefited and each member should make his coöperation a subject of moral consideration. Subscribe and pay for it in advance and commend it to others.

E. W. Tarrant, of Corsicana, Tex., would be glad to get the address, if living, of a Dr. Fisher, who was surgeon to the Maryland Regiment at the battle of Manassas in July, 1861. He thinks he was on duty on the first day of battle at Manassas Junction, and extracted a bullet from the leg of an Alabama boy of the 5th Alabama Regiment.

N. B. Deatherage, of Richmond, Ky., wishes to locate one Jerry Smyth, who joined the Confederate army at New Orleans, made up a company there of which he was captain, afterwards colonel of a regiment, and acted as brigadier in General Longstreet's Division. Any information of him, whether living or not, will be appreciated.

Miss Ida May Thompson, of New Orleans, La., wishes to ascertain the time and place of the surrender of the Orleans Light Horse Guards. She seeks to secure the war record of Lieut. Henry Thornhill, who was a member of the command at the time of its surrender. Write her in care of the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company.

J. W. Whitley, of Maysfield, Tex., wants to hear from any survivors of Company K, 15th Arkansas Regiment, in which he served under Capt. A. B. Crider, who made up the company at Ozark, Ark. Comrade Whitley was in the commissary department during the siege of Vicksburg in the Trans-Mississippi Department.

One of the Important Duties of Physicians and the Well-Informed of the World

is to learn as to the relative standing and reliability of the leading manufacturers of medicinal agents, as the most eminent physicians are the most careful as to the uniform quality and perfect purity of remedies prescribed by them, and it is well known to physicians and the Well-Informed generally that the California Fig Syrup Co., by reason of its correct methods and perfect equipment and the ethical character of its product has attained to the high standing in scientific and commercial circles which is accorded to successful and reliable houses only, and, therefore, that the name of the Company has become a guarantee of the excellence of its remedy.

TRUTH AND QUALITY

appeal to the Well-Informed in every walk of life and are essential to permanent success and creditable standing, therefore we wish to call the attention of all who would enjoy good health, with its blessings, to the fact that it involves the question of right living with all the term implies. With proper knowledge of what is best each hour of recreation, or enjoyment, of contemplation and of effort may be made to contribute to that end and the use of medicines dispensed with generally to great advantage, but as in many instances a simple, wholesome remedy may be invaluable if taken at the proper time, the California Fig Syrup Co. feels that it is alike important to present truthfully the subject and to supply the one perfect laxative remedy which has won the approval of physicians and the world-wide acceptance of the Well-Informed because of the excellence of the combination, known to all, and the original method of manufacture, which is known to the California Fig Syrup Co. only.

This valuable remedy has been long and favorably known under the name of—Syrup of Figs—and has attained to world-wide acceptance as the most excellent of family laxatives, and as its pure laxative principles, obtained from Senna, are well known to physicians and the Well-Informed of the world to be the best of natural laxatives, we have adopted the more elaborate name of—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—as more fully descriptive of the remedy, but doubtless it will always be called for by the shorter name of Syrup of Figs—and to get its beneficial effects always note, when purchasing, the full name of the Company—California Fig Syrup Co.—plainly printed on the front of every package, whether you simply call for—Syrup of Figs—or by the full name—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—as—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—is the one laxative remedy manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. and the same heretofore known by the name—Syrup of Figs—which has given satisfaction to millions. The genuine is for sale by all leading druggists throughout the United States in original packages of one size only, the regular price of which is fifty cents per bottle.

Every bottle is sold under the general guarantee of the Company, filed with the Secretary of Agriculture, at Washington, D. C., that the remedy is not adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act, June 30th, 1906.

An Elegant Home and School for those who are mentally backward and defective

Dr. C. T. Wilbur, the proprietor, has had more experience in educating and training this class of persons than any one now living. He has been in the work for over sixty years. He was instrumental in organizing many of the State institutions, and has been connected with the Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Ohio, and Illinois State institutions in an official capacity, instructing the other officials and subordinates in the proper methods of educating and training this class of persons.

Dr. Wilbur was connected with the first institution of this kind organized in this country. When he was Superintendent of the Illinois institution (for 18 years), it was pronounced the finest institution in the world by experts. He left the public work to organize a private institution where he could take LIMITED NUMBERS AND GIVE THEM INDIVIDUAL AND PERSONAL ATTENTION. State institutions receive and congregate so many that they get very little personal attention.

He has one of the most beautiful places in the world, and every comfort. The inmates receive the most faithful care and attention. Individual and manual training, for both sexes of any age. Have a few vacancies. Number limited to thirty inmates. The most beautiful and comfortable institution of its kind in the world. Dr. Wilbur has had more experience than any physician now living and has been longer in the work.

is much like gunning for birds. You must have a definite aim, because indiscriminate advertising, like indiscriminate shooting, results in empty pockets. The printer furnishes the shot, and postage is the powder that carries it wherever you direct.

And you must have good ammunition. Foolish indeed the sportsman who would use pebbles for shot to save expense, yet equally foolish is the advertiser who wastes energy, postage and opportunity on weak, ineffective printing

Think it over; then let's talk it over. We have furnished ammunition for so many successful campaigns that we know you will find our experience of value.

STORY OF SAM DAVIS—THE MONUMENT.

The design of the Sam Davis statue on the front page is a poor print and view of the heroic figure that is being made by Mr. Zohnay, the sculptor. The expression of the figure is altogether as satisfactory as is that of the bust seen by thousands at the Centennial Exposition. Vigorous effort is being made to have it ready for dedication on November 27, the anniversary of the hero's execution. In the October VETERAN there will be an elaborate review of his matchless fidelity to his country and to principle. Let all who would do honor to his memory be on watch to disseminate the story of his life and death. A pamphlet edition may be issued.

REUNION OF NORTH CAROLINA DIVISION.

The annual Reunion of the North Carolina Division of the U. C. V. was held on the 19th and 20th of August at Winston-Salem, and it was the pleasantest and most successful ever held in the "Old North State." The hospitable citizens of the "Twin City" provided in every way for the comfort and pleasure of the veterans, and all returned to their homes delighted with their entertainment. Over two thousand veterans were registered at headquarters; and not only were their names and commands registered, but also their ages, and thus the average age of them was ascertained to be seventy years. The oldest was Henry Parmenter, of Mecklenburg County, whose age was vouched for as being one hundred and five years.

Eloquent addresses of welcome were made by Hon. C. B. Watson, who was a gallant Confederate soldier, and by Mayor Eaton. The response was made by Col. H. A. London, the Adjutant General of the North Carolina Division, who so enthused the audience that at the conclusion of his address every veteran jumped to his feet and raised the old "Rebel yell" while the band played "Dixie." Gen. C. Irvine Walker made a most appropriate address in advocating the movement for the erection of the monument to the women of the Confederacy, and at his suggestion a committee of fifteen was appointed to collect funds for that purpose. The annual oration was delivered by Gen. Bennett H. Young, of Kentucky, who completely captured his hearers by his fervid oratory and eloquence; and when he concluded, the veterans crowded around him to shake his hand and many embraced him.

All the old officers were reelected by acclamation—to wit: Gen. J. S. Carr, Division Commander; Gen. P. C. Carlton, Commander of the First Brigade; Gen. W. L. London, Commander of the Second Brigade; Gen. J. I. Metts, Commander of the Third Brigade; Gen. J. M. Ray, Commander of the Fourth Brigade. The parade was the grandest ever held in the State, and was witnessed by many thousands.

WALLACE STREATER, Treasurer A. C. M. A.

HIGHEST PERCENTAGE OF REGIMENTAL LOSS.—Referring to the notice in the VETERAN for July as to the highest percentage of loss in any regiment during the war, E. K. Goree, of Huntsville, Tex., mentions that the 1st Texas Regiment, of Hood's Texas Brigade, in the battle of Sharpsburg or Antietam lost eighty-two per cent, which he thinks was the greatest loss of any regiment during the war.

SENTIMENT OF A TRUE VOLUNTEER SOLDIER.

BY COL. M. B. GARY, OF CLEVELAND, OHIO.

After commanding a battery of light artillery in the Union army, later a brigade of artillery from the Ohio to the Potomac River, including the great "march to the sea," and up the coast to the "Grand Review," I most cheerfully united with all good soldiers on either side of the firing line to "stack arms," and with it ended my military record as well as all aspirations of that sort.

Unfortunate, indeed, was it for our poor country, as I have ever felt, that we had at that time on both sides of the Mason and Dixon line a vast number of most distinguished patriots who, failing to reach the firing line until it had ceased, for many years thereafter sought to keep the war spirit alive in the hearts of our people, resulting in great damage to all sections of our then distracted but happily well united and now prosperous country.

Through the friendly courtesy of my neighbor, Capt. H. O. Boon, a veteran of the Confederate army, I have enjoyed in our exchange of current literature the reading of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, which I assure you I also appreciate very much indeed, and now beg that you send it for one year with my compliments to that gallant soldier and my esteemed friend, Col. James A. Bope, at Findlay, Ohio.

Few occasions afford me greater pleasure than in uniting with the veterans in gray in congratulating ourselves that we were permitted to live and witness the improvements and blessings of our reunited country.

If Comrade Gary and his class of men who fought to save the Union from disruption had realized what the class he mentions were doing in the South, they would have come again with their guns and reconstruction (!) would soon have ended.

In the "Rebellion Records," Series 1, Volume XXX., page 95, Brigadier General Brannan reports in official orders: "First Lieut. M. B. Gary for good conduct—for gallantry, skill, and judgment with which he worked his guns."

In Lieutenant Gary's own report of a trying ordeal in the battle of Chickamauga he states: "Ten to fifteen minutes later, having no support on my right, with a loss of thirteen killed and wounded and twenty-five horses killed, and believing it impossible to save the battery after further resistance, I moved the battery without orders to the left and rear, where I fell in," etc.

BIRTHDAY REUNION WITH HIS COMRADES.—The Lynchburg (Va.) News gives an account of "a delightful celebration" at Idlewood, the home of Capt. and Mrs. W. T. Wright: "Captain Wright commanded a company in that splendid regiment, the 2d Virginia Cavalry. He celebrated his seventy-second birthday anniversary by a social reunion of many of his comrades and other friends. A large Confederate flag was unfurled to the breeze, which waved as proudly as though there had never been a surrender at Appomattox. The house was decorated with Confederate flags, daisies, and bright-hued nasturtiums. Such a dinner was served as would have been a dream of bounty and sumptuousness to the hungry Rebel in the days of the war—aye, a feast of all that could delight the palate of the most fastidious. A guest of special honor was Gen. T. T. Munford, of the 2d Brigade. Many a marvelous tale of battle, camp, and march was recounted by General Munford and others, and Mr. J. M. Daniels delighted the company with his songs and banjo-playing, being a close rival to Polk Miller. Mrs. Dan Williams and two children, of Charleston, W. Va., are guests of her sister, Mrs. W. T. Wright, the hostess of this notable social event."

STORY OF A THRILLING TIME IN NASHVILLE.

BY ROSWELL V. BOOTH, VICKSBURG, MISS.

In glancing over the pages of the VETERAN for August I cannot tell you what a train of cherished memories linking me with the far-off past was awakened by the romance of "Major Clare and Mary Hadley."

In 1860 I was a student in the Law Department of Cumberland University, at Lebanon, Tenn., where Miss Mary was a frequent visitor, whom I often met and numbered among the very dearest of my girl friends of that day. It was the year of the great quadrangular contest for the presidency, which resulted in the election of Abraham Lincoln and brought with it our frightful Civil War.

I, together with a large number of the law students, obtained permission from the faculty to go to Nashville to hear the great speech of Stephen A. Douglas, delivered on the Public Square to one of the largest audiences I ever saw assembled, and which was, I have often said, the most massive and convincing argument I ever heard from mortal lips.

The Breckinridge Democrats, not to be outdone, had arranged to bring from Louisville the fiery and eloquent William L. Yancey to address the people that night in front of the east portico of the handsome Capitol building to counteract as far as possible the effect produced by Douglas's speech of the morning. On this occasion I was the escort of Mary Hadley, who was a most zealous and earnest advocate of the brilliant and handsome Kentuckian, John C. Breckinridge, and I managed to secure seats on the upper step leading into the eastern entrance to the building, from which we could hear the distinguished orator and see what occurred in the audience.

Miss Mary had prepared a beautiful wreath to present to the gifted Alabamian, and asked me if I would take it down to him at the moment to be designated by her. I remember well my chivalrous answer: "Yes, Miss Mary, I will do anything on earth you tell me to do." So when Yancey went into one of those exquisite flights of eloquence which no one who ever heard him can ever forget, Miss Mary said, "Now is the time," and I worked my way down through the vast crowd and handed to him the exquisite circle of flowers with her card attached. I can see him now as he paused, threw it over his head, and, resting it on his shoulders, pronounced a magnificent tribute to woman.

I immediately rejoined my companion, receiving as my reward a sweet smile, which illuminated her radiant countenance; and though the mists of nearly half a century have settled down and around the incidents here related, the scene is as clear before me now as on that October night in 1860 when I was a looker-on with the charming Mary Hadley.

Comrade Booth asks information of the family. Major Clare was a gifted lawyer and located at Nashville after the war, but did not live many years. Two lovely, beautiful daughters blessed their home, Mary Lee and Annie. Both married and both are dead. The former was a Mrs. Scott, of St. Paul, Minn., leaving several children, and the latter, Mrs. Duncan, of Nashville, leaving a son, who is in the custody of his maternal grandmother. Mrs. Clare is just as loyal to "Dixie's land" as she was when she sent the flowers to William L. Yancey.

LOCATION OF MAJ. GEN. FORNEY'S MONUMENT.

W. T. Allen, Chairman of the John H. Forney Monument Committee, of Jacksonville, Ala., makes inquiry on behalf of Mr. W. T. Rigby, Chairman of the National Park at Vicksburg, who desires to locate the headquarters of General Forney at Vicksburg, in which he asks:

"How far was it from General Forney's headquarters to the Confederate line in front?

"How far and in what direction were his headquarters from the stone house" mentioned in his reports?

"How far and in what direction were his headquarters from General Bowen's headquarters?

"How far and in what direction were his headquarters from the Yost house?

"Please ask any one, officer or private, who was there, whether in his command or not, who can answer these questions to correspond with me at once on the subject, as it is one of pressing importance; also to publish his answer in the CONFEDERATE VETERAN."

POPE COUNTY (ARK.) VETERANS.

Comrade W. A. McKinney sends from Russellville, Ark., interesting data of the Ben T. Embry Camp, U. C. V., which was organized in 1887 at Russellville with Capt. R. H. Scott Commander. The next annual meeting was at Atkins, and the meetings have been held at Gravel Hill these twenty intervening years. The Pope County Record is diligent in service of the Camp and reports it as one of the leading organizations of the county. The Record prints a list of the members living and those who have died. They approximate a parallel: living, 211; dead, 165. These figures illustrate the fatalities in twenty-one years.

The officers at this time are: M. H. Baird, Commander; W. R. Hale, First Lieutenant; S. A. Henry, Adjutant; R. B. Hogins, Recording Secretary; M. C. Baker, Treasurer; Dan C. Brown, Chaplain.

There is a Camp of Sons of Veterans, bearing also the name of Ben T. Embry, of one hundred and forty-five members. This Camp of Sons was organized in 1903, and the officers for the past two years are: James A. McCracken, Commander; W. C. Hogan, Secretary.

J. B. BABB OVERWORKED FOR THE BIRMINGHAM REUNION.—The Birmingham News of August 21 reports the prolonged illness of Mr. Joseph B. Babb, of that city, who was actively in charge of Reunion arrangements from the beginning to the close. The VETERAN has often wished that the Southern people generally could realize how diligent that young patriot was in behalf of comrades and of credit to his adopted city. The News states: "The friends of Mr. Joseph B. Babb, Secretary of the Birmingham Commercial Club, will learn with regret that he is ill in a hospital at Biltmore, N. C. Mr. Babb left Birmingham several weeks ago in search of health. He spent some time at Mountain Park, and did not improve. He then went to Biltmore, where he is now under treatment. Information comes that he is slowly improving and that he expects to return to Birmingham and take up his duties as Secretary of the Commercial Club about September 1. The people of this city, who know him as a tireless and enthusiastic community worker, will join in wishing for his speedy recovery." Mr. Babb is a Tennessean. He was reared in Memphis, but has lived in Nashville, where he is highly esteemed.

WEARING OF THE GRAY.

BY GEN. M. JEFF THOMPSON, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Who are those who still object to our poor old clothes?
It must be those who stayed at home, for sure our manly foes
Who met us on the skirmish line or in the battle's fray
Are not afraid of us disarmed, though still we wear the gray.
It must be those who were afraid to wear their country's blue
And come to meet us at the front, like soldiers brave and true,
That now behind the might and power of conquering armies say:
"O Lord, protect me from that man in that old suit of gray."

Sure every bluecoat on the sod, from Maine to Rio Grande,
Will show that they are soldiers true and take us by the hand
And bid the politicians halt, for "they know not what they do,"
And they'll compromise the honor of the boys that wore the blue.

For we were told that if we'd keep our "paroles and the laws"
We would never have to grieve o'er the failure of our cause.
So let the politicians on the politicians prey,
The bluecoats always will respect the boys who wore the gray.

COLUMBIA POST, G. A. R., HONORS GEN. S. D. LEE.

The Columbia Post, G. A. R., of Chicago, pays official tribute to the memory of Gen. Stephen D. Lee, concluding with this statement: "On several occasions General Lee complimented this Post by paying us a visit as a representative of Confederate Veterans, and what a sweet fraternizing spirit he exhibited! Tributes to him have come to us through a quondam comrade who served with him on the Vicksburg Commission, flattering in the extreme. Most harmoniously he worked with the Northern Commissioners. With deepest regret we abide by the decree that removed him. To-night we officially, as a Grand Army organization, tender his comf ortless family, a member of which lives here, a generous measure of our sorrow over his loss to dear ones left behind."

It is not to detract from the worthy tribute to General Lee to say that his spirit was typical of the true and faithful Confederates from the ranks up. They don't admit that "time has healed the war wounds." They were ready to greet Union patriots at the time the war closed as cordially as now. But they are still unreconstructed with the villains who made war after the order of Sherman, who designated it as he fought it in Georgia and elsewhere.

HUNTED UP HIS OLD MASTER.—The Colored Baptist Association of Kentucky held its annual meeting in Hopkinsville recently, when the Rev. James K. Polk called to see Capt. C. F. Jarrett, whom he served in the Confederate army until the surrender of General Forrest at Gainesville, Ala. It was a joyous meeting. They had not see each other for forty-three years. There were many pleasant reminiscences as well as sad. "Jim" was a faithful friend and servant. He never shirked a battle, and was always near enough to share his haversack or lead up a new horse. He is now a servant of the Great Master of all, and will doubtless prove true and faithful to the end. In accounting for a change of name in connection with "Jim" Captain Jarrett notes the fact that nearly all the negroes with freedom took another name, and this darky, proud of Tennessee, sought to honor her only native President.

RALLYING TO THE VETERAN.

The spirits of the founder and editor of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN are animated and then depressed. He met a comrade recently in the country almost blind and too feeble otherwise to do any work. The greeting was most cordial by the old man on realizing to whom he was talking. He said: "I can't see to read. Am very poor. I only get five dollars per month as a pension, but I will take the VETERAN again. I want to help the cause." There is evidently no publication in existence where the demand is more important for its friends to give unstinted support, and yet there are thousands who seem to be indifferent to its needs. A month ago statements were sent out in one day at a cost of $250. This included return stamped envelopes and a request stamped on the envelope that postmasters please open if not delivered. Not half of those addressed have replied. They may be dead.

The average patron has no conception of how great is the task to keep up with a large subscription scattered over a great country like this. It is utterly impossible to give personal attention to the list. Some one will write: "You ought to know that my subscription is all right. It was simply an oversight." If such friends will investigate, they can see how great is the mistake. To give ten minutes of time to each subscriber would require two hundred and ninety days of ten hours' labor each year to attend to the subscription list alone. That labor must be performed by assistants and they must be paid for their labor. Then the postage to carry out this arduous task is hardly less than $1,000 a year extra.

Again, there seems to be a sentiment that the VETERAN is published by a strong corporation, and many people are diligent to see that some agent gets a commission. The VETERAN must depend upon agents in many instances; but the subscribers are informed that there are but two individuals concerned in the matter, the agent and the publisher, who is compelled to meet obligations aggregating not less than thirty dollars per day. The collecting of subscriptions in one way and another costs more than $2,000 a year, and there are many on the charity list; so that those who want to help the VETERAN and want to see it larger and better would do themselves a service in sending their subscriptions and persuading others to do likewise.

Make this personal: Think of the benefit to you and the cause if when you go to make remittance you would say to a neighbor or friend that you are going to send for it, to renew your subscription, and that you would send for both, as it would not cost any more and that you would be glad to do it. Instead of a check or post office order for $1, you would then send $2 or more.

Friends, please consider this from a business as well as a patriotic standpoint, and your VETERAN would soon be better than it has ever been. It shall be made good and fine and worthy in every way in proportion as you will in your cooperative capacities make it. Many realize its importance, but simply neglect to speak for it. Mention ought to be made at every Confederate gathering.

CO-OPERATION SHOULD BE GENERAL.

To you who are faithful, liberal patrons, are you doing what you can for the success of the VETERAN? Do you introduce the subject with your neighbors and let them know how important the VETERAN is in finding friends and about those who died or where? Do you tell them that there is but the one life-giving and perpetuating medium of information? Do you write of meetings of your Camp and State Division, giving notice ahead and then report of the proceedings? Do you realize that such report of a dozen lines would be helpful to the interest of all in such section? Will you begin now to do better? This appeal would not be so earnest and ardent except for the fact that each year is the last to a multitude. Please begin anew. Consider whether you can do something, however little, before you die.

Aside from the cause that appeals to you beyond anything in this world, the founder of the VETERAN deserves your co-operation. He has edited every issue in its history of nearly sixteen years, and has done his best all the time. He has met every question as a true soldier in battle, and has endured that which he would not endure again for all the money that has been coined. Surely he merits your co-operation; he is powerless without it. Those who are on the list and do not intend to pay should stop it at once. Some patrons who are liberal and loyal want to pay more than for one year at a time. To such the VETERAN will be sent five years for $4.

TRIAL ADVERTISING RATES.

Previous to January, 1909, advertising will be received at half the usual low price of $25 per page—$12.50; half page, $6.25; a full column thirteen ems, $4.50; and less space at 50 cents per inch. This is the lowest rate ever given for such service. Beginning with January, 1909, it will be doubled.

SUPPLY OF ENGRAVINGS TO THE VETERAN.

Sometime ago when a man sent an article and his picture to be used in connection with it he was informed that he should pay the cost of the engraving, $2. He was spirited in reply and said: "I wouldn't give twenty-five cents to put my picture in your paper." There is no other feature of the work so unfair as to decline to reimburse the office for such cost. It is a direct imposition upon the office to expect it to incur expense of engravings. Those who can should pay.

BACK NUMBERS OF THE VETERAN.

While large prices are paid to complete sets of the VETERAN—recently a gentleman in New York sent $50 to a comrade who offered his complete issues for sale that cost $15, and he had read them all—no extra price is ever charged in the office. On the contrary, back numbers, not complete sets, are offered at five cents each. Those who would like to procure particular copies going back several years can have them at the half price if they can be spared. Send for any back numbers at five cents a copy.

A singular error occurred in the August VETERAN, page 393, in printing a statement by Comrade Charles B. Martin in regard to the foreign element in the Army of the Potomac. It was in that army and not in the Confederate that "thousands could neither speak nor understand the English language." The statement applied to the Army of the Potomac, and not to the Army of Northern Virginia.

RAYMOND (MISS.) MONUMENT.

FROM REPORT TO THE CLARION-LEDGER OF APRIL 29, 1908.

This has been one of the greatest days within the history of Raymond, a red-letter day in the historic old town. The N. B. Forrest Chapter, U. D. C., unveiled the Hinds County Confederate monument. Complete preparations and arrangements had been made for the occasion, and the weather was beautiful. A large stand had been erected inside the courthouse yard near the monument under a large and beautiful oak, an ideal spot, a sheltered retreat for the vast throng in attendance, and in a near-by grove dinner was served on tables by the ladies of the vicinity.

The country people began to arrive early, and perhaps fifteen hundred visitors had reached the town before ten o'clock. Then a special came from Jackson with some four hundred people. The train from below also brought up several hundred; so there were more than two thousand citizens of Hinds County in Raymond before eleven o'clock.

On the arrival of the Jackson train a procession was formed at the depot, with Col. W. A. Montgomery as grand marshal, assisted by Aide Beall and others, and the march was begun to the courthouse grounds, the speakers and special guests occupying carriages, preceded by the Jackson band. Several hundred veterans marched, and they kept time to martial music, as they did forty-seven years ago. Arriving at the courthouse yard, the procession was disbanded and gathered around the grandstand. That courthouse is a memorable place to Confederates.

RAYMOND (MISS.) MONUMENT BY THE COURTHOUSE.

At eleven o'clock Capt. W. T. Ratliff, master of ceremonies, called the assembly to order and announced that Rev. P. A. Haman, of Learned, would invoke the divine blessing. In most eloquent and tender manner the minister returned thanks for the benefits and privileges of the day, for the great men who had gone before, and the good and pure women of the land. Here the orchestra rendered "Dixie," while beautiful girls sang the words.

Captain Ratliff made an address of welcome. He said the monument, erected to commemorate the valor of the Confederate soldier, did not represent defeat, but principles that would endure forever to show what men and women would do for a cause they believed just and right. After referring to many incidents of the great war and the many companies sent to the front by Hinds County, he told of Reuben Downing having organized the Raymond company that went to the Mexican War and that formed part of the 1st Mississippi Regiment, led by the gallant Jefferson Davis, who wrested victory from defeat at Buena Vista and prevented the annihilation of General Taylor's army.

Dr. W. T. Lowrey, "the son of one of the greatest soldiers of the Confederacy," replied to the address of welcome. He said that his early life had been spent in a humble cottage with a mother and sisters, while his father, General Lowrey, was at the front fighting the battles of his country and protecting the homes and firesides of his people. He told how the Yankees had raided his mother's home, driving off the stock, killing the pigs, stealing the chickens, and robbing the bee gums. He described his father's return home with one arm in a sling, but with hope and courage in his bright face. He complimented the Confederate veterans, and said: "We will not forget your deeds of valor and of daring."

Hon. A. Puryear, on behalf of the Board of Supervisors of Hinds County, turned over the keeping of the monument to the members of the N. B. Forrest Chapter, and said he considered it an honor to perform that service. He referred to the day when he was mustered into service forty-seven years ago and when he surrendered with Gen. Dick Taylor four years afterwards. "These events belong to the long ago, but are vividly remembered by old soldiers, and will be till they answer the last roll call. The monument will perpetuate the deeds of the men of '61 who went forth to meet an invading foe, and from battlefield to battlefield they drove the enemy until subdued by starvation and overwhelming numbers." In placing the monument in the care and keeping of the ladies of the county, he said the Board of Supervisors were satisfied that it would be kept unstained and untarnished and handed down to the generations to come a memorial to the deeds of the Confederate soldiers of Hinds County.

After Mr. Puryear's address, seven little girls pulled the cord that held the covering, and the monument stood unveiled in all its grace and majestic beauty.

The band played "Dixie" again, and for several minutes there was rejoicing and applause, till Mrs. J. R. Eggleston, to whose energy and unflagging zeal is due the erection of the monument, stepped forward and accepted the guardianship of the memorial on behalf of the ladies of the N. B. Forrest Chapter, and bade every one welcome.

Mrs. Monroe McClurg was presented as one who had done much for the monument, having gone before the Board of Supervisors with Mrs. Eggleston. She said she was glad she lived in Dixie among the best people of the earth. She recounted the efforts made to induce the Board to appropriate the sum sufficient, $4,000. She told what the Legislature of 1904-06 had done to perpetuate Confederate memories—had authorized the building of monuments in all the counties, had appropriated $50,000 for memorials in the Vicksburg National Park, etc.—and said that women had been the power to induce the Legislature to act, that the Confederate soldier could never be forgotten, and that no honor was too great for him—that “poor is the country that has no heroes, and beggars are those who would forget.”

Hon. Charles Scott, of Bolivar County, the orator of the day, delivered a chaste and beautiful address. He spoke of the days of 1861, when on January 9 of that year the Secession Convention met in Jackson and on the 15th of that month adopted the ordinance of secession as reported by Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar, chairman of the committee, which declared that the people of Mississippi consented to form a Federal Union with such States as had seceded or might secede from the Union.

He held that the principle of secession did not originate in the South, but in the North—in Massachusetts, which declared for secession after the annexation of Louisiana to the Union, John Quincy Adams having declared on the floor of the National House of Representatives that “if the bill of annexation were passed it would virtually dissolve the Union and free the States from their moral obligations.” And then Connecticut, when Texas was about to be annexed, had declared: “It may drive these States into a dissolution of the Union.” He defended the South for seceding, saying that to have remained longer in the Union under all the indignities heaped upon her would have been to lose her self-respect.

He went quite fully into the details of the war, and said the world had never produced better soldiers than the boys who wore the gray, and no country had ever known such women as the mothers, sisters, and daughters of the men who went to war to defend homes and firesides. He paid worthy tributes to the Confederate soldier and to Confederate women.

Dinner was served at two o'clock, and over two thousand people partook of the feast, a dinner consisting of every dish that the good housewife could conceive, all prepared in the most elegant and tempting manner and served by fair daughters of the Southland, young, beautiful, and sweet.

The dinner over, the people returned to the courthouse square, when numerous impromptu addresses were delivered by Mrs. Daisy Stevens, President of the Mississippi Division, Daughters of the Confederacy, Hon. Eli Cupit, Col. W. A. Montgomery, Hon. W. Calvin Wells, Hon. Clay Sharkey, Capt. John Webb, and others. Mrs. Laura S. Webb read an original poem upon “Unveiling the Monument.”

After the exercises were over, the old soldiers sat around and regaled each other with tales of the war and recalled many incidents that had long been forgotten. They gathered about the monument and had their pictures taken, and lingered in the courtyard in social reunion till the rain came up about 4:30, and forced them to adjourn and seek shelter.

The monument stands twenty-seven feet high and cost $4,000. It rests on four red granite bases, is of gray granite from the quarries of Texas, and is surmounted with a heroic bronze statue of a Confederate soldier seven feet high, standing “at rest.” It fronts to the westward, on which side is shown in bas-relief a woman tendering a drink to a wounded soldier. On the pedestal is engraved a Confederate battle flag, the design under the figure being a cannon, representing artillery, while above in large relief letters appears the word “Confederate,” the main inscription reading: “We of the South remember; we of the South revere.”

On the eastern side the sabers, emblem of cavalry, are seen, with the inscription: “Erected by the people of Hinds County, in grateful memory of their men who in 1861-65 gave, or offered to give, their lives in defense of constitutional government, and to the heroic women whose devotion to our cause in its darkest hour sustained the strong and strengthened the weak.”

On the south side is shown the “anchor,” representative of the navy. On the north side is an engraving of “muskets,” infantry, the remaining branch of the service.

The monument is one of the handsomest ever erected in this State, and reflects great credit upon those who designed and built it, and is a fitting testimonial to the gallant Confederate soldier of Hinds County, which sent to the war more men than any county in Mississippi.

All honor to the brave women and the loyal men who built the Confederate monument of Hinds County!

A CAMP DOUGLAS LADDER.

BY W. S. W., LONGVIEW, TEX.

When the day approached for the election of President of the United States in 1864, there were approximately seventeen thousand Confederates confined in Camp Douglas, at Chicago. Many of John H. Morgan's boys, amongst whom was the writer, had been there more than a year. Great care was taken by the Federal authorities to remove every loose piece of timber, every bar of iron, and every nail that could be used by prisoners as weapons or in any way be of aid to them in any effort they might make to escape. Information having come to them that an attack was contemplated from outside upon the surrounding fence, in which attack the prisoners were expected to cooperate, additional troops and batteries of artillery were brought to repel such an outbreak. We learned that big guns were placed in such positions around the prison inclosure as to command every foot of it, and that missiles of death would be hurled from them upon the confined prisoners whenever the attack became so formidable as to demand it. Three lines of infantry were added to the garrison, and were fully equipped for any emergency.

About this time my brother Joseph informed me that he had arranged with a fellow-prisoner named Cooke (a Texan) to scale the fence on the night before the election. He and Cooke had stealthily gathered together from the floors of barracks enough boards to construct a ladder, which they built at odd times when not likely to be discovered. When completed, the ladder was free from observation, having been constructed under and against the floor of one of the barracks. There it was to remain until the night appointed for escape. The fence was not far away, and everything seemed propitious.

As soon as told of the intended attempt I endeavored to persuade my brother to abandon the foolhardy affair. I reminded him of the precaution taken by the Yankees to prevent a successful outbreak, and assured him that certain death awaited him and Cooke if they persisted in putting their ladder to use. Finding that remonstrance was unavailing, I at last told him that unless they gave up the project I would myself inform the authorities, thus saving their lives, though subjecting them to severe punishment otherwise.

The unpleasant duty of divulging the secret was, however, made unnecessary. A Yankee inspector found the ladder while nosing around, and then the prisoners were all drawn up in line while an investigation proceeded. Every man was closely questioned to ascertain, if possible, the name of the ladder builder. We were kept standing in line several hours while this was being done, but no information was secured. The officer then went from one point to another until he had announced within the hearing of all that every man would be kept in line until the guilty party was discovered.

Eventually Cooke stepped from the line and proclaimed himself and a companion as the builders of the ladder. He was at once put under arrest and the other boys turned loose. Cooke was escorted to the barrack under which the ladder was suspended, ordered to pull it out from its cozy place, and to march with it on his shoulder to headquarters. On the way there Cooke was plied with questions as to the name of his companion ladder builder, but he refused to tell. When the headquarters building was reached, he was required to place the ladder against it and then climb up and down, up and down until he gave the name of his confederate. At noon he was instructed to go to his barrack for dinner and return to resume the ladder-climbing.

My brother Joe met him on the way and urged him to divulge the secret; but Cooke said he would not, that he could never betray a companion. But Joe told him that unless he gave the information to the Yanks before morning he himself would confess. When Cooke returned from dinner to again go up and down the ladder, he reflected over matters; and when the hour for release arrived, he was thoroughly exhausted. Joe again met him, and the two arranged to have a sham fight after Cooke had let the cat out of the bag the following morning. Preliminaries were to be fixed up by Joe and the battle to take place at noon the next day.

Cooke revealed the secret, was turned loose, and told to send Joe down to take his place on the ladder. When Joe went to dinner, Cooke and a squad of friends were on hand, and the entire party went to a place where the fight could be "pulled off" without interruption. It resulted, of course, in Cooke's defeat, and he walked away with a bloody nose. It was arranged that Cooke was to go down and report the affair. Joe ate a light dinner, went back, and resumed his duty as a ladder climber. In a few minutes Cooke appeared upon the scene with blood still dripping from his wounded proboscis and reported to the officer that Joe had thrashed him for telling the secret.

The officer soon came to a decision. Cooke was denounced by him as a traitor to his best friend and told that Joe should have killed him for his treacherous act. "Go back to your quarters, you unworthy fellow; but in the meantime I require you to apologize to the soldier who gave you the thrashing." The apology was readily given, and as Cooke walked away Joe was called from the ladder and told that the punishment he had given Cooke entitled him to release, and that he need not continue a ladder climber. Joe thanked the officer and went away to his barrack.

The Yanks were never told that the fight was a scheme to secure pardon for both. The witnesses were all true secret keepers, and from that day on Cooke and Joe were inseparable friends.

KENTUCKY TROOPS IN CONFEDERATE ARMY.

BY R. L. THOMPSON, ST. LOUIS, MO.

My recollection is that Kentucky had but fourteen regiments in the Confederate army, five of which were infantry and nine mounted troops. In addition to these regiments, there were three artillery companies, which served with and were a part of these regiments. Besides these regiments and artillery companies, there were three independent mounted companies—namely, Everett's, Jesse's, and Buford's. The highest number of an infantry regiment was the 9th, and the highest number of a cavalry regiment was the 11th. The numbers nine and eleven would indicate that there was a total of twenty regiments; but, as I shall explain, only fourteen can be accounted for.

THE ORPHAN BRIGADE.

In the infantry composing what was known as the Orphan Brigade there were five Kentucky regiments. Whenever those regiments were referred to by number, they were called the 2d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 9th. And under Gen. John H. Morgan at one time there were eight Kentucky mounted regiments. Besides these, there was Butler's Kentucky Regiment that served under Gen. N. B. Forrest, making nine mounted Kentucky regiments all told.

All of these fourteen regiments I have mentioned served throughout the war in what was known as the "Western Confederate Army," or "Army of Tennessee," at different times under Gens. Albert Sidney Johnston, Braxton Bragg, Joseph E. Johnston, and John B. Hood. There were no Kentucky regiments under General Lee in Virginia and there were none in the Trans-Mississippi Department.

So the six missing regiments are myths, and can be accounted for in only one way, and that is that six of the fourteen regiments had two numbers. In the minds of Kentucky troops there was always confusion about the numbers of the different Kentucky regiments. I doubt if the Kentucky regiments were ever officially numbered by the authorities at Richmond. If they were, they were not consecutively numbered. My belief is that those regiments that were known by number assumed their numbers without authority. Now and then some one would say, "Duke's is the first," when some one else would speak up and say; "You are mistaken. Butler's is first and Duke's the second." No one then or since seemed to have an accurate knowledge about the numbers of any of the Kentucky regiments.

Early in the war there were two officers in Western Kentucky, H. B. Lyon and Ed Crossland, who commanded Confederate troops, and each ranked as colonel; but the regiments failed to materialize. That they commanded troops there is no question, and that they were absorbed by other regiments from Kentucky is very probably true.

As a further proof of this confusion of numbers I will name Colonel Giltner's regiment. This regiment was organized toward the end of the war and was made up of fragments of troops, mostly of General Morgan's old command, some of whom had escaped capture on the Ohio raid. This regiment was called the 4th Kentucky, while Col. W. C. P. Breckinridge's regiment, organized in 1862, two and a half years before, was known as the 9th Kentucky.

Your Kentucky Confederate of the mounted troop was nothing if not fanciful in his notions about numbers. He disdained to be known as a member of a regiment with an odd number. Even numbers seemed to appeal to his fancy and were his favorites, such as second, fourth, eighth, etc. This may seem a silly fad of his, but it is a fact that any one who knew the Kentucky Confederate knows it to be true.

I aver then, as in the outset, that it is my individual belief that no Kentucky Confederate of the mounted troop knew what his regiment's number was, or if it had a number, in fact.

Referring to Morgan's command as I remember it, the organization was unique. There were no brigades or divisions in its make-up; it was always called "Morgan's Command," and the units of the organization were regiments. None of the regiments were referred to by number, but always by the name of the colonel commanding. And Gen. John H. Morgan was captain of the whole squad.

When General Morgan's command was at its maximum strength, it was composed of the regiments of Breckinridge, Chenault, Cluke, Duke, Gano, Grigsby, Johnson, Smith, and Ward. All were Kentucky regiments except Ward's, which was a Tennessee regiment.

Morgan's troopers were mostly full-blooded young fellows; and while they realized that they could not all be officers, they were in fact most of them commanders in spirit, and therefore did not stand for too much authority, although they were as a general rule obedient and dutiful if the discipline was applied in moderation. As an example of their independent character, I will mention Company K of Breckinridge's Regiment. K was the tenth company and smallest in the regiment, with about thirty men. They elected but one officer, and that one their captain, Jim Newt Frazier; lieutenants were superfluous, they said.

The other nine companies in the regiment were larger, and each had its full complement of officers, yet I remember that some of the men in the larger companies complained of there being too many commanders and thought that at least two lieutenants might be dispensed with, thereby adding two more good men to the ranks.

When General Morgan returned to Tennessee from the Kentucky raid, early in January, 1863, he found General Bragg's army at Tullahoma and General Rosecrans's army in possession of the ground between Murfreesboro and Nashville. General Morgan began operating at once on the right of General Bragg's army.

If I were to say Morgan took position on the right of Bragg, I would misstate the fact, for the reason that Morgan's command seldom took position. It was always too busy. Therefore I state it correctly when I say he dashed in on the right of General Bragg's army. Dividing his force, he placed three regiments at McMinnville, three at Woodbury, and three—Breckinridge, Johnson, and Ward—were sent to Liberty, and through those three bases his command continued throughout the winter and spring of 1863 to dash in and out over the field between Murfreesboro and Nashville.

My best remembered raid with a small body of men was known in our camp as the Lavergne Scout. There were about fifty men in the party, led by Maj. John P. Austin, with Capt. William Roberts second in command. We left Liberty on a cold morning in January. Our destination was the Hermitage, twelve miles from Nashville, and our object the capture of a squad of Federal couriers who were stationed there.

By avoiding the main traveled roads and passing between Lebanon and Baird's Mill, where Federal troops were posted, we managed with the assistance of guides to reach the Hermitage about midnight. The couriers had left before we arrived. Learning they had gone in the direction of Lavergne, we followed them.

Lavergne is on the railroad midway between Nashville and Murfreesboro, the main line of communication at that time of Rosecrans's army. On the road that night, between the Hermitage and Lavergne, Comrade Renfro's horse gave out; his misfortune forced him to swap for a horse in a farmer's stable.

In the trade he took a mare with a mule colt and left the colt; then it was our trouble began. The cry of the mule and the answer of the dam alarmed the couriers at Lavergne, and they prepared to receive us. We arrived at Lavergne before daylight and found the boys in a log cabin. Without firing a shot we demanded their surrender. They replied with a volley. Finding we could not dislodge them by firing at one side of the house, we surrounded it and began shooting at all sides, when they immediately ceased firing and surrendered. When they came out, we could count only thirteen; but from the number of shots they fired we supposed there were a hundred of them. We were deceived in the number by the gun they used, an arm that we had never seen before. It had a revolving cylinder like that of an army pistol and a barrel the length of a carbine and shot five times. We brought the couriers away with us on our horses and returned to camp at Liberty without the loss of a man.

Liberty, Tenn., is a village situated at the base of Snow's Hill, fifty miles due east of Nashville. Rome would have been a better name for the town, as it seemed that all the pikes and dirt roads in Tennessee led to Liberty. The three regiments of Breckinridge, Johnson, and Ward established their camps at the junction of three main roads close to each other. Ward guarded the Cumberland River road, Johnson the Murfreesboro road, and Breckinridge the Lebanon and Nashville road; so that whenever an alarm was sent in, all three bugles gave notice of it in concert, and in that way we were never surprised, but were always warned in time to prepare for an advance or retreat, as the exigency required.

Somewhere on the road between Liberty and the Cumberland River there lived at that time a Col. Bill Stokes, an officer of some note, of whom we heard a good deal in time of the war. Colonel Stokes commanded a regiment of the East Tennesseans in the Union army. It was Colonel Ward's ambition, as well as that of his men, who were also Tennesseans, to capture Colonel Stokes, and they made diligent search for him, and at the same time guarded his house closely with the expectation of finding Colonel Stokes at home.

While in camp at Liberty that winter we became used to war's alarms. I remember one morning about two o'clock, while the cold rain was pouring down, Cooper, the bugler, gave the boots and saddle call quick and lively. At the same time Johnson's pickets were hotly engaged on the Murfreesboro Pike. Whether it was the bugle call or the popping of the guns that inspired the boys, I am unable to say; but I remember they were unusually prankish that morning in spite of the rain, as we hurriedly formed to count off for horse holders.

We went forward briskly toward the sound of the guns, and continued to go until we reached the town of Milton. There we found General Morgan with a part of his force in battle with the Federal infantry. When he arrived, two batteries were engaged in a duel. As soon as our regiment put in its appearance the Federal battery began firing at our column. The aim was too low, as the shot and shell struck the ground and decayed logs and stumps, scattering dirt and debris in our faces. One shell stopped at our feet, still smoking. Comrade Judge emptied his canteen of water on it, extinguishing the fuse. We dismounted and entered a cedar thicket, the ground being covered with large rock, which sheltered us from bullets. When the battle ceased, we withdrew, bringing the dead and wounded away, all that we could find, on our horses, the dead tied on.

The battery removed its killed and wounded in the same way, the dead strapped on the caisson and gun carriages. In a short time after the battle of Milton General Morgan started on the ill-fated expedition into Indiana and Ohio.

HISTORY, PATRIOTISM, SYMPATHY.

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY AL G. FIELD AT THE CONFEDERATE MEMORIAL SERVICES, CAMP CHASE, COLUMBUS,
OHIO, JUNE 6, 1908.

Without detracting in the least from the importance of other wars or the valor of those participating in them, the wars of the American Revolution and the great War between the States of the North and South overshadow and make all other wars in which this country has been engaged appear insignificant in comparison.

History records dates and events, yet rarely enlightens as to the causes that created the events. The writings and speeches of the prominent form the basis for the historian. The voice of the general people is not heard on many momentous issues.

The American colonists when they remonstrated against the many hardships forced upon them by the mother country had no idea of rebelling—renouncing their allegiance to Great Britain. Even after the first Continental Congress convened, thousands of those colonists refused to rebel against the mother country, yet they were the most vehement in their demands for what they considered their rights.

Allegiance and loyalty have ever been dominant traits in the character of the Anglo-Saxon race; hence the stability of their institutions and their success in colonizing foreign countries. No other nation than Great Britain has successfully colonized and maintained their authority over foreign possessions. It remains to be seen what we will accomplish in the Philippine Islands.

When war cast its dark shadow over our fair country in 1861, there were thousands of men in the Southern States who frowned on secession. Their love for their land, their devotion to the cause they advocated could not be questioned.

They argued that the South had done more to form the union of the States than the North; and while the South must demand her rights, to secede from the Union was an abandonment of those rights.

That the South had a legal right to secede is a question that the most learned jurists have conceded.

Through Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky Unionists, as they were termed, were numerous. They were looked upon by the extremists as sympathizers with the North. General Lee was against secession, and, as he stated, only drew his sword in defense of his State. As the war became one of invasion, the people of the South became united, as did the people of the colonies in the days of the Revolution, in defense of their firesides and families.

The reader of to-day will be impressed with the similarity of the sufferings and deprivations endured by the armies of Washington and Lee, and that they were Americans is our pride. We who can remember the dark days of that war can more deeply feel the influence of these services. I remember well hearing the old folks predicting the outcome. Six or seven weeks was to end the struggle. None ever dreamed that blood would drench the land or fully realized the enormity of the war that was coming.

General Milroy, a gallant Federal officer, with his cavalry, first invaded our section of Virginia. He made his headquarters in my grandfather's house. He and my grandfather over a jug of apple-jack with honey settled the war that night in so far as they were concerned. When grandfather went to Washington and cashed his voucher for fodder furnished Milroy and his command, the war was not looked upon as such a bad proposition after all.

It was only when Jeb Stuart, an old neighbor, brought his command to our section that war assumed an aspect that was alarming. The Confederacy had not opened a treasury as yet, consequently no vouchers were cashed after their departure, although they were served more bountifully and with more graciousness than the previous visitors. They brought forth the barrel instead of the jug while Jeb was there.

Still we did not realize that the most gigantic war of Christendom was upon us. When grandfather confidentially assured General Milroy that the soldiers of the South when they invaded Philadelphia, Boston, and New York would be treated as courteously as Milroy had treated us, he was entirely sincere.

According to our way of conducting the war, we never intended battles to be fought on Virginia's soil. It was too sacred. Pennsylvania and the hated New England States were to be the battle grounds. We never realized that there was even a remote possibility of the defeat of the cause of the South. We had to leave the old home in Virginia and move to Maryland. When the Confederates forced their way into Pennsylvania and stood at the gates of the capital city of that State, we felt sure we could go back home, that the fighting was all over in Virginia, transferred to the North; but we never saw the old home again.

Two old neighbors, officers in the Confederate service, passing themselves off as horse buyers for the Union army, remained with us several days. It was only when they told of the suffering of the people of the South, of an army fighting without rations or pay, that hope began to sink within us.

Well do I remember listening with bated breath to descriptions in poetic splendor of the deeds of daring of those who fought the battles, and how we shouted in merry glee at stories of the camp fire well told! And I well remember the days of sorrow (tenderly relieved by faith) when with slow step and solemn music we bore the mortal remains of a brave boy to his tent of clay on the sun-kissed hillside of that little burial place in the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia. In our sorrow then we asked: "Can the tender verdure of sentiment ever hide the furrows of sorrow turned by the pitiless plowshare of war? Can the bitter feelings of sectional hate ever be appeased? Can we ever forget our dead?"

To-day we stand together reunited by a bond of sympathy. The birds sing amid the branches of the trees as we strew the flowers of love over the little mounds of earth, and the old trees seem to bend to the younger ones to whisper of the dark days we stood under their branches with hearts bowed down praying only for vengeance. To-day with feelings softened by time, with hearts attuned to the surroundings, we feel it should be an inspiration to every American that Grant and Lee buried their animosities when they sheathed their swords at Appomattox.

The breastworks are leveled to the earth, waving fields of grain are growing on the sod once drenched with the blood of brothers. The sword has rusted in its scabbard; the cannon's mouth is the nest of the dove. It is creditable to our humanity, it is creditable to our love of country that we hold in grateful remembrance the sacrifices of that war as a priceless heritage. The bronzed veterans who bore the brunt of the battle, whether they wore the blue or the gray, in the evening of their lives cherish only admiration for those they actually faced on the field of battle. The McKinleys of the North, the Gradys of the South have spread the gospel of love and peace so effectually that to-day we know no North, we know no South. The sons of the old veterans who fought under Lee and Grant, Stonewall Jackson and Sheridan stood side by side on San Juan Hill. The battleships of Dewey and Schley were manned by those whose fathers fought each other from Bull Run to Appomattox.

My friends, it is services of this character, memorial services for the soldier dead, that have accomplished much in healing the wounds made by that war—more than all the legal enactments devised by the mind of man.

The sunny slopes of Southland's hills are dotted with little white stones marking the last resting places of the soldier dead. National cemeteries are numerous in the South. In the city of the dead, the national cemetery at Chattanooga, some years ago I witnessed a scene that will always live in my memory: men and women of the South decorating the graves of the soldiers of the North—men who had worn the Confederate gray, women who had suffered more and made greater sacrifices than those who fought the battles, men and women of the South whose hopes and fortunes were buried deeper than the shallow graves over which they strewed their flowers. Forgetting all the bitterness of the past, forgetting all the privations and humiliations of the vanquished, they only remembered that the little mound of earth on which they laid their flowers was the last resting place of an American: a son or father, husband or brother of some one in some far-away home. It is only those who have suffered bereavement that can fully appreciate the feelings such scenes awaken within us.

My friends, we are not only honoring the dead who sleep here with these services, but we are carrying consolation, hope, and sympathy to the living. Services of this character awaken sympathy in the most callous of human beings. Sympathy is the open sesame to the hearts of all of God's creatures, and most hardened indeed is he whose heart does not beat responsive to sympathy. Of a truth, all men are mystically united in a bond of sympathy.

Sympathy strikes the electric chain with which we are bound and encircles the world. Sympathy rules the world. The human heart finds shelter nowhere but in humankind; the craving for sympathy is the common boundary line between joy and sorrow. We pine for kindred natures to mingle with ours, to share our sorrow and rejoice in our gladness.

Sympathy is a duty. Without sympathy we cannot see the beauties of this life; without sympathy in our nature the world loses its beauties—the trees their stateliness, the skies their grandeur, the flowers their sweetness, the earth its verdure, and all nature its gladness. Without sympathy we cannot enjoy the noblest pleasures of this life. The person, the man who goes through this life without sympathy can be likened unto Moses as he stood on the mountain of Nebo with all the beauties at his feet and without power to enter into the enjoyment of them.

The man who has sympathy for his fellow-beings is like a stream of pure water that quenches the thirst and invigorates the earth. Sympathy is character in its most beautiful aspect. Sympathy is as necessary to our happiness in this world as life itself. Sympathy is charity in its noblest form.

The man with sympathy in his soul and love for his fellow-man in his heart finds tongues in trees, books in running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything.

If the mute lips of those who sleep in this sacred spot could speak, sympathy would be the message sent to those who mourn them. If the closed eyes could but see, they would fully appreciate the glorious truth: "It is not to die to live in the hearts of those we leave behind."

The only death is to be forgotten.

SECOND SOUTH CAROLINA ON MARYE'S HEIGHTS.

W. A. Johnson, of Atlanta, Ga., who was second lieutenant in the 2d South Carolina Volunteers, referring to the article in the VETERAN for April by James Reese, of the Edney Grays, who said that the 25th North Carolina Regiment was the only one to cross Marye's Heights, writes:

"The 2d South Carolina, under Col. John D. Kennedy, of Kershaw's Brigade, formed line of battle on top of the Heights just west of the batteries and passed down the Heights at a double-quick to the stone fence, or wall, as it is so often called. This was before the 25th North Carolina did the same thing. The South Carolinians and Georgians had repulsed a heavy assault on the stone fence when the 25th North Carolina came over the hill. Though the enemy had been repulsed, they kept up a heavy fire from a line in a depression about two hundred and fifty yards in our front and from their batteries on both sides of the river. The writer saw this regiment (and I take it that Mr. Reese has the number correct) coming down the hill on a run. The men were falling rapidly as they came; and after they got in the road, one of the men climbed back up the steep bank and pulled a wounded comrade down into the road to save him from the hailstorm of bullets coming from the enemy. This regiment came over the same point of the Heights which the 2d South Carolina had passed but a short time before.

"The colonel of this North Carolina regiment was a fine looking man, and walked up and down the road just behind his line, sword in hand and a smile on his face. He was the finest-looking man in battle that I ever saw, and seemed to be as pleased at the way we repulsed the Yankees as a baseball fan could be over a hit and a run by his man. He was very cool, however—that is, sure game and manly.

"The writer was mixed up with Cobb's Georgians and the North Carolinians just a few feet east of the farmhouse, which was just over the fence and about in front of which Gen. T. R. R. Cobb was wounded. No one private soldier can tell all that goes on in a battle, and I add this statement to Mr. Reese's in the interest of history."

BATTLE OF WILLIAMSBURG.

BY R. C. MAY, JEFF DAVIS LEGION, A. N. V.

This battle was fought on a cloudy, drizzling Monday, April 9, 1862. Sunday, the day before, was bright and clear. Early in the morning reports of explosives at Yorktown gave warning notes of important movements being made by the army. Soon that rumbling noise made by hosts of men and animals was heard, and tramping columns of infantry, like shadows, were passing by. After all had passed, the order was given to mount, fall in, form column, and march.

Behind the slow-moving infantry we marched until two or three o'clock, when bang! whiz! flew a leaden missile over my head; and looking back, I saw a blue-coated man reloading his gun not more than one hundred yards away. I thought: "Old fellow, were I allowed to shoot, you would be numbered among the missing when called for by your comrades." He soon had his piece reloaded and leveled at my back, when the same banging, whizzing noise occurred again and at frequent intervals afterwards. I felt reassured and all tremor left my nerves when I discovered his meager ability as a marksman.

We marched for a considerable distance at an ordinary walk, while the blue-coated soldiers dogged along, firing at our column without effect until we got to the landing place on the James River. There we were told that the Yankees had possession of the road. Soon, however, a courier came to Gen. J. E. B. Stuart with the information that the way was clear. It was then darkening rapidly; the light of day was giving way to the gloom of evening as we wearily marched to the old camping ground. Here, as before stated, the rain began, and morning found us damp and cold when the bugle called to form at dawn.

As soon as it was light enough for us to see, our march was directed to the east of the town. Here the land descended toward the east. About a mile distant were our earthworks, rifle pits, and a redoubt or two constructed to command the approach from Yorktown. We looked the field over, saw no enemy, but soon discovered the woods full of them in front and to the right and left. But few of our troops could be seen, these occupying the rifle pits. Indeed, it was a pitiable sight, a phantom army opposed to an innumerable blue-coated host. But, undaunted, Maj. W. T. Martin led our column over the field in full view and open to the Yanks, when immediately they opened their battery, thereby giving us the knowledge we wanted. Soon the battery was captured by an infantry regiment, but could not be brought away. Again we marched around, again the battery opened, and again it was silenced by capture. Three times in succession was this done at intervals, our regiment marching the length of the field north and south under artillery fire not more than a half mile away.

When the sun had almost set, we were resting standing in the mud and water about one-quarter of a mile southwest from Fort Magruder when I saw a horseman turn hurriedly from a group of men, put spurs to his horse, and come toward us. When near enough for us to hear his voice, he gave the order to charge cavalry—"Charge, the day is ours!" So here began the first regimental cavalry charge made by the Army of Northern Virginia unless the 4th Virginia Cavalry, under command of Colonel Wickham, beat us by a few minutes. My impression is that we charged first and stood in column of fours, with left flank to the enemy (Hancock's Division); while the 2d Florida Infantry marched under our cover, formed line of battle at the head of our column, then advanced and were repulsed, again using our cover for retreat; while John Pelham fired two of his Howitzers almost as rapidly as one can fire one of the old Colt's repeaters. When the 2d Florida got in a safe place, we then followed, night soon throwing a mantle of obscurity over the battered spirits of the men. Our casualty was two men and horses hit, but not seriously hurt. Thus the battle ended.

Tuesday morning found us early on the field hurrying the stragglers off, clearing the field, and covering the retreat of Gen. J. E. Johnston. This fight was conducted under the command of Gen. James Longstreet, and leisurely did we march away from a field which we held Sunday night, Monday and night, and could have held against the concentrated efforts of General McClellan's hosts. We were not forced from this field, as some one has stated, but took our time to march away. I was the last man in the regiment.

I often wished during those days that I was somewhere else, but now I am proud that I was there.

BATTLE OF THE WILDERNESS.

BY ISAAC G. BRADWELL, BRANTLEY, ALA.

The battle of the Wilderness commenced forty-four years ago, and there were several days of fighting before General Grant became convinced that he could do nothing there and made an effort to swing his left wing and take up a position between Lee's army and Richmond. Every soldier in the army knew that when the campaign opened in the spring we would have to meet overwhelming numbers, some of whom were fresh from the West, who boasted that they had never turned their backs on an enemy, and led by a man who had shown himself ever ready in defeat to try new plans and who was provided with everything necessary to insure success. We were conscious also of our own weakness and of our lack of men and equipment. We were informed that Grant would assume the offensive in the spring with two hundred thousand men, while we knew that we could not oppose him with more than one-third that number.

The outlook offered little reason to hope for victory; but we were inspired with resolution, as we were fighting for our country. We remembered how we had before met and defeated the great odds against us, and that our noble old general was still in command. General Lee, contrary to his custom in 1862 and 1863, placed his divisions some distance back from the Rapidan, and had only weak cavalry pickets stationed at the ford to observe the enemy's movements and to report to him when they should make their first attempt to cross. Between our army and the river was a strip of thickly wooded country called "The Wilderness." This was General Lee's trap set for his opponent, and he rightly judged that he would walk into it. He felt sure that he could maneuver his small army better in this dense forest and that the superior artillery of the enemy would be of very little advantage to them.

General Grant was slow to begin operations. No doubt his reason was to give the ground time to harden, so that he would not be deterred from action. On the 4th of May he marched his army down to the fords and drove off the Confederate cavalry pickets. These immediately conveyed the news to General Lee's headquarters and the general commanding the nearest divisions. The Federal army soon crossed the narrow strip of open country intervening and entered the woods. They were met by the advance divisions of the Confederates, and a sharp battle began.

Here the writer must relate those things which fell under his own observation. Our brigade (Gen. John B. Gordon's) spent the winter in camp a few miles from where the battle began. The evening before orders were issued to move. We marched off very leisurely toward the battlefield, and could occasionally hear the distant sound of small arms. At dark we bivouacked, and early in the morning resumed our march in the same direction, following an old road. We had not gone very far when our military band came marching back, and we knew from this infallible sign that the enemy was near. Looking ahead, we saw the head of our column marching out into the woods at a right angle with the road. The brigade was soon formed in line on the right and left of the road. On our right General Rodes's Division was now having a hot time.

We stood a moment waiting orders to advance, when we saw General Gordon riding from the left to the right of the brigade. He had his hat in his hand and talked to each regiment as he passed. As he rode in front of our regiment (31st Georgia) he said: "We have always driven the enemy, but to-day we will scatter them like leaves before the winds." He told us to be careful as we advanced through the thick woods, to maintain our line, and not to crowd each other on the right or left. When he saw that his men were about to sanction his advice with a yell, he told them to keep silent until they struck the enemy, and then to give the Rebel yell and press them.

The spirits of the men were so much wrought up that every officer and soldier repeated his order to advance. We could see nothing in front for the thick woods and smoke, and must have gone three hundred yards before we encountered the advance line of the enemy. Our men poured a deadly volley into this and charged them with a shout that scattered them in great confusion. They fell back on their second line, some distance in the rear, with our men only a few feet in the rear. This second line also fled, with our yelling men in hot pursuit. Hundreds threw down their arms and surrendered. So great was the number that fell into our hands that our ranks were much reduced by those who carried prisoners to the rear. The rest who remained continued to press the fleeing enemy until they came to the reserves. These were now reënforced by a multitude of refugees, and as our men rushed into their line they gave us a warm reception.

Although now outnumbered perhaps twenty to one, our men continued to advance step by step and from tree to tree until the enemy fled and left us in possession of the field. Among the dead and wounded lying in our front were a full set of silver cornet band instruments. These were taken and used until the close of the war by our regimental band.

Night now came on, and we found that we had penetrated so far into the enemy's line that we were in danger of being captured. We were detached in the thick woods from the rest of the brigade. Our colonel (C. A. Evans) finally piloted us to the other regiments. They told us with great enthusiasm that this was the greatest battle our brigade had ever fought. They claimed that we had taken two thousand five hundred prisoners, one full regiment and its colonel. I cannot vouch for the number of prisoners, as our regiment was detached almost immediately to assist Hays's Louisiana Brigade, which was holding some breastworks to our left. This was indeed a great battle, as was that fought the next day, of which I may write at some time in the future.

RESPIRE FROM HARD SERVICE.

Miss Rowe Webster, of Nashville, gives reminiscences:

"Shortly after the battle of Fort Donelson several soldiers came to our house (Beechwood), near Wartrace, the home of Col. Andrew Erwin, who had married my sister. His home was headquarters for the Tennessee army, and Mrs. Erwin was a Florence Nightingale to the soldiers, giving them all she had, nursing the sick, and sending them on to their commands as soon as able. Until just before the battle of Murfreesboro there was a lull in hostilities, and for six months General Hardee's Corps, Cleburne's Division, and John C. Brown's Brigade were encamped within our grounds. This seemed to be a time of peace, and many social pleasures were indulged in. We were thrown more or less with all the officials of the Army of Tennessee. When the battle of Murfreesboro began, we could hear the firing as distinctly as if in our yard, although it was twenty-five miles away.

"As Lieutenant General Hardee's 'Tactics' were used throughout the Confederate army, having had a finished course at West Point, and he such a brave man and thorough soldier, it seemed very strange that this distinguished man was not mentioned during our Reunion at Nashville in 1897, while many more less noted were named conspicuously. There was not a kinder man to his soldiers than General Hardee, and he was in as many hard-fought battles as any officer in the army.

"Among our distinguished guests was a young Englishman who belonged to the Coldstream Guards, attached to the Queen's palace. He came to examine into American warfare, and was so pleased with the Southern people that he wrote a book called 'Six Months in the Confederate States.' He gave us a copy, but it was lost in changing our location."

[Miss Webster has since died. She was a beloved woman.]

An ex-Confederate writes the Nashville American in the same spirit as Miss Webster's paper: "I have often wondered why it is that we see in the papers so little about the gallant Gen. W. J. Hardee. In looking over the pictures of the Confederate generals, published in the papers lately, his is conspicuous by its absence. You hardly ever see it anywhere. Just why this is, is beyond my comprehension. He was identified with the Army of Tennessee from first to last. The writer was mustered into service by General Hardee in Little Rock, Ark., in July, 1861, and came with his command to Bowling Green, Ky., that winter; left there under him and came to Nashville, reaching here the day Fort Donelson fell, and was under him through all the fortunes of the Army of Tennessee until the surrender. He was ever on hand, and no better general officer did the Confederacy have than he, and none more fully possessed the confidence of his troops. Nor was there a murmur as to his efficiency or his gallantry. His post was always the one of responsibility; and wherever Hardee was, that part of the line was regarded safe. He never lost a battle and his part of the field was never beaten. He sometimes had to yield to overwhelming numbers or retreat because some other part of the lines gave way, but he was never routed. Let us not fail to remember and honor his memory as it should be. He deserves all that can be said of him."

REMINISCENCES OF MURFREESBORO.

BY COL. W. D. PICKETT, ASSISTANT INSPECTOR GENERAL TO LIEUTENANT GENERAL HARDEE.

A sketch of army movement preceding this great battle seems advisable and admissible. After the battle of Shiloh, the Confederate army engaged in that bloody contest fell back in good order to Corinth, a point of great strategic importance, and was soon covered by field fortifications. The Federal army, now under command of Major General Halleck, after reinforcing to an effective force of about 100,000 muskets, cautiously approached and confronted the Confederate force under Beauregard, now reinforced by the troops under General Van Dorn and General Price from the Trans-Mississippi Department.

About May 25 heavy skirmishing between the two armies began, and a battle was planned which, if fought, has always been believed would have been a success. General Van Dorn's Corps was on the extreme right of the Confederate position. He reconnoitered the flank and rear of the Federal lines and suggested, it was understood, that a sufficient force should turn the Federal left and attack in flank and rear, and at the proper time the rest of the army should in concert assault the Federal lines in front. This plan was finally decided on, and General Hardee's Corps was to make a night march, reinforce Van Dorn, and the combined force was to make an early attack, and was early on the ground ready for action. There was no indication that the Federals were aware of the movements. Everything was ready for the advance when it was suddenly announced that the projected attack had been abandoned, and Hardee's Corps was returned to its intrenchments. The reason given for the abandonment of the attack was that General Van Dorn, on further reconnoissance, thought the artillery could not be moved forward on account of marshy ground and other impediments.

On May 30, 1862, the Confederate force under General Beauregard evacuated their fortified lines at Corinth and retired in good order with all the artillery, sick, and wounded to the vicinity of Tupelo, Miss. On June 27 General Bragg succeeded to the command of the Army of Tennessee at Tupelo, General Beauregard being relieved at his own request on account of impaired health. Some time was spent around Tupelo in the reorganization, instruction, and drill of his army by General Bragg, resulting in great betterment to its morale, drill, and general efficiency.

Then commenced the movement preparatory to the Kentucky campaign. The strategic reason for that movement it is unnecessary to discuss. The infantry was transferred by rail to Chattanooga, Tenn. The artillery marched to Rome, Ga., thence by rail to Chattanooga.

On August 27 the Army of Tennessee, under General Bragg, crossed the Tennessee River with an effective force of 27,000 men, artillery, and infantry (these figures were given out at that time), arranged into two corps of two divisions each—one, Cheatham's and Withers's Divisions, under Major General Polk; the other corps consisting of Buckner's and Anderson's Divisions, under command of Maj. Gen. W. J. Hardee.

The route of the army was across Walden's Ridge, thence up the Sequatchie Valley, thence over the Cumberland range of mountains to Sparta, Tenn., thence through Glasgow, Cave City to Munfordsville, Ky., where the first opposition was encountered.

As soon as General Bragg's objective was made evident General Buell, then in command of the Federal army, rapidly concentrated his army, leaving only a garrison at Nashville, Tenn. By a rapid march he followed along the Louisville and Nashville Pike, his advance being at Bowling Green, Ky., about the time Bragg's army reached Munfordsville, on September 14, 1862.

Coöperating with Central Bragg's advance into Kentucky, Gen. E. Kirby Smith, with about thirteen thousand men when concentrated, moved from Knoxville, Tenn., on August 14, crossing the Cumberland Range by Rogers Gap (Cumberland Gap being then in possession of the Federals) and thence in the direction of Richmond and Central Kentucky.

After a slight resistance, the Federal forces at Munfordsville, under Colonel Wilder, capitulated, and its garrison of about four thousand men surrendered and were paroled and sent back to join Buell's army, rapidly approaching. The Confederate army crossed Green River on the evening of the capitulation, September 16, thence by the Louisville Pike, turning off at the Hodgenville Pike and through that village to Bardstown, Ky., leaving the Louisville Turnpike open to Buell's rapidly advancing army. General Bragg's army made a halt of about ten days at Bardstown, resting his tired troops and awaiting developments of the enemies' movements. Buell's advance skirmished with Bragg's rear guard at Green River bridge, crossing that stream the next morning, thence on to Louisville, leaving Bragg's army on his right flank, determining to supply his army at Louisville with all necessaries, reorganize it, and to await reinforcements before renewing the campaign.

In the meantime Gen. Kirby Smith pressed on through London, Ky., toward Richmond, near which point he encountered and routed a considerable force on August 30 under General Manson (variously estimated at from seven to sixteen thousand men, Kirby Smith's force, on account of the absence of Heth's Division, being about seven thousand men). This victory resulted in the capture of about forty-three hundred prisoners, five thousand small arms, and twelve pieces of artillery. This success enabled General Smith to occupy Lexington and all Central Kentucky, rich in supplies of all kinds. In the meantime General Buell had been recruiting his army and furnishing it with all necessary supplies needed for an offensive campaign, and on October 2, 1862, with his whole army of one hundred and eight thousand men, moved from Louisville in the direction of Bragg's army at Bardstown. Bragg's army retired slowly in the direction of Perryville, a small village ten miles from Harrodsburg. Buell made demonstrations at first, as if Frankfort and Lawrenceburg were his objective. Kirby Smith's force was moved to Lawrenceburg to meet this threatened movement. This demonstration caused Bragg, at Smith's urgent request, to detach Withers's Division of Polk's Corps to a point between Perryville and Smith's position. In a few days the movements of the Federal army convinced Bragg that Perryville, and not Lawrenceburg, was his objective point. He accordingly determined to offer battle on a line in front of that village, ordering General Withers's Division to rejoin his corps at Perryville at once. The clash came on October 8; but only Anderson's and Buckner's Divisions of Hardee's Corps and Cheatham's Division of Polk's Corps took part in the engagement, a force of only about sixteen thousand men. Withers's Division did not reach the field in time to participate in this hard-fought battle, lasting from about ten o'clock in the morning until darkness separated them.

The Federals were driven from the fields; the Confederates occupying the battlefield until eleven o'clock at night, when they withdrew in the direction of Harrodsburg with a loss of about 3,200 men, killed and wounded. The Confederate forces engaged in that battle were about sixteen thousand men. General Bragg blamed General Withers, a highly meritorious officer, so much for dilatoriness that he was placed under arrest, and remained so until about the time of the battle of Murfreesboro. On the other hand, it is claimed that General McCook, who commanded the advance corps of Buell's army, brought on the engagement prematurely, before the Federal army was concentrated. Had Bragg's army been united with Smith's Division, the probabilities are that the army of that splendid gentleman and able soldier, Don Carlos Buell, would have been worsted, as the Confederate army was never in better trim for battle.

The Federal army was so much superior in strength and the Confederate army was so far removed from its base of supplies that prudence required it should retire from Kentucky. As Cumberland Gap had been evacuated by the Federal force of 8,000 men, the way was now clear for Bragg's army to retire. Accordingly he conducted his army through Harrodsburg, Camp Dick Robison, Crab Orchard, London, Barboursville, and Cumberland Gap to Knoxville, Tenn., reaching the latter place without anything of note retarding its progress.

The entire Confederate army was then transferred by rail to the vicinity of Murfreesboro and Shelbyville, Polk's Corps occupying the former place and Hardee's Corps the latter place. In a few weeks Hardee's Corps was advanced to a point on the Shelbyville and Nashville Pike, near to Eagleville, so as to be within supporting distance of the other corps at Murfreesboro.

During the foregoing movement the Army of the Cumberland (Federal) had been gradually transferred by marching and rail to the vicinity of Nashville, Tenn. General Buell had been relieved of the command, and Gen. W. S. Rosecrans had succeeded to the command.

I have deemed it best, thus much, to give a condensed sketch of the operations of the Army of Tennessee, under Bragg, from the date of the battle of Shiloh to about December 1, 1862, in order to make more intelligible the events following.

After a week or ten days of rest near Eagleville, during which time Hardee's headquarters were in that vicinity, Bragg and Hardee became very anxious in regard to the advance of Rosecrans's army. This uneasiness had been increased by the result of a reconnoissance made by myself and General Wharton, commanding the cavalry outpost. This reconnoissance and the information gained caused Hardee to move his temporary headquarters to a farmhouse within one mile in the rear of the cavalry's outpost headquarters. In a few days it became necessary to know more definitely of the enemy's intentions, in order to give time for Hardee's Corps to concentrate at Murfreesboro or wherever battle was to be delivered.

About December 27 General Hardee, after emphasizing the importance of definite information, directed me at once to make a night reconnoissance at a proper hour and find out something certain as to the movements of the enemy. About nine o'clock I proceeded to the outpost, that night in charge of Col. Tom Harrison (then in command of the 8th Texas Cavalry, one of the crack cavalry regiments of the army), who, upon being told the object of my calling, said he would go with me, as he was pretty familiar with the ground. The night was dark and stormy, a drizzling rain falling, but altogether it was a favorable night for the work in hand. In order not to disturb the enemy's pickets, we made a detour to the left through a brushy woods for about one mile, and emerged onto a timbered ridge that overlooked the valley of Triune Creek, a little below the small village of Triune. Down the mountain side about one hundred and fifty yards was a faint flicker of the camp fires of the enemy's picket line, so that we were about as close as it was desirable to be. Selecting a point giving a clear view of the valley, a panorama was before us that dispelled all doubts of the enemy's intentions. The whole valley was lighted by the enemy's camp fires. Farmers' fence rails must have been abundant; for though it was ten or eleven o'clock at night, the camp fires were still burning brilliantly. The camp before us was of at least a division of infantry, and down the valley was the reflection of other camp fires. The advance of the Federal army had commenced, and this was the camp of the advance division.

After viewing in silence this notable panorama, we simultaneously came to the same conclusion that the enemy meant business, and that the clash between those gallant armies was near at hand. I sent General Hardee a dispatch to that effect, and that the time for the concentration of his corps on Murfreesboro should not be long delayed. After viewing the scene awhile longer, I returned and reached temporary headquarters about midnight and found that orders had already been sent out for the movement of Hardee's Corps on Murfreesboro.

I remained with Wharton's outpost until about noon the next day. The enemy's infantry was early on the move, advancing in line of battle, or at least with apparently a double line of skirmishers, this in spite of the drizzly, misty, rainy day. Wharton's Cavalry Brigade was driven back so vigorously that on the summit of the divide between the houses of Messrs. Perkins and John S. Claybrook on the pike their skirmishers, under cover of a misty fog, came up within one hundred yards of the cavalry's line before being discovered. The vigor and rapidity of their advance showed unmistakable business.

COL. W. D. PICKETT.

It was unnecessary to stop longer with the outpost under the circumstances. A start was at once made to join Corps Headquarters at Murfreesboro, with a drizzling rain continuing all day. Having lost much sleep in the last twenty-four hours; and knowing I would need all my physical resources in the approaching battle, after reporting the latest information by courier, I stopped at a farmhouse, had a good sleep, and reached Murfreesboro in the forenoon of December 30.

Our army had already been formed for battle in front of Murfreesboro. Originally, before the enemy had developed his plan of battle, Hardee's Corps, consisting of Breckinridge's and Cleburne's Divisions, were in line of battle to the right of Stone River; Polk's Corps (Cheatham's and Withers's Divisions) were formed to the left of that stream, the Nashville and Murfreesboro Pike passing through the right division of the corps. General Rosecrans had made a rapid concentration of his forces by various turnpikes leading to Murfreesboro and massed a large force under General McCook on the extension of the left of the Confederate army. That caused a rapid movement of Cleburne's Division from the right of the army to the left of Polk's Corps, leaving Breckinridge's Division on the right of Stone River. General Hardee was given McCown's Division supported by Cleburne. On this formation the battle of December 31 was fought; Hardee in command of the Confederate left wing.

Bragg's plan of battle was for Hardee's Corps to make a dash at daylight on the Federal's right wing under McCook. The entire army as it advanced was to swing to the right with the right of Polk's Corps on Stone River acting as a pivot and double back the right of the Federal army on the Nashville Turnpike, their line of retreat. It was learned afterwards that General Rosecrans had determined on a similar attack—that is, to send a large force across Stone River and make a strong attack on the Confederates' right and rear, believing that movement would cause a weakening of the Confederates' left. This movement was well planned, for had a force of ten thousand or fifteen thousand men been moved across Stone River at daylight and made a vigorous and successful attack on Breckinridge's Division of five thousand men through open country for artillery, Murfreesboro would have been in his grasp and defeat might have been the fate of Bragg's army. Rosecrans's army was so much superior to his opponent that he could have vigorously attacked Bragg's left and prevented him from reinforcing his right.

General Hardee was on the ground before daylight, and with his accustomed energy and ability superintended the opening of the battle. Fortunately for the opposing force, the Federal army did not awake quite early enough; for while their army were getting ready for an attack on the Confederate right, McCown, supported by Cleburne, at crack of day in misty, drizzling weather made one of his accustomed dashes on the Federal right, and surprised and ran over the opposing brigade, capturing a battery and a large number of prisoners. The attack was taken up by Cheatham's and Withers's Divisions, and soon the entire army on the left of Stone River were engaged. The enemy's lines were so vigorously pressed back that Rosecrans saw at once that his entire right flank was endangered, and the troops intended for the crossing of Stone River and attack on Breckinridge were hurriedly moved to his right flank. These reinforcements came too late, however, for the onslaught of the Confederate forces was such that the Federal forces were forced back after hard fighting until their right and right center were doubled back on their left wing and left center to an angle about ninety degrees—almost back to the Nashville and Murfreesboro Turnpike, their line of retreat. The battlefield was a succession of cedar thickets and of cultivated fields. The cedar thickets afforded good cover against the attacking force, and were stubbornly defended, as the number of killed and wounded in their front attested. Around a captured battery there were some twenty dead bodies of Federals lying so close that you could have stepped from one to the other. In this case the Confederates had approached under cover of open woods and were then at short range.

The plan of battle as determined on by Bragg was to swing on the right as a pivot. The outside brigades in cases of success, in following up their fleeing opponents, are apt to fly off at a tangent. This plan was ordered at Shiloh. The Confederates were to swing around on their left as a pivot and press the enemy against Lick Creek. This plan was not and could not be carried out in practice on the field. In this battle the different brigades of Hardee's Corps were somewhat out of position and scattered from this cause, and it required some time to concentrate and organize in proper shape for a renewal of the attack.

Up to this time, three o'clock, the enemy's right had been forced back about three miles. The Confederates' victorious forces in double-quicking, charging, loading and firing, and cheering, were a good deal exhausted. By the time the Confederate force had been concentrated in good shape for the advance, the Federal lines in front had been heavily reinforced from their left and partially fortified. On account of the strong position of the enemy and the unquestioned heavy reinforcements, together with the exhausted and depleted condition of his own forces, General Hardee did not think it prudent to renew the attack without reinforcements. Had there been a good and fresh division at hand to be hurled on the Federal lines while it was in the rearward move, giving the time for Hardee to reline his own forces, the Federal right would have been driven back to the Nashville Pike or Stone River, resulting in the rout of the Federal army and the capture of a large part of his artillery and wagon train.

This brings up the great mistake, on the eve of a great battle, of sending most of the cavalry in the enemy's rear to capture the enemy's wagon train. In the present case all of Wheeler's cavalry of 3,000 men were sent to the rear of Rosecrans's army, and did effective service in destroying many wagons; but had such a force dismounted been hurled at the enemy's right flank at a critical time, it might have brought about the great success above alluded to. First win the battle, and the enemy's wagon trains fall into your hands. The need of these reinforcements caused the job to be half finished, as it was at the battle of Shiloh.

As it was to be expected, there was great rejoicing in the army and throughout the South on the result of the first day's fight at Murfreesboro (December 31), as well there might be. The right wing and right center of a superior army in men and artillery had been forced back for about three miles and double-backed on its center and left wing.

At this time during a cessation of the fighting General Hardee directed me to parole all prisoners that were not dangerously wounded at a large Federal field hospital on the Wilkerson Pike (located in and around the Griscom House) that had been swept over by the Confederate lines, four or five officers being assigned me to assist. There appeared to be about one thousand wounded in the house upstairs and downstairs, in outhouses, and on the grass surrounding the house. When the gruesome job was finished, the lists were inclosed to the inspector general of the army, Colonel Beard, who reported the number about six hundred officers and men. These wounded were in the various stages of vitality—from the slightly wounded, who were usually cheerful and talkative, to the mortally wounded. There was no groaning, according to the novelist. In fact, the writer passed over several hotly contested battlefields, and at no time ever heard a groan, much less the "shrieks and moans of the dying" so bravely described by the "yellow-back" novelists.

During this time the Federal litter bearers brought in the body of an officer (which was laid on the grass outside the house) clothed in a somewhat worn undress uniform without insignia of rank. He was of slight build, rather thin-visaged face, full sandy whiskers. The wound was from a Minie ball just below the cheek bone, the blood from which had slightly flowed down on his whiskers. His features were in perfect repose. His whole appearance impressed me as of no ordinary man. It was the body of Brig. Gen. Joshua Sill, of the "Regulars," from whom afterwards was named one of the most important posts on the Southwest frontier, Fort Sill.

It was evidently anticipated at army headquarters that Rosecrans would evacuate his position the night of the 31st. Daylight showed he had not. It was hoped that during the day and night of January 31 the evacuation of the enemy's lines would have been made. The plans were being considered on January 1 as to how he could be forced to this alternative if by the morning of January 2, 1863, he had not done so. The morning of that day dawned with the enemies standing firm and determined to await another attack.

On the 2d of January General Hardee, with myself, passed along the Confederate position to the crossing of Stone River, and there met Gen. Leonidas Polk alone. While a private conversation was had between the two, the party had crossed the river, and very soon were met by Gen. J. C. Breckinridge. Whether this was a preconcerted meeting, it never transpired. During this time it appeared to be the design of these officers to make a reconnoissance with a view to a movement on the Federal left flank, as it was to be expected that he had a force on that side of the river to guard it. Before much had been accomplished in the reconnoissance a staff officer overtook General Polk and informed him he was needed on his lines. After proceeding a short distance, General Hardee was recalled hurriedly to his line by a staff officer. Turning to General Breckinridge, he said: "I must return, but will leave Pickett here to represent me." So Breckinridge and myself and certain of his staff officers moved forward through open timber to the picket line, that day in charge of Capt. Joel Higgins, of the 2d Kentucky Regiment of Hanson's Brigade, one of the best soldiers that Kentucky furnished the South. Just on the picket line was a two-story farmhouse occupied as a picket post.

There was some desultory picket-firing going on, not enough to interfere materially with the reconnoissance. In front of this farmhouse was an open cultivated field extending in front four or five hundred yards and extending about the same distance in width back from the river. On that side of the field it was bordered by an open woods, under cover of which afterwards Breckinridge formed his division for the attack. On the far side of the field from the picket post was a slight prominence or hill, immediately on the left flank of the Federal army, extending from Stone River back about the length of a brigade front. This hill or prominence was on the left flank of the Federal army, which, could it be taken and held by the Confederate forces, would necessitate the evacuation of the Federal position or otherwise force a general engagement. The reconnoissance showed there were no troops of any kind in sight, though the hill was of sufficient prominence to hide from view a considerable force. The fact that a picket line was in front, and the apparent importance of the position from a strategic point of view, was prima facie evidence of such a force being ready to defend it. After the Federal position had been thoroughly reconnoitered, a message came from General Bragg for General Breckinridge to report at his temporary headquarters, a few hundred yards in the rear on the river bank. My impression is that General Bragg had already determined to make the attack, as he at once commenced explaining the order of attack. Prefacing his orders with the remark that as his division had not been much engaged in the battle of December 31, it had been selected for this important movement. These remarks did not appear to me at the time to be made in any invidious or critical sense, as afterwards charged. Bragg's orders to Breckinridge were that a vigorous attack on the position just reconnoitered should be carried, held, and strongly fortified, having in view positions for four field batteries. Besides three batteries from his own division, he had been assigned Captain Robinson's Battery of Napoleons from Polk's Corps. The hour of attack was to be about four o'clock, the signal being a discharge of four pieces of artillery in quick succession. The impression appeared to be that with an attack at that hour, if successful, the enemy would not attempt to retake it that night, giving ample time to fortify. The balance of the army at the signal were to make demonstrations with artillery and otherwise along the whole front. These instructions were given in my hearing at about noon on January 2. Breckinridge began at once to make the necessary preparations for carrying out the order of battle.

My instructions from General Hardee did not extend immediately beyond the reconnoissance of this position; but on my expressing to Breckinridge a wish to see the movement through, he promptly acquiesced, and gave me temporary assignment on his staff. General Breckinridge took advantage of the cover afforded by the strip of woods heretofore described, which fronted the position which was the object of the attack and was on the edge of the open field through which the charge was to be made. At his orders I formed the two right brigades, Pillow (in command of Palmer's Brigade) in front, supported by W. C. Preston's Brigade in the second line. On the left of Pillow was Hanson's Kentucky Brigade, supported by Adams's Louisiana Brigade, that day commanded by Col. Randall Gibson. The four batteries of artillery were in the rear at a proper interval, and were to go into action at the proper time. Everything was apparently well screened from the view of the enemy, ready for the signal guns to move forward.

Let us take a glance now at the position of the forces of the Federals on the opposite side. My information comes from Col. W. R. Milward, of Lexington, Ky., who was then captain of the 21st Kentucky (Federal) Infantry, whose recollection is distinct on the events of that day, and who is in every way a reliable gentleman. He says that position was defended by Van Cleve's Division of three brigades—Price's Brigade, Fiffe's Brigade, and another brigade formed in three lines, brigade front—his brigade being on the right of the battle line, the right of the brigade resting on Stone River and extending at brigade front from that stream. Major General Crittenden reports that these three brigades were supported by Grose's and Hazen's Brigades in a position hidden from view of Captain Milward. Captain Milward states that the fifty-eight pieces of artillery that played such havoc with Breckinridge's Division were stationed on a bluff on the north bank of the river, not more than three hundred yards in the rear of the position that was the object of attack. He states that most of this artillery was placed in position on the morning of the attack by Colonel Mendenhall, chief of artillery, in anticipation, as he understood, of this attack. It has been stated that Generals Bragg and Breckinridge knew of the massing of this artillery. I feel sure this statement is not correct, or it would have been mentioned during the reconnaissance of the morning, and am further of the opinion that the attack would not have been made had this fact been known.

At the expected signal, about 4 P.M. of the 2d (the discharge of four pieces of artillery), the Confederate front line, Pillow and Hanson, advanced out into the open, followed at a proper interval by the second line, Preston and Gibson. As Breckinridge, in the rear of the center of the second line, emerged from the woods, the front line had reached about the center of the field. Up to this time the enemy's artillery had not opened fire. The front line, however, was exposed to a destructive musketry fire from the infantry on the top of the ridge. About this time the whole line charged at "double-quick," "arms right shoulder shift," with the bright barrels glistening in the daylight. It was a magnificent sight, seldom seen on Western battlefields on account of so much timber.

Soon after the charge had commenced the enemy's massed artillery of fifty-eight pieces began to play, at first shooting over the heads of their own men; but it was too late to retard the onward dash of the Confederates' lines. After a fierce contest on the crest of the position, they swept over the crest and down the opposite slope, closely following the retreating Federal troops. After getting beyond the crest on to a slope next to the river, they were out of reach of this artillery fire, as it could not be so far depressed. The Federals were followed to the water's edge, as was stated by Captain Milward, of the 21st Kentucky.

One part of the order of battle was attained: the position sought had been gallantly carried. The next thing was to hold and then fortify it. By this time heavy reinforcements of infantry had arrived from the Federal right wing, that had been so far forced back on December 31 that the distance across was quickly passed. These reinforcements did not cross the river at that time, nor did they take much part in the battle.

The Confederate lines were slowly retired back to the crest of the position that had been won, and then it was that this mass of fifty-eight pieces of artillery, according to Captain Milward's recollection, got in most of its work—with a range of about three hundred yards, with a discharge (estimated by its own officer) of one hundred shells per minute (at first with canister and grape and then shrapnel shells filled with leaden bullets). It can be imagined what havoc was made in the ranks of this gallant body of soldiers. An inspection of the field, according to Captain Milward, indicated that a majority of the dead were found on the crest and on each slope of the crest. No troops could long stand firm under such a concentrated fire at short range and without protection or fortifications. The only alternative was to seek the shelter of the woods where they had been formed. An effort was made to rally them in the open by Major Graves and myself, but the continuance of this fire made it impossible. The rally was slowly made under the protection of the woods; and by the time the first reinforcements arrived, under Gen. Patten Anderson, a considerable force had been re-formed. The Federal forces, after reoccupying the ground they had been driven from an hour before, showed no indication of following up their success, and darkness closed the conflict.

This battle proved one of the most destructive of that war for the time engaged. Not exceeding one hour did the fighting last. The Confederate troops carried into action were 51,000 men (not including the 9th Kentucky, not engaged); the killed and wounded were 1,700 men. These figures were given out after the battle. I have never understood what officers suggested and urged this attack, but I am sure that neither General Breckinridge nor General Hardee favored it.

The 9th Kentucky Infantry, commanded by Col. Thomas H. Hunt, was not in the day's operation of his brigade. It was kept in the trenches on the extreme right of the Confederate army, and was exposed only to the fire of artillery. Henry M. Curd, the adjutant of that regiment, was killed by a six-pound shell. He died at the post of duty, where he would have preferred to have fallen.

There is one incident of this memorable hour's conflict that should be told. As Breckinridge in beginning the advance emerged from the woods, the front line was at full charge. Hanson's Brigade, on the left, was more in view as it passed up over a rise in the field and presented a fine sight, as at "right shoulder shift," arms "glistening in the sunlight," giving rousing cheers as they "double-quickened" up the slope. General Breckinridge could not restrain his enthusiasm. He exclaimed, pointing to the left: "Look at old Hanson!" We had proceeded along a line of fence leading in the proper direction about two-thirds the distance across the open when a halt was observed. On investigating the cause there, just over the fence was General Breckinridge kneeling by the side of a wounded man, apparently holding firmly to the artery of the leg just above the knee. The wounded man had apparently received his death wound, as it afterwards came out that a large fragment of a shell had struck the leg just above the knee. That wounded man was "old Hanson," and beside him was his bosom friend and distinguished commander. During this incident the fire of these fifty-eight pieces of artillery was in full swing. Presently an officer rode up, followed by an ambulance, with tears streaming down his cheeks. It was Captain Helm, General Hanson's brother-in-law and his brigade commissary. It was a sight indelibly impressed on my memory—the dying hero, his distinguished friend and commander kneeling by his side holding back the lifeblood, his kinsman with tears of affection streaming from his eyes. All this under the fiercest fire of artillery that can be conceived made it ever memorable. This scene passed almost as quick as it takes to write it. General Hanson was promptly moved by the ambulance. Breckinridge was soon as alert and clear-headed as ever. That General Breckinridge and six or eight mounted officers attached to his staff were not killed or wounded is attributed to the fact that the shrapnel shells fired by the enemy's artillery burst just overhead and their contents reached the ground beyond. Had the time fuses been shorter and the shells burst fifty or one hundred feet earlier, the casualties among that group of officers would have been great. As it happened, not one of these officers was hit. Furthermore, the musketry fire from the crest of the position passed about the height of a man's shoulder on horseback. For that reason, during the temporary halt at Hanson's fall, these officers dismounted. Hanson's death was a great loss to the Southern cause. He was an able, conscientious, intrepid officer. Had he lived, he would have attained high rank.

Captain Robinson, of the battery before alluded to, made an independent report to the commander in chief, which, in a humorous vein, as is understood, reflected on the conduct of this division on account of their hasty retreats after the hill was captured and that massed artillery of fifty-eight pieces had attained full swing. This report caused at that time a great deal of bad feeling between the friends of General Bragg and the friends of General Breckinridge. As far as the conduct of officers and men was concerned in that division, made up of "Kentuckians, Tennesseans, and Louisianians," no criticism could be made. There never were troops, officers and men, that behaved with greater valor and gallantry during that trying ordeal. Under that artillery fire, with no protection from fortifications, there was nothing else to be done than to go to cover of woods as fast as possible. They were not panic-stricken, but readily rallied under the shelter of the woods. But this division needs no defense from any one, for in all the subsequent battles of that war—Chickanauga, Mission Ridge, and all the battles of the Atlanta campaign—their deeds of valor have been indelibly inscribed on the "tablets of fame."

On the 3d of January General Rosecrans had given no indications of an advance. General Wheeler, of the cavalry, however, reported that considerable reinforcements had arrived on the field. Under all the circumstances General Bragg decided to retire from his position on the morning of the 4th of January in the direction of Tullahoma. General Rosecrans gave no indications of following, and the campaign of 1862 ended by General Rosecrans's army going into winter quarters near Murfreesboro and the Confederate army near Tullahoma about thirty miles apart.

The above reminiscence, written at the request of friends, to me is one of the most stirring events of that war. The details of those events are indelibly impressed on my memory, and are substantially true.

Since the above was written this famous battlefield was during the first week of December, 1907, gone over and inspected on two separate days. As was to have been expected, the passage of forty-six years has made great changes in the landscape. Where once were woodland pastures are now cultivated fields; where once were open fields are often brush-wood thickets. The woodland where Breckinridge's Division was formed preparatory to the charge on the Federal position is a cultivated field. The buildings mentioned heretofore in that vicinity have been burned. The field through which the charge was made appears as it did on the day of the battle. The fence near which the gallant Hanson fell appears to be in the same position; but the point marked on the ground where he fell is wrong, and should be within fifty feet of the fence.

Now cross over Stone's River, stand at the monument near the position occupied by that mass of fifty-eight pieces of artillery that had been located that day in anticipation of an attack, view its commanding position over the ground through which that splendid division of Kentuckians, Tennesseans, and Louisianians made its famous charge (a position entirely hidden from view until the Federal position across the river had been carried), and it would seem a wonder that that gallant division, instead of losing only one-third of the number that went into battle, should not have been almost entirely annihilated during that three-quarters of an hour of actual fighting.

The records of war do not give an instance where troops showed greater valor or suffered greater comparative loss for the actual time of the conflict.

There were not many points of the battlefield of December 31 recognized; as it was passed over only once on the day of the battle. The Griscom House, the center of the large field hospital of the Federal wounded, was readily recognized, as was the relative position of the two turnpikes.

THE GALLANT PELHAM.

[Perhaps the last communication received from Col. James R. Randall, author of "Maryland, My Maryland," in the VETERAN office was in reference to a clipping inclosed from the paper he edited in New Orleans up to the time of his death. This clipping was a beautiful tribute to the young and gallant Pelham, the Alabama boy who won the praise of General Lee and his promotion to lieutenant colonel a month after his death. The article in question first appeared in the St. Louis Post Dispatch, the writer signing himself J. O'C.]

In the May Atlantic General Schaff continues his charming reminiscences entitled "The Spirit of Old West Point." and there is a touch of rare sentiment in what he says of John Pelham, who, he tells us, was mortally wounded near Kelly's Ford, Va., March 17, 1863: "Of all the men at West Point in my day, either as cadets or as officers, his name will possibly outlast all save Cushing's; and I have sometimes thought that the last dew will sparkle brighter on Pelham's memory. And that for two reasons: First, he was closely associated with Lee, whose towering fame, like a soft burning torch, will light the face of the Confederacy down the murky galleries of time, wooing atonement for the South at every step; and, secondly, poetry and sentiment, under some mysterious and inexorable impulse, seem loath to turn away from great displays of courage and sacrifice of life for a principle; most lovingly of all will they cherish the ashes of brilliant youth associated with failure. The romance of defeat has more vitality, I think, than the romance of victory. Like the morning-glory, it blooms freshest over ruins."

At Fredericksburg Pelham, in charge of Stuart's artillery, won Lee's admiration, and that soldier spoke of him in his dispatches as the "gallant Pelham," and so he is remembered. He has often been praised, but seldom with more genuine feeling than by his former friend and foe, who gives us this picture of him: "He was gracefully tall, fair, a beautiful dancer; it may well be asserted that nature was in a fine mood when she molded his clay. His eyes generally were cast thoughtfully down, and a little wrinkle on his brow gave just the faintest suggestion of a frown on his otherwise unclouded face. In the winter of 1863-64, while with the Army of the Potomac, more than once I traveled the road to Kelly's Ford, where he was killed, little dreaming of the height of his present fame. I have always thought of the circumstances connected with the coming home of his body to his widowed mother in Alabama as having about them all the beauty and mystery of night. It was on a night when the moon was full, and her still, white light lit the way by the cotton fields he knew so well and lay softly white on the roof and in the dooryard of home. His mother stood waiting for him on the doorstep, and as they bore him up to her she whispered through falling tears: 'Washed in the blood of the Lamb that was slain.' She is buried beside him in the little village graveyard at Jacksonville, Ala. He was but twenty-five years old."

There were a few exquisite memorial poems among the many worthless ones written during the Civil War, and that on the death of Pelham by J. R. Randall, author of the most notable lyric of the time, "Maryland, My Maryland," may take its place among the sweetest. Its style is old-fashioned; it is cumbered with classic allusions and conventional effects; but its simplicity, sincerity, and pathos prevail, and two or three happy phrases render it immortal. It is worth reading in connection with Schaff's tribute.

THE DEAD CANNONEER.

(Major Pelham, C. S. A., killed March 17, 1863.)

Just as the spring came laughing through the strife
With all its gorgeous cheer,
In the bright April of historic life
Fell the great cannoneer.

The wondrous lulling of a hero's breath
His bleeding country weeps;
Flushed in the alabaster arms of death,
Our young Marcellus sleeps.

Nobler and grander than the child of Rome
Curbing his chariot steeds,
The knightly scion of a Southern home
Dazzled the land with deeds.

Gentlest and bravest in the battle brunt,
The champion of the truth,
He bore his banner to the very front
Of our immortal youth.

A clang of sabers 'mid Virginian snow,
A fiery pang of shells,
And there's a wail of immemorial woe
In Alabama dells.

The pennon droops that led the sacred band
Across the crimson field;
The meteor blade shrinks from the nerveless hand
Over the spotless shield.

We gazed and gazed upon that beauteous face;
While round the lips and eyes,
Couched in their marble slumber, flashed the grace
Of a divine surprise.

O mother of a blessed soul on high!
Thy tears may soon be shed;
Think of thy boy with princes of the sky
Among the Southern dead!

How must he smile on this dull world beneath,
Fevered with swift renown—
He with the martyr's amaranthine wreath
Twining the victor's crown!

There is something of the same spirit seeking varied expression in John Esten Cooke's "O band in the pinewood, cease," a sort of protest against the music after Pelham died.

Colonel Randall added to this:

"It was my fortune to have been stationed a part of the time during the war at Selma, Ala., when the remains of the 'gallant Pelham' were brought there on the way to their final rest at Jacksonville. For an hour or more, pending the arrival of the train that was to carry that glorious but sad burden to his widowed mother, the people were permitted to look upon him through the glass of the coffin. He seemed to be asleep. The face was statuesque and unharmed. There was a lovely smile around his lips, and the half-opened eyes were just as described in the poem. * * *

"Jacksonville is hallowed as the grave of the 'gallant Pelham,' and once when a mob became unruly and menacing, where the officers of the law were powerless, the battle flag of the valiant youth, advanced by a standard bearer, put the mutineers to flight. Even in death he was victorious."

GEN. R. E. LEE TO A CARELESS STUDENT.

BY REV. D. B. STROUSE, SALEM, VA.

In the session of 1866-67, when Washington and Lee University was crowded with students, General Lee being its President, a young man went there from North Carolina and entered the Academic Department. He was about eighteen years old and an honorable, gallant fellow. When he called on General Lee in his office, the General asked him if he was related to Mr. M—, of North Carolina, to which the young man replied: "I am his son." General Lee told him that he was glad to see him, and stated that he was entertained with great hospitality by his father and mother one night during the war. M— replied that his parents frequently referred to that incident with much pleasure.

M— was full of fun and loved society; he studied but little and failed to attend many of his recitations. His room adjoined mine and I was fond of him, and more than once remonstrated with him about the neglect of his studies (being myself a hard student), but, so far as I could see, to no purpose.

One day, after the end of the first month of the session, he opened my door and invited me to his room. I saw that he had been weeping, and asked him whether he had ill tidings from home. He said that he had not; but, wiping his eyes, he told me in a semi-confidential way that one of the negro porters brought him a message that morning saying that General Lee wanted to see him when he had leisure. He went to General Lee's office. The General received him very kindly, gave him a seat, and inquired about his father and mother.

The General then told him that he had been looking over the reports of the young gentlemen of the university for the preceding month, and he wanted to speak to him about his before sending it away. Then he picked up the report, which was lying by itself.

He then said that it was difficult to prevent mistakes from sometimes getting into the reports. The General called attention to his very low grade in Latin, and asked: "Do you think you are entitled to no higher grade than that?" He replied that he had not studied Latin as he should have done, and could not claim that it was incorrect.

General Lee then took the different studies, giving the grade in each, all of which grades were very low. He asked Mr. M— in each case whether he thought the grade as high as he should have had. He replied that he had no doubt it was, confessing that he had not given the attention to his studies which he should have done, and General Lee expressed much regret.

Finally he called the young gentleman's attention to the very large number of unexcused class absences with which he was charged, and asked him whether he thought he had missed so many recitations without excuse. He admitted that he had not attended his recitations as he should have done.

His confession seemed to make General Lee very sad indeed, and he sat in silent thought for some time. He then said that if he mailed the report to his parents it would give them great pain, and his recollection of them was such that he would not like to inflict upon them the sorrow. On the other hand, he said that if the reports were published in the university catalogues they would be sent monthly to parents and guardians. He then added: "I do not know what to do." General Lee sat for some time in deep thought, and then gently he began to tear the report into strips one by one and crumpled the pieces between his two hands and threw them into the wastebasket.

Mr. M— told me he broke down entirely and wept. As soon as he became quiet General Lee said to him: "Son, we cannot undo the past; that is forever gone; but the future is in our hands, and you can so pursue your studies and attend your recitations from now on that it will give me real pleasure to send your reports to your parents, and they will be greatly pleased when they receive them."

He said to me that he rose to his feet and extended his hand to General Lee, saying: "General, I will do it."

General Lee took his hand and told him that his assurance was all that he wished; that, having done so little during the first month, he would be at a disadvantage, and would have to study very hard and review much, but that he must not be discouraged.

The matter was never afterwards referred to by Mr. M— or by me, but I am very sure that General Lee was never again made sad by one of his reports.

THE ELECTRICAL SUBMARINE MINE—1861-65.

BY CAPT. HUNTER DAVIDSON, PURAYU, PARAGUAY.

I have lately received a copy of "Submarine Boats, Mines, Torpedoes," by Commander M. F. Sueter, Royal Navy, in which the author, as well as others who have undertaken similar works, seems to ignore almost entirely the part taken by the Confederate States in torpedo warfare, that arm of warfare which to-day has developed into the greatest means of coast defense existing and may become one of the greatest in offense.

I may here start out with the assertion that to the Confederate States of America (1861-65) was due the first successful application of torpedoes in time of war, and to the department under my command was due the first successful application of the electric submarine mine, also the only successful use of the offensive torpedo—that is to say, without the loss of the attacking party—was made by myself, as may be seen farther on.

I have often thought since our second American Revolution that authors and editors have taken not only an unfair advantage of the weaknesses of the South after the war but a singular unmanliness in depreciating or treating with indifference whatever was achieved by the South.

The North overpowered us, and even foreigners wish to make it appear that the North overpowered all the glory also. Much brag and bluster was to be expected on the part of the North; but surely impartial history should be looked for from intelligent foreigners.

That most intelligent Secretary of the Navy of the Confederate States and formerly United States Senator and Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs for many years, Mr. Stephen R. Mallory, saw very early in the second revolution that we required every means which civilization would permit to defend ourselves against an enemy many times our superior in numbers and resources, and so his attention was given to torpedoes. Every idea or invention from whatever source was eagerly seized upon and tested. The distinguished Capt. M. F. Maury, "The Geographer of the Sea," was placed in command of torpedo experiments, with myself as his assistant; but this stage of our efforts was very crude and experimental for want of means. Captain Maury was soon detached and ordered to Europe, and I was placed in command of the corps.

Up to this time electricity as applied to the explosion of submarine mines was very little understood, and the leading man in electrical matters, the chief of the Confederate States Telegraph Department, Dr. Morris, could give no information, and deprecated the idea of making experiments which he considered could have no favorable results. The best that Maury was enabled to do with the means at his command was in the use of a Wollaston battery which required thirty-six gallons of dilute sulphuric acid to explode a charge a short distance off with the best of conducting cables. One can imagine the clumsiness and inefficiency of such means.

No tanks had been designed or constructed especially for mines. Old boilers and such like picked up at random and without cables and anchors were placed in the river; but the freshets rolled them over and took them downstream, breaking connections, etc. But all this was owing to our imperfect means and the determined opposition of some and sneering indifference of the rest to torpedo warfare in general, except the intelligent and laborious Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Mallory.

When I took charge of the work, my friends begged me to give it up and go aboard ship. "It wasn't worthy of a good officer to engage in such nonsense." "Torpedo warfare had never been successful." "It wasn't right to waste the material of our poor country in such more than doubtful experiments," etc. Whenever I called on the chief of ordnance for powder, he would not receive me. It was only by a positive written order from Mr. Mallory that I could obtain it. Captain Maury did not have time to make experiments to test the effect of gunpowder of different kinds at different depths or, in fact, to make experiments at all. He only placed the tanks; but what he did do was to show the necessity for elaborate experiments and designs.

It was with these considerations that I gave all that was best in me to the study of the question. Nothing discouraged me so much as the opposition of my friends, men whom I loved and respected. The opposition of others I did not care for so long as Mr. Mallory was favorably impressed with the work.

I brought to bear some mechanical talent, for I had invented a boat apparatus which I used successfully to save life at sea, which the United States Congress by unanimous vote had purchased. I was young, energetic, strong, and healthy.

It is not necessary to say anything here in honor of Matthew F. Maury. He is too well known to the world for his rare abilities and purity of character, and we all loved him as he deserved.

When I had worked out the best plan I could devise, it was submitted to Mr. Mallory (Secretary of the Navy) and approved. I have no means in this remote, secluded region of giving plans or even illustrations in order that the public in general may understand my experiments. Moreover, my object in this article is only to prove in accordance with history my claim to having been the first to make electrical torpedo mines successful in actual warfare—that is, according to all customs, the inventor of such mines, and to give some unknown but important facts of history in relation thereto.

The electrical mines (tanks) which were used in the Confederacy and their fixtures were made in the great Tredegar Works in Richmond, according to special designs. Anchors were designed and attached to these mines, so that they never moved when placed. For a depth of five or six fathoms they contained eighteen hundred pounds of rifle powder, the conditions that obtained where the gunboat Commodore Jones was completely destroyed on the James River, Virginia.

The insulated cable had to be brought through the blockade at great risk and expense, and frequent losses would stop the work. After many experiments, a galvanic battery was designed capable of exploding a mine at any reasonable distance and which one man could carry from station to station under his arm, instead of the Wollaston battery weighing upward of a ton, as one only of its defects.

It was with the means as mentioned that in the month of May, 1864, events occurred which had an important bearing upon the war and belong to history.

The fleet of Rear Admiral S. P. Lee, U. S. N., was coming up the James River, accompanied by transport with stores, etc., to cooperate with Gen. B. F. Butler in the attack on Drury's Bluff, the "key to Richmond." Of course I had had warning through the signal corps; and suspecting that some of the many negroes prowling about and who knew of my having placed mines in the river would inform the fleet, I had the wires and galvanic battery shifted over to the other side of the river in a swamp, where the enemy would not suspect anything.

The fleet approached, dragging for mines and with an armed party marching along the shore supporting the launches. Presently the fleet and the dragging stopped, seemingly doubtful as to what conditions they were approaching, and sent the Commodore Jones ahead to explore. She was permitted to pass over the mines by us, as we wanted to get the flagship or a monitor, and thought they would come on; but she dropped down again, and Mr. Peter Smith, of York River, Va., one of the bravest men I have ever met and who held the wires, believing it would be the best chance when she was over the mine again, closed the circuit, and effected a complete destruction in the presence of the whole fleet.

And now comes the important part of this event. Had it been only the destruction of a gunboat, the event might be passed, as many another at that period; but the fleet which was hurrying up the river to support B. F. Butler in his famous dash on Richmond (see Porter, p. 471) immediately dropped down again, and did not get so high up again for nine days.

A great fleet with transports repulsed by electrical submarine mines! Butler made his attack, and was badly defeated because the gunners from Drury's Bluff batteries helped to defeat him, which they could not have done had the fleet been enabled to pass the electrical submarine mines.

Mr. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy, wrote to me of this event, "Your repulse of the Federal fleet by means of submarine electrical mines at Deep Bottom, where Grant crossed over to Petersburg afterwards, has saved Richmond," and further on remarked: "I always considered your torpedo division as equal to any division in our army."

Like many another poor Confederate, after the Revolution I felt disgusted with everything and knew the folly of my writing about the war, and so the foregoing facts have never been published that I know of. Admiral D. D. Porter, in his "Naval History of the Civil War," passes the occurrence over slightly. He must have seen the connection of facts. I suspect he did not want to acknowledge the repulse of a Federal fleet and an army corps as the effects of one torpedo mine.

Dr. Schart, in his "Naval History of the Confederate States," does not seem to realize the relative importance of those events. Commander Sueter, Royal Navy, in his late work, page 270, calls the vessel destroyed the Commodore James, and says it was on the Roanoke River, which deprives the event of its peculiar importance and historical interest.

A short time after the repulse of the Federal fleet, and when it was still in the river below, I had occasion, by orders of course, to go down with a flag of truce for the purpose of communicating with a Federal flag of truce boat anchored below the fleet. I thought the fleet had gone far below, but to my surprise when turning a bend in the river suddenly I came upon them; and although my flag of truce was flying, they opened upon me immediately. One ball passed so close to my head that I could feel the wind from it. Of course I rounded to in short time, and Captain Lamson, chief of staff, whom I knew and liked before the war, came out to me in a large boat well armed.

He brought a message from the gallant admiral that he did not acknowledge I was "engaged in civilized or legitimate warfare;" and if I came down again, he would not treat me even as a prisoner of war. Among other things I particularly and slowly answered: "Respice finem." In less than six months all the Federal gunboats were armed with torpedoes.

The gallant admiral thought me a savage for repulsing his fleet in broad daylight, and yet it was all right for Grant to blow up at the dead of night sleeping, unarmed, unconscious men at Petersburg with a mine.

Captain Mahan, the naval historian, as late as in The Hague Conference, denounced submarine mines as "inhuman and cruel," and yet he did not broach the subject of Grant's sub-terra mines. How much difference in this world between meum and tuum!

A person reading carefully the work of Commander Sueter, Royal Navy, 1907, cannot help thinking that he displays an intentional spirit of unfairness toward the Confederates. He is obliged to leave one to infer that the Confederates invented electrical submarine mines, but he does not say so. He misplaces facts and names and says the mines were made in England, but he never fails to mention names and facts if they relate to the Federal side. He appears to be well up in torpedoes, but unfit to be a historian.

In another branch of torpedo warfare Commander Sueter, 1907, had a plain opportunity of saying something instructive to torpedo history and complimentary to the Confederates (see Admiral Porter's "Naval History of the Civil War," pp. 473, 474); but he gives the shortest possible notice of what the Confederates did with offensive torpedoes, whilst on the same pages (271, 272) he goes into detail, although with justice, on the Cushing affair, and leaves the reader to suppose that was exceptional. The facts are that my attack on the Minnesota (flagship) was before Cushing's destruction of the Raleigh and set him the example. Yet Commander Sueter, Royal Navy, puts Cushing's before mine and gives mine but a passing notice. I had to go upward of a hundred miles outside our lines by river, patrolled by Federal gunboats, and to pass through the whole Federal fleet close to and hailed by many of them before I reached the flagship Minnesota. She was well lighted and had guarding her a gunboat, also well lighted and attached to her stern by a small line. She was well prepared for defense; but owing to the cowardice of those on the gunboat my boat was not pursued, as could and should have been done, for after the explosion of the torpedo against the Minnesota two of the gunboat's men suddenly appeared on deck. Foreseeing a chase, I fired my revolver at them, and they disappeared without even letting go their line, as they had ample time to do when my boat had backed off from the Minnesota, and of course had to stop in order to go ahead again, as her single cylinder engine "caught on the center," and there had to wait, about fifty yards' distant, under the frigate's fire until Engineer Wright, one of "the bravest of the brave," crawled into the engine in the dark and pulled her off the center, and for which he was promoted two grades.

As we shot ahead close to the gunboat I did not see a man on her deck. The marines of the frigate peppered us all over. There was hardly a square foot on the little boat not marked by a bullet, and my hat and clothes were perforated; but no damage whatever was done except the breaking of my left thumb when a shot from a big gun passing close under and lifting our stern high out of the water threw me against the iron shield over the man at the helm. This little shield, 3x16 inches, over the one man was the only protection we had, and the boat differed in no sense from any other steam launch except as to her torpedo pole, etc.

Believing we would of course be pursued the long distance up the river we had to go, I determined it would be best to throw the enemy off the scent if possible; and so instead of steering directly toward home we steered directly opposite—that is, toward Norfolk—and turned round for home when out of sight. It did throw them off the scent. We hid in the creeks, unshipped the funnel, and covered the boat with branches in the daytime. Several times we saw the Federal gunboats behind us. This was the only instance during the war that I know of where offensive torpedoes were used successfully without the loss of the attacking party.

And now comes a little piece of interesting history.

One will very naturally ask why, if the foregoing statements are correct, it is that President Jefferson Davis never once mentions Captain Davidson's name nor alludes to anything he did during the war in his "Rise and Fall of the Confederate States."

He had to nominate me for my first promotion by Congress "for gallantry" and later to nominate me again when the war suddenly terminated and prevented confirmation. How, then, was this inconsistency?

Well, I knew Mr. Davis when he was Secretary of War and sometime Secretary of the Navy in General Pierce's Cabinet, and later when he was Senator and my bill was before Congress, when my invention was purchased by unanimous vote for saving life at sea. I had listened to Mr. Davis when speaking with much attention, for I had an all-absorbing interest in our great men and had formed my opinion of him as a leader in great affairs.

On one occasion in a cloakroom of the Senate, where I had been talking to Senator J. A. Pearce, he turned and engaged in a few moments' conversation with Mr. S. A. Douglas, and suddenly exclaimed, "O, Douglas, let Davis alone; it's no good stirring him up in this way," at which Mr. Douglas chuckled and seemed much tickled. All this went to form my opinion of Mr. Davis, and so one day, unfortunately in private conversation, just as our war was commencing I said to a friend: "We will never succeed with Mr. Davis as President." I know that this remark came to his ears.

On two occasions during the war he treated me with marked discourtesy, although on one of these occasions Gen. R. E. Lee was present and treated me with kindness. When he heard of the attack on the Minnesota, he merely exclaimed, "Humph, why didn't he blow her up?" and when he heard of the repulse of the Federal fleet on the James River, he made no comment whatever.

In his "Rise and Fall of the Confederate States," Mr. Davis never alludes to my services, but praises the performances of his dear friend, General Rains, whom he favored in every way possible, but whose only performance was a notable event of the war—viz., General Rains had put into the James River floating spar torpedoes with sensitive fuses anchored just under the surface. In several official communications I had warned Mr. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy, against these torpedoes as dangerous alike to friend and foe; but he had to give way to the President's orders.

Just as the war was closing a flag of truce was sent down from Richmond with seven hundred Federal prisoners on board. The boat (the Shultz) passed General Rains's torpedo all right going down, and the seven hundred Federal prisoners escaped; but on returning she struck the spar torpedo and was blown to pieces. What a howl, like that of the murder of Lincoln, there would have been in the North if that boat had struck the torpedo going down! She was but a shell of a boat, and possibly nine-tenths of the Federal officers and men would have been murdered, and by whom? Nor does Mr. Davis mention the amusing performances of General Rains in the Florida Seminole war with torpedoes and sensitive fuses concealed under blankets to attract and catch the Indians. But the biter was bit, and the Indians caught him and peppered him with lead. He was daft on sensitive fuses, and his experiments were generally disastrous.

Mr. Davis does not mention these facts, although he goes so closely into torpedo warfare as to say: "In torpedo warfare all that was necessary was a demijohn of gunpowder and a sensitive fuse." (See page 208, Volume II., "Rise and Fall of the Confederate States.") It is with great reluctance that I allude to Mr. Davis. I who have fought and bled in that war have the same old feelings of veneration and love for the dear old South and all that concerns it; but I feel at the same time that I have a reputation, as well as Mr. Davis and others, to defend, and my descendants demand it of me.

After the publication of Mr. Davis's "Rise and Fall," I wrote a polite letter to him calling his attention to his omissions. His reply to me was far from being ingenuous, and—I don't care to go farther, but if you like will mail you the correspondence. This little circumstance is only a straw, but, like many a mere personal feeling, has wrecked the prospects of a nation.

The motive for this article is the late work of Commander Sueter, R. N. I had given up interest in all such matters; and although indignant still at times, aroused by flagrant misrepresentations of the history of the war, I had determined to keep quiet. The work of Commander Sueter has been too much for me, and I have commenced and have gone through and am prepared to give more detailed matter if desired. I hope the article may be of interest to your greatly esteemed journal.

A recent article in a so-called scientific journal of New York that is a persistent enemy of the torpedo gives us food for reflection. After endeavoring to prove that the torpedo does not hold its own as against the gun, that journal remarks that in time of war fleets will not approach the coast and take unnecessary risks. What an evident contradiction and what a tribute to the torpedo!

Looking back over the forty-four years since the Federal fleet was repulsed on the James River, Virginia, by electrical mines, their first effective use in time of war, we must believe that the development of the torpedo has fully kept pace with the development of the battleship. What nation would dare to dispense with the torpedo to-day?

In 1864 I was "not considered as engaged in civilized or legitimate warfare," and even as late as The Hague Conference Captain Mahan considered sea mines as "cruel and inhuman;" but of course Grant at the "Crater" in Petersburg was all right.

If torpedoes do nothing more than keep the enemy off from our coast, what an incalculable assistance to our defenses and an established and reliable arm of warfare! But there are certain signs that the torpedo is not going to be satisfied in resting at the bottom of harbors, etc. It will assume the offensive, and ships will be constructed especially to convey the submarine torpedo boat into action with the battleship. More than half the weather at sea will be smooth enough to use these boats. Battleships will be well battered and placed out of action by the gun, but will go down with the first tap of the torpedo. Think of a battleship costing ten millions and carrying a thousand or more men going down at once, and what ship will stop for one moment to save lives when the victory is at stake?

That scientific journal thinks that the battleship will keep off the coasts, eh? But if the mountain won't come to Mahomet, Mahomet will go to the mountain. I have been a firm believer in torpedoes, offensive and defensive, since 1864 and they are more proportionately in evidence to-day than ever. There is too much sentimentality in The Hague Conference. "War is all hell— at best," said Sherman. Compassion should be limited to women and children, the sick and the disabled, then "carry the war into Africa."

[In printing the foregoing criticisms of President Davis, the VETERAN breaks its rule. The considerations are that Captain Davidson has been long absent in a far-away land. He did marvelous service for the Confederacy, and it may be the President was at fault. The VETERAN, however, stands for the Confederate President officially and personally as a great and good man. None are perfect.—ED. VETERAN.]

ALBERT SIDNEY JOHNSTON'S DUEL.

BY MAJ. BEN C. TRUMAN.

It was the privilege of the writer to once spend several hours in the presence of the distinguished soldier, Albert Sidney Johnston, some fifty years ago, upon the eve of his descent upon Utah, and I have never forgotten the impression made. He was very large and massive in figure, and finely proportioned. He measured six feet two inches in height, and had flesh to give him perfect symmetry. His face was large, broad, and high, and beamed with a look of striking benignity. His features were handsomely molded. He was very straight, and carried himself with grace and lofty and simple dignity. His whole appearance indicated in a marked degree power, decision, serenity, thought, benevolence. I thought him then at first blush, and thought it unvaryingly afterwards, and think now in the hallowed memory of his noble manhood, made sacred by the consecration of his thrilling and heroic death for the Southern cause, that he was one of the sweetest and most august men I ever met. His character was entrancing in pure nobility. It was that gentle politeness that won everybody who approached him and endeared him to his people.

I have been informed by Confederate officers who knew him well that he was at all times the thorough American gentleman and in the dread carnage of the field the incarnation of the splendid warrior. Said Lieut. Col. John B. Richardson, of the Washington Artillery of New Orleans, to me once some years ago in discussing Johnston: "He always rode large and magnificent horses. His favorite steed was a gray. And when he was mounted upon the noble animal, he was the beau ideal of a general. His firm, graceful seat in the saddle, his majestic proportions, his soldierly carriage, his handsome uniform, his noble countenance, the radiant bearing of knightly chivalry that marked every movement and features—all leave a proud remembrance of gallant and striking manhood for those to dwell upon who knew and loved him."

He was killed about twelve o'clock in the first day's fight at Shiloh, April 6, 1862; and when the historian sits to write what will be the unimpassioned history of the turbulent Civil War, he will lovingly dwell upon no character more shining, illustrious, and exalted, upon no hero more luminous for chivalry, genius, and sublime manhood, than Albert Sidney Johnston.

One of the bravest men that ever lived was Felix Huston, of Texas, who in 1836 commanded the army in the field of the Lone Star State. Probably his nearest counterpart since was Gen. Joe Hooker. Huston was as oratorically magnetic and impassioned as Patrick Henry, E. D. Baker, or Thomas Starr King, as intrepid as Custer, Sheridan, or Kilpatrick, and as fond of wine and women as Luther Magruder or Van Dorn. And while he was truly a tactician, discipline with this rollicking Hotspur was a lost or an unknown art.

About this time Albert Sidney Johnston was adjutant general of the Army of the Republic of Texas during the administration of President Sam Houston. This was subsequent to the battle of San Jacinto, and the Texans were encamped on that territory lying between Galveston Island and Indianola. Thomas J. Morgan and George W. Morgan, of Ohio, who were colonels of Ohio regiments during the Mexican War, and who were general officers during the rebellion on the Federal side, were officers of the army of the Lone Star State in 1836. The latter is now living at Mt. Vernon, Ohio.

One day in November, 1836, Albert Sidney Johnston was directed to assume command of the Texan army, much to his own surprise and much against his wish. Indeed, he called at once upon President Houston and stated that he would greatly prefer to remain undisturbed, and incidentally declared that the heroic army of the Texas Republic would be the loser thereby. But Houston and Congress had decided to place Johnston in command, and to accept the resignation of the gallant Huston if necessary. Huston at once turned over his command to Johnston, and upon meeting his successor raised his cap and extended his hand pleasantly and otherwise exhibited evidences of real or seeming friendship, all of which was cordially and courteously accepted.

Upon the following evening Huston invited Johnston and his staff to supper, which was as fine as could be given; and wines, cigars, mirth, and melody made the time pass merrily until the so-called witching hour when Johnston and his staff took their leave. In exactly twenty minutes afterwards, however, Major Izzard, of Huston's staff, called at Johnston's quarters and presented the following note: "General Huston has the honor to present his compliments to General Johnston, and begs to assure him that there is no man in the Republic of Texas under whom he would be more proud to serve; but that the President and Congress had put upon him an insult; and as he could not demand that satisfaction of the President and Congress as he would wish, he had the honor to request that General Johnston as their representative would state when it would be convenient for him to meet General Huston on the field of honor, and that Major Izzard was authorized to return with a reply."

In proportion to its population no section of country on earth contained so many able, ambitious, gallant, and chivalrous men as the Republic of Texas at that time. And of course dueling, or rather the code of the duelo, was a high and honored custom, if not, indeed, the law of the land; and many of the best men of the famous new republic had fallen victims to its stern requirements. Therefore Johnston had only one thing to do—accept Huston's mean, uncavalrous, uncalled-for challenge. True, he had given his predecessor no earthly offense. On the contrary, he had accepted his invitation to join him at a well-served repast, had made merry with his host until midnight, and each had wished the other well at parting. Still, the requirements of polished barbarism or the fear of being "posted" compelled a brave, good man to weaken for the first and only time, and he replied as follows: "General Johnston reciprocates the sentiments so kindly expressed by General Huston, and begs to inform him through Colonel Moorehouse that it will afford the general commanding pleasure to meet General Huston on the west bank of La Baca on the following morning at a point to be determined by their respective friends."

"This is an outrage," said Colonel Moorehouse to Major Izzard.

"I know it," responded the latter.

"General Johnston never pulled a hair trigger in his life, while General Huston can put a pistol ball into a dollar thrown into the air. General Johnston is inviting murder."

"Sir!"

"Yes, sir; I mean what I say. But he is a splendid shot with a rifle, and I shall advise him to use that weapon."

"The rifle is not allowed by the code, Colonel Moorehouse."

"I believe you are right," responded the Colonel; "but it is unfortunate that the only brace of dueling pistols in camp is owned by General Huston."

This was true, and it was the opinion of all that Johnston would not select rifles as weapons, as he was the soul of honor, and would rather surrender his life than take the very advantage that his rival in a state of great mortification might willingly use over him. The only pocket case of instruments in camp was owned by Assistant Surgeon Coates, and this case was borrowed at about five in the morning by Medical Director Ezra Reed on the pretext that a soldier had mashed a finger.

But "Bang!" "Bang!" was heard an hour later, and the whole camp made a break for the river, shouting: "Johnston and Huston are fighting!"

And so they were on the west side of the river.

At the first fire the ball from Johnston's weapon cut a twig from a tree, which fell at Huston's feet, while the ball from Huston's pistol went through the lapel of his opponent's coat. Huston picked up the twig and said: "That was a capital shot, General."

"So was this," serenely responded Johnston, running his thumb through the hole in his coat: "much better than mine, I apprehend."

"You shall have another chance, then, General."

"All right, my friend, if it is strictly agreeable to you. Gentlemen, load again."

The principals again fired, Huston's missile going no one knew where and Johnston's hitting the ground a few feet in front of his antagonist and scattering some dirt on the clothes of the latter. At the third shot Johnston missed, and the flint of Huston's pistol failed to strike fire in consequence of the weakness of the spring, at which Huston sat down at the root of a tree and braced the spring with a wedge. They then fired again, and Johnston was shot through the hip and fell as if dead. But he at once raised himself on his elbow and said: "Gentlemen, I had no grievance against General Huston whatever, and I call upon you all to bear witness that this meeting has been conducted according to the laws of honor."

General Johnston was then lifted up tenderly by Colonel Moorehouse and Dr. Reed and borne from the field; and although he suffered great pain physically, it was nothing compared with the remorse that Huston carried with him to his deathbed, for there was no earthly cause for the challenge, as Johnston had done him no wrong. Further, the challenged man might have chosen rifles, and was strongly urged to do so by Colonel Moorehouse; but declined because he was an expert shot with such a weapon.

In speaking of the duel sometime afterwards Huston said to Gen. John H. King, who commanded the regulars in the Atlanta campaign and who lately died in Washington of pneumonia: "There are two kinds of cowards in this world—the brave coward is one of them. In our duel in 1836 Albert Sidney Johnston was one, and so was I. I knew that he had put upon me no wrong, and that out of respect for me he had assumed command of the army with reluctance. I had no more right to challenge him to mortal combat than I have to challenge you. It was a shameful piece of business, and I wouldn't do it again under any circumstances. I was what may be termed a brave coward, if I may coin the name. And so was Johnston in accepting my challenge. I have reproached myself many times for my attitude. I invited the General to supper, treated him cordially, and in half an hour afterwards challenged him to mortal combat. And he not only accepted it, but named six o'clock the following morning as the hour of meeting and selected pistols instead of guns. Why, when I reflect upon the circumstance, I hate myself, for the General was an expert with the rifle, but didn't know a dueling pistol from a sailor's knot. I owned the only dueling pistols in camp, and could hit the ace of diamonds at dueling distance at the drop of a handkerchief. And I kept setting him up until I hit him. Why, that one act blackened all the good ones of my life. But I couldn't challenge Congress; and President Houston, although a duelist, was too far above me in rank. Well, thank God, I didn't kill him. And, mark my word, Lieutenant King, some day, if occasion requires it, Albert Sidney Johnston will display a gallantry that may possibly carry him suddenly to his grave."

ABOUT DAVID O. DODD.

BY J. A. GILLILAND, WARRENSBURG, MO.

The David O. Dodd Chapter, U. D. C., of Little Rock, Ark., holds memorial services on the birthdays of David O. Dodd, who was executed there January 8, 1864.

There seems to be a question as to whether or not he was offered his life if he would reveal the names of the men who made the plot, and I think I can make it clear that he was.

As I am possibly the only person now living who knows about it, I should have written long ago. I was taken to the Little Rock prison in April, 1864.

After the war I returned home, and very soon thereafter, before I had ever heard of Dodd's execution, I met a Federal soldier, Will Smith, and we became quite good friends. When he found that I had been in prison at Little Rock, he told me about the capture and execution of young Dodd. He was a soldier in General Steele's command at the time of Dodd's capture and execution. Smith's story of the capture corresponds exactly with the account given in the VETERAN of December, 1905. He was present at Dodd's trial, and said he was offered his life more than once. The day of the execution General Steele told Dodd that he knew he did not make that plot and if he would reveal the names of the men who did make it he would pledge him his word and honor in the presence of all the soldiers and citizens present that neither his life nor the lives of the men who made the plot should be taken. Smith said the soldiers were mad because the boy was executed. They said he was too brave a boy to die.

I would not rob Sam Davis of any of the honors he is receiving at the hands of the South, for he deserves them all. But I think David O. Dodd is as grand a hero as Sam Davis or any other boy or man who ever gave his life for his country, and he should receive the same recognition from the people of the South. His name should be recorded on the pages of history as a hero of the South.

SIXTY-SECOND VIRGINIA AT NEW MARKET.

BY JASPER W. HARRIS, MONTROSE, VA.

In Rev. Giles Cook's sketch of the fight at New Market he recalls some facts that I send you. Sigel came up to New Market on the 14th of May, 1864, and was met by Imboden's Brigade and held there until after night. It was very dark. I took twenty men and crawled up close to their line and fired into their faces. They moved back about a mile below the town. Then we moved about five miles and met General Breckinridge, when we all came back together to the same position that we had on the 14th. On the 15th, soon after daylight, we commenced shelling them, and they returned the artillery fire, keeping it up until about nine o'clock. Our regiment, the 62d Virginia, was attached to General Wharton's Brigade, and we were formed in line. The 51st Virginia was on the left of the 62d and the 62d on the left of the M. I. Cadets, extending to the right of the Staunton Pike. Our regiment was on the left of the pike. We marched to the lower side of New Market, then we were ordered to charge.

"A CRITICAL NARRATIVE."

BY LIEUT. GEN. ALEX. P. STEWART.

My attention has been called to some statements made in a book published in 1907 by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, entitled "Military Memoirs of a Confederate. A Critical Narrative," by E. P. Alexander, brigadier general in the Confederate army, chief of artillery Longstreet's Corps.

These statements are made in Chapter XXIII., pages 578, 579, and constitute very serious charges against Gen. B. F. Cheatham and myself, which, if true, should have subjected us both to the severest penalties. So far as I am individually concerned, they are absolutely false and without foundation. I do not believe they are true so far as General Cheatham is concerned.

Describing the events of the Confederate war that took place in the fall of 1864, the campaign made by Gen. John B. Hood, in command of the Army of Tennessee, into Tennessee and his lamentable failure to attack the enemy near Spring Hill, Tenn., during the afternoon and night of November 29, 1864, the writer says:

"The issue at stake was now lost by the noncompliance with orders of General Cheatham, commanding one of Hood's Corps.

"Schofield had taken position on the north side of Duck River, opposing Hood's crossing. Hood left Lee's Corps to demonstrate against Schofield, while he threw a pontoon bridge across the river three miles above, and crossed Cheatham's and Stewart's Corps, which marched to Spring Hill on the Franklin Pike, twelve miles in Schofield's rear, arriving about 3 P.M. This place was held by the second division of the 4th Corps, about four thousand strong. Hood's force was about eighteen thousand infantry. Hood took Cheatham with Cleburne, a division commander, within sight of the pike, along which the enemy could now be seen retreating at double-quick with wagons in a trot, and gave explicit orders for an immediate attack and occupation of the pike. Similar orders, too, were given to Stewart's Corps; and when Hood found later that nothing was being done, he sent more messages by staff officers, which also failed of effect. The head of Schofield's infantry arrived about nine o'clock, and passed unmolested except by some random picket shots to which they made no reply. * * *

"A few days after Cheatham frankly admitted his delinquency. It was rumored that both he and General Stewart had that evening absented themselves from their divisions. Both had been often distinguished for gallantry, and Hood now overlooked it, believing it had been a lesson not to be forgotten. Nevertheless it proved the death blow to Hood's army."

In reply to this remarkable tissue of false statements I quote from Series I., Volume XLV., Part I., serial No. 93 of the "Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies," pages 712, 713:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF TENNESSEE, NEAR SMITH-FIELD DEPOT, N. C., April 3, 1865.

"Sir: In my report of the operations of my corps during my campaign made by General Hood into Tennessee I omitted the details of what transpired near Spring Hill during the afternoon and night of the 29th of November, 1864. I respectfully submit the following statement and ask that it be filed as a part of my report.

"On the morning of November 29 General Hood moved with Cheatham's Corps and mine and Johnson's Division of Lee's Corps (the latter reporting to me), Cheatham's Corps in advance. We made a forced march to get in the rear of the enemy. In the course of the afternoon, about three or four o'clock, I reached Rutherford's Creek as Cheatham's rear division was crossing. I received orders to halt and form on the south side of the creek, my right to rest on or near the creek, so as to move down the creek if necessary. Subsequently I received an order to send a division across the creek, and finally between sunset and dark an order was received to cross the creek, leaving a division on the south side. Edward Johnson's Division, being in the rear, was designated to remain. Riding in advance of the column about dark, I found General Hood some half a mile from the creek and about as far west of the road on which we were marching and which led to Spring Hill.

"The commanding general gave me a young man of the neighborhood as a guide and told me to move on and place my right across the pike beyond Spring Hill, 'your left,' he added, 'extending down this way.' This would have placed my line in the rear of Cheatham's, except that my right would have extended beyond his. The guide informed me that at a certain point the road made a sudden turn to the left, going into Spring Hill; that from this bend there used to be a road leading across to the pike, meeting it at the tollgate some mile and a half beyond Spring Hill toward Franklin. I told him if he could find it that was the right road. Arriving at the bend of the road, we passed through a large gateway, taking what appeared in the darkness to be an indistinct path. Within a short distance I found General Forrest's headquarters, and stopped to ascertain the position of his pickets covering Cheatham's right and of the enemy. He informed me that his scouts reported the enemy leaving the direct pike, leading from Spring Hill to Franklin and Nashville, and taking the one down Carter's Creek. While in conversation with him I was informed that a staff officer from General Hood had come up and halted the column. It turned out to be a staff (engineer) officer of General Cheatham's, who informed me that General Hood had sent him to place me in position.

"It striking me as strange that the commanding general should send an officer not of his own staff on this errand, or indeed any one, as he had given directions to me in person, I inquired of the officer if he had seen General Hood since I had. He replied that he had just come from General Hood, and that the reason why he was sent to me was that I was to go into position on General Brown's right (the right of Cheatham's Corps), and he and General Brown had been over the ground by daylight. Thinking it possible the commanding general had changed his mind as to what he wished me to do, I concluded it was proper to be governed by the directions of this staff officer, and therefore returned to the road and moved on toward Spring Hill. Arriving near the line of Brown's Division, General Brown explained his position, which was oblique to the pike, his right being farther from it than his left.

"It was evident that if my command were marched up and formed on his right (it being now a late hour) it would require all night to accomplish it, and the line, instead of extending across the pike, would bear away from it. Feeling satisfied there was a mistake, I directed the troops to be bivouacked while I rode back to find the commanding general to explain my situation and get further instructions. On arriving at his quarters I inquired of him if he had sent this officer of General Cheatham's staff to place me in position. He replied that he had. I next inquired if he had changed his mind as to what he wished me to do. He replied that he had not. 'But,' said he, 'the fact is, General Cheatham has been here and represented that somebody ought to be on Brown's right. I explained to him that in the uncertainty I was in I had directed the troops, who had been marching rapidly since daylight (and it was now 11 P.M.), to be placed in bivouac, and had come to report. He remarked in substance that it was not material, to let the men rest, and directed me to move before daylight in the morning, taking the advance toward Franklin.

"Subsequently General Hood made to me this statement: 'I wish you and your people to understand that I attach no blame to you for the failure at Spring Hill. On the contrary, I know if I had had you there the attack would have been made.'

"Very respectfully, General, your obedient servant,

ALEX. P. STEWART, Lieutenant General.

Gen. S. Cooper, Adjutant and Inspector General, Richmond."

LATER LETTER FROM GENERAL HOOD.

CHESTER, S. C., April 9, 1865.

My Dear General: Before leaving for Texas I desire to say that I am sorry to know that some of your friends thought that I intended some slight reflection on your conduct at Spring Hill. You did all that I could say or claim that I would have done under similar circumstances. The great opportunity passed with daylight. Since I have been informed that your friends felt that my report led to uncertainty as to yourself and troops, I regret that I did not make myself more clear in my report by giving more in detail about the staff officer of General Cheatham's. I only regret, General, that I did not have you with your corps in front on that day. I feel, and have felt, that Tennessee to-day would have been in our possession. * * *

Your friend,

J. B. Hood.

Volume XLV., Part I., serial 93 of the "Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies" was published in 1894; this "Critical Narrative" was published in 1907. It would seem that if the author of the latter had wished to be accurate and just he would have consulted the "Official Records."

Speaking of the battle of Franklin, he says: "To assault was a terrible proposition to troops who during Johnston's long retreat had been trained to avoid charging breastworks." What breastworks were in their way which it was necessary to charge? This writer has evidently accepted as true General Hood's claim that the Army of Tennessee was demoralized by General Johnston's conduct of the Atlanta campaign. There could not be a greater mistake. If anything could have demoralized that army, it would have been the removal of General Johnston from the command of it and the substitution of General Hood.

The truth is, the failure at Spring Hill was General Hood's own failure. He was at the front with the advanced troops, or could have been, and should have been; and if he gave "explicit orders for an immediate attack and occupation of the pike" and they were disobeyed, the remedy was entirely in his own hands. If it had been true that Cheatham and I disobeyed orders to make an immediate attack and absented ourselves from our commands that evening and Hood had overlooked such offenses, that would have demonstrated his incapacity for the chief command.

The author of the "Critical Narrative" excuses the attack on Franklin on the ground that Hood saw no alternative, since he had lost the one opportunity of the campaign at Spring Hill the night before. The loss at Spring Hill could have been fully retrieved at Franklin by crossing the Harpeth River by the fords above Franklin and getting a strong position among the Brentwood hills in the rear of the enemy.

Of what value is a "Critical Narrative" made up from "rumor?" It is worse than a waste of time to read such a book.

GENERAL CUSTER AND RAIN-IN-THE-FACE.

BY B. D. TEAGUE, AIKEN, S. C.

During a terrific but unsuccessful assault on Battery Wagner, one of the celebrated strongholds that defended the entrance to the Charleston Harbor during the War between the States, a gallant colonel was killed leading a Connecticut regiment. After the war a son of this officer found employment with a relative who was the proprietor of a Southern tourists' resort. He learned that if he could stand the rigid examination he could enter the United States army as a lieutenant, and fortunately found an old Confederate veteran brigadier at the place, an inventor of torpedoes and fuses, who coached him in his studies and preparation for the ordeal, through which he passed successfully in time and received his commission. During his tutelage he evened up with the old gentleman by teaching his charming daughter all the delightful conjugations of the verb "to love," and finally married her.

Stationed in the Far West, the young officer made the acquaintance of the celebrated Indian chief, Rain-in-the-Face, who claimed to have killed General Custer, the last man slain in the bloody fight with the Sioux Indians, known as Custer's Massacre. From the Indian the officer obtained a spoon which he had made from a buffalo's horn, which with other Indian articles he presented to the writer to add to a collection of Indian relics, souvenirs, etc., which were subsequently donated to the museum of the Charleston (S. C.) College.

General Custer was a dashing, daring cavalry officer. At the surrender at Appomattox some of Gary's Cavalry Brigade were firing at a line of Federals, when General Custer dashed up unattended in great style to General Gary and imperiously demanded that the firing cease immediately, explaining that General Lee had surrendered his army. Our impetuous commander, Gary, had not heard the news before, and with an oath denied it and took Custer prisoner; but in a short space of time the news was confirmed and Custer was released. General Gary with a few followers immediately dashed through the lines and escaped the surrender. Though the North Carolinians claim to have fired the last shots of the war, Gary's command of South Carolinians have good proof that this fusillade of theirs which the Federal general tried to stop was the last on that memorable occasion.

There is a story related of General Custer which we hope is not true, but which is as follows: During an encampment of his command in the valley of Virginia in the early period of the war a party of his troopers, attracted by discharges of a gun in the woods near by, arrested a half-witted young fellow, nearly grown, but almost an idiot, who was hunting squirrels. The boy, frightened, when asked if he was not a "bush-whacker," more at the threatening manner of his captors than anything else, said, "Yes," yet not knowing the meaning of the word. He was brought before General Custer, who mistook his foolishness for dissembling and had him court-martialed and sentenced to death. The prisoner was made to dig his own grave and was then mercilessly shot. His body tumbled into the hole and was quickly covered up. All this was done in spite of the protestations and beseeching for his life by the old men and women of the place and the agonizing prayers of the poor boy's mother and father. It is said that the heartbroken mother appeared before the General afterwards and in scathing words reproached him for this murder, and with uplifted hand, as if calling from heaven a malediction, prophesied for him a bloody death.

Visiting the Jamestown Exposition after the Richmond Reunion, a large picture in one of the buildings drew our attention. Approaching, it was found to be a life-size delineation of the final desperate struggle of a group of soldiers at the Custer massacre and Rain-in-the-Face giving the final fatal blows to the General. It was horribly realistic and brought to mind vividly the prophecy of the mother of the murdered boy.

THE OLD BATTLEFIELDS.

BY T. C. HARBAUGH.

The old and cherished battlefields! how do they look to-day—
The many spots where in their youth once wrestled Blue and Gray?

Where shrill the bugle blew the charge and underneath the pines
In onset fierce and deadly strife met once the surging lines,
Do all the scars of war and hate stand out against the sun?
And does the sward unburied hold the rusted sword and gun?
What grim ghosts haunt those fields to-day? What dismal sounds are heard?
Say, is the air, as long ago, by battle rudely stirred?

Fair are the battlefields of old, with daisies all abloom!
The roses fleck the haunted ground where once was woe and gloom,
The kine are grazing on the meads where once the charge was made,
And the oriole is singing in the death-invested glade;
The ringdove softly woos his mate beside the Tennessee,
And the lily looks to heaven where were pitched the tents of Lee;
And 'neath a stately cedar high on Round Top's rugged crest
In holy innocence and peace a wren has built her nest.

Where Pickett charged that summer day the clover's bloom is red;
The peaceful pines reflected are in Shenandoah's bed.
In Marye's Heights I plucked a rose snow-white the other day,
And smiling is the Wilderness where grappled Blue and Gray.
I saw two children arm in arm, devoted lovers twain,
Chase bees amid the clover sweet in Sharpsburg's "Bloody Lane;"
And in the battered Purker church a hymn of peace I heard,
And a breeze that breathed devotion the cedars gently stirred.

You cannot trace the cannon ruts at Shiloh for the flowers,
At Malvern Hill the golden bee is busy through the hours;
The rain has cut the ramparts down, and where one time they rose
Through cornfields with their emerald blades a south wind softly blows:
In Chickamauga's wooded glades the squirrel is e'er at play,
The skylark over Lookout's crest with matins greets the day;
The grass is green on Franklin's plain, no blood-red banners wave,
And honeysuckles hide in love the missing comrade's grave.

I've heard the robin call his love among the daisies bright
That cover Spottsylvania's fields with vestments of samite;
The spider spins her subtle threads among the dewy grass
That sparkles in the morning's light in old South Mountain's pass.
At Cedar Creek no bugle blows, the battle drums are still,
And children, whistling, go to school o'er bloody Fisher's Hill.
Some angel's hand has decked with bloom the sward of Seven Pines,
And round Stone River's sturdy oaks the velvet ivy twines.

So look the battlefields of old this sweet and peaceful day:
The lily bends above the Blue, the rose above the Gray;
Through them the crystal brooklets, softly singing, seek the sea,
And o'er them skyward floats a song of love from every tree.
Forever may the white rose hide the lurid marks of war,
And may the clover long conceal the cannon's rugged scar!
O each year may some angel plant to greet the summer rain
The God-kissed bloom of paradise upon each battle plain!

OFFICERS OF THE CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS' HOME OF KENTUCKY. GEN. BENNETT H. YOUNG IS PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD.

KENTUCKY CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS' HOME.

The Kentucky Confederate Home is one of the younger of such institutions in the South. It was created by an act of the Legislature of March, 1902, and has now two hundred and forty-eight inmates.

Various cities in Kentucky made bids for the location of the Home; but it was finally put at Pewee Valley, and the authorities were so fortunate as to secure what was known as "Villa Inn Ridge." This had been built at an expense of $100,000, and has a capacity of more than one hundred and twenty-five guests. It was furnished handsomely throughout, with large airy dining room and all the conveniences and comforts of a hotel.

At first it was not believed that there was a sufficient number of invalid and infirm Confederates in Kentucky to fill the Home. The State started out with an annual per capita of $125. This was finally increased in 1904 to $175, with a fixed appropriation of $20,000 a year, provided the per capita would not yield that amount.

Fifty-six thousand dollars was appropriated for the building of an infirmary, and it is said that the Kentucky Confederate Home has the best infirmary of its kind in the South. The infirmary has only fifty rooms, but these have been more than filled.

From time to time the Kentucky Legislature has acted with great generosity, and both Republicans and Democrats have vied with each other in making proper and liberal provision for the care and maintenance of the Home. Two hundred and fifty is the limit of capacity.

The authorities will apply next year for a tuberculosis infirmary. The average age of the inmates is about seventy-two and a half years.

For a long time there was no assembly hall at the Home. Mrs. L. Z. Duke, of New York, a native of Greenup County, Ky., whose only brother was killed at Shiloh, donated $2,200 for the purpose of providing a room for entertainments of all kinds. Mrs. Duke's wishes have been beautifully executed. The hall will seat about four hundred people and is beautifully furnished. Gen. H. A. Tyler provided funds to buy a handsome piano, and the stained-glass windows were donated by Gen. Bennett H. Young, of Louisville.

Under the law as now existing only Confederate veterans can be appointed as trustees of the Home.

The institution is situated at Pewee Valley, Ky., sixteen miles from Louisville, and is reached by the interurban railroad, the main building being four hundred yards from the depot.

Federal surgeons and officers who have visited the Home say that it is more complete and comfortable in its appointments than any Home sustained by the Federal government for the use of its soldiers.

The Board of Trustees is composed of the following gentlemen: Andrew M. Sea, Louisville; C. L. Daughtry, Bowling Green; W. A. Milton, Louisville; Fayette Hewitt, Frankfort; W. F. Beard, Shelbyville; William N. Bumpus, Owensboro; L. H. Blanton, Danville; A. L. Harned, Boston; Charles C.

MRS. L. Z. DUKE, GIVER OF HALL TO THE HOME.

Reed, Paducah; Leeland Hathaway, Winchester; Bennett H. Young, Louisville; G. R. Mattingly, Bardstown; Garrett D. Wall, Maysville; J. W. Hollingsworth, Princeton; Congrave Croft, Fulton.

Col. Henry George, the Commandant, who was with Forrest, entered the service when only fifteen years of age. He has discharged the duties of the position with success.

GATHERING AT CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS' HOME OF KENTUCKY. ADDITIONAL BUILDINGS WOULD SHOW NOW.

Gen. Bennett H. Young, Commander of the Kentucky Division, U. C. V., has been the President of the Home since its organization, and the Kentucky Confederates all take great pride in the splendid institution provided by the State of Kentucky for the use of those who fought for the South.

About one-third of the inmates of the Home are from other States, but have been residents of Kentucky.

The Home has a beautiful park attached to it, which is carefully and thoroughly kept, and these Confederate veterans have everything the State can offer to her chivalrous sons.

DONOR OF THE L. Z. DUKE HALL TO CONFEDERATES.

A monthly periodical of the Home gives an account of a visit by Mrs. Duke as a guest at the Kentucky Home:

"The pleasant anticipation of her visit was more than realized in her gracious presence. She held a reception in the L. Z. Duke Hall that she might again express her love and interest in the men who wore the gray and have an opportunity to shake the hand of every veteran in the Home. After the singing of 'We Are Old-Time Confederates' by the veterans, she was presented by Col. Henry George, Commandant of the Home, and a welcome was extended for the veterans by Mr. Holloway in a happy address. Mrs. Duke, with a heart full of emotion, responded in a sweet, unassuming way that touched the hearts of all of her hearers, and they realize more than ever that her munificent gift to the Home of L. Z. Duke Hall was a gift of love for the comrades of her only brother, who gave his life on the battlefield of Shiloh for the cause of the South.

"Mrs. Duke has always wished in some way to express her loyalty to her native State and love for the Confederate cause, and she must have realized that she could not have done so in a more appropriate way than in presenting to the Home L. Z. Duke Hall.

"Mrs. Duke joined the delegation of Confederates from Louisville to Birmingham as matron of honor of the Kentucky Division of U. C. V., being appointed by Gen. Bennett H. Young. After enjoying the magnificent hospitality of Birmingham and the many gracious attentions conferred upon

MRS. DUKE IN BIRMINGHAM PARADE—ON FAR SEAT IN REAR.

Kentuckians, she returned to the Home for a couple of days' rest on her way to New York, bringing with her the beautiful State sponsor, Miss Pearl Haggard, of Winchester.

"It is the hope of all connected with the Home that Mrs. Duke will make at least semiannual visits to the Home, where a hearty welcome will always be extended to her."

AUTHORSHIP OF A POEM, ETC.

BY COL. ARCHIBALD GRACIE, 1527 16TH STREET, WASHINGTON, D. C.

I notice the discussion in the August number of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN as to the authorship of a poem which appears in the JUNE VETERAN, page 270, the authorship of the poem being attributed to Maj. H. A. Whiting, of General Rodes's staff; while in the August number Mrs. Jane Young, of Houston, Tex., is said to have written it and dedicated it to Hood's Texas Brigade. Now I have in my scrapbook a newspaper clipping of war times which contains almost word for word the same poem, headed "Rodes's Brigade by Larry Lee," and at the end of the poem "Richmond, July, 1862." The clipping is from a Richmond paper.

Since writing the above I notice that the authorship is attributed to Capt. William Page Carter. Possibly he wrote under the nom de plume of Larry Lee.

Perhaps this may also shed light on the true authorship of this poem, and some of your correspondents may know who "Larry Lee" was. Though I was only a child when I arranged my scrapbook, I was probably interested in preserving this poem because of its beautiful rhythm and for the two additional reasons that my father commanded Alabama troops and was to have commanded Rodes's Alabama Division, made vacant on September 19, 1864, by General Rodes's death. General Gracie was killed, however, before the time for him to take command of it.

I have in my scrapbook quite a number of poems, clippings from wartime newspapers, some of which are:

"Scott's Lament." From the Raleigh Register.

"In Memory of Brig. Gen. John Pegram, Killed in Battle February 6, 1865." By "C."

"Beauregard's Tactics." By Joseph Barber.

"My Wife." By Maj. George McKnight, Columbia, S. C.

"My Maryland," "written while our army was still in Maryland for the Advertiser and Register, Alabama, September 24, 1862." By Maj. J. R. Randall.

"The Greatest Victory of the War, La Bataille des Mouches, Fought Friday, February 20, 1863." By Eugenie.

In the August VETERAN, page 374, Comrade N. W. Phillips, of Weatherford, Tex., who was a member of the 43d Alabama Regiment, inquires for a man he intercepted while scouting toward Chattanooga after the battle of Chickamauga. The incident to which he refers is a very important one in the history of the battle and about which he has written to me. While there is no doubt of the truth of what he has written, I would like confirmation of it from as many sources as possible, and I would like still further details in regard to it: "About daylight we formed a line and there came an order to our regiment to detail three men from each company to search the woods from there to Chattanooga for the enemy, and I was one of the three to go from Company B. I thought my doom was sealed, for I had no idea that the enemy had fled. I felt almost sure I would be killed, but we went on up and down hill for about two and a half miles. We met one of our men, who had been captured and made his escape. He told us the Yankees were crossing the river with all their might. We were the happiest lot of men you ever saw."

The time to which Mr. Phillips refers is the morning after the battle of Chickamauga—namely, about daylight on Monday, September 21, 1863. The scouting party was sent north toward Chattanooga from Snodgrass Ridge. Confirmation in regard thereto from surviving members of this regiment or others of Gracie's Brigade is much desired.

"Thou hast but taken thy lamp and gone to bed;
I stay a little longer, as one stays
To cover up the embers that still burn."

MAJ. W. HOOPER HARRIS.

Many admiring friends in Tennessee were saddened by the news that on August 10, 1908, Maj. William Hooper Harris had died in Mobile the day before. He had lived in that city for several years with his son-in-law, Mr. Erwin Craighead, editor of the Mobile Register.

Major Harris was the son of Dr. Nathan Harris and Jane Lowry, and was born August 5, 1835, at the Cherokee Agency, Tenn., his father at the time being surgeon in the employment of the government. The greater part of Major Harris's life was spent in Tennessee, and he was in business in Nashville before the war. At the outbreak he volunteered in the Confederate service. He was at first a lieutenant in Company A, 1st Battalion Tennessee Cavalry. Then he was transferred to Wheeler's Cavalry and promoted to the rank of major, being made chief quartermaster and a member of his staff. A commission as colonel was made out for him; but the war terminated his service, and it never reached him. He was paroled May 3, 1865, at Charlotte, N. C. He was a member of Cheatham Bivouac and Camp 35, U. C. V., Nashville.

Major Harris passed through the war without serious hurt, being but once wounded. He had the peculiar adventure while assisting in covering the retreat from Tennessee after Hood's campaign, however, of leaping into a river on one horse and coming out on the other side on another, his command being under fire at the time. The leap was from a rather high bluff, and he was unhorsed. Floundering about in the water, he caught a stirrup, and, holding to it and to the pommel of the empty saddle of a horse belonging to one of his comrades, managed to get ashore.

Major Harris was twice married. His first wife was Jennie Martin and his second Mary Preston Craighead, both of Nashville. The children who survive him are the offspring of the first marriage. He leaves a son, W. Hooper Harris, of New York; two daughters, Mrs. Erwin Craighead, of Mobile, and Mrs. C. B. McLeod, of Jackson, Ala.; also a brother, Judge Richard R. Harris, of Rome, Ga.

Major Harris was genial of nature and very fond of association with his fellows. In his prosperous days he was generous to all, particularly to old comrades who were not faring so well as he. He was a very active and enterprising man even down to his last days, being engaged in a paying operation of some magnitude and promise.

For some time after the war Major Harris was at the head of a large business in New York. Later he was engaged in the cotton business in Nashville. He was so prominent in Nashville that his friends made a close race with him for Mayor of that city. Later he lived in Arkansas and the last six years in Mobile.

The funeral of Major Harris took place on August 11 from the home of Mr. Craighead, 400 Congress Street. Rev.

Dr. Matthew Brewster, of Christ Church, read the Episcopal burial service and afterwards the beautiful hymn, "Abide with Me." The remains were laid to rest at sunset in Magnolia Cemetery. Although he maintained his relations with the Tennessee organization as a Confederate, there were a goodly number of veterans present wearing the badge of the Raphael Semmes Camp. Over the coffin were spread the folds of a Confederate flag and upon the flag a beautiful bunch of white carnations and a knot of palm branches.

LORENZO NOBLE DANTZLER.

L. N. Dantzler was born December 31, 1833, in Greene County, Miss.; and died December 11, 1906, in Moss Point, Miss. He graduated at Centenary College, Louisiana, in 1851, and when twenty-one years of age entered the cotton business in Mobile, Ala. He served in the 21st Alabama Regiment as a private, and was wounded at Shiloh. He was then assigned to the secret service of the Confederate government, in which he continued to the close of the war. Immediately after the war he removed to Moss Point and engaged in the lumber business as a member of the firm of William Griffin & Co.; and after the dissolution of this firm, he continued the business alone, finally incorporating the firm of L. N. Dantzler Lumber Company, of which he was president. This firm operated seven mills with an output of one hundred million feet of lumber annually. Its real estate possessions comprise about 300,000 acres of timber land.

A sense of gratitude to this noble man induces more than the brief mention as above supplied. A few months before his death he visited summer resorts in Tennessee, and made many friends. A topic with him in talking to mature people was the CONFEDERATE VETERAN. He did not hesitate to commend it and tell them they ought to take it. He became interested in the VETERAN through the thoughtfulness of a daughter who was educated in Nashville.

L. N. Dantzler was the youngest of six sons. His father, J. L. Dantzler, removed at an early day from South Carolina.

Training his sons as practical business men, Mr. L. N. Dantzler was relieved in later years of any business cares, and enjoyed the comfort he so well earned.

Mr. Dantzler was united in marriage in 1857 to Miss Eran Griffin, and eleven children were born to them, seven of whom are living: John Lewis, L. N., Jr., A. F., G. Bruner, Mary E. Cowan, Emma D. Izard, and Anna L. Bozeman. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

The funeral was held in the Methodist church at Moss Point by Rev. W. B. Lewis, the pastor and personal friend of Mr. Dantzler. The attendance was the largest ever known in the county. The Jackson County Camp, U. C. V., attended in uniform. Among the benefactions made before his death Mr. Dantzler gave to the Church at Moss Point $10,000 and to the public school of that place he gave a like sum.

GEN. JAMES H. LANE.

In a tribute to Gen. James H. Lane by Prof. F. H. Smith, of the University of Virginia, in November, 1907, he states:

"Among our general officers perhaps no one of his grade held a more honorable place in the esteem of our people—an esteem founded on his unswerving loyalty and courage in time of war and his quiet usefulness since the conflict ended—than Gen. James H. Lane, of Virginia, whose sudden departure from life has been a source of widespread grief.

GEN. JAMES H. LANE.

"James Henry Lane was born at Mathews C. H., Va., in 1833. He was descended from several of the old colonial families. He was trained at the Virginia Military Institute, that nursery of fine young manhood whose prowess on the battlefield years ago and on the athletic field in more recent days is nowhere regarded with greater honor and pride than it is at this institution. Stonewall Jackson was his teacher in natural philosophy. Of him he always had many stories to tell, for 'Old Jack,' as the boys loved to call him, was unique in many respects besides his military genius, which was then quite unsuspected.

"Graduating 'with honors' at the Military Institute in 1854, two years later Lane came to the University of Virginia. Though he stayed here but one year (1856-57), he made his mark, and left in the memories of his teachers an abiding respect for his ability and his solid character. The writer of this sketch enjoyed the privilege of being the head of one of the schools in the university which Lane attended, and in after years, with others, felt a pride in the distinction gained by his promising pupil. But the esteem was not one-sided, not merely that of the university for its son. No one of its alumni, however prolonged his connection with the institution might have been, ever left it with deeper affection or cherished for it a more unbroken loyalty during his entire life than James H. Lane. He did this without abating one jot of his love for the institute at Lexington, to which he owed his fine preparation. He did not believe that devotion to one required that he should disparage the other, but realized that they were coworkers in a vast field which neither could fill alone. From this university he went into the ranks of the teachers of our land.

"When the war broke out, he was professor in the North Carolina Military Institute, at Charlotte. His admirable military training and capacity pointed him out as one fit to be a leader, and almost immediately after entering the service he was elected major of the 1st North Carolina Volunteers, afterwards famous as the 'Bethel Regiment,' and in conjunction with these troops, under the command of Col. D. H. Hill, Lane had a conspicuous part in the battle of Bethel, on the Peninsula, which is considered as the first battle of the war.

"On September 21, 1861, he was unanimously chosen colonel of the 28th North Carolina Regiment, and between him and the gallant troops of that renowned State there grew up a mutual pride and confidence. 'Lane and his North Carolinians' was destined to be a historic phrase. In every important engagement of the Army of Northern Virginia and in many of the minor actions of that army, from the battle of Hanover C. H. to the surrender at Appomattox, Lane and his brave North Carolinians were conspicuous.

"He was with A. P. Hill in that memorable rapid march September 17, 1862, from Harper's Ferry to Sharpsburg, where Hill arrived just in time to hurl back Burnside's attack on the right. General Branch was killed in this battle, and Colonel Lane took charge of his brigade in the field. This was one of the three brigades that formed the rear guard of Lee's army when it recrossed the Potomac. At Shepherdstown September 20 Colonel Lane was still in command of this brigade when it helped to rout and drive the enemy into the Potomac 'in the face of a storm of round shot, shell, and grape' from the opposite bank of the river. The soldiers of Branch's Brigade asked for Lane's promotion; and on the recommendations of Generals Lee, Jackson, and A. P. Hill he was appointed brigadier general and assigned to the command of Branch's Brigade.

"To tell of the part that General Lane played in the great battles of the war would be beyond the limits of this sketch. Both General Lee and General Jackson held him in high esteem as one of their most capable officers, as is proved by the many important enterprises which were intrusted to him.

"In the battle of Spottsylvania C. H., May 12, 1864, 'Lane's North Carolina Brigade achieved undying glory.' The London Times's correspondent wrote that 'Lane's North Carolina veterans had successfully stemmed the tide of Federal victory as it went surging to the right.' And a writer, recalling this great battle thirty-three years afterwards, exclaims: 'Who will forget the figure of the "Little General," as the soldiers affectionately called the heroic Lane, when he gave the command for that deadly volley which checked Hancock's Corps?' It saved the right wing of Lee's army.

"A colleague of General Lane's at Auburn, Ala., speaks in a letter before me of the pride with which the General used to relate how his brigade, almost decimated by the murderous fire of the enemy in that battle (Spottsylvania C. H.), which they had sustained for hours in one of the bloodiest episodes of the war with colors flying and band playing, marched past General Lee, who bared his head in silence and watched them as they crossed the works, deployed, and disappeared amid the wild cheering of their comrades who remained behind.

"It is a touching fact that it was this noble brigade into whose lines Stonewall Jackson rode in the twilight of that glorious but dreadful day at Chancellorsville and by whose mistaken fire was laid low the hero for whom every man of them would willingly have died. No one will ever know certainly how Jackson was killed. Lane's Brigade was the only command in the front line. Gen. A. P. Hill, who was also wounded the same evening, told General Lane afterwards that he thought Jackson had been wounded by the firing of the 18th North Carolina Regiment, but that his own wound had been dealt by the enemy. In the dark on the 'plank road' General Lane, returning from a reconnoissance to get further instructions from General Hill about the night attack which Hill had ordered him to make, met General Jackson, who 'in an earnest tone and with a pushing gesture of the right hand in the direction of the enemy said: "Push right ahead, Lane!"' That was the last time Lane ever saw his beloved general. Later that night Jackson had been mortally wounded. Whenever General Lane tried to tell about it, his voice broke.

"At the close of the Civil War General Lane laid down his arms. It was not to abandon his country in despair and seek new allegiance, but, like his great leader, the noble Lee, to employ his powers in peaceful lines for the benefit of the people he loved and fought for. General Lane resumed the honorable life of a college professor: first at the Polytechnic Institute of Virginia, at Blacksburg, and then with Col. Leroy Broun in raising the Polytechnic Institute of Alabama to the remarkable place it holds in the respect of the citizens of that State and of the educational world at large. For twenty-five years he filled the chair of civil engineering and drawing at Auburn, Ala. * * * General Lane's influence here (at Auburn) will endure as long as the college itself. He was a man of singularly pure and simple character, absolutely straightforward and sincere, without fear, a soldier every inch of him, whose scorn no student dared to provoke, and a stanch friend whose loyalty none ever doubted.

"We recall a recent visit to Auburn. We had not seen General Lane since he was a student at this place. At the train we were greeted by several valued friends, among them the General, whose bright eye and elastic step and hearty salutation carried with them no sign of infirmity. But his work was done; and when the rolling year brought to him the call of the Master, he answered it with brave resignation. It is a beautiful fact in nature that the sunshine of to-day is not limited in its beneficent effects to the day itself. For all time to come the world will be the better for it. So a good life is never lost, but in its results is eternal."

[It was a strange oversight that due tribute was not paid to General Lane at the time of his death. He had been an active friend of the VETERAN and gave much through its pages in the vindication of the Southern people. A sketch of him appears on page 150 of the VETERAN for May, 1894.]

RILEY STEPHEN BEAVER.

Another seat is left vacant in the Bill Dawson Camp, No. 552, U. C. V., at Dyersburg, Tenn., by the death of Riley Stephen Beaver on July 16, 1908. He was born near Mifflin, Tenn., March 1, 1842, and was thus in young manhood at the beginning of the War between the States. He soon enlisted in the Confederate army, joining the second company made up in Henderson County, with "Uncle" Dick Barham as captain. It was made part of the 27th Tennessee Infantry.

Riley Beaver served with distinction through the entire four years, ever ready to respond to the call of duty. He was elected corporal at the organization of his company, and by his gallantry and popularity was soon elected second lieutenant, a position that he held throughout the war. He participated in the principal battles fought by the army of Joseph E. Johnston, and was wounded several times.

Comrade Beaver is survived by his second wife and several children, who mourn the loss of a devoted husband and father.

THREE COMRADES OF LUMPKIN, GA.

Reports from Lumpkin, Ga., note the passing of three prominent Confederate veterans whose lives were identified with the growth and prosperity of the community:

Major Corbett, who died on August 21, 1907, was one of the most valued and highly respected citizens of Lumpkin, honored and loved by all who knew him. He went out as a soldier early in 1861 as a member of Captain Shepard's Company C, 2d Georgia Regiment. After passing through many engagements, he was severely wounded in the second day's battle of Gettysburg, losing his right arm. As the Commander of Clement A. Evans Camp, of Stewart County, from its organization until his death he was much loved, and in return he was always planning for the pleasure and happiness of his comrades. He was buried in his Confederate uniform.

MAJOR CORBETT.

Major Corbett was married in 1878 to Mrs. Epsie Mansfield, who survives him with one daughter.

George W. Everett, who died very suddenly at his home, in Lumpkin, Ga., October 5, 1907, was born in Washington County, Fla., February 26, 1832. His parents removed to Stewart County, Ga., when he was a boy; but he was living in Louisiana when the war broke out, so he entered the army from there, joining Company K, of the 31st Louisiana Regiment. He was a faithful and courageous soldier, and was an active and faithful member of Clement A. Evans Camp, U. C. V. As a Christian who loved his Christianity, as a citizen who stood for true citizenship, as a husband considerate and true, a father loving and kind, his life was as full of good, useful deeds as it was of honorable years.

GEORGE W. EVERETT.

At the outbreak of the war John F. Irvin entered the army as a private in Company I, of the 21st Georgia Regiment, under Captain Lynch, and his record in the Confederate service was that of a brave and faithful soldier. He was honored by his comrades in being made captain of his company, and faithfully led them as duty directed to the end. He was married in 1878, and is survived by his wife and several children. Death came to him in November, 1906, at his home, in Lumpkin.

JOHN F. IRVIN.

PETER MONROE JOHN.

Peter Monroe John, a Confederate soldier, a member of "Hampton's Legion," and a Christian gentleman, has "passed over the river" and joined his comrades on the other side. He was born in Marlboro County, S. C., February 11, 1831, on land settled by his grandfather, Griffith John, one of the early Welsh settlers of that section. When he grew to manhood, he built himself a house almost in sight of the old homestead, where as a successful tiller of the soil he led an independent and peaceful life in a home which was noted far and wide for its generous and delightful hospitality. At the outbreak of the War between the States he enlisted as a private soldier, and for four years followed South Carolina's matchless warrior, Wade Hampton, through success and defeat, participating in all the battles fought by that famous Legion.

Comrade John married first Miss Kate McArthur, of Richmond County, N. C., in 1859. She died in 1891, leaving two sons, the youngest of whom, Mr. W. L. John, survives his father. Mr. John married the second time July 12, 1893, his second wife being Miss Sallie Blue, of Marion, S. C., a daughter of the late Col. John Gilchrist Blue, of the C. S. A., and a sister of Lieut. Victor Blue, of the United States navy, who also survives him.

Comrade John was true to all the trusts that life imposed upon him. Modest in disposition, quiet and dignified in manner, earnest in purpose, faithful to duty, helpful to friend and neighbor, he pursued his even way far from the rush and turmoil of the world which held no attractions for him, and was beloved by all who knew him. In his youth he united with the Methodist Church at Parnassus, remaining a true and steadfast member thereof for more than fifty years, until his death, which occurred on the afternoon of July 16, 1908, after an exceedingly painful but patiently borne illness of one week. An immense concourse of people attended his funeral; so large, indeed, was the crowd gathered to show respect and honor to their departed friend that the church could not hold them, and on this account the services were conducted in the grove adjacent.

Peter John led a simple life, did the duty that was nearest, and in dying has bequeathed to those he left behind a wealth of beautiful memories which will live forever in their hearts.

In sending the foregoing Miss Kate Lilly Blue writes:

"As the daughter of a Confederate soldier long since gone to his rest, everything pertaining to the cause for which he fought is dear to me, and I also have been an interested reader of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN for some years.

"Peter John was devoted to the VETERAN. He preferred it to all other periodicals, and was greatly interested in the last copy, which came just before his death. He had his wife read it all to him. When she finished it, he said: 'The Confederate veterans are going very fast now.'"

THOMAS W. LOCKETT.

Lieutenant Lockett was a gallant Confederate soldier. He was born in Autauga County, Ala., July 14, 1839, his father's family moving from there to Columbia County, Ark., before the War between the States. He died recently at his home, in Camden, Ark.

Lieutenant Lockett enlisted as a private in a company known as the Lisbon Invincibles in Union County, Ark., and marched on foot to Little Rock, where he was put in the well-known 6th Arkansas Regiment, which was first commanded by Col. Richard Lyon. Lieutenant Lockett was in the battles of Shiloh, Murfreesboro, Perryville, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Ringgold Gap, all through the Sherman and Johnston campaign from Dalton to Atlanta, and was at the close of the war, surrendering at Goldsboro, N. C.

When the 6th Arkansas was reorganized, Private Lockett was made a lieutenant. He was severely wounded in the battle of Chickamauga. That intrepid soldier, Gen. Pat Cleburne, complimented him on the battlefield for conspicuous bravery. No one who knew him ever doubted his moral or physical courage.

Lieutenant Lockett has a widow and three children who are living and prominent in Camden, Ark. The oldest is the wife of Shade B. Proctor. The second, a son, Reese Thomas Lockett, married Miss Bettie Ramsey, daughter of the late Rev. Daniel B. Ramsey, who was rector of St. John's Episcopal Church of Camden for several years, and was captain of Ramsey's Battery that did such efficient service in the Army of Tennessee. Mr. and Mrs. Reese Lockett have a bright daughter, little Miss Bruce. William P. Lockett married Miss Lena Gee, daughter of Charles D. Gee and Martha Kellum Gee and granddaughter of Col. James M. Gee, the first colonel of the 15th Arkansas Regiment, C. S. A. The widow, Mrs. Mary E. Lockett, has for years been the efficient President of the H. L. Grinstead Chapter, U. D. C.

Mr. P. Lynch Lee, of Camden, who furnished the foregoing, gives the following in regard to Comrade Lockett:

"An incident in the life of Lieutenant Lockett was brought to mind by reading a newspaper article lately, headed 'A Second Solomon.' The article regarded a dispute in a New Jersey city over the ownership of a horse, the case having reached the court. After several hours had been consumed by lawyers on both sides, an adjustment appeared no nearer than at first. The plaintiff, who claimed the horse was stolen from him, made the proposition to let the horse, who he said was well acquainted with the city, decide the question.

"The officer having the disputed animal in charge was to turn him loose and the owner of the stable he went to was to be declared the rightful one. This being done, the horse went to the plaintiff's stable, which settled what the court found difficulty in doing.

"A somewhat similar case occurred on our own Washington Street not many years after the war between a city boy and a country boy over the ownership of a dog. Both were very persistent in their claims, and would not yield a particle. The animal was then in the possession of the city boy. At this juncture of the dispute Lieut. Thomas W. Lockett appeared; and as the city boy's father, a very nice gentleman, had sided with his son, saying that the country boy had not produced sufficient evidence to entitle him to the property, Lieutenant Lockett, as was characteristic of him, wished to see that the boy who had two against him had an even chance in the contest. He told the lads that he would test the question in a manner that would convince both of them who was the rightful owner. At Lieutenant Lockett's request the city boy delivered the dog to him. He then asked each boy to tell him the name he called the dog by. One said the dog's name was Dash, and the other that it was Ring. 'Very well,' said Lieutenant Lockett. 'Now one of you go up the street a little way and the other down the street the same distance.' They complied with his request, when he then told each of them to call the dog. After both called earnestly for the dog, Lieutenant Lockett let the animal loose, and it readily answered to the name of Ring. The country boy was rejoiced. He and Ring went on to their happy rabbit hunting grounds. These two incidents remind us of King Solomon's settlement of the baby question."

COL. T. B. MASSIE.

On the morning of the 29th of April, 1908, at his home, in Rappahannock County, Va., Col. T. B. Massie, of the 12th Virginia Cavalry, Ashby's old brigade, crossed over the river of death to meet his old commander, Stonewall Jackson. He was married twice and is survived by his widow and eight children, who mourn their loss. He was a chivalrous, patriotic Christian gentleman of the old Virginia type, and when mounted on his war horse, Perry (who was wounded four times), was a leader worthy of any foeman's steel.

When Col. A. W. Harman was wounded and captured on June 9, 1863, Massie had command of the regiment, except when he was wounded, until captured late in February, 1865.

On the 6th of May in the severe Wilderness fight General

Rosser ordered Colonel Massie: "Clear your front!" In this charge Colonel Massie led a portion of the regiment through the enemy's lines. They closed in his rear; but he was equal to the occasion, and dashed into the wilderness, passed around General Grant's left flank, captured some prisoners, and reported at headquarters by midnight.

At Samaria Church on the 24th of June, 1864, in charging some breastworks built of rails he was wounded, and it was reported that his son, I. G. Massie, sergeant major of the regiment, killed the man who was trying to shoot his father the second time. Before his wound healed he was again commanding his regiment; and on August 25 at Reams Station, when Gen. A. P. Hill defeated Hancock and drove him out of his breastworks, the 12th Virginia Cavalry was dismounted and fought side by side with the 12th Virginia Infantry, and Colonel Massie's regiment was the first to enter the place.

On September 16, 1864, after passing in the rear of Grant's army at Sycamore Church, near the James River, his regiment, led by him, broke through Grant's rear guard and, assisted by the rest of the brigade, captured twenty-four hundred and eighty-three cattle, which Hampton's Cavalry safely delivered into General Lee's hands. This was the greatest achievement of cavalry during the war.

When the war was over, although he had lost heavily, few men did more to build up the waste places of his State, and at the time of his death he was Commander of the Camp of Confederate Veterans in Rappahannock, Va.

MRS. EDWIN G. WEED.

MRS. EDWIN G. WEED, OF FLORIDA.

[To the United Daughters of the Confederacy, by Mrs. Cornelia Branch Stone, President General.]

It is with a deep sense of sorrow and sympathy that it becomes my painful duty to announce to you the death of our beloved Ex-President General, Mrs. Edwin Gardner Weed, wife of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Weed, of Florida. A woman of exalted character, of gracious and winning manner, of warm and generous heart, and of superior mental attainment, she had lent the grace of all of these qualities to the service of her Church and to the work of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, and her loss is irreparable.

In 1866 Mrs. Weed was elected the first President of the Florida Division, U. D. C., and three years later her great executive and administrative ability had recognition in her election to the office of President General U. D. C. With her bereaved family we mourn that her beautiful life on earth is no more, yet we have the blessed assurance that she has entered into rest eternal.

Mrs. Weed was a daughter of Col. Thomas F. Foster, deceased, and was married to Bishop Weed April 24, 1874, at Summerville, Ga. The family removed to Jacksonville, Fla., in 1886, and had resided there afterwards. Mrs. Weed was strong in all good works, and never spared herself when public or private need was seen. As directress of the children's auxiliary to the Board of Missions and as President of St. John's Guild she accomplished a great deal for the Episcopal Church and endeared herself to its organizations generally. It was not alone in Church work but in every charity her sympathy and generous heart were active.

The Times-Union states:

"In 1901, when Jacksonville was destroyed by fire, the wonderful executive ability and resource of Mrs. Weed was most evident. She was at a luncheon when the fire started, and at once got in her carriage, and in full dress started out to find her friends in distress. Going to some houses, telephoning to others, by nightfall thirty or more persons had been gathered under the hospitable roof of the Bishop and Mrs. Weed. Telegraphing to Savannah for bread and coffee, Mrs. Weed not only served supper to her household of guests, but sent the gardener out with large buckets of coffee and boxes of sandwiches, and went in a carriage to the military pickets with hot coffee and sandwiches, telling them to come or send to her house if they wanted more. A piazza bench was filled with sandwiches for any who came.

"This hospitality was kept up for weeks, and daily telegrams were sent to Savannah for bread and coffee.

"When the Florida Division of the United Daughters of the Confederacy was formed, in July, 1866, Mrs. Weed consented to become the first President of the five Chapters forming the Division, and lent her name and her influence to the upbuilding of the work in her adopted State, sparing herself in no way in the fulfilling of her self-imposed duties. For two and a half years Mrs. Weed filled this office.

"At the Richmond Convention of the general organization of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, in November, 1899, Mrs. Weed was unanimously elected President General of the organization. For two years she held this important office, and endeared herself to hundreds of women by her unflinching courtesy, gentleness, consideration and patience, and by the justice and impartiality of her rulings.

"One of the last important services performed by Mrs.

Weed in U. D. C. work was that of chairman of the committee for the inscriptions for the monument to President Davis which was erected at Richmond by the people of the South. This was most important and exacting work, to be scanned and criticised by the entire country. The beautiful inscriptions on the monument prove the literary ability, wisdom, and judgment of Mrs. Weed and her committee. While they did not write all the inscriptions, having called upon foremost Southern scholars for advice and assistance, to Mrs. Weed and her committee alone belongs the credit of the completed work."

J. O. ALLEN.

("I triumph in death as well as in life.")

J. O. Allen died July 25, 1868. He was born December 3, 1843, at Rock Castle, near Nashville, in the home of his grandfather, Dr. James Overton. He was the eldest child of George C. and Martha Overton Allen. He volunteered October 10, 1861, at Camp Weakley, near Nashville, in Company I, 1st Tennessee Cavalry, and served under Gen. Joseph Wheeler. He served in some severe battles, and among them were those of Shiloh, Brittain's Lane, Chickamauga, and from Rocky Face Ridge to Atlanta.

Comrade Allen was reserved almost to timidity, but he was noted for the strictest integrity. He was a very silent man, but ever expressed himself with forceful integrity. He was of Scotch-Irish stock. His father's family came from Donegal, Ireland, and settled in Pennsylvania in 1754. His mother and Raglands, of England. Tillman Dixon, of Revolutionary fame, was his great-grandfather. Dr. Overton was an aid-de-camp to General Winchester. He was entitled to the crests of the Wallers, the Overtons, and the Allens; but that in which he prided most was his Cross of St. Andrew—the "cross of honor." Comrade Allen died where he fondly lived, by the Cumberland River, and was buried in his Confederate uniform.

J. O. ALLEN.

W. B. HART.

Mr. William Bilbo (Babe) Hart died at Austin, Tex., on July 22, 1908, from an attack of rheumatism. Comrade Hart was born and reared at Hartsville, Tenn. He belonged to an old and distinguished family. He became identified with the Confederate cause early in 1861. He first joined a company in the 2d Tennessee Infantry, commanded by Col. (afterwards Gen.) William B. Bate. He served the first year with that regiment in Virginia, after which he was transferred to Colonel Barteau's Tennessee Cavalry, and served in the Western Army during the rest of the war. He served his country faithfully and well. He was generous and a true patriot.

DAUGHTERS OF CONFEDERACY AT MONTEAGLE.

THE PRESIDENT GENERAL OFFICIATES ON U. D. C. DAY.

The day set apart in the Woman's Congress of the Montecagle Annual Chautauqua for the United Daughters of the Confederacy was one of the most interesting of the series of programmes carried out during that week, which was the exponent of woman's endeavor for the uplift and betterment of humanity. This having been the centennial year of the birth of Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States of America, the life, character, and service of this great man was the keynote of the addresses given. The speakers were Captain Guion, Vicksburg Park Commissioner, and in this position successor to Gen. Stephen D. Lee by appointment from President Roosevelt, and Judge H. A. Chambers, a distinguished lawyer and jurist of Chattanooga. These gentlemen were further known for their valued service as Confederate soldiers. Addresses were made by Mrs. Eleanor Gillespie, Historian Tennessee Division, U. D. C., Mrs. T. J. Latham, Mrs. E. A. Buford, and Mrs. Carrington Mason. Readings by Mrs. Zylla Cardin and Mrs. John Bell Keeble added a pleasing feature to the entertainment, and the Confederate Choir of Memphis, which attended only in part and was led by Mrs. E. B. Douglas, with Mrs. W. J. Meyer as accompanist, gave charming selections at each meeting. Mrs. M. M. Gardner, of Nashville, and Mrs. F. M. Guthrie, of Memphis, contributed vocal selections that were greatly appreciated.

At the afternoon meeting a memorial service was held, and tributes were offered to Mrs. E. Kirby Smith, Gen. Stephen D. Lee, Col. Robert A. Allison, Mrs. Stringer, former President of the Florida Division, U. D. C., and Mrs. Edwin Gardner Weed, Ex-President General U. D. C.

A symposium of interesting incidents and historical recollections given in three-minute talks by several speakers was one of the delightful features of the programme.

One of the most lasting benefits was had in the presentation of a scholarship in Buford College, Nashville, to a lineal descendant of a Confederate soldier of the State of Tennessee to be awarded by the U. D. C. of Tennessee. Mrs. E. A. Buford, President of this college, generously includes in this gift "board and tuition;" and this bestowal not only embraces the usual college curriculum, but also gives industrial and manual training, which is along the broad lines that all education should and will tend in the future.

Mrs. John W. Thomas, widow of the former President of the Montecagle Assembly, presented a handsome silk Confederate flag to the Montecagle Chapter, U. D. C., which is named for her husband in honor of his many benefactions to that mountain resort and of his valued services to the Confederacy. The presentation was made by Mrs. R. E. Folk, President of the "First Tennessee Regiment" Chapter, U. D. C., of Nashville, in an appropriate and graceful speech, and Miss Blanche Hindman, daughter of General Hindman, of Confederate fame, received it on behalf of the "John W. Thomas" Chapter, of which she is the President.

Miss Hindman delivered the address of welcome at the opening session, to which response was made by Mrs. Cornelia Branch Stone, President General U. D. C.

MRS. C. B. STONE'S RESPONSE TO ADDRESS OF WELCOME.

There are few sweeter words in the Saxon tongue than "welcome," for it is born of the purest emotions of the human heart, prompted by hospitality, one of the typical characteristics of the Southern home. The cordial welcome extended to-day, voiced in words of eloquence from the President of your local Chapter, renders it difficult to express the tender appreciation of this warm heart and handclasp.

When your State President asked me to come to you on this day of the Woman's Congress of your great annual Chautauqua, the day set apart for the United Daughters of the Confederacy—to give such service seemed a sacred duty. We meet here as Americans, knowing one common country, with reverence for its flag, its achievements, and its standing among the nations of the earth, in all of which we have a just pride, for much of this sprang from Southern statesmanship and Southern valor. The South gave the world the Declaration of Independence, awakening the old despotic dynasties to a new sense of "liberty, equality, and fraternity;" the South won the War of the Revolution; the South, led by Andrew Jackson, gained the victory of New Orleans; the South established the great republic of Texas, and by treaty annexed it as a State and placed her "lone star" on the flag of the Union, and later in the Mexican War greatly aided in giving to this country its valuable Western territory.

The South through her sons had the largest share in creating and inaugurating the institutions of our government. Then why should we not glory in the ever-increasing power and renown of the United States? Since our patriotism is undoubted, there is a treasury of glorious memories all our own, the keynote of which was the valiant struggle made by this same people of the South to uphold that free government which their forefathers had done so much to found and defend and in which was involved the preservation of individual rights. When these were endangered, with united action the States of the South determined to resume their delegated rights, believing that the purposes for which these were surrendered had been violated and the compact broken.

Then when coercion like a great pall confronted them her men sprang to arms in defense of home and principle. For four long, sad, suffering years with a matchless courage and fortitude the men in gray won many victories, and left on the pages of history a splendid record of deathless deeds. Yet, outnumbered and overpowered by men and resources, they laid down their arms. With their homes in ruin, their land desolated, all seemed lost save honor.

The bereaved widows and mothers of the South who with unselfish devotion had borne their full part in that disastrous war received these heroes with pathetic smiles, and inspired new hope and courage to rebuild the shattered structure of Southern wealth. It is no vain boast to say that this has been done, and in its accomplishment the men and women of the South have indeed shown themselves worthy descendants of heroic sires.

But more than this: they have striven to weave into the life and civilization of the young men and women of our land a reverential regard and memory of their ancestors, who as Confederate soldiers and citizens during the four years of the War between the States gave to all future generations a stainless example of sacrifice, virtue, and valor from leaders and men that has glorified a cause sometimes called lost but for which there is no death, founded, as it was, on truth and justice.

The United Daughters of the Confederacy have adopted this work, and as their representative I stand here to-day to proclaim our faith and duty and to urge harmonious, united action in this great endeavor, without which there will be failure in best results.

It is gratifying to say that much has been accomplished in memorial tribute to the living and the dead; but much more remains to be done that the young men and women may know of the heroism of the men who followed Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Joseph E. Johnston, Albert Sidney Johnston, Forrest, Morgan, and Stuart, and a host of other commanders of immortal fame, and, above all, the great master mind of Jefferson Davis, the President of the Confederate States of America, who wisely directed the affairs of that government from its "rise to its fall."

In this centennial year of the birth of Mr. Davis our efforts have been directed to secure a close study of his life and character in the public and private schools of the South and by the people at large that a just estimate might be had of the value of his service to this country on the battlefields of Mexico, in Senatorial and Congressional halls, and in the Cabinet of President Pierce as Secretary of War, where he left the impress of his great genius in many needed reforms and improvements.

His life was full of service to the United States from the time of his graduation at West Point until the hour when Mississippi, his adopted State, which had given him every honor at her disposal, called him to her allegiance and service in the field in defense of "Southern rights." Before he could fully enter into this he was elected to the office of Chief Executive of the Confederate States. To all of these positions of trust and honor he brought an integrity of purpose, a pure and patriotic motive, and marked ability.

That a more perfect knowledge of the life and Christian character of this distinguished man might be had, this movement was inspired by the Mississippi Division through resolutions presented and adopted at the General Convention held in Norfolk, Va., last November. The response from all of the Divisions and Chapters has been enthusiastic and faithful, and the centennial birthday, June 3, was observed with beautiful and fitting ceremony.

The Tennessee Division, under the efficient and energetic leadership of their President, Mrs. M. B. Pilcher, has kept pace with the most zealous in this work.

My dear Daughters, do not relax your efforts until every schoolhouse in the South shall have a portrait or picture of Jefferson Davis and Robert E. Lee, that these two great exemplars of unselfish patriotism, who gave service with an eye single to their country's good, may be a continual inspiration to the youth of our land toward that high type of citizenship which once held honor above all qualifications with a wholesome scorn for corruption in the conduct of the affairs of life and of government.

It is a valued privilege to be with you at this great assembly and Woman's Congress, where all that is uplifting and for the betterment of mankind is advocated and urged, and may this session be fruitful of much good!

With loving appreciation your President would make acknowledgment of your devotion to duty and your loyal and ready response to all service asked of you, and your tender consideration shown in her hour of darkness and distress. May God bless and protect you!

WOMAN'S CONGRESS AT MONTEAGLE

Mrs. Judith Winston Pilcher, Chairman Woman's Congress, in sending Mrs. Buford's apotheosis on Jefferson Davis, writes: "At the earnest request of many friends and admirers, Mrs. Buford has agreed to have her rare oration upon Jefferson Davis published, as it formed a feature of the interesting U. D. C. programme at Monteagle. Being an unusual adaptation from Shakespeare, it came as the crystallizing of the patriotic thought and sentiment associated with the South's great leader. This being the centenary year of Jefferson Davis, we endeavored to make him the central thought among many fine papers, poems, and a Jefferson Davis symposium, which was a veritable love feast. This paraphrase of Mark Antony's oration over the dead body of Caesar, adapting it to our great leader, was the piece de resistance by common consent of the day."

Mrs. Pilcher expresses gratitude to Judge Chambers, of Chattanooga, for his oration on President Davis.

THE "APOTHEOSIS OF JEFFERSON DAVIS," BY MRS. BUFORD.

Friends, Comrades, President, lend me your thoughts.

I am no orator, as these speakers are,
But an earnest woman that loves the man—
And that they know full well—that gave me
Public love to speak of him.

I come to test our hero, not to praise him.

The evil that men do lives after them;

The good is oft interred with their bones;

So let it not be with Davis. His bitter foes

Oft have declared Davis was ambitious.

If it were so, it was a grievous fault,

And grievously hath Davis answered it.

Here under leave of our President and the rest

Come I to speak in Davis's defense.

He was our friend, faithful and true to all.

He did bring many treasures to the South,

Which did her empty coffers fill.

Did this in Davis seem ambitious?

When that the poor have cried, Davis hath wept;

Ambition should be made of sterner stuff.

You all do know that in the Senate oft

Most tempting honors unto him were shown

Which he did oft decline. Was this ambitious?

You all did love him once, not without cause;

What cause withholds you now to justify him?

You do all know our chieftain; you remember

The very place where he was born.

'Twas on the "dark and bloody ground" he woke,

The birthplace of the "Commoner" anear.

The broad savannahs of the South he claimed

Beside the Mississippi's bounding stream,

Where glorious Southern sun and clime and scene

Instilled into his youthful, thirsting soul

That warmth and light that should enthuse his life.

Within the nation's antique, classic halls

His mighty genius militant arose.

He from his Alma Mater issued forth.

The brave defender of his country's rights,

In war or peace her champion of truth.

And from the gory field of battle turned

To plead the independent rights of sovereign States.

Beneath Old Glory's e'er-inspiring folds

The consecrated patriot he lived

Till war's dark shadow fell upon his home,

And he with faith unblemished espoused our cause.

With head and heart and hand he wrought for all

Throughout the awful conflict, dark and sad;

And when the dread catastrophe befell,

Unflinching still he calmly met his fate

Till he, the foremost living statesman then,

In dungeon damp in shackles lay in chains.
 This was the most unkindest cut of all,
 Ingratitude, more strong than traitor's arms,
 Quite vanquished him. Then burst his mighty heart,
 As crushed and powerless he prostrate fell.
 O what a fall was there, my comrades dear!
 Then you and I and all of us fell down.
 While cruel Tyranny reigned over us
 The world aghast upon the horror gazed,
 And yet humanity, not evil all,
 Released the chastened spirit, ever true.
 And Southern love and sympathy recalled
 The martyred hero home to fair Beauvoir.
 The awful storm and stress of life were o'er;
 Its hopes and fears and passions all were dead,
 And trustingly his soul majestic passed
 Within the realms of justice, mercy, peace—
 His memory our heritage so grand.
 To-day we count the decades passed and gone,
 While nations vindicate his life and cause,
 And sons and daughters of Confederate fame
 In honor and in reverence to him bow.
 Jehovah reigns, the Union is preserved,
 While battlefields historic stand for "Blue" and "Gray."

OUR "BLACK MAMMY."

BY MRS. WILLIAM HUME, NASHVILLE, TENN.

Prior to 1865 the Southern people were "plantation folk," living with their servants on large estates. There was among them a freedom from restless change because of the fixedness of their possessions. They were content and the happiest people on the face of the globe. Each proprietor felt himself a king. He was master of all he surveyed. The practical lives of our ancestors were such as to challenge and hold our loving respect.

At no time in the history of our race has there ever been a peasantry so happy and in every way so well-to-do as the negro slaves of America. The civilized world stood amazed at the social conditions in the South during the eventful period from 1861 to 1865. The slaves during that time guarded with loving fidelity the homes of their masters.

Among the most faithful were our black mammy. She was the most loved and by all odds the most privileged "pusson on the plantation." No one, not even "missus," opposed her. Though born in a lowly station, she wielded a scepter. She held in her arms the joy of the home—the little one given to make life beautiful, he who in coming time would be king in his father's place. It was young master! Or maybe the little one was "Meh Layde," the future queen and mistress.

Ah! history has no parallel to the faith kept by the negro in the South during the Civil War. Often five hundred negroes were found to one white man on these plantations, and yet through these dusky throngs the beloved women and children walked in safety. The unprotected home rested in peace. In the words of our brilliant Southern son, Henry W. Grady: "Unmarshaled the black battalions moved to the fields in the morning to feed the armies who but for their industry would have starved, and at night they gathered anxiously at the great house to hear the news from master, though conscious that his victory made their chains enduring."

Among the noblest and most devoted of all surely may be classed our black mummies. Being in the house altogether with the master, mistress, and children, they had fine opportunities for improving themselves in every way. No instance can be given of one of these faithful ones proving aught but the loving and devoted friend of the home, and black mammy would die for her baby—the baby in her charge. Not only in monumental praise but in "song and story should our black mammy receive a part of the dues we owe her memory."

MRS. WILLIAM HUME.

Her beautiful life of devotion and unselfishness and her sweet dialect will be buried in the grave of faithful mammy.

Her immortality is due to her devotion and loyalty under circumstances which never before tried human hearts. Her memory is a precious legacy.

At the conclusion of the above paper Mrs. William Hume read a scene "In the Cabin on the Old Plantation," "Mammy coming to meet Mistic's gran'chile." She closed by a plantation lullaby, which she sang very sweetly:

"Blow, li'l' breezes, blow.

Mammy's baby gone ter sleep.

Blow, li'l' breezes, blow."

Mrs. Hume had with her a picture of the black mammy of her family who had served them twenty-seven years.

The Daughters of the Confederacy in Nashville took no vacation this summer. They are fortunate in having the history building at Centennial Park whenever desired. In mid August the various Chapter meetings were well attended, and it was at one of these that Mrs. Hume read the story of black mammy, coming from her country home to attend the meeting.

INFORMATION SOUGHT CONCERNING JOHN J. MCGUIRE.—Mrs. John Joseph McGuire, of Pensacola, Fla., seeks information of her husband, who fought through the war as a Confederate soldier. He enlisted in an artillery company from Wilmington, N. C., and was afterwards put in the navy to run the blockade. His wife does not know further of his command. If any of his old comrades should see this and can give any light on the above, please communicate with Mrs. J. J. McGuire, Pensacola, Fla.

By GILBERT GAUL,
NATIONAL ACADEMICIAN.

With Introductory Sketches by
THORNWELL JACOBS.

Exquisitely reproduced in four colors, on heavy polychrome paper.

Those who love the South and her brave old veterans have desired for many years to have their courage, their devotion, their unmatched heroism and the home-life of their families crystallized on canvas. After nearly a half century this has just been done. Gilbert Gaul, of New York, was employed several years ago, and has now finished the series. It is called With the Confederate Colors, 1861-5, and consists of six paintings, as follows:

No. 1. Leaving Home.—Shows a typical Southern interior of the period. A lad is telling his homefolks good-bye. One sees the newspaper fallen to the floor, the favorite bird-dog pleading infinitely with his eye, the father, mother, sister, slaves—all done as if a photograph had been magically turned into colors.

No. 2. Holding the Line at all Hazards.—A battle scene. The last magnificent stand of "those who had fate against them." One of the finest battle scenes ever painted.

No. 3. Waiting for Dawn.—A campfire scene. The snow covers the ground. A farm house burns in the distance. The "enemy's" battle line glows on the horizon. A masterpiece.

No. 4. The Picket and the Forager.—Companion pieces sold as one picture. The first shows a lonely picket on duty. The second presents a bread and chicken-laden forager returning to camp after a day's excursion.

No. 5. Betting on the Flag.—The boys in blue are backing their cause with a pile of coffee in a social game of cards between the lines. Southern tobacco is the bet of the "Johnny Rebs" that the bars will be victorious. One of the most popular of the series.

No. 6. Tidings.—A pretty Southern girl is reading a letter from the front to the groups of women and slaves. A grandfather bends forward eagerly to listen, and a wounded soldier on furlough forgets his bandaged arm as he bears tidings from the firing line. A beautiful and touching picture.

of Gilbert Gaul's Famous War
Paintings.
Gentlemen: I congratulate you on publishing the portfolio of pictures, "With Confederate Colors," by the most distinguished painter of military subjects in this country. As an artist he is endorsed by the National Academy of Design and others of highest repute. It seems most timely that the South is at last to have pictures which are really historic documents, and which must appeal to her people, because Mr. Gaul's pictures are really a sympathetic translation of the war period. The portfolio should be not only in every Southern, but in every American, family. These paintings, with their pathos, their tragedy, and the great sorrow of the great war period, will perform a great duty in pointing the younger generation to avoid drifting into channels which might provoke a like repetition of our great Civil War.
With kindest wishes for the success of your praiseworthy undertaking, I am,
Yours truly,
STEPHEN D. LEE.

Mr. Gaul's strong brush has portrayed with much realism, not their bitterness and recriminations, but their magnificent motive, their magnanimous courage, their unmatched devotion. Those who love the real values of the Old South will prize these pictures beyond price, and indeed they should appeal to every intelligent American, man or woman.

Pictures 15x19 inches, reproducing every shade of tone and motif, and embossed so as to give perfect canvas effect. Each one is a masterpiece, depicting the courage, sacrifice, heroism, sufferings and home life of the Southern soldier.

CLEBURNE AND HIS COMMAND

By CAPTAIN IRVING A. BUCK,

Former Captain and A. A. G. Cleburne's Division

When Captain Buck was in a hospital in '64, suffering from a dangerous wound, Gen. Cleburne wrote Surgeon Gore: "You must save Buck. He is the best adjutant general in the army." That was high praise, for "Old Pat" knew a soldier when he saw one. And to-day Captain Buck is an authority on all questions relating to the history of the Western Army. A student of military history and the art of war, he knows every inch of ground Cleburne fought over and marched over, because he was there by the General's side, his devoted friend, companion, and aid. We are used to enthusiastic biographies of soldiers and statesmen—our literature abounds in such. But this biography is one in a thousand. The General himself is the heart of the book, his personality is its spirit, and his deeds the action of the story. Captain Buck has done his work with scholarly precision. Facts are supported by official documents, reports, and letters, and all the testimony available is ranged on both sides of any mooted point. Cleburne's fellow-officers—Hardee, Johnston, Bragg, Hood, and Polk—are clearly drawn, and Cleburne's relations with them frankly treated. All in all, it is an admirable work, sincere and painstaking, worthy the great soldier of whom Gen. Hardee wrote: "Two continents now claim his name, eight millions of people revere his memory, two great communities raise monuments to his fame, and history will take up his fame and hand it down to time for exemplifying wherever a courage without stain, a manhood without blemish, an integrity which knew no compromise, and a patriotism that withheld no sacrifice are honored of mankind." Large Octavo. $3, net. Postage, 18 cents.

TWO SOUTHERN BOOKS

ROBIN AROON

By ARMISTEAD GORDON

"Robin Aroon" is the story of a pretty girl who lived very long ago, a high-spirited girl, daring and beautiful and debonaire, and how her heart fared in its warfare with her own caprice, her coquetries and conquests. Mr. Gordon has caught the spirit of the rare old Colonial life, its stately grace, its formality, the romance and color and glory of it all. "Robin Aroon" is a cameo, delicately and clearly cut, a perfect gem of a love story. It is the sort of love story that makes your eyes mist with tears and makes you long vaguely—and unaccountably—for the spring-time of youth and love and all their fleeting deliciousness. It is a gem of a love story, "a very riband in the cap of youth." 12mo. $1.25, net. Postage, 10 cents.

A VIRGINIA FEUD

By GEORGE TAYLOR LEE

In this story of Virginia life Mr. Lee is true to the traditions of his family. In the long honor roll of Virginia's history what name so quick to spring to one's lips—to one's heart—as the name of Lee? A Lee writing of Virginia life—how well that forecasts a book of delights! Mr. Lee knows the life of the Blue Ridge mountaineers thoroughly, and his history of the Shiflett-Duncan feud, into which Vanmeter is drawn by circumstances, is interesting and instructive. Step by step, through scenes exciting and pathetic, one follows the murder and crime and suffering involved by this traditional hatred, and one understands, as never before, how these feuds are nourished. 12mo. Postpaid, $1.50.

WATERLOO

By THOMAS E. WATSON

If you have read Watson's "Story of France" or his "Napoleon,"—and almost everybody else has—you know how he writes history, the dash and brilliance and zeal of it all. No living writer uses facts with more vital effect. The men and women that made and remade France—kings, queens, priests, harlots, soldiers, prelates, demagogues—they are human beings, living their lives to wreck or fortune, "even as you and I." And when these men and women are dead, you close the "book" and find it labeled "history!" Watson's "Waterloo" is superb. It is Napoleon staking crown and empire, fame and happiness, and all our heart is in the fight. We help dispose the forces; we study the sky; will the elements befriend The Man? We watch Wellington coldly; he is a great general, but his blood is ice, and yonder is—Napoleon! We wait for Grouchy; he is breakfasting with leisurely elegance, and Napoleon—Napoleon is waiting for him! We send courier after courier, message after message. We watch the face of The Man. The afternoon shadows are lengthening . . . O God! where is Grouchy? That's Tom Watson's "Waterloo." It lays your heart at Napoleon's feet. In a recent letter, Mr. Watson writes: "In 'Waterloo' I have not used any of the material used in 'Napoleon,' excepting the general line of the narrative. . . . In fact, my reason for writing 'Waterloo' was that so much new Napoleonic material is now available which had not come to light when my 'Napoleon' was written." Octavo. $1.50, net. Postage, 15 cents.

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE SOUTH

ter, with a scrutiny of the best photographs and portraits extant of each. That this undertaking has been accomplished in every phase and detail, with wonderful fidelity to nature in each portrait, and with marvelously effective ensemble, is the comment of all who have seen the picture.

"To uncover the head and stand in thrilled awe before this great presentment of these immortal warriors who wore the gray has been the instinctive act of every Southerner as he entered its presence. It fascinates and holds one who gazes upon it with entrancing emotions.

"What a host of memories it must invoke for the veterans who followed those leaders and obeyed their commands! Involuntary is the reflection that there was not one of the twenty-five about him but did not loyally, heartily, and devoutly give the laurel of transcendent greatness to the star of all the darkness of Appomattox. Of all the twenty-six, but one is living—General Simon Bolivar Buckner."

General Marcus J. Wright, the well-known Confederate veteran, has this to say of the painting and lithograph:

"Mr. W. B. Matthews.

"DEAR SIR: I have had the pleasure of seeing the original picture of 'Lee and His Generals,' painted by your brother, George B. Matthews. I regard it as one of the finest paintings I ever saw. His truthfulness of feature of all these great generals is most remarkable.

"I have also seen the lithographic copy of the great painting, which is a most striking and accurate reproduction of the original. I hope all Confederates will procure copies.

"The Last of the Wooden Navy" is the only authentic picture of the first day's fight which changed the mode of naval warfare all over the world. It was a Southerner who conceived the idea of an ironclad, who built the first ship, and it was in Southern waters that the fight was fought. There are only 3,000 of these pictures remaining on hand to be sold.

Lieutenant Littlepage, of the C. S. Navy, has this to say of the "Last of the Wooden Navy:"

"It affords me pleasure to state that the painting recently made by your brother, George B. Matthews, of Virginia, entitled 'The Last of the Wooden Navy,' is a remarkably fine one, and gives a very excellent idea of that memorable engagement in Hampton Roads, on the 8th of March, 1862, when the Merrimac (the Virginia as she was first christened) engaged the U. S. fleet. Just the evening before the engagement I made a pencil sketch of the Merrimac, and the painting by your brother was made from this drawing. I personally supervised the painting as it progressed, and I believe it gives a very fair representation of the fight as it actually occurred. It may not be amiss for me to add that I was a lieutenant in the C. S. Navy, and was on board the Merrimac during the engagement.

"With the hope that the lithographic reproduction of this painting, which is exceedingly fine, may meet with a ready sale, I am, very truly yours,

[Signed] H. B. LITTLEPAGE."

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The third lithograph was made from an oil painting made from the last photograph taken of Mr. Davis prior to his death, and is a very fine likeness of the great Confederate—the leader of the "Lost Cause." The original painting hangs in "Beauvoir," Miss. There are only 1,000 of these left. The prices of these pictures are as follows—viz.:

For "Lee and His Generals," 55 cents sent by mail in tubes; for "Last of the Wooden Navy," 55 cents; and for Jefferson Davis, 25 cents. To agents, the price is, in lots of twenty-five or more, for the first two, 25 cents each, and for Jefferson Davis, 15 cents.

State, city, and county agents wanted. Large profits assured to good canvassers.

GUNNING FOR ORDERS

is much like gunning for birds. You must have a definite aim, because indiscriminate advertising, like indiscriminate shooting, results in empty pockets. The printer furnishes the shot, and postage is the powder that carries it wherever you direct.

And you must have good ammunition. Foolish indeed the sportsman who would use pebbles for shot to save expense, yet equally foolish is the advertiser who wastes energy, postage and opportunity on weak, ineffective printing

Think it over; then let's talk it over. We have furnished ammunition for so many successful campaigns that we know you will find our experience of value.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY IN THE INTEREST OF CONFEDERATE VETERANS AND KINDRED TOPICS.

Entered at the post office at Nashville, Tenn., as second-class matter. Contributors are requested to use only one side of the paper, and to abbreviate as much as practicable. These suggestions are important.

Where clippings are sent copy should be kept, as the VETERAN cannot undertake to return them. Advertising rates furnished on application.

The date to a subscription is always given to the month before it ends. For instance, if the VETERAN is ordered to begin with January, the date on mail list will be December, and the subscriber is entitled to that number.

The civil war was too long ago to be called the late war, and when correspondents use that term "War between the States" will be substituted.

The terms "New South" and "lost cause" are objectionable to the VETERAN.

JEFFERSON DAVIS HOME ASSOCIATION.

This most important matter is to be taken up in the November issue. It concerns a memorial park, etc., to our beloved President, Jefferson Davis, at the place of his birth. At a recent meeting in Louisville the action of the committee was to place the direction of this undertaking largely with the editor of the VETERAN. This was against his protest; but the enterprise has been undertaken, and the advantages are so fascinating in low options on part of the property desired and gifts of other portions that the Southern people will gladly procure it if the situation is properly presented, and this will be undertaken with merited zeal. Do let us work together in this worthy cause.

At going to press time good news comes from Gen. Clement A. Evans, Commander in Chief U. C. V., who writes, after mentioning that General Mickle has returned to his office after a prolonged illness: "I desire to take up at once actively the matter of the Davis home, and am writing on the subject to various members of the committee of fifteen." He refers also to the deep interest of General Buckner on the subject, and regrets that he cannot act as chairman of the General Committee. It is hoped that General Buckner will do so. He is now our last surviving lieutenant general.

THE SAM DAVIS MONUMENT.

It is not expected now to dedicate the Sam Davis monument on November 27, as was published in a recent issue of the VETERAN. The work is more prodigious than was realized, and to perfect all the details satisfactorily more time is required. Besides, by deferring it until the new year the State Legislature will be in session, and the event may thereby have increased importance and dignity. The concrete foundation is being put in, and all the work is being executed with much care. The fact that Maj. E. C. Lewis is giving it his close personal attention is a guarantee that the public will admire the result. Major Lewis was Director General of the Tennessee Centennial Exposition, and has directed the principal historic ornaments in Nashville for years.

In this issue of the VETERAN there is republished much of the wonderful history of Sam Davis. The next issue will continue the theme, and in the December VETERAN there will be published a complete list of subscriptions. This list is deferred in the hope that many other names will be added. It may be recalled that $1 is the amount especially solicited, and the suggestion is made that those who have already contributed and are inclined to do so will now send another dollar. One contributor has sent a dollar every year since his first subscription. That list will be deposited in the corner stone, and it is earnestly desired that it represent every State in the Union. About $1,000 more is necessary, and those who have contributed may now add to the sum if they wish. Some have voluntarily offered to double their subscriptions. It will be a special favor to the VETERAN for all who wish to subscribe or add to what they have given to do so at once.

PENSIONS FOR VETERANS AND WIDOWS.

The provision being made by the different Southern States for the relief of needy Confederate veterans and their widows has become a considerable item in their annual appropriations, such aid being of far-reaching benefit to the poor and dependent. However, some of the conditions under which this aid may be secured are such that many who need and deserve relief are shut out. For instance, each State is trying to provide for those who served with its own troops, yet a condition of residence in the State for a certain length of time prevents those who have settled in other States from enjoying its benefits. While this is overcome to some extent through other States making provision for those who are not of their State troops, but are residents of those States, still a general rule on this point would be to the benefit of all.

Another condition relates to the property owned by the applicant. In some of the States possession of property to the value of $75 or an income to that amount, which could not possibly provide for one's physical needs, debars the issuance of a pension. Other States put the limit at $300 or $400; yet the comrade whose thrift in working days enabled him to own a little home is certainly as much entitled to aid in his age and feebleness as one whose misfortunes and perhaps less diligence prevented the accumulation of anything.

It is hoped that these conditions may be overcome in some way, so that the really deserving may have this State relief. It is understood, of course, that the applicant must prove a clean record before he can get a pension.

Statements having been secured by the VETERAN from the different Pension Boards as to the annual appropriations, the following showing is made for each State:

Alabama makes an annual appropriation of $150 for the support of each inmate of the Confederate Soldiers' Home at Mountain Creek, and in addition the sum of $400,000 is now appropriated annually for the additional relief of needy Confederate soldiers and sailors resident citizens of the State of Alabama and their widows.

Arkansas has a pension appropriation amounting to about $470,000, which is disbursed according to the disability of the pensioner, the largest amount to veterans or widows being $100 per year. This also applies to resident citizens of the State. In addition, the sum of $125 is appropriated for the support of each inmate of the Confederate Home established at Sweet Home, near Little Rock.

Florida has a pension roll of some 7,164, the average being $120 per annum for veterans or widows. The payment for this year will amount to about $900,000. The pensioners are those who have resided in the State ten years previous to applying for a pension and are over sixty years old, irrespective of State service. The Confederate Home and Hospital have additional appropriations.

Georgia's latest appropriation for pensions was $900,000 annually, which includes widows. This applies to residents of the State who were in the regular service of the Confederacy as members of Georgia regiments or companies. The Soldiers' Home in Atlanta has an appropriation of $15,000 a year.

Kentucky makes an annual appropriation of $175 for the maintenance of each inmate of the Confederate Home at Pewee Valley. No pensions are allowed by this State.

Louisiana maintains a Confederate Home at New Orleans, and in addition makes an annual appropriation not to exceed $150,000 for its pension fund, part of which is to be expended in providing artificial limbs to those who were thus injured in service and for keeping them in good repair.

Maryland has an annual appropriation of $12,000 for the Maryland Line Confederate Home at Pikesville, and there is also an appropriation of $750 for the interment of deceased Confederate soldiers. No pensions are given by Maryland.

Mississippi now has an annual appropriation of $300,000 for its needy Confederate veterans and widows, distributed according to class. While the appropriation for the Soldiers' Home at Beauvoir for 1908 was $22,500, it was increased to $25,500 for 1909. About $14,000 was also appropriated for additions and improvements to the Home and $2,500 for uniforms for the inmates.

Missouri makes an annual appropriation of $92,900 for the annual support of the Confederate Home at Higginsville, which includes salaries of officers and employees, expenses and improvements about the Home. No pensions are granted.

North Carolina pays annually to Confederate veterans and widows the sum of $400,000, with $12,000 additional for special cases, and about $20,000 annually for support of the Home at Raleigh. These pensions are paid to bona fide residents of the State for twelve months, regardless of State enlisted from.

South Carolina limits its appropriation for pensions to $250,000 annually for its veterans and widows. About $5,000 of this fund is to be expended for artificial limbs for those in such need and to keep them in repair. The last Legislature also made an appropriation for the erection of a Home for the poor and dependent soldiers, which building will soon be ready for their reception.

Tennessee appropriates $300,000 annually for its Confederate pensioners, with an additional $75,000 for Confederate widows. The Soldiers' Home on the Hermitage tract has now about one hundred and twenty-four inmates, with an annual appropriation of $135 for each one. Actual residency in the State is a condition for granting the pensions, yet exceptions have been made where Tennessee soldiers were residents of other States.

Texas has now and has had for two years past an annual appropriation of $500,000, the constitutional limit, for Confederate pensions. The Home at Austin also has State support.

Virginia's latest appropriation was $425,000 for pensions to Confederate soldiers and widows, and this includes matrons who served in Confederate hospitals as long as twelve months. The Lee Camp Soldiers' Home at Richmond is also provided for through an annual appropriation of $47,000 for the two hundred and eighty inmates.

NOTICE TO THE CHAPTERS OF THE U. D. C.

FROM REC. SEC. GEN. U. D. C., MRS. A. L. DOWDELL, OPELIKA, ALA.

At each annual Convention of the United Daughters of the Confederacy the complaint comes from numerous Chapters in each Division that no credential blanks have been received, and hence the credentials of the elected delegates were not sent from the Chapter to the Credentials Committee, as required by the constitution.

The Recording Secretary General has always made every effort to avoid this by care and painstaking in her office, mailing these in sealed envelopes to the President of each Chapter as she finds the addresses among the rosters in the "Appendix" of the minutes of the preceding Convention.

Your Corresponding Secretary will with the same care try to have them reach you for the Convention in Atlanta this year. The loss of these credential blanks in transit is probably due to two causes: a loss in the mails, or more probably the Chapter has had a change of officers during the year of which the Secretary has not been informed.

To avoid a repetition of the same cry at the Atlanta Convention in November, "No credential blanks received," your Secretary decided to reproduce in the VETERAN a copy of the letter of information with the credential blank which has been sent in duplicate to the President of each Chapter by the Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. R. C. Cooley. These we reproduce below, and your Secretary would urge each Chapter to use this form and write the credentials of its delegates, should no blanks be received, and send them, as directed to do in the letter of information, to your Secretary and to the Chairman of the Credentials Committee, Miss Benning. Your Secretary has followed still another plan of precaution to avoid this excuse of no credentials received. She has sent to each State President an extra number with the request that she will supply those Chapters in her State who may have failed to receive the credential blanks.

Special to Each Chapter: The next annual Convention of the United Daughters of the Confederacy will convene in Atlanta, Ga., Wednesday, November 11, at 10 A.M. Each Chapter is entitled to one delegate for every twenty-five members, or fraction thereof not less than seven. Any one delegate can cast the entire vote of the Chapter; or if no delegate can attend, the Chapter can be represented by proxy. It is very important that each Chapter should be represented; and if it cannot be represented by a duly elected delegate, it should be by proxy.

Please find inclosed two blank credentials for delegates which are to be filled out as soon as your delegates are elected. One of these forward to Mrs. Andrew L. Dowdell, Recording Secretary General U. D. C., 605 Avenue A, Opelika, Ala., and the other send to Miss Anna C. Benning, Chairman Credentials Committee, care Mrs. Robert E. Park, 48 Merritts Avenue, Atlanta, Ga. It is important that Mrs. Dowdell should receive these credentials at least ten days before the Convention and at the earliest possible time. Read carefully Article II., Section 3 and Article III., Section 1 of the By-Laws for full instructions.

The Piedmont Hotel, Peachtree Street, Atlanta, has been selected as headquarters. [Other places and the rates are in the President's letter, page 489, in this issue.—ED. VETERAN.]

The Leland, Peachtree Inn, and private boarding houses will furnish cheaper rates.

Secure rooms in advance by applying to Mrs. S. H. Malone, Chairman Information and Entertaining Committee, 144 East Pine Street, Atlanta, Ga., or to either of the hotels.

Reduced rates will be given on all railroads. See your ticket agent for exact particulars.

The Division Presidents and all chairmen of committees are required to have their reports typewritten ready for print and to leave them at the desk of the Recording Secretary after being read before the Convention. All reports when made belong to the Convention and must not be carried from the platform.

Note Article VI., Section 1, By-Laws.

S. A. CUNNINGHAM, Editor and Proprietor.
Office: Methodist Publishing House Building, Nashville, Tenn.

This publication is the personal property of S. A. Cunningham. All persons who approve its principles and realize its benefits as an organ for Associations throughout the South are requested to commend its patronage and to cooperate in extending its circulation. Let each one be constantly diligent.

CO-OPERATION AMONG CONFEDERATES.

There is no organization, however worthy, of greater importance than the Confederates, and those they represent should cooperate as a fraternity. Conditions to them are peculiar in the fact that there can be no succession, other than such as their progeny may represent, to veterans and the women who made equal sacrifice in the awful struggle for the principles of the government founders and in defense of their God-given rights. Happily the victors are beginning to do tardy justice; but there is no duty more sacred than the firm establishment of the reasons the Confederates had in their daring revolt against the defiance of principles upon which the United States Government was founded.

Confederates should be systematically organized on new lines for the maintenance of their high and sacred principles and at once. The VETERAN, the most important factor to these bodies, should not depend upon the ability, intellectually and financially, and the life of one person. There should be a line of succession established, and there should be a large sum of money for the maintenance of the principles involved.

There ought to be a strong financial committee comprised of rich and eminently reliable men to whom subscriptions should be sent (the funds to be invested wisely as to reliability with the best income practicable) and having authority to take such action as may be suggested by conditions. There are thousands of men and women who would certainly rather give practical indorsement in financial support to this cause than for any other, and it ought to be done. An opportunity of this kind would prove a spiritual blessing. Won't faithful, zealous comrades consider this subject and give their views through the VETERAN? It should be considered promptly, and in the meanwhile comrades and our dear women should be diligent to see that the VETERAN is sent to every Southern family. Camps and Chapters should canvass their vicinities and have every friend of the cause interested. If they would do that, copies might be sent to all who can't pay for it. Instead of twenty thousand circulation, there ought to be at least two hundred thousand. The founder merits this cooperation if unremitting zeal for nearly sixteen years and doing the very best possible all the time at every peril deserve the consideration.

So much lethargy is painfully surprising. Our generation is falling fast, and every faithful member knows that principle and honor caused more sacrifice than would be made for billions and billions of gold. We know too that if we would "work while it is day" we must do it now. Don't fail to consider these suggestions. Write and talk about them. Consider that you have neighbors who would cooperate with you and be blessed with you if you would only begin the mission work. It deserves your attention, and it should have it without delay. You can procure one subscriber who is not familiar with the VETERAN. Will you do it?

There is a class of veterans who left the South for large cities North at the close of the war who made manly struggles and won large fortunes. These men have been so absorbed in the affairs of time that they have never done what they might for their unfortunate comrades and to maintain the principles for which they suffered with their comrades. Let us appeal to them, so that in the Great Day they will be the happier in having contributed as they have been prosperous to that "story of the glory" in which they fought in defense of principles that link time to eternity.

MATTERS POSTPONED TO NOVEMBER ISSUE.

Some important articles for this number of the VETERAN have been necessarily deferred. A sketch of that royal man and able Confederate officer, Gen. A. P. Stewart, whose last article for publication appeared in the September VETERAN, is unavoidably delayed. Then the lovely wife and for many years widow of Gen. Braxton Bragg is to have record in the November number. She died recently in New Orleans.

[In connection with General Stewart the following is used, but too late for the purpose indicated.]

To the Chapter Presidents: Mrs. M. B. Pilcher, Treasurer Tennessee Division, U. D. C., requests that each Chapter in the State pay tribute to the memory of Lieut. Gen. A. P. Stewart in a memorial service on October 2, 1908, the eighty-eighth anniversary of his birth.

The State President further requests that each Chapter invite the veterans to participate in this loving service.

General Stewart was born in Tennessee, and at the time of his death was the ranking officer of the Confederate army.

MRS. E. E. ADAMS,

Cor. Sec. Tennessee Division, U. D. C.

TENNESSEE STATE REUNION, U. C. V.—The annual gathering of Tennessee Confederates, to occur this year on October 14 and 15 in Nashville, is anticipated with much pleasure. This is to be a joint meeting of Bivouacs and Camps, and they have not met in Nashville for many years. Very low railroad rates have been secured.

Mrs. John P. Hickman, who was Secretary General U. D. C. at the time, desires a copy of the minutes for the year 1897. It is the minutes of the Convention held in Baltimore.

THE ADJUTANT GENERAL ON TEXAS REUNION.

Since the report, found elsewhere, of the annual meeting of the Texas Division, U. C. V., Adj. Gen. W. T. Shaw has written an account in which he states that no more successful and enjoyable occasion has occurred in the history of the organization. The attendance of veterans was good and the crowd of visitors exceptionally large for a State meeting, being estimated at from ten to fifteen thousand each day.

Great enthusiasm prevailed both among the veterans and the attending citizens at large. The Sons of Veterans, as is their custom, held their annual meeting at the same time, and under the capable and enthusiastic direction of Walter B. McAdams, State Commander, gave the veterans and others present a splendid entertainment on the evening of the 25th.

Major Harris, Commander of Wills Point Camp, opened the exercises on the first day at the pavilion in Goodnight Park with a few appropriate remarks, and after invocation by Rev. Ira M. Bryce introduced successfully the following local speakers: Judge John F. Spinks, in behalf of Van Zandt County; Hon. John L. Brooks, in behalf of the local Camp of Sons; and Miss Corinne Meredith, for the Mrs. Cone Johnson Chapter of U. D. C.

Presidents of State Divisions and Chapter Presidents where no Division is organized will see that all requirements have been met for their full representation in the Annual Convention. Such requirements are: A complete registry of membership papers with each State Registrar or with Chapter Registrar where no Division has been formed, the payment of annual dues on October 1, 1908, which amount must be sent to Mrs. L. E. Williams, Treasurer General U. D. C., Box 55, Anchorage, Ky., and the filling out of credential papers and prompt return of the same to Mrs. A. L. Dowdell, Recording Secretary General U. D. C., Opelika, Ala. Duplicate copies of these credential papers must be sent to Miss Anna C. Benning, Chairman Credential Committee, care of Mrs. Robert E. Park, 48 Merritts Avenue, Atlanta, Ga. Chapters must elect delegates at once, that these credential papers may be filled out and returned without delay. If a Chapter sends no delegates to the Convention, proxy representation in writing may be appointed. Credential blanks will be sent out from the office of the Recording Secretary General, and any Chapter not receiving these will apply to Mrs. A. L. Dowdell, Opelika, Ala.

It is urged that all reports of general officers, State Division Presidents, and chairmen of committees be made as concise and businesslike as possible and typewritten. When read, these reports must be turned over to the Recording Secretary for printing in the minutes.

All officers and State Directors of the Arlington Confederate Monument Association must make a written report of all work done during the year to the President General, ex officio chairman, at the meeting of the Association, which will be held during the Convention in Atlanta. Do not forget our soldiers sleeping in the National Cemetery at Arlington and to whom we are now striving to erect a monument, a loving tribute from the Daughters of the Confederacy. To this end let the annual meeting show a good report.

Chapters will bear in mind that the placing of portraits of our great chieftain, Jefferson Davis, and the peerless commander, Robert E. Lee, in the schools of the South should be continued, as this is in line with our purpose to keep alive the best and most sacred memories of "the days of the sixties;" and besides, such endeavor is inspiring and educational to the youth of our land.

Favorable railroad rates will be secured, and a large attendance is expected at this annual reunion, where our pledges of loyalty may be stimulated and renewed and where that fraternal spirit that makes us one in purpose and action may find its holiest and truest realization.

RECORDS OF CONFEDERATES IN WASHINGTON.

BY J. W. COOK, HELENA, ARK.

Your August number, among other good things, contained a suggestion that every ex-Confederate should write the War Department and get a transcript of his war record. This was an entirely new idea to me, that of getting our records of service in the Confederate army by writing to the national war office. I remembered, however, that many years ago some of the Southern States (Mississippi, my mother State, among them) had made a special appropriation to properly verify and compile her war records; but with the demoralized conditions that surrounded everything Southern I supposed those records would naturally be very meager, including, perhaps, muster rolls and possibly giving some history of regiments and brigades and maybe larger bodies. Imagine my surprise, then, when, a few days after writing the Adjutant General giving my company and regiment, I received a short but complete sketch of my personal service, correct in every detail, dates and all. I can best describe it by giving it verbatim:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., August 29, 1908.

"Mr. J. W. Cook, Helena, Ark.: The records show that one Joseph W. Cook served as a private and as a corporal of Company A, 43d Mississippi Infantry, Confederate States Army. He was enlisted at Aberdeen, Miss., May 17, 1862, for three years, and on the muster rolls of the company for the months of July and August, 1864 (the latest on file), he is reported absent in hospital, wounded July 24, 1864. The Federal records of prisoners of war show this soldier captured at Vicksburg, Miss., July 4, 1863, and paroled under the terms of the capitulation of that date, and that he was captured again in December, 1864, at Nashville, Tenn., and was released at Camp Douglas, Ill., June 18, 1865.

F. C. DOMINICK, A. A. G."

Now I consider this a very interesting and important document, and will heartily join in your suggestion that every Confederate should avail himself of this privilege, and the friends of those who have answered the last roll call would do well to do the same as a memorial of the advanced guard. These coming from the official records are the same in effect as an honorable discharge, which under the circumstances was impossible for every one to get.

[If applications for this data should be general, many would be disappointed, as the record is far from being complete. However, all who can should secure such record.—EDITOR.]

CONFEDERATE TWINS.

It is believed by the writer of this ou dit that little Company E, 41st Tennessee Regiment, can safely challenge the many thousands of organized units composing the Confederate States army and navy upon the subject of twins. There were three pairs in that single company—namely, Capt. John F. and James Fly, Revs. Sam O. and J. Allen Woods, Edwin R. and Walter S. Bearden.

The Flys were originally from the vicinity of Nolensville, and both are dead. The Woodses were from Bedford County, both living and active ministers of the gospel, Allen being a Southern Presbyterian pastor in West Tennessee and Sam a Cumberland Presbyterian at Crowell, Tex. The Beardens were from Petersburg, Tenn., where Company E was formed. Edwin was a citizen of Chattanooga at the date of his death, in 1881, though he died at the home of his brother, Walter S. Bearden, in Shelbyville, Tenn.

The Woods and Bearden twins, each closely resembling his brother (too young even for mustaches) and uniformed alike as commissioned officers, were frequently mistaken one for the other by their most intimate comrades, resulting occasionally in ludicrous "situations;" and once at Port Hudson, La., in the arrest of Ed Bearden because he didn't have his coat buttoned and sword belt fastened, the supposition being that he was the other Bearden, who was on duty as brigade officer of the day (a very hot one in April, 1863). General Gregg discovered his mistake about the time that Ed reported at his headquarters, as at that instant Walter passed near accoutered en regle and appeared to enjoy the joke more than the pestered officer did at the time.

Captain Fly was left sick at Russellville, Ky., and hence was not captured at Fort Donelson; but he rejoined the regiment after the Vicksburg exchange, and, bearing its colors in the bloody battle at Raymond, Miss., was disabled by a wound through his right arm.

Sam Woods became the captain of the Richmond company (Company B). Ed Bearden commanded Company E in the battle of Chickamauga, where he was wounded seriously in the ankle, the fibula being broken. Walter was disabled at the battle of Jonesboro, Ga., while leading the company in a charge, receiving a serious wound through the thigh of his right leg, and, gangrene supervening, it was thought he would not recover. He and Ed each used a crutch and a stick coming home in May, 1865. Walter S. Bearden has been one of the Chancellors of the State since 1886.

EIGHTY THOUSAND SOUTHERN VOTERS IN NEW YORK.—An Association of Southern Democrats in New York sends out a circular in which the statement is made that "there are some eighty thousand voters in this city who were born in Dixie land, few of whom fail to take an interest in the welfare of the South."

WORD FROM COL. JAMES D. TILLMAN.—Col. James D. Tillman, in whose regiment the editor of the VETERAN served (the 41st Infantry), writes from his country place, Harms, Tenn.: "As I get older the VETERAN seems to get better. I never fail to scan the death roll, and often see the name of some one I knew." Colonel Tillman seeks a copy of the diary kept by S. A. Cunningham during the war and published in a pamphlet of about sixty pages. The author printed three hundred copies of this reminiscence for free distribution. If any one who was the recipient of a copy will supply Colonel Tillman, he will confer an appreciated favor. He writes: "I had a copy, but it cannot now be found. It was of great interest to me, and I especially desire it to get some dates."

In "Confederate Military Annals of Tennessee," by Dr. J. Berrien Lindsley, the following memorandum appears: "One of the most valuable sketches of Tennessee in the great Civil War was brought out some years since by Sumner A. Cunningham, of Shelbyville, a private in the 41st Regiment."

The statement "private" is made the occasion to emphasize that the editor of the VETERAN held no commission, and he aspires to be nothing above "Mister." True, he was chosen as orderly sergeant and served a good deal as sergeant major of the regiment, but no commission is given for these positions.

In this connection the last conversation remembered with General Lee was on this subject. It was last November at Vicksburg. Mr. C. was in conversation with several Federals who were attending their annual convention, the Army of the Tennessee Association, and had been addressed as a field officer, when he said: "Excuse me, gentlemen, I carried a gun." It happened that Gen. Stephen D. Lee was standing very close by, and he responded: "Well, I appointed you colonel on my staff; and if you repudiate it, I can't help it."

Comrade T. F. Perkins contributes a little fun for the VETERAN: "While the 11th Virginia Regiment, Pickett's Division, was at Orange C. H. and the enemy was near, orders were positive that no drunkenness be allowed. One of my Irish comrades of Company D got very drunk, and the boys for a little fun got up a court-martial and sentenced Pat to be shot. When he was asked whether he had anything to say or not, Pat replied: 'Yes, I have an old friend, Mike, whom I would like to talk with.' Mike made his appearance, and he was a little drunk also. Pat said: 'Mike, they say I have got to go. We have been boys together, and I wish you to go with me.' Mike replied, 'Pat, I can't go, but I will divide my money with you,' and began to fumble with his pocket. At that the laugh was on the boys, so they turned them loose."

A "hard-tack" cracker picked up on the battlefield of Gettysburg by Lowndes Saunders, of the 2d Virginia Regiment, and sent to Miss Lela Roberta Perkins, of Bedford City (now Mrs. A. J. Hall, of Hartsville, Tenn.), was recently exhibited at the VETERAN office. It is nicely browned, and does not appear to have been cooked a year.

REUNION AT COLUMBUS, MISS.

There was a most interesting service by the veterans of Lowndes County, Miss., early in September at Columbus. There was a feast for the inner man and a feast of reason and a flow of eloquence, prominent veterans relating stirring incidents of the great war. There was a fine orchestra present, and with song and music the day passed delightfully. The morning was devoted to business. This included the election of officers for the ensuing year. Capt. T. A. Stinson was made permanent President, Capt. W. E. Pope was elected Secretary, and Capt. John A. Neilson Treasurer.

A memorial service was held in honor of the veterans who had died during the past year, and a committee was appointed to draft appropriate resolutions to their memory—some of the most gallant men that represented Lowndes County in the great internecine struggle. Then there were Gen. Stephen D. Lee, Commander in Chief of the United Confederate Veterans, Gen. Jacob H. Sharp, "the hero of the Locust Grove," Capt. L. Walburg, Dr. A. A. Wofford, Dr. A. C. Halbert, Dr. W. L. Lipscomb, Capt. E. C. Leech, Messrs. E. C. Ferguson, R. L. Harris, and A. L. Myers. A committee consisting of Gen. E. T. Sykes, Judge J. A. Orr, and Col. C. L. Lincoln was appointed to prepare suitable resolutions, which were adopted as follows:

"Whereas Death, who knocks with equal hand at the door of the cottage and the palace gate, has been busy at his appointed work, and has during the past twelve months taken from our number ten of our most cherished and distinguished comrades; therefore be it

Resolved: 1. That in the death of these comrades the members of this association feel that words are inadequate to express the deep and heartfelt sorrow their departure from among us has occasioned, and we feel that we can but feebly portray our emotions of sadness in thinking of the loss we have sustained.

"2. That we extend to the families and friends of our deceased comrades our heartfelt sympathy in this time of their great affliction, and assure them that in their hour of sadness their sorrow is the sorrow of us all.

"3. That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to each of the city papers and a copy thereof sent to the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, at Nashville, Tenn., for publication."

At twelve o'clock dinner was served, and a sumptuous repast it was, too. The veterans and their friends were first served with Brunswick stew, which was faultlessly prepared. The Brunswick stew was followed by a meat course, etc., and in the barbecued meats the same degree of perfection was obtained. Fragrant coffee accompanied the meat, the whole making a repast that was verily fit for a king.

After dinner was over the speech-making commenced, and short addresses were made by several veterans. Capt. W. E. Pope officiated as toastmaster, and five-minute talks on war topics were delivered as follows: "The Hampton Roads Conference," Judge J. A. Orr; "Sharpshooters," Col. W. C. Richards; "The Scouts," Judge Newnan Cayce; "Prison Times," Capt. John A. Neilson; "Youths in the Army," Capt. E. D. Cavett.

In addition, Mr. R. B. Ford read several interesting poems relating to the war, which interested the veterans.

A graceful compliment to the Confederate veterans on the occasion of their annual barbecue, September 11, was bestowed by the Columbus Railway, Light & Power Company in providing for them free transportation to Washington Park.

ABOUT ATTACK ON FEDERAL WAGON TRAIN.

On page 396 of the August VETERAN Comrade W. H. Moore in his article, "Attack on Federal Wagon Train," says: "Lieut. Patton Inks, of Capt. Pleasant Buchanan's company, was ordered to select thirty men from Buchanan's, Brown's, and Beaty's companies and move in advance." Lieutenant Inks was first lieutenant of Capt. Buck Brown's company, though he had been first lieutenant of Captain Buchanan's company (H), 15th Arkansas Infantry. Captain Buchanan was killed a few months after this fight.

A few months after, in the early spring of 1864, Capt. Alvin Beaty and Lieut. A. M. Rich reorganized Captain Buchanan's company, and with other recruits formed a full company, and with its splendid officers kept up the fighting reputation of the old company. It is correct history we wish to leave to our country, and I am sure Comrade Moore wishes it as much as any one. He remembers incidents and names well after the lapse of forty-four years.

He also says: "Do not ask me why Colonel Brooks did not move forward and take possession of the train." It was not from lack of courage, as he had demonstrated on the battlefield before this and after. There was too much caution and lack of dash required by all successful cavalry officers.

U. D. C. CHAPTERS NAMED FOR GOOD OFFICERS.

From J. P. Smartt's address to U. D. C. at Chattanooga:

"Chattanooga and vicinity is rich in memories of heroic deeds. F. M. Walker and A. P. Stewart, for whom our local Chapters are called, are names synonymous with all that is noble, pure, heroic, and sublime in life. The former was killed at the head of his brigade while leading a charge in front of Atlanta, Ga., July 22, 1864. Colonel Walker, as he was generally known in the army, was a lawyer in Chattanooga in 1861. He raised a company and joined the 19th Tennessee Regiment, was elected lieutenant colonel at the organization of the regiment, and subsequently colonel. He was in command of Maney's old Tennessee Brigade at the time of his death, and his commission as brigadier was received after the battle. A finer type of the Christian patriot and fearless soldier never surrendered his life on the field of conflict than Gen. Francis M. Walker.

"Of all the officers of the Volunteer State in the Confederate service, in the grandeur of his rounded character, to my mind General Stewart has always been 'the noblest Roman of them all.' Having attained the rank of lieutenant general and commander of the Army of Tennessee at the surrender, he is now the ranking lieutenant general of the Confederacy, and lives enthroned in the love and esteem of the people of the South, his life an example and benediction to this and all future generations."

CHILDREN OF THE CONFEDERACY.

REPORT OF MRS. MARY G. PICKENS, DIRECTOR FOR THE ALABAMA DIVISION.

Madam President and Daughters assembled, with greetings of love I submit my report. Since June, 1907, I have written two hundred and nine letters and sixty-eight postals; have issued two hundred and twenty-two application blanks, registered one hundred and eighty-five applications, and issued seventy-four certificates of membership and sent money for same ($3.70) to Mrs. Palmer. I have sent out sixteen packages of blanks, etc., and three registered packages of application papers. Hoping to stimulate interest in my work, I mailed (at my own expense) in January a circular letter to every Chapter in Alabama (fifty-nine), that they might see the importance of the work and give their approval if not assistance to the Children of the Confederacy in their memorial to Gen. Robert E. Lee. I planned for them to work for this as a scholarship fund to be established at Auburn, Ala., where a boy or girl (of Confederate descent) with a common school education can go and with the "Lee Memorial" fund (when established) take any special course preferred to fit him or her for life's work. Many young men and women for want of proper training are deprived of getting lucrative work. I want twelve hundred and fifty dollars to endow this scholarship, from which to realize one hundred dollars a year, and it can easily be raised with the cooperation of all. See what a few Auxiliaries have already done:

Robert E. Lee Auxiliary, Enfaula, $35.

Pelham Auxiliary, Tusculmbia, $3.50.

Joseph E. Johnston Auxiliary, Athens, $7.

John W. Forney Auxiliary, Jacksonville, $5.

R. E. Lee Memorial Auxiliary, Anniston, $25.

Ellen Peter Bryce Auxiliary, Tuscaloosa, $20.

George P. Harrison Auxiliary, Auburn, $12.

Emma Sansom Auxiliary, Troy, $75.

J. E. B. Stuart Auxiliary, Montgomery, $3.

Eliza T. Porter Auxiliary, Greenville, $5.

Joe Wheeler Auxiliary, Birmingham, $10.

Sam Blackwell Auxiliary, Decatur, $8.

Sam Davis Auxiliary, Clayton, $2.

Eight Auxiliaries have not reported.

Gifts from individuals: State Director, Greensboro, $15; Miss Mary C. Forney, Jacksonville, $1; Mrs. B. B. Ross, Auburn, $2; Mrs. Martha Gielow, $1; Mrs. C. David White, Washington, D. C., $1; Mrs. Marion Butler, Washington, D. C., $1. Total subscriptions, $231.50.

We now have twenty-one live Auxiliaries and nearly five hundred children, six Auxiliaries having been organized and several old ones reorganized since I took charge.

Most of the Auxiliaries that have not responded to the Lee Memorial have promised to do so, and I feel sure that with the good start we have made our Children of the Confederacy will double their energies and soon accomplish this grand and beautiful work—one that no other Division has done. Mrs. Brown, our State President, takes great interest in this branch of her work, and has aided me in every way.

Mrs. Stone, our President General, wrote me a beautiful letter in which she said: "You are doing a splendid work. The 'Lee Scholarship' is a wise memorial which will give practical education to some boy or girl each year." She sent my circular letter to the Chairman of the Texas Division, Children of the Confederacy, and she indorses the little shield pin and suggests that we adopt it as a Division and bring it up at the General Convention to be indorsed for all Children of the Confederacy. I also sent out the question papers from our President to the Children, and many Chapters promised to work for the gold medal.

JEFFERSON DAVIS HOME ASSOCIATION.

At a meeting of the Jeff Davis Home Association, held in Louisville September 19 at the Louisville Banking Company, the following business was transacted:

1. The office of Vice President was created, and S. A. Cunningham, editor of the VETERAN, was unanimously elected.
2. The Vice President was authorized and empowered to take active charge of the canvass for funds for the purposes of the Association and to have charge of the appointment of agents for canvassing in the bounds of each Camp of Veterans and each organized Chapter of Daughters of the Confederacy.
3. That our Secretaries be instructed to prepare news items and other matter for publication each month in the VETERAN.

KENTUCKY TROOPS IN CONFEDERATE ARMY.

BY CAPT. THEODORE F. ALLEN, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Mr. R. L. Thompson, of St. Louis, Mo., in the VETERAN for September, 1908, says that the 4th Kentucky Cavalry (Giltner's Regiment) was organized toward the end of the war, and that the 9th Kentucky Cavalry (Col. W. C. P. Breckinridge) was organized in 1862, or two and a half years prior to the organization of the 4th Kentucky Cavalry.

I should say not—not by a long shot. Why, I was wounded and captured by Giltner's 4th Kentucky Cavalry in East Tennessee in November, 1863, and the 4th Kentucky Cavalry had then been in the field in active service for a year.

The records show that the 4th Kentucky Cavalry was recruited in the summer of 1862 while Bragg's army was in Kentucky.

The 4th Kentucky Cavalry Regiment, nearly nine hundred strong, was fully organized at Salyersville, Ky., on the 5th of October, 1862.

Another criticism by Henry George, of Pewee Valley, Ky.:

"In the VETERAN for September there appeared an article from R. L. Thompson, of St. Louis, Mo., which purported to give Mr. Thompson's recollections of the Kentucky regiments in the Confederate army, and the article shows that Mr. Thompson's recollections are seriously at fault. He says there were but fourteen regiments in the Confederate army and names them—2d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 9th Infantry. Why did he not learn before he wrote the article that there were a 3d, a 7th, and an 8th Kentucky Infantry Regiment, commanded respectively by Thompson, Crossland, and Lyon? He further shows his lack of knowledge of Kentucky troops by stating that there were none in Virginia. It should be well known that the 1st Kentucky Infantry fought in Virginia until their time expired and they were discharged. Still another blunder: He says that early in the war there were two officers in Western Kentucky (H. B. Lyon and Ed Crossland) who commanded Confederate troops and each ranked as colonel, but the regiments failed to materialize.

"The above will be news to the survivors of that splendid Kentucky brigade composed of the 3d, commanded by Thompson, the 7th, commanded by Crossland, and the 8th, commanded by Lyon, and later the 12th Cavalry, commanded by Falkner, which brigade was commanded by Buford, Thompson, Lyon, and Crossland at different times. This command saw as hard service as any troops in the Confederate army, and participated in a number of the hardest-fought battles of the war, losing half their number in one battle—Harrisburg. The whole article is full of blunders."

Col. V. Y. Cook, of Batesville, Ark., calls attention to his language about Buford's Independent Company. This evidently refers to Gen. Abe Buford, whose name does not occur in the records in a rank below that of brigadier general. He commanded a division of eight regiments—four Kentucky and four Tennessee—under Forrest. Colonel Cook writes more on the history of Kentucky officers in the Confederacy, but expected others to reply to this.

T. B. Fauntleroy writes from Paducah, Ky.:

"An article written by R. L. Thompson, of St. Louis, in the September VETERAN stated that there were five infantry and nine cavalry regiments in the Confederate army from Kentucky. Mr. Thompson evidently forgets a few facts connected with Kentucky's record. The 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th Kentucky Regiments, together with the 12th Louisiana and the 35th Alabama, constituted Breckinridge's Brigade, Buckner's Division. These regiments were with Albert Sidney Johnston at Bowling Green, Ky., and were with him until he was killed at Shiloh. After the battle of Shiloh Beauregard assumed command, and we were with him all through the Corinth to Baton Rouge campaign. Then the Army of the Tennessee was formed. The 2d, 4th, 5th, and 9th Kentucky Regiments were transferred to Bragg's army; the 3d, 7th, and 8th Kentucky Regiments remained in the Mississippi Department, and were mounted and put under N. B. Forrest. They remained with him until the surrender to E. R. S. Canby at Citronelle, Ala., May 13, 1865.

"The colonels of all the Kentucky regiments but one (the 7th) were promoted to the rank of general; and if the numbers of these regiments were not known at the War Department in Richmond, I fail to observe how they could ever have received their commissions. If my friend Thompson will read the 'Life of Forrest,' he will see that the Kentucky regiments were in as many hard-fought battles as any command."

Thomas C. Wright, of Jackson, Miss. (629 N. Jefferson Street), writes in connection with the Thompson article: "There was a 1st Kentucky Infantry, Col. Thomas Taylor, which was in the Army of Northern Virginia very early in the war. It was a Kentucky regiment of Kentuckians, recruited largely in Louisville, Ky. This was prior to the brigade proper now known as 'The Orphans.'"

He writes of other commands already mentioned in the foregoing, and states that Ed Byrn's battery, organized in Washington County, Miss., was almost exclusively of Kentuckians. Comrade Wright adds: "I had a brother killed in Breckinridge's charge at Murfreesboro. I was much interested in Colonel Pickett's account of that battle."

The VETERAN owes an apology for the use without corrections or comment of Mr. Thompson's article. It was used with the presumption that the author had studied the subject, and was therefore not critically considered. Mistakes will continue to occur, careful as may be its management.

There was at hand a record of Kentucky troops in the Confederate army, published in Washington soon after the war, naming the regiments and battalions of infantry and cavalry. There were not many artillerymen from Kentucky. General Lyon was captain of a battery, Company 1st having been detached from the 3d Kentucky Infantry for that purpose. Then there was Cobb's Battery, whose commander was promoted to major of artillery. R. S. Williams is reported as having had a Kentucky battery, but there is no roll of members on file. Cobb's Battery was one of the most noted in service.

There were organized from first to last twenty-one Kentucky battalions, thirteen cavalry regiments, and nine regiments of infantry.

SUGGESTED INSCRIPTION FOR CONFEDERATE BANNERS.—Capt. J. V. Hooper, of Roanoke, Va., suggests that the Camps and the Chapters of the different Confederate organizations adopt a banner on which is a scroll with the inscription: "Our Aim, the True History of Our Cause." This would doubtless be very effective in that it would impress the younger generation with the serious idea which impelled the banding together of Confederate survivors and sympathizers, and perhaps induce a study of the principles which animated those who fought and sacrificed for the Southern Confederacy.

FIRST SOLDIER KILLED IN THE WAR.

BY J. OGDEN MURRAY.

Under the above heading the VETERAN for August contains the following statement: "John Quincy Marr, captain of the Warrenton Rifles (Company K), 17th Virginia Regiment Infantry, was evidently the first soldier killed in the war, having been killed at Fairfax C. H. on June 1, 1861."

Col. George A. Porterfield was in command of that part of Virginia now West Virginia in 1861, having been sent there to recruit men and hold territory most of which was intensely Union in sentiment and hostile to the Richmond authorities. On the 22d of May, 1861, Colonel Porterfield with a small number of men was rendezvoused at Fetterman, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, about one mile north of Grafton (now West Virginia). On that night a company of Union men left Grafton to attack Porterfield's camp. Two men of the Union company advanced and were challenged by the Confederate pickets. In reply to the challenge the Union men fired on Colonel Porterfield's pickets, who returned the fire, killing Bailey Brown, of the Union company, shooting him through the heart with a leaden slug. Colonel Porterfield's men had no fixed ammunition, and were compelled to cut lead into slugs for use in battle at that early period of the war.

Within the last two years there has been erected at Grafton a beautiful monument to the memory of Bailey Brown, "the first victim of the Civil War." I had always believed the gallant Capt. John Q. Marr was the first victim of the war; but the date of Bailey Brown's death being May 22 and Captain Marr's June 1, it is evident Bailey Brown was the first victim. I have become possessed of some very important facts in connection with this West Virginia campaign. We should have the true history of the West Virginia campaign of 1861 that the future student of history shall be clear when he writes upon the subject of why the Richmond authorities sent Colonel Porterfield alone into a hostile country to recruit and hold territory in which nine-tenths of the population were intensely Union in sentiment and opposed to the policy of the Richmond government.

MONUMENT AT BENTONVILLE, ARK.

BY GEN. J. H. BERRY, COM. ARKANSAS DIVISION, U. C. V.

On the 8th of August, 1908, a monument to the Confederate soldiers was unveiled at Bentonville, Ark. It is a beautiful monument with the figure of a private soldier at the top. It is in the center of the park on the Square at Bentonville. The following are the inscriptions:

"Confederate" on the four sides of base.

South side: "1861-1865."

East side: "They fought for Home and Fatherland."

North side: "Their names are borne on Honor's shield; their record is with God."

West side: "To the Southern soldiers. Erected by A. J. Bates and the James H. Berry Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, August 8, 1908."

Mr. A. J. Bates, a citizen of the town and who was a private soldier in Shelby's Missouri Brigade, gave $1,000 of the money to construct it, and the local Chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy raised the rest of the money. There was a very large assembly of people present at the unveiling, a great parade, and fourteen young ladies represented the fourteen States whose soldiers fought for the Confederate cause. Prayer was offered by Rev. R. E. L. Bearden, of the

M. E. Church, South. Mrs. W. F. Patton, President of the Chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy, gave a brief history of the construction of the monument, and announced that Miss Ruth Terry, whose father served in the Kentucky Orphan Brigade, had been selected to unveil the monument, and while the band played "Dixie" amidst the applause of the people assembled the monument was given to the public. Hon. Clifton R. Breckinridge, of Fort Smith, Ark., son of Maj.

CONFEDERATE MONUMENT AT BENTONVILLE, ARK.

Gen. John C. Breckinridge, then delivered a magnificent address, thereby conferring additional honor on the name he bears.

Too much praise cannot be given to the Daughters of the Confederacy and Mr. A. J. Bates, whose united efforts made it possible to thus honor those who died for the Southern cause.

WORTHY TRIBUTE TO JEFFERSON DAVIS.

PROF. HENRY E. SHEPHERD, IN BALTIMORE SUN.

The two years extending from 1807 to 1809 are marked by the advent of a group of men of light and leading such as have rarely descended upon the world in so brief a period. Merely to suggest a few of the full welling fountain heads of change that cast their radiance over these crowded years of glorious life, Robert E. Lee, Jefferson Davis, Edgar A. Poe, Charles Darwin, William E. Gladstone, Abraham Lincoln were all born between the dawning days of 1807 and the close of 1809. To the student of historic coincidences it is suggestive to note that Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln were both born in Kentucky at intervals of eight months from each other—June 3, 1808, February 12, 1809—and that the natal day of the Confederate chief falls on the anniversary of Cold Harbor, June 3, 1864, the most brilliant of the victories won by Lee over the vast and surging host of Grant, when ten thousand Federal soldiers lay prostrate in less than half an hour before the deadly fire of the Confederate army.

We assume on the part of the maturer readers of the Sun an acquaintance with the essential or characteristic events of Mr. Davis's life. His education at West Point, where R. E. Lee and Joseph E. Johnston were his contemporaries; his honorable record in the war with Mexico; his early Congressional services; his association with the Cabinet of President Pierce, 1853-57, as Secretary of War, from which he passed into the Senate, retiring upon the secession of Mississippi, the State of his adoption; the marvelous story of his administration as the only President of the Southern Confederacy; the final overthrow, the capture, the unique and fadeless infamy of his treatment at Fortress Monroe; his ungracious release when the charge of treason sank under the weight of its own flagrant absurdity; his death in December, 1889, almost simultaneous with that of Robert Browning—such is a mere outline, a faint suggestion of a character in distinctive features without parallel in our national annals.

The pitiless rancor of partisan hate has pursued the fame and memory of Mr. Davis far beyond the grave; notably was this deplorable tendency illustrated by the comments of the Northern press upon the occasion of the dedication of the monument at Richmond on June 3, 1907. Malignity and acrimony, unrelenting and untempered with the lapse of years, have obscured the historic perception of the American people, if they have not resulted in absolute eclipse of judgment, with regard to the motives, the ideals, the genius, as well as the personal character of the Confederate President. It is a significant fact that in not one of the text-books in current use in the schools of Baltimore, allied to the South by every bond and memory, social, material, and political, that centuries of historic community can inspire, is there to be found a single reference—even a remote allusion—to the prolonged and vicarious tortures inflicted upon Mr. Davis by his captors at Fortress Monroe, the lamp that cast its fierce and relentless light into his frail and delicate eyes, causing an agony that baffles all power of description, the shackling with heavy manacles, the inspection of his correspondence, even with his own wife, the crucifixion of the soul involved in the vigorous revision of his most sacred utterances by his vulgar and insolent jailers.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The story carries its own moral and conveys its own lesson. In the retrospect of the past it stands out in its appalling hideousness; age cannot dim its horror or wither its infamy. That which the shaping spirit of imagination strove to realize and portray through the medium of the drama was illustrated in the cell of the Confederate President at Fortress Monroe with a perfection far transcending the wildest dreams of the artistic fancy. Here, if ever in the tragedy of human history, was Prometheus chained to the rock, the vulture gnawing at his vitals. Yet in the revealing light of this centennial year the whirligig of time is fast bringing in its revenges. The streams of tendency that dominate our political evolution constitute the most far-reaching and effective vindication of the man and the cause of which he was the martyr as well as the champion to be found in the annals of contemporary ages.

The relentless gravitation of our national development for at least four decades has seen the creature supplant the creator until not only the sovereignty but the autonomy of the States has faded like the baseless fabric of a vision and left no trace behind. Such is the logical outcome of the failure of the Southern Confederacy to perpetuate its existence—an autocratic executive, an abject Legislature, a subservient judiciary. It is no overwrought fantasy of rhetoric to affirm that the American republic entered upon the downward slope to death with the coming of Appomattox.

If we contemplate Mr. Davis apart from his political career and his political convictions, he may be justly accorded a place in the foremost files of fame. No rational mind will at this stage impeach the purity of his motives or challenge the intense sincerity of his constitutional creed. More than this, the range of his intellect was majestic and all-embracing in its nature. He seemed at least to approach the Baconian ideal and take all human knowledge for his province. In the accuracy and the comprehensiveness of his acquirements he has no peer among American statesmen save Thomas Jefferson. His mind was endowed with a faculty of assimilation that was truly Shakespearean. Science, literature, art, history, jurisprudence—all had been absorbed in minute detail by his masterful receptive power.

As an illustration of his rare versatility of intellect and the affluence of his knowledge I recall my last conversation with him, which occurred at the home of a friend in Baltimore. The subject of discussion was the most effective method of teaching the English language in our higher forms of education. With the subtlest discrimination he ranged over every feature of the complex problem; one would have been inclined to suspect that the world-worn statesman had bestowed no small measure of his genius and labor upon the scientific elucidation of his mother tongue.

In his mastery of English, whether in the vigor and grace of a cultured diction or in the thrill and inspiration of an oratory which is in the man, the time, the occasion, and is fortified by the resources of an almost boundless knowledge, he stands with the foremost of those who have drawn the deepest meaning from the chords in dealing with the subtle harmonies of our native speech. Witness as illustration his messages to the Confederate Congress, and perhaps his noblest effort, the address upon the occasion of the death of Gen. R. E. Lee, October, 1870. Take him for all in all—his versatility of intellect, breadth of acquirement in spheres of knowledge remote and unrelated, his uncompromising allegiance to his own political ideal, his inflexible refusal to palter with the eternal truth—we shall not look upon his like again. It is perhaps not too much to declare as an expression of personal conviction that he was the only character developed by our national conflict to whom the historian of the age to come can attribute the rare distinction of far-reaching, creative, and unsullied statesmanship.

ENGLISH MAN-OF-WAR AT FORT SUMTER.

W. B. Fort, of Pikeville, N. C., contributes a remarkable incident occurring during the eighteen months' bombardment of Charleston by the Federal fleet and shore batteries:

"One beautiful morning as the sun was rising from her bed in the ocean into a bright, clear sky with only a few fleecy clouds, while a balmy and gentle wind ruffled without roughing the surface of the sea, far to the southward could be seen a black smoke curling from the funnels of some large steamer, hull down. She was first taken to be another block-ade ironclad of the Ironside's type; but after closer inspection with our powerful marine glasses, we found her to be a large man-of-war rapidly approaching the blockading line of the Federal fleet as they were bombarding the city and forts. As she approached the fleet she hoisted the English flag and sailed close in to Fort Sumter, so near that we could see from the forts and Confederate ironclads the expressions of the officers and men, many of them viewing us with marine glasses, evidently admiring the beautiful proportions of our formidable ironclad fleet and forts. Her flag saluted the stars and bars and her band played 'Dixie' amidst shouting and cheering on both sides. While our flag saluted theirs and our bands played 'God Save the Queen' grim war was forgotten for the time being, and both Confederates and Federals ceased firing to salute the colors of a nation that was mistress of the seas and upon whose possessions the sun never sets.

"The English man-of-war was making her annual trip north to English possessions in Canada after being stationed during the winter among the English West Indies Islands."

CORRECT ESTIMATE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

BY GEN. C. IRVINE WALKER, CHARLESTON, S. C.

In considering the career of Jefferson Davis as President of the Southern Confederacy, we should ever remember that he was placed at its head by its people and against his wishes. He did not seek to govern us, but we called him to direct the destinies of our new nation. Therefore if he committed any faults (and, being human, he probably did), the blame should rest upon us, we who placed him in the position and forced upon him the responsibilities.

If, however, on Mr. Davis is placed the burden of the faults of the Confederacy, he should fairly receive the glory for what was accomplished. Really his work seems almost superhuman. Called to the presidency of a republic without any legal organization, without an army or navy, without even the means to arm or equip either, without a dollar in its treasury, he organized and directed it so admirably that for four long years, without resources and with only six hundred thousand armed men and the mere shell of a navy, we held at bay an old and well-organized country, with two and a half millions of fighting men under arms, a powerful navy, with the resources of the world to draw from, and supported by the moral sentiment and effective assistance of the great nations of the world. With the softening influence of time and the cooling of passion, his part in these magnificent achievements will receive its due meed of praise. The world will yet acknowledge him, as it should, as one of the greatest of the Anglo-Saxon race.

History will do justice and vindication must follow enlightenment. No general action has ever led to a fairer and juster consideration of the character and worth of Mr. Davis than that which the good women of the South, preëminently her loyal daughters, adopted to make memorable the centennial year of Mr. Davis's birth. They asked the schools of the South to give study to his character and to impress his greatness upon the children of the South, and specially requested that a true portrait of Mr. Davis be placed in every schoolhouse of the South.

It was my privilege to assist Mrs. W. J. Behan, President of the Confederate Southern Memorial Association, in her work of securing a really good portrait of Mr. Davis. The coöperation of the Art Publishing Company of Charleston, S. C., secured the publication of a true portrait of President Davis which, as it should, depicts him in the vigor of his strong intellectual manhood and not in the decrepitude of old age, as most others have done. Mrs. Hayes, Mr. Davis's sole surviving child, selected the original photograph from which the engraving was made, and her heartfelt commendation of the engraving was given when it was published.

The States of Louisiana and Mississippi are fortunate in having liberal and patriotic citizens to be influenced and loyal Daughters as the ladies of the C. S. M. A. to impress this influence upon them. The New Orleans Picayune most generously donated enough of these portraits to give every school in these two States a copy. With like generosity the Times-Democrat of New Orleans contributed a pamphlet bearing on Mr. Davis's life for use in the schools. The interest of the officials of each State was evidenced by its distribution in Louisiana through the Parish Superintendents of Education and in Mississippi through Mr. Dunbar Rawlins, Director Department Archives and History. Fortunate these States!

In honoring the memory and exalting the appreciation of the character and deeds of President Davis the United Daughters of the Confederacy also did most valued and effective work. Largely by their influence Mr. Davis's birthday has become a legal holiday in most of the States which were in the Confederacy and is annually observed by the U. D. C. Chapters. Their efforts contributed to the most beautiful celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birthday, the study of his life in many schools, and the placing of his portrait in these schools. The work to these ends will be continued during this year and in the prosecution of their memorial work for all succeeding years.

Unfortunately nearly all of the schools of the South were closed, their sessions having ended, at the centennial anniversary of Mr. Davis's birth. Many of the schools then open celebrated the day and loyally installed portraits of the great Confederate chieftain given by the good women. The Association, therefore, acted most wisely at its meeting at Birmingham in extending to a later date (the anniversary of President Davis's death) the completion of this holy work. We can confidently look forward at this date to a general celebration, a study of his exalted character, and the placing of a true portrait of Mr. Davis in every school in the South, and with the closing of the year see the good work reach its full fruition.

GENERAL EVANS COMMENTS THE FOREGOING.

Gen. Clement A. Evans, Commander in Chief U. C. V., to whom was submitted the foregoing, writes:

"I have read to-day with special care and great interest your letter on the subject of our duty to make known to posterity the exalted character of Jefferson Davis as a man, a citizen, a statesman, and as the President of the Confederate States of America.

"Mrs. Behan has been for years the admirable and untiring leader in this just endeavor, and she has the gratitude of the Confederate soldiers as well as their admiration for her truly noble work in the past and also in her purpose officially to have a true portrait of President Davis placed in every schoolhouse in the South.

"The letter expresses fully the sentiment of the United Confederate Veterans."

ALSO COMMANDANT APPERSON, OF THE SONS.

Hon. J. W. Apperson, Commandant of the U. S. C. V., also indorses the sentiments, saying: "I heartily approve of your action in this matter. The suggestion in your letter should be carried out throughout the South, and I can assure you of the coöperation of the Sons of Veterans."

COLORS OF SEVENTH GEORGIA REGIMENT.

BY C. K. MADDOX, CAPTAIN CO. K, 7TH GEORGIA INFANTRY.

In October, 1864, during Grant's last advance on Richmond, the 7th Georgia Regiment, after marching from early dawn, reached an old field near Fair Oaks, across which they saw the Federals coming in line of battle. The Confederates were behind breastworks, and soon the field was covered with smoke. When it lifted, every Yankee to be seen was lying on the ground. The battle was fought and decided in ten minutes. Our lines remained quiet to see what would happen next.

Toward four o'clock Sergeant James L. Bell, of Company K, climbed over our works and went over the battlefield. Far off to the left in wooded land some of the enemy still lingered concealed. Now and then one would fire at the sergeant, and he fired back. But he ran forward to the shelter of a small tree when two shots at one time were fired at him. On reaching the tree he fired again. The weeds around him were nearly as high as his head. As he fired a soldier raised up right in his face and said: "Don't shoot; we'll surrender." Then another and another Yankee arose. They had run into a ravine and were lying there concealed by the weeds waiting for night. They thought they had been discovered by the Confederates and that the sergeant had been sent out to bring them in. They were the 19th Wisconsin and parts of some New York regiment, about three hundred in all.

When they offered to surrender, Bell said: "Put down your guns, then." They left them in the ravine and went by twos and threes to the Confederate breastworks, where they were taken and sent to Richmond. The 19th Wisconsin had its colors, and the color bearer, John Fallen, did not want to give them up; but Bell took them away and carried them to his regiment.

It is needless to say that the unexpected rising up of so many of the enemy almost paralyzed Sergeant Bell, but he bravely took the best course and brought them in. The flag-staff was tipped with a silver spearhead and had two silken tassels. Sergeant Bell took the stars and stripes off and presented the staff to the 7th Georgia Regiment, and the colors of the 7th have been attached thereto ever since. The next day Sergeant Bell took the captured colors up to General Field along with the Confederate Cabinet, but were recaptured near Washington, Va., and returned to the State of Wisconsin, where they now are. The colors of the 7th Georgia on the Wisconsin staff were taken to Washington City, and remained there forty years, when they with the colors of all the Southern States were by act of Congress returned to their respective States. The colors of the 7th Georgia, still on the Wisconsin staff, are now in the Georgia Capitol, and on the staff is the following legend:

COLORS OF THE 7TH GEORGIA REGIMENT.

The 49th Wisconsin Regiment, with this staff, was captured by Sergeant J. L. Bell, Company K, 7th Georgia Regiment, October 30, 1864, at Fair Oaks, Va., seven miles from Richmond on the Williamsburg Road.

The Wisconsin colors were detached and turned over to Brig. Gen. G. T. Anderson, commanding.

The staff was presented to the 7th Georgia Regiment by Sergeant Bell, and the regimental colors placed thereon. It was surrendered at Appomattox C. H. April 9, 1865, and sent to Washington, D. C., where it remained forty years, from 1865 to 1905.

An act of Congress required the return of all colors to the States to which they belonged. This staff was returned with the colors of the 7th Georgia Regiment and placed in the State of Georgia archives.

J. L. BELL.

In November, after the fighting of the season was over, General Lee gave Sergeant Bell a furlough of thirty days for his brave and meritorious conduct. Bell still has a piece of this furlough.

SPLENDID WORK FOR SHILOH MONUMENT.

BY MRS. ALEXANDER B. WHITE, CHAIRMAN FOR U. D. C.

Friends of Shiloh: The Treasurer of the Shiloh Monument Association has sent me a full report; and as it shows the interest in the Shiloh monument, it is sent to the VETERAN that all may know the good work being done. This represents cash received only, while outstanding pledges amount to several hundred dollars.

Many who have visited Shiloh have told me it made them sad to see so many beautiful and handsome monuments to Northern soldiers and none to the Southern, though equally valorous. "Southern valor never rose to greater heights" than on this fatal field of Shiloh; so let us remove this reproach from us by speedily erecting there a monument commemorating Confederate valor.

I hope we shall soon have contributions to this most worthy cause from every U. D. C. Chapter and every Camp of U. C. V. and U. S. C. V. in the country. It will be a memorial to our own brave, our own loved ones, our own dead; so let us all help.

Report rendered to Mrs. White September 12, 1908, by Mrs. Roy W. McKinney, Treasurer of the Shiloh Monument Association, Paducah, Ky., to whom all State Directors are requested to send contributions from their respective Divisions by November 1, so that a full report may be made at the Atlanta Convention.

WOMAN'S WIT FOR THE COTTON GIN.

Eli Whitney, inventor of the cotton gin, was aided in his success by the quick wit and insight of a woman. In "Old Paths and Legends of the New England Border" Miss Katherine M. Abbott gives the story of the consummation of Whitney's experiment. Mrs. Greene, granddaughter of Gen. Nathaniel Greene, had become interested in Mr Whitney's enterprise, and invited him to spend the winter at her home, on Cumberland Island, "where an abundance of cotton and quiet were assured." One morning he descended headlong into the drawing-room from his workshop in the fifth story and excitedly exclaimed: "The victory is mine!" In sympathy guests and hostess went with him to see the model in motion by which Whitney was to change the industrial history of the world. For a few moments the miniature saws revolved without hindrance, and the separation of the seed from the cotton wool was successfully accomplished; but after a time the saws clogged with lint, the wheel stopped, and poor Whitney was in despair. "Here's what you need!" exclaimed Mrs. Greene. She seized a clothes brush and held it firmly to the teeth of the saws. "Madam," said Whitney, overcome with emotion, "you have perfected my invention!"—Exchange.

MEMORIAL TO GEN. GEORGE MOORMAN.

Plans for the proposed memorial to the lamented Gen. George Moorman are reported to be maturing rapidly, and the Moorman Memorial Association will be incorporated. A lot in Metairie will be purchased and the contract let for the monument. Some delay has occurred in preparation of the charter by W. O. Hart and Capt. E. M. Hudson by the illness of the latter. Col. J. A. Harral is an active worker in the movement. Arrangements have been made for the purchase of lot 97, plot 2, in Metairie Cemetery. The lot fronts eighteen feet on Avenue E. It measures fifteen feet in the rear and is twenty-four feet in depth. The lot will cost $500. There is $555, which will leave $55 of the fund now on hand to go toward the monument. It is intended to let the contract for the monument, and it is expected that the balance will be received before the work is completed.

The contract provides for a South Carolina granite shaft twelve feet in height, bearing a tablet for an inscription above the emblem of the United Confederate Veterans, which will cost $675. The burial place will be arranged for the interment by the side of General Moorman of his wife and son.

Colonel Harral read letters from Gen. George W. Gordon, of Memphis, inclosing a subscription of $10, and from Gen. V. Y. Cook, of Arkansas, with $10; also from Gen. John S. Carr, of North Carolina. The latter sent $25.

A letter from a Federal veteran, Maj. Everett Lane, of Rockland, Mass., asking the Association to accept a small contribution, was read by Colonel Harral. He said that he noticed in the CONFEDERATE VETERAN that subscriptions were being made for a Moorman memorial; and as he had learned to admire and esteem the late General Moorman, he asked to be allowed to make a contribution.

ANOTHER WAR HEROINE—ALICE WRIGHT.

BY E. LOUISE STROTHER, SHERMAN, TEX.

Mrs. A. W. Clinton (née Wright) presented a Confederate flag to the first company organized in Missouri for the Civil War, in Col. J. R. Boyd's command. From that time each moment of her life through the entire war was given with heroic devotion to the "Rebel cause." Enthusiastic, aggressive, and devoted, she seemed inspired, and performed services worthy to be remembered. She was the bearer of important dispatches at times and under conditions when it would have been impossible for a man to succeed. She hid soldiers in the woods far away from civilization, took them food, and then rode alone under the cover of darkness back home.

A price was set upon her head by the Federal authorities, but dauntlessly she continued to contribute to her country's cause. Quantrell, the noted guerrilla, trusted her, and many valuable services she rendered him. She was active on the battlefields of Glasgow, Independence, and Lone Jack, ministering to the wounded and dying.

At one time a number of Confederate recruiting officers from Price's army were captured; and although they were in possession of papers showing that they were entitled to be treated as prisoners of war, they were shot. Among them were her brother-in-law and two intimate friends, Col. B. G. Jeanes and his brother. She went unattended except by a Cumberland Presbyterian minister who was seventy-five years old, identified the bodies, and brought them one hundred miles in a wagon to their homes to be buried.

Her brother, Dr. W. S. Wright, chief surgeon in Col. A.

E. Steen's command, was captured and placed in the Myrtle Street Prison, in St. Louis. Into St. Louis went Miss Wright. For a whole year she worked, and by her courage and diplomacy she secured his freedom, although he had been condemned to die.

She was generous as well as brave. Upon one occasion a man whom she had regarded with friendship, but who had espoused the Federal cause and was a known reporter of news against her side, was to be killed, and the plan was known to Miss Wright. Late in the afternoon of the fatal day she saw him passing her house. Mercy and tenderness impelled her in his behalf. She could not bear to know that a man was to be killed in cold blood. She went out, stopped him, and suggested that it would be better for him to take another route, which he quickly understood, and thus she saved his life.

Time and again fire in the hand of the enemy destroyed her property; and when the surrender occurred, she was without means. She went to Montana seeking health. There she met and married Judge J. H. D. Street, a prominent lawyer and gifted orator. One child blessed this union. Later as Mrs. Street she married a Mr. Clinton, who died about ten years ago. Mrs. Clinton is now the guest of honor in the North Texas Female College, in Sherman, Tex. Still unconquered, she is the heroic, delightful woman of "Secesh" times.

SEVERE SERVICE UNDER STONEWALL JACKSON.

BY ALECK HUNTER, WASHINGTON, D. C.

[The writer, Aleck Hunter, is a son of old Admiral Bushrod Hunter, of the United States navy, who was retired before the Civil War broke out.]

On July 25, 1862, Kemper's Brigade of Pickett's Division left Gordonsville, Va., in light marching order with three days' rations in their haversacks, and that was the last one we drew until September 20, almost two months—incredible, but true. Our brigade was about two thousand strong. My regiment, the 17th Virginia, had about four hundred and seventy-five in all or about four hundred and forty muskets.

We crossed the Rappahannock July 27 and skirmished all the 28th and marched to Salem that day and rested. On the night of the 29th we made that famous march of thirty-five miles. We reached Thoroughfare Gap the morning of the 30th and got breakfast of "roasting ears." The next two days we fought the battle of Manassas, and that night feasted on the captured supplies; then onward, without a halt, men dropping out constantly from weakness and sickness, over the mountains into the valley; then across the Potomac into Maryland, living entirely on green apples and corn. We fought the battle of Crampton Gap September 12, marched all night and fought the battle of Boonsboro the 14th, then northward and back, until the morning of the 17th of September, when my regiment drew up in line of battle at Sharpsburg with forty-six muskets and five officers. All of us were barefooted; not one had tasted meat for a couple of weeks; all were in rags and without underclothing, and we were "devoured" with vermin. All day we held Burnside's column back, though they were five to one. I was the only private unwounded and untouched at the end of the fight. With all the suffering, there was no complaint. We learned to cook anything. I even ate a part of a polecat. Naturally I have but little patience with whinings of men claiming to be heroes. I am glad to see that no complaints came from the Southern troops.

TEXAS CONFEDERATE VETERANS GATHER.

The News, Dallas, reports from Wills Point, Tex., August 25, that the seventeenth annual reunion of the Texas Division, U. C. V., was one of the best yet held, and exceeded in attendance and interest any previous meeting. The State Division of the Sons of Confederate Veterans convened there at the same time. The citizens of Wills Point have ever prided themselves upon their hospitality. The patriotism of the people there proved equal to the occasion. Visiting Veterans were given supper, bed, and breakfast in the homes assigned to them, and a barbecue dinner was served to the Veterans each day. Free transportation to and from the park was also furnished. A beautiful grove protected visitors from the sun, and bordering the park is a large lake of clear water that added to the picturesqueness of the scene.

At night the Sons of Veterans gave an entertainment to the Veterans at the auditorium in town, and Hon. Gordon Russell, Congressman from this district, delivered an address.

The meeting of the Veterans was called to order by Maj. James A. Harris, Commander of the local Camp. Rev. Ira M. Bryce invoked the divine blessings.

Major Harris extended a welcome from the city and introduced Judge John S. Spinks, of Canton, who welcomed the visitors in behalf of Van Zandt County. Hon. John L. Brooks extended a welcome from Camp Calvin Crozier, U. S. C. V., Wills Point, and Miss Corinne Meredith for the Mrs. Cone Johnson Chapter, U. D. C. All the welcome addresses were happy and interspersed with music by Peery's Military Band.

Capt. B. B. Paddock responded to the welcome addresses. "I was very glad indeed," he said, "when the General Commander so highly honored me by asking that I respond to-day to the gracious words of cordial welcome that have been spoken to us, because for many years I have looked upon Wills Point as one of the most loyal and devoted friends of the Confederate soldiers. From year to year it has been necessary for me, living as I do to the west of you, to pass through this beautiful city on our annual journeys to the Reunions of the entire South. As we would near Wills Point and look from the car window we could see the throngs of people in the sunlight and hear the delightful strains of Southern pieces furnished by the Wills Point Band. There were mothers and daughters always to bid us Godspeed on our journey to our national Reunion. I have always felt that I would like to come to Wills Point and meet her people, and I am pleased with the honor that has been conferred upon me to respond to these gracious words of welcome."

At the conclusion of Captain Paddock's response the meeting was formally turned over to Gen. K. M. Van Zandt, Commander of the Texas Division, U. C. V. General Van Zandt stated that he was glad to greet so many old comrades and expressed confidence that the meeting would be a most successful one. General Van Zandt introduced Miss Katie Daffan, President of the Texas Division, Daughters of the Confederacy, who spoke feelingly to those present, her remarks being roundly applauded. Before adjourning Commander Van Zandt announced the committees.

In the afternoon the report of the Committee on Credentials was read and adopted. The report of the Adjutant General was read and referred to the Committee on Resolutions. The report of the Historian was read by C. C. Cummins and referred to the Committee on Resolutions. The mortuary report was read, as was the report from John B. Reagan, Superintendent of the Confederate Home in Austin, both being referred to the Committee on Resolutions.

Governor Campbell was commended for his action in the text-book matter in an address by Colonel Miller.

Gen. W. L. Cabell ("Old Tige") was introduced and greeted with great applause. General Cabell made a short talk to the Veterans.

Colonels Miller and Booth were tendered a vote of thanks for their work in the text-book matter.

One of the interesting features of the day was a competitive drill by two companies of Confederate veterans, the Dallas Confederate Guards, commanded by Captain Lamar, and the Fort Worth Grays, commanded by Capt. M. D. Sellers. First Lieutenant Watkins had charge of the drill for the Fort Worth Grays. It was an interesting spectacle to the thousands who watched it, and as the old vets went through the drill the applause was deafening. The judges awarded the prize to the Dallas Confederate Guards. The prize was a beautiful Confederate battle flag, 4x7 feet in size and handsomely mounted. The flag was presented by Miss Katie Daffan, President of the State Division, Daughters of the Confederacy, and in presenting the flag to the successful contestants Miss Daffan compared the Confederate veteran with the knights of the age of chivalry, and said that a contest between Confederate veterans displayed more courage and valor than that displayed in the days of knight-errantry. She explained the meaning of the flag, the colors typifying the most refined of the human virtues—the white, purity; the red, daring and courage, etc. She presented the flag in the name of the Texas Division, United Daughters of the Confederacy.

The Sons' organization met in the Presbyterian church, Division Commander Walter B. McAdams presiding. The programme of business followed an invocation by Rev. Mr. Wright, of Wills Point. The number of Camps reporting was most encouraging.

In his address Judge W. M. Pierson, of Dallas, Assistant Judge-Advocate General U. S. C. V. and Lieutenant Commander Camp W. L. Cabell, Sons of Veterans, introducing the sponsors and maids of honor to the State Reunion of Confederate Veterans, Daughters of the Confederacy, and Sons of Veterans, said:

"As a son of the South and of a State that has ever been loyal to Southern traditions it is my pleasure to present to this Reunion the sponsors and maids of honor. * * * It is the well-known creed of Texas chivalry that our women are a part of our religion, and the first lesson the stalwart young Southerner learns as he faces the battle of life is that above all things he must protect and defend the sanctity of Southern homes. We are a little old-fashioned in our ideas of right and wrong. The history of the Southern people has been made great because of the influence of a sublime character who presides over the destinies of Southern homes, and with her regal scepter of love touches the great, throbbing heart of the South.

"My friends, if it were in my power to gather together all the laurels of victory and chaplets of fame of the eternal ages and make them into one loving wreath with which to crown the greatest hero of the centuries, I would think of her who fought the silent battles of the Confederacy, who amid the long watches of the night mingled her stitches on the garments of her loved ones with her prayers to her God for the success of Southern rights, and I would place this wreath upon the pure brow of her of whom I speak—the Southern woman!

"What strength of purpose and loyalty to duty must have been hers when she buckled the sword of her life's companion as well as the sons of her bosom and bade them go with the knowledge that they might never return. 'You are my all, but duty to our country calls—go.'

"The women of the South are true to the traditions of the past. The glittering titles of broken-down, spendthrift noblemen (?) have for them no attraction. They hold that the greatest title a man can wear is that of a Southern gentleman, and that the most splendid royalty is that of Southern blood. * * *

"The Southern woman, like her Godlike sisters of old, was last at the Southern cross in its darkest hour and first at the grave of its buried hopes. Hers were the silent battles. For her there was no beat of drums, no song of the bugles, no excitement of the charge, no waving of victorious banners over embattled hosts upon the field of glory. She could only wait and wait and wait till at last the dread message came from the field of battle that her loved one had died for his country, and then 'with a more than Spartan heroism she gave no sign of despair that might discourage those at the front, but like a statue solid set and molded in colossal calm' she sat mute and resigned at the foot of the red, dripping altar of patriotism whereon lay in hallowed sacrifice her sainted dead. We have talked of building monuments to her memory; and, bless her heroic soul, she has been steadily going forward all this time building monuments to the soldiers of the South. The noblest woman who ever kissed away the furrows from the throbbing brow of pain or brushed back the tangled tresses of the dead is a Southern woman, the uncrowned queen of the centuries.

"When the war was over and the broken battalions of the South turned homeward, it was the Southern woman who met the returning soldier on the doorsteps; and as she had ever been his inspiration upon the field of battle, so now together they took up their task of restoring a desolated land, and upon the blackened ruins of battle building a grander civilization, a larger truth, and a better liberty.

"And in that dark night of negroid corruption, when slimy carpetbaggers, a few Judas Iscariots in the South (with all due apologies to Judas Iscariot), and half-witted negroes attempted to establish Ethiopian domination, it was the Southern woman who stood in the breach of the nation's honor and with the voice of a goddess demanded of Southern chivalry that they remember the spirit of the cavaliers that had baptized this continent in rivers of heroism and demonstrate their right to live. At once came the mighty response: the unconquered spirit of the Southern Anglo-Saxon that had never known what it was to submit to an inferior race arose like a mighty avalanche, swept the usurpers from their places, and reestablished the government of the fathers. My friends, I desire to say here and now that in my opinion the enfranchisement of the negro was at once a grotesque comedy as well as one of the greatest crimes of history, and Southern blood does not to-day and never will recognize negro equality either socially or politically.

"Thus in those crucial times, when the fate of the South was being weighed in the balances, when hope seemed all but gone and our sons were almost in despair, there was a firm character who stood like a rock in midocean, braving the war of whirlwinds and the dash of angry waves; stood holding aloft the beacon of hope, stood firm and undaunted for the principles of the fathers, and, laying the sword of knighthood on the manly sons of the South, bade them go forward to the achievement of still other victories upon the glorious battlefields of peace. And be it said to her honor and glory as well as that of her sons and loved ones whom she inspired that the principles for which they contended are becoming more and more inwrought into the fabric of our nation, and under God I believe that the final preservation of this republic depends upon the ultimate triumph of the principles of the South and of our uncrowned queen, the Southern woman.

"Inspired by such mothers, is it any wonder that the Daughters of the Confederacy are to-day so true to the holy memories of the past?

"The women of this noble organization, with a zeal greater than that of Peter the Hermit, have made their crusade to the holy land of Southern memories, and as their prattling babes gather about their knees they look beyond the gleaming stars to where they know the record of the Confederate soldier is truly written; then with the vow of Hamilcar in their hearts and the love of justice in their pure souls, they teach their children and tell them to teach their children's children that the men who wore the gray were not traitors, but that they were the grandest patriots of the ages, and that when time shall be no more they will be the immortals of God.

"And now by the tender memories which halo the devoted past, by the memory of those who fell in defense of the right upon the red crest of battle, by the memory of the noble men and women who are to-day demanding that the record of the Confederate soldier shall be truly written, and in the name of these organizations which have for their object the perpetuation of these holy memories, I have the honor to present to this Reunion your sponsors and maids of honor, beautiful, refined, and patriotic women of the glorious Southland, of whom with one of old we may well say: 'In their faces we behold the eternal!'"

JUDGE C. C. CUMMINGS'S ANNUAL REPORT.

Maj. Gen. K. M. Van Zandt, Commanding-General: I have the honor to submit this my annual report as Historian of the Texas Division at this the seventeenth annual Reunion.

The Woman's Home.—I was premature in announcing in my last report the adoption of the amendment to allow appropriations to the Home, so generously provided by the efforts of the Daughters of the State. It was afterwards found that it had been defeated by a small margin, the issue being confused by other propositions submitted at the same time. The Democratic platform recently adopted at San Antonio pledges a resubmission by the next Legislature.

Confederate Pensioners.—Comrade E. A. Bolmes, our efficient chief of the Pension Department, shows that a thousand new pensioners will be added to the 8,700 now on the roll at the end of this year. Advanced age alone is not the cause of this extraordinary addition, but increase of the cost of living, taken with the rejection of all applicants for labor except those who can command the highest mark of strenuous endeavor in our modern modes of workday rules. There seems provided no place in our ethics of political economy for any but the strongest, the fittest being secondary. This is drifting us to old age pensions, such as Germany and England are canvassing, caused by the flood of European labor taking the place of our home product. Comrade Bolmes is unable to give the death rate of pensioners because no mode is provided for such tabulation.

The Last Roll.—The death roll of our comrades grows apace every year. This year among the notables of the order is the departure of our chief in command, Stephen D. Lee, just before the Birmingham Reunion. Of the State, we have again to record the second vacancy of the Adjutant General's office in the demise of Colonel Jackson, and among the leading Camps that of Col. E. W. Taylor, of Lee Camp, Fort Worth. Col. W. T. Shaw, who succeeds Colonel Jackson as Chief of Staff of the Division, will report in detail the death roll of the Camps.

Storied Urn and Animated Bust.—The good old State of Georgia through her press, Camps, and Chapters is earnestly advocating the erection of a monument to our war women of the South. "Woman in History," of which our Daughter, Miss Katie Daffan, is now preparing a volume, was last at the cross and first at the tomb. So with us in the short-lived Confederacy. Our women clung to the Southern cross of our Crucifixion and have been first to erect monuments to our heroes, and we owe them in turn a mausoleum as high as the sky. On motion of Captain Paddock and seconded by General Van Zandt, of Lee Camp, Fort Worth, the next Legislature is to be memorialized to mark the positions of Texas troops on the noted battlefields of our great war.

Adjutant General's Report.—Col. W. T. Shaw's annual report contains much of general interest and shows an increase of twenty per cent in Camps reporting over the previous year.

Partisan Text-Books Again.—After ten years of sectional peace under our school text-book law of 1897, there has arisen a power that knows not Joseph, and the John B. Hood Camp at Austin first made the discovery that partisan hints scattered in the text-books now in use were of such a character as to lead the young mind into the dangerous vortex of the darkest period of our unhappy strife between the States. Sheridan's ride, suggesting desolation as a fine art, and Sherman's march to the sea, recalling a period when the Duke of Alva with his council of blood doomed whole cities in the Netherlands, are not calculated to promote the object of our nonpartisan text-book law, especially when Texans by this law effaced all allusion to their own heroes to effect this nonpartisan purpose. The last reenactment carrying the law down to 1912 requires the Text-Book Board to adopt histories of the United States which give the construction of the Constitution which the fathers who formulated it placed upon it. I am not advised how far this suggestion has been used by the Board, but venture to assert that the South is willing to rest its case on this proposition. The Hood Camp found embalmed in the leaves of simple arithmetical propositions on page 251 of Mayers-Brooks text-book such dark shadows as above and many others which the State Board promptly eliminated and substituted nonpartisan incidents of Texas history instead. Since then other like violations of this beneficent law have been published. Whittier's barbarous myth of Barbara Frietche is quoted as to a few lines, the whole of the fiction reciting falsely that Confederate soldiers fired on a Union flag in the hands of an old woman. The Biglow satires, written in derision of the Mexican War, which was for the integrity of the Union when Mexico sought to wrest Texas from under the stars and stripes, and others, the most dangerous being Seward's higher law than the Constitution, said to be on page 31 and repeated on page 215 of the large grammar of a series now in use—this is what dynamited the sections and brought on the collision of the States adhering to the law.

The Songs of a Nation.—Many of the above are used in sections of the Union which constantly boast of having been the savers of it and appropriate rewards confined to themselves in the act; but they seem not to apprehend that it is not only offensive to a large area not germane to the thought, but that it is even dangerous as a doctrine to be sung, as "Sherman Marching through Georgia" constantly paraded before eleven millions of a nonassimilating race, many of whom are yet immature in political wisdom and many more incorrigible degenerates, who are taught that all this stands for liberty with license to do at will as wards of the party claiming their allegiance. It is worthy of serious consideration whether or not such teachings seeking an entry into Texas schools and used more blatantly in other sections of the Union are the cause of the epidemic of violated law possessing this class of citizens yet in the first stages of civilization.

Roosevelt's African Mission.—The books quoted are made to say that President Roosevelt does the right thing at the right time. A query arises here. Is not this the right time for him as head of the party responsible for this condition of so large a class of citizenship to negotiate with some European power for a spot in Africa large enough to receive this castaway class, deported by and under control of the United States?

THE CLOSING DAY OF THE REUNION.

Many a camp scene was recounted as the hundreds of veterans in attendance at the State Reunion gathered in groups under the inviting shade of the trees in Goodnight Park or on the porches of the homes where they were being entertained in tales of incidents "during the war." Comrades long separated saw each other for the first time in years, and as they met and embraced each other tears of joy would stream from their eyes. They recalled scenes about the camp fires or on the battlefield, some humorous, some pathetic, and others tragic.

The crowd was reported as the largest ever assembled in Wills Point. Visitors were lavish in their compliments of the splendid arrangements for entertaining the guests and the good order that prevailed. Visiting veterans considered it a "record breaker."

Mount Pleasant was selected as the next place of meeting and the last Tuesday in July as the date.

The veterans are in earnest about the schoolbook election, and $305 was subscribed to carry into effect the resolution adopted to carry the question of annulling the present contracts into the courts. Much indignation is felt on the subject.

Gen. K. M. Van Zandt was reelected Division Commander by acclamation. Accepting the nomination, General Van Zandt spoke feelingly and said the responsibility was a serious one, but that he could ask no greater honor of any people than to be Division Commander of the Confederate veterans of Texas. General Van Zandt reappointed Col. W. T. Shaw, of Fort Worth, Adjutant.

The following Brigadier Generals for the State were elected: First Brigade, J. T. Jarrard, Huntsville; Second Brigade, J. T. Largent, San Antonio; Third Brigade, F. T. Roche, Georgetown; Fourth Brigade, W. B. Berry, Brookston; Fifth Brigade, W. J. Lacy, Denton.

Miss Martha Crosby, of Bowie, was called upon to recite "Echoes of the Confederacy," and the rendition was greeted with great enthusiasm. The young lady was elected Daughter of the Division. [This address by her at Bowie was published last year in the VETERAN.] A veteran sang an old war song, and then the vast audience sang "God Be with You till We Meet Again."

Walter B. McAdams was reelected Commander of the Texas Division, U. S. C. V.

The entertainment given by the Sons of Veterans was interesting to the visitors.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.

We have carefully examined the report of Col. W. T. Shaw, Adjutant General of the Division, and note with gratification the improved financial condition of the Division and that twenty-two more Camps have made annual reports than at the last Reunion. We recommend the adoption of the report and that it be printed in full in the proceedings of this Reunion.

The report of John B. Reagan, Superintendent of the Confederate Home, is complete and satisfactory, and we congratulate our comrades in the Home upon the evident care bestowed upon them by the Superintendent, and we extend him our thanks for his unremitting attention to their comfort.

We recommend that the mortuary report be printed in full in the proceedings of this Reunion and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the Adjutants of the several Camps in this Division be earnestly requested to make prompt and complete detail report of deceased members of their respective Camps, that their names may be printed in the proceedings of the Division at its annual Reunion.

Whereas the last Legislature requested the assessors of the State to list all veterans and widows in their respective counties, but it having developed that in many instances the work was so neglected as to be worthless, and appreciating the importance of thorough work in this matter; be it

Resolved, That the next Legislature be petitioned to pass a law to require the assessors in each county of the State to make a full and complete list of all Confederate veterans in their respective counties and also a complete list of all widows of all Confederate veterans in their counties, and that if it is found necessary in order to get such list complete the assessors be allowed an adequate compensation for their services.

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the action of the Democratic party in Texas in convention assembled in recommending the abrogation of the term "pauper oath" in applications for pensions by Confederate veterans.

Resolved, That we believe the taxpayers of Texas will cheerfully assume the burden of making provision for the care of the widowed mothers and sisters of Confederate veterans who are left without proper support in their declining years; therefore we call upon the Thirty-First Legislature to submit to the people of Texas at the earliest practicable day an amendment to the Constitution of the State authorizing liberal appropriation for the maintenance of the Confederate Woman's Home.

Resolved, That Texas, in the plenitude of its riches, should do honor to the Confederate dead that sleep in unmarked graves and who gave their lives as a willing sacrifice to constitutional rights.

Resolved, That the Thirty-First Legislature be memorialized to make liberal appropriation of funds to erect suitable monuments to the valor of Texas troops who fell and are buried in any and all of the national cemeteries of the country.

Resolved, That the law authorize and constitute the Commanding General of the Texas Division, United Confederate Veterans, and the Commanders of the several Brigades of United Confederate Veterans in Texas a commission to select designs and locate said monuments.

We have considered with great pleasure and interest the comprehensive report of the Historian of the Texas Division, Col. C. C. Cummings, and extend him the thanks of this Division for the care and labor devoted to the duties of his office, and we recommend that his report be printed in full in the proceedings of this Reunion.

Resolved, That we deplore the lack of Southern spirit, State pride, and patriotism that impelled the State Text-Book Board in its violation of the evident spirit and plain letter of the law in the selection of the schoolbooks from which the children of citizens of Texas are to be taught.

Resolved, That we recommend that the Commander of the Texas Division, United Confederate Veterans, endeavor to find some patriotic son of the South who will take this matter into the courts and if possible prevent this wrong being imposed upon the people of Texas and their descendants; that Confederate veterans who have been blessed with an abundance of this world's goods are hereby appealed to to contribute to the payment of such expense as may be incurred by such litigation; that we recommend that the books heretofore in use in the public schools in Texas be continued until this question is finally decided.

Resolved, That the Texas Division, United Confederate Veterans, reiterate their unswerving loyalty, undying affection for and devotion to the noble women who compose the United Daughters of the Confederacy. We appreciate the work of love in which they are engaged and the noble and unselfish devotion exhibited by them in everything which pertains to the welfare of the Confederate veterans and without which our labors in their behalf would be greatly increased.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Division are hereby extended these noble women for their efforts in our behalf.

Whereas since our last Reunion our beloved comrade, Col. George Jackson, former Adjutant General of this Division, has "crossed over the river;" therefore be it

Resolved, That this Division has lost an enthusiastic member, a faithful and competent official, and the State of Texas a worthy citizen; that we tender his grief-stricken widow our sincere condolence in her bereavement.

For seventeen years the Texas Division, United Confederate Veterans, has held its annual Reunions each in a different city of the State, and each occasion has been one of pleasure to us and of unstinted kindness, partiality, and attention that remains with us and ever will as most pleasant memories; but it has been left to Wills Point to especially display a hospitality and generous consideration for our comfort and entertainment that will be a perennial source of delightful recollection to us.

Resolved, That we assure the good people of Wills Point one and all, and particularly the kind and faithful ladies and gentlemen specially in charge of all arrangements, of our most sincere and grateful appreciation of their efforts in our behalf. And we beg to further assure them that neither time nor circumstance will ever efface from our hearts and minds the joyous and happy recollection of our Reunion in their young city, and for them and theirs we pray happiness, contentment, and prosperity for all hereafter.

Respectfully submitted, T. J. Jarrard, J. H. V. Miller, W. W. Heartsill, Charles L. Martin, B. B. Paddock, committee.

REUNION AT DALLAS IN OCTOBER.

Gen. W. L. Cabell, Commanding Trans-Mississippi Department, calls comrades to Dallas on October 20 as Confederate Day at the State Fair. This will be a fine Reunion.

Walter B. McAdams, Texas Division Commander U. S. C. V., issues like orders and a patriotic address to the young men of Texas, asking their presence in Dallas.

THREE HUNDRED MILES IN A WAGON.

BY SALLY ROYCE WEIR.

The sultry heat of the late afternoon was intensified by the almost unbearable fragrance of the magnolias, bays, jasmines, and other semitropical trees and shrubs with which the swamps surrounding the plantation were filled. Go where I would, there was no escape from this sickening sweetness; but it was some relief at least to be out of doors. So, taking my two little girls with me, we started for a walk.

It was in August, 1865, and we had long since received the sorrowful news of Lee's surrender. The struggle was over; the dreadful loss of life and property had not availed us. My husband had been in the Confederate army, and I was now in Alabama, far from the Tennessee home from which I had been ordered in the third year of the war by Gen. Gordon Granger, under suspicion of being a spy for the Confederate army. I had left with my children three days after receiving the order, and since that time I had wandered through many of the Southern States and suffered much privation. At present I was boarding in the home of a Southern planter whose negroes, numbering over a hundred, were now set free, and were as helpless and lost as children in their unaccustomed freedom. Provisions were very scarce in the South, and we had often suffered with hunger.

The children, blessed with the light hearts of childhood, were chattering gayly as we walked; but I was sad at heart and lost in deep thought. I was startled by hearing their joyful cry, "Look, mother, look! there's father, there's father;" and looking quickly where they pointed, I saw some distance up the road what appeared to be a ragged, dirty negro. "Hush, girls," I said reprovingly. "What do you mean? That is not your father, but a negro. You should be ashamed of yourselves." They were silent for a moment, but unconvinced, and in a moment they broke away from my side and went racing up the road to meet this stranger. He lifted up each little girl to hug and kiss her, and then I saw that they were right, and it was indeed my dear Moses! Dirty, ragged, and sunburned till he was almost black, he had come to us afoot after Hood's army had disbanded, and had actually walked sixty miles that day, and was so weary he could hardly stand.

After he had rested for a week, he began to plan for our return home. We had over three hundred miles to travel, and how to accomplish it was a great problem. The railroads through the South were in such a condition that many of them had been abandoned, and those still in use were uncertain and unsafe; but even if the service had been good we could not have used it, for all our Confederate money was dead on our hands, and our condition was desperate. We heard that it was even suggested in the town to raise a purse of money for us, as we were so far from home; but we felt unwilling to accept it.

In the midst of our perplexities, to our great surprise, a letter came from Moses's brother-in-law, who was a quartermaster in General Butler's army in New Orleans, sending us two hundred dollars in greenbacks. He had heard in some way of our whereabouts, and felt that we would need help. Surely money was never as welcome before.

After receiving this unexpected help, Moses went to a place some miles away where the Union army had a wagon yard and general supply depot, which they had taken from the Confederates, and told the officers where he lived, and that he wanted to get a wagon to take his family home. They told him he could go out in the yard where the wagon refuse was, and if he could patch up a wagon out of that he was welcome to it. After he had been absent nearly a week, we saw him returning late one afternoon with a strange-looking skeleton of a wagon drawn by one large bony horse. Moses was more sunburned and ragged than ever, but in good spirits.

"How did you manage to get it?" I asked him that night. Moses took his pipe from his mouth and said: "I'll tell you all about it, Martha, when I am done smoking." So after a time, when the pipe was empty, he said: "When I first went to those Yankees at the yard, I could hardly make up my mind to ask any favors of them; and if it had not been for you and the children, I would not. As it was, I put my pride in my pocket and told them that I was three hundred miles from home with my family and wanted to buy a wagon to travel in. 'We have no wagons to sell,' said the man to whom I spoke as he walked away. Then another man who had overheard me came up and said: 'No, we have none to sell, that is true; but out there in that part of the yard is a lot of broken and mismated stuff; and if you can find anything there to make a wagon out of, you can have it without charge.' I thanked him and walked over to the rubbish heap. Now, as you know, I never made a wagon nor anything of that kind; but it was a case of necessity, and I went to work. I found the sun had made the irons so hot that they blistered my hands; so I got some water to cool them in. I also found wagon-making was hard, tiresome work, and I was often uncertain how to proceed. But by looking at other wagons and profiting by some of the advice which was liberally offered, I managed at last to get together the structure which you see at the gate. I used the fore wheels of a four-horse wagon and the hind wheels of a two-horse wagon, but it runs as well as if it was made to go together; and if it will carry us home, that is all I ask of it. Next I must have something to bring it here; so after some bargaining I bought Frank, the black horse, and some harness. I hitched up and started; but after I had traveled half a day, the sun was so hot and I felt so tired that I drove out in the shade of the cypress trees and lay down for a rest. I fell asleep and dreamed the journey was over and we were safe home; but when I awoke and looked around, I found my horse was gone. 'Stolen,' I thought. I looked and called, but he was nowhere to be found, and I sat down and cried, for I felt that if my horse was gone and the money with which I bought him I was simply ruined. Some distance down the road I saw a house, and I went to it to make inquiries. When the man of the house, who was a Methodist minister, heard of my loss, he said he had not seen the horse, but added kindly: 'You come right in and stay with me, stranger. This is Saturday, and to-morrow there is to be a big meeting at our church and I will give notice that you have lost your horse, and I reckon you will most likely get some news of it. Anyway, that is about all you can do.' I thought so myself, so I stayed over. There was a large crowd at the little church; and when the minister told of my loss, a man in the congregation stood up and said: 'The horse is over at my place. I found him in my field and did not know where he belonged.' I was so happy when he said that I declare I felt like shouting, and I never enjoyed a meeting in my life as much as I did that one. After I found the horse, you may be sure I did not lose sight of him any more till I reached here. To-morrow we must begin preparing for our journey."

The wagon lacked a body, so Mr. Oliver, the old planter with whom we boarded, gave us the box in which his daughter's piano had been shipped. We were glad to get it, and found it an excellent fit. Some kind of cover was necessary to protect us from the blazing heat of the August sun; so Moses managed to buy for a fabulous price a few yards of unbleached muslin. This I made into a cover, and Moses and Mr. Oliver put it on over some bows which they had manufactured. The cover was so scanty that it only reached from the top of the front bow to the top of the back one without an inch to spare, and on each side it lacked a foot and a half of coming down to the wagon bed. It looked cool and airy; but as our heads would be out of sight up in the top, like that of the ostrich, we were happy and contented.

From a man on another farm Moses bought a small gray mare, paying forty dollars for her. It was fair to assume at that time that every horse was of doubtful ownership, and this man, Mr. Boswell, said that one of his had been taken from his field and this, a gray mare, left in its place; so with that warning Moses bought her. We then bought some flour, a little meat, and what else we could in the way of provisions, and were ready to start.

The day before we left Mr. Oliver asked us to go out on his back veranda and witness the contracts he was going to make with his former slaves. When we were all ready, the horn was blown for the negroes to assemble from the quarters, and soon the yard was filled with the dark-hued crowd. Their attire was very scanty, the climate was hot, and our long sojourn there had accustomed us to the sight. The grown women wore only one long garment, a "shift," the men cotton shirts and trousers, and all the children under twelve years of age, both boys and girls, were clad only in their own dark skins. Mr. Oliver was an old man, and the negroes waited in respectful silence.

"I have already told you," he said, "that the war is over and the Yankees say you are free. If you want to go away and leave me, I have no right to keep you. But I am not compelled to feed and clothe you as I have done; you must now learn to make enough to feed and clothe yourselves. That is what freedom means—a little more work. My crops are still growing in the fields, and I want hands to work them and women to cook and wash. I would rather hire my own negroes than others. Now those of you who want to hire to me step up one at a time and tell me."

They came forward slowly, hesitating, as yet, to think and act for themselves; all but one man who sulkily refused—a man whom Mr. Oliver had whipped some months before and who evidently bore him a grudge. Some who came he refused to hire. Turning to us, he said: "They have only been burdens to me; and if freedom has come to them, it has also come to me." One of these was Emmaline, a woman who before her freedom had been valued—with her expected child—at one thousand dollars. Negroes always took a great pride in the price at which they were held by their masters, and Emmaline had often boasted of her worth. Later, when the hiring was over, she came to me, weeping bitterly, and said: "Miss Martha, master don't want me; he won't keep me, and mistis says she don't want me neither! I wish to de Lord dem Yankees had done let me 'lone. Den I was worth a thousand dollars, an' now I ain't worth nothin', an' can't even hire myself. O what will I do when master sends me 'way?" I was sorry for her, for her case was a hard one; but I could find no words of comfort. Freedom had come to her, even if it was unwelcome, and the poor woman went away wringing her hands and bitterly lamenting.

The next morning my two small trunks were lifted into the wagon, the children's cream-colored pony, Dolly, was tied to the back of it, we said farewell to the family, also the yard full of negroes, climbed into our places, and were fairly started on our three-hundred-mile trip.

At the first motion of the wagon the pony saw the white cloth cover swaying above her head; and being frightened, she pulled back with all her might, stopping our progress altogether. A dozen little darkies rushed her in the rear; and thinking this last state worse than the first, she consented to trot behind us. All went well till about a mile from the house, when we came to a wide and deep mud puddle. The horses and wagon plunged into its depth, and were safely across it and fairly up the other side when the pony happened again to look up and see the flapping cover. She squatted down on her haunches and pulled back with all her might just as the horses were trying to drag the wagon over a large root. Their effort was fruitless; the pony was fat and stronger than both thin horses, so back came the wagon into the puddle. Three times Moses put the horses to the bank, and every time the pony pulled us back. Moses was so angry he could hardly trust himself to speak, and the children were distressed about the pony. "You may as well give it up, Moses," I said. "They will never pull us out; they can't; and if I untie Dolly, she will run back and you will have to lose time going after her."

Moses began to take off his shoes and socks and roll up his trousers. When he at last descended into the puddle and untied the pony, I could have screamed with laughter, but dared not. The pony was led out and tied; and the wagon rescued from the mud; but Moses was in no humor to be spoken to for some time. When I thought he had cooled down enough, I ventured a suggestion: "Moses, suppose you try to fasten that saddletree on Dolly and let me ride her; then she won't give you so much trouble. I don't think she intends to lead behind the wagon." "I am afraid you will get a fall," he answered. "I have nothing but a bridle rein to strap it on with." "I am not afraid," I said. "I am so accustomed to riding that I could almost do without a fastening. Let's try it."

So a halt was made, the bare tree of a man's saddle was fished out of the wagon and strapped on her fat back with a bridle rein, a wooden stirrup was shortened to fit my foot, and I mounted, riding sideways and carrying over my head a green silk parasol to shield me from the sun. I found riding more comfortable than the hard, springless wagon, and the children were delighted to watch me ride Dolly.

Sometime that day we came to the banks of the Black Warrior, where we found a ferryboat. The river was very narrow, not more than two boat lengths across, though we were told it was often six miles wide when in flood. After we crossed, we came to a very nice house on the road near the ferry, and I sent the children there to ask for some drinking water. They came back, and filling my tin cup handed it to me, and the wagon started on. I was very thirsty and drank eagerly, and as I did so I let my green parasol drop more and more over Dolly's head till at last she saw it, and with one clean spring sideways left me sitting on the ground with the cup of water still unspilled in my hand. I was very much jarred, but fortunately unhurt. The gentleman at the house came running out to help me. I mounted again, and soon overtook the wagon.

At noon we halted for our first meal on the road. I had biscuits and some nice honey in a tin box and a few other eatables; but before the meal was over a sudden sharp shower drove us to the shelter of the wagon, and some of the honey was spilled on our dresses, to our great discomfort. Toward night we halted and made our first camp. The condition of the country was very unsettled and dangerous, filled as it was with disbanded soldiers, robbers, and desperadoes of all kinds. Moses had been over the road before, and always tried to make our camp near some house for protection. The horses were fed and tied near the wagon; and after a cold and scanty supper, we made the best arrangements we could for sleeping. Moses took his army blanket and lay on the ground under the wagon, where he could better watch the horses. My oldest girl, Betsey, and I slept in the front of the wagon on the horses' hay: while my youngest, Sally, as we called her, thought she had a very snug place between my two trunks at the rear.

We started again at daybreak, after a restless night, and sometime that day arrived at Eutaw. As we were driving through the street a man came up and hailed Moses. "Where did you get that gray mare you are driving?" he said, looking hard at our sorry outfit. "I bought her from Mr. Boswell," Moses answered in his slow, deliberate way. "What did you pay for her?" "Forty dollars," said Moses. "Well, she is mine," the stranger answered. "She was stolen from me at a picnic, and I have not seen her since. Where are you going?" When Moses had explained our situation, the man said very kindly: "I see how you are placed, and I won't stop you. As it happens, I know Mr. Boswell, and we will settle it between us. I think he will do what is right." "I think he will," said Moses, "and I will be under many obligations to you if you will let us go." "Drive on," said the stranger, "and good luck to you;" and we were on the road, once more, blessing him in our hearts for his kindness.

We traveled steadily that week without further mishaps; and after a few days, the girls took turns riding Dolly astride and bareback as they had done on the plantation. We had by this time passed out of Alabama and were in the eastern part of Mississippi. We now took a straight course for Aberdeen, near which a cousin of mine lived, thinking we would break our journey by visiting with him for a few days.

After we crossed the beautiful, clear Buttahatchee River, we soon came to his home, tired and sleepy, as we had been trying for many nights to sleep in the piano box on the top of trunks, saddletraps, corn and fodder for the horses, and no one knows what else. We received a warm welcome, and for a few days lived again like "white folks." Here we saw rice growing which was taller than my head (and I am called a tall woman) and beautiful pomegranates both in fruit and in flower. I was very much interested in the way the people of the neighborhood had barricaded their barn lots to keep their stock from being stolen. They had built double log fences all around them, and where the logs crossed each other they were pinned together with stout wooden pins. The space between the logs was filled to the top with stone, and the fence was fifteen feet high. The doors which opened into these lots were such a complication of bolts and bars that it would have required powder to open them, and we felt quite safe about our horses while we stayed there. Here we were able to buy a sidesaddle for Dolly, hoping that by using it the children could ride her with more safety.

After visiting with my cousin a few days, we again took up our journey, rested and provisioned afresh.

"Let me ride Dolly to-day, mother," begged Betsey after we started; and when I consented, she proudly mounted. But pride goes before a fall, and Betsey soon got hers. Being unused to a sidesaddle, she fell off the first time Dolly trotted down a short hill; and Dolly, taking advantage of the situation, ran away down the road, till she was caught by some men and returned. Then I mounted, being an experienced rider. After a day or so, I put little Sally up to ride, keeping her behind the wagon. All went well for some time, till at last, coming down a hill, Sally let the shawl I had thrown over the saddle slip down on one side, and Dolly, looking back, saw it. Without a moment's warning she bolted in a mad runaway, with Sally clinging to the saddle horns and not even trying to hold her in. There was a rail fence on one side and thick woods on the other, and I saw she was going to pass between the fence and the wagon. If she succeeded, I knew she would kill Sally. "Moses!" I screamed, "jump out and stop the pony!" Almost as I spoke he jumped in front of Dolly, throwing up his arms as he did so, and she checked suddenly in her mad flight, reared straight up, throwing Sally on the ground under her. As I saw her hoofs descending on the child I covered my face with my hands to shut out the sight of her death. I heard Moses groan and Sally scream, and then Dolly, wheeling away, rushed madly into the woods. He picked up the child, who was crying and said that Dolly had stepped on her side; but on examination we found her more scared than hurt.

In the meantime we could hear Dolly in the thicket plunging, rearing, and kicking till at last she came out on the road cowed and trembling, with the saddle and blanket kicked off and her fore leg bleeding and cut by the horns of the saddle. "I think," said Moses as he grimly inspected her, "we are having too much pony on this trip. We had better sell her the first chance we have." At that the children cried and begged for their pony, as they always did when we spoke of selling her; so, as there was no purchaser in sight and Dolly was too badly hurt to travel, we moved slowly on till we found good water, and went into camp for a few days. We spent Sunday at this camp, and hired a woman who lived near to bake us some fresh bread. When we started again, we tied up Dolly's bridle and let her follow the wagon.

We now began to come into a rough, hilly country, and were warned that it was very dangerous to follow the road we were taking. "You will certainly be robbed and killed," said one man whom Moses questioned. "If you go this way, it will cut off quite a distance, to be sure, but the longest way around is often the best. Very few people live there now, and the old road is blockaded by the trees which the soldiers cut to impede pursuit. I would not take my family that way for money." After some debating, Moses at last decided to take the risk, especially as our horses were now so worn out that he did not think they could stand the longer road.

Once on the way, a new trouble beset us. Frank, the black horse, which had done so well on the level roads we had traversed, now showed a strong determination to trot down all the hills. He had evidently been accustomed to a curb bit, and the snaffle had no effect on him. He did not know what holding back meant, and trotted gayly on down the hills, taking Pat, the gray mare, with him. Moses wrapped the reins around his hands as we started down a steep and a regular corduroy road. Halfway down were two men walking their horses over it very carefully. Away went Frank, with Moses leaning back on the reins, and everything in the wagon bouncing up as high as it could. We held on tight, and flew past the men, who had drawn their horses to one side when they heard the clatter of our coming. When we reached level ground, they came up with us. "That is a very dangerous horse you are driving, stranger," said one of them; "and if you don't mind, he will be the cause of some accident."

"I am obliged to you for your warning," Moses answered when he had recovered breath. "I would be pleased to travel slower if I could." They laughed at his answer, and so we parted.

Later the same day we passed a band of robbers. They looked us over very carefully as we passed; but our appearance was so utterly forlorn that they let us pass. I had two valuable gold watches, Moses's and my own, concealed on my person, where I had carried them all through the war except for a short time when they had been sealed in tin cans and buried in the ground. We feared for the pony, she was so fat and pretty; but for some reason they did not take her. Often after that we met many whom we supposed to be robbers and some disbanded soldiers, but none of them molested us.

We began to find a great deal of cotton dropped on the road which in some places was nearly white with it; and as the girls and I often walked behind the wagon, we picked up quantities till we had no more room for it. Moses said the planters were taking their own cotton away by night, because they were afraid it would be confiscated by the government, and in their haste the bales got broken and there was much of it wasted.

One day as the children and I walked we fell some distance behind the wagon; and when we came in sight of it again, we were at the foot of a steep hill. There, to our surprise, we saw Moses and the wagon clearly outlined against the sky. The wagon was on one side of the road and the horses on the other side, facing the wagon and divested of all their harness except their collars, while poor, patient Moses stood by in despair. "How did you get in such a fix?" I asked when I reached him. He replied that the hamestring broke, and of course all the harness fell off. It took some repairing before we were ready to move on again.

We were now in a land made desolate by armies, and a more forsaken country I never saw. For ten miles at a stretch we would pass nothing but deserted houses. In many cases the doors were open and the furniture still there, showing that the flight had been hasty and the need of departure very urgent. From one elevation where we could look over the country we saw thirty chimneys standing as lonely sentinels to mark the ruins of what appeared to have been beautiful homes. The roads were blocked by large trees which the soldiers had cut, which made our progress slow.

Saturday came while we were in this part of the country, and at night we stopped near a clear, pretty creek which ran between two deserted houses, and there prepared to camp over Sunday, as was our custom. Moses went off to investigate the country around us; and when he returned, he said: "Give me some flour, Martha, and I will get some fresh bread baked. I have found a very nice house still inhabited, and they will bake it."

He was gone some time; and when he returned, we let the girls go a little distance up the creek in the bushes to bathe. As Moses and I sat talking we were startled by hearing the most piercing screams of distress. "It's Sally!" I cried. "Some one is killing her! Run, Moses, run!" We both ran at full speed, guided by the screams. Moses soon outran me, but now I heard no sound from Sally. "They have killed her," I thought. Then I began to go more slowly, and soon I saw both girls hidden under the bushes, laughing and trying to pull on their clothes as fast as their wet skins would allow. "What have you been doing?" I asked, angry that we had been so badly frightened for nothing. "Just as we came out on the sand bank to dress," said Betsey, still laughing, "a crawfish took a good bite on Sally's big toe, and she fell down on the sand and kicked and screamed; but it would not let go. And just as she did kick it off we saw father go running past, calling us, and we did not answer, but hid in the bushes because we did not have our clothes on. Then I washed the mud and sand off Sally's back where she could not reach it, and we were dressing as fast as we could before father should come back and find us." I felt like whipping them both, although I was very much amused at the culprits. "You nearly scared us to death. Here they are, Moses. It was nothing but a crawfish."

That Sunday we visited the deserted houses; and when we went in one of them, a drove of sheep came dashing down the stairs from the rooms above and ran outdoors. They frightened us at first, for we thought there was some one in the house. In one house we found a stove and some furniture.

When we started Monday, Moses said: "About a good day's travel ahead is a very nice place, and I hope we shall be able to camp there to-night. I stopped there as I came through, and know the lady of the house. She was very kind to me." Thus encouraged, we pushed on as fast as our gaunt horses would permit, and about noon we came to the finest spring I ever saw. It was in a rough part of the country where it would not be of much use to any one, and there was no house near; but it gushed out from under a great overhanging rock like the mouth of a cave, for we could walk into it. The spring was deep and cold, and evidently the source of a large creek. We ate our dinners there, and later in the day came to level ground, and passed over a beautiful clear river whose name we did not know. On the other side we found a lovely cypress grove, the most beautiful thing we had seen in our journey, and we rested there an hour. The long arms of the cypress trees were twined and intertwined above our heads, shutting out the sun and making a cool green light which was indescribable in its beauty, and their great knees were twisted into fantastic shapes, suggesting goblins and dragons in their fairy bower, and the entire ground was carpeted with rare and lovely flowers. Care seemed to roll from our shoulders, and for one never-to-be-forgotten hour we were in fairyland. When we came out into the fierce glare of the sun, we plodded on for a time in silence, still longing for that lovely grove we were never to see again.

About dusk, when the poor horses looked as if they could hardly endure any longer, Moses said we had come to the place he wished to reach; and driving a little way from the road, we prepared to camp. I thought it was a very dismal place. There was too much thick underbrush close around us and no house in sight; but Moses said it was not far away, and, unhitching the horses, he led them away to water. The children also got out of the wagon to rest; but I still sat there, feeling a strange presentiment that all was not well. In a few minutes some negro women appeared, and looked only too well pleased to have found us. They rushed to the children and grabbed up their hands to see if they wore rings. Finding they each had a small gold ring, they tried to get them to go to the peach orchard with them. I gave the girls a look which their war training had taught them to understand, and they at once came to me and climbed into the wagon. Then the negroes came and peeped in till they saw our trunks, about which they whispered. Then I heard them say: "I wonder if she has any rings; let's take her out and see." They gave a whoop, which was answered, and soon the thick underbrush began to part in many places and black half-civilized negroes crept out in constantly increasing numbers. They crowded around the wagon to look, and then began to yell and dance and roll in the sand like so many savages preparing for a feast.

Moses did not return with the horses, and I felt as if he had been gone an hour. I was afraid they would take the children from me by force and afraid they had already murdered him, as they were so evidently planning to do to us. Their yells were understood and answered, this time by men. At present there were only women and children and young boys around us—about thirty or forty, I should think—but I heard what sounded like a large party of men coming across a cornfield. If Moses would only come in time to save us! Just then he appeared, leading the horses, and said in great surprise: "Why don't you and the children get out and rest and have your supper?" I motioned him to come to me and whispered: "They are going to kill us! Their mistress is gone, and there are no white people here; they told me so. Hitch up as quick as you can before the men come, or we shall never get away alive; they are only waiting for them." Moses glanced around at the yelling, dancing crowd, and saw there was truth in my words; so he began to put the horses to the wagon in a hurry. "What are you doing?" they called. "Going to drive up a little farther to camp," he answered; and they let us move out into the road, while they whooped and danced and rolled in the sand with renewed vigor in their delight at the prospect of the great riches which were to be theirs when they had secured our rings and trunks.

When we gained the road, it was almost dark, and not far away we could hear the men talking and answering the calls of the women. "There is a small town about two miles ahead; we shall not be safe till we reach it," said Moses to me. "Do you think you and the children can keep up with the wagon? We had better lighten it all we can. These poor horses are so tired I am afraid they will fail us." He sprang out as he spoke, and we also jumped down. I took the pony by the bridle to lead her, and Moses ran by the horses and urged them up to their best speed. After we had gone a short distance, the negroes woke up to the fact that we were trying to get away, and pursued us with whoops and yells and calls to stop.

We had but little hope of escaping, as the road was very rough and the horses were so tired; but we all put our last remaining strength into the effort to save our lives, and the noble horses responded as gallantly as if they knew what depended on their speed. Sometimes the negroes sounded very close, and I shuddered as I fancied a black hand was stretched out to grasp me in the darkness, and I dared not even think what my fate would be nor the fate of my poor little girls. Then in some turn of that endless road they seemed farther away, and my hopes rose. I panted for breath as I ran and thought of the stories I had read of poor unfortunates pursued by wolves, and I thought that our case was worse than theirs, pursued as we were by human wolves. The wagon rocked and swayed, and I thought: "What if it turns over or the rotten harness breaks?" The pony also gave trouble. Being stung, I suppose, by gnats, she kept throwing her head back trying to bite her back till she nearly jerked the bridle rein out of my hand, and at last she even tried to lie down and roll. "Get some switches, girls, and whip her," I called, and they ran behind and kept her going with their switches. Then I thought: "What if little Sally gives out? she is the youngest. Can she stand such a run?" The strength of a chain is always the weakest link, and Sally was ours; but by good fortune she made no complaint, and kept up with the rest of us. At last the pursuit seemed to slacken. For some time I had not heard them, and presently Moses halted the weary horses and said we were near enough to the town to be safe.

We camped close to a large mill that night and were told that our lives would not have been worth a moment's purchase if we had stayed where we first intended, and that no white person was safe outside the town. I have often thought that if we had been murdered that night our families would never have known in this world what became of us, and our fate would have been one of the unsolved mysteries.

When we reached the town and were driving through the street, we passed a livery stable. A group of men were standing before the door, and I heard one say in an angry tone: "She is mine, and I intend to have her." He appeared to be looking after us, and suddenly we thought of Dolly. What if she was a stolen horse when Moses bought her and this was her former owner? for she had been bought in West Tennessee. We drove on as fast as we could; and as the man did not at once follow us, we turned off the road and went out some distance to camp. We did not see the man again.

Soon we passed into Northern Alabama, intending to cross the Tennessee River at Florence. After crossing the beautiful river, we began to feel as if we were near home once more. The roads were dusty and the wells and water courses so low that it was difficult to get water for the horses. Often people would give drinking water only to us, but refuse it to the poor famished beasts, and we felt distressed about them. How often we thought of that beautiful spring on the mountain and longed for its clear, cold water!

We were now in a part of the country where we were well known, and might reasonably expect to meet people who knew us; so we naturally began to think more of our appearance than hitherto. We were not only dirty, but our clothes were worn. Moses's trousers were out at the knees and the sun-burned skin showed through, and Sally was especially shabby. We both hoped and dreaded to meet friends. The nights also were getting colder, and we would wake in the morning almost chilled through and quite stiff. As we neared Mt. Pleasant two nice-looking gentlemen passed us riding good horses. They were almost by when one exclaimed, "Hello! is not that Mr. Royce?" and wheeling his horse, he came back and greeted us with much fervor. He was a younger son of one of the best-known families in Tennessee—the Polks—and had once been Moses's pupil. "Now you and Mrs. Royce and the children must come right on to father's house and take dinner and rest a day. I won't take any refusal, and I will be at home by the time you arrive," he said, and he would not leave us till we had reluctantly promised.

"What shall we do, Moses?" I said when Mr. Polk had gone on. "I don't feel as if we could go to such a house as that dressed as we are. Just look at your trousers." "We certainly don't look stylish," he said, smiling at my distress. "Why don't you redeem the credit of the family by putting on that blue-flowered silk that you have in the trunk and the blue crape bonnet with green grapes that I brought you from Macon and paid a hundred and fifty Confederate dollars for? That would be something like style." "Don't mock my distress," I answered. "We can keep our promise by stopping at the door; but I just will not go in the house and dine with them, dressed as we are now. As it is, we must try to improve our appearance in some way. Suppose you drive out to one side and we will dress up the best we can, but not in the blue silk. I have only half of it, anyway, for the other part was stolen from me at Chattanooga when my trunks were robbed early in the war."

Moses did as I suggested, and I opened the trunks and got out some of our most suitable clothes, though the best was poor enough, and, pinning up shawls around the wagon, I tried to dress the girls and myself. When this impromptu toilet was finished, we took down the shawls and continued our journey. We came to the house in about half an hour, and the family all came out to greet us, for we had often visited with them in happier days and Moses had always been a great favorite of theirs. When they found we steadily refused all invitations to remain, they brought out cake, and wine and ice water for our refreshment. They also advised us to leave Dolly with them, assuring us it would not be safe to take her with us, as there were still many soldiers around, and we all understood only too well their fondness for horse-flesh. We were thankful to take their advice, and considered they had done us a great kindness. They also told Moses that as he had escaped from the military prison the year before he was not included in the general pardon and would be in danger of arrest. This was very disturbing news, and we hardly knew what course to pursue. We finally decided to go on and trust to our friends, who would know what to do, and could hide Moses if necessary.

The next point we wished to make was Columbia, and about two miles from that city we came to a stream of water crossed by a bridge. Moses took the horses out and led them down to the water, saying: "They shall have all they can drink this time." We drove on afterwards, and just before we entered Columbia we came to a bridge which crossed above a railroad at an elevation of forty feet. Near it was a house which had been a tollgate, and a number of Union soldiers were lounging on the porch. When we came on this bridge, we saw that it was not very safe; the side rails were gone and the floor looked rotten. What, then, was our horror to see our black horse, Frank, walk in a slanting direction toward the edge of the bridge, taking the small gray mare with him! Moses was pulling on the reins with all his might, but I saw he could not stop Frank; and as he jumped out at the front we jumped out at the back, fully expecting to see our horses and wagon and all we possessed lying crushed on the railroad forty feet below. Instead I saw Frank lying on the bridge as rigid as if he had been dead and the gray mare standing beside him. His leg had broken through a rotten end of plank, going through to his body, and instead of falling out he had fallen over on the bridge floor. Then I did what I had never done before—asked the Union soldiers to help me. They came very willingly and lifted the poor horse out, and after a little got him on his feet and led him off the bridge and pulled our wagon over. They told us he had had a fit from being allowed to drink too much water when he was overheated.

After a time the poor horse seemed to feel better and began to pick grass; so we hitched him up and drove slowly on once more, because we must reach the town before nightfall. We passed many people, all strangers to us, till at last an elderly lady and gentleman who were out for an evening walk met us. They, too, almost passed us, till suddenly the gentleman said, "Can this possibly be you, Royce?" and at the same moment Moses threw down the reins and jumped out. They were so glad to meet that they threw their arms around each other's necks and kissed as fervently as I have ever seen women do. He was a brother minister, Dr. Peas, and a dear friend of ours, and that night we stayed at their house and slept in comfortable beds and ate at a well-appointed table once more. In the morning, after bidding them farewell, we started on the last stage of our journey, for we hoped to reach Franklin that night. Several times as we drove through the town we were hailed with the call: "Hello, Uncle! have you any butter or eggs to sell?" Moses patiently answered "No" and drove on, but I felt indignant. We had made the wagon our home for so long that I had come to feel a certain pride in its appearance, and resented the fact that it was mistaken for a common market wagon and Moses for a dorky.

After we cleared the town, we knew we were only a day's travel from home, and began to feel very much excited. We had heard that our house had been destroyed; but all our interests centered in the town, and we had many friends there. We felt that whatever work we took up in the future could most readily be begun in this locality. But the day still reserved some discomforts for us to crown our long journey, and presently it began to rain. This made us very uncomfortable, as our cover was but scanty. All through the South we had had sunshine and but little rain; but now it blew in at the sides where the cover was short and made us wet and miserable. We would not stop for it, because the horses traveled slowly and we had no time to spare if we would reach home that night.

"We are nearly home, Martha," called Moses as the sun began to set. "We are only about a mile from Franklin." We all roused up and began to peer eagerly forward, when all at once the black horse began to turn out of the road as he had done at the bridge, and in a few moments he fell down rigid and stiff in another fit. We climbed out and Robert unfastened the harness and loosed the collar; and when the poor horse had recovered consciousness once more, we began in great disappointment to make our last camp. Before the light faded we searched for water, for we were very thirsty, but could not find any, nor could we see any house near; so after a scanty supper, thirsty and disappointed, we lay down in our wagon beds for our last sleep outdoors. In the early morning we could hear the roosters crowing for day and the dogs barking in the town, and roused up cold and hungry to resume our interrupted journey. In half an hour we had climbed the last hill between us and home, and paused for a few moments to look down once more on the well-remembered scene.

SON OF A VETERAN ON SOUTHERN SENTIMENT.

BY R. W. GRIZZARD, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Sentiment has ever been the finer fiber of our Southern people. We rejoice that its strain is still a part of our heredity. May our people never lose this distinguishing trait nor become so commercialized as to grow recreant to the glorious past and to history! Posterity should see that the valor, heroism, and deeds of the Confederacy be never lost to memory, but rather be chanted along with the pæans of all ages. Moving epics and compelling tales, voices sweeter than any siren ever uttered, and pens sprightlier than have hitherto been wielded will tell yet again of the Old South and its glory; how its gray-clad heroes, when war's dread tocsin sounded in the land, rallied to the cry of arms, and, marching to the front, proved their love to their hearthstones, their devotion to their God-given principles on every field of carnage from Bethel to Appomattox.

THE FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE OF THE SOUTH.

BY SAMUEL E. LEWIS, M.D., LATE ASSISTANT SURGEON C. S. A.

(Read before the Association of Medical Officers of the Army and Navy of the Confederacy at their annual reunion in Birmingham, Ala., June 9, 1908.)

There is now living in Washington, D. C., a noble woman whose sacrifices and devotion for the welfare of the sick and wounded of the Confederacy, though highly valued at the time when the horrible carnage of war and camp diseases filled the hearts of the Southern people with distress, have been forgotten in her old age save by some of her cotemporaries still living, when it would be gratifying to her to know that she is held in kindly remembrance by the people of her beloved South.

In the belief that it would prove of interest to this Association to revert to the humane services of this devoted woman, some few gleanings relating to her history and work are selected from a book written some years ago by Miss Kate Cumming, a cotemporary nurse.

This lady, then the widow of Dr. Frank Newsom, of the State of Tennessee, was a native of Brandon, Miss., the daughter of the Rev. Dr. T. S. N. King, who went to live in Arkansas when she was still but a little girl. There a few years later she was met by Dr. Newsom, to whom she became endeared in virtue of her many charms of person and noble characteristics of mind.

Dr. Newsom died not very long after they were married, leaving her the great wealth of which he was possessed. Not long after she became a widow hostilities took place between the Northern and Southern States. She took a number of her own servants and, collecting hospital supplies, went to Memphis, where her work in hospitals commenced. Her initiatory work was in the City Hospital, of which Dr. Keller had charge, with a corps of Roman Catholic sisters. From there she went to the Southern Mothers' Home, under Mrs. Sarah Gordon Law, who organized and managed that institution for some time.

MRS. E. K. NEWSOM—FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

After the battle of Belmont, she was solicited by Drs. Tenner and Marstin, who were in charge of the Overton Hospital, to become its matron. There she remained until, becoming aware from the abundant attentions bestowed upon the sick and wounded by the ladies of Memphis that she could be of more service elsewhere, she went to Bowling Green, Ky., in December, 1861, taking her servants and a car load of supplies with her. There the most horrible suffering and lack of comforts existed in the hospitals. There were no suitable buildings, few supplies of any kind, and the weather was extremely cold. There was, indeed, scarcely any organization in the hospital departments in the entire South at that time. She bent all her energies to bring order out of chaos, and from four o'clock in the morning till twelve at night this devoted Christian woman was a ministering angel at the bedside of stricken, suffering, and dying Confederate soldiers.

When General Floyd reached Bowling Green with his troops, the surgeons, hearing of Mrs. Newsom and her noble work, waited upon her and requested that she take sole charge of the hospital in Bowling Green, which she consented to do, and she remained there until the fall of Forts Donelson and Henry. Then she went to Nashville and organized the Howard High School into a hospital, and in a very short time had it ready for the wounded from those forts. Before Nashville fell into the hands of the enemy Mrs. Newsom, assisted by Colonel Dunn, had the wounded and sick placed in cars and carried to Winchester, Tenn., and there she worked as assiduously as ever for the comfort of the sufferers. The encroachments of the enemy making another movement imperative, she went with the sick and wounded to Atlanta, Ga.

Later she was summoned from the Empire City Hospital of that city to Corinth, Miss., with her servants and supplies, to administer to the wants of the wounded from the battle of Shiloh; first to the Tishomingo Hospital, and from there to the Corinth House.

Later Mrs. Newsom became matron of a hospital in the Crutchfield House, Chattanooga, where with her servants she worked as heroically as ever for the good of the cause. She kept with the Western Army until the close of the war.

When our army was retreating before Sherman, she was in Atlanta associated with a high-toned Christian lady, Miss Munroe, of Kentucky. The wounded men under their care were encamped in tents, and the exposure was so great that the Sisters of Charity, who were then in charge of the hospital, gave it up to them. Her health gave way at this time, and she returned to her home, taking back with her a young sister, Miss Fannie King, who then assisted her in the hospitals.

When duty called, her perseverance was inflexible. By the wounded and sick to whom she ministered she was looked upon as an ethereal being, and many of her patients spoke of her as such. Being a devout Christian, her whole walk in life showed her love for her Master's work. The beauties of Christianity were so exemplified in her life that its influence radiated upon all with whom she came in contact. The memory of her noble life spent in the cause of suffering humanity during our war will ever remain as a memorial of what can be done by a true woman.

No one would seek to take from the high credit due to the English Florence Nightingale or the great recognition and high honors she has received from the British government and people for her philanthropic labors. But Mrs. Newsom would not suffer by comparison with her so far as sacrifices, devotion, labor, and suffering are to be considered. The family of her English sister humanitarian had been enriched by the inheritance of the estates of Peter Nightingale. She rendered great service in philanthropic work, it is true; but it nowhere appears that she sacrificed the wealth of her family or of herself in devotion thereto. Mrs. Newsom gave all she had—wealth, youth, health, and opportunities, all that made life dear—and is now at advanced age living poor, forgotten, and unknown by her Southern people; while her English sister humanitarian has had abundant wealth showered upon her. On one occasion alone 50,000 pounds sterling in money was collected for her in reward of her services in the Crimea, which, it is true, she declined to receive except on the condition that the money should be appropriated to the establishment of a training school for nurses, which was done, and the institution placed under her direction. There had been sent to her by Queen Victoria a precious jewel and a letter of thanks. There had been raised by the soldiers of the Crimean War a penny contribution to erect a statue in her honor, which she would not permit. During quite recent years high honors have been bestowed upon her by King Edward of England; and she has been presented with the freedom of the great city of London.

[It is worthy of mention that the freedom of the city of London consists as follows: A parchment inscribed with the name and titles of the person to whom it is to be presented guarantees to the holder and his children after him forever the right to live and trade within the city without having to pay a tax on the goods as they are brought in. It exempts him from naval and military service and tolls and duties throughout the United Kingdom. It assures to his children the care of the Chamberlain, who, in case they are left orphans, takes charge of their property and administers it in their interest until they arrive at years of maturity. The parchment bears the seal and signature of the Lord Mayor and Chamberlain, and is generally ornamented with ribbon and illuminated. It is always inclosed in a long thin gold box and is intended, of course, as an heirloom.

MRS. E. K. TRADER IN LATER YEARS.

At the appointed time the individual is met in the Common Hall by the Mayor and Chamberlain, the latter informing him that the city has decided to confer upon him the privileges of a free citizen, and makes an address applaudatory of the special services or merits of the individual. The recipient signs his name in the clerk's book, and this officer and the City Chamberlain sign their names beneath as guarantors, becoming, according to the rule, responsible for his acts as a citizen. The recipient then steps forward, the oath is administered by the Chamberlain, who demands that he shall be in every respect true and loyal to the interests of the city, and the gold box is committed to his care.]

Miss Nightingale is a good and noble woman, and well deserves all the honors which have been bestowed upon her. For many years she has lived in London in retirement and ease in the full enjoyment of the recognition and appreciation by her fellow-countrymen and countrywomen. But she was no more noble and good than Mrs. Newsom, and no better deserved the adoration and requital of her people. How unlike the treatment which has been accorded these two noble women, engaged in similar humanitarian work! To the one all that heart could wish; to the other, forgetfulness.

Though others may forget, let us not permit such reproach to rest upon the medical corps of the army and navy of the Confederacy, particularly of the Western Army. While she is still living and would be cheered by the knowledge of it, let us do what we may be able to render just honor to this noble, patriotic, humane, and devoted Christian woman.

To that end the following resolutions are herewith submitted and their adoption by this Association earnestly prayed for:

"Whereas there is now living in the city of Washington, D. C., a noble Christian woman, formerly Mrs. E. K. Newsom (now Mrs. E. K. Trader, a widow), born in Brandon, Miss., a daughter of the Rev. T. S. N. King, a Baptist clergyman, who went to live in Arkansas when she was but a child; there she was married to Dr. Frank Newsom, of Tennessee, who died a short time before the war of 1861-65 began; laboring in which war she sacrificed her entire wealth of servants and other property and impaired her health in her great and distinguished ministrations and services to the sick, wounded, and dying soldiers of the Confederate army throughout the entire period of the war, which at that time won for her the great love of the officers, soldiers, and physicians; and whereas this Association deems that the devotion of this noble woman is not recognized; or if so, not appreciated by the people of the South at this time as it should be; therefore be it

"Resolved: 1. That this Association of the Medical Officers of the Army and Navy of the Confederacy at this the eleventh annual meeting in the city of Birmingham, Ala., send her loving greeting with best wishes that the Supreme Being will vouchsafe to her declining years fullness of peace and comfort, and the gratifying consciousness that the veteran Confederate soldier and his descendants hold in kindly remembrance the great and distinguished services which she rendered the sick, wounded, and dying at a time when the Southern people were themselves suffering and in the greatest distress.

"2. That this devoted Confederate woman is hereby commended to the high consideration of the Southern people of this day.

"3. That the Secretary is hereby authorized and directed to transmit a copy of these resolutions to Mrs. E. K. Trader in Washington, D. C., and to request the daily press of this city and the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, of Nashville, Tenn., in behalf of this noble Confederate woman, to give place in their columns to this brief sketch of her history and services and to these resolutions."

HOW "JOHNNY" GOT SOME BLANKETS.

The following incident was recently related by a Federal:

"Once we were camped in the mountains of East Tennessee. I didn't know it could be so cold down South till I tried it for myself. One bitter night I was on picket duty away off from camp, down in the edge of some woods and close beside a little creek. I was tramping along through the snow, kicking my feet and beating my hands together trying to keep warm, when I heard a voice somewhere off on the other side of the creek calling softly: 'Yank! Yank!'

"I knew the enemy was in camp not far away, so I raised my gun in an instant; but the voice called again: 'Don't shoot, Yank! I'm all alone, and I don't mean any harm.'

"'Who are you, then, and what do you want?' I asked as quietly as I could.

"'I'm a Johnny,' said the voice again, 'and I want to see if you can't spare me a blanket.'

"'You are crazy,' said I. 'I'd be shot if they caught me giving you a blanket.'

"'There's no need for you to get shot,' said Johnny, 'and I'm 'bout to freeze, picketing out here in the snow. My uniform's nothing but rags, and I haven't got any overcoat or blanket or anything. Blankets are scarce over in our camp, and it's awful cold, Yank.'

"He said it solemnly in that soft voice of his (the Southerners have a soft, easy way of talking), and—well, the upshot of it was that I promised him I would bring a blanket with me when I came back the next night and leave it to him to get it. Next night when I went to saddle up (our picket line was so far from camp that we had to ride) I got half a dozen blankets out of the commissary and put them under my saddle, and was just about to get away with them when the sergeant spied me. 'Hello, there!' said he. 'What you going to do with all those blankets?'

"My heart was in my mouth; but I knew he couldn't see how many I really did have, and so I answered back cool enough: 'You don't suppose it's warm out there picketing a night like this, do you?' And with that he turned away. I tell you I was glad to see his back!

"Well, I got safe out to the woods with my blankets, and pretty soon I heard the same voice calling again: 'Yank, Yank, have you got that blanket?'

"'Yes,' I said. 'I have six of them, and I came near getting caught, too.'

"'Glory!' said Johnny. 'Glory! Now you jest slip down to the creek and unfold them a little and drop them in one at a time, and I'll do the rest.'

"I did just as he told me (I didn't have to get off my beat to do it), and he went a little way down the creek and fished the blankets out as the current brought them along. When he'd got the last one out, he fell down on his knees (I could see him in the dim moonlight), and I never heard anybody pray such a prayer as that Southern soldier prayed for me, kneeling there in the snow in his ragged old uniform. I took off my hat and stood still till he was through, and then he faded away in the darkness."

[Let us quit talking about "time healing the wounds" or the bitter spirit of true soldiers. The foregoing illustrates the kindly regard that existed while the soldiers on both sides were suffering each for his principles.—ED. VETERAN.]

WARRIORS GRAY.

[The army under General Lee passed by the old gray stone gate of Mount St. Mary's College on its way to Gettysburg. Three Southern students joined it, and met soldiers' deaths on July 3, 1863. They lie buried in the college cemetery within sight of historic old Round Top. Their names were Maurice Byrne, Millikens Bend, La., Jules Freret, New Orleans, and James Norton, Mobile, Ala. These verses commemorate a war tradition of the college, in which there is involved (poor fellows!) more fact than fancy for the young "Warriors Gray." The Rt. Rev. Bishop of Mobile, Edward P. Allen, D.D., was formerly President of Mount St. Mary's.]

Warriors gray, with stars and bars,
Erect and strong, and seamed with scars.
At dusk pass by "the old mount" gate,
Nor falter foot in step with fate.

With blaring bugle, throbbing drum,
From old Virginia up they come;
Each war-worn face tells dark, stern tales
Of bloody fields and wasted vales.

Manassas' scars in ragged lines
Cross slash the gash of Seven Pines.
Ah, bugle, drum, and flag of fate!
Three boys from Dixie guard the gate.

Warriors gray and glad as song,
With swinging stride swirl swift along;
Brothers in arms and torn with scars,
What flag makes kin like stars and bars?

Who lags and shirks the grim, red war
When kinsmen fight for home afar?
When brothers march to meet the fray
And Dixie dies in garb of gray?

Gayly the colors seem to dip,
As through the dusk the bearers slip;
Yea, fond as death and fierce as fate,
They wrap young hearts that guard the gate.

Warriors gray and strong and straight
Pass out with dusk the old gray gate;
Boy soldiers ere the sunken sun
Shades stars and bars and glinting gun.

At Gettysburg, where Pickett led,
With Kemper, Garnett, Armistead,
Bravest of brave, where battle rolls,
In front they fall; God rest their souls!

Thus ever at dusk the flag goes by
With warriors gray that may not die!
Alas! the fair, furled flag of fate!
The warriors gray! The old gray gate!

An error was made in the notice of Bishop Ellison Capers, page 289 June VETERAN, which stated that he was colonel of the 23d South Carolina Regiment, when it should have been the 24th. He was made brigadier general in 1865.

SOLDIERS OLD AND YOUNG.

Referring to the recent publication about a Confederate soldier who was over sixty years old when he enlisted, Capt. J. H. Lester, now of Rogersville, Ala., mentions one who was considerably older as well as a very youthful one:

"I will not claim the youngest, but I believe I can give you the name of the oldest soldier who served in the Confederate army, or perhaps of any army, and for the two extremes of youth and old age in the same company I challenge the world.

"Robert Patrick, of Rogersville, Ala., enlisted in Company E, 7th Alabama Cavalry, in the summer of 1862, aged fourteen years and nine months, and served to the close of the war. Mr. Patrick is now a citizen of Pulaski, Tenn., with plenty of this world's goods to insure him not only the comforts of life but the means for pleasure in his old age.

"Richard J. Andrews enlisted in Company E, 7th Alabama Cavalry, in the fall of 1862 at Rogersville, Ala. He was born in Lunenburg County, Va., May 24, 1793. He was discharged in 1863, in his seventy-first year, on account of old age, against his very earnest protest; in fact, he was very angry when informed that I had an order to discharge him. I appointed him sergeant (fifth) of my company and favored him while in the army in every way consistent with my duty. He was a neighbor and friend of my great-grandfather, Henry Lester, in Virginia, and also a soldier from 1812 to 1815 and a pensioner at the time of his death for services in that war. On his tomb is: 'Richard J. Andrews, born May 24, 1793; died June 6, 1887.'"

SAW GENERAL LEE AT PETERSBURG.

A. A. Garrison writes from Derita, N. C.:

"On the 2d of April, 1865, I was in the engagement to the right of Petersburg, Va., when the enemy first broke our lines in a most serious hand-to-hand engagement. I went to the locks of the canal, where I saw Gen. R. E. Lee. He was putting up his field glasses and looked very sad, but brave. The shells from Fort Steadman were scouring the air and plowing the ground. I realized that it was no safe place for him nor for me. I was eating my last piece of corn bread. I was three months in my eighteenth year, and had been in service about one year.

"General Lee gave an order to our brigadier, General Lane, to 'Gather up those stragglers and hold Fort Gregg as long as you can.' General Lane 'gathered' his men (sixteen in all), one of whom was Lieutenant Riglar, turned us over to him, mounted his horse, and rode to the rear. We were all of the 37th North Carolina Regiment.

"A man of Company D, of our regiment, volunteered to shoot while three of us loaded, and we did the best that was possible. I had about eighty rounds of new cartridges; and when I surrendered, my cartridge box was nearly empty. This soldier of Company D took good aim, and I think he must have killed and wounded scores of the enemy. Near the close of the engagement he was shot through the jugular vein. I was captured and taken to Point Lookout, Md."

CONFEDERATE CEMETERY, THOMASVILLE, N. C.

BY REV. DR. WILLIAM H. RICH, MACON, GA.

Who can ever forget the disastrous march of Gen. W. T. Sherman through Georgia, South Carolina, and into North Carolina, leaving death and destruction in his wake? On April 26, 1865, Gen. Joseph E. Johnston surrendered to him near Greensboro, N. C. Some of the sick and wounded soldiers were carried to Thomasville, N. C., and the Baptist church building was turned into a hospital, where faithful and patriotic women ministered to them in their sufferings, wiped the death damp from their brows, and tenderly laid their bodies to rest in the little cemetery hard by.

These women and their daughters to whom they told the story of their loving work have been endeavoring to erect a suitable monument to mark the last resting place of those faithful and battle-torn heroes. So far they have gathered a neat little sum for the work, but it is not enough. Being associated with them in this work while pastor of the Baptist Church there, they have asked me to make the appeal and receive the funds and assist them in erecting the monument.

Herein I give a list of those buried there. When you have read these names, please mail me a check, money order, or registered letter, so that the monument may be erected. This will be read by many who are able to send large amounts and by others who are only able to send small amounts. Let no one fail to have some part in this blessed work. I have laid the matter before Col. N. E. Harris, of Macon, Ga., and Col. C. M. Wiley, who approve it. Send all contributions to me.

FIGHT AT MOUNT STERLING, KY.

[This letter was written forty-five years ago by a reputable citizen of Mount Sterling, Ky., to a personal friend then living at Owensboro, Ky., but now at St. Louis, Mo. Having discovered the letter among some of his old papers, he sent it to the VETERAN. The author of the letter died years ago.]

MT. STERLING, KY., April 4, 1863.

Brother C., yours is received. We are well. For the first six months we have done very well indeed, but things look awfully gloomy ahead at this point. The recent fight and fire here have embittered everybody.

You ask some information of the recent fight at this place. Having perfect knowledge of the whole affair, I will give you the truth; but it has never appeared yet in the papers. Col. Roy S. Cluke, from this town formerly, came here over four weeks ago with about six hundred men (8th Kentucky Cavalry), mostly men from this region with whom you and I are acquainted. At their first entrance here the troops (about four hundred) which had been here all winter ingloriously fled toward Paris and left us to the tender mercies of the Rebels. About sixty of Cluke's men came in pellmell after them, screaming like devils. They overhauled and captured and destroyed nineteen out of twenty of their wagons, burned all the commissary stores left, broke up all their guns (amounting, I suppose, to several thousand dollars' worth of property), and had what they thought a good time generally. Since then they have destroyed about sixty government wagons and other things proportionately. Cluke's entire command came in the next day. Since then there has been skirmishing through town and near here several times, with sometimes a loss of one or two in killed or wounded.

But last Sunday week was the fight proper. Colonel Walker took five hundred men and went up toward Hazael Green in hunt of Cluke, leaving here near three hundred men. While he was away Cluke slipped back and drove in the pickets on Saturday night. The Federals took to the houses in every available place. At daylight the firing commenced, and I witnessed the whole scene from behind a large locust tree in the yard while the bullets were whistling through the top of the trees. The fight lasted about three hours, when a flag of truce was sent in for an unconditional surrender of the town, which was refused.

The Rebels then commenced firing the town, and burned fifteen buildings, including the "Campbellite" church. Another demand for a surrender was made with a threat to burn the entire town. The Federal commander, seeing the flames around him everywhere with no chance to escape, surrendered. And then from every hill and "nook and crook" they came pouring in like so many locusts; but, strange and unaccountable, they behaved well. They were highly gratified seemingly with the government property they found in town. The losses were four Federals killed and two wounded. One Rebel was killed, a young man by the name of Curtis, from near Washington, Mason County, and four wounded. One, Captain Pendleton, from Clarke County, has since died; all the rest will probably recover.

Cluke took out and paroled two hundred and eighty-three men, besides a few at the hospitals and a few pickets since taken. There has been some skirmishing since, with a loss of one or two killed. Steele's company left Cluke last week and went back to Tennessee. Cluke's whereabouts is not exactly known; but some of his men were day before yesterday cutting up some of their "shines" on the pike near Maysville. The Federals have passed through here since and stole pretty much everything in town—wood, corn, hay, chickens, pigs, bees—and burned fences.

As ever yours, etc.,

STONEWALL JACKSON.

["Let us pass over the river and rest in the shade of the trees." Written by N. B. Bowyer, now of Lakeland, Fla., in 1863, soon after the death of Stonewall Jackson.]

A wail sweeps o'er thy valleys,

Virginia, deep with woe;

Thy noble sons and daughters

In silent grief bend low—

In silent grief bend low

The high-souled, gallant Jackson,

Who sleeps in glory's grave.

The noble chieftain's form is still,

He sleeps his last long sleep;

His brave and faithful legions

In deepest sorrow weep—

In deepest sorrow weep

For their daring leader slain,

Who sleeps in silent grandeur

Beneath the battle plain.

Death stilled the clarion voice

That stirred his band to dare

The front and shock of battle

When cannon rent the air—

When cannon rent the air

And armies met in strife,

Advancing and receding

Before the tide of life.

Our tongues will ever whisper

The glory of his name,

And our hearts will always cherish

The hero's deathless fame—

The hero's deathless fame

And the cause he loved so well

And the sorrow that consumed us

When the noble Stonewall fell.

With the fall of Stonewall Jackson

The South had cause for woe,

For the name of that bold warrior

Struck terror to the foe—

Struck terror to the foe

That turned and wildly fled,

For victory was the watchword

When the gallant Stonewall led.

Virginia, with thy glory,

Shall link his endless fame;

Her limpid streams of water

Will chant his deathless name—

Will cant his deathless name,

And every rill will tell

And every breeze will whisper

How the immortal Stonewall fell.

The South will never cease

To praise his glorious name,

And our hearts will ever cherish

The hero's boundless fame—

The hero's boundless fame

And the heavy debt we paid

When he crossed over the river

To rest in the shade.

MEMORIES OF WAR TIMES.

BY JOE F. WILLIAMS, WALNUT GROVE, MISS.

I joined the Confederate army in Company K (Joe Rodgers, captain), 5th Mississippi Regiment, at Chattanooga, Tenn. My first battle was that of Chickamauga, September 18-20, 1863. I was shot in the neck on the 19th. The bullet lodged in my body somewhere, and is still there. Jack Sanders saw me falling and caught me. The captain said, "Let him alone;" but he held on to me as if I had been his brother. He took me about two miles and made me a bed of straw. During the night the straw caught fire near me. Being paralyzed, I could not move; but I managed to wake him, and he kept me from burning. The next morning he returned to the command. I was taken to the field hospital, and thence to Marietta, Ga. My father came and took me home. A few days after I got home a paroled soldier, W. T. Edgeman, came to our home. He had been captured at Vicksburg. He stayed with us several months. His home was in Texas. He went back to the war with me and joined my company. We fought together in the "Rye Patch" battle, May 15, 1864. I should like to hear from him. He was a fine boy.

The day I was eighteen, May 17, 1864, I rejoined the army. I did so just to be with my brothers. There were four of us in the same company. One was killed in that terrible battle of Franklin, Tenn. I lost my right arm near Atlanta July 22, 1864; then my fighting was over. But there came something worse: I was captured in thirty yards of the breastworks, and was hauled in a rough wagon about twenty miles to their field hospital, where my arm was amputated on the 26th. I suffered greatly. The wound became infested, and they used turpentine as a disinfectant, which caused agony.

On September 1 I was sent to the hospital at Marietta, Ga. A Yankee woman proposed to dress my arm every day if I would give her a ring that I was wearing. She got the ring. One day I was walking on the street when I met an old lady, "Grandmother Calder." I went to her home every day. She gave me nice dinners and money. Two young ladies, the Misses White, lived near her. They were planning to get me out by dressing me in ladies' clothes, getting passes, and riding out of town, as they often did. Just then a Yankee called for me and said: "Johnnie, they sent for you to go back to the hospital." In two days I was sent to Atlanta, Ga., and put in prison, where I stayed about two weeks. They sent me to Chattanooga, Tenn., and there I was put in jail for three weeks. Then I was sent to Nashville, Tenn., and put in the penitentiary for three days. While we were on the train a Yankee hung his haversack near me, and I was so hungry that I slipped a cracker just as easy and ate it as sly as a mouse. That was all the stealing I did during the war. They took me to Louisville, Ky., and after four days sent me to Camp Douglas, Ill. When we were inside the gate, we had to undress, even pull off our shoes and socks, in the snow six inches deep, that they might know we had no arms. We were then put in barracks. I was sick, and the doctor called to see me every morning. He would say: "Good morning, Mr. Williams. How do you feel this morning? Take one of these pills every two hours or take them all at once; it doesn't make any difference." I had mumps and smallpox, and did not want anything to eat; so I got along well on that line.

We were sent from there March 15, 1865, to Baltimore, Md., and by boat on the Chesapeake Bay into the James River, twenty miles below Richmond. I took pneumonia and was sent to a hospital. I was so sick that I could not see, and could not get any medicine. Hamil McDonald told me that if we didn't get out soon the Yankees would get me again. I didn't think I could walk, but I thought I would rather die on my way home than get in their hands again. So he got us a sixty days' furlough, and I walked a mile and a half to get a train. We went through North and South Carolina, and reached my old home where I was born, in Marion County, Ga. I weighed then one hundred and thirteen pounds. I stayed with Uncle and Aunt Nancy Greene, who treated me as if I had been their own son. I was with them two months, until the surrender. I left for home June 1, and reached there the 10th.

I went to school until I was twenty-two years old. I was married to Miss Fannie Hays, of Philadelphia, January 14, 1869. We had eight children, and six are living. Three daughters and one son are married, while one daughter and a son are unmarried. My wife died January 25, 1895. I was married to Miss Fannie Burnett, of Carthage, Miss., July 21, 1896.

I was converted and joined the Cumberland Presbyterian Church (where I expect to stay) in July, 1862. I have been an elder since 1866. I have attended five General Assemblies: at Evansville, Ind., Nashville, Tenn., Marshall, Mo., Springfield, Mo., and Dallas, Tex.

I have been to four Reunions of the old soldiers. At the first, in Atlanta, I visited the battle ground on which I lost my arm. I met some of Grandmother Calder's family, but she was already numbered with the blessed. At the next, in Memphis, Tenn., I met Jackson Hudson, whom I hadn't seen in thirty-four years; then at New Orleans and next at Dallas.

I hope all the veterans who read this are Christians, and that one day when we "pass over the river" we will rest beneath the shade of the trees.

NORTH CAROLINA TROOPS AT GETTYSBURG.

BY A. T. MARSH, HIDDENITE, N. C.

I was a member of Company I, 53d North Carolina Regiment, Daniel's Brigade, which was composed of the 32d, 43d, 45th, and 53d Regiments, and 2d Georgia Battalion—in all about five thousand strong. Although we had been in the field nearly sixteen months, it was our first regular battle. Our division (Rodes's) arrived at Carlisle, Pa., on Saturday evening preceding the battle, where we rested two days. We then set out for Gettysburg; and after marching a day and a half, we met the enemy, and without ceremony went to fighting in earnest.

We were in an open field, while the enemy in front of our regiment were in a grove of large trees. After fighting for some time, they made a charge on the 45th North Carolina, which was the extreme right of our brigade. We were ordered to fire right oblique, which soon caused them to about face and run to the rear faster than they came toward us. They left quite a number killed and wounded. Later they rallied and came at us again, with the same result. They made the third attempt, and as soon as they turned their backs we were ordered to charge them, driving them from the grove and capturing most of them in our front.

We advanced to the suburbs of Gettysburg, where we bivouacked in line of battle during the night.

In passing over a gully I saw a puddle of muddy water; and being very thirsty, I stopped, dipped a tin cup of it, and just as I raised it to my lips I discovered a wounded Yankee a few feet from me, lying in the bottom of the gully. He looked at me wistfully, and I asked him if he would have a drink. He replied in the affirmative, and I gave him the cup, telling him I could do no more for him and that our ambulance corps would be apt to find and take care of him. His thigh was broken. Five minutes before I would have shot him, but instead of an enemy he was only a helpless man.

Early next morning we fell back just beyond Seminary Ridge, where we supported some of our batteries from about ten o'clock till dark, when the artillery duel ceased. Many shells exploded in our ranks, killing and wounding several of our men. It was a trying ordeal to lie there and take it without being able to return a shot. However, we were consoled by the thought that our artillery was paying them in kind. About dark our command advanced a few hundred yards to the front and relieved other troops. We stayed there till not long before day. We then moved by the left flank for three or four miles and took position facing where we had been the first two days.

Daylight came before we had reached our position, and we advanced under a terrific shelling from the enemy's batteries. Being in open ground for about a half mile, it is a wonder that our loss was not greater. We finally reached the woods, and the shelling ceased, they not knowing where we were. We advanced up a long, steep hill and reënforced some Georgia troops. The enemy being on another hill with a deep ravine between us, we fought there for several hours, till the enemy placed a battery on a height to our left and commenced enfilading our line with grape and canister.

Our position being untenable, we were ordered back to the foot of the hill. We then moved by the right flank a short distance and again ascended the hill, where we held our position the rest of the day, after sending a very heavy force of skirmishers a short distance to the front. The skirmishers kept up almost an incessant roar of small arms, while the cannonading exceeded anything we had ever heard.

Hill's Corps was making its charge on the opposite side of the heights; but our line of battle was not engaged after the morning, though we were momentarily expecting it. After dark we retraced our steps of the early morning and went into camp near our position of the first and second days of the battle. We rested here on the 4th, and left on the retreat on the morning of the 5th.

Our regiment lost ninety-nine men killed and wounded the first day, nine belonging to our company, all wounded. One man in our company was shot through the body just above the hips, the same ball breaking one of the bones in his arm; another was shot through the breast, the ball going out by the side of his spine. A third one lost a leg. The rest were flesh wounds. The youngest member of our company, a sixteen-year-old boy, was struck on the forehead. We were moving by the left flank, and I saw him lying on his back, the blood trickling down his face. I thought he was dying; and after the battle was over that evening, some one asked: "Where is Simpson?" I replied, "He is dead," and was corroborated by others who saw him. We knew no better till next morning about ten o'clock, when we heard that he was at the field hospital walking about. He came to us on the third evening, and upon my telling him that I thought he had been killed on the first day he replied that he knew nothing about it till he found himself about one hundred and fifty yards to the rear, running like a whitehead. He never missed a battle in which the brigade was engaged till the close of the war, and he lived till a few years ago.

We were once on the Rapidan River near Moreton's Ford, and near by was a large patch of Irish potatoes. The land had been plowed and part of the potatoes saved; but a lot were left, which the men soon found and commenced grabbing out of the dirt. A guard was put around the patch, and Simpson was caught. General Daniel told his captor to take him to a large apple tree not far off and keep him under guard. In a short while Simpson was in the top of the tree, singing "Dixie" at the top of his voice. General Daniel, hearing him, sent a courier to tell the guard to let that man go to his company.

I am nearly seventy-eight years of age; but I do not forget the scenes through which we passed from 1861 to 1865, and I cherish the memory of all true Southern soldiers.

INSIDE TESTIMONY FROM JOHNSON'S ISLAND.

[J. M. Gresham, of Monroe, Ga., who was lieutenant of Company H, 42d Georgia Regiment, replies to Col. H. A. Smith, of the 128th Ohio Infantry, as to the treatment of prisoners on Johnson's Island, which article appeared in the VETERAN for May.]

I was captured on December 16, 1864, near Nashville, and with many others (commissioned officers) sent to the Island. I was released June 20, 1865. We did not get the same rations as their soldiers.

A day's allowance of wood never lasted all day. I often carried at two armfuls a day's allowance of wood, and this was for a small stove for about two hundred prisoners. The winter was very severe, and the lake was covered with ice all winter two to three feet thick. The captain stated that all used water from the same wells. There was no well inside the prison yard. The prisoners used water from the lake. Clothing, blankets, etc., were not furnished plentifully. My captain and I slept for two weeks on a bunk (plank floor), our only bedding two light blankets we had when captured. After some left our room on exchange, they divided their bedding and kept us from freezing. No provisions, not even a grain of black pepper, could be purchased from the sutler till after the surrender. Those who were fortunate enough to have any money had to give it to the authorities before entering the pen, but it was placed to their credit outside. As stated, we could buy nothing to eat until after the surrender. We would make out our little orders, have roll caller vouch for correct name given, carry order to headquarters, and have it approved and returned to us at next roll call. We would go to the sutler's quarters, present our order; and if the name appeared on his list as having enough money outside, we would get the articles mentioned, but at an enormous price.

Printed cards were distributed among the prisoners, issued by Col. Charles W. Hill, commander of the post, promising all who would take the oath full rations and tobacco, the same as their army got, and privileges of going outside the pen. This looked like we were getting the same rations as their soldiers. I have one of the printed cards in my possession now. About two hundred, under above promise, made application for the oath. An order was issued separating the oath takers from the faithful prisoners and assigning them separate quarters. We did not know till then how many nor who they were. After being separated, the two classes kept aloof from each other. They were not given full rations, but fared as the balance of us.

On one occasion, after paper reports of a great victory by the Federals, these scalawag oath takers applied to Colonel Hill for a United States flag and hoisted it on the roof of their building, and as soon as seen the loyal prisoners scaled the roof and tore it down. An armed company of Federals rushed through the gate to quiet the disturbance; but quiet was not restored until Colonel Hill came in and made a speech, apologizing for letting the United States flag come into the pen, stating that he honored and respected the loyal prisoners and would trust them further than the oath takers.

Large quantities of provisions and tobacco were shipped through flag of truce from Richmond via Old Point Comfort to prisoners on the island, but were never delivered until after the surrender, when many had gone out on exchange, and therefore never received them. I wrote an aunt in Kentucky to send me a suit of clothing. My letter was returned from outside stating on envelope that my order must be for gray and of inferior quality. I managed to get hold of another United States stamp and wrote again as per orders. The suit was received outside and the letter sent in marked "clothes not such as ordered," and I never got them.

I could mention many things very humiliating, but space forbids. I guess Capt. H. A. Smith was there, but I did not see things as he reports. Lieut. Foster V. Tollett, of the 128th Ohio, was our last roll caller, Block 12. He was a nice, clever man, but was under strict orders and could show no favors if he desired to. I never heard of a Federal there asking a prisoner if he could do anything for him. I never saw any waste rations in slop tubs, but have seen prisoners fishing out meatless bones to boil for soup. Wharf rats and house cats never escaped if they got into the pen, but were chased and caught and eaten by the prisoners. I saw one large Irish potato sliced and divided among six men and one teaspoonful of beans to each. This is what the Northern papers called giving vegetables to prisoners once a week and their "fare as good as at home." While their prisoners were "starving to death at Andersonville" ours were ditto on Johnson's Island.

I have the names and addresses of a large number of comrade prisoners from all the Confederate States, many of them now living, and I can substantiate every word I have written and much more equally as humiliating.

While we are all now under the same flag, let us be agreeable, but I want to see true history written.

WADE HAMPTON AND W. T. SHERMAN.

Many people do not yet know the truth about the burning of Columbia, S. C., and there are still perverters of the truth.

In a "History of the United States," by Henry William Elson, published by the Macmillan Company in 1905, page 287, appears the following: "At Orangeburg a slight battle was fought and another before Columbia, the enemy being led by Gen. Wade Hampton. Columbia surrendered February 17, 1865, Hampton escaping after setting fire to five hundred bales of cotton. The fire soon spread, and a large portion of the town was soon consumed."

Many times has this falsehood been very fully exposed.

On page 286, Volume II., Sherman in his "Memoirs" says: "In my official report of the burning of Columbia I distinctly charged it to Gen. Wade Hampton, and I confess I did so pointedly to shake the faith of his people in him."

In his official correspondence at "Headquarters Military Division of the Mississippi in the Field, February 24, 1865," Sherman wrote to Lieut. Gen. Wade Hampton, commanding cavalry forces C. S. A.: "It is officially reported to me that our foraging parties are murdered after capture and labeled 'Death to All Foragers.' One instance of a lieutenant and seven men near Chesterville and others about three miles from Feasterville. I have ordered a similar number of prisoners in our hands to be disposed of in a like manner. I hold about one thousand prisoners, and can stand it as long as you can; but I hardly think these murders are committed with your knowledge, and would suggest that you give notice to the people at large that every life taken by them simply results in the death of one of your Confederates. Of course you cannot question my right to forage on the country. It is a war right as old as history. . . . I merely assert our war right to forage and my resolves to protect my foragers to the extent of life for life."

To this letter General Hampton replied as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, Feb. 27, 1865.

"Maj. Gen. W. T. Sherman, U. S. Army, General: Your communication of the 24th reached me to-day. In it you state your foraging parties were 'murdered' after capture, and you go on to say you had 'ordered a similar number of prisoners in our hands to be disposed of in like manner'—that is to say, you have ordered a number of Confederate soldiers to be 'murdered.' . . . In reference to the statement you make regarding the death of your foragers, I have to say I know nothing of it; that no orders given by me authorize the killing of prisoners after capture, and I do not believe that any of my men killed any of yours except under circumstances it was just and proper and perfectly legitimate that they should kill them.

"It is a part of the system of the thieves whom you designate as foragers to fire the dwellings of those citizens whom they have robbed. To check this inhuman system, which is justly execrated by every civilized nation, I have directed my men to shoot down all of your men caught burning dwelling houses. This order shall remain in force as long as you disgrace the profession of arms by allowing your men to destroy private dwellings.

"You say I cannot question your right to forage on the country. 'It is a right as old as history.' I do not, sir, question this right. But there is a right older than this and one more inalienable—the right every man has to defend his home and protect those that are dependent upon him. And from my heart I wish that every old man and boy in my country who can fire a gun would shoot down as he would a wild beast the men who are desolating their land, burning their houses and homes, and insulting their women.

"You are particular in defining and claiming 'war rights.' May I ask if you enumerate among them the right to fire upon a defenseless city without notice, to burn that city to the ground after it had been surrendered by the authorities, who claimed, though in vain, that protection which is always accorded to civilized warfare to noncombatants, to fire the dwelling houses of citizens after robbing them, and to perpetrate even darker crimes than these—crimes too black to mention?

"You have permitted, if you have not ordered, the commission of all these offenses against humanity and contrary to the rules of war among civilized nations. You fired into the city of Columbia without a word of warning. You gave no notice. After its surrender by the Mayor, who requested protection of private property, you laid the whole city in ashes, leaving amid its ruins thousands of old men and helpless women and children, who are likely to perish of starvation and exposure. You turned no pitying eye upon their sufferings; your line of march can be traced by the lurid light of burning houses, and many are the households where there is agony far more bitter than that of death.

"The Indian scalped his victims, regardless of sex or age; but with all his barbarity he always respected the persons of his female captives. Indians were not rapists. Your soldiers, more savage than the Indian, not content with burning homes to the ground, insult those whose natural protectors are absent. . . . I shall hold numbers of your men as hostages for those whom you have ordered to be executed."

What a rebuke to General Sherman! He must have winced! For in his "Memoirs," after admitting he laid the burning of Columbia on Hampton for a specific purpose, in that same report he says: "I estimate the damage to Georgia alone at one hundred million dollars: ninety-eight millions was simple destruction; two millions inured to our advantage." And then with a boast, like Thad Stevens or Beast Butler would have indulged, he boastfully adds: "My soldiers have done the work with alacrity and with a cheerfulness unsurpassed."

Forget it not, Hampton pointedly charged Sherman then, on the 27th of February, 1865, while it was all fresh, just done, with the crime of burning Columbia. This correspondence was accessible to "Historian" H. W. Elson had he desired to tell the truth.

But Sherman's object to discredit Hampton did not succeed. He destroyed Columbia, but not Hampton. Nor does Historian Elson refer to Hampton's demand in 1866 that Congress appoint a committee of investigation to fix the charge of "who burnt Columbia."

Hampton does not stand discredited. Sherman did not "break the faith of the people in him." He died mourned by all the South and honored and beloved like Lee and Jackson and Forrest and Stuart. His name sheds luster on the American character. No monument will be higher than his. After the war were his greatest battles and his greatest triumphs. He redeemed the State from carpetbag rule; he glorified the land that Sherman had despoiled, and died not only beloved as a great commander in war but a great statesman as well.

PRISONERS AT FORT WARREN, BOSTON HARBOR.

Miss C. M. Davis sends from Fernandina, Fla., these pictures of prisoners at Fort Warren. The scenes are in front of a building with stone front of massive blocks and in block letters the name, "Fort Warren, 1850."

Fort Warren is in Boston Harbor. The date of the taking of these pictures is not known, yet it was evidently between January, 1863, and the time the prisoners were released in 1865. Miss Davis, the sender of the pictures, is a daughter of George W. Davis, deceased, who was a "blockader." She is anxious to procure information in regard to any others in the picture than the three marked with figures 1, 2, 3. Those known to her in the two groups are her uncle, Cornelius Galloway Smith, deceased, a native of Brunswick, Ga., who was a blockade runner, making a successful trip on the steamship Calypso, but was captured on a second trip. He was two years and nine days in prison, being released June 20, 1865. He is seated on the left, lower row. Her father, G. W. Davis, is standing nearer the center of the group and facing No. 1. No. 3, it will be seen, is in the top row sitting with a shawl around him—Edward John Johnston, an Irishman, who died and was buried at Fort Warren. This is the first picture ever printed in the VETERAN of any prisoners at Fort Warren. It will be remembered that in that prison Alexander H. Stephens, John H. Reagan, and other prominent Confederates were confined.

BY WILLIAM A. ROBY, HAMBURG, ARK.

After a long, hot march across Mississippi and Alabama, W. H. Jackson's Division of Cavalry joined Johnston's army at Rome, Ga., about the 10th of May, 1864, and engaged the enemy at Kingston a few days afterwards, which was our first fight in Georgia.

Two regiments of Ferguson's Brigade, the 2d Alabama and Perrin's Mississippi Regiment, and the 8th Confederate Cavalry were engaged in the fight. Perrin's Regiment dismounted and the other two were held in reserve mounted. We were opposed by "Wilder's Lightning Cavalry." Frenoy's scouts and Battle Fort's company were thrown to the front mounted.

PRISONERS AT FORT WARREN, BOSTON HARBOR.

Wilder came on us with a charge. Our advance met him with two volleys each, and retired to the rear of the dismounted men, who met them with a broadside that checked their charge and threw them into confusion. The 8th Confederate, armed with sabers and pistols, backed up by the 2d Alabama, charged them, which made the rout complete. In the fight Colonel Earl, in the 2d Alabama, was killed. I was a member of Captain Fort's company, H, Perrin's Regiment, which was afterwards commanded by H. L. Muldrow. You can form some idea of the service we rendered from that which I now relate.

On November 2, 1864, Sergeant W. A. Campbell and myself spread out blankets at Blue Mountain, Ala. I remarked to him: "This is the first time we have spread out blankets out of the hearing of guns since the 10th of May." He replied: "Yes, and this is the first day since that date that we have been all day out of the reach of Yankee bullets."

Lest my article be too long, I will give you but one other instance of scouting in Georgia. While Hood was marching into Tennessee Fort's scouts were operating on the right flank of his army near Villa Rica, Ga. We came in contact with a party of Federal scouts about equal in number to ours, and we were at them before they knew it. Part of them had stopped and were catching some horses and two or three young mules in a citizen's lot. We fired on them and charged them. They abandoned the citizen's stock and some of their own horses and took to their heels. We followed them closely for about a mile, where they had rallied and formed a line of battle. Before we reached the line Captain Fort was shot through the shoulder. Comrade Campbell overhauled a Yankee corporal, who would neither stop nor surrender; so he knocked him off his horse with the butt of his gun. We made another charge and routed them. One of the scouts, J. G. Gunn, who had just received from home a fresh young horse, dashed by the wounded captain and said as he passed, "Captain, I can't stop my horse and my pistol won't shoot," and like a flash he went in among the Yankees and out of our sight. They did not attempt to capture him, as they were in so great a hurry to get away themselves. When Gunn returned to us, it was found that his horse was shot, and I think died the next day. We got a doctor to the Captain that night. The next day I was detailed to take the prisoners back to the brigade. Comrade Campbell joined me in a couple of days. From there he was sent home after supplies, clothing, etc. I went with him to Blue Mountain, where he took the railroad for home and I returned to the command at Ladiga, Ala.

THE THRILL OF "DIXIE" IN BIRMINGHAM.

During the Reunion in Birmingham the Confederate veterans were given a cordial invitation by the best musical artists of the city to a concert which proved of unusual merit. While every number was highly meritorious, the singing of "Dixie" by Mrs. J. Griff Edwards, of Portsmouth, Va., was the event of greatest joy. She was aided by her company or band of beautiful and lovely young ladies from Virginia and Tennessee, dressed in Confederate gray jackets and gray slouch hats.

They sang it at the afternoon session of the veterans' business meeting, and an enthusiastic veteran, L. M. Park, of Atlanta, was eager to hear it again. At the close of a magnificent instrumental piece by the band he arose from his seat in the audience and exclaimed: "Mr. Bandmaster! Mr. Bandmaster!" Immediately all eyes were centered on him. The bandmaster delayed his programme while the veteran continued: "Many years ago there was held in Baltimore a convention of ministers, and the 'Elder' Booth (as he is called to distinguish him from his sons, Edwin and John Wilkes) was playing an engagement in the city. Booth happened in on the convention, and was recognized by one of the clergymen who had heard him on one occasion recite the Lord's Prayer. He made the motion that the convention ask Mr. Booth to recite the prayer. Some of the 'strait-laced' disciples were horrified, secretly believing such a proceeding by a 'play actor' was profane if not sacrilegious. Mr. Booth reluctantly complied with the request. At the conclusion it was said that not an eye but was more or less misty with tears, and one old brother exclaimed with emotion: 'For over forty years I have been repeating that prayer secretly and publicly and hearing it so repeated, but I can truly say I never before knew of its wondrous beauty and power.' Some of my old Confederate comrades can with equal truth say we have heard 'Dixie' sung thousands of times since it was first composed and have hip and hurrahed over it, but never were we so thrilled and filled with enthusiasm and love for our Southland as we were when 'Dixie' was rendered by Mrs. Edwards and her young ladies. Will they not exceedingly oblige by singing it over again?"

Mrs. Edwards most graciously complied, and not only sang "Dixie" with her voice, but she spoke it, she acted it with every motion of her head, body, and eyes. And when at the chorus she so winsomely and witchingly sang, "I'm glad I live in Dixie," the audience went wildly mad with joy that they, too, lived in Dixie; and when a little farther on she so boldly declafed, "In Dixie's land I'll take my stand," and defiantly declared she would "live and die for Dixie," the audience was thrilled with the wildest enthusiasm. Hats were thrown in the air, handkerchiefs and flags wildly waved, and the Rebel yell filled the hall and echoed and reëchoed the enthusiasm of the delighted hearers and intensified their love for the song, the sunny South, and for the charming singer.

Never was seen in Birmingham anything approaching it in patriotic fervor.

DIXIE LAND.

BY S. W. F. PREWETT.

Though "Greek met Greek" and freed the slaves,
I hold no hate for Northern braves;
The brothers' war made brothers' graves—
But Dixie land for me!

Forgive! forget! O heed the cry!
Each thought it right, each heaves a sigh,
America will do or die!
Thou Dixie land for me!

I love my native Southern hills,
Her mountains, vales, her plains, her rills;
Each sacred spot my being thrills—
Proud Dixie land for me!

'Tis here the sweetest warblers sing
To greet the rarest charms of spring;
And here my fondest mem'ries cling—
Fair Dixie land for me!

'Tis here the balmy zephyrs blow,
'Tis here the fairest flowers grow,
And here the sweetest girls I know!
O, Dixie land for me!

Grand, matchless beauty spot of earth!
Thou land of chivalry and worth,
I love thee, loved thee from my birth!
Old Dixie land for me!

Let poets sing thy charms sublime.
Let patriots praise this hero clime
And damn the wretch who calls it crime!
Hurrah for Dixie land!

Blame not to me the old "Confed.;"
I love the living, love the dead;
All honor crowns our hero's head
In dauntless Dixie land.

UNVEILING OF MONUMENT AT LEESBURG, V.A.

BY HUGH LEE POWELL, LEESBURG.

May 28, 1908, will be long remembered by our county people, as it embraced more of pleasant occurrences than any day within the memory of our people.

In the early morning a large crowd gathered for the celebration of Memorial Day. The multitude marched with music and carried beautiful flowers to the cemetery to decorate the graves of the Confederate dead. On returning to the courthouse lawn, the veterans were cordially received and entertained at an elegant luncheon tendered them by Mrs. Stirling Murray, President of the Loudoun Chapter of the U. D. C. The hour for the unveiling of the beautiful monument having arrived, Gov. Claude A. Swanson was introduced, and made an eloquent address, after which Col. Edmund Berkeley, who commanded the splendid old 8th Virginia, spoke to his cheering veterans. At the conclusion of Colonel Berkeley's address our beloved United States Senator, John W. Daniel, held his large audience spellbound for two hours by his eloquent recital of the facts that made glorious the record of the Army of Northern Virginia.

Our townsman, Harry T. Harrison, a son of one of Loudoun's soldiers, recited the following original poem:

A STATUE.

A statue, proof of thy maker's art, bronze cast;
In days to come a monument to ages that have passed;
To-day to us who gather here
You are that some one our hearts hold dear.
That father, brother, husband, lover
At peace with God beneath the sod,
Who heard the call, who walked the way,
That soldier of right who wore the gray.

A statue mutely telling the sad story
Of a nation that died 'midst a halo of glory;
Of shattered hopes, ambitions dead,
Of noble blood that was freely shed;
Of the bugle's call for more to fall;
Of those who went, none being sent;
Of where the fiercest waxed the fray
Was found the soldier who wore the gray.

A statue linking the heavens with the earth,
The form of that hero to whom our nation gave birth,
Who followed on where honor led,
Till he rested with our holy dead;
And when at the last the trumpet's blast
Sends forth that call that comes to all,
As an honor guard on that last day
We'll find the soldier who wore the gray.

All that preceded was a delightful introduction to the effective unveiling of the beautiful bronze statue surmounting a massive granite base, which was presented as an affectionate testimonial to the memory of the faithful sons of Loudoun County by the Loudoun Chapter, U. D. C.

MEMORIAL TO GEN. STEPHEN D. LEE.

Mr. W. T. Rigby, Chairman of the Vicksburg Military Park Commission, is taking an active interest in the memorial to Gen. Stephen D. Lee. He writes on September 7, 1908, to the editor of the VETERAN: "It gives me pleasure to be able to herewith hand you a copy of Colonel Watterson's very encouraging letter. Should other friends take hold of the matter in the same generous spirit, we need not call on General Lee's son for a large part of the cost of the statue. This would be very gratifying; in fact, the statue should be placed in the park by the General's friends. Six contributions of $100 each have now been made: three by Confederate and two by Union veterans, one by the son of a Confederate veteran. We are now expecting, with the permission of the sculptor, to dedicate General Lee's statue in the park sometime next May."

Mr. Watterson's letter to Colonel Rigby is as follows: "Naturally all of us here take a very deep interest in the proposed memorial to Lieut. Gen. Stephen D. Lee. You can place upon your subscription list the names of Col. W. B. Haldeman, Bruce Haldeman, Esq., and Henry Watterson each for $100. Whenever you need the money, Mr. Haldeman will send check for the whole amount."

MONUMENT AT LEESBURG, VA.

SAMUEL DAVIS.

AN UNEXCELLED ILLUSTRATION OF HIGHEST HONOR IN MAN.

Upon the forty-fifth anniversary of the execution of Samuel Davis, which occurred at Pulaski, Tenn., on November 27, 1863, it is expected that a bronze statue will be formally dedicated at the capital of his native Tennessee in commemoration of his sublime example of regarding truth and honor of greater value than life. Readers of the VETERAN for a dozen years will recall the history which so moved the multitude that several thousand dollars were contributed to a monument in commemoration of the matchless record made.

ARTICLES COPIED FROM THE VETERAN.

[A paper by S. A. Cunningham, the editor, read before the Tennessee Historical Society, tells the story in brief.]

Introductory to this paper on Sam Davis, the writer mentions that he had never heard of him until after the CONFEDERATE VETERAN was established, and then, when a school oration was submitted for publication, he was inclined to reject it, feeling that there were so many equally worthy heroes it would hardly be fair to print this special eulogy. The fearful trial of the young Tennessean was not then comprehended. Later on, when returning from a reunion on the battlefields of Shiloh in April, 1895, participated in by the veterans of the two great armies engaged in it, two ex-Federal soldiers who witnessed Davis's death on the gallows at Pulaski, November 27, 1863, recited the details of the event; and when they said "the Federal army was in grief over it," he resolved to print the story, and reprint it until that typical hero should have as full credit as the VETERAN could give him.

The history in brief, as told by his comrades, was sublime, while every additional fact in connection with his career demonstrates all the stronger his merit to immortality. The record now submitted to the keeping of this noble society contains extracts from some data that has been published; but the concise collation, it is hoped, will be treasured and preserved for the edification of generations to come after us.

Samuel Davis was born October 6, 1842, near Smyrna, Rutherford County, Tenn. His parents had emigrated from Virginia. Upon the tablet of a beautiful marble monument erected by his father in the garden of his good country home are these words: "He laid down his life for his country. He suffered death on the gibbet rather than betray his friends and his country." The monument is surrounded by an iron fence. Within that inclosure are buried father, mother, and maternal grandmother.

When the South and North rushed to arms, Sam Davis was attending a military school at Nashville, under the direction of Bushrod R. Johnson and Edmund Kirby Smith. Soon these teachers were commissioned to positions in organizing the Confederate army, and both were promoted to important commands. Many of the cadets were sent out as drillmasters, while Sam Davis enlisted in the 1st Regiment of Infantry as a private soldier. His record was so good that when General Bragg directed the organization of a company of scouts, in 1863, Davis was chosen as a member. This company was under the leadership of Capt. H. B. Shaw. It is said that Captain Shaw, disguised and called "Coleman," posed as a herb doctor, and in most successful ways used deception as a spy; and his scouts wore Confederate gray with pride and independence. This command of scouts was organized by Gen. B. F. Cheatham, who took first into his confidence Captain Shaw and John Davis, the older brother of Sam, in service.

These scouts slept in thickets, where devoted friends, mainly ladies, underwent the peril of going to them by night to feed and inform them of all they could learn about the status and movements of the Federal forces. Sam Davis was one of the coolest and bravest of the command, a young gentleman whose integrity of character was as near faultless as can be conceived, with a patriotism that induced him to suffer any privation and any peril. About the 20th of November, 1863, having been supplied with reports as complete as it was possible to procure and a note from Captain Shaw ("Coleman"), he started on his perilous journey through Federal to Confederate lines.

Gen. G. M. Dodge had an army of sixteen thousand men in that vicinity, with his headquarters in Pulaski. He was much disturbed by the efficiency of these scouts, and determined upon desperate measures to stop them. The noted "Kansas Jayhawkers" (7th Kansas Cavalry) were scouring the country, and they captured Sam Davis with these important documents upon his person. There is no evidence of treachery upon the part of anybody. The patrol of that region was so complete the wonder is that any of the scouts escaped. Captain Shaw was captured, but so kept his identity concealed that he was held as a prisoner. I have seen his autograph, with rank and position attached, in a book belonging to his fellow-prisoner, A. O. P. Nicholson, a Tennessean, written at Johnson's Island. While it has been impossible so far to ascertain whether Davis knew of Shaw's capture, the belief is that he did, and that he referred to him when he said the man who gave him the information was worth more to the Confederacy than he was. Joshua Brown, who was in jail with Davis, states that he (Davis) knew Shaw was in jail. Mr. Brown wrote at length upon the subject, and from his paper several extracts are made:

"General Bragg had sent us, a few men who knew the country, into Middle Tennessee to get all the information possible concerning the movements of the Federal army; to find out if it was moving from Nashville and Corinth to reinforce Chattanooga. We were to report to Captain Shaw, designated by us as 'Coleman,' who commanded the scouts. We were to go south to Decatur and send our reports by a courier line to General Bragg at Missionary Ridge. We were told that the duty was very dangerous, and that but few of us might return; that we should probably be captured or killed, and we were cautioned against exposing ourselves unnecessarily. After we had been in Tennessee about ten days, we watched the 16th Army Corps, commanded by General Dodge, move up from Corinth to Pulaski. We agreed that we should leave for the South on Friday, the 19th of November, 1863. A number of our scouts had been captured and several killed. We were to start that night, every man for himself; each of us had his own information. I had counted almost every regiment and all the artillery in the 16th Corps, and had found out that they were moving on Chattanooga. Late in the afternoon we started, and ran into the 7th Kansas Cavalry, known as the 'Kansas Jayhawkers;' and when we learned who had captured us, we thought our time had come. We were taken to Pulaski, about fifteen miles away, and put in jail. Davis was one of the number. I talked with him over our prospects of imprisonment and escape, which were very gloomy. Davis said they had searched him that day and found some important papers upon him, and that he had been taken to General Dodge's headquarters. They had also found in his saddle seat maps and descriptions of the fortifications at Nashville and other points, together with a report of the Federal army in Tennessee, and they found in his boot this letter:

"GILES COUNTY, TENN., THURSDAY MORNING,
November 18, 1863.

"Col. A. McKinstry, Provost Marshal General, Army of Tennessee, Chattanooga.

"Dear Sir: I send you seven Nashville, three Louisville, and one Cincinnati papers with dates to the 17th—in all eleven. I also send for General Bragg three wash balls of soap, three toothbrushes, and two blank books. I could not get a larger size diary for him. I will send a pair of shoes and slippers, some more soap, gloves, and socks soon. * * * Dodge says he knows the people are all Southern, and does not ask them to swear to a lie. All the spare forces around Nashville and vicinity are being sent to McMinnville. Six batteries and twelve Parrott guns were sent forward on the 14th, 15th, and 16th. It is understood that there is hot work in front somewhere. Telegrams suppressed. Davis has returned. He tells me the line is in order to Summerville. I send this by one of my men to that place.

"I am, with high regard,
E. COLEMAN,
Captain Commanding Scouts."

It was evidently not known by "Coleman" when writing to whom he would intrust the papers and articles. W. L. Moore was first directed to carry them, but his horse required rest.

Davis's pass is of the usual kind. It reads:

"HEADQUARTERS GENERAL BRAGG'S SCOUTS, MIDDLE TENNESSEE, September 25, 1863.

"Samuel Davis has permission to pass on scouting duty anywhere in Middle Tennessee or south of the Tennessee River he may see proper. By order of General Bragg.

E. COLEMAN, Captain Commanding Scouts."

"The next morning Davis was again taken to General Dodge's headquarters," Joshua Brown continues, "and this is what took place between them, which General Dodge told me occurred: 'I took him into my private office and told him that it was a very serious charge brought against him; that he was a spy, and from what I found upon his person he had accurate information in regard to my army, and I must know where he obtained it. I told him that he was a young man and did not seem to realize the danger he was in. Up to that time he had said nothing, but then he replied in the most respectful and dignified manner: "General Dodge, I know the danger of my situation, and I am willing to take the consequences." I asked him then to give me the name of the person from whom he got the information; that I knew it must be some one near my headquarters or who had the confidence of the officers of my staff, and repeated that I must know the source from which it came. I insisted that he should tell me, but he firmly declined to do so. I told him that I should have to call a court-martial and have him tried for his life, and, from the proofs we had, they would be compelled to condemn him; that there was no chance for him unless he gave the source of his information. He replied: "I know that I will have to die; but I will not tell where I got the information, and there is no power on earth that can make me tell. You are doing your duty as a soldier, and I am doing mine. If I have to die, I do so feeling that I am doing my duty to God and my country." I pleaded with and urged him with all the power I possessed to give me some chance to save his life, for I discovered that he was a most admirable young fellow, with the highest character and strictest integrity. He then said: "It is useless to talk to me. I do not intend to do it. You can court-martial me or do anything else you like, but I will not betray the trust reposed in me." He thanked me for the interest I had taken in him, and I sent him back to prison. I immediately called a court-martial to try him.'

"The following is the action of the commission, which has been furnished me by General Dodge:

"Proceedings of a military commission which convened at Pulaski, Tenn., by virtue of the following general order:

PULASKI, TENN., November 20, 1863.

"General Orders No. 72.

"A military commission is hereby appointed to meet at Pulaski, Tenn., on the 23d inst., or as soon thereafter as practicable, for the trial of Samuel Davis, and such other persons as may be brought before it. By order of Brig. Gen. G. M. Dodge.
J. W. BARNES, Lieut. and A. A. G.'

"Report of the commission:

"The commission do therefore sentence him, the said Samuel Davis, of Coleman's Scouts, in the service of the so-called Confederate States, to be hanged by the neck until he is dead, at such time and place as the commanding general shall direct, two-thirds of the commission concurring in the sentence. Finding and sentence of the commission approved, the sentence will be carried into effect on Friday, November 27, 1863, between the hours of 10 A.M. and 2 P.M. Brig. Gen. T. W. Sweeney, commanding the 2d Division, will cause the necessary arrangements to be made to carry out this order in the proper manner.'

"Captain Armstrong, the provost marshal, informed Davis of the sentence of the court-martial. He was surprised at the more humiliating punishment, expecting to be shot, not thinking they would hang him; but he showed no fear, and resigned himself to his fate as only brave men can. That night he wrote the following letter to his mother:

"PULASKI, GILES COUNTY, TENN., November 26, 1863.

"Dear Mother: O, how painful it is to write you! I have got to die to-morrow morning—to be hanged by the Federals. Mother, do not grieve for me. I must bid you good-by for evermore. Mother, I do not fear to die. Give my love to all.

"Your son,
SAMUEL DAVIS.'

"Mother, tell the children all to be good. I wish I could see you all once more, but I never will any more. Mother and father, do not forget me. Think of me when I am dead, but do not grieve for me. It will not do any good. Father, you can send after my remains if you want to do so. They will be at Pulaski, Tenn. I will leave some things, too, with the hotel keeper for you. Pulaski is in Giles County, Tenn., south of Columbia.
S. D.'

"After his sentence," continues Mr. Brown, "he was put into a cell in the jail, and we did not see anything of him until on Thursday morning, the day before the execution. We were ordered to get ready to be removed to the courthouse, in the public square, from the jail. Davis was handcuffed and brought in just as we were eating breakfast. I gave him a piece of meat that I had been cooking, and he, being handcuffed, was compelled to eat it with both hands. He thanked me, and we all bade him good-by. The guard was doubled around the jail.

"The next morning, Friday, November 27, at ten o'clock, we heard the drums, and a regiment of infantry marched down to the jail, and a wagon with a coffin in it was driven up, and the provost marshal went into the jail and brought Davis out. He got into the wagon, stood up, and looked around at the courthouse, and, seeing us at the windows, bowed to us his last farewell. He was dressed in a dark-brown overcoat, with a cape to it, which had been a blue Federal coat, such as many of us had captured and then dyed brown. * * *

Upon reaching the gallows Davis got out of the wagon and took his seat on a bench under a tree. He asked Captain Armstrong how long he had to live. He replied: "Fifteen minutes." He then asked him the news, and Armstrong told him of the battle of Missionary Ridge, and that our army had been defeated. He expressed much regret, adding: "The boys will have to fight the battles without me." Armstrong said: "I regret very much having to do this. I feel that I would almost rather die myself than do what I have to do." Davis replied: "I do not think hard of you; you are doing your duty."

General Dodge still had hopes that Davis would recant when he saw that death was staring him in the face, and that he would reveal the name of the "traitor in his camp." He sent Captain Chickasaw, of his staff, to Davis. He rapidly approached the scaffold, jumped from his horse, and went directly to Davis, placed his hand on Davis's shoulder, and asked if it would not be better for him to speak the name of the one from whom he received the documents found upon him, adding: "It is not too late yet." And then, in his last extremity, Davis turned upon him and said: "If I had a thousand lives, I would lose them all here and now before I would betray my friends or the confidence of my informer."

Davis then requested Chickasaw to thank General Dodge for his efforts to save him, but to repeat that he could not accept the terms. Turning to the chaplain, he gave him a few keepsakes to send his mother. He then turned to the provost marshal, saying, "I am ready," ascended the scaffold, and stepped upon the trap.

The theory that the papers were secured by a negro and that Davis sacrificed his life because of the promised confidence to the black man, while very pretty, is not consistent with the letter from Captain Shaw ("Coleman"), in which he itemized the things sent, and Davis evidently would not have failed to report any important information to "Coleman" that he might have secured before starting, who would have mentioned it, and he evidently was making the best possible speed to get away after leaving his chief. Another theory that certain papers were secured from a Federal officer through his wife, who was intensely concerned for the Confederacy, is not now believed. Divest the event of all fancy ideas, and credit the solemn fact of Davis's self-possession and his immovable courage when the awful test came, and that is glory enough.

Many pathetic incidents have occurred in connection with it. Only a few weeks ago one of his executioners came to Nashville; and having expressed a desire to visit the grave, I went with him to the place. He was received kindly and treated courteously by the families of a brother and sister. After dinner we went to the grave, accompanied by Oscar Davis and family. The guest placed some flowers upon the monument, saying, "He was the best friend I ever had," and stepped away in tears. Recovering himself, he said: "You must excuse me." During the day he visited other members of the family, and all treated him with real hospitality. The circumstances called for their courtesy and kindness. Theirs was the philosophic acceptance that a soldier must obey orders.

Courteously Federal survivors are reminded, however kindly they may have felt, that, with the law to "execute between the hours of 10 A.M. and 2 P.M.," they need not have been so hasty as to have him on the way to the gallows at ten o'clock. Such haste was not necessary, and is not to their credit.

All efforts to secure a picture of Davis have failed; but a gifted sculptor, coming to Nashville for work upon the Tennessee Centennial Exposition, made a composite bust portrait of Davis, using photographs of his brothers, and taking poses from a sister, some of whose features were said to be much like his. With these guides and counsel from some gentlemen who well knew the dress and general outline of a Confederate soldier, the bust portrait was made which, whether a good likeness or not, so well represented the character that it gave great comfort to admirers of the hero.

R. B. Anderson, of Denton, Tex., who was a member of Shaw's Scouts, writes that Davis was captured under the bluff at Bainbridge (Ala.) Ferry, on the Tennessee River. When he realized that he must surrender, he threw his package of papers as far as he could into the river; but a Federal followed them down until they floated near enough for him to get them. This was told by the ferryman. Davis was taken to Pulaski by Lawrenceburg, at which place the captors divided, and one of the detachments captured Captain Shaw on the way, who claimed to be an "ex-surgeon of the Rebel army." After Shaw's capture, Alex Gregg was placed in command of the scouts.

Mr. Anderson states that on April 9, the date of Lee's surrender, he was passing General Wheeler's headquarters, when he was hailed by "an emaciated old man," whom he soon recognized as Captain Shaw. This was soon after Shaw's exchange, and Mr. Anderson adds: "I could not help shedding tears when he told me how Sam Davis died to save his life, and how he pleaded with him to save his own by telling. Davis replied to Shaw, moreover, that if he should tell 'Dodge would murder them both.'"

After the war Captain Shaw returned to Tennessee and re-engaged in steamboating, taking John Davis with him, the father of the Davises, John and Sam supplying largely the money to buy the boat. In an explosion soon afterwards on the Mississippi River the loss was total, while Shaw and Davis were of those killed outright.

TRIBUTES TO THE HERO.

It is now several years since the heroism of Sam Davis became a theme in the VETERAN. Much has since been learned. Mr. John C. Kennedy, a friend of the family, went to Pulaski, accompanied by Oscar Davis, a younger brother of Sam, secured the body, and brought it home. He told of the deference paid him on his mission by the provost marshal at Pulaski, of the voluntary offer of Federal soldiers to exhume the body, and how reverently they stood by the grave, their assistance not being necessary. He told of the special order given at Columbia by the commander of the post to have a ferryboat transfer his team, and how the Federal soldiers there volunteered to ease the wagon down an embankment, and, putting their shoulders to the wheels, pushed it up the steep grade across the river, and how they walked away in silence with uncovered heads as he turned to thank them.

A Federal officer gave a succinct account in the Omaha Bee of April 13, 1895, of Davis's heroism, and recites that when the offer was sent to him at the gallows "the boy looked about him—he was only twenty-one years old, and life was bright and promising. Just overhead, idly swinging back and forth, hung the noose; all around him were soldiers, standing in line, with muskets gleaming in the bright sunshine; at his feet was a box prepared for his body, now pulsing with young and vigorous life; in front were the steps that would lead him to a sudden and disgraceful death, and that death it was in his power to avoid so easily. For just an instant he hesitated, and then the tempting offer was pushed aside forever. The steps were mounted, the young hero stood on the platform with hands tied behind him, the black hood was pulled over his head, the noose was adjusted, and the drop fell, * * * and thus ended a tragedy wherein a smooth-faced boy, without counsel, standing friendless in the midst of enemies, had, with a courage of the highest type, deliberately chosen death to life secured by means he thought dishonorable." And that Federal officer added: "Of just such material was the Southern army formed."

Gen. G. M. Dodge paid tribute to Sam Davis through a letter of several columns in the VETERAN, and inclosed his check for $10 for the monument. He gave a history of the conditions in the department under his command and then of Davis's extraordinary courage, concluding with the following: "I appreciate fully that the people of the South and Davis's comrades understand his soldierly qualities and propose to honor his memory. I take pleasure in aiding to raise the monument to his memory, although the services he performed were for the purpose of injuring my command, but given in faithfully performing the duties to which he was assigned."

THE SAM DAVIS OVERCOAT.

Rev. James Young, to whom General Dodge referred in his letter as chaplain in the Federal army, and Sam Davis were much attached to each other. In a letter to the VETERAN May 22, 1897, he wrote a description of the overcoat, in which he said: "Before we left the jail he gave his overcoat to me, requesting me to keep it in remembrance of him." In a subsequent letter the venerable clergyman stated that, while still appreciating the gift, he regarded "the remembrance fairly fulfilled," and added: "I am in my seventy-third year, and cannot reasonably expect to care for it a great while longer, so you need not return it. I have cut one of the small buttons off the cape, which I will keep. The night before the execution Mr. Davis joined with us in singing the well-known hymn, 'On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,' in animated voice." Chaplain Young died a few weeks after sending the coat. He had used it to cover his children in winter.

The overcoat was received just as the Nashville Daughters of the Confederacy opened their first meeting in Ward Seminary (U. C. V. Reunion headquarters); and when they had recited the Lord's Prayer in unison, the recipient of the coat called attention to what he wished to show them, stating that he did it at once as a fitting event to follow "that prayer." Miss Mackie Hardison, Assistant Secretary of the Chapter, wrote in the minutes: "When it was shown, every heart was melted to tears, and there we sat in that sacred silence. Not a sound was heard save the sobs that came from aching hearts. It was a time too sacred for words, for we seemed almost face to face with that grand and heroic man, the noblest son of the South and our own Tennessee. Never have we seen hearts melted so instantaneously as were these the instant this treasure was revealed. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, with one accord we wept together; and then Mr. C— quietly stole away, taking this sacred relic with him. It was some time before we could resume business and hear the minutes of the previous meeting."

This coat, now at the VETERAN office—in a cedar case furnished by generous W. B. Earthman—was procured by Oscar Davis only a few days before the capture from a deserter of the Union army, and it had been dyed by the mother.

This sketch must be concluded with the merest mention of a memorial service held at the Davis home, attended by some fifteen hundred persons. One-third of the assembly went from Nashville on a special train. The service consisted of sermons, songs, and addresses—all appropriate.

Announcement, after much reflection, to undertake the erection of a monument to Sam Davis resulted in quick and cordial approval from all sections, North as well as South, and there has been already subscribed over $4,000.

GENERAL DODGE'S LETTER IN FULL.

NEW YORK, June 15, 1897.

Editor Confederate Veteran: In fulfillment of my promise to give you my recollections of Samuel Davis, who was hanged as a spy in November, 1863, at Pulaski, Tenn., I desire to say that in writing of matters which occurred thirty-four years ago one is apt to make mistakes as to minor details; but the principal facts were such that they impressed themselves upon my mind so that I can speak of them with some certainty.

When General Grant ordered General Sherman (whose head of column was near Eastport, on the Tennessee River) to drop everything and bring his army to Chattanooga, my corps, the 16th, was then located at Corinth, Miss., and I brought up the rear. General Grant's anxiety to attack General Bragg's command before General Longstreet could return from East Tennessee brought on the battle before I could reach Chattanooga. General Grant therefore instructed General Sherman to halt my command in Middle Tennessee and to instruct me to rebuild the railway from Nashville to Decatur. The fulfilling of this order is fully set forth by General Grant in his memoirs.

When I reached the line of the Nashville and Decatur Railroad, I distributed my troops from Columbia south toward Athens, Ala. I had about ten thousand men and eight thousand animals, and was without provisions, with no railroad or water communication to any basis of supply, and was obliged to draw subsistence for my command from the adjacent country until I could rebuild the railroad and receive my supplies from Nashville.

My command was a part of the Army of the Tennessee, occupying temporarily a portion of the territory of the Department of the Cumberland, but not reporting or subject to the commander of that department.

Upon an examination of the country I found that there was an abundance of everything needed to supply my command, except where Sherman's forces had swept across it along Elk River. He wrote me: "I do not think that my forces have left a chicken for you." I also found that I was in a country where the sentiment of the people was almost unanimously against us. I had very little faith in converting them by the taking of the oath of allegiance. I therefore issued an order, stating the products of the country I required to supply my command, and to all who had those products, regardless of their sentiments, who would bring them to the stations where my troops were located I would pay a fair price for them; but if I had to send and bring the supplies myself that I should take them without making payment, giving them only receipts; and also issued instructions that every train going for supplies should be accompanied by an officer, and receipt given for what he took. This had a good effect, the citizens generally bringing their supplies to my command and receiving the proper vouchers; but it also gave an opportunity for straggling bands to rob and charge up their depredations to my command. This caused many complaints to be filed with the Military Governor of Tennessee and the department commander of the Army of the Cumberland.

Upon investigation, I found that most of these depredations were committed by irresponsible parties on both sides, and I also discovered that there was a well-organized and disciplined corps of scouts and spies within my lines, one force operating to the east of the line, under Captain "Coleman," and another force operating to the west, having its headquarters in the vicinity of Florence, Ala. I issued orders to my own spies to locate these parties, sending out scouting parties to wipe them out or drive them across the Tennessee River. My cavalry had considerable experience in this work in and around Corinth, and they were very successful. They brought in many prisoners, most of whom could only be treated as prisoners of war. The 7th Kansas Cavalry was very efficient in this service, and they captured Samuel Davis, Joshua Brown, — Smith, and General Bragg's chief of scouts and secret service, Capt. H. B. Shaw—all about the same time. We did not know of the importance of the capture of Shaw.

Nothing of importance was found on any of the prisoners except upon Davis, who evidently had been selected to carry through to General Bragg the information they had obtained. Upon Davis were found letters from Captain Shaw (known as "Coleman"), the commander of the scouts to the east of us, and many others. I was very anxious to capture "Coleman" and break up his command, as my own scouts and spies within the Confederate lines were continually reporting to us the news sent by Shaw and his movement within my lines.

Davis was brought immediately to me, as his captors knew his importance. They believed he was an officer, and also knew he was a member of "Coleman's," or Shaw's, command. When brought to my office, I met him pleasantly. I knew what had been found upon him, and I desired to locate "Coleman" and ascertain, if possible, who was furnishing the information, which I saw was accurate and valuable, to General Bragg. Davis met me modestly. He was a fine, soldierly-looking young man, dressed in a faded Federal soldier's coat, one of our army soft hats, and top boots. He had a frank, open face, which was inclined to brightness. I tried to impress upon him the danger he was in and that I knew he was only a messenger, and held out to him the hope of lenient treatment if he would answer truthfully, as far as he could, my questions. He listened attentively and respectfully to me, but, as I recollect, made no definite answer, and I had him returned to the prison.

My recollection is that Captain Armstrong, my provost marshal, placed in the prison with him and the other prisoners one of our own spies, who claimed to them to be one of another Confederate scouting party operating within my lines. However, they all kept their own counsel, and we obtained no information of value from them. The reason of this reticence was the fact that they all knew Captain Shaw was one of our captives, and that if his importance were made known to us he would certainly be hung; and they did not think that Davis would be executed. One of the prisoners, named Moore, escaped.

Upon Davis was found a large mail of value. Much of it was letters from the friends and relatives of soldiers in the Confederate army. There were many small presents, one or two, I remember, to General Bragg, and much accurate information of my forces, of our defenses, our intentions, substance of my orders, criticisms as to my treatment of the citizens, and a general approval of my payment for supplies, while a few denounced severely some of the parties who had hauled in supplies under the orders. Captain Shaw mentioned this in one of his letters. There were also intimations of the endeavor that would be made to interrupt my work and plans for the capture of single soldiers and small parties of the command out after forage.

I had Davis brought before me again after my provost marshal had reported his inability to obtain anything of value from him. I then informed him that he would be tried as a spy, that the evidence against him would surely convict him, and made a direct appeal to him to give me the information that I knew he had. He very quietly but firmly refused to do it. I therefore let him be tried and suffer the consequence. Considerable interest was taken in young Davis by the provost marshal and Chaplain Young, and considerable pressure was brought to bear upon them by some of the citizens of Pulaski, and I am under the impression that some of them saw Davis and endeavored to induce him to save himself, but they failed. Mrs. John A. Jackson, I remember, made a personal appeal in his behalf to me.

Davis was convicted upon trial and sentenced. Then one of my noted scouts, known as "Chickasaw," believed that he could prevail upon Davis to give the information we asked. He took him in hand, and never gave it up until the last moment, going to the scaffold with a promise of pardon a few moments before his execution.

Davis died to save his own chief, Captain Shaw, who was in prison with him and was captured the same day.

The parties who were prisoners with Davis have informed me that it was Shaw who had selected Davis as the messenger to General Bragg and had given to him part of his mail and papers. I did not know this certainly until a long time after the war. I first learned of it by rumor and from what some of my own scouts have told me since the war, and it has since been confirmed confidentially to me by one of the prisoners who was captured about the time Davis was, and who was imprisoned with him up to the time he was convicted and sentenced, and knew Shaw also, as well as all the facts in the case. Captain Shaw was an important officer in General Bragg's secret service corps. He had furnished the important documents to Davis, but his captors did not know him and his importance. I sent Captain Shaw North with the other prisoners as prisoners of war. I learned that he was greatly alarmed when he was informed that I was trying to induce Davis to give me the information he had. This is where Davis showed himself a true soldier; he had been intrusted with an important commission by an important officer, who was imprisoned with him, and died rather than betray him. He knew to a certainty that if he informed me of the facts Shaw would be executed, as he was a far more important person to us than was Davis.

During the war I had many spies captured, some executed who were captured within the Confederate lines, and who were equally brave in meeting their fate. By an extraordinary effort I saved the life of one who was captured by Forrest. Through my efforts this man escaped, though General Forrest sized him up correctly. He was one of the most important men we ever had within the Confederate lines. Forrest was determined to hang him; but Major General Bishop Polk believed him innocent, and desired to save him.

Great interest was taken in Davis at the time, because it was known by all of the command that I desired to save him. Your publication bears many evidences of this fact. It is not, therefore, necessary for me to state that I regretted to see the sentence executed; but it was one of the fates of war, which is cruelty itself, and there is no refining it.

I find this letter bearing upon the case. It may be of interest. It was my first report to Maj. B. M. Sawyer, assistant adjutant general, Army of the Tennessee, notifying him of the capture of Davis:

"PULASKI, TENN., November 20, 1863.

"I herewith inclose a copy of dispatches taken from one of Bragg's spies. He had a heavy mail, papers, etc., and shows 'Captain Coleman' is pretty well posted. We have broken up several bands of mounted robbers and Confederate cavalry in the last week, capturing some five commissioned officers and one hundred enlisted men, who have been forwarded. I also forward a few of the most important letters found in the mail. The toothbrushes and blank books I was greatly in need of, and therefore appropriated them. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. M. DODGE, Brigadier General."

The severe penalty of death where a spy is captured is not because there is anything dishonorable in the fact of the person being a spy, as only men of peculiar gifts for such service, men of courage and cool judgment and undoubted patriotism, are selected. The fact that the information they obtain is found within their enemy's lines and probably of great danger to the army is what causes the penalty to be so very severe. A soldier caught in the uniform or a part of the uniform of his enemy, within his enemy's lines, establishes the fact that he is a spy and is there in violation of the articles of war and for no good purpose. This alone will prohibit his being treated as a prisoner of war. When caught, as Davis was, in our uniform, with valuable documents upon him, such conditions seal his fate.

I appreciate fully that the people of the South and Davis's comrades understand his soldierly qualities and propose to honor his memory. I take pleasure in contributing to a monument to his memory, although the services he performed were for the purpose of injuring my command, yet given in faithfully performing the duties to which he was assigned.

Gen. G. P. Thruston, of Nashville, who occupied conspicuous positions as adjutant general in the Federal army during the war, and secured both the gratitude and esteem of noncombatants for his manly course, writes the following: "I inclose $25 for the Sam Davis Monument Fund. The example of this noble young Southern soldier should be kept in lasting remembrance. I wish also to commend and thank you for the spirit of justice and fairness with which you have always seemed personally disposed to treat the soldiers of the Union side in the Civil War in your valuable publication, the CONFEDERATE VETERAN."

Rev. James I. Vance, in sending a check to the Sam Davis Monument Fund, writes: "As a Southerner and a Tennessean I cannot allow such a memorial to Southern valor and sublime heroism to rise without some share in so noble an enterprise. You are speaking a stirring message of unflinching devotion to duty in preserving to coming generations the fame and glory of Sam Davis."

Twenty-five dollars has been received from a gentleman now living in Chicago who, when a boy of fourteen, served as a militiaman in Mississippi in 1864. He prides himself that he is a "regularly ordained veteran," and is a member of the Isham Harris Camp, at Columbus, Miss.

BILL ARI'S TRIBUTE TO SAM DAVIS.

When we were schoolboys one of the questions that was discussed in our debating society was: "Is There Such a Thing as Disinterested Benevolence?" The affirmative side generally gained the victory, and ought to, though it must be admitted that selfishness is at the bottom of many acts of charity and pretended friendship. Indeed, disinterested benevolence is so rare that when a well-authenticated case occurs it is talked about and gets in the newspapers. In the olden times it became a matter of history, and has come down to us like the parable of the Good Samaritan and the story of Damon and Pythias. Indeed, if our lamented soldier boy, Sam Davis, who died rather than betray a friend, had lived in Roman times, he too would have come down to us as a sainted hero. There are Knights of Damon and Knights of Pythias, and there ought to be Knights of Sam Davis.

Parental love, fraternal love, conjugal love are not to be counted in these historic incidents. Such love is to be expected from those relations. That goodness of heart which prompts a man to befriend those who are no kin to him and from whom he expects no reward is disinterested benevolence. Samuel Davis was the highest type of loyalty to friendship that history makes any record of. Pythias was condemned by Dionysius to suffer death for a crime of which he was guilty. He begged for a short respite to go home and arrange his family affairs, and Damon took his place in prison and agreed to die for him if he failed to return. But he did return, and Dionysius was so impressed with admiration for their love for each other that he pardoned Pythias and became the friend of both. But Samuel Davis had no friend to take his place. * * *

Mr. Lincoln would have pardoned Sam Davis if he had known of it. I wish that every boy in the Southland knew of the sad yet glorious death of this hero at Pulaski. Tennessee has a State history. If not already, it should be recorded in the next edition. My good friend, Sumner Cunningham, has done all he could to make it historical in the VETERAN and to have a noble monument erected to his memory. It is a comfort to know that many Federal soldiers and many big-hearted people from the North have contributed largely to it.

COMRADE NOEL'S TRIBUTE TO SAM DAVIS.—I have often thought to write and convey to you my appreciation of your noble and grand effort not so much in history making as in its preservation and truthful narration. In being the chief factor in the building of the monument to young Davis, you have done more to bring before the great American people a character that is likened unto none ever referred to by any history since the days of Zerubbabel, who would have given up his life as young Davis did rather than to have betrayed the trust reposed in him. No character in the War between the States is by half so grand and noble as that which led young Davis to the losing of his life.

THE BOY HERO OF THE WAR.

And lo! thy matchless boy, O Tennessee!
 With pinioned arms beneath the gallows tree,
 Looked forth, unmoved, into the wintry skies,
 The nut-brown ringlets falling o'er his eyes;
 He, by kind gaolers, had been oft implored:
 "Speak but one word! To freedom be restored!"
 The lifted signal, "Hold," the messenger cried;
 And, springing up, stood by the hero's side.
 "My boy! This bitter cup must pass you by!
 Too brave, too noble, and too young to die!
 Your mother, father, sisters—when they learn—
 Even now, perhaps, they wait your long return.
 Speak but one word—the real culprit's name!
 'Tis he should bear this penalty and shame.
 Live for your mother! Think a moment how"— "Not with the brand of fraud upon my brow!
 I and the 'culprit,' true, might both go free;
 The broken pledge would haunt not him, but me.
 How light soever what promise man may make,
 Should be kept sacred for his honor's sake!
 My mother!"
 (And choking back the sob, but half concealed,
 His head drooped low! At last must nature yield?)
 "My mother!" flashed again the tear-dimmed eyes.
 "At her dear knees she taught me how to die!
 Her loving heart would be too sorely pained
 If to her lips were pressed her boy's with falsehood stained."
 "My brave, brave boy," the pleader spoke again;
 "A boy in years, but worth a thousand men
 Like him for whom, the coward, traitor, knave,
 You'd lay your own brave, young life down to save.
 Speak out! Life is so sweet! Be free once more!"
 "I never knew how sweet life was before!
 Still—words are useless, General, but forgive—
 You're kind; yet if I had a thousand lives to live,
 I'd give them all ere I could face the shame
 And wear, for one hour, a base, dishonored name."
 The die was cast! Our tears were idle tears
 For him, who gave one day and gained a thousand years!
 Centuries on centuries shall go circling by,
 But still he is not dead! SAM DAVIS cannot die!

The Nashville Christian Advocate of back date: "Whoever rescues from oblivion the name of a noble man performs a service to humanity. We therefore commend with all our heart the effort now making by Mr. S. A. Cunningham, of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, to raise sufficient funds for building a monument to that gallant Tennessee boy, Samuel Davis, who was hanged by the Federal authorities at Pulaski during the great war. Detailed by General Bragg to act as a scout in Middle Tennessee, Davis was captured after he had accomplished his purposes, and, on being searched, was found in possession of important drawings and other military papers. A court-martial was summoned, and he was tried on the charge of being a spy, and sentenced to death. So deeply impressed, however, was General Dodge with the manliness and straightforwardness of the beardless soldier that he offered to cancel the sentence and send him to the Confederate lines under a safe escort on one condition: that the names of the persons who had furnished the contraband information should be given up. This was a terrible temptation to put before one so young and so full of life and hope. Davis, however, not only declined to accept his release on any such terms, but also expressed a sense of indignation that he should be asked to betray the secrets that had been confided to his keeping. Even on the scaffold General Dodge renewed the proposition, and urged its acceptance, but was met with the same unyielding spirit. In recent months the General has written most warmly of the high and steadfast courage that Davis displayed, and many other Federal soldiers who were conversant with the facts and witnesses of the execution have also borne witness to the sublimity of the action by which the promise of life was thrust away without the quiver of a muscle, because it involved the sacrifice of personal honor. Mr. Cunningham has already received about two thousand dollars, the most of it in small sums from old Confederates, but some from Federal soldiers. In due time we may look to see a proper monument of the stainless young hero set up in the capital city of Tennessee, to teach our young men forever that it is better even to die rather than prove false to a trust."

The editor of the VETERAN had a conference with Lieutenant General Schofield, commander of the United States army, on this subject, and he said that it was "not because there is anything dishonorable in the acts of a spy; that only men of courage, fine judgment, and undoubted patriotism are ever selected as spies. It is the great danger to an army that causes the penalties to be so severe. The garb of a spy will not save him from the severe penalties, although it is in his favor to be in the uniform of his army."

This company was made up at New Concord, Ky., and was mustered into service at Union City, Tenn., about August 1, 1861. It was disbanded at Greenville, N. C., at the close of the war.

This sketch is given as extraordinary in many respects. Not many have kept as complete a record as Comrade Eaves. It is important that these several company rolls be preserved and copies should be made.

JULIUS FREED.

Although born in a foreign land, Julius Freed espoused the cause of the South at the outbreak of hostilities, in 1861, joining the Washington Rifles, Company I, 15th Tennessee Regiment, at Memphis, Tenn. He fought gallantly to the end, coming home, like many others, with wasted fortune; but he took up his life again with great determination to win a name and place among his fellow-men, which was accomplished by his energy, push, and fair dealing. The most of his life was spent in Trenton, Tenn., where he succeeded in business as well as helping materially toward the welfare of the town, and was a good neighbor and friend. He died July 17, 1908, leaving a wife and eleven children—eight sons and three daughters.

WILLIAM H. LEWIS.

The Adjutant of Joe Kendall Camp, Warrenton, Va., reports the death of William H. Lewis, an esteemed citizen of Fauquier County, Va., and a prominent member and officer of the Camp. At the beginning of the war he entered the service of the Confederacy as a member of the Black Horse Troop, Company H, 4th Virginia Cavalry, and served with conspicuous gallantry until that eventful day at Appomattox.

When the Black Horse Camp was organized, soon after the war, he was elected Commander, serving as such for several years. At the time of his death he was Lieutenant Commander of the Joe Kendall Camp, one of the largest Camps in Virginia. In the organization and advancement of these Camps he manifested great interest.

As a citizen he was beloved by all who knew him. He represented the two counties of Fauquier and Loudoun with ability for several terms in the Virginia Legislature.

JUDGE JOHN O'STEEN.

Judge John O'Steen was born in Panola County, Miss., April 17, 1845; and died at Paragould, Ark., August 14, 1908. His parents were of Scotch descent, originally from Alabama. With his father Judge O'Steen went to Arkansas about 1859, and in 1862, when but seventeen years old, he enlisted as a volunteer for the Confederacy, joining Captain Adair's company at Jonesboro, and he served until the close of the war in Company B, Lyle's Regiment, Trans-Mississippi Department, and surrendered at Vicksburg in 1865.

He settled in Greene County after the war, following his trade as a gunsmith in St. Francis township, which he served as justice of the peace from 1878 to 1882. He was elected county and probate judge in 1882, and reelected in 1884 without opposition and for a third term in 1886. It was during his administration that the county site was moved from Gainesville to Paragould and the present courthouse and jail were built. Judge O'Steen was elected county and probate judge again in 1902 and 1904, and served as Mayor of Paragould from 1896 to 1898. He was prominent also in Church work and Masonry, having held almost every office in the lodge. His death occurred after a brief illness. He was married in 1870. His wife survives him.

MAJ. WILLIAM M. STRICKLAND.

Maj. W. M. Strickland, patriot and soldier, after years of suffering borne with that fortitude which characterized him in all the trials of a life whereon the shadows often rested, heard "the one clear call" on March 4, 1908, and went to "the Master of all good workmen" with a record of brave and fruitful service, valuable alike in war and in peace.

William Matthew Strickland was born near Raleigh, N. C., January 1, 1823. His father, Matthew Strickland, moved to Panola County, Miss., in 1837. Later Major Strickland went to Holly Springs, where he continued to reside for half a century, a citizen beloved and honored. He studied law with the late Judge James F. Trotter in 1847, and the following year entered the law office of Watson & Clapp, afterwards becoming the junior member of the firm of Clapp & Strickland. The early recognition of the talent of the young attorney by such men as Judge J. W. C. Watson, one of the leading chancery lawyers of the South, and Hon. J. W. Clapp, eminent jurist and Congressman, gave him foremost rank at the bar, a position which his ability and learning maintained thereafter.

When the dread war cloud burst over the Southland, Major Strickland responded at once to his country's call. Entering as a young sergeant in the Jeff Davis Rifles, a company in the first volunteer regiment of Mississippi, under Col. Christopher Haynes Mott, he rose rapidly in military service, and at the close of the war bore the rank of major—promotions that speak at once for his valor and efficiency. He was a close friend of President Davis, whose guest and host he frequently was. When Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston was killed at Shiloh, the remains were placed in Captain Strickland's office at Corinth until sent to New Orleans for interment. They were later removed to Austin, Tex. Returning to Holly Springs, he resumed the practice of law, and won laurels for his thorough legal knowledge, honesty, and high purpose.

During the days of reconstruction, when tried and true men were needed as they were never before needed in the history of the South, Major Strickland was wise in counsel and quick in action, meeting with brave heart and patriotic devotion every trust imposed upon him. He was an enthusiastic party man, a Jeffersonian Democrat, prominent in all political measures and meetings in town and State. A recognition of the great brotherhood of man kindled his unselfish, enthusiastic interest in fraternal orders, conspicuous among them being the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, which in turn did him the highest honor within the State and beyond its borders. The Grand Master of Tennessee wrote: "He was as devoted and true a friend as ever clasped a hand. * * * I shall wear his memory near my heart as an inspiration to higher thought and better deeds."

In 1902 a decline in health removed Major Strickland from fields of activity and made him a quiet onlooker for six years before his earthly pilgrimage ended. Major Strickland was twice married. His first wife was Miss Martha Mildred Thompson, daughter of Dr. James M. Thompson. His second wife, who survives him, was Miss Janie Leake, daughter of Col. Francis Terry Leake, whose affluence, liberality, and devotion to the cause made him a potential force in the Confederacy. Major Strickland also leaves five children.

Such in brief is the record of a life which gave ready response to human needs and human service—an honorable heritage to wife and children.

In the more intimate circle of the home, where it was my privilege to know him, Major Strickland met as fully as any man I ever knew those sacred relations of husband and father. His watchful care was manifest everywhere, while his forceful personality was underlined with rare tenderness and sentiment. Such devotion called forth the respect and love it so well merited. Throughout his long and trying illness wife and daughter, possessing all those attributes that are admirable and charming in woman, were as ministering angels, while the sons bore faithfully the responsibilities that had fallen upon them. This devotion knew no weariness in good and in evil days—aye, "a growing and abiding love." Loyalty was a marked characteristic of Major Strickland—loyalty to his God, his family, friends, and country, and to all mankind a ready, responsive sympathy. His was essentially a religious nature, abounding in faith, hope, and charity. Though always a true and unquestioned follower of the Master, he did not enlist until the day was far spent, when he was baptized and confirmed in the Episcopal faith.

He solved the problem of life rightly, adjusting the prose to the poetry, the sordid to the spiritual, the common and selfish to the high and beneficent. Thus he realized the higher joy of living with a vivid sense of beauty and appreciation as one who stood ever for nobler and better things. A clergyman friend often entertained in his hospitable home writes this simple, forceful eulogy: "It is like the passing of Enoch or Elijah: he walked with God, and was not; for God took him." His wonderful mind seemed so clear; his sweetness and beautiful serenity under his affliction were in a nature so full of vigor and action—simply a marvel. I know not when anything has ever taken hold upon me as the rugged, heroic, polished strength, combined with gentleness, patience, and fortitude undaunted, displayed each day and each hour by this man whom I shall always account it an honor, a privilege, and an inspiration to have known." B. J. G.

DR. JOHN T. IRION.

On August 9, 1908, at the ripe age of seventy-one years, after a prolonged illness borne with fortitude and patience, Dr. John T. Irion, physician, minister of the gospel, journalist, Mason of high rank, and brave Confederate soldier, "passed over the river" mourned by a host of friends. His funeral at the Methodist church, of which he was a member for over fifty years, was one of the largest ever held in Paris. For years he was a distinguished minister in the Methodist Church.

Dr. Irion was a man of unusual ability and attainments. He was a deep thinker, a man of literary tastes, and a ready and forceful writer. For fifteen years he was editor of the Paris Post-Intelligencer. He was an enthusiastic Mason, and was from 1880 to 1882 Past Grand Commander of the Masons of Tennessee, and later was Grand Lecturer three years.

No braver or better soldier ever wore Confederate gray; nor was any one more devoted to the loved cause. For years he was the beloved Adjutant of Fitzgerald Camp, 1284, U. C. V.

At the age of twenty-three he enlisted at Paris, Tenn.,

DR. J. T. IRION.

on May 21, 1861, in Company G, of the celebrated 5th Infantry Regiment of Tennessee Volunteers, which did valiant and hazardous service in all the Kentucky and Tennessee campaigns and in Georgia, winning a fine reputation for faithfulness and heroism. After Perryville it received honorable mention, and several times was commended by commanders for brave and brilliant service.

Dr. Irion was wounded at Perryville in the brilliant charge that General Cheatham made on Gilbert's army corps, destroying it as an organization. He was disabled for field service and was kept in prison at Louisville.

In May, 1862, Dr. Irion was elected captain of his company, and later was offered promotion as surgeon and again as major, but declined. In the Kentucky campaign he commanded his company, which part of the time formed the rear guard of Gen. A. P. Stewart's command.

He was appointed inspector of hospitals of his corps by General Polk, which position he held until failing health compelled him to resign November 15, 1863. A peculiarity of his service was that all the time he was on detail as surgeon he still held his position as captain of his company. He did not take the oath of allegiance to the United States until March 22, 1866.

Dr. Irion was married three times, and is survived by a wife and six children. He was a stalwart character, a safe counselor, a true friend. He was a friend "tried and true" to the writer of this little sketch, to whom it is a sad pleasure to pay this slight tribute.

[The writer of the foregoing is Mrs. Alexander B. White, former President Tennessee Division, U. D. C., of whom Dr. Irion requested proper notice in the VETERAN.]

CHARLES W. TEMPLE.

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican reports the death at the Farren Hospital in that city of Charles W. Temple, at the age of seventy. The Republican states that he went to a hospital in New York some time ago and submitted to operations for the removal of cancers in the throat and on the tongue, but obtained no permanent relief.

Mr. Temple was a native of Colrain. Being in Mississippi at the outbreak of the Civil War, he enlisted in the Louisiana "Tigers," and later served on the general staff of the Confederate generals, A. P. and D. H. Hill. In the battle of Gettysburg he served on the staff of Gen. Carnot Posey in Anderson's Division.

In 1875 he enlisted in the 8th United States Cavalry under Colonel Gregg, serving five years. For sixteen years he fought Indians under various generals, including Reno and Miles. In 1889 Mr. Temple went to the Philippines with the 22d Regulars, and reenlisted after the expiration of his first enlistment. He was mustered out at Fort Leavenworth October 18, 1904. When he retired, he was first sergeant. He came from fighting stock. He was never married. He leaves a brother, Dr. A. H. Temple, of Colrain, and a sister, Mrs. Helen Temple Brigham, of Elm Grove and New York, well known as an inspirational speaker.

JACOB VALENTINE GRINSTEAD.

J. V. Grinstead died recently at his home, in Lexington, Va., aged sixty-one years. He was a member of the Lee-Jackson Camp, U. C. V., and a prominent attorney of that city. He was a native of Abingdon, Va., the son of Benjamin Franklin and Catherine Ann Grinstead. When a mere boy he joined Smith's Battalion, Morgan's Brigade, serving as orderly sergeant until captured in October, 1863. He was sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, and was kept a prisoner until June, 1865.

Comrade Grinstead was a faithful Church member, and his loss is deeply felt in the community. He is survived by his wife and three daughters.

CAPT. WILLIAM BRAME FONVILLE.

Capt. William B. Fonville died at Hot Springs, S. D., November 21, 1907, of heart failure. His health had been impaired for about two years, but his friends were shocked by his death. Captain Fonville was a native of Bedford County, Tenn., born near Shelbyville February 13, 1833. He was engaged successfully in the mercantile business at Petersburg, Lincoln County, in 1861, when the men of Tennessee were called to arms, and he promptly enlisted. He was chosen captain of Company E, 41st Tennessee Infantry, and was captured at the siege of Fort Donelson. He was imprisoned at Camp Chase and later at Johnson's Island. In September following he was exchanged at Vicksburg, and in the reorganization of the regiment he was selected captain of his company, and was with it in the campaign in North Mississippi, Vicksburg, Port Hudson, Raymond, and later in the siege of Jackson. He was with his command in the battle of Chickamauga. At Missionary Ridge sometime afterwards he was captured and again sent to prison.

Captain Fonville was a vigilant disciplinarian, and prided himself in having a larger per cent of his men for duty than did any other company of the regiment.

After the war Captain Fonville engaged in the life insurance business, and was one of the most noted agents in the country. He resided in Kankakee, Ill., for some years after the war, but returned later to his native State, being an ardent Southerner and loyal to his people. He made his home in Nashville from 1887 to a few years ago, when he moved to Chicago.

Captain Fonville is survived by two sons and three daughters; also by a sister, Mrs. Ann O. Stone, of Fayetteville, Tenn. His wife died in the summer of 1906, and is buried in the family lot at Mount Olivet, Nashville.

JAMES C. JONES.

By an oversight in making up the forms for the June VETERAN a fine engraving of Comrade James C. Jones was omitted. (See page 293.)

Comrade Jones was an invalid and occupied a wheel chair for twenty-eight years. His father, for whom he was named, was one of the most eminent Governors in the history of Tennessee, serving two terms, and later was United States Senator. This son served in Col. W. F. Taylor's regiment of cavalry as a private, was promoted for efficient service to lieutenant, and later was assigned to the staff of Gen. W. H. Jackson, of Forrest's command, as assistant adjutant general.

After the war he became a teacher, and later still was elected county register in Memphis. It is stated that he was the only register of Shelby County who ever succeeded himself in that office.

Invalid as was Captain Jones for many years, he was an eminent social favorite; and when staying at what he was pleased to call his "Mississippi home," where he had spent the summers since 1888, he was the charm of the young people in their social gatherings there, which were frequent. In 1877 he married Miss Alice Tate, who survives him.

FRANCIS MARION KELSO.

"A Confederate Soldier" was the inscription requested for his tomb by F. M. Kelso, familiarly known to friends and kindred as "General"—a simple line that is full of meaning. Kind-hearted, true, and brave, he lived his life as a gentleman, always thoughtful of others, never self-seeking.

Francis M. Kelso was the son of Jefferson and Malinda Kelso, born June 29, 1842, in Lincoln County, Tenn. A friend writes that "as a boy he was kind, generous, lovable, always respecting the rights and privileges of others." He became a Christian in early boyhood, and lived that life consistently. In November, 1861, he became a member of Company B, 44th Tennessee Regiment, and was with his regiment through all its campaigns from Shiloh to Appomattox, and was present in every battle and skirmish in which it was engaged. He never asked for leave or indulgence at any time, believing that the few which could be granted should be enjoyed by fathers and husbands, and in every battle he was to be found where it raged most furiously, yet came out of the war unscathed. His courage and patriotism won for him the love and respect of his men and the implicit confidence and admiration of his superior officers. He was several times mentioned in Gen. B. R. Johnson's reports for gallant and meritorious conduct on the battlefield and recommended for promotion. His gallantry at Petersburg, where with fifteen others he captured twelve hundred of the enemy, has no parallel in history, save that of Captain Bell, reported in this issue of the VETERAN.

Returning home at the close of the war, he contributed his share toward the restoration and upbuilding of the country. He represented his district twice in the State Legislature—an honor unsought. His love for old comrades had never grown less, and of late years his attention had been given toward securing pensions for those needing such assistance. In his last illness he sought to have a comrade of the war as his companion. He died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. R. L. Cunningham, in Knoxville, Tenn., on the 26th of November, 1907, and was buried at Rose Hill Cemetery, Fayetteville.

DR. HILDRETH H. SMITH.

At the advanced age of nearly fourscore and ten years Dr. H. H. Smith died at his home, in Atlanta, Ga., September 14, 1908. Though a native of New Hampshire, he came South when a very young man, and he soon espoused the spirit of his adopted section. He began the practice of law in Baltimore; but through affliction of his eyes he abandoned the profession, and with a party of friends he went on a sailing vessel to the capes of South America and up to San Francisco. In 1840 he taught school in North Carolina. He was married in North Carolina to Miss Mary Brent Hoke, a sister of Maj. Gen. Robert F. Hoke. In 1854 he accepted a chair in the University of North Carolina, at Chapel Hill, which he held until the days of reconstruction, when negroes were admitted to the schools despite the protests of white people; so he resigned and established a school at Lincolnton, where his educational work was continued without the humiliating embarrassment that was then unavoidable at Chapel Hill. Later he went to Texas, becoming President of the State Normal School at Huntsville. He had much to do with the Peabody Educational Fund in organizing municipal schools under terms of the trust. Later for a time he taught at Shelbyville, Tenn., after which he settled permanently in Atlanta.

Dr. Smith was a man of most extensive learning and possessed a marvelous memory. He was an ardent secessionist. Surviving him are his wife, two sons (Gov. Hoke Smith and Burton Smith, son-in-law of General Gordon), and two daughters (Mrs. F. S. Whiteside, of Atlanta, and Mrs. Everett McAshen, of Houston, Tex.).

Dr. Smith had been a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church for about fifty years.

VAN BUREN VINSON.

Van Buren Vinson died at the family home, Houston, Tex., on August 27, 1908. The deceased was born at Franklin, La., on September 25, 1840, of a fine old Southern family, and throughout his long life he maintained the ideals of Southern manhood and the high traditions of his ancestry. He served the South well, there having been no truer soldier in the Confederate army. He was of the first company, the Washington Artillery. As a citizen he ever cherished the memories of that heroic struggle of the Southern soldiery and people. He was a devoted member of Dick Dowling Camp, and the Camp attended the funeral in a body.

He leaves a wife and two sons (David and Carroll Vinson) and two brothers (B. F. and Soule Vinson). His death was due to a stroke of paralysis about three weeks previous.

The funeral was conducted from the residence by Rev. T. J. Windham, of Trinity Episcopal Church. The following citizens were chosen as pallbearers: B. B. Rice, J. R. Waties, James Adair, Phillip Fall, Leonard Abercrombie, June Cox.

RITCH.—Andrew J. Pickett writes from Shopton, Ala.: "A. S. Ritch, of Company E, 60th Alabama Regiment, died August 2, 1908, eighty years old, leaving a wife, two daughters, and one son. He was a brave soldier and a good citizen."

ROBERT BRANK McLEAN.

Robert Brank McLean was born at Greenfield Place, Flat Rock, Tenn. (near Nashville), September 5, 1883; and died near Waverly, Tenn., on the 17th of July, 1908, having nearly completed his twenty-fourth year. He was a son of Charles Andrew McLean, of Flat Rock, Tenn. To the sorrowing father, mother, sister, and brothers the many tributes to this worthy young man, passing so suddenly in his youth, are a solace in the midst of desolation. A few are here given:

"Your sorrow is overshadowing many homes, and hearts are bleeding with yours and longing to share your burden. How proud you must feel that God lent you such a treasure! And now can't you give it back to God? Try to realize that he means only good. I have heard nothing but the kindest things of dear Brank, and never saw him without feeling the deepest admiration and regard for him. Truly he hath left a good name."

"There was never a more noble, manly, Christian boy, devoted brother and son; and knowing his worth on earth, we should not be surprised or grieved because God was ready to welcome him to the happy home he won by his many good and noble deeds here."

Dr. W. F. Tillet, of Vanderbilt University, wrote to a member of the family: "It was worth much to you to have a brother whose character and reputation in a community were such as he had earned."

Another who knew him well said: "What a comfort the memory of your dear boy will ever be! Nothing in his short manly life you would blot out."

"You have my deepest sympathy in the loss of one of the best boys in the world."

"He has been crowned among those who deserved many stars."

"I prized his friendship more than I can tell you, and I am glad that I knew him."

"I have been in your home enough to know what a kind son, brother, and grandson he was."

"What a blessed example his life should and will be to his younger brothers!"

"And surely there is no one who knew and loved Brank but has been made a little more tender, gentler, more loving, and more forgiving by his going."

"What a comfort it must be to think what a splendid man he was and that he was ready to go!"

"In time to come what a pleasure and satisfaction it will be to look back and remember what a perfect boy in every respect your dear Brank was!"

"He had such strength of character, was so noble and manly in all things."

With his application for the post office at Flat Rock this recommendation was sent to Washington: "He is rigidly honest."

He was a member of Woodbine Methodist Church, having joined in 1897, when he was fourteen years old.

This fine young man was not a Confederate; but his family on both sides, while largely of the old Whig party, were zealous for the cause of the South, regardless of sacrifice. He was connected with the postal service, and the funeral, occurring on Sunday, was largely attended by his associates from the city.

His home, from which the funeral occurred, was at Flat Rock, and formerly the residence of Wesley Greenfield, quite in the city now.

Here Gen. B. F. Cheatham established his headquarters as corps commander when the Confederate army confronted Nashville during the first two weeks of December, 1864.

[Mr. Greenfield being a kinsman, the editor of the VETERAN enjoyed the comfort of his splendid home during that period—an unusual treat for him. Calling by there after the battle lines had been withdrawn late in the night, the venerable gentleman procured such food as he had and gave him some Confederate money, hoping it would do him "some good."]

JAMES RICHARD THOMSON.

James Richard Thomson, born near Russellville, Ky., in 1837, was an only child and early left an orphan. He was married when but twenty-two years old to Miss L. L. Edwards in January,

J. R. THOMSON.

1860, removing with his wife and her sister to Navarro County, Tex. In 1862 he joined and helped to raise Company D, 20th Texas Cavalry, F. M. Martin captain and T. C. Bass colonel. He was elected lieutenant in 1863, and during the last year of the war commanded his company most of the time on account of the captain's ill health. Serving faithfully through the war, he was honorably paroled May 23, 1865. Just after the war he lived at Brenham, Tex., for a number of years, removing thence to Weatherford and then in 1896 to Wagoner, Okla., where he had lived since. He was a member of Camp W. L. Cabell.

On the 31st of July he quietly and peacefully passed into eternal rest, survived by his wife, three sons, and five daughters. He had fulfilled the early promise of a useful life, and was well known and loved in his community.

GEORGE WOFFORD.

George Wofford was born in Georgia April 7, 1843. He volunteered as a soldier in the Confederate army in 1861, serving in Company D, 21st Georgia Regiment, which went at once to Richmond and was attached to the Army of Northern Virginia. During the four years of service he returned home but once. He was a cool and fearless soldier in all the great battles of his command, proving his absolute loyalty to Georgia and the South. Part of his service was under Gen. John B. Gordon. These four years of war in the Army of Northern Virginia filled up in a large degree the pleasures of his memory, and he liked to talk of his experiences. As one of the starved and ragged remnants of the Army of Northern Virginia he was at Appomattox, and sorrowfully stacked his gun in surrender because Lee said so. After that war he enlisted under the banner of Christ, and under his leadership he fought a good fight, kept the faith, and finally on the 4th of September, 1908, he stacked his arms of earthly warfare for the peace of eternity.

DR. H. M. FIELD'S "BRIGHT SKIES."

F. M. Farr, Adjutant Camp 708, Union, S. C., writes: "Dr. Field's volume, 'Bright Skies and Dark Shadows,' sent me by you, has been read with much interest and pleasure. To a veteran his vivid portrayal of the battle of Franklin gives a pleasure which only an old soldier can experience when some skillful narrator recalls to him the memory, mellowed by years, of the scenes of his former exploits. His sympathetic treatment of our Southern heroes and his appreciation of Southern scenery and character make the book a delight. As a contribution to the literature of the race problem his chapters on that vexed subject seem valuable from the spirit in which he has approached the question. To a lover of literature the book is pleasing from the charming style, the broad spirit of humanity, the liberal culture, and the good, hard common sense shown by the author. I consider it a valuable acquisition to my library, and hope that the feeling displayed in its pages may soon permeate both North and South."

This book by Dr. H. M. Field, the last of the four eminent brothers, the others being David Dudley, Cyrus, and Stephen J., is most accurately described in the foregoing. The price ($1.50) has been reduced to fifty cents, postpaid.

SPLENDID NEW JERSEY ESTATE.

PROPERTY ON LONG HILL ROAD, NEAR CHATHAM.

A magnificent place twenty-five miles from New York on the Lackawanna Railroad and Hudson River Tunnels (running time about fifty minutes) is offered for sale or exchange by Dr. Edward H. Hamill, a Confederate veteran, and since its organization the Medical Director of the Prudential Insurance Company. It is located one and a half miles from Chatham Station and about two miles from Summit, and is one of the most beautiful places in America. It consists of twenty-nine and a half acres beautifully situated on a mountain top overlooking Summit and the Passaic and Green River Valleys.

The grounds are most attractive, there being beautiful lawns, broad, winding, well-shaded macadam driveways, and many flowering shrubs, bushes, and plants.

From an orchard of some two hundred young fruit trees there is fine fruit in season. The large vegetable garden contains many varieties, including an asparagus bed and an abundance of small fruits.

The purest water is piped to all buildings and to hydrants throughout the grounds from an artesian well four hundred and thirty feet deep.

The property has large frontages on two avenues, and neighbors and surroundings are most desirable. The residence is modern and of cement stucco and timber construction. In the basement are a large splendidly equipped kitchen, servants' hall, laundry, boiler room, and storage room. On the first floor are the large hall, library, parlor, dining room, etc.; also an extensive octagonal porch, pergola, and sun porch. The second floor contains four commodious chambers, two modern tiled baths, large closets, etc.

The house is finished in hardwood throughout, including floors, has plate-glass windows, hot water heat, open fire-places, double storm sashes and doors for winter, awnings and copper screens for summer.

The house, barns, and grounds are lighted by acetylene gas and are wired for electricity.

The carriage barn is large and constructed of the same material as the house, and will accommodate several horses, carriages, and three cows. A five-room apartment with bath is on the second floor. There are also a large hay and vegetable barn, corncrib, chicken house, engine house, garage, and two small buildings which could be used for servants' quarters.

The buildings are all new and in perfect condition, having been completed during the past two years. They were built and are now occupied by the owner, who must sell on account of failing health.

The property is one of the handsomest small estates in the State of New Jersey, is unencumbered, and title is guaranteed by the Fidelity and Trust Co., of Newark, N. J.

This property will be sold for $35,000, which is below actual cost, on terms satisfactory to responsible purchaser.

Address owner, Edward H. Hamill, M.D., Chatham, N. J.

[The editor of the VETERAN visited this magnificent place recently, and the memory of it all is that of one of the most charming homes ever seen. The realty was selected by the owner, who had lived in the vicinity for some years, and he secured the best of locations, and the improvements were all made for a home and not for sale. It is one of the highest spots in the vicinity of New York, and is surrounded by wealthy, refined people. It is well away from manufacturing industries, an ideal locality for those who desire the luxury of cultured country life and yet of easy access to the metropolis of the country. Seated in the "pergola," built of Portland cement—the same as the construction of a large pool in which were the finest goldfish—choicest cantaloupes, delicious peaches and grapes, all grown on the place, were enjoyed. The landscape in all directions is exquisite.]

"MY MARYLAND" AND OTHER POEMS.

The recent publication of the poetical works of James Ryder Randall, author of "Maryland, My Maryland," in book form has added another valuable volume to our literature. Randall's fame need not now rest on the fact that he had done one thing better than any one else. The work of compilation was a labor of love undertaken by two devoted friends of Mr. Randall's, Miss Lillian MacGregor Shepherd and Matthew Page Andrews, of Baltimore. The expense of publication was met by contributions secured through the efforts of Senator Whyte, while the proceeds from the sale of the volume are to go to the benefit of Mrs. Randall. The book was issued in April and has been well received, many favorable comments having appeared in leading journals. The reader will be delighted with the varied beauty of his composition, many of his poems equaling any of the shorter lyrics in English literature. Senator Whyte wrote the introduction to the volume; and though death intervened before the kindly hand had finished its friendly task, yet his great admiration for the poet and his genius is most fittingly expressed. Oliver Wendell Holmes once said: "My only regret is that I could not do for Massachusetts what Randall did for Maryland"

James Randall was a native of Maryland, and he never lost his intense love for the place of his birth, though circumstances compelled his residence far away from his State for many years. At the time of his death, in January, 1908, he was residing in Augusta, Ga., and from there supplied special articles to different newspapers in Baltimore and elsewhere. He had for many years been a resident of New Orleans, where the ties of friendship held him very close.

The book is published by the John Murphy Company, of Baltimore. Price, $1.50. Orders filled by the VETERAN.

"GENERAL LEE, HIS CAMPAIGNS IN VIRGINIA, 1861-1865."

As a member of the official household of General Lee from the beginning to the end of the War between the States, acting first as aid-de-camp and then as adjutant general on his staff, Col. Walter H. Taylor was doubtless in closer touch with our great General than any one during that period of strife, and therefore he is well prepared to give the history of his campaigns. Colonel Taylor will be remembered as the author of "Four Years with General Lee," published some thirty years ago with the special idea of "establishing the fact of the great numerical odds against which General Lee's army had to contend," and which was necessarily restricted largely to purely statistical matter. In this later volume he has given larger scope to his memoirs, especially of General Lee personally, and has endeavored to give such account of the different battles as will enable the reader to secure a fair idea of each, while the tediousness of detail is eliminated. The excellent maps of some of the more important battlefields add to the impressiveness of his descriptions. Colonel Taylor has made a most readable narrative of his reminiscences, and his close connection with the men and events of which he writes gives weight to all he says.

The book is dedicated to "The Noble Women of the South," who in their devotion and self-sacrifice made the achievements of the Southern soldiers possible. The mechanical make-up is excellent, good, clear type on good paper, well bound in cloth. See advertisement in this number.

A SOUTHERN ENTERPRISE.

The Magic Food Co., whose attractive advertisement appears in this issue, can be relied upon as one of the largest and most reliable concerns of Chattanooga.

The business was started sixteen years ago by I. C. Mansfield and W. T. Tyler, who are still connected with the active management.

These gentlemen are both Confederate soldiers, having served throughout the war with Lee in Virginia.

By honest, square, and capable methods they have built up an enviable reputation for their famous Magic Stock and Poultry Remedies until they are well and favorably known from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

They have been proved to be especially adapted to Southern climatic conditions, and for that reason are now largely used in the South.

Every Stock and Poultry Feeder should read this advertisement and write to the Company for further particulars.

They maintain a Veterinary Department, and will give advice, free of charge, to all who write them.

Some recent communications touching on the organization known as the "Sons of Liberty" or "Knights of the Golden Circle" induce the request for reliable data concerning the organization which had its base of operations in the Northwest. Especially is it desired to learn who of its members were responsible for any failure in plans or what outsiders discovered and frustrated the plans of the organization.

PRIZE BY ARKANSAS DIVISION, U. D. C.—In May, 1908, the Arkansas Division, U. D. C., offered a prize of twenty-five dollars in gold to the students of the State University for the best essay on the "Life and Character of Jefferson Davis." Quite a number entered the contest, but the prize was given to Mrs. R. S. Womack, of Bentonville.

Legal and Historical Status of the Dred Scott Decision.

BY W. R. EWING, LL.B., Attorney and Counsellor of the Supreme Court of the United States; Author of "Northern Rebellion and Southern Secession," Etc.

This work is a history of the famous case, and a thorough judicial examination of the opinion of the court, together with a plain statement of the legal questions involved.

An unanswerable vindication of the correctness, justness, and legality of every point decided in that world-famous opinion read by Chief Justice Taney, of Maryland, March 6, 1857. The decision was made the excuse for dangerous more rebellious and more extensive than ever known in the South, and which became one great cause of secession. So to save the North and incriminate the South the opinion was misrepresented, the court maligned, and vital error thrust into our history; and there it has long remained.

NORTHERN NULLIFICATION,

The decision "gave conspirators new confidence," said Sumner.

Taney covered "the most glorious pages of his country with infamy and insulted the intelligence and virtue of the civilized world," it was said in the Atlantic Monthly.

SUCH CHARGES ARE LEGION: LIKE ERROR IS YET TAUGHT both to the children of the South and the North. Professor Pomeroy, for instance, says the decision is "a by-word and a hissing;" while Carson says "the infamy of that fatal blunder" and "the blood-stain on his ermine" must be carried by the Chief Justice to eternity.

Eminent authors, such as Brice of England, Von Holst of Germany, and nearly all American writers, admitting the great importance of the case, have perhaps unwittingly fallen into the errors of the past and tell us that the decision is based upon and that the decision as to the Missouri Compromise was extra judicial, etc.

That there are no obiter dicta, that the decision of the Missouri Compromise question was not only proper but a judicial duty, that the North, especially the States that made most objection, had furnished statutory, political, and judicial precedents, are some of the important facts shown by the author.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO GOVERN A TERRITORY, a very practical question, is deduced from rules now no longer disputed in America, and it is shown that the principles upon which Taney based the decision are to-day accepted as fundamental.

There is also a careful history of the Northern nullification, the bitter anti-negro laws of the North and West, a history of the case, a sketch of the court, etc.

Bound in neat cloth, introductory price $2.00, if either cash or thirty day subscription be received at once.

N. B.—The edition is limited; and the publishers wish to realize upon it at once, and having a few copies of Northern Rebellion and Southern Secession, cloth, 383 pages, will give the two books for cash or subscription payable in thirty days, twelve cents extra for postage, if orders come without delay. A splendid opportunity to those who apply early.

Both works widely indorsed by writers and scholars!

The Paris Medicine Company, 2622-30 Pine St., St. Louis, Mo., manufacturers of Laxative Bromo Quinine and other standard preparations, have a new discovery that far surpasses anything ever placed on the market for the cure of Old Sores.

When Marconi stated that he could send messages across the ocean without a wire or cable, the world did not believe it; if we were to tell you that DR. PORTER'S ANTISEPTIC HEALING OIL will cure old sores which other remedies have failed to cure, you would not believe it; therefore, if you have an old sore, we wish to place the remedy, FREE OF COST, in your hands to convince you that it is the most wonderful remedy ever discovered.

WE MEAN IT.

Do not delay to send us your name and address, referring to this advertisement, and we will send you by mail a 25c. package free of cost.

If you know of any old soldier who is suffering from an old sore, send us his name and we will send him a package free of cost. We give it free in this way because we know that when one family tries it they will recommend it to other families, and thus introduce it.

Jerry Turner, of Franklin, Ky., would like to hear from some old comrades of Company F, 7th Tennessee Regiment. He has a roll of the company from 1861 to 1865.

Curtis Green, of Oglesby, Tex., needs the number of the VETERAN for January, 1893, to complete his file. Any one having this copy will confer a favor by writing to him.

Dan W. Ward, of Juno, Ark., inquires the whereabouts of J. A. Kelley, who belonged to Company E, 3d Arkansas Regiment. When last heard from he was in New Orleans.

W. L. Hendry, 2006 Seventh Avenue, Tampa, Fla., would be pleased to communicate with any surviving members of Capt. John Chambers's company of Florida troops during the war.

J. W. Bausell, of Lebanon, Va., would like to hear from any survivors of the Moorfield stampede of August 7, 1864. With a large number of others he was captured there and sent to Camp Chase.

Wishing to make application for a pension, Mr. J. L. McGough, of Strawn, Tex., who served in Company C, 15th Mississippi Infantry, wishes to locate some of his old comrades in order to get proof of his service.

Dr. A. C. Bennett, Vinson, Okla., who was in Gen. Sterling Price's command, Marmaduke's Division, Trans-Mississippi Department, wishes to correspond with some survivor of Company 11, 44th Mississippi Regiment. This company was made up at Holly Springs, Miss., in 1861.

J. W. Allen, of DeWitt, Ark., writes that a year or so ago an old cannon was taken out of White River at St. Charles, Ark. The gun is loaded and spiked, and is supposed to have been turned into the river from the Confederate fort before its capture by the Federals. It is understood that a Captain Fry was in command of the Confederates at this place. Any survivors on either side of the battle of St. Charles will confer a favor by writing to Mr. Allen.

A Testimonial from an Ex-Confederate Veteran

Sometime in January I saw your advertisement in the CONFEDERATE VETERAN for Salvator Remedy for Eczema, and I got a one-dollar box and used it as directed. I soon found it was doing me much good, sent and got two more boxes, and now feel as well and free from eczema and better than I have in forty years.

I was broken out at times with a stinging, burning, itching fire from my head to my knees. I have tried a number of doctors, but they did me no good. They gave me Bull's Sarsaparilla, S. S. S., Liquezone, and a number of other unpleasant things to swallow, also advised vapor baths and Hot Springs, Ark., mineral wells. I have spent hundreds of dollars on other humbugs.

I now feel it my duty to tell the world of Salvator Remedy and its wonderful cure on myself. I was for a number of years passenger conductor on the N. & D. and L. & N. railroads, lived in Grayson, Lamar, and Hannin Counties, Texas, for thirty years, and am sixty-seven years old. I am known in Tennessee, Alabama, and Texas.

He was instrumental in organizing many of the State institutions, and has been connected with the Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Ohio, and Illinois State institutions in an official capacity, instructing the other officials and subordinates in the proper methods of educating and training this class of persons.

Dr. Wilbur was connected with the first institution of this kind organized in this country. When he was Superintendent of the Illinois institution (for 18 years), it was pronounced the finest institution in the world by experts. He left the public work to organize a private institution where he could take LIMITED NUMBERS AND GIVE THEM INDIVIDUAL AND PERSONAL ATTENTION. State institutions receive and congregate so many that they get very little personal attention.

He has one of the most beautiful places in the world, and every comfort. The inmates receive the most faithful care and attention. Individual and manual training, for both sexes of any age. Abraham Lincoln Said:

"Neighbors, Give Your
Boys and Girls
A Chance"

These are the words used by the great emancipator in his famous speech, delivered at his old home to his friends and neighbors at Springfield, Ill.

Recalling what little opportunity he had in his early youth to get an education, and looking back to the days when he walked miles and miles for a book (for he then owned none of his own), Abraham Lincoln pleaded with the rural and village people, his old friends and associates to give their children a better chance—a chance to fight the battles of life successfully.

SURELY YOU want to give your boys and girls a better chance, not necessarily a college education, but better still, a home education. It is not always the school that gives the education; you can give this same opportunity or better to your family right in your own home. Good books—valuable books. Oh! how Lincoln cherished these.

What would Lincoln have said had you asked his advice on buying a great History of the World, an entertaining and educational Library for your home, "The Library of Universal History," and especially if we offered it at less than half of the regular price and so easy terms?

We want you to see these volumes, examine them in your own home without any expense on your part; then you can decide. That is what the family in the picture below have done. Mail the coupon now before you forget it. See the volumes themselves—it costs you nothing.

Note the quiet, peaceful, happy home scene, the family gathered around the table under the bright lamp, old folks and young folks reading the Library, and the child looking at the pictures. Surely you want to help your family. Do not neglect the opportunity, do not wait until tomorrow but cut out and mail the coupon at once.

The American Underwriters Corporation, receivers in Bankruptcy, Invites you to examine this Library of Universal History in your own home for an entire week absolutely free of charge.

We wish to prove to you that our enforced offer of the remaining sets of this magnificent publication, at less than cost, is the most stupendous book offer ever made. A new publication from cover to cover, prepared by a staff of great historians. Cost to produce nearly $250,000. Heartily endorsed by America's greatest scholars and teachers.

HERE is the greatest opportunity ever offered—an opportunity for our readers to secure at less than half price these fifteen beautiful volumes.

This offer is made possible by the failure of the publishers, The Union Book Co., of Chicago. Hundreds of sets of this work have been sold at auction, and they are worth every cent of it, but we now name you a rock-bottom bankrupt price of only $50 after examination and $2.00 per month for 12 months. It is impossible to name a lower price for cash in full as this is less than half the publisher's price and is made only to close out the few remaining sets quickly.

WITH THIS HISTORY you may sit beside the madman, Nero, on his awful throne; touch his mantle and hear him speak. Walk with Caesar and gain inspiration from this genius of the Romans. Enter the ancient Coliseum and behold once more the martyrdom of the Christians, whose bravery and sacrifice of life among borders of red-jawed jungle beasts, paved the way for the Christian religion in Rome. Ride beside Alexander the Great, whose steel-hooped charger dashes over the blood-stained battle fields of his career. Stand beside the mighty Nelson at Trafalgar, and hear his hoarse commands as the English fleet sweeps the power of France from the ocean.

Look once more at the gory battle field of Waterloo; see English and French in mortal combat; see the mighty Napoleon sitting like adamant, the old guard around him, scanning the field and realizing his iron reign was over; then talk with him at St. Helena, where, standing alone, he gazes over the trackless ocean, watching the misty guller and dispirite as he has his power and greatness. Travel back for sixty centuries when man was but a being of the forest, as unlike the man of today as we are unlike the lowest in the droves of humanity. Attend the Bacchanalian banquet of the ancient kings of Assyria and Persia; watch their mighty smiles flash. Go to ancient Babylon, walk its streets and see and hear as you would in the days of Balthazar.

Stroll among the pyramids of Egypt and pry into the wonderful secrets which these majestic relics of antiquity possess in their enormous bosoms; and draw the Nile and visit the ancient cities, the great white palaced cities which flourished a thousand years before the dawn of the Christian era; see Greece in her regal power, overcome by the borders of Rome; watch Spain as she rises to dominating power, only to fall and crumple in the droves of humanity; watch the wars of the English and cross the ocean to our own shores.

Watch the starting line of patriots battling against the whirling and bullets of the mother country; grasp the hand of the patriot, the Forge, walk through the snow with him and hear his cheering words to his silver-tipped, roared army; sit with him on his wild veranda and talk with him at Mt. Vernon; then witness the rise of our own republic and pass through the dark days when brother was arrayed against brother. Know the mighty rail-splitter, Lincoln, as he was. Stand beside Grant at Vicksburg, or Meade at Gettysburg; hear the awful cannonading, and see the dashing lines cut to pieces. See the valor and the courage of the great, through the very eyes of the indomitable Lee, view all these thrilling events as if the world were passing once more before your own eyes.

To own this history means you need never spend a lonely evening. It is cheering to converse with the children of destiny. To be associated with great men and events is to be great oneself, and you will add to your store of knowledge, which is power, and to the richness of your life.

Rev. Dr. F. W. Gunsauls,
President Armour Institute
and Pastor Central Church
(Auditorium) Chicago, says:

"Without the slightest touch of religious or political bigotry, the editors of the 'Library of Universal History' have dealt soberly and deeply with the forces of church and state which have ruled mankind. With great scholarship they have not become dull; with a trained and genuine power of imagination they have never become vague. It is a work of real genius; its thought is clear and vigorous, its English pure and eloquent. I am certain these volumes must be of immense popular service in stimulating historical study in our country."

Sen. William B. Allison,

The Grand Old Man of Iowa, says:

"I have recently bought the 'Library of Universal History,' and find the topical arrangement of the matter especially advantageous for ready reference and take pleasure in recommending this valuable work as well as the plan for its distribution."

The editor of this paper advises every reader to write for these splendidly written, authoritative and beautifully illustrated books for free-examination in your own home for a week, without any expense or obligation on your part to purchase.

ORATORY OF THE SOUTH

BY EDWIN DuBOIS SHURTER

Author of "Science and Art of Debate," published by this house.

Professor Shurter is in charge of The School of Public Speaking at the University of Texas. He is an authority on the history and development of oratory in America, and especially that of the South, and his book is devoted to Southern oratory from the close of the War between the States to the present time. This is the first of a series of similar volumes, to be issued from time to time, and the plan of bringing out this series had its inception in the fact that the current oratory of the South has been little exploited. As Professor Shurter says in his Preface: "While in books of oratorical selections we find represented noted Southern authors of the past, . . . since the Civil War, with the exception of Grady, public speakers of the South have received scant recognition. This certainly is not due to lack of material, for the new problems of liberty, education, and government that have arisen in the South . . . have brought forward their champions and expounders." The author's aim being to give these latter-day speakers a fair representation, each selection in "Oratory of the South" is preceded by a few lines of introduction relative to the speaker, and the occasion and circumstances under which the oration was delivered. This first volume of the projected series contains nearly a hundred selections, and among the orators represented are Henry W. Grady, Stephen D. Lee, John Sharp Williams, David A. DeArmond, Richmond P. Hobson, Henry Watterson, W. C. P. Breckinridge, Edward W. Carmack, John W. Daniel, Champ Clark, Fitzhugh Lee, William Gordon McCabe, Isador Rayner, Emory Speer, Albert H. Whitfield, General Joseph Wheeler, Charles B. Galloway, and Cardinal Gibbons. Large octavo; $3 net; postage, 20 cents.

TWO KENTUCKY NOVELS

Beyond the Blue Grass

By George Creswell Gill.

Ginseng County, beyond the famous Blue Grass region—a succession of hills and bowlders and miniature canyons and sparkling streams, where the rarest wild flowers grow and the sunsets are glorious; where the people live as their great-grandfathers lived, where the mail is carried on horseback, and comes twice a week in favorable weather; where the houses are built of hewn logs, the women weave their own linsey-woolsey, and the men talk politics of two decades ago. The story of the way Ginseng County threw off the lassitude of generations, its complacent acceptance of the traditional, is written here. Mr. Gill knows the people; he knows the mountains, their beauty, their moods, their secrets. 12mo; postpaid, $1.50.

The Heart of Kentucky

By Mrs. H. D. Pittman.

In the year 1825, when Kentucky was almost rent in twain by two political factions, the Attorney-General was killed at his own door by a midnight assassin (?), presumably a political adversary. History records no motive for the crime. Using this brief chronicle as a framework, Mrs. Pittman has written a forceful novel of absorbing interest. She is well known as the author of "The Belle of the Blue Grass Country." In her new book she mirrors the fine old days—if they be "the old days"—when that great heart beat for honor and courage, the honor of beautiful women and the courage of brave men, and love was an exalted thing, to be vindicated at the risk of all else. The spirit of old Kentucky is here; what else need be said? 12mo; postpaid, $1.50.

THE BATTLE OF FRANKLIN

BY COL. R. W. BANKS

Capt. Co. D, 37th Miss. Consolidated Inf., C. S. A.; Lieut.
Col. Commanding 3d Miss. Inf., U. S. Vol., Spanish-American War.

"The bloodiest engagement of the War between the States, November 30, 1864," says Colonel Banks. Indeed, the battle of Franklin was frightful, appalling, bloody, brilliant. For sheer gallantry, daring initiative, and sacrificial courage it has no superior, perhaps no equal, in all the brilliant and terrible battles of the War between the States. From a swift charge against fearful odds it grew to a hand-to-hand encounter in the dead darkness, a struggle in a steady hail of bullets—shouts, groans, commands, and, above all the tumult, the thrilling "Rebel yell"—courage and death and blind endeavor in one mighty uproar! John Fiske, the historian, writing of this battle, says, in part: "Again and again the Confederates renewed the attack with bravery and pertinacity almost incredible. But against the storm of grape and canister and musketry in front, with the enfilading fire of the batteries across the river, no human gallantry could stand. . . . When we bear in mind that the battle of Franklin began at four o'clock in the short afternoon of the last day of November, the destruction of life seems awful. . . . More than 8,000 men were killed and wounded—nearly 6,000 on the Confederate side, about 2,300 on the Union." Colonel Banks has done his gracious work with excellent effect. One can see it all—the early winter night gathering darker and darker, the flashes of fire spurring through the smoke, and young "Ed" Russell, now Major E. L. Russell, pressing forward, over the dead, over the dying, over trampled breastworks, past slashing bayonets, on, on, carrying his sacred flag, his heart aflame—on to "the inner breastworks," where he plants his colors, the dead all around! 12mo; $1.25 net; postage, 10 cents.

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE SOUTH

LEE AND HIS GENERALS.

ter, with a scrutiny of the best photographs and portraits extant of each. That this undertaking has been accomplished in every phase and detail, with wonderful fidelity to nature in each portrait, and with marvelously effective ensemble, is the comment of all who have seen the picture.

"To uncover the head and stand in thrilled awe before this great presentment of these immortal warriors who wore the gray has been the instinctive act of every Southerner as he entered its presence. It fascinates and holds one who gazes upon it with enthralled emotions.

"What a host of memories it must invoke for the veterans who followed those leaders and obeyed their commands! Involuntary is the reflection that there was not one of the twenty-five about him but did not loyally, heartily, and devoutly give the laurel of transcendent greatness to the star of all the darkness of Appomattox. Of all the twenty-six, but one is living—General Simon Bolivar Buckner."

General Marcus J. Wright, the well-known Confederate veteran, has this to say of the painting and lithograph:

"Mr. W. B. Matthews.

"DEAR SIR: I have had the pleasure of seeing the original picture of 'Lee and His Generals,' painted by your brother, George B. Matthews. I regard it as one of the finest paintings I ever saw. His truthfulness of feature of all these great generals is most remarkable.

"I have also seen the lithographic copy of the great painting, which is a most striking and accurate reproduction of the original. I hope all Confederates will procure copies.

"The Last of the Wooden Navy" is the only authentic picture of the first day's fight which changed the mode of naval warfare all over the world. It was a Southerner who conceived the idea of an ironclad, who built the first ship, and it was in Southern waters that the fight was fought. There are only 3,000 of these pictures remaining on hand to be sold.

Lieutenant Littlepage, of the C. S. Navy, has this to say of the "Last of the Wooden Navy:"

"It affords me pleasure to state that the painting recently made by your brother, George B. Matthews, of Virginia, entitled 'The Last of the Wooden Navy,' is a remarkably fine one, and gives a very excellent idea of that memorable engagement in Hampton Roads, on the 8th of March, 1862, when the Merrimac (the Virginia as she was first christened) engaged the U. S. fleet. Just the evening before the engagement I made a pencil sketch of the Merrimac, and the painting by your brother was made from this drawing. I personally supervised the painting as it progressed, and I believe it gives a very fair representation of the fight as it actually occurred. It may not be amiss for me to add that I was a lieutenant in the C. S. Navy, and was on board the Merrimac during the engagement.

"With the hope that the lithographic reproduction of this painting, which is exceedingly fine, may meet with a ready sale, I am, very truly yours,

[Signed] H. B. LITTLEPAGE."

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The third lithograph was made from an oil painting made from the last photograph taken of Mr. Davis prior to his death, and is a very fine likeness of the great Confederate—the leader of the "Lost Cause." The original painting hangs in "Beauvoir," Miss. There are only 1,000 of these left. The prices of these pictures are as follows—viz.:

For "Lee and His Generals," 55 cents sent by mail in tubes; for "Last of the Wooden Navy," 55 cents; and for Jefferson Davis, 25 cents. To agents, the price is, in lots of twenty-five or more, for the first two, 25 cents each, and for Jefferson Davis, 15 cents.

State, city, and county agents wanted. Large profits assured to good canvassers.

The date to a subscription is always given to the month before it ends. For instance, if the VETERAN is ordered to begin with January, the date on mail list will be December, and the subscriber is entitled to that number.

The civil war was too long ago to be called the late war, and when correspondents use that term "War between the States" will be substituted.

The terms "New South" and "lost cause" are objectionable to the VETERAN.

JEFFERSON DAVIS HOME ASSOCIATION.

CONFEDERATES AND THEIR FRIENDS SHOULD CO-OPERATE.

VETERAN readers are familiar with the movement to purchase a sufficiency of the birthplace of Jefferson Davis for a memorial and a park. At Birmingham on June 10, 1908, the United Confederate Veterans accepted the responsibility of the purposes of the promoters of the scheme to procure the property indicated. General Buckner forcibly urged the Convention to acquire this memorable spot of Southern ground, and on motion of Gen. Bennett H. Young the Convention directed that a committee of fifteen be appointed of which the Commander in Chief should be chairman ex officio, and the following committee was appointed to cooperate with the subcommittee: S. B. Buckner, Bennett H. Young, S. A. Cunningham, H. C. Myers, W. A. Montgomery, K. M. VanZandt, V. Y. Cook, Stith Bolling, John H. Bankhead, T. W. Castleman, Basil W. Duke, Julian S. Carr, T. D. Osborne, J. P. Hickman, and J. H. Leathers.

The subcommittee has taken action by appointing S. A. Cunningham Vice President of the Association and giving him full authority to take active charge of the canvass for funds and the appointments of agents for canvassing, etc.

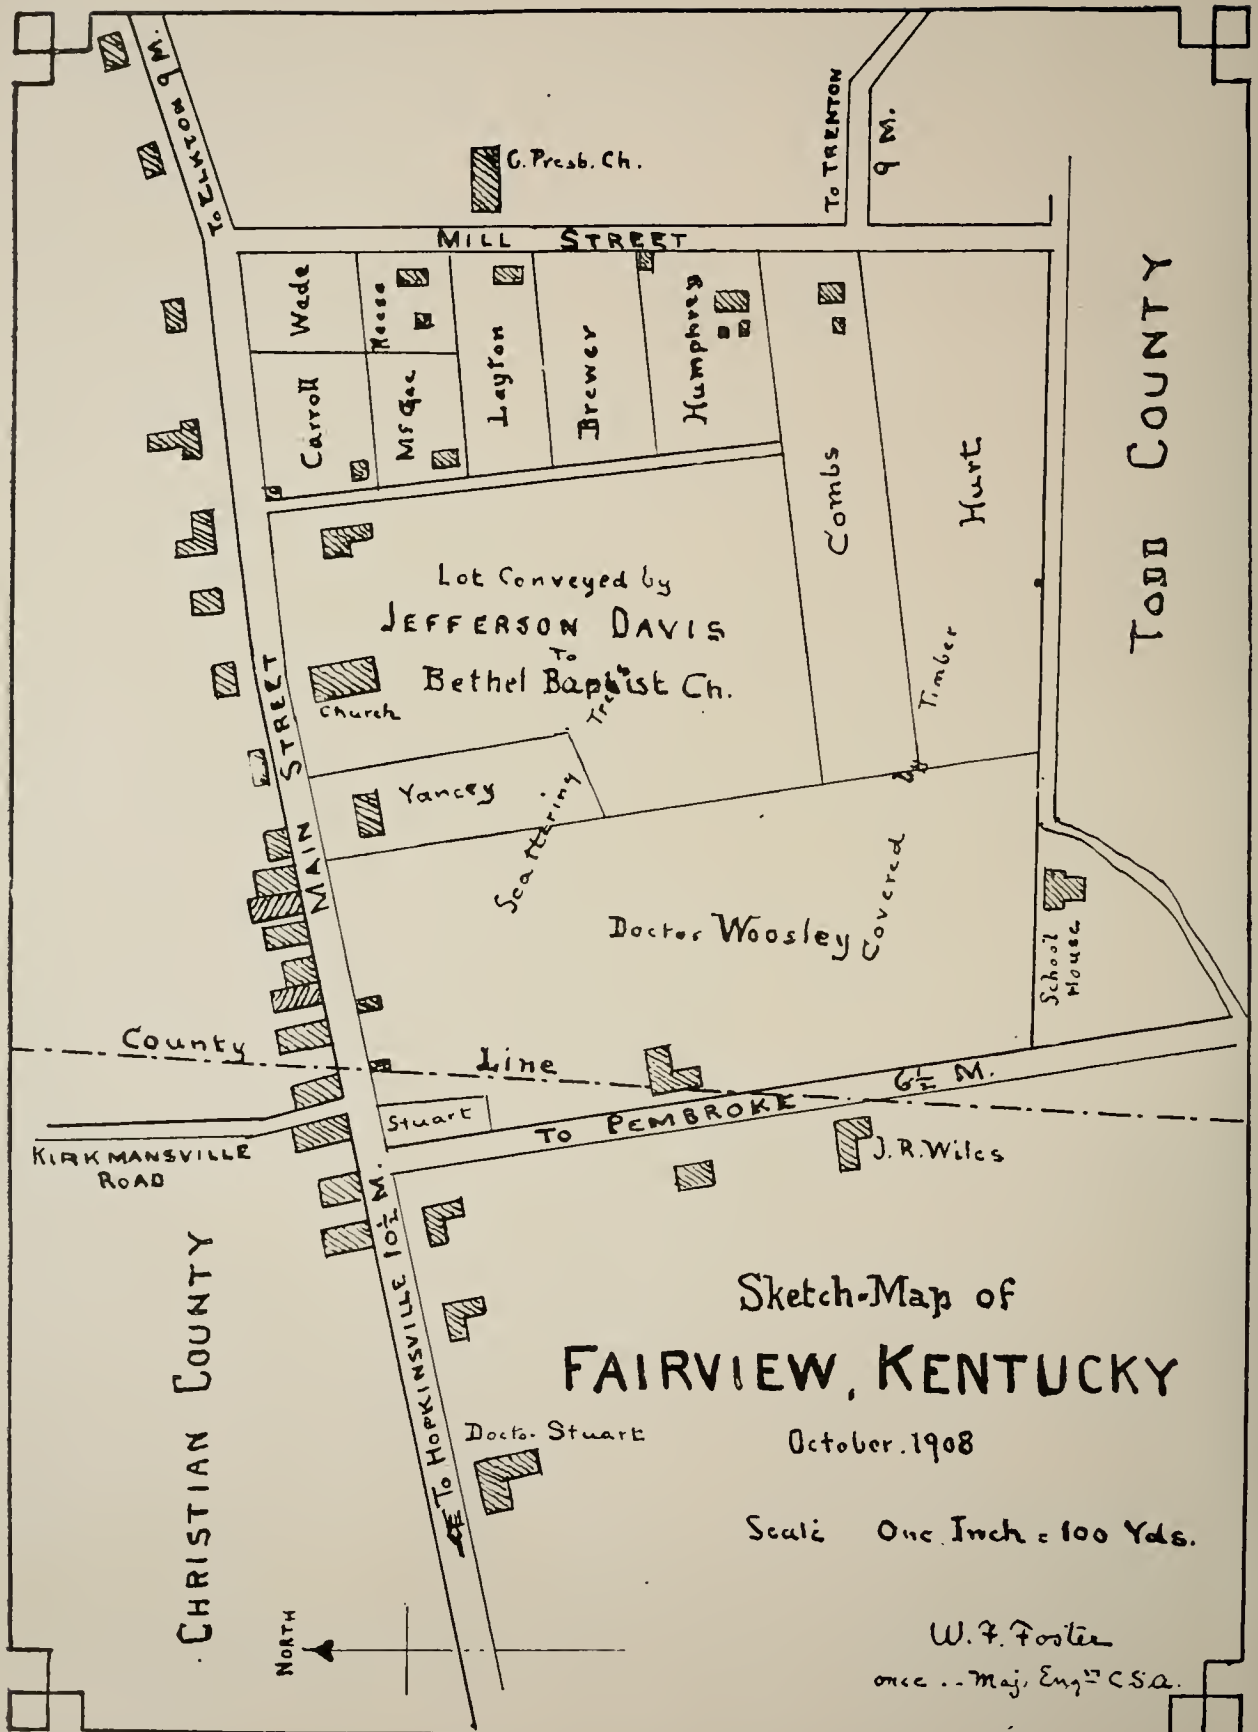

If Daughters of the Confederacy will make known their purpose to secure the premises made sacred for all time—and they will do the work eventually—each State member of the committee will be animated in its purpose.

This work must be taken in hand at once to secure the property desired at the very low prices designated in options. These low options were secured by Hon. W. B. Brewer, a patriotic representative citizen of Fairview, who unhappily died in October. The committee approves heartily and gratefully all that Mr. Brewer and others of Fairview have done in securing these options, and they appeal to every Confederate organization to be diligent to secure these lands. The options expire next April, and some of the more important ones cannot be renewed. Appeal is made to the United Daughters of the Confederacy to cooperate with the committee in buying the lands. The most desirable place in the list is that of Dr. Woosley, whose house would be at once a fitting home for worthy widows of Confederates who may be in need.

TENNESSEE CONFEDERATES FAVOR THE MOVEMENT.

The following resolutions were adopted at Nashville:

"The Tennessee Division of United Confederate Veterans commends the movement which has been inaugurated to pro-comply its purposes during the remainder of this year, 1908. Next year there will be a widespread effort on behalf of the

All sections are concerned. While members of the committee predominate from Kentucky, it is no more a Kentucky than a Virginia or Texas enterprise. The inspiration of every Southern man and woman should be to take this up and ac-memorial to President Lincoln at the place of his birth, near Louisville, and surely the pride of Southern people will induce a procurement of the birthplace of President Davis if its adornment should be left to coming generations.

Dr. C. C. Brown, of Bowling Green, Ky., who conceived the plan, was appointed to solicit subscriptions, and by his enthusiasm good results are being accomplished.

Veterans, Daughters, and Sons of Veterans who are inclined to cooperate in this work will help the cause very much by letting the South know through the VETERAN their purpose and the progress they make. This is a fitting opportunity to show that spirit of cooperation which the Southern people should possess above any others of the earth.

The most isolated Camps, Chapters, or individuals can help in this undertaking. The matter of memorials may be cared for in the future. It seems so fitting in this centennial year of the birth of our Confederate President that we would do well to honor his memory by securing such an admirable area that our children's children may have the inspiration of this year's work to build worthy memorials. Next year vast sums will be spent on the birthplace of President Lincoln.

Send subscriptions to Capt. John H. Leathers, Louisville, or to S. A. Cunningham, Nashville. Report to the VETERAN.

S. A. CUNNINGHAM, Editor and Proprietor.

Office: Methodist Publishing House Building, Nashville, Tenn.

This publication is the personal property of S. A. Cunningham. All persons who approve its principles and realize its benefits as an organ for Associations throughout the South are requested to commend its patronage and to cooperate in extending its circulation. Let each one be constantly diligent.

THE SOUTH'S PATRIOTIC MECCA.

The best showing possible under the circumstances is made in this issue for the Jefferson Davis Home Association. Maj. W. F. Foster, of Nashville—as loyal and faithful comrade as survives the war, who occupied various responsible positions in the army, serving as engineer for Lieut. Gen. A. P. Stewart's Corps much of the time—has graciously visited Fairview and made a sketch map of the town, indicating clearly the property it is desired to procure as a perpetual memorial. The late W. B. Brewer, of Fairview, exercised much diligence in procuring options upon such parts of the property as seemed desirable by the committee. These options run until April 27, 1909, and every option seems to be on terms of actual value. Mr. Hunter Wood, of Hopkinsville, has procured a quit claim to the Baptist Church area from Mrs. J. A. Hayes, the bequest being such that the property would revert to her estate if it be converted to any other than Church purposes (which is the usual form), and the spirit of the community is general in behalf of the worthy purpose of making it a perpetual memorial to the most distinguished citizen in the South's history. The State of Kentucky will doubtless release the property that may be procured from taxation for all time.

This should be the South's Mecca, and it would seem most fitting to locate here such a memorial as the Southern people desire to Maj. Henry Wirz, who was offered his life if he would incriminate our beloved President of the Confederacy, but preferred death. In this connection the suggestion is made that the Wirz monument fund be applied to the Davis Home enterprise for all who want to pay tribute to his memory and likewise honor Mr. Davis. With greatest possible deference to Georgia's noble, patriotic, and Christian women the VETERAN bespeaks their most favorable consideration of the blending of the funds for the two sacred purposes.

Photographic illustrations are given of the Woosley property, with the suggestion that the splendid residence be made a Home for Confederate Women. Kentucky might take charge of this feature in the outset. It is highly important to procure the Woosley property anyhow, as shown on Major Foster's map. That generous patriot, Dr. E. S. Stuart, whose aunt nursed Jefferson Davis in his infancy, donates the lot on the corner of Main and Pembroke Streets. This, with the Yancey lot fronting Main Street (Mr. Yancey gives an option on it for less than he has been offered for the property and then offers to buy the house from the Association) and the other lot backed by the Woosley property, as may be seen on the map, would suffice for the great purpose of the undertaking. It is desirable, however, to procure the entire area.

Fairview is easily accessible. A splendid turnpike connects the town with Hopkinsville, and the magnificent highway runs in the other direction to Elkton and on to Russellville, while Pembroke Street is the nearest direction to the railroad. Then it is quite possible that an interurban railway will ere long connect Hopkinsville and Russellville via Fairview and Elkton.

The VETERAN appeals to every Southern man and woman—to Camps and Chapters—to consider this subject earnestly and at once, and that they write to S. A. Cunningham, Nashville, Tenn., Vice President of the Association, or to some member of the committee and demonstrate what can be done by general coöperation. Such action would be in accord with the appeal (in behalf of the VETERAN) by Gen. Clement A. Evans, Commander in Chief U. C. V., on the following page.

Beautifully engraved certificates of membership in the Association worthy to be framed will be sent to all subscribers who contribute one dollar or more. These will be furnished by Capt. John H. Leathers, Treasurer (banker), Louisville, Ky., S. A. Cunningham, Nashville, or Dr. C. C. Brown, of Bowling Green, who conceived the idea of this Mecca and is ardently devoted to its achievement.

On the day of going to press it appears that the location of the Wirz monument is to be determined. If a plea by wire does not cause postponement, it is desired that the matter be reconsidered, since in honoring the memory of Maj. Henry Wirz no more appropriate spot could be designated than the birthplace of President Jefferson Davis.

CONCERNING THE VETERAN.

Please consider contents of the following page carefully and write Mr. Cunningham if you desire to coöperate for the greater usefulness of the VETERAN. If the officers of every Camp and Chapter would procure publication in their local papers, many thousands of people would become interested, for a large number don't even know of the VETERAN. Exchange copies would be sent to all editors who would help us, and they doubtless would take pleasure in it if requested to do so. Ask all such editors to write for particulars.

In this plea for a universal effort by Confederates to greatly enlarge the circulation of the VETERAN the editor asks his personal friends if they won't coöperate for one year at least. He never has directly solicited a subscription. Suppose they regard it a tax. Would they not agree to that much? Many of them would gladly entertain him at ten times the cost. The VETERAN will be sent to January, 1910, for one dollar.

PRESIDENT GENERAL U. D. C. URGES SUPPORT.

In a letter of October 26 Mrs. Cornelia Branch Stone, President General U. D. C., writes: "It is a singular coincidence that my annual report was just written and in the hands of the printer in which I had urged that the CONFEDERATE VETERAN ought to be in the hands of every Daughter of the Confederacy when I saw that General Evans is also urging the support of the VETERAN. I don't understand how a member of the U. D. C. or a veteran can get along without it."

PLEASING TRIBUTE FROM VIRGINIA.

At a meeting of the Joe Kendall Camp, No. 91, U. C. V., October 3, at Warrenton, Va., this resolution was passed:

"Resolved, That this Camp cordially recommends the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, a monthly publication published in the city of Nashville, to the patronage of all Confederates cherishing the memory of our cause, as it faithfully reiterates the heroism and valor of our dead and cannot but be instructive to the children of all veterans. We insist that our posterity should be imbued with the principles of their fathers and intensified in the faith for which they fought and died. The editor of this publication was a faithful Confederate soldier.

THOMAS SMITH, Commander.

R. A. HART, Adjutant."

WILL YOU READ THIS AND SHOW IT?

HEADQUARTERS COMMANDER IN CHIEF U. C. V.,
ATLANTA, GA., October, 1908.

I desire to use space in the true and able magazine, the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, published monthly at Nashville, Tenn., to appeal personally and officially to the officers of the United Confederate Veterans, to the officers of all Camps, and to all Confederate soldiers—the United Sons of Confederate Veterans, the United Daughters of the Confederacy, and the Confederated Southern Memorial Association—to take into special practical consideration the very important matter of greatly increasing the subscription list and the general distribution of our official organ throughout the Southern States especially and in all other States as well.

The Confederate Associations above mentioned are members of one great body, each bound to the others by the most sacred ties which ever united a patriotic people. They are united in the spirit of perfect patriotic allegiance to our own great country as the union of great States, and our aims and objects are worthy of our best and purest purposes to keep good faith with all the prime principles which distinguish our government; while we will be equally faithful to our own Confederate history, our memories, and our present obligations to the dead and the living actors in the Confederate struggle.

The CONFEDERATE VETERAN is the organ of all our Confederate Associations; and it is not only most ably and attractively engaged in presenting every month the true historical features of the Confederacy and publishing incidents of heroic life in Confederate times, but it is becoming a truly Southern magazine which represents the present glory of the South as well as the historic glories of the Southern States and people. Its own fidelity in our service for many years demands our fidelity to it, which we can show by an energetic effort to increase its usefulness.

Permit me, therefore, to urge the officers and members of our Associations to recall the appeal made a few years ago on this behalf by General Lee and the Commanders of Departments, Divisions, and Brigades of United Confederates, which produced widespread interest throughout the South; also to urge again all the Camps of United Confederate Veterans, all Chapters of the United Daughters, and the Camps of Sons to adopt practical plans by which subscriptions will be secured. We should show in this way our appreciation of the great work done for us by the able editor, our faithful Confederate comrade, S. A. Cunningham.

I would not ask my comrades and others addressed in this communication to do this important work for our cause without doing the same myself. I will gladly make personal solicitations for subscriptions wherever I have opportunity.

Faithfully yours,

CLEMENT A. EVANS.

ACTION IN TENNESSEE ON GENERAL EVANS'S APPEAL.

The following resolution was adopted by a rising vote:

"The Tennessee Division of United Confederate Veterans, in annual convention assembled, express their most grateful appreciation to our Commander in Chief, Gen. Clement A. Evans, of Georgia, for his timely and most worthy appeal to us and to all Confederate organizations of the South in behalf of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN and its founder, S. A. Cunningham.

"We as an organization and as individuals testify to an exception of the rule in that one prophet is honored at home—in his own country—and vie with our comrades and our daughters everywhere in ardent, loyal indorsement and support of the VETERAN as an absolutely faithful representative of our sacred cause, and we thank General Evans for what he states in his appeal. Moreover, we will join with him in a pledge to personally labor to secure its greater usefulness to the present and coming generations.

"Resolved, That General Evans's appeal be published in the minutes of this Convention."

ACTION OF GEORGIA CONVENTION, U. C. V.

Mr. Cunningham, editor of the VETERAN, was presented to the Convention, and General Evans made earnest plea, as in the foregoing address, urging general coöperation.

After suspension of the rules, the following was adopted by the Convention in a heartily unanimous vote:

"Resolved by the Georgia Division, United Confederate Veterans, That each Camp in said Division appoint a committee to request editors of newspapers in their vicinity to publish General Evans's appeal in behalf of the VETERAN, and that this committee also see the officers of Sons of Veterans and Daughters of the Confederacy in this behalf.

"Resolved, That our comrades consider and communicate their views to Mr. Cunningham in regard to plans for perpetuating the VETERAN."

The resolutions were offered by Sergeant Malcolm MacNeill, who served in the 18th Mississippi Regiment, Forrest's Cavalry, and now resides in Atlanta.

To enable comrades to comply with the foregoing resolutions, copies of the appeal, etc., will be supplied upon request and a year's edition will be sent to all newspapers who will generously comply with applications.

COMMENT BY THE CHATTANOOGA TIMES.

Gen. Clement A. Evans, of Georgia, Commander of the United Confederate Veterans, in a recently published letter, commended in the highest terms the work of Mr. S. A. Cunningham, of Nashville, in the making of his magazine, the CONFEDERATE VETERAN. General Evans is emphatically right. Mr. Cunningham is doing the old soldier, the cause he fought for, and the people of the South an invaluable service and one that in after years will be appreciated as it should be. The publication of the VETERAN, begun in a modest sort of way, has come to be the greatest enterprise of the kind in the country. Each number contains records that in after years will be of the utmost importance in making up the history of the Civil War period.

The VETERAN contains from time to time personal reminiscences and individual experiences in connection with every important campaign and every engagement of the war, which, prepared and written by those actively engaged therein, will afford the historian the most reliable and accurate data in compiling the future true and unbiased account of the great civil conflict that can be found anywhere. Its files will prove an inexhaustible thesaurus of interesting incidents of "the national tragedy," and from its pages will glow countless side lights that will give truthful views of the men who participated, and the details of their deeds and actions will be read with pleasure and pride by their children and children's children for many generations. As the ranks of the surviving Confederates grow thinner, the columns of the VETERAN become more important, more interesting, and with the encouragement the publication ought to have it will in time become the most reliable and accurate compendium of history and story pertaining to the Confederate cause we have.

FROM "THE OTHER SIDE" AT FRANKLIN.

BY J. K. MERRIFIELD, ST. LOUIS, MO.

The battle of Franklin, in my opinion, was one of the most desperate of the Civil War. There were not as many men engaged as in other battles; but as line after line charged and was cut down by our guns a new line would be seen coming up to meet the same fate, until the charging stopped from lack of men. As reports show, 1,640 dead Confederates were buried on the field out of, say, fifteen thousand troops engaged. This showed a loss of 6,560 wounded by the rule that for one killed four are wounded. Besides, a list of generals killed and wounded shows a greater loss of generals than in any other battle of the war.

Our regiment, the 88th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, was in the 1st Brigade (Opdyke's), 2d Division (Wagner's), 4th Corps (Stanley's). Our brigade had been rear guard all day up to Franklin, and we lost some men on the skirmish line. As we arrived at Franklin we filed through the works, formed in line a short distance in the rear, stacked our guns, and were going to make coffee and eat. Our center was the pike between the cotton gin and the Carter house. The first thing to attract our attention was a cannon shot from a Confederate gun. The ball rolled down the pike through our command; then began the rattle of musketry. Our brigade was quickly called to arms. Ahead of us we could see the line broken between the Carter house and cotton gin. We at once moved forward, and after a desperate struggle recaptured the works and all the Confederates inside of them as prisoners. This was the first I ever saw of hand-to-hand fighting. Bloody bayonets were frequently seen. Picks, shovels, pistols, and butts of guns were used on both sides to gain the mastery.

Then commenced a series of charges by the Confederates, lasting until after nightfall. One act of bravery I shall never forget. The color bearer of General Featherstone's headquarters flag rode a horse as close to the works as he could before the horse was killed, and then the bearer of the flag ran to the top of the works and pitched forward (I supposed killed) inside, and as he fell I grabbed the flag. Prisoners told me it was General Featherstone's headquarters flag of a Mississippi brigade. I have it now in my home, in St. Louis. It is elegantly framed, and I prize it very highly. After a charge by General Cockrill's Missouri Brigade, I ran out over the works about one hundred feet where I had noticed a flag go down. I picked up the flag, pulled it off the staff, and put it in my pocket. A fine-looking officer lying there covered with dead bodies asked me if I would remove them from his leg, as he was wounded in the knee. I got his leg free. Then he asked me for a drink out of my canteen. I leaned over and told him to drink. While he was drinking he asked me to unbuckle his sword belt, which I did. Just then I heard the wisp of a bullet, and, looking up, I saw another line about three hundred feet distant advancing. I turned and ran to our works, taking the belt and sword with me. These I presented to the Historical Society at St. Louis through General Harding, of Jefferson City.

The flag was of the 1st Missouri Infantry and was destroyed in the big fire in Chicago. The sword was the property of Col. Hugh Garland, commanding the 1st Missouri Regiment in that battle. Colonel Garland was undoubtedly killed where he lay after I left him, as he was in the line of the firing. I have no doubt but that I was the last person to whom Colonel Garland ever spoke. I have often wondered if any of his relatives were living. If so, I wish I could see them. I was glad to be able to give him a drink of water.

I have talked this battle over with our dear old Ex-Senator Cockrill, of Missouri, who was a brigade commander there and was wounded. He agrees with thousands of others that Franklin, Tenn., November 30, 1864, was the worst "slaughter pen" and the most bitterly contested of all our battles with more loss of life on the Confederate side for the number engaged than any battle of the Civil War.

The question has often been raised: "Why did General Hood fight that battle?" * * * If Hood had made an attack on us at Spring Hill, in my opinion a different tale would have been told, and the Northern army would have been routed; and if Hood had succeeded in breaking our lines at Franklin, he would have captured or killed all troops south of the river and would have come on into Nashville.

Van Horn's "History of the Army of the Cumberland" says there is nothing in the record of any war that shows so few men as Opdyke's Brigade had saved an army as they did that of the Cumberland at Franklin. Had we not retaken the works, Hood's army could and would have whipped each wing cut off in detail, and too much credit cannot be given to the men of Opdyke's Brigade for what they did that day. I have received a medal of honor for my part in that terrible battle. But I only did my duty. I believe this government should buy the ground and make the Franklin (Tenn.) battlefield a national park, and the different States should erect monuments there, as they have at Vicksburg, Chickamauga, and Gettysburg. This battle of Franklin was the turning point of the war in the Western armies.

General Hood allowed his army on the day after the battle to go over the field, and what the troops saw there (1,640 dead comrades) took all the fight out of them. That is why the battle of Nashville soon after was such a rout.

GENERAL SCHOFIELD FAVORED MONUMENT AT FRANKLIN.

Capt. Thomas Gibson, of Nashville, who served on the staff of Gen. John Adams (killed at Franklin), wrote a plea that the government take an interest in the battlefield of Franklin. He sent the print to Gen. J. M. Schofield, who wrote to him in reply:

"St. AUGUSTINE, FLA., December 11, 1901.

"Capt. Thomas Gibson, Nashville, Tenn.—Dear Sir: I have read your very interesting article in the Nashville Banner of November 30 on the battle of Franklin. It is entirely just in its estimate of the character and importance of that battle.

"I concur heartily in your general suggestion that the people should erect suitable monuments to commemorate the heroic sacrifices of the soldiers who gave their lives for the cause they had espoused and which they believed to be just. And I concur in your view that the battle of Franklin might well be regarded as an exceptional case. There the Confederate army made its last desperate effort to maintain an aggressive campaign. Its failure marked the beginning of the end—the restoration of the Union in which all now rejoice. The government of the United States might appropriately erect on that field a monument to commemorate the valor of the American soldiers, their fraternal reunion where the conflict was decided, and the glorious result to which this finally led in the hearty reunion of all the people."

THE BATTLEFIELD OF FRANKLIN.

BY T. C. HARBAUGH, CASSTOWN, OHIO.

It has been my fortune to visit nearly all the great battlefields of the great war, and among them all there is none that so impresses me as the field of Franklin. This is not so much on account of its natural beauty as for the valor displayed there by the veterans of both sides, who there covered themselves with imperishable glory. Franklin has an interest which no other battlefield possesses. The gigantic conflict which raged there November 30, 1864, took place when the fortunes of the heroic Confederacy were about to terminate in gloom. The crowning disaster of Appomattox was almost in sight; but the heroism of the South as displayed at Franklin added another star to the shining crown of her achievements.

Why this great battlefield has not been appropriately mapped and memorialized in bronze and granite has ever remained a mystery to me. It was not an epoch-making battle like Gettysburg or Chickamauga, but it stands out as a field of individual heroism above the many conflicts of the sixties. Any one who visits Franklin is thrilled by the memories that meet him there. It was largely fought by the young men of Tennessee, led by some of the bravest generals of the Confederacy; while the men of the Federal army were the youth of the North and West. It is to-day a crying shame that nothing has been done for the field of Franklin. It deserves monuments upon which should be inscribed the deeds of the men who fought there, that coming generations visiting this spot could read the lines dedicated to American valor.

Franklin will ever be connected with the heroism of Cleburne, Granbery, Gist, Adams, Strahl, and other Confederate leaders who ended their lives upon its crimsoned soil, as well as the rank and file of that heroic army in gray which stained its trenches with their blood. I have heard from the lips of Federal soldiers only praises for the fighting qualities of the men whom they met on the field of Franklin, and likewise Confederates have given unstinted praise to the gallantry of Federals there. It was American against American, and this is what has crowned Franklin forever as a field where valor clashed against itself. There is no more historic structure in our country to-day than the Carter House. A mighty memorial should rise where it stands, a memorial dedicated to the heroes of both armies who met on that ill-fated field, hand to hand, bayonet to bayonet, each struggling in the autumn dusk like Titans for the ascendancy.

Steps should be taken at once looking toward the proper marking of the field of Franklin. Ere long the last veteran of the two grand armies will have joined the "universal bivouac," and none will be left to attend the dedication of a monument to their valor at Franklin. The erection of a memorial shaft should be undertaken at once. It is wrong to postpone it longer. The Harpeth, which sings on its way to the sea, should have the honor of reflecting in its lispng waters a monument to the men who invested the battlefield of Franklin with deathless renown. All deserved well of their country, the men in gray and the men in blue, children alike of the greatest republic on earth. Kentucky has erected at Chickamauga a monument to all her sons who fought there. Let Tennessee or the general government do the same at Franklin. I hope to see the day, and trust it is not far distant, when high above the sword of Franklin will tower a stately shaft dedicated to the men who met in battle there and placed in Columbia's diadem a new star to American valor.

I saw the gentle Harpeth flow
Among the hills one day,
Where, when November's sun was low,
Fell fast the brave in gray;
I saw the daisies blow and nod
Where once the trenches rose,
And heard a song bird greet her God
Where legions met as foes.

I looked across the shimmering plain
From battle's echoes free,
And in the gloaming saw again
The brave Confederacy;
I saw the gray-clad legions form
In glory's endless line,
Baring their breasts to meet the storm
'Neath shattered oak and pine.

On, on they came in glory's van,
On, on with shining steel,
Shoulder to shoulder, man to man,
In battle's shock to reel.
I saw the line of deadly fire
That swept the trenches grim;
I saw the South's true sons expire
Within the battle's rim.

Brave were the men the Southrons met
On Franklin's field that day,
A gallant foe whose bayonet
Pressed sharp against the gray,
Heroic as their sires of old,
Upon the ground they stood,
And breasted, brave, undaunted, bold,
The battle's surging flood.

'Twas bayonet to bayonet,
 Amid the smoke of war,
 Till all the ground with blood was wet
 Beneath the twilight star,
 I heard the autumn breezes sing
 A requiem for the brave
 Who found within that crimson ring
 A gallant soldier's grave.

I'd weave a wreath for those who died
 That day in Southern gray,
 Who fell where glimmers Harpeth's tide
 And leaps its crystal spray;
 And here's a crown for those who yet
 Can muster in that line
 Which stood behind the bayonet
 In Franklin's shade and shine.

The years may softly come and go,
 Your valor will not fade;
 The Harpeth will forever flow
 Where you your record made;
 The daisy in her vestments white,
 The rose of crimson hue
 Will greet the morn and greet the night
 On Franklin's plain for you.

REUNION AT TIMOTHY, LA.

[From a report by Timothy Oakley, Adjutant.]

September 9 was a "red-letter day" for the people of Timothy, La., the occasion being the Reunion of the veterans of Camp Henry Gray and the barbecue dinner given in their honor. The people of Timothy did themselves proud. The committee was most active in seeing that every possible attention was shown every visitor. It was one of the largest gatherings ever held at Timothy, and in all the vast assemblage the best of order prevailed. There was no evidence whatever of any whisky being on the grounds. The best of feeling prevailed between all present.

The old veterans were made to feel that they were still held in the highest esteem by the people of the present generation. The veterans met many of their old comrades, and our hearts were saddened by reports that many had passed away since our last annual meeting.

A pleasing feature of the programme was the singing of "Dixie Land" by twenty-four little girls who stood while singing on the grand stand while Confederate flags fluttered in the breezes on every side.

There was speaking by Senator W. B. Boggs, of Plain Dealing, Attorney Pope, of Magnolia, J. H. Barnes, Lee Coyle, S. D. Knight, L. E. Russell, and others. Lieut. Charley B. Heflin, of Heflin, La., sang "Twenty Years Ago" and a love song of "Auld Lang Syne" that greatly delighted the young and old.

S. R. Wheeler, of Talladega, Ala., refers to an error in the account of the death of Gen. A. P. Stewart that appeared in the VETERAN for September, in which it is stated that he was in command of the Army of Tennessee at the close of the war. Of course it is known that Gen. Joseph E. Johnston was commander of the Army of Tennessee following Hood's disastrous Tennessee campaign. General Stewart was promoted after the death of Gen. Leonidas Polk to command his corps to the close of the war.

GEORGIA STATE REUNION.

It is impracticable to give in this issue of the VETERAN as full report as desired of the Georgia State Reunion, held in Atlanta October 22 and 23. There is much of general interest in the proceedings, which will be given later.

The Convention was held in the large Broughton Auditorium, and the attendance of old soldiers seemed large; but it was not until the parade on the 23d that a conception of the number in attendance was had. The veterans in the parade were estimated to be between three thousand and four thousand. Then the military of Georgia, a long line of carriages bearing U. D. C., L. M. A., and D. A. R., with their multitude of occupants and gorgeous decorations, together with a long line of schoolboys (perhaps a thousand), each one bearing a tiny Confederate battle flag and moving like a soldier, furnished a scene that was inspiring. It is not extravagant to state that under the circumstances the equal has not been seen at any State Reunion, and that it will perhaps never be equaled again.

It seemed beforehand that $7,000 was an unnecessary amount of money to be raised, and yet after so much hospitality the wonder is that so much of it could have been extended with that amount.

The Governor of the State, the Mayor of the city, and others made addresses, inspired by the magnitude of conditions, which were a credit to the Empire State of the South.

WELCOME AND FAREWELL.

[Reply of Hon. Joseph B. Cumming, of Augusta, to the welcome by the Governor of Georgia and the Mayor of Atlanta.]

It is certainly no small compliment for any man or any body of men to receive a welcome from the great State of Georgia and from the marvelous city of Atlanta. This high honor is enhanced in the present instance by this great State and this brilliant city putting forward their chief magistrates for the purpose of tendering it. Personally I esteem it a great privilege to be asked to express as far as I can for these old Confederates their appreciation of this distinguished honor; and in their name, your Excellency and Mr. Mayor, I voice their thanks, albeit feebly and inadequately. We are glad to launch so pleasantly and auspiciously this one of our Reunions, any one of which in the nature of things may be ultimate or at least penultimate.

As I am put forward to discourse of welcomes, permit me to speak not only of this one but also of others.

The welcome which you have given so cordially suggests others which the Confederate soldier has encountered along his pathway in war and in peace. As I speak memory flies back with its more than lightning speed to those early days of the great war, when companies of ardent volunteers were moving on to future battlefields to take their places in those armies which later on were to do deeds of deathless fame. What welcomes they received in every town and village! How the good things with which the then unwasted land abounded were lavished upon them! Wreaths and garlands of flowers, waving handkerchiefs, cheers from the multitude, similes and blandishments of the fair, benedictions of the old—these and much more were bestowed in abundance at every stage of "young Mowbray's journey to the war." Vivid even now are those far-off scenes to those of us who yet survive them, and unspeakable are the emotions which their memory after so many years still awakens in our hearts.

The welcome so ardently and lovingly bestowed on the soldiers of '61 was speedily followed, as to many of them, by another "welcome" of a far different character—the "welcome" which a brilliant orator coming from Ohio, but speaking to a sympathetic New England audience at the commencement of the war with Mexico, invoked at the hands of that people for the soldiers of the Union, which had not as yet suffered disruption—a "welcome with bloody hands to hospitable graves." Such "welcome" awaited soon many of those gallant soldiers who marched gayly to the front amidst the cheers and flowers, the smiles and benedictions which had accompanied their earlier welcome.

MAJ. JOSEPH B. CUMMING.

The next welcome to the Confederate soldier was when he returned at the end of the war defeated, disappointed, and discouraged. His welcome then almost without exception was to a family circle narrowed by the loss of some of its members—brother, father, son—whom the great war had claimed. Not infrequently his welcome was to a home marked by gaunt chimneys and beds of ashes. The accompaniments of his welcome in almost every instance were poverty, broken fortunes, and gloomy outlook. But this melancholy welcome was glorified by something of the heavenly. The noble, lovely women of the stricken land remained to console, to cheer, and to charm. Something of the heavenly, did I say? Aye, indeed! The nearest thing that I can imagine to this welcome of the returning Confederate soldier is the case of some poor mortal soul liberated from the sufferings of this world welcomed by the angels of heaven.

Welcome to the young soldiers marching to the wars; welcome of bloody graves to so many of them; welcome for returning soldiers to desolate homes, but loving hearts—these I have mentioned. And now we have reached the last stage of welcomes—the welcome extended by hospitable communities to a diminished and fast-diminishing number of that vast army which first and last marched under the flag of the stars and bars. Mingled with your words of welcome are expressions of praise and laudation. If we accept these as our due, do not on that account accuse us of a lack of becoming modesty. We base our claim to them not on valor nor on battles won. Valor is common to most men. Victories are ordained by the God of battles. But we base our claim on that attribute which raises poor mortals nearest to divinity—self-sacrifice. That was the crowning virtue of the Confederate soldier. Permit me to repeat myself on this theme. The enunciation of a truth cannot be repeated too often. And so I beg to be permitted to say again in substance and in form what I have said before on similar occasions—that I believe the sentiments of the average Confederate soldier: "That period of my life is the one with which I am most nearly satisfied—a period of persistent, steady effort to do my duty, an effort persevered in in the midst of privation, hardship, and peril. If ever I was unselfish, it was then. If ever I was capable of self-denial, it was then. If ever I was able to trample self-indulgence underfoot, it was then. If ever I was strong to make sacrifices, even unto death, it was then; and if I were called upon to say on the peril of my soul when it lived its highest life, when I was least faithless to true manhood, when I was most loyal to the best part of man's nature, I would answer: 'In those days when I followed a battle-torn flag through its shifting fortunes of victory and defeat!'"

Welcome. Farewell. How nearly alike are the two words! "Well" is the keynote of both. To the arriving guest we say in effect: "It is well that you have come." To him departing we express the wish that he may fare well on his journey. How near together and yet how far apart! The language of the great Roman people was in this like our own. With them too the two words kept close company. In one short sentence and in one salutation they united the two, "Salve et vale," welcome and farewell. Æneas, when with magnificent funeral ceremonies he awaited by the funeral pyre the body of the young hero Pallas, saluted it with "Welcome and farewell." Salve et vale: "Salve in eternum. mihi; in eternum vale."

Nothing could so emphasize the nearness of welcome to farewell as an occasion like this. In the very nature of things the welcome given on this occasion must tread close on the heels of farewell. Think of it! Those whom you are welcoming so generously are the diminished survivors of a war begun and ended nearly fifty years ago. The youngest of the soldiers of that war must needs be old men now. The average soldier of that period if still living has passed the limit sung by the poet king of Israel, and now, only "by reason of strength," lingers a little longer on the stage. Since they ceased to be soldiers Atlanta has had time to rise from her ashes and to grow into the magnificent city which now welcomes them. How near, then, under such circumstances must be your farewell to your welcome! What one of us listening to the music of your welcome does not seem to hear all through it the minor note, farewell? Indeed, must not this occasion in the very nature of things have less of the joyful reception of the guest than the affectionate speeding of his departure? Whatever language of cordiality and hospitality you may employ, however often you may use the word "welcome," there must arise in the minds of those who speak and of those who listen the thought that this is equally an occasion for the word "farewell." How many of those who now hear the gracious words of welcome will listen to them no more forever! How soon there will be occasion, so far as the Confederate soldier is concerned, for but one of these words, "Farewell!" How near together have the passing years brought welcome and farewell, Salve et vale!

GREETING BY MISS MAY FOREHAND, VIENNA, GA.

Veterans, Friends, and Daughters of the Confederacy: I am no orator, as these speakers are, but an earnest daughter of the Confederacy who loves the cause. I come bearing the greetings of the local Chapter of the Dooly County Daughters of the Confederacy, a company of local Southern women wishing me to place a garland of love upon the brow of the survivors of our Southern braves.

Since your last annual Reunion we have erected in a beautiful little park in the capital city of our county a Confederate veterans' monument at a cost of about $2,000. This beautiful piece of polished masonry stands topped with the chiseled form of a manly private soldier resting upon his gun, thus indicating that, while the war is ended and the battle is lost, the cause still lives. It is a monument erected to commemorate the valor of the Confederate soldier and to show what men and women would do for a cause they believed just and right. We want it to perpetuate the deeds of the men of '61 who went forth to meet an invading foe and who from battlefield to battlefield drove the enemy until subdued by starvation and overwhelming numbers.

I come bearing the greetings also of the Dooly County Camp of the Confederate Veterans. I covet no higher privilege as one of their daughters than to be their sponsor on this great occasion. I convey to you as survivors of that great army their congratulations on this your general Reunion day, for they deem it your duty as long as you live thus to assemble yourselves and memorialize in song and speech, in prose and verse the valorous deeds of fallen heroes.

[Here Miss Forehand recited the stanzas beginning with "Git my old knapsack, Mary, and my uniform of gray," etc. This was on title-page of VETERAN for June, 1908.—Ed.]

Yes, the brave boys of 1861-65! Who but mighty men of war could have taken the small resources of the South and stood for four long years against the well-equipped North with limitless resources? In population they stood as eleven to three, in soldiers as four and one-half to one, in money and resources as plus to minus. Think of it! The North had nearly twice as many soldiers to send home at the close of the war as the South had on the field at any time—two million six hundred thousand North in deadly combat against six hundred thousand South. For four years the conflict waged. When peace was declared and the smoke of battle was cleared away, nearly four to one lay on the field as slain by the Southern soldiers, with fifty thousand more prisoners of war than they had. This is too sad to make boastful mention of; it is only to reveal to our sons and daughters the noble heroism of their fathers as well as to do justice to the matchless leadership of the commander in chief, Robert E. Lee, and our other generals. He was a military genius, keen in foresight, masterly in strategy, wise in bravery. He was brilliant and scholarly, clear-headed and sweet-spirited. He had the temperament of a poet, the instincts of a business man, the qualities of a soldier, and the habits of a saint.

No, we rejoice not in the number slain or imprisoned by our Southern grays, but in the bravery impelling them on. Let our right arms lose their cunning and our tongues be silent ere we forget our fallen chieftains or cease to honor their brave deeds.

But the war is over. Now the sixties are more than two-score years past. General Lee realized at Appomattox that the end had come. He said: "It is the part of wisdom for us to acquiesce in the inevitable; to hope for the best, turning to our material interests, and await results." In this same spirit the bereaved widows and mothers of the South who with unselfish devotion had borne their part in that disastrous war received back home these heroes with pathetic smiles, and inspired them with new hope and courage to rebuild the shattered structure of Southern wealth. It is no vain boast to say that this has been done, and that the men and women of the South of to-day are worthy descendants of heroic sires.

MISS MAY FOREHAND.

So in all of the pathetic scenes of this hour, a commingling of tears for the fallen with our love for the living, we are nevertheless Americans, knowing one common country, with reverence for its imperial flag, its achievements, and its standing around the nations of the earth, in all of which we have a just pride as Southern patriots.

The delivery of the address was so happy, concluding with the entire "Conquered Banner," that a rousing yell that belongs to our veterans demonstrated thorough appreciation.

ATHENS GETS THE NEXT GEORGIA REUNION.

Comrade and Hon. A. L. Hull invited the Georgia veterans to Athens next year in an appeal so pertinent that without competition the Convention accepted by a rising vote of approval and thanks. He spoke briefly and concisely, saying:

"There are twelve hundred students at Athens. We are desirous to have the Reunion there, that in this day of commercialism these young Georgians may know that there is such a thing as sentiment—a sentiment which controls the actions of men, which impels them to maintain their rights, even though in maintaining them they suffer hardships and hunger and loss of property and even of life.

"Besides this, Athens has a claim on this Reunion. There is no city or town in the South which exerted so potential an influence in the formation of the Confederate States as did Athens. Of the seven Southern States which met in Montgomery to organize the Confederacy, Georgia, by common consent, was the most influential. Of the ten delegates from Georgia, Howell Cobb, Thomas R. R. Cobb, and Benjamin H. Hill were residents of Athens. Of the remaining seven, five—Robert Toombs, Alexander H. Stephens, Eugenius A. Nisbet, Augustus R. Wright, and Francis S. Bartow—were students at Athens, and at the formative period of their lives drew the inspiration there which fruited in their manhood.

"Eugenius A. Nisbet wrote the ordinance of secession of Georgia, Howell Cobb was the President of the Provisional Congress, Alexander H. Stephens was Vice President of the Confederate States, Robert Toombs was Secretary of State, Thomas R. R. Cobb virtually framed the Constitution, and Benjamin H. Hill was an influential member of the Confederate States Senate. Four of these became generals in the army, and two were killed in battle.

"What other city in the South can claim an equal influence in the formation of the Confederate States as Athens? I hope we shall see you there at the Reunion next October."

"GIRLS' CONFEDERATE HOME."

BY MRS. NATHANIEL GREEN WILLIAMS, FRANKLIN, TENN.

When we read in the reports of the Educational Committee of the U. D. C. of the scholarships bestowed by different institutions of learning, we feel constrained to add a small quota of praise to those whose generous impulses, taking tangible form, have made it possible for so many young women to fit themselves for teachers.

The Peabody College, at Nashville, offers free tuition to those who intend to become teachers; and when we shall have erected a girls' dormitory or Girls' Confederate Home in the vicinity, where board at a minimum price can be obtained, with all the home comforts, restrictions, and parental care exercised in discretion by a competent matron, we shall make it possible for many bright, ambitious young women to acquire an education and become self-supporting.

A diploma from Peabody College carries with it the open sesame to all the public schools and many private schools of the country for those seeking a position in them. Then, too, there are disadvantages under which many young women labor, even after obtaining scholarships. For example, three young girls from different sections of a neighboring State secured scholarships on a competitive examination. It was by the most economical living and the cheapest board.

Let every member of the U. D. C. strive to make it possible to educate one daughter or granddaughter by building this Girls' Confederate Home, and thus enable them to secure a comfortable home and board as the young men do at their universities.

Do not disregard this call, Daughters of the Confederacy, but aid in erecting this living memorial to our honored dead, and thus perpetuate the memory of those noble sires who gave all for their homes and loved ones.

If every Chapter in the Tennessee Division would raise $100 or every member give $1 per capita, our hopes would be realized in the grandest monument yet erected except the Soldiers' Home. Daughters, veterans, friends, take this matter up, and do not let Thanksgiving pass without an offering for this worthy, benevolent, and philanthropic cause.

A correction is due in the address given with the article on page 400 of the VETERAN for August by Mrs. Bettie J. Lindsey, which should have been Eufaula, Ind. T., instead of Alabama. It was read before the Stephen D. Lee Chapter.

TENNESSEE U. D. C. PROGRAMME.—The Historical Committee of the Tennessee Division, U. D. C., has issued its programme for 1909-10 in a pamphlet that will be remembered for its exquisite beauty and for the lofty sentiment, especially in its tribute to Dixie Land. The November and December suggestions are for the study of South Carolina. Public memorial service for January 19, 1909, is to be on Gen. Robert E. Lee, and the general outline for that month includes the settlement of Mississippi and comments upon Jefferson Davis as a statesman. The thirteenth annual Convention of the Division is to be held in Jackson during May, with Bishop Thomas F. Gailor as orator. The committee is composed of Mrs. Eleanor Molloy Gillespie (Chairman), Mrs. Emma Neil Gates, and Mrs. Corinne McCorry, of Jackson, Mrs. Newton White, of Pulaski, Mrs. Jean Dobbins, of Columbia, Mrs. George Blake, Nashville, and Mrs. Owen Walker, Franklin.

It was a happy inspiration by Mrs. Annie B. Voorhies, of San Francisco, which started the planting of a Confederate grove in each city where the General Convention U. D. C. is held to commemorate that meeting. Each State sends a tree typical of its forests, and this "tree-planting" is made quite a feature of the Conventions. This year the meeting will be in Atlanta, Ga., and the Mayor and Park Commissioners have offered a beautiful place in the City Park for the "Confederate Grove," and on the day before the Convention meets the planting will take place.

POLICE OF NASHVILLE AND ATLANTA—A WORD OF HUMOR.—In the resolutions of thanks by the Georgia Division, U. D. C., at its recent Convention in Atlanta thanks were expressed for the services of the police. There was no record of heroic deeds by those officers of the law. The Mayor in his welcome address had said: "You can sit in our best rockers, put your feet on the pianos, and spit on the carpets." The resolutions of thanks to the police of Atlanta recall the comment by "Will," a Nashville bootblack, who, thankful for a well-earned dime soon after the Tennessee Confederate Reunion the week before, said: "They had a good time. The police had nothing to do." The spirit of the old boys was thus illustrated by a member of Cavalry Troop A on the night parade (not a "night rider" in the usual sense): "I don't drink liquor, I don't smoke cigarettes, and I'm happy."

Capt. W. H. Gregg, of Kansas City, Mo., corrects a statement made by Mrs. E. Louise Strother in her article on page 500 of the VETERAN for October—that Col. B. G. Jeans and brother were executed with her brother-in-law at the time referred to. Captain Gregg says:

"I knew Col. B. G. Jeans and the entire Jeans family. There were three brothers, Beal, Lum, and Sam. Lum, being an invalid, was shot down at his home in Jackson County by Kansas Jayhawkers about 1863; Sam became insane and died. Colonel Jeans left this county in the eighties.

"My own dear wife, I think, deserves to be placed on the list of Missouri heroines. I married her November 3, 1864, and took her to Texas on horseback to prevent her imprisonment. In our party were two other ladies and fifty men; and besides the many hardships, we had one day's fighting, and, being in the enemy's country, we were obliged to keep the women near the command. They heard many bullets whiz. In this day's fighting we killed forty-five nigger Indians and white soldiers without the loss of a man killed or wounded. This was our bridal tour."

SAM DAVIS, AN AMERICAN HERO.

AN ADDRESS BY THE MONUMENT COMMITTEE.

The Legislature of the State of Tennessee by resolution authorized the location of a monument to Sam Davis within the Capitol grounds, and a committee clothed with proper power was designated to carry out the provisions of this resolution.

This committee has selected the site on the most fitting and unique promontory of this magnificent area, near the southwest entrance at Vine and Cedar Streets, and has completed the concrete foundation, ready to receive the marble paving inclosure and base for the statue.

The Zolnay bust of Davis, exhibited to a million people at the Tennessee Centennial, is the accepted personification of the hero, and the artist has designed a full figure of heroic size, clothed in his Confederate gray jacket, with trousers tucked in cavalry boots, just as worn by the martyr when he so heroically met his death. This statue is now at the bronze works ready for casting.

All who are familiar with this sad story and have observed the pose, features, expression, and air of this conception of Sam Davis will be gratified to anticipate its perfection in complete heroic figure of bronze. It will give increased sympathy and admiration for the patriotic hero—awakening emotions akin to worship.

Sam Davis was a youth of Tennessee who, like many another of her boys, went to war in 1861 for home and friends, except that he was tried as never soldier was, and through his trial lives, and the wonderful story of his life will, regardless of sectional lines, stimulate men and women to continue to sacrifice for truth and principle.

Young Davis belonged to Shaw's Scouts, who, under orders from General Cheatham, were operating in Tennessee around their very homes, when they were nearly all, including Captain Shaw himself, captured by the Federals of General Dodge's command. Valuable papers were found on the person of Davis, clearly implicating him. Shaw was in the prison also at the time, but was known as Coleman.

Davis was tried by court-martial. The evidence being clear, he was convicted and sentenced to be hanged. The same death for the violation of the same rule of war was met by Nathan Hale eighty years before when acting under General Washington's order, the difference, giving Davis the greater distinction, being that he was offered life and liberty under conditions which he declined as dishonorable.

As Davis went to his death immunity was offered him if he would tell who gave him the papers found on his person. His captain, Shaw, had given them to him, and was then in the same prison at Pulaski. He refused to purchase his own life at the price of another's. The Son of Man says: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Sam Davis said: "If I had a thousand lives, I would lose them all here and now before I would betray my friends or the confidence of my informer." Nathan Hale said: "I regret I have but one life to give to my country." Monuments erected by the American people to Nathan Hale stand in numerous places, and now after forty-five years we, encouraged by nearly every State in the Union, have come to build a monument to Sam Davis's memory.

Let us make it so suitable, so beautiful, so suggestive, so true that those living who knew him and his record for truth and honor and those who may come after and read that story in this monument will feel only pride in the consciousness that they are fellow-men of Sam Davis, of Tennessee.

By the committee: Joseph W. Allen, J. M. Lee, John W. Thomas, J. W. Childress, R. H. Dudley, G. H. Baskette; J. C. Kennedy, Treasurer; S. A. Cunningham, Secretary; E. C. Lewis, Chairman. [The first four have died.]

The committee desires to raise a sum sufficient to complete this monument according to the design. We desire that the monument shall be eminently fitting to the subject and appropriate to the place. Of this amount there is now on hand $5,000. Contributions are solicited to make the sum desired, $6,000, and should be sent to the Treasurer, John C. Kennedy, Nashville.

Wishing to complete this monument at once, request is made of all persons interested in this worthy cause to send their names with amounts or remittances promptly, so that the scope of plans may be determined and the work completed. Will you not kindly send — dollars?

Nashville, Tenn., November, 1908.

The editor of the VETERAN is gratified with the promise of completing this monument very soon. He recalls his dread of responsibility in beginning to raise money for it.

Since the estimates as above by the committee more elaborate work has been determined, so that considerably more than the estimate will be necessary. Therefore it will be opportune to remit now by those who desire to contribute to the honor of this incomparable young Confederate hero. One gentleman who had contributed $25, realizing the necessity of a large increase, increases his donation to $100.

Remember that the entire list of subscriptions is to be published in the December VETERAN, and it would be a happy condition to place in the corner stone the entire list of names.

WAR RECORDS ON SAM DAVIS.

The following official paper from "headquarters left wing 16th Army Corps, Pulaski, Tenn., November 20, 1863," is signed by G. M. Dodge, brigadier general:

"Maj. R. M. Sawyer, A. A. G. Department of Tennessee: I herewith inclose a copy of dispatch taken from one of Bragg's spies, Samuel Davis. He had a heavy mail, papers, etc., and Captain Coleman is pretty well posted. I think I will have him in a day or two. We have broken up several bands of mounted robbers and Confederate cavalry in the last week, capturing some five commissioned officers and one hundred enlisted men, who have been forwarded. I also forward a few of the most important letters found in the mail. The toothbrushes and blank books I was greatly in need of, and therefore appropriate them. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
G. M. DODGE, Brigadier General."

AN ORDER FROM GENERAL SHERMAN TO GENERAL DODGE.

On November 12 General Sherman wrote from Winchester to General Dodge at Pulaski: "Whilst at Pulaski let your mounted men hunt out the pests that infest that country. Show them no mercy; and if the people don't suppress guerrillas, tell them your orders are to treat the community as enemies. If they keep order and quiet, then pay for corn and hogs, etc., or give vouchers; but eat up all the supplies—grain, hogs, and cattle—of Elk River."

Sherman wrote to Dodge from Bridgeport, Ala., in November: "I think it right to make citizens earn good treatment."

On November 11 General Dodge wrote to Col. J. W. Fuller, commanding brigade: "All destruction of property must be prohibited. * * * For everything taken by the proper officers proper receipts must be given."

SEVENTH TENNESSEE CAVALRY.

BY COL. W. L. DUCKWORTH, BROWNSVILLE, TENN.

To the communication in the June (1908) VETERAN, page 268, signed by R. J. Black, Memphis, Tenn., I feel impelled to make reply.

With his narrative as a whole I shall have nothing to do. It is the closing sentence only with which I wish to deal—namely, "Col. W. F. Taylor commanded the 7th Tennessee to the close of the war." A similar erroneous statement occurs in the book entitled "The Seventh Tennessee Cavalry," by J. P. Young. In the closing sentence of page 101 of this book is the following statement: "This left the regiment under the command of Lieut. Col. W. F. Taylor, and it so continued until it assembled at Gainesville, Ala., to be surrendered in May, 1865." Immediately preceding this statement there appears this: "And next day Colonel Duckworth was sent to Mobile." This is an error. I was not sent to Mobile next day nor any other day. In truth, I was never in Mobile, Ala., from the day of my birth to the present time.

The book is in error at another point. The regiment was never assembled at Gainesville, Ala., for parole or for any other purpose during the war. Mr. Black and the book agree, however, on this one point: that Col. W. F. Taylor commanded the regiment until the end of the war. What became of Colonel Duckworth they do not pretend to say, leaving the reading public to infer, inasmuch as he had been "sent to Mobile," whose prison was at that time the synonym of degradation and infamy, that his sun went down in darkness and his life out in disgrace.

When I called Judge J. P. Young's attention to these errors, he recognized the injustice and gravity of them, sympathized with me, and said he would be glad to do anything in his power to right the wrong if any way could be found by which it could be done. He informed me that he had nothing to do with the subject-matter of the book; he was only employed to edit and bring out the book. For his courtesy and kindness he has my thanks.

It is a fact that W. F. Taylor was lieutenant colonel of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry, that he was in command of the regiment during my absence from September, 1864, to April, 1865; but it is also a fact that I was ordered to "report for duty to these headquarters" (headquarters of 1st Division of Forrest's Cavalry, Brig. Gen. James R. Chalmers commanding) in April, 1865, which, having obeyed, I received orders signed by Brig. Gen. W. H. Jackson (acting temporarily for General Chalmers) to proceed to the head of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry and to take command of same as per my commission, which I did.

After some uneventful days, we were transported down the Black Warrior to Sumterville, Ala.; from thence we were led out three or four miles by a staff officer to a place which he had selected for a camp for Brig. Gen. A. W. Campbell, and here we were located and remained for several weeks. Here we received information of the surrender of our department by Lieut. Gen. Dick Taylor. This made us all prisoners of war. Here also we were informed of the appointment of two commissioners, one by each of the two hitherto belligerent governments, to settle all matters occasioned by the surrender of our department, including paroles for all of us who were Confederate soldiers, and that the commissioner to represent the United States government was E. S. Dennis, brigadier general United States Volunteers, and that the commissioner to represent the Confederate States government was W. H. Jackson, brigadier general Confederate States Volunteers, and that the joint office of these commissioners for this business was located at Gainesville, Ala., about twelve miles from our camp.

Soon we were ordered to disarm and surrender all implements of war and properties of the Confederate States in our possession. Following this was an order to make a roster of our regiment by companies preparatory to receiving paroles. When these orders had been executed, I took two officers of my staff and went down to the commissioners at Gainesville; and after attending to all official requirements and receiving my own parole and that for the officers with me from the hands of the commissioners, we returned to camp, and soon every officer and soldier in the 7th Tennessee Cavalry had his parole and we were all citizens of the United States government again. Only one more order came from General Campbell's headquarters, and that was to appoint the day when we were to break camp and set out for our homes, the routes we were to travel, and the order in which we were to march and disband.

My commission as colonel of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry, C. S. A., which is before me, bears the date of November 10, 1863. It was sent to me from Richmond. I never sought it; neither was I expecting it. I held five commission offices during the Civil War, and was never a candidate for one of them.

My parole is also before me. It bears the date of May 12, 1865. It is first marked "approved" by General Jackson, then signed by both commissioners. This statement of facts and figures settles the question as to who was colonel and who "commanded the 7th Tennessee Cavalry to the end of the war."

The foregoing paper being in reply to some controverted question, it was submitted to Judge J. P. Young and to R. J. Black, so that each statement might appear for our reading

JUDGE YOUNG'S RESPONSE TO COLONEL DUCKWORTH.

The article of Col. W. L. Duckworth, of Brownsville, entitled "Seventh Tennessee Cavalry," inasmuch as it refers to the book so entitled in terms of protest, requires some notice. The book was written by me eighteen years ago and before the war records containing the reports of that period of the war were published. A year or two since Colonel Duckworth, formerly commander of my regiment, called to see me and stated that I was in error in saying in the book that Col. W. F. Taylor was in command of the 7th Tennessee at the surrender, as he had reassumed command under an order issued by Gen. W. H. Jackson before the surrender and actually commanded the regiment at the time. The writer told Colonel Duckworth that he had nothing to do with the subject-matter of the book; but, his company having been at that time on detached service, he relied upon the statements of his comrades for information as to those occurrences. The statements referred to were in the elaborate sketch of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry, prepared by a committee of the regiment for Lindsley's "Confederate Military Annals of Tennessee." That sketch on page 644 of said volume asserted that Colonel Duckworth had been sent to Mobile. The writer promised Colonel Duckworth that if furnished the orders reassigning him to command by General Jackson he would be glad to correct the error in a letter to the VETERAN. This, however, was never furnished by Colonel Duckworth.

It is to be deplored that controversies arise among old comrades, and no one is more desirous of doing justice to them than the writer. The war records are silent about these transactions except as to one letter, written by General Chalmers, which will be quoted herewith, and Colonel Duckworth's name is not otherwise mentioned in the whole series except with credit to himself outside of this letter so far as the writer knows. The letter referred to is as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS CHALMERS'S DIVISION, FORREST'S CAVALRY,
WEST POINT, MISS., Sept. 12, 1864.

"Col. F. M. Stewart, 15th Tennessee Cavalry; Col. J. U. Green, 12th Tennessee Cavalry; Col. W. L. Duckworth, 7th Tennessee Cavalry; Col. J. J. Neely, 14th Tennessee Cavalry; Maj. P. T. Allin, 26th (Tennessee) Battalion.

"Gentlemen: I am directed by Brigadier General Chalmers to say to you in reply to your note of this morning that by paragraph 1 of General Orders No. 73, from headquarters Forrest's Cavalry, dated Grenada, August 30, 1864, the regiments under your respective commands were organized into a brigade 'to be designated as Rucker's Brigade,' and by paragraph 2 of the same order Col. E. W. Rucker was assigned permanently to the command of that brigade. Colonel Rucker having reported for duty, you will obey promptly all orders issued by or coming through him.

"A copy of the letter referred to above was sent some days since from these headquarters to Colonel Neely, who was then commanding your brigade, and it was his duty to have issued copies of it promptly to the different regiments under his command; but the General learns with regret that this duty was neglected and the order permitted to lie unpublished in his office, a neglect of duty which deserves censure. As, however, Colonel Neely had regular official information of the existence of that order, which was indeed in his own hands, and as some others of you had verbal information of the existence of such an order, the General thinks that the fact that you have not received official copies of it affords scarcely a decent pretext for hesitating to obey orders issued by or coming through Colonel Rucker.

"I am, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant, W. A. GOODMAN, Assistant Adjutant General."

As to the whereabouts of Colonel Duckworth after his suspension from the command of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry immediately following the foregoing letter of General Chalmers or when he returned to the regiment, the writer has no personal knowledge. But upon application to Col. W. F. Taylor, the former lieutenant colonel of the regiment, he has been furnished the following statement which may throw some light upon these disputed historical facts.

Colonel Taylor's statement:

"MEMPHIS, TENN., October 10, 1908.

"J. P. Young, Esq.—Dear Comrade: In response to your inquiry will say that when our colonel was suspended from the command of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry at West Point, Miss., about September 15, 1864, I was ordered by General Forrest to take command of the regiment, and I continued to command it for the remainder of the war, and surrendered it at Gainesville, Ala., May 12, 1865. I received orders from no one except our brigadier general during that time.

"Sincerely yours,
W. F. TAYLOR."

It was upon information derived from living sources that the history of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry was based, the writer using occasionally for reference the article in Lindsley's "Military Annals," above referred to, and there was no purpose to depreciate Colonel Duckworth's career in any way. Indeed, an inspection of the little book will show that its pages are highly complimentary to him all through; and if the writer made an error in saying that he had been sent to Mobile, as stated in the "Annals," he very much regrets it.

MR. R. J. BLACK'S REPLY TO COLONEL DUCKWORTH.

In the article written by me in the JUNE VETERAN, page 268, is mentioned Col. W. L. Duckworth, of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry Regiment, as having been relieved from his post of duty upon the reorganization of the brigade. My statement was that the brigade, and not the regiment, was reorganized. Toward the end of my article I meant to say that Col. W. F. Taylor commanded the regiment to the close of the war from about September, 1864. Colonel Duckworth may have been near by, but I did not observe that he was with his regiment at the time of surrender at Gainesville, Ala., about May 12, 1865.

The Colonel seems to think that I should not have mentioned his name, and I had no idea of making any adverse comments as to him at the time. He is held in high esteem by me, and I merely wished to convey the idea that Lieutenant Colonel Taylor was in command of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry during his temporary absence.

THE CABELLS AND THEIR KIN.

A biography of Gen. William L. Cabell appears in a volume entitled "The Cabells and Their Kin," edited by the Hon. Alexander Brown, now out of print. It contains in detail an elaborate history of the Cabell family. In it is a sketch of Mrs. Sarah Epes Doswell Cabell, who was born April 27, 1802; and died August 5, 1874, at the residence of her son, the Hon. George C. Cabell, in Danville, Va. There were eleven children: Pocahontas Rebecca, John Roy, Virginia J., William Lewis, Powhatan Bolling, an infant that died unnamed, Algernon Sidney, George Craighead, Sarap Epes, Joseph R., and Benjamin Edward Cabell.

William Lewis Cabell was born in Danville, Va., January 1, 1827. He entered the United States Military Academy, West Point, in June, 1846, and graduated in 1850; entered the United States army as second lieutenant of the 7th Infantry, and was promoted first lieutenant in June, 1855, and captain in March, 1858. He served in the Utah expedition, at Fort Kearny, Fort Arbuckle, Fort Cobb, etc. In March, 1861, he resigned from the United States army, and cast his lot with his people. He entered the Confederate States army, was commissioned major, and under orders from President Davis went to Richmond on April 21, 1861, to organize the commissary, quartermaster, and ordnance departments.

On June 1, 1861, he was ordered to Manassas as chief quartermaster of the Army of the Potomac [Northern Virginia.—EDITOR VETERAN] on General Beauregard's staff. After the battles of July 18 and 21, he served on Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's staff until January 15, 1862, when he was transferred to the Trans-Mississippi Department, under General Van Dorn. He was soon promoted brigadier general, and assigned to the command of all the troops along White River. After the battle of Elk Horn, March 6 and 7, 1862, this army was transferred to the east side of the Mississippi River. The removal, being under the especial charge of General Cabell, was performed within a week. He continued in active service in this army, and especially distinguished himself in the battles of Iuka and Saltillo in September, at Corinth October 2 and 3, and at Hatchies Bridge October 4. He was wounded while leading his brigade upon the breastworks at Corinth and again at Hatchies Bridge, which disabled him from command for some time. Owing to his fighting qualities, he was called "Old Tige" by his soldiers.

While recuperating from his wounds he was ordered to inspect the staff department of the Trans-Mississippi Army. When able to report for duty, in February, 1863, he was placed in command of the forces in Northwest Arkansas, and succeeded in organizing one of the largest and finest brigades of cavalry west of the Mississippi. He commanded this noted brigade in 1863-64, leading it into many severe engagements. On the raid into Missouri, under General Price, he was captured on October 24, 1864, taken to Johnson's Island, in Lake Erie, thence to Fort Warren, in Boston Harbor, where he was confined until August 28, 1865.

He was married July 22, 1856, to Harriet A. Rector (eldest daughter of Maj. Ellis Rector and Catherine Duval, his wife) at her father's residence, near Fort Smith, Ark. She was known among the Osage as "Shingo," meaning the "Little Bird." The Rectors were from Fauquier County, Va., and the Duvals from near Parkersville, W. Va., but of Huguenot origin; while the Rectors were of English ancestry. Mrs. Cabell died while upon a visit to her mother April 16, 1887. To them were born seven children—viz.: Benjamin E., Katie Doswell, John J., Lawrence Duval, and Lewis Rector Cabell. The other two died in infancy.

The contributor of the above is Frank D. Brown, of Philipsburg, Mont., who succeeds Paul A. Fusz as Major General in command of the Northwest Division, U. C. V. He mentions General Cabell as the only other than President Davis "tried for treason." He evidently means that charges were preferred against General Cabell; but it is well known that there were none tried.

ONE OF OUR YOUNGEST SOLDIERS.

A report from Louisville, Ky., states that John H. Whallen, of that city, is "the youngest Confederate veteran in the United States." His friends make this claim and Gen. Basil Duke vouches for it.

The war ended forty-three years ago, and Colonel Whallen, now only fifty-seven years old, saw three years' service in the great struggle between the States. There may be men younger than he who fought in the Confederate army, as a man who enlisted at the age of thirteen in the last year of the war, now only fifty-six years old; but there is no man of his age who can point to three years' service as a real soldier.

Colonel Whallen was eleven years old when he enlisted in the Confederate army. He lived in Alexandria, Ky., twelve miles south of Cincinnati; and when some youths of the neighborhood formed a party to cast their fortunes with the South, Whallen, who was well grown for his age and of most adventurous spirit, persuaded them to accept him. On their first start a band of home guards who had learned what they were about undertook to intercept them. There was a sharp brush, and Whallen shot one man, wounding him seriously. He met this man after he returned from the war, and they became good friends.

Whallen and his comrades joined the 4th Kentucky Cavalry. Whallen was assigned to Capt. Bart Jenkins's company, and from that time on he was a soldier and knew real war. His company was chiefly on duty in Southwestern Virginia; and although it participated in few big battles, it was in constant fighting and skirmishes, and the work was harder and more dangerous than that which fell to armies that enjoyed respites between combats, as each man had to rely more on his individual prowess.

Capt. Bart Jenkins says that Whallen was one of his best soldiers, and General Duke, who frequently met him during the war, says the same. Captain Jenkins's most thrilling story is of the time he and Whallen were besieged in a house by bushwhackers. Jenkins was ill and Whallen was hardly large enough to handle a gun, but they beat off the band until aid came.

Whallen served until mustered out in 1865, when he was just fourteen years old. He lives in Louisville, owns the Buckingham Theater, is treasurer of the Empire Circuit, and has business interests that make him one of Louisville's prominent citizens. His most cherished possession is a cross of honor that was bestowed on him by the Daughters of the Confederacy for his services.

THE FIRST SUBMARINE BOAT.

BY ARTHUR P. FORD, AIKEN, S. C.

In the February number of the VETERAN appeared an article by Charles Moran, describing the first submarine boat to engage in actual warfare, which is so inaccurate that I feel impelled to give the facts. In my book, "Life in the Confederate Army," published by the Neale Publishing Company, there is an account of this boat, and I extract what relates to it as follows:

"It was about this time, 1863 (not 1864), that I saw that celebrated torpedo submarine boat, the Hundley (not the David), the first submarine boat ever built. As I was standing on the bank of the Stone River (near Charleston) I saw the boat passing along the river, where her builder, H. L. Hundley, had brought her for practice. I watched her as she disappeared around a bend in the river, and little thought of the fearful tragedy that was immediately to ensue. She made an experimental dive, stuck her nose in the mud, and drowned her entire crew. Her career was such an eventful one that I record what I recollect of it.

"She was built in Mobile by W. L. Hundley and brought to Charleston in 1863. She was of iron, about twenty feet long, four feet wide, and five feet deep—in fact, not far from round, as I have seen it stated—and equipped with two fins, by which she could be raised or lowered in the water. The intention of her builder was that she should dive under an enemy's vessel with a torpedo in tow which would be dragged against the vessel and exploded, while the Hundley, or Fish, as some called her, rose on the other side. She was worked by a hand propeller and equipped with water tanks, which could be filled or emptied at pleasure, and thus regulate her sinking or rising. The first experiment was made with her in Mobile Bay, and she went down all right with her crew of seven men, but did not come up, and every man died, asphyxiated, as no provision had been made for storing a supply of air.

"As soon as raised she was brought to Charleston, and a few days after her acceptance by General Beauregard Lieutenant Payne, of the Confederate navy, volunteered with a crew of six men to man her and attack the Federal fleet off Charleston. While he had her at Fort Johnson, on James Island, and was making preparations for the attack, one night as she was lying at the wharf the swell of a passing steamer filled her, and she went to the bottom, carrying with her and drowning the six men. Lieutenant Payne happened to be near an open manhole at the moment and escaped. Notwithstanding the evidently fatal characteristics of this boat, as soon as she was raised another crew of six men, under Payne, volunteered and took charge of her. But only a week afterwards an exactly similar accident happened while she was alongside the wharf at Sumter, and only Payne and two men escaped.

"H. L. Hundley, her builder in Mobile, now believed that the crews did not understand how to manage the Fish, and came on to Charleston to see if he could not show how it should be done. A Lieutenant Dixon, of Alabama, had made several successful experiments with the boat in Mobile Bay, and he also came on and was put in charge with a volunteer crew, and made several successful dives in Charleston Harbor. But one day, the day upon which I saw the boat, Hundley himself took her into Stone River to practice her crew. She went down all right, but did not come up; and when she was searched for and found and raised to the surface, all of her crew were dead, asphyxiated, as others had been.

"After the boat was brought to Charleston, several successful experiments were made with her, until she attempted to dive under the Confederate receiving ship, Indian Chief, when she became entangled with an anchor chain and went to the bottom, remaining there until raised with every one of her crew dead, as were their predecessors.

"No sooner had she been raised than a number of men begged to be allowed to give her another trial, and Lieutenant Dixon was given permission to use her in an attack on the United States Steamship Housatonic, a new gunboat that lay off Beach Inlet on the bar, on condition that she should not be used as a submarine boat, but only on the surface with a spar torpedo. On February 17, 1864, Lieutenant Dixon, with a crew of six men, made his way with the boat through the creeks behind Sullivan's Island to the inlet. The night was not very dark, and the Housatonic was easily seen lying at anchor, unmindful of danger. The Fish went directly for her, and the torpedo striking the Housatonic tore a tremendous hole in her side. The ship sank to the bottom in about four minutes; but as the water was not very deep, her masts remained above water, and all of her crew except four or five saved themselves by climbing into the rigging. But the Fish was not seen again. From some unknown cause she again sank, and all her crew perished. Several years after the war, when the government was clearing the wrecks and obstructions out of Charleston Harbor, the divers visited the scene of this attack, and on the sandy bottom of the sea found the hulk of the Housatonic and alongside of her the shell of the Fish. Within the latter were skeletons of her devoted crew."

The submarine torpedo boat, the Hundley, or the Fish, has often been confused with surface torpedo boats called Davids. There was only one Hundley, but many Davids. The first David was designed and built at Charleston in the summer of 1863 by Dr. St. Julien Ravenel and Mr. Theodore Stoney, if my memory serves me right. They were cigar-shaped crafts, about thirty feet long, and each carried a torpedo at the end of a spar from the bow. They were propelled by miniature steam engines. The Confederate government built a number of them for use along the coast. It was on one of these crafts that Glassell distinguished himself.

[This article should have had earlier attention, as others had called attention to the seeming erroneousness of the accounts published in the VETERAN for February. In this connection reference is made to the article in the VETERAN for September, Pages 456-459, by Capt. Hunter Davidson.—ED.]

THE CROWN OF LIFE.

BY DR. THOMAS CALVERT, WASHINGTON, D. C.

[The author of this beautiful poem is an honorary member of the Henry Wilson Post, G. A. R.]

O Life! What is it that thou hast to give us
That we should cling tenaciously to thee?
Why should we envy those who may outlive us
And find our strongest wish the wish to be?
Life's mottled floor is evermore alluring,
With its alternate flecks of light and shade;
Nor do we think when pains we are enduring
'Twere better if beyond its pale we strayed.

Our hopes may sadly march in line before us
As ghosts of what had not the life to last,
And griefs that through the bitter waters bore us
Come back to us across the murky past.
Perhaps for roses plucked the thorns have torn us,
Perhaps each sunny ray was lost in shade,
And all the joys that up to heaven have borne us
Perhaps have fallen and in earth are laid.

Although we know that living means more sorrow,
As ever faster dear ones pass away;
Yet though each day we fear a dark to-morrow,
For that to-morrow would we gladly stay.
We may not know what is the wish inspiring
That we may long remain in mortal life,
Endure its grief and share its toil, untiring,
And ever ready for its constant strife.

Yet that ambition permeates our being
And ever rules us from our infant days,
And in the skies above we're ever seeing
Grand palaces the future is to raise.
And what may be the wellspring of this clinging
To search for sprites that evermore elude,
To siren hopes that wrecks for us are bringing,
To smiling fays that strike with hand so rude?

It is the fond hope in our souls implanted
That we, ere from this life we pass away,
May see fulfillment of ambition granted
That we may blaze the path through which we stray;
That we may marks and warnings leave behind us
To help the lives of those who follow on
And see our tracks, while pressing on to find us,
With blessings on our names when we are gone!

This is the crowning of all living—
To leave a name that shall with honor shine,
To win the fame of generously giving
A life for others with a love divine.
All other fruit of life is but a cinder
That falls to ashes at Time's lightest blow;
Wealth, station, power may be but clogs that hinder
The rise to heights of an immortal glow!

The soldier true wards harm and ill from others
And faces death, himself to meet all blows.
He shows he loves his fellow-men as brothers,
And wins the honor even of his foes.
To risk his life for others is his glory—
A glory that shall e'er illumine his name,
And when the record tells his noble story
Shall place it high upon the scroll of fame!

BEVERLY YOUNG, OF MISSISSIPPI.

DR. B. F. WARD, IN WINONA TIMES.

Miss Lucile Webb Banks has written a graphic and beautiful description of Waverly, the magnificent ancestral home of the Youngs, situated on the Tombigbee River, near Columbus, Miss. It was occupied at that time by two old bachelor brothers, Capt. William Lowndes Young and Maj. George Valley Young, familiarly known as "Major Val" and "Captain Billy." These two patriotic and hospitable old gentlemen had a brother, Beverly Young, who was a private soldier of Company I, Van Dorn Rifles, 11th Mississippi Regiment. He was one of the first to enlist, and served as a private till he received his fatal wound in a desperate charge at Gettysburg.

Though wealthy, Beverly Young was modest, unassuming, and unpretentious, yet genial and courageous in the face of every danger. He was severely wounded in the leg in the last day's battle; but with a crooked oak limb which he had found and used as a crutch he could hobble around a little, and insisted on my giving attention to others whom he considered were in more urgent need than himself, saying that he could wait. For protection from a July sun I had laid a number of the very badly wounded on the ground in an oak grove through which ran an insignificant little brook. The night after General Lee retired, leaving five or six thousand wounded on the field, an unexpected rain fell in torrents. Quickly the little stream overflowed its banks and flooded the ground where our wounded lay from ankle- to knee-deep. It was very dark. We were apprehensive that some of the brave fellows would drown before we could get them out, but we rescued them all. I waded in water knee-deep to where I knew a man was lying with his head at the root of a large oak. Hearing nothing from him, I thought he was drowned, and, stooping down to feel for him, I touched an uplifted hand wet and cold as the chill of death. I spoke to him. He recognized my voice and faintly answered: "Doctor, I thought I was gone and was holding up my hand in prayer." The water was up to his chest, but he had rested his head against the root of the tree to keep above water. I took him by the arms, raised him into a sitting position, and, kneeling in the water with my back to his chest and making him clasp his arms around my neck, I staggered to my feet and carried him to high land, although his weight was greater than mine.

When daylight came we were confronted with a sad spectacle. The poor fellows were wet and chilled, their wounds were soaked with dirty water, and none of them had a change of clothes. Near by were a farmhouse and a very large brick barn which was filled with straw. I walked up to the house, and was met by a typical Pennsylvania farmer. I saw the hard lines in his face and realized the rigor of the judgment seat before which I stood. How I did wish for the eloquence of Paul that I might have made that old Hessian Felix tremble! I did my pathetic best. I wanted straw worse than the Israelites did in the brickyards of Egypt, but could not get it without the money. I told him I had not a dollar of funds that would be current in his country, and reminded him that on the battlefields of Virginia many Federal wounded had fallen into my hands, and that I had always extended to them the same care and attention given to my own wounded; but he was not in the "reciprocity" business. I then inquired how much he would charge for straw enough to make beds for a certain number of wounded, as I wanted it only for the worst and most helpless cases. He replied that I might have the straw for five dollars.

I walked back with a heavy heart, and I feel till yet the anguish that seized me when I looked on the pale and pinched features of those intrepid and bleeding boys a thousand miles from home dying upon the bare, wet, inhospitable soil of a heartless enemy without even an old Confederate blanket between them and a dying couch. I told them I had not a dollar with which to purchase the straw to make them a bed.

Beverly Young was sitting down by a tree waiting for his clothes to dry on him. He put his hand in his pocket, took out a five-dollar gold piece, the last he had and that he had saved through many months of hunger and want for such an emergency as had now overtaken him, and said: "Here, Doctor, take this and pay the old Shylock for his straw." I replied that he was going to a Yankee prison, that he was badly wounded and would sorely need that money, and that I did not feel that it was right to take it. He said: "Yes, take it and provide for those boys; they are worse off than I am." I went back, dropped the coin in the old man's hand, and his eyes glittered like a basilisk's as he clutched it. I think his greed was the more gratified because it was blood money. We all went to work packing the straw in our arms, stripping the wet clothes from the boys, and covering them naked in the straw while we hung their soiled, bloody garments out to dry.

Brave, great-hearted "Bev" Young, crippled, penniless, suffering the cruelties and inhumanities of a Northern prison! He died of wounds! The people of Columbus ought to build a monument to his memory with a five-dollar gold coin embossed upon its face and an inscription under it something like this: "Beverly Young, wounded and a prisoner, gave his last dollar to his suffering and dying comrades."

Monuments are an important part of history. They are books that never go out of print and require no new editions to bring them up to date. They are the milestones of the centuries, the oracles of the ages. They inspire the youths and young men to emulate the heroism, the manhood, and the patriotism of their ancestors. * * * There was more heroism in Beverly Young's contribution of his last cent to his suffering comrades than in his charge the day before on the blazing line of the enemy's breastworks. * * * To carve the memory of this deed in stone would be an eloquent appeal to the embryonic manhood and womanhood of our children as lasting as the famous oration of Demosthenes over the Athenian dead who had fallen in a losing battle as disastrous to Greece as Gettysburg to the Confederacy.

THE STORY OF SABINE PASS.

W. E. Sawyer, Commandant of Camp Erath, U. C. V., Thurber, Tex., writes an appropriate criticism:

"In the August issue of the VETERAN M. V. Ingram states that the first and only time the Federal gunboats were defeated by the Confederate land forces was at Fort Donelson. The achievement of this great victory by Major Bedwell was one of the greatest during the Civil War, but it was not the only victory of its kind during the four years of struggle.

"On September 6, 1863, General Franklin, with four thousand men, assisted by a fleet, was sent to effect a landing at Sabine Pass and from thence to operate against Galveston and Houston. Four Union gunboats attacked Fort Grigsby, which was defended at the time by forty-two men and two lieutenants with an armament of six cannons. The officers and men were all Irishmen, and the company was called the Davis Guards. The captain, F. H. Odum, was not present, and the company was commanded by Lieut. R. W. Dowling.

For an hour and a half this gallant little band was subjected to a terrific bombardment. The result of the fight was the repulse of the gunboats, two of which were captured with their armament, eighteen guns, and one hundred and fifty men. So the fleet of twenty vessels sailed away, minus two gunboats, with Franklin's command without making any further attempt. Besides the prisoners, the attacking party lost fifty killed and wounded. Not a man in the garrison was hurt. The victory was as decisive of the attempted invasion of Texas as if it had been a great battle.

"This authority is quoted from pages 282 and 283 in 'Story of the Confederate States,' by Joseph T. Derry. Please see page 228 in same history for other defeat of gunboats by John B. Magruder. This is not written for the purpose of controversy, but for the purpose of historical accuracy."

[It was a slip to let the Ingram paper go uncorrected. The wonderful story of Sabine Pass is doubtless without parallel in the world's wars. Others may challenge the statement of Comrade Ingram. It is not in the spirit of controversy, as stated above, but to get history correct, that such errors are gladly corrected.—ED. VETERAN.]

REUNION OF FORREST'S ESCORT AND STAFF.

Mrs. Ruby Duff Boone Creson writes of the annual Reunion of Forrest's Escort, held at Booneville, Tenn., September 8 and 9, which had a programme of music and recitations on Tuesday evening, with welcome address by N. F. Bonner and response by T. C. Little. She states:

"Fifteen years have elapsed since the escort met here, and many faces were missing and several members who had entertained them then are here no longer, among them being Capt. Nathan Boone, H. L. W. Boone, J. H. C. Duff, B. B. Ingle, and Perry Logan. The feeble state of Dr. J. B. Cowan's health prevented his being present, and George L. Dismukes was reported sick.

"The deaths reported since the last meeting were: Capt. William Forrest, Maj. Charles W. Anderson, Dr. J. N. Taylor, John W. Snell, John P. Hoffman, and Jordan Womack.

"A large crowd welcomed the 'boys who wore the gray' to a lovely grove on Wednesday; and after a speech by Col. E. Shapard, of Shelbyville, a sumptuous dinner was spread.

"Forrest's followers are ever welcome to Booneville.

"The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, W. C. Buchanan; Vice President, R. C. Garrett; Recording Secretary, George L. Cowan; Secretary and Treasurer, N. F. Boone; Chaplain, D. C. Kelley.

"The next meeting will be at Shelbyville."

SAVED BY AN OMISSION IN COURT RECORD.

Omission in the proceedings of a court renders the sentence void. John S. Cantwell, of Wilmington, N. C., sends the following:

"While in winter quarters near Orange C. H., Va., during the winter of 1863-64 Private James R. Phillips, of Moore County, N. C., was brought to camp and confined as a deserter. Charges were preferred against him, and he was tried before a court-martial and condemned to be shot. A petition for his pardon was signed by all the officers of the regiment present for duty excepting Lieut. Col. William M. Parsley, the captain of his company, F, 3d North Carolina Infantry, and Lieut. Cicero Craig, of Company I.

"In regular course the proceedings of the court were read at dress parade, resulting first in a communication to Lieut.

tenant Colonel Parsley, commanding the regiment, requesting his release and return to duty because of the fact that in the proceedings of the court the words 'two-thirds concurring' were omitted. Colonel Parsley forwarded the communication, indorsed 'respectfully approved.' Brigadier General Stewart returned it 'disapproved.' The same communication was addressed to Gen. R. E. Lee, respectfully demanding his release and return to duty. This went forward through the regular channels to President Davis, who pardoned him, and he was put in the ranks of his company for duty the day the campaign of 1864 opened, about the 6th of May, 1864.

"Phillips was captured with his company and the rest of the brigade of Gen. Ed Johnson on May 12 at Spottsylvania, Va., and he was confined at Point Lookout, where he deserted again by taking the oath to the United States government.

"Has any one heard of another case where an omission in the proceedings of a court-martial saved the condemned?"

NIGHT IN THE SOUTH.

[The following was founded on fact told by a G. A. R. man to the writer, Isabella Caldwell Jones, 1221 West Seventh Street, Los Angeles, Cal.]

A grizzled Union soldier sitting nigh

Telling tales of civil battles gone by.

"Just once," he said, "in that four years I cried.

It was for a Rebel company, all died.

We rode, well fed, well mustered out, brass buttons too,

A goodly squad of Union boys wearing Union blue.

It was four, o'clock the sundial said when, turning down a lane,

We came upon a scrap of army that roused as onward now we came.

Some were old, and all were sick—a pitiful band,

Ragged, hungry, sorrowful, awaste their land.

They were 'up to arms and right about;' their eyes were bright;

And as the setting sun began to sink, there began another fight.

We were five and more than five to one, when suddenly

A private school of little Rebel boys turned out bravely!

Those little boys! My God! they fought like warriors of old,

The schoolmaster and the little classes, till all of them were cold.

The little plot was strewn with dead, thirty or more.

We mowed them down like waving grass; thank God, 'twas o'er,

And night fell with jealous haste to wrap them in her quiet gloom.

Good heaven! that fence corner was red like a bloody tomb.

Those little boys, all so young, had died so blest;

So bravely for their cause they bled, God give the youthful soldiers rest.

And as we marched off, we Union men, strong in our might, We left the handful of Rebel soldiers and the boys and the schoolmaster in the night.

But out the past again I sigh when I think upon that sight.

Ah! all is fair in war, they said. Fair? maybe, but right?"

Inclosed with the foregoing was this note by the author: "It is a true story, and has so haunted me that I wrote it in this form and read it before my Chapter, U. D. C. I thought perhaps it would help keep alive the pride of the youngest generation in the glorious deeds of Confederate soldiers."

THE CONFEDERATE FLAG.

BY ANNE CHEW DORSEY COQUILLET, AUTHOR OF "THE OLD GRAY COAT."

Hanging on the wall o'er yonder
Is a flag of yesterday,
And it represents the story
Of the boys who wore the gray;
What they fought for long and bravely,
Freedom for the land they loved
And the sacrifice and glory—
Was it more than what they owed?

God and country was their motto,
And the flag meant that and more:
Homes and freedom, wives and daughters.
So the gray they proudly wore,
Fought with courage grand, and glory
Crowns that flag of yesterday,
And we hail it with all honor—
"Furled and useless," did you say?

Furled it may be, but not useless;
For it points to higher things,
Teaches lessons to your children.
Priceless memory round it clings—
Memory linked with Lee and Jackson.
What brave men can do for love
Of the country which has borne them
And the God who reigns above.

Just the Cause was what they fought for,
And to-day it lives again;
All the country now resounds with "State rights fight for might and main!"
Yes, they did their duty bravely,
And that flag it bears no stain;
Memories linked with Lee and Jackson,
Sacred now, will never wane.

Naught on earth can blight the record
Of the flag that's floating there,
And our hearts are filled with rapture,
E'en though wells the scalding tear.
For the principles they fought for
Are to-day alive and strong,
And we hope to see them vanquish
Ignorance and willful wrong.

Yes, old Flag, you've done your duty;
Furled you may be, but you'll live
In the hearts of sons and daughters,
And all honor they will give
To the flag their fathers fought for,
And the memories with it fraught
Of the noble deeds of daring
And the lessons which they taught.

ington, Pa., now in their ninety-fourth year. They were born in Scotland. They came to this country to pick up gold that they expected to find lying loose. Andrew Jackson was President, and they "blamed the Democratic party for failure to find the Eldorado" that they expected. And they boast that they have always been enemies to the Democratic party. The hardier of the two has been married and raised a half dozen children. This matter comes to the VETERAN because of its record of veteran twins.

ABOUT THE TENNESSEE REUNION.

The twenty-second annual Convention of the Tennessee Bivouacs, Confederate Soldiers, met in Nashville on October 14. Judge Z. W. Ewing, of Pulaski, President, presided. The Convention being called to order, Dr. J. H. McNeilly, Chaplain of the Association, delivered an eloquent invocation expressing thanks to God that so many veterans had been spared to be present. At the conclusion of the prayer President Ewing appointed Judge S. F. Wilson, of Nashville, H. E. Cannon, of Memphis, and Sam Claybrook, of Brentwood, a Committee on Credentials to examine the report on the list of delegates as reported by Secretary John P. Hickman. The committee shortly after reported the number of votes each Bivouac was entitled to cast.

Secretary Hickman announced the programme of entertainment provided for the visitors by the Board of Trade and the committees in charge of arrangements. Gen. George W. Gordon, of Memphis, Commander of the Army of Tennessee Department, took the place of former Senator E. W. Carmack on the list of speakers, and he delivered the principal address.

A resolution adopted by the Tennessee Historical Association of Memphis was offered to the Convention by Gen. George W. Gordon indorsing the present Board of Pension Examiners, composed of George B. Guild, of Nashville, Frank A. Moses, of Knoxville, and W. H. Coley, of Milan, and asked their reappointment. The resolution set forth that all three members of the Board had been indorsed by the Bivouacs

OLDEST TWIN BROTHERS IN THE WORLD.—A Pittsburg paper comes to the VETERAN with a sketch of "the oldest twins in the world." They are Neven and William Kerr, of Worth-and Camps of their respective Divisions of the State. The resolution was adopted unanimously.

President Ewing delivered a short address, which was indorsed by applause. He congratulated the veterans that so many of them had been spared to attend this Reunion. "I hope we will all pass through the coming year without loss," he said; "but I know that this cannot be. This will be the last Reunion some of us will attend. Our heads are gray, our pulse is growing weaker, our bodies are not strong; but let us hope that as we pass from these scenes we will finally meet where there is no parting."

The report of the Board of Pension Examiners was then read by Col. Frank A. Moses, Special Examiner and member of the Board. It showed that the total number of pensioners on the State's pay roll is 6,100. Of this number, 4,659 are veterans and 1,441 widows of veterans. Since the October meeting last year three hundred and seventy-six soldiers and seventy-two widows have crossed over the river, making a total of four hundred and forty-eight deaths for the past year. "The roll is rapidly changing," said Colonel Moses in his report. "The 'thin gray line' grows thinner day by day. What is to be done for them must be done quickly."

Pensions were granted to six hundred and forty-eight veterans during the last year, and three hundred and twelve widows were placed on the rolls, making a total of nine hundred and sixty new names added to the roll during the year.

Colonel Moses made a comparison in his report of the pension appropriations made by Tennessee and the national government, showing that since the first pension law was passed in this State, in 1891, the State has appropriated for soldiers and their widows $2,680,000, or about one dollar per capita for the population of the State; while the national government is appropriating over $155,000,000 a year, or nearly two dollars per capita for every man, woman, and child in the whole country. It costs the national government $2.94 to pay each of its pensioners, while it costs the State of Tennessee only ninety-one cents, which includes all incidental expenses. The United States Pension Office does not have to pay postage, and all the printing is done in the Government Printing Office; so that if the State Board were on the same basis with regard to these expense items as the national government the cost to the State of Tennessee per capita would be about one-fourth what it is to the nation.

It is claimed that Tennessee pays better pensions to the Confederate soldiers than any other Southern State, and statistics were quoted from a number of States showing the difference in the way Tennessee takes care of the veterans as compared to other States. Where Tennessee pays $300, Colonel Moses showed that Virginia pays $150, North Carolina $72, South Carolina $90, Georgia $100 to $150, Florida $150, Mississippi $125, and Louisiana $78.

Colonel Moses made some suggestions, among which was one that the Camps and Bivouacs provide for the selection of a committee of six old soldiers—two from each grand division of the State—to cooperate with the Board in a revision of the laws relating to pensions. This committee could meet with the Board upon call of the President of the Board and invite suggestions from persons interested in the welfare of the old soldier and his widow.

Colonel Moses reported that pension attorneys have been overcharging veterans and quoted the law, which fixes the fee at one dollar and makes it a misdemeanor to contract for or receive, directly or indirectly, more than this fee. The penalty is a fine of $500 and ten days' imprisonment. Colonel Moses reported that in a number of cases in which he had made examinations he had required the attorneys to make restitution to avoid prosecution. He said, however, that the Board has directed that there should be no more compromises, and that future violators of the law will be prosecuted.

President M. S. Cockrill's report showed that there are one hundred and thirty-four veterans living at the Home at the present time. Forty-three were admitted during the past year, fifteen died, while eight were discharged. President Cockrill considers the death rate very small, taking into consideration the advanced age of the inmates—the average age being seventy-two—and most of the inmates are feeble old men when they are admitted. He paid tribute to the U. D. C.: "We are greatly indebted to the Daughters of the Confederacy for the care of our sick. They have a regularly employed matron in the hospital, with several paid nurses. The Tennessee Division of the Daughters have a regular standing committee to look after the Home, with Mrs. W. B. Maney, of Nashville, as chairman. The services of this committee are invaluable."

The Home is in debt by about $750 more than it was a year ago. The indebtedness then was $1,030. "During the last year," Captain Cockrill said, "we have received from the State in per capita tax $16,316, while the sales from the Home have been $1,413, making a total of $17,730. We are given only thirty-seven and a half cents a day to feed, clothe, and doctor the inmates, not as much as is given for the care of the criminals of the State. * * * We must have an increased allowance, and we hope this Division will petition the Legislature to make the increase."

The report states that the outside of the Home is badly in need of repairs, and asks that the next Legislature make the necessary appropriation. The last Legislature, it is shown, appropriated $1,500 for this purpose, but it was left out of the engrossed bill.

Captain Cockrill added that the increased cost of maintaining the veterans at the Home was due to the increased price in the cost of necessities and the advancing age of the veterans, which made it necessary to employ more help at the Home than was needed when it first started. "Eighteen years ago," he said, "when the Home was first started, we bought bacon at six and eight cents a pound; to-day we have to pay ten and twelve cents for it. Then the average age of the veterans in the Home was sixty-five years; now it is seventy years. This makes it necessary for us to employ additional help because the veterans are getting so far advanced in age that they can't serve themselves as they could years ago."

John P. Hickman, Secretary and Treasurer, read his report, which showed a total collection of $144 and disbursements amounting to $316, leaving a balance overdue in the treasury of $172. The report was received and adopted.

The report of the Historical Committee was submitted by Col. George C. Porter, the chief feature being a recommendation that the Association indorse the idea to procure, collect, and publish the names and commands of all Confederate soldiers from Tennessee. It was asked that the Association authorize the Historical Committee to appear before the Ways and Means Committee of the next Legislature and urge an appropriation to accomplish the purpose. The report also requested that all Camps and Bivouacs within this jurisdiction be requested to ask Senators and Representatives to vote for such an appropriation.

MORE OF THE BATTLE OF NEW MARKET.

[In a letter to Thomas H. Neilson, of New York, Col. George H. Smith, of Los Angeles, Cal., who commanded the 62d Virginia Regiment in the fight, says:]

I take the VETERAN, and before receiving your letter had read your article and also the letter of Captain Bruce in the December number. I have also read many other communications about the battle of New Market, published from time to time, and among these the article, or an extract from the article, of Mr. Lewis Wise, who was a member of the Cadet Corps at the time of the battle. The latter speaks of the steadiness of the corps at a certain juncture in the fight when the veterans to the right and left of them were faltering and falling back: and Captain Bruce, as he says (evidently referring to the same juncture), observed "Imboden's men falling back." The place and time referred to are explained in the inclosed "Memoranda" of the fight.

The place was the northern fence of Bushong's house yard and its extensions easterly and westerly; the time, the brief interval between the halting of the 51st Regiment at the fence and the withdrawal of the 62d from the position to which it had advanced after the 51st had halted. During this interval the Cadet Corps had come up on the right of the 51st. Captain Bruce's observation refers to the 62d Regiment, which was the only part of Imboden's men in the infantry line. Mr. Wise's observation as to the faltering of the veterans on his right and left refers, therefore, to the 62d and the 51st. As to the latter, he is in a measure correct. The 51st had halted at the fence, and were apparently for a brief space in some disorder, as appears from Captain Bruce's statement. Mr. Wise's reference to the veterans on his right has also some semblance of truth, for the 62d had just then been drawn back from an advanced position where it had stood alone under the concentrated fire of the Federal line; and it needs no explanation to soldiers to know that when men are brought back from such a position no attempt is made to preserve their ranks. The men, however, came back under my orders and promptly formed as soon as we had gotten under the protection of the elevation we had crossed; and all this with a steadiness that would have provoked the admiration of a more experienced soldier than Mr. Wise or of a more accurate observer than Captain Bruce or his informant. It may be added that within a quarter of an hour afterwards the whole matter was reported by myself to General Breckinridge on the field precisely as I have stated it above and in the inclosed memoranda, and he entirely approved of the withdrawal of the regiment, and then, as on all occasions when he spoke of the regiment, most highly commended its conduct.

From the halt of the 51st at Bushong's fence resulted the failure of the first line to carry the position of the enemy; and there also resulted on the right flank a loss to the 62d Regiment of over two hundred men, and on the left the loss of the opportunity of capturing the detached battery near the river, of which Edgar's Battalion so promptly availed itself.

The halt of the Cadets when they came up on the right of the 51st was inevitable; nor if, as Captain Bruce says, they participated somewhat in the disorder occurring at that juncture, are they to be blamed; though for myself I am not prepared to say that this was the case. The time referred to by Captain Bruce was probably that of the coming back of the 52d from its advanced position, which must naturally have contributed to that effect; but my recollection is that they and the right of the 51st stood steadily in their position. At least we left the 51st in their position and found them with the Cadets still in the position when the regiment moved back; nor have my subsequent investigations led me to doubt the accuracy of my memory on this point. They did not, however, form on the left of the 62d when that regiment advanced with the 22d; and the result was that the two regiments named led the advance in this part of the field, and continued in advance until the enemy was routed and we had passed the line of their position. I have no doubt, however, that, as Captain Bruce says, the 51st with the Cadets promptly followed our advance and that of Edgar's Battalion, and thus participated in the final and victorious onset and doubtless largely contributed to the result. They are, therefore, entitled to their full share of the credit of the victory. Their case was one that often occurs in battle and with the best troops. It was that of troops brought to a temporary stand, and yet quickly recovering themselves and pressing to the front. It may be added that in their advance the right of the 51st and the Cadets must have passed over the ground immediately on the right of the 34th Massachusetts and the position of Kleisor's Battery, and in this way they may be said to have captured the guns left by that battery on the field; but this must have been after the enemy had been driven from their position and the position of the enemy had been passed by the 62d and the 22d Regiments.

You may observe that Captain Bruce is mistaken in other matters which demand correction. As to the position of the troops he says: "Next to the 51st on the right was the Cadet Corps, then Imboden's Brigade, and on the left of the 51st Edgar's, Clark's, and Derrick's Battalions." The Cadet Corps was not in the line until the time alluded to, when it had reached Bushong's fence; nor was Imboden's Brigade on the right of the Cadets at that or any other time, but only the 62d Regiment; and on the left of the 51st was Edgar's Battalion only, Derrick's Battalion and probably Clark's being in Echols's Brigade, to their and our right.

The distance at this time between our line and the enemy's (at least to the east of the ridge) was much over one hundred yards—the distance given by him—and could not have been less than three hundred. Of this I may speak with confidence, as the 62d had advanced, I should say, probably a hundred yards to the front of the position of the 51st.

Captain Bruce must also be mistaken in saying with reference to the position of the 51st along Bushong's fence and its extensions that they stayed in that position for an hour and fifteen minutes. The time of the whole affair from the commencement of the advance of Breckinridge's line may be estimated from the fact that, except as above explained with reference to Wharton's Brigade, there was a continuous advance, most of the time under fire, from our first position until the enemy was routed; and estimating the distance at one and a half miles, the battle could hardly have lasted much over an hour. Certainly the interval between the time of our arrival at Bushong's fence and the final onset could not have been over a quarter of an hour.

ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLE OF NEW MARKET.

The battle took place mainly on the eastern slope of a ridge running between the valley turnpike on the east and the Shenandoah River on the west, though partly on the west slope, which was steep and rugged. The eastern slope is very gentle, and forms what may be called, disregarding inequalities, an inclined plane, sloping toward the turnpike. This is intersected at New Market by a valley running from New Market down to the river, which is bounded on the north and south by tolerably steep hills. This I will call the New Market valley. Beyond the crest of the hill, north of this valley, the ground, which is slightly rolling, continues unchanged to Bushong's house, a distance of about half a mile. Beyond this is a valley, or rather two valleys, running from the saddle joining them; the one eastward toward the turnpike and Smith's Creek, the other westward to the river. This saddle was some distance to the left of Bushong's house. The west valley was rough and precipitous; the east valley was shallow and soon widened out into the plain. To the north of these valleys was a hill or ridge rising from a bluff on the river to the summit opposite the saddle joining the two valleys, and from there gradually descending into the plain toward the turnpike. Northward from the highest point of the hill extended a ridge corresponding to the ridge to the south, but owing to the approach of the river and the turnpike much narrower.

Breckinridge's army was formed, say, a half mile south of New Market, back of the hill forming the south side of the New Market Valley. Wharton's Brigade formed the first line, its left resting on the summit of the ridge and its right extending down toward the turnpike. It consisted of the 62d Virginia Regiment on the right flank and the 51st on the left. Echols's Brigade formed the second line, which was in echelon about two hundred paces to our rear, the left of Echols's line being just behind the right of Wharton's. This brigade consisted of Patton's Regiment (the 22d), which formed the left of the line, and of Derrick's Battalion, and probably of Clark's temporarily assigned to it, Derrick being on the right. In reserve and to the rear of the center of the two lines were the Cadets and Edgar's Battalion; but soon afterwards the latter was moved to the left of the 51st Virginia Regiment as it advanced. McLaughlin's Artillery with two guns of the Cadet Corps and two sections of McLanahan's Battery were to the east of the turnpike; as were also the cavalry, consisting of the 18th and 23d Virginia Regiments.

Sigel's army was unaccountably divided into two lines. The first of these consisted of the 18th Connecticut and the 123d Ohio Regiments, with four guns of Snow's and two of Ewing's Battery, and was posted to the north of the hill on the north side of the New Market Valley—the artillery on the left and the 18th Regiment well up on the ridge to the right of the line. About one-half or three-quarters of a mile farther on, on the hill to the north of the valley at Bushong's house, the main line of the enemy was posted—his artillery, with the exception of one battery (Dupont's), occupying the ground from the bluff on the river to and beyond the summit of the hill in front of Bushong's house, his infantry extending to and across the turnpike. Dupont's Battery was on the turnpike to the rear of the left flank of the enemy. The infantry line consisted of the 34th Massachusetts, the 1st West Virginia, and the 54th Pennsylvania (in the order named from right to left), and of the 12th West Virginia. Of the last regiment, some companies supported the artillery on the right; the others were formed in the rear of the right of the 34th Massachusetts; from which regiment a company had been detached to the right as skirmishers. The fire of the batteries on the right of the enemy's artillery line and of the supporting infantry commanded the slopes to the west of the ridge; those toward the left the eastern slope.

Breckinridge's army advanced in the order I have explained.

The 62d, on the right of Wharton's Brigade, was about opposite the 123d Ohio on the left of Moore's line. As we passed over the hill bounding the New Market Valley on the south we came under artillery fire. The guns, however, had not gotten our range, and halfway down the hill we were protected by the hill opposite, and were thus enabled to march across the ravine without disturbance. We halted at the foot of the hill on the north side for a few minutes to rest. At that time I did not observe Echols's Brigade, perhaps on account of intervening obstacles; but we could see the Cadets crossing the hill on the south side of the ravine following our march, and nothing could have been handsomer than the perfect order in which they moved; though by this time the enemy's guns had got their range, and I understand a considerable loss occurred. Mounting the hill, we met with no serious opposition from Moore's line; though to our left there was some resistance. From this point until we arrived at Bushong's house we were exposed to the fire of the artillery of the enemy, and in the latter part of our march to their musketry fire.

My regiment, being on the right of the line, naturally marched toward the part of the enemy's line in sight, which was the position of the 134th Massachusetts Regiment, on the right of the enemy's infantry line. This was an error for which, however, I do not regard myself as accountable. Had my regiment been directed toward the left or center of the enemy's line, it would have left space to the right of the ridge for the whole of Wharton's Brigade, and the whole of this brigade would have struck the enemy's main line. Owing, however, to the direction of our march, Edgar's Battalion and the greater part of the 51st were thrown to the left of the ridge, leaving only the right companies of the 51st Regiment and my regiment in front of the enemy's main line, Echols's Brigade being still in echelon to the rear.

When we reached the line of the fence beyond Bushong's house, the right of the 51st Regiment became exposed to a heavy fire from the enemy's line, and the regiment halted and commenced firing. The 62d continued to advance, and on passing the slight elevation in front of it and reaching the depression beyond came under the close concentrated artillery and infantry fire of the Federal line, losing in a very few minutes over two hundred of the men. The whole loss of the regiment in the fight was two hundred and forty-one out of an aggregate of about five hundred, including seven of the captains. These, it should be mentioned, were eleven in all, including Captain Bronson, commanding a company of Missourians, which had been temporarily assigned to us, which did good service and suffered severely. Seeing it impossible to effect anything with the remaining two hundred and fifty or two hundred and sixty men, I ordered the regiment to fall back, which it did, halting after passing the elevation referred to and immediately re-forming, and upon the 22d Regiment coming up forming on its left, and advancing with it. This was the final onset, and was followed by the retreat of the Federal line. Whether Clark's Battalion was with the 22d on the right, I cannot from the information I have determine.

There is some confusion with reference to the position of Clark's Battalion in the fight. It belonged to Wharton's Brigade; but, as I have understood, was transferred to Echols in exchange for Edgar's Battalion, which, as I have said, was assigned to the left of Wharton's Brigade. Captain Hoffman, of Clark's Battalion, however, says that it was deployed as skirmishers in front of the 51st Regiment, and upon reaching the hill north of the New Market Valley it was reassembled and took position on the left of Wharton's Brigade; if so, it was not in the line on the attack upon the enemy's second position. I think, however, that we may assume that only one or two companies of the battalion deployed as skirmishers, and I am inclined to think that the rest of the battalion was in the center of Echols's Brigade. Derrick's Battalion at the commencement of the advance was, I think, on the right of Echols's Brigade, but on passing the town it was confronted by the enemy's cavalry, which necessitated its extension to the right and its separation from the brigade.

In the meantime, I am informed, something of the same sort had occurred on the left of the brigade—that is to say, when the 51st Regiment halted, Edgar's Battalion, passing through their ranks, pressed to the front and captured two of the guns on the hill near the river. This is disputed by Captain Bruce, whose company was at the right center of the regiment; but I am informed that between him and the left of the regiment a woods was interposed, so that that part of the regiment could not have come under his observation. My information as to the movements on the left of the regiment is derived from the report and statements of Colonel Edgar, who is supported in this by numerous affidavits of officers and men of his company, which seem to me to establish the facts stated.

At or about the time the 62d was in its advanced position the Cadets—as I gather from all the information I have been able to get—following the march of that regiment, came up on the right of the 51st, having outstripped the march of Echols's Brigade. This account of the movements and position of the Cadet Battalion is based partly on my own observation and partly on information from others and irresistible inferences from what I myself saw. Its relative position as it crossed the hill south of the New Market Valley, marching by itself and considerably to the rear of Echols's Brigade, is based upon my own distinct recollections, which is confirmed by one of my officers, whom I have lately met, Captain Holt. It was then following the march of the 62d, which would bring it on the right of the 51st. That it was on the right of the 51st on the withdrawal of the 62d from its advanced position is equally certain. Judge Evans, of San Francisco, who carried the colors of the corps, was acquainted with Lieutenant Colonel Lang, of the 62d, and has told me that he saw Lang on that occasion. It seems also that on the final advance they passed the position of Kleiser's Battery, which could not have been the case unless they were to the left of my regiment. Finally the account of the severe fire to which they were subjected and the consequent loss given by Colonel (since General) Shipp obviously refers to this position of the Cadets at the Bushong fence and to the right of the 51st Regiment, and otherwise cannot be understood. It may be added that in comparing my account of the movement of the 62d and 22d Regiments with the report of Colonel Wells, of the 34th Massachusetts, it will be found that his account agrees perfectly with mine and, as it were, dovetails into it; so that there remains no doubt in my mind as to the relative positions of the two regiments, the 62d Virginia and the 34th Massachusetts.

The Cadet Corps and the right of the 51st Regiment were much cut up by the heavy fire to which they had been subjected. Neither of them formed on our left when we advanced with Echols's Brigade, but they both promptly followed the movement; and as the line of their march naturally would pass over the position of the left of the enemy's artillery, it may be said they captured the guns left on the field by them. But this was after the enemy had been put to rout, and the 62d and 22d had passed beyond the position that had been occupied by them.

The Confederate artillery was actively and effectively engaged to the east of the turnpike, and their fire, together with the advance of Derrick's Battalion, must have contributed largely to the victory. The cavalry, consisting of the 18th and 23d Regiments, operated on our right, and were thus opposed to the Federal cavalry. My regiment having been detached from Imboden's Brigade and assigned to Breckinridge's Division, with which it remained during the Richmond and Lynchburg campaigns, I did not have the opportunity of inquiring as to the services of the two regiments in the battle; nor have I ever seen General Imboden's report. It appears, however, from Pond's account that Imboden crossed to the left bank of Smith's Creek and moved down upon the left flank and somewhat to the rear of the enemy's line, and with his two pieces of artillery, supported by his two regiments, participated in the repulse of the attempted charge of the enemy's cavalry. Pond ascribes to his movement a very decisive effect. But to this McLaughlin and Derrick largely contributed, as doubtless also to the demoralization of the left of the enemy's infantry line.

THE FORCES ENGAGED.

On the Confederate side the infantry engaged consisted exclusively of the several regiments and battalions above described, which numbered, according to General Imboden's report cited in Pond's "The Shenandoah Valley in 1864," all told 3,440. This, I should say from my own recollections, is somewhat exaggerated, as my impression from conversations at the time with various field officers and from subsequent investigations is that the two brigades with my regiment numbered about 3,000. Whether this would include the Cadet Infantry (numbering 221), I am not sure; but assuming it not to be included, the full force would be about 3,220. Besides this, according to General Imboden's report, there were 350 artillery men with eighteen guns, making with the cavalry 800, an aggregate of 4,370. Mr. Pond adds to this aggregate, on the authority of General Lincoln, a "northwest brigade" (983); but no such troops were on the field. The number of guns reported by General Imboden is very considerably above what I had supposed. Colonel Edgar, who has investigated the subject, estimates the number at ten—namely, Chapman's four guns, Minge's two, and McLanahan's four. Colonel Edgar belonged to Breckinridge's Division, with which he came from Southwest Virginia, and was doubtless familiar with its organization, and he correctly adds the four guns of Imboden's Brigade. I would, therefore, put the aggregate (infantry, cavalry, and artillery) at about 4,140—to wit: infantry, 3,220; cavalry, 800; artillery, 120.

On the Federal side there were eight regiments of infantry, which may be estimated as making an aggregate of about 4,000. Of these, there were two regiments that were left with the wagon train, leaving for active participation in the fight about 3,000. But these, which belonged to Moore's Brigade, were on the field before the close of the fight, and with Dupont's Battery did effective service in covering the retreat.

There were in all five batteries of artillery, numbering, as well as I can make out, twenty-eight guns—namely, Carlin's, Snow's, Kleiser's, Dupont's, and Ewing's. Of these, Ewing's was probably with the cavalry on the left of the Federal line, and Dupont's, which arrived late on the field, and to the rear of the left of the line on the turnpike. The remaining twenty guns were, I suppose, on the right of the infantry line. The cavalry, two brigades, were on the left of the line. They numbered over one thousand men. General Sigel, as reported by Pond, says: "The battle was fought on our side by 5,500 in all." Assuming this total to be correct and that it includes the two regiments that were with the trains and the cavalry, it should be distributed somewhat as follows: Infantry, 4,000; artillery, say, 360; cavalry, 1,140; total, 5,500, as against a Confederate total of about 4,100.

My information as to the Federal strength is, however, very scanty, being based principally on the data given by Mr. Pond in his work cited above. I leave it, therefore, to be determined more accurately by our friends on the other side. I see no occasion, however, for their being troubled about the disparity of the forces. For in view of the way the troops on the Federal side were handled by Sigel it can hardly be doubted that the result would have been the same, even had there been a greater disparity against us.

The above account is based largely upon information derived from others, much of which is confused and conflicting. I have also been much embarrassed by not having a map of the ground, which I have not seen since the battle. As to what is stated from my own observation with inferences therefrom, I feel assured of its correctness; as to other matters, it stands subject to correction.

COLONEL SMITH REVISITS THE BATTLEFIELD.

Since writing the above I have visited the battlefield of New Market and talked over the fight with old comrades who participated in the battle, and from information received from them and from other sources and from my examination of the field I find that I have to correct my account of the battle in several particulars.

The hill to the south of the New Market Valley is now known as Shirley's Hill, and Shirley's house (built since the war) marks about the place where the 62d was halted to reform before its advance on the enemy's first line.

I find also that at a point south of Boshong's house the ridge is bounded on the west by a valley called "Indian Hollow," between which and the river intervenes another ridge. North of the point referred to the ridge is bounded on the west by the river, and from about opposite Boshong's house its western face is concave to the river and very steep and precipitous. I find also that from that point the ridge, instead of continuing northward, as I supposed, bends to the left and runs to the river, its river face being a steep precipice. At the point of junction the summit of the ridge is the highest point on the enemy's line, which extended along a gentle slope northeasterly and obliquely to the turnpike.

With regard to the formation of our line, I am now satisfied that Clark's Battalion, with the exception of the skirmishers referred to by Captain Hoffman, was on the right of the 51st Regiment and between it and the 62d. Wherever, therefore, I speak of the right of the 51st, the reference should be understood as being to Clark's Battalion.

With regard to the enemy's artillery, from a statement of General Sigel (of which a copy has been sent me by Colonel Edgar), it appears that there were two batteries on the right and two in front of the left of his line. The latter were put out of action by our artillery, or at least were moved to the rear. Their place was supplied by Du Pont's Battery, which came up toward the close of the fight and took position in the rear of the left of the line.

To the troops enumerated as constituting the enemy's second line we must, I think, add the 18th Connecticut, which retreated from its first position along the ridge and must have been re-formed to the rear of the artillery on the right and along with the 12th West Virginia.

The distance from the north fence of Boshong's yard to the enemy's line I find to have been a little in excess of four hundred yards and the distance of the advanced position of the 62d from the fence (now marked by a forked locust tree) two hundred yards, which brought the regiment within two hundred and thirty yards of the enemy's line.

There is some confusion as to the movements of Imboden's Cavalry Regiments, and I find upon inquiry that Pond's account of the matter is somewhat inaccurate. Colonel Johnston, of Breckinridge's staff, in his account of the battle says that Imboden's Cavalry was ordered to move down on the right bank of Smith's Creek to Mount Jackson with a view of burning the bridge at that point; and I am informed by one of the officers of the 18th that this was true of his regiment and of at least part of the 23d. But a part of the latter regiment was probably brought over to the west of the creek, where certainly all of his artillery was. The attempt to burn the bridge was defeated by the high water. The greater part, if not the whole, of the two regiments, therefore, did not participate in the battle, though a considerable part of the enemy's cavalry followed their movements. Whether General Imboden went with the bulk of the cavalry or remained on the left bank of the creek does not clearly appear, but the latter supposition is the most probable. I find from information furnished me by Mr. Dwyer, who participated in the fight, and from a written account left by Lieutenant Berkeley, who commanded Imboden's Artillery, that one or both sections secured a very effective position within a half mile of the left of the enemy's infantry line, which renders probable what is said by Mr. Pond as to the effectiveness of its fire.

I also find that my estimate of the time consumed in the fight was insufficient. I would now estimate the time consumed from the beginning of our march to the rout of the enemy's second line to have been over an hour and a half.

REV. DR. HUMPHREYS REPLIES TO CRITICISM.

REJOINDER TO CAPT. D. H. BRUCE ON THE BATTLE OF NEW MARKET, DECEMBER VETERAN.

[This unique battle, in which Gen. John C. Breckinridge with thirty-five thousand men defeated General Sigel with ten thousand, May 15, 1864, has given rise to much discussion, growing out the fact that no report of it was made either by the commanding general or his brigade commanders. About two years ago a brief history of the battle by the Rev. Dr. Humphreys appeared in the Richmond Times-Dispatch, in which he stated substantially that the 26th Virginia Battalion, under Lieut. Col. George M. Edgar, which entered the fight behind the 51st Virginia Regiment, pushed through that regiment when it fell back in disorder at the beginning of the action and, pressing forward, drove the enemy from the key to his position, capturing several guns, thereby weakening his hold on the ground occupied by the rest of his line, which soon gave way under the hard blows of our brave troops in front of the center and left. The denial of this statement by Captain Bruce has led to the following rejoinder.]

STILLMORE, GA., Dec. 24, 1907.

Dear Confederate Veteran: As Captain Bruce has mentioned and contradicted a statement I made in the Times-

Dispatch, I beg to be heard by your readers. Captain Bruce is extremely inaccurate in many of his statements. First, he puts Derrick's Battalion on the extreme left of our line of battle. It was on the extreme right. This is error number one. Second, he says Clark's Battalion was also on the left of the 51st Regiment, to which he belonged. On the contrary, counting from right to left, it was either third or fifth. All agree that it was third except General Wharton, who said it was fifth. In either case it was to the right of Captain Bruce. Third, he recalls that there were "others," but does not say whether he means troops or battalions or regiments. In short, there were no others. Our line from right to left was made up as follows: Derrick's Battalion, the 22d Regiment, Clark's Battalion, the Cadets, the 62d Regiment, the 51st Regiment, and Edgar's Battalion. If General Wharton was correct, Clark's Battalion was not third, but fifth. There is universal agreement as to the others. As there were no "others" of any sort, this is his third error. When he says he saw Derrick's Battalion going toward the retreating enemy on the left, he makes a fourth error. Sed ea satis.

Captain Bruce himself sustains substantially my contention. He admits that the right half of his regiment, including his company, broke back to shelter behind a fence, and fought for a while there until the enemy were seen retreating. Where were the left half, and what were they doing all that time? Why were they not driving the enemy?

When our line approached close to the enemy, Edgar's Battalion, owing to an obstacle, dropped in close behind the 51st Regiment, and this regiment was for the time the extreme left of our line, and they should have driven and pursued the enemy. They failed; yes, they failed. Thank you, Corporal Wampler and Captain Bruce, for your testimony to that fact. I knew it before, but am thankful for your testimony notwithstanding. Colonel Edgar's official report tells the whole truth of the matter, and here it is: "A heavy fire was opened upon the regiment in our front, and it gave way. I at once ordered my battalion forward to its support; and though my line was a good deal broken in passing through that of the regiment, it advanced steadily until the enemy gave way."

The troops whom Captain Bruce saw pursuing the enemy were not of the 51st Regiment, were not Derrick's Battalion, but were Edgar's Battalion; and having started behind the 51st, they had to pass through it or over it to get at the enemy, and did pass over it.

Col. George D. Wells, of the enemy, says their artillery on the hill was withdrawn before his men were driven. You are right, Captain Bruce, in saying substantially that your men came from their shelter after we had the enemy on the run.

PRISONERS "CHARGED" A KENTUCKY ORCHARD.

W. L. Ditto, Ocala, Fla., writes to Capt. T. O. Stuart:

"Dear Comrade: In the latter part of July, 1862, Gen. Simon Bolivar Buckner was in command of the Confederate forces in East Tennessee, with his headquarters at Knoxville. Our regiment, the 1st Louisiana Cavalry, commanded by Col. John S. Scott and Lieut. Col. J. O. Nixon, was of the command. The General took two regiments from General Pegram's brigade, with seven pieces of artillery, and gave the same to Colonel Scott's command, forming a brigade.

"General Buckner, greatly desiring to relieve Gen. John Morgan if possible, who was over the Ohio River in the enemy's country, ordered Colonel Scott with his brigade to immediately proceed to Kentucky and 'kick up Jack,' in order if possible to call off the enemy, who were after him with, it is said, thirty thousand troops under General Burnside. Our artillery impeded somewhat our journey, and at Richmond, Ky., we fought General Saunders, of Kentucky, with a brigade of the enemy. We fired our artillery and charged them, when they fled in disorder. We captured some fifteen or twenty prisoners, mostly young men of Kentucky. My Company (K) was the rear guard. Colonel Nixon turned the prisoners over to our company with orders to turn them loose when we got a goodly distance from town.

"We moved quite slowly on the pike, and made considerable halts; our company had controversies with the prisoners, and our boys were severe until I restrained them. One of the prisoners said: 'Captain, would you blame us for following out our honest convictions and going out to war instead of one who shirked and cowardly stayed at home?' We halted in front of a stately Kentucky mansion with a magnificent apple orchard full of the 'Golden Pippin and the great Pryor Red.' I asked the prisoners if they liked apples, and of course they said they did. Well, I ordered them to charge that orchard. They looked doubtfully at me, but I repeated the command, when they leaped down the hill, over the stone fence, and went into the orchard. We moved on and left them.

"How often have I thought of those stout, healthy Kentucky boys, and how they must have felt relieved being turned loose in a great apple orchard instead of being shut up and confined for months in a dingy prison! When we arrived in Kentucky, General Morgan had been captured and General Burnside with his thirty thousand troops had returned to Kentucky, and they gave us 'fits' on all sides, waltzing us right and left. A few were captured; among them were this scribe and his little company. Colonel Scott marched his brigade away with flying colors. He had four hundred captured mules on hand."

VALUABLE MEMORIAL VOLUME.

A ROSTER OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN OF THE UNION AND CONFEDERATE ARMIES.

In a "last appeal to Missouri Confederates for the sake of history" James W. Allen, Missouri Trust Building, St. Louis, addresses all Camps of the United Confederate Veterans in Missouri, the Confederate Southern Memorial Association, the Sons of Veterans and Chapters of the Daughters of the Confederacy, and all surviving Confederate soldiers in Missouri, also the relatives and friends of deceased Confederate soldiers, and states:

"In 1903 Congress directed the Secretary of War to compile from the records of his office a roster of the officers and enlisted men of the Union and Confederate armies. The records of the Union soldiers being complete and the records of the Confederate soldiers being very incomplete (not exceeding twenty-five per cent of enlistment), the Secretary of War requested the Governors of the several Southern States to cooperate with the department in making the Confederate part of the roster as complete as possible, in order that the Confederate soldier might receive that recognition of which he is justly entitled. Many of these States, with the exception of Missouri, took up the work, and have about completed same, under legislative authority, with appropriations ranging from $8,000 to $20,000. When I learned these facts at the Reunion in Richmond, and knowing that our Legislature would not meet until 1909 and realizing that the few surviving soldiers are rapidly passing away, I determined to inaugurate the work for Missouri, hoping and believing that our Legislature at its next session would cause it to be completed and also to have it made a matter of record in the Adjutant General's office at Jefferson City.

"The work undertaken by me has been more successful than I anticipated, owing to the fact that the press of the State, regardless of politics, appreciating the importance of collecting this historical data, gave the subject much publicity. Since the 5th of August last I have received over five hundred letters, collected about three thousand original Confederate documents, consisting of muster rolls, historic rolls, and other miscellaneous papers relating to the service of Missourians who served in the Confederate army. These documents have been forwarded to the War Department for record and return after they have served the purpose for which they were loaned. This work has the approval of the Missouri Division of the United Confederate Veterans in Convention assembled at Fulton last fall. * * *

"For the sake of history, for the sake of the memory of our deceased comrades who fell upon the field of battle and now lie buried in graves unmarked ('unknown') and those who since that eventful period have answered the 'last roll call,' it becomes our sacred duty to see that their names are correctly enrolled upon the pages of this official roster, which will be published by the government."

In a letter from Maj. Gen. F. C. Ainsworth, U. S. A., to Capt. James W. Allen he states: "I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 12th inst. relative to the Missouri troops in the Confederate service. I am gratified at this evidence of your willingness to aid the department in its efforts to make the Confederate part of the roster as complete as possible. Because of the impossibility of paying for documents furnished or services rendered, the Department has been compelled to rely upon the voluntary and unpaid assistance of those who, like yourself, share the solicitude of the Department to complete the roster, and thereby to give to the Confederate soldier the recognition he is justly entitled to receive in this great memorial volume. The documents sent by you contain much valuable information not heretofore in the possession of the Department, and will be carefully preserved and returned to you after they have served the purpose for which they were loaned."

TEXANS IN THE BATTLE AT MURFREESBORO.

BY LIEUT. J. T. TUNNELL, PROCTOR, TEX.

The "Reminiscences of Murfreesboro," by Col. W. D. Pickett, in the September VETERAN induce me to write my experiences in that memorable battle. I was first lieutenant of Company B, 14th Texas, Ector's Brigade, McCowan's Division. My brigade was on the extreme left of the Confederate infantry. When we struck their skirmish line in the open field, we drove them back on their main line so rapidly that we got to within easy gunshot of their main line before they knew it. My regiment confronted a battery of six guns, I think, but they fired only two or three shots with artillery until we were among them. Many of the Yanks were either killed or retreated in their nightclothes. We pursued them with the Rebel yell. In advancing we found a caisson with the horses attached lodged against a tree and other evidences of their confusion. The Yanks tried to make a stand whenever they could find shelter of any kind. All along our route we captured prisoners, who would take refuge behind houses, fences, logs, cedar bushes, and in ravines. We drove them helter-skelter for, Colonel Pickett says, about three miles, when we halted to re-form our lines and rest a few minutes.

My captain, F. A. Godley, was severely wounded early in the morning and placed me in command of the company. Our line was re-formed at the south side of a small open field beyond which was a heavy grove of timber, mostly red cedar, into which the enemy had retreated. They had concentrated a very strong force of fresh troops and planted, it was said, six batteries of artillery near the Nashville Pike.

After resting a few minutes we sent forward a line of skirmishers and then followed in line of battle. We encountered the enemy at the edge of the cedar brake. The ground was level, but overspread with large lime rocks with many lime sinks from a foot to two or three feet deep. The timber was principally cedar, interspersed with large white oaks and other trees. For some distance we drove them, as we had been doing; but about this time the artillery opened on us and cut the timber off over our heads, and it seemed that the heavens and the earth were coming together. Our men sheltered themselves as best they could behind trees, ledges of rocks, etc. Their front line of battle (for they had several lines) seemed to take fresh courage and began to advance upon us, walking a few steps, then firing and falling down to load.

In this critical situation, we having only one line and the men badly scattered, I began to look around for a superior officer to advise with; but there was not one in sight. Very soon, however, I saw Colonel Andrews, of the 32d Texas of our brigade, coming down the line from the right, running from one large tree to another waving his hand to the rear, which I knew meant retreat, which command was passed down the line. A retreat just then was as dangerous as an advance, but was our only salvation from death or capture; so we retreated out of the cedars and across the open field, where we again re-formed our lines. We left several officers and many good men in that cedar brake, many of them killed and wounded and some captured. Other troops took our place in front of the cedar brake, and my brigade moved some distance to the right.

As it was now night, we bivouacked in line of battle after sending forward a strong skirmish line. The dead and wounded were thick all around us. It happened that there was a large lime sink four or five feet deep where my company was stationed. This afforded protection from the wind, which was very cold, and we built little fires in there, as they could not be seen by the enemy. Among the wounded we put in our resort was a Yank quite young and intelligent, shot centrally through the breast with a Minie ball. We divided water and rations with him, and next morning our young Yank, with assistance to rise, could sit up awhile. We moved from that position, and our skirmishers were constantly engaged; but we were not in any other general engagement till General Bragg retreated, my division going to Shelbyville.

IN MEMORIAM—MAJ. JAMES BREATHED.

BY HIS BROTHER, FRANK BREATHED, PETERSBURG, W. VA.

So little is known of the early life of Maj. James Breathed, the fearless, dashing artillery officer who commanded the celebrated battery which has always been known as Breathed's Battery since the death of the immortal Pelham on March 17, 1863, at Kelly's Ford, Va., that I thought his comrades and friends would perhaps be gratified by a recital of his early life up to and after the Civil War.

Maj. James Breathed, of the Stuart Horse Artillery, Army of Northern Virginia, was the son of John W. Breathed and Ann MacGill Williams, of Hagerstown, Md. He was born on February 13, 1838, at Fruit Hill, Morgan County, Va. (now W. Va.). At an early age his father and mother moved near Hagerstown, Md. Young Jim Breathed was sent to St. James College, near his home. Later he studied medicine in the office of Dr. Charles MacGill at Hagerstown, Md.

MAJ. JAMES BREADED.

In 1855, after being with Dr. MacGill for two years, he went to Baltimore and took a course of surgery under the celebrated Dr. Nathan Smith. There he received a diploma, and was graduated an M.D. at the age of twenty-one years. He went to St. Joseph, Mo., shortly afterwards and began the practice of medicine, and remained there until Virginia seceded, on April 17, 1861. Being a strong Southerner and in the fire of youth, he determined to go into the service of the South. So he returned to Maryland, and while en route he sat in the same car seat with Col. J. E. B. Stuart, who was returning to his native Virginia to offer his services to the Governor. Breathed two days after reaching home crossed the Potomac River at Williamsport, Md., went to Martinsburg (now W. Va.), and joined a company of cavalry that was being organized there by Capt. John Blair Hoge, and that became Company B, 1st Virginia Cavalry. While in this command he again came in contact with Col. J. E. B. Stuart, who was then colonel of the 1st Virginia Cavalry. When they met, Stuart recognized Breathed as his traveling companion of a few weeks previous.

Colonel Stuart was struck with Breathed's manly bearing; and when Pelham organized the celebrated battery of "Stuart's Horse Artillery" at Centerville, Va., in the fall of 1861, he was transferred from Company B, 1st Virginia Cavalry, as a private to the battery. Later, at General Stuart's suggestion, Breathed was elected first lieutenant of the battery, and started on his unparalleled record as "the hardest artillery fighter the world produced," so said Gen. R. E. Lee. The names of the incomparable Pelham and the intrepid, dashing Breathed will be handed down to generations yet to come as true types of Southern valor and manhood. Breathed at that time was only twenty-two years of age, being Major Pelham's senior by one year.

After the war Major Breathed returned to Hancock, Md., and again practiced medicine for several years, loved by all and his old battery to a man. He passed away at Hancock, Md., on February 14, 1870. He sleeps well and fitly on the outer edge of the South's area at Hancock, Md., on the north bank of the Potomac and on a high hill overlooking the beloved State of his birth. His remains were deposited by a few of his surviving comrades and in the midst of a large concourse of friends and relatives.

"We laid him to rest in his cold, narrow bed,
And grav'd on the marble we plac'd o'er his head
As the proudest of tributes our hearts could pay:
'He never disgrac'd the dear jacket of gray.'"

AT JOHNSON'S ISLAND.

BY ANNAH ROBINSON WATSON, MEMPHIS, TENN.

The Big Black River, flowing southward through Mississippi, enters the great "Father of Waters" near Vicksburg. On the 17th of May, 1863, the 12th Battalion, Arkansas Sharpshooters, with a number of other troops belonging to the Confederate army, was ordered to guard the railroad bridge over this river where a plank roadway had been laid for the passage of wagons loaded with supplies for the troops in Vicksburg. Just as the train of wagons was crossing the Federals made a sudden attack, captured the bridge, and cut off the only possible means of escape for the Confederates. The latter were under a heavy fire, and must surrender or swim the river with the poor chance of reaching the city. Some undertook this arduous task; but many were drowned, others shot, and some captured before time was allowed even for this effort.

Company B, 12th Battalion Arkansas Sharpshooters, was reduced to seven men and one officer, Lieut. (later Captain) W. L. McLean. He was only a boy of nineteen years, but had already proved his devotion to the Southern cause and his fearlessness in battle. While collecting the small remnant of his company a squad of Federals dashed up, one of them exclaiming: "There's an officer! We'll take his sword!" Lieutenant McLean heard the remark, and, stepping behind a giant magnolia which stood just at his side, hastily unbuckled his sword and threw it, point foremost, into the Big Black River, which was flowing below the bluff where they stood.

The Federals did not see the act, and their commander called out: "Your sword, sir!"

"It has just reached the bottom of the river," calmly answered Captain McLean.

He was then captured, with the remaining members of his company; and, together with a large number of other prisoners, they were taken to the transport, which carried them up the Mississippi River to Northern prisons.

At Cairo, when transferred from the boat, a friend, Ben Fraun, the mate, gave Captain McLean a Federal overcoat and trousers. "You will find it cold on Johnson's Island if you stay long enough," said the friend, "and these may be useful."

At last the end of the journey and Johnson's Island was reached. It is, as every one knows, a small body of land in Lake Erie, near Sandusky, Ohio. Here for the use of the prisoners were thirteen buildings called "blocks;" one of these was a hospital. There were other structures used as kitchen, guardhouse, sutler's store, and one devoted to the use of refractory prisoners. These were situated in grounds of three acres, which were surrounded by a parapet or stockade of heavy timbers about sixteen feet high. Outside was a broad walk where numerous sentinels paced their beats and watched for any effort on the part of the prisoners to escape. Near the large gate of this inclosure was posted the artillery, and a short distance off were the quarters for Federal officers and men. Outside, on the lake, lay a gunboat with which a ferry kept up constant communication.

A large number of prisoners were confined here, probably thirty-five hundred when the maximum was reached, and among them were preachers, lawyers, physicians, poets, and farmers—in fact, representatives from all the avocations of life. These were divided into "messes," with from four to eight men in each.

Captain McLean and the prisoners with him reached Johnson's Island on June 5, 1863. With a circle of personal friends he selected Room 18, Block 3, and took possession with the earnest hope that the sojourn would be of short duration and that through an exchange they might soon be sent South again and to active service.

The room occupied by Captain McLean was fourteen feet square, was without closet, crevice, or panel where even a small article might be secreted. He gave the matter careful consideration, and asked permission to cover the walls with newspapers. The request was granted, and he went to work. When the task was finished, the walls looked clean and neat, and successfully passed the inspection of the guard, who did not observe a little roughness in the ceiling where an opening had been cut and then pasted over. But within the hole so made were hidden the suit of Federal clothes and other valuables which the young captain had taken this method of concealing. This work completed, he entered upon the trying experience of prison life. The days lengthened into weeks, the weeks into months, and the dreary monotony became almost unendurable. Among his comrades were strong men who wasted and died broken-hearted, and others who became dejected and embittered as they thought of loved ones at home whose tears and prayers as yet had availed nothing.

It is impossible accurately to estimate the influence of heredity in its power over the emotional nature of the individual under such circumstances. In young McLean's nature were cogent forces at work which made this imprisonment maddening. The family historian relates that his great-grandfather, Donald McLean, was a Scottish chieftain, whose son, Lachland, was appointed surgeon in a British regiment stationed on the island of Mull, in the British Channel. From this point he is said to have visited the coast of France, and there met and later married Sarah Gabourelle, daughter of a Huguenot nobleman. Some years later the young surgeon sold his commission in the British army and emigrated with his wife to Albemarle County, Va. Their son Charles came as a pioneer to West Tennessee, married Miss Jane Elizabeth Love, and was a man of prominence in the early newspaper ventures of the State. And now their son, Capt. W. L. McLean, was an inmate of a Northern prison. Though only a boy, he bore himself bravely; but his mind was ever filled with the thought of escape, for he felt that death in the attempt would be greatly preferable to supine submission to what seemed inevitable. He looked at the gunboat on the lake and at the large force of Federals guarding the prison, and recognized the desperate risk of such an effort; but determined that sooner or later it must be made.

Prisoners continued to pour into the island, and at last the dining halls were taken for their use and new halls substituted. It was decided that the floors of these should be covered with rocks, and soon wagons loaded with rock from Lake Erie began to come constantly to the building site. With each wagon there were four Federal soldiers.

One day Captain McLean, who had watched them closely, observed that when the wagons unloaded and left the number of soldiers with them was irregular—sometimes two, sometimes six—and this suggested a chance. He went to his room, opened the hole in the ceiling, and donned his Federal suit. One of his comrades entered unexpectedly and exclaimed: "Why, Mack, what are you doing?"

There was a stern look on the young captain's face as he answered: "Don't ask questions; don't watch me; this is a leap for life."

He went out and reached the place for unloading just as a large wagon halted, and with shovel in hand he went to work. When the wagon bed was empty, he jumped in and was carried outside the great gate. The team paused a moment, and he got out, went to the edge of the lake, and, kneeling down, pretended to drink. He was really looking about and deciding what to do. The wagon drove off, and, rising, he walked leisurely across the Federal campus to a point somewhat removed, where the grass and weeds were high and an old elm tree stretched its great branches low to the ground. Here he was completely screened, and lay down with the intention of waiting until nightfall before attempting to leave the island.

He had been here only a short time when one comrade, then another, both in Federal uniform and both having followed the same course as himself, joined him. Then the three waited together, discussing the possibilities and deciding what had best be done, if they should escape detection until dark.

"We will make a raft," said Captain McLean, "and float to Sandusky, then off to Canada and freedom. But if there should be trouble, if any of the Federals should come along, Newman must do the talking. He looks and speaks more like a Yankee than we do."

Suddenly Newman exclaimed: "Hush, hush, boys! there are some of the troops now. Perhaps they are looking for us!"

And sure enough, a party of a dozen passed near by and hailed them. "Hello! what are you fellows doing over there?" they called.

"O, just resting," answered Newman in a sleepy voice. "Been helping with the wagons; off duty now."

And the party passed on. Only a few moments later another squad approached. "Are you Yanks or Johnnies?" called out the old Irishman commanding the company.

"Yanks," replied Newman; "belong to the 178th Ohio. Off duty and resting." His two companions seemed to be asleep and unconscious of what was transpiring about them, and this second party of Federals passed.

"Boys, this is becoming exciting," said Captain McLean. "I wonder if anything unusual has happened and whether they have missed us."

He did not know that a fourth Confederate, attempting to escape in the same manner, had been detected by the gate sergeant and captured; that the commandant, Colonel Hill, had ordered "roll call" at once, and that this, showing three men unaccounted for, had resulted in an order under which several squads of soldiers were sent out to make a thorough search of the island.

Captain McLean, with his two companions, again seemed to be sleeping; but their hearts were beating wildly, and they were thinking that the sun stood still in the heavens and that darkness would never come. Soon they heard again the regular tramp of soldiers. Would the party pass them or would they be seen and hailed?

"What are you doing over there?" suddenly called a firm young voice. "I believe you are the Confederates we are looking for!"

"You insult us, sir," answered Newman, half rising; "we belong to the 178th Ohio. Come on boys," turning to his comrades, "let's go to our command."

"Hold on!" exclaimed the young Federal, cocking his gun. "If you are what you claim to be, identification at Colonel Hill's headquarters will be easy; fall into line."

Captain McLean knew only too well that resistance was useless, that identification at headquarters meant immediate detection, and, admiring the manly bearing of the young fellow, he walked up to him and said courteously: "May I ask your name, sir?"

"Andrew Jackson Taylor, of the 178th Ohio Volunteers," was the response.

"I am not surprised, sir, that the owner of that name should have detected us, though others failed. You are right; we are Confederates."

"I'm sorry for you," answered the young soldier kindly; and the two boys (for the Federal was very young and McLean only twenty) walked side by side to headquarters. Here they found quite a crowd gathered—men, women, children, and negroes. A guard with bayoneted guns opened the way to the gray-haired commander, Colonel Hill, who was an officer of the regular United States army. His bearing was courteous in the extreme, and there were lines of sympathy on his kindly face as he looked at the three prisoners before him.

"Confederates, notwithstanding your blue uniforms," he said slowly, "where did you get them?"

"It was our privilege to get them, Colonel Hill, if we could," answered Newman coolly.

"And my privilege to deprive you of them," was the prompt reply.

There was a pause in which the Colonel looked at them gravely, and the Confederates wondered what would be their fate. Would they be shot, would they be put into the cell reserved for the worst offenders—what would be done? Home and freedom seemed farther away than ever before.

"Gentlemen," the old commandant continued, "your effort was worthy a more successful termination; but stern duty demands that I return you to prison."

Then the Confederates were given in charge of a lieutenant, who was ordered to take from them the Federal uniforms. But, to their astonishment, no punishment was inflicted. They were merely returned to their places and to the dull routine of prison life. To this there was now no interruption, and twenty long months from the date of their incarceration dragged away. Then came the "surrender" and the cessation of hostilities, and the war was over.

The prisoners were taken from the island and exchanged; and after a long and tedious journey, Captain McLean reached his home, in Tennessee, where he still resides.

When the Confederates vacated the prison at Johnson's Island, these lines were found penciled on the wall in one of the apartments:

"FAREWELL TO JOHNSON'S ISLAND.

"Hoarse-sounding billows of the white-capped lake
That 'gainst the barriers of our hated prison break,
Farewell! farewell! thou giant inland sea;
Thou, too, subvertest the modes of tyranny—
Girding this isle, washing its lonely shore
With moaning echoes of thy melancholy roar.
Farewell, thou lake! Farewell, thou inhospitable land!
Thou hast the curses of this patriot band—
All, save the spot, the holy sacred bed,
Where rest in peace our Southern warriors dead."

Major McLean is the last surviving member of the famous Southern Cross Drill, composed in 1864 by Lieut. Charles Dugan while a prisoner of war on Johnson's Island and taught to thirty-two young Confederates as a stag drill to beguile the weary hours of captivity.

REMINISCENCE OF SHILOH.

BY DR. JOHN CUNNINGHAM, RAVENNA, TEX.

I was the first lieutenant of Company G, 4th Kentucky Infantry, during the great battle of Shiloh and put in two full days. Many people of to-day have the wrong conceptions of the soldiers' enjoyment in a great battle. They had their fun. In the regiment were several wags, amongst whom were "Devil Dick," "Wild Bill," and "Stauff Williams." On one occasion the regiment was behind a low embankment at rest. Our friends (?) the Federals were speeding many stray messengers of death immediately over us. Wild Bill proposed to bet Devil Dick a dollar that he could not lie flat on his stomach and elevate his heels above the embankment for one minute. The bet was accepted and money staked. So up went Dick's heels. At the expiration of the time Dick's heels came down minus a heel tap. A hearty laugh went up at Devil Dick's recklessness and loss of a heel tap. Had the ball been one inch lower, the imp would have lost a foot.

At our first engagement with an Illinois regiment we fired a couple of volleys at about one hundred yards distant, then charged with a double-distilled Rebel yell. The Federals vacated. The 4th Texas was halted immediately on the position recently occupied by the Federals and where sixty-five of their dead and wounded were left. One fresh Dutchman, with a big toe shot off, was yelling: "A surjohn, a surjohn!" Stauff Williams, of our company, would yell out at the top of his shrill voice: "You d— Dutch son-of-a-gun, if you don't stop that racket, I'll shoot a trace chain through your bread-basket!" Dutchie hushed quickly. All present were amused at the ridiculousness of both men.

A wild, weird scene was witnessed on Sunday evening. Maj. Gen. John C. Breckinridge and his entire staff had halted immediately in our rear, beneath the great, spreading branches of a majestic oak. The Federal gunboats were shelling the battlefield. A large shell struck the giant oak just beneath the branch and, bursting inside, tore the tree into splinters. General Breckinridge and staff, scenting danger, dashed out. Gen. George B. Hodge, a staff member and hard of hearing, did not instantly comprehend the situation; but, casting his eye upward, he caught on. Seeing the falling wreck, he electrified his charger with both spurs and dashed from the jaws of death. Then the old 4th cheered and yelled at the escape of their favorite general. I could write of many amusing incidents, but must not ask too much space now.

TIGE ANDERSON'S BRIGADE AT SHARPSBURG.

BY W. H. ANDREWS, SUGAR VALLEY, GA.

After the battle of Crampton's Gap, Md., September 14, 1862, General Lee withdrew his forces to Sharpsburg, a small town between Antietam Creek and the Potomac River. He formed his line of battle in front of the town on the ridge facing the creek, with Longstreet on the right and D. H. Hill on the left. Gen. Tige Anderson's Brigade was on the right of the road and Toombs's and Drayton's Brigades to the right of his. The regiments in Lee's army were nothing but skeletons. It was claimed at the time that Lee had thirty thousand men in the battle of Sharpsburg and thirty thousand lost in the march from Manassas. A large number were without shoes, and were not required to keep up or go into battle. Company M of the 1st Georgia Regulars, to which I belonged, was represented by five men—myself, Corporal W. G. Humphreys, Privates Zack Ables, David, Gann, and Jordan J. McMullen. The regiment had about fifty men and Tige Anderson's Brigade not over five hundred. While our numbers were few, I am satisfied that Lee had the flower of his army with him at Sharpsburg.

During the 15th the Federal army, under Gen. G. B. McClellan, arrived and formed in line of battle on the opposite side of the creek. The day passed quietly with the exception of the usual picket firing. We noticed on the morning of the 16th on top of the Blue Ridge, opposite the Federal left, a signal flag waving in the breeze. It was not long before the Federal artillery on the left opened on Drayton's Brigade. They were in full view of our position, and it was heart-rending to watch the boys under that terrible fire of shell. Longstreet's Artillery on the right was posted along the ridge in front of Anderson's position, while the horses and caissons were in the rear with the infantry, some thirty yards distant. The guns in our front opened on the Federal artillery, drawing the fire on our position, relieving Drayton on our right. The cannonading was terrific and lasted for several hours.

During the fight General Longstreet was seen riding from our left along the line in rear of the guns with his field glasses to his eyes and his bridle reins on his horse's neck. His horse moved slowly, as though looking for grass, as they passed on down the slope, seemingly reluctant to leave the field. Sometime afterwards General Pendleton, chief of artillery, rode along the line in the same way, both riders and horses seeming indifferent to the bursting shells.

In the meantime General Anderson walked up and down the line with his hands folded behind him, as unconcerned as if he had been strolling in his front yard at home. Every eye was on him, and at intervals one of his boys would clap his hands and say: "Did you see that shell brush his coat tail?" Bursting shells did not cause him to "bat his eyes." Brave Old Tige, how his boys loved him! With such officers as we had in the Army of Northern Virginia, how could the boys help fighting as they did?

While our officers were performing their daring feats of bravery we boys were at our old occupation of hugging mother earth. How near and dear the old lady seemed as we spread ourselves so flat a flounder would have looked round by the side of one of us! During the firing we had an exhibition of cowardice. The assistant surgeon of the regulars thought the bursting shells were a little too familiar, and, becoming frightened, made a break for the rear, when one of the boys called to him, "Here is a safe place, doctor," and he made for him; then some one yelled up the line, "Run here, doctor; this is a good place;" and he made back up the line with the shells nearly lifting him off his feet. Then some one down the line would yell to him, until he could stand it no longer, and made a break for a small branch to our right, while the boys stood on their heads and rolled over, yelling themselves hoarse. Before I would have made such an exhibition of myself before those dare-devil, fun-loving Georgians I would have been shot into mince-meat.

The artillery horses were standing near, and I was interested in watching them under fire. They looked tired, hungry, and sleepy, with their heads down, ears drooped, and eyes closed. I could not but pity them, knowing that they, like myself, were suffering from the pangs of hunger. Through the neck of one a cannon ball had passed, but he was still walking about. Horses soon learn the commands as well as the men. The Federal artillery was more than ours could stand, and a retreat was sounded. When the first command, "Riders, prepare to mount!" was given, every horse's head went up with ears erect; at the second command, "Mount!" they were wild; and when the third was given, "Limber to the rear!" the guns were carried to a place of safety behind flying hoofs. Then the firing ceased.

About noon I saw General Lee mounted on Traveler in the road, when General Jackson rode up and saluted him. A smile played over the dirty faces of Longstreet's men at sight of Stonewall, for they knew that his foot cavalry was not far in his rear. We felt like Gen. D. H. Hill's corporal: we needed "a leetle more reinforcements."

Jackson captured Harper's Ferry, with eleven thousand five hundred prisoners, fifteen thousand stand of small arms, seventy cannon, and a large amount of supplies. His command was placed on the left of D. H. Hill, with the exception of A. P. Hill's Division, which was left at Harper's Ferry to parole the prisoners. Late in the evening the Federals, having crossed Antietam Creek above, attacked Jackson's forces, and a battle of several hours ensued, Jackson holding his own. About sundown a cow was feeding in front of Anderson's Brigade, and the General ordered her killed and divided among his men. I received about one-fourth of a pound, and after heating it over some coals ate it without salt or bread. It only whetted my appetite, as I had not eaten anything in forty-eight hours; but a Rebel soldier never complained.

On the morning of the 17th, as soon as the pickets could see each other, firing commenced, and by sunrise a general engagement was on our left and center. Sometime after sunrise Anderson's Brigade was ordered to Jackson's support, and we moved out by the left flank to the northeast corner of the town, then obliqued to the left, and passed between the town and a cornfield on our right, where the Federal artillery was making noise enough shooting through the green corn to have been firing trace chains instead of canister.

We passed through a bottom where there were a number of Confederate wounded who asked, "What command?" then cheered us on our way. We then passed over a ridge into a large stubble field, turned by the right flank, and advanced in line of battle on a large piece of woods; and when within two hundred yards of the rail fence, the Federal sharpshooters opened fire on our line, and our sharpshooters were ordered to the front. I saw a Federal officer shot down as our men entered the woods. On reaching the fence we were ordered to pull it down, pile it up, and lie down behind it to protect ourselves from the sharpshooters, who were concealed behind the tree.

While peeping over the rails in search of the enemy a ball struck the rail in front of my nose; and thinking some one was on the lookout for me, I lowered my head. It was a heavily timbered piece of woods, with not enough undergrowth to obstruct our view. The Federal line of battle was beyond the ridge and not visible from our position. A regiment on the right of our brigade entered the woods by the right flank, and as their heads showed over the ridge the Federals fired on them. The order was given to change front, forward on the first company right in front, which change was executed on the double-quick, and the fight opened in earnest.

In the meantime General Kershaw's South Carolina Brigade marched within twenty feet of our line and halted a few moments. Again the command, "Forward!" was given, and they marched over our line. As they stepped over us General Kershaw asked, "What command?" and when told called for three cheers for the Georgians, which the Palmetto boys gave with a vim. Sherman said, "War is hell;" but there are scenes enacted on the field of strife worth a man's life to witness. We watched and admired the Palmetto boys as they moved into action without a bobble or a tremor in the line, and as their heads showed over the ridge the Federals opened fire; but the boys moved steadily on until they reached the top of the ridge, when every man fired at the same time. If I had not been a Georgian, I should have wanted to be one of the Palmetto boys. There is nothing on this green earth half so grand as the sight of soldiers moving into action. A cavalry charge is superb; artillery dashing on the field carries you away; while the deadly infantry moving into the jaws of death causes you to hold your breath in admiration.

As there always was something for idle hands to do, General Anderson ordered his brigade by the left flank double-quick, and with arms at the right shoulder shift we moved rapidly down the fence; and when the head of the column passed Kershaw's left, the Federal line opened fire, and the brigade caught it until we made our distance to the left. It has been nearly forty-six years since that eventful day; but in memory I can still see the sturdy forms of my gallant comrades as they moved under that deadly fire from the enemy's guns. Gallant Georgians! braver troops the world never produced.

The command was given by the right flank, and the boys scaled the fence. I was never able to decide whether I landed on my head or my feet; but I made better time over that fence than I ever did over one before or since. As the boys struck the ground a sheet of flame belched forth, and the sharp report of the rifles seemed to say: "Yankee, you have had your way long enough; we will now have ours." When I looked in front, I saw about sixty yards distant a solid line of blue, and every man working his gun for all it was worth. Directly in front of me I saw the stars and stripes waving to the breeze. How defiant it appeared as it slowly unfolded, then dropped back again around the staff! I thought as I looked that it would be honor enough for one day if I could cause it to strike the ground; and placing my rifle to my shoulder, I took deliberate aim at the color bearer's breast; but as I pressed the trigger my gun snapped. I had to pick the tube, put in powder and cap, and when I looked up the line was a little in advance of me.

I saw Lieut. G. B. Lamar, commanding Company F, in front of the line waving his sword and calling on the men to follow him. Thinking my being in the rear might cause the Lieutenant to suspect I was showing some white feathers, under the impulse of the moment I ran through the line to the front. Looking to the left, I saw Capt. R. A. Wayne and one or two other officers holding up the almost lifeless form of Captain Montgomery, who had been shot in the head. I had but a moment to take in the situation, as an order passed along the line to "Charge, boys, and give them the bayonet!" and with the wild Rebel yell ringing in my ears and a wall of bayonets in my rear, I had to move in a hurry.

There is something in a desperate charge, a feeling that cannot be defined or expressed, in the onward rush to victory or defeat. In the wild charge many thoughts passed through my mind, but one question was uppermost: "Should the Federals stand the charge, what would become of me?"

When we were within thirty feet of the Federal line, it wavered, then broke and dashed to the rear. The yell that went up from my throat started from the bottom of my heart. Where the line had stood the earth was covered in blue. I believe I could have walked on them without putting my feet on the ground. General Anderson remarked afterwards that he believed every man in his command killed a Federal the first shot. The Federals and Georgians took to the trees, and then followed some of the prettiest fighting I saw during the war—a tree-to-tree combat. I saw numbers throw down their guns and hold up their hands, and the boys would tell them to run through our line.

The Federals were driven out of the woods between three hundred and four hundred yards, when an officer dashed in front of the line ordering the brigade to fall back, as the Federals in Kershaw's front were holding their own and we were liable to be cut off. I did not fall back with the line, but kept on until the enemy disappeared over the ridge in a field; and the last shot I fired was at a squad of three, as they were pretty badly scattered. It had seemed like a run through the woods, but I fired forty-five cartridges during the fight. My next move was to replenish my cartridge box, which I soon accomplished from boxes thrown away.

While thus occupied the Federals planted a battery at the edge of the field and shelled the woods. I saw a wounded Federal seated at the root of a large oak, and I decided to approach him. When within fifteen feet of him a shell burst between us, and as I dodged he laughed. Dropping on my knees in front of him, we had an interesting conversation while the shells were exploding around us, one burying itself in the tree at his back. This, however, did not seem to disturb him, though he was already shot through the leg below the knee. He belonged to Sumner's Corps, Sedgwick's Division, Gorman's brigade, composed of the 1st Minnesota, 15th Massachusetts, and the 34th and 82d New York Regiments. He told me he was the color bearer of the 1st Minnesota; that he carried the flag at the first battle of Bull Run, and had been carrying it ever since, and concluded: "Some of you boys were too sharp for me this morning." I learned in 1901 through the Atlanta Journal that the name of my Yankee friend was Samuel Bloomer, and that he was still living and stumping about on a cork leg at Stillwater, Minn. On the thirty-ninth anniversary of the battle I wrote him a long and friendly letter, to which he replied, sending me his photograph, as he said, to put in my Yankee picture gallery.

Anderson's Brigade was ordered back to the right, and had a warm engagement with the enemy in an apple orchard, where Col. William J. Magill, of the Regulars, lost his left arm and was left in the hands of the enemy when the army recrossed the Potomac. The brigade again moved to the right, where they were when night put an end to the conflict. Sometime in the afternoon General Burnside stormed and carried the bridge below Sharpsburg and forced back Longstreet's right. At 4:30 P.M. Longstreet had been forced back to the center of the town, and times were looking blue for the Confederate arms, when A. P. Hill's Division arrived on the field and turned the tide of battle in Lee's favor, driving the enemy from the field. Night put an end to the bloody conflict, and thus ended the most desperate battle of the Civil War.

The loss amounted to twenty-five thousand men, about equally divided, the Confederates losing twelve thousand five hundred in killed and wounded, eight thousand dead and wounded lying on that gory field. According to report, McClellan had eighty-seven thousand men—sixty thousand actively engaged on the field and twenty-seven thousand in reserve. General Lee held his position during the 18th, and at night crossed the Potomac, continuing the march on the 19th and until daybreak on the 20th, when we reached our wagon trains and secured something to eat. Longstreet's Corps and D. H. Hill's Division never drew an ounce in five days, and the battle of Sharpsburg was fought on apples, green corn, and empty stomachs.

KIND WORDS FROM "THE OTHER SIDE."

An address was delivered at Knoxville on the last Memorial Day which contained pleasing expressions from a Union veteran, Dr. John F. Spence, who was a soldier in the Federal army and came to Tennessee in the fall of 1865 to begin some educational work. He participated in the founding of Grant University at Athens and Chattanooga, and was its president for nearly twenty years, and much praise is given him for his zealous services in behalf of education in Tennessee.

Dr. Spence evidently sees in his maturer years with clearer vision the true situation of the sections, for in his Memorial Day address at Knoxville May 30, 1908, he paid fitting tribute to the Southern people in what they did in the sixties.

Dr. Spence was chosen National Chaplain of the G. A. R. at its recent meeting in Toledo, Ohio. He was educated in the Ohio Wesleyan University, and in 1862 came South with an Ohio regiment, with which he served until the end of the war. He remained in Knoxville, and in the same year founded the East Tennessee Female Institution. In 1867, with others, he founded the Grant University at Chattanooga, and in 1893 he founded the American Temperance University in Harriman, Tenn., and served as Chancellor for ten years.

DR. J. F. SPENCE.

ADDRESS BY DR. JOHN F. SPENCE ON MEMORIAL DAY.

Comrades and Fellow-Citizens: In memoriam honore: To honor the memory of the nation's dead heroes is the supreme business, the beautiful and lofty mission of every truly loyal citizen. To-day in memoriam we look into the face of the nation's peril and the hour of its redemption.

My comrades, while the frost may be in our hair and the lead in our joints and the rheumatism in our muscles, we are ever ready to fight our battles over and renew the memory of the times and deeds long past.

Some forty years ago Gen. John A. Logan, the first National Commander of the G. A. R., issued the first Decoration Day proclamation. He said: "We should guard their graves with sacred vigilance, and all that the consecrated wealth and taste of the nation can add to their adornment and security is but a fitting tribute to the memory of her sainted defenders. Now that sectional strife and feeling has given way to one of brotherly kindness, it is meet and right to call up the fact that the nation really owes its Memorial Day to the women of the South. Immediately following the close of the war the women of Columbus, Ga., went out and scattered flowers over the graves of their Confederate dead, and some of them also scattered flowers impartially over the unknown and unmarked resting places of the Union soldiers."

I well remember as the news of this touching tribute flashed over the North it roused as nothing else could have done national amity and love and allayed much sectional strife and passion. It thrilled every household where there was a vacant chair or aching heart for the lost hero whose remains had never been found, and in a mingled tempest of grief and joy many a family (over the North) cried out: "Maybe it was our darling."

Thus out of the deepest sorrow, common alike to North and South, came this beautiful custom—"scattering flowers over the graves of our dead."

During the same year came the inspired lines from the sore heart of the poet, "The Blue and the Gray:"

"From the silence of sorrowful hours
The desolate mourners go,
Lovingly laden with flowers
Alike for the friend and foe
Under the sod and dew
Waiting the judgment day;
Under the roses the Blue,
Under the lilies the Gray."

Three years later Commander in Chief Logan issued the first "flower proclamation." Since then the strewing of flowers is recognized as a holy sacrament, North and South alike.

There are in the United States some eighty national cemeteries, and most of them in the South. In these graveyards of the government lie more than 300,000 of the nation's dead; of these 300,000 guarded sepulchers, 145,000, nearly one-half, are marked with the saddest of all sad epitaphs: "Unknown."

My fellow-countrymen, I will speak to you briefly to-day of the results of our great national conflict. The war settled the question of State rights. Through the ages every international dispute about rights, about principles that could not be adjusted by diplomacy has been settled by war. For years the doctrine of "State rights" caused the chief contention in the nation. It could not be settled on the hustings, in Congress, or by the press, and finally the adjustment was submitted to the arbitrament of the sword. And the doctrine whether a State has the right to secede has been forever settled. It does not lie in the mouth of any one who believed in the right of a State in 1861 to secede to deny it now. That question was settled by the war, and no formal treaty was necessary as evidence of what the world could see.

The people in the South as sovereign States had the right to submit to the arbitrament of war. It was done, and, like those who have gone to war, all must abide the issue. So that now if a State should attempt to secede those who would cast their fortunes with it would be rebels. But not so in 1861. Then the right of a State to withdraw from the Union was an open question.

A few persons still hold to the unfortunate doctrine, and talk at times in their wrath about withdrawing from the Union. It is a shame they have not been permitted to read history. Nothing better illustrates the situation than this incident in the life of Gen. R. E. Lee. When the great conflict had ended and defeat had come to the armies Lee had led, he was visiting the house of a friend in Richmond, Va. With that love of children that always characterized him the old hero took upon his knee a fair-haired boy. The proud mother, to please the guest, asked the child: "Who is General Lee?" Parrotlike the expected answer came: "The great Virginian who was a patriot true to his native State." And then came the question: "Who was General Scott?" "A Virginian who was a traitor to his country."

Putting down the child and turning to the mother, the General said: "Madam, you should not teach your child such lessons. I will not listen to such talk. General Scott is not a traitor. He was true to his convictions of duty as I was to mine."

This was spoken by the great chieftain when the fires of the late war were still smoldering. He would have the mothers of the South teach their children that he and General Scott were both right, because each believed himself to be right, and State rights before the war gave them protection. And that is precisely what that noble son of New England, Charles Francis Adams, himself a gallant Union soldier, has more recently said in a public address—that the North and the South were both right because each believed itself right. And such is to be the ultimate verdict of history.

We were all patriots, Federal and Confederate, North and South; and we settled on the field of battle a constitutional question that could be settled in no other way. Public opinion is already moving, and moving rapidly, to the mark of that final verdict. No other nation commands such profound respect. Already, like the sun of nature, our nation is a mighty fountain of commerce, of intelligence, of scientific knowledge, and of religious light, supplying and feeding more or less every known people on the face of the earth. The future of this marvelous, this amazing empire possesses greatness and magnificence that the mind of man can neither measure nor comprehend. The trend of the times is with our nation. * * *

The Civil War freed the negro and conferred on him the right of suffrage and turned him loose on the South. No race of people was ever hurried with such swiftness through freedom into power. In a little more than twelve months from the day he walked down the furrow a slave the negro was a voter, dictated in legislative halls, holding office and trying to make laws. This race problem has been and is now upon the South; the South must face it. She merits the sympathy of all human-kind. It is a race issue. The races and tribes of earth are of divine origin. Behind the laws of man and the decrees of war stands the law of God. We in the South intend to respect his command: "That God hath separated, let no man join together."

This is not a sectional issue between the North and the South; it speaks in Ohio and Georgia, in Massachusetts and Tennessee alike. It speaks wherever the Anglo-Saxon touches an alien race. It has recently spoken in universally approved legislation in excluding the Chinaman from our gates not alone for his ignorance and vices, but for the inferiority of his race.

Yes, my countrymen, the Anglo-Saxon blood has dominated, controlled always, everywhere. It fed Alfred when he wrote the charter of English liberty; it gathered about Hampton as he stood beneath the oak; it thundered in Cromwell's veins as he fought his king; it humbled and destroyed Napoleon at Waterloo; it carried the drumbeat of England around the world, and spread on every continent the gospel of liberty and of God.

And I may strongly say that Anglo-Saxon blood established this republic, carved it from the wilderness, conquered it from the Indians, wrested it from England, and last but not least, after a four years' struggle, stilled its own tumult, consecrating this republic forever as the home of the Anglo-Saxon and the theater of his transcending achievements. Never may one foot of it be surrendered to any inferior race while that blood flows in American veins.

My countrymen, I want to say that my political and social horoscope is pregnant with good things. I have traversed along scholastic, political, and social lines nearly every portion of our Southland in the last forty years, I have mingled and conferred with both races, and I am free to announce to you to-day I have no fear of a race conflict.

Already nearly one-half a century has passed since the negro received his freedom and suffrage, and at no time since 1865 has the South been more hopeful and quiet and has the colored race been better satisfied. The storm centers, North and South, are dissolving. My vision is already being filled by the presence of a wise, brave statesman, a born leader, who shall move a challenge at the gates of the North to all foreigners. "Who comes there?" admitting every one who seeks a home or honors our institutions and whose habits and blood will run with native current, but excluding all who seek to plant anarchy or establish alien men or measures on our soil, and will demand that the standard of our citizenship in the South be lifted and the right of acquiring suffrage be abridged. When that day comes and that statesman takes his place, the position of the South will be fully understood and everywhere approved.

CONFEDERATE BREECH-LOADING CANNON.

BY CAPT. THEODORE F. ALLEN, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

In the VETERAN for October, 1908, referring to the Kentucky troops in the Confederate army, you mentioned that there were few batteries of artillery from Kentucky. You also state that R. S. Williams is reported as having had a battery of Kentucky artillery in the Confederate army, but there is no roll of the members on file or on record.

You are probably not expecting a Federal officer to post you on this subject of Williams's Confederate Battery; but as I happened to be in front of that villainous battery on one occasion, I am in a position to speak on the subject, and I want to tell you that Williams's (or, as it was most generally known, Schoolfield's) Battery comprised breech-loading cannon, and I fancy these were the only breech-loading cannon in the Confederate army, and I am sure the history of this battery, comprised of breech-loading artillery, should be recorded in the annals of the Confederacy.

My regiment, the 7th Ohio Cavalry, was in front of this battery in the battle of Blue Springs, East Tennessee, October 10, 1863. In this engagement we presumed we had Giltner's Cavalry Brigade in front of us, and we were expecting to have a lively tussle; but when the engagement opened, we were greatly surprised to find a battery of artillery in our front, and the way they did let go at us was a caution. We were dismounted; and throwing ourselves flat on our bellies, we let the fire of this battery go over our heads. They did not hurt us. We had never run up against a battery of this kind before. It was Schoolfield's Breech-Loading Confederate Battery. These guns, one-pounders, were mounted on light wheels, and they could be put in action by one horse in shafts. We had heard artillery many times before, but we had never heard anything that made such a horrible noise as the shot from these breechloaders. We thought they were firing railroad spikes at us from the awful noise as the shot went over. In that engagement there was a large portion of Burnside's 9th Army Corps of Infantry, and these little breech-loading cannon sent a thrill of fear through every man over whom the shot passed.

Having been so badly scared by this battery, I took pains in later years to learn the history of these breechloaders.

Capt. R. S. Williams, of Covington, Ky., went to Richmond, Va., early in the war and induced the Confederate government to cast a battery of six breech-loading cannon of which he was the patentee. This was perhaps the only battery of breech-loading cannon in the Confederate army. During its period of service it was attached to Giltner's Cavalry Brigade, and the twenty-five young men who worked the guns were detailed or volunteered from Maj. Bart Jenkins's battalion of Kentuckians, the battery being much in service with the 4th Kentucky Cavalry. The twenty-five young men detailed from Maj. Bart Jenkins's Battalion were commanded by Capt. J. J. Schoolfield, of Jenkins's Battalion, and the battery, as stated above, was generally known as "Schoolfield's Battery," although it was "Williams's Battery" originally.

Captain Williams died a few years ago at Covington, Ky., but Capt. J. J. Schoolfield is still living. He is an attorney at law, and resides at Iuka, Ill. Captain Schoolfield tells me that so far as he knows this was the first battery of breech-loading artillery ever used on any battlefield; that it required three men to handle a gun when in action: one to place the cartridge in the breech, one to cap it, and a third to sight it. This man (who sighted it) turned a crank that threw the breech out and in with one revolution. These guns, as stated, carried a one-pound solid ball and had a range of about one mile. Captain Schoolfield regarded it as a very effective gun for those times, although "it was too light in metal, and sometimes when being very rapidly worked in action the breech would expand with the heat of firing until it would not return to its place in the gun." The guns were about six feet in length. One of them is in possession of the War Department at Washington, and has been placed on exhibition as a curiosity "used by the Confederates during the Civil War." It has also been shown at expositions in different parts of the country. There is one other gun, which, I may mention, was stolen during the Civil War. Col. Tom Johnson, a Confederate officer, when on a scouting expedition in Eastern Kentucky with a small body of cavalry, took one of these guns along with a working squad. While in camp one night a Federal partisan named Captain Patrick made a quiet raid on Johnson's camp, got inside his camp without being discovered, and actually stole the gun and carried it away, and is still in possession of it. This feat of the Federal partisan excited a good deal of fun in both armies, and resulted finally in the story on Col. Tom Johnson that a Union woman visited his camp one afternoon, hid the little gun under her apron, and carried it off.

Captain Schoolfield a few years ago had occasion to write a letter of inquiry to another attorney in East Kentucky in regard to the title to some real estate that a client of his was interested in, and Schoolfield wrote to him to make the examination and charge the cost to him. This attorney made the examination desired very promptly and reported to Captain Schoolfield what he had done, and told Schoolfield that there was no bill for expenses for the reason that he had the little Schoolfield gun that Captain Patrick stole from Col. Tom Johnson, and that sometimes when they had a Republican victory in their county they used the Schoolfield gun to celebrate it, and they felt they were well repaid for any little favor they might do for him. Captain Schoolfield tells me that, while he infers that his correspondent and himself do not agree politically, he is disposed to call it even.

It is now about forty-five years to a day since I stood in front of Schoolfield's Battery in the battle at Blue Springs, East Tennessee; but I am pleased to be able to state that there are others living besides myself who survived the awful noise of this battery, and I may also state that on the Confederate side, among others I recall, still living are Capt. J. J. Schoolfield, of Iuka, Ill., Maj. Bart Jenkins (commander Jenkins's Battalion), of Umatilla, Fla., Rev. Capt. E. O. Guerrant, D.D., of Wilmore, Ky., and Capt. T. M. Freeman, of Houston, Tex.

Captain Guerrant was the adjutant general of Giltner's Brigade and knew this battery well, and I am sure the editor of the VETERAN will agree with me that these survivors ought to contribute their recollection of this breech-loading battery in the Confederate army and that the same may go on record; and if it proves correct, as Captain Schoolfield thinks, that this was the first breech-loading artillery used on any battlefield, then I am sure the records ought to be made now while the men familiar with the circumstances are still living.

ABOUT TITLES IN THE U. C. V.

Comrade Frank D. Brown, recently chosen as Major General of the Northwest Division, comments upon the article from "a prominent veteran of Maryland," in which dignified objection is made to the wearing of the insignia of the officers engaged in the Civil War by present and past officers of the United Confederate Veterans. He says:

"I most heartily agree with him, and I shall cordially support any effort made to change the present marks of distinction worn upon the coats of our Division, Brigade, Regimental, and Company Officers.

"While I value my own position most highly, I feel embarrassed in wearing a general's stars when seated beside a man in our General Reunions who won his own in actual service. The wearing of a uniform distinctively our own invites no such unfavorable comment. Let our old living officers be properly decorated. I know that many brave and gallant gentlemen command various Divisions of the U. C. V., and this criticism certainly does not apply to such.

"And there should be a Department order that no veteran who has not actually joined his regiment and seen service or been in actual service not less than one year can be elected to command our Divisions and Brigades. The credentials of an aspirant should be that he had at least one year of actual service either in the field or prison. He should present unquestioned written evidence of such service. By doing so the humiliation of unjust suspicion is avoided and adverse criticism defied. It is very easy for an aspirant possessing a hazy record, yet wealthy, to secure the coveted honor. He simply pays his way in by giving liberally to the association, wearing gorgeous uniforms, and displaying himself at our Reunions. These he contributes to make the show a success. Our Reunions are simply social gatherings of men who have done their best, and meet each other in the fond hope of again seeing upon earth comrades they knew in the war. Down deep in their hearts they revere their Commanders, Gordon, Lee, Evans, Cabell, and their other generals. Let them continue to wear the stars they earned. Let our colonels and captains, lieutenants and naval officers wear the insignia conferred upon them by the War Department at Richmond, and let us wear what we have a right to put on—a uniform of our own made of gray and decorated with an insignia in no way in conflict with that of our commanders of the dark and bloody days. At the Memphis Reunion of 1909 I will use every endeavor to make the change suggested by the comrade from Maryland."

MISS LOUISE DOUGHERTY, GAINESVILLE, TEX.

Miss Louise Dougherty unveiled the beautiful Confederate monument in Gainesville, Tex., assisted by her maids of honor, as reported on page 377 of VETERAN for July, 1908.

[The monument was erected by the Lou Dougherty Chapter, U. D. C., and the engraving was ready for use in that issue, but it happened to be confused with some engravings of sponsors and maids to the Reunion.]

FLAG OF THIRTEENTH ALABAMA REGIMENT.

Lucius D. Alden, who served in the 33d Missouri Infantry, U. S. A., and is now Deputy Auditor in the War Department at Washington, talked with Mr. John Hamel, Assistant Secretary of the Tennessee Board of Health (who attended the Tuberculosis Congress there), in regard to an experience in battles at Tupelo, Miss., July 15-17, 1864. He said:

"After a charge by the Confederates (the 2d, I believe) was repulsed by Gen. Joseph A. Mower's Division of the 16th Corps, a number of skirmishers and sharpshooters (among them the writer) were thrown out and advanced farther down the slope. We climbed over a rail fence at the foot of the slope, crossing a road to the rising ground beyond and on the right, entering and passing through a field of very tall corn. Later, the enemy's line having reached cover of their position, their artillery opened up on us, and General Mower, who had just then ridden up, ordered us back, and we returned to our position on the opposite slope from the enemy. At that time the skirmish line advanced, and just as I had climbed over the rail fence I heard a voice calling for my assistance, and, turning, saw a fine-looking and well-dressed Confederate soldier sitting on the ground with his back to the fence just to my left, who entreated me to pull off his boots. I dropped my gun and instantly responded, pulling off both boots, and discovered that he had been shot through both legs below the knees and that his limbs were badly swollen. The last look into his face as he thanked me showed his great relief. I think he was in the same position when, a little later, we fell back.

"A color bearer went down with his flag as the enemy fell back, and I requested permission of General Mower to advance up the slope and secure it; but the General would not let me risk it in open view to the artillery fire as well as that of sharpshooters. I understand from one of our regiment that another member of it has the flag. It is that of the 13th Alabama. I have written to learn about it more fully and to assist in securing its return if possible. This might be a clue to the information desired—the Confederate who was shot in the legs."

CARELESS USE OF CROSS OF HONOR CRITICISED.

Some little time ago the Recording Secretary of the Virginia Division, U. D. C., called attention to the inexcusable carelessness with which many applications for crosses of honor are filled out, in reference to which she states:

"At the recent Convention of the Virginia Division, U. D. C., a committee was appointed who will petition the Legislature to enact some laws to protect the crosses from being worn by any but the rightful owners; but what good will that do when such a state of things exists as was brought to light in that Convention? Instances were reported where applications were signed by veterans vouching for applicants who, they later declared to the Daughters, they knew to be deserters! I have in my possession now an application for a cross—with company, dates, etc., signed by Adjutant and Commandant and by veterans—and no name of the applicant! I also know an Adjutant who took from the post office without a written order a cross which had been sent by registered mail to an applicant and gave it to a friend of his to wear to the Richmond Reunion, who was not in the army at all!

"It is the aim of the U. D. C. to see that true history is written and taught; but with such records as the above put away in our archives what will it be? It is 'up to' the veterans themselves. The little bit of bronze is intrinsically worthless; but does it 'represent nothing on God's earth now?' Is it only a bit of bronze to you?"

In giving the above criticism the VETERAN hopes to put all organizations having to do with the cross of honor to more diligent care in their distribution. However, it is impelled to give general praise for the unceasing care of Daughters in giving it only where merited. It may be accepted as a rule that the man who wears a cross of honor has established a record worthy of highest praise. Let all guard this sacred bit of bronze, so that its possessors will leave a treasured heritage to posterity.

THE VETERANS' CROSS OF HONOR.

BY H. H. STEVENS.

(To the air of "The Old Oaken Bucket.")

How dear to the heart of each gray-headed soldier
 Are the thoughts of the days when all wore the gray!
 While memory recalls every trial and danger,
 And scenes of the past live in battle array,
 Though long since discarding our arms and equipments!
 There's one thing a veteran most surely will note:
 The first thing he sees on the form of a comrade
 Is the little bronze cross he wears on his coat.

Chorus.

The little bronze cross, the sacred bronze cross,
 The U. D. C. Cross that he wore on his coat.

"How much did it cost," said a man to a soldier,
 "The little flat cross you wear on your coat?"
 "A fortune in money," he answered the stranger,
 "And four years of marching and fighting to boot.
 The wealth of the world cannot purchase this emblem,
 Except the buyer wore the gray too;
 For it shows to mankind the marks of a hero—
 A man who to honor and country was true."

Then let us be proud of this emblem of honor,
 And wear it with spirit both loyal and bold;
 Fraternally welcome each one who supports it,
 With love in our hearts for the comrade of old.
 Each day musters out whole battalions of wearers,
 And soon will be missed this token so dear;
 But ages to come will remember with honor
 The man who'd the right this bronze emblem to wear

MAJ. JOHN C. THOMPSON, OF MISSISSIPPI.

BY W. H. LEE, COLUMBUS, MISS.

The article in your August issue, "Ages of Oldest Confederates," impels me to tell the story of a unique couple. In April, 1861, there came to our regiment as enlisted privates in a North Mississippi company the father ("Judge," by courtesy), John C. Thompson, aged seventy, and his son, Flem, aged thirteen. Their disparity of years soon made them conspicuous and favorites in the regiment. Many a helping hand was extended to the pair as they trudged along both from the ranks and from the officers' quarters, though they claimed no exemption from duty. The old gentleman was a lawyer by profession, a man of education and intelligence. When asked why he enlisted at his age, he replied that he had talked and voted for secession and felt he ought to fight for the cause.

In August, 1861, he marched with us from Union City to Tiptonville, Tenn., helped us occupy and guard New Madrid, Mo., went with us to Columbus, Ky., and took part in the battle of Belmont. In April, 1862, we moved to Shiloh's bloody field, where on the morning of the first day's fight our assistant surgeon found the old Judge stretched out with an ugly scalp wound which at first sight appeared mortal. The stricken veteran asked to be taken to the hospital to escape burial in the trenches, so Surgeon Lipcomb hurried off for an ambulance. On his return the Judge was in the ranks, head tied up and rifle on shoulder. Later in the day he received a second wound, and was subsequently sent home for repairs. Our Colonel Blythe and Lieutenant Colonel Herron were both killed in the fight, and during the Judge's absence an election was held to fill vacancies. By unanimous vote the gallant old Judge was elected major, which rank he held to the end. He shared with us the Kentucky campaign, going through the battle of Mumfordsville, fought at Murfreesboro, and in September, 1863, came to Chickamauga, where he was killed while gallantly leading one of the last charges on Snodgrass Hill. That night a squad of his devoted comrades, of which I was one, carried the brave old body to the rear, made a rude coffin of boards torn from Lee & Gordon's Mill, and reverently committed it to rest with a few words from our chaplain. Peace to his ashes! He has surely gone to Valhalla. All honor to the brave old Arkansans and Georgians of whom you wrote; but I think my old major excelled them in that he equaled them in age, surpassed them in service, and in the end made the supreme sacrifice for the Southland of his birth and love. The boy Flem served through the war, retiring as sergeant major.

An extract from Gen. Patton Anderson's report of Chickamauga from Mississippi Register Department Archives and History is as follows: "Among the killed was Maj. John C. Thompson, of the 44th (Blythe's) Mississippi Regiment, fearless among the fearless. A man of education and position at home, of an age far beyond that prescribed by the laws of the land for involuntary service, at the first tocsin of war he enlisted in the ranks, and fought as a private at Belmont and Shiloh, having been severely wounded at the latter. His gallantry and services marked him before the men of his State for promotion, which he soon received, and he commanded his regiment with his usual gallantry at the battle of Murfreesboro. On the memorable field of Chickamauga his devotion to the cause of country has been sealed with his blood."

THE LAST SHOTS BY GEN. JOHNSTON'S ARMY

BY A. WOOD, RIO GRANDE CITY, TEX.

I notice in the July (1908) VETERAN a letter from Comrade J. B. Whitsit. I suppose he means from small arms or muskets; he does not say, but says they were sheltered by some trees. I do not doubt but what he says is true. I have always thought Hart's Battery, of South Carolina, fired the last cannon that was fired by General Johnston's army. This battery was commanded by Gen. S. D. Lee at the beginning of the war. The battery had been ordered from Virginia to Gen. Wade Hampton's South Carolina command, arriving just at the close of the battle of Averysboro. We followed on after General Sherman, and fought the battle of Bentonville some three days later. We then with cavalry followed on after General Sherman to within ten or twelve miles of Goldsboro pressing and fighting his rear guard as opportunity offered.

When General Sherman advanced on Raleigh, we contested every inch of ground until we got to Raleigh. There we heard through some prisoners that General Lee had surrendered. We camped in the edge of the capital of the Old North State that night, the 12th of April, 1865. Next morning we marched through the town, and out on the Hillsboro Road some half a mile from the depot General Hampton rode up and ordered Lieutenant Bamburg, commanding the rear section, to stop one of his guns and burn the depot, as it contained some Confederate supplies. The fourth gun was unlimbered in the road and some half dozen shells fired into the depot, when smoke was seen coming from it. Sergeant File commanded the gun with Sojourner as gunner.

We remained in the rear of General Johnston's army and did reserve picket duty while General Johnston and General Sherman were agreeing on terms of surrender, and then marched back to Greensboro and turned in our guns. Gen. S. D. Lee came to see the boys there.

So rapidly are comrades passing away, and so heavy is the demand for space in the "Last Roll" columns, that request is made of all who send such tributes to make the notices as brief as possible and have them written clearly. Ancestry and other data save as Confederate soldiers, if used at all, should be very brief. Clippings are nearly always too long. No charge is made for publishing these tributes except where a picture is used, when two dollars is charged for making the engraving. Every one who has an engraving in the VETERAN should pay for it or some one else should do so.

PIPES.—Maj. E. S. Pipes, for many years Commander of the Camp at Kaufman, Tex., died on February 16, 1908. He belonged to Company G, 32d Louisiana Regiment, and his service was about Vicksburg, Miss., and elsewhere.

PHILLIPS.—Another comrade of Kaufman has also passed over the great divide. R. A. Phillips, a member of Company D, 12th Alabama Battery, under Wheeler, died on June 27. Both of them—Pipes and Phillips—were good and true soldiers of the Confederacy.

LINDSEY.—T. J. Lindsey died in Palo Pinto County, Tex., on August 2. He was among the first to volunteer for the Confederacy, serving in Company H, 1st Texas Cavalry, for four years. He was a good soldier. As a citizen also he could be relied upon implicitly.

KYLE.—J. R. Kyle, of Seffner, Fla., died on the 5th of August, aged sixty-seven years. He was born in Pontotoc County, Miss., and served in Company E, 2d Mississippi Regiment, making a good and faithful soldier.

LAMKIN.—M. A. Lamkin died at his home, in Huntsville, Tex., on August 18. He was born in Missouri in 1841. Comrade Lamkin served the Confederacy as a member of Company D, 5th Regiment, Hood's Texas Brigade, doing valiant service in Virginia. He was wounded several times. He was a member of John C. Upton Camp, U. C. V., of Huntsville.

BROOKS.—On January 11, 1908, S. D. Brooks died at his home, near Brooks Station, Tenn., in his eighty-first year. He was first lieutenant of Company D, 1st Kentucky Cavalry, and was a prominent member of the "Orphan Brigade." He never missed a meeting when able to attend. He was highly esteemed by all his comrades and neighbors.

LOFTICE.—Warren Loftice was born April 2, 1828, in North Carolina; and died near Malissa Station, Tex., July 22, 1908. He enlisted in the Confederate service in 1861 and remained till 1865. No truer, braver, or more loyal soldier ever shouldered his musket in the cause of his country.

COLEMAN.—L. D. Coleman was born and lived all his life in Laurens County, Ga. Death came to him on July 28, in his seventy-fifth year. He entered the Confederate army in May, 1862, as a member of Company H, 14th Georgia Regiment, and participated in all the battles of his regiment, coming out unscathed with the exception of a slight wound received at Gettysburg.

MRS. BRAXTON BRAGG.

Mrs. Cornelia Branch Stone, President General U. D. C., to the United Daughters of the Confederacy:

"Again death, the insatiable, has entered our ranks and taken from us one of our Honorary Presidents, Mrs. Eliza

MRS. BRAXTON BRAGG.

B. Bragg, the widow of Gen. Braxton Bragg, a distinguished commander of the Confederate States army, who died in New Orleans September 25, 1908. This announcement is received by the United Daughters of the Confederacy with profound sorrow and sympathy, for we mourn not only the widow of one of the great leaders of the Confederate army, but a woman of the sweetest and highest Southern type. Dignified in manner and speech, refined and cultured, patriotic and unselfish, she combined all of the gentle graces with the force and grandeur of a great mind and heart.

"In the beautiful language of Mrs. Clay-Clopton, she has passed away like the petals of the fallen summer rose, but to bloom, we hope, in the garden celestial."

The VETERAN is gratified to have the foregoing from the highest earthly source among women. It is a vivid portrayal of a character whose imperfections could hardly be detected. The editor had the honor of knowing from Mrs. Bragg some of the hardships through which she passed during the war.

Although her husband commanded the second largest and strongest army of the Confederacy and might have had his wife with a retinue of servants and of course the best we all had, she stayed at the home on a plantation in Louisiana, taking the best care of it that she could, until the Federal forces went and destroyed all. They even cut the beds to pieces and scattered the feathers over the yard. Noble Christian woman, she did what she could.

GAREY AND WATSON, OF DICK DOWLING CAMP.

The Adjutant of Dick Dowling Camp at Houston, Tex., reports the loss of two comrades from their connection:

Maj. John E. Garey died on July 14 at the age of eighty-four years. He was a veteran of three years, in all of which he gained renown as a brave and gallant soldier. He was chief quartermaster of the Trans-Mississippi Department at the close of the War between the States, and his service had been marked by that rugged honesty which was one of his characteristics. He was a genial companion and devoted friend, and his passing has left a mourning family and friends.

W. V. R. Watson died at the age of seventy, having lived the allotted span of human life, in which he set an example worthy to be followed. He served through the war in Company K, 17th Alabama Regiment, and was wounded at Shiloh. His familiar form is missed in every walk of life.

MAJ. PETER FONTAINE.

The Bar Association of Charleston, W. Va., took action with respect to the death of Maj. Peter Fontaine, one of its members. President J. M. Payne appointed a committee to submit resolutions, which were adopted by the meeting.

Maj. Peter Fontaine was a member of that association from its organization, and had been a member of the bar since 1873. He was born in Hanover County, Va., in 1840. He was a son of James Fontaine, of that county. After taking a course of study at the University of Virginia, he, upon the breaking out of the War between the States in 1861, promptly volunteered in the Hanover Troop, C. S. A., and by his merit, good judgment, sagacity, and courage he rose from the ranks to be a major, and served upon the staff of General Wickham and then the staff of General Rosser until the end of the war. He was severely wounded in the battle of Kelley's Ford.

Soon after the war Major Fontaine went to Charleston and taught school for a time. Then returning to his Alma Mater, the University of Virginia, he took a course in law, and commenced the practice of his profession about 1873. For many years he was a commissioner in chancery of the circuit court of the county, also of the United States court sitting in Charleston.

Major Fontaine was zealous in the formation of the Bar Association of Charleston, taking an active part in its organization, and was its first secretary. Much is due to his good judgment and industry in starting this association on its career of usefulness to the profession and Charleston. He was beloved and useful as a member of the Kanawha bar and a most worthy, scholarly, and learned citizen. The association tendered its earnest sympathy to his family in their great bereavement.

[From data by Thomas L. Broun, of Charleston, W. Va.]

BROCK.—Drew Brock was born in Henderson County, Tenn., in February, 1842; and died at Trezevant in August, 1908, having gone to Dyer County just after the war. He served in Company L, 6th Tennessee Infantry, going through many hard-fought battles, such as Chickamauga and from Rocky Face Ridge to Atlanta. He was captured at Chickamauga, but made his escape and returned to his command. He was not sick a day during his service. He is survived by his wife and family.

JOHN FORSYTH SMITH.

"John F. Smith has answered his last roll call," remarked a comrade as he stood beside the casket containing the body of John F. Smith on June 6, 1908. He was courageous in battle during the four years of strife that overshadowed our sunny land, and he was equally brave during the years which followed in the upbuilding of his home and country and equally so in later life under the increasing weight of years and infirmities. His health had not been good for some months, and his life passed away as gently as a child falls asleep.

At the beginning of the war, in 1861, Comrade Smith enlisted in the first company that left Lauderdale County, Miss. (the Pettus Guards), commanded by Capt. W. F. Brown. It was ordered to Virginia, and afterwards was mustered in as Company F, 13th Mississippi Volunteers, under command of that gallant soldier, Col. William Barksdale.

Comrade Smith was in active service during the entire war, from 1861 to 1865, with the exception of eight months spent as a prisoner at Point Lookout, Md. He was captured in the battle of the Wilderness, in May, 1864.

Comrade Smith was born in Bibb County, Ala., on July 29, 1834. During his early childhood his father moved to Mississippi and settled near Enterprise, in Clark County. His father died when he was a small boy. In 1866 he married Miss Martha E. Hall, who survives him, together with two sons and four daughters. He was an honored member of Walthall Camp, U. C. V., and was buried with their honors.

THE LATE S. G. ELEAZER.

[By a mishap in the make-up of "Last Roll" forms for the September VETERAN the following was omitted from the tribute to Comrade S. G. Eleazer by James H. McNeilly, Chaplain 49th Tennessee Infantry. See page 417.]

I conducted the funeral service, which was attended by a host of friends from miles around, and among them a number of his comrades of the 49th Regiment, gray and bent and scarred with wounds. They all loved him.

He had attended every Reunion of the U. C. V., and as our comrades were gathering for the Reunion in Birmingham he joined the larger company who have passed over the river to rest in the shade of the trees of life.

Personally I feel deeply the loss of a friend of all my life, tried and true, who never failed me.

[James H. McNeilly, Chaplain 49th Tennessee Infantry.]

WIFE OF ROBERT JAMISON.

Mrs. Camilla Patterson Jamison, wife of Prof. Robert D. Jamison, of Murfreesboro, died July 11, 1908, at the home of her son, H. D. Jamison, 2111 White Avenue, Nashville, of a protracted illness of several months. She was an earnest Christian worker from childhood to her death. She was also an ardent defender of the cause of the Confederacy, and in 1861 as a young bride gave her husband to the service of our beloved Southland. He was true and faithful to the cause to the end, and survives her. He served in Brown's Brigade, of which no member has ever been ashamed.

BRAGG.—At the same place where he was born on December 10, 1845, in Ouachita County, Ark., Arthur V. Bragg passed away in April, 1908. He enlisted in the Confederate service early in 1864, and made a true and faithful soldier to the end, as became his lineage of Southern and patriotic blood. His father dying when Arthur was but nine years old, the care of his widowed mother, sisters, and younger brothers fell upon him, and was faithfully met. He was interested in all movements tending to honor the memory of the Confederate soldier, and attended many Reunions with his comrades.

JOHN M. RAYSOR.

The sudden death of Comrade John M. Raysor at his home, in Atlanta, Ga., was an inexpressible shock to his friends and comrades of Stonewall Jackson Camp. From the resolutions passed in his honor the following sketch of his life was secured:

John Michael Raysor was a native of South Carolina; but his father having removed to Florida before the war, it was from that State that he entered the Confederate service. His father was colonel of the Florida State Troops, and all his brothers were in the Confederate service, one of them being a captain. John Raysor served in the 5th Florida Regiment, of which John C. Hatley was colonel. He was with the Virginia Army until wounded, his right arm being shattered; but it finally healed and became fairly serviceable. He was then detailed with the enrolling department of the State of Florida until the close of the war.

He participated in many battles, being twice awarded medals for distinguished gallantry in action: at Chancellorsville, because he was the first to cross a hastily improvised bridge in a successful charge against the enemy's intrenchments, and at Gettysburg, because he faced almost certain death in drawing off in the dark the Confederate pickets, whose orders were to fire without challenging. It is said that when his brigadier general called upon him to perform that glorious deed at Gettysburg his captain said: "John, if I were you, I would not go; it is almost certain death." He replied: "Some one must go, and I might as well be the one."

Comrade Raysor removed to Atlanta shortly after the war, and for sixteen years past had been connected with Judge Orr's court. His life was that of the consecrated Christian, ever looking onward to something better. His love for little children was a fine trait of his character. For years he was superintendent of the Trinity Home Mission Sunday School, and was also long a member of the Board of Stewards of Trinity Church. Death came to him in his sixty-sixth year. His daughter, Mrs. Robert T. Clayton, of Birmingham, and three sisters and a brother, Capt. George D. Raysor, of Quitman, Ga., are the survivors of his family. He was also proud of having been a Confederate soldier, yet no one ever heard him give an account of his personal bravery.

CAPT. J. P. BAYLY.

Capt. James P. Bayly died at Hennessey, Okla, on September 18, 1908. In the spring of 1861 he enlisted in Company H, 6th Virginia Cavalry. He was afterwards elected lieutenant, and promoted to captain of Company D, 5th Virginia Cavalry. Gen. J. E. B. Stuart's official report of December, 1862, says: "Lieut. James P. Bayly succeeded Captain Bullock (who was killed) in command of the dismounted sharpshooters, and, gallantly charging across the creek, drove the enemy's infantry skirmishers from the ground, capturing eleven of them, and maintained his position until dark, when in obedience to orders the detachment was withdrawn."

Captain Bayly was a member of William Richardson Camp, U. C. V., of Front Royal, Va.

[From W. E. Grayson, Commander of Camp Richardson.]

WILLIAM ALEXANDER POLK.

William A. Polk was born in Lawrence County, Mo., on February 14, 1844, where he lived his first six years. He was with his uncle, Maj. D. D. Berry, in Springfield, Mo., in the early fifties, and from then to 1861 lived alternately between Walnut Bend, Ark., and New Castle, Tenn. At the opening of the War between the States he joined the first company organized in Hardeman County, Tenn., by Dr. W. B. Morrow, Captain; John Marsh, First Lieutenant; and Polk, Second Lieutenant. He afterwards joined the 4th Tennessee Infantry, remaining with that regiment and participating in building the fortifications at Forts Pillow and Randolph. He was also in a campaign from New Madrid, Mo., to Cape Girardeau, returning to New Madrid and thence to Columbus, Ky. He was then transferred to Capt. Jack Neely's scouts, which was afterwards a part of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry. He performed staff duty with General Villipigue and Col. A. P. Thompson, also served with this regiment until after the Hood expedition to Nashville. He was captured soon after in Mississippi while on a scout, and spent the remaining period of the war in prison at Camp Douglas, near Chicago.

Among the many comrades who have given testimony as to the fidelity and bravery of Mr. Polk, Col. W. F. Taylor, who was lieutenant colonel of the 7th Tennessee Cavalry, wrote on April 4, 1908: "It gives me pleasure to testify to the good character of one of our old regiment, such as you proved to be—a gentleman, a brave soldier, one who was ever prompt to obey orders and one who did his duty nobly and well."

After the war, when Comrade Polk returned to his home July 4, 1865, he found that his father had been driven from home by the Federal troops and that his stepmother was in a destitute condition. In 1866 he moved with his father's family to Navarro County, Tex., settling near Dresden. Late that year he was married to Miss Mattie Mosley, of Hernando, Miss., who survives him with six of their eight children. He had been a resident of Corsicana, Tex., continuously since 1883. He stood high in the estimation of his fellow-citizens, who had honored him with public office at various times. He was a consistent Church member and prominent as a Mason, having been Master of the Dresden and Corsicana Lodges.

He died on June 22, 1908, and the memory of his unselfish patriotism, valor, and Christian spirit inspires admiration.

"Than his no hand would sooner turn
To drop his alms in pity's urn;
Than he none higher worth e'er won
As husband, father, brother, son;
On none can higher praise descend
As soldier, citizen, and friend.
In each respect, well tried and proved,
Honored he lived and died beloved."

GEN. EPPA HUNTON.

Brig. Gen. Eppa Hunton, of the Confederate army, died recently at the home of his son, Eppa Hunton, Jr., Richmond, Va., aged eighty-six years. General Hunton, although a vigorous old man, had been blind and deaf for several months. He had been very low for several weeks, but his death was unexpected at this time. He was buried with military honors in historic Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond.

General Hunton was known as the hero of Ball's Bluff. He was a member of the Virginia Secession Committee. He was also on the military committee to prepare Virginia for defense. He resigned as a brigadier general in the State service to enter the regular Confederate army. He was promoted to be a brigadier general after the battle of Gettysburg, where he was wounded in the charge up Cemetery Heights. He was captured at Sailor's Creek on "Lee's last retreat."

General Hunton was elected to Congress in 1872, and was reelected thereafter four times. He was appointed United States Senator in 1892 to fill the unexpired term of John S. Barbour, and was the colleague of Senator John W. Daniel.

GEN. EPPA HUNTON.

DR. B. S. MEDLOCK.

Dr. Ben S. Medlock, of Benton, Ark., died on September 22, 1908. He was a member of Company E, 1st Arkansas Regiment of Infantry, and served in Virginia the first year of the war, including the battle of Bull Run. In 1862 the regiment was transferred to the Army of Mississippi (later Army of Tennessee), to Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston's army, just in time to take part in the battle of Shiloh. He served until the close of the war, and was in all the engagements participated in by the regiment. In 1863 he was promoted to second lieutenant. He was a brave and gallant soldier.

He was a Mason, and was buried by them at Collegeville, eight miles from Benton, his former home. It was his special request to have his Masonic burial service conducted by James H. Shoppach, of Little Rock, an old comrade of his.

[Data from Dr. Fred W. Bush, Benton, Ark.]

CAPT. R. M. WILLIAMS.

Roger Mackerness Williams was born April 8, 1834, near Gadsden, Ala.; and died at the home of his son-in-law, E. M. Turner, in Dallas, Tex., March 22, 1908. When his education was finished he settled at Ashville, Ala., where he met and married Miss Cordelia Dill on November 8, 1855. This union was blessed with one son, James A. Williams, who became a leading physician and died several years ago in Arkansas.

When the call for troops was made in 1861, Roger Williams enlisted promptly, and was elected first lieutenant of Company A, 10th Alabama Regiment. He was a brave officer, and was soon promoted to captain. He always said, "Come on, boys," leading the way for them. He was kind to his men, and they loved and trusted him. He was in many battles, among others the First Manassas, Frazier's Farm, Fredericksburg, Seven Days' Fight around Richmond, Second Manassas, Harper's Ferry, Sharpsburg, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania C. H., etc. The 10th Alabama was in Wilcox's Brigade, Mahone's Division, A. P. Hill's Corps.

In July, 1865, he was married to his second wife, Miss Sarah R. Phillips, and soon thereafter removed to Tupelo, Miss., from which place he went to Hillsboro, Tex., in 1885. In June of 1907 he made his home in Dallas, Tex., where he died. He was a true man, a brave soldier, and an honored Church member, leaving an honorable life to bless the wife and children surviving—three daughters and two sons.

JOHN L. SHOWALTER.

John Lineweaver Showalter died on May 28, 1908, at his home, at Volcano, W. Va., of vulvular heart trouble after several weeks' illness. The deceased was a gallant Confederate soldier, who at an early age enlisted in McNeill's Partisan Rangers, and participated in many of the noted exploits of that famous organization. He was born near Harrisonburg, Rockingham County, Va., December 8, 1845. A widow and six children, together with a host of admiring friends, mourn their loss.

T. W. WESTLAKE.

Thomas W. Westlake, of Columbia, Mo., has been laid to rest near his old home, at Locust Grove Church. He joined the Confederate army in 1861 at Lexington, Mo., under Capt. J. B. Watson, and went South from there under Gen. Sterling Price, and was in the army until it ceased to be. He then went to Mexico with Gen. Joe Shelby, and was in service there a year and two days.

FRATERNAL SPIRIT AMONG ALL TRUE VETERANS.

BY A. I. MATHER, ROCKLAND, MAINE.

Since the publication of my little article in the July VETERAN I have been the recipient of many fraternal letters from old comrades who wore the gray demonstrating that the old vets who were on the firing line are full of fraternity. I feel confident that the boys of '65, the real heroes, came to the conclusion that the war ended at Appomattox.

I have often wished that there might be a reunion of the remnant of the veterans of the two great armies. The memory of that fraternal scene at Appomattox will never be effaced from my memory. How fraught with interest would such a reunion now be! No one but those who participated in the stirring events of '61 to '65 can understand the undercurrent that lies dormant in the hearts of the men on both sides who would be amalgamated and welded into a chain of universal brotherhood by a gathering of the old warriors of nearly half a century ago. It is a subject well worthy of earnest consideration. Let us think it over, comrades, and work for its accomplishment.

As the years are passing, and as we are getting into the "sear and yellow" stage of life, who is there among the fast-dwindling crowd who wishes to lose the golden memories of the sixties? Notwithstanding all the sacrifices, sufferings, and trials, who would exchange these memories for a monarch's diadem?

Sweeter and dearer to all of us in coming years will be the remembrance of the olden camp fires, the bivouacs, the long march, and the thrill of the charge! Let us have them in common. They are ours! Meanwhile foster the comradely feeling that prevails and work for a reunion that will annually embrace all the old vets on both sides of the sixties.

"God bless the men that wore the blue,
The men that wore the gray,
For both to principles were true,
And both true in the fray."

In giving the foregoing the VETERAN responds for Confederates, subject to their approval.

There has ever been and will remain a sentiment of esteem for men of our common country in offering their lives for principle. Veterans of the Union army know this. They know that when captured or on occasions when brought into social contact with Confederates who were manly men at the front they were treated as well as they could have expected to be; but there are mountains and mountains of infamies that can never be atoned, and at the last Confederates, men and women, can do no more than pray: "May the Lord have mercy on their souls!"

The editor of the VETERAN has been in journalism nearly forty years, and all along as a Democratic editor in discussing these sectional matters took the position that the Southern people would cheerfully have submitted to such decision and adjustment as the true Union soldiers would have given. Moreover, he expressed the belief that if the Union soldiers, happy in their return to home and comfort, had realized the infamy of reconstruction they would have returned to the South in defense of the people they had overpowered. The camp followers (carpetbaggers) maintained a reign in our devastated land that cannot be compared to anything short of the torment described with four letters, the first of which is "h."

Confederates are magnanimous, but time-healing doesn't apply in this connection. The spirit of Christianity had its proper place in the camp of the soldier and on the scout as well as in the battle.

Some years ago there was a disposition to compel the use of "old glory" on the schoolhouses of the South. That was unwise. We all respect the flag and what it stands for, and we hope it will grow in favor with coming generations; but the term "old glory" is not pleasing. The "stars and stripes" is a term solemnly and reverently observed, and we all desire its complete affectional restoration; but to accomplish that all action must be considerate.

INQUIRIES FOR AND ABOUT VETERANS.

William Jasper Holladay, a veteran of Fredericktown, Mo., inquires about his old comrade, William H. Thompson, who was reared in Helena, Ark., and enlisted in the Confederate army at Fredericktown, Mo., in 1861. He was first lieutenant in Company I, 3d Regiment Missouri Infantry, Gen. Jeff Thompson's Brigade. Later he served in the 6th Missouri Regiment as first lieutenant. In 1862 that regiment was transferred east of the Mississippi River, and in 1863 he was transferred to the medical department. He survived the war and lived in Meridian, Miss., in 1866. When last heard from he was in Galveston, Tex.

F. J. Mims, of Henderson, Tex., seeks the post office addresses of any members of the 21st Alabama Regiment, Company G, commanded by Ed Spaulding, of Montgomery, which information will be thankfully received.

W. A. Campbell, Columbus, Miss.: "In the article by W. H. Mason in the August VETERAN, 'Attack on a Federal Wagon Train,' among those he mentions as being with him is the name of Walter Parks. I would be glad to know if he was from Cincinnati, Ark., near Fayetteville, and a brother of John Hamilton Parks. The latter was a friend and schoolmate of mine, and his sister Lizzie married Judge Jacoway at Dardanelle, Ark.

Mrs. Susan T. Munford, of Auxvasse, Mo., R. R. No. 2, desires to hear from her sister, Mrs. M. J. Allmon, who was Miss Matilda J. Moxley and married James Allmon, a member of the 2d Missouri Cavalry, near Senatobia, Miss., in 1863. Mrs. Munford also says that any friends or relatives of Abner Nash, a member of the 2d Missouri Cavalry, will be informed as to where he lies buried upon inquiry of her.

Richard W. Munford, of Auxvasse, Mo., was one of those who soldiered under General Price in Missouri, but was transferred to the Army of Tennessee in 1862. He was captured in May, 1863, on the Big Black River, near Vicksburg, and taken to Camp Morton, Ind., then to Fort Delaware, and later to Point Lookout, Md., where he was guarded with negroes. After being here a year he was sent to Elmira, N. Y., and was there twenty-one months. He had just gotten out on parole when General Lee surrendered. He wishes to hear from any of the boys who were in prison with him. He is now a member of Camp Jackson, of Calloway County, Mo.

Henry Dillard, of Meridian, Tex., writes that among the papers of his grandmother, deceased, was found a letter written in response to some inquiry for a Mrs. Dillard, who, with other ladies, had the care of a Confederate hospital at Somerville, Tenn., before the Federals got possession of Memphis. The first page of this letter is missing, hence the name and address of the inquirer could not be ascertained; but he can now write to Mr. Dillard, as above.

"DIXIE" PLAYED WITH A NEW AIR.

Mr. Al G. Field sends a notice of the "South's Sweetest Air," theme of a baritone solo, which states:

"'Dixie,' the song of the South, has a peculiar fascination that makes the melody popular everywhere, even to those who are not familiar with the significance of the song. Dan Emmett, the author of 'Dixie,' composed many more meritorious songs, yet most of them are forgotten, while this song seems to be immortal.

"Kinsell Pearce, a composer of note, has written a baritone solo for brass, entitled 'Dixie with Variations,' that has become popular wherever heard. It is a medley of songs. South-land's sweetest airs blend in the variations. 'Old Folks at Home,' 'Massa's in the Cold, Cold Ground,' 'Old Kentucky Home,' and 'Maryland, My Maryland' are introduced in the harmony carried through the solo by the band. The effect is more than pleasing. The author is a talented performer with the baritone and executes the solo exquisitely.

"'Dixie' has been used in many ways musically, but Mr. Pearce has seemingly outdone all others in this arrangement of Dan Emmett's popular song. The composition is dedicated to Mr. S. A. Cunningham, editor CONFEDERATE VETERAN."

The dedication of this music was suggested by Mr. Field. On the occasion of his recent visit to Nashville the Banner in notice of the parade stated: "The band is bigger and better than ever, and the musicians are artists without exception. Mr. Field serenaded the CONFEDERATE VETERAN office, a custom he never overlooks. He is a warm personal friend of the editor, Mr. S. A. Cunningham, and has dedicated a beautiful arrangement of Southern airs to him. The band plays this medley in an irresistible manner, and applause is as certain to follow as the night the day."

"A Woman about Town" in the Tennessean wrote of Mr. Field and his visit: "Al G. Field, the well-known minstrel man and the thorough gentleman, whom many Nashville people have the honor to know, loves Nashville, and says that he finds a sort of getting-back-home feeling stealing over him when he gets within the city's gates. Al Field is big-hearted and broad-minded and affectionate, and he loves his friends and is loved by them heartily and in a way that bespeaks his true and sympathetic nature. One of his nearest friends here is S. A. Cunningham, editor of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, and one of the best-known and most cordially liked men in all the South. Probably the affinity is because the men are both warm-natured, both sympathetic, both loyal in their nature, and both constant in friendship. For many years they have been good friends; and whenever the popular minstrel man comes to Nashville, the first thing he does is to look up Mr. Cunningham. He also never forgets to have his band serenade Mr. Cunningham's office, and the courtesy and the thoughtfulness are thoroughly appreciated by him."

This same "Woman about Town" writes of Mr. Field's address in the VETERAN for September: "The address is well worthy a careful perusal, and is quite characteristic of the splendid mental attainments and the sympathetic nature of the author."

PICTURE OF BOYHOOD IN THE COUNTRY BY AL G. FIELD.

There is a small club in Louisville with unpretentious quarters. Its atmosphere is surcharged with good fellowship and a hospitality that captivates those who are fortunate enough to be honored as its guests. Marse Henry Watterson is President; John Macauley is the only other officer. He has no title—just host. One guest at each meeting of the little Bohemian gathering is the rule.

Al G. Field, who lately became the proud possessor of a farm, was the guest of the club recently, and in response to the toast, "The Farmer," spoke as follows:

"Gentlemen, to respond to this toast honors me. To be a farmer has been the dream of my life. Beginning on the farm. I ask no more pleasant ending than so to pass my last days—on the farm. The facetious remarks of the toastmaster do not explain my reasons for going back on the farm. It is true financial considerations did not govern me in this matter, although I hope to make the farm self-supporting. If I do not, however, I shall not feel that I made a bad investment.

"In seeking the quietude of the farm I was actuated by that yearning that comes to all men who have led a busy life—to turn back the years and try to live again the days of patches, freckles, stone bruises, and laughter; to live those days again when there was only one care in the world—not to be late for meals. I want to go away back yonder in my life to a house half hid from view by the locusts and maples, where the bees hummed and swarmed; I want a scent of the honey-suckle as the maples and locusts budded forth in springtime, the morning of the world; I want to follow the path down by the big spring, through the hazle bushes, where the cotton-tail jumped up just ahead of me and the redbird sang his sweetest song. I can follow the path in my mind as the hunting dog does the scent down to the old rock hole, where the clear, cool waters of the creek formed an eddy in which the chub and yellow perch lurked and jumped at the bait, as they never did anywhere else.

"I want to feel that ecstasy that only comes to a boy when the bottle cork he uses for a bobber goes under water, when something is pulling on the line like a scared mule, bending double the pole he cut in the thicket on his way to the creek; I want to feel that supreme joy that only comes to a boy when he lands a two-pound fish for the first time in his life; I want to throw the pole away, roll up the tangled line, hide it in the corner, and sneak back to the house the opposite direction from the creek, that the folks wouldn't suspect I had been fishing on Sunday.

"I want to go back yonder in my life where the hills meet the sky in a purple haze and feel myself growing with the trees, where the smell of new earth calls to the woods, where the dogwood is budding and the May apple peeps up through last year's leaves at the new leaves budding out on the grand old maples above.

"I want to go so far back from the worries of city life that the crowing of the cock and the cackle of the hen will tell me it is morning instead of the clanging of bells and blowing of whistles. I want to go back yonder where the setting sun instead of the city lights will tell me it is night. I want to live in the happiness of an autumn when the frost was on the pumpkin and the fodder in the shock, when the hickory nuts falling on the ground called the squirrels, when the stars gleamed bright enough to afford light to bring a possum out of a tree with the flintlock musket (how I cherished that old gun!), and when the snow hid the roads and paths like the white coverlet on the big bed in the spare room and the big back log cracked and burned on the hearth and the red apples glistened in the firelight and the popcorn imitation of a snowstorm was more realistic than any artificial one I have since witnessed. How I shivered as I undressed in the room above going to bed, but how soundly I slept after getting warm!

"I want to go back to one of those hallowed Sunday mornings in summer when the hush of heaven seemed to fall on the earth, when the quiet that spread over hill and vale seemed to announce the Spirit of God in some unusual sense, when the peace of heaven seemed very near.

"While living the old days over—the days away back yonder—I want to live in the love and esteem of my friends of to-day. Whilst I cherish only a memory of the friends of the old days, I hold, after my family, the love and esteem of my friends of to-day above all things in this life.

"Gentlemen, come down to the farm. Visit with me and endeavor to live the life of a boy again if only for a day."

PRIZED HONOR TO AL G. FIELD.

An always interested friend of our Confederate organizations is much pleased with the following official notification:

"Dear Sir: It is a pleasure to inform you of your election to an honorary membership in the Robert E. Lee Chapter, U. D. C., and I well know our action will be received by you with the same good feeling that prompted it.

"With our best wishes, I am, cordially,

MRS. THOMAS D. REILLY, Columbus, Ohio."

An amusing circumstance occurred with Mr. Al Field while on his last visit to Nashville. He had entertained at dinner Mr. W. A. Sheetz, Manager of the Vendome, and the editor of the VETERAN in his car, and was sitting with the latter on a back seat in the theater explaining the devotion of one of the end men, who had just rendered a good song, but didn't like it. Mr. Field was considerate of conditions; but he was approached by a policeman, who didn't know him, with the remark: "You are disturbing the performance." Mr. Field replied "All right" as demurely as if a polite countryman who was made to feel that he had been guilty of trespassing against the propriety.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.

A visit to Kalamazoo, Mich., in September is recalled with much pleasure. Dr. C. T. Wilbur, who fought in the war for the Union, which ended with him with Lee's surrender, was royal host, meeting the train with Burr Bannister, a New Yorker, who had been living in Tennessee a few years when the war began and who enlisted promptly in the Confederate service and is still loyal to Dixie, although he has lived North since the war. Boyhood associations were delightfully renewed with the editor of the VETERAN, although they had not met since the surrender of Fort Donelson. Dr. Wilbur made us both happy in his elegant home.

Kalamazoo is noted as being one of the most beautiful cities in the United States. Its wide streets, cement sidewalks, and remarkably clean streets amaze its visitors. It has fine old trees, oaks and elms, and is noted also for its fine residences.

Kalamazoo College, a Baptist educational institution, and an elegant new normal school belonging to and supported by the State of Michigan are located in the city; and its public school buildings are unsurpassed for their capacity and adaptability to the purpose of the education of the children of the town. It has a very large high school, and the standard of education is so high that graduates are admitted to Michigan University without other examination. It also has a very large State Insane Hospital, with eighteen hundred inmates, and the Wilbur Home and School for Feeble-Minded Children. It has many lucrative industries. Four very extensive paper mills, a large carriage factory and several smaller ones, a large corset factory, a large playing card manufactory, a large skirt and pant factory, and a very large manufactory for secret society regalia and military uniforms are of its leading business enterprises.

Kalamazoo celery is noted the world over. It is raised in the rich river bottom by Hollanders, who are quite a large population in the suburbs of the city. It is said that from seventy-five to one hundred tons of celery per day are shipped out of Kalamazoo in the busy celery season. It is sold at the station and on the streets at "ten cents for a large bunch."

The city is level, but is surrounded by fine elevations. The Kalamazoo River runs through it, and that stream gave the city its name. It was an old Indian settlement, and was the scene of J. Fenimore Cooper's famous novel entitled "Oak Openings." It has about forty thousand inhabitants, is half-way between Chicago and Detroit on the Michigan Central Railroad, and is a very desirable residence city.

Some interesting reminiscences are expected from Comrade Bannister.

GEN. STEPHEN D. LEE AND PRESIDENT DAVIS.

BY COL. J. L. WOFFORD, WASHINGTON, D. C.

You request me to write in regard to the character of Gen. S. D. Lee as viewed by me. I cheerfully comply with your request, and I feel that my relationship to and intimacy with General Lee for years during our Civil War and afterwards enables me to give a proper estimate of him as a man, soldier, and Christian gentleman.

I knew him well while he was a brigadier general at Vicksburg. He slept in my tent the night before the battle of Chickasaw Bayou. He told me that night that he intended to have me open the fight when Sherman commenced to land his troops and the real battle commenced. He would give me the post of honor, which of course meant the post of danger. This he did, as his reports show, of which I am credibly informed, though I have never read them. General Lee and I, so President Davis told me, were the first exchanged of the Vicksburg prisoners. Being made lieutenant general, he was placed in command of the department composed of the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, and that part of Louisiana east of the Mississippi River within our lines; while I was major of artillery and assigned at Richmond to be his chief of artillery.

General Lee upon being exchanged preceded me a few days to assume command of the department. On my way from parole camp at Demopolis, Ala., to join General Lee somewhere in North Alabama I had to take boat at Demopolis and travel on the boat some twenty-five or more miles—I now forget the distance—until we came to the terminus of the railroad running from Meridian, Miss. Shortly after getting on the boat I was surprised to see on board Mr. Davis,

COL. J. L. WOFFORD.

Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, General Hardee, and other high officers of the army. I noticed they were closely engaged in the ladies' cabin, talking earnestly, I presumed, on important business; hence I remained in front. When perhaps midway of our boat trip, President Davis came to me in front of the boat, and after greeting me most cordially said: "Well, I suppose you are on your way to join Stephen D." I replied that I was. He then added: "You will find him between Decatur and Huntsville, Ala. He may be at Huntsville by the time you can join him." He then added: "I confidently expect to hear most encouraging reports from you and him." He said that he looked upon Stephen D. as one of the most promising and capable young officers of the army; that he had tried him in Virginia, in Mississippi, at Chickasaw Bayou, Baker's Creek, and Vicksburg, and he always came up to the full measure of his expectations. He added, extending his hand to bid me good-by: "I saw you in front and came forward to greet you and to send a cheerful message to Stephen D. I have no fears but what my reports from your department will be all I could expect." He then returned to the generals above named in the ladies' cabin, and that was the last time I saw Mr. Davis until I met him at Corinth, Miss., on the train upon his return home from prison at Fortress Monroe.

Mr. Davis had been my guest for days at a time before the war, and I entertained and dined him at my camp at Chickasaw Bayou during his last visit to Vicksburg during the war. I was the first Mississippian to meet and welcome him in the northern part of the State upon his return from prison. I had him as my guest after the war, and met him frequently from that time until a very few years before his death; hence my opportunity of knowing him.

I know Mr. Davis to have been conservative in his views about secession, and really did not favor secession unless all the Southern States or slave States seceded in a body. He was a refined Christian gentleman, above reproach, and as conscientious as a man well could be—in a word, he embodied those traits which made him true and steadfast, a patriot of the highest order with the courage of his convictions.

Excuse me for digressing apparently from the subject-matter of my letter. I am the only living member, so far as I know, of General Lee's staff; was his chief of artillery and messed with him during his command of the department; was with him at Atlanta, and met him often after the war; so that I knew him thoroughly.

He was brave, yet cautious; he was firm in his discipline, yet just and merciful to a marked degree. I recall an instance of his mercifulness. He went with a division or more to the aid of General Forrest in North Mississippi, and joined that gallant officer at Baldwin. The next day Mr. Elliott, his adjutant general, and I were walking along the railroad, when we found a guard at the door of a box car. We learned that there were two prisoners in the car sentenced by General Forrest to be shot the next morning. We conversed with the condemned men, and saw that one of them was in his teens, while the other was a man thirty or thirty-five, and that their homes were not far from Baldwin. They had gone home to get some fresh horses, theirs being broken down, and were arrested near home, brought to camp, tried for desertion, and sentenced by General Forrest to be shot. These facts were told General Lee. He only said, "The boy must not be shot," and the next morning before the hour of execution a pardon was granted the boy. General Lee told me several times that he would have pardoned the man, but did not because General Forrest might think he was injuring his discipline.

General Lee possessed to a great degree those virtues we all love to honor and admire in our fellow-men.

MONUMENT TO GEN. S. D. LEE AT VICKSBURG.

Comrade S. P. Allen, of Palestine, Tex., contributes $25, half of a month's salary, to the Stephen D. Lee monument at Vicksburg.

Gen. G. M. Dodge, one of the two surviving army commanders U. S. A. (Gen. O. Howard being the other), contributes $50 to this monument, and in doing so writes: "It gives me great pleasure to join in paying this proper tribute to General Lee. He was a very brave soldier during the war, and after the war was one of the most genial and companionable gentlemen I ever met, and did fully his part in bringing the two sections together, and he won the friendship of the Army of the Tennessee, who met him at Vicksburg."

The Georgia Division in its annual Reunion recently resolved to contribute $500 for this monument fund.

Let it be known that Colonel Rigby, who is so zealous for the success of this monument, served in the Union army. His "labor of love" comes from an intimate knowledge of the character of Gen. Stephen D. Lee. Let us all help him.

In this connection an extract is made from a letter by Capt. H. Moorman, of Owensboro, Ky., in which he sends subscriptions: "My son, Dr. Moorman, was graduated from Georgetown College, and then took his course in medicine at Cornell University and New York City. He was president of his class, and for the highest mark was awarded first place in the hospital. He entered the universities an entire stranger. He is of fine moral character. I feel grateful that he is an honor to the name. He has my father's full name (Maj. S. M. Moorman, commissary of the Orphans' Brigade, who was fifty years old when he enlisted in 1861 as a private). Dr. Moorman is a nephew of Gen. George Moorman."

MISSOURI REUNION AT NEVADA.

The twelfth annual State Reunion of Missouri Confederate Veterans was held at Nevada, Mo., on October 1 and 2, 1908, with a large attendance. There were over four hundred veterans in line during the parade, while the sponsors and maids of honor and veterans too infirm to march in line were in carriages and automobiles, making an inspiring appearance. The ball given the sponsors and maids was well attended, and many of the veterans, forgetting for the time their ages, joined in the dance and merrymaking. The smoker given the veterans was also much enjoyed. John W. Halliburton, of Carthage, Mo., was elected Major General to command the Division, O. P. H. Catron, of West Plains, was elected Commander of the Eastern Brigade, and George M. Jones, of Springfield, Commander of the Western Brigade.

The Reunion was a success in every respect, and the veterans returned to their homes praising the citizens of Nevada and the members of Camp 662 for the courtesies and hospitality extended them.

Maj. Gen. Frank D. Brown, of Philipsburg, Mont., commanding the Northwest Division, U. C. V., wishes information in regard to the men and officers of the Mississippi Light Artillery. Any of the survivors are asked to communicate with him.

TRIBUTES TO GEN. A. P. STEWART.

[The Army of Tennessee veterans through a committee composed of Aristide Hopkins (Chairman), Y. R. LeMonnier, M.D., and J. Adolph Chaloron say of him:]

Lieut. Gen. Alex P. Stewart was born October 2, 1821, in Rogersville, Hawkins County, Tenn. He was sent to the United States Military Academy at West Point as a cadet and entered a class of one hundred and thirty, which, when he graduated in 1841, had dwindled down to fifty-six. Gens. W. S. Rosecrans, John Pope, G. W. Smith, John Newton, Earl Van Dorn, James Longstreet, Lafayette McLaws, Richard A. Anderson, all known to us through their deeds, were among his classmates. After graduating he was assigned to the 3d Artillery as second lieutenant and served one year. In 1843 we find him again at West Point as assistant professor of mathematics. In 1845 he resigned on account of ill health and returned to Tennessee, where, until the breaking out of the war, he instructed in the Universities of Lebanon and Nashville the rising generation of the day in mathematics, national philosophy, and astronomy. Is it to be wondered at that with such professors Tennesseans should have proven themselves the magnificent bulwarks of their firesides?

At the secession of Tennessee we find him major of an artillery corps of twenty batteries which was transferred to the Confederacy. Soon after this, in November, 1861, Major Stewart was placed in command of the heavy artillery at Columbus, Ky., where on the banks of the Mississippi he had charge of the big gun, "Lady Polk," which, so admirably aimed under his command, did such havoc as to compel General Grant, who had landed on the opposite side of the river with a superior force, to take refuge on his gunboats and steam up the river in all haste, leaving behind his dead and wounded. The conduct of the Major at this, the battle of Belmont, showed of what metal he was made, and it is not astonishing that we find him at the end of the war a lieutenant general, the second highest rank of the army.

A few days after this battle, on the recommendation of Gen.

Albert Sidney Johnston, he was made a brigadier general and ordered to Corinth, from whence, at the head of a brigade in Major General Cheatham's Division, he participated in the two days' fight at Shiloh. After this Brigadier General Stewart showed himself most favorably in the Kentucky campaign under General Bragg and also at Murfreesboro. In 1863 he held Hoover's Gap on the retreat to Chattanooga. He was sent to London, Ky., to reinforce General Buckner, and with him fell back to Chickamauga.

In the early part of 1863 he was made a major general, and on the 19th of September of that year, in the first day's fight at the memorable battle of Chickamauga, he pierced the enemy's center, which army was commanded by his old West Point cadetmate, General Rosecrans.

Major General Stewart was again conspicuous in that remarkable and most successful retreat of a hundred days under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston from Dalton to Atlanta, Ga.

When on June 14, 1864, Lieut. Gen. Leonidas (Bishop) Polk was killed on Pine Mountain, Major General Stewart was placed in command of his corps and afterwards made a lieutenant general as successor of the lamented Bishop, and remained as such until the end of the war.

During the war he took an active part in all the campaigns of the Army of the West (Tennessee) and participated in its battles, commencing with Belmont, November 11, 1861, to Bentonville, N. C., and the surrender at Greensboro, in this State, on May 1, 1865.

In the battle of Mount Ezra Church, before Atlanta, on July 28, 1864, he was wounded in the head and had to be carried off the battlefield by Comrade Aristide Hopkins, a member of his staff. As soon as he recovered he resumed command of his corps, at the head of which after that unfortunate removal of General Johnston by President Davis, he went through the Tennessee campaign under General Hood, participating in the battles of Franklin and Nashville.

Since the death of our regretted comrade an incident about the Tennessee campaign at Spring Hill, Tenn., has come to light which we, the active participants on that memorable occasion, cannot allow to pass by in silence. The assertion by Brig. Gen. E. P. Alexander, chief of artillery Longstreet's Corps, author of "Military Memoirs of a Confederate: A Critical Narrative," that Lieutenant General Stewart and Major General Cheatham, as rumored, had both that evening absented themselves from their divisions is, we assert most positively, false. We, as staff officers and courier to General Stewart on that eventful evening, declare that the General was most actively moving about enforcing General Hood's orders; that we never were within sight of the pike; that the first sight we had of it was the next morning, when one of us prevented the Yanks from killing their mules with axes and from destroying the bridge. See General Stewart's reply to the above in the CONFEDERATE VETERAN for September, 1908, pages 462 and 463. As says the General: "Of what value is a critical narrative made from rumor? It is worse than a waste of time to read such a book."

The war over, our comrade, covered with glory, returned home not as a major of artillery, but as a lieutenant general, and, putting aside his high military insignia and reëntering the modest professorship, again began to instruct our youths in those high principles of learning which make of men the standard bearers of a nation in times of war as in times of peace. From 1874 to 1886 he was Chancellor of the University of Mississippi, at Oxford.

The Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park completed, General Stewart was appointed one of its Commissioners, and here again showed the great weight of his knowledge. In his conscientious endeavor to do his duty he would go over those forty miles or more of road in that beautiful park on foot or on horseback, and it was in one of these surveys that he met with an accident (injury to his hip) from which he never completely recovered.

The loss of his wife, that comfort of life, a true specimen of the charming Southern lady, her address so amiable and sweet, was a terrible blow to one of his advanced age; but it was borne with that beautiful resignation characteristic of the true Christian.

General Stewart, like all great men, was of a modest and retired nature and opposed to notoriety. He had the conscientious knowledge of having done his duty in this world to the best of his abilities. His sins were certainly those of omission.

Over fourscore years of age pressed heavily upon our comrade, who in the last year or two of his life retired to Biloxi, on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico, and there in his quiet retreat waited for the last roll call; and when it did beat, his soul, crowned with a wreath of amaranth, took its heavenly flight.

His conduct during the war was such that his old soldiers, who were devoted to him, nicknamed him "Old Straight." An instance of his strict uprightness was seen in his last days. In this quiet retreat, though still mentally working for the United States government, as seen by papers on his desk ready to be mailed to the Chickamauga Park, General Stewart returned monthly the check mailed to him by the government, considering that his work did not return value received. What an emulating example to the rising generation! O that we could call our public officials "Old Straight!"

"But his days are over and he is no more,

And the green grass will grow on his grave evermore."

The Louisiana Division of the Association of the Army of Tennessee shall ever be proud that it had as one of its honorary members Lieut. Gen. Alex. P. Stewart. The old age of a great leader gathers reverence as an oak gathers moss. And now, comrades, that this great man of our cause is no more, may we, one and all, ever venerate his memory! To his three sons, who ever will be cherished by this Association, we tender our heartfelt sympathy in this the hour of their tribulation. Therefore be it

Resolved, That a page in our record book dedicated to our honored dead be set apart, that this eulogy be therein inscribed, and that a copy be transmitted to his sons

An interesting account of General Stewart is promised. Those who expected it this month will not be disappointed in the December issue. It will refer specially to the General's religious belief in which there is much interest by those who knew him.

Mr. Charles Swett, of Vicksburg, Miss., who organized Swett's Battery, wants the names of about one hundred and ninety-five of the members of that organization that he has been unable so far to ascertain. He was promoted during the war, and does not know the men who were recruited after the time he had charge of the battery. He states that there were about fifty Tennesseans in the battery during the war. As he wishes to send all the surviving members a memorial he has had printed, he would appreciate hearing from them.

WAR RECORDS DEPARTMENT OVERTWORKED.

BY GEN. MARCUS J. WRIGHT, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Editor Confederate Veteran—My Dear Sir: The suggestions contained in the issues of the CONFEDERATE VETERAN for the months of August and October that every ex-Confederate should write to the War Department and get a transcript of his war record have resulted, so I have been advised, in such a flood of applications that the War Department, owing to the limited clerical force allowed by law and the pressure of public business, has been compelled to decline to comply with such requests unless some special purpose, other than the applicant's own gratification, of sufficient importance to justify the time and labor involved is to be subserved. Well knowing the interest that ex-soldiers take in such matters, the Department has always heretofore cheerfully complied with requests of ex-Confederates for their war records by furnishing a brief statement thereof from the Confederate Archives in the office of the Adjutant General of the army; but the considerable time and labor involved in complying with the comparatively few requests heretofore presented has been so materially increased by the numerous applications recently received as to embarrass the Department in the disposition of its current business. The Department will continue to furnish to the chief officers of the various Confederate associations, Soldiers' Homes, and Pension Boards such information from the Confederate Archives as may be necessary to enable them to pass upon applications and claims that may be actually pending; but, for the reason stated, the Department cannot hereafter entertain requests for war records unless the purpose for which they are desired is of sufficient importance to warrant the furnishing of the information, and this rule will be impartially applied to cases of ex-Union as well as to ex-Confederate soldiers.

In order that the historical data contained in the records of the Civil War may be made accessible to all who are interested, all the available force of the War Department that can be spared from the transaction of the important current business is now engaged in compiling a complete roster of the officers and enlisted men of the Union and Confederate armies as authorized by the act of Congress approved February 25, 1903. In addition to the reasons already stated, you will readily see that it would be inadvisable to divert any portion of the clerical force from this important work to the work of furnishing individual war records, especially in view of the fact that those records will be published in the roster now in course of compilation, and thus be accessible to all who are interested.

The publication of the articles referred to will doubtless result in spreading the impression that the War Department is still furnishing the war records of ex-Confederates; so I have taken this means of advising you concerning the matter in order that you may take proper steps to notify your readers of the position of the Department, and thus avoid the disappointment and chagrin that might result to them from the fact that the practice of furnishing war records, except in the limited class of cases above referred to, has been discontinued.

The foregoing is most significant as showing the influence of the VETERAN. Think of two issues overtaking the capacity of the United States government to supply information about the records of Confederate soldiers! Advertisers might act upon this indication to their profit. The sparse amount of advertising deters many from using its pages even at the very low price. Those who desire to help the VETERAN could in no way be as helpful as in commending it to advertisers.

MEMORIAL TO "BILL ARP" IN CARTERSVILLE.

Recently in the Presbyterian church of Cartersville, Ga., there occurred a fitting ceremony to Maj. Charles H. Smith through the generosity of the late Judge John W. Akin, who gave a bronze tablet. Judge Akin was an ardent admirer of Major Smith, and, knowing his virtues and usefulness, did this loving act to help perpetuate his noble work among his fellow-men. On the tablet is this inscription:

"Chas. H. Smith

'Bill Arp'

1826

1903

Author, Philosopher, Royal Arch Mason, Confederate Soldier, Christian. His Pen, So Like Himself, Softened and Sweetened Life to Unnumbered Thousands.
God Rest His Loved and Loving Heart."

Major Smith was not only a zealous, consistent member of the Presbyterian Church, but was a ruling elder in the Church, holding that position when he died.

Major Smith was a man who did not like ostentation. He was as modest as he was learned and great. He urged before his death that his funeral should be characterized by simplicity in every particular. Yet the people knew of his greatness, and he was a contradiction to that saying that "a prophet is not without honor." They praise the thoughtfulness of Judge Akin in placing this tablet to his memory in the beloved church of his membership.

MONUMENT AT BILL ARP'S GRAVE.

In connection with the foregoing the VETERAN takes pride in reproducing the picture of the monument erected through an appeal in its pages. It was on the way to the burial that the editor suggested the monument to Hon. Joseph M. Brown, Governor elect of Georgia, and their contributions started it. The money was raised by contributions through the VETERAN.

KENTUCKIANS DEFEND THEIR STATE.

Col. Keller Anderson, Memphis, Tenn., also replies:

"In the list of Kentucky organizations which Mr. R. L. Thompson, of St. Louis, Mo., furnished you as serving in the Confederate army he seems to have overlooked the 1st Regiment of Kentucky Infantry, which was assembled at Louisville, Ky., by Col. Blanton Duncan in April, 1861. It passed through Nashville, Tenn., and remained there several days; this was before the officers of the 1st Tennessee had completed its organization. It proceeded to Lynchburg, Va., remained there a short time, was sent to Harper's Ferry, and was mustered into the regular Confederate service on the 22d of April, 1861. For some time after our arrival at the Ferry Gen. T. J. Jackson was colonel commanding the post. After a few weeks Colonel Jackson was relieved by Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. When Virginia voted on the ordinance of secession, I did duty at the polls in Harper's in a Confederate uniform, fully equipped, armed with Minie rifle and saber bayonet. My orders were to protect 'Union men' or any one voting against the ordinance from insult or injury. * * *

"With Bartow's Brigade we made the heavy march from Winchester to reinforce Beauregard at Manassas. The organization immortalized itself in that battle as Bartow's Brigade; but the 1st Kentucky didn't share the glory, they being dumped by a railroad wreck during the passage of the last part of the route. It took part in all the maneuverings from the position five miles in front of Washington, D. C., to the trenches at Yorktown, where it was under fire night and day for three weeks, and faced the enemy at Dam No. 1, where two assaults were made and repulsed. It was heavily engaged at Dranesville, Va., in December, 1861, and suffered quite a loss in men. The enlistment was for twelve months, and expired while the regiment was facing McClellan's army at Yorktown. After the army left the Peninsula, the 1st Kentucky Regiment of Infantry was taken to 'Winder Camp,' Richmond, Va., and honorably discharged. Blanton Duncan, Thomas Taylor, and William Preston Johnston each at times commanded the 1st Kentucky Regiment. Most of the men entered the mounted service. I went to Hanson's Kentucky Brigade of Infantry."

J. A. Duncan, Bonham, Tex., who was second lieutenant of Company K, 8th Kentucky Regiment, C. S. A., writes:

"I read with some surprise in the September VETERAN an article by R. L. Thompson, of St. Louis, on 'Kentucky Troops in Confederate Army.' His recollection is very bad, his information very limited, and his statement very incorrect when he says: 'H. B. Lyon and Ed Crossland commanded troops and each ranked as colonel, but the regiments failed to materialize.' Now the latter part of this statement is incorrect.

"Of the six missing Kentucky regiments, I can account for three—to wit, the 3d, 7th, and 8th—and testify that they were not 'myths,' as he pleases to term them. They were full regiments, of ten companies each, and served through to the end.

"Col. Ed Crossland commanded the 7th. The 3d was organized by Lloyd Tilghman, who was made brigadier general and killed at Baker's Creek, Miss., and afterwards commanded by A. P. Thompson. The 8th was organized by Hon. H. C. Burnett, who soon resigned, and was succeeded by Col. H. B. Lyon. He was promoted to brigadier general, and was succeeded by Col. A. R. Shacklett.

"After the exchange of prisoners at Vicksburg, these three regiments were in Buford's Brigade, Loring's Division, and were in the campaigns from Holly Springs, Coffeeville, Grenada, Canton, Big Black, and Baker's Creek, from which place General Loring took his division to Jackson instead of going into Vicksburg with General Pemberton. After the Vicksburg and Jackson campaign, these three regiments of Buford's Brigade were mounted and served under General Forrest the remainder of the war."

Col. N. S. Hale writes of the Thompson article on "Kentucky Soldiers in Confederate Army:"

"R. L. Thompson attempts to edify the minds of your readers on the subject of 'Kentucky Troops in Confederate Army.' In this article great injustice is done to four regiments of as brave and as noble men as ever bore arms for the cause of the South, who enlisted early in the action and served to the close of the war. I refer to the 3d, 7th, and 8th Kentucky Regiments of Infantry and the 12th Kentucky Cavalry.

"The 3d was organized by Col. Lloyd Tilghman, afterwards General Tilghman, killed in the battle of Baker's Creek, Miss., May 16, 1863. After Tilghman's promotion the 3d was commanded by Col. A. P. Thompson, who commanded the Kentucky brigade in the battle of Paducah, Ky., and who was killed there while leading a charge on the enemy's fortifications. The 7th was organized by Col. Charles Wickliffe, who was killed while in command of his regiment in the battle of Shiloh, and who was succeeded in office by the gallant but now deceased Col. Ed Crossland. The 8th was organized by Col. H. B. Lyon, who was soon promoted to the rank of brigadier general, leaving the regiment in command of the intrepid Col. A. R. Shacklett to the close of the war. The 12th Cavalry was organized and commanded by Colonel Faulkner.

"The three infantry regiments above named were mounted and transferred to Forrest's Cavalry the last year of the war, where, with the 12th, they composed Forrest's noted Kentucky Brigade, and I feel fully competent to testify to the fact that they were in no sense 'a myth,' as represented by your historian. I served with these troops through the war, and feel that I owe it to the living and to the dead to say this much in correction of the history offered in the article referred to."

L. Donaldson writes from Tiptonville, Tenn.:

"Mr. Thompson states that Kentucky had only fourteen regiments altogether in the war, giving the highest number of infantry regiment as the 9th and the highest number of cavalry as the 11th. He is in error, as I was a member of the 12th Kentucky Cavalry. Our colonel was W. W. Faulkner. This 12th Kentucky Cavalry was brigaded with the 3d, 7th, and 8th Kentucky Infantry Regiments about the 1st of April, 1864, and these regiments were mounted and served as cavalry or 'mounted infantry' until the close of the war, surrendering at Selma, Ala., in 1865.

"After these four Kentucky regiments were placed together in Lyon's Brigade, with Abe Buford as division commander, they were in the following battles: Attack on Paducah, Ky., Union City, Tenn., Brice's Crossroads, Harrisburg, Oxford, Athens, Sulphur Trestle, Pulaski, Johnsonville, Hood's raid, etc. This famous Kentucky brigade, which served with great honor, has gone down into history, and its name will live as long as the war shall be remembered.

"If the writer of that article will read the 'Life of Nathan Bedford Forrest,' by Dr. John Allen Wyeth, he will see glorious mention of these Kentucky organizations."

THE BATTLE OF FRANKLIN.

BY LIEUT. I. M. OLIVER, ARMY OF TENNESSEE.

'Twas on the Harpeth's bloody marge
Our comrades made the gory charge;
With steady tramp and deafening yell
They braved the hissing ball and shell
That thickly through the darkness fell,
With front as firm as o'er the shore
The tumbling billows laid before,
Through thunders rolling everywhere
And lightnings leaping through the air
That made the rattling ridges glare!
Still bravely onward did they press,
Like heroes who but seemed to guess
Of passing death's defile or die
To make a path for Liberty.
Two lines of works our comrades won.
And now the foeman had but one;
Along this line still thickly lying,
They boldly sent their death shots flying,
While nobly rushed our gallant braves—
Some won the works, some found their graves.

Here you might see where patriots fell
For native land they loved so well—
Brave comrades lying 'long the ground
Where glory's hands had laid them down,
And you might mark here in your mind
The waving, rallying, charging line—
Like attitude in every form,
Behold, in all who braved the storm:
Most fell still pointing to the foe,
While bravely daring first to go,
Their guns still clinched in lifeless hands,
As if about to do command,
As if in all the single thought
Of common action just had wrought.
And you might see in like twilight sky
A light subdued in every eye,
As though each heart the bloody while
Was cheered by honor's sweetest smile
To know they'd found—what next they'd crave
To victory—a soldier's grave.

The field was bloody, but the most
Of carnage that dark line can boast,
Where the locust 'grove still thickly stands
And lifts on high its leafless hands—
There stricken limb and ball-scarred form
Proclaim the climax of the storm.
Along this grove did many a brave
Find—what all must find—a grave;
Here Cleburne fell—while his big heart,
Revenge and valor strove to part;
Ambition's royal light did shine
Bright from his eyes as 'gainst the line

He led his brave and gallant men,
Who never knew a fear, and then—
Prince of Southern braves—he fell,
Where and where the world shall tell.
Here Carter fell and Gist and Strahl,
And John Adams, valorous as them all,
Like some old hero grand in song
On battle steed the thunders 'mong.
He swept the fiery marge along
Far to the front of his command, Recheered the charge and waved his hand—
Then 'gainst the breastworks' reeking side
Plunged like a thunderbolt and died.
There many fell, but above the rest
Who in the stormy grove did press
One sleeps for whom the softest line
Should flow and fairest garland twine,
For he fell in the dear family yard
Of his native home on the sloping sward,
Where, it is said, three years before (A soldier passed from his mother's door)

He paused to take a long, last look
On forms which in his heart he took.
With throbbing breast and changing cheek,
To his mother one last farewell speak.
Brave soldier, rest. The world 'round
Could not afford thee sweeter ground.
Here first thine eyes did drink the light
Of thy native clime, so fair and bright;
Here was thy heart, thy mother's home,
And here the quiet little room
Where first she clasped your infant hands
And taught you what our God commands.

Or with a kiss of anxious care
She heard you lisp your little prayer.
Brave soldier, rest! Beside you lies
Your comrades, altars, all you prize;
Yonder old grove, though sear,
Still lifts its branches 'bove you all.
And winds as soft as the voice of hope
Shall sweetly woo the gentle slope
Till nature from her dewy wing
Fair daisies o'er your beds shall fling.
Brave soldier, rest! 'Neath the locust rest;

'Twas not in vain you bared your breast.
Ambition, honor, virtue, love,
Like sentinels, surround the grove.
And guard with never-ceasing care
The quiet sleep of heroes there.

A REVERIE.

BY MARY BLACKBURN WIGSTRAND.
You ask why I'm sitting alone
Here in the gathering gloom,
The firelight casting strange shadows
On the walls of my quiet room.

I'm wondering what is the meaning
Of words I so often hear!
They seem to cast a reflection
On all I hold most dear.

What do they mean by "Lost Cause?"
Are they spiritually blind? Can't they see
The glorious, undying heritage
They have left for you and for me?

It can never be lost; 'tis immortal,
And written in letters of light
How men gave their all gladly, freely
For a cause they felt to be right.

"New South" I hear lightly spoken
From lips I deemed loyal and true.
And I note with pain and amazement
An accent of pride on the "New."

Are they trying to cast in oblivion
The land where our cradles stood—
The land of those who wore the gray
And true, brave womanhood?

Have they forgotten the conquered banner,
Soiled, ragged, and old,
Furled with deepest reverence
With honor in every fold?

Their meaning, perhaps, I've misunderstood;
If so, a pardon, I crave.
The only excuse I can offer
Is my love for a soldier's grave.

The New South may have wealth, and power
That reaches o'er land and o'er sea;
But the true, brave South of our fathers
Is the only South for me.

MRS. FRED WIGSTRAND.

Mrs. Fred Wigstrand, author of the foregoing "Reverie," is the daughter of Capt. Breckinridge Blackburn, of Kentucky, who was a prominent lawyer of Memphis, Tenn. She is prominent in literary and musical circles, and has "added to Arkansas and the West in their highest type of womanhood."

MISFORTUNE IN USING TITLES.

W. F. Jackson, of Yorkville, S. C., who was a member of Company G, 6th South Carolina Infantry, Longstreet's Corps, has a word to say about titles in the U. C. V.: "I fully agree with the Maryland Confederate in your July number as to the U. C. V. making so many major and brigadier generals, colonels, etc. A great mistake is made in the use of these titles. Even now an old Confed would need to be well up on the C. S. A. register to tell who were the real officers of the war. I have been asked what division or brigade a certain 'general' commanded, and often had to reply that it was only a regiment or company; but they had surely won by merit their real war rank. These empty titles add nothing but confusion that will be worse and worse hereafter to those who wish to know the real officers of the Confederate States army."

Some comrades have suggested the placing of U. C. V. after or before general, colonel, or major to whom the title has been given by his comrades, and in most instances where the preferment is worthy; but it does not relieve the confusion, which will be worse and worse to future generations.

"MEMORY DAYS."

This is a book by Alexander Paxton, "in which the Shenandoah Valley is seen in retrospection, with glimpses of school days and the life of Virginia people of fifty years ago."

Few there be who have not their days of retrospection. Even the little child dwells on what "used to be down to gran'pa's," while we who have more years to look back upon take keen delight in retracing the winding steps of time until we are lost in their mazes.

Alexander Paxton was born and reared in the Shenandoah Valley, that beautiful and fertile section of Virginia; and though his later life has been spent largely in other surroundings, his heart still turns to those early happier years, the recollections of which are embodied in his "Memory Days," a simple narrative of the old-time customs and happenings of his neighborhood some fifty years ago, extending from his earliest school days to the time the tocsin of war called him to the sterner duties of a patriot. He was then a senior at Washington College, Lexington, Va.; and when the guns of Sumter had sounded through the land, the college was aglow with the spirit of secession. One exception there was in the faculty in one Dr. Junkin, a Northerner by birth and education, who bitterly resented the placing of a "secession" flag on the dome of the building by the statue of Washington, threatening to take it down if he "had to tear the building down." He made the janitor take it down and burn it, and prayed that so might all perish who raised a hand against the Union. The students were determined, however, and the next morning a larger flag was floating beautifully over the building, and the faculty had been informed that the flag should not come down. Upon learning that it was still on the building, Dr. Junkin read his resignation in class, closing with the words: "I'll never teach under a Rebel flag!" Recitations closed that day, and the boys were drilled and otherwise prepared to join Jackson at Harper's Ferry.

So ended for Comrade Paxton the days of most delight to be recalled. Since the war he has been an educator of note and connected with many schools, one of which was the "Academic School" of East Nashville, Tenn., some few years since.

The book is published by the Neale Company, Washington. Cloth-bound, $1.50, postpaid.

Legal and Historical Status of the Dred Scott Decision.

By W. R. EWING, LL.B., Attorney and Counselor of the Supreme Court of the United States; Author of "Northern Rebellion and Southern Secession," Etc.

This work is a history of the famous case, and a thorough judicial examination of the opinion of the court, together with a plain statement of the legal questions involved.

An unanswerable vindication of the correctness, justice, and legality of every point decided in that world-famous opinion read by Chief Justice Taney, of Maryland, March 6, 1857. The decision was made the excuse for dangerous

NORTHERN NULLIFICATION,

more rebellious and more extensive than ever known in the South, and which became one great cause of secession. So to save the North and incriminate the South the opinion was misrepresented, the court maligned, and vital error thrust into our history; and there it has long remained.

The decision "gave conspirators new confidence," said Sumner.

Taney covered "the most glorious pages of his country with infamy and insulted the intelligence and virtue of the civilized world," it was said in the Atlantic Monthly.

SUCH CHARGES ARE LEGION: LIKE ERROR IS YET TAUGHT

both to the children of the South and the North. Professor Pomeroy, for instance, says the decision is "a by-word and a hissing;" while Carson says "the infamy of that fatal blunder" and "the blood-stain on his ermine" must be carried by the Chief Justice to eternity.

Eminent authors, such as Brice of England, Von Holst of Germany, and nearly all American writers, admitting the great importance of the case, have perhaps unwittingly fallen into the errors of the past and tell us that the decision is based upon and that the decision as to the Missouri Compromise was extra judicial, etc.

That there are no obiter dicta, that the decision of the Missouri Compromise question was not only proper but a judicial duty, that the North, especially the States that made most objection, had furnished statutory, political, and judicial precedents, are some of the important facts shown by the author.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO GOVERN A TERRITORY,

a very practical question, is deduced from rules now no longer disputed in America, and it is shown that the principles upon which Taney based the decision are to-day accepted as fundamental.

There is also a careful history of the Northern nullification, the bitter anti-negro laws of the North and West, a history of the case, a sketch of the court, etc.

Bound in neat cloth, introductory price $2.00, if either cash or thirty day subscription be received at once.

N. B.—The edition is limited; and the publishers wish to realize upon it at once, and having a few copies of Northern Rebellion and Southern Secession, cloth, 383 pages, will give the two books for cash or subscription payable in thirty days, twelve cents extra for postage, if orders come without delay. A splendid opportunity to those who apply early.

Both works widely indorsed by writers and scholars!

DIXIE LAND.

BY ANNE CHEW DORSEY COQUILLET.

In all the world no land so fair
As Dixie, old Dixie,
The women nowhere quite so dear
As Dixie's, old Dixie;
There manhood never failed to dare
To do the right in spite of fear,
And business there is on the square
In Dixie, old Dixie.

The sun shines bright and hearts are light

In Dixie, old Dixie,
And darkness never shuts down quite
On Dixie, old Dixie.
With song and jest, and wit the best,
And worth and mirth, and all the rest
Compared, she nobly stands the test,
Does Dixie, old Dixie.

Just let the sons and daughters too
Of Dixie, old Dixie,
To the ideals be always true
Of Dixie, old Dixie;
Then come what may, she'll never rue
The wind and storm, spondulix few,
Or trials which may yet accrue—
That's Dixie, old Dixie.

We judge the future by the past
Of Dixie, old Dixie.
Yes, with the right her lot was cast,
Was Dixie's, old Dixie.
Though storm might rage and wintry blast,
And shot and shell fall thick and fast,
Her courage failed not to the last—
That's Dixie, old Dixie.

To do the right with main and might Will Dixie, old Dixie;
A quitter she was never quite,
Not Dixie, old Dixie.
Her men are brave, her women pure,
And every test they will endure,
And onward, upward just as sure
As heaven's above goes Dixie.

N. B. Watts, of Fredericktown, Mo., is interested in hearing from any member of Company D, 7th Louisiana Regiment, who can testify as to the service of A. A. Butts, who enlisted at New Orleans in January, 1862, in the command mentioned, under Colonel Penn. Comrade Butts now lives at Fredericktown, is an invalid, and has no relatives living there, and he wishes to enter the Confederate Home at Higginville. To do this he will have to establish his record through surviving comrades.

Mrs. M. C. Frost, Station G, Memphis, Tenn., wishes information of Edward Bamy, a native of Mississippi, and known to have been a Confederate soldier and in the battle of Shiloh. His location in the past or present is desired.

THE CRATER.

BY MRS. S. F. WATSON.

Dun gray sky, with its gloomy light,
Glisten of falling rain;
Rows of wheat in the gathering night;
Once there were rows of slain.

Plowman, stepping with quickened pace
(Thicker the rainfall now),
Whispers, gloom on his dusky face,
"Plowed up a skull jest now."

Green are the trees on the chasm's brink,
Grown in the years since then;
Day when the depths of that hellish sink
Crushed bodies and limbs of men.

Smooth are the sides of the pit and fair,
Little white daisies over the sod;
Green the wild strawberries gathered there;

Once 'twas the red of blood

Voices of women, laugh of a child,
Chime of bells in the air;
Once from the depths 'twas the death cry wild,
The rattle, the groan of despair.

* * * * *

Leave it there under the dun gray night,
Under the falling rain;
Let us go back to the city's light,
To peace and the world again.

But oft in the glisten of mist and rain,
Under a gloomy sky,
Hid in our hearts we shall see it again;
Comrades, 'tis not good-by.

A Testimonial from an Ex-Confederate Veteran

Sometime in January I saw your advertisement in the CONFEDERATE VETERAN for Salvator Remedy for Eczema, and I got a one-dollar box and used it as directed. I soon found it was doing me much good, sent and got two more boxes, and now feel as well and free from eczema and better than I have in forty years.

I was broken out at times with a stinging, burning, itching fire from my head to my knees. I have tried a number of doctors, but they did me no good. They gave me Bull's Sarsaparilla, S. S. S., Liquezone, and a number of other unpleasant things to swallow, also advised vapor baths and Hot Springs, Ark., mineral wells. I have spent hundreds of dollars on other humbugs.

I now feel it my duty to tell the world of Salvator Remedy and its wonderful cure on myself. I was for a number of years passenger conductor on the N. & D. and L. & N. railroads, lived in Grayson, Lamar, and Hannin Counties, Texas, for thirty years, and am sixty-seven years old. I am known in Tennessee, Alabama, and Texas.

Abraham Lincoln Said:

"Neighbors, Give Your Boys and Girls A Chance"

Publisher Fails!
This Library of Universal History Sent to Your Home FREE

These are the words used by the great emancipator in his famous speech, delivered at his old home to his friends and neighbors at Springfield, Ill.

The American Underwriters Corporation, receivers in Bankruptcy, Invites you to examine this Library of Universal History in your own home for an entire week absolutely free of charge.

We wish to prove to you that our enforced offer of the remaining sets of this magnificent publication, at less than cost, is the most stupendous book offer ever made. A new publication from cover to cover, prepared by a staff of great historians. Cost to produce nearly $250,000. Heartily endorsed by America's greatest scholars and teachers.

HERE is the greatest opportunity ever offered—an opportunity for our readers to secure at less than half price these fifteen beautiful volumes.

This offer is made possible by the failure of the publishers, The Union Book Co., of Chicago. Hundreds of sets of this work have been sold at 50c each and they are worth every cent of it, but we now name you a rock-bottom bankrupt price of only 50c after examination and $2.00 per month for 14 months. It is impossible to name a lower price for cash to full, as this is less than half the publisher's price and is made only to close out the few remaining sets quickly.

WITH THIS HISTORY you may sit beside the madman, Nero, on his awful throne; touch his mantle and hear him speak. Walk with Caesar and gain inspiration from the genius of the Romans. Enter the ancient Colosseum and behold once more the martyrdom of the Christians, whose bravery and sacrifice of life among borders of red-jawed jungle beasts, paved the way for the Christian religion in Rome. Ride beside Alexander the Great, whose steel-headed charges dashed over the blood-stained battle fields of his career. Stand beside the mighty Nelson at Trafalgar, and hear his hoarse commands as the English fleet sweeps the power of France from the ocean.

Look once more at the gory battle field of Waterloo; see English and French in mortal combat; see the mighty Napoleon sitting like adamant, the old guard around him, scanning the field and realizing his iron reign was over; then talk with him at St. Helena, where standing alone, he gazes over the trackless ocean, watching the mist gather and disperse as had his power and greatness. Travel back for sixty centuries when man was but a being of the forest, as unlike the man of today as we are unlike the lowest in the grade of humanity. Attend the Bacchanalian banquet of the ancient kings of Assyria and Persia; watch their mighty armies clash. Go to ancient Babylon, walk its streets and see and hear as you would in the days of Babylon.

Stroll among the pyramids of Egypt and try into the wonderful secrets which these majestic relics of antiquity possess in their enormous bosoms; sail down the Nile and visit the ancient cities, the great, white, polished cities which flourished a thousand years before the dawn of the Christian era; see Greece in her real power, overcome by the horde of Huns, watch again as she rises to dominating power, only to fall and crumble and decay; then go through the wars of the English and cross the ocean to our own shores.

Watch the starving line of patriot battalions against the wealth and bullets of the mother country; grasp the hand of Washington at Valley Forge, walk through the snow with him and hear his cheering words to his aching, ragged army; sit with him on his wide veranda and talk with him at Mt. Vernon; follow the thrilling rise of our own republic and pass through the dark days when brother was arrayed against brother. Know the mighty rail-splitter, Lincoln, as he was. Stand beside Grant at Vicksburg, or Meade at Gettysburg; hear the awful cannonading and see the dashed lines cut to pieces. See the valor and the courage of the gray, through the very eyes of the indomitable Lee; view all these thrilling events as if the world were passing once more before your own eyes.

To own this history means you need never spend a lonely evening, it is enabling to commune with the children of destiny. To be associated with great men and events is to be great oneself, and you will add to your store of knowledge, which is power, and to the richness of your life.

Rev. Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus,

President Armour Institute and Pastor Central Church (Auditorium) Chicago, says:

"Without the slightest touch of religious or political bigotry, the editors of the 'Library of Universal History' have dealt soberly and deeply with the forces of church and state which have ruled mankind. With great scholarship they have not become dull; with a trained and genuine power of imagination they have never become vague. It is a work of real genius; its thought is clear and vigorous, its English pure and eloquent. I am certain these volumes must be of immense popular service in stimulating historical study in our country."

Sen. William B. Allison,

The Grand Old Man of Iowa, Says:

"I have recently bought the 'Library of Universal History,' and find the topical arrangement of the matter especially advantageous for ready reference and take pleasure in recommending this valuable work as well as the plan for its distribution."

The editor of this paper advises every reader to write for these splendidly written, authoritative and beautifully illustrated books for free-examination in your own home for a week, without any expense or obligation on your part to purchase.

Recalling what little opportunity he had in his early youth to get an education, and looking back to the days when he walked miles and miles for a book (for he then owned none of his own), Abraham Lincoln pleaded with the rural and village people, his old friends and associates to give their children a better chance—a chance to fight the battles of life successfully.

SURELY you want to give your boys and girls a better chance, not necessarily a college education, but better suit, a home education. It is not always the school that gives the education; you can give this same opportunity or better to your family right in your own home. Good books—valuable books. Oh! how Lincoln cherished these.

What would Lincoln have said had you asked his advice on buying a great History of the World, an entertaining and educational Library for your home, "The Library of Universal History," and especially if we offered it at less than half of the regular price and on easy terms?

We want you to see these volumes, examine them in your own home without any expense on your part, then you can decide. That is what the family in the picture below have done. Mail the coupon now before you forget it. See the volumes themselves—it costs you nothing.

One of the Important Duties of Physicians and the Well-Informed of the World

is to learn as to the relative standing and reliability of the leading manufacturers of medicinal agents, as the most eminent physicians are the most careful as to the uniform quality and perfect purity of remedies prescribed by them, and it is well known to physicians and the Well-Informed generally that the California Fig Syrup Co., by reason of its correct methods and perfect equipment and the ethical character of its product has attained to the high standing in scientific and commercial circles which is accorded to successful and reliable houses only, and, therefore, that the name of the Company has become a guarantee of the excellence of its remedy.

TRUTH AND QUALITY

appeal to the Well-Informed in every walk of life and are essential to permanent success and creditable standing, therefore we wish to call the attention of all who would enjoy good health, with its blessings, to the fact that it involves the question of right living with all the term implies. With proper knowledge of what is best each hour of recreation, of enjoyment, of contemplation and of effort may be made to contribute to that end and the use of medicines dispensed with generally to great advantage, but as in many instances a simple, wholesome remedy may be invaluable if taken at the proper time, the California Fig Syrup Co. feels that it is alike important to present truthfully the subject and to supply the one perfect laxative remedy which has won the approval of physicians and the world-wide acceptance of the Well-Informed because of the excellence of the combination, known to all, and the original method of manufacture, which is known to the California Fig Syrup Co. only.

This valuable remedy has been long and favorably known under the name of—Syrup of Figs—and has attained to world-wide acceptance as the most excellent of family laxatives, and as its pure laxative principles, obtained from Senna, are well known to physicians and the Well-Informed of the world to be the best of natural laxatives, we have adopted the more elaborate name of—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—as more fully descriptive of the remedy, but doubtless it will always be called for by the shorter name of Syrup of Figs—and to get its beneficial effects always note, when purchasing, the full name of the Company—California Fig Syrup Co.—plainly printed on the front of every package, whether you simply call for—Syrup of Figs—or by the full name—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—as—Syrup of Figs and Elixir of Senna—is the one laxative remedy manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. and the same heretofore known by the name—Syrup of Figs—which has given satisfaction to millions. The genuine is for sale by all leading druggists throughout the United States in original packages of one size only, the regular price of which is fifty cents per bottle.

Every bottle is sold under the general guarantee of the Company, filed with the Secretary of Agriculture, at Washington, D. C., that the remedy is not adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act, June 30th, 1906.

SAM DAVIS

TRIBUTE BY ELLA WHEELER WILCOX

When the Lord calls up earth's heroes
To stand before his face,
O, many a name unknown to fame
Shall ring from that high place!
And out of a grave in the Southland,
At the just God's call and beck,
Shall one man rise with fearless eyes,
And a rope about his neck.

For men have swung from gallows
Whose souls were white as snow.
Not how they die nor where, but why,
Is what God's records show.
And on that mighty ledger
Is writ Sam Davis' name—
For honor's sake he would not make
A compromise with shame.

The great world lay before him,
For he was in his youth;
With love of life young hearts are rife,
But better he loved truth.
He fought for his convictions;
And when he stood at bay,
He would not flinch or stir one inch
From honor's narrow way.

They offered life and freedom
If he would speak the word;
In silent pride he gazed aside
As one who had not heard.
They argued, pleaded, threatened—
It was but wasted breath.
"Let come what must, I keep my trust,"
He said, and laughed at death.

He would not sell his manhood
To purchase priceless hope;
Where kings drag down a name and crown,
He dignified a rope.
Ah, grave! where was your triumph?
Ah, death! where was your sting?
He showed you how a man could bow
To doom and stay a king.

And God, who loves the loyal
Because they are like him,
I doubt not yet that soul shall set
Among his cherubim.
O Southland! bring your laurels;
And add your wreath, O North!
Let glory claim the hero's name,
And tell the world his worth.

The Baltimore Sun, in commenting upon this volume, entitled "My Life and My Lectures," says that it is "wonderfully engrossing both from the unusual and dramatic experiences of the writer, and his remarkable gift of grasping the dramatic and picturesque details of an event and so transferring them to the printed page as to rivet the attention of the reader regardless of the subject treated." The Richmond Times-Dispatch says: "A fascinating personality described in a fascinating book. . . . His ability to infuse into the story of his experiences the dash and color of his personality separates it from the prosaic and commonplace and endows it with vitality that is imperishable." # TO THE PEOPLE OF THE SOUTH

LEE AND HIS GENERALS.

As owners of the three lithographs in color, all three copies of great paintings from the brush of George B. Matthews, a native son of Virginia, we make an appeal to our Southern brethren to assist us in placing them in every Southern home, so that to the younger generation as much as possible of the atmosphere of the past may be transmitted, and they may the more readily treasure the memories of a noble ancestry and of a sacred cause.

The first lithograph, "Lee and His Generals," is thus described by one of our Southern writers, Mr. Robert Watkins, of Alabama:

"A study of the picture will doubtless convince all who behold it that it is the greatest group portraiture ever produced in America. It required a study of each face, form, and character, with a scrutiny of the best photographs and portraits extant of each. That this undertaking has been accomplished in every phase and detail, with wonderful fidelity to nature in each portrait, and with marvelously effective ensemble, is the comment of all who have seen the picture.

"To uncover the head and stand in thrilled awe before this great presentment of these immortal warriors who wore the gray has been the instinctive act of every Southerner as he entered its presence. It fascinates and holds one who gazes upon it with enthralled emotions.

"What a host of memories it must invoke for the veterans who followed those leaders and obeyed their commands! Involuntary is the reflection that there was not one of the twenty-five about him but did not loyally, heartily, and devoutly give the laurel of transcendent greatness to the star of all the darkness of Appomattox. Of all the twenty-six, but one is living—General Simon Bolivar Buckner."

General Marcus J. Wright, the well-known Confederate veteran, has this to say of the painting and lithograph:

"Mr. W. B. Matthews.

"DEAR SIR: I have had the pleasure of seeing the original picture of 'Lee and His Generals,' painted by your brother, George B. Matthews. I regard it as one of the finest paintings I ever saw. His truthfulness of feature of all these great generals is most remarkable.

"I have also seen the lithographic copy of the great painting, which is a most striking and accurate reproduction of the original. I hope all Confederates will procure copies.

"The Last of the Wooden Navy" is the only authentic picture of the first day's fight which changed the mode of naval warfare all over the world. It was a Southerner who conceived the idea of an ironclad, who built the first ship, and it was in Southern waters that the fight was fought. There are only 3,000 of these pictures remaining on hand to be sold.

Lieutenant Littlepage, of the C. S. Navy, has this to say of the "Last of the Wooden Navy:"

"It affords me pleasure to state that the painting recently made by your brother, George B. Matthews, of Virginia, entitled 'The Last of the Wooden Navy,' is a remarkably fine one, and gives a very excellent idea of that memorable engagement in Hampton Roads, on the 8th of March, 1862, when the Merrimac (the Virginia as she was first christened) engaged the U. S. fleet. Just the evening before the engagement I made a pencil sketch of the Merrimac, and the painting by your brother was made from this drawing. I personally supervised the painting as it progressed, and I believe it gives a very fair representation of the fight as it actually occurred. It may not be amiss for me to add that I was a lieutenant in the C. S. Navy, and was on board the Merrimac during the engagement.

"With the hope that the lithographic reproduction of this painting, which is exceedingly fine, may meet with a ready sale, I am,

[Signed] H. B. LITTLEPAGE."

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The third lithograph was made from an oil painting made from the last photograph taken of Mr. Davis prior to his death, and is a very fine likeness of the great Confederate—the leader of the "Lost Cause." The original painting hangs in "Beauvoir," Miss. There are only 1,000 of these left. The prices of these pictures are as follows—viz.:

For "Lee and His Generals," 55 cents sent by mail in tubes; for "Last of the Wooden Navy," 55 cents; and for Jefferson Davis, 25 cents. To agents, the price is, in lots of twenty-five or more, for the first two, 25 cents each, and for Jefferson Davis, 15 cents.

State, city, and county agents wanted. Large profits assured to good canvassers.

AN INVOCATION—FATHER TIME.

BY MEDORA MARCHANT LITTLE, DALLAS, TEX.

Spare my heart from growing old!
Touch not the Fount of Youth;
Let it become as pure as gold,
And spotless as Eternal Truth,
With human love and human kindness;
For the ones who err in blindness
"Wake the angel sleeping on the wing"
To tune sad souls to heaven's gladness
And of redemption sweetly sing.

Spare my heart from growing old!
Let its pulses throb with love
That's tender, true, and bold,
Reflecting sunshine from above,
Making bright the life of man,
Strewing roses where'er it can;
And with faith in man and God,
Fret not at Life's brief span,
But gently "bend beneath the rod."

From my cheek the roses brush,
Touch with frost my dark brown hair,
As years drift into twilight's hush;
While care upon a brow once fair
Leaves footprints dark and deep,
And sorrow's tears fade eyes that weep,
Pray let my soul reflect the sunset's gold
To gild the darkness of the coming sleep,
And spare my heart from growing old.

SAM DAVIS MONUMENT FUND.

Just thirteen years ago the first appeal was made for contributions toward a monument to Sam Davis, the boy soldier of Tennessee who sacrificed life rather than principle. Some good contributions were received on November 27, 1895, that being the thirty-second anniversary of the execution of the matchless hero. Responses were many and expressed great interest and enthusiasm. It was thought that so many years would elapse before completion of a fund sufficient to build a suitable memorial, yet even now something is lacking of the $6,000 which is necessary to complete the plans adopted by the committee. Several good friends have been duplicating their dollar contributions through a number of years, and the suggestion is made that others will now let us have one other dollar to help make up the deficit. If each one would respond, it would more than suffice. But, alas! many have passed beyond all earthly interests. In looking over this list the sad realization is impressive of the loss of many good friends and true whose kind words and deeds encouraged and supported the VETERAN through many trying years, and to those remaining gratitude is expressed for their many good offices.

Publication of the list of contributors has been deferred to the January number in order that it may be as complete as possible just before the dedication of the monument, which will be during the coming session of the Tennessee Legislature, to convene in January.

Just preceding the presentation of the revision of the U. D. C. Constitution and By-Laws Mrs. Alexander B. White, of Tennessee, a member of the Revision Committee, made a statement before the Convention that many present would remember that at the San Francisco Convention she told of the monument which was planned to commemorate the bravery and martyrdom of the immortal Sam Davis, of Tennessee, and asked their help; that they responded promptly and generously by giving out of the U. D. C. treasury $500 for the monument, and that now she wanted for herself and in behalf of the Sam Davis Monument Committee to again thank the United Daughters of the Confederacy for the gift of $500 and their other contributions. Further, she wanted them to know that the committee had a beautiful and appropriate design for this monument, which they expect to dedicate in the near future on the Capitol grounds at Nashville. She explained that they haven't quite all the money needed to carry out their plan, and she felt that they as individuals and Chapters would be glad if all admirers of lofty honor and devotion to right as portrayed in the death of Sam Davis would help in the work. Mrs. White added that she had copies of an address issued by the committee (this address is in the VETERAN for November), telling of the progress of the work on the monument and their plans for it, furnished by Mr. Cunningham, of the VETERAN, a member of the committee (who was attending the Convention), and that she would ask the pages to distribute these copies to the delegates, which was done at once.

THE JEFFERSON DAVIS MEMORIAL PARK.

Subscriptions to the Jefferson Davis Home Association are beginning nicely. The sentiment of approval prevails among all people. Even from some who were on the "other side" in the great struggle come words of approval. They think that, while so much is being given to the Lincoln Memorial, and appropriately, American patriotism should be stirred to secure a memorial park to the most distinguished man in the South's history.

This movement means much to Confederates everywhere, and every one (every Camp of Veterans and Sons, every Chapter of Daughters, and the Ladies' Memorial Association) should collectively or individually take pride in procuring the area that has been designated as a memorial park. If this be done, future generations will see to its proper adornment and preservation.

It is important to secure this realty now—before April 27, 1909. Will not the smallest organizations enlist in this undertaking? If they so determine and inform the VETERAN, descriptive data will be supplied. We must succeed in this worthy, sacred undertaking. The committee having it in charge will carry out as faithfully and economically as practicable the plans which have been outlined. Patriotic women should take pride in the procurement of the property as early as practicable; Veterans and Sons of Veterans should send contributions promptly. One dollar will secure the certificate of membership filled out in the name of sender or of any one for whom the sender may request it. With the money in hand the committee anticipates much advantage in some of the purchases.

Of the presentation of this subject in the VETERAN for November much approval is expressed. Capt. John H. Leathers (Banker), Louisville, Treasurer, writes: "We should make this matter succeed, and I believe we can do it." Our gallant Bennett H. Young, Commander of the Kentucky Division, U. C. V., in making a subscription of $100, writes: "We have been getting in a little money, but not much. The Kentucky Legislature will undoubtedly help this enterprise to the extent of $2,500 or $5,000. They gave $2,500 to the Lincoln Memorial Farm, and I am sure they will do as much for the Jefferson Davis Memorial Home."

That gallant, faithful Confederate, Col. V. Y. Cook, of Arkansas, who has done so much for the cause, sends in his modest way $100.

The list of contributors will not be published for a month or so. In the meantime every person as an individual or member of some organization is appealed to in behalf of raising the necessary sum. Send at least one dollar and procure a membership certificate and frame it as evidence of loyalty to the Confederate sentiment. While hundreds of thousands are contributing to the Lincoln Memorial Farm in Kentucky, the birthplace of Jefferson Davis should be secured, so that hereafter generations yet unborn will feel called upon to memorialize his birthplace in Kentucky, where the South's marvelous soldier, statesman, and citizen was born less than a year before President Lincoln—on June 3, 1808. Let us pay this tribute as a centenary offering during the year 1908. Send money to Capt. John H. Leathers, Louisville, Ky., and keep the VETERAN advised of all progress.

Mr. Jerome Twichell, Company E, 3d Arkansas Regiment, President Twichell Iron Company, Kansas City, writes Capt. John H. Leathers, Louisville, Ky.:

"My Dear Captain: I have read in the VETERAN with very much interest the plan for securing the birthplace of the late lamented President of our beloved Southern Confederacy as a Southern Mecca to perpetuate the memory of his life and services to his country. Inclosed please find check for $5, for which kindly send me certificates to the following persons: Jerome Twichell, Mrs. Jerome Twichell, Jerome Twichell, Jr., Norman Dean Twichell, and Miss Orian Atwater.

"This is certainly a most praiseworthy undertaking, and cannot but be successful. There are surely enough of us left among the veterans, together with the sons and daughters, to contribute a fund sufficient to make this spot a pride to every Southern heart."

CONFEDERATED MEMORIAL ASSOCIATIONS.

A fitting and worthy criticism comes to the VETERAN from Mrs. W. J. Behan, of New Orleans, President of the Confederated Memorial Association, in which she states: "After all the work that has been done by the noble women of the Confederacy and is still being done by the Memorial Associations of the South, you ignore us completely in your appeal to cooperate in buying the land required at Fairview, Ky., for the Jefferson Davis Memorial Park. (October VETERAN, page 409.) It is true we are not a very large body, and our ranks are growing thinner every day like those of the veterans, yet we are well organized, and it seems to me that in recognition of past services the Memorial Association should not be overlooked. We should be invited to assist in accomplishing the great work undertaken by your committee. How can the veterans ever forget the work done by the women of the sixties?"

The VETERAN is not disturbed by this complaint from dear Mrs. Behan, whose career at the head of this first organization, first in service and first and last in the hearts of all Confederates, has been thoroughly efficient.

This criticism is made the occasion to speak of Mrs. Behan personally. Since the consolidation of these venerable Memorial Associations, for which special tribute is paid to noble women in Arkansas, the labors of Mrs. Behan have been observed year after year in sincere admiration and gratitude. In maintaining place for the noble women who have kept her at the head she has been as astute, as wise, and as patriotic as the best of our general officers. Many a time has the enthusiasm of young women in the U. D. C. and the Veterans and the Sons seemed to ignore the worthy organization of these noble women; yet Mrs. Behan, always well balanced and always present at every important convention, at the right time and in the best way has so directed events for the Ladies' Memorial Association as to present them in the most admirable relation to all that is elevating and sacred for the organization deserving the first place in existence. As a record to stand while the thousands of volumes of the VETERAN are preserved in libraries and in the homes of rich and poor, let it be remembered that from the beginning gratitude has been and is unstinted to this remarkable woman's achievements for the cause that is dearer than life to the most devoted of all the people in the South in their most sacred ideals. The VETERAN could not exaggerate the esteem for the Ladies' Memorial Associations, singly and collectively, and the editor is gratified in this opportunity to confess its oversight at times, yet to express its unstinted admiration for the wisdom and faithfulness of the President through so many years in maintaining this motherhood, which is next door to Paradise.

Briefly, as to the Confederated Southern Memorial Association and the Jefferson Davis Memorial Home Association: It would seem the most fitting thing imaginable for them to take a leading part in that undertaking and to have special charge of the property when it is procured. Mrs. Behan has been constantly zealous and most successful at the U. C. V. Reunions in having suitable memorial services to President Davis, and no doubt all Confederates would be gratified for the C. S. M. A. to have the special care of this Jefferson Davis Memorial enterprise.

All deference and all honor are ascribed to the women who held memorial services soon after the war and achieved the erection of our first monuments to Confederates. Aye, back of that, all honor to those women who gave assistance to the volunteers in their earlier years, who later nursed the sick in their own homes and in the hospitals, who buried the dead, who held the first memorial services to honor patriot dead.

In a sense, the VETERAN has been very derelict in not presenting persistently the fact that these noble women have published a history of the work done by them in earlier days. It is a large octavo volume of over three hundred pages, with fine engravings of many monuments. This book is offered at the surprisingly low price of $1.25, postage twenty cents additional. Every man and woman who would like to possess this beautiful and valuable history would do well to send the price to Miss Daisy M. L. Hodgson, 1816 St. Charles Avenue, New Orleans, or it will be supplied by the VETERAN. It is more than worth the price, and the purchase of the remnant of the edition would supply funds for other worthy deeds.

MOORMAN MONUMENT, NEW ORLEANS.

With highly commendable zeal the committee engaged upon a memorial to Gen. George Moorman, who was Adjutant General to the United Confederate Veterans until his death, are nearing completion of their work. A little less than five hundred dollars is necessary to finish the payment. If any comrades have neglected to make contribution, they should do so soon, or they can have no part in the comfort of having paid tribute to the memory of that faithful and beloved officer. Such persons may address Col. J. A. Harrell, President, or W. T. Blakemore, Treasurer of the Moorman Memorial Association, New Orleans.

ALABAMA STATE REUNION, U. C. V.

Mobile has again entertained the Alabama State Division, United Confederate Veterans. This was done only a few years ago; but as Birmingham had so royally entertained the General Federation, it seemed well for Mobile to open the doors for this convention.

The Alabama Division of Sons held its annual meeting, invitations having been extended by the George E. Dixon Camp of Sons in Mobile. The invitations included not only the Alabama Division of Sons of Veterans, of which Albert C. Sexton is Commander, but that of the Army of Tennessee Department, U. C. V., under command of Clarence Julian Owens, of Abbeville.

The city of Mobile has never perhaps appeared to better advantage. Its new life, after being dormant in a way for so many years, with its new hotels, the restored Battle House (estimated to cost a million dollars), the Cawthon, the Bienville, and others, supplied ample and delightful comfort to the guests, while the people generally responded to the Confederate sentiment. A marked feature was the abundant supply of music in the parks and hotels. It was fine "all the day" and until day again. Decorations were elaborate in private homes as well as about public buildings. The residence of Col. E. L. Russell was the most conspicuously decorated perhaps in the city. It is located on Government Street, near the great white school building which has ever been a credit to the city. The convention was received in a commodious theater on the first day, while the business meetings and receptions were in Temperance Hall.

The next issue of the VETERAN will have a report of the proceedings, one notable feature being that of the Army of Tennessee Department of U. S. V., under the splendid direction of Commander Clarence J. Owens.

REMEMBERS SOUTHERN WOMEN'S KINDNESS.

(The Oswego Daily Times.)

Andrew J. Hirschbolz went out to the Riverside Cemetery to-day and placed American flags and flowers on the graves of nine Confederate soldiers who are buried there. This is the forty-second time that he has gone out the day before Memorial Day and paid such honor.

When the Civil War broke out, Mr. Hirschbolz went out with an Iowa regiment. When his first enlistment had expired, he went to Chicago; and after working for a time he reenlisted in the 88th Regiment of Illinois. While in Kentucky he was shot and was taken to an old building in Bardstown. There were no accommodations for taking care of the wounded, and he nearly died. While lying there, partly conscious, a lady and a young girl came along and found him. He was unable to speak. They brought him water, and he was soon able to speak. They took him home with them and nursed him back to health. The woman was in charge of a girls' seminary. The son of the family was a Confederate soldier.

When Hirschbolz was sent North, the mother and daughter asked him to keep a lookout for the son and brother in case he should find him wounded or a prisoner. He resolved that he would repay the kindness of this Confederate family. When he came to Oswego, he found several Confederate prisoners confined at the fort, and immediately did everything in his power for them. Two of the men died, and later seven more were buried with them in Riverside.

When Mr. Hirschbolz returned here after the war, in 1865, his first thought was of the lonely and unhonored graves up the river. On the day before the Memorial Day of 1866 he took flowers and flags to the cemetery and decorated nine graves. At that time the feeling ran high, and he was roundly criticised for his kindly act. The veteran organization to which he belonged started proceedings to court-martial him and expel him. The highest officer in the State, to whose attention the case had been called, quashed the proceedings and wrote a strong letter in which he commended Mr. Hirschbolz for his act and stated that if a little more of this spirit could be shown the breach in the nation would soon be healed. Since that time Mr. Hirschbolz has made his pilgrimage every year, and he intends to continue it as long as he lives.

NEW OFFICERS TENNESSEE DIVISION, U. C. V.

At a meeting of the Tennessee Division, U. C. V., held in Nashville on October 14, 1908, these officers were elected: John H. McDowell, Union City, Division Major General. John M. Brooks, Knoxville, Brig. Gen., First Brigade. Baxter Smith, Nashville, Brig. Gen., Second Brigade. C. B. Simonton, Covington, Brig. Gen., Third Brigade. John P. Hickman, Nashville, Adjutant General.

Confederate Veteran.

S. A. CUNNINGHAM, Editor and Proprietor.

Office: Methodist Publishing House Building, Nashville, Tenn.

This publication is the personal property of S. A. Cunningham. All persons who approve its principles and realize its benefits as an organ for Associations throughout the South are requested to commend its patronage and to cooperate in extending its circulation. Let each one be constantly diligent.

In presenting the prize paper from Columbia College on "Robert E. Lee: A Present Estimate," by Miss Christine H. Boyson, of Minnesota, it is explained that with the emphatic protest against many expressions therein contained there is no criticism of the girl author nor of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, as the paper was not submitted to them, and the VETERAN generously assumes that the distinguished gentlemen who comprise the committee must have judged it specially upon its literary merit. Promise was made to publish it without question as to its fitness, hence the appearance and the criticism. (See page 667.)

WHERE THE VETERAN CIRCULATES.

Interested friends of and advertisers in the VETERAN may see where it circulates by the following percentages: Alabama, 5.50; Arkansas, 5; California, 1.50; Florida, 2; Georgia, 4; Illinois, Indiana, and Kansas collectively, 1; Kentucky, 4; Louisiana, 3; Maryland, 1; Minnesota, Massachusetts, and Michigan, 1; Mississippi, 7; Missouri, 5; New York, 1; Montana, Nebraska, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, 1; Oklahoma, 3; Tennessee, 13; Texas, 22; Virginia, 8; West Virginia, 2; Washington, D. C., and Washington State, 1. The remaining nine per cent is miscellaneous, as it goes to nearly every State in the Union and to many foreign countries. Comrades and friends in the South upon seeing the relative circulation in their States with others may have aspiration to increase it. In such event local lists will be supplied and a commission to worthy agents granted. Sample copies will be supplied free.

The very interesting article on Maj. James Breathed which appeared in the VETERAN for November was incorrectly credited to his brother, Frank Breathed, as the author. It was written by H. H. Matthews, of Pikesville, Md., who was a member of Breathed's Battery, and has before been published in newspapers. The error was evidently made by crediting the sender of the clipping with the authorship.

After a recent visit to Tennessee, in which he became acquainted with the story of Sam Davis's heroism, Mr. Jack Akers, of Cleveland, Ohio, sent a contribution of ten dollars to the monument fund in his own name and subsequently the same amount in the name of his two sons, Jack Akers, Jr., and Gardner F. Akers. In sending these contributions he wrote: "I told them the story, and both boys said: 'Dad, chip in five dollars for each of us.'"

The venerable Theodore G. Carter writes from St. Peter, Minn.: "I notice that my tag says 'November, 1908.' Now as I have every number you have ever issued, I do not feel like dropping an old friend while I live, and therefore inclose one dollar in currency to renew for the ensuing year. When you cease to receive my renewals, you may conclude that I have 'passed over the range.' As I am now about seventy-seven, it cannot be long, but in the meantime I wish to continue to hear from the 'other side.' I wish you continued prosperity."

VIRGINIA GRAND CAMP OF VETERANS.

Hon. Tipton D. Jennings, of Lynchburg, Va., writes enthusiastically of the late meeting of Virginia veterans, in which he says: "Charlottesville, Va., gave a truly glorious reception to the Grand Camp of Confederate Veterans and to the Virginia Division, U. C. V., on October 20, 21, and 22. The attendance was large, the proceedings interesting, the decorations lovely, and the music by the Confederate Choir both inspiring and affecting; the sponsors and maids of honor were sweet and charming, the citizens hospitable to the utmost degree, and the weather ideal. Altogether the veterans have never enjoyed themselves more. Charlottesville! Long may she wave!"

COMPANY A, THIRTIETH TENNESSEE, IN BATTLE OF CHICKAMAUGA.—From H. H. Hockersmith, Hermitage, Tenn.: "Company A, 30th Tennessee Infantry, Captain Bidwell's company, from Robertson County, went into the battle of Chickamauga with twenty-two men, only four being left to stack arms upon Snodgrass Hill, nine being killed and nine left wounded upon the field after hostilities had ceased and a complete victory had been won. Three of the four are still alive, John Martin, W. H. Farmer, and H. H. Hockersmith, while the fourth, Eugene Burr, died in the Texas Soldiers' Home last year. With equal numbers, can any company show a larger percentage of casualties?"

GEN. J. E. B. STUART NOT AT CARLISLE.—L. R. Edwards, of Franklin, Va., a member of the 13th Virginia Cavalry, writes promptly after the publication of an article against Gen "Jeb" Stuart: "Without discussing the shelling of Carlisle, Pa., by General Stuart, allow me to correct the statement in the July VETERAN that 'General Stuart was not at Carlisle.' It was there about midnight that I conveyed a message just received from General Lee to General Stuart that six thousand prisoners had been captured. We left the vicinity of Carlisle—i. e., the rear guard, which I commanded—about daybreak Thursday morning. The command reached Gettysburg that evening and fought Meade's right next day."

In a letter from Comrade W. L. Ditto to Capt. T. O. Stuart, page 573 November VETERAN, a mistake occurs in the beginning, wherein the author states that General Buckner was in command of the Confederate forces in East Tennessee in July, 1862, when it should have been 1863.

"MY OLD CONFEDERATE"—AN ADDRESS.

A memorable feature of hospitality to the U. D. C. Convention, Atlanta, is treasured by delegates as a present from the Atlanta Chapter, U. D. C. It is a beautifully printed pamphlet entitled "My Old Confederate." On the cover page there is an exquisite half-tone design of a Confederate battle flag floating in the clouds. It is an address delivered before the Atlanta Camp sometime ago by Dr. John E. White and dedicated to his father, Rev. James M. White, a gallant soldier of North Carolina Cavalry in Hampton's Legion.

It is a story as told by his father, who is of the "unreconstructed." In addition to the beautiful frontispiece, there are four full-page engravings, it would seem, "gotten up regardless of expense." This is an unusual enterprise for a Camp, and the address must possess merit by the expense incurred in its production. This booklet may be had of Capt. W. H. Harrison, State Capitol, for twenty-five cents.

UNITED DAUGHTERS OF THE CONFEDERACY.

The meeting of the United Daughters of the Confederacy in Atlanta November 11-14 was well attended and much work was accomplished. It will not be practicable in this issue to give a résumé of the proceedings. A large part of the time was occupied in changing the constitution and by-laws. This was a prodigious work, and caused a great deal of animated discussion. The features discussed at great length and by many delegates most ably were the crosses of honor to descendants and the admission of women of Northern birth and of grandnieces to membership. It was decided to give the cross of honor to descendants and to limit the bestowal of crosses to the year 1910 instead of 1915, as was the law formerly. The conditions of bestowal to descendants may appear later.

It was decided to admit to membership women of Northern birth after most earnest pleadings, in which Mrs. Parker, President of the great New York Chapter, took a leading part. A forceful argument was that many men came from the North before the war, and that their wives were ardently devoted to the Confederate cause, in which their husbands were offering their lives. The admission of grandnieces and their descendants seemed well, for nieces and grandnieces will have died, it is hoped, before the great organization shall have ceased to vindicate "the story of the glory" of the Confederate cause and to maintain in history the justice of the South in going to war.

REPORT OF MRS. CORNELIA BRANCH STONE, PRESIDENT GENERAL.

The report of Mrs. Stone in a pamphlet of fifteen pages was read by her to the Convention, introduced as follows: "One year ago you placed in my keeping the highest honor at your disposal—a sacred trust—which was received in good faith, with deep and tender appreciation, and a determination to give you the best service at my command. If my report brings you 'nothing but leaves,' you will know that the storms of life have beaten too fiercely and the fair flowers of promise came not to fruition, and know too that in the darkest hour of trial my heart turned to you and to the cause you represent."

Her first official visit was to Washington City, where she addressed all the Confederate organizations in behalf of the Arlington Confederate monument, in which much interest was manifested. A practical organization was promptly effected, and it is making amazing progress in the procurement of a fund worthy of the cause—the erection of a Confederate monument in the Confederate circle at Arlington Cemetery. The monthly reports in the VETERAN of the Treasurer, Mr. Wallace Streater, will show the beautiful progress.

The President General next attended the dedication of a memorial window to Mrs. Jefferson Davis in the Episcopal church, "the Westminster of the South," at Biloxi, Miss., an account of which was published in the current issue of the VETERAN. The report gives Miss Decca Lamar West special credit for her efficient work in the success of that memorial undertaking.

Her report is complimentary to the harmonious union of the Indian Territory Division with that of Oklahoma, the blending of the two becoming necessary when the territories by law became the new State of Oklahoma.

A report is given of the dedication of the Jefferson Davis monument in Richmond, the greatest work yet achieved by the United Daughters of the Confederacy.

The proceedings of the Norfolk Convention are reviewed in the report, and a condensed record of most important proceedings is made.

A feature that did not seem to amuse the Convention was impressive in the report of the effort to procure the right to make crosses of honor—at the time limited to 1915 and is now 1910—from a Mr. Crenshaw that he would give an instrument in writing which would release the organization from procuring crosses through his estate after his death. There was no reference to his being very aged or infirm.

Theus Brothers, makers of the U. D. C. badge, had been interviewed in regard to their rights of the patent, and Mrs. A. B. Hull, chairman of a committee, reported that "Mr. Theus declines to sell the patent, but promises that if at his death his son declines to continue the jewelry business he will make a bequest of the patent to the association."

An interesting account is given of the Woman's Congress at Montevale, in which on U. D. C. Day the President General presided. The programme, prepared by Mrs. Pilcher, was broad and far-reaching, while the keynote and central thought was fittingly Jefferson Davis. After referring to the publication of proceedings in the VETERAN, the President General states: "It is my duty to call your attention to the generous aid given our organization by the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, the pages of which have been ever open to us during the year for the reception of material of interest and importance to the U. D. C. This valuable periodical should be in the home of every Daughter of the Confederacy, as its contents each month give much historical data not previously written."

She also makes acknowledgment to the editor for "many courtesies in behalf of the promotion of our work," and to the Keystone, published in Charleston, S. C., "which has been equally courteous and generous in service, and deserves our grateful appreciation."

Reference is made to the unhappy condition of the finances of the organization. It has been so generous in making worthy appropriations as to be unable to meet fully certain promises; therefore more diligent care and economy has become imperative.

She urges the importance of supplying portraits of President Davis and Gen. R. E. Lee to the schools in the South. She approves the protest of certain influential Camps who are opposed to the wearing of Confederate uniforms by Southern women and the assumption of military titles, and commends "that uniforms be white, emblematic of the purity and truth of Southern womanhood." She states: "It is not in line with the objects of the United Daughters of the Confederacy for Chapters to take active part in political contests."

The President General pays tribute to the memory of noble women who are already on the Last Roll record of the VETERAN: Mrs. Sheldon Stringer, President of the Florida Division, died soon after the Norfolk Convention; Mrs. Edwin G. Weed, who was also President of the Florida Division and later President General of the organization. This is the first death among those who have been President General of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. Mrs. Bragg, Honorary President General, is also mentioned in the report as of those for whom the U. D. C. deeply mourn, concluding: "All these have performed duty faithfully."

She pays fitting tributes to Lieut. Gens. Stephen D. Lee and Alexander P. Stewart, of the veteran heroes who had died during the year. Concluding the memorial, she said: "Let us gird on our armor and pledge ourselves anew, forgetting self in our service and sacrifice, to preserve the memories of their great deeds, the record of which is pure and stainless."

FROM REPORT OF PRESIDENT TENNESSEE DIVISION.

In her report of the General Convention of the U. D. C. Mrs. Pilcher, President of the Tennessee Division, states:

"Mrs. Stone, the President General, is immensely popular both on and off the platform, and I feel sure that the genuine love and consideration of her Daughters helped her through the arduous work of those strenuous days. The most trying experience for us all was the consideration of the amendments to the constitution and by-laws. It was very tedious, and took a long time; but it was very necessary to finish up this dreaded work, postponed from last year. It is devoutly to be hoped that at least a decade will pass before it has to be done again.

"Tennessee paid more money than any other Division except Virginia, and was only second to Georgia in the vote. We had a large delegation of representative women. There were some pretty innovations. Among others, each State had been requested to furnish a miniature State flag to leave with the hostess Chapter as a souvenir. When the roll was called, the President of the State called went forward and presented her flag to the Custodian General of Flags, Mrs. Anthony Walker, of Virginia, who conducted this pretty ceremony. Tennessee's offering was a banner made of Lyons' banner silk and handsomely trimmed with bullion fringe, cords, etc., and supported by a gilt staff. It was much admired.

"We also took a pretty sugar maple to be planted in the Confederate grove at Atlanta. Mrs. Voorhies, of San Francisco, inaugurated this in her city. It was done again at Norfolk, and each year request is made of the State Presidents, who gladly respond.

"Tennessee's President introduced a resolution that met with prompt and hearty approval—that the 10th of September be made one of our annual and perpetual 'days of observance' to be known as 'Founder's Day,' in honor of the founder of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. This organization had its beginning in Tennessee's capital city on September 10, 1903. It is needless to add that this distinguished woman who founded the U. D. C. is Caroline Meriwether Goodlett. The Convention set the seal of its approval by a unanimous vote.

"Mrs. Stone's Cabinet is most acceptable to the body. This was plainly to be seen in the election of officers, as most of these were returned, though the time limit—an unwritten law—had expired.

"The social features of the Convention were brilliant in the extreme. Atlanta always reaches high-water mark in what she undertakes.

"The Convention goes to Houston, Tex., next year, and from the indications we believe there will be a large attendance. I think I am correct in reporting, as heard in the Convention, fifty-seven thousand Daughters of the Confederacy, and they plan and accomplish an immense amount of work each year. We hope to push with all possible vigor at our State Convention at Jackson next May the movement to erect a monument to Gen. A. P. Stewart at Chickamauga Park. The Gen. A. P. Stewart Chapter at Chattanooga and others are most enthusiastic for this."

Reports from other State Presidents are solicited.

A YOUNG SOUTHERN BOY AS AUTHOR.

The VETERAN is proud of the achievements of the fourteen-year-old son of Dr. John A. Wyeth, an ex-Confederate soldier, author of the "Life of Lieut. Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest" and President of the New York Southern Society.

John Allan Wyeth, Jr., first came into public notice in his thirteenth year as the author of a poetic drama entitled "The Weaker Man," which was written for and accepted and is to be produced upon the stage by the distinguished actor, Mr. E. H. Sothern, who declared it to be "remarkable as literature and of great dramatic merit."

The writing of the play came about in this way: Its author, having witnessed a performance of "The Sunken Bell," a symbolic play rich in poetic suggestion as rendered by Mr. Sothern and Miss Julia Marlowe, ventured to write a criticism upon the play and the performance. This criticism attracted Mr. Sothern's attention to such an extent that it resulted in his requesting Master John to try his hand at a play. A contract was made, and within two months' time the child forwarded to Mr. Sothern the poetic drama entitled "The Weaker Man," which was promptly approved and accepted by the great artist.

Among a number of minor poems written by this young author is the one printed herewith. It was written under the excitement of a letter received from a playmate whose father had bought and rehabilitated a famous and for several centuries deserted castle on the Rhine. The letter gave a graphic description of the castle, its secret passages and haunted towers, with its history, which dated back to mediæval times, and also told of the beauties of the river Rhine and the surrounding picturesque country.

The poem was written within an hour of the receipt of this letter and is printed verbatim et literatim as then written.

TO SCHONBERG.

BY JOHN ALLAN WYETH, JR.

Hail to thee, noblest castle on the Rhine.

Far famed in ancient history for strength!
The Rhine beneath thee curves about thy base
And lays before thy feet her sinuous length.

Apollo sinks behind the distant hills
And hurls his feeble rays about the sky,
While softly glowing is the evening star,
And night falls, placing all her lights on high.

The river ripples and the grasses sway;
The moonlit leaves turn from the gentle wind,
About thee in the woods a boar is heard,
Or else a leaping deer or startled hind.

Pale Dian slips between the angry clouds
Which seek to thwart her in her chariot white,

Till, closing round her with a rumbling sound,
They hide her gracious form and welcome light.

The storm clouds sweep along the ruffled Rhine,
A deadly silence fills the startled air;
The breathless land awaits the tempest's force
With fearful expectation everywhere.

Amidst the storm thy turret-crowned head
Is lifted as in scorn. Against the gale
Thy stony strength thou warest till at last
The storm retreats and dies into a wail.

Then smiles the morn upon the fruitful fields;
The birds sing, twittering their merry lays;
While thou, serene, majestic, stand'st aloft
Within thy dream of mediæval days.

AT AN OLD KENTUCKY HOME—FAIRVIEW.

The VETERAN would like to present scenes all about Fairview, Ky., now that such widespread interest should be exercised. One of the active citizens in behalf of securing the birthplace of the South's beloved President, Jefferson Davis, is Comrade R. F. Vaughan, who visited Nashville with Mr.

AT RESIDENCE OF R. F. VAUGHAN, FAIRVIEW, KY.

W. B. Brewer. Accidentally the picture above was procured. Mrs. Vaughan, in light skirt, sits on the right of her guests; next to her is Mrs. Sudie B. Jessup, of Elkton; the next sitting is Mrs. Sue Pennick, of Wellington, Kans.; while Mrs. Annie Wilkins, of Elkton, is standing in the rear.

SUGGESTIONS FOR BENEFIT OF THE VETERAN.

BY MRS. D. A. S. VAUGHT, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

You asked me once to report the plan I have adopted when desiring to contribute to any bazaar or fair for Confederate purposes. I suggest to the ladies to get up voting contests for the most popular old veteran, the winner to receive from me a year's subscription to the VETERAN. My little dollar outlay thus is multiplied, for at five cents a vote one hundred votes is a very short score. Some one old gentleman is gratified by being pronounced the most popular, and the pleasure and advantage of reading the VETERAN is gained.

Wherever I learn of libraries in the State established or run by the U. D. C., I donate a year's subscription to the VETERAN, and at present I am waiting to learn the name and officers of a Chapter U. D. C. organized last week at Gonzales, La., to offer a year of the VETERAN.

In a personal note Mrs. Vaught states: "I believe that among the prisoners of Fort Warren shown in the October VETERAN is the figure of my mother's brother, Capt. Richard Hayneworth Gayle, third figure from the right in the lower picture—the gentleman with beard and soft hat."

LETTER FROM MAJ. FRED C. LOW.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, TOGUS, ME., Nov. 14, 1908.

I had no idea when I asked for a sample copy of your magazine, not knowing it was now published, that I would receive more than one copy. Since received they have been circulated about the Home, and much interest has been expressed in some of the articles. I have tried to get information as to what Confederate troops we faced on that afternoon of June 18, 1864, and I now think it was Wise's Brigade, Johnston's Division, Beauregard commander. As many of your readers were in the ranks of the Confederate troops, I would like to hear from them. The poetry at the end of the article was written by Rev. Edgar F. Davis, a Congregationalist clergyman, then of Hamilton, Mass. Sergeant William K. Nason is now living in Kenduskeag, Maine. Inclosed $1.

We have gone carefully over the roll of the regiment name by name and find we lost in killed and died of wounds 441 men. There were exactly 2,200 men enrolled. Fox gives our loss at 423 officers and men. He says the 26th North Carolina had the heaviest loss of any Confederate regiment.

At the close of the war there were living, or supposed to be, 1,568 men of the 1st Maine Heavy Artillery. Years ago I made a roster of their names, and we accounted for all but 220 men. These were probably deserters, bounty jumpers, and men who enlisted under fictitious names in order to obtain the big bounties offered by cities and towns in order to obtain men to fill their quotas. Some cities and towns offered as much as $800 for such men to enlist. Then the United States offered $300 more bounty to be paid in installments of $50 each every six months. I am anxious to find some smart man who can instruct me how to find these 220 missing men.

For years I was Secretary of the Regimental Association of the 1st Maine Heavy Artillery. [See page 646.]

James E. Porter, Wilkinsburg Station, Pa.: "I am inclosing two dollars, which renews my subscription to the VETERAN. I renew for two years, for fear I might overlook it. Your subscription list ought to grow. I hardly know how a Confederate soldier can get along without it. Then you make so good a journal, both typographically and intellectually, that I don't understand how you can do it. Quite a number of us 'Yanks' have an enjoyable time reading the VETERAN and talking over the matters in which we think you are dead wrong; but that will not cause us to let our subscriptions lapse. I think a movement will be put on foot soon to have the National Encampment of the Grand Army meet in Atlanta within the next few years. It cannot come too soon."

W. M. Watkins, Superintendent Confederate Soldiers' Home of Arkansas: "In the October VETERAN inquiry is made by Dan W. Ward, of Juno, Ark., of the whereabouts of J. A. Kelly, of Company E, 3d Arkansas Regiment. While in New Orleans in February last I saw the name 'J. A. Kelly, Company A, 3d Arkansas,' engraved upon a tablet in the tomb of the Army of Northern Virginia."

THE REUNION BRIGADE AT SPARTA, TENN.

The Reunion Brigade, composed of the 8th Tennessee Cavalry, Shaw's Battalion, a part of the 4th Tennessee Cavalry, and fragments of other cavalry regiments, and of the 16th, 25th, and 26th Tennessee Regiments, and fragments of other infantry commands, met at Crossville, Tenn., on October 15, 1908, in annual Reunion. Col. W. L. Dibrell, the senior officer, took command of the brigade and formed them in line at 10 A.M. with the Harriman band in front. Next to the band was the Confederate infantry, then the Federal infantry, and then the cavalry. The infantry was commanded by Col. William Lowery, of White County, and the cavalry by Maj. J. L. Quarles, of Sparta. The command moved eastward, then remarched westward, passing in review at Key. It was halted in front of the Cumberland Hotel.

In the election Col. W. L. Dibrell was elected Brigadier General to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Gen. W. G. Smith. Jackson Davis, of Putnam County, was elected Colonel of Cavalry, John Hickey, of White, Lieutenant Colonel of Cavalry, with A. A. Reagan, of Putnam County, Major of Cavalry, and Joe A. Dibrell Adjutant of Cavalry. William Lowery, of White County, was elected Colonel of Infantry, J. W. Mathews, of Cumberland County, Lieutenant Colonel of Infantry, W. M. Parsons, of Cumberland County, Major of Infantry, and W. A. Hamby, of Crossville, Adjutant.

Gen. W. L. Dibrell announced that he would reappoint all of General Smith's staff with the same rank.

The Brigade selected Sparta for its next annual Reunion.

After the election of officers, the cavalry dismounted and the veterans, accompanied by the band and crowd, marched to Rink Park, where seats and a stand had been erected.

J. W. Cooper, marshal of the day, presented Rev. H. E. Partridge, who led in a short prayer. Short addresses were then delivered by Judge C. E. Snodgrass, Rev. Partridge, and Capt. James W. Lowe, and all of them were well delivered. After the speaking, dinner was announced, the old soldiers occupying a table especially prepared for them. Three large beeves were cooked for the occasion.

After dinner General Dibrell named a committee to draft resolutions on the death of Gen. W. G. Smith—to wit: Maj. J. L. Quarles, Cols. John Mitchell, S. V. McManus, W. A. Hamby, and J. W. Cooper. Said committee reported the resolutions in which they paid fitting tribute to Gen. Smith.

There were from fifty to sixty old Confederate soldiers and some twelve or fifteen hundred citizens in attendance.

The VETERAN has been such a valuable medium in its inquiry notices for locating long-separated comrades that it now hopes to be equally successful in locating a fortune for Mrs. M. C. Frost, of Memphis, Tenn. It seems that her father, H. H. Carr, was a partner in an Alaskan gold mine with one Edward Bamy, who had stayed there to work it and who sold it at a good profit when the rush to that region began, about 1898. Bamy then started out to locate his partner, and upon ascertaining that he was dead he began a search for the daughter, who had married in Cincinnati, Ohio, and moved to Cleveland. Her husband's attention was called to the story of Bamy's search as it appeared in Cincinnati papers, and he then began a search for Bamy, who seems to have disappeared. Mr. Frost had expected to try to find him at the Birmingham Reunion, as Bamy was a Confederate veteran, but was prevented by illness from attending. He and his wife are now in Memphis (Station G). Information of Mr. Bamy is desired.

THE WORK OF KENNESAW CHAPTER.

REVIEW OF ITS REMARKABLE ACHIEVEMENT.

The struggles of Marietta L. M. A. and the Kennesaw Chapter, U. D. C., Marietta, in gathering dollar by dollar the money for the lovely monument erected in the Confederate Cemetery at that place should encourage all others with like responsibility.

In the Marietta Cemetery sleep three thousand Confederate soldiers, representing every State from Maryland to Missouri and through the South that took part on the Southern side during the desperate conflict of '61-'65.

In the campaign approaching Marietta, as Sherman advanced and Johnston was forced back, the sick and the wounded Confederates were sent to Marietta until the town became one vast hospital. Churches, public buildings, private houses—all were occupied and all the comfort possible was supplied to the pitiful sufferers.

The hospital records show the death lists of young men scarce entering manhood, of gray-haired sires, of soldiers from every Southern State who lost their lives fighting on Georgia soil far away from home and friends, and it was fitting that Georgia women should go in and out amid these scenes of suffering and do what they could to cheer and nurse and comfort the sick and wounded and help bury the dead. In the "hospital section" of this cemetery rests the dust of many a brave man borne to his last narrow home from these hospitals. Later Sherman's army swept through the town. Many of the people fled before the oncoming horrors of fire, sword, and ruthless destruction. * * *

In April, 1866, a party of friends gathered at the cemetery, cleared away the rubbish, and laid flowers on each mute little mound, a custom that has never been allowed to lapse. On each successive 26th of April, no matter what the hindrances, memorial services have always been observed. For several years the Ladies' Memorial Association was able to keep the cemetery in creditable order; but in 1869 two earnest, faithful women, Mrs. Charles Williams, of Columbus, Ga., gone to her reward, and Miss M. J. Greene, now living in Atlanta, undertook the removal of the Confederate dead scattered on the battlefields of Chickamauga, Kennesaw, Kolb's Farm, New Hope, and all along the line of the Western and Atlanta railroad. State aid was obtained, additional land was donated, and by the heroic efforts of these two women the bodies of over two thousand Confederate soldiers were rescued from neglect and reinterred in the Marietta Cemetery.

The proper care of so large a cemetery was beyond the resources of the fast-depleting Memorial Association, and State aid, which had been most certainly expected, failed in those fearful days of reconstruction; so gradually the cemetery fell into decay. In the early nineties the Memorial Association was reorganized with the avowed purpose of rescuing the cemetery from ruin. Mrs. R. L. Nesbitt was elected President, and has been re-elected each year since. She has ever been ardently devoted to the work. The treasury was empty and the Society was reduced in strength and numbers. To overcome this condition seemed again a hopeless undertaking.

MRS. ADELAIDE M'CLATCHY.

However, the women who had lived through the four years of war and of carnage and had survived the horrors of reconstruction had learned great lessons in patience, endurance, and perseverance. After many struggles and with some discouragements, their faithfulness was rewarded.

Many devices were resorted to to make money. The first sum realized was from a county agricultural exhibit at an Atlanta exposition. Every article displayed was collected, packed, shipped, and put in place by women, and from the premiums won over two hundred dollars, the first money, was gained. Gradually this was increased until there was enough to clear away the rubbish, open the driveways, and put in seventeen hundred of the needed three thousand marble headstones.

About this time the Kennesaw Chapter, U. D. C., came into existence, and right nobly did these younger women go to work. By this help sewers were put in at heavy cost, because in some places it was impossible to stop the washes which were beginning to expose the bones; the speaker's stand of brick and marble was completed, and the remaining thirteen hundred headstones were put in place; shrubbery was planted, and the whole place, between six and seven acres, was sodded in Bermuda grass. It will thus be seen that before Kennesaw Chapter could begin work on a monument she must aid in rescuing the cemetery from ruin.

Mrs. Adelaide McClatchy, a most devoted member of both organizations and a zealous worker, suggested that the Chapter build a monument to the men who gave their lives for the principles that Southern women hold dear. Three hundred dollars of the necessary amount had been accumulated, when Mrs. McClatchy was called away from the sacred work, and for a while it seemed as if utter stagnation had settled upon it. The effort to aid in keeping up the repairs on the cemetery, in cutting the grass, and in meeting all the various appeals which come to every Chapter exhausted the slender resources at command; and then it was that a generous member, Miss Hattie Cleveland, by the gift of one hundred dollars revived the fainting energies of all the members, and a determined, steadfast effort was put forth. No work was considered too insignificant if it would add a few dollars to the fund. Fairs, rummage sales, lawn parties, parlor entertainments, lunches served on many different occasions, baseball games, spinsters' conventions, a beautiful flower show, hundreds of letters of appeal, silver teas—in fact, every suggested means was patiently, faithfully followed up, and finally a special edition of the Atlanta Journal was secured, netting over five hundred dollars, which brought the goal into view!

The Varina Davis Chapter, Children of the Confederacy, made by their own work $150 for the monument fund.

Let no Chapter despair. If with the extra care of the cemetery and meeting all U. D. C. claims Kennesaw Chapter could struggle on to success, to so great a success, surely other Chapters can do much. The lovely monument stands guard over the three thousand graves, and the disappointments and discouragements of eight years are forgotten.

The cemetery now belongs to the State of Georgia, and an appropriation of five thousand dollars has been made by the Legislature to begin the work of beautifying and improving this city of our dead. The site is beautiful, and the green slopes are in full view of historic Kennesaw Mountain, where many of these soldiers lost their lives. When the work of adornment has been completed and this cemetery equals in beauty the handsome National Cemetery, just across the town, where all that money and taste and skill could do has been done by the national government to honor the over ten thousand Federal soldiers who sleep there, then indeed will Kennesaw Chapter feel that her work has not been in vain and that her reward is enduring.

Mrs. R. L. Nesbitt, President Kennesaw Chapter, Marietta, Ga., has full directions for conducting the "Spinsters' Convention" which she will be glad to furnish any Chapter on application free of charge. It has always been found attractive and secures good audiences.

The extraordinary, prolonged labor in zeal and persistence of these noble women in Marietta is of concern to all who were in the Army of Tennessee especially. It will be hard to find a place where so much has been accomplished by so few women.

REV. MOSES STRONG ROYCE.

BY SALLIE ROYCE WEIR, HOT SPRINGS, N. C.

[So widespread is the interest in the story about "Three Hundred Miles in a Wagon," page 505 October issue, that other data have been procured from the author, Mrs. Weir.]

Moses Strong Royce was born in Rutland, Vermont, July 13, 1825. His great-grandfather, Stephen Royce, removed to Vermont sometime in 1774, and soon became prominent in the early history of the State. He was a member of the convention which met at Cephass Kents, in Dorset, July 24, 1774, to declare the New Hampshire Grants a free and independent State. His uncle, Stephen Royce, the third of that name, was judge of the Supreme Court of Vermont for twenty-five years and chief justice for five. At the end of that time he was elected Governor by a majority of eleven thousand, being the first Republican Governor elected in the United States. At the end of the first term he was reelected by the same large majority. His father, Rodney Royce, had a career most promising in the legal profession, but he died in his thirty-sixth year.

Moses Royce completed his education at the University of Vermont, in Burlington, graduating at eighteen. While at the university he was brought under the influence of Bishop Hopkins, and decided to study for the ministry of the Episcopal Church. He came South a few years later to Greeneville, Tenn., and supported himself by teaching while completing his studies for the ministry. He married Martha A. Broyles, a daughter of Dr. James F. Broyles, a prominent physician of Greeneville, and they went to Nashville, Tenn., traveling by stagecoach. Here he was ordained priest by Bishop Otey, the first Bishop of Tennessee, only one year after he had been ordained deacon. Later they moved to Franklin, Mr. Royce taking charge of St. Paul's Church.

Like Moses of old, Mr. Royce was slow of speech and temperate in action; and when the crisis of the great Civil War came, he considered carefully the facts in the case, and decided that the South was in the right and her claims just. He espoused her cause and served her faithfully to the end, although by so doing he lost the favor of his uncle, Gov. Stephen Royce, and a share of his property, the entire estate passing at his death to his more favored nephew, Judge Homer Royce. He raised a company of men, Mr. Carey Harris, of Franklin, being one of his lieutenants. He was often detailed on scouting expeditions to cut off forage trains, watch gunboats on the Cumberland River, and other dangerous work of that nature.

On one of his expeditions he encountered a superior force, and was made prisoner. He was confined in the military prison at Nashville—the penitentiary. Here he was tried on the charge of being a guerrilla and sentenced to be shot. The trial was such an unjust farce that the man whom he was accused of murdering was in court to testify that he had been killed. After his sentence he visited a photograph gallery under guard and had photos made for his mother and his wife.

REV. M. S. ROYCE.

His family at the North made every effort to save his life without success; but his wife made an appeal to President Davis, which was more successful. Traveling to Richmond from Greeneville, Tenn., in the most inclement January weather, often going afoot in the mud and crawling over the fallen timbers of burned bridges or crossing swollen streams, she at last reached Richmond and saw President Davis, who secured a stay of sentence, holding hostages for his life.

A letter written by Mr. Royce to his mother at that trying time is characteristic of the man. He stated that his imprisonment was not such a misfortune after all, for he had a fellow-prisoner who was a Spaniard with whom he was studying, and that if his execution were delayed for three months he thought he could learn the language in that time. He at last made his escape from prison with three companions one dark, stormy night, February 29, 1864, by cutting a hole in the floor of the cell with a saw made from a case knife. They were hotly pursued; but after many adventures finally reached the Tennessee River in safety, and as soon as possible rejoined their commands.

At the close of the war Mr. Royce brought his family from Alabama to Tennessee, "three hundred miles in a two-horse wagon," only to find when they reached Franklin that their once beautiful home had been utterly destroyed. Their worldly goods consisted of the wagon and horses and a dollar and a half in money. Many doors were opened and kindness shown to them.

Hard years followed, filled with work and privation; but later Mr. Royce took charge of Holy Trinity Church, in South Nashville, his family remaining on the farm. Here he labored beyond his strength in fulfilling the duties of his Church. He taught a day school to increase his earnings and a night school to help boys who could not pay. He established the St. Paul Building Association to enable poor people to obtain a home, and started a small Church in a disreputable suburb of the city. He was very much interested in this work, and the bell was hung in the church the morning he died.

In 1873 Nashville was visited by a serious epidemic of Asiatic cholera, and Mr. Royce was one of the first victims. He went out to see his family Friday, returning Saturday morning, and was entreated by them not to go back on account of the cholera, as he was feeble and worn out; but he refused, saying that he could not desert his people who would need him. He also requested his wife not to come to him in case he was stricken, as she could not reach him in time, would only endanger her own life, and would leave their two young daughters alone and helpless.

Saturday night he sat up with Mrs. Cabler, who died of the dread disease, and Sunday morning he was stricken in the chancel at the time of a morning service. He was taken across the street to the house of Mrs. Fisher, and died there before daylight Monday, June 9. His family never saw him again, as he was buried from his church the same day. His remains rest in beautiful Mount Olivet and his memory in the hearts of his people, for whom he gave his life. In his church they have placed a marble tablet with his name inscribed in gilt letters and below the words: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

He was incapable of accumulating wealth; but he has left the imperishable memory of a good name, which is far better.

On the following page there is an account of Mrs. Royce's trip to Richmond.

TRIP TO RICHMOND IN 1863.

BY SALLY ROYCE WEIR.

[The following narrative is the personal experience of Mrs. Martha A. Royce, the widow of Rev. Moses S. Royce. She is still "unreconstructed." It was written by her daughter, Mrs. Weir was the author of "Three Hundred Miles in a Wagon," although she wrote in her mother's name.]

I was in the home of my father, Dr. Broyles, near Greeneville, Tenn., when I received a letter from my husband telling me that he had been captured by the Federals and was sentenced to be shot. I had been sent away from my home, in Franklin, Tenn., seven months before by Gen. Gordon Granger, who made a public example of me by giving me three days' notice to leave their lines. Another family was also sent out with me, and we were marched between ranks of soldiers, who stood with drawn bayonets to let us pass. It was proposed in this way to strike terror to the hearts of the Rebels who remained.

I pondered long over the letter, and could think of but one thing which might possibly help my husband. If I could only reach Richmond and see President Davis, he might hold a hostage for his life or procure a stay of sentence. I started the next day, taking a soldier cousin and one of my sisters with me. The weather was bitter cold and the roads very bad. We used my father's horses till we reached Mr. De Vault's house, on the Watauga River; but here they had to be sent back, as there was no way to cross them over. We stayed there that night, and it was so cold the next morning that when I wet my hair to brush it the water froze on my head. After breakfast Mr. De Vault said he thought by using great care we could cross the river, as the ice had broken up and was floating in large blocks; but he said he would not allow me to risk it if my errand was not so urgent. He took a negro man and helped me over. I thanked him heartily; and wrapping up well, we tramped across the wide field. They would allow only one of us to cross at a time, and three men were put in the boat with poles to ward off the ice; for if it struck us, it would surely upset our craft. The river was very swift, and we ran with the current, landing far below our starting point. The water tossed the boat like a leaf, and the drifting blocks of ice threatened instant destruction. The men warded it off as well as they could, but sometimes our escape was so narrow that I almost felt the icy waters would close over my head.

When we reached the Holston, it presented another problem in the way of crossing. The bridge had been burned by the soldiers, and the only way left was to climb over the blackened timbers which had fallen and lay helter-skelter in the water. The train was somewhere on the other side; and if we could only cross, most of our troubles would be over. There were plenty of soldiers about and a dozen or more men besides who were searching for the body of a man that had lately been drowned in crossing. His poor father had just arrived to press the search, and he looked so heart-broken that we felt great sympathy for him.

We stood for a while watching some soldiers who were making their perilous way across the timber, and then decided to make the venture. I started on alone, but a soldier came to my side and said: "Allow me to go with you. I will give you what help I can; it is too dangerous for soldiers, let alone women." I gratefully accepted his help, for I was afraid I couldn't get over unaided. We went on slowly together, sometimes climbing over, sometimes under the great, blackened, jagged timbers through which the rushing water boiled and tumbled, covering them in places with an icy spray. Once or twice I slipped, and would have gone under but for the soldier's helping hand. Near the center where the current was the strongest some of the beams had been washed away, and a plank had been thrown across, while below it the water ran as swift as at a mill race. As I went slowly over, holding his hand, he said: "I expect that poor fellow they are hunting is right under us now." It was not a cheering remark at such a critical time.

[When I reached this same place on my return home, I found the broken timbers had been removed and another railroad bridge was in process of construction. It was forty feet high where it spanned the river, and was only partially timbered, with a single foot plank running through the center for the use of the workmen. A number of soldiers and others wanted to cross at the same time as ourselves; so while we were passing over the workmen steadied the frail structure with ropes from each side, about twenty men on a side pulling against each other. We went at a snail's pace, and I dared not look at the dashing water so far below. Just as we were starting one poor soldier who had tried to pass came crawling back along the plank and said: "Don't go on there, ladies; you can't stand it." When we heard a gust of wind coming, we would stop and brace ourselves for the shock, as our frail support rocked back and forth.]

After crossing we held to the course indicated and pushed ahead. The frozen ground had completely thawed, and I have never seen such mud as we had to tramp through. My sister and I had no overshoes and wore congress gaiters with thin soles. Heavy shoes were not made for women in those days.

When we at last reached the top of the hill, we soon arrived at a train waiting. We got rid of as much mud as we could and then climbed aboard. Such a train! Such grimy, dirty, ill-kept cars as these were! They had been overloaded so often that they were bent through the center like an old-fashioned farm wagon bed. But we were not at all fastidious. I had now been a week on the road, and had gone forty miles! We traveled at a very moderate rate of speed until we reached Bristol. Then we were obliged to wait till one o'clock in the night for a train to Richmond.

MRS. MOSES STRONG ROYCE.

When we at last arrived in Richmond, the goal of all my hopes, we had to walk to a hotel, as there were no conveyances. We soon learned that Gen. John Morgan was expected the next day, and there was much anxiety to see him. It was after his escape from Camp Chase Prison.

The city was so crowded that I feared we could not find room anywhere, but at last secured accommodations at the Spottswood Hotel. There were no elevators then, and I dreaded to climb so high as the fifth story; but we had no choice. We were made very comfortable, and as soon as possible I made my wishes known to the President and asked when I could see him.

Very soon I had a number of calls from some of the leading officers, who told me that it would be impossible to see the President until after General Morgan's reception the next day. They complimented me on the courage I had shown, and promised to do anything they possibly could to assist me. In fact, I had so many callers and had to go down the many flights of stairs so often that by night I was almost dead with fatigue and felt that I would not go down again even to see the President!

The next day, as we could do nothing else, we went with the crowd to the City Hall to see Morgan and hear him speak. The streets were covered with a wet, dirty snow which soon turned to slush under the feet of the throng of people who were pouring into the hall. The ladies were shown into a large room. I should say a large proportion of the feminine population of Richmond was present.

After a while a man appeared at the door and said: "Have patience, ladies; the General will be here directly." We had grown restless, when the same smiling man came to the door and said: "Just be quiet, ladies; General Morgan is coming right away." Soon we heard that General Morgan was gone. He had spoken in another place. We determined to go to the hotel and see him. Through slush and snow we waded, with our voluminous crinoline tilting up before and behind us as we crowded together, giving fleeting glimpses of muddy congress gaiters and white stockings. When we reached Morgan's hotel, we took it by storm, and the astonished men who were gathered in the lobby were brushed to one side. We asked no questions; we could trust no man again. One unfortunate was caught ascending the stairs as he went up. He flattened himself against the wall and looked as humble and apologetic as possible!

When we reached the upper corridor, we began to cry: "General Morgan! General Morgan! Where is Morgan? Morgan! Morgan!" At the first call a door opened a little way down and a man's head appeared. It was instantly withdrawn, but too late to save him. We were upon him with the quickness of a cat after a mouse, and the room was filled instantly. Five or six big, fat men were in there who had been refreshing themselves after the fatigue of Morgan's reception, and their dismay at our sudden invasion was laughable. "I assure you, ladies, that General Morgan is not here. His room is farther down the corridor. He will be happy to see you," said one as they huddled together against the wall, pushed there by the stern, unsmiling crowd of offended women. We got out of their room, and then another door opened farther on, and General Morgan appeared with his wife by his side, and both stood smiling and pleased to receive us. The angry buzzing of the crowd changed instantly to a satisfied hum, and we began to pass in line before them, each one receiving a handclasp and a word of greeting from them both.

How well I remember the erect, soldierly figure in his handsome gray uniform, looking every inch a gentleman as well as a soldier, with his clear, piercing eye, his pleasant smile, the warm grasp of his hand, and a resolute look of courage, dash, and determination which I find it hard to put into words. He gave me the impression of one to whom fear was unknown and who could be trusted to act with promptness and wisdom in any emergency. He had just passed through the terrible ordeal of a Yankee prison, and the graceful wife by his side looked very happy. How little I thought as I took his hand that in less than nine months he was to be murdered within a few miles of my father's home, my birthplace! As long as a son or a daughter of the South remains his memory will be loved and honored, and his brave deeds will live forever in the pages of history. God's peace be with him, for he was a noble gentleman!

The next day we went by appointment to see President Davis, for I was tormented with the urgency of my errand, and grudged every moment that I was compelled to lose. It was bitterly cold again and the ground white. At the Capitol we found everything under strict military guard, and the most zealous scrutiny was made of all strangers who came; for every one was under suspicion, as the President's life was always in great danger. We were admitted into a large ante-room in which were his military staff, and they seemed very cold and formal. I saw President Davis for only a few moments; but I obtained the promise of help for which I had traveled so far and suffered so much, and he assured me that everything possible would be done at once.

The President was dressed in a gray suit, and was tall and thin, with the grave ascetic face which his pictures always gave him. He looked pale, careworn, and not very strong. I presume he must have had at that time some presentiment of the coming end of the struggle which we could not have, for at that time we never doubted that we would win.

I had now done all it was possible for a woman to accomplish, and my husband's fate must be left in the hands of high officials; so after trying to shop in stores which were almost empty and filling as well as I could the many commissions with which I had been charged, we turned our faces homeward, to brave the trials and hardships of the journey.

J. J. Bolton writes from Demopolis, Ala., of his collection of war relics, among which are several that he would like to return to their original owners if they can be found. A sword that was left with a young lady near Demopolis by a Missouri captain can be obtained by the owner by giving his name and address and name of the young lady. The letters "C. S. A." are engraved on the blade and hand guard. He would also like to return a set of draughtsman's instruments, a candlestick, and an account book belonging to Theophilus Williams, Lafayette County, Mo., which was left by R. O. ## MORE ABOUT C. S. A. BREECH-LOADING CANNON.

In a letter to Capt. Theo F. Allen, Cincinnati, J. W. Minnich, Grand Isle, La., writes: "I saw one gun (I cannot state just where it was) which was a breechloader all right. It was a small affair on wheels which a strong man could 'tote.' The barrel was not more than four feet in length. The bore was about three-quarters of an inch, possibly one inch. The cartridges were dumped or placed in a boxlike receptacle attached to the breech and in which was an arrangement operated by a crank whereby the cartridges were fed into the gun with an automatic shell ejector. The parties having it in charge stated that it would throw three hundred shots a minute. The man operating the crank also sighted the gun through a quarter-inch slit in a shield about eighteen inches square fitted to the gun to protect the manipulator. Owing to some part of the running gear being out of commission, the gun was awaiting transportation to the gun hospital. Its effective range was stated to be twelve hundred yards. I have never seen any other like it, and was told that it was the only one of its kind in existence, then simply a sample."

Captain Allen (439 Race Street, Cincinnati) writes in regard to it: "If other ex-Confederates know anything regarding breech-loading cannon used during the Civil War, I would be pleased to hear from them."

SITE OF FORT PILLOW IN MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

[The Bolivar (Tenn.) Bulletin.]

Thirty acres of land in one huge mass caved into the Mississippi River at the site of old Fort Pillow, about fifty miles north of Memphis. Without the slightest warning of the impending catastrophe the big section of earth toppled into the sluggish current. The rending and groaning as the landslide took place was heard for miles, and caused consternation among the negroes of the vicinity.

The bluff where the slide took place is nearly two hundred feet high. The river has been extremely low, and the current, taking a new direction, had evidently cut far back under the bank, and the slide resulted. By the time the enormous mass of earth had reached the surface of the river in its fall it was moving with considerable velocity. The result was to send a great tidal wave sweeping across the river.

On the opposite shore is Butler, Ark., and along the banks were moored a number of house boats. The towering wall of water picked these up as if they were feathers and tossed them topsy-turvy into the willows that lined the bank. The willows were of a dense growth, and largely broke the force of the big wave. The water, however, spread over the lowlands, inundating acres of cotton fields.

As the water receded the house boats were left high and dry on the bank. Some are still in the willows, their owners finding it impossible to get them back into the river until a way is chopped. On the land that disappeared into the river were a number of old cannon that have remained at Fort Pillow, and no trace of them has yet been discovered.

THE LEES-McRAE INSTITUTE, PLUMTREE, N. C.

BY THE DAUGHTER OF A C. S. A. CAPTAIN.

The Lees-McRae Institute, a Christian industrial school for the boys of our Southern mountains, was started as a primary school in 1903 without capital and with one lady and one student teacher. By it a veritable wilderness has been converted into a clean, thrifty, and Christian neighborhood.

The first year a dormitory was erected, the money having been given by three friends, two of whom live at Plumtree and the other residing elsewhere, who gave one thousand dollars toward it. The next year an academy building, which includes an auditorium, an excellently fitted laboratory, and three class rooms, was added, and the year following still another building at Plumtree and two primary school buildings in the adjacent country. Last May a farm containing four hundred acres was purchased, and there twelve boys have lived, helping to supply the school table and at the same time plodding along nobly with their education.

In September a large number came into the school, and worked that month with such earnestness and zest that this bade fair to be the brightest year of the five. And although the dormitory, which housed about forty people, burned to the ground at the end of that first month, the academic department has not suffered, and the students are still doing splendid work. These boys accepted the great loss of the dormitory building in a calm and beautiful manner, and instead of discouragement each is enthusiastic and is doing his part in the way of rebuilding.

This peculiar little mountain school was at first made up of small children, then of larger-sized girls and boys, and now entirely of boys. There is a sister school at Banner Elk for girls in domestic training and general culture.

The boys at Plumtree are under military discipline at all times. In the afternoons, instead of athletics, all are engaged in industrial work. The standard of academic instruction is perhaps higher than can be found in remote regions.

The outcome of this test of the native capacity of the people who live in our mountains is beginning to be seen in some of the students who are found in government positions, in electrical work, as lumber inspectors, and gospel workers. The moral training goes along side by side with the mental and physical, and no boy without the right material in him cares to remain in this school. This training has truly meant the redemption of the village. To it the people owe their inspiration and happiness.

The present plan is to have a much larger school for older boys only, those who will reach out to the needy people of the mountains and teach them the lessons they have learned, and to this end every effort is being made to rebuild and enlarge the capacity. There is no lack of students; they are anxiously waiting to come. There is a lack of facilities. A boy's education for one year is possible with fifty-six dollars, while $2,000 will build and furnish a home for forty boys.

Plumtree is in Mitchell County and Banner Elk in Watauga, both adjoining Carter County, Tenn., noted as the north-eastern county; hence the saying, "From Carter to Shelby."

THE COLUMBIA POST, G. A. R., ISSUES "IN MEMORIAM" TO GEN. S. D. LEE.—The G. A. R. Post, Chicago, in an extended tribute to the memory of Gen. S. D. Lee, states: "With little warning our Southern sister commonwealth, Mississippi, recently sustained the loss of her highly appreciated son, the courageous, courtly, cultured Gen. Stephen D. Lee. On several occasions General Lee complimented this Post by paying us a visit as a representative of Confederate Veterans, and what a sweet fraternizing spirit he exhibited! Tributes to him have come to us through a quondam comrade who served with him on the Vicksburg Commission flattering in the extreme. Most harmoniously he worked with the Northern Commissioners. With deepest regret we abide by the decree that removed him. To-night we officially, as a Grand Army organization, tender his comfortless family—a member of which lives here—a generous measure of our sorrow over his loss to dear ones left behind."

CONVENTION KENTUCKY DIVISION, U. D. C.

On October 13 delegates from all parts of the State assembled in historic Bardstown for the twelfth annual State Convention. Reports from the many Chapters evidenced the increasing interest and desire to perpetuate the memories of our Southern heroes.

The Albert Sidney Johnston Chapter, of Louisville, sent the largest delegation. It represented five hundred and fifty members. The Richard Hawes Chapter, of Paris, had the honor of furnishing the State President, Mrs. W. G. Talbot, a daughter of the famous old county of Bourbon. Her address was replete with just and beautiful tributes to the Southland and its heroes. She ruled with becoming grace, and was highly complimented upon the fairness of her decisions.

Bardstown is a beautiful though small place and the third oldest in the State. Its educational advantages are superior and its historical record is cherished by every patriotic Kentuckian. The people are hospitable and generous, and were unstinted in their efforts to make the visit of the Daughters most enjoyable. The hand of welcome was extended many miles from this town by a committee of ladies who met the incoming Daughters and assigned each to a home.

Bardstown was the home of some of Kentucky's most famous lawyers, jurists, and statesmen, among whom might be mentioned Hon. Benjamin Hardin, Judge John Rowan, Hon. Felix Grundy, Charles A. Wickliff, Col. William N. Beckham, Gov. Charles R. Morehead, Gov. William Johnson, Gov. William P. Duval, Col. G. W. Connor, and is the birthplace of Gov. T. C. W. Beckham. It was also the home of the inventor of steamboats, John Fitch, who lived and died in Bardstown. His remains now repose in the "Old Cemetery." Louis Philippe, the exiled king of France, resided in Bardstown for more than a year, and afterwards made several valuable presents to the St. Joseph Church, which is the most historical as well as the most beautiful Catholic church in the State. Nazareth, the Catholic school taught by the Catholic sisters, and considered to afford the greatest facilities for the education of young ladies of any school of its kind in the world, is located within two miles of Bardstown.

The Convention closed after two days' sessions, and then the hostesses ordered carriages and conveyed their visiting delegates to the important points of interest. Two beautiful receptions were given, adding the old-time Southern hospitality here so cordially dispensed.

The officers for the current year are: Mrs. William G. Talbot, President; Mrs. M. B. Reynolds, Mrs. Polk Prince, and Mrs. M. D. Bond, Vice Presidents; Miss Mayme Geary, Recording Secretary; Miss Lucy Colville, Corresponding Secretary; Mrs. W. H. Escott, Treasurer; Mrs. A. M. Sea, Historian; Mrs. Jennie Catherwood, Chaplain; Mrs. J. M. Arnold, Recorder of Crosses.

MONUMENT AT THOMASTON, GA.

Mrs. Julia Davis Yates, Recording Secretary of the Shannon of Upson Chapter, U. D. C., writes that the Chapter was organized in 1905 and that it has seventy-five members, the majority of whom are enthusiastic, earnest workers.

The Chapter unveiled their handsome monument April 26. It is dedicated to the Confederate soldiers of Upson County.

AT DEDICATION OF THE MONUMENT.

Mrs. Yates writes: "We have labored patiently but untiringly to this end, and without a dollar of debt we dedicated our monument. Memorial Day is always held sacred in the hearts of our members. The birthdays of Lee and Davis were fittingly observed. Crosses of honor were presented on both occasions. While our work for the past two years has been for a monument, we have contributed to various calls. We expect to use our fund on hand now for an educational purpose. We are ready at all times to do all in our power for the comfort and pleasure of the 'dear old boys in gray.'"

INQUIRY BY AND ABOUT VETERANS.

H. M. Zorn, Walnut Ridge, Ark.: "In looking over a diary I kept during the war I find that on the 29th of November, 1864, I was in the fort at Columbia, Tenn., with some Georgians. Amongst them were J. P. Thornton and Capt. A. J. West, from Stovall's Brigade. The next day we were on the march together with Hood's army to Franklin, Tenn., where the bloodiest battle of the war was fought. As we rode upon the field approaching Franklin, about 3 P.M. on November 30, the Yankee bombshells were flying thick and fast. One of them exploded over us, killing Thornton's horse, wounding me in the foot, and Captain West in the head and hand. My recollection is that Thornton was a courier and Captain West was serving on Gen. Carter L. Stevenson's staff. I would like to know if these comrades are still living; and as the CONFEDERATE VETERAN goes everywhere in the South, I know of no better way of finding out than asking through it."

RESPONSE BY COMRADE WEST.

The advanced copy of a letter you received from Comrade Zorn, of Arkansas, stirs most sacred recollections of the past.

I remember as clearly as if it had happened yesterday the events that occurred at Columbia and Franklin, Tenn., mentioned in Comrade Zorn's letter. I remember in that connection, in addition to those mentioned, that there were Lieut. Henry B. Tompkins and Maj. John P. C. Whitehead. Major Whitehead was adjutant general of Stovall's Brigade.

The J. P. Thornton mentioned was my boyhood friend in Troup County. He survived the war and lived the life of a useful citizen in LaGrange, Ga., where he died a few years ago. His daughter married Judge E. C. Kontz, of Atlanta, one of our most successful and prominent attorneys. Lieut. Henry B. Tompkins became United States Judge of the Savannah District, and afterwards moved to Atlanta and became my neighbor on Peachtree Street, where he died a few years since. Maj. John P. C. Whitehead is still living near Augusta, Ga.

Mr. Zorn's letter furnishes another evidence of the great usefulness of the VETERAN in furnishing avenues for information from one Confederate to another that cannot be obtained in any other way.

I am writing to Mr. Zorn, but cannot forego the pleasure of telling you how highly I appreciate his letter.

If Comrade Zorn were living east of the Mississippi, he would already have known of "Lientenant West," for he has been most prominent in Confederate matters. He has served as Commander of the North Georgia Brigade and as Major General of the Georgia Division, United Confederate Veterans, and as quartermaster general and United States disbursing officer for the State of Georgia.

MOSES EZEKIEL ON A STATUE OF JACKSON.

An interesting letter comes from H. C. Ezekiel, of Cincinnati, Ohio, in reference to the work of his brother, Sir Moses Ezekiel, so well known as a sculptor of great genius. He is now at work on a statue of Gen. T. J. (Stonewall) Jackson, to be erected at Charleston, W. Va., and desires to get good photographs or other portraits of General Jackson, with data as to his uniform, accouterments, etc., that will be useful to him. Any response to this should be sent to Mr. Ezekiel at 334 Main Street, Cincinnati.

Mr. Ezekiel writes: "I was quite a boy at the time of the war, and served only in the Home Guards; but my brother Moses was a cadet at the Virginia Military Institute, at Lexington, and graduated from there. He was in the army from the time the institute was burned by Hunter, and was in the battle of New Market, where the cadets distinguished themselves. You may possibly know of him as an American sculptor of some renown. My brother, E. M. Ezekiel, was a member of the Richmond Light Infantry Blues, one of the oldest military organizations in the United States, and served during the entire period of the war."

The author of the above illustrates a fact that should be impressed upon the readers of the VETERAN who believe in it by the statement: "I regret very much indeed that I did not know of the publication before this time, as I should have been interested in it. I should like to have sent copies to relatives. I herewith send check for $3 as subscriptions to —."

EASTERN SHORE OF VIRGINIA CONFEDERATES.

BY T. C. KELLEY, ADJUTANT OF CAMP 651, U. C. V., HALLWOOD, VA.

[Accomac and Northampton Counties compose the Eastern Shore of Virginia. The Chesapeake Bay separates these two counties from the rest of the State. This bay is thirty miles wide and one hundred and fifty miles long. The eastern shore is a peninsula eighty miles long and ten to fifteen miles wide. During the war the Federal government had blockading vessels in all our creeks and rivers, and our only chance to reach Dixie's land was to run by these blockade boats in little canoes and skiffs; so the chances were very hazardous. Nevertheless about five hundred crossed and took part in the hard struggle. Please look on the Virginia map and see our peninsula lying between Chesapeake Bay on the west and the Atlantic Ocean on the east.]

I am a Confederate veteran who served through the war, from April, 1861, to April, 1865, ending service at Appomattox. My company surrendered fourteen men under the second sergeant, J. W. Ryland, all commissioned officers having been killed, wounded, or captured. I walked from Appomattox to Richmond and then to Mathews County. There I took passage in a yawl sixteen feet long and crossed the Chesapeake Bay to my father's, in Accomac, the extreme eastern county of Virginia, eight miles from the Maryland line. I arrived at home on May 8, 1865, having been absent four years and sixteen days. I had received two wounds. One bullet entered my breast just above the heart and was taken out from under the shoulder blade. Three months after that I received the second bullet. It struck just under the heart and passed out through the lower part of the shoulder blade, which paralyzed the left shoulder and arm down to the elbow, and it has ever remained so.

In 1885 the veterans of the Eastern Shore of Virginia organized the Harmanson-West Camp No. 651, U. C. V. The membership was three hundred and twenty-seven. They and friends went to work to raise money and erect a monument to the memory of their fallen comrades. After eight years of hard work and much discouragement, on November 1, 1896, the Camp assembled at the town of Parksley, on the New York, Philadelphia, and Norfolk Railroad, and in the presence of thousands of people Miss West, a sister of Lieut. Otho K. West, one for whom the Camp is named, unveiled a beautiful monument of Vermont gray granite thirty feet from base to top of Confederate soldier at parade rest.

Dr. Frank Fletcher was elected Commander in 1885 (he has been reelected at every election since), John H. Wise, J. W. Broughton, and A. J. Lilliston Lieutenant Commanders, and G. G. Savage Adjutant.

After the completion of the monument, the Camp declined in interest and ceased to meet for business.

In 1903 Commander Fletcher appointed the writer Adjutant of the Camp. Since that time I have worked hard to revive it and get it into working order again. The Camp had never joined the U. C. V. nor the Grand Camp of Virginia. I could not get any meeting of the Camp; but I paid dues in the Grand Camp of Virginia and a charter fee; also secured a charter for the Camp in the State Division, U. C. V., and a charter in the U. C. V. from Adjutant General W. E. Mickle. I have continued to pay dues and represent the Camp at Division Reunions and national Reunions. I have had a good time all to myself representing the Camp at the various Reunions. Birmingham capped the climax of all the Reunions I have ever attended. I had the good fortune to go in the car with Mrs. J. Griff Edwards and her Confederate Choir. They gave us a delightful entertainment all the way to Birmingham and back to Portsmouth, Va. God bless them!

On March 28, 1907, I called a meeting of the Camp at Onley, and invited all the sons of veterans and daughters of veterans to meet with us. Many did so, and we organized a Camp of U. S. C. V. and a Chapter of U. D. C. Mrs. George W. Nelms, of Newport News, came over and organized the Accomac Camp, U. S. C. V., and the Jefferson Davis Chapter, U. D. C. This Chapter is progressing finely, and I am proud of it. The Accomac Camp is not making much progress. On April 8, 1908, I called a meeting of the Camp of Veterans at Cape Charles, where thirty-seven veterans answered the roll, and we transacted much business. We organized by reelecting Dr. Frank Fletcher Commander, Teackle T. Wescott, H. H. Wilkins, and P. O. Twyford Lieutenant Commanders, and T. C. Kelley Adjutant.

The Camp decided to hold annual Reunions, the first Reunion to be at Parksley on October 1, 1908. Dr. Frank Fletcher's wife called for all eligible daughters of Confederate veterans to meet at Jenkins Bridge, in Upper Accomac, on May 25, 1908, to organize a U. D. C. Chapter. Mrs. Frank Anthony Walke, of Norfolk, Va., came over, organized it, and named it the Dixie Chapter. This is a live organization. In August we advertised and talked up the proposed Reunion, and the Commander and his comrades were gratified and delighted to see so large an assemblage. From three thousand to five thousand people had assembled about the Confederate monument. At 11:30 o'clock the Portsmouth express train arrived with Mrs. J. Griff Edwards and her Confederate Choir on board. The Convention was called to order by Dr. Fletcher, and the invocation was delivered by the Chaplain, Rev. John W. Hundley. Then there was music by the Confederate Choir, led by Mrs. Edwards, and by the Firemen's Band. The address of welcome on behalf of the town of Parksley was by Rev. Mr. Clayton. Rev. Mr. Taylor, an old veteran, delivered an address in reply to the address of welcome, followed by "Dixie," led by Mrs. Edwards.

Judge Mann, of Nottoway, Va., delivered the oration of the day. He told how his comrades fought, suffered, and died for Dixie's land. After this there was music by the Confederate Choir, and Mrs. Edwards and her Choir sang "Dixie" with their souls in it, and as they finished the Rebel yell broke out.

Mrs. C. R. Waters recited very beautifully a poem "Faithful unto Death," written especially for this Reunion by Rev. Dr. Bowen and dedicated to those slain in battle from the Eastern Shore of Virginia. Capt. A. S. Marye, a veteran of Richmond, Va., delivered a short address on "The War as It Was," in which he received the close attention of the audience. At 8 P.M. there was a musical "Extravaganza" in Hopkins Hall given by the Confederate Choir. I could not describe this grand entertainment. Those glorious old songs of Dixie's land carried the old veterans off their base, as those daughters of Dixie put their souls into those old war songs.

This Reunion has awakened anew the old boys who wore the gray. One hundred and five old veterans belong to the Camp. We have lost by death two hundred and twenty-one. Most of those living were at the Reunion. A few were too feeble to attend. Of these, I mention Col. Winchester Hall, who commanded the 26th Louisiana Regiment, and is ninety years old.

The VETERAN is my Confederate Bible, and I wish your subscription list may grow to hundreds of thousands.

HOW GEN. A. S. JOHNSTON DIED.

[John P. Broome, in Arkansas Gazette.]

I am the only living man who saw Albert Sidney Johnston die. On Saturday, the day preceding the battle, I was detached from my company of the Georgia Hussars and made courier to General Johnston. About noon on Sunday, the day of the battle, I was riding with General Johnston, Dr. Yandell, and Governor Harris, of Tennessee, when we came upon a group of wounded Federal prisoners. General Johnston ordered Dr. Yandell to look after them; but Dr. Yandell objected, stating that he should stay with the General, when General Johnston replied: "These men are suffering. I command you to stay here and attend to them." So the Doctor stayed with the wounded prisoners.

About two hours after that, when we had been fighting all the time and the bullets were thick, General Johnston turned to Governor Harris and said: "General Hurlburt is mighty stubborn." Then he rode around in front of the brigade, and when only about one hundred and fifty steps from the Illinois men under Hurlburt he took off his hat—a soft black hat with the sweeping plume in it. He was the handsomest man that ever wore uniform. While the bullets flew thick about him he smiled quietly and spoke to his men. "Boys," he said, "General Hurlburt seems to be mighty stubborn. We'll have to see what we can do with the bayonet. I don't tell you to go, but I ask you to come with me." And he went thirty or forty paces ahead of his men.

Nothing could have withstood that charge. Hurlburt's Brigade was broken into tatters. But those Illinois troops were good soldiers, and they gathered in little groups as they ran and loaded and fired while running. It was a shot from one of these groups that hit General Johnston. The first I knew that he was hit was when Governor Harris remarked that General Johnston was wounded, and General Johnston replied: "Yes, fatally, I believe."

Under Governor Harris's directions I lifted General Johnston from his horse and laid him upon the ground. But he never said another word, dying two minutes afterwards. When Dr. Yandell came, he broke down and cried. If the Doctor had been where he should, instead of with those Federal prisoners, General Johnston would never have died. Dr. Yandell said the wound was not necessarily fatal.

I stayed with the body until Governor Harris sent me to the rear with a message to General Beauregard, who succeeded to the command.

THE TRUE STORY OF A SOUTHERN BOY.

BY WILLIE HAYWODE JENNINGS—THIRTEEN YEARS OLD.

My uncle, Clarence Malone, was attending the University of Mississippi when war was declared between the States. He wrote home that he was going to war with the "University Grays," but grandfather told him to come home and go with the "Columbus Riflemen." He did this, and I expect there were many sad hearts when he left. As he was a private, he could not take his servant, Matt; so he arranged with the captain that Matt should go and wait on them both.

The company was ordered to Bowling Green, Ky., where, in throwing up breastworks, he found after digging sixteen feet down some seashells and sharks' teeth. He filled a bag with these things and sent them home to his mother. I have them now. In his first battle he was captured and sent to Camp Douglas, near Chicago. To amuse himself, he cut the buttons from his coat and carved them into rings and crosses. One of the rings has a rose on it; another a heart and star made out of a silver dime. He carved them with a penknife.

After staying at Camp Douglas a year, these Southern boys were exchanged for some Northern prisoners. They were put on a flatboat and sent down the Mississippi River in the hot sun. When grandfather met them in Memphis, the skin was peeling off of their hands, necks, and faces.

After resting a while at home, Clarence joined Company C, of the 10th Tennessee Regiment. They were such good fighters that they were called the "Bloody Tenth." They did not have to fight all of the time, however, for in his letters he would tell of the girls he met and of the parties he went to.

In the battle of Chickamauga he was kneeling by his captain's side when a shell came by and took the captain's head off of his shoulders. Now there was no one to lead them; so Clarence waved his sword and cried: "Follow me!" As he was first lieutenant, he was made captain, and he certainly did lead his men bravely. He went in with a full company and came out with six men. Judging from his picture, he was very handsome, and caused many heartaches among the ladies.

But this is enough, as we know the South was overpowered with numbers; so let us say with Father Ryan in his poem, "The Conquered Banner:"

"Furl that Banner, softly, slowly!
Treat it gently—it is holy,
For it droops above the dead.
Touch it not—unfold it never;
Let it droop there, furled forever,
For its people's hopes are fled!"

ARKANSAS DIVISION, U. C. V.

Capt. J. F. Smith, of Little Rock, is the new Major General commanding the Arkansas Division, U. C. V. He was elected at the annual State Convention in Little Rock to succeed Ex-Senator James H. Berry, who commanded the Division for two years. Captain Smith is just sixty-five years of age. He enlisted in the Arkansas State troops in June, 1861, and was in the battle of Oak Hill. Soon thereafter the State troops were disbanded, and he reënlisted at Fayetteville in October, 1861. After the battle of Elkhorn, in March, 1862, he went with his command east of the Mississippi River under General Price. He was in the battle of Corinth and other severe battles, such as Iuka, Grand Gulf, and Baker's Creek, and was under fire many times in smaller skirmishes. He was in the siege of Vicksburg and surrendered July 4, 1863. He came back across the Mississippi River, and in September, 1863, organized a company in Washington and Madison Counties and became its captain, and served in that capacity until the troops finally surrendered.

The new Division Commander has been twice married, the second marriage being with Mrs. C. A. Forney, an active worker in the Confederate cause. She was the first President of the Arkansas Division, U. D. C.

The Convention was called to order by General Berry. The opening prayer was by Rt. Rev. J. M. Lucey, of Pine Bluff, Chaplain of the Division. The address of welcome was delivered by Chief Justice J. M. Hill and the response was by General Berry. The memorial address was delivered by Rev. T. E. Sharp, D.D., pastor of the First Methodist Church, South.

The memorial address of Dr. Sharp was not only cheered to the echo, but the veterans passed a resolution requesting the minister to prepare the address for publication. He recounted the many hardships of the Confederate soldier and paid him a high eulogy as a soldier of honor and heroism. Dr. Sharp discoursed upon the immortality of the soul, and said the man who gave his life for principle would be rewarded in the hereafter if he should not be rewarded here.

The Convention adopted a resolution providing for the appointment of a general committee to help in raising funds for the memorial to the women of the Confederacy. The resolution favored that Arkansas should promptly and generously act to secure this memorial to the women who were "an inspiration to the brave, a spur to the laggard, and a whip of scorn to the unfaithful. The committee to be appointed by General Smith is authorized to represent the Confederate veterans before the Arkansas Legislature and ask for such assistance as may show the State's appreciation of the "godlike heroism of the women of Arkansas."

Brigade Commanders were chosen as follows: J. R. Johnson, Hickory Plains, First; Dr. W. A. Brown, Monticello, Second; Col. W. W. Folsom, Arkadelphia, Third; W. P. George, Berryville, Fourth.

CAPT. THOMAS L. MASSENBURG.

BY CAPT. R. E. PARK (STATE TREASURER), FORMERLY OF MACON, GA.

Thomas Lowry Massenburg was the eldest son of William Massenburg and his wife, Ann Wythe Lowry, and was born in Elizabeth City County, Va., February 9, 1836. He was educated at Carey's Academy, Hampton, Va., and soon after finishing there entered the Pharmaceutical College in Philadelphia, where he graduated with distinction in 1857. Immediately upon his graduation he went to Savannah, Ga., to accept a position as pharmacist in probably the largest drug store in the South. He was married in St. John's Episcopal Church, Savannah, to Miss Rosalie E. Stiles, on April 17, 1860. Eleven children were born of this union, five of whom survive—namely, Mrs. Capt. E. V. White, of Portsmouth, Va., Charles Rebel, Miss Rosa, Lloyd, and Frank Johnson, of Massenburg.

Captain Massenburg moved in 1861 to Macon, Ga., where he joined his father, who moved to Macon from Hampton, Va., about the same time, and engaged in the wholesale and retail drug business. Scarcely had he become established in his new home when he gave up everything to enter the Confederate service.

The career of this splendid gentleman in the Confederate army was highly creditable to him, and will always be the subject of pride to his children and grandchildren. He entered the artillery service; and after many engagements where he conspicuously exhibited his superb gallantry and devotion to duty, he became the captain of his battery, and the Jackson Artillery was changed in name to "Massenburg Battery." The care and protection which he gave to his splendid command of artillerymen is explained fully by the following anecdote showing his love of justice and his unwillingness to inflict disgraceful punishment upon one of his command, though a violator of one of the regulations of the army.

Beyond the members of the Massenburg Battery, it was not known that the late Captain Massenburg was once reprimanded, and that by the colonel of his regiment, during the war. The incident can now be told, and it illustrates the kind feelings the old soldier entertained for his "boys," as he called the members of his company.

While in camp in Tennessee a member of his company was found guilty of violating one of the regulations of the army. The sentence of the court-martial, which followed, was that the man should be strung up by the thumbs for a considerable length of time. This was the punishment sometimes inflicted.

and it had been seen by the captain, who received his orders from headquarters to have this sentence on one of his men carried out. Several days passed and the sentence was not carried out as ordered. The failure becoming known to his superior officers, an orderly was sent to the battery directing Captain Massenburg to "report at the big tent." Dressed in his full suit of gray, the tall and straight captain reported and stood erect before the commanding officer.

"Captain, did you receive orders to punish Private Blank, of your company?"

"I did, sir," with the proper salute.

"Then, sir, you must do your duty."

Without a word, but with the proper salute, the captain about-faced and returned to his battery.

One, two, three days passed and the sentence was still not carried out, and again came the orderly for the captain to report at regimental headquarters. Again the captain donned his uniform and stood before the colonel as erect as before.

"Have my orders been carried out, Captain Massenburg, to have Private Blank punished according to the sentence of the court-martial?" asked the commander.

"They have not, sir," with the salute.

"Why not, sir?" thundered the officer in tones that boded no good to the captain, but did not frighten him.

"Because I shall not submit for one of my men to be punished in that cruel manner," and again the respectful salute.

Instantly the captain was ordered to give up his sword and consider himself under arrest. He was given a tent near headquarters. Late in the afternoon an aid was sent to Captain Massenburg to ask if he was ready to obey orders.

"Not that order," said the captain. His release soon followed, the commanding officer being convinced that Captain Massenburg would not string one of his men up by the thumbs.

The captain and his commanding officer did not speak until after the battle that occurred sometime afterwards. It was the colonel who spoke first, and it was to congratulate the captain upon his splendid display of courage. Before the close of the war they were fast friends.

This incident will be remembered by the few of the old battery who are here to bow their heads over the grave of that glorious old soldier, their old captain.

Publication of the death of Captain Massenburg, while not wholly unexpected by his anxious friends and admirers at home, caused a shock in Macon and throughout Georgia and to friends elsewhere. There was an expression of genuine, unfeigned sorrow from all classes of people. It had been known for some time that this gallant soldier and courteous gentleman was in declining health; but when, after long absence, he appeared at his office in the City Hall (having been for years Clerk of the City Council of Macon, Ga.) and his cheerful salutation was heard by his numerous friends who called to greet him, the hope came that he would be himself again; but a few days thereafter he remained at home, believing that the inevitable was near, and finally the stroke of paralysis which resulted in his death came.

Few men in Macon or in Georgia commanded the love and respect of his fellow-men to a greater degree than did Capt. T. L. Massenburg. He was my long personal, devoted friend, and I loved him as a brother. During the thirty-five years of my residence in Macon I knew him intimately, and it was our delight to meet and talk over the heroic days of the Confederate war and the dreadful days of reconstruction. Through it all he was the patriot, the soldier, and the officer sans peur et sans reproche. His manly bearing and gallant conduct on all occasions were consistent with his heroism as a soldier. In Chickamauga Park there is a graven stone which marks his name and the spot where Massenburg's Battery of Artillery stayed the fearful onslaught of the enemy during the great battle at that place.

The living members of his command bear eloquent testimony to the fact that no braver man, no truer hero, no more loving or devoted commander ever drew a sword in defense of his country.

After the war, when he became a private citizen, those qualities that made him a prince among soldiers made him a prince among men. He was the soul of honor; he was a thorough gentleman in its fullest, truest sense.

In 1900 he was elected Clerk of the City Council of Macon, which position he continually held with satisfaction.

Sacred be the memory of my beloved friend.

In the "War Records" there is frequent mention of Captain Massenburg. In a report by Brig. Gen. R. L. Gibson while operating on the eastern shore of Mobile Bay mention is made of Captain Massenburg with other commanders "for skill and courage, rendering valuable service not only on land but against the fleet."

AT MURFREESBORO JUST BEFORE THE BATTLE.

[The following reminiscence was written some years ago for a Nashville paper by Charles E. Robert, now deceased.]

I wish I were able to faithfully picture the scenes I witnessed at Murfreesboro on that most eventful Christmas day, 1862, just preceding the bloody battle of Stone's River.

The armies of the Union and the armies of the ill-starred Confederacy lay like crouching tigers, expectant of a battle—the one intrenched at Nashville, the other camped on the open plains of Rutherford.

The Federal general, Rosecrans, ordered a forward movement, and with drums beating and bands playing and the bugles sounding the inspiring call "to saddle" under the starry banner of our now united and happy country seventy thousand soldiers of the Federal Union took up the line of march along the turnpike that led out south from Nashville. This was the pageant that those on the "successful side" saw that day. Let us look at the other.

On Christmas eve the officers of the 1st Louisiana Confederate Regulars and the officers of Hanson's famous 2d Kentucky Confederate Regiment gave a ball at the courthouse in Murfreesboro, which proved a magnificent affair. The beauty and the fashion of Middle Tennessee and many distinguished Confederate officers were present. The decorations were handsome. How well I remember them, although but a tiny lad, doing service in General Bragg's escort, under Col. Hypolite Oladowski, the chief of ordnance! Among the decorations on the walls I noticed four large "B's" constructed of cedar and evergreens—Beauregard, Bragg, Buckner, and Breckinridge. Over the windows were the names Pensacola, Donelson, Shiloh, Santa Rosa, and Hartsville, all entwined in cedar, these names representing victories the 1st Louisiana and 2d Kentucky had gained. Conspicuous in the hall were numerous captured United States flags, with the union down, the starry field reversed—trophies belonging to Gen. John H. Morgan, and furnished for the occasion by his newly made bride, the beautiful Miss Mattie Ready. General Morgan's wedding had occurred the month previous, and even during his honeymoon he had fought and won the battle of Hartsville, and brought back as trophies the regimental banners of the 104th Illinois and the 106th and 108th Ohio Infantry. It was therefore a most joyous occasion, and the grim soldiers laid aside their bloody occupations for the smiles and favors of the fairest of the Southern beauties. Chivalry was there, and the sounds of revelry by night seemed to reproduce the dawn of the fateful day that hung over "Belgium's capital."

In what strong contrast there comes the announcement of five military executions the next day—one by hanging and the rest by shooting! The first was a spy, a traitor, and a thief named Gray. The crime charged to the other four was desertion. Never will I forget the horrible execution of a young Kentucky soldier, a member of Captain Page's company, of the 2d Kentucky Regiment, whose officers the night before had given the ball in the Murfreesboro courthouse. His home was in Barren County, Ky., near Glasgow, and his family were noted for their wealth, culture, and high social standing. His mother, a widow in affluent circumstances, doted on this boy with all the inexpressible love and tenderness that fills a true mother's heart, and he was the idol of her life. During the famous raid made by General Bragg's army into Kentucky the young man, on furlough, went to his home and remained with his mother several weeks. When Bragg returned from that section, he rejoined his command, and was accounted by all his comrades a brave and dutiful soldier. Shortly after the Confederate army reached Murfreesboro he received intelligence that the enraged Federals had set fire to his mother's house, destroyed her beautiful homestead, and turned her out upon the cold charities of a pitiless world. He at once went to the colonel of his regiment and requested leave of absence to go to his mother and have her comfortably placed, promising to return in thirty days and rejoin his comrades. It being on the eve of battle, his colonel refused to recommend his application. Next he went to the brigade commander, then to the division general, and finally to General Bragg himself. His efforts were fruitless. Turning from General Bragg with flushed face and hot rebellion in his heart, he exclaimed through clinched teeth: "I will go, General Bragg, if you have me hanged for it."

This act of mutiny and insubordination greatly enraged the sternest disciplinarian of the Confederacy; and calling the guard, General Bragg at once ordered the young man's arrest and had him sent to the guardhouse, manacled with ball and chain. Two nights after the prisoner made his escape, and set out on foot for his Kentucky home. A squad of cavalry was sent in pursuit, and overtook him just as he had crossed the Tennessee boundary line near Scottsville. He was brought back, tried by court-martial, and condemned to be shot. Christmas day at twelve o'clock the order was carried into effect. The Kentucky brigade was marched to an open field and drawn up in line forming three sides of the hollow square. The day was dismal, and the very elements seemed to share in gloomy sympathy the sad hearts of the whole army of Confederates. As noon approached the clouds grew dark and heavy. The troops stood there in one of the heaviest rainstorms I ever remember until the prisoner was brought out into the center of the square, riding in a wagon seated on his coffin and followed by a hearse.

After bidding a few friends farewell, without kneeling or being blindfolded, the brave young fellow with firm step advanced and faced the executioners.

At twelve o'clock precisely the lieutenant's voice rang out clear and sharp with the awful command: "Ready, aim, fire!" The volley was deafening. The prisoner fell back dead, pierced by eleven balls. He had paid the penalty of military insubordination. His debt of love to his mother was washed away in the heart's blood of a hero. * * *

General Breckinridge protested against the execution, and the whole army was in a mutinous state, the Tennesseans swearing vengeance if one of the 24th Tennessee was executed, and the Alabamians claimed exemption for one of their number. Bragg in despair, unable to quell the storm he had raised, applied to President Davis. By what means Mr. Davis did this is not known; but the Kentuckian and the Alabamian were executed, the Tennessee soldier was pardoned. General Bragg afterwards most rigidly enforced the death penalty against deserters; but never in the history of the Army of Tennessee was there a sadder scene than the death of young Lewis at Murfreesboro on Christmas day in 1862.

Alex VanWinkle, of Franklin, Ill., makes correction of the date of the fight at Hatchie's Bridge, saying that it was on Sunday, October 5, 1862, instead of the 4th, as given in article on page 563 of November VETERAN. "I was there," he writes. "Some one has termed it 'Hell on the Hatchie.' I think it was Colonel Pugh, of the 41st Illinois, acting as rear guard to our division under Hurlbut. We were the only troops engaged on our side. Colonel Pugh, chafing under the noise of battle and not being an actual participant, it is said, exclaimed: 'They are having h— down there and the 41st can't get a smell.'"

A STUDY IN GRAY—MISS M. A. H. GAY.

BY HOWARD MERIWETHER LOVETT, ATLANTA.

A visitor to up-to-date, sky-scraper Atlanta, Ga., may search in vain for a historic atmosphere. The civic spirit holds no allegiance to a past buried beneath the embers that smoldered from Sherman's firebrands. Freshly cut stone and new paint with flaunting modernity conceal all hall marks of the typically Southern which calls for a touch of age and romance. Even a church beginning to show upon its walls the mellowing signs of time is promptly replaced by a glittering granite pile. A city with no cherishing affection for old churches seems singularly devoid of the historic instinct, and a city that goes on renewing itself in this way invites perpetual youth and crass commonplaces.

Yet there is a remnant of her historic past clinging as it were to the outspread garments of Atlanta. There may be found in a suburb of this bustling city a bit of almost unbelievable local color of ante-bellum times preserved by some strange alchemy of fate amid the rank growth of the (new) South. To gain a proper spirit and understanding for a pilgrimage to this veritable heirloom of the fallen Confederacy read "Life in Dixie During the War," by Miss Mary A. H. Gay. This modest gray-bound volume may be found at Atlanta's public Carnegie-endowed library; and read in the crisp atmosphere of this institution, the effect is like the enchantment of crystal gazing—the phraseology, the rhetoric, every manner of thought of this book belong to the days that are not. Yield to its literary influence, and the present and materiality fade, and through a mist loom the outlines of the life of another age: pictures of its people, manners, and customs are formed, delicate, quaint, and unmistakable. We behold again that land of halo and incense whose traditions are as imperishable as is the loyalty of a race. Go, while the spell is on you, to one spot of the historic old South, tarnished by no coarser touch than that of gentle Time: this is the home of Miss Mary Gay, author of "Life in Dixie During the War."

Decatur is the oldest suburban town of Atlanta. Indeed, Decatur was a town long before Atlanta was a city. During the trolley ride we pass the site of the Federal battery of war times, marked by a signboard reminding us that we traverse historic soil. Many bullets have been gathered as relics from the ground about here and extracted from oak trees. They are relics of the last struggle of the Confederacy, for in the battles around Atlanta Despair conquered Hope. When Johnston, the wary and skillful, was removed from command and Hood, the reckless fighter, put in his place, the enemy had but to accept an advantage unwittingly offered them. Only such fatalities as this and "General Starvation" combined could ever have overcome the unconquerable soldiers who wore the gray. Invincible before all but Fate, it was here the Confederacy fell.

Decatur, a town of ante-bellum prestige, has long been the home of Southern gentle folk. The imposing new courthouse, the beautiful grounds of Agnes Scott Institute, and many signs of modern improvements enhance the attractions of the old place, but do not destroy ante-bellum distinction. Old fashions and new seem amiably disposed to each other. On the day of my pilgrimage gray skies bent over the old town and a gray mist enveloped its quiet streets. My mind already attuned to the minor key of a gray and shadowy past, I felt that the scene was tinged with a fitting melancholy. Crossing the courthouse grounds, a large object shrouded in funereal canvas loomed on the sight; this is the fallen Confederate monument recently erected by the local Chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, which, like the doomed cause they sought to commemorate, had only a fleeting existence; it lies in the dust, a symbolical pile of broken marble.

Not many hundred yards away is the old homestead where lives Miss Mary Gay, the author and heroine mentioned. The grayish-white old-fashioned dwelling, with its broken fences and neglected grounds, appears on the landscape like a faded etching of a once living scene, hardly real in its antique lineaments. There is something about the place that brings to mind the word "surrendered" with all its historic force. The lawn is covered with unmown grass, brown from November frosts. The few gaunt old oaks which forty years ago sheltered the camp of Garrard's Cavalry stand like tired sentinels of a fallen host. The scattered and forlorn-looking shrubbery of the nearly extinct flower garden, the ancient scuppernong arbor of "deserter's" memory, the time-blackened and untenanted servant house, the primitive well, despoiled of the "old oaken bucket"—all denote the desolation of disuse. No new hopes sprang into life on this soil trampled beneath the feet of an invading army. Reconstruction entered not these gates.

Standing on the small portico before the glass door that opens into the parlor, I gladly turn my back to the dreary outdoors; a glimpse of the interior is cheering. The open fireplace, the walls covered by pictures and bookshelves, the low-cushioned chairs, the book-strewn reading table have the attraction of the used and suggest a habitation of culture and gentle manners. The door is opened by a little old lady, the very embodiment of ante-bellum tradition. The smooth bands of gray hair, showing age without artifice, the old-time courtesy, the low, unaggressive voice, a bearing of dignity blended with graciousness—all bespeak a gentlewoman of the South. As I hold the soft hand of this old lady, whose form is bowed by the burden of eighty years, and listen to her placid tones of greeting I can hardly realize that this was a young and vigorous heroine of war times, who with great physical courage and fortitude served her people and the cause she loved. No wonder her eyes have grown dim, for she has seen the home of her youth fall into decay around her; her hopes, her loved ones lie buried; only one sister remains to keep vigil with her as she sits by the old hearthstone with memories of the sacred dead. It has been said: "The loneliness of the young is sadder than any other loneliness; it has no memories; its hopes are perilous, impatient, and untried." Hers is the less sad loneliness that has memories and resignation instead of hope. "We never shed so many tears as at the age of hope; but when we have lost hope, we look upon everything with dry eyes, and tranquillity springs from incapacity." When Fortune has done her worst, the mind may rest in tranquillity and muse on memories that return to solace.

As I looked at her who had suffered so much and lost so much and who had bowed before no conqueror save all-compelling Time there stole over me a feeling akin to reverence due heroic old age. My romantic soul delighted in the wonderful preservation of this old type of gentlewoman. Her voice had not a note suggestive of a date later than the sixties; her language, a model of pure English, seemed taken from some old classic. The soft enunciation, the perfect accuracy of expression, the power of making her dear memories live in the imagination of the listener were unique and gave pleasure to mind and ear. She related incidents of the time when Garrard's Cavalry had its headquarters in this house. The old mahogany library table brought to mind a story. "The most valuable part of our library was destroyed, wantonly destroyed," said she without the slightest intonation of resentment. "We loved books, and it was provoking to have vandal hands desecrate them for no purpose; the leaves were torn out and scattered on the ground or used as waste paper. We picked up handfuls of the 'poets' or 'essayists' around the house. Our self-respect made us ignore as much as possible the rough, coarse soldiers; we held our heads high and appeared not to notice what pained us deeply. There were some young and delicate soldiers unused to camp life and suffering from exposure; such appealed to my mother's sympathy, for her only boy had endured such hardships, and she thought of other mothers far away. One young man seemed really ill, and it was asked that he be allowed to come in and lie by the fire, where he could be quiet. Ma put a mattress for him just there in the corner by the bookshelves, with his head almost under the table where it now stands and his feet to the fire. She made a cough sirup for him and doctored him as she would her own child. He got better and went away. We were sorry afterwards that we had neglected one thing: that was to remove the shoes concealed under the table. Shoes were very hard to get at that time; we had been so fortunate as to procure several pairs, and hid them on the crosspieces under the table top. The sides of the table hid them completely from every point of view except from the floor beneath the table. When the sick soldier disappeared, the shoes did too. He no doubt spied them from his low bed and considered them a trophy of war. Yes, my dear, it did seem ungrateful."

"We had only this room and one other," continued the passionless voice. "Federal officers occupied the rest of the house. They confiscated our larder and servants, and had their meals cooked and served in home style. Some of the officers were gentlemanlike in manner, and offered us food. We could not accept as charity what was ours by right; the food would have choked us. They had taken our bureau drawers as feed troughs for horses. We gathered scattered grains of corn around the camp and picked out the grains from the cracks of the bureau drawers to subsist upon. No other food could be had. We beat up the corn into coarse hominy and cooked it like mush."

In the writer's own family tradition, the grains of corn were parched and eaten dry. This was in the route of Sherman's march to the sea. Succulent Indian corn no doubt saved many from starvation during that dreadful period. One who knows the possibilities of Indian meal in the way of "batter bread," "hoecake," the lusty corn pone, to say nothing of hominy and "big hominy," sees not the worst hardship in such diet. But the ancestral ladies who were reduced to dry parched corn must have been sustained by much patriotism as well.

Miss Gay kindly showed me the historic bureaus, also the wardrobe upon which she stood when she so cleverly stored the overcoats of the Confederate soldiers in the ceiling of one of the rooms. I saw the very spot where the plastering was cut away to make a hiding place.

"We have no servants now," said the gentle lady apologetically. Hospitality, with other joys of life, had fled from these silent rooms. This home, once the scene of festivity and good cheer, now shelters only the quiet gray-haired sisters.

There was a slight tremor in the even voice as we paused before the parlor mantel, and she changed the subject by calling attention to the large engraving of "The Burial of Latané" and related its story.

But we returned in thought to Garrard's encampment. "One day," said she, "we knew that the Federals had heard good news for them. 'Yankee Doodle' was played to the liveliest tune, and the camp seemed rejoicing at victory. We were so anxious to learn the cause. Our hearts were filled with apprehension. There was a sick soldier lying on the outskirts of the camp. We had given him some simple home remedies, and for this purpose I sometimes passed near him. Our suspense was so great that I sought to relieve it and asked in a low tone: 'What is the news of war?' He understood and replied: 'Johnston has been recalled and Hood put in command.' It was enough: no wonder our enemies rejoiced. It was here the Confederacy fell."

The tale was told, and I arose to go. Passing around the room, Miss Gay pointed out mementoes and pictures of interest. They were for the most part engravings and photographs of Southern heroes, statesmen, and authors. A section of the modest wall was dedicated to Jefferson Davis and family. On another wall there hung aloft a portrait of Queen Victoria in all her royal regalia; it was no doubt made in the sixties, judging from the style of dress. Miss Gay paused before it and said in that quiet voice: "After Jefferson Davis, I had no President; so in my heart I gave allegiance to Victoria as my sovereign. We Southerners are of pure English blood. Yes," she went on with the note of pride more perceptible as I looked inquiringly at a picture of President Roosevelt hanging beside the Queen, "I acknowledge my President now; he is of Southern blood. He is a man who is not afraid to stand by his convictions." So much for the reconstruction of the Southern woman of this type. I had seen her before; her loyalty to Southern blood is deathless.

"No President since Jefferson Davis until Roosevelt of Southern blood!" said I with a smile in which there was no derision.

"My dear," said she gently, "I try to be just. Here you see I have the portrait of Grover Cleveland (pointing to it hanging apart). Not that I felt he was my President, but he was as honest as Mr. Davis, and I honored him."

Miss Gay had promised me a picture and autograph souvenir, and she left the room a few minutes to get it. I again sat before the fire, and while waiting looked through a little volume of sketches and verses written by Miss Mary Gay years ago. It was as old-fashioned as her unreconstructed patriotism. One tender little love poem attracted my attention, and I wondered if among other buried treasures of the past there was a romance. When my hostess returned, we spoke of the book, long since out of print, and I said: "Won't you read me a selection from this book, as I may never see another copy of it?" I gave it to her opened at the poem mentioned.

"No, no, my dear, not that," said she, turning the leaves. "I will read you something else." The verses she read were so simple and unaffected, so entirely a transcript from her life's disappointments, so perfectly in keeping with her personality that it seemed a message from her very soul. The voice in its passionless, hopeless resignation was indescribably pathetic, without a quiver of emotion, but with the calm of long-spent emotion the lady read to me these lines, of which she gave me a copy:

I AM DREAMING.

I am dreaming, fondly dreaming
Of the happiness of yore,
Of the blissful, peaceful moments
Gone for evermore.
In the vanished sunny hours
I had visions bright and fair,
And I garlanded fresh flowers
For my raven, glossy hair.

I am dreaming, sadly dreaming
Of Elysian moments past,
Of the days that knew no sorrow,
Of the years that fled fast.
Then the future seemed before me
Like a rose-begirted path,
Down through which I longed to wander
'Mid the dreams a poet hath.

I am thinking, I am thinking
Of the changes time has wrought,
His cold touch and silent treading
And the desolation wrought.
There's an end to all my dreaming
In the ruins 'round me cast;
There's an end to hope's bright beaming
In the shadows of the past.

Many a cheerless, blighted home
In his path the War God made;
Many a noble hero fell
By the cold, relentless blade.
In my home amid the Southland
The blood-covered banner waves
O'er the greensward of a brother
And his gallant comrade's graves.

O'er hill and dale the angry Mars
With reeking sword has swept;
His darkened garments drenched in brine
By sorrowing ones oft wept.
His blighting touch and withering breath
Naught in his pathway left
But sickness, sorrow, pain, and death,
And hearts of joy heretofore.

Though many long and dreary years
Have passed above my head,
My heart, like desert sands, retains
The deep marks of their tread.
There's an end to all my dreaming
In the ruins 'round me cast;
There's an end to hope's bright beaming
In the shadows of the past.

MORE ABOUT THE ANDREWS RAID.

[W. J. Knight, who was engineer for Andrews on that famous raid, has written the VETERAN from Stryker, Ohio.]

As to the formation of our party at Shelbyville, in the first place there was a special meeting called by Gen. O. M. Mitchell for the commanding officers of each company (three Ohio regiments, 21st, 33d, and 2d Ohio) to discuss the feasibility of sending a squad of soldiers through the enemy's line for the purpose of destroying the bridges on the Georgia State railroad between Chattanooga, Tenn., and Atlanta, Ga. Those officers considered it practicable, and Captain Brewster, of my company (E, 21st Ohio), reported my name for the expedition.

On the 7th of April we were called out on dress parade, when the colonel asked that if there were any engineers in the regiment capable of running a locomotive they step to the front; so I stepped out, thinking I was going to get a soft snap, but it proved quite different. He told me to report to headquarters immediately after being dismissed. The captain said he would go to headquarters with me, and on the way he told me the first I knew of the expedition. He said it would be optional whether I went or not, as they could not compel me to go. When we got to headquarters, he introduced me to the colonel as being the man he had mentioned and also the one who stepped out under the call for an engineer. The colonel thought it a lucky coincidence. Andrews was there also, and I got my first introduction to him. He had his maps laid out on the colonel's table, and pointed out where we were at the time and where he wanted to go, etc., and it looked much better on paper than I found it on land. He also told me there would be others going besides myself, and that we would meet outside the picket lines south of Shelbyville and wait for further instructions. He said that I would have to take off my uniform and put on citizen's clothes; and should I be caught in the enemy's lines and they discovered who I was and in disguise, I would be treated as a spy, which would be death. He asked if I was willing to go under those conditions and take chances with himself, and I told him I was.

The colonel gave me a pass to go to town and procure my clothing, and I bought it to suit my own taste and liking. As soon as it was dark I started south to our place of meeting outside our picket lines. This is the sum and substance of our starting.

INQUIRY ABOUT A LEBANON GIRL.—Please inquire for me through the VETERAN about the heroine of whom I write. I was a member of Company G, 2d Kentucky, Orphan Brigade. In the fall of '62 we were camped at Murfreesboro, Tenn., when General Morgan asked for two regiments of infantry to accompany his cavalry to capture Hartsville, fifty-four miles away on the Cumberland River. The 2d and 9th Kentucky were chosen. We left Murfreesboro December 5 at eleven o'clock in the morning, reaching Lebanon, Tenn., about dusk. As soon as we arrived there the ladies brought us all kinds of nice things to eat. A little girl about fifteen years old filled my haversack; and having nothing to offer her for her kindness, I asked what I might bring her, and she replied: "A live Yankee." We crossed the river and attacked the enemy at daylight Sunday, the 7th. They were altogether surprised, and our victory was complete. We captured a battery and 2,104 prisoners. This we accomplished with sixteen hundred guns. It was a straight Kentucky fight on our side. We started immediately for Murfreesboro, and by chance in Lebanon I halted in front of the home where the little girl lived who had filled my haversack and turned over to her a live Yankee and also a very fine guitar I had captured after the fight. She said she would treasure it as long as she lived. I gave her my name, but did not learn hers, nor have I ever heard anything from her since. I would very much like to hear from her or any one who knows of the circumstances. James A. McDonald, care Kansas City Oil Co., Kansas City, Mo.

REMINISCENCES OF FREDERICKSBURG.

BY DR. SAM R. BURROUGHS, BUFFALO, TEX.

About one-fourth of General Lee's army was shoeless, and had been since prior to the Sharpsburg campaign. While encamped at Culpeper C. H. and before moving into position at Fredericksburg green beef hides were issued, out of which moccasins were made. These came to us in patterns, regardless of the size of the feet they were intended to cover, with instructions to stitch them up with the hairy side in, in order that the hair might serve the function of the absent sock. However, the first few miles' march through the rain and deep mud disposed of this uncanny foot gear. Near the 1st of December, 1862, the ladies of Richmond sent Hood's Texas Brigade a box of shoes, which when prorated gave the company of which I was a member (Company G, 1st Texas Regiment) two pairs. There being eleven men in our company without shoes, the writer included, the orderly sergeant, James Kennedy, prepared as many straws, and the boys lined up and pulled. The result showed that Marshall Hamby and Tom Main were the lucky ones.

General Lee's army of about 50,000 men occupied the heights south of the city, extending from Marye's Hill on his left to the plains below Hamilton's Crossing on the Richmond and Fredericksburg railroad on his right. An old country road which led from Hamilton's Crossing in an irregular course just in the rear of the crest of this chain of hills had been made to conform to the military requirements of the position by new cuts at suggestive intervals. This line was called the military road. General Barksdale's Mississippi Brigade was deployed upon the south bank of the Rappahannock River with orders to oppose the advance of the enemy.

General Burnside's army of 112,000 men occupied Stafford Heights, a commanding position opposite the city, on the north bank of the river. General Burnside, having occupied this position since about the 20th of November, finally decided to attack General Lee in the latter's position, and to this end issued orders for the immediate construction of two bridges over which his army could be transferred to the south bank. To execute these orders, initiatory steps were taken during the night of the 10th by the engineer corps, supported by a heavy line of skirmishers and the artillery on the heights. The material out of which these bridges were to be constructed had to be conveyed to the water's edge by the workmen, and the fire from Barksdale's Mississippi Rifles was so accurate and deadly that it brought forth the assertion from a Northern newspaper correspondent that "each plank carried to the water's edge cost the government one hundred men in killed and wounded." Four distinct and determined efforts to construct the bridge in front of the city having been thwarted by these Mississippi marksmen, General Burnside turned his one hundred and forty-seven pieces of artillery upon the doomed city in order that history might not record the fact that two small Confederate regiments were sufficient opposition to prevent an army of 112,000 men crossing a river at a point of the latter's own selection. This bombardment began about ten o'clock on the morning of the 11th and continued throughout the day, and about the middle of the afternoon General Lee ordered the evacuation of the city, after which the enemy rapidly completed the construction of this bridge, the one at the mouth of Deep Run having already been completed.

About 5:30 on the morning of the 11th General Lee's signal guns gave the intelligence that the enemy was in motion, thus demonstrating that acute surveillance which ever characterized the great Southern chieftain. In the cold stillness of the hour the reports of these guns reverberated ominously over the heights bordering the valley of the historic Rappahannock, and seemed to dwell menacingly in the distance.

The writer was on guard duty when these memorable signals proclaimed the approaching bloody conflict, and in obedience to orders given when posted reported at once to his quarters to awaken his slumbering comrades. In less than thirty minutes from the last echo of the signal shots General Lee's army was in line of battle, the first formation being in the military road. Many of the men rushed half clad into line, so much so that the first line was a white instead of a gray one, the men completing their toilet in the frigid December atmosphere. In this line those treasured letters from father, mother, sister, wife, and sweetheart were slowly drawn from inside pockets, read once again, torn into small bits, and scattered upon the ground, as it were, to consecrate with home thought and heart-to-heart expression the soil which would soon drink of the noblest and most chivalrous blood of our Southland. So profuse and uniform were these tiny pieces of paper when the army advanced there was still a white line left to mark its first position.

Just before the order came to forward Maj. John R. Woodward, our former captain, called the writer to his side and drew from his military saddle pockets a pair of embossed patent leather slippers and requested that I leash them to my feet, which I did; but a few moments later, when we plunged into the dense fog and the deep wintry mud at the foot of the hill, these parlor shoes were left about six inches below the surface to await the resurrection morn, while the feet went forward with the line over an old field through which several narrow but deep ditches had been cut. These ditches could not be seen for the dense fog, and many of our comrades fell into them and had to be assisted out. At the distal side of this field the line was halted and skirmishers sent forward through the fog to a distance of one hundred yards in advance. This position was about the center of General Lee's line, and we remained here all day without firing a gun, and at night returned to our old quarters, to be called into line again at early dawn on the morning of the 12th, in which position we remained the day and night.

About ten o'clock on the morning of the 13th this fleecy covering pulled up its borders and rolled into ethereal transparency and revealed for the first time the long blue lines of General Franklin, double-columned and interspersed at strategic points with fifty-one well-supplied and manned pieces of artillery, covering General Lee's right. General Franklin at once made an assault upon our right, commanded by General Jackson, but was repulsed by the dexterous handling and accurate fire of the latter's artillery before a single infantryman had the opportunity of emptying his gun. However, about 1 or 2 P.M. General Franklin made a second attack, which, after a most persistent and bloody engagement, resulted as his first. It was during the first attack that the gallant Major Pelham covered himself with immortal glory and military distinction. Gen. J. E. B. Stuart had ordered Major Pelham to place one or two of his guns on a little elevated spot far in advance and to the left and rear of General Franklin's left; and when the latter's heavy assaulting columns moved forward, Major Pelham's fire was so rapid and destructive that it drew the concentrated fire of five batteries, which compelled him to retire. It is stated upon good authority that one of Pelham's shells penetrated the Phillips house, General Burnside's headquarters, across the river several miles.

During all this time, beginning at 10 A.M. and closing with the darkness of night, a most desperate, ghastly, and bloody struggle was raging in front of and at the foot of Marye's Heights, resulting in the defeat of General Burnside's troops, who displayed a military obedience and intrepid gallantry worthy of a more competent commander.

Throughout the engagement Hood's Brigade occupied its original position in readiness to reinforce either right or left as might be required. About three o'clock in the afternoon we were ordered to the support of the right, but we had scarcely made a movement before the order was countermanded. Late in the evening, when the last attack was made on our left, we were quietly moved to the rear of Marye's Hill, and there held in reserve until the battle was over, when we were ordered to our original position, where we remained during the 14th and 15th awaiting another movement on the part of General Burnside, who during a rain storm on the night of the 15th retreated to the north side of the Rappahannock.

About dusky darkness on the 15th Hood's Brigade was moved to the front and ordered to advance through the darkness and keep in touch with the enemy. This we did until we reached the south bank of the river near the old Bernard house about one hour before day. As it was important that a decision be reached before daylight as to whether picket-fighting would be indulged in, our officer of the day, Capt. E. S. Jemison, hailed his corresponding opponent and informed him of the fact that it would not be the policy of General Lee unless his pickets were fired upon, and received the happy response that our pickets would not be molested.

During the 16th I spent a good part of the day walking over the grounds and inspecting the Bernard house. It was built on the style of the old English mansion, with large, roomy apartments and most handsomely furnished in all its appointments. Its library was its most beautiful and attractive feature, filled with the most artistic cases, plethoric with the costliest and most interesting volumes. At the center of the west end was suspended upon the wall a life-size portrait of Cleopatra, exhibiting the deadly asp nestling in her bosom—the work of a master's brush. This lovely specimen of art had not escaped the ruthless hand of the vandal soldier, but had received the thrust of his bayonet, which penetrated its entire framework. The cases containing the rare and costly books, which to behold would make any book lover's heart ache, had received a like treatment with the picture. Neither Cleopatra nor her companion library could fight the battles of the South, but became the victims of the "evil consequences of war." Not wishing to behold this wanton destruction longer, I passed directly into the large dining hall. This had served as a military hospital during the battle; it was a surgery, wherein the mutilated limbs and bodies had been subjected to such repair as science and art could then offer. The hands, arms, feet, and legs which required amputation had been cast out of one of the windows and constituted a conical heap whose apex found a level with the window basement. A line of white-washed negro cabins stretched from this building to a considerable distance down the river; these furnished quarters for our pickets. In one of these cabins were found several bombshells, and by some carelessness on the part of the inmates two or more of these projectiles rolled into the fire and exploded between midnight and day one morning, and by their reports both armies were brought to attention.

It was my day to cook, and I gathered up all the canteens and walked down the steep bluff to the river to fill them with water. I found my "partner in blue" engaged in the same duty on the opposite bank. He at once inquired if I had any "old Virginia twist," to which inquiry I responded in the affirmative, propounding a counter inquiry relative to his supply of parched, ground, and sweetened coffee, a compound which at that date commanded a high premium in the Southern army. My "partner" announced that he had an abundant supply of that commodity in store, and would be glad to enter into foreign negotiations for a mutual exchange. This I very readily agreed to, and he informed me that if I would meet him alone the next morning at eight o'clock he would ship me a full cargo, accompanied with proper clearance papers. As it was contraband to have any communication between the opposite pickets, each agreed to secure the services of one of his comrades who would stand watch on the upper banks for the coming of the two "officers of the day." The Southern watch would whistle "Dixie," while the Northern watch would whistle "Yankee Doodle."

Each party to the contract appeared promptly on time the next morning and, having posted his watch, descended to the water's edge. My "partner" had his boat all ready, bringing it under cover of his overcoat. This craft consisted of a piece of plank twelve inches wide, one inch thick, and about four feet in length drawn skillfully into a bow at one extremity, while the other was rounded into a beautifully shaped stern to which was securely adjusted a proportionate rudder. About midway between stern and bow stood a mast, rising to a perpendicular of about thirty inches. A strong cord was drawn tightly from the center of the stern over the top of this mast and secured to the bow. The sail when leaving a Northern port was made of a copy of the last issue of the New York Tribune; when leaving a Southern port it consisted of a copy of the last issue of the Richmond Dispatch. This vessel made several trial trips empty before we could properly adjust the rudder for the force of the current. However, the required angle was soon discovered, and our heavy-laden vessel was safely landed in port. The coffee was stitched up in little quarter-pound sacks, six of which were a load for our one-masted boat. When the boat was ready for a voyage, a bill of lading, together with clearance papers, was securely fastened to the mast. When arriving at a Southern port, the cargo of coffee was promptly checked out and a cargo of tobacco was checked aboard, and the vessel cleared for a Northern port. I have one of these bills of lading now; and as near as I can decipher the signature, which was made with a lead pencil, it was prepared and signed by J. J. Jacobs, 124th New York Volunteers. If I am correct in the name given and Mr. Jacobs is still living and these lines should reach his eye, I desire to say a letter from him would be much appreciated.

In sending a good list of subscribers secured at the Confederate Reunion at Mangum, Okla., September 25-26, Dr. A. C. Bennett, of Vinson, praises the hospitality of the people of Mangum, who were so royal in their treatment of the visitors, and adds: "If we would all work at our meetings a few hours, we would soon have the whole South reading the VETERAN. * * * I wish every one of the old Confederates could have it. I am the man who tried to get you to subscribe for the VETERAN at Richmond last year. My best wishes for you and the best journal in the world."

BATTLE AT NIGHT BY LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN.

An article in the Banner, Dwight, Ill., by a Federal states:

"The forces of Hooker and Longstreet had been opposed to each other since the beginning of the war in Virginia. Now both generals had been sent west to try their strength against each other on a new field. The valley between Lookout and Raccoon Mountains was held by Longstreet. It was through the northern edge of this valley, skirting the Tennessee, that Hooker was obliged to pass.

"Hooker and the 11th Corps went into camp a mile below Brown's Ferry in the evening of October 27. Three miles in his rear, at Wauhatchie, was camped Brig. Gen. John W. Geary, of Pennsylvania, with a division of the 12th Corps. The soldiers slept in line of battle, ready for an attack. It was not likely that they would be permitted to raise the siege of Chattanooga unmolested. They were not disappointed in their expectations of a fight. Hooker's march along the river road to Brown's Ferry was made in plain view of the Confederate troops occupying Lookout Valley and the mountain slope.

"Midnight came with the moon shining brightly over both armies. The first hour of October 28 struck. With it came a burst of artillery and musketry that sounded in the ears of the sleeping soldiery like an earthquake. All sprang to their feet instantly. Geary's Division back at the ferry had been attacked on three sides by Longstreet's troops. The attack was a very heavy one. Gen. O. O. Howard was the commander of the 11th Corps. Hooker had general command of the 11th and 12th Corps. Howard was no sooner awakened by the noise of battle than a messenger came to him from Hooker saying: 'Hurry, or you cannot save Geary.' Schurz's and Steinwehr's Divisions were quickly started toward the sound of firing. General Howard himself with two companies of cavalry hastened in advance of the infantry.

"A little after three o'clock Howard reached Geary. He found that Geary had already done his work bravely and well. Longstreet's men had been driven back. Our readers have met with the poem called the 'Charge of the Mule Brigade.' It was during this night battle that the incident which originated the poem occurred. During the noise and the flash of artillery and musketry in the darkness the mules belonging to Geary's Division suddenly became frantic with terror and made a stampede. By the hundreds they broke loose and galloped directly into the midst of the Confederate ranks. In the darkness it was easily mistaken for a charge of cavalry.

"General Geary had won the fight at this end of the line. But it was at a cost which to him could never be made good. For in that night battle his gallant young son, Lieut. Edward R. Geary, was killed. General Howard found Geary thus sore stricken in the very moment of victory. This battle in the darkness lasted three hours. Geary held the Union right. Hooker's army was encamped to face Lookout Mountain.

"While Geary was fighting on the right Longstreet made an attack on the left near Howard's headquarters. He hoped thus to engage the left and prevent assistance from being given to Geary. He sent the attacking column around almost to the rear of Howard's camp and ordered them to capture a hill there. They had ascended the hill and were intrenching themselves as best they might in the dark before they were discovered.

"As soon as their presence was known Col. Orland Smith was ordered to charge the hill with his brigade and carry it. This he did gallantly. His men charged up the steep, rocky hillside and drove the Confederates from the top at the point of the bayonet. Longstreet was thus repulsed on the right and on the left. He fell back from Lookout Valley, which thence on remained clear of Confederates. After the night battle in Lookout Valley, Longstreet was sent against Burnside at Knoxville. This experienced and brave Confederate general thus opened the fighting at Chattanooga, but took no further part in it.

"In the night battle of October 28 the Union army lost four hundred and twenty men and the Confederates still more. After this battle there was no more interruption in the forwarding of supplies to the army at Chattanooga."

[This account is not given with full indorsement, yet it is as fair as may be expected from "the other side." It is natural that each honestly saw the things favorable to his own side in the struggle and that his view strengthens with the years.—EDITOR VETERAN.]

HEROINE ALICE WRIGHT-CLINTON.

BY I. F. PENDLETON, ADJT. COM. A. S. JOHNSTON CAMP, 644.

Another war heroine on page 500 of the October VETERAN, giving an account of the flag presentation by Miss Alice Wright, interests me. I had the honor of being one of those present. It took place in front of an old theater building in St. Joseph, Mo. There were two companies present, one commanded by Captain Carson, from Easton, Mo., and one from DeKalb, commanded by Capt. George Buck.

MRS. ALICE WRIGHT-CLINTON.

The lady was a very pretty girl, and I can see her now as she made her address to the two companies.

I would not be without the VETERAN for any consideration. You will hear from me again, I hope, with a club. I have reorganized the Camp, and have about thirty members.

Miss Alice Wright presented the first Confederate flag in Missouri. The presentation took place in front of the old theater building. It stood on a high eminence in St. Joseph, Mo. The staff officers were at her side and the command below playing "Dixie." It was the most glorious moment of her life. She had to flee in a short time disguised, accompanied by her little four-year-old nephew, J. H. Wright, who now lives in Mansfield, Tex., and Charles Slaybock, of St. Louis, a younger brother of Gen. Lon Slaybock.

Being a guest at Mr. Asbury's, near Plattsburg, the Federals passed, entered the house, and searched for Miss Wright. Being hid in an old lumber room, she escaped detection. She followed in the rear of the army, and went to Liberty, Mo., the guest of General Doniphan. Her brother, Dr. Wright, came and escorted her to Jackson County to her sister, Mrs. Jeanes. She was then banished by order of General Stein, commander at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

We were camped near Agency Ford, Buchanan County, Mo., and had gone to St. Joseph and captured a Federal recruiting officer. We remained some time in St. Joseph, but returned to camp the same evening. It was soon after the Camp Jackson affair. I had forgotten all about the affair until I read the Strother paper.

BRAVE, NOBLE BOB ALLISON—HIS FLAG.

BY E. M. GARDNER, NASHVILLE, TENN.

During the recent U. C. V. Reunion in Nashville I was on a Glendale car when I engaged in conversation with an old veteran who said he belonged to the 20th Tennessee Regiment. I told him I was a soldier too, but from Mississippi.

"O, Mississippi," he said, "the noblest soldiers that ever lived. I remember them well. The 15th Mississippi was captured at Fishing Creek, and while the Yankees held them our colonel said: 'Boys, we can get them back.' He had us charge on his own orders, and we released them. I met a member of the 15th Mississippi at a Reunion not long ago. He was all shaky with the palsy, hobbling along with a stick. When I said to him, 'I was one of the 20th Tennessee,' he became excited and cried out: 'They are the best fighters in the world.' I said: 'No; they are a lot of cowards.' Before I could think he had lammed me over the head with his stick. That unexpected deed showed what the 15th Mississippi thought of the 20th Tennessee that rescued them at Fishing Creek."

He again said: "Do you know any Allisons in Nashville?" I told him I did. "Bob Allison," he said, "was from Nashville. He was in the old 20th Tennessee. A better boy never lived. He never grumbled. If he had enough to eat, it was all right; if he didn't have a bite, it was all right. Whenever he was off duty, he had a book or paper reading. I have seen him carrying three or four guns at a time when some of the other boys were broken down. If I should have said, 'Bob, I am sick,' he would have answered: 'All right, Jim, I will go in your place.' When a squad of the boys were up on the mountain doing picket duty, he'd say: 'I'll make them a pot of coffee and carry it up to them.' That's the kind of a boy Bob Allison was. One time I came home with the measles. I met a small man and he asked me about Bob and said: 'Tell Bob his mother and I miss him badly, but we know he will do his duty. He is our only child.'"

Here the old soldier looked serious. "I wish I could forget about Bob," he said. "I am too old to cry, but I can never tell about Bob without tears coming to my eyes. I often think about it when I wake in the night. I would give a hundred dollars if I could forget it. No, I have no hundred dollars to give; I have no money at all; but I would give anything I could to forget about Bob Allison."

"It was at Jonesboro," he continued. "We were going forward in line of battle and Bob was carrying the flag, when he was shot through the body, and as he went down he took the old flag and pulled it around him, saying: 'Jim, let it be my winding sheet.' I said: 'All right, Bob; you may have it.' Just then Colonel Smith said: 'Bring the flag along, Jim Bennett!' I said, 'Colonel, Bob wants it for his winding sheet;' but the Colonel commanded, 'Bring it along!' and I had to pull it loose from Bob's dying hands. I can never forget how he looked as I left him. I wish I could. I wish I could." And the old fellow cried as if it had happened yesterday. Before I left the car he said: "Next day we came back, and Bob was dead. We buried him. You know how we had to bury them in a trench. The colonel explained afterwards that it wouldn't do to let the flag go down in a fight; but it was mighty hard to refuse Bob Allison's request."

[This Colonel Smith referred to was afterwards Brig. Gen. Thomas Benton Smith, and was captured in the battle of Nashville. After he had surrendered, a vicious, cowardly Federal cut him across the head with a saber. The lick was so severe as to injure his skull, and he has for many years been an inmate of the Middle Tennessee Asylum for the Insane.]

GENS. KIRBY SMITH AND BUSHROD JOHNSON.

Maj. W. A. Obenchain, of Bowling Green, Ky., kindly criticises a statement in the VETERAN concerning Sam Davis's teachers while at the Tennessee Military Academy, and in response to a request as to the connection of Gens. E. Kirby Smith and Bushrod R. Johnson with the school he writes:

"In answer to yours of the 12th inst., Gen. E. Kirby Smith was a graduate of West Point and an officer in the United States army up to April 6, 1861, when he resigned. In 1868 he established a military school in New Castle, Ky., known as the Western Military Academy, and offered me the position of professor of mathematics and commandant of cadets, which I accepted. In the early part of 1870 the academy buildings at New Castle were destroyed by fire. Afterwards, in 1870, he and Gen. Bushrod Johnson, under agreement with the trustees of the University of Nashville, took charge of that institution. General Smith as Chancellor of the University, and General Johnson as Principal of the College of Liberal Arts and Science, or Academic Department, but an equal partner in the profits of the school. Both of them taught classes.

"I went to Nashville with General Smith, and held in the university the chair of modern languages and the position of commandant of cadets until 1873, when I resigned on account of my health and went to Texas.

"The establishment of Vanderbilt University seriously affected the attendance of the University of Nashville, and in 1875 that institution was turned over to the trustees of the Peabody Normal Institute. General Smith went to the University of the South, at Sewanee, as professor of mathematics, and held that chair until his death, March 28, 1893.

"According to Appleton's 'Universal Cyclopedia and Atlas,' Gen. Bushrod R. Johnson graduated at West Point in 1840 and served as an officer in the United States army until 1847, when he resigned. At the outbreak of the War between the States he was a professor in the Western Military Institute of Kentucky, at Georgetown. What he did after leaving the University of Nashville I do not know; but he died in Brighton, Ill., May 24, 1894.

"I might add that of the original faculty of the University of Nashville under Generals Smith and Johnson Mr. S. M. D. Clark, of the Montgomery Bell Academy, in Nashville, and myself are the only members now living."

LIFE DOWN SOUTH.

Ain't you ever waked up early from a night of blessed sleep
 An' watched de light grow in de sky as day begins to peep,
 Wid de grass all strung wid diamonds fit to decorate a king,
 An' hear de catbird far away his hymn of glory sing?

Den you ain't never lived!

Did you ever go out fishin' when de's work you oughter do
 An' lazy up an' down de creek de sleepy hours frough,
 Or sit out on a log jest where de trailin' grapevines sway
 An' watch de cork bob up an' down while little minnies play?

Den you ain't begun to live!

Did you never heah de mockin' bird a-singin' to hisse'f

While you sit out on de gallery in de soft an' mellow light
 An' de breezes whisper in yo' ear de secrets of de night?

ATLANTA WANTS A GRAND MONUMENT.

"GEORGIA'S DUTY TO HER CONFEDERATES."

[At the August (1908) meeting of Atlanta Camp No. 159, United Confederate Veterans, a committee was appointed to formulate a suggestion looking to a proper recognition of the patriotic services of the Georgians who represented their State in the great war of 1861-65 and to submit the suggestion to the people of Georgia for their consideration, and at the September meeting of the Camp the committee made the following report, which was enthusiastically indorsed:]

Comrades: Monuments and memorials have been erected all over our land, in the South as well as throughout the North, commemorative of the services of the men who answered the call of the North for the subjugation of the South. National parks and cemeteries have been established and are being lavishly cared for at Arlington, Sharpsburg, Vicksburg, Andersonville, Chickamauga, Murfreesboro. and many other places. Nearly all of the Northern States have erected massive monuments to their volunteers, and nearly every Union general of any note has been so honored either by his State or the general government. Many memorials have been built in honor of the men who fought the battles of the North. The ingenuity of the architect and skill of the sculptor have been taxed to furnish designs and models for these tributes to patriotism and valor, and vast sums of money have been expended in erecting these testimonials.

The visitor who rides along the driveways of these national parks finds at every turn, on every side, tall shafts on piles of marble and granite, placed there by the States of the North. The volunteers from Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Ohio, Massachusetts, New York, Wisconsin, Iowa, New Jersey, Delaware, Connecticut, Nebraska, Indiana, New Hampshire, Illinois, Maine, Vermont, Minnesota, California, Michigan, and Kansas have all been remembered and honored in their respective States and wherever these national parks have been established.

In comparison the soldiers of the South who fought her battles and defended their homes and their States seem strangely neglected. Here and there may be found local recognition of the men who served the South. The patriotic women of our State have built many beautiful memorials in honor of those who went out from their home counties. They are local tributes appropriate and beautiful, reflecting great credit upon the devoted ladies who have caused them to be erected. They are the tender tributes of our mothers, our wives, our children.

The State has not aided these good women. With them the work has been a labor of love and in many cases of self-sacrifice. These local monuments do not, however, represent any recognition by the State of her soldiers.

The State did erect a fine monument at Chickamauga and assisted in paying for the magnificent statue of Gen. John B. Gordon, and in a small way contributed to the building of the monument in Marietta Cemetery. The Chickamauga monument cost $25,000. The State gave $15,000 to the Gordon statue and a small amount to the Marietta monument. The first mentioned was erected in honor of the Georgia troops who took part in that battle.

With these exceptions, Georgia has done nothing on this line. True, Georgia has been liberal beyond any other State in granting pensions to the disabled and indigent soldiers within her borders and to the widows of those who have passed away.

Why should not Georgia do something in honor of all those who went forth at the call of the State and represented Georgia on a hundred battlefields?

It would be out of the question to erect appropriate statues or monuments to each of her fifty or more generals who rendered distinguished services, quite a number of whom were killed in battle. It would be impossible to appropriately recognize by separate monuments all who gave their lives for the State or have passed away since the war. Georgia, however, can and ought to follow the patriotic example of the other States and erect one grand, imposing testimonial to all her heroic soldiers and sailors. Let it be a monument in honor of Gens. James Longstreet, William J. Hardee, Lafayette McLaws, John B. Gordon, William H. T. Walker, Joseph Wheeler, Pierce Young, Alex R. Lawton, Howell Cobb, Ambrose R. Wright, Hugh W. Mercer, George T. (Tige) Anderson, Henry L. Benning, Francis S. Bartow, Tom Cobb, George Doles, Ed Willis, Victor J. B. Geraiidy, Paul J. Semmes, Robert Toombs, Philip Cook, C. C. Crews, E. P. Alexander, Edward L. Thomas, Bryan M. Thomas, Alfred H. Colquitt, Claudius C. Wilson, Alfred Cumming, Peyton Colquitt, George P. Harrison, W. T. Wofford, Robert Henderson, William M. Phillips, J. P. Simms, Peter McGlashan, J. Gib Wright, Henry R. Jackson, John K. Jackson, C. A. Evans, Marcellus Douglas, L. J. Gartrell, John T. Mercer, Bill DeLoney, Jeff Lamar, Robert Smith, Dudley M. DuBose, Kent McCoy, Josiah Tattnell, J. McIntosh Kell, James D. Bullock, Eneas Armstrong, Dick Armstrong, George Borchart, Wilbur Hall, and the one hundred thousand heroes who fought and served under this long list of illustrious leaders.

Let us take the Davis monument, Richmond, Va., as a design. Erect a towering granite monument on the capitol grounds. Place at the corners bronze figures life-size, representing respectively the infantryman, the artilleryman, the cavalryman, and the sailor. On the top place in pure marble the figure of a Southern woman holding in her outstretched hand a laurel wreath as if crowning the heroes below. Around the base of this main shaft build a massive granite wall, or arcade with heavy columns, with broad panels on each face. Place in the panels bronze tablets in bas-relief, upon which may be inscribed the brigade organization something after this style:

Anderson's Brigade,

Hood's Division, Longstreet's Corps,
Army of Northern Virginia.

Devote one panel for the names of Georgians who were officers in the Confederate navy. On the center column of this arcade inscribe all the names of the corps commanders and the major generals, with the brigade organizations arranged to the right and left on other columns. Appropriate inscriptions should be placed on each side of the main shaft.

Georgia could easily erect this monument by appropriating annually for four years, say, $25,000. It might cost more than this sum. It could be constructed for that amount and made perfectly beautiful. If $100,000 were appropriated, it would be less than $1 for each man who answered the call to defend the honor of the State and who fought in defense of its homes and firesides. Besides being a recognition of their self-sacrificing devotion to duty, it would also in a small degree honor the glorious women of Georgia, who deserve more than the men who fought her battles.

Capt. W. H. Harrison, of the committee, read the appeal to the Convention, and it was adopted with much enthusiasm and in a rising vote.

GORDON'S GA. BRIGADE IN THE WILDERNESS.

BY I. G. BRADWELL, BRANTLEY, ALA.

In my article on the battle of the Wilderness, page 447 of September (1908) VETERAN, I promised to give an account of the brigade on the following day, May 6.

Our division (Early's) held the extreme right of Lee's army that day, and our brigade, except our sharpshooters, was held in reserve to reestablish the line should the enemy, with his overwhelming numbers, break it. Our sharpshooters were deployed in front of the division, and did wonderful execution all day. Our skirmishers, under command of Captain Kellar, of the 60th Georgia, were deployed in the thick woods behind trees about thirty or forty feet apart; while the enemy had five men on each post about ten or fifteen feet apart, owing to convenient trees. They held their ground until relieved late in the day to assist the brigade in its grand charge on the enemy's works. Far to the right Longstreet and A. P. Hill were having a hot time, while on our part of the line the fighting was confined to heavy demonstrations.

Late in the afternoon our brigade was ordered to the extreme left to support Smith's Virginia Brigade, holding that part of the line. We took position in the rear of the Virginians who were holding the works. To our left the land sloped to a ravine. A few moments after our arrival we saw General Gordon coming toward us from this ravine. The thick woods concealed all our movements, while the land to the enemy's right was open. For some reason they failed to put out pickets to observe our movements in that direction, and were quietly preparing their evening meal behind their excellent breastworks unconscious of the terrible assault which was soon to burst on them.

General Gordon had shown General Early his opportunity and afterwards General Ewell, who commanded the corps. Finally General Lee came and examined the ground with Gordon. As soon as General Lee rode away orders came to move to the left flank as quietly as practicable. When we reached the ravine, we marched up the bottom of it and formed the brigade in line. The skirmishers were formed a few feet in our front and ordered to move up the hill at "double-quick," while the main line was to move forward at "quick time." All orders were given in a whisper. All this took but a few minutes. The skirmish line went up the steep hill on a run, and the sharp report of their unerring rifles apprised the enemy that we were on their flank and rear. Our orders were not to fire until we had passed over our skirmishers; but our men, seeing their great advantage, could not be restrained, and opened with a terrible volley. The skirmishers fell down on their faces to protect themselves from the fire of their own men until they came up and then joined in the charge.

As it happened, the 31st Georgia, which held the right of the brigade, struck the breastworks of the enemy, so that one or two companies on the right were in front of the enemy's works. The other regiments of the brigade swung far around to the left and to the rear of the enemy's breastworks almost without opposition.

As soon as the Yankees recovered somewhat from their fright they began to shoot down their line of works, supposing that the main body of our men were in that direction. Most of my company, finding the fire of the enemy too hot on the right side of the works, crossed over and joined in the advance with the main body of the regiment; but it was even a worse place. It seemed that nothing alive could remain there a minute. Several of my comrades were killed around me by a hurricane of balls. The regiment now bore to the left as they advanced in the dark woods and suffered very little from the fire of the enemy, who lost our direction. I got back on the right of the works, and was reloading my gun when Col. C. A. Evans told me that those were our own men in front, and he ordered me to advance on that side of the works. Being alone, I hardly knew what to do; but, remembering a soldier's duty, I obeyed orders.

I went quite a distance through the thick woods without seeing any one. At length I found a young man on the picket line firing at the works in front. I spoke to him and asked him to what command he belonged. He replied: "Hays's Louisiana Brigade." I told him not to shoot in that direction, as our men were there. He replied with a good deal of emphasis: "They're Yankees." I told him I was going over there, when he said that if I could go he could too, and we went together. Arriving at the breastworks, we found a multitude of men in great confusion, with no order and no one in command. We were soon in the motley crowd, and the balls from our line were making havoc on all sides. We then perceived that we were in the midst of the enemy, who had not observed us. I whispered to my comrade and said: "Let's run out." Inching our way through the crowd to the front, we rushed toward our men, going through the woods parallel with the works. When out of range in the darkness, we soon saw a long line of reserves ready to support our brigade awaiting orders.

It was pleasant to us to be with our own again. Learning that we had just escaped from the enemy, we were told to pass through and go to the rear. We made our way on, and soon saw a number of small fires ahead. When we reached them, we found ourselves in the little field where we first struck the enemy. Here our men had the prisoners. Among them were two generals—General Seymour, of New York, and General Shaler. I found that Lieutenant Compton, of my company, was wounded. When General Seymour got off of his fine horse, he patted him on the hip and said: "He's a fine horse, boys; take good care of him." I went to the little fire where the generals were sitting, surrounded by our men, who were very much interested in what they had to say. General Seymour was very talkative, while Shaler was extremely moody and sullen. Our men took a great liking to Seymour, and as I approached I heard him say that the war was only a small affair any way, that we would be compelled to come back into the Union, that he was a Democrat himself, and that his uncle was Governor of New York, etc.

About this time Col. C. A. Evans came up and told me to assemble all of our brigade who were about there and take them back to the line of battle. We all rejoined our regiments, which we found facing the enemy and expecting the fight to be renewed at any moment.

How much of Grant's line we captured I cannot say, but we had driven his right wing back on his center as far as his headquarters. The next day I inspected the captured breastworks. They were made of dirt, logs, dead men, blankets, and every object that could be picked up. The dead presented a ghastly appearance with limbs extending out from among the logs and rubbish. Dead and wounded of the night before lay everywhere. In front of one of our batteries I saw two Federal soldiers whose heads were cut off by a cannon ball, and near by were two very intelligent men from New Jersey, both badly wounded. They told me where they were from, and asked me if they would be provided for. I told them that they certainly would be as soon as our litter bearers had gathered up our own wounded. I was very sorry for the poor fellows. They were soon removed.

The next morning the sharpshooters were advanced to find the enemy's position, and engaged their pickets in a sharp skirmish. The position of the brigade was shifted to another point from which we could hear our boys bantering them to come out and fight; but General Grant preferred, after the severe experience of the two days previous, to keep his men behind their works, while he brought up his reserves left on the north bank of the Rapidan.

WANTS TO LOCATE A FEDERAL COLONEL.

C. W. Stone, of Hondo, Tex., makes inquiry of a certain colonel of Federal cavalry who was captured near Cleveland, Tenn., May 9, 1864, by John Haney, of Company F, 8th Texas Cavalry, Terry's Texas Rangers. He writes: "The Rangers charged the infantry skirmish line and captured the most of them before they reached their command, which was behind a rail fence. This colonel came down the lane with his regiment in fours with drawn sabers; and when just past the fence, behind which was their infantry, they made a left turn through a gate, coming square on our left. As soon as Haney saw them he said: 'I'm going to have that colonel.' 'I'll see that you get him,' said I. So we turned and went at them as fast as we could drive. They about-faced, and were going back as fast as they could get through the gate. The colonel wheeled his horse to the side of the column and rode rapidly, Haney gaining on him, however, at every jump of his horse. When he got to the gate, the colonel could not get through because of his men crowding, and just as he had started through Haney was by his side and shot his horse dead. The horse fell just past the gatepost and on the colonel's left leg, so he could not get out. In an instant Haney was over the fence; and when the colonel saw it was a Texas Ranger, you should have heard him begging for his life. Haney would pat him on the face and tell him if he could keep his own men from riding over him he was all right. Then Haney kept shooting at his men as they ran through the gate. I stood with my pistol in my hand and never fired a shot. As soon as the men were all through we pulled the colonel from under his dead horse and lifted him back against the fence, still begging for his life, Haney telling him that he could have killed him more easily than his horse, and that he would have gone to h— in a second for the lies he had told about the Rangers killing prisoners. On that account Haney insisted on Gen. Joe Wheeler's paroling the colonel, so he could refute such stories by telling how he was treated."

Comrade Stone, who was of Company D, 8th Texas Cavalry, explains that he and Haney got far in advance of the others in their determination to capture the colonel.

YOUNG MAN'S ESTIMATE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

FROM SPEECH BY LEE MERIWETHER AT BIRMINGHAM REUNION.

Commander in Chief, Veterans, and Sons of Veterans:

Forty-three years ago, almost to the month and day, a boat steamed into Hampton Roads and headed for the grim walls of Fortress Monroe. It was not a passenger boat, yet one passenger there was upon that boat whose name will long be remembered by the American people. As he stood on deck with folded arms, silently gazing at the wide moats and massive walls and steel-barred windows, which in a few moments were to shut him out for two long years from the world in which he had been so conspicuous a figure, this man uttered no word, made no sign to indicate the emotion which must have surged within him at that tragic climax to his career. His body was conquered, but the spirit, the soul of Jefferson Davis was never conquered. On that fateful day in May, 1865, when approaching his dungeon, Jefferson Davis held himself as sternly erect as in the days of his youth when he stormed the heights of Monterey or as later when armies moved at his command and a devoted nation followed his lead.

In the New York Herald of May, 1865, was a letter of a special correspondent who was on that boat in Hampton Roads and who described the scene as one of intense interest. Such a scene was beheld when Napoleon sought refuge on the Bellerophon and was carried captive to St. Helena, and in all the world a parallel to Napoleon's pathetic plight after Waterloo was not seen again until Jefferson Davis was carried that May day in 1865 to prison in Fortress Monroe. * * *

Not unlike the French emperor in this respect is the history of Jefferson Davis. The Herald correspondent who described the voyage of the boat that bore the captive President of the Confederacy to his fortress dungeon paused a moment to mention a little boy and girl—Mr. Davis's children—who were playing on the boat's decks, all unconscious of the dire catastrophe that had overwhelmed their father. "Happy children," wrote the correspondent—"happy because they are too young to know the disgrace, the ignominy that is ever to be their lot simply because their father is the arch traitor—Davis." * * *

O nameless, O obscure, O long-forgotten reporter, if still in the land of the living, you will have read of the unveiling of the Davis monument in Richmond, you will have seen there the half of a great nation rendering homage to his memory, and you will now know that what in 1865 you described as a disgrace has long since become to those children a priceless heritage. On the very day that I read that Herald letter in the Confederate Museum one hundred thousand men and women gathered together to listen, with tears in their eyes, to speeches eulogizing Jefferson Davis, one hundred thousand men and women gathered together to witness the unveiling of a superb monument to Jefferson Davis, and on the speaker's stand in front of that monument, surrounded and honored by Governors of States and Senators of the United States and by a hundred thousand American citizens, sat a daughter of Jefferson Davis. She is a fair and gracious Southern woman, but the honors heaped upon her last June were not because of her many personal charms. No, Mrs. Hayes was honored as few queens are honored because she is the daughter of Jefferson Davis. How wasted the sympathy for the "disgrace" to those two children playing on the deck of that boat in Hampton Roads! At two o'clock of that day last June, the hour when the Davis statue was uncovered, every train on thousands of miles of railway in the South was stopped wherever the train happened to be, and remained motionless for the space of five minutes as a tribute of respect to the great man whose memory was at that moment being honored at Richmond and was sacred in the minds of millions of people.

My countrymen, a noble spirit, like a nugget of pure gold, may be covered with slander and abuse without impairing the true worth within. In the years following the war many a politician for a brief day was mistaken for a statesman; during their day they were followed by a crowd of cringing courtiers. And during their short day these shallow souls took their fling at Jefferson Davis. Their very names are forgotten, while the name of Davis is honored by ever-increasing millions of his countrymen. In a number of Southern States his birthday is a legal holiday; in all of the Southern States his memory is revered.

It has been said that much of the affection and respect bestowed upon Jefferson Davis is because he was made to suffer for the whole South.

It was my good fortune to know Mr. Davis personally. As a child I played with his children, particularly with Winnie, the "Daughter of the Confederacy," who was about my own age and my neighbor in Memphis. And a year before Mr. Davis's death I had the great pleasure and honor of visiting him for some days at his home, Beauvoir. Never shall I forget the sweetness and gentleness of Mr. Davis, nor the calm philosophy with which he bore his unparalleled misfortunes. As I saw Jefferson Davis at Beauvoir the year before he died he was a man of lofty mind and exalted character. Surrounded by his family and his books, Mr. Davis's last years were spent in dignified retirement, his philosophy a perfect shield against the slings and arrows of the malignant enemies who continued to assail him until death closed his eyes and removed him from the realm of strife and malice. * * *

FORTS PEMBERTON AND LORING.

BY W. A. GILLESPIE.

On General Pemberton's retreat from Coldwater to Greenwood, Miss., in December, 1862, my company (C), 20th Mississippi Regiment, was in that muddy, dismal retreat. At Grenada General Van Dorn gathered his cavalry and placed himself in General Grant's rear at Holly Springs, causing the Federal army to fall back to Memphis, where General Smith was organizing a fleet of transports and gunboats to get in the rear of Vicksburg by way of Yazoo Pass, Coldwater, Tallahatchie, and Yazoo Rivers. The army at Grenada had gone into winter quarters, my regiment being encamped five or six miles above the town on the south side of the Yalobusha River.

My wife was with me on Christmas day. She was a great spirit during those times in preparing materials to keep busy the good women of Greenwood who were sewing for our company. My wife traveled over the country behind runaway mules to tanyards and shoe shops to procure shoes for the boys, and either brought or sent them to us.

Capt. Ben Sturdivant had orders at that time to get up a crew for the steamboat J. M. Sharp to go down the river for supplies for our army. He said I would complete the crew, as he had engineers. Mate Brown, of the old steamboat Dew Drop, and Sid Auter were of the crew. After securing a special detail from General Pemberton, I returned to camp; and when I showed my detail to Capt. Monroe Liddell, he grew wrathful over the detailing of his orderly sergeant. I returned to Grenada and went to work that evening on board the boat Sharp. It had been stripped for burning; but we got off the next day, bound for the Tallahatchie River for a load of corn.

On our trip down the Yalobusha River to Greenwood my wife was the only cook on board, and she managed to cook meal and meat for a very hungry crew on an old box-shaped cooking stove without cooking utensils. Reaching Greenwood, we laid in a supply of necessary comforts and steamed up to Captain Sturdivant's plantation, where the Captain put his negroes and teams to loading the boat. Returning to Greenwood, we left our lady passengers (my wife and Mrs. Auter) and steamed up to Grenada, using corn for fuel when we failed to secure fence rails. After unloading, by orders from headquarters we took on board a party of civil engineers and overseers with two hundred negroes, our purpose being to have the engineers locate and fortify a position to stop General Smith with his fleet of gunboats and transports which was then entering the Yazoo Pass from the Mississippi.

We proceeded to the mouth of the Yazoo Pass, where the overseers and negroes were landed on both sides and a few miles up. The negroes had commenced felling the trees leaning into the Pass to obstruct the same and prevent the fleet from descending, when Capt. W. B. Prince, in command of the cavalry company above us, sent us word to leave at once, or we would be captured. He further suggested that by cutting down the trees we were helping the enemy more than ourselves, as the fleet had a submarine saw boat in advance which sawed the trees up and floated them to one side out of the way.

We lost no time in profiting by Captain Prince's instructions, and steamed down to the mouth of Coldwater River, where the engineers landed and examined the ground for fortifications, and pronounced it unsuitable. We then proceeded down the Tallahatchie River out of what is known as the "Wilderness" to Sharkey Landing, and there tied up for the night. Late that night, when all were asleep but the watchman, pilot, mate, and myself, I was criticised by the trio for playing such a poor game of euchre, and I confessed to them that my mind was more fixed on finding a suitable place to fortify than on the game. I then suggested to Auter, who knew the topography of the neighborhood, that Clayton Bayou would be the most suitable place in my judgment. Thereupon he awoke the engineers, and, their interest becoming aroused upon my statement of the case, they kept me up the rest of the night propounding questions and making a map of the ground. Just before daylight they ordered Captain Sturdivant to get up steam and proceed to the mouth of Clayton Bayou at once. Captain and pilot protested that it was very dark and there was no torch on board, and the engineers replied: "Then float until daylight." This we did, and on reaching Clayton Bayou that evening the engineers landed, looked over the ground, consulted maps, and then commenced to stake off the ground in a zigzag way for the breastworks, and named the place Fort Pemberton.

Dispatches were sent to Grenada that evening. Our boat was ordered up Tallahatchie River to Dr. Curtis's plantation after a load of cotton bales to be used in the breastworks, and our next load of bales came from the Purnell plantation, down the river a few miles. General Pemberton came across the country from Grenada and studied the situation, and the next morning we were ordered with another steamboat, the Ben McCulloch, to Grenada for troops. General Pemberton, that quiet, unassuming gentleman, went back with us on the boat. The army was soon transferred from Grenada by boat and across the country to Fort Pemberton. Other troops from Haynes's Landing and Snider's Bluff, on the Yazoo River above Vicksburg, were rapidly transferred to the fort by boats.

Fort Loring, named for Gen. W. W. Loring, who lost an arm in the Mexican War, was a continuation of Fort Pemberton down the Yazoo River. In a few days the historical steamship Star of the West, at which the first gun of the war was fired by order of General Beauregard at Charleston, and afterwards captured by Gen. Van Dorn on the Texas coast, was brought up the Mississippi, Yazoo, and Tallahatchie Rivers, scuttled, and sunk just above the mouth of Clayton Bayou across the channel to obstruct the passage of the enemy's fleet. This was accomplished by Lieut. A. A. Stoddard and a detail from my company. In a few days the enemy's fleet appeared and battle commenced. It was strictly an artillery engagement, and continued for several days without any casualty but the crippling of one of their gunboats and the killing of several of their crew. No loss on our side. They failed to reach either our right or left flanks with troops, owing to dense woods, cane, and overflow. They landed some light artillery at the Tindall place and came across to the Cochran plantation (now owned by the heirs of Gen. J. Z. George), but met with such a warm reception from our cannon planted along the south banks of the Tallahatchie and Yalobusha Rivers that they were more than glad to retire, realizing that our artillery outclassed theirs.

The enemy soon became discouraged by their failures and retreated the way they came, and my company comrade, Tom Chapman, was detailed to follow the enemy's fleet in his "dug-out," and he saw them safely back into the Mississippi River, after which the army fell back to Vicksburg and other points, and Forts Pemberton and Loring were no more except in history.

EXPERIENCES ON JOHNSON'S ISLAND.

BY CAPT. H. W. HENRY, LAKE WIER, FLA.

In a back issue of the VETERAN a New York officer says that the Confederate prisoners of war received the same rations as were issued to the Union soldiers in garrison. I was a prisoner of war on Johnson's Island, Ohio, from the latter part of December, 1864, to late in June, 1865. If my memory after these long years is correct, rations were issued to the prisoners twice a week, and were brought in bulk to the cook house and divided among the various messes by prisoners.

The rations consisted of pickled pork, loaf bread, hominy, rice, beans, onions, and potatoes. Once a week salt, soap, vinegar, and fresh beef were supplied us. The beef was always the fore quarter and neck. It was pronounced good "old army mule" by those who had experience with that meat at Vicksburg. The bread, while good, amounted to not more than one double-thick slice a day to a man, rice, hominy, or beans to no more than a handful, and potatoes and one onion to each prisoner, and they unsound frequently.

The only things I remember as plentiful were salt and soap. Of course these did not suffice. We endeavored to devise some plan whereby out of our excess of soap the grease might not be extracted for our nutriment.

As evidences that the rations issued to us were insufficient in quantity, a committee composed of prisoners who were physicians and surgeons carefully weighed and tested the rations and reported to the commandant of the prison and also sent their report to the New York press "that the rations issued to the prisoners on Johnson's Island were not sufficient to sustain a man in good health." The publication of their report was suppressed, we understood. There was no improvement.

At every issue of rations the prisoners gathered around hungry and lean, and nothing was allowed to go to waste. Every bone and shred of meat, bean, grain of rice and hominy were carefully gathered, and the prisoners would rake the slop and garbage of the cook house and gather every scrap that showed any sign of nourishment. There was a cook house with regular cooks and all the appliances; but during the winter, when we had stoves and fires in each room, most of the prisoners prepared to cook their own rations, thus avoiding any possible waste and the payment of a small sum in stamps to the cooks for their work. The cooking was generally done in buckets or tin cans on the top of the stoves and mostly in stews, as the additional hot water increased the diminutive ration and helped to fill the "aching void." If a can was overturned from the stove and its contents spilled in the dirt, it was carefully scooped and saved. It was a regular-rule to boil all the bones until not an "eye of grease" would rise on the water; and when the bones had passed through all the proper stages, they were soft enough to be chewed up and swallowed.

Rat-killings afforded some little relief to our constant hunger, though the rats, like ourselves, were of the lean order. A rat hunt was very exciting, not so much for the sport as for the game. As soon as "taps" were beat lights were put out, and every rat hole was carefully stopped up but one. Near this stood a prisoner ready to close it as soon as the game had entered. We all stood silent and motionless in various parts of the room in the dark, and as soon as the rat was in the room the hole was closed, and then began a weird dance, each one endeavoring to get the game under his heel. At the squeak of the victim the game was bagged and the hunt ended.

Of course a craving, gnawing hunger was ever present with us, and strong men became weak, nervous, and excitable. To the credit of the Confederate soldier, through all these deprivations, and in spite of the proclamation posted constantly in all the prisons offering release on parole and full rations and clothing, a very few proved unfaithful to their cause and country.

Something to eat was the subject of our thoughts by day and dreams by night. It was currently believed that a fat dog which followed one of the wagons bringing wood into the prison was enticed into the barracks, killed, and eaten. Anyhow, the dog disappeared.

Some of the prisoners cooked and ate their whole rations on the day of drawing. One of them on being asked if he did not suffer with hunger during the two or three days' interval replied that he did, and then he was asked: "Are you not hungry every day in the week?"

Capacity to eat happily, however, became limited. One morning I was invited to breakfast by some friends who had received a box of provisions from friends in Baltimore. Of course I went with much misgiving as to how I should be able to maintain propriety at such a feast. Upon seeing a table covered with a white cloth, plates, knives and forks, beefsteak, fried ham, onions, potatoes, hominy, hot biscuit, coffee, cream, sugar, etc., I felt as if I could take it all. To my bitter regret, I found, after a very moderate breakfast, that I could hold no more.

Of course all prisoners did not suffer in the same degree. Some were detailed in the hospital, some had friends in the North who sent them boxes of provisions when they could, and even some of the garrison officers brought in provisions to friends among the prisoners, and some who had greenbacks could have something smuggled in to them. The large majority, however, were without friends or money.

As for the assertion of the officer that the sutler shop was open and supplies could be purchased, I will say that even had this been true the sutler did not give his goods without money and a price. Again, the sutler shop was not open from the time we entered, in December, 1864, until after the surrender of the armies of the Confederacy except for the sale of stamps, stationery, and tobacco. No provisions of any kind could be bought. It was generally understood that the reduction of rations down to the starvation point and the shutting off of all access to any other source were in accordance with an order of Secretary of War Stanton (not of blessed memory) in retaliation for our treatment of Federal prisoners.

At Johnson's Island the commandant, Colonel Hill, seemed to be a fair and honorable man, and the prisoners under his charge, with the exception of scant rations, were treated fairly and were never subjected to abuse, indignity, or cruelty. I write this in the interest of truth.

AWFUL LOSSES—TRIBUTE OF GENERAL HANCOCK.

Mr. George B. Engle, Jr., who served in Company A, 5th Wisconsin Regt., writes from 142 Washington Street, Chicago:

"On the first page of your September VETERAN I notice a paragraph, 'highest percentage of regimental loss,' and crediting the 1st Texas Regiment as having lost eighty-two per cent at Antietam or Sharpsburg. On the 5th of May, 1862, in the battle of Williamsburg the 5th North Carolina, according to the history of that regiment written by its adjutant, James C. MacRea, lost eighty-three per cent. The historian says they counted four hundred and fifteen as they went into action; that seventy-five answered roll call the morning after.

"Major Butterfield, who was first sergeant of Company F, of the 5th Wisconsin, said company being detailed after the repulse of the Confederates that charged Hancock's Brigade to look after the Confederate wounded and dead left on the field, counted two hundred dead and two hundred and fifteen prisoners, and made a note of it at the time in his diary. This report was made by him from his diary at a reunion of the 5th Wisconsin held at Milwaukee May 27, 1902. It is a very remarkable coincidence that his count on the field should tally with the adjutant's report of the 5th North Carolina.

"During this battle, in the charge made against the brigade of Hancock, the 24th Virginia lost a total of one hundred and eighty-nine; the 38th Virginia, 0; the 23d Virginia, 8—making a loss in the brigade, including those of the 5th North Carolina, of six hundred and twenty-one.

"As the writer remembers this charge, he heartily indorses the remark made by General Hancock after the repulse that 'the 5th North Carolina and the 24th Virginia should have "immortality" inscribed upon their banners.'

THE COFFIN OF GENERAL LEE.

"There is a singular incident in connection with the burial of Gen. R. E. Lee. He died October 12, 1870. A few days before his death the great flood of that year in the upper waters of the James River had been disastrous, Lexington was cut off from communication with the outside world, and there was not a coffin in town suitable for General Lee. In this dilemma a box was found that had floated down the swollen river and was stranded. On opening it a beautiful casket was revealed, and in this casket the body of the South's chieftain was placed in the chapel of the university."

The above appeared in the VETERAN for March, 1905, page 112, and in confirmation of that report the following correspondence is given:

"MONTGOMERY, ALA., December 27, 1907.

"President Washington and Lee University—My Dear Sir: I am a veteran of the cause championed and espoused by the peerless Robert E. Lee, and I am asking that you give me the facts as you know them in regard to the finding of a casket on the banks of the James River in which General Lee was buried. The statements that I have seen in regard to it seem so mythical that I wish if possible to get the facts.

"Thanking you for any information in this line, I am, very respectfully, MORGAN S. GILMER."

To this came the following response:

"WASHINGTON AND LEE UNIVERSITY, LEXINGTON, VA.,
January 1, 1908.

"Morgan S. Gilmer, Esq.—Dear Sir: Your letter of December 27, inquiring about the facts connected with the casket in which Gen. Robert E. Lee was buried, was duly received, and I inclose herewith a letter from Prof. Alexander L. Nelson which will make the whole matter clear to you. Professor Nelson has been a member of the faculty of Washington and Lee University for over fifty years. He is a man of unusually good memory and clear mind, and you may regard what he says as absolutely correct.

"Yours very truly,

JOSEPH L. CAMPBELL, Sec."

"LEXINGTON, VA., January 1, 1908.

"Mr. John L. Campbell, Secretary—Dear Sir: In response to the letter of Mr. Morgan S. Gilmer, of Montgomery, Ala., which you inclose to me and in which he inquires about the casket in which Gen. Robert E. Lee was buried, I make the following statement: During General Lee's last illness it rained heavily and incessantly for three days, and North River, which runs by Lexington, was swollen much beyond its usual high-water limits. This river, a tributary of the James River, had been improved by a system of locks and dams and was used for the transportation of freight and travel. Alexander's Warehouse, located on the bank of the river, was the depot for the town of Lexington. This warehouse was washed away by the flood, and all of the roads leading to Lexington were torn up and rendered impassable. When General Lee died, the undertaker of the town reported that he had no suitable casket on hand; that a new supply had arrived at the warehouse a few days before, but had been washed away. While our people were in this dilemma, a youth reported that he had seen one of the caskets lodged on an island a few miles below the town. It was secured and found to be suitable, and General Lee was buried in this casket under the college chapel.

"Yours truly,

A. L. NELSON."

The VETERAN is pleased to have such confirmation of its article of a few years ago.

CARNAGE IN FIRST MAINE HEAVY ARTILLERY.

ITS FATE IN FRONT OF PETERSBURG, VA., JUNE 18, 1864.

BY CAPT. G. L. KILMER, MILITARY EDITOR AMERICAN PRESS ASSN.

Utterly hopeless was the gallant charge of the 1st Maine Heavy Artillery at Petersburg June 18, 1864. The action lasted but ten minutes; the regiment went in alone, and lost more men than any other regiment in any single engagement during the war. The circumstances were peculiar. The 1st Maine belonged to Hancock's Corps, that had borne the brunt of the hard fighting of the previous six weeks in Grant's Wilderness campaign, including the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, and Cold Harbor, and had lost in these conflicts over thirteen thousand killed and wounded out of a total of thirty-six thousand engaged. At Petersburg on the 16th and 17th of June the corps lost heavily, and on the 18th was ordered to push forward where the Confederates had, as it transpired, planted their "last ditch."

The point where the 1st Maine charged was a salient built by General Colquitt's troops and known as "Colquitt's salient." It was a bare ridge called Hare's Hill, and was in front of the site of the Hare house, where the Union Fort Stedman afterwards stood. Several attempts had already been made by these troops to carry the salient; but although repeated trials and failures had been noted at army headquarters, word came to Gen. Gershom Mott to try again with his 3d Division. Mott protested to his superior, General Birney, then commanding in Hancock's stead, that it was sheer murder, a repetition of the slaughter of Cold Harbor. "My orders to you are to assault," said Birney.

"I knew," said Mott afterwards, "that it was useless to expect suicide en masse from my old troops who had seen the wolf, had felt his teeth, and bore the scars. All I could hope was that a heavy artillery regiment, the 1st Maine, innocent of the danger it would incur, would lead off with a dash and carry the works with a rush."

The 1st Maine at the time of the order lay some distance back from the scene of the charge, and the men learned that they were to go in where other troops had failed. Every man on extra duty was called on to handle a musket, and the total roster, as I have it from Maj. Fred C. Low, who was a lieutenant in Company B, was eight hundred and thirty-two men. The regiment was formed in three battalions of four companies each, each battalion led by a major, and had what is called a battalion front—that is, there were three lines of two ranks each, one line leading and the others following successively, each line composed of a battalion. The 1st was in McAllister's Brigade, and several other regiments of the brigade were formed behind it in the same order. On each side of McAllister's Brigade was another brigade, formed in the same order, so that the force under Mott was three columns of a brigade each, the 1st Maine being at the head of the central column.

The key to the Confederate line lay in front of the 1st Maine, about five hundred yards distant. The intervening space was an open field, slightly rising toward the enemy. The Confederate batteries on both sides of Colquitt's salient and the infantry as well could rake the ground over which the column was to charge. General McAllister was at the time temporarily commanding another brigade, and on attempting an assault with this command over the very ground where the 1st Maine was to lead his men "fell like forest leaves under a hailstorm," and he gave it up. When he learned what was on foot with his own brigade, he said: "God-help them! They cannot advance on those works; they cannot live. The enfilade fire will cut them down."

In the full knowledge of all this, all excepting the fact that they were to go forward alone and that the regiments behind and on each side were not to move one foot until the forlorn hope had broken through the enemy's line, the Maine boys made ready for the terrible work. Major Low says: "When the men saw what was expected of them, knapsacks were taken off and thrown into a pile and bayonets fixed. Orders were to remove the caps from the muskets and rely entirely upon the bayonet. The men's faces had grown very serious. We knew that very many of us were to die. Men turned to their comrades bidding each other good-by, and with tears trickling down their cheeks dictated messages to wives, fathers, mothers, sisters, and sweethearts in case they should be among the slain and their comrades survive. I myself received a number of such messages."

Upon receipt of the word "forward!" the Maine men sprang at double-quick, and the moment the first battalion line appeared above the embankment where the column formed the slaughter began. "Men were shot dead within the first five feet," says Capt. F. A. Cummings, a survivor. "The crash of two thousand muskets rent the air as a long line of flame leaped from the works in our front, and the well-known yell of the Army of Northern Virginia mingled with the roar of the Rebel batteries on our right and left as their canister followed the musket balls of the infantry and tore enormous gaps in our ranks. The 1st Battalion melted away before this fire and lay in a heap, officers and men, except now and then a scattering one who had miraculously escaped. Before the 2d or 3d Battalion reached its place the regimental formation had been almost obliterated, and two-thirds of the 1st Maine lay stricken upon the field. Still without firing a gun, but in blind obedience to orders, the remnant struggled on toward that pitiless line of fire that never once ceased or slackened. The reader will understand that regiment was alone."

Major Low thinks that some of the men went within fifty yards of the enemy's works, but could not attain the barrier before them. They submitted like heroes to the tempest of canister balls and bullets, and under close fire covered the ground with their dead and wounded. The wave of heroes was shattered against that rampart of earth and blown to pieces by that whirlwind of death.

There were three flags carried in the charge by three sergeants, and six corporals acted as color guards. Of the nine, seven were shot down and one, a corporal, was killed. Another, W. A. Nason, received nine wounds. Nason took the colors from a wounded sergeant and went ahead until he fell with a wound through the body and in both legs. He was found after darkness covered the field unconscious with the flagstaff in his grasp. His name was entered among the mortally wounded, but he is alive at this date.

Some accounts place the number engaged in the ranks at nine hundred and fifty; others at nine hundred. Major Low places it at eight hundred and thirty-two officers and men in line. The official loss reported was five hundred and eighty killed and wounded, but fuller details swell it to six hundred and thirty-two. The killed and mortally wounded were two hundred and ten. The regiment was as good as wiped out. Colonel Chaplin, the leader, went to General Mott after the charge was over and, offering him his sword, said: "Take my sword, General; I have no further use for it." Then, pointing to the ground between the lines, he continued: "There is my regiment lying on that field." Colonel Chaplin had trained his men that, being soldiers, they "must obey orders." "Boys, always obey orders and never flinch," was the message he sent to the regiment as he lay dying some weeks afterwards.

The 1st Maine had not only the highest loss of any regiment in one engagement, but the highest in killed and mortally wounded during its term of service. It was in fourteen bloody engagements, and had four hundred men and twenty-three officers killed or mortally wounded. Its percentage of killed and mortally wounded was exceeded by only one regiment, the 2d Wisconsin, which lost 19.7 per cent, against 19.2 of the 1st Maine. The 1st Maine saw but ten months of fighting. In its first battle, Spottsylvania, May 19, 1864, it lost four hundred and seventy-six killed and wounded out of about sixteen hundred engaged.

The charge of the 1st Maine at Petersburg has been compared with that of the Light Brigade at Balaklava.

EXECUTION OF JOHN BROWN.

[An old newspaper clipping comes to the VETERAN in regard to the execution of John Brown at Harper's Ferry. It is a letter from Col. J. T. L. Preston to his wife, Margaret J. Preston. Liberal extracts from it are herein copied.]

CHARLESTOWN, Dec. 2, 1859.

The execution is over; we have just returned from the field, and I sit down to give you some account of it. The weather was very favorable; the sky was a little overcast, with a gentle haze in the atmosphere. Between eight and nine o'clock the troops began to put themselves in motion to occupy the position assigned to them on the field. To Colonel Smith, of the Virginia Military Institute, had been assigned the superintendence of the execution, and he and his staff were the only mounted officers on the ground until the major general and his staff appeared. By ten o'clock all was arranged. The cadets were immediately in the rear of the gallows, with a howitzer on the right and left, a little behind, so as to sweep the field. They were uniformed in red flannel shirts, which gave them a gay, dashing, Zouave look. They were flanked obliquely by two corps—the Richmond Grays and Company F—which, if inferior in appearance to the cadets, were superior to any other company I ever saw outside of the regular army. Other companies were distributed over the field, amounting in all to about eight hundred men. The military force was about fifteen hundred.

The whole inclosure was lined by cavalry troops, posted as sentinels, with their officers—one on a peerless black horse and another on a remarkable-looking white horse—continually dashing round the inclosure. Outside this inclosure were other companies acting as rangers and scouts. The jail was guarded by several companies of infantry, and pieces of artillery were put in position for its defense.

Shortly before eleven o'clock the prisoner was taken from the jail and the funeral cortège was put in motion. First came three companies, then the criminal's wagon drawn by two large white horses. John Brown was seated on his coffin, accompanied by the sheriff and two other persons. The wagon arrived at the foot of the gallows and Brown descended with alacrity, and without assistance ascended the steep steps to the platform. His demeanor was intrepid without being braggart. He made no speech. Whether he desired to make one or not, I do not know. Had he desired it, it would not have been permitted. Any speech of his must of necessity have been unlawful, as being directed against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth, and as such could not be allowed by those who were then engaged in the most solemn and extreme vindication of the law. His manner was without trepidation, but his countenance was not free from concern, and it seemed to me to have a little cast of wildness. He stood upon the scaffold but a short time, giving brief adieus to those about him, when he was properly pinioned, the white cap drawn over his face, the rope adjusted and attached to the hook above, and he was moved blindfold a few steps forward. It was curious to note how the instincts of nature operated to make him careful in putting out his feet as if afraid he would walk off the scaffold. The man who stood unblanched on the brink of eternity was afraid of falling a few feet to the ground!

He was now all ready. The sheriff asked if he should give him a private signal before the fatal moment. He replied in a voice composed in tone and distinct in articulation that it did not matter to him if only they did not keep him too long waiting. He was kept waiting, however. The troops that had formed his escort had to be put in their proper position, and while this was going on he stood for some ten or fifteen minutes blindfold, the rope round his neck, and his feet on the treacherous platform, expecting instantly the fatal act. But he stood for this comparatively long time upright as a soldier in position and motionless. I was close to him, and watched him narrowly to see if I could perceive any sign of trembling or shrinking in his person; but there was none. Once I thought I saw his knees tremble, but it was only the wind blowing his loose trousers. His firmness was subjected to still further trial by hearing Colonel Smith announce to the sheriff: "We are all ready, Mr. Campbell." The sheriff did not hear or did not comprehend, and in a louder tone the announcement was made. But the culprit still stood steady until the sheriff, descending the flight of steps, with a well-directed blow of a sharp hatchet severed the rope that held up the trapdoor, which instantly shrank sheer beneath him, and he fell about three feet; and the man of strong and bloody hand, of fierce passions, of iron will, of wonderful vicissitudes, the terrible partisan of Kansas, the capturer of the United States arsenal at Harper's Ferry, the would-be Catiline of the South, the demigod of the abolitionists, the man execrated and lauded, damned and prayed for, the man who in his motives, his means, his plans, and his successes must ever be a wonder, a puzzle, and a mystery—John Brown—was hanging between heaven and earth.

There was profoundest stillness during the time his struggles continued, growing feebler and feebler at each abortive attempt to breathe. His knees were scarcely bent, his arms were drawn up to a right angle at the elbow, with the hands clinched; but there was no writhing of the body, no violent heaving of the chest. At each feebler effort at respiration his arms sank lower and his legs hung more relaxed until at last, straight and lank, he dangled, swayed slightly to and fro by the wind.

It was a moment of deep solemnity. Before us was the greatest array of disciplined forces ever seen in Virginia—infantry, cavalry, and artillery combined—composed of the old commonwealth's choicest sons and commanded by her best officers. God's holy law and righteous providence was vindicated: "Thou shalt not kill;" "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." And here the gray-haired man of violence meets his fate after he has seen his two sons cut down before him earlier in the same career of violence into which he had introduced them. So perish all such enemies of Virginia, all such enemies of the Union, all such faces of the human race! So I felt, and so I said with solemnity and without one shade of animosity as I turned to break the silence of those around me. Yet the mystery was awful—to see the human form thus treated by men, to see life suddenly stopped in its current, and to ask one's self the question without answer: "And what then?"

In all that array there was not, I suppose, one throb of sympathy for the offender. All felt in the depths of their hearts that it was right. On the other hand, there was not one single word or gesture of exultation or insult. From the beginning to the end all was marked by the most absolute decorum and solemnity. There was no military music, no saluting of troops as they passed one another, nor anything done for show. The criminal hung upon the gallows for nearly forty minutes; and after being examined by a whole staff of surgeons, the body was deposited in a neat coffin, to be delivered to his friends and transported to Harper's Ferry, where his wife awaited it.

Brown would not have the assistance of any minister in jail during his last days nor their presence with him on the scaffold. In going from prison to the place of execution he said very little, only assuring those who were with him that he had no fear, nor had he at any time in his life known what fear was. When he entered the gate of the inclosure, he expressed his admiration of the beauty of the surrounding country, and, pointing to different residences, asked who were the owners of them.

There was a very small crowd to witness the execution. Governor Wise and General Taliaferro had both issued proclamations exhorting the citizens to remain at home and guard their property and warned them of possible danger. The train on the Winchester railroad had been stopped from carrying passengers, and even passengers on the Baltimore railroad were subjected to examination and detention. An arrangement was made to divide the expected crowd into recognized citizens and persons not recognized, requiring the former to go to the right and the latter to the left. Of the latter, there was not a single one. It was told that last night there were not in Charlestown ten persons besides citizens and military.

There is but one opinion as to the completeness of the arrangements made on the occasion and the absolute success with which they were carried out. I have said something about the striking effect of the pageant as a pageant; but the excellence of it is that everything was arranged solely with a view to efficiency, and not for effect upon the eye. Had it been intended as a mere spectacle, it could not have been made more imposing; had actual need occurred, it was the best possible arrangement.

You may be inclined to ask: "Was all this necessary?" I have not time to enter upon this question now. Governor Wise thought it necessary, and he said he had reliable information. The responsibility of calling out the force rests with him. It only remained for those under his orders to dispose the force in the best manner. That this was done is unquestionable, and whatever credit is due for it may fairly be claimed by those who accomplished it.

Brown's wife, in company with two persons, went to see her husband last night, and returned to Harper's Ferry this morning. She is described by those who saw her as a very large, masculine woman, of absolute composure of manner. The officers who witnessed their meeting in the jail said they met as if nothing unusual had taken place, and had a comfortable supper together.

Many doubtless presume that Brown was executed at Harper's Ferry; but it was at the county seat (now West Virginia) in a thoroughly legal and orderly manner.

A RUNNING FIGHT.—Capt. W. A. Campbell writes from Columbus, Miss.: "I noticed in the VETERAN for October, page 519, a letter from my old comrade, W. H. (Sandy) Roby. We saw hard service together. * * * We were once after a scouting party of General Kilpatrick's force, then encamped at Draketown, Ga. When we got on their trail and had pressed them ten or twelve miles, they halted at a farmhouse, and we charged them with a yell. Then we had a running fight of about a half mile. The ejector of my Spencer seven-shooting carbine got out of order, so I had to get a stick to push out the empty shell, and upon remounting joined the fight again. Coming up with a big Federal with a Henry rifle in his hand, I ordered him to throw it down. He was slow about doing so; and as my horse was running and I did not care to leave an armed enemy behind me, I clubbed my Spencer and gave it to him back of the head, when he fell from his horse as if dead. Captain Fort was shot across the shoulders, and just missed being shot in the spine, his wound being thirteen inches long, and it put him out of the fighting for the remainder of the war. After the fight, I found my Federal with a cut about three inches long. Taking him and Captain Fort to a farmhouse, I sent for a Dr. Rogers, who dressed the wounds of both. The prisoner asked me that night why I had hit him; but he knew that he had held on to that Henry rifle too long. He belonged to the 5th Indiana."

W. H. Bachman, Magnet, Ark.: "For the VETERAN I relate a bit of history not generally known in regard to the arrest and detention of Jefferson Davis by Confederate soldiers. John Carmichael and Albert Norfleet belonged to Company D, of the 42d Mississippi Regiment, and were about the youngest members. I belonged to the same regiment. In July, 1862, while we were stationed at Camp Lee and doing provost duty in the city of Richmond, these two boys were put on the same post of duty with instructions to let no one pass without proper authority. President Davis was passing when halted, and was refused permission to proceed until Lieutenant Wilson, their commander, was informed. Then the President was permitted to go on his way. It is said that this strict adherence to orders secured for these young soldiers a dinner with the President of the Confederate States that day."

A SOLDIER'S CANTEEN.

[At an exhibition of old relics held in Jackson, Mo., there was an old wooden canteen which had been found during the Civil War just after the Confederate troops had passed which suggested the following lines by A. Hildreth, of Jackson, Mo.]

Iron-bound, stopperless, dry,
Empty, except for the air;
Found when the troops had gone by—
Now with the curios rare.
Borne through the thick of the fray,
Close to a brave heart, I ween!
Where is the soldier to-day?
This was a soldier's canteen.

* * * * *

Lay the old relic away!
Its waters once gurgled between Lips of a soldier in gray—
This was the soldier's canteen.

WHAT WAS ENDURED BY CONFEDERATE WOMEN.

[Letter by Mrs. Lizzie Lucas Dillard, Meridian, Tex., in response to an inquiry by "J. L. Thompson and other Missouri Confederates" for survivors among the women who acted as nurses in the hospital at Somerville, Tenn. It was found among the papers of Mrs. Dillard after her death, and was sent to the VETERAN by her son, H. H. Dillard, of Meridian, in the hope of reaching the inquirer.]

Mr. J. L. Thompson and Other Missouri Confederates: My attention has just been called to your letter of inquiry published in the CONFEDERATE VETERAN, of Nashville, Tenn.; and as you request, I answer through the same channel.

Your pleasant surprise opens the avenues of many sad memories, yet my heart is thrilled with gratitude that we were enabled to do something to succor the brave men whom the disasters of war had rendered helpless and for whom Southern patriotism had provided an asylum at Somerville, Tenn.

Though separated widely from the friends of that war period, I have kept in close touch with many of the nurses and matrons of the old Hardwick—hotel hospital. Most of them have answered the call of the Master and gone home to glory. Miss Lucy Dillard, that intelligent, wide-awake Dixie lover, sleeps among Confederate comrades in the Somerville Cemetery. Mrs. Pulliam, Mrs. Williamson, and Mrs. Scott are sweetly resting in the same inclosure and waiting for the resurrection which is to reward useful and godly lives. Miss Bertie Miner, the tireless reader and letter writer for the sick soldiers, and who was so savagely treated by marauding Northern soldiers, has gone too to her Father's house. And Mrs. Virginia Lucas, the active benefactor and zealous friend of all Confederate soldiers, went to her reward from Russell's Valley, North Alabama, several years ago. I alone, as far as I know, am the only surviving member of that Woman Corps that presided at the West Tennessee refuge for soldiers forty-five years ago. Then you see how time is gathering us into the fold, and there I hope to meet the valorous men who defended womanhood in the South against a cruel and barbarous invasion.

"Am I still a friend of the Confederate soldier?" Yes, and shall ever be. I regard patriotism among the loftiest possessions in the keeping of man, and the soul which does not know much of that fine fervor has missed one of the distinctions of pure manhood. Neither victory nor defeat can impair, nor can conditions change it.

"Am I still loyal to the flag of Dixie?" I love it with as much fervid zeal as in my young womanhood. And why should I not love it? I gave four years of tears and prayers for its success, four years of tireless toil to its vindication; while for full three years I was the victim of cruel and barbarous outrages at the hands of soldiers who invaded Southern homes under an alien flag.

When I recollect these wrongs perpetrated upon defenseless women and children, my very soul revolts at the reckless barbarity of Northern soldiers. While I suffered personal indignities from these "knights in blue," I am really glad that Northern women escaped the ravages of vandal hordes and knew so nearly nothing of the horrors of war. Such scenes as we in the South were forced to witness blunt the finer sensibilities of woman and put her out of her natural sphere.

Three days after the hospital at Somerville was closed and the remaining sick and wounded Confederates had been removed a raiding squad of eighty Federal soldiers dashed into the town and drove the old men into the courthouse

Then they began a system of robbery, pillage, and plunder that beggars description. Wardrobes were smashed to pieces, trunks broken open, feather beds ripped up and contents scattered—in fact, nothing of value escaped the vigilance of the barbarians. The principal sufferers were those who had been conspicuously active about this old Hardwick—hotel hospital. Somerville people will never forget the wanton destruction of their household goods and the total disregard of every sentiment of decency.

Having a home just outside of Memphis and fearing similar outrages, I moved there under the false impression that places inside the Federal pickets would give some security to person and property. But it was a delusion, and I determined to move down the Mississippi River upon our plantation, where we had the promise of corn bread and bacon from the faithful negroes who still stayed on the farm. The cavalry at Helena soon found us out and daily raided us, taking just what they wanted, even down to woman's wearing apparel. To give us a taste of "Pelion on Ossa piled," the Federal gunboats on the river picked us out for target practice. Of all terror-inspiring things to an unskilled woman, nothing exceeds those fiery-tailed monsters as they crash through buildings and explode in open air so violently that earth and air tremble with the shock.

Our only safety was in a "dugout" beneath the ground, with negro women and their children and two white women all huddled in confusion, waiting for the cessation of bombardments. With such memories you surely will not insist upon a specific answer to your question: "Are you reconstructed yet?"

While the war developed many phases of human depravity evidenced by the fiendish deeds of a barbarous soldiery, the reconstruction acts passed for our humiliation and the destruction of all our social, industrial, and commercial resources was the crowning ignominy of despotism, and furnishes a painful contrast between a monarchy and a republic.

When England in vindication of her colonial unity made war upon the Boer republic and wasted it into submission, then the purposes being accomplished, the war not only ended, but a system of wise and humane rehabilitation for the land of Oom Paul was immediately started by the British Parliament. Instead of vindictive legislation imbued with bitter hatreds, as was administered to us, England wisely and in a spirit of Christian humanity saw the advantage of pacification, and did all that was possible to build up the wasted country and inspire the brave Boers with a capacity for a new uplift. Horses, mules, cows, hogs, agricultural implements, medicine, with spinning wheels, looms, carding machines, and other household necessities, were supplied in lavish profusion, and thereby in all that makes up national greatness the monarchy of Queen Victoria excelled the Lincoln republic too far for comparison.

Now, my old friends, while I have not said half I wanted to say, it would make my letter a bore perhaps to continue it and tell you about the work of the carpetbaggers, the Federal judges, and the bogus Governors sent down upon us as vampires; so I close.

May that Almighty Providence who shielded you so signally in defense of the constitutional rights of the South in the cruel war protect you and all the remnant of the brave Confederates and bring you at last to the beautiful city!

Those who do not preserve their copies of the VETERAN would help the cause by giving to others not familiar with it.

The poem below is republished, requests for copies having been made from various sections until the edition containing it is exhausted. The paper was read to a large congregation in Chicago on the first anniversary after the Iroquois Theater fire, and copies were distributed with the Church calendar.

LINES AMONG THE PAPERS OF P. D. CUNNINGHAM, DECEASED.

You think of the dead on Christmas eve,
Wherever the dead are sleeping,
And we, from a land where we may not grieve,
Look tenderly down on your weeping.
You think us far; we are very near,
From you and the earth though parted.
We sing to-night to console and cheer
The hearts of the broken-hearted.
The earth watches over the lifeless clay
Of each of its countless sleepers,
And the sleepless spirits that passed away
Watch over all earth's weepers.
We shall meet again in a brighter land
Where farewell is never spoken;
We shall clasp each other hand in hand,
And the clasp shall not be broken;
We shall meet again in a bright, calm clime
Where we'll never know a sadness,
And our lives shall be filled, like a Christmas chime,
With rapture and with gladness.
The snows shall pass from our graves away,
And you from the earth, remember;
And the flowers of a bright, eternal May Shall follow earth's December.
When you think of us, think not of the tomb
Where you laid us down in sorrow;
But look aloft, and beyond earth's gloom,
And wait for the great to-morrow.

CAPT. SAMUEL POWELL.

Capt. Samuel (Tuck) Powell died September 2, 1908, of Bright's disease, being sixty-two years and seven months old at the time of his death. Captain Powell was born January 29, 1846, near Perryville, Ky. He went to Missouri with his parents, Golston and Mary Coulter Powell, in December, 1855, and settled on a farm on which the town of Elliott is now located, in Randolph County, Mo. He enlisted in the service of the Confederacy June 15, 1861, at Renick, Mo., and went immediately to Boonville, Mo., with his company, under Capt. C. J. Perkins, of the Missouri State Guards. Gen. John S. Marmaduke was in command of the State forces at that point. General Lyons, of the United States army, was marching to that point. "Tuck" Powell faithfully served his State for six months, the term of his enlistment. He returned home, and in the spring of 1862 enlisted in the Confederate service for three years or during the war, and remained to the close of the war. He surrendered with the Trans-Mississippi Army in 1865. In June, 1863, he was promoted to captain of a company for gallant and meritorious conduct in the regiment of Col. C. J. Perkins.

After the close of the war he came home, remained only a short time, went to his native State, Kentucky, and stayed there several months, until better feeling existed in Missouri. He then went back, entered school, graduated at Mount Pleasant College, and became professor of mathematics. He resigned to accept the position of superintendent of the high school at Roanoke, Howard County, Mo., and afterwards accepted the position of superintendent of schools at Moberly.

He was married to Miss Fannie Terrill, daughter of Rev. Benjamin Terrill, December 25, 1870. To this union four children were born—two sons (Frank and Jerry) and two daughters (Bertie and Viley), who, with his devoted wife, survive him and live in the State of Oklahoma.

Captain Powell leaves a number of relatives and friends in Missouri, Lieut. Isham Powell, a gallant soldier and officer under Gen. Joe Shelby, being his brother.

About the year 1888 Captain Powell moved to Oklahoma Territory and became an active and enthusiastic advocate of Statehood, and for several years represented his Territory in Washington, D. C., to the end that it might be a sister State of the Union. He lived to see the fruits of his efforts, his Territory a State, and had he lived longer would have been honored in recognition of his persistent efforts in her behalf. The writer knew Captain Powell well for fifty years. As a child, he was obedient to his parents and seniors; as a man, an honorable, exemplary citizen; as a soldier and officer, a hero; as an educator, he had but few equals. He was in every relation of life a gentleman.

[The foregoing is from B. H. Ashcom, Wagoner, Okla.]

COL. JAMES JASPER PHILLIPS.

The death of Col. James J. Phillips, which occurred on the 11th of February, 1908, was noted by resolutions of the Confederate Veteran Camp of New York City, of which he was a prominent member. Early in the conflict he became a member of Pickett's Brigade, and followed the fortunes of that famous commander through all of his brilliant career, being among the few who charged the Round Top at Gettysburg and lived through that storm of shot and shell. Although modest and retiring as a woman, he was lion-hearted and knew not fear. After the war, in the peaceful walks of life he won the esteem and affection of his fellow-man. * * *

To the above is added the tribute of one who had known him long and well: "Colonel Phillips graduated from the Virginia Military Institute in 1853, and for some years served as assistant professor there. He then organized the Chuckatuck Military Academy (Nansemond County, Va.), where he taught until the secession of Virginia, when he closed it and organized the Chuckatuck Light Artillery Company, was elected captain, and assigned to the duty of building a fort on the north point of Nansemond River, fronting on Hampton Roads. At the evacuation of Norfolk they were ordered to Richmond and assigned to Company F, 9th Virginia Regiment of Infantry, Armistead's Brigade, and commenced their active field work at Seven Pines, May 31, 1862. Soon after he was promoted to lieutenant colonel, and the brigade was assigned to Pickett's Division. After the battle of Gettysburg, he was promoted to colonel of the 9th, and as such served most gallantly to the end, declining promotion to brigadier general over older officers. After the war Colonel Phillips engaged in farming, and then in the mercantile business in Norfolk, some twenty-five years ago removing to New York City, where he built up a fine business. Colonel Phillips as a man and soldier was possessed of great personal magnetism, so that all who came in contact with him learned to respect and love him. Ever ready to uphold and maintain the just cause, with nothing to apologize for, ever liberal in his views and his help especially to old Confederates, with full faith in the hereafter he has passed from our midst."

MAJ. JOHN JAMES REEVE.

Maj. J. J. Reeve died at Henderson, Ky., July 10, 1908. He was born at Richmond, Va., in 1841. He was a student at the University of Virginia when the ordinance of secession was adopted by the Virginia Convention, and immediately accompanied the troops to Harper's Ferry, where the government stores were promptly seized.

He enlisted at first in Company F, 1st Virginia Infantry, but later in Company F, 21st Infantry, with which command he served in Virginia from July, 1861, to April, 1862. He was then promoted to the rank of captain and assistant adjutant general, and directed to report to Brigadier General Stevenson, then at Suffolk. He accompanied General Stevenson when the latter took command of the Confederate forces at Cumberland Gap, served with him during the Kentucky campaign under Gen. E. Kirby Smith, and then went with him to Mississippi. When General Stevenson was promoted to be major general, Captain Reeve was commissioned as major. General Stevenson commended him for gallant conduct in the battle of Baker's Creek, and he was similarly mentioned for his service during the siege of Vicksburg. After the capitulation of Vicksburg, he was paroled and later exchanged.

With the division he joined Bragg's army at Chickamauga Station, Ga., and participated in the battles of Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge. During the "hundred days' fighting" in Georgia he was constantly on duty. This campaign extended to Jonesboro and Lovejoy. He was then with General Stevenson in the Tennessee campaign under General Hood, which included the battle of Nashville. In 1865 he participated in the campaign in the Carolinas, and was in that last noted battle of the army at Bentonville. He surrendered at Greensboro.

It is apparent, therefore, that Major Reeve was in the army during the entire war, serving at Harper's Ferry in a company of students made up for that occasion at the University of Virginia. His military history is one of which his friends are justly proud.

"On many occasions his valuable services were noted in the official reports of his commander." In Volume XXIV., Part 2, page 98 of "War of the Rebellion, Official Records" Major General Stevenson in his report says: "Preëminently distinguished throughout the action of Baker's Creek, especially for his indefatigable efforts in rallying the broken regiments and taking them again into action, was my chief of staff, Maj. J. J. Reeve. For his active assistance to me on that occasion and the gallant and intelligent discharge of his duties day and night during the siege of Vicksburg I am greatly indebted to him."

In the same volume, XXIV., Part 2, page 352, Brig. Gen. Stephen D. Lee, commanding 2d Brigade, Stevenson's Division, in report Demopolis, Ala., July 25, 1863, says: "Maj. John J. Reeve, assistant adjutant general of the division, was with me on the lines upon several occasions, and particularly attracted my attention by his daring and coolness during the assault of the 22d."

In 1868 Major Reeve removed from Richmond, Va., to Henderson, Ky., where he afterwards made his home. In 1871 Major Reeve married Susan, the daughter of the Hon. Archibald Dixon and Elizabeth Robertson Cabell Dixon. One daughter, Margaret Caskie, the wife of Robert Manley Lyman, of New York, survives him.

Major Reeve was a gentleman in the fullest sense of the word. He was kind and gentle, yet positive and strong in all his intercourse with his fellow-men both in business and socially. He was honest, he was a Christian without puritanism, a learned man without egotism, a brave man whose paths were peace, and in all his walks pure and upright. He was sorely afflicted by the hand of death and with physical pain, but bore it all uncomplainingly. His friends and family loved him, and all who knew him esteemed him highly.

[Sketch by Henry C. Dixon, Henderson, Ky.]

JOHN HENRY STEPHENS.

On the 27th of July, 1908, the sufferings of John H. Stephens were relieved by death at his home, in Kansas City, Mo., at the age of seventy-nine years. He was born in North Carolina, and at the age of twenty years he went to Texas and engaged in the cattle business, in which he became well known throughout Texas and the West.

When war was being waged between the North and the South, Mr. Stephens enlisted with Terry's Texas Rangers. He was wounded in the battle of Shiloh. He never enjoyed recounting his experiences or telling of any exploits in which he had part, but was a modest Christian gentleman, content to live his life in quiet ways in the consciousness of duty well done.

Comrade Stephens was twice married, and of these unions there were two daughters and two sons, all of whom are residents of Texas. In 1883 Comrade Stephens removed from Texas to Kansas City, where he became a broker in ranches and was agent in the sale of many large estates. A comrade says of him that he "never knew a man who came nearer to living up to a high ideal."

MAJ. J. J. REEVE.

MRS. WILLIAM A. CAMPBELL.

One by one that noble band of women whose hearts and lives were consecrated to the cause of the South in the great War between the States are passing away from the land they loved so well.

Comrade William A. Campbell has suffered the greatest bereavement that can befall a true heart in the death of his wife, Mrs. Alicia Campbell, at their home, in Columbus, Miss., on the 21st of October, 1908. No better soldier than Comrade Campbell served the cause of the Confederacy, and his wife, who was Miss Alicia Campbell, belonged to a family devoted to our cause. Two of her brothers were in the army; one was killed at Chickamauga. As a girl she was faithful in ministering to our soldiers. She thoroughly sympathized with her husband in his love for the South, and it was her pleasure to minister to him in those bodily sufferings which were brought on by exposure while he was a soldier in the field. A true Southern soldier never sought her help in vain.

I ask that the VETERAN publish the following tribute to her by one who knew and loved her:

"The announcement of the death of Mrs. W. A. Campbell will bring sadness to the hearts of many warm friends in Nashville, where as Miss Alicia Campbell she lived for a number of years.

"She was active in Church and charity circles, being a member of the First Presbyterian Church under the régimes of Dr. Hoyt and Dr. Witherspoon. She left the imprint of her earnest life on the minds and hearts of all who knew her by her gentle, kind nature and the strength and firmness of the principles by which she guided her life.

"On removing to Columbus she assumed immediately the duties of Sabbath school teacher, and lived the consistent life of the wife of an elder of the Church.

"She had hosts of devoted friends there who will miss her kind ministries and uplifting leadership. Her ideals were high, and she was truer to them than one often finds in man or woman.

As a Confederate, as friend, as woman, as Christian she was tried and never found wanting.

JAMES H. MCNEILLY.

A. M. ANDERSON.

At his home, with a landscape view of unusual beauty, in Montgomery County, Tenn., on August 4, 1908, Alfred Minor Anderson, who was a good citizen, a true friend and Christian gentleman, and a gallant soldier, received an honorable discharge from life's long warfare, aged seventy-three years and one and a half months.

Comrade Anderson was born in Green County, Ky., on June 20, 1835, and came with his father, Peter Anderson, a noble character, in 1853 and settled near Ringgold, Tenn., and there lived until the fall of 1895, when he moved to the place where he died.

In 1870 he was married to Miss Bettie Lindsay Watson, of Nashville, Tenn., who preceded him to the echoless shore. Of their five children, three survive—Mrs. Jennie A. Sewell, of Louisville, Ky., Mrs. E. A. Cooke, of Clarksville, Tenn., and Peter M. Anderson, who resides at the old homestead. He is also survived by two brothers (I. M. Anderson, of Montrose, Pa., and Frank O. Anderson, of the Ringgold vicinity) and one sister (Mrs. W. S. Polk, of Baltimore, Md.).

On the 10th of December, 1885, he was again married, this time to Miss Virginia Vaughan, who survives him.

Early in 1861 he enlisted in Company A, of the 14th Tennessee Infantry, C. S. A., as gallant a body of men as ever fought in battle. He served under Stonewall Jackson and Robert E. Lee from soon after the First Manassas battle to Fredericksburg, where he was captured and held as a prisoner at Point Lookout, Md., until the close of the war, reaching home in June, 1865. He participated in many of the principal battles of that period, always conducting himself with gallantry and heroism. As an evidence of his soldierly qualities, he was much beloved by his comrades, all of whom spoke in praise of him.

He was a member of the Baptist Church and also of Forbes's Bivouac, by whom the funeral service was conducted. Old comrades bore him to his last resting place, three of whom—Dr. T. D. Johnson, Joe Williams, and I. W. Ballentine—are the last surviving members of his old company. Clad in the uniform of a Confederate soldier, in a casket trimmed with the same material, with a miniature flag of the South by his side, he sleeps well beneath the shadow of a majestic Confederate monument.

MAJ. H. C. WOOD.

Maj. Henry Clay Wood died December 3, 1907, at his home, in Florence, Ala., of heart failure after an illness of ten days. He was seventy-six years of age. He was socially and in business one of the leading men of his section. Major Wood was a native of Florence. His father, Alexander H. Wood, went there from Virginia in the early part of the century as one of the pioneer settlers of Florence. He was a younger brother of Judge W. B. Wood and Gen. Sterling A. M. Wood, both deceased. He, with Judge Wood, was a member of the old Florence Land Company, which did much for the industrial development of Florence.

Major Wood's war record was fine. He was in active service from April, 1861, until the surrender. He enlisted on April 1, 1861, at Fort Morgan as lieutenant of Company K, 7th Alabama Regiment, and was paroled at Greensboro, N. C., April 20, 1865. In August, 1861, he was promoted to lieutenant and adjutant of the 16th Alabama Regiment, and in 1863 was made major and commissary. On February 17, 1862, he was made aid-de-camp to Gen. S. A. M. Wood, serving until April, 1862, when he was promoted to major on the staff of Gen. M. P. Lowry. He participated in the battles of Shiloh, Perryville, and many other engagements.

MAJ. H. C. WOOD.

Major Wood was married to Miss Sallie Shepard, of Richmond, Va., who, with two sons and three daughters, survives him. The funeral was in charge of Camp O'Neal, U. C. V.

[The VETERAN regrets this belated notice, as Major Wood was one of its staunchest friends and patrons. The memory of his delightful amiability, coupled with that dignity of manner which illustrates the thorough gentleman and Christian, will ever be cherished by those who knew him. He performed the duties of husband, father, neighbor, and citizen thoroughly. It was hard to realize that he had lived more than half a decade beyond the allotted "threescore and ten" years.]

JOHN FORSYTH SMITH.

[This picture of Comrade John Forsyth Smith was intended to go with the sketch of him on page 587 of the VETERAN for November.—EDITOR.]

WILLIAM C. BIERKAMP.

William C. Bierkamp, formerly of Moorefield, W. Va., a member of McNeill's command of Partisan Rangers, C. S. A., died August 1, 1908, at Romney, W. Va., of cancer of the stomach. He entered the army when a mere boy, and proved a good and faithful soldier. Of a kind and genial disposition, he was greatly beloved by his comrades and friends. For more than forty years he had lived at Romney, where he amassed considerable property, and was long a trusted employee of the State institution there. A widow and several children survive him.

MAJ. CHARLES B. PEARRE.

Pat Cleburne Camp, of Waco, Tex., reports the passing of a distinguished comrade, Maj. Charles B. Pearre, whose death occurred on the 10th of August, 1908. Though a long sufferer from constitutional infirmity, he had possessed an active and vigorous mind, and was always interested in public affairs, using his energies to the advancement of his community.

He was a native of Maryland, but went to Waco in 1859, and there entered upon the practice of law.

He enlisted in the 8th Texas Cavalry, and was associated with Terry and Ross and Harrison in his service for the Confederacy. He was in the charge when Colonel Terry fell in front of the enemy near Bowling Green, Ky., where Gen. A. S. Johnston commanded in the winter of 1861-62. He continued in the cavalry service to the close of the war, and was one of the daring Texas cavalymen who made the Texas Rangers a terror to the enemy whether on picket duty, on skirmish line, or in battle array.

No less devoted was he to the service of his State in the days of reconstruction. He was the district attorney for many counties in Central Texas, and combated the malignant schemes and frauds which were attempted to be perpetrated upon the citizens of Texas and contributed his best efforts to their defeat.

Shortly after the war Major Pearre was married to Miss Earle, of Waco, whose parents were among the first settlers of the city. He was a true patriot, an honest citizen, and a faithful friend.

WILLIAM H. KIRKPATRICK.

Another drops from the fast-thinning ranks of the gray. On the 8th of September, 1908, William H. Kirkpatrick died at Bridgeport, Tex., in his sixty-eighth year. He was a native of Wilson County, Tenn., and removed to Texas in 1873, residing successively at Valley View, Gainesville (of which city he was Mayor at one time), and Bridgeport (where he was again honored with the office of Mayor). He lived there about thirteen years, and remained in active business until the close of his life.

At the beginning of the war Comrade Kirkpatrick was about twenty years of age. He joined Colonel Ward's regiment of Tennesseans, and was captured at the fall of Fort Donelson and imprisoned at Springfield, Ill. While there he was visited by his father, who contrived to furnish him with a suit of citizen's clothes and some money, and he soon after made his escape after having been a prisoner for eleven months. Returning South, he served in Capt. John D. Kirkpatrick's company, under Morgan, during the remainder of the war.

He was married in 1865 to Miss Hunt, of Wilson County, with whom he lived happily until the end. He was a Christian from the age of eighteen, warm-hearted and charitable, in whom the needy found a friend.

GOODWIN.—Died at Mineral Wells, Tex., on the 20th of July, George W. Goodwin, of Midlothian, Tex. He was born in Mississippi in 1841, emigrated to Texas about 1855, locating near the present site of Mansfield. Comrade Goodwin was among the first to volunteer in the cause of the South. He served in Company H, Buchel's 1st Texas Cavalry, for four years and seventeen days, and was a model soldier, always ready for duty, however hazardous. His life after the war was characterized by equal faithfulness and uprightness, winning for him the respect of all who knew him.

HON. SAMUEL MOSBY SHELTON.

HON. S. M. Shelton died at Horseshoe, N. C., August 11, 1908, aged seventy-one years. As a gallant Confederate soldier, as a friend and neighbor about his home, as a husband and parent, as a citizen, and as a humble and devout follower of his Redeemer, he was true. His remains were brought to his home, at Vicksburg, Miss., and his funeral was held in the Presbyterian church, of which he was an elder, August 13, 1908. There was present a large concourse of his fellow-citizens, the Vicksburg Bar Association attending as a body.

Samuel M. Shelton was a native Virginian, who went into the war with the 12th Mississippi Regiment. He was the son of Walter C. Shelton, a farmer of Hanover County, Va., and Mary Ella Mosby, a cousin of the famous Confederate cavalryman, Col. John S. Mosby. Mr. Shelton was born in Hanover County August 3, 1837, and was educated at Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia. He came to Mississippi in September, 1859, made his home at Raymond, taught school and studied law under his uncle, John Shelton, until the war began, when he enlisted as a private in the Raymond Fencibles, a company one hundred and twenty-seven strong, made up largely of college students, clerks, and young planters.

The Fencibles left Raymond April 29, 1861, and at Corinth the men were mustered into the Confederate service as Company A of the 12th Regiment, under Col. Richard Griffith. The regiment reached Manassas Junction, Va., July 22, 1861, just missing the battle of July 21, and remained in that vicinity until March, 1862, when they moved to the peninsula, and fell back on Richmond before McClellan's army. About this time the 12th was feeling much aggrieved because they had not been in battle, and declared that other Mississippi regiments were receiving all the honors. But at Seven Pines, May 31, 1862, the 12th was ordered to charge the main position of the enemy, and, advancing with four hundred and ten men, lost two hundred and five in killed and wounded in seven hours of continuous fighting.

Though it was their first battle, the men behaved with such steadiness and valor that Gen. D. H. Hill rode up in their front and concluded a fine tribute to their bravery by saying: "Within the limits of your State resides my only brother, and in your soil rest the remains of my dear departed mother. I had always intended to remove her remains to North Carolina and let them mingle with the ashes of her ancestors; but, Mississippians, since I witnessed your brave conduct on last Saturday they shall ever sleep in your soil."

Private Shelton shared the service of this regiment in its subsequent battles in the Seven Days before Richmond, at Second Manassas, Sharpsburg, and Fredericksburg. In the spring of 1863 he was transferred to Company A of the 44th Virginia, of Jubal A. Early's old brigade of Ewell's Division, with which he fought at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, the Wilderness and Spottsylvania C. H. In the latter battle, May, 1864, he was captured, and thereafter he was a prisoner of war at Point Lookout, Md., and Elmira, N. Y., until taken to Richmond and paroled, March 3, 1865. While waiting exchange he visited his old home, and there was informed of the evacuation of Richmond. Mounting a horse, he followed General Lee and heard the last guns at Appomattox.

In December, 1863, he had been married between the lines to Imogene Gray, of Raymond, and took his wife to his father's home. After the war they returned to Mississippi, and Mr. Shelton began the practice of law at Vicksburg in January, 1866, beginning a professional career which was in a high degree successful. He was one of the leading lawyers of the State. After the death of his wife, in 1885, he married in 1887 her sister, Annie Gray. He left a son and daughter.

[The foregoing is from R. Y. Johnson, of Guthrie, Ky.]

SENATOR ALBERT WEBER.

Hon. Albert Weber died at his home, in Hickory Withe, Tenn., August 5, 1908. He was born in Memphis, Tenn., March 27, 1840, was of German descent, and to this parentage was indebted for the tireless energy, methodical ways, economy, and thrift for which he was noted. About the time of attaining his majority he enlisted in the Confederate army April 23, 1861. He was drum major of the 15th Tennessee Regiment, consolidated with the 37th Regiment near Wartrace, Tenn., in 1863. He was in the battles of Belmont, Shiloh, Perryville, Murfreesboro, Hoover's Gap, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Buzzard's Roost, and the many engagements from Dalton to Atlanta. He was injured at Jonesboro by the explosion of a shell. He was with Hood's army in his Tennessee campaign, and was in those memorable battles of Franklin and Nashville. Comrade Weber was never ill or absent from his command except when on furlough and when he became separated from the army in the last few months. He was paroled in April, 1865, and was admitted to the Confederate Historical Association February 18, 1906.

He twice represented Fayette County in the State Legislature, and at the time of his death was State Senator. He was widely known and esteemed throughout his section.

So loyal was he to the Confederate cause that he requested to be buried in his old uniform. He was especially noted for his loyalty to any cause he espoused and to his friends. He was married to Miss Fanny Ivy in 1866, who survives him with six children; also a sister, Mrs. John MacKenzie, of Cleveland, Ohio. He was buried with Masonic honors.

HON. ALBERT WEBER.

LIEUT. W. A. BROWN.

W. A. Brown, of Deasonville, Yazoo County, Miss., died at Vicksburg on November 7, 1907. He was in Vicksburg in attendance on the Reunion when the summons came.

Comrade Brown was born in May, 1839, near Troy, in Obion County, Tenn. At the breaking out of the war he was Agent for the Mississippi Central Railroad at Duckhill, Miss., and enlisted soon after the first call for troops at Grenada. He was elected second lieutenant of his company, and was connected with Stanford's Battery.

Lieutenant Brown served throughout the entire war with rare fidelity and regularity. He was not absent from a single battle in which his company was engaged. Some of these battles were Shiloh, Corinth, Murfreesboro, Perryville, Chickamauga, and the many between Chattanooga and Atlanta with Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. He was with Hood when he made that ill-fated expedition into Tennessee, and was in the bloody conflict at Franklin. He laid down his arms with Johnston at Greensboro, N. C.

He was a gallant soldier, a faithful friend, and a high-minded, noble gentleman.

After the war Comrade Brown engaged in the mercantile business at Deasonville, which he conducted without an interruption up to the day of his death, a period of nearly forty years.

CAPT. REDDEN MCCOY.

Capt. Redden McCoy died at his home, in Kemper County, Miss., on March 23, 1908. He was born in Monroe County in 1832, and moved to Mississippi with his parents in his youth. He was reared on a farm, and was a farmer by occupation.

At the breaking out of the war he volunteered in the Confederate service, enlisting in Company A, of the 35th Mississippi Infantry. His first regular battle was at Corinth, and he afterwards carried a scar as a memento of that event. He was in the siege of Vicksburg, and also served in the Georgia campaign. His last service for the Confederate cause was rendered at Blakeney, Ala., where he was taken prisoner of war and sent to Ship Island.

Captain McCoy was a gallant soldier of the highest type. He was never known to murmur or to shirk a duty. He served as Commander of Thomas H. Woods Camp, U. C. V., for a number of years; but failing eyesight caused him to resign from the command, much to the regret of his comrades. It was his great pleasure in declining years to have visits from his comrades, with whom he would talk over recollections of their soldier life.

Captain McCoy was twice married, first to Miss Josephine Mosley and next to Miss Sarah McConnel, who survives him with ten children of the two unions, all useful members of society. In early life he became a member of the Baptist Church, and always took an active part in its services. He bore his afflictions with Christian fortitude, and the memory of his faithfulness to every obligation is a precious heritage to his children.

JUDGE J. M. WRIGHT.

The Gainesville (Tex.) Daily Register printed first on its title-page November 9, 1908, the following introduction: "Seldom if ever in the history of Gainesville has its citizenship been more heart-pained and sorrow-shocked than on Sunday morning about 7:30 when it was announced that Judge James M. Wright had passed to his heavenly reward."

In its sketch the Register states:

"Judge Wright was a Gainesville pioneer, having settled here with his family in 1883. He was born in St. Helena Parish, La., July 24, 1842, and was therefore in his sixty-sixth year.

"In 1860 he enlisted in the 3d Louisiana Infantry, and served with signal bravery and distinction throughout the war between the North and South. He was wounded at Rome, Ga., in the right arm.

"At the close of the war the then young soldier returned to his home, in Moorhouse Parish, to be elected district attorney, a position which he held for six years.

"After moving to Texas he served as city attorney of Gainesville, and in 1900 he was elected county judge, which position he held four years. His law partner in Gainesville was Hon. W. L. Denton.

"Judge Wright was conspicuously active in the cause of education, and was long a member of the school board of his city.

"On the funeral occasion court was adjourned and public schools were dismissed.

"He was long Commander of the Joseph E. Johnston Camp, U. C. V., and was a constantly zealous friend of the VETERAN for many years.

"Judge Wright's family consisted of his wife, Dilla S., his son, Clinton Wright, of Globe, Ariz., and a daughter, Mrs. George A. Frierson, of Ada, Okla."

From Judge Wright's last letter, Gainesville, Tex., Oct. 3, 1908: "I am real sorry you have been given so much trouble in reference to the unveiling of the monument at this place on June 3. Miss Dougherty's given name should be spelled 'Loucy.' She was sponsor at the unveiling. The Lon Dougherty Chapter, of this city, took the name of Miss Loucy Dougherty's grandmother. Her grandfather was Capt. F. M. Dougherty, of the Confederate army, and died here several years ago. He was a man of great wealth and President of the First National Bank in this city. W. H. Dougherty, son of Capt. F. M. Dougherty, is the father of Miss Loucy Dougherty, and he also is a man of great wealth. Miss Loucy Dougherty has returned from an extended trip through Europe. We regret it was not in your power to be with us at the unveiling of the Confederate monument. With continued good wishes."

EVERETT.—J. A. Everett died at his home, in Cabot, Ark., September 25. He was born in Alabama eighty-five years ago, and moved from there to Mississippi, thence to Arkansas. His service for the Confederacy was in General Cabell's brigade. He was a member of James Adams Camp, U. C. V.

MAJ. CLAY STACKER.

Few people know that Maj. Clay Stacker was one of the volunteer escorts of President Davis after the surrender of General Lee. President Davis took ten of the escort and left for Washington, Ga., May 10. Private Clay Stacker then volunteered as one of an escort of fifty to Gen. J. C. Breckinridge under the command of W. C. P. Breckinridge. On leaving Washington, Ga., Gen. J. C. Breckinridge was informed that a battalion of two hundred and fifty Union soldiers were just down the road under Major Andrews. Clay Stacker, then a beardless boy, was sent with a flag of truce requesting that they be allowed to "go in peace," that the Confederates had no desire to molest Andrews's men. The request was refused, and an "unconditional surrender" was demanded. Breckinridge replied: "You have my ultimatum." Clay Stacker delivered this message, and Andrews's reply was: "Go in peace."

Whether in Georgia a tried soldier or in Virginia as a college boy in the battle of New Market, Clay Stacker knew his duty.

Our Maj. Clay Stacker, the patriotic, unselfish, sober-minded man and Christian gentleman, leaves as a priceless heritage to his children the cross of honor of the Confederacy and a bronze medal for special gallantry at New Market.

Clay Stacker, who saw duty as through the eyes of R. E. Lee and Sam Davis, as son, father, and friend, soldier or citizen, ranked as one of the most useful men of our State.

He was born in Stewart County, Tenn., and was called to his final post of duty from his home, in Clarksville, Tenn., September 13, 1908. Duty was his battle cry; duty his goal, his ambition. It mattered not whether public opinion was for or against him, duty was his fetich; and when his final command came, it left no mark upon his manly brow.

[The foregoing is from a sketch by Boyd Johnson.]

J. M. GATELEY.

J. M. Gateley was born in Madison County, Tenn., in 1825; and died at his home, near Camp Nelson, Lonoke County, Ark., on September 21. He was a gallant Confederate soldier, serving in Company A, 47th Arkansas Cavalry. He was a man loved and respected by the community in which he lived, and his generosity of spirit was shown in the donation of the land for a Confederate cemetery, now called Camp Nelson. He was a member of Camp James Adams, U. C. V., and his burial services were by his fellow-members of the Camp and Masons.

COL. EDWIN R. SMITH.

Col. E. R. Smith was born in Washington County, Va., November 14, 1828; and died October 8, 1908. When he was twelve years of age, his father, Thomas Jefferson Smith, moved to Russell County, where the remainder of his life was spent. In 1861, when the drum beat the Southrons to arms, he was among the first to respond to the call. He raised a company of infantry at Lebanon, Va., his company becoming a part of the 29th Virginia Regiment. He was captain until sometime in 1863, when he was promoted to the rank of colonel. His regiment was in General Pickett's division, and he participated in many of the bloody battles of the Army of Northern Virginia. He bore himself in the fiery ordeals with firmness and courage to his honor. Colonel Smith was considered the finest drillmaster in the division. He was once wounded, shot through the right hand at Drewry's Bluff.

Colonel Smith was the eldest of seven brothers, all of whom were in the Confederate army. He was a man of extensive learning, and possessed a wonderful memory. Although he had been paralyzed for several years, his mind was clear and bright until the last. In spite of affliction, he was always patient and cheerful. He made his home with his daughter, Mrs. B. F. Ball, Richlands, Va. He was a member of the Methodist Church. After a long and useful life, he has crossed "over the river" to join his comrades.

DR. C. WATKINS.

Dr. Claibourne Watkins, a pioneer of the medical profession in Arkansas and a member of one of the most prominent families in the State, is dead. Dr. Watkins was the second son of Chief Justice George C. Watkins and Mary Crease Watkins and was born in Little Rock March 2, 1844. He was a student at St. Timothy's Hall, a noted school at Catonsville, now a suburb of Baltimore, Md, when hostilities began in 1861, and left his studies to return home and enter the military service in defense of his native State. Soon after reaching Little Rock he went to Benton, where a company was forming, enlisted as a private, and was later made lieutenant. The company was mustered into the Confederate service as Company B, 11th Arkansas Infantry. At New Madrid, Mo., he was elected to the captaincy of his company in 1862.

He was of the garrison surrendered April 15, 1862, and was a prisoner at Camp Chase, Ohio, and at Johnson's Island six months. When the regiment was exchanged at Vicksburg, Miss., in October, 1862, it was consolidated with the 12th Arkansas and later with the 17th, and, being mounted, was assigned to duty in Eastern Louisiana, where Captain Watkins participated in skirmishes and scouting expeditions during the Federal operations against Port Hudson and Vicksburg. In one of the engagements near Port Hudson in the summer of 1863 he was again captured by the Federals, but after a month's confinement at New Orleans he escaped from prison. Subsequently he was on duty with Gen. S. D. Lee's command until the close of the war, surrendering at Jackson, Miss., in the Department of the Gulf, Gen. Richard Taylor commanding.

After the war he studied medicine, and was graduated from the Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia in the class of 1868. He began his practice at once in Little Rock, where he was a leading practitioner for the greater part of his life.

In 1873 in St. Louis he was married to Miss Mildred Farley, of Mississippi, who survives him.

CAPT. J. K. P. MCFALL.

In the latter part of June, 1908, Capt. James McFall died in Austin, Tex. Captain McFall was born in Maury County, Tenn., and was engaged in engineer service in construction of the Nashville and Decatur Railroad until the beginning of the Civil War. He was a volunteer in the Maury Grays, one of the companies forming the 1st Tennessee Regiment, and continued in the army without intermission until the surrender at Greensboro, N. C. Returning to Tennessee, he resided in Nashville, being most of the time employed in the office of the City Engineer until 1875, when he removed to Austin, Tex., where he afterwards resided.

In January, 1869, Captain McFall married Miss Mary Patterson, of Nashville, who died in December, 1904. He is survived by two children, Mrs. George Mendell and Mr. Polk McFall; also by two sisters, Mrs. Thomas Crosby and Mrs. John Kirby—all of whom reside in Austin, Tex.

ROBERT E. LEE—A PRESENT ESTIMATE.

BY MISS CHRISTINE BOYSON, MINNESOTA.

[The United Daughters of the Confederacy supplies the prize paper from the Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York, under the above caption. The prize of one hundred dollars offered by the United Daughters of the Confederacy for the best essay written on the South's part in the War between the States was awarded to Miss Christine Boyson, of Minnesota. Miss Boyson was a student of remarkable ability, and displayed from the first a genius for English. The committee making the award is composed of Dr. Alderman, Chairman, President of the University of Virginia; Dr. C. Alphonso Smith, Department of History of the University of North Carolina; and Dr. John H. Finley, President of the College of the City of New York. This work was inaugurated a few years ago by Mrs. Livingston Rowe Schuyler, who is untiring in her efforts to promote a truthful record of the War between the States. The topic chosen by the committee of which Mrs. Schuyler is Chairman was "Gen. R. E. Lee" for 1907—his centennial year.

While the able judges have awarded the one hundred dollars to this Northern girl, the VETERAN is unwilling to make record of it without protest against several statements; such, for instance, as: "Intellectually the South was practically dead. Most of the people were densely ignorant." Again: "To do now what he [General Lee] did then would be treason, for the Civil War has since taught what is right in this regard." "We shall have come to think of Lee as the English did of Washington, * * * for indeed he differed from the greater Washington only in choosing the wrong side. * * * He had to struggle with ignorant and inferior assistants who often misunderstood his orders and often made his faith in them a cloak for carrying out their own designs. * * * Often he had his own valor and the loyalty of a few men to oppose the almost boundless resources of the North. Western leaders were always incompetent," etc. It is consistent with the spirit of the writer to use the term, "lost cause." Let Southerners all stop using the term.

It seems most unfortunate that the prize paper given out by the United Daughters of the Confederacy, under the critical examination of the eminent scholars at the head of these highly reputable schools of learning, should be published as a history to eulogize the great and good General Lee at the expense of nearly all that is true of the South and her people. This scholarship is given for the best essay on subjects pertaining to the South's part in the War between the States, the United Daughters of the Confederacy to appoint the judges to examine the papers; and the winner of the scholarship is required to remain and pursue the subject, the aim being to secure the study of correct history from the South's view-point. Verily the writer of this essay has much to learn, but the United Daughters of the Confederacy will hardly contribute to her further education unless she changes teachers.]

The ingratitude of republics is proverbial. A land where every man is a potential hero accepts heroic service as her due, awards it the plaudits of the hour, and straightway forgets its origin. The sublime poem lives on, but the poet is forgotten; the invention inaugurates a new industrial era, but the inventor dies neglected in a garret; the ship of State launches forth into a wider and calmer sea, but those whose patriotic devotion tided her through the storm sleep in unvisited graves.

Happily, however, a newly discovered manuscript, a chance investigation, a political crisis brings back the half-forgotten name with all the new meaning of accumulated years. Ruskin may be right when he says that all great work was meant to be done for nothing; but some one else has said with equal truth that no heroic service is ultimately unrecognized; and whether or not the speed which marks every phase of present-day American life has also quickened the American sense of appreciation, at least it is true that here the process of accepting a hero is a much shorter one than in England. Milton waited nearly two centuries for Wordsworth's immortal sonnet, and Cromwell even longer for the statue that should testify to his real place in the hearts of all Englishmen; while here the memory of Robert E. Lee's public life is still fresh when the centennial of his birth calls forth expressions of an estimate that bids fair to be both just and permanent.

It is a matter of significance that the new voice should arise in the North, where until the past decade the hatred and bitterness of the war have still been kept alive. Yet one cannot but note as a striking feature of the recent centennial the noble tribute and lofty praise on the part of Northern orators and the Northern press. That sectional feeling should die so soon is a fact unprecedented in the history of any other war of like magnitude and importance, but that close upon its death should sound a tribute to the very spirit of the enemy is nothing short of a miracle.

This change in attitude has come about through a new understanding of the Southern cause and of Lee himself. Men speak now not so much of the war of the rebellion as of the war of the States. (This view is set forth in an editorial article in Outlook, Volume LXXXIV., p. 955.) As we look at it from a distance it takes on the aspect not so much of a social or economic upheaval as of a great human tragedy followed by a great calm and a wider vision. Nowhere is this more observable than in the contrast between the present spirit and that which marks the accounts written just after the heat of the conflict. Even where these historians purport to give an impartial account they have much to say about the "Rebel cause," in a defense of which the "ringleaders of the conspiracy" sought to raise themselves into "lords and potentates" over "the ruins of their country." The slaveholders were "arrogant barons" accustomed to exercise "despotic control" over "wretched serfs" until they had come to regard themselves as "the only gentlemen and legitimate rulers of the land." These histories abound in accounts of "Rebel atrocities" and "Northern patriotism," of "Yankee ingenuity" and "Rebel cunning;" Southern mistakes are instances of "infatuated ignorance" and a Southern victory always a mystery. Lee is the arch traitor, and every movement of his army is made synonymous with vandalism and lawlessness. (Most of these epithets are borrowed from "A History of the Civil War in America," by John S. C. Abbott, and published in 1866.)

All such accounts are manifestly prejudiced and exaggerated; nevertheless they indicate what in essence at least was once a widely prevalent attitude. On the one hand, there was the South engaged in a rebellion against the established government; on the other hand, Lee, already a Union officer and distinguished as such for his splendid services. When such a man could consent to lead in such a cause, there was but one name for his conduct.

It is just here that the new estimate diverges from the old. It maintains that Lee's attitude toward the war was inevitable.

It goes even farther: it insists that any other attitude would have been treason to his own convictions and to the social order of which he was the finest representative.

To understand what this social order was, one need but glance at the conditions of the South as contrasted with those in the North at the opening of the war. In almost nothing were they alike. The South was of necessity agricultural. Life was centralized chiefly on the great plantations or in scattered communities. In the North a vast commercial system had grown up under the leadership of great captains of industry and concentrated in flourishing cities. Slavery had to a great extent gone out even before 1808 because industrially it was unprofitable, while in the South the increased production of cotton with its dependence upon cheap labor had vastly increased the slave population. The loss of slavery as an institution would, therefore, involve the loss of an enormous capital; industries dependent upon it would inevitably shrink; above all, it would mean the destruction of the whole social fabric, for in the South slavery was bound up with society. Intellectually the South was practically dead. Most of the people were densely ignorant; hence the great religious and educational movements which in the North had built a church and a schoolhouse at every crossroads had swept by them unheeded.

But most significant of all is the fact that these different social and economic conditions had enforced different conceptions of government. The idea of an indissoluble union had early grown up in the North and had been strengthened by the incoming of vast hordes accustomed to a paternal system of government. "No State," said Lincoln, "can upon its own mere notion lawfully get out of the Union. * * * The Union is unbroken, and, to the extent of my ability, I shall take care * * * that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States." ("The Appeal to Arms," by J. K. Hosmer, p. 15. American National Series.) The same theme, union now and forever, kindled Webster's loftiest eloquence. His opponent in that famous controversy of ideals was the voice of the whole South. For a long time events there had hastened the secession movement. In a country where the mass of the people accepted ready-made opinions misconceptions carried ideas forward and made false maxims seem working principles, so that before 1860 the people in general believed they had a right to secede. They maintained that of all rights not expressly delegated to the central government this was the most important, inasmuch as it was the only one that could prevent the central government from becoming a despotism. They were, first of all, citizens of the State and owed their first allegiance to it. The whole South was impregnated with the idea that anything else was treason. (Chapter III. of a new life of Lee written by P. A. Bruce.)

It was as the product of such doctrine that Lee stood. But he stood for much more, and it is in this additional fact that the North has found ground for its bitterest criticism. Were he merely a Southerner his conduct might be defensible; but he was the son of a Revolutionary officer; he held a position of honor in the Union army; through his wife he was connected with the Washington family; back of him stretched a long line of heroic souls, the pride and boast of Virginia. He was born and reared on the soil that had fostered some of the staunchest defenders of the Constitution. How could such a man with such a heritage take up arms against the cause for which they had fought?

We answer that in this very fact lies the explanation of his decision. His training and the natural bent of his own mind had bred the deepest reverence for those immortal names. Indeed, this was the common feeling of Virginia as a whole. She shrank from the thought of secession because of the recollection of proud men who had stood for freedom. She knew, moreover, that if she seceded her soil would become the battle ground of hostile forces. But when it came to a question of coercion by a power which in common with all the Southern States she felt to be external, there was but one course of action open to her.

This was the position that Lee took. He loved the Union for which he had fought; but when the Union became an invading army, he must act. He realized that his decision would probably draw many Southerners into the conflict, that his Arlington would become a camping ground of the enemy, that his loyalty would be questioned; but the soil of Virginia called him, and to that call there could be but one answer. The slave system with which he thus took sides was vastly different from the general institution of the South. In Virginia that order still retained some of its patriarchal character; it was dignified and not material. "If I owned the four million slaves of the South," he writes, "I would gladly sacrifice them to the Union; but how can I draw the sword on Virginia, my native State?" (Outlook, Volume LXXXIV., p. 955.)

Personally Lee had everything to gain by any other decision. He was the most prominent man in the Federal army; he had already been offered the command of its forces. (See Trent's "Robert E. Lee," "Chronology of Lee's Life," also Long's "Memoirs of R. E. Lee," p. 91.) But to him duty was the sublimest word in the language, and so he threw himself and all he had—his home, his fortune, his chances of personal advancement—into a desperate cause. He was a traitor in that he sacrificed all to aid the enemies of his country, "but so were George Washington and John Hampden and William of Orange." (C. F. Adams in a speech: "Shall Cromwell Have a Statue?") But things which are technically of the highest criminality may at times be of the least disgrace. To do now what he did then would be treason, for the Civil War has since then taught what is right in this regard. But the matter of secession had purposely been left open by the framers of the Constitution, and in the minds of many sincere people both North and South it was still a question. (Page 16 Hosmer's "The Appeal to Arms," American National Series.) The real issue was not between patriotism and the want of it, but between two forms of it, and the point to be borne in mind is that those who believed in one conception were as loyal as those who clung to another. To the Southerner loyalty meant loyalty to the State and duty meant going with the State in victory or defeat. Judged from this standpoint, the willingness to sacrifice anything but honor, Lee and the South he represented "constitute the real patriotic riches of the nation." (Outlook, Volume LXXIV., p. 646.) The tragedy of the situation lay in the fact that there were patriots on both sides, and the beauty of it now lies in the spirit in which both sides have accepted the outcome of the war as the best. Before long we shall come to think of Lee as the English have come to think of Washington, whom lately they regarded as a rebel; for, indeed, he differed from the greater Washington only in choosing the wrong side.

This justification of Lee's attitude toward the Union may be noted as the first and in some respects the most important aspect of the new estimate of him. But there is at least one other regard in which a great change of feeling has come about, for there have not been wanting those who, while they granted the purity of his purpose, still found fault with his military career in a way that made him scarcely less despicable than if he had acted from the basest motives. He plunged his State and the whole South, said they, into a disastrous war by the influence of his own reckless example. He accepted the command of the Virginia forces before his resignation from the Union army had been passed on at Washington. ("History of United States," by James Schouler, Volume VI., Footnote, p. 67.) He declared at first that he would fight only to protect his State; he soon fought everywhere. ("History of United States," by James Schouler, Volume VI., p. 67.) He issued orders that whoever would serve the Rebel cause should have the privilege of leaving the stockade and finding plenty of food and clothing. ("The Boys of '61," Coffin, p. 412.) If he did not directly order the starvation of Union soldiers, he at least did nothing to prevent it. ("The Boys of '61," Coffin, p. 412.) He was always on the defensive. He made no vigorous attacks. The plans for his battles were narrow and incomprehensive.

Much has been said by the South in an attempt to explain these matters and to refute the aspersions cast by the older North upon Lee's generalship. Yet one cannot but feel that his real place as a commander can never be determined by answering the questions that arise in connection with any one or all of his battles. More and more we are coming to see that any estimate of Lee's generalship that does not take into account the whole military situation he had to face must be unfair and prejudiced, for it is upon the way in which he acquitted himself in that situation that his title to permanent greatness will ultimately rest.

Lee undertook the defense of a country without a navy, vulnerable in almost every point because of its waterways, against what was at least the nucleus of a strong navy in the North. He undertook a war against great captains of industry without any of the splendid resources of the system they represented. He accepted the command of a few raw and untrained troops in the midst of a population vastly uneven in temper and character. He had to struggle with ignorant and inferior assistants who often misunderstood his orders and often made his faith in them a cloak for carrying out their own designs. Moreover, a conservative estimate places the total levy of the South on the basis of three years' service as only about two-thirds of the levy of the North. (J. K. Hosmer, in "The Appeal to Arms," p. 9, American National Series.) Discipline was always loose and officers often insubordinate. At times he had only his own valor and the loyalty of a few men to oppose to the almost boundless resources of the North. Western leaders were always incompetent, roads were poor, supplies were scarce, and, above all, the Confederate government was lamentably inefficient. As a result of such a combination of conditions it is little wonder that Lee's generalship was marked by the failures that have given his enemies so rich a field for criticism. At Fredericksburg he failed to crush the enemy by not pursuing Burnside; his seven days' fight around Richmond was rendered inglorious by his failure to control his forces in such a way as to bring his strength to bear on the adversary's retreating column; the battle of Malvern Hill was scarcely more than an incoherent and unorganized struggle.

Yet Lee will go down in history as one of the great generals. His skill as a strategist and tactician, together with his splendid audacity, is unsurpassed in all history. He displayed unerring insight into the idiosyncrasies of his adversary and adapted himself with wonderful versatility to meet his antagonist. He watched a favorable opportunity; he weighed and calculated the chances of success, and only this made it possible for him to hold out as long as he did against such tremendous odds. He disciplined a few scattered troops into an army that could withstand a long-established and highly organized government; he laid down a system which in its essential features remained unchanged throughout the war. Somehow when military skill was wanting his audacity served him, and in studying the lives of great leaders one cannot but be impressed with the fact that after plans had been coolly and judiciously laid it is this audacity that wins when it is the outcome of judgment. This was the secret of Lee's success, and for this he deserves all the credit the South gives him. Moreover, he constantly grew in military power, being never greater than in his final campaigns, which are faultless instances of baffling a great power with small resources. The outcome of the war cannot detract from the glory of that army or himself.

But it is neither as the product of a civilization that is past nor as a commander that Lee will be given a permanent place. For neither as the exponent of a form of patriotism which the results of the war have made treason nor as the leader of a lost cause could he attract anything but sentimental interest. His real worth lies in the spirit of the man himself, the loftiness and dignity of his character, the richness and fullness of his soul. The fact that these graces were united with a fine presence and a courtly manner goes far perhaps to explain why he has been so unfortunate in his biographers. "They have painted him," says Mr. Hosmer, "not only free from all faults, but from all foibles. Not content with traits of greatness, those who describe him have dwelt often upon petty things—his well-cut beard, the correctness of his dress, the whiteness of his teeth, his proper deportment—until one almost expects to read as he turns the pages that his hair was never parted awry and that he never ate with his knife. The only trace of shortcoming in him that one diligent reader of the accounts of him has been able to discover is that he sometimes slept in church when the sermon was dull. Such abnormal absence of defect becomes depressing; one longs for the discovery of a fault to redeem to humanity a hero so flawless. We can admire but hardly sympathize with a character entire and perfect." ("The Outcome of the Civil War," by J. K. Hosmer, p. 298.) Doubtless his fine presence and his genial, sunny manner cast an irresistible spell over all who came into personal contact with him; but for the historian of a later day to represent him as a man of stainless virtue is to make him ridiculous. Moreover, such characterizations will mean less than nothing to the children of a future day when those who felt his magnetic charm shall have passed away. It is therefore a source of gratification that the newer estimate has found a basis for these extravagant tributes in the qualities that abide. This is especially true in the North, for in the South the feeling for Lee has never been mere sentiment. To them "Marse Bob" has been a term of genuine endearment. It is impossible to realize the enthusiasm for him that prevailed during the war. After the war it became almost consecrated, for it then had the added touch of sympathy. By the older Southerners he is still held in greater reverence than Washington or Jefferson, and with the younger generation there is no abatement of this feeling. The South takes delight in his memory because the whole spirit of his public life refutes the indiscriminate aspersions cast upon their social system by the constant insistence on the part of the abolitionists that they were trying to perpetuate an economic system that was repugnant to the growing enlightenment of the age.

But local prejudice and sectional hatred have long blinded the North to the real beauty of Lee's character, for even those who knew him best never lost sight in the contemplation of his human greatness of the fact that he was still the leader of what to them was a seditious cause. It has been for the children of a later day to come into an understanding and appreciation of the feeling of the South. We see in him the combination of certain great forces, an air of "stately columns and fragrant gardens," which to the North gives him a unique charm. We see in him something vastly more significant for our time—a splendid public spirit, especially after the war. He accepted its result as a fact, and spent no time in idly repining over lost hope or fighting again the battles of the war, as so many Southerners did. He allowed no thought of the struggle to interfere with his duty. His home, his fortune, the strength of his manly vigor were gone; but he accepted none of the gifts and none of the offers of a home which friends both in England and the South poured in upon him. He chose to remain in America, the scene of his labors and his defeat. When a lucrative position with an insurance company to be established at Richmond was offered him, he declined it, although he was at that time very poor. He felt, he said, his inability to care for funds which he believed were a sacred charge both for the living and the dead. He refused the governorship of Virginia lest the North should mistake his motive, and gave himself instead to the comforts of home and to educational endeavor. He accepted the presidency of a college disorganized and poor; he left it rich and crowded. To the system he there inaugurated educators still go for inspiration and guidance. He enlarged the scheme of studies; he put himself into personal contact with every student; he allowed no discussion of the war or any criticism of General Grant or the North. His gracious, kindly manner pervaded the whole university. He believed that education was the greatest need of the South, and in this later events have proved him something of a seer. "He stands as the champion of reason rather than passion, of fairness rather than prejudice, of progress rather than reaction, of constructive work rather than futile obstruction." ("General Lee's Place in History," by Edward Mims. Outlook, Volume LXXXIV., p. 978.) This we of the North have come to believe, and in such a recognition of human greatness the land is moved forward into the light of a happier day. Men who, like Charles Sumner, placed Lee in the catalogue of those whose cause bears the "primal eldest curse, a brother's murder," and handed him over to the "avenging pen of history" have been succeeded by men in his own State who have voted a monument to his memory.

Nor is this all. Everywhere over the North the literature of the Civil War is filled with a different spirit from that of forty years ago. In our schools the citizen of to-morrow is being taught a broader conception of patriotism and a truer meaning of what constitutes real public service. Everywhere Lee is fast coming to take his place side by side with Lincoln as a hero for all time.

In the light of this new feeling the resolution placed before Congress not many days ago (March 27) providing for a monument to stand in the nation's capital is peculiarly fitting and significant. Should the bill pass the House, such a monument will rise where the North and the South meet together to solve the problems that still confront us. It will stand as the testimony of a great and free people to one of the supreme leaders among men. It will rise grandly eloquent of a spirit not intoxicated by glory, not crushed by defeat, unspoiled by praise and success—the spirit of Robert E. Lee.

THE CIVIL WAR—BEFORE AND AFTER.

This little book, "All Around the Civil War Before and After," is printed in excellent style by the Wynkoop Hallenbeck Crawford Co., New York City. The author, William Hawn, is a native of Alabama, and was a member of the 7th Louisiana Regiment. It is dedicated "to the noble women of the South and to the memory of those who have passed away, who through long years of trial and almost inconceivable privation devoted their efforts with Christian zeal to encouraging the soldiers in the field, to nursing the sick, and to comforting the dying."

In the preface the author says: "This booklet is only a compilation of certain well-known recorded events: matters of history, opinions of and expressions by many men, with some reflections by the compiler. Its object is not to reawaken the animosities of half a century ago; far from it. The hope of the compiler is to truthfully present in concise form the reason why the Southern States seceded, to relieve the Southern people of the charge of treason, to set forth briefly the efforts they made to maintain peace, in order that their descendants may not under the influence of so-called histories, false, partisan, and vituperative, cease to honor their fathers."

The book begins with the first permanent settlement by Englishmen in America in 1607. It refers briefly to the injustice and bad faith of England by which the colonies were driven to rebel; it refers to the Union formed under the "Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union," from which all the States afterwards seceded; calls attention to the fact that the New England States, especially Massachusetts, were first to assert and claim the right to secede; and it records how and by whom African slavery was introduced into the country, and also how and by whom the exchange of prisoners was stopped during the war. The author's style is lucid and his arguments convincing.

The historical truths set forth are of vital importance. The publication contains much in concise form. Our children and our children's children should know its contents. The book is cordially recommended.

The price is seventy-five cents, and it may be obtained from the author, William Hawn, 442 Classon Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

R. I. Holcomb, of St. Paul, Minn., writes: "I have recently subscribed for the VETERAN, and need not say that I am highly pleased with it, and wish I had every number from the beginning. I regret that I did not know about the VETERAN sooner. I used to take the Southern Bivouac; but it went down, and I did not learn about the VETERAN until recently. I served three years and six months in the Federal army, and I recognize that theré were two sides to the Civil War, and we can never get a correct idea of that great struggle until we hear what both have to say. The VETERAN fills a long-felt want in this respect. If my old comrades among the Feds throughout the North only knew about the VETERAN and just what it is, I think you would have ten thousand new subscribers within thirty days."

A HOLIDAY OFFER.

People of the South:

The first ready to mail December 1; the latter one of the most highly appreciated books dealing with Southern history, indorsed by the most brilliant men in our section, of which a very few copies remain.

The Dred Scott work is not alone the only true history but as well the most startling of this famous American case. The author, a lawyer and historian, has given a strong defense of the decision and a pleasing and gratifying justification of the view the Southern people took of the situation; and the errors of the North are fearlessly exposed. The author shows slavery to have been a mere incident, while vital questions of government were the issues. Technical points made clear and the more than two hundred large pages thrillingly told. Indorsed by some of the best lawyers and historians in the South. Both works in neat cloth. After this, price of new work alone is $3. Add twelve cents for postage. Address

"THE UNKNOWN."

BY ALEX. W. BEALER.

Afar from friends who loved him well,
Amid the battle smoke alone,
This well-beloved soldier fell
To sleep throughout the years "unknown."

What loving mother watched for him
With longing eyes and speechless moan?

How many eyes with tears grew dim
Because this soldier died "unknown?"

But God, who watches over all,
Knows well the one beneath this stone;

And when the angel's trump shall call,
He shall no longer be "unknown."

Capt. James M. Palmore, of Company K, 10th South Carolina Volunteers, C. S. A., was killed in the battle near Atlanta, Ga., on the 28th of July, 1864. Captain Palmore's haversack, containing a Testament, fell into the possession of Capt. David A. Logan, a Federal soldier, who now lives at Patoka, Marion County, Ill. Captain Logan states that this Testament is in a fair state of preservation, and that he is anxious that some of the family or friends of Captain Palmore should have it, and he will take great pleasure in answering any communications in regard to it.

Mrs. Elizabeth Stewart Longbottom, 3318 Woodland Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa., is anxious to hear from any one who was with her father, Charles M. Stewart, during the war. He enlisted at Lexington, Mo., in June, 1861, in Company A, Capt. J. Moreland, under Col. John P. Bowman, Weightman's Brigade, under Gen. Sterling Price. It is said that Mr. Stewart was later elected second lieutenant, and went with the main army across the Mississippi River. His daughter will appreciate hearing from some of his comrades.

Mrs. E. L. Freer, of Clifton, Tenn., who takes subscriptions to magazines, asks to be remembered when ready to renew. She is a helpless cripple, and by this means is trying to pay for a home. As the widow of a Confederate soldier, she is deserving of whatever assistance can be rendered by those who have the veterans' interests at heart, and she will be deeply grateful for patronage extended in the way suggested.

the only remedy that will cure by external application; no stomach drugging, but direct and local application for all Skin Diseases, Eczema, Acne, Tetter, Salt Rheum, Scaly Eruptions, Sores, Itching, Bleeding, and Protruding Piles, and Chapped Hands. It has no equal. In fact, it acts as if by magic; stops itching immediately, and is guaranteed to do as represented or money refunded. One trial will convince the most skeptical. It is within reach of all. Salve can be obtained at Salvator Remedy Co., 2844 Locust St., St. Louis, or by mail to any part of the United States on receipt of $1.20.

A Testimonial from an Ex-Confederate Veteran

Sometime in January I saw your advertisement in the CONFEDERATE VETERAN for Salvator Remedy for Eczema, and I got a one-dollar box and used it as directed. I soon found it was doing me much good, sent and got two more boxes, and now feel as well and free from eczema and better than I have in forty years.

I was broken out at times with a stinging, burning, itching fire from my head to my knees. I have tried a number of doctors, but they did me no good. They gave me Bull's Sarsaparilla, S. S. S., Liquezone, and a number of other unpleasant things to swallow, also advised vapor baths and Hot Springs, Ark., mineral wells. I have spent hundreds of dollars on other humbugs.

I now feel it my duty to tel the world of Salvator Remedy and its wonderful cure on myself. I was for a number of years passenger conductor on the N. & D. and L. & N. railroads, lived in Grays n, Lamar, and Hannin Counties, Texas, for thirty years, and am sixty-seven years old. I am known in Tennessee, Alabama, and Texas.

A. N. Hamilton, of Comanche, Tex., asks for information regarding the fate of J. A. Hamilton, who was a member of the 35th Georgia Regiment, Thomas's Brigade, French's Division, Hill's Corps, A. N. V., and was seen after the battle of Gettysburg, in which he participated, but has not been heard of since.

Mrs. J. W. Fisher, R. F. D. No. 6, Box 15, Lebanon, Tenn., wishes to hear from any one who can testify as to the service of J. W. Fisher in the Confederate army. He belonged to Company B, 4th Tennessee (Starnes's) Regiment. She wishes proof of his having served to the close of the war.

 ber of regiment. Kindly write to Mrs.

J. A. J. Taylor, of Short, Miss., wants to hear from some member of Company
 E, 11th Tennessee Infantry, who can testify as to his service and enable him to get a pension.

An inquirer asks for the name of the adjutant of the 13th Virginia Cavalry, stationed near Culpeper, Va., under
 Gen. "Rooney" Lee, Gen. J. E. B.
 Stuart, and Colonel Chambliss. He was later promoted to major.

Arch F. Park, of North Fort Worth,
 Tex., is anxious to secure the war record of his father, Arch L. Park, who was a railroad man at the beginning of the war, and went into a Tennessee cavalry regiment under Forrest either from Robertson or Giles County. He was said to have been a quartermaster or wagon-master.

Mr. Charles Hickey, of Waco, Tex.,
 R. F. D. No. 3, is trying to secure the war record of his father, J. P. Hickey, of which he knows only a part. He says his father ran the blockade from Delaware, and enlisted in the Maryland troops, 4th Maryland Battery. His second captain was named Brown, a son of Mayor Brown, of Baltimore, and his third and last captain was Chew, who after the war lived in Georgetown, D.
 C. Comrade Hickey drifted South after the surrender, and he afterwards surrendered at Meridian, Miss. Any additional information will be appreciated by the family.

J. W. Hardin, of Terrell, Tex., would like to hear from or of three girls whom he assisted in getting to the train on their way to Macon, Ga. Their mother had been driven out of Rome, Ga., with four children, and she wished to send the three girls to an older son in Macon.
 Comrade Hardin says it was in the latter part of June, 1864, and he and a comrade were returning from a scout up toward Dalton and had asked for something to eat at the place where this woman was with her children. She requested their assistance, and with the permission of the lieutenant in command an old carriage was procured and the girls taken across the country to get the train. The name of the family was Wilkerson, and he recalls that one of the girls was called "Duckie." He would like to know if any of them are living.

Abraham Lincoln Said:

"Neighbors, Give Your
Boys and Girls
A Chance"

These are the words

used by the great emancipator in his famous speech, delivered at his old home to his friends and neighbors at Springfield, Ill.

Recalling what little opportunity he had in his early youth to get an education, and looking back to the days when he walked miles and miles for a book (for he then owned none of his own), Abraham Lincoln pleaded with the rural and village people, his old friends and associates to give their children a better chance—a chance to fight the battles of life successfully.

SURELY YOU want to give your boys and girls a better chance, not necessarily a college education, but better still, a home education. It is not always the school that gives the education; you can give this same opportunity or better to your family right in your own home. Good books—valuable books. Oh! how Lincoln cherished these.

What would Lincoln have said had you asked his advice on buying a great History of the World, an entertaining and educational Library for your home, "The Library of Universal History," and especially if we offered it at less than half of the regular price and on easy terms?

We want you to see these volumes, examine them in your own home without any expense on your part, then you can decide. That is what the family in the picture below have done. Mail the coupon now before you forget it. See the volumes themselves—it costs you nothing.

Note the quiet, peaceful, happy home scene, the family gathered around the table under the bright lamp, old folks and young folks reading the Library, and the child looking at the pictures. Surely you want to bring your family. Do not neglect the opportunity, do not wait until tomorrow but cut out and mail the coupon at once.

The American Underwriters Corporation, receivers in Bankruptcy, invites you to examine this Library of Universal History in your own home for an entire week absolutely free of charge.

We wish to prove to you that our enforced offer of the remaining sets of this magnificent publication, at less than cost, is the most stupendous book offer ever made. A new publication from cover to cover, prepared by a staff of great historians. Cost to produce nearly $250,000. Heartily endorsed by America's greatest scholars and teachers.

HERE is the greatest opportunity ever offered—an opportunity for our readers to secure at less than half price these fifteen beautiful volumes.

This offer is made possible by the failure of the publishers, The Union Book Co., of Chicago—hundreds of sets of this work have been sold at 50c each and they are worth every cent of it, but we now name you a rock-bottom bankruptcy price of only 50c after examination and $2.00 per month for 1 month. It is impossible to name a lower price for cash to full, as this is less than half the publisher's price and is made only to close out the few remaining sets quickly.

WITH THIS HISTORY you may sit beside the madman, Nero, on his awful throne; touch his mantle and hear him speak. Walk with Caesar and gain inspiration from his genius of the Romans. Enter the ancient Coliseum and behold once more the martyrdom of the Christians, whose bravery and sacrifice of life among hordes of red-jawed jungle beasts, paved the way for the Christian religion in Rome. Ride beside Alexander the Great, whose steel-booted charger dashes over the blood-stained battle fields of his career. Stand beside the mighty Nelson at Trafalgar, and hear his hoarse commands as the English fleet sweeps the power of France from the ocean.

Look once more at the glory battle field of Waterloo; see English and French in mortal combat, see the mighty Napoleon striking like a madman, the old guard around him, scanning the field and realizing his iron reign was over; then talk with him at St. Helena, where, standing alone, he gazed over the trackless ocean, watching the miles gather and dissipate as had his power and greatness. Travel back for sixty centuries when man was but a being of the forest, as unlike the man of today as we are unlike the lowest in the grade of humanity. Attend the Dacchian banquet of the ancient kings of Assyria and Persia; watch their mighty armies clash. Go to ancient Babylon, walk its streets and see and hear as you would in the days of Balthezer.

Stroll among the pyramids of Egypt and pry into the wonderful secrets which their majestic relics of a highly advanced to their enormous bosoms; sail down the Nile and visit the ancient cities, the great white walled cities which flourished a thousand years before the dawn of the Christian era; see Greece in her regal power, overcome by the hordes of Rome; only to fall and crumble and decay; then go through the wars of the English and cross the ocean to our own shores.

Watch the starving lines of patriots battling against the bullets of the mother country; grasp the hand of Washington at Valley Forge, walk through the snow with him and hear his cheering words to his shivering, tired army; sit with him on his wide veranda and talk with him at Mt. Vernon; follow the thrilling rise of our own republic and pass through the dark days when brother was arrayed against brother. Know the mighty rail-splitter, Lincoln, as he was stand beside Grant at Vicksburg, or beside at Gettysburg; hear the awful cannonading and see the dusky lines cut to pieces. See the valor and the courage of the gray, through the very eyes of the indomitable Lee, view all these thrilling events as if the world were passing once more before your own eyes.

To own this history means you need never spend a lonely evening. It is enlightening to converse with the children of destiny. To be associated with great men and events is to be great oneself, and you will add to your store of knowledge, which is power, and to the richness of your life.

Rev. Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus,
President Armour Institute
and Pastor Central Church
(Auditorium) Chicago, says:

"Without the slightest touch of religious or political bigotry, the editors of the 'Library of Universal History' have dealt soberly and deeply with the forces of church and state which have ruled mankind. With great scholarship they have not become dull; with a trained and genuine power of imagination they have never become vague. It is a work of real genius; its thought is clear and vigorous, its English pure and eloquent. I am certain these volumes must be of immense popular service in stimulating historical study in our country."

Sen. William B. Allison,

The Grand Old Man of Iowa, says:

"I have recently bought the 'Library of Universal History,' and find the topical arrangement of the matter especially advantageous for ready reference and take pleasure in recommending this valuable work as well as the plan for its distribution."

The recent Confederate Reunion held in Nashville was brought to a successful close by a street parade, in which the National Casket Company carried off first honors for the most artistic display in the commercial division. This is the third successive occasion in which the National Casket Company has carried off first honors, and therefore their floats are always looked for with much interest.

As a model design for Confederate Reunion display, the above illustration shows how well merited the award, while it evidently possesses advantages regardless of the sentimental features. In a description of this float a Nashville daily paper stated:

"The huge float of the National Casket Company was first in the procession. It consisted of a realistic imitation of a marble sarcophagus representing the South's chest of sacred memories. The chest was draped with Confederate flags and guarded head and foot by a Son and Daughter of the Confederacy dressed in their respective uniforms. On the base of the sarcophagus was inscribed: 'Your Sons and Daughters will forever guard the memory of your brave deeds.' The float was drawn by four large black horses draped with heavy netting and fancy trappings, and attended by four outriders in livery, altogether making a handsome and artistic appearance very pleasing to all who saw it."

departed leader. He made eloquent reference to his death in the great cause of prohibition, and said that this cause would yet triumph, a statement that was greeted with applause that was emphatic and prolonged. Mr. Hughes then took up the alleged causes leading to the assassination of Mr. Carmack and showed how had he yielded to the requests or demands of his slayer his usefulness would have ben ended and a great blow would have been struck at the freedom and the integrity of the press of the State. Mr. Carmack had died a martyr to principle. Beautifully and tenderly did Mr. Hughes invoke the blessings of Almighty God upon the widow and the son of Mr. Carmack. He said that they were a sacred heritage to the people of this community and this State and should be comforted, sustained and helped through life.

Mr. Hatcher's tribute was beautifully worded and spoken with deep emotion. He also characterized Mr. Carmack as a martyr to duty; his life was sacrificed in the cause of good government.

No more feeling or expressive tribute was paid to the departed by any of the speakers than that of H. P. Figuers, who had known Mr. Carmack from early boyhood. Mr. Figuers told of how shortly after the close of the last campaign Mr. Carmack had said to him that if he could know that his boy would never be able to find an open saloon he would be ready to die. He urged that the fight for his cause should continue.

Congressman Padgett, who had known Mr. Carmack from early boyhood and who had been associated with him in all the walks of life and finally serving with him as a member of Congress while Mr. Carmack was in the Senate, made a most appropriate address. Mr. Padgett manifested much feeling while speaking of the departed. He said that not only was Mr. Carmack a great man, but he was a good man; he was a pure man and no power and no influence could swerve him from the path of duty or make him betray the people's interests.

J. H. Dinning spoke briefly but with much feeling and eloquence and his tribute was a masterpiece. He placed the departed Senator upon the highest pedestal and said that his fame and his works would endure forever. He called upon the people to dedicate themselves anew to the work which the Senator had been unable to complete because of his untimely end.

The tribute of James A. Smiser, who was a school-mate of Mr. Carmack in the famous Webb School at Culleoka, was a notable effort. Mr. Smiser was filled with emotion and it was with much difficulty that he spoke. He traced the life of the brilliant statesman from the hour that he met him in the school room until his death. He declared that he had been assassinated because he had dared oppose and expose the corrupt political powers that are in power in Tennessee.

TEXT OF RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

The report of the Committee on Resolutions was then submitted by J. I. Finney and unanimously adopted. This report follows:

Edward Ward Carmack was born at Castalian Springs, Sumner County, Tennessee, on November 5, 1858. He died at Nashville, Tennessee, at the hands of assassins on November 9, 1908. He fell a martyr to Duty. The manner of his taking off was a shock to every law abiding citizen of the Nation and his assassination deserves and will receive the severest condemnation of every right thinking individual.

In the death of Mr. Carmack this Nation was deprived of one of its ablest leaders; this State was bereft of its greatest, its most gifted and its noblest son; this community suffered the loss of its brightest, its best and its most useful member. Truth lost its most intrepid and uncompromising advocate; Right and Justice were left without the most fearless, able and determined defender those virtues had in our county and our citizens were separated from a good neighbor and wise counsellor.

Tennessee stands bowed in grief at the bier of her martyred son, but it is here in Maury county where he lived for so long, where he was best known and therefore best beloved that the grief at his untimely taking away is the most poignant. The people of this county had known its departed leader in boyhood, in early manhood, in the days of poverty and of struggle; they had watched with paternal pride his rapid rise to the front in the ranks of the country's greatest men; they knew his private walk as others did not and could not know it; they were more intimately acquainted with his character than the people elsewhere; they better knew those virtues which entitled him to be called Great, hence he was more devotedly loved in Maury county than in any other section of the good people for whose cause he gave his life's blood. Words could not adequately express the grief of his friends, his life-long associates and his neighbors at his death. It is, however, fitting and proper that this people should leave in written form some feeble expression of that deep and lasting affection, that unbounded admiration, that firm and unquestioning faith that they had for and in him, whose memory and virtues we assemble today to commemorate.

As a private citizen Carmack was loved, honored and admired as few men have been. As a legislator he was faithful to his trust and true to the people who gave him his commission; as an editor he was courageous and intensely devoted to the right. In every duty of life, in every station to which he was called, in every cause which he served, his course was characterized by a rigid adherence to principle and by uncompromising hostility toward wrong. He loved the right. He prized his honor above any earthly possession. His hands were kept clean. No tainted dollar ever passed into his pockets. He was true to every obligation of life, public and private.

Edward Ward Carmack was a patriot in the truest sense; an altruist, a man who loved his fellowman; a man who cared little for the gratification of ambition and almost nothing for earthly possessions. He was magnificently endowed with that most rare and estimable of virtues—moral courage. He made no compromise. He never stopped to ask whether victory or defeat would be his portion. "Is it right?" This was the only question he ever asked or considered; it was all that he wanted to know. A hundred times he had the ability and the power to compromise for his own advantage, but he spurned with contempt every suggestion of compromise. He loved his people, to their interests early in life he dedicated his talents and his very being, and what he did not conceive to be for the welfare and advantage of the people of his State and his nation he opposed with all the ability, the vigor and the power of his matchless intellect and noble character.

Mr. Carmack was a brilliant editor, he was a wise and astute statesman, a courageous and devoted defender and advocate of truth and righteousness and the chosen standard-bearer of the cause of clean politics. All his powers he consecrated upon the altar of his country for the common good. As legislator, as editor, as private citizen, as a Senator of the United States, as the dominant factor of a great political party in his State, his powerful resources of mind and heart were ever enlisted for the cause of civic righteousness. Never did braver knight go to war in a worthier cause than did Edward Ward Carmack when he enlisted under the stainless banner of God and Home. It was while holding that banner far above the ramparts of vice and corruption and immorality that he received the mortal wound.

Although brave, determined and aggressive, our departed leader was gentle and chivalrous, a true knight in the highest and best acceptation of that term. Although not for all the money in all this world would he have stooped to an ignoble deed, he was as sympathetic in the presence of need and affliction as was ever a sister of mercy. He was generous and charitable to an extreme but his benefactions were without ostentation. He was of that character of men who count life worthless, a thing to be despised if it be not lived worthily.

Mr. Carmack's faith in the goodness of God, in the redemption of mankind through the blood of the Savior was simple and childlike. He loved the word of God. He read no book with such devotion, such constancy or pleasure as he did the holy scriptures. He accepted every word therein written as the inspired word of God, and in no public man of his generation is there beheld a better understanding or a higher appreciation of the eternal truths of the Book of Books, than in Mr. Carmack. His speeches, his editorials and his lectures abound with quotations from the Bible and with illustrations produced by constant and devoted study of the book. Likewise his character reflects the impress that was made upon his mind and heart by almost constant association with the lives of the saints through the interpretation of their words.

In every sense of the word Mr. Carmack was a great man. He was great in intellect; great in character. His ideals were the highest and his ambitions the loftiest. He knew no call but that of Duty; he acknowledged no master but the divine ruler of the universe; he served no interests but the interests of all the people. His highest ambition was born of an unselfish desire to contribute to the welfare of his neighbors, his county, his State and his nation. He refused most tempting financial offers because their acceptance would have deprived his State of his services.

Mr. Carmack came to this county when a fatherless boy. He contributed to the support of his mother. His early life was one of poverty and hardships, but by his own strength of character, his determination and his perseverance he soon won a place in the affections and the appreciation of his associates and at the early age of twenty-four was elected a member of the County Court. Although he held higher positions of trust in after life in none did he show greater fidelity to duty than when a member of the County Court. He was rewarded by a grateful people two years later by election to the Legislature, where, while one of the youngest members he soon took first rank as a debater and parliamentarian.

After he returned from the Legislature Mr. Carmack again took up the practice of his profession, but in 1886 he accepted a call to the editorial staff of a Nashville daily. His work as an editor attracted the attention of larger papers and 1892 he became editor of a Memphis paper. In the great campaign of 1896 the owners of Mr. Carmack's paper did not agree with him upon the paramount issues. His convictions were not for sale and he promptly resigned from the most lucrative and agreeable position open in Tennessee to his profession. In the same year he was elected to Congress. In the House he served two terms and on March 4, 1901 he entered the Senate. No legislator in the history of this country who served so short a period in the Congress ever left so great an impress upon his nation. He was universally acknowledged the most brilliant member of the Senate. He took rank with the foremost men who had spent decades in the world's most august body. Had he continued in Congress and his life been spared he would unquestionably have occupied a place in our parliamentary history that is held by Edmund Burke in England. In the Senate where Webster and Clay and Calhoun and Carpenter and Sumner and Ben Hill had been accounted the standards of greatness, Carmack took high honors. He was loved and admired by all who prized a fair fighter and respected ability and integrity and he was feared by all who sought to secure unfair advantage or prostitute the people's interests to selfish ends.

His last campaign was his greatest. Never did his noble qualities shew to finer advantage; never was the innate greatness of his character so well manifested; never did he battle with more zeal, more fidelity and more courage than when bearing the standard of Home and Sobriety. He incurred the enmity of all who were entrenched behind the bulwarks of crime and vice and oppression. His tragic death came ere victory crowned his efforts, but his cause was just and holy and we have an abiding faith that it will triumph. The accomplishment of the reforms for which he freely gave his life will be the most enduring memorial of his work.

To his widow and orphaned son we, the people of Maury county in memorial meeting assembled, tender our deepest sympathies and we pray that God may comfort them in this their darkest hour and that He may lighten their load of sorrow. He is a father to the fatherless, and may He be a comforter and a companion to her who journeyed through life with our departed leader. May the words of the divine Master "My Grace is sufficient for Thee" abide with and comfort those of his family who have been bereft his love and his counsel.

Resolved that this memorial of our friend and neighbor and leader shall be properly inscribed and transmitted to Mrs. Carmack and that a copy be published in the Columbia Herald and the Nashville Tennessean.

ADDRESS OF HON. G. T. HUGHES.

At the memorial services on Sunday afternoon in honor of Senator Carmack, Hon. G. T. Hughes said:

"We are here as neighbors and friends, as those who have known him longest and loved him best, to pay homage to the life and character of Edward Ward Carmack, and to express as best we can our deep grief at his untimely and tragic death and our heartfelt sympathy for his bereaved loved ones. There are in this audience those who were united to him by ties of marriage and blood, some who have known him from childhood, some who were the comrades of his boyhood years, and many, and I among that number, who have known him from his earliest young manhood. Who have followed his fortunes with unabated interest to the hour of his death, and have given him our unflinching trust, and our support in his every aspiration and endeavor. All present, whether they have been personally associated with him or not, are familiar with his character and the principle events of his life. And I may say, and truthfully say, as I believe, that in this vast audience, not one present but will join us in heart and spirit in paying this tribute to his memory.

"Before such an audience, even if time would permit, it would be unnecessary to review the incidents of his remarkable career. It will be sufficient if we take a view of his character as it was evolved from the processes of his life's work, of the man as perfected by his years of struggles, defeats and successes.

"We do not claim for him that he was a perfect man, no he was a very human man, and no one would have resented such a claim with more emphasis than he would have done himself, for he felt an unutterable scorn for all sham and hypocrisy. He was free to confess his faults. Not that he was insensible to them, or indifferent to public censure, but that he did not want to appear better than he was; that he did not and would not lead a double life. It was this spirit of openness and frankness that made those of us who knew him best resent with so much earnestness the charge that was brought against him during his recent political campaigns that he was insincere in his protestations to the cause of prohibition, or in his life. We knew that a more loyal and true man to his convictions and to his high ideals never lived.

"There was a period in his life, when his character seemed to hang trembling in the balance, and when we who were deeply concerned in his welfare, and who knew the possibilities of the man, looked with deep concern upon his course, but at that period of his life, he met and loved the woman whom he afterwards won, and it was to her influence and splendid character more than anything else, he owed his rescue from the perils which beset him, and the state and the nation owes to her a debt of gratitude for the splendid influence exerted by her in helping to mould and bring to their highest excellency the splendid traits of manhood for which our dead friend was so distinguished. And what a consolation it must be to her to feel that in this indirect way she has helped him to build such an imperishable monument.

"It was just about this time too that he was called to the editorship of one of our largest daily papers, a work so well suited to his peculiar talents.

"His success was immediate and phenomenal, but this success, caused him to realize perhaps as he had never done before the responsibility which his genius and remarkable power over the minds of others had imposed upon him.

"Through the channels of our daily newspapers there sweeps the current of commercial and business life, of society and political thought, but through it also sweeps the current of that dark stream of sin and crime. As he sat with his hands upon the public pulse he could feel the throbbing of humanity, the crime, the sin, the fearful consequences which flow from the liquor traffic were revealed to him as he had never seen it or dreamed of it before, and hence it was that early in his career as an editor he declared himself the relentless foe of the low dives and gambling hells of our larger cities, and engaged in the work of reformation in his adopted city. He declared on a public occasion in the city of Memphis that 'if he were the prosecuting attorney in that city he would make it so hot for the disorderly element, for the keeper of the low dives and the gambling hells, that they would be glad to swim the Mississippi River to escape the conflagration.'

"He favored the rigid enforcement of the law against this class of outlaws, he favored more stringent regulation. He then advanced to the idea of local prohibition whenever it could be obtained, and was in the fight at many points to secure prohibition locally. He was so outraged by the bold and defiant attitude of this lawless element, by their constant and persistent disregard and violation of the law, that he felt it to be his duty, when an officer of the law had been shot down in his effort to arrest a law-breaker, that he volunteered his services in the prosecution of the offender, and made one of the most powerful appeals to the Jury for the enforcement and vindication of the law that was ever heard in any of the courts of the State. His next step was but the logical sequence of what had gone before of his deep rooted convictions. He had seen that prohibition was effectual wherever it had been tried, that none of these communities would again return to the liquor traffic and he became a State-wide prohibitionist.

"I have adverted at length to his work as an editor and in the cause of prohibition, because it is so intimately connected with the causes leading up to his death.

"It was known at the time Mr. Carmack assumed control of The Tennessean, that he would advocate State-wide prohibition and that he would do so notwithstanding the declaration in the platform in favor of local option, that he did not consider that he was bound by this declaration of the party, he insisted that it was not the voice of the party, but of the whisky power, with what ability he pressed these views upon the public, and with what success, may be told in the fact that when the result of the last election was declared it was found that a majority of those returned to the legislature favored state-wide prohibition.

"He knew as did possibly every man in the state who gave the matter any consideration, that every power and influence possible would be exerted to prevent any such legislation, that untold thousands could be commanded to debauch and win the chosen representatives from their allegiance to the people.

"He knew that the Governor would exert every atom of his influence to prevent it, and he knew that Col. Cooper was himself equally hostile to such a law. He knew, too, the close and intimate relationship which existed between Col. Cooper and Gov. Patterson's administration. I am not speaking of their mere personal friendship. I am giving utterance now to matters of public history, well known to every reading man in the State. He knew that Col. Cooper was the Chief Counsellor, the Prime Minister so to speak of the Governor, that it was his genius that presided over the convention that first nominated him for the office of Governor, that in the last legislature, he perhaps more than any other one individual, sought to carry out by his own personal influence, the policy of the Governor, by having his opinions and recommendations enacted into law. He knew that Col. Cooper was largely responsible for the management of the last campaign, and for the declarations that were made by the so-called State convention. He also knew that Mr. Cox, the former Governor, had while a member of the legislature at one time opposed every effort to secure prohibition, that his loyalty to the cause of State-wide prohibition was seriously in doubt. He knew that between Governor Patterson and former Governor Cox there existed or had existed the most violent personal hostility, that there was no ground upon which these two former enemies could meet, without retraction, and public retraction of the severe charges which had been made by one against the other and by both alike. He did not believe that two gentlemen could with any degree of self respect meet in friendly conference, after all that had passed unless proper explanations had been made to the public and this was the sentiment which pervaded his editorial comment on this meeting.

"When therefore the meeting of these two men was made public it startled the State. Naturally people inquired what could be the meaning of such a meeting and Mr. Carmack in his paper merely gave utterance to what was on the tongue and in the mind of every one. He did not charge that they had met to consider means of preventing the legislation for which Mr. Carmack was so earnestly striving but he so worded his comments that they would either be forced to a denial, or silence would mean confession, and they were silent. Now Col. Cooper is said to have brought about this meeting and I have never heard it denied that he did do so, or that he participated in the meeting.

"I feel free to speak of this matter not merely because it is a matter of history, but because Mr. Carmack's utterances in regard to this meeting, and those connected with it, have been made the subject of a bitter attack upon his character. And as we are here to express our views of his character, it is proper that we should vindicate his good name. I feel free to speak of it because whatever Mr. Carmack may have said editorially, would furnish no justification either in law or morals for his murder, and would hardly be a matter of legitimate inquiry in a prosecution for such offense, except to show a motive for the crime, or possibly to mitigate the offense from murder in the first degree to murder in the second degree. I feel free to speak of it because a great principle is involved which concerns not only the public weal, but personally affects the editor of every newspaper in the land.

"Now it is charged that Mr. Carmack had assailed the character of a private citizen, and held him up to public ridicule without just cause. No man would resent the action of an editor in assailing the character of a private citizen who had given no adequate cause for such criticism sooner than myself.

But there was nothing in the article objected to, which in the slightest degree reflected upon the personal honor of Col. Cooper, nothing which would justify even the most sensitive 'Southern gentleman' in resorting to arms to heal his wounded honor.

"But was, and is Col. Cooper a private citizen, he did not hold a public office that is true, but he was an active force in politics, and an active force in resisting the very policies which Mr. Carmack was advocating with all the energy of his nature. From his past course, Mr. Carmack was justified in believing that he would persist in his endeavor to defeat State-wide prohibition.

"The men who control public policy, who are perhaps most influential in placing laws upon the statute books, are frequently, perhaps generally, not public officers. The political Boss is never an official, he elects governors, legislators and minor officials, and brings his influence to bear upon them to secure desired legislation. The man who waits in the purlieus of the legislative halls as a lobbyist is not a public official. Is it to be held that a newspaper shall not be permitted to comment upon and render abortive the acts of those who are striving to prevent what the editor may conceive to be for the State's best interest? Mr. Carmack knew as every other man knows that publicity is the best way to prevent the defeat of the people's will. He knew that with the public gaze riveted upon each and every member of the legislature, that with every movement and combination brought to light, these men would not dare to repudiate their pledges to the people who elected them. If Col. Cooper had the right to demand that his name should not be again used, then every other man who was proposing to exert his influence, however sinister it might be, or however corrupt would have had the same right. Mr. Carmack could not afford to give the pledge exacted of him, even though the penalty of a refusal to do so was death. Had he yielded, he would have been forced to resign his position. Col. Cooper was not proposing to retire from politics. If Mr. Carmack therefore had yielded to his demand, he would have been left free to engage in combinations and exert his influence whenever and in whatever way he saw fit. Was this what he was seeking, or was it really anger at what was said?

"Mr. Carmack declined as any brave, courageous, true man would have done, let the consequences be what they may, and he paid the penalty with his life; therefore we say he died a martyr to duty. And they can not snatch from the brow of our dead friend the crown of a martyr won by his noble self sacrifice and devotion to duty and place upon it the brand, 'vindicative defamer and libeler.'

"I would be glad to speak of his work in other fields of usefulness, but there are others to follow me, who will do so more appropriately than I could.

"Our leader is dead and we scan the horizon in vain to see the coming man who is to fill his place, but dead though he be, his spirit animates his followers and we will press forward to victory, the banner which he carried shall not trail in the dust. With that lodestar, which was the beacon light of his life. 'Clearly in our own eye, we will each true man stand truly to his work in the ship, and with undying hope, will all things be fronted, all be conquered. Nay with the ship's prow once turned in that direction, is not all, as it were well.'

"They are proposing to erect a monument to the memory of this great man and I shall gladly contribute to this purpose, but my friends he needs no monument to perpetuate his name. He has already built a monument in the grateful hearts of his countrymen, 'a monument more lasting than brass, more imperishable than marble or granite,' but if we would build a monument that would add to his bliss in paradise if such a thing be possible, let us build that monument on our statute books in a law for State-wide prohibition."

ADDRESS OF HON. E. H. HATCHER.

The following is the beautiful eulogy of Hon. E. H. Hatcher at the Carmack memorial service on Sunday:

"We have not yet recovered from the shock of Senator Carmack's cruel assassination. We seem yet to be stupefied, as if held in the thrall of a hideous nightmare.

"But this is 'a time for memory and for tears,' and not the fitting occasion for expressing our just resentment and righteous indignation. But I can not forbear to say that, as Edward Carmack was so shamefully shot to death almost within the precincts of the former home of James K. Polk, and within the sacred presence and holy sunlight of the statue of the martyr, Sam Davis, his virtues and his public services were 'pleading, like angels, trumpet-tongued, against the deep damnation of his taking off.'

"He has fallen, a martyr to civic righteousness and honor and to his vow to exterminate the whiskey power in Tennessee.

"He put behind him every ambition save that of duty. He resigned and cast aside every passion and every purpose, save that of rescuing his beloved State from the cruel clutches of a remorseless and corrupt political machine and the domination of the liquor traffic.

"To have accomplished this noble purpose, he would gladly have laid down his useful life, "So that the sacrifice ascend to heaven."

"He left a deathless lesson—
A name which is a virtue, and a soul
Which multiplies itself throughout all times

When wicked men wax mighty, and a State

Turns servile."

"We know not whether "THE LAW" will mete out even handed justice to those who are responsible to God, and should be held responsible to man, for his cruel death; for we know how often, too often, it happens that "In the corrupted currents of this world

Offense's gilded hand may shove by justice."

"But, in the great forum of an enlightened and awakened public sentiment, 'The action lies in its true nature.' We cannot catalogue his virtues, for time would not permit. As a private citizen, his life was one of stainless honor. Power could not bend or warp, neither could gold corrupt or influence his conduct in private life or public service. In his death the American republic has suffered an irreparable loss. Hushed is his matchless eloquence; yet its influences remain deeply imbedded in our republican institutions. Silent is the marvelous genius and inspiration of that pen, which was arresting the combination of an unscrupulous political machine and a still more unscrupulous traffic. But his unconquerable spirit, born of a splendid genius and an inflexible sense of duty, will long outlive all those of us who are now pouring out our tears, like rain, over his untimely fate.

"Ed Carmack never affected to wear 'The napless vesture of humility.' He despised hypocrisy and cant more than any man I ever knew. The most wonderful feature of his remarkable career as a public man is that, in his speeches and debates before the people as a candidate for public office, he was never known to utter a word which even malice could torture into flattery of any class of men.

"As truly as it was said of Ciceronianus, could it be said of Edward Carmack that "He would not flatter Neptune for his trident

"Or Jove for his power to thunder."

"Just upon the eve of his debate with Gov. Taylor, I handed him some verses that I had clipped and cherished for years, upon THE LABORING MAN, every line of which was instinct with truth and beauty; I suggested that he repeat it in his speeches, in the coming canvas. He read the verses, expatiated upon their beauty and force, but gave no intimation of his purpose to use them. He never did so. Yet no man who ever lived had more respect and honor for the exalted dignity and crowning glory of labor; and none ever had a more genuine admiration of the laboring classes than he. He had fought his way in life through extreme poverty, from the plow handles to a commanding position of national influence in the Senate of the United States. But he scorned the arts of the demagogue; and would not for any earthly reward, have practiced the tricks of flattery or servility to any man or class of men. Yet those of his tens of thousands of friends, who knew him well, loved him next to idolatry.

"He is dead; offered up as a sacrifice upon the altar of duty. He died the victim of a corrupt system, but he did not die in vain. For, although there has been poured out upon the streets of Tennessee's capital city, the richest and most precious blood of our State, the sacrifice is worth all the cost to the people whom he so devotedly loved and for whom he was struggling with patriotic, unselfish and fearless devotion, if only his martyrdom can accomplish the noble purposes for which he was striving and for which his life was offered up as a sacrifice.

"Let us remember that
 'They never fail who die
 In a great cause; the block may soak their gore,
 Their heads may sodden in the sun;
 their limbs
 Be strung to city gates and castle walls—
 But still, their spirit walks abroad.'

"But it is to his heart-broken, grief-stricken, desolate widow and his manly boy that this awful tragedy is freighted with the most appalling disaster. But what an inspiration and what an example has he left to his idolized son to guide and influence and inspire him through life. We can not and we would not enter into the holy sanctuary of a sacred grief. But the entire nation is in deep sympathy with widow and fatherless son in their paralyzing loss. A merciful Providence can, alone assuage their grief. We can only weep over their desolation and pour out our tears in neighborly sympathy and affection. We revere his memory. We weep over his untimely death. His monument is bullded in the heart of every true and loyal American citizen.

"Let us take up, as best we can, the consummation of his patriotic purposes, and strive until we realize their full fruition.

"If we but do our duty, as our dead friend did his, the overthrow of the political machine and of the allied and banded forces that accomplished his death is certain.

"Peace to his ashes. Honor to his memory. And woe to those who are responsible for the shedding of his priceless blood."

Mr. Hatcher kept a copy of the lines on the "Laboring Man" to which he referred and they are as follows:

"Among the noble men of earth,
 Are men whose hands are browned
 with toil;
 Who, backed by no ancestral birth
 Hew down the woods and till the soil.
 And win thereby a prouder name
 Than follows king's or warrior's fame.

"The working men, whate'er their task,
 Who carve the stone or bear the hod,
 They wear upon their honest brows
 The royal stamp and seal of God;
 And worthier are their drops of sweat
 Than diamonds in a coronet.

"God bless the noble working men;
 Who rear the cities of the plain;
 Who dig the mines, who build the ships,
 And drive the commerce of the main!
 God bless them; for their toiling hands
 Have wrought the glory of all lands!"

ADDRESS OF CONGRESSMAN

L. P. PADGETT.

At the memorial services on Sunday to the memory of Senator Carmack, Congressman Padgett spoke as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:
 "I shall not detain you at great length. You have already listened to two tributes more eloquent than I can hope to speak.

"Edward W. Carmack is dead. His murdered body rests in our soil. God and temperance still live. Forward! March! We are here today to pay a just tribute of respect to the memory of ex-Senator Carmack. I wish I were able to speak a tribute which his merits deserve. The poverty of my language deprives me of the opportunity and privilege of speaking in praise of him as my heart wishes.

"I have known Mr. Carmack for many years—since we were young men together. We have been associated in very pleasant relations. In social life, as attorneys at law practicing at the same bar and in the same office. We were associated in our work for six years in the Congress of the United States. Permit me a personal reference. On the eleventh day of November, 1880, he was one of my groomsmen at my marriage in the First Methodist church. On the 11th day of November, 1908, in the same church, I was one of the great multitude attending his funeral, with sad heart and bereaved soul honoring his memory and lamenting his sad death. Through all these years I can testify that Mr. Carmack was a true man in the noblest and best sense of the word. He was a man of ability—possessed of a great intellect capable of grasping understandingly the great questions involving his country's weal or woe and affecting for good or ill the peace, prosperity and happiness of his fellow men. He had a great heart, in sympathy with mankind, responding at all times to the needs of humanity. Broad in his sympathies, tender in his affections, true in his convictions, firm and steadfast for the right and comprehensive in his conceptions of public questions and his duties to his country he espoused the cause which he believed was for the betterment and uplift of humanity. He was an honest and an honorable man—a man of integrity and nobility of character. His honor and his honesty were unimpeachable. No man could approach him with a corrupt purpose and no one could question the purity or sincerity of his conviction. He was a man of convictions. He believed something and he stood by and for his beliefs and had the manly courage to battle for his convictions and the ability to present and defend them. A man of courage and convictions for right and duty.

"In his observations and experiences as a public man he had seen men in misery and debauchery—he had seen boys and young men led astray from all the virtues of manhood into degradation, corruption and crime—he had seen womanhood ruined and sorrowful and young girlhood blighted and blasted. All these things appealed to his highest sense of duty and to his high ideals of manhood and womanhood and their possibilities of good or evil; and his great heart, moved by his great intellectual conceptions, responded in behalf of humanity's good and he gave his life for his country's betterment.

"Edward W. Carmack is dead, but he still lives. From his ashes will arise inspiration and power and determination, which will nerve and strengthen the purpose and hearts of thousands; and from every hillside and in every valley in Tennessee men and women will go forth, inspired by his memory to do valiant battle to lift the young manhood and womanhood of our land to a higher, a nobler and a better plane of life and of living.

"Standing today in the shadow of his death and mindful of his character and work I verily believe he could truly have said,

"I live for those who love me

And for those who think me true,
For the God who made me

And the good that I can do."

"In conclusion let us hope that 'He who tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb' may by his love, mercy and consolation bless and comfort his bereaved ones."

ADDRESS OF HON. H. P. FIGUERS.

The following is the eulogy delivered by H. P. Figuers at the Carmack memorial services on last Sunday:

"How have the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle."

"Know ye not, that there is a Prince, and a great man fallen this lay in Israel?"

"These words were spoken three thousand years ago, by King David; the first in regard to his much loved friend, Jonathan, and the second in regard to his enemy, Abner, who had espoused the cause of the house of Saul, and who had just been assassinated as our friend and martyr was.

"On last Monday afternoon, when the news that our friend had been assassinated, was flashed over the wires, in every direction, the voices of the people from every city, town and hamlet in the State, and from our whole South land, that he loved so well, went up with an accord, 'Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man this day fallen in Israel?'

"E. W. Carmack was a great man. I deal in no mere platitude or hyperbole, when I say that, in my opinion, and that of thousands of others, Ned Carmack was the greatest man that Tennessee has ever produced. From the hall of memory I have examined and passed in review, the names of Tennessee's great men; those that were to the manor born, and those that were sons by adoption. I have not overlooked the names of Jackson, Polk, Johnson, Bell, Haskell, Gentry and others, all great men, but our hero and martyr had more of the elements of greatness than any of them, measured by the standard of greatness, as recognized by the enlightened world today.

"Many of these worthies were great in some particular point of character. Carmack had every element of character to make him superbly great. He had a splendid intellect, unflinching moral courage and an undaunted and chivalric physical courage. With these elements of character, he was a formidable antagonist for all people opposed to civic righteousness. No wonder they feared him, and desired his removal from the State.

"He had the intellect to discover, and the courage to expose the machinations of the evil ones in the State. He is not dead but only at rest. His spirit is yet abroad in the land. He laid the foundation and the temple will now be built—a temple more enduring than brass or marble.

"He lives in the beauty of his unselfish and patriotic example. He exists in the grateful remembrance of his co-temporaries. The flashes from his great life will penetrate far into the darkness of the future. Mothers, in Tennessee, will teach their children, yet unborn, to hush his name with love and reverence; and pausing underneath the shadow of the monument, to be erected, say, this is in memory of a noble martyr, who gave his life for the homes of the women and children of the land.

"The workmen perish, but the work goes on, and Carmack like one of old, will accomplish more in his death than in his life. Let us be true to carry on to completion the work so masterfully begun by him.

"Ned Carmack was a great Statesman. He was not a politician. He knew nothing of the tricks and demagoguery of the politician. He was a close student, and with his matchless intellect, studied the institutions of his country. He mastered the constitution and laws as a science, and this is why he was at all times a potent factor in the national halls of legislation. It was this that made him the equal of any man, in debate, in both houses of Congress; and made them respect him as a man of unusual ability.

"When he was first elected to Congress, his seat was contested by a man of much ability. The house was largely Republican, and his opponent was more nearly in alignment with that party than Carmack.

"He made the argument for himself. That speech is a recognized classic. It abounded in flashes of pathos, wit, humor, invective, and, at times, irresistible eloquence, and logic. His speech won his seat. From that day he was recognized as the peer of any man in that branch of Congress, composed of men of national reputation.

"I was in the Senate Gallery several years ago, and a party, who was pointing out to me the prominent Senators, said to me, if you remain here long enough you will discover that Mr. Carmack is greatly admired by his brother Senators. While other men are making speeches only a few listen. Other Senators may be seen reading, writing or walking about, but when it is known that Carmack is going to speak, there is not a vacant seat, and every Senator listens to what he has to say. Several prominent Senators have said that he was the ablest man in the Senate—the greatest body of men on earth.

"His editorial career has been as phenomenal as his political life. He did not think or write along the lines of the ordinary newspaper editors. He had a large vocabulary and his writings were marked with originality and an unusual brilliancy. He had an extraordinary and forceful way of saying things that was very attractive and convincing.

"He was as great in the lecture field as the other two. His lecture on "Character" has been pronounced, by competent judges, to be one of the greatest productions of our time. It should be printed in enduring form and placed in the hands of the boys and girls of the State.

"I have read all of the encomiums that have been pronounced by loving and admiring friends, and I endorse them every one, but I cannot let this opportunity pass and not say a word in regard to his stricken and heart-broken widow.

"I have known her since she was a small child, playing with her pet lamb in her father's yard. She was a sweet and gentle child; a charming young girl and woman, and beloved by all who met her.

"Her marriage with Ned Carmack was the turning point in his life. Her sweet and gentle nature; her pure and exalted devotion to him, and the family; her good common sense and correct judgment; her holy life, every day; her sublime faith in God were all potent factors in developing his life into the great man he was. He was justly proud of his noble wife. The dear little boy will not like for proper training under her care. May God bless him.

"I agree with Mr. Cave when he said there is no grander type of womanhood in the State.

"One incident, and I close. Just after his defeat for Governor, one afternoon he dropped into my office and we had a long conversation over the situation. He was rather depressed over his defeat and was telling me of several offers that were open to him.

"I said, 'Ned the speeches you have made, the splendid campaign you have conducted over the State, the work you have done this year will bear fruit and accomplish good long after you are gone.' He remained thoughtful for a moment, and then said 'Figurs, if I could know for a certainly, upon a given day, that my boy could not find an open saloon in Tennessee in which he could enter, I would that day willingly die."

ADDRESS OF HON. J. H. DINNING.

At the memorial service to Senator Carmack on Sunday, Hon. J. H. Dinning spoke as follows:

"In Collier's of last week was a specially striking picture by Remington, 'The Warrior's Last Ride,' depicting the slow and solemn procession, accompanying the Indian warrior slain in battle, back to his home where friends and loved ones could pay to him the last sad rites due to the honored dead. Almost at the same time another sad and heartbroken procession, through the historic streets of Columbia, were receiving their dead, not slain in honorable battle, but assassinated with a smile of greeting on his lips.

"We have laid our dead away, and through our tears we can but see that today the city of Columbia is the cynosure of the nation, because the nation is anxious to see how we, the neighbors and friends of Senator Carmack demean ourselves on this occasion. It is a source of great pleasure, I am sure, to every one of this audience that these proceedings have been marked by such perfect feeling and moderation. For our dead belongs to us and yet does not belong to us alone. In every hamlet of his native state to day, there are eyes that are moist and hearts that are heavy. In every state in the Union, strong men grow husky when they think of Ned Carmack and his fate. He had no favors to bestow, no offices to fill; he had occupied high position, but poverty claimed him as her own; it was because he filled the full stature of a man that the nation stands today appalled.

"What were some of the elements that made him great? I had known of his greatness as an editor when he first began his splendid career. I shall never forget the awe I felt as a school boy when I first saw him in a University recitation room, in the midst of his onerous demands as editor, day after day discussing questions of the higher economics with a university professor. I thought then that a man who could take time for that sort of thing while at the same time he was dazzling the State as an editor, would go far in the race of life. In daring impetuosity and brilliancy of argument, he fairly rivaled Blaine, against his personal integrity there was never breathed the faintest suspicion. As a statesman, says Savoyard, he took higher rank than any other one term senator since the establishment of the Republic, except possibly David B. Hill of New York, and Benjamin Harvey Hill of Georgia. As a friend and a comrade, he reflected the best traditions of the old time South, and of him could it be said as Webster said of Calhoun, that nothing little or mean ever came near his hand or heart.

"We have laid his body to sleep with the flowers, guarded by the everlasting sentinels of the sky. If his spirit could be with us this afternoon, as perhaps it is, he would tell us to love the cause for which he gave his life, and to give our selves more fully to the salvation of the state that he loved. For while he loved his country as a whole, the truest instincts of his being were only evoked, when he reflected upon the South that had loved him, and especially Tennessee, the land of mountain and of glade, of forest and of mead. With the burning eloquence of a Savonarola and the unselfish devotion of a Havelock, he fought my fight and yours, and I call upon every element of manhood in this downtrodden state to carry on the fight he has so well begun. And when the heart grows faint and courage fails, we will stand again beside his silent tomb, and reinvigorated with that consecrated dust, like Antaeus old, we shall regain our strength and more.

"With Tennyson we can say:
 "Hark! the Dead march wails in the people's ears;
 The dark crowd moves; there are sobs and tears;
 The black earth yawns; the mortal disappears,
 Ashes to ashes—dust to dust.
 He is gone who seemed so great,
 Gone; but nothing can bereave him,
 Of the force he made his own,
 Being here, and we believe him
 Something far advanced in state,
 And that he wears a truer crown.
 Than any wreath than man can weave him.

Speak no more of his renown,
 Lay your earthly fancles down,
 And in the vast cathedral leave him,
 God accept him, Christ receive him."

ADDRESS OF HON. JAS. A. SMISER.

At the memorial services in honor of Senator Carmack on Sunday afternoon, Hon. James A. Smiser spoke as follows:

"Among those who have come today to pay a tribute to the memory of our beloved friend, I, perhaps, with few exceptions, have known him longer, if not better, than most of those present, for my association with him began in life's morning march when his bosom was young."

"One morning in the early seventies my father carried me over to the village of Culleoka to enter me as a pupil in the famous Webb Brothers' Training School. Among the first boys with whom I became acquainted during the recess hour was a boy somewhat older than myself. He was the same boy whom I had seen that morning when I arrived, standing in the center of a group of boys who seemed to be greatly amused at something he was telling them. He was not a large boy. He was not very prepossessing. His hair was red and disheveled. His eyes a light blue. His face was oval and covered with freckles. He wore a broad brimmed straw hat. He was without his coat. He was barefooted, and his pants were rolled up.

"He was not so good looking, I thought, nor so well dressed as some of the other boys, but there was something about him that made me wonder who he was, and why it was the boys liked so much to be with him. In a short time I found myself a member of this same company of boys. I did not then, as now, know exactly why, except that it always seemed that there was more fun where he was.

"As the days and months passed by I grew more and more to be entertained in his companionship, and I distinctly recall that on many occasions when the boys were weary of the games, we would gather around him and demand a speech. On these occasions there was always a crowd of anxious listeners, whom he entertained in royal fashion with his peculiar wit and mimicry, and many a time did we make the welkin ring in loud applause occasioned by his well directed thrusts.

"He was full of life, and buoyancy, and hope; and he made those around him share his joys. It seemed natural, and quite the thing to do, to follow him and carry out his plans of boyish sport.

"But it was not all fun there, for this was a school where every boy had hard and arduous labor to perform, and he was no exception to the rule. There were lessons to be learned, and with that same energy and desire to lead, he applied himself to the task and took front rank among his fellows. A few years of hard work there gave him the basis for that broader knowledge and riper experience which in after years he attained. As he grew up he was a leader among the boys, as in after years he was a leader among men. His natural characteristics showed no taint of deceit, no littleness of soul, no unfair dealing. He was bold, aggressive, open, free-hearted, generous and just alike to friend and foe.

"He was popular among the boys, and while there were sometimes antagonisms, there were few indeed which he could not out-wit or subdue without an open rupture. He was not quarrelsome, and I remember but few occasions when he ever had a personal quarrel or fight with any of the boys, but every boy in the school knew that he was not a coward. They believed that he was brave, and indeed he was.

"When he left this school, to begin, a little later, the struggle in life's real battles, he carried with him the love, respect and admiration of the teachers and of every school-fellow whom he had known, many of whom in the years to come were to be his true and trusted allies in the warfare which he waged on sin and vice. And now I come today to add my testimony not only to the power and genius of his intellect, but also to the kindness of his nature, to the loyalty of his devotion, to the sincerity of his purposes, to the courage of his heart, and to the true nobility of his character during these earlier years of his life.

"These are the characteristics which shaped the course of his life. They were the guiding stars, the compass, by which he steered his bark through the dark and tempestuous seas of political turmoil. They directed and controlled the powers of his intellect and will; and whether in the private walks of life or in the broader field of public endeavor, they guided him unerringly to Truth and Justice.

"After leaving school he began life in this city, where he studied law and for some years practiced his chosen profession. During these years he impressed the people of this community with the brilliancy of his mind, with the genial fellowship of his heart and with the sterling character of his integrity. But a broader field of usefulness and honor awaited him, and from the bar he transferred his efforts to the editor's chair. Here his resplendent powers of mind soon impressed upon a great State the force of his genius. He was of the Jeffersonian school and he preached Democracy pure and undefiled. His party in the State had begun to drift away from its moorings, and it was largely through his efforts that it was brought back within its true limitations. During all these years he was a profound student of the civil and political history of his State and Nation. He became familiar with the fundamental principles of government, ample evidence of which may be found in his public writings and speeches.

"He espoused the cause of the people against the great and powerful combinations of wealth and corporate interests, and with the zeal of a devoted heart he stood between them and its encroachments. His achievements along this line marked him as a statesman of the highest rank and a patriot who stood above the paltry power of pelf.

"But he was a reformer, as well as a statesman and patriot, waging a relentless war on vice and corruption. In the city of Memphis his keen Damascus blade drove a corrupt Judge from the bench, disbarred a venal and corrupt attorney, and scattered their minions like fowl birds of prey driven into their caves and hiding places. He was now easily the foremost editor of the State, if not in the whole Southland. He was receiving the largest salary of any editor in the State. The owners of the paper desired him to advocate a policy on the currency question in which policy he did not believe, but with that same firmness and devotion to principle which characterized his life, he promptly resigned his position, although in so doing he was left without employment and without means. But he was not destined long to so remain for soon he became a member of Congress and for two successive terms added new laurels to his crown of fame. At the end of which time an admiring State elected him to the Senate of the United States. Here his genius found full scope and with the Titans of debate he proved himself the equal of the best. Though one of the youngest Senators he took front rank in this, the greatest body of Statesmen in all the world. He was respected and admired by both the Democratic and Republican members of the Senate.

"He entered public office a poor man and left it a poor man. He had no longings for wealth, and money had no temptations for him. He was true to the principles which he believed to be right, and no amount of money or offers of political preferment could swerve him from his duty. He stood like adamant against Federal encroachment upon the powers of the States. He assaulted the imperialistic tendencies of the dominant party and did much to expose and curb its unrestrained lust for power. He loved his country and he longed to see it restored to the fundamental principles of equal and exact justice to all men and special privileges for none. But it was to the people of his native State and the Southland, and to the principles and traditions that were sacred to their hearts, that claimed the deepest devotion of his soul and called for his most chivalric achievements. When these were attacked, like a young lion of the tribe of Judah he met its enemies in the open pathway with a courage that was sublime, and, while others faltered, he, with the full measure of his majestic manhood, resisted their encroachments.

"When changing political fortunes had displaced him from office, he put aside tempting offers of wealth, ease, and comfort to remain in his native State to add his influence towards the betterment of its people.

"The corrupt and damning influence of the saloon and vice had seized the reins of government and were administering its affairs. By an unholy coalition with the powers of the State the serpent of the saloon had left its trail of slime in the Capitol of our State, and had entwined its folds around the executive branch of the government and its foul breath had poisoned the whole political atmosphere. By common consent Edward Ward Carmack was chosen to lead an attack upon its power, and, if possible, to dethrone it. He undertook the task and with Spartan courage he exposed its hypocrisy and infamy. By all the means within its power, the saloon with its allied powers of vice and crime, sought to deter his exposition of its shame, but true to the trust of his plighted faith he continued his course. They threatened his very life, but it was useless. His courage was invincible. He dared to do his duty in the face of death itself. Then it was that this same corrupt power, this nameless hoard of political freebooters, determined to remove him. It was necessary, if this power was to remain in control. And so it was that he died by foul assassination according to the plan devised by the chief emissary of all that is corrupt and vile within our State. Upon its accomplishment what unspeakable horror filled the minds and hearts of the citizens of this great State. I will not recount the horrid details of his taking off. At another time and at another place this will be done by other lips more equal to the task than mine.

"Here to the home he loved so well we brought him and buried him in the Southland for which he battled, with the best powers of his being, and concerning which he said, "To that land every drop of my blood, every fiber of my being, every pulsation of my heart is consecrated forever. I was born of her womb; I was nurtured at her breast, and when my last hour shall come, I pray God that I may be pillowed upon her bosom and rocked in sleep within her tender and encircling arms."

"And when I stood beside his bler and looked upon that cold and pulseless form, and read in the lines of that noble face the courage, the integrity, and the devotion to duty written there, a thousand memories came rushing in upon me. I saw him again in boyish ardor as he stood in his circle of friends yonder in the school yard at Cullcoke, where I had first seen him in the years that are gone; I heard the shouts of his companions; I saw him in his young manhood's prime, climbing the ladder of fame. I saw him wielding an influence in his State as an editor in behalf of good order and public purity, which it 's given unto but few men to have. I saw him in the Halls of Congress fighting the battles of his people, the keen blade of his eloquence piercing the armor of the minions of corrupt power. I saw him in the Senate chamber and I heard his clarion voice as he summoned the forces of Democracy to battle for the cause of Liberty and Right. I saw him leading the fight in his native State against the powers of corruption and crime, and I saw his red plume waiving in the forefront of battle. I saw him in defeat unconquered, return and again assault the powers of vice. I watched his manly onslaught like a "Paladin" of old who fought for humanity's sake, dauntless in courage, invincible in purpose, unchecked in his high resolve. I saw him lying in the gutter pierced by the assassin's bullet. I saw him dead, dead, dead, a martyr to the cause of civic righteousness; and I said unto myself, I would rather have lived his life and died the death of a martyr and gone down to dusty death with my honor unstained by corruption, leaving a legacy to my country for an example of high endeavor, than to have been victorious and have lived a thousand lives of corruption and infamy as lived by the man who planned his death."

MONUMENT

To Commemorate Virtues of Maury's Noblest Son.

An important feature of the Memorial services at the Opera House Sunday afternoon was the appointment of a Memorial Committee embracing more than one hundred of the leading citizens of Maury county, who will have in charge the work of raising funds and erecting a monument to the memory of Senator Carmack in the public square in Columbia.

This movement is backed by almost an unanimous demand from the people of the great county of Maury and from those citizens who have gone out to other counties and other states. From all parts of Maury the word has come, "We loved and honored him; we want to erect a monument to his name and memory, one that will honor his own county and his own people," and this same word has come by word and by letter from scores and hundreds of men who knew him personally or who loved the great cause for which he was the chosen leader.

That the work of raising funds will be an easy matter goes without saying for hundreds stand ready and anxious to contribute in a greater or less degree according to their means. They say "In honoring him we honor ourselves. We saw the beginning of his public career and watch his course with pride. Supported him in his ambitions, and the county that holds his dust today never had a more brilliant or more courageous son or a truer friend. Let the county of his adoption, rich in every natural resource raise a slab to his memory fitting to his work and his character."

After the appointment of the committee of more than one hundred to take this work in hand, by motion the special committee in charge of this special feature was added to the committee of the whole. Chairman G. T. Hughes will call this committee together at an early date and will outline the work and appoint an executive committee to look after the details.

The special committee submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas Senator Edward W. Carmack on the 9th day of November, 1908, came to an untimely death in Nashville, Tennessee, therefore "Be it resolved that in the death of Senator Carmack Maury County has sustained an irreparable loss and the State one of its ablest statesmen,

"Be it further resolved that as a tribute to the memory of Senator Carmack the citizens of Maury county shall cause to be erected on the Public Square in Columbia, Tennessee, a suitable monument, commemorative of the life and character of their distinguished fellow citizen;

"Be it further resolved that the following named persons shall constitute a committee to collect a suitable fund, for the erection of the monument, and while the committee will not attempt to limit the amount of any individual subscription, it is desired that as many as possible shall contribute to the fund, and therefore small amounts will be received by the Committee.

"Respectfully submitted,
JNO. W. FRY,

COLUMBIA WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN

TEMPERANCE UNION MEMORIAL

At a largely attended meeting of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union Nov. 13 a resolution was introduced by Miss Lula Figuers to have the Tennessee Woman's Christian Temperance Union memorialize the National Union to make Senator Carmack's birthday a red-letter day of their calendar.

The motion of Mrs. E. P. Turner to erect a public drinking fountain in this city to the memory of Senator Carmack met with the hearty approval of all. A committee was appointed to confer with the men's memorial movement and definite action is deferred as some thought it better to unite in one memorial and others wished to have a distinct tribute from the W. C. T. U. to the peerless leader of temperance. Amid the tears of all, the president, Mrs. T. N. Figuers, read in conclusion with deep feeling the beautiful poem of Mr. Rice, "The Chief."

The following beautiful tribute was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas Senator Edward Ward Carmack, a martyr to his convictions; because of his dauntless courage and intense earnestness; because he stood fearlessly for civic righteousness against political corruption; because he led the fight of the home against the iniquitous liquor traffic; fell, on Monday, Nov. 9, a victim to the assassins' weapon, therefore be it resolved:

"1. That we, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Columbia, while we are in tears at the awful tragedy that has taken one of our noblest and truest friends and leaders; while our hearts are filled with sorrow and gloom over the untimely loss of the champion of the womanhood and manhood of our State; it is a solace to our bleeding hearts to pay tribute to his nobility and sincerity of character, to a man of physical and moral courage, to a man whose guide was the voice of duty.

"2. That we recognize that he was a man of tremendous force and honesty, of splendid mentality, of matchless power and eloquence in the forum of his country. His removal is an irreparable loss to the state, to the South and to the nation, where he was ever a fighter and truly he has not fought in vain' for a higher plane of public morals. 'Greater love hath no man than this that a man lay down his life for his friends.'

"3. That we pray for forgiving hearts; may we lay earthly animosities aside; may we renew our strength to carry on the fight, though our gallant chief has fallen; may he speak to thousands of hearts who will bear the standard of righteousness to victory.

"4. That we of his home town are peculiarly bound by strong bonds of friendship; that we have been permitted to know more intimately the kindness of his heart, the gentleness of his nature, the sincerity of his purpose, the devotion to his home. That we are thankful that his life has touched ours, inspired us and renewed the earnestness of men everywhere. The state, the nation is better because he has lived.

"5. That to the noble and bereaved wife, to the manly son we extend our sincerest, deepest sympathy. May God comfort and sustain them in their sorrow and may they remember that the love and sympathy of thousands of hearts goes out to them.

"6. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Mrs. Carmack, be spread upon the records of the Union and published in the city papers.

"MRS. R. G. COX,

"MISS CAROLINE WILLIAMS,
"Committee."

THE CHIEF

By GRANTLAND RICE.

THE Chief is fallen! So the Troop
 Today rides slowly;
 Sad heads bend low—broad shoulders droop
 Where Death lies holy;
 And there are tears in weary eyes
 As rain from winter's weeping skies
 Where every sobbing southwind sighs
 A requiem lowly.

THE Chief is fallen! Halt the Guard
 For voiceless prayer:
 Love's last pale lilies crown the sward
 Above him there:
 And through the lonesome pines that sway
 Above his rose-crowned Rest today
 Life's lost winds whisper on their way
 Love's deep despair.

WHAT was the crime for which he died
 In unfair fight?
 Foul Crime! He dared through Faith and Pride
 To stand for Right!
 And so by coward heart and hand
 "Shot in the back"—he leaves his band—
 A shadow in the Lonesome Land
 Of starless night.

SHAME crowns the State where, thrown away,
 Sad honor weeps;
 But blood shall call for blood the day
 That Justice sleeps;
 The hurt—the heart-ache and the the tears
 Shall know no end through endless years,
 Nor dim, as Life's deep twilight nears
 And Darkness creeps.

"O Captain! Captain! From the wall
 The bugles blare;
 Wake, Captain! Wake! Your Troopers call
 In dull despair;
 They wait for you by hill and stream—
 Their dripping sabres flash and gleam—
 O Captain! Captain! Must you dream
 Forever there?"

"THE roll call, Captain, of the Troop—

Your comrades wait;
 Until you come their proud heads droop,
 All desolate;
 They may not give their chargers speed
 Without their Bean Sabreur to lead—
 Their Paladin in time of need
 To storm the gate."

"SEE—in the east Dawn's crimson glow
 Has brought back Day;
 Up, Captain, up—we need you so
 To lead the way;
 Look—through the mists the sunbeams shine
 Along the steel that arms your line"—
 God of the World! He gives no sign—
 No word to say.

NO answer now from white lips pressed
 And unreplying;
 Still hands upon a silent breast
 Forever lying;
 But out from God's white land of light—
 Beyond the Field—beyond the Fight—
 His clear voice rings across the Night
 With strength undying.

THE Chief is fallen! But the Flag
 In rippling roll
 Waves proudly. Let no Trooper lag
 Of stalwart soul;
 Up! Boot and Saddle! To the Fray!
 And in the mad, wild charge today
 God pity him who blocks the way
 Or bars the goal!

CARMACK'S PLEDGE TO THE SOUTH

The South is a land that has known sorrows; it is a land that has broken the ashen crust and moistened it with tears; a land scarred and riven by the plowshare of war and billowed with the graves of her dead; but a land of legend, a land of song, a land of hallowed and heroic memories.

To that land every drop of my blood, every fiber of my being, every pulsation of my heart is consecrated forever.

I was born of her womb; I was nurtured at her breast, and when my last hour shall come, I pray God that I may be pillowed upon her bosom and rocked in sleep within her tender and encircling arms.

—(From speech in the House of Representatives, U. S.)

CARMACK'S TRIBUTE TO WOMAN.

It is not the throned and sceptered king, it is not the dark statesman with his midnight lamp, it is not the warrior grimed with smoke and stained with blood, it is the queen of the home who under God rules the destinies of this world. There is the center from which radiates the light that never fades. For I say to you the sweetest wisdom of this world is a woman's counsel and the purest altar from which human prayer ever went to heaven is a mother's knee.
