WILLIAM SHARP

ENGRAVER

IF a school of art may be said to secure a foundation and attain a positive existence, when its disciples, striking out a new path, follow it successfully step by step, and gradually develop all its intrinsic merits, then we may safely say, that the English school of engraving sprang into being when the mezzotinto method was introduced into that country.

This new manner of engraving, practiced but little on the Continent, seems to have been at once appropriated by the English engravers; for to use the words of John Evelyn, who published the secret in the year 1662, having received it from Prince Rupert, to whom it was imparted by the inventor, Ludwig von Siegen, "it set so many artists to work that they soon arrived to that perfection it is since come, emulating the tenderest miniatures."

In their hands, beginning with John Smith and George White (two good English names), the resources of this style were so fully brought out that it came to be called the English method, and even in our own day, the engravers in mezzotinto of England hold the same relative position in the art, as those who practiced it in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. What this development has been is sufficiently proved by a mere allusion to the works of such men as McArdell, Houston, Earlom, Pether, Green and Murphy, of the last century; and Say, Hodges, Ward, Turner and Cousins, of the present.

Previous to this time (1662), and even up to the beginning of the last century, the line engravers of England, limited almost entirely to portraiture, produced but little (with the exception of those admirable artists, Hollar and Faithorne) of sufficient merit or consequence to stand the test of the ripened judgment of the connoisseur of the present day. But the eighteenth century witnessed the perfection of a branch, to the English practitioners, of which we are indebted for some of the finest productions of the art. Francis Vivares, John Browne, William Woollett and others, have left us works which have never been surpassed, and place the landscape engravers of the English school at the head of all others. Not but that the Continental schools have produced individual examples of great excellence, but such are only isolated cases, not sufficient, of themselves, to overcome the aggregate talent of the English.

But the salient point of this period, and one revealing the fullest strength of the English school of line engraving, is found in the works of its historical engravers, the principal of whom, it is our purpose to particularly notice, whose works, for simple dignity, force and directness of purpose, have rarely, if ever, been equalled. We allude to William Sharp, the greatest historical engraver that England has yet produced.

William Sharp was born in London, on the 29th day of January, 1749. Evincing at an early age, an inclination to drawing, his father, a gun-maker, of some repute, determined to qualify him for that branch of engraving, which he deemed the most important, the ornamenting of fire-arms.

He was accordingly apprenticed to a Mr. Longmate, who practiced this species of engraving, technically termed bright engraving, from the attention being drawn to the work; and not to impressions taken from it, by filling the incisions with ink.

At the expiration of his engagement, and with this limited preparation for prosecuting the art beyond mere business purposes,—having in the meantime married a French woman,—he commenced for himself.

The early efforts of a man of talent are always interesting, but in the case of the subject of our notice, they become of more than usual importance, inasmuch as there is no evidence of his having at any time received any positive or actual instruction in the higher walks of his profession. He may be classed among those who have worked themselves into distinction by their native powers of observation, perseverance and industry, the progress towards excellence being regular and certain. The varied powers exhibited in his works show a constant desire for improvement, and great freedom from the constraint of any regular manner or school. He was the founder of his own style, the intelligent pupil of his own labor and experience.

His first attempts at engraving for the purpose of taking impressions therefrom, were two business cards, designed for attracting attention to his regular vocation. The one a vignette of an angel seated among clouds, wearing a wreath of laurel, and holding a circular tablet, on which is inscribed "Sharp, Engraver, No. 9 Bartholomew Lane, Royal Exchange, London;" the other a small oval, consisting of two figures, one standing, the other seated on a cloud, a wreathed circle is between them, bearing the same inscription as the former, and on a ribbon which they hold "History, Ornamental Writing, Seals, &c." Both of these cards are well engraved.

His next essay is of much greater interest, both as an evidence of his desire to become something more than an engraver of dog collars, and door and card plates, and as being the first real step towards superior art. It is a quarto plate, published 1775, and from his own drawing, of an old lion "Hector," well known at the time as an inmate of the tower of London, the prints from which being exposed for sale in his shop window, attracted considerable notice, and sold moderately well. The drawing offers no evidence of future ability, but the engraving is well done, and shows considerable command of the burin.

Encouraged by the sale of the "Hector" print, he was induced to relinquish his original calling, and seeking more eligible quarters, moved to the neighborhood of Vauxhall, where he began to engrave small plates for book publishers, thus commencing his career as an artist, a career in which, in the words of a contemporary writer, "he performed some of those grand and laborious works, which will long remain an honor to himself, his art and his country." At this period of his life he is described as a well-formed, well-looking man, inclining to corpulence, laboring zealously in his profession, fond of out door exercise, and indulging in daily ablutions in the Thames, being a strong and expert swimmer. For neighbor and occasional associate he had John Browne, the distinguished landscape engraver.

The first plate to bring him into notice, as an historical engraver, was that of "Alfred the Great, dividing his loaf with the Pilgrim," after Benjamin West, executed for, and published by Alderman Boydell, in 1782. It has considerable merit, shows good drawing—it is said he was instructed in this branch by West—and is well engraved, yet scarcely prepares one for the admirable production of two years later, the "Lucretia" after Dominichino, also published by Boydell.

The "Lucretia" is a splendid example of the art, executed in the firmest, freest, and broadest manner, every stroke clear and distinct, not a line too much, not a line too little. Carefully and laboriously engraved, yet free from all appearance of mechanism, and so consecutive in all its parts, that it seems almost to be the production of a single sitting. It was a fit prelude to his great work of the following year, 1785, "The Doctors of the Church," after Guido Reni.

The picture formerly in the Houghton gallery, now in the Imperial gallery at St. Petersburg, painted for Paul V., represents the four Latin Doctors of the Church, St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine and St. Gregory, arguing and consulting their great books for the authorities on the subject of the favorite doctrine of the Catholic Church, the "Immaculate Conception," which was confirmed by that Pope in a bull issued in 1617; with them are presented St. John Damascene and St. Ildefonso, who were especial defenders of the doctrine.

This picture, painted in Guido's early and more powerful manner, was eminently suited to the innate vigor of the engraver, and his translation of it is a work of art in its truest sense. Every part of it is managed with the most consummate skill, and in the finest keeping; the drapery well and nobly arranged, the deep thought and character of each head admirably rendered, the anatomy most carefully developed, and the drawing perfect; a profound sense of meditation pervades the whole, well fitting the character of the scene. Sharp considered it his best work.

It forms the cap-piece of his reputation; and well might Raphael Morghen say to its engraver, after exhibiting the choice, reserved proofs of his own numerous fine productions, well might he say, as he drew from his folio an impression of the justly celebrated plate, "And now, Mr. Sharp, I will show you a print which is equal to anything I ever did in my life!" It is something when one artist can appreciate the work of another; but we know that the Italian never produced its equal.

The exquisite little oval print of this time, 1786, "The Children in the Wood," after a drawing by Benwell, of which he engraved the figures, the landscape being engraved by Byrne and Medland, deserves more than a passing notice, not alone for its merits, but for exhibiting a power of adaptation as well to his subject as to the treatment of his co-workers. The figures of the two children asleep in a close wood are most carefully and delicately engraved, in a manner suited to their youth and innocence, as it is to the fine sentiment and execution of the landscape, and did we not know otherwise, the same hand would seem to have produced the whole plate.

While thus constantly employed and establishing his reputation as an engraver, he became dissatisfied with the remuneration which he received from the print dealers, and becoming possessed of some property, by the decease of a brother, he began to publish his own works. Soon afterwards about the year 1787, that date appearing on his print of "Zenobia," he moved to a larger house in Charles street, near the Middlesex hospital.

This print, a profile after a picture, by Michael Angelo, in the possession of Sir Joshua Reynolds at the time of the engraving, is one of the best efforts of the engraver. It shows a wonderful command of the burin, and is fully up to the most exacting demands of the art. Every portion of it, the flesh, the head attire, the decorations are executed in the most appropriate manner and with the utmost taste and ability, while the calm dignity of the illustrious queen is most happily rendered. Nothing is slighted, nothing forgotten, and we are told that it was a great favorite of the engraver himself.

It was about this time—the removal to Charles street—that the even tenor of his life was disturbed, and the serenity of his mind became unsettled, with those singular hallucinations regarding the prophet Richard Brothers, and the folly, if not crime, of Joanna Southcott. The delusion of this lunatic Brothers consisted in imagining that he was divinely appointed to gather the Jews together and to lead them on their predestined march to recover Jerusalem. Sharp engraved his portrait, with rays of light descending upon his head and with the title of 'Prince of the Hebrews,' the sincerity of his belief in the rhapsodies of the prophet is made manifest by the sentence inscribed beneath, 'Fully believing this to be the man whom God has appointed I engrave his likeness, William Sharp.' The would-be Prophet however died in a mad-house leaving his mission unaccomplished.

In his belief in the pretensions of Joanna Southcott, he was not alone, for it is said that at one period the number of her converts in London, and its vicinity, amounted to upwards of a hundred thousand. She was a woman of humble parentage, born in 1750, and when about forty years of age, being carried away by the fervor of a heated imagination, gave herself out as the woman mentioned in the 12th Chapter of the Book of Revelation. In this her assumed capacity, although in the highest degree illiterate, she scribbled much mystic and unintelligible nonsense in the way of vision and prophecy, and for a while carried on a lucrative trade in the sale of seals, which were, under certain conditions, to secure the salvation of the purchasers. Her followers became very enthusiastic, but about the close of the year 1814, the time of her death, she herself began to have misgivings, during some comparatively lucid intervals, in which she declared that 'if she was deceived, she was convinced she had at all events been the sport of some spirit either good or evil.'

Sharp engraved her portrait from his own drawing, and is said to have believed in her till the day of his death. She is represented sitting, with an open book before her, and wears a large bonnet, somewhat different in shape and size from the female headgear of the present day. There is a complacent, self-satisfied look in her broad and fleshy countenance, while the eye has an unmistakable expression of low cunning.

The last survivor of the followers of Joanna Southcott, a certain Mrs. Peacock, on whom the mantle of the propheticess was supposed to have fallen, died quite recently at the advanced age of one hundred and three years.

The simplicity of his nature which brought him under the influence of these delusions, served him however to much better advantage on a certain and rather important occasion, and relieved him from an unpleasant, and at that time, dangerous predicament. Dabbling a little (it could be no more) in the politics of Thomas Paine and Horne Tooke—both of whose portraits he engraved—he was brought before the members of the privy council as one suspected of entertaining revolutionary principles. During his examination, being vexed at what to him seemed irrelevant questions, he handed to Pitt and Dundas the prospectus of a work which Tooke had in contemplation, requesting them to have the goodness to put their names to it as subscribers, and then to give it to the other members of the council to add theirs. A hearty laugh at the singularity of the proposal ensued, and he was soon after liberated.

From the great number of portraits that are being daily, nay hourly produced, a large proportion of which it must be admitted are very common place, the majority of observers, not reflecting that it is given but to few to attain excellence, fall into the error of supposing that portrait painting is an inferior branch of the art. Now the exact reverse is the truth, for when properly understood and prosecuted it is one of the highest. The portrait painter, to be successful, must be a close observer of nature, possess a keen insight into mind and character, and a faculty to perceive and, when perceived, to express all those little indications and traits of temperament and habit which, when transferred to the canvass, impress us with a full sense of individuality.

All the great painters of history were fine portrait painters, and their portraits are prized not wholly as admirable examples of painting, but also as exponents of life and character, each furnishing as it were by masterly interpretations, an epitome of humanity, an easily read page of history.

Thus something more is needed than dexterous management of material; mind must seek mind, so that the "ruling passion" may be discovered and expressed. If such are the elements of portrait painting, and if such are the requisites of a portrait painter, must not the translator possess in a degree, corresponding faculties, in order to enable him to convey in his language, that which the painter expresses in his, the original.

Portrait engraving is the most usually practiced form of the art, but portrait engraving, when prosecuted according to these rules, and with this intelligence is one of the highest branches of the art, and in this William Sharp stands unrivalled in the English, and the equal of the best portrait engravers of any school.

His earliest dated portrait (1777), is a small circular plate of Alderman George Faulkner, very roughly executed; but his very earliest, judging from the work itself, is an unfinished one of Dr. Samuel Johnson, still smaller. It is engraved in the very rudest manner, without any attempt at middle tint or regularity of line, yet preserves some indications of resemblance to the well known features of the famous lexicographer.

Of the large portraits engraved by Sharp, two are always especially referred to and quoted as fine examples, both of the art and the artist. The 'John Hunter,' of the year 1788, and 'Matthew Boulton,' of 1801.

The former painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds, represents the eminent surgeon and distinguished anatomist, seated at a table in an easy and natural position, in the act of inditing a manuscript, the head slightly raised, with the eyes turned upwards as in thought. With the exception of the hand holding the pen, the broken lines of which seem scarcely satisfactory, every part of this plate is executed in the very best manner, the drawing perfect, every line in its proper place to give character and expression, the face and hair being most delicately engraved. The striking characteristic of the work being the faithful rendering of 'the pale cast of thought,' which makes the countenance one not easily forgotten. The late Charles Sumner, a great lover and excellent judge of prints, terms this 'the foremost portrait in English art, and the coëqual companion of the great portraits of the past.'

The latter 'Matthew Boulton,' after a painting by Sir William Beachey, represents that celebrated engineer, also seated, a three-quarter length, with a medallion portrait in one hand, and an examining glass in the other. This is engraved with a broader line, and in a more vigorous manner than the former, eminently adapted to the character and personality of the successful manufacturer and active partner of James Watt, the distinguished improver of the steam engine. As in the John Hunter, every part of the plate is carefully engraved and skilfully managed, conveying the idea of a strong, healthy organization, coupled with the markings of firmness and self reliance, traits of character which he must have possessed. Well do these works deserve the esteem in which they are held, each different, yet each remarkable in its way.

Sharp had some eccentric notions on the subject of physiognomy. He advanced the singular doctrine that every man's countenance had depicted on it the appearance of some bird or beast, to the character of which his natural disposition bore a resemblance. Thus in those whose dispositions were generous and courageous, he fancied he could discover the likeness of a lion ; in those who were fierce, he saw that of tigers or eagles, whilst the timid and hesitating betrayed the characteristics of the milder and more gentle type of animals. He made no scruple in the personal appropriation of these resemblances, and his comparisons were sometimes highly amusing.

Besides the two large portraits already mentioned, there are others of the same size, quite, if not equal in merit. Of these that of 'The Right Reverend Samuel Seabury, D. D.' Bishop of Connecticut, after Thomas Spence Duché, published in 1786, is of interest as being the portrait of the first Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the United States, painted by the son of the Reverend Jacob Duché, so well remembered for his course during our revolutionary struggle. The Bishop, a half-length in robes, is standing with his left hand extended, as if speaking, while his right rests easily on a closed Bible placed on some rocks, the back ground being made up of a landscape. It is executed in Sharp's best manner, and is a splendid specimen of portrait engraving.

We may cite also that of 'The Right Hon. Robert Dundas, President of the Court of Session,' after Raeburn, published 1790, with the one of a few years later of 'The Hon. John Hyde, one of the Puisne Judges of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, in Bengal,' after R. Home, in wig and gown, in which the fair complexion of the judge is most admirably rendered, and the engraving in every respect of the finest character.

Of his later period, and fully equal to anything he has done, is the 'Sir Everard Home,' after Sir William Beechy, of the year 1810, nearly a full length sitting, a masterly work; and 'Sir Francis Burdett, Bart,' after James Northcote (1811), a half length, the head and figure full of character, and the flesh tints most admirably given. It is engraved in the same manner and is as fine as the highly esteemed one of 'Matthew Boulton.'

Of his smaller portraits that of 'Kemble,' after Martin Arthur Shee, (1803), may be mentioned; and of his smallest 'The Hon. Thomas Erskine,' and 'George, Prince of Wales,' both after miniatures by Richard Cosway. The latter is an exquisite production, engraved in the most tender and delicate manner, and in a fine early impression is a perfect gem.

We close our reference to his portraits with one of exceeding interest apart from its merits as an engraving, which are of the highest order. It is from the portrait of Charles I., painted by Vandyk for the purposes of Bernini the sculptor, in which he is represented in three positions, profile, three-quarter and full face. No one can look at this print without being touched with the sorrowful cast of the countenance, and being impressed with the innocence of the unfortunate king. It is a sad, sad page of English history, brought vividly, almost painfully before us.

But it is as an historical engraver, that Sharp's great ability and varied powers are made manifest, to thoroughly comprehend which, it is only necessary to examine for a few moments his two prints, the 'Lear,' after Benjamin West, and 'The Doctors of the Church,' already referred to. No two works are more unlike, the one a representation of the absolute repose of deep thought, the other an expression of the violent action of overpowering feeling, 'the tempest of the mind.' The effect of the one rendered by the boldest exercise of line and sudden transitions of light and dark, the other indicating by careful and deliberate markings in all its parts, the absorption of reflection and absence of excitement. We have designated one as forming the cap piece of his reputation, but the 'Lear,' for vigor and originality of execution has never been surpassed, and when West insisted that it should not be engraved in the chalk manner, but in line, and by Sharp, he not only asserted the dignity of his own art, but showed a proper appreciation of the professional excellence of the engraver.

Leslie in speaking of Boydell's well known enterprise, the 'The Shakespeare Gallery,' for which the picture was painted, says 'It did also much for engraving; and, among other admirable productions, we owe to it Sharp's transcendent work from West's 'Lear,' a work showing that the power of a first-rate engraver, even of other men's designs, does not lie within the scope of mere talent; but that it is genius, and of a higher order than that displayed by many a painter, who looks upon engravers as artists much below him.'

For pictorial qualities as well as an example of Sharp's wonderful executive ability, the print of 'Diogenes in search of an honest man,' after Salvator Rosa, is justly celebrated. The rugged countenance of the old cynic is marked with all the certainty of time itself, while the flowing beard and ample drapery are engraved in the most admirable manner.

His 'St. Cecilia,' after Dominichino, though stiff and formal in its character, and displaying perhaps a little too much of the handicraft of the engraver, is nevertheless a noble production, but as a work of the painter, it fails in giving that expression of rapt inspiration which of right belongs to the countenance of one who hears 'the music which is divine.'

Quite different again in subject, but of exceeding merit as an engraving, and unsurpassed in its truth of translation, is the 'Head of Christ,' after a remarkable painting by Guido. The picture, or rather sketch in oil—in possession of Benjamin West at the time of the engraving—is said to have been produced with unprecedented and almost incredible rapidity. It represents the Saviour, crowned with thorns, the hair thick and clammy with sweat and blood, drops of which have fallen upon his breast; the expression which is most wonderfully translated in the engraving, is that of resignation under agony. 'Behold! and see if there be any sorrow like unto his sorrow.' The varied manner of line, the deep rich tone so ably imparted, and the entire handling, evincing the fullest sympathy with the subject, make this an extraordinary production, in which the engraver has carried his art to its highest development, and completest purpose.

Other well known works are the 'Infant

Christ' after Annibale Carracci ; the large plate of 'The Holy Family,' after Sir Joshua Reynolds ; 'The Witch of Endor,' after Benjamin West ; and the smaller but very beautiful one of 'The Virgin and Infant Saviour,' after Carlo Dolci.

His largest plates are 'The Sortie made by the Garrison of Gibraltar,' after John Trumbull, most of the heads in which are elaborate portraits, and 'The Siege and Relief of Gibraltar,' after J. S. Copley ; the former has been pronounced one of the finest historical engravings of modern events that has ever been executed.

But to specify Sharp's best works, is simply to enumerate all, and a selection is either a matter of taste or a choice of subject. Few engravers have been so equal, yet so varied, few translators so true, yet so original.

His professional fame was widely spread even in his own time, and in 1814 he was elected a member of the Imperial Academy at Vienna, and of the Royal Academy of Bavaria. Sir Joshua Reynolds offered to recommend him as an associate engraver of the Royal Academy, London, but he rejected the offer, warmly espousing the opinions of Sir Robert Strange, Woollett, Hall, and other eminent engravers who considered their art slighted by their not being allowed to become Royal Academicians.

His last important plate was the 'Mary Magdalene,' after Guido, the finished print being dated 1822, the seventy-fourth year of his age, a beautiful work which shows but little evidence of failing powers, the defective execution of the chin, and the drapery on the right shoulder being the most apparent; a large fine plate of the same year, 1822, 'The Women at the Sepulchre,' from a picture by Annibale Carracci, was left unfinished.

He died at Chiswick on the 25th day of July, 1824, and lies buried in the Church yard at that place with Hogarth and De Louthembourg, for the latter of whom, he at one time entertained much mystic reverence, for possessing as a follower of Mesmer, a half-physical, half-miraculous power of curing diseases and imparting the thoughts and sympathies of distant friends. Sharp left no descendants, his wife having died at an early period of their married life without issue.

What a singular contradiction is presented in the life and works of England's celebrated engraver, and what a forcible illustration of the alternate strength and weakness of our nature do they reveal to us. His works, are the exponents of prolonged energy and mental dignity, every line a thought, and every thought clothed in the noblest language of the art.

The life, how different! The engraver of "John Hunter" and "The Doctors of the Church," is found to be a superstitious believer in the wild prophecies of a lunatic, a blind devotee to the cunning devices of an ignorant woman. We rise from contemplating his works, feeling that we have been in communication with an earnest, honest man; our ideas have been enlarged, and our reverence for truth has been increased. We peruse the record of his life, and are saddened and humiliated with its story of weakness and credulity.

“What thin partitions sense from thought divide!”

But the life of a man of genius, the life of William Sharp, must be sought for in his works. Throughout all may be discovered a simple earnestness and determined integrity of purpose, a resolve to do that which was allotted him, and to do it well, which carries instant conviction of moral strength and purity of life; that he may have been practiced on, but could not practice on others, and that an unsuspecting faith in the honesty of his own nature, precluded him from suspecting that of others.

Long after the names of Richard Brothers and Joanna Southcott, shall have been forgotten, and the folly of their adherents remembered only with wonder and regret, will the productions of the engraver be sought for and prized, and his character as truly exhibited in them, be perceived and appreciated.

That which man feels, that only he expresses ; the truth or error which is within becomes apparent in the handiwork.

PREFACE.

The following catalogue is claimed to be a full record of the life work of "William Sharp, Engraver," whose career exemplifies in the most striking manner, the fact that talent is simply labor intelligently directed.

It was compiled with but two exceptions, the portrait of "Sir William Hamilton," and the "Entrance Ticket for a Vauxhall Regatta," from the singularly complete collection of that artist's productions in the possession of John S. Phillips, Esq., of Philadelphia, from which source most of the different states of the plates were obtained, some from one or two other collections, and a few from good authorities being included.

While not as complete in this direction, as could be wished, it may be considered reliable as far as it goes, and is thus offered to those interested in the subject, and as being really the first descriptive catalogue of the works of one whose prints must always form an important feature in every well selected general collection.

The measurements, which are in English inches, refer to the engraved portions of the plate, the margins not being included, except in one instance, which is noted.
